Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I regret to interrupt, but the hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on, by unanimous consent.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think the hon. member has been speaking for more than half an hour. She started at twenty-five minutes to five.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: My information from the table is that the hon. member has spoken for over forty minutes.

Mr. HEAPS: All I can say is, the information is wrong.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead; unanimous consent.

Miss MACPHAIL: I thank the house. I am sure we are all interested, and certainly youth is not a partisan subject. The scheme of education in Canada should be changed. I regret that we have not a department of education in the federal government. Of course we cannot have it under present conditions, but I believe the system of education has had something to do with the youth problem. Too much we have thought of education as a means of preparing a child for an easier life. Too often parents say to a child, "I want you to go to school because I do not want you ever to have to work as hard as I had to." That is a mistake. It gets many people into alleys where they do not belong and are not happy. It leads to crowding in the white-collar jobs and professions, and to a dearth of well trained tradesmen and craftsmen.

School and life have been too much isolated from each other. Youth is kept in the academic world, even those who go only as far as senior matriculation up to the age of twenty; then they are turned loose in the world of reality wholly unprepared to find their way around in that unfamiliar place. I do not think the problems of youth can be solved entirely apart from the social and economic problems of the country, but a carefully thought out youth program could do much. I commend the government for its youth training project; that is one thing which needed to be done, because it takes these young people who have no jobs or young people who want to work with their hands but do not know how to get into such work, and gives them an opportunity not only to work with their hands but to get training as well. No one who attended the meeting held in the railway committee room the other night could fail to realize the lift that not only the youth of Canada themselves but their instructors have been given by this training project. We so seldom see any real enthusiasm any more that it was a delight to feel the enthusiasm exhibited, although I must say one man from Ontario let his political enthusiasm run away with him.

There is much to be said for the youth training project. It is possibly only a beginning, only a stop-gap. It may be that a great many of these young people cannot be placed in jobs when they finish the training, but it is doing something, and it is constructive. And something constructive is so remarkable that one wants to praise it. I feel that the people of Ontario ought to bring such pressure to bear on the government of that province that they would be forced by public opinion to use the full allotment of money made available to them by the federal government. Last year I understand they used only 40 per cent, and this year they promise to use even less. Enough pressure should be brought to bear to induce even the Ontario government to cooperate with the dominion government.

Something else that could and should be done, possibly by the Department of Labour, since it has undertaken this first task, is to provide a general leisure time program for youth, unemployed and employed; youth who have more time than they can constructively use, who need physical exercise, need the happiness that comes from large numbers of youth being together. This should include gymnastics, singing, outdoor games, and at least something along the lines of handicrafts, art and dramatics. I was impressed by the picture we saw the other night of a mining camp in British Columbia. Those young men were happy together and were learning a great deal.

Since I am speaking on borrowed time I am not going to finish what I intended to say, but shall simply say that good as youth training projects and all these other things that we have been talking and thinking about are, they are not going to move fast enough to take care of all these 100,000 single unemployed, not all young, who are drifting around this country or being cared for in hostels at about ten cents a day for food, sometimes getting three meals a day and sometimes two. I cannot think of anything more terrible than the life of these drifters, going back and forth across Canada or cooped up in hostels. It is a great human wastage, and Canada cannot afford to waste 100,000 of her single unemployed.

If I had time I should like to develop that further, but in closing I shall simply say that I think we should set up camps on the order of the CCC camps in the United States. I do not think we would need to be ashamed of patterning them on the camps of another country, because they have had the experience which we could get only at great cost. I do not want military camps, but the CCC camps are not of that type. They are camps where the young men learn to work on the job. They receive lectures in relation to the work they are doing and are also offered general adult education. Almost every conceivable kind of development is offered them if they want to take it; and in addition, and perhaps more particularly, they are given good food, warm clothes and medical and dental care. They work eight hours a day, five days a week and are paid $30 a month, with from $22 to $25 going back to support their families. Instead of being weights on their families, they have become bread-winners, and the responsibility which many educators to-day claim is not a distinguishing feature of our youth has been developed.

Some other opportunity will offer itself to deal at greater length with this question, but I should like to say that I went through some of the hostels in Toronto just before I came to Ottawa to attend the session. After seeing the hopelessness on the faces of some of those men I should be surprised indeed if anyone could say they did not want to work. The men in charge say that about ten per cent of single unemployed are tubercular, and we know that delinquency is increasing rapidly. It has been said that recidivism among our prisoners now is up to about ninety per cent. They come out of gaol; they cannot find jobs, and therefore, possibly voluntarily, they commit another crime and return to prison. So, if we say we cannot afford to put these men into camps and train them, we do not count the cost we already bear for feeding them, for treatment of the tubercular, for crime and for all sorts of institutions in which a great many of them finally land. I entreat hon. members of this house to think over this problem of youth and see if we cannot do something that will touch many more than are being affected by the youth training plan, good as it is.

Mr. F. D. MacKENZIE (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, there are some comments I should like to make during this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Before going on with my remarks may I join with those who have already spoken in congratulating the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address and in expressing my appreciation of the visit which King George and Queen Elizabeth will make to Canada this year. I should like also to congratulate the two new ministers upon their appointment to cabinet positions.

I am most surprised, Mr. Speaker, to find myself in agreement with many observations made by the last speaker. Has the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) changed during the recess, or have I?

For a moment or two I should like to deal with the question of wheat. Canada is the largest wheat exporting country in the world and, as such, has felt the full force of the world wheat situation. The prairie provinces in particular have had to face extremely difficult conditions resulting from such adverse international situations as have arisen from time to time since 1929-30. The whole matter was thoroughly surveyed in a four-day conference called by Premier Bracken in Winnipeg last December. At that time it was considered that the outlook was none too promising, and if a satisfactory solution is reached it will be only by utilizing the best brains obtainable, working in conjunction with favourable natural forces and an improved international situation.

In the east I have often been asked why the western farmers did not switch from the growing of wheat to other types of farming. Sometimes the suggestion is advanced that certain shifts might be made in cropping and production practices in the prairie provinces. Let us assume that such shifts are possible; what new problems would arise in respect to markets? What would be the effect of such shifts in agriculture upon the west, upon Ontario and Quebec and upon Canada generally? I understand that this wheat problem will be brought up in the house at a later date, and probably this is one of the issues that will be discussed. In order to show what disastrous effects a sweeping change from wheat growing to dairying would have, taking that as an example, I have several tables of figures concerning the quality production of butter in all the provinces of Canada, showing by provinces the awards which have been won at the leading Canadian exhibitions. To those who are unfamiliar with the situation these figures may be startling, and they will be of great help in assisting hon. members to visualize the seriousness of the situation, especially for Ontario and Quebec, if there should be any extensive shift from wheat growing to dairying over a wide area in the prairie provinces.

I have here a summary of the percentage of first prizes won by each province exhibiting butter at the ten leading exhibitions of Canada in 1938. The figures indicate that in that year the percentage of first prizes won by Manitoba was 57·6 per cent; Saskatchewan, 2·8 per cent; Alberta, 35·2 per cent; Ontario, 2 per cent; British Columbia, 2·4 per cent. With respect to the percentage of all prizes for 1938, the figure for Manitoba was 44·6 per cent; for Saskatchewan, 2 per cent; for Alberta, 47·4 per cent; for Ontario 4·1 per cent; for Quebec, ·5 per cent, and for British Columbia, 1·4 per cent. This indicates a total percentage of first prizes for the three prairie provinces of 95·6 per cent, and a total percentage of all prizes of 94 per cent.

I might call attention also to the large number of prizes won at Canadian exhibitions by the Gladstone creamery. I have figures here which tell the story of the success of a young man named Paxton, who took over the Gladstone creamery in 1930, and whose achievements since then, right through the depression, are among the most remarkable that have come to my attention. Before I sit down to-day I hope to tell hon. members of some other stories of success on the part of young men in this country even during these hard times, over which the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and the Conservatives are weeping so much in this house.

The speech from the throne shows that the government is aware of the situation that exists at the present time and is prepared to deal with it. I remember saying to the people on the night of the election in 1935 that Canada's problems could be solved, not with ease and not by governments alone, but only by the cooperation and assistance of both governments and people. What a happy day it would be for Canada if all could work together for the common good, the employer and the employee, the merchant and the farmer and, in parliament, the government and the opposition. What a step forward it would be if this could be accomplished in parliament. What do we find here? We see the government doing what they can, always subject to criticism, fair and otherwise; and never, so far as I can remember, a practical, constructive suggestion offered except, if I may say so, from the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) last night and the hon. member who preceded me to-day. To me the whole thing seems so silly that one wonders why it has lasted so long.

At a later point in my remarks I wish to make some observations with regard to unemployment, and when the special items come up for debate I hope to take further part in that discussion. But I should like to say a word now with regard to youth training, to supplement what has been said this afternoon. I find that we can agree on at least some of these things. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and the government deserve a word of commendation for what has been done, and I am glad to see that this work is to be considerably extended. I have watched with interest and satisfaction the progress made, and have taken some slight share in this work in my own province. I have visited and have seen the operation of forestry camps and rural training, both in schools in home making for girls, and in agricultural classes for boys, physical training classes, and urban vocational schools for both boys and girls. There is a great work being done in all those lines. If industry will cooperate I believe the way is pointed through this program to the solution of the present youth problem, and especially if expansion takes place as it is needed. So well is the work going on in my province of Manitoba that I am satisfied much of it can be put on a permanent basis, irrespective of how long the present situation lasts and of whether the dominion continues to assist and direct.

Home-cooking and agricultural schools, and athletic and gymnastic classes will always be of value, as will urban vocational schools, which should be made to serve the country as well as the city. The farm of to-day is to a large extent mechanized, and will be more so in the future. Therefore I say the vocational schools should be made accessible to the smaller towns and rural communities. I think these projects might point the way to the solution of the youth problem. After having seen boys' agricultural schools at work in Neepawa and Shoal Lake, girls' schools in home-making at Minnedosa and Gladstone, the fine work being done and the high type of youth doing it, and after having seen a number of the youth who left those schools a year ago; the fine type of youth who have worked in preparing themselves for instructors, and those who have already organized classes in local centres such as Carberry and elsewhere, with favourable results, one seems justified in the expectations I have voiced.

I was struck by a remark made by Mr. Elliott, of the youth instructors' staff in Alberta, at a meeting called by the Minister of Labour. I believe Mr. Elliott has charge of placing boys in farm homes, something which could be done with good effect in all agricultural provinces. It seems the procedure is to bring a boy and a farmer together—a boy who has no work, and a farmer who is willing to take the boy, if he is physically and morally sound, and give him a home and training. Mr. Elliott said a boy twenty-two years of age came to him to be placed. He asked the boy what he would like to do, and the boy replied he did not know, because he had never had a chance to try. Mr. Elliott implied, as much by his manner as by what he said, that the trouble lay somewhere else than where it actually did lie—right with the boy himself, his family, his school and the community in which he lived. If my memory serves me correctly, that boy was placed with a farmer near at hand.

Who is to blame if such a boy had not been working in that place years before? Is it necessary to start a movement away down here in a department of government at Ottawa, and is it necessary to set up a special staff and expend large sums of money in order to show a town boy in Alberta or in any other province that he can get work and training with a neighbouring farmer? But that is what is being done. Is it not absurd? Where is the spirit of the pioneer? Self-help is lacking throughout Canada. Whole communities are looking to some government to give them a hand-out. The youth in the cities of the west, but only in the cities, are in that position.

Ours is an agricultural economy. It is in that line of work which most of our people are needed. But they are looking for white-collar jobs, and the boys themselves are not altogether to blame. They are the product of the homes, schools and communities. So far the tendency of all of these is to educate away from hard labour into dependency rather than into a state of independence. In that regard I agree with the hon. member who preceded me in the debate.

It would be to every city boy's lasting advantage to spend at least a year with a good farmer, obliged to do the work done by the farm boy, so that he could gradually learn responsibility in his work. The boy in the town or city of to-day has no responsibility in the home. He has no chores to do, no wood to cut and to carry in and no water to carry from the town pump. In this day of a higher standard of living our work is done for us, and as a result our youth suffer. They will continue to suffer until we are prepared to bring about a different state of affairs.

Passing through Winnipeg I was told about a young chap who was down on his luck and who for months had been trying to get work, but with no success. He travelled to Vancouver and back, but could find no work. I wonder what kind of work he was looking for. Had he asked any farmer for a job? I am sure I could have placed him. I know that during harvest and threshing time I visited in two days five different outfits who were running short-handed; they could not get men. I know farmers were asking me at different times if I knew of any men in the country who would work.

Let me tell about another young man. I believe he came from Ireland at the beginning of the depression. He did not know anything about farming, and had no friends in Canada. He came to Manitoba and began working with a farmer, although he knew nothing about farming when he began. Although he has been in Canada for nine years he has never paid board, because when he could not get money for working he would work for his board with a farmer. Last summer that boy had $1,500 in dominion government bonds, besides some cash in the bank. That is not bad for a depression period, is it? It is not bad for a boy who did not know anything about Canadian farm life. Why cannot our boys do that?

In the spring of 1936 I was travelling by train from Dauphin towards Swan River, and I noticed a boy sitting across the aisle from me. He was such a fine looking chap that I went over and sat beside him and entered into conversation. Upon being asked where he was going, he replied that he was going to take a position on a farm near Swan River. But when he was asked from what relief camp he had come, I never saw a boy or anybody else so insulted. He said, "I would not work in a relief camp." Judging from his conversation that he was English, I asked him how long he had been in the country and he replied that he had come direct from London, England, and had never been outside that city until he came to Canada. He had never been out of work one day in Canada, and that included the depression period. He said that no boy in Canada needs to be out of work. I say the same thing, so far as the boys in my own province are concerned. Those are two instances to offset those which have been described by other hon. members.

Two years ago I asked a number of farmers in my constituency if they would take boys into their homes to teach them the work of the farm. Of course, it was understood that these boys would be healthy, both in mind and in body. In every instance they agreed. The right kind of boy would have been given a home as good as he could find anywhere. But the farmer also has his difficulties. He must contend not only with poor crops and low prices, but with the hired man. That is one reason why so many of our farmers are buying tractors and doing without men. I am sure that this situation has been made much worse by the institution of direct relief.

Last year and in previous years I visited some of the CCC camps in the United States, as far south as Alabama. I found much good work being done, that is in comparison to the boys not having anything to do. The boys were disciplined, fed and clothed by the army, and this was done very well. They worked on projects at varying distances from the camps, and if the distances warranted, they were driven to their work. The hours of labour were not long and a moderate wage was paid. I interviewed citizens in communities close to some of these camps, and the invariable opinion expressed was that of all PWA projects the CCC camps were the least objectionable.

At the beginning of this year I spent some days before the session opened at Dearborn, Michigan, where I had an opportunity of viewing first hand some of the experiments being carried on by Mr. Ford. I saw the technical schools operated in connection with the River Rouge plant. I saw the system of schools, from primary classes to second year college, known as the Edison institute in Greenfield village. I saw the schools conducted for the workers of various plants located outside Detroit. I think there are some thirty towns in which small plants have been located under Mr. Ford's decentralization plan. There was also a summer farm project being carried on at Dearborn. This was in the form of a cooperative scheme of gardening and marketing. This project had the effect of turning the minds of a number of boys, some of them the sons of professional men, into the direction of farming, and they were being so placed.

Is there a lesson for Canada in any of these schemes? I say unhesitatingly that the forestry camps in Manitoba are run just as well as the CCC camps in the United States which I had the privilege of visiting. I believe the discipline in our camps is more effective and permanent in character, especially for Anglo-Saxons, in that it is not military. It may be that city boys find the work in these camps somewhat difficult, but I do not think the work is too difficult for the average farm boy. I tried out an experiment myself. I interceded to have a farm boy placed in one of these camps in order to satisfy myself that the work was not too hard. This boy was accustomed to the regular farm routine. He was used to rising at five o'clock in the morning and continuing with the hard work of the farm until it was finished at night. That boy did not stay more than three weeks in the forestry camp. He did not tell me himself why he had left, but I learned from his father that his reason for leaving was the fact that they could not keep him busy. He found it hard to wait until eight o'clock before starting work, and he could not lie around in the evening without having anything to do. So he just left and went home.

Mr. Ford's many youth projects offer a lesson to our Canadian industrial leaders, if not to the government. Would that some of them would take a leaf from his book for the good of Canadian youth. I am satisfied that if industry will give full co-operation to the training projects instituted by the dominion Department of Labour, and developed with the cooperation of the provincial departments of education and labour to a point where they are past the experimental stage, the way will be pointed to a solution of the so-called youth problem. The projects are now on a proven practical basis and need only the cooperation of industry to put them over the top.

There is no doubt that times are difficult, but much of the trouble lies with people, especially with those of us in the cities who seem to have lost the old pioneering spirit. I was surprised to find so much flabbiness of muscle, mind and will among the youth of the large cities. I have met many splendid examples of the opposite type, but mostly in the country. I think the existence of the flabby type of youth is due to the attitude to be found in our homes and in some of our schools, to such defeatist speeches as we hear in this house from the opposition benches, and to certain articles in the press. We cannot blame the youth themselves. You do not hear this sort of talk from the boys on the farm who are kept busy at their daily toil. This continuous wail of defeatism and despair is responsible for the aggravation of the whole problem. It is unworthy of men who should be offering constructive suggestions and assistance rather than adopting blockading tactics and trying to destroy the morale of the nation.

What would we think of parliamentarians and publicists who attempted to act in war time as some are acting now? They would be considered, and rightly so, to be rotters and traitors. There can be testing moments in peace times just as in times of war. The man who serves his country in times of peace is as worthy of honour as he who serves in times of war. There seems to be a remnant of belief in this house, according to what I have heard expressed here, that patriotism means wearing a uniform in times of war. It means nothing of the sort. Patriotism means getting out and fighting a common enemy, whether in peace or war. Right now the enemy at our gate requires the best efforts of all in and out of parliament in order to bring about its defeat. To me the unreality of this chamber sometimes makes Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs stark realism by comparison. Is it too much to ask that we in this house should become patriotic for a change and join in a common cause against a common enemy? I should not wonder but that the cabinet would welcome cooperation in the great task that lies ahead.

Imagine the effect upon the country! No doubt the amazement at seeing all the forces of parliament working as one unit would so shock the people that they would be forced into doing something for themselves. The old term used to be "self-help", but I hesitate to use it in modern economic society lest I be ridiculed. Imagine the whole people doing something for themselves! Why, the battle would be won in no time. I want to congratulate the government and the Minister of Labour upon the expanded youth program. If we could get back that doing-something-for-themselves mental attitude, that spirit of self-help, especially in the minds of those who inhabit our larger cities, the government program would not matter very much even though it were ten times expanded. I am coming to the conclusion that we have reached the stage in our development where our largest cities will have to be decentralized.

What of other depressions in Canada? I can well remember three or four of them, none of them so long continued as this, I admit, but in none did state relief function. Take the early nineties. Business and industry were then more stagnant than between 1930 and 1935. The boys of Ontario were trekking to the United States for jobs. Farm prices and conditions were worse than they are to-day. I heard the now Senator Marshall describing for a great audience back in 1911, in the Fort William rink, just how bad farm conditions were on Ontario farms in those days. And I shall never forget his classic phrasing in his final summing up of the desperate economic conditions on the farm as he concluded, "And raising hogs did not pay for the wear and tear on the swill-pails." There was no state relief then, no state charity. And did anyone starve in Canada? Neighbourly and community kindness took care of the situation. The same is true of the 1911-1914 depression. There was no state relief then, and neighbourly and community kindness again took care of the situation.

Again, in 1921, did anyone in Canada starve? Not until this relief racket started in 1930 did things get out of hand, with state charity to the *n*th degree. And what has become of neighbourhood kindness and charity, community kindness and care for its neighbours? Just what one would expect. When the state is taking the responsibility, let it do it; that is the attitude, and by the very nature of things it could not be otherwise. There are many reasons for this, both psychological and governmental.

When the state takes on the job of relief, you are told, in order to help officials function: Send the needy to the town hall or municipal office or chief of police. When an army of professional and unprofessional social and relief workers is established as an adjunct of government, we are prepared to let them handle the job—a situation that is likely not only to prolong the problem indefinitely, but also by all the laws of human relationships likely to harden human relations in the body politic. Is not that just what is happening under our eyes to-day? When state charity comes in, human neighbourliness goes out.

Not only is that true in the matter of relief; it is terribly true in the matter of old age pensions. I am in a position to know and see, over a considerable area, a difference to-day as compared with the time before old age pensions came into effect in Canada. I am in a position to note the widespread growth of callousness and the neglect of parents on the part of many sons and daughters who are in a position to care for their own. But state charity comes in, and out go even the decencies of fine family relationships. State charity will kill even family relationships, and I commend this thought to those conscientious leaders in our Christian ministry who are honestly searching for "the shape of things to come." Human nature just "can't take it," unless fortified by more than economic security. National charity in form only will destroy the fine, real family and neighbourhood care and consideration which we once knew.

May I leave this thought with the house? If anyone wants the answer to socialism, let him look at the change that is taking place in men's and women's thinking of their family obligations since old age pensions were established, and at the change in community thinking as to their obligations since national government relief was instituted. This I know is only one side of the question, but it is a side about which something must be said and done.

If I have a few more minutes, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to something that was said in the debate about price and wage fixing in New Zealand, which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) looked upon favourably. I can give you another opinion upon it, to place in juxtaposition with that of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. It is an authoritative statement just to hand, taken from the monthly bulletin of the National Bank of Australasia, dated December 9, 1938, page 16 which contains the following material in its "New Zealand Letter." I think it is just as well to put this on the record beside the opinion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. It is headed "Difficulties Ahead" and reads:

> In the last few weeks members of the government have frankly admitted that the financial and economic outlook is causing them some anxiety. In a speech in Christchurch on November 26, the Minister for Industries and Commerce, the Hon. D. G. Sullivan, after referring to the drain on the London funds of the New Zealand banks, warned his hearers that the next year or so would see the government engaged in an "economic and financial battle of very great intensity." Discussing the same subject a few days previously, the Prime Minister said that it had become necessary for New Zealand both to import less and to increase primary and secondary production. At the same time he announced that a committee of the cabinet was investigating the possibility of increasing industrial production in New Zealand.
> So far, there has been nothing more definite than this; and a detailed statement of the government's intentions is being awaited with some anxiety by the business community, which has begun to suspect that drastic alterations in the New Zealand economy are under contemplation.
> It can be assumed that the government has two immediate objects in view. One is to divert labour and capital away from public works into more immediately productive forms of enterprise. According to the latest figures, there are now nearly 25,000 men employed on public works; and it is obvious that this is affecting the labour supply for farming and for several branches of secondary production. The government's second object is to check the decline in London funds; and it can be assumed that the restriction of importing necessary for this purpose will also be the basis of a scheme for a permanent expansion of secondary production.

The covering letter enclosing this material contains this short paragraph:

During the last ten years we have been assured that our salvation is to come from copying Russia, the Scandinavian countries, the United States under the New Deal, and the fascist countries. Mr. Hepburn has gone to Australia now to find out how they do it, and Mr. Coldwell is all in favour of New Zealand. I wonder why no one tries Liberia. That is the finest example in the world of a nation which prefers self-containment and poverty to participating in modern civilization.

I have another statement taken from The Dominion, a daily newspaper of Wellington, New Zealand. I shall read only a short paragraph for the record, to be read in juxtaposition with the statements made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar:

With reference to the question of "insulation," Mr. Savage in to-day's Dominion states "Unless we have some control over our overseas trade we just cannot protect ourselves." With all due respect to Mr. Savage and his ideals I venture to suggest that what we New Zealanders really require is "more control over ourselves" and less prejudice against traditions of purely British origin that made New Zealand what she is. Mr. Savage refers to the fact that "the price of butter in the London market has fallen heavily in recent weeks, but the income of the dairy farmer suffers no longer from falling overseas prices." At whose expense, Mr. Savage? With butter selling retail in London for 1s. 2d. a pound compared to 1s. 7d. in New Zealand the favoured treatment is a charge on the consumer, who is not only a victim of the guaranteed price but owing to reduced consumption his household is being deprived of the essential vitamin D for which there is no substitute. Admittedly the dairy farmer is assured of a fixed price, but with butter at 1s 7d. a pound in New Zealand retail sales are dropping and the health of the community is suffering in consequence. There is a difference between the two temporal blessings—health and money: "Money is the most envied but the least enjoyed; health the most enjoyed but the least envied."

The guaranteed price is falling heavily on the consumer and as we are not piling up armaments in the dominion there is surely no excuse for New Zealanders contributing an enormous amount yearly in the form of food taxes.

I have other clippings here which show how the farmers over there view price fixing. More than sixty-five per cent voted against the government when they introduced this price fixing scheme.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has exhausted his time to speak.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. H. B. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): I wish to associate myself with previous speakers in this debate in congratulating the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address. They both made excellent speeches, and I am sure that the entire house, irrespective of party, enjoyed them as much as I did. I should like also to congratulate our two new cabinet ministers, one of them from Ontario (Mr. McLarty) and the other from Alberta (Mr. MacKinnon). These are men whom we have known quite intimately during the last few years in the house, and I feel sure that the house appreciates their ability and is certain that they will achieve success in the high offices to which they have been appointed. I should also like to congratulate the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Manion) upon his election as head of the Conservative party, that party which has had so much to do with the history of our country. The hon. leader of the opposition comes from the same part of Ontario as I do, and I assure him that the people there feel highly honoured that a man from that part of the country should be chosen to lead that party. I voice the opinion of all the people of northern Ontario in wishing him every success in leading his party—of course in opposition.

In rising to speak so late in the first debate of this session, I feel that I may be very brief in my remarks, and still serve the purpose which I have in mind. Much has already been said on both sides of the house on those problems of the day with which Canada is faced, and while naturally I do not agree with all the views that have been advanced, it is not with any desire to engage in argument that I now rise. Rather what I have in mind is that at the outset of a very important session the people in my riding have a right to expect their representative to call to the attention of parliament those matters which might most affect them. That duty I now wish to perform.

In common with all other members of the house I want to express my gratification at the proposed visit of Their Majesties the King and Queen to Canada this year. This royal visit is something to which all Canadians, without distinction, will look forward with pleasure and loyal interest. The people in my constituency, many of them at least, hope to have an opportunity of seeing the royal couple, even if only for a brief time. Kenora-Rainy River forms a bottle neck through which travellers and commerce alike must pass to move between east and west, and its location is particularly fortunate in connection with the royal visit, because the riding must necessarily be one through which their majesties will pass. Nowhere in the country will the royal visitors be able to see scenery superior to that afforded by the Lake of the Woods district, nor would a sightseeing journey across Canada be complete without seeing that district. Moreover, Kenora-Rainy River will present as typical a view of the economic life of the great north country of Ontario as can be seen anywhere in this province.

I do not propose at this time to launch into a discussion of the troubled state of international affairs, but I do feel called upon to say a word in support of the attitude of the government in the crisis of last September. Perhaps more than ever we realized then that Canada is but a small factor in the concerns of nations with many times our population, but the issue of peace or war is a vital one for our people. The suffering imposed by armed conflict is relatively as acute in a nation of eleven million people as in one of one hundred million. I feel that we Canadians have much to thank our government for. In those tense days of September we could not settle the affairs of Europe, but any lack of caution on our part, any unwise utterance, might possibly have been the spark to light the powder. The government, at the risk of being misunderstood, remained silent, and by remaining silent earned some of the credit for the avoidance of a horrible war. There are other horrors in the world, such as poverty and unemployment, but they cannot be placed alongside war in a comparison of horrors.

Yet the government is not content to trust to chance in defence matters. We may all hope that war will continue to be avoided, but if it is not we must be at least partly prepared to protect our country. From this point of view I welcome the increase in the vote proposed for the defence of Canada. We must be ready to resist greed and aggression, and now is the time to prepare. We are not increasing our armaments against any country; we are only taking necessary steps that the armaments which others will pile up in any case cannot be used successfully against us.

I am confident that the trade agreement concluded with the United States by the present government shortly after coming into office helped employment and trade generally since that agreement came into operation. I therefore feel optimistic that the new trade agreement now entered into will even further expand our trade with our neighbouring republic. These agreements would have been desirable at any time, but with many of our former good customers abroad now unable or unwilling to buy as large a share as formerly of the products that Canada has for sale, increased trade on the north American continent is a godsend for us. Until the European situation changes for the better we must hope to expand our trade with Great Britain and the United States in order to help those industries here which depend on trading outside Canada. I speak from somewhat intimate knowledge of this subject because railroading is a very important industry in our district, and decreased sales of wheat, for example, or similar crops, hit our workers directly. Whatever makes trade move, helps our railroads and helps my riding. Employment conditions in Canada have been adversely affected not only by our own troubles but by unsettled conditions abroad. I am glad that the government has not waited for the clearing of the air, so to speak, in international affairs, to give to trade and employment the upswing which is so badly needed.

The housing legislation, special measures for youth training, assistance to the provinces for road construction, and other similar steps, have all been a help in providing much needed work. As a member of this house I am fully prepared to support the government in every future step which they may have in mind to provide more work of this kind. The foreign trade policy of the government, as I have said, has been a big help to us; but unfortunately there is a limit in these days to what we can expect along those lines. Support by any feasible steps to the construction industry, the mining industry, logging and pulp and paper, is very necessary. Kenora-Rainy River is more and more pushing to the front in the mining industry, and whatever the government can do by building roads or by any other steps to help the mining industry will help the people of my riding and will help one of the greatest industries we have in Canada. Assistance to the provinces for road construction is something else that we are very much interested in. We need the work provided by construction, and we need the roads after completion. When road construction is stimulated, it is a case of doing two good deeds at the one time.

As for the forestry industry, much reforestation work could be carried out in northern Ontario, including my own district. Here again, while we might have in mind the employment that this work would give, we should also keep in mind the future of Canada and the shrinkage of products from the forest unless much more is done to replace what is burnt and what is cut. Just this year quite a section of our district was robbed of valuable forest resources by fire. Lives were endangered and resources eaten up. In addition to clearing the way for the growth of young trees, much profitable work by fire prevention measures could be undertaken.

One cannot sit in this house for four years without understanding the problems with which the ministry is always faced. There is the financial problem; there are constitutional difficulties. None the less there are two considerations that have to be borne in mind in order to be fair to the people of this country. The first is that when normal employment is not sufficient to take care of our people, we must be ready, in order to provide a large volume of much needed work, to take measures that would not be taken at other times. In the second place we must not let financial consideration stand too much in the way when certain undertakings would perhaps pay large dividends to the people of Canada at some future date on an expenditure which would probably be less to-day than if the work were delayed. It is from the point of view of these two considerations that for my part I intend to look upon the legislation that we may be called upon to deal with at this session.

When speaking previously in this house I expressed my steadfast support of the principle of unemployment insurance. It is unfortunate that before now the way has not been cleared to proceed with a measure of that kind, but I do hope that a system of unemployment insurance may grow out of the work of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. If we had started unemployment insurance in pre-depression years, we would have been much better off during the last decade; we would have had a great deal of money accumulated to assist in meeting the cost of unemployment. Even now, and more particularly after the experience we have had, most of us will agree that eventually we must have a system of this kind, and the sooner the better.

In opening my remarks I said I intended to be brief, and consequently I shall not take up any more of the time of the house. I may summarize my remarks by saying that my support can always be relied upon for any reasonable measure which has the object of giving jobs to many of our people at this time.

Mr. A. A. BROWN (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the motion before the house upon the way in which they performed what must have been a most difficult task. While I did not agree with his facts and deductions, I did admire the splendid bilingual accomplishments of the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier), and I regret very much that in my early days I did not apply myself more assiduously to the study of the French language. I must also express my deep satisfaction at the coming visit of their majesties to this country, and I hope and trust that their visit will stimulate the loyalty of all Canadians not only to the crown but to Canada as well.

It is generally agreed that this government was extremely fortunate in being returned to office under conditions probably more favourable than those under which any other government has been returned since confederation. It was elected with a record majority, as hon. members to the right of Mr. Speaker often remind us. In addition, in all provinces but one there were governments of the same political complexion. During the campaign the electors were encouraged to believe that the provincial governments, in cooperation with the federal government, would vigorously and courageously attack the economic and political problems of this country; but as we scrutinize the activities of the government during the three years it has been in office, we find it has made little or no effort to deal with those problems. It has made no attempt to deal with the railway problem, which is costing the taxpayers of Canada about a million dollars a week. It has made no effort to deal with the heavy burden of taxation which is bankrupting our municipalities and provinces, choking our industries and discouraging the investment of capital. No effort has been made to deal permanently with the unemployment problem, which should not exist in a land so rich in natural resources. No leadership is being offered to weld this country into the unified force which is necessary for the permanent peace and prosperity of Canada. Rather do we find the government ignoring these serious problems and following a policy of inaction which is creating a spirit of unrest throughout the whole dominion.

Not only was this government elected under the most favourable conditions; it was extremely fortunate in following the former Conservative administration under the leadership of the former Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), who did the spade work in meeting the problems of the depression. It was the legislation enacted by the late administration that formed the basis for the bulk of the depression legislation under which this government has carried on for the last three years. Many of us have short memories, so I think it would be well to put on Hansard some of the outstanding measures placed on the statute books by the late administration, most of which were later nullified in whole or in part by the actions of the present government. The late Conservative administration was responsible for acts dealing with unemployment and social insurance, minimum wages, the eight hour day, the day of rest, fair wages and so on; for measures dealing with special farm loans and loans to fishermen; for acts providing for the rehabilitation of drought and soil drifting areas in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta; for special relief measures; for an act to assist in the construction of houses and, finally, for a measure putting teeth in the Combines Investigation Act. And it was the former administration which negotiated the empire trade agreements, which turned out to be the financial salvation of Canada, but which many members of the present government opposed vigorously. The previous government took definite steps to preserve Canadian markets for Canadian workmen, agriculturists and employers of labour, and when this government took office employment was increasing, trade was expanding and Canada had a favourable trade balance amounting to many millions of dollars. At that time it did appear that this country was well on its way to recovery and prosperity.

Perhaps it would be well to check briefly the record of the present government which was elected to office in October, 1935, under such favourable conditions. In the speech from the throne in 1936 the government stated that Canada's most urgent national problem was unemployment. Parliament was advised that the government had concluded a treaty with the United States which was to break up that economic nationalism which was said to be undermining our standard of living. Parliament was further advised that the government intended to refer the social legislation to the Supreme Court of Canada for a ruling as to its validity.

There is no doubt the government was and is convinced that the negotiation of the Canada-United States treaty of 1935 was its outstanding achievement. Members of the government waxed quite enthusiastic and eloquent about the benefits which Canada would derive from this great treaty. It was going to expand the trade of the country; it was going to provide wider markets and raise the standard of living. It was going to reduce unemployment and enable our farmers to obtain a fair price for their products. We, the members of the opposition, pointed out that the disadvantages outweighed the advantages and that the advantages gained by our farmers would be only temporary. We pointed out that the employers of labour and the workers of the country would suffer from the mass production and unfair competition of United States manufacturers. We pointed out further that the farmers would neglect their stable market in Great Britain for the unstable market of the United States. We pointed out that under ordinary conditions the United States was a great producer and exporter of agricultural products, and that instead of importing farm products it would be a competitor of our farmers in foreign markets. We pointed out the experience of Canada with the United States under former treaties, the distress caused the farmers of Canada by the cancellation of the reciprocity treaty of 1866, by the imposition of the Fordney-McCumber tariff and later by the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1930. We further pointed out the loss which would be entailed by our railway and transportation systems if we engaged in trade north and south at the expense of trade east and west.

We are now in a position to say that the extravagant claims of the government were not realized, and that the predictions of hon. members on this side of the house came true. Unemployment was not banished; the farmers did neglect the British market, and I believe it was the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) who rose in her place in the house last session and protested to the government because there were not proper shipping facilities to ship cattle to the British market. The reason given and accepted was that the farmers had stopped shipping cattle to Great Britain and were shipping them to the more convenient markets of the United States. As a result ships which were ordinarily used for such traffic were converted to other uses.

In the second session of this parliament we were reminded by the government that Canada was rapidly forging her way back to recovery and prosperity; that markets were expanding, revenues were increasing, unemployment was decreasing and the wages and purchasing power of the workers and farmers were on the increase. In the speech from the throne we were advised that negotiations were being continued for a three-way treaty between the United States, Canada and Great Britain, which would confirm and enlarge the advantages gained by Canada through the treaty of 1935. A minister of the government pointed out that some industries would necessarily have to make some sacrifices for the general good of the country. The protracted negotiations and untimely utterances by members of the government did much more to slow up industry and increase unemployment than anything else.

Again we read from the speech from the throne that parliament will be asked to approve the Canada-United States treaty which will retain and confirm the advantages derived from the treaty of 1935; that reductions in taxation on trade will be made, and that the government will take over a further share of the burden of relief. In this fourth, and possibly the last speech from the throne before a general election, we would naturally expect to find legislation of a kind which would provide some permanent solution for at least some of our problems. But instead of that we find the same policy of inaction, except that the government has promised to take over the greater part of the relief burden —and that will possibly be only for a short time.

The speech from the throne announces the completion of the Canada-United States treaty, which completion the government hopes will cover all its sins of omission and commission. It is not my intention to-night to deal with the treaty in detail, but I should like to say a few words about the method of its negotiation. There is no question that representatives of Canada were handicapped in negotiating the treaty. The United States representatives had authority to reduce duties by only 50 per cent, and since their rate of duty was at almost the highest peak in the history of the country it was impossible in many instances to receive reciprocal consideration.

The government of the United States consulted all parties whose interests would be affected by the treaty; they permitted representations to be made by the interested parties, and in some instances adjustments were made. On the other hand our government consulted neither the manufacturers and labour organizations nor the agriculturists. The United States, with its population of 110,000,000 people, was exceedingly careful to protect its markets by quotas and restrictions, while Canada, unlike the United States and practically every other nation of the world, took no such precaution.

It has been said in the house that there is very little opposition to the treaty; but I have not found, even in the house, an enthusiastic supporter of the agreement. The support has been qualified, with certain conditions mentioned. It is true that from time to time the treaty has been given faint praise by some manufacturers and some prominent financial men; but the true test of feeling in regard to a treaty of this kind is the manner in which employment is affected.

Have the employers of labour made plans to increase their staffs? Have the labour organizations gone on record in favour of the treaty? Have the farmers, fruit growers and vegetable growers sent their approval of the treaty to the government? No. To obtain a further test I am suggesting that hon. members should turn to the financial page of their favourite newspaper, and note particularly whether industrial or other stocks have reacted favourably since the completion of the treaty arrangements was announced.

Even members of the government admit they are not sure what benefits the Canadian people will derive from the treaty, but they are hoping Canada will benefit to a great extent. I say the government has no right to gamble away the livelihood of fellow-Canadians on pious hopes.

The speech from the throne indicated further that the government intends to assume a larger share of the relief burden of the municipalities. The government should have taken this action long ago when it was advocated by the mayors' association of Canada. This action should have been taken before municipal debts had accumulated to their present volume. This burden upon real estate is one of the main reasons for the lack of prosperity in the building industry, regardless of the amount of cheap money that is available.

When this parliament convened in 1936, according to the government unemployment was Canada's most urgent national problem. Three years have elapsed and unemployment is still Canada's most urgent national problem, although this government by its inaction does not seem to be aware of the fact. The mayor, the civic administration and the citizens of Hamilton know that unemployment is still Canada's most urgent national problem. Hamilton has one of the best civic administrations in the dominion. Its population is over 150,000 people, and it is situated in one of the largest fruit and vegetable growing districts in the dominion. It is the second largest industrial city in Canada. As I have said before in this house, there is no city in Canada that is more sensitive to the fluctuations of the tariff. It is this uncertainty about the tariff and these new trade treaties that is the cause of a great deal of unemployment in Hamilton to-day. The other day a prominent manufacturer told me that since this government came into office he has found it impossible to plan the activities of his industry for any considerable time ahead. We all know that this is necessary in any business. The manufacturers advise me also that the interpretation of the acts dealing with the importation of certain goods is generally not in favour of the manufacturer.

Since this government came into office in 1935 Hamilton has spent $2,257,152 on relief. In the year ended December 31, 1937, that city spent $329,979 upon 11,201 individuals. In the year ended December 31, 1938, it spent $649,089 upon 17,055 individuals, an increase of 6,254 in the number of individuals on relief. I am informed that during the first two months of this year 370 more families, not individuals, have gone on relief. I should like to inquire from the government what action is being taken to provide work, not relief, for these individuals.

The speech from the throne states further that there is to be a thorough tax revision and that reductions in the taxes on trade are to be made. I believe that such action will prove most injurious to our manufacturing industries, and the repercussions cannot help but be felt in the primary industries. I feel certain that this action will add considerably to our unemployment problem. The government states that these reductions will increase the purchasing power of our people, but for the life of me I cannot see the benefit in increasing their purchasing power when that purchasing power is to be used in making purchases, not in Canada, but outside this dominion. Surely there are taxes other than the tariff which could be reduced with more benefit to the country. The tariff is the only tax that produces both revenue and employment. Why should Canada, which imposes duties lower than those of any other country—24·9 per cent on dutiable goods and 13·7 per cent on all goods—contemplate lowering the tariff still further? Why should we have thrown upon our markets goods made by cheap foreign labour? Why should United States goods be dumped on our market at ridiculously low prices, thus throwing Canadian workmen out of employment?

I should like to ask the western farmer particularly to try to understand the problem of the industrial centres. Evidently he believes that the central provinces are the proverbial land of milk and honey. I should like to point out to him that just as the drought in western Canada causes distress, hunger and poverty, so does a reduction in tariff beyond reasonable limits cause distress, hunger and poverty in industrial Canada.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks let me say sincerely that it was not primarily my intention to speak in this debate. I believe, however, that this debate offers an open and very fine forum where all members of parliament find it possible to voice the opinions of their own sections of the country. A number of fine speeches have been delivered since the beginning of this session, and in many instances some of the problems facing Canada have been brought forward in a forcible manner.

Before I proceed any further, I want to do as other hon. members have done. It is with all sincerity that I compliment the newly elected member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) upon his wonderful speech, his poise and his profound knowledge of public life. He is certainly a wonderful asset to this house and to parliament.

I should like to compliment highly the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) who has shown in this instance and several times previously how well he is seized of the situation in his own constituency. He has demonstrated to this house how familiar he is with regional and national problems. To those of us of French descent he has proven to be a wonderful inspiration in showing us how perfectly he has mastered the two official languages of Canada. His accomplishment should be an incentive not only to French Canadians in Quebec, but to all of French descent throughout Canada. They should make it their obligation and their pleasure to learn the English language. Of all the compliments that have been paid to the hon. member, none pleased me more than those which came from the English speaking sections of this house. Hon. members were unanimous in their praise of the accomplishments of the hon. member, and I was glad to hear them say that if it were possible they would try to learn the language of the minority. That is one of the finest declarations I have heard in this House of Commons in the past thirteen years, and I think it speaks well for the future unity of this country and of the mutual respect between the two great races that form the majority of its population.

I should also like to pay a well deserved compliment to the newly elected member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) upon the eloquence and ability he displayed in his speech this afternoon. We know he has received a very fine training in the provincial field. It is not my intention; indeed, I feel that it is against the ethics of the house, to criticize a speech made by a new member, and therefore, with reference to the remark he made this afternoon that he represented the interests of the east, I content myself with saying that I am perfectly satisfied to represent in this house the problems not only of my own constituency but of Canada as a whole, not as an easterner or a westerner, but as a Canadian.

I was very glad to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) occupying his old seat in the house again this session, and it was fine to see the unanimity with which the newspapers of the country greeted his return to public life. Regardless of their political leanings they were unanimous in appreciating the fine work that has been accomplished by the Minister of Finance in the present government and in wishing him a speedy and permanent recovery to health and his full activities again.

May I also pay tribute to the newly elected leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), particularly because he is to some extent a northern Ontario man. It is true that during the last federal elections northern Ontario did not find it possible to give him a seat; but that sort of thing must be expected in public life, and while I cannot say that I very warmly wish that he will find a seat in our section of the country, I am glad that he is a northern Ontario man.

I should also like to congratulate the newly appointed members of the cabinet, the new Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty) and the minister without portfolio (Mr. MacKinnon). By their personal ability and the grasp they have shown of public questions not only have they earned a place in the cabinet, but I am sure they will make a success in their new field. I should also like to pay tribute to the previous Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott), and undoubtedly his successor has a big task ahead of him because the former Postmaster General was a true Canadian, an able statesman, and a good minister, and administrator.

I should like to say a few words about the visit of the king and queen to Canada in the spring. It is undoubtedly a great honour that they are bestowing on this section of the empire in visiting Canada, and we appreciate it very much. But the people in my part of the country were, to put it mildly, not a little disappointed when the itinerary of their majesties' visit was given out and it was stated that it would not be possible for the king and queen to visit our section of northern Ontario. I mention the matter here in the house, and I have already spoken to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), explaining to him that logically we might well expect a visit from their majesties to our section of the country, because of our geographical situation and because of the fact that in that section more progress has been made in the last thirty years than in any other part of Canada. In addition, we have good railway facilities, the best on the continent, and I do hope it will be found possible for our royal visitors, on their return from the Pacific coast, to visit Kapuskasing, Cochrane, the Porcupine, Kirkland Lake, and also our agricultural and industrial section of northern Ontario. It is a country that has been blessed by Providence, a country with great natural resources now being intensively developed, and our pioneer population of nearly four hundred thousand has been engaged for many years now in pushing back the frontiers of Canada. It has not been an easy task. They have had to fight all the way through. Anyone who studies the economic history of this dominion must realize that during the last eight years the development of the natural resources of northern Ontario has been a wonderful factor in combating the depression. I have already shown to the Prime Minister how it would be possible, without occasioning any delay or lengthening the route of our royal visitors, for them to spend a very few moments with our people of northern Ontario, and perhaps northern Quebec, on their return trip to the east.

I have only a very few words to say about the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition. It is absolutely impossible for me to support it because it is simply a negative.

I very much appreciated the speech that was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail), and I should like to compliment both her and the hon. member for the Yukon (Mrs. Black) upon the wonderful speeches they have made during the present debate. Their speeches were constructive and carried more weight than some of the rabid partisan speeches to which we sometimes listen in the House of Commons.

The opposition has been harping on what it calls this do-nothing government. So far the opposition has been only bitterly critical without offering anything constructive. It is hard for me to understand the attitude of the loyal opposition, particularly when I recall that they were in power from 1930 to 1935, and that one of their first acts after being returned to power in 1930 was to call an emergency session of parliament for the purpose of creating one of the worst institutions Canada has ever known, namely, direct relief. The then Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) won the election in 1930 by telling the country he would cure unemployment. Then he called an emergency session of parliament to do what? To cure unemployment? No, to make it worse—to make parliament vote twenty million dollars, and then he instituted direct relief, a system of doles.

It was much easier for the government of that day to institute direct relief than it is to uproot the system at the present time. It is often said that democracy is on trial; that is true, and it is true particularly because of the rash promises that were made by hon. gentlemen opposite during the elections and again during the present session. They were going to solve unemployment. Canada was going to blast its way into the markets of the world. But, Mr. Speaker, when we consider what the late government did so far as unemployment is concerned, it ill behooves the present opposition to criticize the government. We are fully seized of the actual situation, and it is the implicit duty of every member of this house to bend his or her energies to abolish direct relief and to give work.

I was surprised to hear some members of the opposition state that we opposed them very bitterly during the time they were in office. I well remember that in 1935 we were accused by the late lamented Sir George Perley, who was at the time leading the government in the absence of the then Prime Minister, for not opposing the government enough. I well remember, too, that the present leader of the opposition, then sitting on the treasury benches as Minister of Railways, accused the opposition on several occasions for not opposing the government sufficiently. Surely that is an evidence that we were giving the government the fullest cooperation possible, in an endeavour to cure a serious situation which is not only national but world-wide.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, has there been anything constructive in the criticism of the opposition since this debate began? Is there anything constructive in the amendment of the leader of the opposition? No, absolutely not. I sat on the opposition benches for a good many years, and I never made a political speech. Why? Because as a member of parliament I was fully seized of the seriousness of the situation that was facing this country, and the responsibility and duties of my position.

As soon as the present leader of the opposition was elected leader of his party, he made several speeches in different parts of this country, as it was his right and duty to do, and one of the first policies that he propounded was that it was an obligation upon the federal government to make unemployment a matter of federal concern only.

I am absolutely open-minded, Mr. Speaker, in my discussion of unemployment because, representing as I do a district that is largely concerned with mining, industrial development and agriculture, I am fully seized of the unemployment question and some of the sufferings that it causes. It is true that we have some unemployment at the present time, and there is not a single Canadian worthy of the name who does not at the bottom of his heart want to see this ulcer of unemployment, which is eating into the life of our country, removed. But the problem is not easy of solution. While it is a national problem, it is also an individual problem for which every Canadian is just as directly responsible as any government or any member of the government. We must go down to the valley and play the game with the people; we must see and endeavour to find out and learn the causes of this problem of unemployment and ways of solving it. It is surprising to hear such statements as those, for instance, by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), who seems to think that the individual member of parliament is not fully seized of such a situation as exists in his constituency with regard to unemployment. We are aware of it, and deplore it, and whether we sit on the treasury benches or in the opposition, all hon. members try to the limit of their abilities and powers to remove this evil from our national life.

I believe that a similar statement was made by the leader of the opposition on one occasion only, namely in Montreal, and that ever since he has been mute upon the subject. If I thought for one moment that to make the unemployment question purely and simply a national and federal matter would solve it, I would be willing that it should be done, and done at once. But that would not provide an absolute and permanent solution; the problem is harder than that to solve. Primarily the responsibility rests on the individual Canadian citizen; second, on the townships and municipalities; third, on the provinces and also on the federal government; but all must equally share the responsibility. You cannot get away from that. We are all fully alive to the situation; all of us have given thought to try to solve it. Only a few days ago I was speaking with a curate in northern Ontario, and he said, "Why do you not solve the unemployment situation the same as they do in Germany, for instance, or in Italy, or in Russia?" This was my answer, "Are the Canadian people at the present time in a mood to have the unemployment and youth problem solved in the same way in which it is being handled in those totalitarian states—to see the youth of this country regimented in the same way as they are in Russia or Germany or Italy, where they get two or three cents a day, and where they are compelled under severe discipline to do work which perhaps they do not like or are not fit to do?" The Canadian people are not in a mood for regimentation, although there is no avoiding the fact that as a democracy we are in need of more discipline. I remember that a short time ago the Canadian corps association passed a resolution which, if acted upon, would, they thought, help to a great extent to solve the youth problem in this country. They suggested that it would be possible to "regiment," in the mild sense of the word, the youth of this country, putting them in some sort of camp, not barracks, where they could be looked after and given suitable training and education. Yet immediately there were unfavourable reactions from nearly every section of Canada. While we should not copy what has been done in the totalitarian states, if we are to find a solution of this problem there must be a little more of the spirit of self-sacrifice and self-discipline.

During the present discussion references have been made to disunity in this country. Let us consider for a moment a point which I had in mind in speaking of the unemployment situation, namely, the disunity within certain parties in the house. The Social Credit party, for all of whose members I have a high respect, have their own difficulties; they had to throw out one of their own members, if he did not go of his own volition into the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation corner. We find that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party were rather abusive last year to one of their members who drew out from their ranks, and that the same thing happened to several of their members in Vancouver, British Columbia, and also in Toronto, whom they forcibly threw out of their fold. We have recently seen a spectacle of disunity in the great Conservative party, both provincially and federally. At the same time all these groups capitalize very highly and rejoice over the disunity which they find in this dominion. What is to be said of the attitude of Premier Duplessis as regards the problem of unemployed youth? If Mr. Duplessis thought for one moment that we intended to make unemployment an exclusively federal question, he would realize that it would be one of the finest ways to centre all economic activities under this government, and he would be one of the first to protest. If we were able to solve the present unemployment situation by really making it a national and federal responsibility, I would be absolutely in favour of doing so. But what would happen? You would immediately have a reaction, and rightly so, through the expenditures made by the federal treasury in all centres of this country, requiring the federal government to take charge of practically all economic activities within the provinces, and then you would hear more "hollering" and criticism from the municipalities and, in particular, from some of the men who have been most outspoken on this subject of disunity. Such a policy will be centralization under federal authority with a vengeance!

Let it not be thought for a moment that any member of this government, when he goes before his constituents or leaves the four walls of this house, tries to unload his responsibilities on the shoulders of others, or is not trying to the uttermost to find a solution of this problem.

A word about national unity. Our friends on the other side seem firmly to believe, and perhaps want to believe, that we have disunity in this country. I belong to a section in northern Ontario where, only twenty-five years ago, some people were speaking very seriously of seceding from old Ontario. I know I shall be believed when I state that this agitation was never deep and never serious, and I always fought against such an idea. Later on, as the country developed, we had a Conservative government at Toronto. At that time some of the farmers and miners in the mining section of northern Ontario, because they did not get all the roads and attention they expected from Queen's Park, as it was called then and as we call it now, or because they did not obtain all the colonization and highways roads they wanted, started to talk about secession, like a bunch of young school boys, because, as has been very properly said, man is just a grown-up boy. But these things were absolutely superficial. In those days the Liberals in a good many instances were guilty of starting that kind of agitation, never believing at the bottom of their hearts that they wanted to secede from old Ontario. At the present time, now we have a Liberal government at Queen's Park, some Conservatives have begun to argue that we should secede. Hon. members need not worry about that kind of thing. Northern Ontario will never secede from southern Ontario or from the Canadian confederation.

Let us review very briefly the situation in the various provinces. It is true that to the Rowell commission were presented several briefs which were explicit and definite in their requests of and intended raids on the federal government. But if one studies those briefs one will find that for the most part it is a case of "ganging up" on the federal treasury to obtain more money. Take the money question away and you have no disunity in this country. I am not a married man—unluckily.

I will admit—but I am told that a little family spat sometimes is good for family life, and I should not like to see our national life so placid that we would have no right to discuss our provincial, regional and national problems without talk of disruption and disunity. Is there any real disruption in British Columbia? No; there is none whatever. Is there any real disruption in Alberta? No, there is none there. If some of the regulations put forward by my friends of the social credit party have been disallowed by the higher courts in this country, it was simply because they were against the statutes of Canada, because in many instances they amounted to confiscation or repudiation; only for those reasons were they disallowed. It was not a question of being unfair to Alberta. While I am speaking of that fine province, now they are in power there with a large majority my hon. friends know how hard it is to apply the policies—I will not say the fallacies—of their own party.

Let us turn to the provincial governments of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Those two fine provinces as well as Alberta have suffered grievously in the past six or seven years on account of the drought. The situation so far as agriculture is concerned has been very bad, and when the people suffer they are bound to make requests not only in the provincial but in the federal forum. But does anyone believe for one moment that for those reasons Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba will secede from the Canadian confederation?

Or take the case of my own province of adoption, the dear old province of Ontario. Does anyone think for one moment that Ontario, the keystone of confederation, will secede from our confederation? No, Mr. Speaker, it will not. It is true we may have some differences, which constitute only a natural development, and during these troublous times the overwhelming majority of the Ontario people are absolutely behind this great confederation and ready to do all they can in a spirit of give and take, cooperation and understanding, to bring prosperity to every section of Canada.

In regard to my native province of Quebec, I realize that for the last few years there has been a propounding of new theories with which I am not in sympathy, far from it, but I tell hon. members that most of the stories of agitation from the fine old province of Quebec relate to the activities of an infinitesimal minority. Take, for instance, those who want to have a French Canada within a Laurentian boundary; they know well that they are not logical with themselves, their own people, or the Canadian people as a whole. That movement does not go very deep. There is talk of fascism, and I have no more love for fascism or nazism than I have for communism, but these movements also have no very deep roots in Quebec. The people who for the last four centuries have colonized both shores of the St. Lawrence and are now colonizing and opening up for civilization the unoccupied lands of this country would never seriously think of secession from the Canadian confederation.

But we have some grievances, and we have problems to face at the present time. One which has been a heavy burden on this country for the last seven or eight years is that of unemployment caused by a new factor that was non-existent previously. Sometimes we hear from the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) particularly and from some other hon. members that in the past when large numbers of immigrants were coming to this country, it was only like filling a bottomless pail, and some of our native population were lost to the United States. There was reason for some of my relations going to the New England states and to California, and no matter what the situation was in Canada these people would never have come back to live in our midst. In most instances the same principle applies in regard to the hundreds of thousands who left Canada for the United States. It is nevertheless true that this heavy emigration was a national loss to Canada in times past, and we all deplored it. But for the last few years that emigration has not been possible. Thus we have to face a new situation. Our natural increase in population has to find means of life in our midst. This is one of the problems that Ontario, and more particularly Quebec, have to face at the present time. But it will never be solved by agitation or talk of secession, which, I repeat, is superficial. In the old provinces there is very little leeway left for colonization; in the western provinces only a few open spaces are left, and there is more left in British Columbia. We must of necessity put our heads together to find ways and means of keeping in this country the natural increase in our population, and giving our people the standard of living to which they are accustomed.

Let us study for a moment the talk of secession in the maritime provinces, those fine old provinces of which we hear so often, and with good reason, that have given so many fine men to the public life of this country, and whose sons have made their mark in every state of the American union and Canada. Do hon. members think for a moment that the maritime provinces, which made some sacrifices to come into confederation, would secede from Canada? No, they will not. I am positive it would have proved most beneficial had all the provinces found it possible to bring their grievances before the Rowell commission, because we must have mutual understanding of one another's problems, and all parts must have opportunity to express their sentiments. But there was never a thought in the minds of the people who presented the most rabid briefs and tried to make the greatest raids on the federal treasury, or even made the most rash requests, of seceding if they thought their requests would not be implemented. But it is easier to disrupt than to keep united. It is our bounden duty in this federal house to take a national viewpoint. We have one primary duty when a question threatening disunity is mentioned; that is, to work in every way to maintain unity in every section of the country, and in this work of upbuilding we must always give the best there is in us.

I shall not enlarge much longer at this time on the question of unemployment, although I may say a few words later in regard to its relationship to the agricultural aspect. It is impossible to find some one simple formula to cure unemployment. It will not be cured by reform of the monetary system only; agricultural loans only will not cure it; reduction of tariffs alone will not do it; the problem is more complicated than that. If it were possible, for instance, for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to start the printing press, issue to-morrow billions of dollars of new Canadian money, distribute it to every section of the country and say, go ahead with a program of public works, the problem would have been solved long ago. But I repeat, no simple formula or abundance of criticism will solve the problem of unemployment.

As far as the subamendment is concerned I confess it is not so rabidly socialistic as in previous years. I must give credit to the hon. member for Vancouver East for the fact that it is very brief and entirely non-committal, it is neither fish nor flesh; anyone could vote for or against it, and it would be absolutely harmless. But a few days ago the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) put a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), asking him whether, after all that had been said by the leader of the opposition in this house, it would be possible for him or his party to propound their theories in the province of Quebec—something of that kind. I am not now interested directly in the province of Quebec, but I know the mood and temperament of the people. I know there was no necessity to ask such a question. Although the communists have done all they could to bring the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation into their fold, the federation have resisted the temptation so far although in two ridings at the last federal election they were so close together in Timiskaming and Nipissing that they had the same electoral organization.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not with the consent of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Mr. BRADETTE: Perhaps, I repeat that it is to your credit that you have kept free of them, although the pressure has been so strong from the other side. At the same time a thing that surprises me most is the strong sympathy you show for the communistic ideal.

Mr. COLDWELL: In a public statement in Saskatchewan last week, Walter Wiggins, secretary of the communist party, called for a united front behind the present Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): And your Saskatchewan leader asked them to unite behind the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, no.

Mr. BRADETTE: I repeat that there was no necessity for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to ask that question of the Minister of Justice, and in that way to try to show the province of Quebec in an improper light. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the members of his party, and, as far as that goes, everyone else, so long as they remain within the law of this country, would be as free in the province of Quebec as in any other province of the Canadian federation. Although I am not absolutely in full agreement with the padlock law because it does not go far enough in some particulars, I do say that if our communist friends believed that Russia is such a wonderful earthly paradise, I would be in favour of passing a law immediately to deport them and ask them to go and live in that country. To the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation I can say that I am just as liberal-minded as they are. I have been a labour organizer, and I have good labour support in my section. When there is a strike I stay with the workers and know what happens, and speaking as a labour man I say the communistic party is boring within the labour ranks Trying to solve the problems of Canadian labour? Oh, no, trying to aggravate them, trying to sabotage Canadian industry and get the virus of communism running rampant in the factories and industries of this dominion. I repeat to my friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation that when they pose as champions of the communistic ideal, they must of necessity carry some responsibility for the things for which that party stands. And these are things which are absolutely foreign to our Canadian thought.

When you are dealing with Russia and communism you are constantly driven to metaphors; it is like a vast looking-glass where all "values" are inverted. When they are ready and willing to destroy the liberty of the individual for the sake of the state; when they are ready—and they have done it—to destroy religion in all its forms because they call it the opiate of the people; when they are willing to destroy the intelligentsia of a country; when they want to work from within towards revolution—I see some members on the other side laughing, but see what has happened in Russia. An infinitesimal minority has brought that country to where it is to-day. I do not intend to say that things were good in Russia prior to the present regime, and as far as I am concerned it is absolutely up to the Russians to have the kind of government they wish to have. But at the same time the communist or bolshevik party in Russia, before they were able even to prove that their theories were applicable to their own nation, made it a religion to spread those theories throughout the world. They were not satisfied to impose them on the Russian people only; they wanted to spread them throughout the civilized world. They have sent missionaries and apostles over here to try to scuttle our labour organizations, to poison the food in our labour camps and to destroy the machinery in our mining camps.

I know whereof I speak in connection with this matter, and if I display some sign of emotion it is because one night they rushed me when I was attempting to shame the English and French-speaking Canadians who were being run and led, as far as labour organizations in this country were concerned, by people who did not even want to be naturalized. Those people, who told me I should call everybody "comrade," tried to rush me off the platform; some of them were only a few feet from me. So I say to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party: I want to believe that you are sincere; I have seen you in action in this House of Commons, and I have great respect for the two leaders of your party, though I do not agree with the principles of socialism. But would it be possible for people from Canada, labour men or average Canadians, to go to Russia to-morrow and try to agitate against the Russian government? What would their lives be worth? They would not be worth a cent; they would hang by a thread. We must beware of revolution.

This is the sort of thing we hear in Canada, under those British institutions which have come to us through centuries of fighting and bloodshed. We have freedom of religion, thought and action. We seem to think we can sit complacently by and take no action on these matters; we seem to think we are absolutely immune in this regard, but we are not. The moment you give a viper a chance to sting you, death follows. Give typhoid a chance to spread into every section of this country and fifty per cent of our population will disappear within a year. Should we be tolerant of disease, immorality and venomous serpents such as those I have mentioned? As far as I am concerned I say, no. We have our Canadian constitution and our parliamentary system. We must uphold with all our might these cherished institutions. It is not perfection, and I have no desire to uphold some of the shortcomings of the democracies, or even of our system of parliamentary government. But surely we know in our own hearts that our system is much to be preferred to what they have in Russia, Germany or Italy. If I speak again with feeling, it is because in my own soul and conscience I have suffered when I have seen fine, upright Canadians fooled into joining these new institutions or organizations, about which they knew nothing. Before they were aware of it they were not leaders at all, but were receiving the sticks and stones which were supposed to be aimed at the heads of the so-called leaders.

I should like to mention just one or two matters with regard to the international situation. I am very glad indeed that it is not within my power to know all the secrets of international diplomacy, because we all feel that the situation is deplorable, and I might find the burden unbearable. Only twenty years after the close of the war that was supposed to end all wars we find that all the so-called civilized nations of the world are ready to jump at one another again like ferocious animals. I am no prophet; I have no power to tear away the veil that hides the future of the civilized world, but it is easy to visualize what would happen if we had a world war again. It would be the doom of civilization as we know it. Our civilization would be set back at least two hundred years; such a war would create anarchy and untold misery, and that must be avoided by our activity and our prayers. Mankind is never greater than when it kneels before its God and Creator, and it should be possible to have such fervent prayers that the leaders of the nations of the world may find it possible to settle their troubles without calling on the flower of their mankind and womankind to be sacrificed and butchered, not on the field of honour but on the field of blood and mud, and all the miseries known to mankind.

These are things which make everyone tremble. How I appreciate the statesmanlike attitude that was adopted by the leader of this government only a few months ago; and when I make that statement I am voicing the sentiments of every one of my constituents. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was fully seized with the gravity of the situation, and how his heart must have been troubled when he thought of the horrible holocaust that might have been started at any time during that period of tension last fall, when the fate of the whole world was hanging on the actions of two or three men. And here I must compliment most sincerely the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon the admirable attitude he adopted during that time of stress. He was more than a politician then; he was a statesman, when he said he was in agreement with the Prime Minister of Canada. The same might be said with regard to the social credit group, who showed themselves to be men of vision in a time of crisis and fully aware of the situation. I should like to believe that my friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Confederation party felt the same way, but they have always been turbulent and to all appearances antagonistic to peace, and even during the present session they have been twitting and tantalizing the government in regard to its external policy, and have even said during this discussion that the pact of Munich was a fiasco.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the pact of Munich was not a fiasco; it was a triumph of statesmanship on the part of the leaders of Great Britain and France, and the whole world should be thankful to Mr. Chamberlain. More than that, Munich gave an opportunity to the fine German people—because there are many fine people left in Germany; the majority of them are—to cheer Mr. Chamberlain, when they well knew he was not on a mission of war but bent on a mission of peace. They cheered Mr. Chamberlain because the German fathers and mothers and their sons and daughters knew that war would be just as horrible for Germany and Italy as it would be for France and Great Britain. They were cheering because they knew there was still hope, under Christianity and for the preservation of our civilization as we know it, for peace in this world. My hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party should be sincere with themselves, and I am going to ask them a question. Suppose for a moment that at the time of the crisis a Labour government had been in power in England and Mr. Attlee had been prime minister and had taken the same steps at Munich. Would they not have been the first to praise him for his vision and foresight? I know they are all men of peace, as we all are. I know they are in favour of self-defence, and I know they will never willingly allow civilized countries to be down-trodden. That is why I am all the more astonished at their attitude on this matter.

Let us briefly review what reasons we might have had last fall to fight against Germany in defence of Czechoslovakia. The natural protector of that nation was Russia. Was she ready to act? Assuredly not. It was impossible for France to fly over Germany and Poland to defend Czechoslovakia. Was it possible for Great Britain to offer any direct relief? Both France and Great Britain have always upheld the principle of justice to minorities, and no one can get away from the fact that in Czechoslovakia there was a German minority that wanted to get away from the tutelage of that country.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman's time is up.

Mr. BRADETTE: I just want to conclude with a few words.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. BRADETTE: I thank hon. members most sincerely, and in conclusion I want to repeat that in this house we have a great responsibility. There is more than an election to think of, though if I should be remiss in my duties as a member of parliament I want my own constituents to be my judge and jury.

But as I have said before, regardless of what happens at the next general election, whether it is this year or next year, would it not be wonderful if we could find it possible to put our heads together to work out a solution of our pressing problems? Criticism is necessary; opposition is also necessary, but it should be constructive criticism and constructive opposition. It should then be possible to face the future of this country with the knowledge that we shall have unity in our constructive activities, that our work will be fruitful in accomplishments and results, and that we shall find it possible, to a very large extent, to solve the problems that are so important as far as the youth and, indeed, all citizens of this country are concerned, for a better, greater and more prosperous Canada.

Mr. W. F. RICKARD (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations on the speech from the throne. I can assure the house they will be short, and I shall simply state facts because I believe that already a great deal of time has been wasted. May I join with other hon. members in congratulating the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply. Their speeches were a credit not only to themselves but to the constituencies they represent. Also I should like to add my word of commendation of the appointment to the cabinet of the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. McLarty) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon). I am sure both hon. members will add much prestige and dignity to the positions they occupy. I am sure I voice the sentiment of hon. members on both sides of the house when I say we are sorry indeed that on account of ill health the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Elliott) had to relinquish his position as Postmaster General. As one of the new members who came to the house in 1935, I should like first of all personally to thank the retiring Postmaster General and his staff for the splendid cooperation they have given.

May I add also on behalf of the people of the constituency of Durham our appreciation of the visit of Their Majesties King George and Queen Elizabeth. Although they cannot personally visit the only town in Canada where radium is made, I hope they will pass through the town of Port Hope on their way west. I am sure their visit will add much towards cementing the ties of friendship between Canada and her neighbour, as well as ties of friendship with other countries of the world.

May I congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon his election as leader of the Conservative party. I am not personally acquainted with the hon. member, but I believe he was brought up in the Liberal fold, and no doubt will do a good job as leader of the Conservative party.

Being a farmer I am perhaps more interested in trade agreements and their effect upon agriculture than in any other single item. We have listened to many hon. members on both sides of the house who state they are farmers. I cannot see why there should be so much difference of opinion among them, when they are all selling the same articles in the same markets of the world. I agree with the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) that both federal and provincial governments have done a great deal towards educating the farmer to produce economically and efficiently. But the main thing is to sell our products to advantage, after we have been educated to grow them. That is where this government has done most for the farmers, through its trade agreements. Surely no one directly interested in agriculture will say that if we had not had the United States market in the past three years we would have received more for our cattle and hogs. On the contrary we scarcely would have been able to sell them.

Among the concessions which have been gained for agriculture in Canada one of major importance is a further reduction in the duty on cattle of 700 pounds or more, and an increase in the quota. Under their tariff act of 1930 the United States established a duty of three cents per pound, but under the trade agreement of 1935 this was reduced to two cents, the number of cattle not to exceed 155,799 head. The duty is now further reduced to one and one-half cents per pound, and the quota is raised to 225,000. The new agreement also stipulates that not more than 60,000 heavy cattle can be sold in any one quarter. I believe this is a good clause. Also there will be 100,000 calves up to two hundred pounds allowed into the United States market at a reduced rate of one and one-half cents per pound. Dairy cows are allowed to enter the United States in any quantity at a duty of one and one-half cents per pound.

The new agreement reduces the duty on hogs to one cent per pound, and on pork to one and one-half cents per pound. The duty on milk has been reduced to three and one-quarter cents per gallon, and the duty on cream from thirty-five cents to a little over twenty-eight cents per gallon, but the quota of 1,500,000 gallons remains the same. Cheddar cheese and poultry, potatoes and many other commodities are mentioned. Surely no one will say that the treaty is not to the advantage of the Canadian farmer. I should like to place on Hansard figures which I do not believe have been placed there before, showing the number of cattle and other commodities we were allowed to ship and the percentage we did ship.

	Total of quota	Used by Canada 1938 Per cent to December 3	1937 Per cent to November 27
Cattle, 700 pounds or more.. .. ..head	155,799	45·7	Quota filled
Calves, less than 175 pounds.. .. ..head	51,933	73·4	Quota filled
Dairy cows.. .. ..head	20,000	33·2	30·2
Cream.. .. ..gallons	1,500,000	0·34	8·6
Seed potatoes.. .. ..bushels	750,000	99·4	99·6
Lumber.. .. ..feet board measure	250,000,000	62·4	52·6

Receipts from Canada of seed potatoes amounted to 745,497 bushels or, as the table shows, 99·4 per cent of the quota. With respect to unmanufactured lumber the total quantity shipped amounted to 155,906,000 feet.

Of course we must have some form of cooperation. The time has come when we cannot market profitably in a haphazard, slipshod way, but we must have some system whereby the farmers themselves will cooperate and take advantage of the markets their government has opened for them. If they do that, they will be in a much happier position before long.

We hear some criticism of the reduction in the preferential tariff on apples from 4s. 6d. to 3s., but it is generally agreed that the price of apples was no better after we had the preferential tariff of 4s. 6d. than it was before. More than that, I am an apple grower myself, and at present have 400 barrels of spy apples to sell. A man who was on the committee at the time the empire trade agreements were signed told me that the apple growers and shippers did not expect to get 4s. 6d. preference. At that time they would have been satisfied with 80 cents a barrel, which is considerably less than they are getting at present.

I should like to see the dumping duty retained for at least another two months, until March 1 instead of January 1, in order to give us an opportunity to clean up a little more of our fruit before the citrus fruits enter the market at a reduced rate. I believe it is optional in the agreement that with the consent of the other countries this could be done.

Furthermore, I do not believe any package of apples should be put on the market without having a government stamp of some kind on it. We hear people say, "We cannot get a good apple to eat. If we buy a peck or a bushel of apples, the top may be good and the bottom trash." Surely we should be able to relieve that situation and give people what they pay for. If we do not, we cannot expect to have good markets.

Something has been said about price fixing, and the government is blamed by some for fixing the price of western wheat at 80 cents, and not fixing the price of Ontario wheat. The previous government fixed the price of western wheat at 87½ cents per bushel. I have every sympathy for the western farmer.

Last summer I had an opportunity of travelling through the west to the coast. I visited many cities and towns in western Canada, and also communities in the dried-out areas of southern Saskatchewan. As far as southern Saskatchewan is concerned, it seems to me that it would not make very much difference if the price had been fixed at $2 a bushel, as they had no wheat to sell. To my mind it will be a long time before they have any. There are many areas of the west which are splendid sections of country. To my mind Alberta is a wonderful province. I visited Calgary and the Turner valley oil field, and also drove out to the town of Red Deer which boasts of having no municipal debt. I visited many sections of British Columbia. I want to state now that the hospitality of the people of the west is not excelled by that of any people in the world.

I also represent a riding which is half urban. There are several important industries in my constituency, and I am glad to say that since the present government came into power they have been doing more business than ever before. We will admit that during the latter part of 1938 conditions were not as good as they were in 1937, but even at that they were a great deal better than they were from 1930 to 1935 when hon. friends to my left were in office. This is the first time in the history of Canada that this country did not suffer the full effects of a United States depression. The fact is that Canada's production in 1938 as compared with that in 1935 showed an increase of 13 per cent; the United States production showed no improvement, while that of Great Britain showed an improvement of only three per cent.

In the village in which I live there is a small box factory that employs from sixty-five to seventy men and girls. They have done a wonderful business during the past three years. In that village we have only two or three families on relief, and that only because of the ill health and the inability to work of the heads of the households. The Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company enlarged their plant in Bowmanville last year by several thousand square feet in order to take care of increased business. There are other industries in that town such as furniture factories and foundries, all of which are doing very well. Port Hope is the only place in the world where radium is made, and several of the industries in that town did better business than ever before prior to the last half of 1938. They increased the wages of their employees, and many have added to their plants. These industries have not been hurt in any way by the trade agreements. In fact they may have been benefited. This explains why unemployment is not so bad in my constituency. I do not say that we have no one out of work. We have seasonal unemployment the same as in many other places. There are many people who would like steady jobs, but conditions are not nearly so bad as they were from 1930 to 1935.

The transient problem is one of the worst problems that has to be faced by our municipalities. We do not mind looking after our own to a certain extent, but we do object to having our police stations filled with these people all the time and having them live either from house to house or on the town. I am glad to know that the government is taking action in this regard. I am glad also to know that our different service clubs and our churches and other organizations are trying to cooperate with the government in solving this problem. I believe that if the government, these different organizations and business, be it on the farm or in the factory, would all cooperate, we could go a very long way toward solving many of the problems we have to-day. Government and business have new opportunities to work hand in hand in solving problems which can be solved only by their working together. As colleagues and not competitors they could get down to brass tacks on a national program for economic stability and social advancement, including greater security for the individual. Political controversy, failure on the part of governments to take business into their confidence and indifference or inaction on the part of business leaders will never provide a positive approach to our national problems.

The new trade treaties embody two principles that we all should be ready to endorse. In the first place the pact is a step away from trade barriers and restrictive tariffs that have almost crippled world trade and undermined the financial structure of many powerful nations. It is fitting that the Anglo-Saxon democracies should be the first to abandon narrow nationalism and lead the world in an attempt to reestablish a normal interchange of goods and services. The Canadian trade treaty with the United States merits commendation because of the advantages secured for the primary industries of this country. Agriculture, fishing and lumbering should all benefit. If these industries improve, the gains will soon be reflected in all phases of our economic life.

I should like to say a word about the implements of production. The tariff on farm implements has been reduced all along the line. When this government came into office, duties on farm implements were 25 per cent, 15 per cent and 10 per cent. These were reduced to 7½ per cent and 5 per cent, with some items being placed on the free list. Importations of these implements from the United States have increased from a little more than $4,000,000 in 1935 to above $16,000,000 in 1937. The duty on mining machinery has also been reduced. The duty on gasoline was reduced from 2½ per cent to one-half per cent, and imports of this commodity have increased by over $1,000,000. Unmanufactured fertilizers have been free since 1906, but reductions from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent and from 20 per cent to 15 per cent have been made in the duty on manufactured fertilizers by the present government. We have in the town of Port Hope a fertilizer plant which is doing a real business. This plant has proved of real service to that part of the community.

Our national defence problem is perhaps as important as anything that we shall discuss in this house during this session. When we came into office in 1935 the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) promptly called for a report on conditions at that time. It was found that practically every service was absolutely out of date. Canada lacked adequate naval forces, while the militia had no field gun ammunition. There was not sufficient field artillery, and coast defence armaments were found to be obsolete. There were no tanks, armoured cars or tractors, and the manufacturing facilities for these armaments were not available in Canada. The reorganization of the militia was recommended in 1932, but no steps were taken at that time to carry out that recommendation. It was found that militia training was at a low ebb, the training efficiency being only about 17 per cent. Appropriations for the militia service in the last two or three years have been approximately double those of the previous government. The appropriations this year for the navy are treble those of the late administration. Appropriations for the air force are approximately five times those of the previous administration. Appropriations for the three services prior to this year were almost treble those of the previous administration.

When we compare our national defence with that of Australia we find that we are falling a long way behind. In Australia the national defence premium is $6.73 per capita; in the United States it is $7.58, and in Great Britain, $27.21. Canada's is $3.17. The only countries doing less for their own defence than Canada are a few of the minor Central American republics. We are proud of our asosciation with the great British commonwealth of nations. We are greatly appreciative of the part played by the British fleet in preserving our shores from the menace of invasion. We recall with gratitude and appreciation the words of President Roosevelt uttered at Queens university, when he came last summer to join with our own Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in dedicating the new international bridge at Ivy Lea. He said:

> The Dominion of Canada is part of the sisterhood of the British empire. I give to you assurance that the people of the United States will not stand idly by if domination of Canadian soil is threatened by any other empire.

We are indeed a fortunate people to have such friends.

While we have a Department of National Defence, I am just wondering, Mr. Speaker, how it would be to have a Department of Peace. It may be just as necessary to have a Department of Peace as a Department of National Defence, and I think the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon), who has just been appointed to the cabinet, without portfolio, could fill the position of Minister of Peace very creditably. Of course, he would have to work in conjunction with the Department of External Affairs, and his assistance would afford great relief to the Prime Minister in carrying out his duties as Secretary of State for External Affairs.

We hear a great deal from the opposition about this being a do-nothing government, but I want to say in closing that no government in history has gone so far in putting its election pledges into effect as has this government. They have grappled with many problems which had no direct bearing on their platform and to which no reference was made in the platform. They certainly did not pass legislation only to have it referred to the courts and declared ultra vires; and I am satisfied that the people of Canada, when they know the whole story, will approve what has been done by this government and will return it to power whenever an election takes place.

I shall vote, Mr. Speaker, for the main motion and against the amendments.

Mr. C. R. EVANS (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to add my words of congratulation to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It was a gratification to us coming from western Canada to be honoured by having the junior Liberal member from the west chosen to move the address, and I am sure we are all agreed that he acquitted himself well in his first attempt at speaking in this House of Commons. We are indeed pleased to have the hon. member for Brandon representing in this house the Liberal cause from western Canada.

I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Stormont upon the excellent manner in which he delivered his speech in both English and French. We of the English-speaking race often envy the French-Canadian for the fluency with which he can speak in both the official languages of the house.

I should like also to extend my congratulations to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon his election to the leadership of the Conservative party of Canada. I have one particular wish for him, and that is that for many years he may remain leader of the opposition in this House of Commons.

It is gratifying to know, Mr. Speaker, that our king and queen intend to visit Canada this year. We in western Canada look forward to their visit with great expectations. The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), in addressing the house to-night, expressed the wish that the king and queen might visit northern Ontario. We in the southwestern part of Saskatchewan and the people in the southeastern part of Alberta are naturally disappointed that their majesties' itinerary as at present arranged permits of no stop at any point between Moose Jaw and Medicine Hat. That leaves a long stretch of three hundred miles in southwestern Saskatchewan and southeastern Alberta where the school-children and our young people will not have an opportunity of seeing their majesties.

During the course of this debate we have heard a good deal of criticism of the distribution of relief in western Canada, and particularly in Saskatchewan. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), in the course of his address the other day, stressed the maladministration of relief in Saskatchewan. I come from a portion of Saskatchewan where for the last thirty years it has been found necessary to have relief administered or assistance given at some time or another to some of our people in that part of the province, and the relief had always been administered through the rural municipalities of western Canada until 1930, when that system was changed. A relief commission was then set up by the then cooperative government, which was dominated by Conservative members and led by a Conservative premier. I have every respect for the gentlemen and the ladies who composed that relief commission in Saskatchewan, but I cannot say the same for the relief inspectors who were travelling throughout the country administering the relief. We had that system of relief by a commission in Saskatchewan for five years, and when the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in this government, who was then leader of the opposition in Saskatchewan, issued his manifesto to the people of that province before the provincial election of June, 1934, he stated that if he were returned to power one of the first acts of his government would be to scrap that relief commission.

I could tell many stories, Mr. Speaker, about maladministration of relief in Saskatchewan, under the relief commission, by the inspectors who travelled the length and breadth of the province, but I would hate to stain the pages of Hansard with the corrupt practices which they followed prior to the provincial election of 1934. At that election the people of Saskatchewan definitely decided that they did not want the administration of relief by a commission; for not one member of the Anderson administration, the so-called cooperative government, was returned to office. I think that speaks very well for a system of relief administration in Saskatchewan through the rural and urban municipalities. We had this latter system of relief tried again for four years since 1934; then we had another provincial election in June last, and the people of Saskatchewan definitely endorsed the policies of the Liberal government for the administration of relief through the rural and urban municipalities of Saskatchewan.

There has also been considerable criticism of the labour policies followed in Saskatchewan in connection with certain government projects. In the constituency I have the honour to represent we have had, during the past three years, several large projects carried out under the administration of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and they employed each year several hundred men. In 1938, on the various projects in my constituency, there were at one time between five and six hundred men working. I should like to take a few minutes to explain to the house just how the labour policies were worked out on the larger projects in the southwestern part of Saskatchewan.

We held meetings at which we organized our labour policy. It was decided by the Minister of Agriculture that wherever possible on these projects local labour was to be used. So, in order to use local labour to the greatest extent possible, we drafted certain areas around these projects, from which areas local labour was to be drawn. We then set up a registration employment office for labour. The labour was drawn from that register in the order of registration as the labour was required on the various projects. No credentials were needed either from the provincial members or from the federal member as a condition of getting a job on any one of these projects. Everyone was given a job regardless of political affiliations. I should like at this point to pay a tribute to the Minister of Agriculture for the excellent manner in which he has administered the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act policy in Saskatchewan. We feel that it is going to rehabilitate that province so that the farmers will be able to make a living and carry on.

I should like for a short time to direct attention to one particular branch of work which has been carried on under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and really administered by the experimental stations. Here I would pay a tribute, first, to the great work which the superintendents of the experimental farms at Swift Current, Indian Head, and Scott, Saskatchewan, have done in extending control of soil drifting, re-grassing and the different cultural methods in the drought area. Under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act it is possible for the farmers to organize themselves into agricultural improvement associations. These associations, in cooperation with the experimental farm in each district in which they are organized, are kept in close touch with all the developments in the control of soil drifting, re-grassing and other methods.

Last spring, when I was home during the easter recess, I had occasion to drive through the district south of Tompkins. Tompkins is a town on the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway about sixty miles west of Swift Current. South of Tompkins was an area of about 30,000 acres on which during 1936 and 1937 there had been very little growth of any kind. This soil had drifted in the fall of 1937 and during the summer and winter of 1937, and last spring it looked as though it would be impossible for the farmers to seed a crop. Through the work of the agricultural improvement association and with the help of the experimental farm they continued to do good work in this area and have made real progress in solving some of the serious problems facing the farmers in southwestern Saskatchewan. Chief among these is the soil drifting menace which has harassed the prairie farmer severely during the past few years. The unusual drought conditions during 1937 left all the cultivated land in the district tributary to Swift Current either in a drifting condition or in a condition which gave great concern and alarm. This was due chiefly to the fact that the crop seeded in the spring of 1937 failed to grow. With the exception of the scanty stubble carried over from 1936, the whole country was practically bare of vegetation cover of any kind.

Following severe drifting during the winter and summer and fall of 1937 the wind-swept prairie presented a horrible spectacle in the spring of 1938. Thousands of acres in a solid block were swept clear, and miniature deserts covering many thousands of acres could be found in many points in the southwest. The farmers individually were helpless, because any cultural work attempted was quickly destroyed by the wind and drifting soil from adjoining fields. It was evident that the cooperation of every farmer in the entire district would be necessary if drifting were to be stopped and the land seeded. It is in this respect that the agricultural improvement association proved a great help in solving the problem. Meetings were held and plans were laid which included the furrowing of entire areas on the same day. Whole families turned out to stake out the fields in eight-rod strips, and every kind of furrowing implement, from walking ploughs to the new steel lister, was used. By ploughing furrows at eight to ten rod intervals the drifting could be temporarily stopped. The land would then be quickly cultivated to bring the first lumps to the surface to prevent further soil drifting until crops on the alternate strips were established. Difficulties presented themselves, however, and it was frequently necessary after a severe storm to do the furrowing all over again. Furrows alone would not control drifting, and when a storm arose before the whole area was worked, furrows were completely filled. It was here that the organization proved its great value. Encouragement and support were needed to keep a large body of farmers working in the face of great difficulties. Special equipment and motor power were needed where suitable machines were lacking and power was insufficient. Agricultural improvement associations through the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and the help of the experimental station at Swift Current were able to supply a limited quantity of this equipment. This helped the less fortunate of their members to fight the battle of the drifting soil to a successful conclusion. In all areas where the organized effort was supplied, the drifting was controlled and the crop established. Great credit is due to the farmers who cooperated so wholeheartedly in the face of almost insurmountable difficulties.

The agricultural improvement associations have been responsible for many new activities in southwestern Saskatchewan. To their credit they have the solution of the soil drifting problem. The experimental work carried on by the experimental station at Swift Current in cooperation with the agricultural improvement association members has laid the foundation for a successful soil drifting control program which will eventually bring all drifting soil under control. Therefore there is in southwestern Saskatchewan no dust bowl that cannot be controlled.

For just a few minutes I should like to say something about the Canada-United States trade agreement as it affects western Canada, particularly our live stock exports. Already this year we have shipped 17,702 cattle to the United States in comparison with 3,256 head last year. So it is plain tc be seen that the reduction of one and one-half cents per pound on heavy cattle over 700 pounds is an inducement to the growers of cattle in Canada and particularly in western Canada to take advantage of the price of good beef cattle in the United States. During the first week of December of last year I had occasion to visit a big feeder in the southern part of the province who was feeding about 1,200 head of beef cattle. Those were all two and three year old steers, weighing 1,200 to 1,400 pounds. He had been feeding them from about October 15, and he told me he expected to start shipping them to the United States on the first of January. A few days ago I received a letter from this feeder telling me about seven carloads of cattle which he had shipped to Chicago at the first of the year and for which he had just received returns. He estimated that on those cattle he saved about $6.50 per head in duty, and his net profit, not including that, was about $20.50 over what he would have received on the Toronto market on the same day.

So I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his colleagues upon the splendid trade agreement they have consummated with the United States. It will be of untold value to the stock raisers and farmers of western Canada. There are many advantages which they will receive under this trade agreement that were not included in the 1935 agreement. So the stock raisers of western Canada look forward to the future with confidence and hope, believing that under the administration of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture, who has charge of the live stock industry, their future will be very bright. We believe that in the near future that industry will make good progress in western Canada.

Mr. P. J. ROWE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to touch briefly upon certain references made by some Liberal members to the problem of European victims of nazi and fascist terror.

This question has been confused, I think, with immigration proposals, to which this group is opposed. The hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle) I think it was, discussed the question as though it were a Jewish problem, but it is neither an immigration nor a Jewish question. Two-thirds of the refugees are non-Jews whose objections to totalitarian dictatorships have endangered their lives and the lives of those whom they hold dear. Can democratic people therefore refuse under proper safeguards to give aid and succour to those who suffer for the ideals of democracy and human liberty? Thousands of Sudeten Germans and Czechs as well as a large number of Jews appeal for aid. We urge the government to join with other democratic states in answering that appeal; that is all.

Reference was also made to the speech of the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) in Montreal last week end, which has been widely interpreted to mean that the government would refuse to grant admission to these refugees. If that is the government's policy, this house should be told so at once; for, when parliament is in session, in this house alone should pronouncements of government policy be made. I urge the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to announce a policy for Canada which will conform to the traditional Liberalism of which he sometimes boasts.

This group to which I belong was glad to learn from the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) that the amendment proposed by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation will receive the support of the Social Credit group.

[Mr. Evans.]

We feel that it should receive the support of all who are genuinely desirous of curbing the irresponsible power of financial and industrial monopolies. I am afraid, however, that I must decline to accept the congratulations of the hon. member for Acadia, who suggests that this amendment represents a change in the policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. Ever since it came into being, this group has urged the necessity of effective measures of social control, ensuring that the financial and industrial machinery of Canada shall operate in the interests of the Canadian people as a whole. This amendment represents no change in policy whatever. In some instances social control can be exercised most effectively through government ownership; in others, through measures of state regulation, and in still others, through the efforts of cooperatives. In any given instance we favour that form of social control which will be most effective. I know that in his own excellent speech my hon. friend favoured the same sort of social control; he urged that the government establish a minimum price for agricultural products, based upon the cost of production plus a fair remuneration to the producer. That is directly in line with our amendment. So is the advocacy of planning in the international sphere for the purpose of controlling production and stabilizing prices; and we would add, making available to the people of the world the goods and services which their efforts have brought into being.

A few days ago, when coming from Edmonton to attend the session, I picked up a copy of the Toronto Daily Star of December 31, 1938. In glancing over the headlines I noticed a number of things that will more or less form the basis of the remarks I am going to make. The first headline was a statement, I assume it to be a joint statement, a kind of New Year's message to the Canadian people, from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). The headline said, "Prosperity, labour and peace predicted." The article went on to say that in the opinion of these ministers 1939 would be a prosperous year for Canada. Then I remembered the 3,000,000 farmers in Canada whose incomes per family in 1934 averaged $474. I thought of the 2,420,000 wage earners, or 98 per cent of all who drew wages and salaries during the same year, who had an average income of $664, and would get about the same in 1939. One could hardly call that prosperity for the farmers or for the mass of the workers of this country. On the other hand I remembered that in the same year 1934, 23,600 people, representing three-fifths of one per cent of the population of Canada, would receive approximately $940,000,000, or an average of $39,860 per family. And I remembered that in 1938 corporation earnings reached an all time high in Canada. It seemed reasonable to expect that 1939 would be a prosperous year for this class in Canada. But the Minister of Finance forgot to say just for whom the prosperity would be available. It is also true, I believe, that taking as the basis of calculation the 1931 census and the Bank of Nova Scotia's monthly review for May, 1937, approximately 4,000 persons in Canada, on the basis of the distribution of income set forth in the 1931 census, and translating that into the 1934 national income, would receive $600,000,00, or $150,000 each. Prosperity for that group, yes, but not for the mass of the people of Canada.

I had also with me a copy of the Monetary Times of December 10, 1938. This paper reported that in 1938 dividends paid by corporations in Canada were $313,000,000 as against $305,000,000 in 1937 and $256,000,000 in 1936. Then from the same issue of this newspaper I quote:

> The Imperial Oil group, including International Petroleum, Royalite and Andean National, are distributing about $43,000,000 this month.

That was December, 1938. Royalite, which operates in Turner Valley, paid in December alone, $529,302, which is $29,000 more in one month than the entire population of Alberta received in royalties from oil for the year 1937. And it should not be forgotten that these figures do not by any means represent the entire earnings or profits of these companies. Dividends are not declared until all wages, salaries, bonuses and so on are paid and reserves of various kinds set up. One has only to glance at the balance sheets of some of these companies to see that many of them are bulging with undivided profits, and the salaries and bonuses paid directors are exceedingly generous. The next headline that struck my eye was:

> Jobless shiver while city celebrates.

This was a statement by Mrs. Kasper Fraser, vice-president of the Welfare Council of Ontario, who told how thirty-six jobless young men were ordered out of the Fred Victor mission of Toronto and forced to sleep on the floor of a church. I quote her words:

> The situation is desperate. Certainly thousands of young men remain uncared for in the bitter cold of this season of festivity and good will.

I turn over a page or two, still looking at the Toronto Daily Star of December 31, 1938, and I notice the report of an interview between the eminent British banker, Sir George Paish, and the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman). I quote the hon. member's own words, quoting himself as making this remark to Sir George Paish:

> Our agriculture is in a worse condition than at any time during our history.

It was the hon. member for Huron North who said in this house a year ago, if my memory serves me aright, that the farmers of Ontario received less than the average office boy, less than a dollar a day. The hon. member is an able and competent statistician, and I do not at all question the accuracy of his calculations. A few pages further on in the same issue of the Star, I read the report of the Canadian Welfare Council, from which I quote:

> Since 1930, Canada will have spent, by March 31, 1939, about $900,000,000 on direct relief, relief works and projects, and she has more people on relief than when she started.

Incidentally the Monetary Times of December 10, 1938, which reports these vast volumes of wealth pouring into the bank accounts of a few favoured Canadians, also quotes the Minister of Labour as saying that 9,467 persons had been placed on farms for the winter in the four western provinces. I quote his statement:

> The per capita cost of the farm placement is $14 per month, including $5 allowance paid to the farmer.

Just a few weeks ago I happened to attend a meeting in Edmonton called for the purpose of discussing the problem of these young men who were being sent out on the farms. I remember very well the words of one of them who said something to this effect: "Some of the boys get the farmer to buy them an outfit of clothing in the fall, pledging their earnings of $5 per month and the bonus which they receive if they remain until spring. Then in the spring they leave the farm with no money and their clothing worn out." I have to quote here a statement that has been quoted repeatedly during this debate, but I think it is quite opportune to give the quotation once more; it will bear repetition. On the night of October 14, 1935, immediately after the election results were announced, the Prime Minister issued this statement:

> We take up at once, as our supreme task, the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty, starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance, discontent and distress in a country more blessed by providence than any other on the face of the globe, and to gain for individual lives, and for the nation as a whole, that health and peace and sweet content which is the rightful heritage of all.

Note carefully, Mr. Speaker, the words of the Prime Minister. He says that his government is going to endeavour to end "poverty in the midst of plenty." Thus he agrees that there is "plenty" in Canada. He says there is "starvation and unnecessary suffering," and again he refers to a land of "abundance." He says there is "discontent" and "distress," and then he refers to Canada as a country more blessed by providence than any other on the face of the globe. The Ontario minister of health, according to the Toronto papers of January 11, reports that there are thirty thousand more people on relief this month in Ontario than there were in January, 1938, and that the relief expenditures will be a million dollars more this year than they were last year. How can there be health and peace and sweet content when the average farmer in Canada has to live on $474 a year; when 895,000 workers, or 36 per cent of all Canadian workers, receive an annual average wage of $202; when 65 per cent of the workers receive an annual average wage of $360; when 84 per cent get an annual average of $506; when 93 per cent get an annual average of $592, and when 98 per cent get an annual average of $664? How can there be health and peace and sweet content in the hearts of nine thousand young western Canadians, both boys and girls, who are working for less than $10 per month, out of which they must pay for their own clothing? How can there be health and peace and sweet content in the hearts of hundreds of thousands of honest, decent Canadian citizens who are compelled to endure the heart-breaking degradation of public charity, who are denied the right to labour creatively, to produce useful and beautiful things for themselves and their children, their every legitimate and normal aspiration crushed and strangled by the fantastic veto which this system has clamped down upon their lives?

Surely these people know the Prime Minister was speaking the truth when he said Canada was a land of abundance, more blessed by providence than any other on the face of the globe. The people are becoming more fully aware every day that, to use again the words of the Prime Minister, "starvation" and suffering are unnecessary in a land of abundance. At every session of this parliament I have referred to the Loeb Survey of Potential Product Capacity, a United States government commission, which proved four years ago that without altering their industrial equipment the people of the United States could produce $4,400 a year for every family in that country. Now the Prime Minister says Canada is more blessed by providence than any other country on the face of the globe, and this must mean that we could actually have more than $4,400 a year per family. How long does the Prime Minister think the people of Canada are going to idle in semi-starvation because the rules of an archaic, obsolete system demand it; when they know that the good things of life are theirs for the taking—and, mind you, the working. I am not suggesting that there should not be work. How long, I wonder, does he think that is going to last? They are not going to submit very much longer to the conditions imposed by this fantastic situation.

No wonder one of his own followers, the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming), driven to exasperation by the complete failure and ineptitude of the government, burst forth in this house only last Thursday with such language as this. He said.

> I begin to wonder how long it will be before the government will be willing to face fairly the fundamental issues.

Later:

> Production for need has become all mixed up with exploitation for profit. In Canada we see poverty and desperation when we have nearly a million people on relief and the granaries are filled with wheat. Do we take the wheat and put men to work, making bread for those who have none? No. We plunge the country further into debt by borrowing money to get the bread. Goods are sacrificed for profit, not only in this country but in others.

Then a little later on he said:

> We would be better advised to spend less time criticizing the Hitler regime and more time in bolstering up our own weaknesses. The best criticism anyone can give of a dictatorship is a perfectly functioning democracy.

I quite agree with that. After denouncing exploitation for profit, and goods being sacrificed for profit, he goes on to say:

> If some way cannot soon be found to make the implement manufacturers toe the line, the government will have to set up manufacturing plants under the control of the government, or some other arrangement.

May I congratulate the hon. member for Humboldt upon his repudiation of the profit system. I want to suggest to him that consistency now demands that he vote for the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) because it involves planning.

His closing words, as they are reported at page 160 of Hansard, struck me as a ringing challenge to democracy and a plea for the new world order. This is what he said:

> The people of Germany turned from democracy just as the people of Canada will turn from democracy if the government of Canada and other democratic countries will not try to make the people happy and contented, but rather hold them down as economic slaves.

The speeches of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Manion) in this debate, are simply, in my opinion, rehashings of the dreary futilities and ineptitudes of which the Canadian people grew tired and weary thirty or forty years ago. They actually dragged in the carcass of that archaic nostrum, the tariff. From the lips of two prominent members of the Liberal party I have just quoted the story of the tragic poverty and despair of the Canadian people. These are the fruits of the tariff and other policies of these two old-line parties which have alternated in power in Canada for over seventy years, or ever since confederation. Had there been anything of virtue in the tariff, surely it would have been discovered in all that time. Surely it is a waste of time to talk of tinkering with palliatives like that.

The leader of the opposition wound up by moving an amendment which, if carried, would have defeated the government and forced it to resign. The amendment regrets a number of things which we all regret. But I am very sorry to observe that the leader of the opposition does not propose to do anything about the matter.

The Montreal Gazette of August 12, 1938, reports that in a speech at Barry's Bay, Ontario, on August 10, 1938, the hon. gentleman told his hearers that federal governments of the past, which includes the one in which he was Minister of Railways and Canals, have done little by way of national planning of Canada's economic life, and that the time has come for action on economic problems. Again, the Gazette goes on:

The wealth of the country, he said, is badly distributed, hence the danger of revolution, and the need for national planning, and so on.

Again I ask the hon. member if he is correctly quoted and believes in the necessity for government planning. Has he changed his mind since the Barry's Bay speech? If so, will he tell the house why. If not, will he be consistent and vote for the subamendment which involves government planning?

There is one ancient custom in connection with the opening of parliament which, I think, should be retained because of the value of its associations. When the king's messenger knocks, and Mr. Speaker says, "Admit the messenger," I think of those heroic ancestors of several centuries ago who established the supremacy of parliament by insisting, at the risk of their lives, that even the imperious demands of the king must await the pleasure of the people's representatives. May I, however, remind the House of Commons that while we are still complying with the rule which keeps even the representative of the king waiting outside the front door of the house, we have permitted a far more deadly foe to creep in through the lobbies and occupy the seats of the government itself. I say this advisedly, because everyone of these privileges and all of this power which distort and strain the relationships between the favoured few who rule this country and the plundered, profaned and disinherited farmers, fishermen and workers whom they exploit, have been derived from laws passed by either this parliament or the provincial legislatures.

I said last year, when speaking on the sweepstakes bill on May 27, 1938, that I knew of sixteen ways by which money is being made in this country to-day, all of which are unmoral, unethical and inimical to the welfare of the majority of our citizens, but all of which are none the less clothed with the force and respectability of law. I hope that later in the session these matters may be debated.

I must refer to the economic and political powers wielded by the members of our senate. The Toronto Daily Star of August 27, 1938, quotes from an article in the magazine Fortune for September, 1938. I quote:

There is no business versus government problem in Canada nor the likelihood of one, because big business and the government are closely allied, if not actually identical. Nevertheless the Canadian economy is one of the world's most precarious, because it rests upon exports, and no one to-day will even guess at the future course of world trade.

And again:

Yet another bulwark of the status quo is the inveterately patriarchal Canadian senate, the importance of its power becomes dramatically apparent when you realize the role which senators play in industry itself. There on the record for all to see is the fact that 43 senators hold 199 directorships or offices in 151 companies, whose known assets without duplication add up to eight billion five hundred million dollars.

This means average company assets per senator of the colossal sum of $200,000,000. When it is realized that this non-elective body, the members of which hold office for life, has the power of absolute and perpetual veto over all the laws passed by the commons, it should be a subject of serious consideration for Canadians.

I turn now for a moment to the trade situation. Professors Leven, Moulton and Warburton, in their studies for the Brookings Institution, show that for the year 1929 in the United States, 36,000 families, or one tenth of one per cent of the population, received ten billion dollars, the lowest income in the group being $75,000, and the average $300,000, while at the other end of the scale twelve million families, representing forty-two per cent of the entire population, received the same amount, namely ten billion dollars, but the highest income in this latter group was $1,500, and the average, $830. This situation prevails on a slightly different scale in both England and Canada. The trouble is, I think, that so much money is paid to so few people and so little money is paid to so many people that the many poor cannot buy the goods and services which they need, while the few rich do not need the goods and services that they can buy. How, for instance, could the average family in the group of thirty six thousand consume $300,000 worth of goods and services? True, they actually do spend about $50,000 each, but the other $250,000 is saved. On the other hand it is easy to see how the average of the twelve million families who receive the $830 each could spend four or five times that amount, if they only had it. So we see that the few rich do not buy these, to them, useless goods and services, and the poor cannot buy them, so they are not produced, for the simple reason that they could not be sold if they were.

Then our economy is turned to the manufacture of luxuries and the instruments of war; for there is no other way in which the profit system can be operated at this stage of its development. Pump-priming or public works programs may serve as palliatives to delay the coming of depressions; but the experience of the United States, which has pumped eighteen billion dollars into its flagging system during the last six years and which now has, according to the statement made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) the other day, 21,000,000 persons on relief, should serve as a warning signal to us. While I welcome every reduction in trade barriers, I do not see how the new treaty can possibly effect a fundamental change in our situation. The masses of the people in most countries are so desperately poor that they cannot buy even the goods which they produce and which they need so badly. Wherever one looks, the desperate plight of the farmer is apparent.

I should like to refer to La Tragédie Paysanne by Marcel Braibant, in which he has something to say about the position of the French farmer. I desire to refer briefly to the position of the French farmer because we are trading with France. We cannot ignore the financial position of those to whom we want to sell our goods. I quote:

> From 1892 to 1929 the number of small farms of less than 25 acres has decreased by 30 per cent. The main cause is the economic condition of modern agriculture. Most peasants have been forced to leave by the economic regime of big capitalism.

The author proceeds:

> The mechanism which has crushed the French peasantry is a complex one. Its development has coincided with the concentration of capital, industry and the commerce of agricultural provisions in fewer hands. During the second empire the manufacturers obtained commercial treaties by which the production of important products of the French soil was either totally or partially prohibited.

There you have it. Wherever you look, big capitalists and industrialists are making treaties in order that they may profit at the expense of the farmers. Again the same author has this to say:

> Since the war French markets have been invaded by the apples, pears, peaches, fresh vegetables of California, Canada, South Africa, Italy and Spain, and by the dried vegetables of Chile and central Europe. Compared with before the war, 707 per cent more table apples have been imported and 1,430 per cent more plums. It is almost unbelievable. French commercial agreements are responsible for this. They have sacrificed their fruit and vegetable producers, most of them small farmers, in favour of exporting the products manufactured by some powerful industrial companies.

May I now glance for a moment at conditions in England? Messrs. G. W. Daniels and H. Campion in their standard work, The Distribution of the National Capital, show that 80 per cent of the capital of Great Britain is now owned by six per cent of the population. The fact that in all capitalist countries from 80 to 90 per cent of the wealth has got into the hands of from five to ten per cent of the people would not be such a serious matter were it not for the fact that the ownership of capital inevitably carries with it the receipt of all the really large incomes. Mr. O. R. Hobson, financial editor of the London News Chronicle, has made a calculation of how the British national income is divided. He says that in 1932-33 the total income was seventeen billion dollars, but that 12,000,000 people out of a total population of 46,000,000 received $12,750,000,000. This would be over $1,000 each or $5,000 per family of five. The other 34,000,000 people received $4,250,000,000, which would be an average of about $500 per year per family of five. This explains why thirteen and a half million persons in England are, to quote Sir John Orr's words in his recent official report on food, health and income, "gravely undernourished."

The farmers of England are so desperate that only the other day, January 17 to be exact, press despatches from London told us that a delegation of 6,000 farmers had decided to march to the House of Commons for a demonstration on February 1. This means, of course, that the farmers of Great Britain are in precisely the same position as the farmers of the United States, France and Canada. Because of the trade policies and trade agreements of their respective countries there has been a reduction in the living standards of the farmers who literally feed and clothe the world, to the level of peasants, peons and slaves.

The United States offers an example of the fallacy of the belief that further reductions in tariffs can bring about a fundamental change leading to a solution of our problem. The United States is the greatest free trading area in the world. There are forty-eight states with no trade barriers. It is undoubtedly the one country in the world that most nearly approaches a position of economic autonomy, having as it does a larger percentage of minerals and materials necessary to maintain a modern civilization than any other area on the face of the earth. Yet I point to the fact that 12,000,000 families in that country, representing 42 per cent of the population, have an income of $830 annually. Again quoting the statement of the Minister of Labour, there are 21,000,000 persons in that country receiving relief.

To come back for a moment to the position to-day of our young people, when the disinherited young men of Canada turn to crime as the sole alternative, or attempt to organize themselves into what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) calls subversive movements, the hon. gentleman prepares to meet with force their threat to what he calls democracy. I should like to quote his enunciation of that policy in an address which he made in Ottawa on February 7, 1936. He said:

> First we must have the defence forces capable of keeping down subversive elements from within.

I have heard the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) say more than once in this house that the way to deal with subversive elements is to remove the cause which, he said, was rooted in poverty and injustice. But that is not the policy of this government. This government has only one policy, that is to meet, with force and nothing else, the demand of the people for the right to participate in this life of abundance. Despite the poverty and misery to be found among the farmers and workers of this country the Prime Minister proposes to set up a purchasing board which will see that reasonable profits are allowed in the purchase of munitions. While the farmers have to keep their families on less than $500 per year, which by no stretch of the imagination can give them their costs let alone any profits, the armament manufacturers are to be guaranteed a reasonable profit by the government. What does the Prime Minister mean by a reasonable profit?

I notice in the Monetary Times of December 10 that the International Nickel Company last month paid dividends amounting to $7,292,013. This company made a profit of $50,300,000 in 1937 and shipped millions of pounds of copper to Japan to be used in the maiming and murder of helpless Chinese women and children, all in defiance of the nine power treaty of which Great Britain and Canada were signatories. The Red Cross appeals to the Canadian people for funds to help bind up the wounds which are the fruits of the activities of our patriotic profiteers.

If the members of the house will vote for the subamendment, it would pave the way for the public control of such companies in order that their mineral products might be used for bath-tubs, kitchen utensils and other necessities which our people are now going without, instead of these mineral products being used as they now are to murder our neighbours in other countries in order to make millionaires in London and New York. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that eighty per cent of the stock of International Nickel is owned outside Canada altogether, and therefore $40,000,000 of its $50,000,000 profits for 1937 were sent out of the country.

From the London paper Peace News, of January 29, 1938, I note that the profits of Krupps, the German armament firm, were 16,000,000 marks in 1937, compared with 14,000,000 marks in 1936. And finally I quote from the London magazine Peace, of May, 1938, the following:

> The armament profiteers have never in history reaped such a harvest as in the past twelve months. Total profits of thirty important iron and steel companies, with big armament interests, were shown here a year ago to have risen from £3,803,040 in 1934 (before rearmament began) to £8,941,169 in 1936, a rise of 135 per cent, and £11,747,074 in 1937, an increase of 239 per cent on 1934.

Last year, during the debate on the address, I pointed out that during 1937 the nations of the world spent fifteen billion dollars on armaments, and that this meant fifty million dollars a day for three hundred working days in the year, since they knocked off on Sundays to pray for peace.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time is exhausted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Let him finish.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may continue, with unanimous consent.

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was pointing out that this meant fifty million dollars a day for three hundred working days, since they knocked off on Sundays to pray for peace, while spending all the rest of the time in preparing to murder each other; and this reduced the standard of living of the people of the world by exactly fifty million dollars a day. For 1938 it was fifty-five million dollars a day.

In his speech the other day the Prime Minister commented on this diversion of capital, material and labour into these destructive channels. He referred to employment as having been a serious problem for nine years, and said that it was a "difficult" and "perplexing" and "baffling" problem because it was a "world" problem, and then he gave this astounding reason. I quote his exact words, on page 60 of Hansard:

> It is a problem with which every country in the world has been confronted within recent years—and why? Because of the policies that are being made to prevail in certain parts of the world, those policies of economic nationalism which, instead of bringing nations closer together, are putting countries into isolated compartments.

What he utterly fails to see is that our country, the British empire and the United States have been the worst offenders in this very matter. From the Manchester Guardian of May 11, 1938, I quote the words of Sir Archibald Sinclair, leader of the Liberal party in Great Britain, and surely he should be a respectable authority in the eyes of the Prime Minister. Speaking at Launceston, Cornwall, on May 12, he said that from the standpoint of peace the most fatal step ever taken by the British government since the war was the adoption in 1932 of the policy of economic imperialism, and the Ottawa agreements. He continued:

> It was not until then that the German people abandoned themselves to the frenzy of despair which we call Hitlerism, and the tariffs and quotas of Ottawa, the economic armaments of the British empire, began to breed in other countries, tanks, aeroplanes and warships, the military armaments of nations which were determined not to go on paying tribute to Britain but to acquire territories and raw materials for themselves in Abyssinia, in Spain, in China, in Austria, in Czechoslovakia, and perhaps ultimately in the British empire itself.

The Ottawa agreements are still in operation, and the new treaty is still, in its effect on German exports, a deadly weapon of economic warfare.

I was literally shocked beyond words the other day to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) speak regarding the effect of the new agreement upon our neighbour countries. He hastened to assure the house that Italy would not derive much benefit; that Japan would not derive much benefit, and that Germany would not derive much benefit from the agreement. Is that a worthy achievement, or reason for congratulation? That seems to me to typify an attitude of mind which utterly fails to comprehend the underlying fact that there is unity among mankind; that there is such a thing as the equal worth of all peoples and races, the common blood and destiny of mankind; that nations must have raw materials. Six nations in this world to-day control eighty-five per cent of vital natural resources. Sixty-eight other nations have to be content with fifteen per cent. Now then, how do you expect to have peace on earth and good will among men when you erect trade barriers deliberately designed to prevent those people from getting the foreign exchange with which to import vital raw materials? That simply brings on war. I agree with Sir Archibald Sinclair.

I often admire the mastery of the Prime Minister in the art of beautiful expression; but beautiful and eloquent words are meaningless, empty, idle and futile in the presence of facts that contradict the words. What is the use of affirming an idealistic conception of world brotherhood and world peace, while at the same time doing everything in the field of action and public policy to negate your words and make the attainment of those objectives impossible?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Surely my hon. friend would not say that the new agreements were directed in any way against either Germany or Italy or Japan. The remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) were in answer to a criticism from the other side to the effect that these agreements were favouring Italy Germany and Japan.

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): Quite so. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), of course, holds a philosophy that I do not hold. I repeat, competition, strife, conflict arising out of our system, compel the creation of treaties which inevitably prevent nations which are short of vital natural resources from getting the foreign exchange which they must have in order to import the raw materials they need. I know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce holds the same philosophy as the Minister of Justice, but it is certainly not mine, and I think that that philosophy and its fruits constitute the reason why we have war in the world.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think my philosophy is midway between that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and that of my hon. friend.

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): We shall be debating the trade agreement in a few days, and we can go into that in greater detail then.

If I may now continue, the Prime Minister said, at page 56 of Hansard:

> I believe if policies of economic nationalism continue to make headway among the different nations, that war will follow as certain as night the day.

And he asks the people of this country to believe that other countries are to blame for this situation. I ask him to ponder the words of the late President Wilson, who, speaking in St. Louis just a few days before his death, said:

> Is there a man or woman, nay, is there a child in this audience, who does not know that the seeds of war are sown in hot, successful, commercial rivalry?

That is the point. If there is commercial rivalry, then we are engaged in it. We are one of the leading trading nations of the world. We are engaged in commercial rivalry to a greater extent per capita than any other nation on the face of the globe, and it leads inevitably to war. May I just quote one sentence from the headline book, Peaceful Change, published by the Foreign Policy Association. At page 27 I read the following words:

> Through the Ottawa agreements of 1932, the members of the British empire, including India, the dominions and a number of British colonies, established a system of trade preferences, favouring each other, and discriminating against outside countries. Since the trade of the British empire amounted to 29·1 per cent of the world total in 1934, such a policy is of serious concern to the rest of the world. Outside countries like Germany and Japan are thus placed at a disadvantage in all these Imperial markets.

I have stated many times in this house that poverty at home is the cause of war abroad; that the farmers and workers who produce the wealth are paid so little for their labour that they cannot buy the goods they have produced. These goods are then shipped abroad in a frantic effort to sell them; but the masses of workers and farmers in other countries are also so poor that they cannot buy our goods, and the resulting scramble for non-existent markets leads inevitably to war. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, how can the three million farmers in Canada who average per family an income of $474 possibly buy the goods they need, or the 98 per cent of Canadian workers whose annual income is $664, or the French farmers, 30 per cent of whom have lost their farms in the last few years, or the British people, thirteen and a half million of whom are gravely undernourished, and thirty-four million of whom are living on less than $500 per family? How can they buy either their production or ours? How can the American people, sixty million of whom get an average of $830 per family, and twenty-one million of whom are on relief—how can all these people who are not getting enough to buy the bare necessities of life, possibly pay for the comforts of life? War may be the ultimate curse, but the preparation for war has now become necessary to the stability of the whole country.

Thus a nation at peace becomes hopelessly dependent on the war effort to support the nation in peace. This is the tragic mess into which the advocates of armaments as the guardian and guarantee of peace have at last drawn the unhappy world. They began by provoking arms manufacture to protect their societies from war. They end by making the war industry essential to protect society from an equally terrible enemy—industrial collapse. The world cannot live without the arms plants and cannot live with them. Now the wide-circling waves of this mad current have touched our own shores, and flooded into our own country. The workers are now feverishly engaged in forging the means of their own destruction; one of these days the cynical old men, whose spiritual blindness, mental confusion, political stupidity, economic ignorance and business incompetence, have brought about this situation, will sit around a table, and like the criminal fools that they are, order the flower of the world's young manhood into another vast international abattoir to murder and be murdered by other young men whom they never saw before, and against whom they cannot possibly have any quarrel, and thus will the last flickering lights of the present civilization go out.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, because I believe that a planned economy would banish poverty and war forever from the earth; because I believe that the Canadian people have an unexampled opportunity to lead the world along this path back to sanity, and because I believe there is no other way to do this, I have much pleasure in seconding the subamendment, and urging all hon. members to vote for it.

On motion of Mr. Heaps the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Monday, January 30, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

VACANCY

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF CALGARY WEST

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the resignation of Right Hon. Richard Bedford Bennett as member for the electoral district of Calgary West. I have accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

IMMIGRATION

PETITION OF LA SOCIÉTÉ ST-JEAN-BAPTISTE PROTESTING AGAINST ALL IMMIGRATION

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Québec-Montmorency): I have the honour to present to this house a petition from La Société St-Jean Baptiste of the Quebec diocese, bearing the signatures of 127,364 persons, vigorously protesting against all immigration whatsover and especially Jewish immigration; demanding with all the energy inspired by the instinct of self-preservation that we maintain a rigorous policy of forbidding immigration; asking also that certain ministers do not permit the entry into this country of even a few immigrants by allowing them special permits or privileges which give access to Canada even when immigration is officially forbidden; and finally pleading that the Canadian government take all necessary precautions to prevent all immigration to this country.

The petition has been laid on the table of the house.

IMMIGRATION ACT

AMENDMENT OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPORTATION OF PROHIBITED OR UNDESIRABLE CLASSES

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 14, to amend the Immigration Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill might be very briefly and vaguely expressed by saying it is a bill for the protection of certain political refugees and of people on relief. The sections of the Immigration Act concerned are sections 40, 41 and 42, under which any immigrant who has not been in Canada long enough to establish domicile is liable to be deported under very summary proceedings if he has been guilty of certain offences or crimes, some ten or eleven of which are enumerated in the sections. I might refer to one or two of them: polygamy; living on the avails of prostitution; being an inmate of an asylum, reformatory or gaol, and a number of other offences. These people are not liable to be deported; they must be deported, and the procedure is very precise. The clerk of the municipality must give information to the minister, who orders a board of inquiry. If they find the facts as stated the man or woman is deported forthwith. It is true that there is an appeal to the minister, but if the minister does not happen to be interested or if he is away the decision very often will be made on the advice of the very officials against whom the appeal is being lodged.

I have no particular complaint against the deportation of men or women who have been guilty of the crimes to which I have alluded, because they generally know what they are doing. But among the offences enumerated one was slipped in which I did not mention. The house will be surprised to learn that included amongst these crimes for which people must be deported is that of having been, at some time since 1910, guilty of having been on relief, or in other words a public charge. It might apply to people born in the old country and who, coming out here, have met with sickness or misfortune. They and all their family are liable to be put in gaol and to be deported, along the lines I have indicated.

The purposes of the bill are twofold. The first is to give the board of inquiry permissive power—not compulsory power—to recommend against deportation of a person against whom the only crime, if one must call it that, is that for a period of perhaps only a few weeks he has been compelled to be on relief, through sickness or other causes. The other feature of it, which is perhaps even worse, relates to political refugees. It is bad enough to be arrested and put in gaol for no other crime than being hard up—because they are kept in gaol until the court of inquiry is held, and then they are deported forthwith. But there is worse, even, than that. A man may not be a British subject and may come from one of those countries of Europe where freedom is getting to be almost unknown. He may have expressed political views against the government of the day, or he may even have gone so far as to slip out at night in order to escape some penalty imposed upon him by reason of perhaps nothing worse than the racial origin of his grandmother or his grandfather. He may even have been guilty of the heinous offence of having slipped out of a certain country with a few more dollars of his own than the government of that country would permit him to have. He may, however, get away and reach British territory. If he is sent back, simply because he is guilty of being on relief, he may face a firing squad or a concentration camp or, more plainly, simply murder—because there is no question that murder has been encouraged, in large numbers, in some of the states to which I have referred.

I maintain it is inconsistent with the traditions of the British empire that a man who comes to this country shall not have freedom from political offences in the country from which he came. Certainly he should not be deported simply because he was on relief for a little while. We speak of everyone being free in a British country. May I point out that the bill only suggests—it does not compel—that in a case where a man's only crime is that of being on relief, and where his being sent home to his country of origin would almost inevitably mean the forfeiture of his liberty and property, and quite possibly his life, such matters should be taken into consideration, and if circumstances warrant he should not be deported. The bill excludes extraditable offences, or any offences which would be a crime in this country, and it leaves ample opportunity to take the very fullest means to get rid of the really undesirable or prohibited immigrants.

The effect of it would be that the board, and the government, will not be compelled as they are now to deport people whose only crime may be that they desire that liberty of thought and speech and action which is so dear to all of us in the British empire.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNEMPLOYMENT

TELEGRAM FROM MINERS AT PASSCHENDAELE, N.S., AS TO NEED OF RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) to a telegram I have received, and which I presume he or some other members of the government have received, indicating a condition so serious and critical that I believe it is deserving of a statement from the minister.

The telegram is from Passchendaele, Nova Scotia, via Glace Bay, and is as follows:

> Miners and their families of this town in dire need of relief or more work. Mines only working two shifts. People are desperate. More work is not possible during winter. Immediate relief is necessary or men will be forced to take direct action as they cannot see families go hungry any longer.

That is all of the telegram which deals with the matter. It is signed by Michael Nearing, local union 4519, of the United Mine Workers. While I had not informed the minister I was going to ask the question, I have taken it for granted that he received a wire respecting the matter. If he has not, I shall be quite content to receive his answer to-morrow, if he prefers.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, a few minutes before the house opened I had received notice from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) of his intention to ask a question based upon a telegram similar to that just read by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion). My information is that the condition referred to has been brought to the attention of the provincial government, which has always assumed the responsibility of allocating both federal and provincial funds available for distribution in connection with direct relief.

Mr. MANION: In regard to the message which I read, do I take it that the minister completely shelves responsibility? Does he assume it to be the responsibility wholly of the provincial government? Has he communicated with the provincial government in regard to it?

Mr. ROGERS: With respect to the latter part of my hon. friend's question, I may say that immediately upon receipt of a telegram similar to the one he received the matter was brought to the attention of the provincial government. As he is aware, the provincial government under both the previous and the present administration, has been charged with the responsibility of deciding where and under what conditions direct relief shall be given. The dominion government makes monthly grants in aid to the provinces for that purpose.

Mr. MANION: Is it not so that a number of exceptions to that have been made by this government?

Mr. ROGERS: Such supplementary agreements with respect to works for the provision of employment as have been made have been brought to the attention of the house, either by the Canada Gazette or by the actual tabling of the agreements.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

WORK OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) concerning the interdepartmental committee appointed about a year ago to investigate thoroughly the Japanese problem in British Columbia. I am of course not referring to the board of review appointed to look into the question of illegal entry.

A press dispatch from Ottawa contained in the Vancouver Province, reaching Ottawa over the week-end, after setting out that there has been the greatest secrecy about this inquiry, states that the results of the inquiry may never be made public. I should like to know whether or not the report of this interdepartmental committee will be made public and, if so, when it may be expected? I would point out that on March 4, 1938, the Prime Minister stated the committee had been instructed to report at an early date.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: That would be a proper question to put on the order paper.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my recollection at the moment is that the interdepartmental committee which, as the hon. member has just said, was constituted prior to the board of review, did make a report to the government, which was intended to be in the nature of a confidential report to guide the government in action which might subsequently be necessary. The action the government thought advisable was the appointment of a board of review, on which there were several representatives.

The board made a very full inquiry. Its report has been printed and tabled in the house. It may be that I am in error in saying that there is no public report of the interdepartmental committee; if I am incorrect in that statement I shall be glad to correct it at another time. However my recollection is that the only report which the government intended to make public is the report of the board of review.

Mr. GREEN: Then there will be no report from the interdepartmental committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the facts are as just stated, I believe that to be so.

SEED GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED MEASURES FOR SUPPLYING OF SEED IN WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, has the Saskatchewan government made application to the federal government for assistance in financing relief seed for the farmers this spring? If so, on what date; and when may we expect legislation to implement this request?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as to the last part of the hon. member's question, namely that part in which he asks when he may expect legislation, I am afraid the only reply I can give is that the government cannot be expected to make a detailed announcement in advance as to its entire program of legislation.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Then, what about the first part of my question? Has any application been received from Saskatchewan?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That part had better stand as a notice of question on the order paper.

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT

INQUIRY AS TO ACTIVITIES OF MAJOR HAHN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, so that there may be no misunderstanding as to the accuracy of the records of this house in further references to the matter in the press, I desire to direct three questions to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie).

First, will the minister explain his statement of July 1, 1938, as it appears at page 4524 of Hansard, to the effect that he never met Major Hahn prior to the execution of the contract with the John Inglis Company—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Let him go on.

Mr. MacNEIL: —March, 1938, in view of his subsequent admission that he met Major Hahn in 1936?

Second, will the minister explain whether Major Hahn acted as the representative of the Canadian government during 1937 with reference to the Bren gun negotiations, and if Major Hahn received reimbursement for his expenses while abroad during 1937?

Third, will the minister explain his statement of June 3, 1938, page 3555 of Hansard, to the effect that the contract was not obtained through the good offices of the Canadian government, in view of subsequent testimony on that point?

Mr. SPEAKER: These questions should not be put at this time. They should be put on the order paper.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): Possibly this is a question of privilege, although the questions as they have been put are not proper either for the orders of the day or for the order paper. Perhaps I may be permitted to answer the questions asked.

The answer to the first question is that my recollection as I stated it last year in the house is my recollection now, and that statement was honestly, honourably and truthfully made.

My answer to the second question is that the gentleman in question did not act as the agent of this government in 1937 and to the best of my knowledge he has not received any reimbursement for his expenses during that year.

With reference to the third question, the statement made by the Minister of National Defence last year was absolutely honourably and honestly made. If my hon. friend wishes to attack the correctness of any of these statements, he has the privilege of referring the matter to the committee on privileges and elections of this house.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, January 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. E. Matthews for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Manion, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to represent in this house one of the four constituencies in the city of Winnipeg. In a comparatively few years Winnipeg has grown from a trading post to a city of 215,000 inhabitants. Within its borders are to be found all races and creeds and men of many different nationalities. It is these men and women who have built up the city of Winnipeg during the past sixty or seventy years. You will find there people of Anglo-Saxon descent, Ukrainians, Poles, Germans, and Jews. All of these people have contributed something toward the development and growth of the city of Winnipeg, which is synchronous with the growth and development of western Canada. Winnipeg in itself typifies the general development of that part of our dominion.

During the twenty-two years that I have been in public life, thirteen of which have been spent in this chamber, it has been always my aim to try to bring about a closer understanding and more harmonious relationship among the various component parts of our population, not merely of Winnipeg but of the whole of the Dominion of Canada. I regret to say I have found that one of the main obstacles to that natural development of our people has been the fact that there are many politicians in the west, as there are probably in other parts of Canada, who are too ready to try to obtain political advantage by exploiting racial feelings and misunderstandings. I have always tried to avoid that in my public life. There is however one thing of which I feel proud, and that is the fact that the people of all races and creeds have been ready to support me year in and year out during the whole twenty-two years I have been in public life.

We find to-day throughout the west a new Canadianism. This type of new Canadian is a credit I am sure to our educational institutions and to the dominion as a whole. I often wish that those who talk so much about Canada, but who have not been beyond the confines of a limited area, could pay a visit to western Canada and see this new Canadian who has developed there. If the people of the west and the people of the east could mingle a little more than they do at present, it would do much to bring about that closer understanding which I am desirous of seeing accomplished. It is with this type of new Canadian that Their Majesties the King and the Queen will shortly sojourn. Speaking for the people of the west, whom I know so well and intimately, may I say that no section of the Canadian people will give a more warm-hearted welcome to their majesties than the new Canadians of western Canada.

We are living in a chaotic world, a paradoxical world. We are living in an age of inventive genius, and yet we see all around us so much misunderstanding and disharmony among the various peoples. One almost begins to despair of what is commonly called modern civilization. When I was a boy my parents had no fear when I crossed the road to go to school because there were no fast moving vehicles that made it dangerous for a child to cross the street. The fastest moving thing we had at that time was the ordinary horse and buggy, or perhaps one of those old-fashioned bicycles, to get upon the saddle of which it was almost necessary to mount to the housetop. Tremendous changes have since taken place. When I was attending school I can remember reading Jules Verne's famous book, Around the World in Eighty Days. I thought then what a marvellous thing it would be to travel around the world in eighty days; yet look at what the inventiveness of the human race has brought about in so short space of time. First we had the bicycle; then came the telephone, the phonograph, electricity, the motor car, and other fast moving machines such as the aeroplane, and so on. There is no limit to what inventive genius has been able to do, but so far apparently no one has been able to work out a formula by which this world with its welter of races and human beings can live together in understanding and a common brotherhood.

During the past few days there has been raised in this house the question of immigration and the question of the refugee. Representing as I do a constituency made up of a mixture of races, although it is preponderantly Anglo-Saxon, I feel I should be remiss in my duty if I did not make some statement with regard to these important questions, affecting as they do so many peoples, and touching principles with which I think most of the hon. members of this house are concerned.

So much, Mr. Speaker, has been said on this question of immigration that the facts, I believe, ought to be known and given consideration and prominence. Certain hon. members have been speaking of immigration and refugees as if they were one and the same problem, with the same meaning and the same implications. There is a great difference between immigration and the problem of refugees. No one to my knowledge has ever asked in these times for an influx of immigrants in the ordinary sense of the word. No one has even asked that the country should be flooded with refugees. In matters of this importance people should not make rash statements without ascertaining the facts; nor should they deal in generalities.

What are the facts? Early last year a delegation of members of this house met the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and discussed the question with him. Subsequently a subcommittee of the cabinet was appointed to consider the matter, and a number of the members of this house had an interview with the subcommittee. The members of the cabinet present—and I think I am entitled to make reference to this—were four members who had been designated as a subcommittee to deal with this important question: the minister in charge of immigration, the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar); the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie); the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), and the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret).

What the delegation requested was that a reasonable number of refugees of all races and creeds be allowed to come forward to parts of Canada where it was considered most desirable that they should settle. The number suggested at the time was five thousand men, women and children—approximately one thousand to twelve hundred families. All the members of the subcommittee at the time appeared to me to be sympathetic, and the members of the delegation present were prepared to give proper undertakings that none of the refugees would become a public charge. The number for which entry was requested was extremely small, in view of the need, but we felt that our government should show its sympathy in the matter; and to permit refugees to enter Canada and be freed from political, religious or racial persecution was in strict accord with historic Liberal principles.

But, sir, a new phase has now been injected into the problem. Everyone who has kept himself informed as to recent events cannot help extending sympathy to the refugees for the plight in which they find themselves, whatever their race or creed may be. Never in the history of mankind have human beings been treated so barbarously as they are being treated at the present time by fascist powers. Men, women and children, families which have been rooted for centuries in the land in which they lived, have been deprived and robbed of everything they possessed and ordered to leave the country, their only crime being that their racial origin or religious beliefs were distasteful to the powers that be or their democratic principles unwelcome in totalitarian states. The pitiful plight of all these people has aroused international concern. Almost every civilized country has definitely taken sympathetic action. Canada as yet has not done so, and I should like to see her take her rightful place with other democratic countries and show her sympathy in a practical manner. Great Britain, France, Holland, Australia and many other countries are giving asylum to tens of thousands of refugees, and in no place, to my knowledge, have they been a burden to the governments that have received them.

In regard to employment it might be well to mention that lately Sir Samuel Hoare said that in England eleven thousand refugees had given employment to fifteen thousand Englishmen. Speaking now with a knowledge of the conditions, and not from mere hearsay, I say that if our government had shown the same sympathetic attitude on this question, the same conditions could have obtained here.

May I point out that the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, speaking in Saint John, New Brunswick, only on Thursday last, said that we owed a debt of gratitude to these refugees and that we should accept our quota of them. There is in this country as a whole a very large body of opinion to the effect that the government should extend the hand of brotherhood and friendship to these people. It is they who have been the first victims of fascist tyranny and oppression; who knows who will be the next?

I make this plea on broad humanitarian grounds, not for any one sect or creed but for all victims of persecution. It pained me last week, Mr. Speaker, to hear hon. members deny the plea of the refugee to the right of asylum. It seemed so inhuman. I am in a sense proud to have this opportunity of making such a plea and in a humble way to follow the teaching of ancient and modern religious thought so beautifully expressed in the words, "Do unto others as ye would have them do unto you;" and if I may be permitted to add one further quotation familiar to us all, let us if possible have peace on earth, goodwill towards men.

I have no desire to follow at length this line of argument, but I do wish to call attention to certain remarks that were made in Montreal on the twentieth of this month by the Secretary of State. I quote his words as reported in the Montreal Gazette:

> Despite all sentiments of humanity, so long as Canada has an unemployment problem there will be no "open door" for political refugees here, Hon. Fernand Rinfret, Secretary of State, declared last night in an address before the St. James Young Liberals Association.
> The government of Canada, Mr. Rinfret said, has decided to date that restrictions on immigration from foreign countries are to be maintained. There is no intention, he added, to diminish those restrictions and as long as there is an unemployment problem the government will be opposed to doing so. "This is not only my personal opinion," the Secretary of State said, "but the policy of the government to which I belong."

Possibly with a cheering and admiring audience the minister's enthusiasm ran away with his discretion, as so very often happens. My criticism in the first place is that it is a most unusual procedure for a cabinet minister to declare the government policy at a meeting in a constituency, especially when it relates to a department not under his control. Further, and of more importance, any statement of government policy should be made on the floor of the house itself, and particularly so when the house is in session. I have already referred to the fact that the Secretary of State was a member of the subcommittee, had been present at a meeting with members of the house and knew what the actual requests were. He knew that no request had ever been made from any responsible source for a policy of the "open door" in regard to immigration, or even in respect to refugees. Such being the case the minister has, to say the least, been guilty of misstating the facts, and has created a wholly erroneous impression amongst his followers. Already many of his supporters from Quebec have taken the cue from the speech of the minister and have drawn inferences which are wholly incorrect and not in accordance with the facts. Statements have been made in the house which tend to create discord between the different races in Canada. It is exactly this kind of talk that is not desirable in the dominion at the present time. Anything which tends to create discord among our people is an obstacle to real progress.

A recent statement made within the past few weeks on behalf of His Holiness the Pope may appropriately be quoted at this point:

> The thoughts and feelings of the holy Father Pope Pius XI will be correctly interpreted by declaring that he looks with human and Christian approval on every effort to show charity and to give effective assistance to all those who are innocent victims in these sad times of distress.

Thus the head of the great Roman Catholic church joins with other Christian leaders in a plea for aid to the victims of cruelty such as the world has seldom seen.

The first few words that the Secretary of State used were these: "Despite all sentiments of humanity." I can hardly believe that anyone could have used language which sounds so harsh and brutal; yet it is given as a statement of government policy. Am I to assume that the government as a whole are devoid of sentiments of humanity? I can hardly believe such to be the case; it seems almost libellous on some members of the government whom I know. I do not think there is a more humane and considerate member in this chamber than the Prime Minister. I have met him under all sorts of conditions, and I know his kindliness and thoughtfulness for others. For a cabinet minister to claim that the members of the cabinet are devoid of all human sentiments is a rash statement which I think cannot go unchallenged.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Secretary of State is not here at present, but I cannot imagine his having made a statement of that kind. I think there must be some misinterpretation of the words or the meaning of them.

Mr. HEAPS: Let me read from the Montreal Gazette. The very first words in the news item are:

> Despite all sentiments of humanity, so long as Canada has an unemployment problem there will be no "open door" for political refugees here—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is not what the hon. member was saying.

Mr. HEAPS: I quoted the whole item at first, and then I referred to that particular part. I think I was absolutely fair in my remarks; I did not take one sentence out of its context.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If my hon. friend will permit, he said the Secretary of State had said that the government have no sentiments of humanity. What the Secretary of State said was just the contrary—although we have these sentiments, so long as there is unemployment, and so on. That is quite different.

Mr. HEAPS: No, I adhere to what I said. According to this news item, the Secretary of State started off by saying, "despite all sentiments of humanity," and then declared that he was speaking for the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I imagine that the passage he has read is a translation of what the Secretary of State said. I should think the minister must in the first instance have said something about sentiments of humanity calling for a certain course of action, and he may have gone on to say that despite those sentiments of humanity certain things could not be done. The thing he referred to as not being possible was the open door, something very different from not considering a settlement in the best possible way short of an open door.

Mr. HEAPS: I can only go by the press reports. I have read the report several times. It would have been better had the minister left out all questions of sentiment in discussing the matter. Perhaps at another time the minister might explain in the house his own words. But it seems strange that on a question of this kind the Secretary of State should go to Montreal and declare the government's policy. Why should not the government's policy be declared in this house, so that there would be no misunderstanding? If the Prime Minister, as I suggested, wishes to declare a policy on this very difficult problem I think there is no doubt he could choose whatever time he desired for doing so.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Perhaps my hon. friend might also wait until the Secretary of State is here to listen to the charges.

Mr. HEAPS: It is not my fault that he is not here; it is his fault. I think it is the custom when the orders of the day are called for all ministers to be in their places, and to-day I did not see the Secretary of State in his place at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course they are slaves.

Mr. HEAPS: Had the Secretary of State been in his place to-day I would have notified him of my intention to deal with this question. I am glad however that the Prime Minister feels that an error has been made by the Secretary of State—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. HEAPS: Oh, he cannot get away from these things. I am satisfied from the way so many of his supporters took up the cue that this report in the Montreal Gazette must be substantially correct. I do not believe that a paper like the Montreal Gazette, which is very fair in its news reports, would go out of its way to concoct a story on its own account.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My friend has not always been such a friend of the Montreal Gazette.

Mr. HEAPS: I said so far as its news columns are concerned. I have never complained about its news reports.

I do not intend to spend the whole of my time on this particular question of refugees. What I have to say may be condensed into a few words. I hope that hon. members of this house, irrespective of race, creed or political conviction, will use their influence in the direction of a better understanding among all sections of the Canadian people. I know how political parties sometimes function; I realize that in the past issues were raised on which it was felt one party might obtain an advantage over the other. But where common humanity calls for action I hope that no group will try to exploit the issue. In order to avoid any such possibility I suggest that the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition should get together. They could also if they wished call in the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, who represents a fairly large body of opinion in this country, and also the leader of the Social Credit group. The Prime Minister might make a statement to the house respecting the matter. I am of the opinion that such a method of approach to the refugee question would eliminate any fear of political advantage to one party or the other.

It has been stated further that labour is hostile to the admission of refugees to Canada, but I believe that generally speaking the assertion is entirely erroneous. First of all let me quote from a statement that was submitted to the dominion government on January 6 by the All-Canadian Congress of Labour. At page 15 of their submission this is what they say:

> In the meantime, however, the plight of the refugees in Europe is forcing itself upon public attention, and, if only because the problem has become intensified by the invasion of Czechoslovakia, which was permitted by the Munich agreement and which at least postponed the sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of young Canadians, the waste of enormous material wealth, and the piling up of an unbearable burden of debt, Canada is believed to be under a moral obligation to cooperate fully with all international bodies which are trying to relieve the situation, and also to provide a place of refuge within her own borders for an appreciable number of these refugees.
> Even if it were necessary to maintain these immigrants, the cost to the nation would be infinitesimal in comparison with what war would have cost. The Congress therefore joins with the many Canadian citizens who have given this question careful consideration in urging that the government present to the forthcoming session of parliament such amendments to the Immigration Act as will permit the admission of refugees, under adequate safeguards as to number, occupation, or other conditions, and that it will assist in every possible way in the attempts which are being made to lessen the suffering of these unfortunate victims of inhuman and relentless persecution. It is felt, however, that any efforts to assist refugees should not involve trade or financial concessions to governments which hold refugees for ransom.

Let me go a step further.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before my hon. friend goes any further, may I ask whether he has what the dominion trades and labour congress had to say on the same subject?

Mr. HEAPS: I was going to refer to that, and I am glad that the right hon. gentleman has asked the question. So far as the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada is concerned, in the last year it has taken identically the same stand on the question of immigration—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is that?

Mr. HEAPS: —but it has not made any pronouncement at all on the question of refugees; and knowing as I do, the members of that congress and those that are affiliated with them, knowing their sentiments as I do —and I do not speak from mere hearsay—I can tell the government from my place in this chamber that I do not believe there would be any objection from that organization if the government permitted a reasonable number of refugees to enter Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was present at the time the congress made their representations to the government and my recollection is that in their presentation they stated emphatically that while there was unemployment they did not wish to have any immigration of any kind into Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: But I have had this question under consideration more recently with many people closely associated with the congress.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is only three weeks ago that they told us that.

Mr. HEAPS: The Prime Minister is mixing the question of immigration with the question of refugees.

Mr. REID: They are immigrants just the same.

Mr. HEAPS: There is a difference between the two. The appeal on behalf of refugees is made on purely humanitarian grounds to allow people who are fleeing from persecution to come in, to give them the right of asylum, that old historic Liberal principle vindicated by men like Gladstone and Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman. I remember when certain refugees found it necessary to flee from Russia and obtained asylum in Britain. This was in 1905, and who was it that welcomed them? None other than the prime minister of Great Britain himself. And to-day, if I make a plea in this chamber for refugees of all races and creeds, I am at least appealing to the same liberal sentiments on the part of hon. gentlemen who now occupy the treasury benches.

In this group over here we are as well acquainted with the labour movement in Canada as are hon. gentlemen opposite. I have been associated with it for a considerable number of years and I still have the support of the members of these organizations. In fact, ninety-five per cent of the people in my constituency are working people, and I know that no working man or woman of any race or creed would object to the influx of a reasonable number of refugees as a humanitarian act at this particular time. I venture to assert that if reference were made to those people who to-day are functioning as the executive of the trades and labour congress and other officials of the trade councils across the country, there would be found, generally speaking, no objection to refugees being allowed to come here in reasonable numbers. I know whereof I speak when I make this statement.

I will now leave the question of refugees, having dealt with it longer than I intended, thanks to interjections from the opposite side.

The Secretary of State, probably in the exuberance of the moment or encouraged by the plaudits of his audience, also made reference to the unemployment situation. Let me quote from the Montreal Star:

> He pointed out that the federal government was ready to assume the cost of unemployment insurance for the whole dominion, but the main obstacle was opposition from the government of Quebec.

I would ask either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Labour whether that is a statement of fact, whether the dominion government is prepared to assume the whole cost of unemployment insurance in Canada, as reported in the Montreal Star of January 21, and purporting to give what was stated in Montreal by the Secretary of State. I do not know whether on this question he spoke on behalf of the government, and when I read it I wondered whether it was a new government policy being enunciated in Montreal. I suggest that the next time any minister of the crown is delegated to declare government policy it might be a wiser thing to have that policy declared from the floor of the house where hon. members can hear it and Hansard can take it down.

Mr. ROGERS: Has the hon. gentleman the statement that was made there?

Mr. HEAPS: I have just quoted from the Montreal Star.

Mr. ROGERS: Read the statement on unemployment insurance.

Mr. HEAPS: I will read again what the Secretary of State is reported to have said:

> He pointed out that the federal government was ready to assume the cost of unemployment insurance for the whole dominion, but the main obstacle was opposition from the government of Quebec.

I wish to know whether that is a policy of the government, that is all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The policy of the government with respect to unemployment insurance has been that as soon as this government receives power to deal with unemployment insurance as a federal matter the government is prepared to take over the entire cost of unemployment insurance—

Mr. HEAPS: The Prime Minister is getting into a little difficulty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —apart from any contribution from any province at all.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. HEAPS: That is qualifying the statement as contained in this paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under a contributory scheme of course.

Mr. HEAPS: But before the Prime Minister made the qualification it was stated that the government was prepared to assume the whole cost of a federal unemployment insurance scheme. That is what the Secretary of State said in this item, and that is what I want to find out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Secretary of State was evidently referring to the situation as between the provinces and the dominion.

Mr. HEAPS: What he said is obvious. He was probably playing a little bit of politics.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Why does not my hon. friend wait until the Secretary of State is here? I give him my word of honour that if I had to attack him I would wait until he was in his seat—and very often, he himself is not in his seat.

Mr. HEAPS: On Friday I was scheduled to speak to-day and we were talking about closing the debate to-morrow. I did not know whether the Secretary of State would be here, and if I did not get my turn to-day, I might not get it to-morrow.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Did my hon. friend tell him that he was going to lay a charge against him?

Mr. HEAPS: This is not a charge.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is, based on the Montreal Star and the Montreal Gazette—

Mr. HEAPS: But that is not a charge. I am not making an insinuation.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): —strong C.C.F. newspapers.

Mr. HEAPS: I have never heard such childish remarks coming from the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I am surprised at him.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Reciprocity.

Mr. HEAPS: Thank you. To say I am making a charge against an hon. member of this house when I quote from a responsible newspaper what that hon. member is supposed to have said—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I say it is unfair comment.

Mr. HEAPS: The Minister of Justice says it is a charge because I am quoting from a newspaper. In other words any hon. member of this house who quotes what another hon. member is reported to have said is guilty of making a charge.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Make it unfair comment.

Mr. HEAPS: Then we will say it is comment, according to my right hon. friend; even say it is unfair comment. It cannot be said that it is a charge. All I am trying to find out is whether this is government policy. Now I am told that the policy of the government is not what is purported to have been said by the Secretary of State, although the Secretary of State claimed to be speaking on behalf of the government at that meeting.

I am interested in the unemployment situation, and because of that I felt constrained to refer to this item appearing in a newspaper purporting to contain the remarks of a minister speaking for the crown. We have had an unemployment situation in this country since away back in 1930, and only a few days ago we heard the Minister of Labour talk about what the government have done for unemployment in this country. He was enthusiastic with regard to the achievements of the government in coping with the situation, and that was what I wanted to deal with principally this afternoon if time had permitted.

I find that in November, 1935, when the government came into power, we had 423,000 persons who were unemployed—that is according to the bureau of statistics. In November, 1938, exactly three years later, the number of unemployed according to the same authority was 398,000, or a drop of about 25,000 in that period of time.

Mr. ROGERS: I suppose the hon. gentleman would acknowledge that in each of those three years the actual number of wage earners in this country would have been increased by the entry into the wage earning group of those who were not within that group previously?

Mr. HEAPS: That is perfectly correct, but does the Minister of Labour realize how many people returned to the old country during that period of time?

Mr. ROGERS: Does my hon. friend know?

Mr. HEAPS: No. Would the minister expect me to know when the government does not know?

Mr. ROGERS: Does my hon. friend seriously suggest that the number would be in the thousands?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes; some people put it at many, many thousands, yet there has been a drop of only 25,000 in that period of time in spite of all the efforts of the government. Then may I go a step further on that very point. Supposing my hon. friend the Minister of Labour, who held a very responsible and honoured position at Queen's university and who is a keen student of economics, had a group of students with whom he was discussing the unemployment situation, altogether apart from political considerations. What would he say about the period from 1930 to 1938? Undoubtedly he would tell his students that starting in 1930 there was a downward curve of industry in this country which reached its bottom in 1933; and that from 1933 there was a rise in employment, an increase in trade activities, which reached its peak in 1937. I know that is what he would tell his students; that is what any economist would say. What does that mean? It means that this period cut right across governments, whether they were Liberal or Conservative.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry, but the hon. member has exhausted his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not wish to take up more than my time, because I know there are many other hon. members who are anxious to speak. We will have other opportunities of dealing with this question.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member has the unanimous consent of the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: I will conclude, Mr. Speaker. I know other opportunities will be afforded before very long to discuss this question of unemployment, as I have discussed it in previous years. But this parliament cannot ignore this very important fact, that of all the questions that confront us the most important are these questions of unemployment and the plight of our youth. I am pleased that the government have taken steps to deal with the youth problem; but as the minister stated in reply to the leader of the opposition, even if a minister were appointed in charge of youth that would not of necessity provide employment. But the other steps the government have taken as yet have not been able to provide more employment, and in my opinion the only way to deal with the problem is by so readjusting our economic conditions that both young and older people will have an opportunity to become self-respecting citizens.

I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the house for the courtesy in giving me these extra few minutes.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), who has just taken his seat, always makes a useful contribution to the debates of this house, and this occasion is no exception. He has brought forward the subject of immigration and the kindred subject of some haven for refugees. The absence from the speech from the throne of any statement whatever in connection with a matter of such importance to this country as immigration is, I think, a fair matter for comment. Of course the subject presents a contentious and difficult question. There can be no doubt, however, that the immigration policy followed, we will say, from 1925 to 1930 contributed in very large measure to the serious problem of unemployment we found in this country in 1930. There can be no doubt, further, that there is room in Canada for a class of selected immigrants who will be able to make their own way, who will be able to sustain themselves and contribute to the solution of the problems of this country.

The debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne affords members of this house an opportunity for general discussion of the problems of Canada and of conditions as they find them in their constituencies. It provides an opportunity to advance suggestions for improvement as well as to offer criticism of the policies of the government, and gives the individual member a chance to bring to the attention of the house and of the government local conditions and problems in his own constituency or locality. Before discussing the speech from the throne, the address in reply, the amendment and the subamendment thereto, I desire to deal briefly with a matter of importance to the constituency and that part of the dominion from which I come. I have referred to it on previous occasions. It is not a matter of purely local importance, but one of wider significance.

Last August the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States united in a very interesting ceremony in connection with the formal opening of an international bridge. Prior to the ceremony which took place at the bridge itself an honorary degree had been conferred upon the president by Queen's university, and on that occasion interesting addresses were delivered by the president and the prime minister. The occasion was one of unusual importance. Expressions of friendship and goodwill were mutual, and the president took advantage of the opportunity to make a declaration of policy on behalf of the United States which was in advance of anything which had been stated previously in that connection. I heard the president say that the United States would not stand idly by and see any alien or foreign force invade the soil of Canada. It was an expression of goodwill which was appreciated, and it was acknowledged by the prime minister.

The bridge, the occasion for the ceremony, crosses the St. Lawrence river through the heart of the Thousand islands. It is not an ordinary bridge but is unique in that it consists of a series of bridges, there being a distance of about six miles between one bridgehead and the other. Use has been made of the islands in the intervening spaces.

Since the opening of the bridge nearly 100,000 motor cars have passed over it. At the date of opening the roadways were not complete; in fact they are not yet entirely completed. It has been said, and I think truthfully, that within a radius of three hundred miles from the bridge live one-third of the population of Canada and one-fourth of the population of the United States. This is a striking statement, and I make it simply to show the possibilities in the development of tourist traffic at this point. The amount of traffic has been beyond expectations, and is capable of great development.

The suggestion has been made that a national park should be established at the bridgehead on the Canadian side. Local committees have been set up to promote this undertaking. From time to time representations have been made. We are told the general policy of the dominion with respect to parks is that the province must acquire the land and turn it over to the dominion, and the dominion assumes responsibility for maintenance and development. There are however a few exceptions to the practice—perhaps not many. In some cases the dominion has acquired directly, either by expropriation or through purchase, certain lands for park purposes, as shown by a return brought down last session following the adoption of a motion I placed on the order paper.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) are thoroughly familiar with the conditions in the area I have mentioned. They have all visited it, and have information on the subject. A local committee has been formed, of which Mr. J. G. Mitchell, of Lansdowne, is chairman. Mr. Mitchell, was very active and influential in urging construction of the bridge and in a very large measure contributed to the undertaking. In company with others he and his committee are now interested in the area about Gananoque, as far west as Kingston and as far east as Brockville, as to the possibilities offered for the establishment of a park.

I take this opportunity to impress upon the government, and particularly upon the Minister of Mines and Resources, under whose jurisdiction a park would come, and the Minister of Labour, who represents that part of the province, the desirability of taking some action towards acquiring land for the establishment of the park. If action is not taken in the near future values will be created and buildings of an undesirable type, from a scenic standpoint, will be constructed, with the result that to some extent at least the natural beauty will be destroyed. Values will be created which do not now exist, and, if action is not taken, in the end the government will be forced to pay a much larger sum to acquire land which, in the interests of the people of Canada, should be acquired for park purposes.

Let me urge upon the government and particularly upon the responsible ministers the necessity for action at this session; otherwise it will be too late and the costs will be very much increased. I urge the point not from any narrow local viewpoint or only from the standpoint of the constituency, but for the purpose of promoting tourist traffic.

The proposed visit of their majesties recalls the coronation of 1937. The impression made upon those who were privileged to attend, and upon the world at large, was very striking and beneficial. We were convinced that we were members of one family, one partnership, and we were reminded of the importance and the value of that association. We continue to appreciate all these advantages, but I fear that sometimes we shrink from sharing the responsibilities that relationship involves. We emphasize our rights, privileges and advantages, and we minimize our duties and responsibilities. We must be prepared to share responsibilities as well as advantages.

The banquet in Westminster Hall, which was attended by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice, other representatives of Canada at the empire conference and the members of the delegation of the Empire Parliamentary Association, was an interesting and historic occasion. The king responded in person to the toast to the health of his majesty. I believe that that was the first time that anything of that kind occurred. The thanks of those present were expressed eloquently and appropriately by the speaker of the House of Commons of Great Britain and by you, Mr. Speaker, representing the overseas delegates. We were all very proud and happy on that occasion, which was one of deep significance. Following the enactment of the statute of Westminster the relationship of Canada to the crown became a little different from what it had been before. The action of his majesty on that occasion showed an appreciation of that change and a disposition on his part to come close to the representatives of his people, whether they resided in a dominion or in a colony.

The visit of their majesties to Canada is a further manifestation of that disposition toward their subjects. The conclusion to be drawn from it is that the throne is not aloof or afar off, that it is not an institution above and apart from the people; it is set up in the midst of the peoples of the empire. We have an indication of their majesties' sympathies and desire to cooperate and live in the bonds of deepest affection and sympathy with their subjects throughout the empire. In the British commonwealth of nations the king reigns, but the people rule. We have a splendid manifestation of those democratic principles which we value so highly. I know that on the occasion of this visit the people of Canada will express their appreciation to the fullest extent. It is to be regretted that the visit of their majesties is to be so short, and that many people will not be able to see them. Their visit to the United States also has significance. It will tend to create a greater measure of understanding between the two democracies and a clearer appreciation of their common objectives and purposes.

The speech from the throne refers to the trade agreement recently negotiated between Canada and the United States. This agreement will be discussed fully and in detail at the proper time when the resolution and the bill are before us. The Prime Minister referred to the sequence of events leading up to the negotiation of this treaty. He did not go back very far. As I recall it, he went back only to 1935, when the previous trade agreement between Canada and the United States was negotiated. I hope that during the debate on the resolution and the bill we will have an opportunity of going back farther than 1935. It would be very interesting indeed if we had the time to go back to 1896 and trace the development of trade from that time on.

There seems to be a disposition on the part of some hon. members on the other side of the house to create an impression that we on this side, particularly the members of the Conservative group, have no appreciation of the value of trade. Listening to some of the speeches one would think that we were entirely oblivious to or ignorant of the advantages of trade and that some appreciation of them had suddenly dawned upon hon. gentlemen opposite. One would think the government had suddenly discovered a new method of promoting trade and that nothing that amounted to very much had been done in the past in that connection. The history of trade in Canada proves that to be inaccurate and misleading.

It would be very interesting to review the history of trade from 1921 to 1930 and to find out why the markets of the United States and many other countries were practically closed to Canada during that time. It would be interesting to find out why the Hawley-Smoot and Underwood tariffs were erected against us in the United States. Falling revenues, adverse balances and severe unemployment settled down as a cloud all over the dominion in 1930. Why was not the remedy of trade for those conditions found prior to that time? Then we come to 1932 at which time we find a lively appreciation of the conditions that existed in this country on the part of the government of that day. They realized the necessity of extending markets and developing trade, and successful efforts were made along those lines which resulted in the negotiation of the empire trade agreements.

Looking at what happened from this distance I am sure that the unprejudiced and unbiased opinion of all in this house must be that those agreements materially and substantially contributed to the prosperity that started in 1933 and continued through 1934, 1935, 1936 and 1937. It was down a little in 1938. All this proves undoubtedly that at that time, as always, there was a lively appreciation of the importance of trade and a disposition to promote trade. There was a desire to make trade agreements wherever and whenever possible, provided they could be made on fair terms without sacrificing the interests of Canada.

Following the 1932 empire trade agreements we found a change in the attitude of the United States toward this dominion. They were much more disposed to negotiate and enter into trade agreements. In fact, when the Prime Minister went to Washington in 1935, immediately following his election and the election of his friends, he found that great progress had been made in the negotiation of a treaty between Canada and the United States. So much work had been done that it took him only a few days to close up the transaction; and he will be able to tell us later, as he has done on former occasions, of the negotiations that led up to the completion of that agreement. He was very anxious to conclude it, and perhaps we are justified in assuming that because of his anxiety he made certain concessions at that time which were refused prior to the time he came into office, and that it was because of those concessions, which could not be secured by the United States prior to the Prime Minister's visit to Washington, that the completion of that agreement was possible in 1935. However, the signatures were put on the dotted line, and the result has been, so far as Canada is concerned, an adverse balance of trade.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) in his address to this house the other day, said in reviewing trade statistics that Canada had a favourable balance of trade with every country in the world except Italy and the United States. I suggest it is not unfair or unreasonable for the people of Canada to expect that they should have a favourable balance of trade with the United States when we have it practically with the rest of the world. When there are in that country 120,000,000 of people to purchase our products, and a much smaller number in these other countries, I do suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is not unreasonable for Canada to expect that we should have a favourable rather than unfavourable balance of trade with the United States.

It is difficult for a private member to analyse and come to a definite conclusion as to the effects of a trade agreement such as the one that will be submitted to us, because the schedules are complicated, and items of the former tariff have been broken up and separated. But when the agreement comes before the house in the committee stage I trust that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) will be prepared to give the details of exports and imports of the various items, and to correlate the items of the agreement with the old tariff and with the items of the agreement of 1935. It will undoubtedly be found that there are in this new agreement some advantages here and there; it will also undoubtedly be found that there are some disadvantages in it; and it will be the duty of members of this house, representing their own constituencies, particular districts and particular interests, to weigh the advantages and disadvantages one against the other, and come to a conclusion. But there is one conclusion that we can come to safely, and that is that the completion of this agreement, whatever other results it may have, will result in increased unemployment in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. STEWART: I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we are now giving concessions for concessions which we are getting from the United States, and which concessions we should have secured in 1935 for the concessions we then gave.

Much has been said on the question of unemployment, and I can add very little to the enormous volume of criticism that has already been expressed in this house. The undertone of speeches even of the supporters of the government has, with very few exceptions, been one of disappointment, an expression of failure, and the hope that something may be done to improve conditions. It has been pointed out that the promises that were made in this connection have not been fulfilled. What about the commission that was to have administered unemployment relief? It has not materialized. Trade expansion, so far as there has been any, has failed to solve the problem of unemployment. Our young people have not been set to work.

I want to refer particularly with one group of unemployed, the transients. A plan of dealing with this class was adopted by the former government by the establishment of relief camps. It was never contended, Mr. Speaker, that that was the ideal solution, but it was an effort to do something at least for these helpless, homeless, hopeless people who were roving over the Dominion of Canada from coast to coast, riding on freight trains, travelling up and down the highways, homeless in every sense of the word. The municipalities would not recognize them; the provinces disclaimed responsibility. So the dominion government of that day said: This is a problem with which we should deal; we will establish places where these poor helpless and homeless men can be provided with food, clothing, shelter and medical attendance until they find work.

Some agitation grew up inside the camps; but worse still, the political agitation in this house and outside of it became so strong that, purely for political purposes, the opposition of that day determined to destroy the usefulness of those camps, and they succeeded. When they came into office they abolished them, as they had said they would do, but they failed to provide any substitute. Since then these people have been wandering over the country, giving trouble in the municipalities, begging, getting into prison and all sorts of trouble. This government has particularly failed in recognizing its responsibility and its duty to the municipalities, to the provinces and to this group of unemployed. The Minister of Labour on one or two occasions intimated that camps might be reestablished, on a different basis. I suggest to him in good faith that he consider doing that now. He asked for suggestions, and has been given many in this house. Even the suggestions and recommendations of the employment commission have not been adopted. I have perhaps no reason to hope that he will adopt any suggestion of mine on this occasion, however I give it to him for what it is worth and in good faith.

I suggest that even at this late date—and it is three years too late—he reestablish the camps for these single homeless friendless men. Let him establish them on any condition that he likes. If the camps that were established were not on a sound and proper basis, surely he can devise some other basis. Surely he can find something better than public buildings in which to shelter these men. I suggest that, having established the camps, the men be taken into them, cared for, trained and strengthened, and that work be found for them. Let me suggest one way of finding work, namely that the government embark upon a program of building secondary roads throughout the dominion. The trans-Canada highway of course must be completed, but there are thousands of miles of secondary roads in Ontario and other provinces that are in bad condition. These unemployed in the different localities could be set to work, and as far as necessary drafts could be made from the central camps of small mobile units of trained men for the purpose of improving the highways throughout the province.

Many excuses are given for the continuance of unemployment. They say the attitude of the provinces is hostile, we have not had the measure of cooperation that we should have had, there have been crop failures, and all the other excuses outlined in the speech from the throne. We did not hear of these between 1930 and 1935, although the same causes were there in just as aggravated a form, or more so than at present. But then everything was blamed, not upon drought or any other causes, but upon the tariff policies of the Bennett government.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. STEWART: I am sorry, but I do not desire to trespass upon the rule. I shall take advantage of some other occasion to give expression to some of the thoughts and ideas that I have in my notes.

I propose to vote for the amendment proposed by my leader, because I am convinced that it exactly expresses the sentiments of the great majority of the people of Canada to-day.

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) will not expect me to follow his remarks during the past forty minutes. I should like, however, to congratulate him on having at last got away from the mental attitude of his party in 1911 when they raised the cry of "No truck or trade with the Yankees."

Mr. STEWART: I never raised that cry. We never raised it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. gentleman's party did so; to deny it is to fly into the face of history. The record is clear.

Mr. STEWART: Give it to us.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I absolve my hon. friend, because I do not see how he, living so close to the boundary, and with the intelligence and kindness of disposition that he possesses, could have endorsed that cry.

Mr. STEWART: I never did.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I accept the hon. gentleman's word, and I am glad that his party as well as himself appear to be getting away from that mental attitude, and to approve trade with the United States, under some conditions at least. But it is remarkable that the trade agreement which has done so much to help trade in this country during the past three years was so nearly ready for signing long before November, 1935, but yet had to wait until a new government, motivated by a new spirit, came into power, before being concluded, and was then signed within a few days. A good part of the trade which we are enjoying to-day arises out of that treaty signed three years ago.

The only other point in my hon. friend's speech that I propose to touch upon is the relief camps. I would say that the people of Canada were abundantly pleased that the relief camps were abolished. Contrast the situation where thousands of young men were cooped up in unwholesome and unhealthy surroundings at a cost to the government of $40 a month, with the plan of this government under which men go out to farms or other employment in wholesome and healthy surroundings and are doing some work at least to give them an appetite for their food.

Mr. PERLEY: On the highways.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There is no need to go on the highways for lack of work under the scheme proposed by this government. On these farms men have an opportunity to earn their own living and get, in addition, $7.50 a month from the government of the province concerned and the government of Canada, and they have the satisfaction of knowing that they are doing something useful, and of living in wholesome surroundings. Who wants to go back to the twenty cents a day scheme, leading to conditions that brought about the riots, about which no one wants to think or speak, and which resulted in bloodshed in the capital city of Saskatchewan.

Mr. STEWART: That was not a camp.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): But the men were stirred to desperation by conditions in the camps. We cannot tie up large numbers of men in camps—

Mr. STEWART: They were not tied; they were free to come and go.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): They came, but apparently they were not free to go.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, they were free to go.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): When you keep men in camps like that without any useful work, they are bound to be discontented, and the same situation will always result. They lost their liberty and sense of opportunity and responsibility.

Mr. SPENCE: They were fed and cared for; that is more than the present government have done.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is all I intend to say about the address of my hon. friend.

An hon. MEMBER: It is more than enough.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Why should I waste time in threshing old straw? Before passing on, I should like to offer my sincere congratulations to the hon. member for London (Mr. Manion) the leader of the opposition. I wish him sincerely all the success that is good for him.

Mr. MANION: How much will the hon. member give me?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I do not know how much that will be; I cannot measure my hon. friend so as to put limits on it, but I know he will take it from me as sincerely as I offer it. On behalf of my constituency as well as myself I express the hope that he will meet with all the success that he and his party deserve in rebuilding their prestige in this country. At this time also I wish to express my own satisfaction and that of the people of my constituency at seeing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) back in the house with a measure of strength and health. All the people of Canada, and particularly those of the province from which he came, watched with fear and later with sympathy during his illness; are gratified that his strength is returning, and sincerely hope that he will be able to go about his duties, and that in the months and years to come his old activity and energy, which were so great, will be restored.

I have heard hon. members in this house divide the speech from the throne into three parts, just as Julius Caesar divided Gaul. I intend to divide my remarks into three parts also, and I shall deal first with some of the claims set forth by certain hon. gentlemen opposite, because I think in some instances they have been less than fair to the province from which they come and less than fair to the government in power in Canada to-day. If I present to them my view of the truth, I hope that they will not be unduly provoked but will themselves determine whether that view as I give it is a reasonable exposition of what might be called the truth.

First, I would refer to some remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), a gentleman whom I respect and whom I have known for a long time, but whose manner of showing up his own country and its institutions in the worst light is one that I cannot possibly commend. As reported at page 75 of Hansard of January 17, he read a letter from a school-teacher in Saskatchewan, and simply left it at that. This teacher made the statement that she received a cash salary of $18 a month. I do not know whether that is true or not. The hon. gentleman gave no particulars of the district concerned, so that it is difficult to trace the statement and ascertain its accuracy or otherwise. I do know, however, that the people of Saskatchewan in recent years have taxed themselves, through the education tax, to such an extent that their government to-day is able to do with their money what in recent years was done with money advanced by this government. The grant from the provincial government to a school district such as that in which the lady in question teaches, if it is an organized district, is $30 a month for a one-room school, and that alone would provide a higher salary.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Except that they do not get it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) know that is not true.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, it is.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. gentleman knows it is not true.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Most certainly it is.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): This is the truth: The government accounts now, as at all times, are paid, but not promptly on the dot because certain formalities have to be observed and some delays are unavoidable. But the money is absolutely paid, and I defy my hon. friend to say on a platform in Saskatchewan that the grants are not paid. They may not be paid on the last day of the school term, but he knows they are being paid.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the teachers are not getting their salaries; that is the difficulty.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If any teachers are not getting their salaries, the remedy for that grievance is for the teacher to take the matter up with the parents, and the parents with the board. Anyone who defames the people of Saskatchewan adds insult to injury if he says that the people of that province care so little for education that they will not see to it that their boards pay the teachers at least up to the limit of the grant which is provided.

Mr. COLDWELL: My hon. friend will agree that coal and other essentials have to be provided out of the grant and that only one-half of the Saskatchewan education tax goes for education.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I have no objection to the hon. members explaining, but the more they explain the deeper they get into the mire. In addition to the grant, raised from $200 a year as it was under the friends of my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar—

Mr. COLDWELL: Not my friends.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): They are not his friends? Why, my hon. friend was one of the midwives that brought forth the cooperative government in a Regina hotel some years ago.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. I would ask the hon. gentleman to be accurate in his statements. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has good reason to know that the statement just made is not accurate.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is not a point of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is a question of truth.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member says that in addition to the increased grant, which is now $30 per school month—and his leader said that this lady teacher received only $18—coal and other necessities are supplied to the school. This enables the school board to pay over the full amount of the grant.

Mr. COLDWELL: Out of the $30.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): No; coal supplies do not come out of the grant. My hon. friend spent a great deal of his time in lauding conditions in New Zealand. Ordinarily my answer to that would be, if I wanted to belittle him, to ask him whether he had ever been in New Zealand. I shall not ask him that question; it would not be fair or reasonable. I shall tell him, however, that if he went to New Zealand he would find, taking into account climatic conditions, natural resources, the nature of the people and other factors, that all these circumstances themselves account for the present situation in that dominion, and they have no reference to anything beneficial effected by a semi-socialist government elected a few months ago. As the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) pointed out, when a change has been brought about in an economic system after that system has been in operation for a considerable time, and when wealth has been accumulated, it is easy to distribute that wealth and dissipate it, giving some appearance of prosperity for a little while. But that prosperity never lasts unless production is increased and marketing is put on a better basis.

Mr. COLDWELL: As it has been.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That remains to be seen. Has production been increased?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It must be borne in mind that there have not been crop failures in New Zealand as there have been in Saskatchewan, and that is one of the main circumstances which explain the state of affairs in that country to-day. Those are the reasons, and not the ones suggested by the hon. gentleman.

Let me now turn to the remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). This government, he declared, is known as the do-nothing government. All I can say is, any government that can carry out an alleged do-nothing policy and yet be instrumental in increasing the national income to the extent of three-quarters of a billion dollars per annum two years after their election is the sort of government that the people want. If, however, the hon. gentleman means by a do-something government that the government should be the sort of one that he and I have witnessed in recent years, with ministers junketing around at political banquets and picnics, burning up the highways at high speed, moving ceaselessly around so as to give one the impression of squirrels in a cage, under the delusion that motion is progress—if that is the kind of government he has in mind, then I tell him emphatically that it is not the kind of government the Canadian people want.

Mr. PERLEY: Tell the house how many trips your ministers made in the last six or eight months.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If that were the issue I would tell the hon. member, but he can find out. The hon. gentleman did not tell us that he wrote to the departments at Regina responsible for the distribution of relief to inform them of conditions existing in the country if those conditions were not favourable. Oh, no. He confined himself to the details of a single court case in which his friend the leader of the Conservative party in Saskatchewan was one of the participants in the court proceedings, as he had a perfect right to be. Possibly the hon. member has from that source information to which I have not access. I would point out—and it is of the utmost importance—that friends in Ontario and Quebec, in the maritimes and other provinces, have in many instances, either out of their abundance or out of their little, contributed to help the people of western Canada in the time of dire distress which they have experienced in the past few years, and I wish to assure all such friends that what they contributed was not deliberately dissipated either by the government or by any of the authorities. It is true that mistakes were made and wrong was done, but it was as a result of checking up by the authorities that wrong-doing was discovered and some men are to-day expiating their crimes in gaol. It is unfortunate that this is so, but human nature being what it is, such things will always occur. It has been so under past governments and is likely to be so to some small extent in the future.

I wish to call the attention of the house to one or two other matters dealt with by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. With reference to the question of wheat marketing he said:

The farmers of western Canada realize now that there must be some control of production, or at least some control of marketing. I am not in favour of controlling acreage, but if I had the opportunity I think I could work out a scheme for controlling deliveries to the market. I had another resolution ready for the order paper—I do not suppose it will be reached this session—to the effect that the government should consider the advisability of amending the Canada Wheat Board Act to empower the board to control deliveries to it through a system of licensing producers to sell or deliver a given number of bushels per seeded acre, and that the permits to sell should be negotiable among the producers only.

I understand the meaning and implications of one of those sentences. The other I do not understand, and I am going to bring it to the attention of my hon. friend in order that he may elucidate it to the house at some later date. He is recommending that only a certain number of bushels per seeded acre could be sold. In other words, he is making a bid to keep the marginal lands under cultivation and to penalize the land with high crop returns. The land the dominion government wants to keep in use and under cultivation is the land he is willing to penalize by allowing only a certain number of bushels per seeded acre to be marketed. Surely that is too ridiculous for even a Conservative government to think of, assuming they had the opportunity to take such action. As to what he means by saying that the sale of these certificates should be permitted only among the producers, I am at a loss to know. I wonder if he is going to encourage some kind of speculation in dealing with these certificates. I leave him to answer that question at some later date; I simply draw the point to his attention now. There is one thing I want to thank him for. He said that after all he had seen, after all the years he had lived in the west, he was not a pessimist but was still an optimist in regard to the question of marketing of wheat. I thank him sincerely for that, because I have reason to believe he is on the right track in making that statement.

Mr. PERLEY: I feel quite sure my hon. friend will support my scheme when I have a chance to explain it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That will be fine. Then the hon. member for Weyburn took up a good deal of the time of the house in complaining about Canada and conditions within this country. He talked about defence and suggested graft, until the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) asked him where the evidence was. Then he withdrew the insinuation. But the fact is that he talked about it in this house; and if he had not been checked when he was, the hon. member would have been able to go out into the country and say he had dealt with the question of graft in the House of Commons and that his statements had gone uncontradicted. So I think it was well that the point was raised. My hon. friend complained a great deal because, he said, we were selling abroad a certain amount of material which might be used for munitions. He went on to say:

> But what right have we to ask the Canadian taxpayer to contribute between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000 a year for national defence, while at the same time we permit armament manufacturers in this dominion to send a steady stream of aeroplanes, munitions and war material to the very countries against which this government is asking us to arm ourselves?

I remember that two years ago, when a small increase was asked in the defence estimates, my hon. friends over there kept saying, "Against whom are we to arm?" The hon. member for Weyburn has found out; we are arming apparently against the people to whom we are sending a stream of munitions and armaments. My hon. friend nods his head. Well, perhaps I am not so well informed as he is, but I do not know of any country to which we have sent aeroplanes and streams of munitions that is likely to be in the field against Canada now or at any other time. If he refers to scrap-iron, nickel and matters of that kind, I think his attention should be drawn to the fact that to-day Canada has no monopoly on nickel and scrapiron. These commodities go into commerce and domestic trade everywhere, and it would be impossible for Canada to carry on business if it segregated or tied up its exports of nickel or scrap-iron to any country that might want those articles. It is true that an embargo could be placed against one or two countries; but at least my hon. friends have made some progress. They now know against whom we are arming.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am sure the hon. member would not want to mislead the house—

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Certainly not, but I have the book right under my hand.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member directed a question to me, and I should like to answer him. If he does not wish me to do so, it is all right.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I shall be pleased to answer a question, though that is greater courtesy than is usually shown me.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I asked the hon. member if he would allow me to ask a question. He asked a rhetorical question about the shipment of aeroplanes. I ask him if he has looked up the licences issued last year for the shipment of aeroplanes and munitions to other countries. If he does so, he will find the answer to the statement I made.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I cannot find any question to answer there. It has nothing at all to do with the matter; it is not relevant.

Then my hon. friend spoke about the reduction of farmers' incomes in Saskatchewan in 1937. Unquestionably the incomes of the farmers of that province decreased in 1937, but I submit that to anyone reading the record or listening to the hon. member the suggestion was left that in some way or another this government had something to do with those low incomes in that year. In 1937 there was no crop at all over a very wide area of the country. In that year the wheat crop accounted for less than one-third of the farmers' incomes; live stock accounted for about twenty per cent, and dairy and poultry products accounted for the balance. That condition was brought about because the sun shone too brightly and the winds were too warm, so that a great deal of that area was scorched. But the hon. member does not say that. Oh, no; the income of the farmers was low in 1937. Of course it was; but why not be fair about the matter and give in this house, where so many pleas have been made so often for assistance from other parts of Canada, the real reason why the crop was so short. I find in the Ottawa Journal of January 30 the following statement taken from the New York Sun:

> It is now reported that a deposit of nickel in Celebes island, Netherlands East Indies, is to be developed by a Holland corporation, and it may be significant that the metal is to be extracted by a new process worked out by the Krupp establishment in Germany.
> Twenty thousand tons of the Celebes ore were treated according to the new technique in the Krupp works in Germany and the results of the test are declared to have been "remarkably successful."

For years my hon. friends have been protesting against Canada selling nickel to European countries. They knew, or they should have known, that in Russia and other countries nickel was to be found, which could have been used but which was a little more expensive to treat than the Canadian nickel, but these countries could get it and use it if they wished to do so.

I should like to make just a brief reference to the time the hon. member for Weyburn spent on the McDaniel incident in Regina. He took unto himself the robes of the holy; he said, "We are a democratic party. We would not do things in that way." I want to tell him that the day after the last provincial election in Saskatchewan, which was held on June 8, in some constituencies where members of his party were elected their supporters were around the next day looking for the jobs that had been promised them before the election. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar shakes his head; nevertheless it is true.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Let us have the facts.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am giving the facts now.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is not a fact; it is an insinuation.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Some of my Liberal friends, remonstrating with some of my hon. friends' friends, said, "Why did you do a thing like that? You knew you could not carry out your promise." The answer was, "Yes; of course we knew that, but what do you suppose we were doing? We were out to get votes."

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Give the facts.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I believe that human nature among my Conservative and Liberal friends is no different from human nature among my Cooperative Commonwealth Federation friends, but the Conservative and Liberal parties have been in training long enough, in preparation long enough—

An hon. MEMBER: Too long.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Too long in preparation? Well, I shall leave it to any hon. member if it would not have been better if some of my hon. friends opposite had taken a little longer in preparation before stepping in with the promises they made. Perhaps then they would not have made the mess of things that has, as a result, been brought about in the province from which the hon. member comes. The old parties, so-called, are democratic parties; democracy is the only new thing in political economy in the world, not the autocracies to which hon. members opposite aspire. The old parties have had experience in dealing with these matters, and they know better than to make too many rash promises they cannot carry out.

The hon. member for Weyburn listed the things his party stands for to-day. I notice they are quite different from the things his party stood for three years ago, but even with that difference it would cost this country billions of dollars to put those policies into effect, and no one knows what the full result would be. As far as one is able to check them up the results would be disastrous, but to-day his party does not emphasize the things it emphasized on the platform just three years ago. They talk about taking over control of the monopolies. Why, three and four years ago theirs was a regular socialist song. They were going to take over the natural resources, the means of manufacturing, producing, transporting, and distributing the wealth produced from the primary sources of this country. They have changed their minds in the interval.

Among the pleasant things I have to look back to in parliamentary life, among the things of which I am proud in connection with my party is that when six years ago in the House of Commons the Prime Minister of to-day (Mr. Mackenzie King), then leader of the opposition, enunciated the party's platform, he had behind him then, and has since, the full support of all his political friends across Canada, and that this platform which has been so largely implemented will still be the party platform until it is fully implemented, along with the other planks which naturally arise out of the progress being made in implementing the platform.

But the hon. member also says that in the interests of social security democracy is liable to be ditched because, forsooth, they say that if we cannot have liberty and security with democracy—well, then, let democracy and liberty go. I want to tell the hon. member—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Nobody said that. The hon. member has not read—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member for Weyburn spent minutes quoting prominent men, saying,

I believe that Hitler is the greatest statesman in the world. Germany and Italy have solved their unemployment problem, and Canada should be able to do the same.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Keep on reading.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): He states:

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that democracy is on trial to-day as it has not been on trial for centuries. I believe that democracy must be made to work, and that unless it can provide jobs for the unemployed, equitable prices for the farmers, and give opportunities and stability to the business and professional classes, democracy will be thrust aside in favour of some other form of government.

Is there any other form of government that has come so near to doing these things as the democracies? Is there any other form of government which has attempted to do these things?

My hon. friend says Germany has solved the question of unemployment.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I did not say that.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Well, when my hon. friend quotes a prominent man as saying it, and keeps on repeating it at every opportunity, surely he is endorsing it to some extent? If not, why does he advertise it?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I hold here—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member must resume his seat.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has deliberately misquoted me twice. I ask the hon. member, if he is going to quote, to quote me from Hansard, and not deliberately try to misrepresent the facts of the case.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I hold a copy of Hansard in my hand, and when I am through with it I shall be willing to pass it on to you, sir, in order to show you what I have read. I have tried to read literally—and I do not like to read—but these are the words of the hon. member for Weyburn, as they appear at page 277 of Hansard. In one instance his words appear at the head of the second column, and in the other instance, near the bottom of the second column. Then, the hon. member went on to say this:

We in this group believe in democracy.

Just as I was listening to his words I happened to look up, and there was my good friend, one of the finest democrats formerly in his party, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor). The hon. member for Nanaimo was elected as a member of the party to which the hon. member for Weyburn belongs, and is still unspoiled as a democrat. Well, it is said that his party suggested that he should resign his seat in the House of Commons. He had been elected as a supporter of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, but as a democrat he was expelled from the party.

Then my eye wandered to the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Rowe), for whom I have great regard—but I am sorry to see him going into poorer rather than better company. I wondered if my Cooperative Commonwealth Federation friends' organization in the constituency of the hon. member for Athabaska had passed a resolution demanding the resignation of that hon. member because he had gone over to another organization. No, I do not suppose they would do that.

He was talking about the social security which could be had. As I have said, I do not often read extracts from papers, but I like to have them under my hand. I have found an interesting one which applies to much of what my hon. friends in all parts of the house have been saying in these latter days, I am sorry to say. I know my Conservative friends do not mean it, and I know my social credit friends will try to get it in another way, but this is an extract from the Citizen of March 24, 1938, which has reference to a reverend gentleman who had just come to Ottawa, a man of very high standing in Canada, who had this to say about English "as she is spoken" in and around the parliament buildings. He told the Ottawa One Hundred club that "The nearer you get to the parliament buildings the more unintelligible the language becomes." There was much use of what he called "highfalutin" expressions, but as far as he was concerned, "social security means you're just dead beaten; that's all."

I hope the day will never come when the Canadian people will admit what my socialist friends told them during the last election campaign—that there are no markets anywhere. They would leave it to some great man to do the planning, the marketing and the producing. The last three years have demonstrated that there is the possibility of marketing and placing produce in the world market, if there is proper negotiation and proper trade legislation. While there are people in the world who are hungry for the goods we can sell, there is a market. I wish to say now—I may not have time later on—that the problems of Canada are still what they have been in the past, and what they are likely to be in the future.

We must produce at a lower cost a greater volume of goods in a form the people of the world will buy. We must be able to sell our products to the best advantage and by the best methods. We must have advertising, transportation and financing methods such as we have in Canada in a large measure. Then we must be able to take from the people of the world who buy our goods some of their goods in return, so that we can get paid for the wealth we are exporting to them.

At this point I should like to say a word to the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) whom I am glad to see in his seat. I do not know whether I should congratulate him upon being where he is. In any event, I shall congratulate him upon being happy where he is, because I would very much rather see him happy than see him unhappy in another place which might be better for him. What I am going to say to him is not very serious, but may I point out that as reported at page 317 of Hansard he seems to be worrying about the amount of United States capital invested in Canada. When the statement was made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) that it is decreasing and that we are paying it back, the hon. member denied this emphatically. I will admit that figures for "Canada 1939" are not absolutely up to date, but they are the latest information I could get. According to this publication the United States capital invested in Canada 1937 was placed at just $50,000,000 less than in 1935. I am sorry to see that it is down. As one who is anxious to see the natural products of Canada developed I should like to see that investment up.

The people of Canada do not owe it all to the people of the United States. Our good neighbours have come here and have made investments on their own responsibility, using their own judgment. Many similar investments are still being made, and I am happy that they are. These people have brought their capital here to invest. They have brought their wealth with them, and I hope that this year will show no decline in the amount of United States money coming to Canada. On the other hand I hope there is a large increase in the amount which comes in, which would have its effect by way of increased production of the natural resources of Canada and consequent prosperity.

When I was speaking to the hon. member for Weyburn a few moments ago I had picked up a small item dealing with unemployment in Germany. His interruptions were such that I omitted to read what I had intended. I hold in my hand an item from the Ottawa Citizen of June 24, 1938, which reads:

> Field Marshal Hermann Goering's new ordinance making every man and woman in Germany, regardless of age, class or occupation, liable for a period of labour service, will apply primarily to Chancellor Hitler's vast building program, it was made clear to-day.

Then it goes on to say:

> Since official statistics show only 37,000 persons of full working capacity are unemployed in the Reich—the remainder of the 390,000 unemployed for various reasons being only partially employable—it follows, the paper says, that the great economic tasks under the four-year plan have been halted because, while plans, funds and materials were ready, there was a shortage of workers.

I listened to the radio one night about two weeks ago and heard it stated that 200,000 German girls are to be called out to do labouring work. Standing by me in the hotel, near the radio, was a middle-aged man, one of those defeatist chaps, and he said, "Why does not our government do something like that?" I listened to the rest of the broadcast, the last line of which was, "Nothing has been said about paying these girls for any work done." I looked around for the chap who wanted our government to do something like that—but he had vanished.

It saddens me to see the attitude taken by those who by virtue of their official positions, by virtue of their education and abilities, by virtue of the opportunities that this country has given them should be the natural leaders of the youth of this country. Instead of leading them to believe that there is defeat and nothing else in store for them, they should be telling our youth that there are more diversified opportunities in Canada for them to-day than there ever were in the past. It is true that to-day a man must go out and make his own job, perhaps more than he ever had to do before, but how can one expect any government to make jobs for all who come along? That cannot be done unless the government is to take over full control, backed up with bayonets like our dictator friends in Europe, and make every one work without any consideration or regard for the pay he shall receive.

This is not a new story for my socialist friends. I should like to quote what their national organizer, at one time a member of this parliament, had to say. The date I have on the clipping before me is November 22, 1933, and it quotes Mr. Garland as follows:

> Mr. Garland emphasized the tragedy of the hopeless outlook for the rising generation, stating that the youths of to-day were being simply poured out into the world—with no prospect of any kind of jobs.

If these youths are being poured out into the world to-day, it may be that they find it hard to get jobs. But if they made use of the education they received; if they got out in the open places and took advantage of the natural resources of the country; if they were willing to fight against nature and try to solve their own problems with the education they had received, they would be much better occupied than in listening to counsels of despair. In the Evening Citizen of January 27, 1939, the following paragraph appeared:

> Such great leaders and creators as Henry Ford, and "Boss" Kettering of General Motors, see nothing in the present confusion and cloudy atmosphere of affairs but big things ahead. They see in the inequalities and imperfections of to-day but the promise of a better and happier life ahead for all.
> Teachers and schools are unable to put vision and will into people. These must be born with one and developed from within. And the more they are developed the more they spread and enlarge. Aspiration, nurtured in the human heart, acquires rootage that gives to dreams their everlasting foliage.
> Neither teachers nor school can draw a map of the dimensions of a human being's area or limitations. What we are that is peculiar and distinctive to ourselves is what measures out our worth and which appraises us to the world. With what endowments we are born!

Let me say in all sincerity; let me say in all humility if you will, so you will consider my words, that what the government and leaders in this country should be trying to do is to secure better people, rather than trying to put people into better circumstances. Slums do not make slum people; it is slum people who make slums. Some encouragement should be given by the government—the scientists, biologists and statisticians can show them how because they can measure men; I admitted a short while ago I could not measure my hon. friend the leader of the opposition—so that we may have in this dominion people with better health, more sanity and greater intellectual energy. When that is done we shall be able to get away from many of the troubles we have to-day and have had during the last few years. Every boy and girl leaving school should know that at no time in the world's history have two and two made other than four. They should be taught not to listen to those who for their own advancement try to make them believe that two and two make five or six or eight, depending upon how they want to juggle things.

There is just one other item I want to bring to the attention of my good friend, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). When the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) was speaking the other day, he dealt with the connection between communists and socialists. I shall not spend any time in going into this in detail, because I contend that the progress from socialism to communism is a logical move, step by step. There is, however, this difference. The communist is intellectually honest because he tells you where he is going, what he wants to do and how he intends to do it when he gets there. He deserves some respect, but the other chap camouflages too much. The hon. member for Cochrane gave full credit to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation for not associating with the communists. At that moment the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar interrupted, and said:

> In a public statement in Saskatchewan last week, Walter Wiggins, secretary of the communist party, called for a united front behind the present Prime Minister of this country.

At which moment I said:

> And your Saskatchewan leader asked them to unite behind the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has elapsed.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): May I say just a few words more?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I do not approve not keeping the rules of the house, and I regret they have been broken so often. I have, however, been delayed somewhat, and I thank you, sir, for the privilege of finishing. After my statement the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar interjected with, "oh, no." I looked up the Regina Leader-Post of January 9, 1939, in which I found a statement about this matter. After stating that Mr. G. H. Williams was the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, the article continues:

In a statement, Monday, Mr. Williams replied to a call of the communist party relative to a united front of democrats. Mr. Williams said:

"We note that the communist party through their spokesmen, Mr. Wiggins and Mr. McManus, have called for a united front of democrats behind Premier King. The C.C.F. suggests that the united front of democrats should be formed behind J. S. Woodsworth (C.C.F. leader)."

Mr. COLDWELL: A united front of democrats, not of the communist party.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What I said was that Mr. Williams replied to a statement by the secretary of the communist party that democrats should line up behind the present Prime Minister. To whom was the leader of the socialist party in Regina referring?

Mr. COLDWELL: Democrats.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): In the first place the call was from the secretary of the communist party for a united front of democrats to line up behind the Prime Minister. It was not for a united front of communists, it was for a united front of democrats. Mr. Williams then came into the picture and said that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation suggested that the united front of democrats should be formed behind the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth).

I am going to let it go with one further word of appeal to all hon. members. Whether or not they are ready to take my advice, I think they will recognize the worth of it. Let us get away from this defeatist attitude. Let us stop telling the youth of Canada that there is no chance for them here or elsewhere; that unless we change our attitude these youths will be forced to follow some leader with some sort of planned economy. There are those who deride the Prime Minister for his love of history, but I think many would do well to read more. They would then find that tyrants have always come into power by promising quick solutions for the evils that were bothering the people at some particular time. They have always pursued the course that the tyrants of to-day are pursuing. The prophet Samuel told his congregation that the king they asked for would assess them one-tenth of all their flocks. One of my statesmen friends would go even further, and assess them one-seventh. I appeal to all hon. members to tell the whole truth about Canada. While times are difficult, our natural resources and climatic conditions are such that one properly located and equipped with sound health, mentality and intellect can make a living in this country.

Mr. E. J. WERMENLINGER (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, on rising to speak on the motion now before the house, I should like at the outset of my remarks to refer to the proposed visit to Canada of our beloved king and queen. It is unfortunate that their stay in the Montreal district is to be of such sort duration, for only nine hours. Verdun is an independent city, completely detached from Montreal. We thought with the war record that we possess we would have been honoured with a short visit from our gracious sovereigns. Verdun is the third largest city in Quebec. Its population is fifty per cent French-speaking and fifty per cent English-speaking, and it has never had any racial or religious trouble. Out of a population of 20,000, Verdun sent 4,000 soldiers, or twenty per cent, with the expeditionary forces of 1914. We had thought that this loyal population, which now numbers 65,000, including hundreds of war veterans who fought with the imperial forces and who came to Verdun during the post-war years, would have been given an opportunity to see at close range our great king and queen. It would take only fifteen minutes for the royal visitors and their escort to come through the city of Verdun, and such a visit would be gratifying and inspiring to our population and of immense interest to our royal visitors because they would travel through a city named after the great French city of Verdun, the bulwark of civilization during the war years, and a city having the same motto as our own, "They shall not pass,"—I mean the enemy. They would travel along the old trail of the Indian tribes beside the beautiful St. Lawrence river, in its most picturesque location, a few yards from the Lachine rapids and a short distance from the spot where in 1669 Cavalier de La Salle organized his expedition to find a great river which was to lead him to China—in French, La Chine, whence the name of Lachine—and where in 1689 the Indian tribes almost exterminated the French settlers of that day.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, may I make a digression. I wish the hon. Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) were in his seat, but I take this opportunity of bringing to his attention the fact that the monument erected and dedicated last summer to Cavalier de La Salle, the great French explorer, was erected at the wrong place. It was in Ville La Salle, in my constituency, that he lived. That is where he fought and where he started his expedition, and the monument erected by this government in Lachine has been erected in the wrong place. It is not the first time that politics have distorted history.

I shall deal particularly with one subject mentioned in the speech from the throne, and that is unemployment, which affects my constituency very seriously. In this connection I should like to read some correspondence and documents which I have in my hand. The first is a letter, dated January 13, 1939, addressed to myself, from the clerk of the city council of Verdun, and reading:

Dear Sir,—

Please find enclosed copy of a resolution of the city council of Verdun dated January 9, 1939, together with a copy of the statistics mentioned, and copy of a letter addressed to-day to the Hon. Norman McLeod Rogers, Minister of Labour.

Yours very truly,
A. J. Burgess,
City Clerk.

The letter to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is as follows:

January 13, 1939.

Hon. Norman McLeod Rogers, M.A.,
Minister of Labour,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—I am instructed by the council of the city of Verdun to forward you the latest statistics on the unemployment relief situation in this municipality. This shows an increase of 50 per cent since this time last year in the number of unemployed who are receiving relief.

The council instructs me to draw to your attention the fact that this serious increase is apparently the opposite of the total trend throughout the dominion, according to newspaper reports of the general improvement based upon supposedly authoritative federal sources.

His Worship the Mayor desires me to point out that the experience of Verdun is the same as that of the province of Ontario where, according to the provincial Minister of Public Welfare and Municipal Affairs, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of yesterday, the situation in this municipality and in the province of Ontario are almost parallel. The city council is sure you will be interested to know that, when we abandoned direct relief on the 1st of August, 1937, in favour of a program of public works, our relief lists were cut 40 per cent in a few months. A slight increase was noticeable from January to May of 1938, after which a gradual increase has been recorded each week. Unemployment relief is given only to those who are in need and who are employable. Unemployables, such as infirm, the aged, widows, etc., are assisted through local charitable organizations.

In the light of the above facts, the city council cannot understand newspaper reports which state that, according to the federal authorities and even federal ministers of the cabinet, the unemployment situation shows substantial improvement.

The city council respectfully requests some enlightenment on such reports.

Believe me to be, sir,

Yours very truly,
A. J. Burgess,
City Clerk.

Here are statistics of the city of Verdun with respect to public works employment, replacing direct relief:

J. R. French,
Director of Finance and General Manager.

Then the following:

Statistics Concerning Relief Against Unemployment

Alderman Wilson submits for consideration a report from the general manager concerning statistics in connection with employment granted for public works in order to substitute it for direct relief, and draws again the attention of the council to the fact that unemployment in Verdun has increased gradually and is now 50 per cent higher than it was at this same time last year. Consequently, though the federal authorities, and especially the Hon. Minister of Labour, have frequently announced an improvement in the unemployment situation all over Canada, that improvement has certainly not been felt in our municipality.

A. J. Burgess,
City Clerk,
Verdun.

Those statistics concern only the employables who are fit for ordinary labour or trade work. What about all the others, those who are not registered, who are helped by their families or relatives? What about the single men who cannot obtain work, and others on public charity? In the Montreal Gazette of January 24, 1939, appeared an article indicating that charitable donations in the dominion are higher and will have to be higher; that the reports of fourteen federated charities in 1938 showed large increases, and that the total of these disbursements is appalling. But people do not want charity; they want work. It is true that the record of those who have given so generously during recent years should cause their names to be inscribed in gold letters on the parchment of history. But what about the broken morale; what about the loss of intellectual and physical power? That can never be replaced.

Having mentioned the amount of unemployment in Verdun, I wish to point out that an hon. member for Toronto said that 65,000 people or 14,000 families in that city were also depending on relief. We all know that at one time Montreal had 47,000 families on relief. I come in contact almost daily with our unemployed. I know something of their former occupations. The great majority of those living in the urban centres were formerly engaged in industry, directly or indirectly, either as tradesmen, craftsmen, specialized workers, or in the offices of manufacturers now on the down grade. Certainly people in the last category are not to be expected to work with pick and shovel, to crush stone or push wheelbarrows. They cannot do it. As far as the trades people in my district at least are concerned, we know that the construction of new dwellings is at a standstill simply because the people are unable to pay rents which will afford any return on the investment that would have to be made. Our industries are idle or bankrupt or working only part time.

Concerning pianos let me quote some correspondence sent out by a United States manufacturer:

Gentlemen:

Under the new trade agreement the duty on pianos is reduced to such an extent as to make it highly profitable to import pianos from the United States, particularly when they can be bought at a fraction of their true worth. With such values to offer you we hasten to communicate the details in order that you may lose no time in availing yourself of the possible profits.

For instance, we will furnish twenty-one pianos, harnessed to the car, at $500 or $600 for the entire lot. In both cases the pianos would be unrepaired uprights and the difference of one hundred dollars allows for the quality of the instruments, by which we do not mean to infer that you would not be getting an excellent buy at the $500 price, but as you know, there are all grades of pianos, and one hundred dollar leeway on twenty-one would permit us to send you very excellent instruments. Similarly, we can furnish you with guaranteed good player pianos, thoroughly gone over, at $55 each, in single lots, boxed, f.o.b. r.r. in New York.

After reading this I am more than ever in favour of a highly industrialized country. Our urban population is too numerous for the amount of industry now operating. We must try to prevent injustices which would be detrimental to any industry, from creeping into the tariff revision.

As my time is getting short I shall just read my leader's stand on protectionism, as laid down in his speech at Charlottetown. He said that protectionism should be reasonable and should not serve to exploit. With that I am in agreement one hundred per cent. He said further that he believes in the principle of reasonable protection for all industry, for the working man and for the farmer, but that there should be some compensations both for the east and for the west.

Regarding that particular item of pianos I could quote an article from the Toronto Globe and Mail dated January 12, which states that the United States duty on Canadian pianos is still 40 per cent, and that the new duty under this trade agreement will be 24¾ per cent with the excise tax eliminated as well as the old minimum valuation of seventy-five dollars. That is going to be absolutely detrimental to the piano-making industry. The workers in the factories will have nothing to do. It is an industry which was starting to get on its feet again. During the years of depression it was producing 400 pianos a year, whereas last year the number produced was 4,000. Now, with all this competition from the United States, the piano-making industry will simply go to pieces. That is just one example.

Let me say a word about the steel industry. As we all know, a number of items in the steel tariff have been reduced, and this is a matter for regret in view of the keen competition our industry meets with from United States manufacturers with their huge output and lower costs, and also the greater competition from the steel industry in Europe, particularly the totalitarian countries. Naturally the steel industry in Canada is concerned about the effect of this agreement upon the fortunes of its customers who buy steel products for conversion into their finished goods, and whose rates of protection have been reduced.

Canada's tariff generally speaking can be said to be on a moderate basis; but if we consider the large number of people dependent on the manufacturing industry for existence, it is unfortunate that the protection afforded industry in this country is being continually lowered.

Other changes in the tariff are expected to improve the lot of the fisherman and the agricultural worker and agriculture generally. We can only hope—it may be but a pious hope—that Canada's loss in some instances will be more than made up in other directions, but it is problematical.

I have a few items here that I would have brought to the attention of the house. I shall name a few which affect industries generally and which aggravate unemployment immensely.

On compounded or manufactured sterilizers the duty in 1935 was 10 per cent, reduced in 1936 to 7½ per cent, and under the new agreement reduced to 5 per cent with elimination of the excise tax. Imports from the United States in 1935 were $528,000, and in 1937, $702,000.

Pianos and organs I have just mentioned. In 1935 the duty was 30 per cent with a minimum valuation of $75. In 1936 the duty was reduced to 24¾ per cent, and it remains the same in 1938, but both the excise tax and the minimum valuation are wiped out.

As regards miscellaneous musical instruments and phonograph records, in 1935 the duty was 30 per cent, reduced in 1936 to 24¾ per cent, and in 1938 the excise tax is eliminated, another concession. Imports in 1935 were $196,000, and in 1937, $467,000.

As far as item 711 is concerned, goods not elsewhere enumerated, heterogeneous, including chemicals of a kind made in Canada, and manufactured food products, in 1935 the duty was 25 per cent, reduced in 1936 to 22½ per cent, and under this new agreement brought down to 20 per cent, with elimination of the excise tax. There were three million dollars' worth of imports in 1937, not counting chemical products.

What about the exemption clause under tariff item 703b? The figures show that goods brought in from the United States total $6,917,000 for the nine months ended December 31, 1938, compared with $5,263,000 in 1937, or an increase of $1,654,000, the largest item of imports being clothing. I have not time to read all the figures, but the second largest item was furniture and household appliances, $865,000. That is the exemption clause under 703b by which Canadian tourists to the United States, stopping over for forty-eight hours, may bring into Canada three times a year $100 worth of goods. Taking into account the loss of revenue from excise and duty; also the loss of business by individual retailers; consequently the loss on the part of industries directly concerned in the production of all these articles, and, further, the unemployment that would result from such procedure, have we not reason to be alarmed at the situation? I am informed that as a result of this new treaty there will be a loss of $18,000,000 through the elimination of the excise tax. Have hon. gentlemen opposite any idea of the loss of business involved, the discouragement to industry and the loss of morale among the working men who constitute the great mass of the population? If not, I invite those who have any doubt to pay a visit to our industrial centres in the most congested districts. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde) is reported in Hansard, at page 178, to have said:

> Liberalism is in a word the antithesis of Toryism, whose sole ideal has always been, particularly in this country, the protection of the privileged classes at the expense of the masses.

I invite the hon. member for Labelle to come and see for himself those great masses of unemployed, and to draw his own conclusion. I invite him to visit our industrial centres and find out for himself who is actually responsible for the chaos. I should like him to bear in mind, too, the promises of his leader on the night of October 14, 1935, when the country was assured that there would be no more adversity or poverty in Canada.

General unemployment in industry is to a great extent responsible for high taxes. High taxes paid by property owners make it impossible, in my riding at any rate, to build new homes. More elasticity should be given the housing act and less stringent conditions should be demanded by the lending institutions. Otherwise it is useless to hope for a revival of the building trade and the employment of workers in these trades.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), in his speech on Monday, January 23, said that it would be desirable to have private industries absorb more of the unemployed rather than have the unemployed engage in public works. But how can this be done when our industries are so jeopardized? The hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Lapointe) is reported in Hansard, at page 167, as having said that the government should start public works without delay, especially in the industrial centres which suffer particular hardship. He is a member from a rural district. How can we reconcile these two different points of view coming from the same side of the house? Perhaps the hon. member for Labelle, who declares that the Liberal party protects the great masses of the workers, will find the solution. Again I say, give industry adequate protection and almost everyone will be satisfied. A policy of encouragement of industry should be pursued so that we may compete with highly industrialized nations of the world and thus acquire the wealth both physical and intellectual that belongs to highly industrialized countries. Instead, we have the situation as mentioned in this house by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) I believe, who speaks of men, otherwise doomed to idleness, being permitted to work on roads, national parks, dumps and so on, like communistic, nazi and fascist labour conscripts toiling for a bare existence. As he says, more young people are to be prepared for careers upon which they will never be able to embark unless new policies are employed by the government.

Do we not sometimes look upon our children as belonging to a lost generation? If we continue much longer in the path we are now following, where shall we find during the next generation our skilled mechanics, engineers, electricians, tradesmen, expert technicians and so on? We shall have to import them from foreign countries. But our youth are taught algebra, geometry, trigonometry, descriptive geometry, analytical geometry, spherical geometry, astronomy, cosmography, infinitesimal calculus, integral calculus, drawing, physics, chemistry, and so on. For what purpose. Surely they do not need all that curriculum to be on a farm. Farming is undoubtely a noble profession, but we cannot all be farmers.

This brings me to the annex D of the agreement signed between the dominion and Quebec governments and dated July 22 last, with respect to trade apprenticeships at an estimated cost of $225,000. Boys are to be taught welding, some electricity and so on, and men are to be appointed to guide them for careers in industry or commerce. How can we give them that opportunity if our industries work only part time or are closed down or go bankrupt? The Minister of Labour says that he favours private rather than public employment, but the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) asked him what had been done by the government to provide work in private industry to relieve unemployment. Trade expansion, trade agreements, answered the minister; and I will add, trade concessions of no benefit to Canada.

The government has announced in the speech from the throne that the report of the Purvis commission will be submitted to a national conference to study the resolutions. The government is again entrenching itself behind a conference, after entrenching itself for three years behind a national employment commission. What has been the cost to the country of all these commissions? The government should take its national responsibility. The government has the authority on financial matters, money matters, banking, industrial and commercial matters. It has the means to act with success, but laissez-faire and too much interest in international affairs interfere with our progress and, as time goes on, will more and more hinder our progress in industry.

One word more. I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to a question that was put in this house by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis) on Thursday, January 19. Referring to the question of old age pensions, he asked:

> In the speech from the throne read yesterday by the lieutenant governor of Quebec I find the following paragraph:
> "Owing to the measures carried out by the present government, the old and the blind of Quebec are receiving monthly a sum of approximately one million dollars."
> As this statement is bound to lead the people into error I should like to know from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) first, who established the old age pensions in Quebec—

Then there was an interruption, and the Minister of Finance replied:

> The hon. member advised me a few moments ago of his intention to ask this question, and in the short time available I have endeavoured to obtain information which, if it is not complete, I will supplement later.
> The old age pensions paid in the province of Quebec have averaged in the neighbourhood of $855,000 per month for the last three months. For the same period they have averaged about $29,000 per month for pensions for the blind.
> With regard to the second question, the agreement between the government of Canada and the province of Quebec with respect to old age pensions, my answer is that it was initiated not by the present government of that province but by its predecessor. I should have pointed out this most important fact, that of the $855,000 per month and the $29,000 per month seventy-five per cent comes from the federal treasury.

That is admitted, and I conclude with this: We all know the history of old age pensions as introduced in this house in 1926. We know that the two members from Winnipeg made them possible, in those days of bargaining between the Liberal party, the Progressive party and the other parties. We all know that at that time fifty per cent of the cost was paid by the federal government. It is my opinion, though I may be wrong, that the Liberal party gave those old age pensions to this country very reluctantly. Then, sir, in 1930 or 1931, after the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett came to power, the share of the dominion government was increased from fifty per cent to seventy-five per cent.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): How much did he promise the electorate?

Mr. WERMENLINGER: It was nothing compared with the promises of 1935. Between 1927 and 1935 the province of Quebec was paying, through imposts, through taxes, through stamps, through $8 per gallon on alcohol, through taxes on cigarettes and everything that could be produced, for the old age pensions of the other eight provinces. The government of Quebec, then led by Premier Taschereau, always turned a deaf ear to the demands of Mr. Duplessis, then in opposition, who wanted old age pensions in that province. That question was not even an issue in the election of 1935; but after the inquiry by the public accounts committee in Quebec an S.O.S. call was sent out by Mr. Taschereau because the ship was being wrecked. That was when he put old age pensions on the program. So. Mr. Speaker, the credit should go to the present premier of Quebec.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am rather tired to-night, having just returned from the city of Halifax, so that if I am not as bright or as dull as I usually am I hope the proper allowances will be made. It is a pleasure to speak on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I believe there never was a time in the history of Canada when the eyes of the world have been more turned toward the north American continent, and more particularly toward this great area, so large in extent but so thinly populated. As we all know our population is only about eleven million people.

To-night I have memories both pleasant and sad. I have memories of those who during the last session of parliament occupied seats in this chamber but who, during the recess, have been called to that bourne from which no traveller returns. I am sure every hon. member, including the ladies holding seats in the chamber, must mourn with the relatives and friends of those who have departed and who have won an eternal crown.

To hon. members on this side of the house and to those members of our group who, because of our numbers, have to sit opposite, I wish to say that we are a unit in support of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) who, in his duties, has been most assiduous and unselfish, who has not thought of himself for a single moment or of the criticisms which have been leveled against him Necessarily, with one as sensitive as he is, it hurts the heart, but it does not dull the mind or shade the intellect. Therefore, with that fine manhood and leadership he possesses in such abundance, he is to-day attempting to give the best form of government it is possible to give.

We are all human; we all err. On some matters respecting advancements which have been made I may not see eye to eye with some others; however, that may be due to the fact that there are elements or considerations over which the government cannot have control. There may be some elements in connection with government which are not discussed in the house, but which nevertheless exist. Perhaps it is best that they remain unknown to hon. members.

First of all may I congratulate the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) who comes as a new member from western Canada, and who showed a keen vision, great clarity of mind and a vocabulary equal to the task of expressing so truly and so well the feelings of his constituency as well as his personal feelings toward hon. members of the house and more particularly toward the Prime Minister and the members of his government. I should like, too, to congratulate the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier), the bright and valiant young man who seconded the address. I was moved the other day when I heard the suggestion that if an hon. member is to remain in the house—and that must be doubtful, even for me—he should study both languages, French and English, so that in terms of either language we may be able to converse privately and to understand each others mentality much better.

I learned with pleasure of the intended visit to Canada of their majesties in May. They come from the heart of empire, and as the heads of the British commonwealth of nations, their visit marks the first time our king has ever visited Canada. He comes not as the King of England, but rather as the King of Canada, and brings as the Queen of Canada his good wife, Queen Elizabeth. This visit indicates an advancement and a further development in the hearts and minds of people throughout the empire.

I should be remiss in my duty to-night if I did not recall the vision of that grand old man who was the leader of the Liberal party and who asked everyone who supported him to follow his "white plume." It was he who first laid down the doctrine of our being children in our mother's house, but mistress of our own. Not only was that visualized by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but it has become an established fact. By the statute of Westminster Canada is a separate entity within the empire, controlling her own affairs. Every act which is in conflict with the laws of Canada or with the Colonial Laws Validity Act must go by the board. Only one act does not come under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, namely the British North America Act. At another time I shall deal with that matter, but for the present I must hurry on.

I know the welcome will be royal, and I know it will be wholehearted. I believe the policy adopted by the government of having their majesties meet the people, rather than having formal receptions and social functions, is the best one to follow. In that way the royal couple may feel the human touch of the individual, the poor man or the poor woman who will say, "I have seen their majesties, my king and queen." The Prime Minister and his government are to be congratulated upon the strong democratic stand they have taken, a stand which reflected the wish of their majesties.

It is gratifying to learn that while in Canada their majesties intend to visit the great republic to the south of us, and while there that they will be the royal guests of the President and the first lady of the United States. They will also have an opportunity of having a bird's-eye view of that country with its 130,000,000 people, and to tie more closely the bond which already exists between the United States and the motherland. The British empire was well blessed when, during the period of the war, between 1914 and 1918, a man of outstanding ability, a man of vision and of knowledge, was President of the United States. I refer to the late Woodrow Wilson. The United States is fortunate in having as its President to-day Mr. Roosevelt, who is a liberal both in essence and in action. He stands, as we do in Canada, for the highest form of democracy. The influence which he wields will be a tremendous factor in the destinies of those democracies that still remain in the world.

I would be remiss in my duty if I did not in a kindly way express my genuine appreciation of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I am glad to see he is able again to resume his seat and carry on the onerous duties of his department. With the help which I am sure his colleagues and every other hon. member irrespective of party will be ready to give him, I feel he will be soon restored to the health he formerly enjoyed. I know he will prove to be an outstanding figure in the shaping of the destiny of Canada.

I come now to an hon. gentleman with whom I have had the honour of sitting in this house, although on opposite sides. Like myself he has grown a bit older and a bit grayer. I refer to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion). It was no mean honour that was conferred upon him by the great Conservative party. He comes to this house well equipped with knowledge, vision, judgment and fairness. I believe that as he passes stage by stage to duties of greater importance he will prove himself equal to the task. I know he will add lustre to the list of his predecessors.

A moment ago I spoke ot those who had passed to the great beyond. I realize with a feeling of deep sorrow that the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, a former prime minister of Canada and the late leader of the Conservative party, is not with us to-day. He is on the ocean journeying toward the heart of empire. I felt it not only my duty, but an honour and a pleasure to go to Halifax for the purpose of attending a luncheon given in his honour. I consider myself his personal friend. As representing the constituency of Halifax, I considered that I should see him depart through the eastern gateway of Canada. He was a Nova Scotian as well as a New Brunswicker. In the early days there was no such name as New Brunswick; it was Acadia, it was Nova Scotia.

Mr. BROOKS: There was in his day.

Mr. FINN: Then I am doubly glad. I have not traced history as closely as my hon. friend, and I want to congratulate him upon the fact that he is tracing me very closely in my remarks tonight. Mr. Bennett brought to this house great ability and great knowledge. He was forceful, powerful, able, adroit and fair. All men in public life at one time or another get a little heated and perhaps say things they would not say on second thought. But just as sure as I am standing here to-night I know that he has a heart dearer than Plutus' mine, richer than gold. I am confident that while he is in the heart of the empire he will always be true to the interests of Canada. I believe that in the future he will play no mean part in the future of that empire. I cannot conceive he will permit his political shade to overshadow his mind. He will be equal to all occasions and I am sure Canada may well be proud when he speaks in the interests of this dominion. I wish him now, as I did in Halifax, Godspeed. I know every member of this house wishes him a quick return to health and hopes that he may retain his vigour, energy and great ability so that these fine qualities may not be lost to Canada in his new home. It is wonderful to think that while differences of party, race and creed are extant in this parliament, yet we meet here together in harmony. We are all reaching out for a common goal. That goal is not earthly; it is beyond. There we will all be equal provided we all are equally deserving of entering the golden gates.

I come now to a question of paramount importance in connection with the address in reply to the speech from the throne. But before I go into the meat of my argument, I should like to congratulate the new Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty) upon his appointment to the honourable position he now occupies. He is one member of this house who has always been dignified, always kind, always pleasant and always fair. I know that any member, irrespective of politics, who enters his office will receive the same generous and fair consideration he has always given to every member, whether sitting on this side of the house or on the other. I regret the illness of the former postmaster general, the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Elliott). I am glad to have learned from the lips of the Prime Minister that the hon. member will soon be able to take his seat although he will be unable to carry on the responsibilities of his former office. I am sure that he will meet with a hearty reception. He was a splendid postmaster general, always kind and ever ready to listen and learn, if the latter was necessary.

I come now to the lone wolf from the province of Alberta where social justice is so well distributed. Perhaps the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore) should be congratulated upon our having adopted one of the planks in his platform. We have taken the lone wolf; for the Prime Minister has appointed the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon) as minister without portfolio to look after the interests of the great body politic in Alberta. He is to assist in the rejuvenation, not of Aunt Mary, but of that province of social credit. Those who are of the temple are searching, not perhaps for money, but for panaceas that will cure all ills and will be palatable, easily taken, and not have to be shaken.

The international situation, Mr. Speaker, is causing alarm and fear throughout the British empire, and in some instances it is no doubt causing remorse. I listened the other day to the address of the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, Prime Minister of Great Britain. While I do not agree,—and I suppose it is of little consequence to him whether I do or not,—with all the turns he has made in British policy towards the dictators in Europe, there is one thing that he has done, and done so completely and conclusively, that on Saturday last he was able to tell the world that Great Britain now stands with her back against the wall and will not budge another inch; that she is ready to go forward; that she wants peace, but is not ready to recede from his former position. Whatever failings Mr. Chamberlain may have apart from carrying an umbrella, he at least has had the courage of his convictions.

I should like to express my admiration also for Mr. Anthony Eden, who resigned from Mr. Chamberlain's government. Recently he paid a visit to the United States, and spoke in the city of New York. I listened to that speech, and there was not in it one word of vituperation, not a word of criticism of the government. It was the wholesome, pleasant, generous speech of a gentleman who was making a social visit to the United States with his wife, and he left upon the people of that country an impression which has done much to support them in their present policy of getting away from isolation, feeling that if democracy is to survive, that great republic to the south of us must, through its people, do its part. Mr. Anthony Eden is deserving of that tribute, and I think it should have been paid him before in this house; but perhaps there are so many other things to think of, and he is so lean and tall that perhaps he was not much in the eye of the onlooker. But he was not forgotten. I have not forgotten him. I am not tall, but I am a bit lean myself.

Let me come now, Mr. Speaker, to a subject which is very dear to the heart of an hon. member of the government who is sitting near me to-night and will give me inspiration, and something more than inspiration, I hope. I trust that he will give me comfort, peace and encouragement with respect to a problem that confronts the fishermen along our seacoast in the little province of Nova Scotia. I refer to the hon. Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud).

I want to congratulate the Minister of Fisheries upon the progress his department has made in bringing about certain reforms since he became the minister. Those reforms have been sound. Certain policies have been put into effect that have proved beneficial to a certain class of our fishermen. But we who come from the maritime provinces would be unfair to the fishermen of Nova Scotia if we did not acknowledge that they are poor and are suffering privations. The people of our province were visited last December by an act of God, through a gale which swept away their lobster pots and equipment and left the fishermen on the beach, as they say of a sailor when he loses his post aboard a ship. Our fishermen in Nova Scotia are to-day on the beach. But it is not so in New Brunswick or in Prince Edward Island because the governments of those two provinces, in collaboration with the Minister of Fisheries, relieved the fishermen of those two provinces of that worry; it has not, however, been removed from the fishermen of Nova Scotia. This is no fault of the hon. Minister of Fisheries. The federal money is there, ready to be spent. The fault lies, not, I would say, through indifference, but through procrastination, in the failure to come to a conclusion as to what policy to adopt in reference to the one-third to be contributed by the province of Nova Scotia.

I had rather thought that the premier of Nova Scotia, when he was in Ottawa not very long ago with reference to subventions for the coal and steel industries of the province, would have taken up with the government the plight of the lobster fishermen. The plight of the miner is not as bad as that of the fisherman. The miner works for a wage, and the company sells the coal he mines; but the fisherman goes to sea, catches the fish, and then has to sell them. When the coal that has been dug by the miner has been brought up to the pit's mouth, his work is ended. The company then takes charge of the coal, sells it through its sales managers, and makes a profit; and their profits, I am sorry to say, are in some instances not disclosed.

I was nearly seventeen years in the legislature of Nova Scotia, my happiest days under the late Hon. George H. Murray, and I was in the government of the day when the British Empire Steel Corporation was incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act of the province of Nova Scotia, with a capitalization of half a billion dollars. The company could not obtain a charter from the legislature of Nova Scotia, nor could they obtain a charter here in Ottawa. They incorporated it with these limited powers; the president, the late Mark Workman, after his journey's end so far as that corporation was concerned, retired from the presidency, and two gentlemen, Mr. Wolvin and Mr. Norcross, came in and took charge. When they came, the city of Halifax gave them a banquet which I attended, and at that banquet Mr. Wolvin said that he came to Nova Scotia to help the province, to build a shipyard, to mine coal and to give the province everything, and that he wanted nothing in return. The next day as I was asked by one of my colleagues what I thought of that speech, I said I was a bit suspicious of a man who came to give you everything and wanted nothing in return.

Under the presidency of Mr. Wolvin the British Empire Steel Corporation was thrown to the wolves. To-day we find that the parent organization is called Desco, and in Pictou county it is the Nova Scotia Steel, Coal and Car Company. It seemed to me that they were doing everything possible to build up Desco at the expense of the Nova Scotia Steel, Coal and Car Company, I believe it was only when they came to a realization that the public mind of Nova Scotia was aroused and that the legislature and government of Nova Scotia were the trustees for the people who own the mines, while the company is only a lessee, that there has been a reformation. To-morrow the minister of mines for Nova Scotia, Hon. Michael Dwyer, takes charge as president of the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company. But he is under the president and directors of the Dominion Steel, Coal and Car Company. The president to-day of the Dominion Steel and Coal Company is a gentleman. I believe he wants to do what is right. But there are men who are associated with that company who through stock transactions have got the company into a position in which it should not be.

To-night, while it is not my direct business, it is my duty to suggest that in considering subventions or further subventions to these companies the government must see that the miner is not detrimentally affected and, with that object in view, see that disclosure is made by these companies of their assets, their stockholdings, their prices; so that this government and this parliament should be in possession of the facts in order to be able to do the right thing; that in future there shall be some control over the development of these rich mines, and that a proportion of the profits shall go by way of wages to the miners who work far out underneath the sea and sometimes never return to their homes and families. These are considerations broader than the policies of government or the opinions of financiers. They go to the very root of the future stability of our great coal industry in Nova Scotia.

I can remember the day when that province, apart from our federal subsidy, was almost entirely dependent for its revenue on the royalty of 12½ cents a ton received on coal brought to the pit's mouth. With the extra taxation that has been imposed being in part declared "ultra vires" of the legislature of Nova Scotia, its income will be curtailed, and the needs are great, as they are in every province of Canada. I sound this note of warning, not because I want to prejudice the position of either of these companies in the minds of hon. members; but always there is some doubting Thomas and also there are arch schemers, and the arch schemer is the one that the government must watch. They should make a case that is clear, open and aboveboard; or, as we say in court, make a disclosure, in order that we may help them on a basis that will be fair to the company and fair to the miners who work so hard for a living.

This is only a suggestion I make; I have no interest except that of the people and those who toil, whether in the mine, in the forest, on the sea or in cultivating the land. These industries are the backbone of any province and any nation, and Canada is a nation. As the central authority it is our duty, when we are asked for subventions and other assistance of a financial character, to see that full disclosure is made of the position of the company, so that we can deal intelligently with the matter when the legislation is brought down by the finance minister, and that it shall be made clear to these people that they must come to parliament with clean hands. I do not say that their hands are unclean, but it is only fair that they should make clear their case, there are many suspicions.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to have to advise the hon. gentleman that he has exhausted his time.

Mr. FINN: With the indulgence of the house there is just one further point I should like to make. Other matters can stand until the estimates are brought down. It is in reference to the lobster fishermen.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. member has the unanimous consent of the house to continue?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. FINN: I thank hon. members through you, Mr. Speaker. You have only done your duty in calling me to order. But the rules have been suspended so often, that the trapdoor need not be closed, and I can say a word further in the interest of the lobster fishermen. I contend that the control of fisheries is a federal matter, one of the subjects which, under section 91 of the British North America Act, comes within the powers of the parliament of Canada and the Minister of Fisheries. In order that relief in aid may be granted through the government and through this parliament, I would ask that at the earliest possible moment the premier of Nova Scotia, the Hon. Angus L. Macdonald, be asked what he and his government intend to do. The fishermen cannot stand any further loan. These people cannot pay their bills to-day, having lost everything through no fault of their own. They have suffered a major disaster, and they should be helped in being reestablished in the industry. This is the time to do it because they have to cut the trees to make their floats and paint them; laths have to be bought to make the traps; twine has to be procured to make the space in which the lobsters go, and so on. These things could be done between now and the time when they will be able to take up lobster fishing again, in another month or two.

The minister has been sympathetic. He has done everything humanly possible for a Minister of Fisheries to do, but he has failed to get an answer from the premier of Nova Scotia and therefore the responsibility does not rest with him. It rests elsewhere, and I submit that the government should wait no longer if they cannot receive a reply that gives some promise of meeting the needs of the lobster fishermen along the coast of Nova Scotia and of providing for them, as the fishermen are being provided for in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, by cooperation between the two governments. I urge that the government act, and that the legislation, through a resolution if necessary, be brought down in order that any further delay may be avoided, so that in the meantime some ray of sunshine may enter into these destitute homes, many of which are in my own constituency, and that fear be dispelled. Then we shall have the satisfaction of having discharged our responsibility.

Mr. RODOLPHE LEDUC (Wright) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I first offer my sincere congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am delighted at the success of my good friend the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier), who was a class-mate of mine at Ottawa university. I well remember having sometimes copied his Latin and English translations at which he was very good, and I frankly admit that were his speech not printed in Hansard, I should be tempted to copy it in its entirety.

I congratulate the hon. member on his success. He is an honour to his family and his constituency and I trust that he will be re-elected at the next elections, in order that he may fill the important role he is destined to play in the public life of Canada.

I wish to emphasize the good fortune which our country enjoys in having at the head of its government, in these troublous times, a man so able, so sincere, so patriotic and so truly Canadian as the present Prime Minister.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier is acknowledged as one of Canada's greatest statesmen. Future historians, who will be able to analyse and compare the lives and careers of the two great leaders of the Liberal party, will write in the history of our country that the disciple was comparable to the master.

The announcement of the visit to Canada in May next of Their Majesties King George and Queen Elizabeth has caused a spontaneous feeling of joy to the entire Canadian people. All the citizens of Canada will want to manifest their loyalty and fidelity to these two illustrious personages who represent for us the supreme authority.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party has always been opposed to absolute protection. I have always been a believer in the Liberal tariff policy, according to which in order to sell to other countries we have to buy from them and consent to certain reciprocal concessions. In 1935 we concluded a trade agreement with the United States, and no one now dares to maintain that it was not advantageous to Canada. Nevertheless, the then leader of the opposition expressed the same fears and complaints as the present leader. I quote his words from Hansard, page 38, volume 1, session of 1936:

> No man, however great he may be, can in twenty-four hours, forty-eight hours or seventy-two hours complete a trade agreement with the United States. And if he does—or did—it would have only one result, that he has been properly trimmed. I think the latter alternative will be the one which history will show fits the case.

Subsequent developments have justified the government's action and shown up the then leader of the opposition as a poor prophet. I am convinced that the agreements of November 17th last will be profitable to the farmers and lumbermen of my constituency. To the farmers, by opening important markets for their products; to the lumbermen, by facilitating the export of forest products, thus tending to decrease the unemployment existing in my section of Quebec province on account of the considerably reduced activity in lumbering operations.

Moreover, the present government has performed a national service. Indeed, is not the civilization which we hold so dear chiefly based on friendly relations between the English-speaking countries of the world? Between the Dominion of Canada, the United States of America, Great Britain and the other British Dominions? The agreements in question have strengthened the bonds of friendship which unite these two sections of the English-speaking world.

I wish to congratulate the Minister of Labour for his untiring efforts towards finding a solution to the unemployment problem and, more particularly, for his youth training program.

Extension courses in agricultural subjects were given in my constituency under the Bilodeau-Rogers agreement.

I would suggest to the minister the advisability of including in that program the training of tourist guides. The house is aware that, every year, numerous tourists from abroad, in search of beautiful scenery, and of fish and game, spend their holidays in the wonderful county of Gatineau. They ask for trained guides. But, unfortunately, one cannot be a guide, no more than a carpenter, without possessing the necessary knowledge. Accordingly, the Minister of Labour would be well advised to discuss with Hon. Mr. Bilodeau the possibility of giving that training to some of our young men.

The government has announced its intention to increase the National Defence estimates by $63,000,000.

I also know that the question of building plants for the manufacture of war material is under study. In that connection, I would ask the government to give careful consideration to the memorandum submitted by the town of Aylmer to the Department of National Defence.

A few miles from Ottawa, there lies a town, once prosperous, in which some 150 families are now unemployed due to the closing of the industries that had made possible the development of that town. Good sites and abundant electric power are available in Aylmer, as well as unspecialized workers anxious to learn a trade and work.

I would therefore ask the government to give serious consideration to the situation of Aylmer before taking a decision in regard to the building of a plant for the manufacture of war material.

(Text) I have so many friends both within and without this country, and especially in my own constituency, who speak the language of Shakespeare that I should be remiss in my duties of friendship and esteem if I did not say at least a few words in the language by means of which these friendships were born and nurtured. In the centre of my constituency, some fifty miles from the capital city, there lies a great stretch of uninhabited land, about ten square miles in extent, known as the plain of Kazabazua. The dense growth of red and white pine which formerly covered this plain has been completely wiped out by repeated forest fires, so that to-day this great tract of land produces practically nothing but a little grass and some blueberries. The soil is unsuited to mixed farming. I wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to have the soil of this plain analyzed by the experts of his department, with a view to ascertaining its suitability for the growth of flue-cured or cigarette tobacco. Should the experiments show that with the use of proper fertilizers this kind of farming could be carried on successfully, tobacco farming could be taught to those who wished to take it up. This would make it possible to place several hundred unemployed families on the land, to the great benefit of my constituency. On the other hand, should the experiments reveal that the land is too poor for farming of any kind, steps could be taken to retimber this plain, which formerly constituted a real preserve of white pine.

Last session the house voted $100,000 for surveys and expropriations in connection with the boulevard and national park in the Gatineau hills. No doubt hon. members will be pleased to learn that the engineers have nearly completed the survey work and that within a few weeks the government will know the definite layout of the parkway and the approximate cost of the undertaking. I have neither the time nor the ability to describe the picturesque beauties of this region, close to the capital city, which hon. members will be able to admire in a few years, after the boulevard is finished. I desire however, to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to include in the supplementary estimates a substantial amount in order to get the work under way and thus relieve unemployment and distress among the poor people of the southern end of my constituency.

(Translation) We are living sir, in very difficult times. Economists, sociologists and statesmen seek remedies to the economic evils affecting our people.

Unemployment has been acute since 1930. I admit that it reached its peak in 1933. After that year, the number of persons under relief fell steadily from year to year. However it is still the most serious problem which our government must face to-day.

Successive governments have tried various remedies. I understand that the British North America Act prevents the present government from establishing unemployment insurance which would form the essential basis of a partial solution of unemployment.

The report of the Quebec Social Insurance Commission contains the following words, at page 203, on the subject of unemployment insurance:

Is it possible to establish unemployment insurance on a provincial basis in a federated state such as Canada? The answer is in the affirmative, for the example of Queensland, Australia, and of certain Swiss cantons prove the possibility. However, ordinary prudence suggests that unemployment insurance should be federal in character. It is very advisable to spread the social responsibilities over the whole country, for otherwise, the provinces which participate find themselves in a condition of inferiority with respect to the non-participants. It must not be forgotten that the expenses involved in social legislation should be incorporated in the net cost of production. If certain provinces do not enjoy the benefits of tariff protection, the industrialists of those provinces must of necessity aim at an equality in social obligations if they do not desire to embark on a policy of rivalry which is not only impossible to maintain, but is unfair.

Moreover it is easily understood that the establishment of unemployment insurance in only one province would prove a great attraction to the unemployed in other provinces and that this social measure would soon prove a complete failure. One must take into consideration the absence of boundaries between the provinces and the natural facilities of moving about in the country.

For that reason, I am in favour of a constitutional amendment on that point. However, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding all their good will, governments cannot solve that serious problem by themselves.

Let us point out also that the responsibility of finding a remedy for unemployment does not fall only on the state. All citizens, and especially those who control the sources of production and the distribution of wealth, manufacturers, merchants and bankers owe it to themselves to collaborate first of all, and then assist the state in finding a solution, so necessary, for a national problem.

Ever since my election as a member of this house, I have heard groups of members suggest that the whole problem would be solved if monetary reforms were proceeded with, and if the purchasing power of every one were increased. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the evil is not so much in the present monetary system as in the wrong use that is made of purchasing power.

I admit that there are people whose purchasing power is not sufficient to provide for their legitimate needs; in such cases, it behooves governments to step in, and even, under certain circumstances, to force employers to pay more reasonable salaries to their employees. On the other hand, what may be a fair salary for a single man, or a worker with, say two, three or four children, is inadequate for the head of a family of seven, eight or more children, and I consider that governments have the duty of helping the latter through a monthly or yearly allowance in keeping with his responsibilities. But, as I said, I feel that the trouble lies not so much in the lack of purchasing power as in the wrong use that is made of it.

I should like to illustrate my argument by quoting a few examples. Let us consider, for instance, the amount of money spent in Canada each year for alcoholic beverages. Statistics show that in 1937 a sum of $126,005,833 was spent for liquor. No one will induce me to believe that such a quantity of liquor was consumed by wealthy people only, neither can I be persuaded that it was used by tourists from other countries. Let us admit that, unfortunately, a large percentage of it is consumed by people of moderate means and by the needy. And much could be said about the amounts spent every year in this country for tobacco, and more particularly cigarettes. Statistics show that in 1937 a sum of $80,703,231 was spent under that item. I could mention a number of other items of expense which are not absolutely necessary and which bring about poverty and hardship.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we have too long been listening to those false prophets of better times to come who have prevented us from seeking the evil where it does exist and remedying it in the proper way.

The evil of the present depression lies in ourselves; we should study not merely the unemployment problem but the causes of poverty and the remedy it calls for.

I have read with some interest the four causes of poverty which were enumerated by the hon. member for Lethbridge in his speech on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, as reported on page 72 of the January 17 issue of Hansard:

> What are the causes of poverty? There are four. The first is debt; the second is taxation; the third is our faulty financial system—faulty either in its essential aspects or in the manner in which it is applied; and the fourth is our faulty method of distribution.

We all know that there are numerous other causes which have not been mentioned and which lead to temporary or permanent poverty; for instance, temporary or chronic diseases; the loss of crops through drought, overabundant humidity or rains, frost, hail, and so on; the destruction of property by fire; labour strikes, etc. Those are real causes of poverty and hardship which governments can neither control nor avert.

However, there are other classes of misfortunes which affect a certain class of society through no fault of theirs; I mean the sick, the infirm, the prematurely aged, the needy mothers and the orphans; and there again, governments are in duty bound to extend their help.

I do say that if we wish to save democracy from a threatened failure, we shall succeed in doing so not in extolling freedom but in educating the whole population, using for that purpose the same methods all over the dominion.

Politicians should be the first to undertake such educational work. Instead of suggesting to the people that their problems, more especially unemployment, will be solved one day it would be preferable to tell them frankly that poverty and destitution will never be banished from this world, for the words of Our Lord cannot be misleading and He did say:

> For ye have the poor always with you; but me ye have not always.

I believe the time has come for men who sincerely wish to save our civilization to join hands in educating the people, and I take the liberty of making, not a suggestion, but a recommendation to the hon. the Secretary of State, with a view to helping those who may wish to devote themselves to that task. I recommend that he should have printed in both languages the report of the Quebec Social Insurance Commission, including the two encyclicals Quadragesimo Anno and Rerum Novarum and have it distributed first to all members of this house, of the senate and of the provincial legislatures, to the clergy, both Catholic and Protestant; to teachers, financiers, manufacturers and bankers; once those people know perfectly well the whole social question as it affects our country, it will then be easy for them to impart such knowledge to all classes of the population and to spread a sound doctrine; we will then be in a position to assert confidently that our unemployment problem has been solved.

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, no one in the house is more pleased than I am at the possible visit of their majesties to this country next spring. May I emphasize the fact that I fully realize the great personal sacrifice which will be theirs.

Respecting the speech from the throne I could not do better than quote the following editorial from the Farmer's Advocate of January 26, 1939:

If the speech from the throne which set the wheels of parliament in motion at Ottawa does not conceal in well chosen words some very pleasant surprises, the present session will be a very disappointing one, so far as legislation is concerned. The intimation that substantial sums of money will be expended on public works has been received with alarm, rather than acclaim, and the reference to legislation dealing with agriculture conveys the promise that grain exchanges will be subjected to some needed reform, but no mention is made of an effort to find a solution of the serious wheat surplus. It is hinted that marketing legislation related to farm products will be brought forward, and this will be awaited with interest, for something will have to be done to lay the ghost of the Natural Products Marketing Act, which was enacted during the regime of a previous government, and constitutionally murdered by this one.

One great fact which in our selfish moments we are apt to forget is the British protection in past years to our foreign trade. We should be willing to show gratitude in return. What has Canada done in the last several years, so far as trade policies are concerned, to strengthen ties that bind the British empire? Nothing. I quote the following from the Toronto Globe of March 20, 1935:

Much tosh one way and another has been talked about the Ottawa agreements. They are not perfect, but this much at least can be said for them: They are agreements, and agreements to trade. The fact makes Ottawa all but unique in modern history. It also ensures to the people of the British empire an opportunity that they would do well to cultivate.

Then, I quote this from the Toronto Globe of November 15, 1935, just one month after the last general election:

Canada's exports increased $100,000,000. Sales to the United Kingdom and foreign countries show marked upturn in the twelve months period. Canada's external trade continues to improve. The increase in total business with the world for the twelve months ending September, was slightly over $100,000,000 over the previous year. Trade with all parts of the world, except the continent of Europe, showed a steady rise.

Exports to the world in the year ended September amounted to $696,532,559, an increase of $58,428,968 over the previous twelve months, while purchases from the world totalled $539,256,521, an increase of $41,857,858. Sales to the British empire amounted to $345,049,567, an increase of $21,103,617, and purchases from the empire were $169,542,030 or an increase of $16,557,770. Exports to the United Kingdom totalled $275,678,858, an increase of $14,245,014, and purchases from Britain amounted to $115,852,732, a growth of only $3,207,776.

A clerical friend of mine, addressing a large audience a few months ago and referring to the British empire, stated that in his opinion Canada was the garden of the British empire, and concluded that part of his remarks by saying that he considered Wentworth county and its vicinity as the garden of Canada. Naturally I agreed with him. It is because of that, and because of the people who have made Wentworth the garden spot of Canada, that I am standing here protesting against the reductions which have been made in the duties on market garden products. It is not a question always of price, but these importations from the United States glut our market to such an extent that at times we cannot sell our produce. What would the forefathers of many of these people, the United Empire Loyalists, say if they knew that their descendants were being deprived of the very principles for which they fought? What is New Zealand doing at the moment to protect her industries and to tie up with the British empire to a greater extent? In this connection I should like to quote from a recent Canadian publication as follows:

New Zealand Restrictions May Affect Canadian Trade

Amplifying cables received last month by the Department of Trade and Commerce at Ottawa announcing control of the import and export trade of New Zealand by means of licences, W. F. Bull, Canadian Trade Commissioner at Auckland, New Zealand, further advised the department that "At the moment the long range effect of this legislation on Canada's trade with New Zealand is not clear. However, it is reasonable to expect that the movement of goods from Canada to this country will be restricted and in certain instances seriously reduced." Mr. Bull reports that the Prime Minister, the Honourable M. J. Savage, has stated that the import control was not a temporary measure to correct the exchange position, but a permanent measure to cushion or insulate New Zealand against depressions abroad. The New Zealand Prime Minister is quoted as saying, "We want to increase our trade with Great Britain. To the extent that we are able, we want to spend every penny of the sterling proceeds of our exports on buying British manufactured goods. The only sensible way is to select the goods we want to buy from Britain. It is all a question of scientific selection of imports.

This same method of import selection is the most effective way of building up our own industries. We are going to give New Zealand manufacturers a definite market if they can turn out goods. To the extent that they cannot, we will import goods from abroad. I want to say most emphatically that what we are introducing is not a barrier but regulative procedure."

I am protesting against tariff reductions, especially reductions on poultry, hogs, the products of the market garden, fruit farms and hothouses, as well as on the different manufactured articles produced in my part of Canada. The irony of it lies in the fact that a great percentage of those people who are opposed to these tariff reductions are or rather have been followers of the Liberal party. My Liberal opponent in the campaign of 1935 stated that he was against a reduction in the tariff on fruits and vegetables, and I believe he made that statement in all sincerity because he is a fruit grower himself. Let me say right at this point that I know of hon. members sitting with the government who are just as much concerned with these reductions as I am. If they do not rise in their places in this house and speak against these reductions, the responsibility will be theirs. They will not be representing the people as they should.

We should encourage and make every effort to improve British empire trade instead of fiddling with this one-sided agreement with the United States. In this regard I should like to read part of an address given by the President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt, before the American farm bureau at Chicago, Illinois, on December 10, 1935: He said:

Some individuals and groups are trying to stir up farmers against other phases of the broad recovery program. Dispensers of discord are saying the farmers are being victimized by the new reciprocal trade agreement with Canada, and are painting pictures of a great flood of imports of farm products rushing across the border.

Agriculture, far from being crucified by this agreement, as some have told you, actually gains from it. We export more agricultural products to Canada than we have imported from her. We shall continue to do so for the very simple reason that the United States, with its larger area of agricultural land, its more varied climate——and its vastly greater population, produces far more of most agricultural products, including animal products, vegetables and fruits, than does Canada.

That is one great thing in their favour.

In the case of the few reductions that have been made, quota limitations are set on the amount that may be brought in at the lower rates. On the other side of the picture, we believe, and most unbiased men believe, that the general increase in our trade with Canada, including the exports of our factories, will so add to the purchasing power of hundreds of thousands of wage earners that they will be able to spend far more than they do today for the products of our own farms, our own forests, and our own fisheries.

To supplement that I should like to refer to an Associated Press dispatch from Kansas City, dated May 20, 1936, as follows:

Says United States Trade Agreements Are Bearing Fruit

The trade agreement with Canada came into force January 1st, 1936. Exports to Canada during the first two months totalled $52,300,000 in contrast to $46,100,000 for the same two months of 1935.

[Mr. Lennard.]

Of even more striking significance is the fact that the increase of exports on items on which Canada granted (tariff) concessions amounted to 26 per cent, whereas exports of nonconcession items increased by only eight per cent.

What do these trade agreements do for the market gardeners and fruit growers of this country? The following is one shining example of how they are being sold down the river. The United States' attitude with respect to these new trade agreements is as follows:

Certain concessions were made, one a reduction on frozen blueberries from Newfoundland. Why? Because they say Canada has made concessions on American strawberries and other berries which cover a large volume of trade.

How in the world is that going to keep many of our primary producers from going to the wall?

On page 60 of Hansard the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is reported as follows:

Men will not put out their money to invest in the different industries. They are withdrawing their capital from industry. Ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who is sitting here to-night, how much of the investment of capital to-day is going into government securities at a low rate of interest in comparison with what took place in former years. It has deprived manufacturing industry and our primary industries, and the like, of the capital they need. Why is that?

I will tell you why. Industrially Canada is virtually standing still. Foreign capital has practically deserted this market. Except in mining there have been few industrial developments during the past three years. There has been too much tariff uncertainty and labour unrest without the compensation of domestic economic stability. The Prime Minister said that the great majority of the people of Canada favoured the trade treaties. I venture the opinion that not one person in a thousand, if he were asked to-day what he thought of the new United States trade agreement, would say that he knew very much about it. And ninety-nine manufacturers out of a hundred, if asked the same question, would answer in a similar way, that they knew very little about these agreements at the moment. For anyone to say that these new trade agreements are acceptable to the people of Canada generally is absolute rot.

As regards the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, it seems strange to me that the government should spend thousands of dollars annually to collect licence fees to enable a concern to flourish over which they claim to have very little control. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, what I suggested on one occasion last session, that if this radio tax is necessary, it should be placed on the price of the set at the manufacturing source, and should not be a nuisance tax costing thousands of dollars annually to collect.

The hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) neglected to answer satisfactorily my question whether the ex-service men he will appoint as vendors of radio licences will receive their appointments upon the recommendation of officials of veterans' organizations; nor did he say anything as to recommendations from the veterans' assistance commissions, composed of volunteer bodies of outstanding citizens in the different centres across Canada. I will tell the house, however, who will make these recommendations. They will be made by Liberal members of parliament, by defeated Liberal candidates, and by the presidents of Liberal associations in the different ridings, and I doubt very much if there will be many ex-service men appointed.

Let us turn for a moment to the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). Last January, and again last July, he stated emphatically that in the matter of relief costs the responsibility was principally on the province and the municipality. But now there has been a change of heart, a change with which I believe the municipalities are thoroughly satisfied, their share now being 20 per cent of the cost. But what the mayors of the cities and towns of Ontario particularly want to know, and what I myself want to know, is this: Is this government sincere in this change of policy? Is it to be the permanent policy of this government? Or is it simply a red herring being drawn across the trail in an attempt to catch votes at the forthcoming federal election?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, regardless of what conditions are, it is about time that Canada stated officially that she was with Great Britain in this her hour of trial, and in saying that I am speaking not for myself alone but for the great majority of the people whom I immediately represent in this house.

Mr. D. E. BLACK (Chateauguay-Huntingdon) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as I have the honour to represent a great number of French-Canadian voters, I take pleasure on this occasion in addressing my first words to this house in the French language, so as to show my esteem for them, for their language, their integrity, and their contribution to the progress and development of this country.

Our fellow citizens of French origin have done much to make Canada what it is to-day, by their loyalty, their industriousness and their honesty. We feel grateful to them for that. By our daily contacts, they have learned that they can always depend on my cooperation, and my sense of justice. I shall always be ready to help them and to be a real advocate of good understanding between the two races.

I would like, sir, to be able to continue my remarks in French; but as it is not my language,—although I considered it my duty to learn it a little,—I shall have to continue in English.

(Text) Every one in my constituency of Chateauguay-Huntingdon, Mr. Speaker, deeply appreciates and takes great pride in the forthcoming visit to Canada of Their Majesties the King and Queen, and we shall be with them in spirit throughout their stay in Canada.

I should also like to take this occasion to express our thankfulness for the return to health and to his duties in this house of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). We trust that his health will continue to permit him to carry on his duties as Minister of Finance as ably as he has done in the past.

The new ministers who have been appointed to the cabinet are also to be congratulated, and we know that in the discharge of their duties they will meet with the expectations of the government.

May I also congratulate the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon his election to the leadership of his party.

I feel that I am expressing the opinion of the citizens of my county and of the country at large when I state that we appreciated very much the calm attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in regard to the European crisis in the troubled days of September last. We know that he stands for peace, and if eventually this country is drawn into war, we shall know that it was the only alternative left and one that we were bound to take.

The counties of Chateauguay-Huntingdon, which I have the honour to represent, border on the state of New York, and in these two counties there are eleven customs ports with an efficient staff of customs and immigration officers, who are doing their utmost to carry out the customs and immigration regulations faithfully and well. Among the largest of these ports are Lacolle, Cantic, Trout River and Henrysburg. These ports daily take in by way of revenue some $3,000.

The county of Chateauguay, Mr. Speaker, is 73 per cent rural and has a total of 1,649 farms, with an average value of $9,000 per farm.

The county of Huntingdon, which I also represent, is also rural to the extent of 83 per cent of its population. The 1,784 farms there have an average value of $7,182. I would have you note, sir, that in both of these counties the values are above the average value of Quebec farms, that average generally speaking, according to the last census, being slightly over $6,000. Both of these counties are very favourably known throughout this entire country, as well as in the United States, for their high grade live stock and dairy cattle. The fact that we are doing considerable business with the people south of the border goes to show that our cattle are always in great demand among our southern neighbours.

As I do not wish to extend this debate indefinitely I shall confine my remarks to the advantages brought to us since 1936 as a result of the trade treaties which this government, upon coming into power effected with the United States. Being in the cattle business for a number of years I am able to bear practical testimony to the assistance given to our farming class by the commercial intercourse which we have had and are now enjoying with our neighbours to the south as a result of the three-way treaty, the benefits of which have already been experienced by our farmers. A comparison of conditions among our farming population to-day with those that existed in 1935 would not be amiss. In 1935 there was very little demand in the United States for our cattle, horses, hay and other farm products, compared with the demand that has existed since 1936. In 1935 I find that ordinary cows were selling for $45 to $50, compared with $65 in 1936 and $85 to $90 in 1937-38. Purebred stock was also selling during those same years at from $100 to $150 and upward according to quality. The duty on hay going into the United States in 1935 was $5; in 1939 it is $2.50. The duty on straw in 1935 was $3, and is now 75 cents a ton. Since 1935 the cattle trade of my county has greatly increased, not only with the United States but also with the United Kingdom. Farmers were receiving in 1938 prices ranging from $70 to $90 per head for two and a half year old heifers for export to the United Kingdom, and grade cows commanded for export to the United States $75 to $100, which was an unheard of thing from 1930 to 1935. Likewise, registered cows sold at from $125 to $200, and our supply was practically exhausted in 1938. As regards the horse trade, the $30 duty of 1935 exacted on horses entering the United States was replaced by a duty of $15 as a result of the trade agreement made between this government and the government of the United States.

I call attention to the fact that these are not estimated figures, but figures representing actual transactions. I challenge anyone to gainsay the benefits that our farmers have derived as a result of the trade agreements with the United States and the United Kingdom. This shows that our government, our Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) and our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) are all duly seized of the importance of doing their utmost to help our farmers and other primary producers. We are very thankful for the policies of the Department of Agriculture, and may I say that our farmers appreciate any help afforded them in improving breeds and finding more markets for the profitable disposal of our surplus crops or other farm products.

That the farmers of Châteauguay-Huntingdon know their business is attested by the fact that many champion Ayrshire and Holstein cows and sires were developed by our farmers, and the counties are famous for their high-grade cattle. At the royal winter fair in 1938 the champion Ayrshire sire as well as the champion Ayrshire dairy cow belonged to farmers of my county, an honour to be proud of indeed.

Of great importance to our farmers, although perhaps not on so large a scale as dairying, are the treaty results obtained in our county as affecting apple growers. The interests of the latter have surely not been sacrificed, since our producers have on the British market a preference amounting to 92 cents a barrel over the United States shipper to the United Kingdom.

The great difference between Conservative speakers and Liberal speakers, as shown in this debate, is that the former are anxious about the manufacturing interests, while the Liberals, without sacrificing these interests, are concerned about the primary producers.

Before closing my remarks I do not wish to allow this occasion to go by without giving voice to the satisfaction of the people of my county with the very favourable results which they have derived from the trade agreements with other countries, and especially with the United States. And let me say that in my opinion the best way to solve the unemployment situation is to improve the agricultural situation, to widen the markets for farm produce and to do all in our power to create a better buying power for the farmers of this country. Forty-six per cent of our population live on farms, and if they have adequate buying power this will go a long way towards absorbing unemployment, because the farmer needs more machinery, hardware, lumber, roofing, paint, fencing, furniture, clothing and household supplies. I have had thirteen years' experience behind the counter in a general store and have personally witnessed the advantage to trade and commerce when farmers have good buying power.

Mr. G. H. HÉON (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, I shall speak half of my allotted time in the language of the majority of my constituents, which is French, and shall devote the latter part of my address to the expression of my opinions in the English language, because thirty-five per cent of the population of my constituency is of English or Scotch extraction. Each and all of my constituents are peace-loving, broad-minded Canadians, not at all concerned as to the creed or ancestry or language of their neighbours, but most respectful and considerate of each others' opinions. There are no racial, religious or linguistic disputes among the people of my constituency; we solved a long time ago the question of national unity and understanding by dropping from our vocabulary such expressions as "majority" and "minority," by treating one another as equal and by learning one another's language.

I have the honour, sir, to represent a constituency which gave to this country Sir John Abbott, a former prime minister, whose distinguished daughter, Doctor Maud Abbott, is a constituent of mine. Argenteuil also elected to this house the late Sir George Perley, whose sterling qualities and gentlemanliness were well known both in Canada and abroad. May I inform this house that such was the late Sir George Perley's generosity that I do not think there was in the constituency one destitute family which did not benefit at one time or another by his munificence. I could add that there is not one church, Catholic or Protestant, which did not receive at some time a substantial cheque. His material kindnesses, quite contrary to the kindnesses of some politicians I know, extended far beyond the pre-election periods.

(Translation). Mr. Speaker, the county of Argenteuil, which I have had the honour of representing for the past year, contains a historic site which is too little known. I invite hon. members to visit it when they can find time to do so. It is on the spot where the picturesque Argenteuil village of Carillon stands to-day that was fought in 1660 the glorious battle of Long Sault where Dollard des Ormeaux and his companions saved the new-born Canadian colony. Such a visit would convince my hon. friends that a race which has gone through the test of such sacrifices cannot perish nor allow itself to be absorbed, and that the French Canadians of to-day are penetrated with the same love of their country and the same indomitable will to survive.

Our hon. friends of English decent would judge us much less severely if they studied our history—and they should study it; they would gain a better understanding of our intellectual outlook, of the legitimacy of our claims, of our honest and firm intention of upholding the rightful interests of our country by always placing, both in our foreign and our domestic policy, the immediate welfare of Canada before that of any other country.

On this point, I believe that the entire French-Canadian representation in this house, whether Conservative, Liberal or Social Credit, is unanimous or at least should be. We may as well state it right now, for the constitutional and political history of Canada has eloquently proved it: the French Canadians, whenever it has been a question of their best interests, have forgotten their petty political quarrels in order to unite under a common standard.

Circumstances which are none of our seeking and which we should have avoided, as well as an ill-advised foreign policy concerning which we have not been really consulted, may perhaps make it necessary for us—much sooner than some believe or desire—once more to forget party lines and join forces to defend what we consider the most sacred interests of our country.

I come from Conservative stock, Mr. Speaker, and I am not ashamed of my party. A political party that has given to the Canadian nation men like Cartier and Macdonald; that has supplied a prime minister like Tupper—who fell for having defended the French-Canadian minority in Manitoba against the great Laurier whom my hon. friends opposite constantly evoke to justify themselves and get themselves elected in Quebec—a party that has been able to attract to its ranks a man of the intelligence and ability of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, is absolutely honourable and deserves to continue to play a leading part in the political life of Canada.

At the Conservative convention of July last I loyally and sincerely supported the candidature of the present leader of the party, because of all the candidates he was the one who, in my opinion, could best understand the French-Canadian Conservative mind. He is the leader of the party, and I must say in all fairness that his declarations regarding immigration have particularly pleased me and that I am entirely with him on that point.

The other day, my hon. friend from Champlain (Mr. Brunelle) did me the honour of mentioning my name in the course of the remarks which he deemed proper to make in connection with the Conservative convention. I may say to my hon. friend that if he would only stop to consider what might happen during a national Liberal convention—if any credence is to be given to what is being rumoured in the lobbies of this house with reference to the proceedings at Liberal caucuses being held these days—he would remember that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones.

At the convention held in July last, I stated that if the Conservatives wanted to secure again the votes of French-Canadians—which they obtained in large numbers in the times of Cartier and Tupper—it was imperative for them to consider more favourably certain French-Canadian claims and opinions. I have nothing to withdraw from what I said on that occasion, and if I were to address a convention, meeting or caucus to-morrow, I would say the very same thing, and in identical terms. But, Mr. Speaker,—and in this I differ from some of my French-Canadian friends who sit at your right,—I am not so blinded by party politics and I am not so tied that I should have to vote for the party against what I should deem to be the best interests of the country, of my province or of my constituents. When I offered myself as a candidate in February, 1938, I asked my electors to give me full liberty of action; this they did, giving me twice the majority which had been obtained by any of my predecessors. I am thus their representative and I am constantly endeavouring to reflect their opinion. I shall vote in conformity with certain essential political principles in which I do believe and in accordance with the best interests of my constituents, even though this should bring me into conflict with certain statements made by influential members of my party. That is my conception of my duty as a member, and I shall ask my constituents to judge me by what I have done and shall do until the end of the session. I feel that I have not been unworthy of their trust and I am prepared to face them again at any time.

My hon. friend, the member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), expressed the fear that the situation of 1911, 1914 and 1917 would repeat itself. For my part, I hardly think that possible. We have developed and grown older since that time. The cruel experience of that period is so fresh in our memory that our compatriots could not submit willingly to the ill-usage due to the strange attitude of public men of both parties at that time. If the two older parties wish to avoid the creation of a third party which, as Hugo would say, "is already boiling in an overflowing urn," they will have to give greater consideration to the purely Canadian sentiment and they must admit, more than they are prone to do at the present time, the opinion of those who believe that, as André Maurois said, "Men of canonical age do not possess the absolute right to legislate with regard to the ultimate fate of those of cannon-fodder age"—l'âge canonique n'a pas le droit absolu de légiférer sur le sort ultime de l'âge canonable—.

On that condition only will the two great parties preserve their prestige and keep the confidence of the electors. If my hon. friends on both sides of the house question the truth of my words, let them inquire from their unbiased organizers, their relations, their friends, the man in the street, the young men and women, the mothers and the wives. They will then learn the real sentiments of the Canadian public.

It is useless to go on deluding ourselves: the two great parties are losing their hold on the Canadian people. If they are to endure, and I think they must endure, it is high time for them to awaken to a realization of the facts and to regain the confidence of the industrial worker, the farmer, the business man and more particularly of our youth.

This house must remember that it truly remains the representative body of the people only so far as it reflects and expresses the people's opinions, only so far as it legislates in accordance with the present needs of the nation. If this government proposes to enact measures relating to matters that were not discussed during the electoral campaign of 1935, and if they fear a situation where they would consider themselves bound to pledge the revenues, the lives and the future of the nation, they should go back to the people in order to get the popular endorsation of every item of their new policy before binding themselves further. Having consulted the electors, and only then, the newly elected government will be in a position resolutely and constitutionally to follow the lines laid down for them by the Canadian people.

The five French-Canadian ministers, who I regret to say are not in their seat except the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud), will understand my meaning perfectly. I may remark in passing, and in all sincerity, that I can well understand their anxiety. And perhaps they, too, can now better understand the true situation of the French-Canadian Conservative ministers during the last war.

It may be that at last we are to see the end of the everlasting charge of war and conscription with which our hon. friends of the Liberal party have managed to get into power at general elections from 1921 to 1930. The hour of retribution is coming; it is approaching. I believe in immanent justice, Our hon. friends of the Liberal party will shortly have to defend in Quebec the policy which they formerly combated with the same fine sincerity which they are showing to-day. The most sincere of the hon. members opposite—one of whom is making a sign to me that it is not so—have already made confessions which do them credit but which irrevocably condemn the policy of their party, and that nobody can deny.

Mr. DENIS: The same thing could be said of your party.

Mr. HEON: I have already said that I was speaking as a free man.

(Text) I wish to commend most warmly the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address. To the mover I express my wish that the short time he will spend in the house will be pleasant. To the seconder I express my thanks for having shown this house what the modern young French-Canadian is: tolerant, bilingual and fully alert to the national issues of the day. I could not express my thought better than to say that as I listened to him the other day I was proud to think that I was a compatriot of his. There should be more men of his type in the house.

The McCullagh controversy gives me an opportunity to make this statement: I have been in federal affairs for only one year, but I am frankly discouraged by the apathy, distrust and lack of support the elected representatives of the people are receiving from those who should, through their influence and wealth, give of their time and efforts to inspire faith and confidence in our system of government. No man has the right to shout that democracy is in danger and must be saved if at the same time he tries to break up those institutions which uphold and guarantee democracy in this country. With the very difficult domestic and external situation, Mr. Speaker, this is no time to ask Canadians to distrust their public men and elected representatives, or to ask them to believe that they are a group of impotent misfits. Fair, intelligent criticism is always welcome; public opinion must be kept on the alert, but it is not fair to suggest wholesale wrecking of the constitution or a wholly impractical change in our system of government when public sentiment is already in a dangerous state of unrest. I am afraid Canada suffers from an overabundance of corner-store prime ministers and armchair opposition leaders, but it lacks men with courage to seek a mandate from the electors, at some cost of time and money, who will come to this house to explain their theories and defend their viewpoints. These gentlemen, I imagine, keep scrupulously away from conventions and nominations, and usually can be found on the golf links on voting day. So far as they are concerned, they are getting better public men and better government than they deserve. I cannot for the life of me understand why the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or this government has refused to give the air to some of the more radical proposals of Mr. McCullagh when the majority of the Canadian people already have done so.

Their Gracious Majesties, who are the sovereigns of this autonomous dominion within the British commonwealth of nations, have kindly consented to visit us. Let us hope that the international situation may not become such that we shall be deprived of the pleasure of seeing them, and all Canadians will pray that the trip may be thoroughly enjoyable to their majesties. In Quebec the king and queen will find Canadians of French descent and Canadians of English descent living together most harmoniously, extending to one another the most generous and courteous treatment, such as should be the case in all lands where dwell the two principles of British fair play and fair dealing. These two racial elements are united in a common loyalty and allegiance to that symbolic crown which to them represents autonomy, freedom, justice and tolerance.

Let no one doubt the loyalty of the French-Canadians to the king of their homeland. Such is the mentality of the average French-Canadian, and such is his fundamental honesty, that he cannot conceive of anyone doubting his respectful attachment to the king and the crown which he wears so nobly. The loyalty of my compatriots, Mr. Speaker, is not sentimental or boisterous; it is not expressed by continual, meaningless flag-waving; it is rather cool, deliberate, intelligent loyalty of mind and judgment, and I sometimes wonder if that does not offer a greater guarantee of permanence than the other kind. The second governor of Canada, Lord Murray, seemed to think along similar lines when he wrote the home government that the French-Canadians were——the bravest race on the globe, and would become the most faithful set of men in the empire.

And was it not Lord Elgin who wrote?

Who knows but that the last hand to wave a British flag on American ground will be the hand of a French Canadian.

Then, Mr. Speaker, it is fair to say that Canada is the one and only country to which the French-Canadian feels he owes his devotion, his love and his life; but though his heart will throb to the tune of O, Canada, no Canadian will more sincerely or more piously sing to God that the king of this autonomous dominion within the commonwealth will be saved, made happy and glorious, and, most of all, victorious over all his enemies of to-day or to-morrow.

The speech from the throne refers to federal-provincial relations. I need not dwell on these matters now, but it might not be amiss to state at this time that this whole subject is an exceedingly delicate one, fraught with dangers and difficulties. The sittings of the commission have shown how much concerned the eastern provinces are over the subject of their autonomy, while the western provinces seem willing to transfer to the federal government those prerogatives which they are financially unable to exercise. A detailed trip through the west last fall has convinced me that no finer, stauncher Canadians can be found than those in the west. They have gone through a terrible ordeal and have real grievances. It must not be forgotten, however, that the eastern provinces have had hard times of their own, and although I imagine they would be prepared to go to the extreme limit in generous treatment and reasonable compromise, apparently they are not willing at this time to consent to amendments to the British North America Act. Speaking for myself alone, and with no authority to speak but for myself, I would say that the apparent distrust Quebec places on any move to amend the Canadian constitution is the fear that, once the door has been opened, there may come later on some hostile majority which will deprive the province of the prerogatives which it values most—autonomy as to language, religion, education and local government.

There is much talk about national unity, and I imagine hon. members opposite are going to use that as a political catchcry at the next general election. But I say to the house to-night: There is no surer way to augment the present disunity than to foster centralization and constitutional amendments at this time. Surely, with the situation as it is, we are not going to take the chance of provoking a cleavage between east and west. All other avenues must be explored before we resort to amendment and centralization.

Amendments will not put money into the pockets of our people, nor will they provide good crops for our western brothers. Centralization will not solve unemployment, nor will it bring back that healthy economic equilibrium which we once enjoyed. The remedy and the panacea lie elsewhere.

[Mr. Héon.]

That famous parliamentarian, Burke, speaking in the imperial parliament when the Constitutional Act of Canada of 1791 was being discussed, said:

> It would be pure folly to try to amalgamate two races with different languages and law. The constitution must be founded on human nature, if it is to remain stable.

These words should be borne in mind by hon. members at this time. It would be most unfair to suggest that the opposition to centralization is purely political and provincial. Provincial legislators I have had the honour to meet, from both east and west, are not at all devoid of patriotism and national spirit. They are only uttering the sentiment of their cabinets and other elected representatives of the people within their local assemblies. They should not, nor can they do otherwise.

Let us not forget the way in which we became a confederation, and those diversities which continue to prevail in race, religion and language. Whatever we do, we cannot change our geography, or the origins of our two main groups. And because we cannot do so there is, in my mind, just as much need for autonomy in local rights as there ever was. I have the utmost confidence that after the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission has been tabled and discussed, and an interprovincial conference held, cooperation and good will will prevail among the delegates of the dominion and the provinces, and some satisfactory solution will yet be found. I cannot say I have lost faith in the inherent ability of our Canadian public men to find a proper way out, just as they did in 1867.

The speech from the throne carries ominous warnings as to the international situation. I should like to express a few strictly personal thoughts on this matter. I want it distinctly understood that as I speak I am speaking for myself alone, and that no person in the house can be bound directly or indirectly by what I shall have to say.

First, I must confess that I cannot share the opinion which seems to be prevalent that we, the elected representatives of the people, should not dare discuss the international situation, or say or do anything which could be construed as meaning that we approve one policy or disapprove another policy of some country which apparently may be on friendly terms with us. There is a French proverb which says: "C'est du choc des idées que jaillit la lumière"—"A spark of light will come from the shock of ideas." That could be very well applied to discussion of the foreign policy to be pursued by this country, in the face of a continental war. The attitude that opinions cannot be expressed at this time is wholly undemocratic and contrary to our standards. If there ever were a time when public opinion should be enlightened and given the true facts of our present situation, it is now. I am sorry to say that in my opinion at least the lack of pronouncement by the government on its external policy, and what it would do in the event of a continental war, creates unrest among all classes of Canadian people.

The policy so far has been directed in such a way that all shades of public opinion have been given the impression that the government's policy was their own. Imperialists have been led to believe that this government was sufficiently imperialistic to please them, while the isolationists have been given some indirect reassurance by the pronouncements of some of the ministers.

The bare truth is that none of us can tell what the policy is, and we would all be hard put to define it at this time. Prior to the right hon. Prime Minister's declaration of January 16, 1939, wherein he stated that when Great Britain was at war Canada was at war, and that parliament would decide, we did not know where we stood. It is all becoming a little clearer now. But it took a long time to bring it out, and the isolationist element of the cabinet seems to have been finally overridden.

It is quite clear that the hesitant yes-and-no external policy of the government has gone by the board, and that we have joined for better or for worse the world-rearmament race. We have not been told where the danger of attack comes from. We have not the slightest inkling of where the impending invasion lies, although four thousand miles of sea must be crossed before we are attacked, and the combined sea forces of Great Britain, France and the United States appear to stand in the way of an invader. These combined sea forces would not bar the passage of the enemy through altruistic motives alone; they would firstly be defending themselves and their commercial sea-lanes.

Now, can this country be attacked by air? I should like to quote from the book of George Fielding Eliot entitled "The Ramparts We Watch" as condensed in the Reader's Digest of February, 1939, at page 68. Mr. Eliot, by the way, was major of military intelligence reserve, in the United States army. He states:

> We need not fear air attacks from abroad. The record for distance flying is 6,295 miles, set by Russian fliers from Moscow to California. But for war operations, the aeroplane's radius of action is but one-fourth its maximum range; for the plane must return to its base. and it must be prepared to fight, to manoeuvre, to waste time searching for its objectives. Moreover, warplanes must sacrifice fuel load for bombs. All this brings down the warplane's range to less than 1,500 miles—about half the distance across the narrower of our two oceans frontiers.

Another military expert Colonel Frederick Palmer, writing in the Montreal Standard of January 28, 1939, says this:

> We are perfectly secure. No enemy can reach our shores. Yet we have never been more apprehensive lest we be attacked. . . . Until bombing planes can go more than 800 miles with a full bomb load, an air raid across 2,500 miles of sea is out of the question. But what if they come on aircraft carriers? Italy has no aircraft carriers; Germany two building. An aircraft carrier without fleet protection is an egg-shell to our destroyers and cruisers.

If the opinions of Mr. Eliot and Mr. Palmer can be taken with reasonable assurance, the attack would not come from the air. Under these circumstances, and assuming that Mr. Eliot's and Mr. Palmer's opinions are the considered opinion of the majority of our military experts, what is the purpose of laying particular emphasis on air defence? I say, without any disrespect, it appears to-day, just as it did in 1914, that we are still the rich uncle from America; that we are bound again to help make the world safe for liberty and democracy. When Britain is at war, Canada is at war! What an admission to make when 70,000 Canadians are sleeping their last sleep in France, and we have a two billion dollar war debt for having followed this now-antiquated policy in 1914! We are not able to save our own people from poverty, hunger and unemployment, and yet we can afford the luxury of spending hundreds of millions of dollars and risking possibly another 100,000 Canadian lives, a full generation of Canadians, to help pay for the glaring blunders of French and British foreign policies made during the last twenty years.

We have had no share in the framing of these policies; we have not been able to cast one vote in approval or disapproval of the public men of the countries who framed these policies, but now we are considered important enough to rearm and stand by their mistakes with our Bren guns pointed at the enemy. Then we are not a north American nation; we are only a glorified extension of Britain and France in America! According to this government, when Great Britain is at war, Canada is at war. What becomes then of the late Lord Stanley's declaration in Toronto when he was secretary of the dominions? I quote:

> Is Canada at war when Britain is at war? Certainly not. Canada has entire responsibility of her own. She is a sovereign state and decides for herself.

In whom are we to believe? If the words of the Prime Minister are to be taken literally, that when Great Britain is at war, Canada is at war, the foreign policy of Great Britain, whatever it may be, binds us to the extent that if the British foreign office decides upon war the decision applies to Canada de jure and de facto. That same policy propounded by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier existed in 1889 and 1914. We have grown since, but we are not free, autonomous Canadians. We still remain colonials in the truest sense of the word. The two billion dollar war debt, the 70,000 brave Canadians buried in France, the 40,000 gallant veterans we have with us, have not earned for this country the right to decide for itself! In my opinion, this automatic commitment to war is the very negation of the autonomous dominion status we are supposed to enjoy. All the shouting that was done from the housetops during the 1926 general elections as to our sovereignty and autonomy, all the trumpet blasts and accompanying fanfare which greeted the statute of Westminster were mere shams. It does seem to me that in the domain of foreign affairs we are still little boys. It seems that we should be seen but not heard when it comes to the question of war.

We are told that parliament will decide. Decide what? What can this parliament decide if we are to be automatically at war? Is it to decide the extent of the participation? We all know what that would mean. There are no half-measures in war; if we are in it we shall be in it to win. There will again be high-powered propaganda and the imperialistic press shouting and calling for "the last man, the last dollar and the last cent." If hon. gentlemen would just recall some of the editorials and flamboyant front-page articles which appeared at the time of the Munich conference, they will easily understand what we may expect. Where will the Canadian voter be in all this? What voice will that body most concerned in war, the youth of this country, have in the matter? These two classes would not even be consulted. Parliament would decide. In my humble opinion this parliament cannot take upon itself the right to decide participation and extensive rearmament. The last general election was not fought on these issues, and the Canadian public has not expressed its opinion sufficiently for this parliament to know where it stands on these matters. If a state of national emergency is to exist; if this parliament is to engage this country in a future war, it should go immediately to the people and seek authority. Let us be frank and face the facts. Participation in a continental war will, whether we want it or not, be an issue at the next general election. It will most certainly be an issue in Quebec. I could not escape it in my own constituency even if I tried.

Colonialism or Canadianism! That will be the issue to be faced by most candidates in the forthcoming general election. I do not know what the verdict will be, but I refuse to think that colonialism is the regime under which the overwhelming majority of Canadians want to live to-day.

Sentiment must not be the deciding factor in an issue of this kind. There is not a single red-blooded Canadian who has any sympathy for nazism, fascism or the methods for which they stand. That is not the question. We must coolly and deliberately decide whether we shall forever mortgage this country's resources and man power, expend billions of dollars and sacrifice generations of Canadians for the benefit of those European governments which find it in their interest to enter into all sorts of secret agreements and manoeuvres for the balance of power. That is the question. Shall we become wedded to those intertanglements for which European politics have become famous? Shall we assume responsibility for all the vagaries of continental diplomacy which we cannot ever hope to prevent and on the course of which we have never nor shall ever be properly consulted? That is the issue.

I want to make it clear before I terminate my remarks that I am not a pacifist in the narrow sense of the word. I believe it is our strict duty to make this autonomous yet component part of the commonwealth invulnerable to attacks and invasion. If this government has been reliably informed that some foreign power has cast a covetous eye on this territory, and if this information originates from authoritative and unimpeachable sources, then it is our immediate and sacred duty to proceed with the speediest, most complete and most efficient plan for the defence of our homeland. I do not infer that we should never take part in any war. What I say is that any war in which we do take part must be a war in which something better than sentiment actuated by prejudiced propaganda is at stake. It must be a war that threatens our very liberty, independence and existence, and the issue of which would be of immediate vital concern to all of us. I say, my country right or wrong, but not fifteen countries.

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I desire to congratulate the mover thereof (Mr. Matthews) and to cite the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) as an example to all hon. members. I believe the hon. member for Stormont has given the house a magnificent example of bilingualism which is a credit to the race he represents.

The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Hyndman) suggested on January 20 that I withdraw my proposed resolution asking the house to change the name of Canada from "Dominion of Canada" to "Kingdom of Canada," and the designation of "Governor General" to "Viceroy", and also that the viceroy should be a Canadian. May I assure the hon. member that not only have I no intention of withdrawing my resolution, but on the contrary I am eager to have it approved by the house before his majesty's arrival, in order that we may confer upon him a title in keeping with the statute of Westminster, the drafting of which is due to that eminent statesman, successor to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and French-Canadian leader, who represents in this house the constituency of Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe).

Why should not Canada enjoy the same privileges as Ireland? Why should we not proclaim the fact that his majesty has been king of Canada since the imperial conference of 1926 and the statute of Westminster of 1931? We should indeed pray his majesty to consent to the amendment of his legal designation so that it may read as follows: "George VI, by the grace of God, King of Great Britain, Ireland, Canada, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand and of the British possessions beyond the seas, Emperor of India, defender of the faith."

Canada having equal status with the other members of the British commonwealth of nations and being autonomous in its internal affairs and in its relations with other countries, I would go so far as to say that this house should ask the government of Great Britain to abolish the post of Secretary of State for the Dominions, which has become unnecessary, there being no longer any dominions.

Further, I am strongly opposed to the doctrine that when England is at war Canada is at war. In that connection allow me to quote from an article published on January 19 last in the Quebec organ of the Liberal party, Le Soleil. Under the heading, "The simple solution of a complicated problem," the article says:

> By virtue of the Statute of Westminster and the principle of self-determination of peoples, we have the right to order our own national future, and the possibility of an early war makes it imperative that we should give the greatest care to our decision. This decision will have to be taken by the parliament of Canada, but it is the duty of all concerned, of the younger element of the population particularly, to make their will felt by a body of representatives subjected to influences both visible and invisible.
> In the statement he recently made on the subject the Right Hon. Mackenzie King expressed his opinion, which is based on a tradition formerly acknowledged by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. But when this illustrious Liberal leader disappeared from the scene Canada was only a potential nation still bound constitutionally to England and the British Empire.
> This bond could not have been broken, in all probability, without recourse to violence, inasmuch as the majority of the voters were then in favour of this imperial subjection. Since that time the Statute of Westminster conferred on Canada, in international law, a political latitude equal to that of England. It depends entirely on us to make this theoretical emancipation more than an empty word.

The article continues:

> It seems to be assumed on all sides that Canada would inevitably be drawn into any war directed against England. No account is taken of the right to neutrality. It is thus inferred that by a series of European or Asiatic complications the Canadian nation is irrevocably bound to the fate of an empire to which it still belongs. It would therefore be as a result of this bond that conflict would threaten to extend to America, thus drawing the United States, through the Monroe doctrine, in a world war. Such is evidently the English plan, but it is logically unsound. As a matter of fact, by its geographical situation and its continental interests, Canada is in duty bound to protect America against this danger. It can do so in two different ways: by leaving the empire; by accepting the Pan-American alliance offered by the United States.

Further on, the same paper says:

> It must not be forgotten that if we permit the sending of volunteers at the expense of the government to help England, a conscription measure might follow, to the misfortune of our country.

What is the best way, Mr. Speaker, to protect our country in that regard, if not to create an independent kingdom and officially to proclaim our neutrality, thus placing ourselves on the same footing as the United States as regards any future intervention?

Let us not forget that in the event of foreign troops invading our territory the United States, by virtue of the Monroe doctrine, is obliged to intervene. Let us make such intervention unnecessary, and let us allow peace to reign for a few centuries more on this north American continent.

We should keep out of European troubles and complications. Let us loudly assert our neutrality, thus giving to our country the true independence which it has won. On those conditions only shall I vote for increased defence appropriations. Otherwise I shall maintain the attitude I have held in years past. Much as I regret it for the sake of certain of my friends, I shall continue with some of my colleagues to sound the note of alarm.

The other day the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) uttered these words:

> Canada, however, should to-day be willing to join with other democracies in offering an asylum to a fair quota of sufferers, both Jews and Christians, in a broad humanitarian effort to relieve their distress.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to answer the hon. member by saying that the finest humanitarian effort that we could accomplish would be to give employment and bread to the 322,000 Canadians who in 1937 applied unsuccessfully to the national employment service for work. Before thinking of providing employment for German, Czech and other victims of persecution, we should seek to provide work for our own Canadians.

It must not be forgotten that more than one-tenth of our manual workers are still unemployed. In the single province of Quebec, from 60,000 to 70,000 sons of farmers are seeking a piece of land to operate. Most of the Europeans that we are asked to admit to this country have not the slightest intention to settle on the land. They will remain in the cities where they will take the place of our own workers, who will be turned out of their jobs. World history shows that victims of political persecution have usually been forced to emigrate with only bare necessities and have had to depend on providence for the rest. Therefore those who think that by opening the door wide to immigration of these refugees we shall be adding to the country's capital, are greatly mistaken. All requests for the admission of political or other refugees should be energetically opposed because of the economic disabilities under which our fellow citizens are labouring.

I had the honour to-day to lay on the table of the house a petition presented by the most powerful national society in Canada, the St. Jean Baptiste Society, bearing 127,364 signatures, protesting against Jewish immigration. Canadians of French and British descent, let us unite against the danger which threatens us in that regard. The present state of our public finances and the commercial and industrial situation forbid our opening our doors to immigrants, especially foreigners who cannot be assimilated into our civilization and traditions, which are the sole guarantee of the unity so necessary to assure a prosperous and happy Canada. I am confident that the government will take this petition into consideration and refuse to amend the immigration regulations in the manner urged by certain classes.

It is not my intention to speak on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, but I thought it advisable to submit to the consideration of the house the few observations I have just made.

On motion of Mr. Casselman the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Michaud the house adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

Tuesday, January 31, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENTS

APPROVAL OF GUARANTEE BY ONTARIO OF LOANS TO MUNICIPALITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) whether or not the province of Ontario has signified its willingness to approve or guarantee loans to be made by the federal government to municipalities, pursuant to the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): No.

RIGHT HON. R. B. BENNETT

OPPORTUNITY FOR REFERENCES TO RETIREMENT FROM LEADERSHIP OF PARTY AND MEMBERSHIP IN HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a question arising out of the first order of yesterday's proceedings having to do with the resignation of the member for West Calgary, the late leader of the Conservative party, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. A short reference was made to it about June 30 of last year, but it was expected that the right hon. gentleman would be back here this session. I should like to know if the government would consider setting aside a little time some day this week so that hon. members may have an opportunity to pay tribute to the right hon. gentleman who was leader of the party to which I belong. In view of his lengthy services in and out of the house I think it only fitting that such procedure should be taken and that he be thanked for his services. I should not like to have it said that a prophet is not without honour save in his own country.

I was not able to hear everything that was said by the hon. member. I shall read it in Hansard and let him have a reply later.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, January 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. E. Matthews for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Manion, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Woodsworth.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, the speech of His Excellency the Governor General briefly expresses the views of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his colleagues with respect to the new trade treaty with the United States. It speaks of this treaty as "a far-reaching agreement", as "a constructive contribution toward a betterment of world conditions", as "furthering the ends of international goodwill," as a reduction of customs duties and excise "much greater than that made by any previous parliament or by any other country in recent years"; and, finally, as enlarging "the advantages of the agreement concluded in 1935". I do not intend to-day to combat each and every of these specious announcements, but I should like to refer to one or two of them.

In other official pronouncements it has been designated as a policy of appeasement. Last June in the house I made an analysis of the trade of Canada and the United States under the trade agreement then in force, and I showed from the returns brought down by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) that the increase of our exports to the United States of commodities, on which there had been no change in the United States customs duties under that agreement, was far greater than the increase of our exports under the schedule of commodities on which the United States tariff was reduced by that agreement. With the permission of the house I should like to place on Hansard a short table of only three lines in which I have brought down the figures to cover the corresponding period of the calendar year of 1938, showing for 1935, 1936, 1937 and 1938 the domestic exports from Canada to the United States, and segregating the value of those commodities exported on which a reduction of duty was made in the United States tariff. If I may be allowed to place the table on Hansard, it would clarify the comments which I may wish to make.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may do so only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: All right.

Mr. CAHAN: The figures are as follows:

Domestic Exports from Canada to the United States

	Twelve months ended December 31st
	1935	1936	1937	1938
Commodities subject to reduction of duty..	$ 35,723,003	$ 59,281,878	$ 64,582,861	$ 37,975,679
Commodities not subject to reduction of duty..	225,962,369	277,635,071	295,429,282	232,485,510
Total commodity exports, excluding gold..	$261,685,372	$336,916,949	$360,012,143	$270,461,189

Our exports to the United States for the calendar year 1935, the year before that trade agreement came into force, of commodities on which the United States tariff was reduced on January 1, 1936, amounted in value to $35,723,000. Our exports of the same commodities during the calendar year 1938 were $37,976,000. In compensation for all the tariff concessions which we made in that year to the United States, comparing our trade for 1935, before the agreement came into effect, with our trade for 1938, we gained merely $2,253,000 of export trade under the reductions of duties made by that agreement.

A comparison of our exports of commodities on which the United States tariff was not reduced shows that, exclusive of gold, our domestic exports to the United States of commodities respecting which there were no reductions in the United States customs duties under the trade agreement which came into force on January 1, 1936, were during the calendar year 1935, $225,962,369, while in the calendar year 1938 the same exports on which no reductions of duty had been made were $232,785,510, an increase in our exports on which there were no reductions in duties of $6,523,141 as compared with an increase of $2,252,676 in our domestic export of commodities on which the United States duties were reduced.

If our prospective advantages from this new trade treaty, which was signed on November 17 last, may be judged by those resulting from the previous agreement signed on November 15, 1935, the new trade treaty offers slight hope of improving economic conditions in this country and even less prospect of proving a "constructive contribution toward the betterment of world conditions" or of "furthering the ends of international goodwill."

I wish that in the quiet hours that are available to him for reflection upon his official misdeeds as well as his official good deeds the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) would carefully consider the basis of his capricious infatuation that by persistently endeavouring to appease the government of the United States we are promoting the cause of international peace. For myself I think that his pretensions in this respect are utterly fanciful.

I recall to the Prime Minister's mind the fact that during the five fiscal years of his regime ending March 31, 1930, Canada's imports from the United States exceeded the United States imports from Canada by $1,296,000,000, and that, nevertheless, that excessive drain upon the economic life of Canada was followed on June 30, 1930, while the Prime Minister was still in office, by the Hawley-Smoot tariff, which practically prohibited all exports of Canadian farm products to the neighbouring republic and brought Canada to the verge of financial ruin, and ruin was avoided only by the Ottawa agreements of August, 1932, which opened to us in a larger measure the markets of the United Kingdom and of our sister dominions. This country might have some ground for confidence if we could be inspired by the Prime Minister's illusive infatuation that the reduction of our modest tariffs against United States products, which will have the inevitable result of increasing unemployment throughout Canada, will nevertheless save civilization from international conflict. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) says:

—the six cent preference has not benefited the wheat growers of the western or any other part of Canada.

And the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) adds:

My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) dealt with the matter (of wheat) the other day and I think showed conclusively that the preference was never regarded as of much benefit to Canada.

I put alongside of that statement articles which appeared in the columns of the London Economist dealing with the same matter. The London Economist of October 9, 1937, in publishing a series of statistics which it describes as the background for an Anglo-American treaty, notes that in 1929, before the date of the Ottawa agreements, Canada sold the United Kingdom 27,190,000 hundredweights of wheat, which increased in 1932 to 46,873,600 hundredweights and in 1936 to 57,842,000 hundredweights.

The Ottawa agreements were concluded on August 20, 1932. On the other hand, the Economist states that the United States sold to the United Kingdom 22,265,900 hundredweights of wheat in 1929, which was reduced to 4,627,200 hundredweights in 1932 and to 45,400 hundredweights in 1936. And so having given full statistics of the trade of the United Kingdom with Canada and the United States the Economist states:

It is beyond question that these (the Ottawa agreements) have dealt hardly with certain American agricultural exports, notably cereals, fruit, pig products and soft wood..... British imports of American bacon and hams, for example, have fallen from £7,364,000 in 1929 to £1,562,000 in 1936, while British imports from Canada have risen from £1,567,000 in 1929 to £5,536,000 in 1936. British imports of American soft wood (principally Douglas fir) have fallen from £2,109,000 in 1929 to £1,144,000 in 1936, while imports of Canadian soft wood have risen from £1,229,000 to £4,107,000. Senator McNary, of Oregon, complained in the United States senate last August that, thanks to discriminating tariffs, the United States had in 1936 supplied only six per cent of the British empire demand for north Pacific lumber against 74½ per cent in 1929.

Again, on November 26, 1938, after the Anglo-American treaty had been signed and when its terms were known in England, the Economist further states that:

Very few of the concessions made to the United States will result in any category of American goods being placed (in Great Britain) in a more favourable competitive position vis-a-vis the domestic producer.

That is, the British domestic producer.

Most of the agricultural products affected are not grown in this country, or where they are, the domestic producer is already safeguarded. In these cases the effect of the agreement will largely be to divert a certain quantity of trade from dominion (largely Canadian) to American hands, without increasing the total volume of imports.

And the Economist adds:

It is known that we have surrendered some of our preference in the Canadian market, and it may be presumed that, since Canada is a net loser by the British American agreement, she will be a net gainer by her own agreement with the United States, i.e., that the concessions she has given to the United States will be at our expense—

That is, at British expense:

—rather than at her own.

That is, rather than at our expense, at Canadian expense. And in a general summary the Economist says that:

Argentina gains from several of the reductions of duty on agricultural produce, notably from the abolition of the duty on wheat, for which she is, with the United States, our largest foreign supplier.

Is it any wonder that the government of the United States, in a recent official pronouncement, quoted by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), concluded that:

One of the most important concessions is the removal of the duty on wheat which has been the equivalent to about six cents per bushel. This has tended to divert trade to Canada and Australia.

In his efforts to bolster up the trade returns so as to show an apparent improvement in our export trade, the Minister of Trade and Commerce issues from time to time statements of our exports which include the value of gold bars which we deliver to the United States in payment of our debit trade balances with that country. In order that I may clearly state the issue in my comments I should like, Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house, to place another short statement on the record which shows for the calendar years 1935, 1936, 1937 and 1938, the official returns of exports to the United States from Canada, and noted therewith for each year is the value of our exports of gold bars to the United States, which are included in these exports.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. CAHAN: The statement is as follows:

Summary of Trade of Canada with the United States

Our imports of commodities from the United States in the calendar year 1935 amounted to $312,416,604. Our domestic exports to the United States for the same year are given by the minister as $358,569,736, although in fact there is included in that amount of our exports, gold bars to the value of $96,884,364, so that our export of domestic merchantable commodities to the United States was only $261,685,372, showing a real excess of $50,731,232 in our imports over our exports to the United States of merchantable commodities.

I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) shakes his head. I defy him to find any inaccuracy in that statement.

Mr. DUNNING: It was very carefully worded.

Mr. CAHAN: I usually try to word my statements carefully and to be accurate.

For the calendar year 1936 the value of our imports from the United States was $369,141,513, as officially given in the returns of the Department of Trade and Commerce, while our exports to the United States of domestic products are given by the minister as $406,664,567, which includes gold bars to the value of $72,747,618, leaving an export of domestic merchantable commodities of $333,916,949, and showing a real trade deficit of $35,224,564 on our year's trading with the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: Is gold not a merchantable commodity?

Mr. CAHAN: No, gold is not a merchantable commodity in the sense that iron or steel or wheat is. It was not until after this government came into office in 1935 that an attempt was made to bolster up the trade statistics to show in the official returns an increase in our exports to the United States by including therein the bars of gold that we were sending to the United States in payment of the international balances accruing out of the deficit in our real trade exports. And in 1936 that real trade deficit in our year's trading with the United States in merchantable commodities amounted to $35,224,564.

For the calendar year 1937, the value of our imports from the United States was $490,504,978, and our domestic exports to the United States, as shown in the official returns, amounted to $470,181,046; but these exports included gold bars to the value of $110,158,903, leaving an export of domestic merchantable commodities of $360,012,143, and showing a real trade deficit for the calendar year 1937, dealing alone with merchantable commodities which up until hon. gentlemen opposite assumed office in 1935 had always been the basis on which these records were kept, of $130,492,835 in our trade with the United States.

For the calendar year 1938 our imports from the United States were of the value of $424,754,993, as shown in the official returns, and our domestic exports to the United States, as given by the Minister of Agriculture in his address on January 25, were $345,911,915, but this included gold bars to the value of $75,450,726, leaving our real export of domestic merchantable commodities at the value of $270,461,189, and showing again a real trade deficit for the calendar year 1938 of $154,293,804 in our trade with the United States.

In brief, during the term of the trade agreement with the United States, which expired on January 1, 1939, our excess of imports of merchantable commodities over our domestic exports to the United States amounted to $370,742,435, and in part payment of these debit balances we delivered to the United States $258,367,247 in gold bars, which are accepted by every country in payment of international balances. We need no new trade agreement with the United States, we need to make no concessions to the United States to the prejudice of our domestic industry, in order to induce the United States to accept gold bars as a trading proposition. Gold bars are the medium of international payments in all countries in the world, and there is not a country on this side of the Atlantic or the other side that would not be very happy indeed to accept our gold bars in payment of any purchases our traders might make in those countries.

If these facts disclose any commercial advantages which we have received from our former trade agreement with the United States, I think we may all fervently pray that such advantages may no longer be dispensed to us in the form of debit trade balances for which we have to export our gold.

I repeat that it is only since 1935 that the government of this country has attempted to boost its statistics of export trade by including its export of gold bars as a trading commodity. But no trade agreement is necessary to induce foreign countries to accept bar gold. Gold is not an ordinary commercial commodity which is subject to customs duties, and gold has no place in trade statistics which are quoted to show the advantages of a reciprocal trade agreement between this country and the United States or between this country and any other country.

When, late in 1932 and early in 1933, I was in Paris endeavouring on behalf of Canada to negotiate a new trade agreement with France, the official representatives of the United States used all available tactics, and even intimidation, to preclude the government of France from negotiating any trade treaty with Canada that would even implicitly recognize the right of the United Kingdom and the dominions to grant to each other any trade preferences, basing their objections on the assertion that members of the British commonwealth were, in relation each to the other of them, really foreign nations, and urging that France should insist that the most favoured nation clause should apply to all the concessions we had made to Great Britain; and if hon. members have read that treaty they will notice that in that agreement with France I insisted upon an unusual form of drafting, by including a special use and application of the term "foreign nation" with respect to France.

In fact, from the time that the Ottawa agreements with the United Kingdom and other British dominions were signed at Ottawa on August 20, 1932, the State department of the United States and its representatives at foreign capitals have striven, by every possible means known to United States diplomacy, to weaken, and, if possible, to destroy the effect of those interimperial agreements.

On the day that the new trade treaties were signed, a special dispatch from Washington to the New York Times clearly indicated the official view of the Washington government that the new trade treaty between Great Britain and the United States "sounded the death-knell of the empire preference theory of trade among members of the British empire."

The Times special correspondent further reported:

It is believed on good authority here that Mr. Hull and his aides refused to consider any exchange of concessions on the basis of a preferential tariff for empire produce, which was considered, in principle, a form of discrimination against American commerce.

On January 25 the Minister of Trade and Commerce assured this house that the "new agreement reaffirms the principle of the British preference, and the United States is admitting that principle." In support of that statement the minister read from the seventeenth article of the new agreement as follows:

Nothing in this agreement—

I call the minister's attention to that.

—shall entitle the United States of America to claim the benefit of any treatment, preference or privilege which may now or hereafter be accorded by Canada to territories under the sovereignty of His Majesty the King.

That stipulation is obviously restricted to the provision that the terms of the treaty shall not entitle the United States to such preferences as may subsist after the treaty goes into effect, and it in no sense affirms the right of Canada to grant such preferences, and leaves the United States still free to condemn such preferences on diplomatic grounds other than the terms expressed in the agreement itself.

Mr. EULER: Is my hon. friend there expressing his own opinion or reading from somebody else's opinion?

Mr. CAHAN: No; I gave the citation and read the language, and I am now giving my own opinion with regard to it. It is so clear from a study of the English language incorporated therein that there is, I submit, no other meaning to it.

The Prime Minister's policy of appeasement is already proving insufficient to satiate the cupidity of politicians at Washington, who are now emulating Hitler and Mussolini in their claims for territorial expansion. I have seen an Associated Press dispatch from Washington, dated December 23, more than one month after this new trade treaty was signed, in which Robert B. Reynolds, democratic senator from North Carolina during the past six years, emphatically affirms that—

If Britain wants to prove her friendship for America, she could arrange for the transfer to the United States of a fifty-mile corridor from the United States to Alaska for construction of a super-highway.

A claim even more insolent than Hitler's claim to the Memel corridor or Mussolini's claim to Tunisia! The senator adds:

When American people think of Britain, they think of what Britain owes us and wonder why the debt isn't paid. Let them give us this fifty-mile corridor as part payment.

And then on reflection he adds, as an additional partial payment:

Let them deliver to us Bermuda.

Mr. EULER: It was not done, though.

Mr. CAHAN: Oh well, the agitation is still under way. Tunisia is not controlled by Mussolini, nor the Memel corridor by Hitler, but their claims are being urged, with the same persistency being shown as the United States has shown in dealing with this country.

Another Associated Press dispatch from Washington, dated December 8 last, announced that:

The new United States defence program, broadened to embrace the entire western hemisphere, may become a factor in deciding the long-standing controversy over development of the great lakes-St. Lawrence basin.

A war department spokesman said to-day that the huge seaway plan was being studied by the army high command in connection with other national defence matters.

What part the proposed project would have in any defence scheme was not disclosed. President Roosevelt said some time ago that demands for electrical energy by industry located in the St. Lawrence area probably would increase tremendously in time of war. . . .

President Roosevelt indicated a few weeks ago, however, that he intended to press the issue. He announced that he had discussed the new seaway treaty with Premier Mackenzie King when the Canadian Prime Minister was a recent guest at the White House. Mr. Roosevelt said that Mr. King agreed that speedy conclusion of a waterway pact was desirable.

Other political commentators in the United States have also declared that the voluntary assumption by the Washington government of the defence of Canada against foreign aggression would involve control of the navigation of the St. Lawrence river and lake system by the naval and military forces of the United States. Evidently an adequate appeasement of the Washington government will involve radical encroachments upon the autonomy and sovereignty of Canada.

There is no doubt that if the Anglo-American treaty shall serve to increase United States exports to Great Britain, it will also serve in like manner, and probably to the same extent, to restrict Canada's exports to Great Britain. On the other hand, if we may measure the possible advantages to Canada under the new trade treaty by the very meagre increase in our export trade to the United States under the former trade agreement which expired on January 1, then it is a safe conclusion that this new trade treaty will not serve to reduce, to any considerable extent, the widespread unemployment from which Canada now suffers.

Canada's economic condition can be improved only by increasing production in Canada, and thereby increasing the national income which is the only source from which distribution can be made for the continuous employment and sustenance of our people.

The product of our gold mines will in every country find a natural market at stable prices, as gold is still the currency of universal acceptance for the payment of international debit balances; but, in the conditions which prevail throughout the world, increased markets can only be found for other primary products, either while the great nations are feverishly preparing for war or when they are actually engaged in carrying on war.

But the needs of our own people are manifold and ever increasing, and I am convinced that the satisfactory solution of the problem of unemployment in this country will chiefly be found in the rapid development and extension of our secondary industries, which are undoubtedly capable of very great expansion.

If members of this government, instead of conducting for months, and even for years past, futile negotiations with the republic to the south of us, which is now really as protectionist in sentiment as in times past, should devote themselves, for a time, to the development of the secondary industries of this country, unemployment would rapidly be abated. The time has come for the government to call into conference our leaders in industry, as well as the leaders of labour, to consider and devise ways and means for extending existing secondary industries and establishing such new industries as would have a reasonable prospect of success under stable tariff and stable monetary conditions.

It is futile to extol, in grandiloquent terms, as we are accustomed to do here, our vast latent natural resources, which will doubtless prove to be sources of vast wealth for succeeding generations of men who are sufficiently intelligent and courageous to take adequate measures for their development and for their utilization to supply the increasing needs of our people. Is this present generation of men and women incompetent to devise and establish ways and means for employing in domestic industry those of our people who are employable and who are now unemployed? I do not think so. We have ample funds and credits available for the purpose. But we can never achieve permanent prosperity by annual grants for temporary relief of the indigent, or by ever increasing our excessive national debt by large expenditures upon unproductive public works. That course only serves to hasten this dominion on the way to ultimate economic ruin; but, by increasing the volume of our domestic industry, by giving reasonable security to both capital and labour, and by establishing reasonable safeguards against the products of the conscripted labour and low living standards of competing foreign countries, we can and should make Canadians the most prosperous and happy people in the world.

If we can assure industry of stable tariff and monetary conditions for a term of five or ten years, industry can safely guarantee the employment of all labour that may be available. It cannot do so when radical tariff changes are so frequently made that industry cannot foresee the fiscal conditions which will confront it and cannot plan its business with confidence six months in advance. Let this parliament ensure such stable fiscal conditions, and let the government forthwith inaugurate a new deal, a beneficent advance, by convening the leaders of labour and the leaders in industry to devise and put into operation adequate measures to ensure the accomplishment of the ends which we all desire to attain.

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South): I shall not endeavour to follow in a critical or analytical vein the very fine speech of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). A gentleman highly trained in the law, he has turned his marked ability today to the discussion of certain phases of our economic and trade problems. My inclinations and training turn me usually to a consideration of the business side of government, but I should like to offer the hon. gentleman my words of tribute and praise for the fine service over many long years which he has rendered in this parliament to the people of Canada.

We have listened to many excellent speeches on the motion to adopt the address in reply to the speech from the throne. We have before us an amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion). The amendment adds to the motion one short paragraph, twice containing the words "the government has failed." We have an amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). This accepts the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition and adds thereto certain opinions respecting financial institutions and monopolistic enterprises. In his proposed amendment the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation expresses views with which in part I have much sympathy, but he has tied himself up with the leader of the opposition in a way that precludes me from voting with him on this occasion. The government may not have achieved everything that many of us would wish, but the government has not failed. Despite some distress, where is there a country in the world whose people are so happily situated as the people of Canada? Nevertheless we must press forward to restore in Canada the happier conditions that prevailed before the war. I am confident that these can and will come again under progressive Liberal government. But it must be progressive.

I propose to-day to continue my efforts of previous sessions to bring better business methods into vogue in parliamentary procedure and government administration. On first coming to parliament I made a critical study of the unbusinesslike form of presenting the estimates for the expenditure of public money Last year I offered a resolution calling for a revision of the rules of the house. However, the government considered the rules to be not so bad. But is it not true that we waste time on relatively unimportant matters and do not come to grips in a businesslike way with matters of great national importance? What value to the country is much of the speaking in parliament? There is endless duplication of the same arguments. Many speeches contain valuable suggestions, but on account of lack of organization to develop the ideas into workable form many suggestions do not receive consideration. Political speeches should give way to business deliberations. Some means should be found of doing away with the prevailing type of bickering discussions and enabling us to assemble as earnest-minded Canadians determined to debate matters back and forth without Hansard recording it, exchange views, offer suggestions and arrive at prompt legislative action.

Recently three men visited me—a farmer, a factory foreman, and a merchant. The farmer said:

> My father bought a binder for $98 and sold wheat for $1 a bushel. I had to pay $250 for my binder and I sell wheat for 50 cents a bushel. Farmers cannot become purchasers of goods under these conditions.

The factory foreman said:

> I know you need adjustments to give you increased purchasing power, but they cannot be made through reducing factory wages.

The merchant said:

> The only relief for the two of you is through drastic reduction in the overhead of debt and cost of government. This must come speedily, by fair means or foul, to save the country from bankruptcy and for democracy. The government has done many helpful things, but we must move more rapidly towards new methods for this new era. Meantime the middle class of citizen is disappearing. Soon we shall have only the rich and the poor. Through our system money has gone into bonds rather than into channels requiring labour.

There you have the crux of the situation which frustrates development of our resources and deprives the present generation of work and the rising generation of opportunity to get started on a career. All honour to those who have struggled bravely to keep off relief and maintain their self-respect as true Canadians; but would anyone suggest that the morale of homes can be maintained under such precarious conditions of life? Youth in sheer desperation takes to the road, travels from place to place in search of work. The refusal must be enough to break any brave heart. Some keep on and on until they become transients. Recently I visited the Ontario reformatory at the meal hour and watched the groups of ten pass to and from the dining hall. There were some seven hundred of them, mere boys, the average age being 19·7 years. Fifty per cent of them are there for first and second offences of petty stealing. They are boys who have not been fitted into some definite work and are without pocket money. Bent on enjoying the pleasures that other boys have, they steal to get pocket money. Would these boys have found their way to the reformatory if they had obtained employment? I say decidedly, no.

Wider markets will help, but we need something further. Crushing overhead, in which the cost of government is a heavy item, is imposed on agriculture and industry alike. These taxes, added to the cost of goods, must be paid by the consumer. High costs of production will shut us out of export markets. Well, what are we going to do about it? If we follow the course of the last session we will talk and talk; it is the system. Is there no way whereby we can meet and discuss the needs of the country with the directness and dispatch of a board of directors in any business? We talk so much about matters of minor importance that there is little time or place for businesslike consideration of the larger issues.

The great railway problem is almost taboo in the house, except when we are called upon to absorb the annual deficit of about $50,000,000 of the Canadian National Railways. Just what is wrong with the system, past and present, of our federal administrative organization? Let me make it clear that my observations and criticisms throughout are intended to apply to all governments over the long past, and not only to the government of the day.

Do we, in the party systems of all parties, permit our organization set-up to approach too much towards dictatorships within democracies? Do we at times, provincially or federally, have leaders who momentarily become so powerful or so idolized that we condone temporarily their autocratic methods? Or do we build our administrative organization on a false economy? Do our efforts to save in small matters result in waste running into millions? We have provincial cabinets of fourteen members in Ontario and fourteen in Quebec. Those provincial ministers have time to clear their desks and give themselves freedom to receive the people and to move about for contacts with conditions and problems.

Until recently the federal cabinet was composed of fifteen members, but now there are sixteen. Federally we overwork some of our ministers until we wreck their health. The ministers have no leisure time to discuss broad issues with private members. In their offices our ministers are always cordial, but pressure of time brings about two-way welcomes,—"Glad to see you come, but more pleased to see you go." I venture to say that private members can mention scores of matters which should be studied, not by royal commissions but by groups of members in conjunction with ministers, and ministers' advisers, in the departments affected. Why not set a few members to work on such matters, choosing men of broad vision, men who are accustomed to dealing with problems from a business standpoint? I shall not take the time here to give more than two or three illustrations of the need for organized study between sessions of conditions which to-day are unsatisfactory. I would place those matters as follows:

1. Radio. I believe the directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are improving progressively our Canadian programs. It is difficult to suit all tastes, but I have confidence that generally speaking the matter of the preparation of programs is in good hands. I do believe however that the financing and collection methods need an immediate and thorough overhauling. The Minister of Transport can hardly be expected to appreciate the defects of the present system, because his time must be fully taken up in the direction of railway, steamship and aeroplane transport services.

2. Rural mail couriers. There is the feeling, quite generally held, that the basis of remuneration for these men in the mail service is not satisfactory. It is an old problem, and the new Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty) would be well advised to enlist the cooperation of members or of some other group of men to consider wherein adjustments can be made.

3. Public buildings. The Post Office Department does not pay for the buildings occupied. It does not pay interest on the cost of the buildings. It does not pay for light, heat, water, or janitor services, or anything else required about the premises. Consequently any announced surplus in the Post Office Department is fictitious. Likewise, the Department of National Revenue, in connection with many of the buildings occupied for customs and excise purposes, does not pay for any of these items. When we are erecting new public buildings for the joint occupation of these two departments, the Ottawa executives of each clamour for space for extravagant present and over-optimistic future needs. I understand the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) has endeavoured to curb these demands, but I imagine he has not had an easy time getting cooperation towards economy. There are government offices in Ottawa where one official occupies as much space as the general managers of three or four large industrial organizations I could name. If we listened with our good ear we ought to be able to hear the demand coming from every part of Canada for lowering the cost of government. The protest is not only against the cost of too many members in federal or provincial houses; it is as much and possibly more against the multitude of employees, clerks, stenographers, inspectors, supervisors, technicians and others developing and carrying on practically identical services in many of the centres of government.

Some large business concerns do business in every province. From one head office the board of directors may formulate a general policy, arrange finances, conduct research, prepare general advertising and in the interests of economy and efficiency handle all matters which are more or less matters of common need to all branches. Periodically managers, sales managers, engineers, accountants and officers from the branches meet at head office in convention, as a business parliament, to discuss policies and programs. Have we not in any well-organized dominion-wide business the suggestion and example of a pattern for economic and efficient organization for the government of Canada? Why do not we get at it? Some say it is politics; they say we are politicians and there is nothing complimentary in that remark. We came here as a group of honest, well-intentioned men and women keenly desirous of doing our part for the good of Canada. I am satisfied that not many have lost their zeal to assist with every measure that gives promise of promoting a betterment of conditions.

Somewhere our system is wrong. It lends itself to too much speaking and not enough to businesslike deliberation. This has been true with all governments, regardless of what party was in power. Too much dependence is placed upon the initiative of the cabinet. Members who are warm supporters of the government on measures of policy know that, according to the rules of the house, an adverse vote on a comparatively minor issue may defeat the government. This rule should be amended to require an affirmative vote on a definite want of confidence motion to defeat any government. Such a change in the rules would promote independence of action on the part of the members.

After all, many of the electors are not worried as to what party is in power or when an election is to be called. Their primary interest is in employment and decent living conditions. When we think of unemployment we are apt to look at the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and criticize him because he has not provided work or pensions or insurance for every person in Canada. The Minister of Labour has to work under great handicaps. There is a limit as to what can possibly be done in his department. Those limiting conditions can be overcome only by the other departments of the government.

How can we rid ourselves of excessive costs in government? How can we speed up the development of our resources by private enterprise reasonably controlled? The Rowell commission is expected to help us answer these questions, but what of the many other important considerations that cannot possibly be touched upon by that commission? Here is where we need group leadership in foresighted planning. Every member should do more forward thinking so that time will not be lost. I say to my fellow Liberals in this parliament, we each have our responsibility, yet the blame for any inactivity on our part falls inevitably upon the shoulders of our leader.

Strengthened organization without the loss of a single day is a crying necessity. That is my recommendation to-day to the Prime Minister and to the government. I want to exonerate myself at once of the charge of selfish ambition. Let them free me of any suspicion of office seeking. My motives have to do solely with the needs of the nation. The distress of the people demands that a new fresh group of say five or seven members be set to work immediately to represent us all in definite forward planning. It matters little whether they be under-secretaries, ministers without portfolio or simply members of an advisory group, so long as they have the opportunity and the ability to think ahead for us along new lines. High qualifications are essential. It may be that the best equipped members from the standpoint of organizing ability may come from two or three provinces only. If that be so, let them be chosen accordingly, whether they come from Prince Edward Island or Quebec or British Columbia. The situation demands the immediate time and thought of more men of broad outlook.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the people of the federal district of Kootenay West, along with all the people of the Dominion of Canada, have both pride and pleasure in the prospective visit of their majesties. However, there is cause for regret in the fact that the interdepartmental committee could not see its way clear to include in the royal itinerary the southeastern portion of British Columbia. It is felt that their majesties would have pride and pleasure in viewing the largest metallurgical plant in the world. Situated at Trail, this plant operates on the output of the mines at Kimberley, the largest silver-lead-zinc mines on this continent. This plant at Trail is of special interest to the empire at large. At the outbreak of the war there was available a very limited supply of zinc, and this supply was controlled by a New York syndicate which taxed the empire and its allies with exorbitant charges. At that time there was no method of treating the complex silver-lead-zinc ores, but the task of finding such a method was turned over to the research department at the Trail smelter. It was not long before the problem was solved. It is true that this involved a huge expenditure for plant and that there were many initial obstacles to overcome, but the result was a steady supply of zinc at a cost less than twenty-five per cent of what the New York syndicate was charging. A continuous supply of zinc was then available to the empire and its allies.

In this debate on the address it is permissible and even advisable for an hon. member to bring to the attention of the government certain conditions which exist in his district as well as complaints which may affect other portions of Canada. This is done in the hope that the government may consider the amendment of existing legislation or the enactment of new legislation to remedy such complaints. Residence property in the city of Trail is quite scarce and this makes it necessary that many of the employees of the smelter find accommodation elsewhere. Many of them have their homes in the rural districts or at Rossland, which is five or six miles up the mountain. With so many homes located away from the immediate vicinity of the smelter the problem arises of transportation for these employees. It is necessary for the men to be on shift on time, and the men on shift are anxious to get home on time. That problem confronted the employees, as well as the matter of a much reduced transportation charge. One of the employees, Mr. John Gordon, conceived the idea of a cooperative transportation company. In 1932 fifteen of the employees made a first contribution of five dollars each towards the purchase of a car, and to-day that transportation association is perhaps the most successful cooperative concern in the Dominion of Canada. It carries 441 men to their labours each day and brings them back. The result has been that another similar organization has been established to transport men some ten or twelve miles from the southeast and another to transport men twenty miles from the north to Trail.

These cooperative transportation societies carry members only, and they were of the opinion that they were exempt from income tax. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) was generous enough to extend the time for payment of penalty and interest until the matter could be looked into. Section 2 of chapter 24 of the Income War Tax Act, 1930, sets forth that cooperative associations of farmers, live stock men, dairymen, poultrymen, fishermen are exempt from income tax, as well as societies of a like nature. I am going to ask the minister if he will not, early this session, consider my suggestion that the Income War Tax Act of 1930 be amended so as to exempt also these transportation cooperatives from the tax.

Under the harbours and piers act, as amended last session, the Minister of Transport was authorized to recommend to the government the appointment of wharfingers, or controllers as they are called, and to collect tolls on all farm products and merchandise passing over public wharves. While that is all very well for the larger wharves, it is certainly an innovation so far as the wharves on the lakes and rivers in the interior of British Columbia are concerned, because there is not a wharf there with a community of many more than a thousand people behind it, and very few with that number. The people using these wharves have had the use of them for as long as forty years in some cases, and they never heard of such a thing as paying tolls to use the wharf. It is true that some ten years ago one wharfinger was appointed, but he lasted only two weeks. Subsequently there was not another until June last, when at a place called Renata on the Columbia river one was appointed. What was the result? The people absolutely refused to pay tolls of any kind; they simply landed their produce on the beach and carried it up over a gangplank.

I cannot conceive of anything which the people of that district are going to oppose more strongly than a proposal that the farmer be required to pay tolls on the little bit of produce he takes to market, and that the merchant pay tolls on the little bit of merchandise which comes over the wharf in a community where there are no more than from three to five hundred people. These farmers and the people of the district generally have a hard enough time to keep off relief. Most of them manage it by sending a little bit of produce to market, and now they are asked to pay tolls on a side of beef, a case of eggs, or anything else which they take to market and hope to sell. I want to say to the Minister of Transport with all deference that he might just as well try to change the course of the Columbia river as to try to make these people pay wharf tolls. The idea is impractical and simply impossible, and that has been demonstrated by the fact that during the last six months the wharfinger at Renata has been standing there and not one case of produce has gone over the wharf.

Why should these people be asked to pay toll? Are people who use the post office called upon to maintain the post office building except as general taxpayers throughout Canada? The residents living behind these wharves contribute their share of taxes to the consolidated revenue fund, and there is no sense under the sun in attempting to collect fees from them on the farm produce they send over these wharves. As a matter of fact, the majority of people using these wharves are English settlers who were brought to Canada during the boom days when the government was spending three million dollars a year to encourage immigration. Unfortunately the lands have materialy decreased in value since then, and there are not the same opportunities for people to make a comfortable living along those lakes. So I do hope the Minister of Transport will reconsider his inclination in that direction. If he will have some officer or officers of his department visit the Arrow lakes and other lakes in the southeastern section of British Columbia, I am sure that their report will convince him of the injustice and impracticability of appointing wharfingers and attempting to collect fees and tolls from the farmers and residents in that district.

Last session I presented to the house the case of a resident in my district who, on bringing in a radio from the United States, was confronted by solicitors of the radio patent holding company and charged a royalty. He was also served with notice that if he brought in another radio it would be subjected to confiscation and destruction. The question of radio patents has been referred to the tariff board and I am perfectly confident that when it makes its report it will contain very commendable recommendations upon which this government may act. But the fact remains that the government could have remedied existing conditions long before it ever referred the matter to the tariff board. It could have relieved the people of Canada from the conditions which existed during 1938. When the matter was first presented to the tariff board, evidence was given which showed that the cost of radios in Canada was from fifty to ninety per cent higher than in the United States. The facts are simply these. There are some seventy patents covering the construction of radios. These patents are held by a holding company which is owned and controlled by the eleven or twelve radio manufacturers in Canada. The manufacturers then purchase from the holding company a licence to use their own patents. Of course that money comes back to them, but at the same time it is tacked on to the price of the radio. Then they are in a position to restrict production, and also to regulate prices. I am sure that the tariff board will give this house a very clear description of the existing monopoly. This holding company has not been so keen to prosecute anybody since the subject was referred to the tariff board. It will be seen that for the first six months of this year radios to the value of $440,000 were brought in under the $100 exemption, and it is fair to assume that, including the Christmas trade of 1938, the total value of such radios will be around a million dollars. My point is that there was a necessity for referring it to the tariff board, but conditions for the people of Canada could have been very much improved had the government itself acted under the authority conferred first of all in the Patent Act, which permits the commissioner of patents to annul a patent where the owner is abusing it. On the other hand the combines act permits the director of combines to annul these patents where they are being used for the purpose of regulating prices or controlling production.

I want to take this opportunity to convince the government that it did not need any further evidence than was placed on Hansard last year. There was placed on Hansard the list of patents, the demand of the solicitors of this holding company for royalty, and a letter from the holding company telling the resident of Nelson to whom I have referred that if he brought in another radio it would be subject to confiscation and destruction. I have it from one than whom there is no keener or better authority in Canada, that under the Patent Act as it exists to-day that holding company has a perfect right to demand the surrender for destruction of any radio brought in from the United States. Is it not a fair assumption on the part of any citizen that when he purchases a radio, pays the duty on it, clears it and takes it to his home, it is his radio and he is secure in its possession? But certainly that is not so, and surely it is a condition which this government should not tolerate when it has the authority, under the combines act and under the Patent Act, to put an end to such monopolistic tactics.

I am going to take this opportunity to thank hon. members of all parties and groups in the house for their unanimous approval of a bill last session which curtailed the activities of the Canadian Performing Right Society. The bill exempted all music communicated by radio or gramophone from payment of royalties to the Canadian Performing Right Society, on the ground that that music was paid for at the source—in other words, paid for by the broadcasting stations and by the manufacturers of gramophone records. Before His Honour Judge Parker, the royal commissioner, evidence was given by the American director of the Canadian society—and the American society, let it be understood, is the parent of the Canadian society—to the effect that the small users of music which are now exempt, that is to say hotels, skating rinks, stores, lodge halls, and so on, have no commercial value and should not be taxed with royalties. That was the evidence of this director. Apparently they had no commercial value then, yet this same society after the passage of this bill goes to the government or to the appeal board and attempts to collect—how much? Instead of $83,000, as collected from the broadcasting stations last year, it attempted to collect $191,000 this year in order to make up the losses which it said it had sustained by the passage of this bill, although, as I have indicated, the director said there was really no loss. But we have to thank the appeal board for its action in the matter, because had the appeal board not taken a hand, had it not reduced the minimum fee of this society, dear knows where it would have stopped. The appeal board brought their fee down from $30 to $5 as a minimum. The appeal board has allowed this society the $83,000 which was allowed last year from broadcasting stations plus some $6,000 additional to make up for the increased number of radio licences issued by the department as at March 31 last.

This is just about the driest subject that one can broach, and there is no interest occasioned in it except by persistency; but I want to try to impress on members of the government the actual burden which this society inflicts upon the public. In the Canada Gazette of November 5 last you will find a statement of the fees which this society proposes to charge for 1939, and in the Canada Gazette of January 7 there appears a statement of the fees which have been approved by the appeal board. I ask hon. members if the people generally are not justified in the conclusion that these fees go to the government and not to the society. The government seems to sponsor this private Canadian Performing Right Society as it sponsors no other institution in this dominion. In the Canada Gazette of January 5 what do we find? A government notice over the signature of three government officials. That notice tells the public and the users of music in Canada just what they shall do. It tells them that they shall pay this society so much in advance, that they shall make periodical reports to this society, that these reports must contain the number of performances of each sort of instrumental music, that they must say whether that music be afternoon, dinner, evening or otherwise, and that unless they do all these things they will be subject to prosecution for infringement of copyright. I want to ask why. Why should the government sponsor advertising the rates for this private society and pay for the advertisement at the rate of about $600 in the official Canada Gazette? Why should it do so any more than pay for say the advertising and subscription rates of every periodical in Canada? There is no reason under the sun for it.

Then comes the question, to whom are remitted the fees which are collected here? Eighty per cent of the fees collected in Canada are remitted to the picture producers and the film agencies which really make up what are classed as publishers in the American Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers. It all goes to the large picture producers and theatre owners. To them I shall refer in just a moment.

In addition to this payment for advertising —it is trifling, I admit, but why should the people pay for it?—we have the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation paying the society $35,000 of the taxpayers' money this year. In the last five years they have paid the society nearly $100,000, and that is just a slight factor in the reason for increasing the radio licence fee from $2.00 to $2.50. It does not amount to much, but why under the sun should the people of Canada pay these fees to a society that does not prove its ownership? Somebody slipped.

Take the Canada Gazette for January 7 and then look at the amendments to the Copyright Act. Permission is given the society to collect fees and royalties for the use of music which it claims to own, whereas the amendment of last session provides that it may be permitted to collect these fees for music which it does own or in respect of which it has authority to make collections. Anybody can claim anything and that is the trouble with the society. It has been making these claims right along and the government does not realize the imposition. The society claims by assignment the ownership of between two and three million pieces of music. Who knows whether it does own that music or whether there was ownership in the assignors? When an individual or an orchestra or a band is prosecuted for the use of music for which royalty has not been paid, that defendant is compelled to show that the society does not own the copyright. That is an impossible situation. The average man has not the financial ability to prove such a thing as against a corporation that is backed by millions of dollars—and when I say backed by millions of dollars I mean that it is backed by the American society, which is composed of theatre owners and picture producers.

Can any hon. member give one good reason why Canada should continue to be a member of the Berne and subsequent conventions? The United States is not a member. The American Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers is not a member because it finds it to its advantage not to be. Instead, it uses the Canadian society as an instrument for collecting money from the people of Canada in order to fill the purses of the picture producers of the United States. We must not lose sight of the inherent right of the individual to all that is due him under the Copyright Act; but when it comes to a concern acquiring these copyrights for the purpose of creating a monopoly and levying tribute on everyone, then I say the government should intervene. I do ask the government to consider the question of withdrawal from the Berne convention.

I wish now to refer for a moment to the Canada-United States treaty. I do not think anyone is fully qualified to pass judgment on the treaty as a whole until the matter has had a full-dress review in this house, because the opinions that are expressed are governed largely by the way in which the treaty affects each member and the people of his district. So far as West Kootenay is concerned, we have mines and fruit. There is a reduction on zinc going into the United States, but to Canada it means absolutely nothing because Canada is governed by world prices. In the United States the zinc market is self-sustaining and they do not have to worry except for the fact that through the reduction in duties the producer in that country gets that much less. That is on account of the fact that

United States prices are governed by London prices plus the duty. We are governed entirely by London prices. But there is one certainty about the treaty so far as we are concerned, and that is the cost to the people of Canada in dollars and cents.

There are 447 items on which all excise is removed, and that means that the Minister of Finance must make up $10,000,000 there. There are 238 items on which there is a further reduction of duty, and a conservative estimate of the duty will give about $8,000,000. To appease the Canadian industry, which will suffer by reason of the importation of manufactured goods from the United States, if we accept the press reports, the government intends to go further and reduce or cancel the excise on the raw materials used by Canadian manufacturers in order to permit of competition with similar products from the United States.

May I say that it is a genuine pleasure to have the Minister of Finance back in the house able to resume his duties. I imagine that his lot, the lot of any minister of finance, is a most unhappy one, particularly on the eve of an election when he has to combat the preelection demands—I will not say requests—for more funds than he would like to give out, demands that come from what we might call a top-heavy majority of government followers. They are the ones he has to consider.

For a moment now I will deal with the Income War Tax Act. I suggest to the minister that in addition to the $20,000,000 which he has to make up by reason of these losses under the treaty, he has a great many other troubles to which he must give his attention. He has, for instance, the wheat losses. They range all the way from $30.000,000 to $60.000,000. Let me be modest and put it at $30,000,000. Then he has to cover another $18,000,000 of loss of sales tax on building materials, $12,500,000 on terminals, and about $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 on the importation of goods under the $100 exemption. Then there was the Canadian National deficit, which in last year's estimate was placed at $42,000,000. The press reports indicated that at the end of six months that $42,000,000 was gone and that another $12,000,000 would be required. With all these worries the Minister of Finance will almost throw up his hands in despair and ask what is the use. Will he not welcome a suggestion which would bring in something instead of allowing it all to go out?

By amendment to the Income War Tax Act, there was a decided loss to the government. Hon. members know full well that if anybody living outside of Canada has an investment in Canada he is subjected to a deduction of five per cent in the remission of the revenue from it. If from some investment he has a revenue of $100 his agent sends him $95 and accounts to the government for the other $5. But for some reason the government was persuaded in 1936 to reduce that five per cent to two per cent in connection with films. I contend that this government has in the last three years lost no less than $450,000 to $500,000. The film agencies say that they are entitled to this reduction because when their films have been run—and I am told by a theatre manager, that the average run is about four hundred times—the films are worn out. Suppose they are; I submit that does not make any difference.

I do not want hon. members to think that I am speaking at random; I ask them to take the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce covering motion picture films. For the year 1936 they will see that the rentals for films paid to these agencies amounted to $7,500,000, and in 1937 it was $8,790,000, an increase of over a million dollars. First of all they wrote off in 1936, about $1,008,000 in wages; according to the report, for 1937 the figure was $1,060,000. That is all well and good. They are supposed to retain for the benefit and profit of the agency some 35 per cent, and the balance is remitted to the picture producers and theatre owners in the United States.

It appears to me that Canada is fertile ground for raising money to transmit to these picture producers and film agencies in the United States. They do not lose anything on these films. Hon. members must not think that into each province of Canada there comes a film from the states. Not at all. They bring in one negative and send it to a film processing plant in Montreal or Toronto, and from that one negative they make as many prints as are required. That negative is valued for duty purposes at five cents a foot, which represents about $165 on a film of 7,000 feet—I use that figure because according to my information that is the average length of a film. Everything is by the foot, whether it be from the United States or for distribution in Canada. The film remains here only ten days and then goes back to the producer undamaged. The prints are turned over to the film agencies for 3½ cents a foot plus the sales tax, so that the total cost of a film shown in one of these theatres for as long as it can be used is about $246.

Talk about figures as long as you please, the fact remains that these films yield a rental of between seven and eight million dollars a year. Yet for some reason the government thought it necessary or advisable to reduce that five per cent tax to two per cent. The five per cent could well be paid. I think the minister should take steps to recover the half million dollars that he has lost in the last three years; certainly there should be no further loss. The agencies in each province are supplied with as many prints as they want, and there cannot possibly be any loss to the agency.

I ask the Minister of National Revenue, then, to include transport cooperatives under the exemption clause, and to see that this three per cent reduction no longer applies to films. There is no reason under the sun why huge concerns sending millions of dollars to the United States should be more favoured than the poor fellow in the United States who has a little investment in Canada from which he receives a dividend. And also I ask the Minister of Transport to drop the tax or toll upon wharves used by settlers.

Mr. T. V. GRANT (Kings): As the hon. leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition (Mr. Manion) is a distinguished member of the profession to which I have the honour to belong, I wish at once to extend my hearty congratulations to him upon having been chosen at a nation-wide convention as chief of the National Conservative party of Canada, which supersedes the Liberal-Conservative party.

I think our hon. friends are making a great mistake in changing their name so often. In other walks of life only companies that have gone bankrupt, or individuals who have got into difficulty and would feel safer under some other name, change their names. Even some ladies hesitate to change their name, although they are specially privileged in that regard. Why has the Liberal party not found it necessary to change its name—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They are proud of it.

Mr. GRANT: Of course they are. There is something fascinating, something charming about it. There is much to be proud of, and nothing to be ashamed of, in the name "Liberal." Even the Democrats in the United States like to call themselves Liberals.

There is much wisdom in the oft-repeated expression that there is none so blind as those who will not see. Our opponents have demonstrated the truth of that saying in their interpretation of the speech from the throne, a document which no well-informed Canadian can deny to be a true summary of a record of achievement unequalled in any similar period by any previous government in Canada. It would take much more time than I have at my disposal, and a much better artisan, to deal adequately with the various items in that speech. But I join with all loyal Canadians in welcoming to this country Their Majesties King George VI and Queen Elizabeth. This is the first time in history that Canada has been honoured by a visit from her sovereign.

In connection with the royal visit no doubt many maritimers had to smile recently when it was announced over the radio from the old country that their majesties would visit "Canada, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland." And yet Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, in the order named, are the two most important provinces in this great dominion. Prince Edward Island, the cradle of confederation, comes first, although we have been given this doubtful special mention over the radio.

My next pleasant duty is to congratulate the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The mover, a native of Prince Edward Island, to which I belong, did not surprise me in the least when he delivered his fine address. Before he left the garden of the gulf for a wider field of endeavour, I had intimately known him as a clever writer, a polished speaker and an educationist. His departure at that time was regarded as a distinct loss to our province.

The seconder has been a near neighbour of mine on the back benches since I came to the house in 1935. I have always found him a most agreeable and lovable gentleman, and I am proud of the exceptionally good speech he made, delivered as it was in both the official languages. It was a treat long to be remembered.

Before leaving the matter of paying compliments let me extend my heartiest congratulations to another genial associate in the person of the new Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty). I am sure his recent promotion will not tend to decrease his popularity among his former companions in the house. The distinguished though lone Liberal member from Alberta (Mr. MacKinnon), with whom I am not so well acquainted, is also deserving of congratulation upon his promotion to the cabinet. I understand his wife comes from Prince Edward Island, a fact which bespeaks his good judgment.

I was surprised to hear the leader of the opposition stress unemployment in his first speech since his return to the house. It is too true that his party was elected on the unemployment cry in 1930.

Mr. MacNICOL: And we shall be elected on the same cry next year.

Mr. GRANT: At that time there were 117,000 unemployed in Canada, and by featuring this comparatively new inspiration they succeeded in persuading the Canadian electorate that it was a most serious state of affairs. Their leader's voice resounded from coast to coast in such expressions as, "King promises to enact measures to relieve unemployment; I promise to end unemployment. Which do you like best?"

Miss MACPHAIL: None of you ends it.

Mr. GRANT: But on taking office what did they do? They added more than 100,000 annually to the unemployed in Canada, and did little but herd them like cattle into unemployment camps of idleness, until the unemployed in Canada exceeded the million mark. I well remember a speech delivered by the then Prime Minister after the numbers of the unemployed had reached about 600,000, in which address he stated that 150,000 unemployed was normal for a country of 10,000,000 people. And yet, in 1930, he and the present leader of the opposition bellowed themselves into power on the cry that to have 117,000 unemployed was disastrous. I say to the leader of the opposition and his followers that such a cry cannot be repeated, and might as well be dropped, so far as trying to deceive the electorate of Canada is concerned.

Miss MACPHAIL: But it was repeated by the Liberals.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GRANT: Our opponents would like to make it appear that the government has been idle. One hon. member who, I am sorry, is not in his seat, has described the procedure as that of waiting for Santa Claus. Nothing could be more unreasonable. We have had Santa Claus continually with us since 1935, in the person of the senior member for Queens, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Dunning)—and may I say that regardless of party affiliation, all hon. members are delighted to see him with such a ruddy complexion and looking so well since his return to the house. I doubt very much if the hon. member who made that statement will have as generous a Santa Claus to deal with him when he hangs up his stocking after the next federal election.

This government have been alert and progressive since the first session of the present parliament. In fact the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has consummated a trade agreement with the United States even before the first session of parliament. In my own constituency programs of public works have been carried out continuously by both federal and provincial governments. In many instances the work has been done jointly, and in order that the needy should not be overlooked in the distribution of work the federal Department of Labour appointed a war veteran whose duty it was to visit the various undertakings and see to it that the poorer and the more needy were given work in preference to the more fortunate.

Since the federal election of 1935, no time has been lost in striving to provide work for our people, through the construction of public works which had been entirely neglected for five years under Tory rule, and by numerous other undertakings, some of which I shall enumerate later. In my constituency almost every federal wharf, with the exception of the one adjoining the business stand of the Tory member who then represented Kings, was either fenced off or had a danger sign posted on it.

With regard to defence, regardless of what our opponents in other groups may say, I believe the government should not engage in the manufacture of war material. We have white elephants enough on our hands in Canada. If we must have armaments, let there be competition, as in other public contracts, and let the work be done under honest and competent government inspection. Let there be no pets or favourites, or anything in the nature of a family compact. Large sums of money which are being asked for to provide for defence would then be spent to the best advantage. Let it not be said at some future time that some one has "plundered". I am not a military man, and shall leave the debate on this subject to those who think they know what should be done to meet any condition which may arise out of what is taking place in this confused and troubled world.

As other hon. members have said, the new trade agreement between the United States and Canada has yet to prove its beneficial effects. But we know the trade agreement of 1935 has helped to save the country from ruin through stagnation of trade, and we know the new trade agreement has been built on a firm foundation, and with the most friendly understanding between the English-speaking nations on this continent. It was surprising to hear the leader of the opposition condemn the abolition of the three per cent excise tax, which was one of the obnoxious taxes imposed on the people by the late government on top of all the rest of the taxes, and at a time when the people had been ruined by high tariff policies which brought about a stagnation of trade. Yet the new leader of the Tory party states in this house that he believes in trade agreements and reductions in taxation! The impressions of youth are hard to eradicate.

The leader of the opposition states that we have not reduced taxation, and yet in the same breath he complains that the three per cent excise tax has been removed. Let me quote a few words from the speech of the governor general:

> The Canada-United States agreements have involved, in addition to the wider markets secured for Canadian products, a thoroughgoing revision of the Canadian tariff structure, and a reduction of taxes on trade much greater than that made by any previous parliament, or by any other country in recent years.

Do our hon. friends opposite think for one moment that the intelligent electors of Canada, who suffered so much during the five years the party opposite were in office, will vote against a government that has done more than the government of any other country in the world to reduce taxes and encourage trade?

The present Liberal party is no more perfect than any other man-made organization. I had hoped for some constructive criticism this year from the official opposition after their three years of subjugation. They were recently delivered from bondage at a convention of their party, and I had hoped that during this session they might show themselves worthy of retaining their present position after the next election, which is all they can hope to retain. Whatever may be said about the Grits and the Tories, it cannot be denied that they have been democratic in principle, and we do not want to see the present official opposition relegated to third or fourth place in this house. I think their new leader has had ample proof of that.

The recent visit of President Roosevelt to Canada was significant in many ways. His assurance during that visit of the loyalty of his great nation to this dominion in case of invasion should dispel from the minds of our opponents their apparent fear that our United States neighbours are not to be trusted. I think our hon. friends can be reassured that with Liberal governments in office in Canada and the United States, trade treaties will be respected in both countries. The treaties of 1935 and 1938 are but the beginning of freer trade arrangements than have hitherto existed between these two peace-loving countries. I suppose there would be a great many obstacles to the removal of the present strict immigration regulations now in existence in both countries, but I cannot see any reason why such barriers should continue to exist. I believe their removal would result beneficially to both the United States and Canada. While I am not in favour of opening the gate to foreign immigration, I doubt the wisdom of dividing the north American continent into two pens.

The brilliant young member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) stated in effect some days ago that when the present leader of the opposition was Minister of Railways and Canals in the previous government he was responsible for certain amalgamations and reductions in the railway service, and that the people of this country feared amalgamation, but the hon. leader of the opposition denied this charge in emphatic terms. During his term of office, however, as Minister of Railways and Canals, the Elmira branch line in my constituency was closed out entirely as far as passenger service was concerned, and the Post Office Department was obliged to establish a mail route to serve this territory. Another line, the Murray Harbour branch, was reduced to three trains a week, and in this instance a mail route of approximately eighty miles had to be established by the Post Office Department.

Mr. MANION: I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman's essay, but I should like to point out that when I was Minister of Railways and Canals I had nothing to do with the running of trains any more than the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) has anything to do with that. I had nothing to do with the closing of branch lines or anything of that sort. That was done by the management of the road without consultation with the government. I think the Minister of Transport will tell my hon. friend that if he does not know it already.

Mr. GRANT: I said, during the hon. gentleman's term as Minister of Railways. Another line, the Cardigan branch, was scheduled to be reduced to three trains a week, and the railway time-table contained the change, but a certain minister without portfolio in the late government happened to be operating a general store on the Cardigan line and that part of the time-table was never put into effect.

But let it be said to the credit of the present Minister of Transport (Mr Howe) and the management of the road that we succeeded in having the train services restored in my constituency, to such an extent at least that the mail routes referred to were done away with during our first year in office, and indignation meetings which were at least semi-annual occurrences during the Tory rule have not occurred in a single instance since 1935. These are facts well known to every elector in my constituency, and they are unimportant compared with the charges made against the late administration by the employees of the Canadian National Railways.

When our opponents say that we have done nothing to relieve unemployment and to assist the farmers and fishermen, how can they shut their eyes to the splendid trade agreements negotiated by this government; to the National Housing Act; to the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, and to the home improvement plan under which loans at the lowest rate of interest in history are made to municipalities, organizations and individuals in order to encourage employment? How can they shut their eyes to the abolition of the sales tax on all building materials, including paint and heating and plumbing, in order to encourage the building trades; to the assumption of provincial and municipal taxes on the properties so constructed; to the abolition of the obnoxious excise tax imposed by the previous government; to the encouraging of public works by assisting the provinces with federal aid; to the assistance given the unemployed by a most liberal expansion of public works; to the program of settling unemployed young men on farms in provinces adopting this plan; to the amendment to the War Veterans' Assistance Act; to the employing of young men in forestry conservation work; to the courses given to young men in the arts of curing fish, scientific farming, carpentry and other trades; to the supplying of seed grain to farmers and to the opening of world markets for the sale of farm products; to the loans given without interest to fishermen to enable them to buy nets as well as food for their children; to the reimbursement of the fishermen for losses due to storms; to the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, and to the appointment of fishermen's assistance boards which, among other accomplishments, erected a great many up-to-date buildings—at least six in my constituency—at fishing centres in which buildings the fishermen may cure and save their products, and the construction of which provided employment for the fishermen? The electors of Canada, Mr. Speaker, know all these things, even if some members of this house choose to shut their eyes to them.

The leader of the opposition stated that the present government, or perhaps he said Canada, had done less in the way of social legislation than any other country in the world. But let me point out that except for two or three years the Tories have had a majority in the senate for the last twenty years or more, and that when Liberal governments tried to pass social legislation, a Tory senate invariably threw it out. The old age pensions legislation is an example. The bill passed this house but could not survive in the senate until the Liberals at last had a majority in that chamber. And the irony of it was that the Tories, after voting against the old age pensions scheme and defeating it in the senate, once it had been enacted despite their opposition brazenly adopted it as part of their 1930 platform, and boldly promised to pay the pensions one hundred per cent from the federal treasury. I think every elector of pensionable age received from the Tory organization a circular letter containing this promise. The official opposition should be ashamed to mention social legislation in this house or anywhere else in Canada. They did reluctantly, when in power, pay seventy-five per cent of the old age pensions because the Quebec government forced them to do so. It was not because of their pre-election promise.

Let me at this point give a brief summary of the promises made by the Tory party to the rural mail couriers of Canada before the 1930 election. It was well known that the rural mail couriers had been organizing for some years; that almost every mail courier had joined the organization and paid the membership fee, and that they were all naturally anxious for a change from the tender system to employment under the civil service of Canada, with a guaranteed living wage and permanency of employment. The then leader of the Tory party, mad for power, resorted to the lowest kind of deception in this instance. Letters were sent out to each and every mail courier in Canada promising to comply with the wishes of the couriers' organization, immediately upon the party's being returned to power. Imagine the influence on these poorly paid mail contractors! They honeycomb Canada from one end to the other, and come in daily contact with all classes of people in the rural sections. They have numerous friends; of necessity they are educated, upright, honest and intelligent, and until 1930 they were unsuspecting. Whatever the Liberal party has done or has not as yet been able to do, we have not attempted to deceive the mail couriers. The Tories deceived them and got their votes and support in 1930. But as a class the couriers have good memories, and they now feel that if their grievances are to be settled this will be done by a Liberal government. I should like to hear some one of our Conservative friends opposite, especially one of the 1930 survivors, discussing this question of the mail couriers.

Some of our opponents have said that the dictators are showing the democracies how to end unemployment; that there is no unemployment in countries ruled over by dictators. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the United States, for example, wished to adopt the same method followed in Germany or Italy of ending unemployment, she could declare war on Canada, and that would end unemployment in both countries until the war was over. Most of the dictator countries have their surplus population either training for war or actually under arms. But Canada and the United States, being peace-loving countries, desire to find honest work for all their people.

I believe, sir, that every member of the Tory party, every member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, even those who have taken post graduate courses in Russia, and every member of the Social Credit party, the party which makes money out of nothing but their words only, as the Lord made the earth, knows that in the last three years this government has done more to relieve unemployment than could possibly be done by adopting their fantastic policies—and the electors of Canada know this too.

I am sure that every member of the Liberal party in this house and throughout Canada, every elector who supported the Liberal cause at the last federal election, and a great many who did not, are proud of the manner in which the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) answered the charges made against this government by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Manion), and that all thoughtful Canadians are indeed thankful that Canada has had at the head of her affairs in these troublous times a man with the long experience and vision of the Prime Minister. Fathers and mothers who wish their families to grow up as peace-loving Canadian citizens have indeed much for which to be grateful. The electors of this dominion feel that they are in safe hands once more; the fishermen know that this government is doing everything humanly possible to solve their difficulties; the farmers who were well to do in 1930 but were either bankrupt or facing insolvency in 1935 have again taken courage, and with the fair prices they have been receiving for their products are not considering a change of government; the fox producers, whose uncertain industry has been placed on a secure foundation by the joint regulations inaugurated by the departments of agriculture, provincial and federal, are not considering a change of government.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, speaking of agriculture reminds me that the genial minister of agriculture for the province of Prince Edward Island, the Hon. William Dennis, has been seriously ill in the civic hospital here in Ottawa, and I would ask every member of this house who loves a good sport to say a prayer for his complete recovery.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just preceded me has gone far beyond the bounds of parliamentary discussion in saying that our honoured leader in the last election resorted to deception. I object to that because it is not, in my opinion, proper for any hon. member to use that expression, and anybody who knows the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett knows that he never used any deception. Let me tell the hon. member that it will take more than the support of the rural mail carriers of Canada to save him and his party at the coming election. The hon. member spoke of being proud of the name Liberal. He also claims that in the United States the Democrats are resorting to that word to describe their party, but may I remind him that the Liberal party in Canada has nowadays very little beyond its name of which to be proud. With some of the things he has said about the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I agree; with others I cannot; but of course he has the right to say what he likes, when he likes, and in whatever way he likes.

For some weeks I have sat here attentively listening to a good many speeches. Until yesterday I did not know that I was going to speak in this debate. Since I came back from Toronto I have had little time to prepare anything, but I have in my head a rambling lot of stuff which comes from my knowledge of the business world and has been instilled into me for a good many years.

The speeches made in this debate have been splendid; each one has expressed the views of the speaker and frequently the views of his party. Regardless of what may be said outside this house in criticism of them, they are a credit to Canada, and I am sorry that my own lack of training will not allow me to maintain the standard which some others have reached. My life in the business world has been a busy one, and I have had no opportunity of training along the line of making speeches in parliament; in fact I never expected to be in parliament. I am here, however, and I am glad to be here. I intend not to make a speech but to offer some observations in my own way about matters of which I know something.

I am sorry that my good friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is not in the chamber. I am delighted that he is back in the house and is feeling in good condition, smiling as he usually does, and sometimes adding a little sarcasm to his wit and humour. He would not be genuine if the sarcasm could not come out as well as the humour; in that respect he may be like myself.

I wish first to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) who moved, and the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) who seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both of their addresses were admirable, and as good a presentation of the subject as I have ever heard.

I can assure hon. members that the old historic riding of Parkdale will rejoice with the rest of Canada at the coming of Their Majesties King George VI and Queen Elizabeth. We shall all be proud to see them. I know the people of my riding will be present in large numbers to see the king and queen, because we are not far from what will be the headquarters of their majesties while they are in Toronto. If they are given a nice drive, which I hope will be arranged, they will go through a portion of my riding which is the most attractive part of that city. We shall all be delighted to see them there.

I would first ask forgiveness if anything I may say should hurt somebody's feelings. It is absolutely not my intention to say anything which will cause strife in this house; I do not think I have ever attempted to do so. I have always acted more or less as a peacemaker among some of my hon. friends, even those on the other side of the house.

We have to-day plenty of trouble, without creating any more strife. We have no unity, no cooperation among ourselves and worse still, no cooperation with other countries. Conditions everywhere are in a terrible state, and we have found no superman yet to solve our problems.

Some hon. members have suggested as a remedy the nationalizing of everything, and especially the controlling of business. My advice to this or to any other government is to forget nationalization and attempting to control business because it cannot be done. While in business for many years I have learned at my own expense that the law of supply and demand will always regulate prices. There is no use of any government trying to run business; they cannot do it; it requires men trained in the business world. The government should stop interfering with business and tinkering with tariffs. Many men have been driven out of business because the worry of running business to-day is greater than can be realized by anybody who has not had practical experience in it.

I agree with the statement which has been made in this house that customs regulations should be simplified. There are many rulings which not only the customs officials, including the commissioners of the different branches, but the minister himself, cannot understand, and the fact that there is such diversity of opinion among those who are administering the customs tariff makes it impossible to get a definite decision from anybody. About a couple of years ago there was put on the order paper a resolution to the effect that something should be done to make it easier for customs officials and business men to understand customs rules.

Toward the end of the session of 1937 the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) introduced a bill to prevent men who had claims against the government from realizing on those claims. I consider that this was quite unfair. He had that bill piloted through the senate committee with the assistance of all the commissioners he could gather together and the odd hired individual who had left the department and who was brought back for the purpose of defeating the wholesalers and importers who were trying to have their claims satisfied. One would think he was dealing with a bunch of thugs or highwaymen rather than with men of high integrity in the wholesale business. Not only did he prevent them from getting their money, but there was put through this house a bill that had the effect of putting them out of court altogether so that they could not sue the government.

He did, however, allow two big firms in Toronto to sue the government for drawbacks which they should have received that year and years back, and they successfully beat the government in the courts. I am wondering whether the government have paid their debts. My view is that the government themselves should pay their debts just as they expect others to do. I do not know how much money was involved in that particular case, but the gentleman in Toronto who looked after the railway claims and the claims in connection with customs had the whole thing compiled. The fact is, however, that the government had the money with which to pay their debts, and they should have done what a good many others do when they fail. Private persons give their creditors 50 cents or 20 cents on the dollar. But instead of that the government robbed these people of every dollar that was legitimately due them. Would anyone with high integrity do such a thing? Is it any wonder that conditions are as bad as they are? Is it any wonder that no one wants to be in business, that no one wants to own a home or property or anything else, because everybody is robbed to death? We are all simply asked to pay taxes. When this gentleman who was looking after the claims of the railways and customs went back to Toronto, he took to heart so seriously the treatment he had received at the hands of the minister in the senate committee that he dropped dead. He left here on Thursday night and on Friday night he was dead. He was only a young man, between thirty and forty. That is the way in which this government is treating people, driving them into their graves. I am not saying this is the only government that has done such things, but this is the worst instance I have ever known. Thousands of dollars were stolen from people in business, and not a dollar to which they were justly entitled was paid them. That is lesson number one.

The firm that I backed financially had no claims against the government at that time, because my advice to them was to do no business through the government, but to act through someone else. I remembered that for thirty years I had done nothing but fight with the customs department in Toronto, though I must add that there have been ministers who straightened things out once in a while. The Hon. Jacques Bureau was one of them; the Hon. Doctor Reid was another. Then there was the Hon. Mr. Boivin, who died suddenly in 1926. I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) was also minister for a while, and we got fair consideration. I never regretted any man's death more than I did that of Mr. Boivin, because I thought he would make a wonderful minister. I had not hoped that he would be elected, but I liked him as a man because he was fair in his dealings with the business world, just as were the others I have mentioned, as well as the Hon. Mr. Ryckman. But there have been ministers who have not been as considerate, and the time is coming when the business world will have to teach them to be fair. I am not making any threat because I am not in business now, but I am still interested in how many people the government rob. Nearly everyone capable of being robbed has already been robbed.

The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has told us of the large percentage of people in business who are dying suddenly of heart trouble. It is all too true, and this government has been responsible to some extent by continually changing conditions and making it almost impossible for business men to carry on. The government appointed a national employment commission, and it will be remembered that I fought bitterly against that move because of the extreme cost which the commission would involve. I could not see what they could accomplish. We were informed that they would tabulate the unemployed by trades and so on, but what does that matter? After all, what difference does it make to what trade a man belongs so long as he is unemployed? Does it matter whether he is a carpenter, bricklayer, machinist, or anything else if he cannot get work? He is unemployed just the same. All that the commission did do was to go to the different municipalities and get a list of the unemployed. That list was in the Department of Labour at the time, so that the expenditure involved was really a waste of money.

The recommendations of the commission have not been adhered to rigidly. There is only one recommendation I wish to touch on at the moment and that is the one with respect to the training of youth. I have to give the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) some credit for that. I had the pleasure of going into a committee room one night and seeing pictures of boys training in the camps in British Columbia, and I listened to addresses from men and women from all parts of the country, telling how enthusiastically the municipalities were cooperating in the training of these young people. But the trouble is that there is no stability about it. I agree that it should be done because there is nothing else you can do, and it is better than doing nothing. It will help the boys and girls even if they get six weeks training, and it should improve them mentally, physically and morally.

I suggested at that time that instead of appointing these commissions we should restore confidence in the investing public, because I felt that this would do more to create employment than anything else. There are thousands of people in Canada with millions to invest; if we had stability in government, if investors knew that conditions would not be suddenly changed but would remain reasonably constant, investment would follow. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) now agrees with me that the proper thing to do is to restore confidence in the investing public. He brought out that point in a speech in Waterloo when he was trying to defeat the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). I am glad that the minister took up the suggestion. I am convinced that there is enough money in the pockets of the Canadian people to put the country on its feet, but the government is making cowards of us all, driving people to buy government bonds. I have not much use for the man who does nothing but buy government bonds. The man who has not enough backbone to go into industry and try to make a living in that way is not doing much for the country. I would not give much for him if he puts his money into government bonds and keeps it in hiding.

How can confidence be restored when the government are negotiating treaties all the time, always negotiating treaties with someone? That has been the custom in the past, but this government has negotiated more than we ever did. I do not think we have been guilty of so many offences that have hurt the country so much. The man who has a vision of the future can see that the treaty now negotiated will drive some subsidiary companies back to the United States, and prevent anybody from putting his money into either business or industry. In my riding there are many industries, because when the big fire occurred down-town one time they were driven to the outskirts and we got many of the factories. Some of the people operating these industries to-day are afraid to say a word, afraid to express an opinion, about this treaty. I have not much sympathy for some of them because they did not support a government that would have given them stability, but now they are out howling on the housetops, but afraid to say a word to the government. It is not good for a man in business or industry to be afraid to talk to the government; they cannot put him in a penitentiary unless he commits a crime; in any event you can always tell them what you think of them. It is true that importers will like this treaty; but they, like the man who puts all his money in bonds, are another class for whom I have very little use. They bring stuff from any country in the world where they can get it and kill manufacturing industry in this dominion. The importer may sit in an office in a twenty-storey building and look out of the window for half his time or look at his nice stenographer, while stealing business from the Canadian manufacturer by bringing stuff from all parts of the world and particularly Europe.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the hon. member himself?

Mr. SPENCE: I was an importer for years, but I kept up a big warehouse, employing ten to twenty men as a rule, and had a big overhead. I am talking about the man who has no overhead except the rent of an office. They are the men who are helping to kill industry in this country. I was in the wholesale fruit business and I have knowledge of the difficulties of the fruit and vegetable growers to-day, competing with growers in a country in which climatic conditions are so much more favourable. There are many states in the union in which two or three crops a year can be grown; that cannot be done in Canada. Some may tell us that they do it in British Columbia, but I do not know any place in this dominion where it can be done successfully. In Canada to-day the duty on fruit and vegetables is only 10 per cent. That should never have come about. Back in 1930 it was 30 per cent, and even then growers of fruit and vegetables had a difficult task.

Mr. EULER: Surely it is more than that now in certain seasons.

Mr. SPENCE: Under the new treaty it is only 10 per cent. When the Prime Minister went to Washington and signed the former treaty the duty on fruit and vegetables was cut in half, to 15 per cent, and then by this treaty hon. gentlemen have cut it a further 5 per cent, which leaves only 10 per cent. That is no protection whatever to Canadian growers who have to compete with growers in a country in which climatic conditions permit the growing of two or three crops a year. Before the Fordney-McCumber tariff was put into effect in the United States in 1923 we had a good market in Detroit and some of the other neighbouring United States cities, particularly for Leamington melons, tomatoes and all kinds of early vegetables. But that tariff which the United States saw fit to put up against our people shut out practically everything. Then came the Hawley-Smoot tariff in 1930, which entirely closed the United States market for our dairy products as well as fruit and vegetables. How can a country get along under such treatment? It is ridiculous. True, we are now getting some advantage on potatoes, but we are giving the same advantage. Our hon. friends have allowed the Americans to set a quota on potatoes going into the United States, and as someone said, one county in this country could produce enough potatoes to supply that quota. Do not ever think that the United States are not looking after themselves; I have dealt with the business people there; they will always give you a sandwich if you give them the pig. We should never have negotiated this treaty. We were in no position to negotiate a treaty at the time when this one was negotiated, because our duties were all too low compared with theirs. And if the treaty applied only to the United States, as it purports to do, it would not be so bad; for after all the United States are good friends and we want to be friendly with them. But under the most favoured nation clause our concessions apply also to countries that are no friends of Canada. I shall not mention names, but there are several of them.

There is no one in this house who can paint a better picture with figures than the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), or the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). They are both dandies at that sort of thing. But the hon. gentlemen have been in politics and sitting in this house so long, not associated with business, that they do not understand the effect of the treaty and have no vision of the results which may flow from it. Canada should have retaliated when the Fordney-McCumber tariff was imposed, and the Hawley-Smoot tariff—

Mr. STEWART: Countervailing duties.

Mr. SPENCE: Oh, countervailing duties have meant nothing. We know that congress has control; no matter how friendly the president appears to be to this country, he cannot reduce the duty more than 50 per cent, and he might well do that and still have higher duties against us than we have against them. So what position were we in to negotiate a treaty with them?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPENCE: Mr. Speaker, just before six o'clock I had made certain references to some ministers of national revenue who at times had not given the trade with which I was associated a square deal. In justice to the present Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) may I say that a few weeks ago I did hear that he was now getting more familiar with customs details in Toronto, and with customs transactions generally, and that a better deal was being given to everybody concerned. I have not been associated with the trade for the last two or three years, so I believe it is only fair to say that opinion seems to be that he is getting more familiar with it.

Since I have been in the house I have known only one trade treaty which has had any beneficial effects on this country, and that was the Canada-United Kingdom agreement brought about in 1932 by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPENCE: Hon. members may laugh as they like, but if they are not stupid they should know that is the only beneficial trade treaty we ever had. Under it we received a preference of 4s 6d per 100 pounds on apples. A few days ago the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) was trying to defend the government in its negotiation of the present treaty. He said that Nova Scotia still had a good deal on apples. The deal they get is that in the present treaty their duty is cut from 4s 6d to 3s per 100 pounds. That is what they lost.

And what about wheat? When any hon. minister will say that a loss of six cents a bushel on wheat does not make any difference, surely he is not familiar with the business. A loss of six cents a bushel means what? It means competition in the old country market. That preference was a profit in itself.

Let us turn our minds back to the French treaty of 1923. That was another treaty negotiated by the party now in office. I remember well that it was another knock for the fruit and vegetable business, more particularly for the fruit business. In the Toronto market we had been selling thousands of baskets of the best cherries in each cherry season to the extract men of Toronto and other parts of the dominion, for the purpose of making extracts. The French treaty killed that cherry market because it allowed Italy as well as France to ship cured cherries in here at a price less than the producer in Canada could accept. The result was that thousands of big Montmorency cherry trees were pulled out of the ground, because their fruit was worth nothing. The cherry market has not come back yet. That was another trade treaty which hurt the fruit and vegetable business.

Is it any wonder that people become alarmed when they try to do business at all? I claim there should be more cooperation between business and government. If business were consulted I am satisfied the people in it would be fair with the government. In the United States both industry and business were consulted in connection with the trade treaty we have just negotiated. But in Canada our departmental officials are supposed to know more about everything than men who have been trained in their own line of business. Such rot! It could not be possible, no matter how brilliant our young men in the departments may be, to know as much as the men who have been trained in a particular line of business. So I repeat that we did not get a fair deal.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has said that unemployment is not the greatest problem. He has said that if peace were assured, we would be able to sell our wheat abroad, and that we would have a great recovery. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I consider that nothing but a smoke screen. The present government must be entirely out of touch with business. They ought to know that the real issue to-day is that in the last nine years we have spent $900,000,000 on relief. Surely this indicates that unemployment is the real issue. I say again it is an indication that the government must be both deaf and dumb, and they have nothing to suggest to improve conditions. They are just drifting along, taking the advice of commissions.

It is unfortunate that they have not more courage. I consider that the growing of wheat to-day is not as important as it was in years gone by, because countries to which we sold many years ago are now growing their own wheat. Nearly every month of the year wheat is ripening in some part of the world, so we need never hope for the same sale of wheat as we had formerly. If it were not for the fact that our Canadian wheat is superior to any other on the world market, it could not be sold at all. The people who buy it have no love for the treatment they received back in 1927 and 1928, when we killed our wheat market. That, however, is out of the question now, and has nothing to do with the present situation.

What has Canada done to help the motherland to protect the movement of our crops to large industrial centres in the British empire and, again, to protect those areas from bombing planes, which might destroy the market forever, so far as Canada is concerned? I am glad to see the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) is proposing to spend money now to defend our country. He will find no opposition from this party, so long as we are sure that the money is being spent to advantage. We have to trust somebody, and we might as well trust the present Minister of National Defence as anybody else while he is in power.

An hon. MEMBER: But.

Mr. SPENCE: Yes, there are some "buts."

An hon. MEMBER: Butts on the guns.

Mr. SPENCE: The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that third parties grew while the Conservatives were in power. I do not take any stock in that at all. He made the further statement that the treaty of 1935 was satisfactory, and that no one could criticize it. He said it made a wider market, and created employment for thousands. We all know it has done nothing of the kind. We know it has destroyed the market, and we have lost, as a result.

It takes a man with a great deal of courage to make a wild statement like that. Sometimes the Prime Minister has courage, because he has a wonderful debating power when he makes a statement of that kind. He must have courage to make it. Let us go back to the years between 1921 and 1930 when the government led by the present Prime Minister was in office. More combines developed and more mergers were created during that time than in any other period of the history of Canada—and no effort was made to stop it. Gradually money got into too few hands. We did not have as fair a distribution of wealth as formerly obtained. Nothing was done to look after the interior business of Canada, a business which should have deserved more consideration.

Mass buying has been encouraged by the party now in office, a procedure which has driven out individual merchants by the hundreds. That is the beginning of our trouble in Canada. If the mass buying proposition had been tackled at that time we should not have had the condition where so many people have gone broke—as they are doing to-day.

Some hon. members are good at rising in their places in the house and painting pictures of distress. In the best of times there were always some who painted such gloomy pictures. I could paint such pictures in regard to my own constituency, but I do not think it is good business to advertise the country adversely on the floor of the house, when we know what is said here may go all over the world.

My advice in connection with the budget is that it should be brought down much earlier than last year, so that the wheels of industry will not stop altogether. From now on everybody knows business will be lagging, and will continue to lag until the budget is brought down. For those reasons I wish the government would give the matter special consideration and bring down the budget in a hurry. I hope and pray that there may be no lowering of the tariffs for either farm or factory. A change in tariffs, whether they be raised or lowered, always creates trouble in the business world. I do not, and never did, believe in high tariffs. But I believe we have to protect the growers on the farm and the people in industry. There is no use in growers producing stuff unless the workers in the industrial centres have money to buy the goods. That is one of the important points to remember. Then, in Canada we have spent millions of dollars in educating the youth of Canada to develop the industry of the United States. That was done in those good old days when this dominion should have been growing by leaps and bounds. For years Canada was simply an incubator for the United States. Now our people cannot go over there, and they do not want to. Those who are there were treated well in the early days, and Canadians were always welcome.

Meddling with business and tinkering with tariffs in Canada brought business to a bad condition in 1930. Some hon. members have said that fifty per cent of the farmers are broke. Let me say that over fifty per cent of people who were in business in 1930 are out of business and penniless to-day. That is a worse condition than that of the farmers.

Many of these people in business cannot even make an assignment. I heard someone say that there are fewer assignments to-day than there were a few years ago, but the only reason for that is that many of these business men are in such bad condition that the trustee or assignee will not undertake the job because he is not sure of getting his money for looking after the estate.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to notify the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. SPENCE: It is not often that I take up the time of the house in saying anything.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), for whom I have a great deal of regard and who is a personal friend of mine, has on the order paper another motion with regard to a new Canadian flag. At a previous session he was good enough to withdraw a similar motion. This is a trivial thing to bring up to-day when world conditions are what they are, when we have so many international troubles with which to deal. The hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lacroix) also has on the order paper a resolution asking that the word "viceroy" be substituted for "governor general", and that the name of this country should be the "Kingdom of Canada" instead of the "Dominion of Canada." What a lot of nonsense taking up the time of this house with resolutions of that kind! I cannot understand why hon. members put motions like that on the order paper. It is such motions that create unrest, disunity and misunderstanding. I do not suppose the hon. members I have named intended that their resolutions should have that effect, but I think all hon. members should use better judgment in these times of trouble and tribulation. I appeal to both hon. members to withdraw their motions in the interests of this house and this country.

Some hon. members advocate reduction of taxes. They say that the sales tax should be eliminated; that the stamp tax should be discontinued and that other taxes should be wiped out. Then, before they sit down, they advocate the granting of more money to the provinces and the municipalities. How do they suppose the government is going to get money when all taxes are eliminated? You can get only what you take from the people, and no government can be blamed for that. Personally I should like to see all nuisance taxes abolished. I hate having to put a three or a six-cent stamp on every cheque I write.

My contention is that every effort should be made to study possible means of economizing. I have had to economize all my life. There was no other way in which I could get along. Economy should be studied in every branch of the service. The cost of administration in this House of Commons is entirely too high. A business administrator could save possibly hundreds of thousands of dollars in running this house, but he would not be very popular. It would be pretty difficult to practise economy around here.

The number of publications issued by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) should be curtailed. Thousands of publications are sent out through the country, when, I should imagine, hundreds would do. What happens to them after they are sent out? The mail men in the city of Toronto and other centres are getting humps on their backs from the loads they have to carry. Much of the stuff sent out from this house and from the different departments is simply carried in through the front-door, possibly kept about fifteen minutes, and then sent out through the back. These publications are simply a waste of good paper and good printing. I said the same thing to the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) when he was Minister of Agriculture, but he did not agree with me. He felt that the publications sent out by his department were more important than those sent out by the Department of Trade and Commerce. Each department feels that its publications are very necessary.

Hon. members and others outside the house have been kicking about the cost of government, but no one has had the back-bone to suggest what should be done to reduce this cost. I would start with this house. If the British North America Act would allow it, I would cut the membership from 245 members to 150. The membership of the provincial legislatures should be cut in half, if not eliminated altogether. The number of county councils could be reduced, although I sometimes think these county councils are of more value to the country than the provincial legislatures. I know quite a bit about county councils.

An hon. MEMBER: How about the senate?

Mr. SPENCE: I am not talking about the senate because it is out of my jurisdiction. I do not know whether my suggestions will meet with approval. I notice the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is smiling. He thinks I am jesting, but I am not.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I agree with most of what the hon. member says.

Mr. SPENCE: The cost of government should be cut down. The salaries paid to the members of this house do not represent all of the waste. Where economy is needed is in the money spent in the different ridings in playing the patronage game. A post office costing $50,000 is built for a town of seven or eight hundred people. This was done since this government came into power.

I think the dumping duties are absolutely wrong. The government has allowed the United States to dictate the number of commodities upon which dumping duties are to be levied as well as the amount of the duty. Four-fifths of a cent or one-half a cent a pound is not a dumping duty. Even the dumping duties that we imposed in our time did not stop stuff from coming in from the other side. There are some people in this country who will pay any price for a commodity if they want it. The dumping duties should be substantial. Another thing, no importer should know the time the dumping duty is to apply.

I have a recommendation to make which I hope the government will consider. I think this would simplify matters around the customs house. I always like to try to make things easier for the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley). Instead of having dumping duties on oranges for eight months in a year, have a duty applied for the year round. I suggest a duty of twenty-five cents a box on oranges, grapefruit, pineapples, lemons and other commodities of that kind. This would simplify matters around the customs house. Everybody would have an opportunity to compete with the other man. When it is known that the dumping duty is to be applied at a certain date, an importer with a large amount of money available can buy a greater number of oranges than another importer who has only limited funds upon which to operate. A man may have only $10,000 to $50,000, but most of his operating money will be on his books. You require a considerable amount of money to run a business. The man who can buy only one car of a commodity cannot compete with the man who can buy ten or fifteen cars before the dumping duty goes on. Such a man is able to offer cutthroat competition for the next three or four weeks. That is something for the government to consider.

The seasonal duty on oranges is around seventy-five cents a box, which is the most ridiculous thing I have ever heard. The duty on grapefruit is one-half cent a pound. Take a ten-car order, which is a fairly small one. The man who can buy before the duty goes on is able to save $345 a car. On a ten-car order that means $3,450. Such a man can sell below another man who is able to order only one car, and still make a big profit. These matters should be arranged so that one individual can compete fairly with another. We should not be playing into the hands of the monopolists and big interests.

It seems to me that we have allowed too many reductions on goods we buy from the United States. I do not think our negotiators had the necessary training. The United States had their specialists from the business and industrial world. They gave us reductions on those commodities which they will never buy, whereas we gave reductions on those commodities that we buy from them all the time. We have been going on reducing everything five per cent, or similar amounts.

I think you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that too much raw material is leaving Canada which should be processed at home, thus giving employment to probably thousands of our own people and giving the railroads plenty of business in moving the stuff backwards and forwards at a higher freight rate than that which the railways get for hauling our raw materials to the seaboard, and which is the lowest freight rate in the world. That is common sense, whether you are a free trader or not. The more people you give employment to in this country, the better.

One hon. member suggested during the debate the other day that the government should develop great mines, on the advice of engineers and geologists. I would not approve taking the advice of engineers, much less that of geologists. I have been fooled that way before. But if three or four men of good common sense have a good proposition in a mine and have a hundred thousand dollars or so of their own to put into it, it would not do any harm for the government to stick in another hundred thousand and take the profits, instead of allowing the whole enterprise to become a monopoly and make more millionaires like our good friend Wright who bought out the Globe. But I repeat, I would not take the advice of engineers or geologists.

I received a document to-day from the civil service commission, and it seems to me ridiculous. I gather from it that they want 115 men technically trained for different kinds of positions in chemistry, entomology, economics, and so forth. We have had enough economics in this house to do me all my life. I never heard a discussion on economics that I could agree with anyway. I have studied economy in another way altogether, and I never knew anything about economics. Let me cite a few of these positions that are to be filled by the civil service commission. Men are wanted for work along such lines, as botanical surveys, fruit diseases, dairy research, soil research, fly-catchers, field husbandry, parasites.

I am one who has imported a great deal of stuff in my lifetime from Holland. I am not doing it very much now because, like everything else, somebody has stolen the business and you cannot get it back. The people of Holland are just as particular that their stuff leaves Holland in good shape as we are to receive it in good shape, and there is very little danger of any plant diseases coming from there. But the entomological branch examines every package that comes out of the box. I have no objection to that because it would be wrong to let any foreign insect that might do a lot of harm get into this country. But I certainly do not see why we need all these men at this particular time. Is business growing? Is our population growing? Is everything so good that we want to spend money? Or is this the pork-barrel? Or are these 115 people to help win the next election? Extravagance of that kind is the worst in the world and should be curtailed.

What I have said about cutting down the membership of the house and of the provincial assemblies I think should be done. Of course, I shall be told that the British North America Act will not allow it; that we can do nothing with the act there. But, Mr. Speaker, rules were made for people who do not understand very much, and we should change them all if they prevent us from doing what should be done.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I have been interested and intrigued by the uniformity and unanimity with which members have risen to congratulate their fellows who have deserved well of this house. It reminds me of a ceremonial Swedish banquet where, from the youngest member to the oldest, they pass in front of the dowager hostess and thank her for the meal they have enjoyed—"Tack fur mat. Tack, tack, tack fur mat. Tusend tack fur mat. Tack fur mat."

The hon. lady member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) feeling that it was becoming a little monotonous, sought to lump her congratulations together and delivered them in one great panegyric. I myself feel that at this late stage of the debate some change should be effected and so, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say it with flowers. For that reason I propose to hand to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) and the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) pansies for thoughts, and rosemary for remembrance—thoughtful remembrance of their leader to new party members.

To the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. McLarty) some violets—violets for faithfulness—and a sprig of ivy in order that he may be zealous in his desire to please in his new office.

But there is also the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon), and to him more violets, for faithfulness, but also a lily, pure and white, and, since he will never be able to keep it in a portfolio, the kindly wish that he may keep it pure and help it to last as long as possible.

To the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) roses, roses, plenty of roses, with a little sprig of fennel, so that he may have the loving flattery of his own party; and if the roses turn out to be blue ones, possibly that is just the colour the hon. member wants.

To the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) a sprig of rue, the herb o' grace, rue for repentance, circled round with many twigs of hazel representing the reconciliation and forgiveness of his friends.

And now, Mr. Speaker, that I have given away all my flowers, I want to record, socialist though I consider myself to be, the real sense of satisfaction which I experience from the fact that Their Majesties the King and Queen of Canada are going to see our country and to deepen by their act the symbolical significance of their place in the scheme of things. To me, sir, the evolution of a free society does not under any circumstances necessarily imply or compel the elimination of that continuing act that we call government. In this evolution government has become among democratic peoples a function of the people, entrusted by the people to representatives of the people, to act for the people. In the struggles of the peoples for freedom in the British democracies, the hereditary rulers have for all time forsworn their right personally to govern, and they have accepted a new and higher symbolical position and significance in their historical succession. As a result, to-day the soul of the people of Canada finds its living symbol in the peculiar person and functions of its king, the King of Canada, he in turn being honoured in his domestic duties by the presence and help of his gracious wife, the Queen of Canada. To-day in every part of the empire this same symbolism is accepted and welcomed in the hearts of the people. I give this explanation because of the many people in our land searching for a correct interpretation of the social movement in Canada, people who find their hearts and minds struggling adequately to rebut the arguments of republicans and the arguments also of the dogmatic socialists, many of whom are vocative members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Removed as a British king is from ambitious selection by heredity; removed as he is from partisanship of every kind by the very nature of his new position and responsibilities; removed as he is from danger of failure in continuity by the very considerations which establish his functions, no citizen of Canada or of the empire need fear that majesty to-day usurps any rights or claims any privileges not entirely proper to the sublimest interests of the people or its most democratic expression, whether those expressions be of capitalism or socialism or any other ism or economy. Consequently, human nature being what it is, my conviction remains that we honour only ourselves when we elevate to his proper place our king, with his queen, as the living symbol of the soul of the people of Canada and when we respect and honour him as such.

There may be some excuse for the dogmatic socialists viewpoint, and there may be even some excuse for the Vancouver Co-operative Commonwealth Federation lady alderman who classified their majesties' intended progress through Canada as "a royal circus"; but if I still correctly estimate the hearts and minds of many Cooperative Commonwealth Federationists in British Columbia, their loyalty to the kingly conception is not the less sincere because it has kept pace with the changing social conditions of our times.

Yet, while rejoicing, my heart is sore, contemplating the condition of many if not most of the people in this amazingly rich and fertile country to which our king and queen are coming. The disposition of many hon. members to take solace and excuse in the biblical statement, "Ye have the poor always with you," is pusillanimous, and it loses its value still more when we recognize that the word in the original Greek text does not mean so much poverty of pocket as it does poverty of mind and opportunity. I well remember as a youngster, away back in my native city of Liverpool, visiting the slum districts under the guidance and expert direction of a very keen student of humanity. I saw and learned there pictures of poverty before which even the tragic pictures of Canadian life to-day lose their luridness by comparison. In 1907, by way of rounding out my experiences in human understanding, I investigated and learned of the festering sores which suppurated Whitechapel and other districts in the east end of London. In 1937, on visiting England again, I made a point of revisiting these old places in London, Liverpool and other parts of the country; and though there is still a great deal to be desired in the condition of these people, my heart was rejoiced to see how here and there and everywhere, slowly but surely the submerged tenth of which that great humanitarian, General Booth, wrote, was being carefully lifted out of the waters of affliction and their feet planted on the highway which leads to opportunity and social security. And so, drawing attention to the fact that my service covers over fifty years of what I myself believe to be a keenly observant mind directed by natural inclination to the study of my fellowman, I am prepared frankly to admit that Canada has no terrors of poverty to compare in its bestial actualities with the conditions of life in the eighties in the older countries of Europe.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): But because I have by this admission led my optimistic friends complacently on, I must rudely shatter their smugness by declaring that the tragedy of suffering to-day in Canada is as vicious to the sufferers here as it was to the sufferers in those older countries—vicious because of its utter needlessness, vicious because of its comparison with what might easily be accomplished, and vicious because its difficulties are so easily understood to-day and so easily remedied.

To-day, because of these facts, it becomes a crime against any community if the government causes such misery. Therefore I declare that if in Canada our people have not adequate food, clothing and shelter, we are committing a crime against our people in this land flowing with the milk and honey of abundance, and sooner or later we must get busy and stamp out that crime. Surely it will be agreed that, if we export wheat, no Canadian citizen should fail to have his bread; if we export milk, no Canadian child should go short of that essential food; if we export cattle, no Canadian worker should sigh hopelessly for his beef; and if we export bacon, no child of Canada should imitate that gutter urchin of the nineties in the Mile End road who went to the corner grocery store and said something like this, "Sye, mister, coupla' ounces of bacon cut wiv a hammy knife, and muvver says tell old red-head not to be stingy." You have all heard that before, but it draws a vivid picture.

Of course I am still new to politics; 1936 marked my first appearance in this or any other elective house, and I came green and raw to the problems of government. I have been disillusioned more times than I care to think of. I have often compared the strange political efforts of the combined membership of this house with the actions of a paunchy individual whom I knew away back in the South African Transkei many years ago. In the heat of summer he liked to wear his trousers back side to front because, he said, it gave him such a feeling of comfort and coolness. With us, we wear the garment of retrogression to escape the heat and distress of these terrible days in Canada. Hon. members, two hundred and forty-five men and women of more than ordinary intellectual capacity, able in themselves individually and collectively to run most of the professions and industries of our nation, meet here in solemn conclave to settle our affairs, but meet here after having secretly sworn, each to himself or herself, never under any circumstances to allow anything to be done in the house in a way that ordinary commercial business is done; never to use any of the principles which have so eminently succeeded in business or professional life; never to permit any interference with business; never to permit the honesty and integrity of business and professional life to mould and fashion the policies of party government.

Of course I have overdrawn the picture; of course I have not hesitated to be caustic in my condemnation; but before I have finished my remarks, discerning members will understand exactly what I mean. It is because of this confliction of vibration that high-minded leaders utter pre-election cries and bring to the public platforms appeals which ring true in the hearts and minds of the people. But it is because of this also that the voice of opposition becomes merely the voice of opposition and turns this august forum too often into a cockpit of tykes and terriers. Because of this, earnest, thinking members again and again drag their solutions of the country's difficulties to be here reasoned about and criticized. But it is because of this also that there is no burial place so deep as the records of this house, no gravestones so heavy as the pages of Hansard. Because of this, men wonder that wrongs are not righted the moment they are declared wrongs. Because of this, we in this house stand fearfully at the doors of common sense and progress, afraid to raise the latch or raise a foot to cross the thresholds. I have heard men in this house, not once or twice, but many times declare that they would not stand for these things for a single moment in their own business. Why then, in God's name, do we as members of this house stand for these things?

In a picture now in Ottawa Ronald Colman enacts the part of a member addressing the House of Commons at Westminster, and in an impassioned speech declares as follows: "The only party to which we should now in these times belong and owe allegiance is all humanity. Let us get together to right these wrongs and mayhap in the doing of it we shall also save our souls." The essential differences between parties render the tasks necessarily tiresome, carping and formal. I have waited for the present government to break through its orthodoxies. I regret to say I have waited practically all the time in vain. I can hope for no better from any of the other parties. Let us forget the political advantages for which we are eternally exhibiting ourselves and let us together drive want and despair from our land; for it can be done and it must be done.

I have said I hope for little from any of the parties as such, and I repeat that until the members of the house are prepared to think in terms of our people's need rather than in terms of party, we shall continue to face a rapidly approaching disaster from which we may never recover. Having said this, I do not know whether hon. members will react with amusement or with toleration or perhaps with righteous indignation when I tell them that in that beautiful part of Vancouver island, the Nanaimo riding, our citizens have double representation. There is the sitting member who devotes all his time to the duties and cares of his office, and there is the supreme director of political patronage, the defeated Liberal candidate who approves or disapproves the efforts of the sitting member as he thinks fit, but who cleverly ensures that his own picture shall be well placed in the local papers and that he, and often he alone, shall get the credit for every advantage secured. So well has this excellent division of service and of credit been maintained that I cannot recall a single occasion when the member failed to make an effort to do his duty or the dispenser of patronage failed to secure the credit for the work done.

I have accepted these conditions amicably for nearly three years and have laughed consistently at the hollowness of the situations it brought about. But I find myself turned definitely to anger when I contemplate its effect on the whole body politic. I have no personal ill-will against this young man. I understand that he has done good work in other directions. I have no personal ill-will against anybody, or, if I have, I try earnestly, with the intenseness of my nature, to avoid it. But that young man will have enough to do to contest his nomination for election in face of the two opposing Liberal candidates whom he will meet. His patronage activities, however, I want to declare in this house, are absolutely contemptible. I have profound personal respect for the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and I have wholeheartedly extended my respect to his ministers. I confess to a sense of joyous relief that the Bren gun probe so recently held left the character of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) unquestioned. But I do know that official letters leave Ottawa enjoining government officials on the Pacific coast to have their submissions for new service in my constituency referred to this back-door member of the riding. I do know that last session, when this young back-door member was in Ottawa, I was called into the private room of a minister of this government—of course, when the minister was absent—to be warned by that young man that I would be a fool if I ran against him for reelection, because he was nursing the constituency for himself and wanted the seat, while I would do nothing more than ruin his chances and fail to seize my own.

Even these things were as "water on a duck's back"; but when I have information that my efforts as member for the constituency have been cancelled or delayed until it suited this man to act, I feel that the country should know; for if these things are being done in the green tree, in heaven's name what will be done in the dry? The latest stupidity, to use a mild expression is this: Early last year, 1938, I conveyed to the former Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) the desire of the citizens of Duncan for two street pillar-boxes to facilitate mail posting. Approved departmentally early in May, 1938, this simple business facility was deliberately hung up by this back-door member until this month, January, 1939, eight months afterwards. The local paper, the Cowichan Leader, Duncan, B.C., under date of Thursday, January 19, 1939, writes as follows:

> Residents of Duncan's Hospital Hill and Townsite will no longer have to go to the post office to mail letters. Duncan junior chamber of commerce has won its fight to have mail boxes placed beside the school store at the corner of Cairnsmore street and the Island highway, and beside Smith's community store at the corner of Coronation avenue and Bundock street.
> With the cooperation of Mr. H. A. Collings, Duncan postmaster, Mr. Claude Green, the junior chamber's committee of one, has been trying for nearly a year to obtain official consent to the erection of the boxes.
> Action finally was secured through a letter to Mr. Alan Chambers, Liberal candidate at the last dominion election. Mr. Chambers wrote this week that authority had been given.

I should like the government to look into that matter. This does not disturb me personally. It will not affect my decision to run again or not to run again. As a matter of fact, I have not yet told myself what I shall do. And I am not seeking credit for my services; they have been sought for and accepted willingly as an honourable duty. But I do earnestly warn the government that these things produce unrest and disquiet throughout the country. The country knows of them, and that disquiet is continually increasing. I declare that political knavery in the outfield is not the best way to train the cricketer to use his bat when he goes to the wicket. I hope hon. members will recognize these stupidities as some more of those things done in politics which would not be tolerated in a well conducted business. Of course it is likely that denial will follow denial. But all that I have said is absolutely true as far as my researches have been able to penetrate the zone of silence which surrounds these matters. While I have had to reflect upon the actions of an individual, I have done so quite unwillingly, my scruples overcome by the gravity of the destroying influence of political patronage in practically every aspect.

Nor unfortunately do I gain much from the contemplation of the activities of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The earnest representation given by the high-minded members of that party in this house does not remove the political trickery which too often activates the controlling members of the party throughout the dominion. Here the members of that party are still largely a protest group, and in consequence of my taunt that no constructive plan was placed before the house by them they have submitted many desired features of an entirely new economy, without, however, showing the constitutional path by which these desired features might be secured for the people. And that, I submit, is essential. In the country the provincial executives are becoming increasingly Marxian socialists with all that this implies of secret talks against the institution of monarchy, of apotheosizing

Marx even beyond the halo which surrounds the Master of all time, of necessary sympathy with the Russian experiment, the human teredos of communism and the revolutionary formulae of Marx and Engels. I have already indicated that the Marxists had seized the British Columbia provincial party executive and were sedulously proselytizing the emotional and protesting adherents of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation there. Do not forget that last word in the title, "federation." In 1932, when the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) carried his credentials to Calgary, to what was to become the birthplace of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, he carried credentials not only from the socialist party of Canada but also from the Vancouver branch of the League for Social Reconstruction, of which I was then a militant member and later became the secretary. The federation was to be farmer-labour-socialist, organizations united in social economic effort. British Columbia never did obtain the united political support of its labour organizations, while the League for Social Reconstruction, or rather its political offshoot, was ousted from its federating possibilities to become either a tool or to be pushed off the shuffleboard.

In Alberta the United Farmers of Alberta, whose untiring worker, Norman Priestley, was the first national secretary of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, have now renounced political aims, withdrawing officially and, therefore, in large measure by membership, from the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation ranks. Thus slowly passes almost unnoticed in its retrograding the Marxist-controlled Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, in its inception and in the enthusiastic hopes of its first devoted workers the finest and most promising economic movement which has demanded attention in Canadian life.

The Social Credit party have not been mentioned by me, but I should not omit them. It will be recognized that I have not hesitated during my work in this house to criticize them as well as to declare the value to the country of their formula. I have little other than sincere respect for the members of this party. I have condemned the weakness in the particular formula by which they hope to bring their hearts' desire to the people. But they are united; they are moving along one track to one goal, and I am impressed to say that because of that we shall see them here in larger numbers in future sessions of this house, battering at the orthodoxies which have our time-worn system in their grasp.

There is one final word and wish arising out of all that I have said. That is that we may get together as a house, intelligent and eager to discover a way by which, no matter what system we live under, we can assure for our people in Canada social security and health and peace and sweet content.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): It is not my desire to add to the repetition of congratulatory references which have been made in this house during the continuance of this debate. May I, however, be permitted to join in all those that have been expressed by hon. members who have preceded me. I do desire to add my word to the expressions of appreciation from all parts of the house on the return to public life of the hon. member for London (Mr. Manion) and his succession to the leadership of the National Conservative party. It is most gratifying to note that he has spoken all across Canada and is recognized as a man of integrity and a good Canadian. Perhaps I should also extend a special word of welcome to my colleague the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) who has already so nobly acquitted himself in this house. In the brief reference he made to his victory in the recent by-election, I know it was his modesty which prevented him from referring to the fact that his majority was such that both of his opponents in the campaign lost their deposits. It is quite obvious that the citizens of central Ontario expressed themselves in a most definite way, and more especially when we remember the heavy battery of strong ministers who went there to assist the Liberal candidate. I attended one of the meetings and sat in the back seat, and I found it interesting to hear what was said.

May I be permitted to add a word of appreciation on behalf of the citizens of the Niagara peninsula, and more particularly Lincoln county, of the arrangements being made for their majesties to visit that historic peninsula, with all its wealth of orchards and vineyards. The royal party will inspect the great Welland ship canal, and spend a short time in the historic old town of Niagara-on-the-Lake, which was the seat of responsible government in Upper Canada many years before confederation. Then they will visit the sacred shrine at Queenston heights, where the name of Laura Secord is perpetuated in memory by the citizens of Canada. They will view at close hand the great power houses of the hydro-electric system of Ontario and travel along the picturesque boulevard which skirts the Niagara gorge, ending their scenic drive at Niagara falls, to rest for a few hours within sight of the mighty cataract, before crossing into the United States. The citizens of the Niagara peninsula, many of whom are direct descendants of United Empire Loyalist stock will welcome the opportunity of expressing their loyalty and devotion to their majesties on their visit to Canada.

In the present debate all hon. members are given ample opportunity to express their views on the subject matter contained in the speech from the throne. When the speech from the throne is presented it is considered to contain a reflection of the policies the government is advocating to meet the problems which confront the Canadian people. It is only fair that we should compare the speech from the throne with the pledges made to the electors before the election in October, 1935, and before this government took office.

After three years I had expected to find at least some explanation of the unfulfilled promises made to the citizens of Canada at that time. Naturally it is with no surprise that we hear increasing murmurings from every part of the dominion. Evasion and inaction are terms which are being applied to the lack of policy which has been so evident during the last three years. A great fear hangs over Canada. For some time past the world has been in a state of military eruption. The crust of civilization appears to be wearing thinner and thinner. With strange suddenness that crust has been broken in spots, only to emit violence and the destructive flames of war. To a certain extent those eruptions have been more or less of a minor nature compared with what may take place at any moment.

We cannot, however, lose sight of the fact that the streets of distant cities and towns are flowing again with human blood. To listen to the speeches delivered by the Prime Minister of England and Chancellor Hitler within the last few days makes one wonder just how quickly the eruption might come again. Fear has again seized a once trusting people. Economists declare war is the result of the natural demand for new markets, aggravated by the irresistible need for raw materials. Whatever frenzy has seized a few—and a few only—of the once so-called civilized nations of the world, it is generally conceded that a more vicious form of selfishness and greed is dominating the hearts and minds of a few of the nations who were professing culture and progress, but who have cast aside all semblance of decency in their lust for power and possession. Surely it is high time, in the name of right and justice, we openly joined our limited resources with those of greater influence.

In the speech from the throne we have the proposal to spend over sixty millions on national defence. With that policy I am in hearty accord. Only a few madmen have made necessary this most drastic action. Is it not, however, all too significant that hand in hand with the proposal to spend vast millions on defence we have laid before us the report of what is called the Davis commission, appointed to inquire into the first large armament expenditure that has been made. On the streets the general comment is that evasion was evident in the report. Some call it a whitewash; some interpret it as the direct result of political influence. One has only to keep his ears open and say nothing, and he will conclude that whatever else the Bren gun can do, it is certainly going to have a double-barrelled recoil on the minds of the people of Canada.

May I extend a word of congratulation to the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) upon the able way in which he presented his views to the house, following a study of the commission's report. We heard the rumblings of the past two years concerning the way in which defence moneys had been spent on the Pacific coast. How that echo has gained volume, with the last few millions of dollars spent for Bren guns! Thousands of dollars have been spent on a commission and now parliament is to decide whether or not we have dug a dead factory from an industrial grave. Now we have a scurrying for cover behind the promise that this will not happen again, because "we are now to set up a defence purchasing board." Mention the Bren gun inquiry on the street, in the train, in a hotel corridor or, perchance, in any place where men would congregate, and if a person were to take a straw vote on what he heard or the opinions expressed, I can only say that the old saying would still hold good, namely that you cannot fool all the people all the time. Is it to be wondered that we have fear at home and abroad? In the midst of it all we stop and realize that unemployment is again on the increase.

Oh, yes, I forgot we are to have some assistance given to the struggling taxpayers at this eleventh hour. Some help is to be given to the taxpayer who has been doing his best to relieve the burdens of some of his brother-men. But in thousands of instances it is too late. The red arrow indicating a tax sale, the red arrow indicating a foreclosure, was aimed two or three years ago at the home owner who had dreaded it for years. The earnings of half a lifetime or perhaps a whole lifetime are gone. Why was not some help along this line given nearly four years ago? Someone who was most unkind has whispered, "Do you not know there is liable to be an election this year?" That information may be authentic, but I do not know.

I understand the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) has originated some scheme of financing our defence costs over a ten year period. This may help the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) out of some of his difficulties. Apparently we are not to get the full effect of the blow until a year or two from now. I noticed the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) has again introduced legislation to change our flag. I suggest that he defer any action this year in order that we may have an opportunity to realize what the union jack means to Canada and what it has meant down through the centuries. Perhaps if we pass safely through a few more crises, we can adopt a suitable ensign for ceremonial purposes. If 200,000 of the unemployed are again called to arms—and God forbid that they should be—I do not imagine they will mind standing shoulder to shoulder with British tommies under the union jack. The history of Canada is such that every right-thinking Canadian cannot help but realize that, after all, we are a part of the British empire.

Many people in this country are tired of camouflage. They have had enough evasion. They are wondering how long it will be before we come out and tell the world where we stand. We are being asked to vote $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 for defence. So far as I am concerned, if it were necessary I would say, make it $160,000,000 or $170,000,000. But I do urge this government to make haste in taking armaments out of the political pot. Let us not have half measures; let us be honest with these young men who are unemployed. How we shall need their services if we are forced to spend perhaps $100,000,000 or more on defence!

I plead with this government to see that in the spending of the next $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 there is no need to smear Canadian defence records with another investigation. Perhaps some hon. members will rise in their place, and say that there was no need of an investigation. But the report is being read; it is now in the hands of the public. I suggest to all members of the government and to all others who do not think in terms of Canada and the empire that they tune in on what is on the air. This is one broadcast that cannot be controlled by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of the present government.

[Mr. Lockhart.]

In this connection may I say that I am one who favours the reasonable regulation of broadcasting period. Wave-lengths must be controlled and distributed. The broadcasting of obscene programs must be made an indictable offence. There are many other matters that must and can be controlled as they are being controlled by other countries in the handling of radio broadcasting. Let us consider the system that has been built up in Canada, as it has been made evident in the last few weeks. This system has been financed largely by taking $2.50 from the pockets of each individual radio owner in this country. This is just another broadcast that will deal a death-blow to the government when the next election comes round. I say to the people of Canada that it will not be long now. If I am in this parliament when that time comes, I shall move to have this unfair tax taken from the statute books. All this has been described to me in a rather amusing way, which is perhaps worth repeating, as the broadcast from LPSO. When I asked for an interpretation of that station name, I was told it was the "Liberal party signing off," to return to the air, we hope, at some later date.

I desire to say just a word about unemployment. We have had this time-worn reference to unemployment in previous speeches from the throne. How we have played checkers with this problem during the last three years! Hundreds of thousands of dollars were spent on a commission—of course it must be by a commission—to have the underprivileged set up in new categories and classifications. I opposed the setting up of this commission, but I am quite frank to admit that I am less critical to-day. That commission did make a number of good recommendations with which I am mostly in agreement. But, I ask, how many of them have been acted upon in the speech from the throne delivered in 1939? I expect that Mr. Purvis will have now concluded that such a report as followed the Bren gun inquiry would have served the same end as the one which he so ably submitted to this parliament.

The hon. ministers of the government know or should know, and every hon. member of this house knows or should know, that unemployment is a burning problem in 1939 just as it was in 1936. This government said this before last election. Has it not been held up to our eyes in every speech from the throne since 1935? When no tangible solution has been found I am surprised that such an extended reference to unemployment should be made in the speech from the throne this year.

Everyone knows that the farmer is harder pressed year by year. Everyone knows that the fruit and vegetable growers are sore beset by importations of fresh fruit and vegetables. Just read their protests made at their recent conventions, and I shall have more to say on that later on. I have had some resolutions sent to me already, and there are more to follow, which will be useful when we are discussing the trade agreements in this house.

Everyone knows that secondary industry is being driven to desperation to keep factories running even on part-time. Every hon. member of this house knows that. I have talked with many heads of industries in recent months, and they are making every effort to maintain the esprit de corps of their employees. Surely the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) does not imply that industry as a whole is not cooperating. I tried to follow his words, and I gathered that impression, but I hope I was wrong.

The greatest difficulty found by secondary industry to-day, when a slight increase of business, which they are striving after day by day, comes to them, is that immediately they call back some of their former employees, or perhaps call in new men to obtain temporary assistance to handle the new business they may have secured, they find that a great many of these men have been on relief and have lost the art of doing the job they used to do. Industrial leaders will tell you that, any day you wish to converse with them on the subject. That has been my experience with secondary industries, and I come from an industrial area, with a diversification of industries.

If the hon. Minister of Labour finds that industry is in some instances exploiting its workmen, surely he has the machinery to take care of that situation. But at once I hear the cry that provincial rights must not be encroached upon. I am getting a little weary of hearing that, Mr. Speaker, in this House of Commons; and how in the last three years this has grown and multiplied! There must be a reason for this. True, we experienced some of these difficulties in former years, but did we find the difficulties insurmountable? Whereas a former administration instituted old age pensions, we find the federal government now paying 75 per cent and the provincial government, 25 per cent. We had cooperation then, and by cooperation now we extend that act, as suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), to take in citizens who have reached sixty-five years of age. Would it not have been reasonable to expect in the speech from the throne that in the light of economic conditions to-day the government might have desired an expression on this point from parliament? We all know that men and women over sixty-five years of age are now completely out of the running when it comes to getting a job.

My conviction is that if the federal government would lead in the field of constructive social legislation, there would be no more difficulty with the provinces than was experienced in extending the old age pensions scheme. It does appear to me that there must be something radically wrong in the approach that has been made by the federal government to the provincial governments, or we would not find the provinces resenting to the extent they do the attitude of the central government. The man on the street keeps asking why the happy family of 1935 can no longer agree. One premier came out openly for one hundred per cent cooperation, and yet he to-day is the bitterest in his denunciation of the policies that have been followed by the central government. There is an old saying, that water will find its own level. I suggest that there have been too many holes somewhere; that the water has formed into pools, and how stagnant some of those pools have become! Workers, farmers, and men of capital—everyone would willingly cooperate to solve the crossword puzzle we have before us to-day, if only they were given a lead.

I shall not criticize the Minister of Labour for the effort he has made to train a small percentage of our youth, a small percentage of that immense number of young men and young women who are turned loose in Canada every year. There has been special training, youth training, as it is called, to supplement technical education. I was interested in a remark made by the Hon. Eric Cross the other day, that he wanted the federal government to list these men who are wandering the highways and byways. I shall not take time to read his statement because hon. members have probably seen it, but I should like briefly to give a personal experience.

A young man came to my home just a few days before I left to attend this session. His clothing was in a terrible state, and he was almost barefoot, although it was a cold night. His plight enlisted my sympathy so I invited him in to have a talk, and this, briefly was his story. He was born and had lived in the city of Guelph. His mother was dead; his father was on relief. He attended the technical school, and among the subjects he qualified in was welding. Leaving school with his diploma he got seven months work in one of the industries there. Then the industry told him that they had lost a great deal of business through competition, and they laid him off. He then went to Sarnia to seek a job, having been told that there was welding to be done there, but he could get no work to do, so he begged his meals and hitch-hiked back to Toronto, where one industry, which was almost shut down, told him they hoped to get some business and suggested that he come back in three weeks when they might have some welding work for him to do. Boats were being repaired at Port Dalhousie, involving considerable welding, so he thumbed his way to Port Dalhousie, and that is how he happened to come to my home, cold and hungry.

Parallel with that I received a letter just a few days ago from a young man whose family I am well acquainted with, and who is attending the central technical school in Toronto. He is specializing in welding there and expects to graduate this summer. He wrote asking me if I knew of any place to which he could direct his attention in order to get a job after he graduated. Am I to tell him the story of the young man from Guelph who tramped and hitch-hiked all over this country trying to get a job at welding? The whole difficulty is that secondary industry is throttled and cannot possibly provide jobs for these young men with special training. You do not have to leave Ottawa to find that out. I suppose quite a number of members of the house saw the article in the morning edition of the Journal of last Friday, from which I quote:

> Homeless wanderers coming from the easternmost reaches of the dominion and the prairie provinces sleep with down-and-outers from Montreal and Toronto.
> "We've never had a winter like it," declared the desk sergeant. Many of the men had been attracted to northern Ontario by reports of mining activity there, but found no work.
> Heaviest night the police doss-house has had this winter was when twenty-nine received the privileges of the lock-up. On Sunday night last, coldest of the winter to date, nineteen were admitted.

Unemployment needs the earnest consideration of this house and this government.

May I say just a word about housing, which dovetails very closely into the unemployment situation. I would refer to the words of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), to be found at page 3898 of Hansard of 1938:

> I know of no better means of expanding employment in Canada to-day than by stimulating building activity. The construction industry is the most important of our capital or durable goods industries. . . .

I believe that the minister knows the situation, and is fully conscious that to a large extent the unemployment problem can be solved if we can re-employ the tens of thousands who follow the construction industry. Not only is it true that labour of one kind and another constitutes approximately fifty per cent of the cost of construction, but when we follow through we find that in the production of materials which go to make up construction, labour comprises perhaps another thirty per cent. The minister outlined the situation very clearly, referring to—> —the magnitude of the dollar value of the products of the construction industry in normal times;

He went on to express in his own good language what that meant to the country, and remarked later on:

> The increase of residential contracts . . . was very largely attributable to the stimulus provided by the Dominion Housing Act and the home improvement plan.

With that I partly agree. The minister will recall that I asked him some questions in this house last year as to what extent he believed that the lending institutions would cooperate. I drew attention to the fact that in connection with the building of workingmen's homes, the need for which is so evident at this time, and was at that time, men could not and do not consider it practicable to erect small homes on uptown streets where the assessment commissioner takes his pound of flesh. In urban centres workingmen prefer, and rightly so, to build near the outskirts of their city or town, and they often choose acre or half-acre plots along highways or improved roads, perhaps just at the very border of the city or town limits. The urgent need is to construct workingmen's homes on lots such as those to which I refer; this is apparent to those interested in the building industry. At the present moment I have in mind about ten homes which could be erected this spring if someone could influence the lending institutions to give reasonable loans in such cases. I hear an hon. member say, "hear, hear." I should like to take a straw vote of the men in this house who know something about this problem. Last year the minister informed us that he had every assurance that the lending institutions would cooperate in every way. I know the minister was sincere, but if he would like me to do so I would give him the address of a man whom I consider one of the most dependable contractors in the Niagara peninsula, who has applied four times for loans on workingmen's houses on splendidly located lots of the type I have described, and who cannot obtain even consideration. I have the complete information in this case, and will supply it if the Minister of Finance still thinks the lending institutions are giving one hundred per cent cooperation.

I agree with the statement made by the minister that the legislation which was introduced has helped. I think I can prove to him that the high taxation on uptown lots in urban centres has prevented the erection of new homes and retarded house construction in this country. I leave it to hon. members whether in some of the small but thriving villages one can obtain to-day a decent loan to build a workingman's home worth around $3,000. It just cannot be done, and I know something about this because I have followed this work for some considerable time. When these same workmen conceive the idea of going out a short distance and buying a plot of ground such as I have described, and there is no possible chance to help them, what happens? They go into the urban centres and rent two or three rooms. With their limited incomes that is all they can possibly afford to live in. The children play on the street. The country is spending millions to stamp out tuberculosis, and the automobile accident goes on taking its toll, in spite of all the safety propaganda that we can enunciate in our schools or through other agencies.

I turn to a consideration of the urgent need in the larger cities across Canada. Surely the Minister of Labour must realize that it is in the larger places such as Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg, that the unemployed are found in the largest numbers. We all know that they drift to these centres. This has resulted in the development of what are termed slum areas.

Unemployment became general all over the world at about the same time. The United States did not have this problem before we did. Have we done one thing more than just study the problem? Did England wait to deal with it? Did the United States move in regard to slum clearance? Go to many of the larger centres in the United States and what do you find? The federal authorities have taken action. Nearly a year ago I wrote the Department of Labour here at Ottawa, thinking I was right in so doing, to draw their attention to what I found was in operation in some centres in the United States. I received a reply that the matter was still being studied or words to that effect. Can anyone dispute that unemployment would be relieved if we had some leadership at Ottawa? In the United States thousands of poor unfortunate individuals are being, and have been, housed for the last year or two, in clean, comfortable quarters at low cost; and I repeat that along with that provision they are stamping out tuberculosis and the death toll from automobile accidents at which we shudder so often when we pick up the morning paper. Proper playground areas are provided. I have not been able to discover in the speech from the throne anything which even suggests action of this kind. Yet we know that to-day in large centres like Montreal, Winnipeg, Toronto, Vancouver and Hamilton—I know of a situation in Hamilton that could be cleaned up—nothing is advanced to meet their needs. But I see in the paper where $300,000 has been spent on an armoury in Hull.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must remind him that he has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I have just a minute or two to finish?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. LOCKHART: I say that $300,000 has been expended on the armoury in Hull, which someone has described as a glorified club room. I was not there, but I have been talking to men who were present at the opening on Saturday last. Well, I suppose there will be no relief in Hull now, but I suggest that it would have been a great deal better to build one thousand working men's homes in Canada at $3,000 each than to put all the eggs in one basket. It creates an overhead when you erect buildings of that kind.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): What about the armouries in Calgary?

Mr. LOCKHART: There are some armoury buildings on the way, I understand.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): What about the old British flag-waving?

Mr. LOCKHART: That is all right; some of my hon. friends may be waving it yet.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): We shall be glad to wave it.

Mr. LOCKHART: The hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) would be wise if he did wave the flag because he comes from a very patriotic city.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): I say we shall be glad to wave it.

Mr. LOCKHART: I suggest to the Minister of Finance that he think this matter over seriously when he confers with the other ministers in the preparation of the estimates, because the erection of these buildings does create an overhead which the people will have to pay for in perpetuity. We shall have more to say about these matters when we get the list of public works which is still in the background. Cannot the Minister of Finance persuade the Minister of Labour to stop studying the question and get together with him with a view to finding some means of building, or of assisting in building, five or ten thousand workingmen's homes across Canada in connection with which there would be no overhead and which would produce far more peace and prosperity than buildings such as I have been discussing, and which, we know, are being considered in many places.

I had wanted to make one or two special references but I shall bring my remarks to a close. I wish, however, to refer briefly to what the Hon. Mr. Cross has said. He expects that by the end of the month unemployment will increase from approximately 250,000 to 283,000. This is a clear indication that something definite must be done. I wish to read from an article along this line which has appeared since we have had the proposed legislation to assist the municipalities. One editor, writing about it, says:

> That will help a great deal in securing a lower tax rate for this city. A reduction of at least two mills is already planned; it is possible that it can be made better than that. The only fly in the ointment is that while the city's share of the total may be less, the total itself may be much greater because of the increased unemployment demands.

I will have more to say later with regard to the question of a balanced budget and touching some of the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler).

We have now entered upon the fourth session of this parliament under this administration, and if I interpret aright the minds of the Canadian people, we shall before long hear the gong sounded and the curtain rung down on one of the greatest four-act dramas depicting inertia and incompetence which we have seen in this country since confederation.

Mr. J. L. DOUGLAS (Queens): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks, which will be brief, I wish to congratulate the mover, the newly elected member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews), and the seconder, the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier), upon their addresses in reply to the speech from the throne. It was a matter of personal pride to me to listen to my good friend the mover, who is a native of my own province, whom I have known for many years, and who has many warm friends in the city of Charlottetown and throughout Prince Edward Island. Last summer I had the pleasure of spending part of a day with the hon. member for Stormont when he visited our province, and I wish to congratulate him also. We are always glad to have members and others from other parts of Canada visit us, and we have always much pleasure in showing them our beautiful island.

I wish also to congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), who has been chosen leader of the National Conservative party. I had the pleasure of meeting and listening to him when he made an after-dinner speech at a banquet in Ottawa in 1934 at a produce dealers' convention which I attended. With his experience as a doctor, a soldier and a parliamentarian, I am hoping that he will be able to make a further contribution to Canada.

May I also congratulate the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. McLarty) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon) upon their appointments as members of the cabinet. I am sure they will do their part in the interests of our Canadian people.

It is a pleasure to see my colleague, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), back in this house, much improved in health. All our people were pleased when they heard that he had selected the north shore of the province of Prince Edward Island to seek rest and health, where one can enjoy the sea breeze from the salt water, and also where one can lie in the hot sand and enjoy the glow of the sun to one's heart's content; and I well believe the minister will agree with me that he owes much to those few weeks which he spent on the island and which helped materially in his rapid recovery. I wish to say, to any other hon. members who are tired and weary, and who wish a quiet peaceful vacation, that there is no other place in this wide dominion to equal Prince Edward Island. I have travelled across Canada twice, and lived three years at the Pacific coast where there are many of our own island people, all of whom some day hope to return to the land of their birth. This reminds me of a story we are told about a certain man who visited heaven where he was shown round the different mansions—as the good book says, there are many. Pointing to a group of men and women who seemed anxious and discontented, and who were separated from the others by great doors, the guard said, "Those are from Prince Edward Island, and if we don't keep them shut up they will go back home."

Just a word about the new trade treaty. The potato growers of Prince Edward Island will, I believe, fully appreciate the great benefit to be derived from the Canada-United States trade agreement, which came into effect this year. The trade treaties of 1935 and 1938 taken together mean a reduction in duty of 22½ cents a bushel on 1,500,000 bushels of seed potatoes, and 1,000,000 bushels of table stock potatoes, and a reduction of 6¼ cents a bushel on all turnips shipped from Canada to the United States. On the potatoes this amounts to a saving in duty of $562,500. On turnips the duty annually saved depends on the quantity shipped, but a modest estimate would be about 2,500,000 bushels. The saving on this quantity would be $156,250, or a total on potatoes and turnips of $718,750. From these figures Prince Edward Island stands to profit to the extent of 80 per cent of the seed shipped and 50 per cent of the table stock and the turnips, or about $475,000. This benefit is realised through a better market outlet for our potatoes and turnips. As hon. members know, Prince Edward Island is about 85 per cent agricultural, and since our potatoes and turnips are a cash crop they make funds available in the months of October and November when the farmers have bills to pay.

We should appreciate it if the West Indies trade treaty, which I believe is to be considered again this year, could be arranged so as to provide for potatoes an outlet to Cuba such as we enjoyed in the years before 1930. That market was a great boon to the maritime provinces. I well remember that Prince Edward Island in 1926 exported over 2,000,000 bushels of potatoes to that market alone. Hon. members will realise what this would mean to the railways, shipping companies and longshoremen, to say nothing of the benefit to the farmers.

I would mention also the benefit derived from the reduction in the duty on fish, cattle, lumber and fox pelts, the latter of which are raised in large quantities in our province. I attended a fox pelt show last month, and at the banquet the chairman asked me to thank the Minister of Finance for his action in sending Mr. Forbes to England to help this industry. What we need is trade and more trade. I agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in what he has said on many occasions, that we are willing to trade with any country which is willing to trade with us on a fair basis.

In December last a heavy storm swept the north shore of Prince Edward Island, doing much damage to wharves and breakwaters, and also carrying away or destroying a large quantity of the fishermen's property. I believe that the government has agreed to reimburse the fishermen for this loss, which action they will appreciate, as they did the assistance given through the fishermen's loan board last year. This government has dealt generously with our province in the way of public works and relief projects. An up-to-date airport was undertaken last fall, thanks to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe), in cooperation with the provincial government and the city, and I am in hopes that it will be completed this year. Our new national park and Wood island ferry, when completed, will be an added attraction to the tourist trade. In the 1938 season 21,615 cars were ferried to and from the mainland, compared with 18,935 in 1937, or an increase of 2,680. This shows that the tourist trade is improving from year to year.

Our province, together with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, has given many of our best men to other parts of Canada, especially to the great west, and not the least among these is our friend the hon. member for Brandon. I was pleased the other day to hear the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) remind the house that Canada does not begin at Montreal, and while I may not agree with him on all matters I was glad to hear that, because I believe that no educational tour in Canada is complete without a visit to the maritime provinces.

Our people are looking forward to the visit of Their Majesties King George VI and Queen Elizabeth this summer. Nowhere in Canada will their majesties receive a more loyal welcome than in Prince Edward Island and especially in the city of Charlottetown, the cradle of confederation.

Mr. J. A. GLEN (Marquette): I noticed the other day that one of the most highly respected members of this house made mention of the fact that he was tired of the continuous praise being given to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. While I have some degree of sympathy with that remark, yet I must take the opportunity of saying a few words of commendation of both the mover and the seconder. I was one of those who assisted in bringing about the return to this house of a Liberal from Brandon. During the course of that campaign I had many opportunities of knowing the kind of man the hon. member for Brandon is, and I know that he fulfilled well a difficult task. I know that the constituency of Brandon expects much of him, and I am sure they will not be disappointed by the manner in which he moved the address. As for the seconder of the address, I confess that my feeling towards him is one of envy. When I heard the faultless English of part of his speech, and was told afterwards by those competent to judge that his French was equally faultless, I could not help regretting that out of a somewhat busy life I had not taken time to acquire at least a working knowledge of French. I must add that the ideas so beautifully expressed in both languages by the hon. member agree with my own, and I predict for him a larger field of activity in the public life of Canada at no distant date.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), in the course of his three hour speech, jumped into the fray like the debonair Irishman that he is. He saw an opportunity to join in a free-for-all fight, and he advanced his foot, twisted his shillelah and was proposing to crack any crown that appeared on the opposing side. Unfortunately for him he invited a duel with a brawny highlandman in the person of the leader of the government. It was daring in the extreme, for this opponent is a man in the very zenith of his powers, a veteran of many wars, yet unscarred, formidable in peace and much more so in war; so that the result of that contest was no surprise, more especially when we remember that his opponent came back to this house at the opening of this session with his following intact, and in fact larger than after the big battle of 1935 fought on Protectionist Mountain. There were sad hearts that night on parliament hill when the leader of the Tories was routed, all his armaments exposed and found wanting, having to retire to his tent with his head bowed and bloody, while his opponent received one of the most spontaneous demonstrations of loyalty and affection from his supporters.

What was the theme which the leader of the opposition set before his followers and which they have religiously followed ever since? Even to-night the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) followed the same theme, which was that there is disunity in the Liberal party. I can understand the glee of political opponents who see dissension in the ranks of their opponents, to foster which dissension is only political strategy. Dissension may weaken—but I cannot understand why anyone should assume, so far as this house is concerned, that there is any dissension in the Liberal ranks here. Surely the country and the House of Commons know of a certainty that there is no disaffection here any more than there always will be in the Liberal party. It contains, as it always has, men who are somewhat rebellious in nature, men who are hasty and impatient. But I think everyone will agree that the Liberal party is broad enough and wide enough to carry all the rebels. Despite these differences, I think I can say with a great deal of confidence that the supporters of the government are convinced that only in Liberalism, in the broad sense of that word, can that measure of peace and prosperity be obtained which we all so ardently desire.

I recall that in the Brandon by-election, the first election held in Manitoba since 1935, the then Liberal candidate, the present Liberal member, and I with him, on many platforms from which I spoke on his behalf, dealt extensively and exclusively with the record of this government. We rested our arguments upon its achievements. We did not deal with the Canada-United States agreement or the Canada-United Kingdom agreement, which were then about to be completed, although we might well have done so, in the certain knowledge that any agreement with other countries which would take away some or any of the barriers of trade would be bound to have beneficial effects, so far as the economic life of Manitoba is concerned.

The leader of the opposition was in Brandon, and, if I may say so without offence, his speech there was very helpful to us. He did not attack the government on its trade policy. I do not think he would have dared to do so, if he expected to win the seat. What the result was, the country knows. I will say, with due appreciation of all that took place in the contest, that the voice of Manitoba was heard in the constituency of Brandon, and that Manitoba has full and entire confidence in the government now in office. They confidently rely upon it to follow the policies it has pursued since 1935.

That election was won without the aid of that $50,000 which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would spend to win the seat. I should like to think that the hon. member's remark was made in the heat of an election, when statements are made in moments of excitement, and regretted as soon as made. But I have been told that during the campaign the statement was repeated, and for that reason I am bound to think the hon. member must have believed what he said.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did.

Mr. GLEN: All his remark did was to evoke the keenest resentment throughout the whole constituency, and I can tell the hon. member now it would have been better left unsaid. I do not believe there is a constituency in the whole of Canada with a higher sense of public morality than the constituency of Brandon. And to link the name of the Minister of Agriculture with that canard, or one such as that, was a procedure viewed by the Brandon constituents as a gratuitous insult. I have not lost my respect for the hon. member; I know he can make a good argument, but I do suggest he might have made one better than the one I have just indicated.

To come to a wider field; it is evident that the whole stock-in-trade of the Tories in an early election will be, not the platform they recently formed and to which they seldom refer, but the need of leadership in public affairs. Most of this cry—not all—comes largely from what is now generally called the eastern interests, and in particular that organ known as the Financial Post has become its most notorious exponent. Would I be wrong if I were to call that paper a Tory organ? I have been reading the issue of January 28, and if it is not a Tory paper—well, I do not know what a Tory is.

In that paper they headline this cry for leadership, and they refer with considerable unction to statements of prominent gentlemen. First they instance the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), and his speech which was delivered in the house on Thursday, January 19. Of course the hon. member was singled out because he paid the paper the compliment of quoting from one of its editorials. Then the president of the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company speaks his piece, to be followed by the president of the North American Life Assurance Company. Then the editor of the Globe and Mail is quoted with approval and, to keep the pot boiling, Mr. Howard Ferguson, speaking as president of the Crown Life Insurance Company, dots the I's and crosses the T's of those other gentlemen. Last of all, Mr. Charles S. Macdonald of the Confederation Life Association is mentioned. Hon. members will notice that almost wholly it is the insurance companies which are represented in the article. May I observe that this is an outstanding example of that form of selfish thought which makes large companies anathema to the general public. No greater disservice to the life insurance business could have been given than by giving prominence to the statements of these gentlemen.

If any unit of business in Canada should be grateful to the government, surely it must be the life insurance business. In season and out of season this government has steadfastly refused and set its face against any process of inflation. Every hon. member knows that had a process of inflation come about in Canada, the first casualty would have been the life insurance companies, with all that that would mean to the vast body of men and women who have invested in life insurance.

It is plainly evident that Mr. McCullagh is one of those who has the solution right to hand. The Financial Post quotes Mr. McCullagh in its issue of January 28, and I shall place the quotation on Hansard:

> We do not need great brilliancy in the administration of public affairs. We require rugged honesty, clear purpose, tireless energy and unswerving loyalty to principles which we, citizens of average intelligence, can appraise fairly.
> If we want to see the government we have we have only to look into any mirror, for government is a reflection of ourselves. If we awaken and lead, our politicians must follow and we shall have honesty instead of expediency, action rather than procrastination.

What does that mean? To my mind, if it means anything it means that this body of men and women in this house, representing all sections of Canada, are lacking in those qualities of "rugged honesty, clear purpose, tireless energy and unswerving loyalty to the principles which we as citizens of average intelligence can appraise fairly." One can speak with any degree of certainty only from one's own observations. My observations lead me to believe that in this parliament are to be found men and women who have just those qualities of mind and heart which Mr. McCullagh refers to in his statement. I would say that in many instances their intelligence will rate just as high as the intelligence of the editor of the Globe and Mail. I think that gentleman should cultivate a sense of humour. He treats himself altogether too seriously. I only hope that none of us here will lose our perspective because of what has been said by this juvenile mind.

To be fair to these gentlemen, I assume that when they were making these statements they were referring to the differences that have occurred in provincial and dominion fields. I say, however, to them: Have you forgotten that a commission has been appointed for the purpose of finding out the facts upon which legislation can be based? Do they not know that the Rowell commission was appointed for that very purpose? I assume that the leading life insurance companies submitted briefs to that commission. I do hope that in those briefs their views were from the Canadian standpoint, and not wholly from what I would call the eastern standpoint. I hope that they took cognizance of the problems of the citizens of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, I hope that they noted the conditions that obtain in Ontario and Quebec. I hope that in their leisure moments they gave passing thought to those of us who live on the prairies, and that they went on to consider British Columbia and the Yukon.

Just as an illustration of the difference of thought, I ask the house to take note of the viewpoint of men who come from the prairies. I attended the marketing conference called in Manitoba last month by Premier Bracken. While there I had the pleasure of listening to the Hon. Mr. Taggart, Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan. In making his address Mr. Taggart stressed most emphatically that any scheme for dealing with our problem by way of a reduction of grain acreage, any suggestion to go more largely into dairy production, must be taken only after due regard had been given to the eastern dairy producer. He contended that any scheme which was formulated must recognize the fact that no industry in one section of the country should be encouraged to the detriment of the same industry in another section. That was the spirit of the west as it was acclaimed at that meeting. That is altogether different from the spirit manifested in the statements made by these men prominent in the insurance world. I suggest that this should be the attitude of those gentlemen and others similarly minded.

That brings me to this: Do they actually believe that this government is composed of fools; that it would legislate without knowing the facts? For what purpose other than the finding of facts was the Rowell commission apopinted? Nothing that this government has done will have a greater effect upon the economic, and, if you like, upon the political life of this dominion than the report of that commission. Instead of seeking political advantage for their party, it should behoove them to exercise a little patience and restraint.

Mr. WALSH: Can the hon. gentleman suggest when that report may be anticipated?

Mr. GLEN: That question should not be addressed to me. I should like to have it now and I hope we have it soon. Whither are these gentlemen headed? Mr. McCullagh is now lecturing us over the radio? I realize it is dangerous to prophesy with regard to anyone, and it is particularly dangerous to prophesy about him. If his addresses mean anything, he is about to suggest a business government or, as he would call it, a union government in which he and his confreres would take a leading part. We had experience with a Union government in this country, and they had experience with a Business government in Britain. I do not think I am exaggerating when I say that the experience of both these countries was not any too good. I suppose if these gentlemen had the power they would settle our railroad problem as Mr. McCullagh seems to desire, by amalgamating both railways into one system. I want to say that the continued expression of such views on government as have been expressed in the Financial Post do not tend to allay the fears of western Canada. They tend to create panic and dismay.

I would direct the attention of these Canadians to the viewpoint of others who are in opposition. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) was evidently instructed to lay down the platform of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation when he spoke on January 24, as reported on pages 275 and following of Hansard. The president of the Confederation Life spoke of the burden of taxation on private industry and referred to how it discouraged private industry. What does he think of the program of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation? The hon. member for Weyburn had submitted the proposals advocated by that group. Out of curiosity I began to wonder what it would cost to put all these into operation. Perhaps at some later date the hon. member will amplify his remarks and give an estimate of the cost. I submit that the question of cost must enter into the consideration of these proposals. One of the proposals suggested by the hon. member, as reported on page 275 of Hansard, was:

1. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have asked for fixed guaranteed prices to the primary producers under a properly planned marketing system.

I suppose when the hon. member refers to the primary producers he includes the farmers, the fishermen, the miners and the lumbermen. The hon. gentleman does not state whether prices are to be fixed for the products of all these industries, or whether the fixed price is to apply only to the farmer. He does not state at what level the prices are to be fixed or the extent to which the government will be called upon to pay subsidies to the various groups. The gross value of agricultural production in Canada for 1937, the latest year for which the dominion bureau of statistics has published figures, is $1,051,698,000. If the government had subsidized our farmers to the extent that they received ten per cent more gross return on their farm production, it would have cost about $100,000,000 in 1937.

Then the hon. member states his second suggestion:

2. Members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation consistently advocated a crop insurance scheme which would enable farmers to manage in those years in which, through no fault of their own, they are deprived of a crop.

Insurance on a purely actuarial basis would mean that the farmers themselves would contribute the premiums necessary to provide for benefits during years of crop failure. Merely to provide the administrative machinery for such a scheme would not cost much, but the hon. member does not state whether it is contemplated that the government should make any contribution to the insurance fund out of which benefits would be paid, and consequently no estimate can be given of the cost.

Next he gives this suggestion:

3. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group have advocated consistently a work and wages program which would utilize the unemployed in the city and farmers of the drought stricken areas.

That proposal surely needs amplification. It might be noted that in their annual review of the unemployment situation the dominion bureau of statistics bulletin shows that the average number of wage-earners unemployed in the first eleven months of 1938 was 401,000. Merely as an indication of the size of the problem, it might be noted that to supply 401,000 workers with incomes of $1,000 each a year would cost $401,000,000. His next suggestion is:

4. Members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have advocated the lowering of the age for old age pensions and increasing the amount of the pension.

The hon. member mentioned in his speech the age of sixty-five. It is estimated that the additional cost to the dominion for the fiscal year 1939-40 through lowering the pensionable age to sixty-five would be between $18,000,000 and $19,000,000. The next proposal is:

5. Members of this group have consistently advocated an unemployment insurance scheme.

What does that mean?

Mr. HEAPS: So has the government.

Mr. GLEN: Just a minute. What does that mean? Does the hon. member suggest insurance on an actuarial basis, with workers and employers together contributing the full amount of the premiums necessary so that it would cost the government nothing other than administrative expenses? Generally such schemes contemplate some government contribution, but in the absence of any specific suggestions with respect to government contributions to such a scheme, any estimate of cost is impossible. For the benefit of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), I may say that I am giving some indication of the cost of these various schemes.

Proposals Nos. 6 and 7 speak of federal grants to education and national scholarships, and the cooperative handling of farm machinery. I do not know what the hon. member means by that; he has not explained it.

Then in No. 8 he speaks of a comprehensive scheme of slum clearance, as advocated by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil); and in No. 9, of an extension of the principle of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Then No. 10 states:

10. Members of this group have suggested that such a program could be financed without increasing the burden of taxation which now rests too heavily upon the people least able to bear it, not by an eight per cent sales tax to which we are violently opposed, but by (a) an increased income tax in the higher brackets; (b) a surplus profits tax, and (c) by deriving revenues from some of the great monopolies such as the tobacco industry, the meat packing industry, and the gasoline industry.

It is interesting to note that the total amount of income tax collected from individuals and corporations in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1938, was about $120,000,000. Even doubling income tax rates all across the board would not have produced more than $120,000,000 for these proposals, which is a small amount as compared with the proposed additional cost.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask what the hon. member proposes to do about these problems?

Mr. GLEN: I stated at the beginning that I was dealing with the proposals and the platform of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and I am asking for their explanation of their own platform. I am not sure they can give it, but I shall be very glad to hear it if they would.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the hon. gentleman has heard the explanation of these proposals in the house from time to time.

Mr. WALSH: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member may ask a question only with the permission of the hon. gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. GLEN: What is the question?

Mr. WALSH: I would ask the hon. member if he subscribes to any one or to all of the suggestions he has just read.

Mr. GLEN: My viewpoint is very well known, but I am dealing now with the platform of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and asking the members of that party to explain their program as they have laid it down.

The total cost of these proposals cannot be computed, of course, because a great many of them would be estimates only; but I think I am within the mark in saying that at least $500,000,000 more would have to be ingathered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in order to meet these proposals; and if the revenue of to-day is not great enough to carry the country's expenditures, what possible hope is there that these things can be carried out by the government of the day?

Mr. POOLE: Could these proposals not be financed by the method suggested by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) in Vancouver, by the issuance of $500,000,000 in currency?

Mr. EULER: You could not do that every year, could you?

Mr. GLEN: Unless the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) obtains the fountain pen of Mr. Aberhart in order to create the money, I do not know where it is to come from.

Mr. COLDWELL: The pen of the Minister of National Defence, or the Prime Minister's.

Mr. GLEN: I find one very serious omission, Mr. Speaker, in this program of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I do not find in it anything with regard to the socialization of land. I know that is rather a delicate question so far as the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are concerned, but with such high minds and pure motives they will surely let the country know, as it is entitled to know, definitely and concretely, where the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation do stand on the question of the socialization of land.

Mr. COLDWELL: If the hon. gentleman wants an answer, I shall give it to him. We do not believe in the socialization of land because it is not a monopoly.

Mr. BOTHWELL: When did you strike it out of your platform?

[Mr. Walsh.]

Mr. COLDWELL: It never was in.

Mr. GLEN: I understand that the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would call himself a socialist. I do not think he would deny that, and as I understand socialism one of the fundamental and integral parts of the program of socialism is the socialization of land. It has been said that there are only two sources of wealth, land and labour, and some would add capital; but I know this, that from the land all things come and to the land all things must go. I have asked on the platform in the Brandon by-election, and on many platforms in Manitoba, for the reason why the socialist party in this House of Commons have not in their platform the socialization of land.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have answered the question now.

Mr. GLEN: Is it because there is a disunity of thought within the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party?

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. GLEN: I do recall this, that when the platform of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was being drawn at Regina, the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) was present with her delegates from Ontario; and it is commonly said and alleged that when the question of the socialization of land was being proposed to be incorporated in the platform, she indicated that if it was incorporated she would retire with the delegation from Ontario. I know that in other and subsequent conferences of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation the same proposition has been put forward and they took the excuse, as given a moment ago by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), that because it was not a monopoly they did not include it in their platform.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not an excuse—the reason.

Mr. GLEN: May I suggest this, that there is so much disunity within the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party with regard to this particular question, that from the political standpoint they dare not put it there or they would lose the votes of the farmers.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he not think it inadvisable— .

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I cannot allow this unless the hon. member who is now speaking gives permission.

Mr. GLEN: I suggested when I first began to deal with this question of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation platform that the house and the country are surely entitled to a concrete statement of the planks of the platform as laid down by the hon. member for Weyburn. I think we shall welcome it and give him all the courtesy that he would desire.

I was pleased indeed to hear the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) the other day. I was so anxious to hear him that, thinking I might miss some of his words on this side of the house, I decided I would sit with the rump and listen to him there. During the course of his speech I said to my deskmate, "Who is making this speech? Is it the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or is it the hon. member for Marquette?" My reason for saying so was that the viewpoint he was expressing was the one I have long held; and as I listened to him my rapture grew and grew until I could almost have gone across and embraced him. And the reason was this: I recalled many times that hon. members on the other side of the house, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce was speaking have twitted him with being a protectionist. He has always denied that; and during the course of his speech there was an ominous silence on the benches opposite, because not one of them made any suggestion that the minister was a protectionist. As I say, I could myself have made that speech, not so happily phrased, however, as the minister did, and I feel sure that he must have felt a wave of sympathy coming to him during the making of that speech. I have always known that he is what is commonly called a realist, but I have not demeaned his intelligence by refusing to believe that he knows that the only way to trade is by trading. That, as I have always understood it, is a fundamental doctrine of Liberalism, and this government is pursuing that path much to the chagrin of its opponents.

The speech from the throne has forecast legislation which, I think, is in accordance with true Liberal principles. I do not for a moment believe that it is the end of their program; it is only the beginning of that era of reform which we looked for and which we are now experiencing from this government.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I am going to support the motion as moved and vote against both amendments. When I read over the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) I wondered with whom he had been in communion, and I could only imagine that the close association he had had with the social credit group has imbued him with some notions which, perhaps, they hold, because I can believe that amendment could quite well have been framed by my hon. friend the leader of the social credit party (Mr. Blackmore) who is now in his seat. I propose to support the motion.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen) will not expect me to follow him in the line he has taken in this debate. Many words of congratulation have already been extended to those who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Even so, I desire also to offer a word of congratulation to those two hon. gentlemen upon the admirable way in which they performed that task. We from the province of Manitoba are particularly pleased that our contingent has been increased by one and that he should have been selected to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne—which he did in a very capable manner at the opening of this debate. As the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen), has already pointed out, the result of the by-election in Manitoba was the return of one more Liberal member from that province, making Manitoba solidly Liberal except for two constituencies in the city of Winnipeg. I believe, along with the hon. member for Marquette, that the voice of Brandon on that occasion was the voice of western Canada in its general attitude towards the present government.

May I also extend a word of congratulation to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon his re-entry into this chamber. We are glad that he has returned. We hope that he will be long spared to enjoy good health and to occupy his present seat in this house.

I desire along with other hon. members to extend my congratulations to the two very worthy gentlemen who have recently been promoted to cabinet positions. We are delighted that they have been selected, and we wish them well.

I desire to express my pleasure at the coming visit to Canada of the king and queen. This visit should further strengthen that little thread of human sentiment and bind more closely together than anything else can the far-flung sections of the British commonwealth of nations.

We are also pleased that this country had the privilege of enjoying a visit during the past summer from the President of the United States. This is a further indication, very dear to us, of the friendship and good relations that exist between these two countries lying side by side.

Nor can I fail at this time to express my gratitude to the Prime Minister of Great Britain for his heroic efforts to save the world from a major catastrophe last fall. I have no hesitation in saying that I could not see any particular pleasure in the prospect of being called to Ottawa last fall to take a stand as to what Canada should or should not do in the event of war breaking out, as seemed hourly possible at that time. Many of us down in the depths of our hearts cannot fail to feel our appreciation and to realize that a responsibility was taken off our shoulders in the performance of a task which we might easily have been called upon to undertake.

The speech from the throne offers an opportunity for members to express themselves on a wide range of matters and to tell of conditions in their various constituencies. So far the criticism of the government has not been too severe; and even what criticism there has been, has been effectively answered by others, including cabinet ministers, who have taken part in this debate. The government is human, and, of course, it may not be perfect. Even so, during its term of office I think it must be admitted that it has done pretty well; and I believe that when its record is calmly considered, it will compare favourably with that of any government in the past. It has a great many achievements to its credit.

Even in this vexed matter of tariff reductions, which we from the west have done our best to urge upon the government, it has not done too badly. We should have liked to see it go further and we hope that it will. Nevertheless it must be admitted that we have had a more far-reaching tariff reduction since this government has been in office than has ever taken place in the history of any one parliament heretofore. This has been accomplished, first, through the trade agreement with the United States, and now we are to have another reduction in the further trade agreements between Great Britain, the United States and Canada. These reductions should mean much to Canada. They should extend her trading opportunities and give the primary producers of this country an opportunity to secure their goods at a more reasonable cost, or at any rate at competitive cost.

The record of the government is also commendable in other ways. A good deal has been said about the finances of the dominion and what the government has been doing in that regard. It is only fair to point out that through the government's policy of refunding maturities we have experienced a creditable reduction in interest rates. The figure given me is a reduction of 29 per cent in interest rates on dominion government borrowings. We do not hear our hon. friends opposite saying very much about that. That can be looked upon as a most commendable achievement. One thing further can be said in connection with our trade agreements. The new agreement which is to be introduced shortly extends to other countries with which we have trade agreements the most-favoured nation clause, so that in that respect we shall secure a further tariff reduction which does not appear on the surface of the agreement with which we are to deal. On top of that, the consumers of the country will be interested in the fact that the three per cent excise tax will be eliminated. All this should be of particular interest to Canadian consumers.

I must say, however, that I am a little disappointed as regards the encouragement which the government attempted to give to the building trade. My observations lead me to believe that so far as the home improvement scheme is concerned, it has accomplished fairly satisfactory results; but I am bound to say that as regards the housing schemes in rural sections I have to express some disappointment. I had occasion to attempt to assist some people in getting accommodations from this source; but they happened to be living in rural areas and I am afraid I shall have to say that the approved lending institutions did not offer the service which the government expected them to give. Perhaps we can assist in having something more done in that regard another year, because I believe that the building industry would be one of the greatest instruments in the hands of the government and of the country to utilize more people and to create greater employment.

A good many people complain about and continue to bring forward the problem of unemployment. They criticize the administration of relief. Viewing the matter from the standpoint of Manitoba, I do not think we have so much to complain about. True, we have a relief problem, largely in our cities; but I do not think anyone has suffered for want of food, clothing or shelter in that province, and I doubt whether that has happened anywhere in the whole dominion where people got into touch with the proper authorities responsible for handling relief. Even with all these things, I am bound to say that we are still, even in western Canada, enjoying a reasonable standard of living.

I have further remarks to make, Mr. Speaker, but with your permission and with the consent of the house I should like to break off at this point. If I may do so, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Wednesday, February 1, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

GOVERNMENT VESSELS

PETITION OF OFFICERS IN PACIFIC COAST SERVICES RESPECTING PROVISION FOR SUPERANNUATION

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I desire to present a petition signed by H. R. Boulton and 121 other officers, chief petty officers and petty officers of the vessels of the various branches of the dominion government service on the Pacific coast. The preamble states that these officers desire to express their loyalty to the service, and their desire to continue in it, but that they are handicapped by the conditions of their service which force them to maintain two homes. This makes it impossible for them to make provision for superannuation. They point out that the service would be greatly improved if men were encouraged by such a system to join the service and make it a permanent life job. The preamble reads:

Wherefore, your petitioners humbly pray that your honourable house may be pleased to pass legislation allowing us to come under the Superannuation Act.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MACNEIL

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT AND NOTICE OF MOTION FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Standing order 16, citation 158, of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms reads:

In the commons, on the 12th April, 1733, and on the 1st June, 1780, it was resolved that it was a high infringement of the privilege of the house, a crime and misdemeanour, to assault, insult or menace any member of the house, in his coming or going from the house, or upon the account of his behaviour in parliament; or to endeavour to compel members to declare themselves in favour of or against any proposition then depending, or expected to be brought before the house.

Last evening I was informed by an hon. member of this house that he had been requested by an official with some responsibility to the house to advise me to this effect: that if I persisted in proceeding with the motion of which I have given notice to refer the Bren gun contract to the public accounts committee certain information relating to the administration of a veterans' organization in 1925 might be published in a manner that would cause me humiliation and reflect upon my personal honour. At the same time inquiries were directed to me by a number of hon. members and representatives of the press with regard to a report in circulation that I had withdrawn the notice of motion standing in my name. Under the authority I have quoted I therefore claim the right to exercise my privileges on two points.

1. The officers of the organization concerned and public servants in possession of the facts assure me that all the evidence relating to the matter referred to can be made available for such inquiry as may be deemed necessary. I would welcome and facilitate such inquiry even though I was not at the time responsible to the house and was upheld in my actions by the organization to which I was directly responsible.

2. In the performance of my duties as a member of the house, I will not submit to what I consider to be intimidation of this nature and regard it as a violation of my privileges and rights and a contravention of the rules and usages of parliament. I intend to proceed with my motion at the appropriate time and in accordance with the rules of this house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As the hon. member has made mention of an official of this house who it is alleged has made certain statements which the hon. member makes the ground for his citing of the rule of privilege, I wish he would give me the name of that official. As leader of the house I should like to know it.

With regard to proceeding with his resolution, I say to him that if he does not proceed with it the government will wish to. He may be quite assured that there will be no objection to proceeding with his resolution.

Mr. MacNEIL: I shall be very glad to place that information in the possession of the Prime Minister.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT

QUESTION OF RESPONSIBILITY FOR ENFORCEMENT ON MANITOULIN ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS FARQUHAR (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) what is the stand of the government in regard to the enforcement of the Canada Temperance Act on Manitoulin Island, having regard to the fact that the provincial government refuses to enforce it, claiming that it is a federal act and not part of the criminal code.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The hon. gentleman kindly gave me notice of his question and I have prepared the following answer:

The provisions of the Canada Temperance Act, since its first enactment in 1878, have never been enforced by the dominion. On the contrary they have been enforced by provincial or local authorities until the present instance involving Manitoulin Island. Of course, it is not desirable that the dominion should intrude upon a field occupied by the province.

The Canada Temperance Act is not distinguishable from other public statutes of Canada, such as the criminal code, the Lord's Day Act and the Juvenile Delinquents Act, the enforcement of which is carried out by provincial or local authorities in virtue of section 92(14) of the British North America Act—administration of justice in the province.

Mr. Justice Street of the Queen's Bench division of the Supreme Court of Ontario stated in Regina v. Bush, 15 Ontario Reports, 398, at pages 403 and 404, in effect, that subject to certain limitations upon its scope section 92(14) has effect to confer upon the provincial legislatures the right to regulate and to provide for the whole machinery connected with the administration of justice in the provinces including the appointment, except judges, of all officers requisite for the proper administration of justice in its widest sense, reserving only the procedure in criminal matters.

Further, I do not think it can be denied that public order locally is, generally, maintained by provincial or local authorities.

With regard to the question as to whether or not the Canada Temperance Act is part of the criminal code, I think it is obvious that the said act is not part of the criminal code, but the prohibitions therein contained do, however, constitute criminal offences as indicated by Sir Montague E. Smith in delivering the judgment of the privy council in Russell v. The Queen, 7 Appeal Cases, 829. At page 835 he said:

> The effect of the act when brought into force in any county or town within the dominion is, describing it generally, to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, except in wholesale quantities, or for certain specified purposes, to regulate the traffic in the excepted cases, and to make sales of liquors in violation of the prohibition and regulations contained in the act criminal offences, punishable by fine, and for the third or subsequent offence by imprisonment.

[Mr. Farquhar.]

In view of the above, my answer to the question submitted is that the responsibility for the enforcement of the Canada Temperance Act on Manitoulin Island does not rest upon the dominion.

I earnestly hope that ways will be found through cooperation within the limit of existing constitutional jurisdictions to cope with the situation described by the hon. member.

ANTHRAX

REPORTED INFECTION OF JAPANESE SHAVING BRUSHES—PROHIBITION OF IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley). The Toronto Globe and Mail this morning carries a front page headline and news column to the effect that the Ontario health authorities have discovered deadly anthrax germs in some eighteen Japanese imported brushes, about which I asked a question in the house last Thursday. The newspaper goes on to state that the Hon. Harold J. Kirby, Ontario minister of health, has requested the federal government to ban importation of the type of Japanese brush involved. Will the minister assure the house that the necessary steps are being taken properly and effectively to carry out this request?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not know anything about the newspaper story to which the hon. member has referred, and he has given me no notice of his question. I shall look into the matter, and if a further answer is necessary I shall gladly give it.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Health): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can answer the question, because it comes to some extent under the jurisdiction of the Department of Pensions and National Health. We received the news yesterday that some of the Japanese shaving brushes had been found to be infected by anthrax spores, and immediately an order in council was prepared—it is now before council and will in all probability be passed within a few days,—which will in future effectively exclude from this country any articles of that nature.

TARIFF BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON REFERENCE RESPECTING VEGETABLE OILS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) with respect to an application that has been before the tariff board since December, 1936, a little over two years ago, with regard to the importation of vegetable oils. First, has the minister received any interim report on this subject from the tariff board? Second, does he expect to deal with the matter this year, and will he ask the tariff board for a final report on the subject? I quite understand that the matter is governed by statute and all that, but if the inquiry is not yet closed Canada would like to know whether or not it is approaching the closing point. It is now in its third year, and it has to do with an important matter involving considerations that are very disturbing to the interests of Canada.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. friend as to the importance of the matter about which he inquires. I have no recollection of an interim report, and I cannot say positively when the final report will be received, but I am expecting it for consideration during this session of parliament.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, January 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. E. Matthews for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Manion, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, last night before the house adjourned I was dealing briefly with a few matters of government policy, the results of which this country can well feel gratified. Many things which the government has done are most commendable. I fear, however, they have not been sufficiently proclaimed to the Canadian people. If the record of the government were better known, I am sure that what it has done would be more fully appreciated throughout Canada and much of the "blue ruin" talk we hear in this House of Commons would disappear like the mists before the rising sun.

I should now like to deal more particularly with the question of wheat marketing. I desire to say to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) that I think he would be serving his province and western Canada better if he pursued a more reasoned policy. He knows, as does every member of the house, that out of our total membership of 245 only some fifty-five members come from the wheat-growing areas of western Canada. He knows further that when a final decision has to be made by the cabinet, out of the sixteen cabinet ministers only three of them, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), come from the wheat-growing areas of western Canada. This number was increased recently to seventeen by the appointment to the cabinet of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon). Therefore, Mr. Speaker, regardless of what party might be in power, that situation would not and could not be materially changed.

Some of my eastern friends are expressing concern over the possible loss to the government this year from the wheat-marketing policy now being pursued. I should like to emphasize two points in particular with regard to it. First, the farmers of western Canada are not getting 80 cents a bushel for their wheat. The price being paid is 80 cents a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat in store, Fort William or Port Arthur. From this must be deducted freight, elevator charges, and the spreads between the various grades. When these charges are deducted, the price to the farmer is much nearer 55 or 60 cents a bushel than it is to 80 cents a bushel. Then in Manitoba we produce a great deal of durum wheat, for which the government guaranteed price at Fort William is 70 cents, not 80 cents, a bushel. It, too, is subject to the same freight costs, grade spreads and elevator charges, so the price with respect to durum is less than it is for common wheat. Manitoba is also a large producer of coarse grains, on which there is no consideration whatever from the government.

Second, I should like to say to my eastern friends that the money paid out in this so-called bonus, in fact the whole amount received by the western farmer for his wheat, is not now in western Canada. What has been paid out by the government by way of bonus has gravitated right back here to eastern Canada: in fact it is doubtful if it ever got out to the west at all. It has come back to eastern Canada through the payment of freight costs; interest, both governmental and private; taxes; and lastly, but not least, in payments for goods produced in eastern Canada and shipped to the west. I do not desire to pursue this matter further.

I realize the arguments which our eastern friends are facing from day to day and the difficulty they are having in explaining why the western wheat producer should secure consideration which is not available to them. I have yet, however, to hear a single one of them say that the western wheat grower was getting too much for his wheat. It is only fair to point out that western Canada over a period of years has suffered what in reality has been a national calamity. Over half the population has been deprived, on account of conditions totally beyond its control, of any earning power. Therefore the resources of that area have been largely depleted; the assets have been liquidated, and there has been nothing to carry the producers over a time of low prices. The people of eastern Canada, I think, fully realize this because they have come to the assistance of these unfortunate people in a splendid manner, and it has been greatly appreciated by our western farm people, business men and others who have had to accept outside help.

A word with respect to the application of the bonus. We in western Canada have a grading system which the people of eastern Canada do not have. Through that system it is comparatively easy to strike the basis upon which a bonus, if desirable, can be set. Secondly, we have also a grain elevator handling organization, complete throughout the western provinces, and through its machinery it is comparatively easy, without setting up any other organization, to distribute the bonus. We have a complete organization already set up. A similar system does not exist in eastern Canada.

I shall leave that matter for the time being, and proceed to another phase of the situation. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), speaking a few days ago, placed on the record some figures relative to the change in the wheat acreage throughout the world. I desire to deal with the problem in a little different manner, putting it in this way: Our wheat problem has been brought about by a recession or a decline in the world's wheat trade. It is not that less wheat is being used, but that less wheat is going into world trade. At one time there was a world's trade in wheat amounting to upwards of 800,000,000 bushels a year; in one year, I believe, the figure reached almost 1,000,000,000 bushels. This has gradually dwindled down until in more recent years the figure has been about 540,000,000 bushels a year. This condition has been brought about by the nationalistic attitude of countries which were formerly large importers of Canadian wheat but who because of fear of war and other national considerations, desired to place themselves on a self-supporting basis in so far as food supplies are concerned. Until that fear is removed, and there is a greater appreciation of world trade, I fear that this country is going to continue to face a wheat problem and the effect on Canadian economy and particularly western Canada will be readily apparent.

We from western Canada adhere definitely to the principle that if we will buy goods from foreign countries, those countries will buy goods from us; and believing in that policy, we hold that every possible effort should be made by the government to extend the trading opportunities of this country in order to make a market for our natural products.

I do not like this idea of a government bonus. Western Canada, as a matter of principle, does not like it. Nor do I propose at this time to say anything with respect to the contribution that western Canada has made to eastern Canada through the policy of tariff protection, because I do not think such a discussion will help in meeting our present difficulties. I would point out, however, that should western Canada be forced to change its system of agriculture, eastern Canada will feel the effect on its agriculture in no uncertain way. We in western Canada can turn, if we have to, to other systems of agriculture. We can turn to dairy production, live stock production, poultry production, honey production, and several other lines; but in so doing we should immediately come into competition with eastern farmers, and then, instead of Canada having only a wheat problem on its hands, it would have a general agricultural problem as well. Western Canada is organized and has the machinery to produce wheat and other cereals. To do anything else it would have to change its entire set-up.

There was recently held in Winnipeg a wheat conference called by the government of Manitoba. It was attended by outstanding men from Canada and the United States, by representatives of boards of trade all across Canada, by grain men, by producers and, I think one can say, by all those who are interested primarily in western agriculture. It was made abundantly clear at this conference that western Canada's natural economy was that of growing wheat and that it would be most difficult to change very much even if it were desirable to do so. I should like to refer briefly to some of the results that came out of that conference. Following the conference, which lasted for almost a week, a committee was set up to continue the activities that had already been started by the conference. From a Winnipeg Free Press report I found this statement relative to the conference:

> The picture painted by the conference showed a shrinkage in world demand for wheat of some 2,000,000 bushels a year. The demand from Great Britain was down five per cent; that from Germany, France and Italy down seventy per cent; from other European countries down thirty-three per cent. Against this, world supplies had risen by 15,000,000 bushels annually. The result spelled low prices.

The chairman of the conference was the premier of the province. The press report of his statement in closing the conference was as follows:

Among the problems he (Mr. Bracken) mentioned were the search for markets, lowering of producers' costs, international exchange, interprovincial trade in seed grains, more aggressive merchandising, industrial uses of surplus agricultural products, study of the western debt structure, and if the only way out was to fight for a share of a smaller market—how best to arm themselves? A western problems research council was needed to correlate the work of research institutions.

I set out this press comment merely to indicate the approach which is likely to be made to this problem on behalf of those particularly concerned with it in western Canada.

Last December it was my privilege to attend in Toronto a meeting of the Canadian Chambers of Commerce. This meeting was called to discuss agricultural problems and nothing else. I am bound to interject here that among those who attended I did not hear a single voice raised in protest against what this government is doing this year for the western wheat grower. Instead, there was a general recognition of the problem and a desire to do something to meet it. In particular, this meeting was called to survey the possibilities, through scientific investigation, and otherwise, of creating new non-edible uses for agricultural products. The chairman of the meeting was a very close friend of mine, a former provincial minister of agriculture of Manitoba, Mr. D. G. McKenzie. One of the things pointed out at this meeting was that agriculture was served well in Canada by scientific men, and that a great deal had been accomplished in the interests of agriculture by our scientists and technical men To cite one example only, the production of new rust-resistant varieties of wheat is illustrative of one of the far-reaching things that have been accomplished. Hundreds of other illustrations could be given. It would seem, however, that so far the emphasis has been placed on the idea of making two blades of grass grow where formerly only one grew, with little attempt being made to invent new uses for agricultural products.

Another thing pointed out was that agriculture in this country was competing not only with the agriculture of other countries, but also with the scientists of other countries. Germany, for instance, is producing from milk casein a material that is a suitable substitute for wool. A large percentage of her clothing both ordinary and high-grade is now being produced from forest products. As illustrative of what industry can do for agriculture, I was fascinated by a statement made by Mr. Henry Ford at the chemurgic conference in 1935. He said he was using in his factory the following agricultural products: 60,000,000 pounds of cotton; 500,000 bushels of corn, 2,500,000 gallons of molasses; 3,200,000 pounds of wool; 1,500,000 square feet of leather; 350,000 pounds of mohair; and an almost unlimited supply of soya beans.

At Atchison, Kansas, extensive experiments have been carried on to find new non-edible uses for farm products. Already some encouraging results have been produced. From oats three products have been developed and are now sold in the United States:

1. From the kernel of the oat they have produced a product called "avenex," a fine oat flour with peculiar preserving qualities.

2. "Levena" a pleasing perfume. Over $200,000,000 annually is spent for cosmetics in the United States. If, therefore, part of our oat supply can be directed to that type of market its usefulness is readily apparent.

3. From the hull of oats a product called "furfural" has been produced. It is now recognized as a base chemical. The state of Missouri has found that by mixing it with a bituminous binder and with dirt there can be built a fairly satisfactory market road at a cost of around $2,500 a mile compared with $30,000 per mile for a concrete highway. The horse and mule population of the United States decreased between 1914 and 1924 by 10,000,000. One, therefore, can see the necessity of attempting to secure a substitute market for oats.

Alcohol is now successfully made from corn, sorghum, barley, rye, wheat and sweet potatoes. Gasoline carrying ten per cent of this type of alcohol is now being sold in 2,000 filling stations at prices competitive with gasoline. A plant at Atchison, Kansas, has a capacity to produce 10,000 gallons a day and uses 1,500,000 bushels of grain a year.

Dr. Hale of Washington, in his book Prosperity Beckons, writes in part as follows of the alcohol industry:

When this new industry—the alcohol industry—starting in this country in July of this year on a minute scale, with the first year's sales not to exceed $500,000, we can confidently predict the course of its progress. Within a few years there will be hundreds of agricrude alcohol plants under operation. Within ten years we should be closely approaching the 20 per cent alcohol blend for automobiles and an appreciable share of cellulose and other acetate markets. Perhaps $1,000,000,000 will not be out of the way in representing the alcohol industry in 1946. By 1956, just twenty years in the future, there is every reason to believe that this mighty industry will be producing fifty million gallons of agricrude alcohol at a selling price of between 15 and 20 cents per gallon with handsome profits. In all truth we await that day in all candor. Its accomplishments in 20 years will have overtopped the sum total of revenues gained by the automobile and petroleum industries together in 1929.

Again, in another place in his book, he says:

Our fermentation industries in supply of agricrude alcohol will require the cultivation of at least 100 million acres of land in 20 years.

This surely is a move in the right direction. In Great Britain and in some other countries they are requiring an alcohol blend in all gasoline used in motor cars. Germany is extracting gasoline from coal, and we know also something of what that country is doing to supplement the use of wheat flour. In the dairy industry, through the introduction of new bacteria and a new process of fermentation, the varieties of cheese offered for sale have been increased from four major varieties to fifty-eight, with a resultant increase in per capita consumption of around three pounds to five and a half pounds between 1920 and 1937.

Further, it is pointed out that complete houses are now being built from agricultural material. Plastics, wall board and paints are now being made from waste lumber, cornstalks, flax and hemp. One readily appreciates the importance of housing, and if the objective can be only partly attained through the use of agricultural materials, and particularly waste agricultural materials, it should result in new sources of revenue to our agricultural producers.

The story of Doctor George Washington Cavers, the negro lad born in slavery, is no doubt known to many. Through scientific research he is credited with making from the peanut three hundred useful articles, and from the sweet potato over one hundred articles.

In this type of work it is already estimated that $150,000,000 of private and public capital has been invested in what they call the chemurgic industries of the United States. Further, under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of last year there has been set aside $4,000,000 a year for the establishment in the United States of four regional research laboratories, the sole purpose of which is to develop new non-edible and industrial uses for farm products.

I am not citing this or advocating it as a solution of our wheat problem or even our agricultural problem; I put it forward as something to which this country might well be giving attention. The utilization of our waste farm products and many of the products that are already going into uses which they have not been going into in the past, may be one of the most far-reaching developments for the revival and revamping of agriculture in Canada.

Those who know our western agricultural set-up know it would be difficult to transform it very much. We are geared to the production of cereals, and any change would require a huge capital outlay and be difficult to bring about. Reduction of acreage is out of the question except in so far as it might apply to sub-marginal lands.

I therefore submit that a general scientific approach to the question of utilizing our agricultural products in industry and for non-edible purposes is worthy of consideration. Moreover it is essential that we continue to pay even greater attention to developments, scientific and otherwise, in other countries with which we compete agriculturally. Our research institutions should have every encouragement possible from this house and from the country as a whole to give heed to these problems.

If these agricultural problems with which this country is faced are not dealt with and every possible approach to their solution followed up, not only western agricultural economy but agriculture throughout the entire dominion will suffer. Western agriculture cannot hope to stand up under its present conditions and with prevailing prices, so if something is not done to relieve that situation I fear we may have a general break-down, resulting in a peasant type of farming which I am sure no one in this country wants to see. On the other hand, I am satisfied that western Canada, given a fair chance to sell in the markets of the world and a fair chance to buy in the same kind of markets in which we have to sell, given encouragement in the matter of research to find new uses for our agricultural products, and given rain and no grasshoppers, can once again become that great wealth-producing part of Canada which it has been in years gone by.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): My desire in the first place is to congratulate very warmly the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply. They have done exceptionally well, and every one of us is proud to have them with us. I must also extend my congratulations to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion). I have been a member of this house since the session of 1925. At that time the leader of the Conservative party was the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen who is now in the senate. The Hon. Mr. Guthrie, who is now the head of the transport commission, was acting leader of the opposition in the session of 1927. Then, after the unforgettable Winnipeg convention, the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett was chosen as the leader of the party. All these have come and gone, and now we have the fourth leader of the Conservative party. May I remind the house that the Hon. Mr. Hepburn some time ago paid him the same compliment that I did years ago to my revered leader. Mr. Hepburn said of Mr. Manion that he was human. So I hope, now that the leaders of both the major parties, and also the leaders of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and Social Credit groups, are all human beings, that the debate will proceed along normal lines.

An event of major importance is the coming to Canada of Their Majesties the King and Queen of Canada. It is the first time since the foundation of this country by old France that we have had a king and queen of Canada, and it is the first time also that they have come to Canada. Also on behalf of my constituents I give expression to our thanks to their majesties for having decided to stop at Rivière du Loup on their way home.

There is, sir, an event which has passed unnoticed to which the attention of the house must be drawn, one which has caused me the greatest surprise. In the Votes and Proceedings of Monday last we are informed of the resignation of the right hon. member for Calgary West, Mr. Bennett. The house cannot be the same without him. Not only did he add colour to the debates; he added magnificent technicolour. I feel his loss perhaps more than anybody else, because I was at odds with him more often than any other member of the house. Last year, on March 7, I spoke thus on the reported retirement of that gentleman from the party leadership:

> Mr. Speaker, as one who never agreed with the policies of the right hon. gentleman who has just spoken, I heartily join the house in extending to him my very best wishes for happiness, good health and a full enjoyment of life outside the house.

Now my good wishes are unconditional. But the very same day, just before I rose to speak, the right hon. gentleman, who remains right honourable in spite of the fact that he thought fit to resign as member for a constituency which had elected him for a full parliamentary term, said this in his concluding sentence:

> I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to thank the house for this manifestation of good will, which, perhaps, if it had been expressed in more strenuous times, might not have been necessary at all.

When I heard those words I was astonished. I thought that the right hon. gentleman did not have the good memory that he always appeared to have. For instance, on March 31, 1932, the Canadian Press sent out the following dispatch:

> Taschereau pays Bennett tribute.
> I wish (said Mr. Taschereau, the former prime minister of Quebec) to pay this tribute to the Bennett government: They have done all in their power to relieve unemployment. I might add, the provincial government has been equally active.

I feel that the right hon. gentleman, if he had been present, would have interjected, "Was not that Mr. Taschereau the one whom I proclaimed the greatest Tory in Canada at a public meeting of the Canadian Bar Association in Quebec? Then I would not have insisted further. But if I take the Canadian Who's Who for 1936-37 I read in the autobiography of the right hon. gentleman a tribute from the Christian Science Monitor, one from the London Morning Post, one from Toronto Saturday Night and another from Maclean's magazine. Mr. Bennett was highly praised by his followers in and outside this house, but not one of them is mentioned. But on page 79 I find this tribute:

> A sincere, hardworking Canadian citizen doing all that he can for his country.

That is signed by Hon. Charles A. Dunning. If Mr. Bennett were here, I would ask him, who is that Hon. Mr. Dunning? and without hesitation he would tell me to look at page 325 of the same book. I turn to that page and find this:

> —engaged in finance and business as president and managing director, and consultant of several large corporations.

But, Mr. Bennett would say, that is not all; read the epigraph:

> The highest type of public man, who enjoys the confidence of his countrymen.

That is signed by Sir Robert Borden. Then who is Sir Robert Borden? I can almost hear the right hon. gentleman telling me, "You have not read the book. Turn to page 103." When I turn to page 103 I see that the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden was the war-time Prime Minister and the leader of the Conservative party, so I would not insist further. But if I read the Montreal Gazette of September 5, 1932, I find a Canadian Press dispatch which says:

> Apart from being a distinguished lawyer he is a true son of Canada.

This statement was made by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) at a bar association dinner in Banff in 1932 and referred to the right hon. gentleman of whom I have just spoken. But then the right hon. gentleman would reply, "Are French-Canadians cockneys? It would be just as easy to say that I am a true son of Canada." But there is something more. Once in Montreal the first citizen of that great city stated that he had boundless admiration for the right hon. gentleman. That is not in Who's Who. Why? Perhaps the right hon. gentleman would interject at once, "Because none of my colleagues has ever said that he had boundless admiration for me." Therefore the right hon. gentleman would add that the last two gentlemen whom I mentioned were truly Liberals but that he could not use their quotations about himself.

There is one question that has been discussed very often in the press and by various speakers in this country; I refer to the question of democracy. Some time ago I read an article which appeared in the Montreal Daily Herald, dated December 5, headed, "Democracy a Failure? The Record Shames the Thought." It is a long article, but there is one very important thing missing from it. There is no definition of democracy. The editor circulated the following request:

Any comment you care to make regarding this editorial will be valued by the editor, The Montreal Daily Herald.

Then not long ago the Winnipeg Tribune republished an article which first appeared in the Deutsche Zeitung, a German paper, under the heading "The Great Lie. Democracies and Dictatorships." In this article, as well, neither democracies nor dictatorships are defined. Then a civil servant of great importance—although I do not believe in him at all —Mr. Dickson, deputy minister of labour, delivered a long lecture in which he said that strikes handicapped democracy, which is surely true. I did not have time to read the whole article. No less a gentleman than his worship the mayor of the metropolis of this country, according to the Montreal Gazette of January 16, said that democracy depends on politicians handing out jobs. To do that we must have the jobs to give. Then in the Montreal Gazette of January 23 Mr. Leo Dolan, chief of the Canadian Travel Bureau, is quoted as urging Canada and the United States to fight communism. No less a person than Sir Gerald Campbell, British high commissioner to Canada, according to a dispatch published on January 27, speaking in Toronto, called for——a united front of democracies, militant and armed, to work for peace against the threats of the dictatorship countries.

I should like to be permitted to read an article from the New York Times headed "Democracy must Cherish its Right of Laughter":

Man, as the saying goes, is the animal that laughs. The statement is not, of course, quite accurate. The hyena laughs, as do certain birds, and the horse cannot always keep a straight face. However, man is doubtless the only animal who cannot live and keep sane without laughter. It is laughter that makes the behaviour of individuals and the absurdity of institutions bearable, and we need it because both individuals and institutions, to the end of time are bound to be more or less absurd on occasion.

These reflections are induced by some comments of Mr. David Low, the English cartoonist, published in the official organ of BBC —the British broadcasting agency. "Undoubtedly," says Mr. Low, "there is more that is inherently absurd in the world to-day than ever before, if only because of the greater contrast between man's vastly increased power and his use of it."

Ideas, if they are good ones, can stand being laughed at—so Mr. Low thinks. Christianity, the motor car and the income tax, he points out, all survived ridicule. Personalities are more vulnerable. The bigger the windbag the easier it is to poke holes in it.

"The leader who sets himself up as a god is," in Mr. Low's opinion, "asking for it." But does he get it? In countries now most supinely under a boss' thumb, where the healthy deflation of fly-blown personalities is most needed, it does not take place. American cartoonists have done wonders with Mr. Roosevelt's chin, but their Italian contemporaries, no matter how much their fingers tickle, dare not distort Il Duce's massive lower maxillary. Where now are those rude artists who in former times helped bring a sense of proportion into the political life of Germany? Even Mickey Mouse is suspect, and Donald Duck would be interned at sight.

One concludes that there is no right a democracy ought to cherish more tenaciously than the right to laugh at anything and anybody it thinks is funny. Mr. Low hints that this right may not be safe in England. One would mourn its loss there, or in France, far more than its loss in Germany. Territories may be lost, spheres of influence may be contracted, the road to India or Tunis may be threatened, but civilization can survive if a joke continues to be called a joke and is not disguised as a great man or a great idea. For, appalling as some of the world's "great men" and "great ideas" are, they are also funny.

It is tragic laughter that would ring around the world to-day if all mankind were free to look at its predicament in its proper light. But it would be healing laughter.

On January 6 the Canadian papers carried a dispatch to the effect that the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett had contended that the church has failed. The headline reads:

Cannot tell where and why, but states in practice philosophy of Christian faith little regarded.

Then the Most Reverend Doctor M. T. Harding, Archbishop of Rupert's Land, said prior to sailing for England, according to a dispatch dated January 13:

Despite the disfavour with which we may view his policies, especially that of persecution, there is no doubt that Hitler is to-day the world's greatest statesman. He has disciplined democracy, an achievement sorely needed in our own country.

Then on January 16 the press carried the following:

Government and Democracy Have Failed
Asserts Rt. Reverend Woodside

He agreed in a general way with the statement made recently by Right Honourable R. B. Bennett at Calgary to the effect that the church had failed.

"I am in general agreement with that. The church has failed to do and accomplish much that we may have desired," said the moderator. "That is not to minimize her great achievements. The man who made that statement knows of her great achievements. But he was right in the sense in which he spoke, that the church has failed."

According to the press the same reverend gentleman stated on January 23 as follows:

"We are not of those who think or say that democracy has failed or is doomed," said Right Reverend Doctor J. W. Woodside, Moderator of the United church in Canada, preaching a sermon Sunday evening in Chalmers church on, "After dictatorship, what?"

The reverend gentleman should be very careful when making a statement like that. An honourable member of the senate I think made a conclusive answer to the statements of the moderator and the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. Senator J. J. Hughes is reported as follows:

If there are in the world at the present time, institutions which men founded and called churches, they may have failed or they may fail, and while the consequences might be serious they would not be fatal. But to say or to think that the church founded by God could fail shows such a misunderstanding of what Christianity means that the persons who so speak or think, while they may be good people and law abiding citizens cannot in reality be called christians.

That appeared on the editorial pages of the Ottawa Journal of January 23, and I think a copy should be pasted on the wall of every schoolroom. The Ottawa Evening Citizen of January 26 contained the full text of a speech made also in Chalmers church by the Hon. W. D. Herridge, former Canadian minister to Washington. The heading reads:

Addressing Chalmers church men's association on "the new democracy," the former Canadian minister to Washington asserts Canada stands in a position to-day to beat back the tide if leadership can be found to take advantage of the new concept of democracy. Dominion must put its house in order first, and then it could promote a world structure that would dismay aggressors.

No one attaches much importance to the sayings, statements or speeches of the Hon. Mr. Herridge. We know that he has spoken so often of the new order without saying what it is to be that when we hear the word "order" come from his lips we consider one pays no attention to it. The New York Sun contained an exceptionally good editorial from which I quote as follows:

True democracy may not be a religion but it must be religious or it is neither true nor a democracy. Democracy without religious emotion is a watch without a mainspring. A philosopher can doubtless imagine a world in which the two would be separable, but in the world that is they never have been separable. In proportion as men have tried to separate them they have found their democracies unworkable and their religions sterile. But there isn't anything new about this, even though the discovery seem new to some of the discoverers.

Principal Douglas of McGill university, speaking in Toronto on October 15, urged discipline in democracy in the following words:

It is a word which in itself is a paradox, for absolute freedom results in the destruction of freedom and it is only restrained freedom which can last. Thus, whichever definition one elects to take, it is a contradiction, for the destruction of freedom converts it into something wholly different, and restrained freedom is not freedom at all.

A brilliant journalist, Mr. Bernard K. Sandwell, editor of Toronto Saturday Night, spoke in a similar vein at a dinner of the professional institute, held in Ottawa on November 29, 1938. The report reads:

Mr. Sandwell, in his racy address on "Some misconceptions about democracy," exploded the notion held by some anarchists and communists that people can get along without rules and regulations. If rules and regulations were necessary for so simple an operation as a game of bridge, how can they be dispensed with in government—probably the most difficult of all tasks?

The hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) attended the annual gathering of the association of life insurance presidents, held in New York on December 1. He told the United States insurance heads that the nation was wedded to democratic ideals. The newspaper report reads in part:

"There is much demand that democracy be more efficient but none that democracy be curtailed and there is grumbling because parliament talks so much but no suggestion that parliament be muzzled," the speaker declared.

That quotation is from the Montreal Gazette, but in the New York Times of December 2, 1938, I find this:

Mr. Ilsley emphasized the point that Canadians are intensely saying: "in no country would a dictator have harder sledding."

He stressed the fact that Canadians are for law and order and asserted that the population of that country is divided along so many ways of thought that the leader of any cult of "ism" must expect prompt and intelligent criticism on a broad scale from the elements of the population to which he does not appeal.

A former member of the privy council at Westminster spoke in New York a few days after the Minister of National Revenue. After he spoke, I wrote to the minister and told him that he had paved the way to Eden. On December 9, Mr. Anthony Eden made in New York city a most pathetic statement which I must read to the house. He said:

I belong, as do so many of you in this room to-night, to the war generation; to a generation which is sometimes referred to in my country as the missing generation. It is a generation which has, quite literally, been decimated. Almost every family has suffered, some have suffered severely and, as inevitably happens, we have lost our best. Yet perhaps the survivors of that generation have a special right to give their message to the world, to the vigorous, combative new world which is taking shape around us at this hour.

What was it that some twenty years ago we and you both fought to achieve? Men spoke of the war to end war, and, even if that seemed to some a goal beyond immediate human reach, we did have faith that the power of arrogant militarism would be destroyed, as we hoped, forever.

Twenty years after we can reflect ruefully how remote we are from the goal of our hopes.

Then he described democracy.

It is the essence of democracy that it provides constant schooling in this endless adventure which is the art of government. Democracy is a university in which we learn from one another. It can never be a barracks, where blind obedience is the first essential.

And then he states what he means by democracy:

Democracy must have the strength of the best tempered steel, not rigid, but supple. It must have the strength of the highest form of discipline—self-discipline.

Doctor R. C. Wallace, principal and vice-chancellor of Queen's university, Kingston, said in Montreal on December 13 last:

The big advantage of other types of government than the democratic was their ability to move speedily when quick decisions were required.

I would impress on you in this critical period the necessity we must place on ourselves of disciplining ourselves from within rather than submitting to discipline from without.

That was a paraphrase of Anthony Eden's remarks in New York. He also said that the safety of democracy rests with every individual citizen, who should thoroughly acquaint himself with local, provincial and national governments and take an interest in international matters. He was inspired by a speech made in New York on December 1 last by Doctor Clarence A. Dykstra, who declared that:

As democracy was losing out in other nations of the world, it might be necessary in the United States to have all educational forces marshalled together to give Americans an understanding of its principles and problems.

He spoke also of education and suggested a vast program of education, calling upon facilities of the press, schools, radio and the screen to fire people with ideals, and he asked if nationally America was invulnerable to dictator doctrine.

Then the Hon. Gordon Conant, attorney general of Ontario, said on December 2 last that drastic measures must be submitted to if the dictator states are not to overwhelm us with their form of government.

Then on Jan. 7 last the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett said in Edmonton that western Canada suffered from lack of discipline. The members of the house who were here at the time he was Prime Minister will remember that once, on the birthday of his then Minister of Railways and Canals, Mr. Bennett praised him for his spirit of discipline. Of course, the hon. gentleman who has now succeeded him as leader of the opposition cannot return the compliment at this time, but it is interesting to see that Mr. Bennett told the people who had supported him for so long that they were lacking in discipline.

To summarize, Principal Douglas of McGill spoke of "discipline in democracy." Mr. Sandwell advocated "rules and regulations of democracy." Principal Wallace of Queen's suggested that "we discipline ourselves." Mr. Anthony Eden said, "It—democracy—must have the strength of the highest form of discipline—self-discipline." Hon. Gordon Conant said, "Canada needs a stronger discipline." Mr. Bennett said "Western Canada suffers from a lack of discipline." The hon. Minister of National Revenue was the only one who touched the right note when he stressed the fact that Canadians are for law and order.

I have mentioned, Mr. Speaker, the views of leaders of thought among the English-speaking population of this country at such length that my time does not allow me to refer to the admirable speeches that have been made on democracy by my archbishop, His Eminence Cardinal Villeneuve, primate of the Catholic church in Canada. In his view, if order is not maintained we may expect anarchy or revolution, and therefore what is essential in this country is order—order in democracy.

On January 4 last the Ottawa Journal in an editorial reproduced from the New York Times this passage:

Statesmen may blunder, falter and betray. Crude gangsters may take on pomp and put their trust in steel and high explosives. They may win local victories. They will not defeat democracy, because democracy, however defined, involves the highest aspirations of which humanity is capable. They attack democracy at their peril. It will, in the end, destroy them.

May I conclude by reading what the Hon. Mr. Justice Dysart said at the Blackstone club in Winnipeg on April 10 of last year:

> A man who thinks our state is based on democracy is under a delusion. We regulate trade, labour, children's welfare and many other aspects of life. That is all contrary to democracy.
> This country is going to revert to absolute government if we don't do some hard thinking and work out some other form of democracy.

Democracy is advocated in many places, and not always in the right way. Democracy means the independence of the individual, within order in society. But if, instead of having order in society; if, instead of having government from above, we have government from underneath, we are exposed to anarchy and revolution. The word is pretty strong but it has been used by several leaders of the clergy as well as of the laity. Therefore, sir, it is to be hoped that Lincoln's pious wish that "government of the people, for the people, and by the people shall not perish from the earth" will hold good for this country. It will not perish, on two conditions: In the first place our Canadian fellow-citizens must have deep religious convictions; in the second place we should establish order in government, order in legislation, order in the public service; and thereby we shall have order in the public activities of this country.

Mr. A. J. ANDERSON (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the first matter referred to in the speech from the throne is the approaching visit of Their Majesties King George VI and his gracious consort Queen Elizabeth. That visit is a matter of great moment to the empire generally and particularly to this dominion. It marks the first occasion upon which a reigning monarch in Great Britain has set foot, during his reign, upon the soil of Canada or of any of the dominions. The present king has already visited this dominion, and was loyally received. His forthcoming visit will enable him to become acquainted with the changes which have taken place since last he was in our midst. On the present occasion their majesties will also proceed to the great republic to the south, having accepted an invitation to visit President and Mrs. Roosevelt at Washington. This splendid gesture will intensify the good feeling which exists between those two great democracies. It will form a striking contrast with some previous meetings in European countries, especially those which have recently taken place between those totalitarian executives the Fuehrer of Germany and the Prime Minister of Italy. Upon their visits there was a display of armed force; the forthcoming visit by their majesties to the United States will be a display of peacefulness, harmony and goodwill which will intensify those good feelings that have existed for a long period of time. The people of Canada will hail with a great deal of pleasure the visit of their king and queen. Personally I regard it with much pleasure, and I know that my feelings are shared by everyone who resides in the constituency I represent. I hope that the welcome which will be extended to their majesties all over the dominion will be appropriate to the position they hold and to our association with the motherland.

After this reference, the speech from the throne proceeds to deal with defence matters. At the present time defence is a rather important subject. The minds of the Canadian people are set upon the protection of Canada and the empire. In the years immediately following the war Great Britain and all the dominions were more or less concerned to reduce their armaments—a praiseworthy object. The United States and other nations were similarly disposed, with the result that appropriations for armaments were greatly reduced. In later years Britain found to her dismay that she had disarmed to a very dangerous degree. Canada did the same, but since we were living in a peaceful environment it did not impress itself particularly upon our people. Yet, whenever the defence estimates, limited as they were, have come before this house in recent years, there have always been objections on the ground that they were too large. The feeling is expressed that to grant money for the purposes of defence of the country would inspire a warlike spirit—which of course is a fallacy.

In 1937 matters in this regard became rather more important, and Canada increased its appropriation for defence. Upon that occasion we were the spectators of an unpleasant exhibition on the government side. The minister was very much embarrassed to find that supporters of the government rose in their places and objected to those appropriations. But the vote went through. May I say that the members of the official opposition made no objection to those appropriations; as a matter of fact, they supported them, and would have supported them had they been increased in a reasonable amount. In 1938 the same thing happened. The government came along with increased appropriations and the opposition supported them. Now we are told in the speech from the throne that increased amounts will be required for purposes of defence, and this statement is implemented in the estimates which have been placed on the table.

During the last two or three years Great Britain has been faced with very difficult conditions on the continent of Europe. In the speech from the throne, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)—for he is really responsible for the speech—states that his government is earnestly and intently watching the situation in Europe, and that at times it appears warlike. That is very true. The best way to judge of the interest of British people in the situation is to look at what has been done. Earl Baldwin, while Prime Minister of Great Britain, was faced with danger from the continent, and took the stern position that England must endeavour to keep peace in the world. He felt that she was not strong enough of herself to play the part of international policeman, but he used his best endeavours to attain peaceful relations. When Mr. Chamberlain followed him, the same policy was pursued. He applied himself most intently to preserve the peace of the world by continuing the friendship which existed between Britain and other nations. This resolve was shown in many ways. At the time of the war between Italy and Ethiopia Mr. Chamberlain did what he could to mitigate that most unparalleled and unwarranted attack by Italy upon an innocent people. His efforts did not stop the war, and Ethiopia was overcome.

Next came the war in Spain, a war between different factions of the Spanish nation. To a great extent it is a conflict between ideals or philosophies. The loyalists or the governmental party were practically socialists, along with the communistic element. The insurgents were the old monarchical party and very much of the fascist type. The result is that this war has been going on in Spain, and other nations of Europe are to some extent taking part. Britain has been the chief agent in maintaining non-intervention between the warring factions. It has been a difficult matter to hold the French back, but it has succeeded. That cannot be said of the two great autocratic nations, Germany and Italy. They have shown their hand clearly, having assisted the insurgent body; yet, notwithstanding the difference of attitude as between Mr. Chamberlain and the totalitarian executives, Mr. Chamberlain has pursued his efforts along the line of peace. While pursuing those efforts, as Prime Minister of Great Britain he was not forgetting the necessity of increasing her armed strength in the interests of preserving the peace of the world. He was not preparing for war. No war was being waged against Britain; no war or threat or any complaint that might lead to war was urged against Britain or any of the dominions. Mr. Chamberlain's whole effort was in the direction of peace. His visit to the Fuehrer of Germany was in the interests of peace. His government succeeded through Lord Perth, the ambassador at Rome, in bringing about an agreement between Britain and Italy looking to peace, and that agreement stood the world in great stead at a later date.

At every stage where matters became serious Mr. Chamberlain was still exerting himself along the lines of peace. Then there was the Munich crisis, with the events that led to the meeting there. Mr. Chamberlain was faced with this position. Hitler had succeeded a very short time before in absorbing the Austrian nation without actually drawing the sword. He was armed and was ready, but that nation was absorbed without any warfare. Then, having succeeded in absorbing Austria, the German republic made demands upon Czechoslovakia on behalf of the Sudeten German nationals living in Czechoslovakia. This course was pursued for a while, and Mr. Chamberlain was still urging measures of peace, not only by correspondence and telephone messages but also by sending representatives to the various parties. His government consented to Lord Runciman's visit to Czechoslovakia in a private capacity for the purpose of ascertaining at close range what was the trouble there. After several weeks there he returned to England, satisfied that the blame was not all on one side. At any rate the fuehrer took courage and with his armed forces ranged along the boundaries of Czechoslovakia, and gave an ultimatum to the President of Czechoslovakia to surrender to his terms—the autonomy of the Sudeten Germans or their absorption by the German nation—or face war within twenty-four hours.

Mr. Chamberlain was put to the test. How far could he go and what would he do? He was impelled by courage and determination to do all that was possible within human power to prevent war, and that was the time when he deserved, was entitled to and was looking for a sympathetic expression from various parts of the empire. He got it from certain parts of the empire, and it was not an expression of war or a desire to go to war; it was an expression of approval of the tremendous efforts he was putting forward personally in the interests of peace. Our Canadian nation was silent. I think the least the Prime Minister and the government might have done on that occasion was to send a message of approval and congratulation to the Right Hon. Mr. Neville Chamberlain on the wonderful efforts he was making to prevent war and to preserve the peace of the world. But that was wanting.

That was in September, 1938. Matters have gone on since, and we find that the fuehrer is still disposed to pursue his ambitions. Britain has increased her armed strength, not that there is any demand at all upon her to use that strength either at the moment or in the immediate future, so far as any part of the empire is concerned. There is no demand upon Canada, and there is no necessity, in discussing this question of defence estimates, to say that the estimates are for the purposes of defending the empire or sending forces beyond the borders of Canada. That might be necessary and it might be justifiable, but at the moment we are mixing up the defence of Canada and appropriations therefor with a much larger question, which is the defence of the empire.

We have heard some expressions in this debate, questioning whether we are justified in passing the large appropriations of this year which look as though they were intended for the defence of the empire rather than of Canada itself. May I say that as a Canadian of Scottish descent I consider myself as good a British subject as can be found in this house or anywhere else, and I am proud of the fact that Canada is a dominion of the British empire. Not only am I proud of that fact, but I believe that as a matter of necessity the future existence and destiny of Canada depend upon our continued association with this great commonwealth of nations.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred the other day to a speech delivered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier back in the days of the war or before, and quoted in a work by our former associate here, Mr. E. M. Macdonald of Nova Scotia. In that book Sir Wilfrid Laurier is quoted as having said, "When England is at war, Canada is at war." Well, that is true, but it does not necessarily mean that we are in the actual reality of war. We are subject to the same conditions as Britain herself. We are part and parcel of the empire. We glory in being a part of the empire. We consider it a privilege—yes more, a right—to be part and parcel of the empire. That privilege and right carry with them a parallel duty and responsibility: the responsibility to do our part in the defence of this great commonwealth of nations. What that part will be remains to be seen when the time comes.

It seems to me folly to spend time saying that we can declare our neutrality in case of war. I was going to use the word "insanity" in describing that attitude of mind. How can we be both in the empire and out of it? The moment Canada declared its neutrality, exercising the powers which we believe we have obtained through the imperial conference and which are embodied in the statute of Westminster, we are out of the commonwealth. If Great Britain were at war with Japan, how far would Japan listen to our protests? She did not give much consideration to the protests of the United States in relation to China or to British or French protests against the methods adopted in making war on China, methods absolutely contrary to the rules recognized in modern warfare. Japan would laugh at our protests, and say: That is nothing; you are part and parcel of the British empire, we will bomb your cities and attack your people. That would be just as justifiable and just as likely to happen as what took place in Ethiopia and is happening to-day in China and in Spain.

As long as we claim and admit that we are part and parcel of the British empire, just so long have we a duty to perform by preparing to defend ourselves in such way that we become a useful and efficient part in empire defence. The defence of the empire does not depend on Great Britain alone. I admit that the greater part of the burden of defence falls upon the old motherland, but every part of the empire has its duty to perform. Every dominion, every possession, as well as the motherland must defend itself to the extent of its ability and according to its importance in the empire. Canada to-day is bound, for the sake of its own self-respect and in view of its future destiny as part of the empire, to spend the money that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) asks for in his estimates. As far as I am concerned I shall support those estimates quite freely.

In the speech from the throne reference was made to a defence purchasing board. This purchasing board was suggested by a recommendation in the recent inquiry. I am not at all surprised that the Prime Minister is thinking along that line. He has not forgotten how profiteering flourished during the last war, and the great abuses that took place in connection with the manufacture of munitions. While half a million men went overseas from Canada to assist the motherland when her existence was threatened, giving all they had, their lives, their homes and their property for the paltry pay of $1.10 a day, and such other amounts as officers got in addition, we had men at home profiteering, becoming millionaires through the manufacture of munitions. It is no wonder the Prime Minister has expressed himself as against such a thing happening again.

When he was approached by an hon. member of this house and asked whether there was anything against private institutions in Canada taking contracts for the manufacture of munitions for the motherland, he was careful to say that he did not see any objection to that so long as the government of Canada was not involved. That letter is on record in connection with the inquiry that recently took place. The Prime Minister followed that up; he was afraid that it might not be enough. He appointed a committee to make certain investigations and report to him. That led to the appointment of an interdepartmental committee to inquire into these matters. That interdepartmental committee was, I believe, composed wholly of men in the civil service. Some of them were of the highest rank, such as the under secretary of state for external affairs, than whom there is probably not a more efficient officer in the service; Doctor Clark, the deputy minister of finance, and the commissioner of income tax, a very clever officer, and others. They investigated this matter of munitions and particularly the contract, known as the Bren gun contract, that the Minister of National Defence told us in rather gleeful terms had saved Canada a prodigious amount of money.

The Minister of National Defence was advised during 1936 and early in 1937 by the chief of staff, General Ashton, on three or four different occasions during the year, of the necessity of the manufacture of armaments under the control of the government. It was recommended that we should establish factories or industries for the purpose of their manufacture. In 1935 the imperial government, after four or five years' tests of this Bren gun, finally decided to accept it, and made a contract with the patentee. What did they do? The imperial government saw to it that the contract contained a clause that it would enure to the benefit of all the dominions. Another clause of that agreement, no doubt inserted at the instance of the patentee, was that these guns should be made in a factory controlled and operated by the government.

All this information was before the defence department when these Bren gun negotiations began. To what extent was it regarded or followed? I criticize the defence department in that regard. With all the information before them they pursued their own course, and what did they do? On October 9, 1936, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) was in the city of Ottawa. He is a young, athletic, fine-looking chap, and one would imagine he should have a good memory. But he does not remember just whether he came to Ottawa in company with his friend Major Hahn or whether he met him here. I think it is pitiable that a young man who has been entrusted with the franchise of a responsible constituency in one of the largest cities of Canada should have to admit that his memory did not serve him any better than that. What was he in Ottawa for? Some of his answers would indicate that he was here on departmental business, and I believe that may be true. If it is true, he remembered that. At any rate he did remember that on October 9 he took Mr. Hahn to the deputy minister's office and introduced Major Hahn to the deputy minister. Major Hahn had been interested in this matter by the brother of the hon. member, a reputable lawyer in the city of Toronto, a scion of a distinguished family. Their father was a man who served his people well; who gave his family an education and whose family to-day are upholding the splendid reputation which he enjoyed. A brother of the hon. member, Herbert Plaxton, became interested in an old building, called by some an old boiler factory, but which I shall call by its proper name, the John Inglis factory in the western part of Toronto.

That was during the summer of 1936. At one time this factory was probably one of the best known in Toronto. John Inglis, the head of that firm, was a splendid man, with great business experience, who enjoyed an extremely good reputation. Unfortunately for Toronto, and probably for Canada as well, he came to the end of his earthly existence a few years ago and was succeeded by an able son, William Inglis, who in later years was known to many of us as either chairman or president of the Canadian National exhibition at Toronto. William Inglis was cut off in the prime of life and died just three or four years ago, and after his death the John Inglis factory became practically dormant. It was closed down in the early part of 1936; in other words, it was a dead industry. The Inglis money was no longer available for the purpose of carrying on that factory, and no other capitalists were interested in taking it over. The machinery and equipment were designed for the manufacture of heavy material such as boilers, turbines and so on, and in the days of its prosperity there was not a concern in Toronto that could touch the John Inglis Company in these lines. It was entrusted with some of the largest contracts given for equipment of this kind; but all that ended before or during 1936, and that was the industry which Major Hahn, through the instrumentality of Herbert Plaxton, was interested in buying.

During the course of this interview on October 9, 1936, the hon. member for Trinity believes he did tell the deputy minister something in regard to that plant. It is rather indefinite. They met in the office of the deputy minister, where there was set up one of the two Bren machine guns that had been bought by the dominion government in 1935. The hon. member for Trinity says he does not remember seeing the gun there at all. That is another wonderful exhibition of poor memory. Major Hahn does admit that he saw it, while the deputy minister says they both saw it and examined it, Major Hahn in particular. But he adds, "I don't think either one of them ever saw a Bren gun before." Major Hahn and his associates were represented as interested in buying, or as having bought, the John Inglis property, which was said to be capable of making munitions. That was the representation which was made, not only to the deputy minister but subsequently to the War Office in London.

Let us see what was the next step. Ten days later, on October 19, 1936, the Minister of National Defence was in his suite at the Chateau Laurier. Again the hon. member for Trinity and Mr. Hahn were in Ottawa, together with a gentleman named Cameron, head of the brokerage firm of Cameron, Pointon and Merritt of Toronto. The hon. member for Trinity had a conversation with the minister at that time, leading up to the introduction to the minister of Major Hahn and subsequently Mr. Cameron. Major Hahn was there for one purpose: to see what he could do, in his own interests and those of his group, toward negotiating a contract for something in the line of munitions. Would it not be reasonable to suppose that such a visit would impress itself upon the memory of the minister; that he would remember he had met these people at that time and discussed this possibility; that these men were introduced by the hon. member for Trinity, and that he had a conversation also with a Mr. Cameron in regard to some financing which might be necessary? But what does the minister say? He says that according to his memory the first time he ever met Major Hahn was on one occasion when he, the minister, had to go to Toronto to examine this John Inglis plant. That is his statement, according to the evidence. His memory also is frail. He further said in his evidence before Mr. Justice Davis—and I am quoting this subject to correction, because for the moment I am relying on my memory—that the first time he had met Major Hahn was when the contract was signed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; that is not correct.

Mr. ANDERSON: He admits that Major Hahn corrected his recollection in that regard. He still feels that whatever he said in the first instance was his memory of what had occurred, but he would have to give way to the credibility of a man who said something different. That was a gentlemanly thing for the Minister of National Defence to do in regard to Major Hahn. I want to say the same in regard to the minister as I have said in regard to the hon. member for Trinity. The minister is also a good Scot. He has a splendid war record; he is a good lawyer out in Vancouver; he is regarded as one of the best looking members in the house; yet his memory is most defective. We are being asked to depart from the regular procedure of parliament in asking for tenders from reputable contractors in connection with public contracts and to give them to a group of men, the members of which the minister says he did not know. In other words, he did not know who were associated with Major Hahn.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his time has elapsed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. ANDERSON: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and, through you, the members of the house for their indulgence. I shall not trespass too long upon the time of the house. It is strange that an hon. member should strongly recommend to the minister and to the deputy minister a group of men, the members of which he was not disposed to name apart from Major Hahn. As it turned out, in the first instance one member was a brother, and later on two brothers were in the combination. In the old days when I used to listen to political discussions in Ontario, we called that nepotism. I do not know what it is called to-day, but it is nothing but patronage being distributed to those who are related to one who happens to be a member of this house. I do not like it. I think it is objectionable. Of course the contract was not signed just at that time, but the negotiations continued.

I have outlined what took place on October 9 and October 19. On October 26, only seven days afterwards, we find the hon. member for Trinity, Major Hahn and Mr. Gordon Plaxton, a brother of the member, on the boat for England. They were following up things very closely. They did not give an opportunity to the minister or the department to inquire whether tenders could be received from other reputable concerns in the Dominion of Canada. These men reached England in the course of a few days and they endeavoured to interview members of the War Office with respect to a contract which they hoped to get, and which they since obtained. They kicked their heels around London for about ten days and were unable to obtain an interview. I suppose they took in the sights of Piccadilly, Hyde Park, Pall Mall, and probably a few other places. They became impatient after a while, and a telephone message was sent through to the minister asking for some assistance. That was worked through the Department of External Affairs, and that is how the Prime Minister becomes involved. He lent himself, consciously or unconsciously, to what was going on in the defence department. A letter was written and sent to the High Commissioner in London, the Hon. Mr. Massey. Through him it was handed on in the proper way to the War Office. In that letter Major Hahn was regarded as a representative of this government. I say that the Prime Minister as head of the Department of External Affairs should have been more careful. If he did not know of this; if the responsibility rested solely on Doctor Skelton, then I am sorry that Doctor Skelton, for whom I have the highest regard, has lent himself to this sort of thing.

Why was Major Hahn considered as the representative of this government in connection with contracts for munitions for Great Britain and Canada? This is monstrous. What about our industries in Canada? We hear a great deal of talk about unemployment and relief, but what efforts did they make to get something beneficial out of the money to be spent by the defence department for the manufacture of munitions? What did they do? They put this in the hands of Major Hahn and his associates, who were, unfortunately for the hon. member for Trinity, brothers of a member of this house.

Let me say a word about Major Hahn. He was a good Canadian and, while I am not sure, I believe he is a graduate of Toronto university. He went overseas, gave good service, and rose in rank. He came back to Canada with imperial rank. He was wounded; he served his country nobly and he is entitled to every credit in that regard. As a man I do not think anything can be said against him to-day, and certainly nothing could be said about him at that time. Upon his return he decided to study law. The law society of Ontario passed a regulation to permit men returning from the front who possessed the necessary qualifications and were desirous of studying law to complete their course in two years. They were to take the same number of lectures and examinations, but the lectures were to be almost continuous. The usual intervals between lectures were to be eliminated. Major Hahn took that course and became a lawyer. My son was one of those who took advantage of that regulation, and the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Factor) was another who took that course. Up to that point these men were all on a par.

Major Hahn became a lawyer, but he decided he would not continue in the practice of law. Industry had a claim on him. We will assume that the war closed in 1919 because many of the important officers did not get back until that year. In 1923, after he had been admitted to practice in Ontario, Major Hahn became interested in the establishment of a concern known as the De Forest Radio Corporation, which carried on business in the constituency represented by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey). That company carried on for seven years, and it was represented to the minister and to the War Office as being a successful business financially.

Seven years is not long in the existence or life of an industry. It was a large industry, but when the adverse winds of the depression struck it in 1930 it began losing money. It was under the administration and management of Major Hahn, and it lost money in 1931, 1932 and 1933. The reason was, he said, that competition was so great that he found it necessary to try to sell the business to one of his competitors, which was done. That was the Rogers Majestic, in Toronto, the operators of CFRB. It bought out the De Forest concern, and the major then dropped out of business. That was in 1934. Now what about that business? It went into the hands of a receiver immediately. The claims against the concern amounted to only $140,000, which was not a large amount for a financially successful concern in seven years, and yet when they came to distribute the assets, what was the result? The creditors got the munificent return of twenty cents on the dollar. Nevertheless that is the company which is represented to the minister, to the Department of National Defence and to the War Office in London, as being a successful one. Although it had not been running since 1936, it was represented to the War Office as immediately capable of turning out war material.

I do not want to trespass further, Mr. Speaker, on the indulgence that the house has been good enough to extend to me, but I should like in conclusion to say that the government of Canada should repudiate that contract. If it goes any further, the imperial authorities will feel that Canadians are not worthy of trust in matters so important as the manufacture and purchase of munitions.

I am not saying anything against the minister. He is one for whom I have had the greatest respect, but I do say that as a minister of the crown he has not exercised that caution, care, and regard for the welfare of Canada which he should have, and which the responsibility of his office demanded of him. I consider that the work of his deputy was positively reprehensible. I shall not apply that term to the minister. I shall give him some credit for having depended on his experts, as he said himself. But how far has he depended on his experts? It has been shown that he did not depend on them at all; that he did not know with whom he was dealing; that he did not ask tenders, as suggested by the interdepartmental committee, from such concerns as the Steel Company of Canada, the National Steel Car Company, the Dominion Bridge Company and other big companies in this dominion that are capable of carrying on this work, companies that have been in existence for generations and are to-day in a strong financial position and able to carry out government contracts with precision and accuracy, companies in which one can have absolute confidence. I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SLAGHT: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. ANDERSON: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman would submit it in writing, I should be glad to answer it. My reason for refusing to do so now is that I cannot hear him, and I do not want to make a silly answer.

Mr. SLAGHT: I think I must accept the latter part of that statement.

Mr. H. G. CLARKE (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, may I first refer briefly to the wonderful speeches that were made by the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Undoubtedly they were the best I have ever heard on such an occasion, more particularly that of the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier), who gave his address in both English and French and with a fluency that I thought could not be surpassed. But a few nights ago I listened to the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Heon) also delivering an address to the house in English and French, and to my amazement his effort equalled, if not excelled, that of the hon. member for Stormont in its fluency in both languages.

I should also like to compliment the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the good judgment he showed in the selection of his two new cabinet ministers a few days ago. I believe these appointments are very popular indeed, particularly that of the new Postmaster General, the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. McLarty). I have known him for a long time. I know his genial nature, and how pleasant it is to be in his company. I know how able he has shown himself in getting things done; and in his appointement to the office of Postmaster General the Prime Minister made a wonderful selection.

Turning now to the speech from the throne, after listening to so many able speeches since parliament convened on January 12 last, I think there is little more to be said, but I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without expressing the gratification and the happiness that my constituents in Rosedale riding, Toronto, feel at the forthcoming visit of Their Majesties the King and Queen. Toronto is, I believe, one of the most beautiful cities in the whole world. In population it is the second largest city in this dominion. I have visited many cities in Canada, the United States, Europe, Asia and Africa, and I have always felt on my return to Toronto that not a city I had visited could compare with it at all. I have spoken of the happiness my constituents feel at having their majesties visit the city of Toronto for a short time this spring. But there is always the bitter to be taken with the sweet. Loyal subjects of the king and queen residing in Toronto are looking for an opportunity to greet their majesties, and what do we find? We find that this great city is imposed upon by being granted only the short period of eight hours for their majesties' visit. I do not know where the blame should be placed, or whether it is just another Liberal government error and the public must suffer for it.

I should like to allude briefly to a matter arising from the news received in Ottawa on Monday morning of the resignation by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett of his seat in the House of Commons. For many years he occupied a seat in this house as private member, as cabinet minister, as Prime Minister, and, for the last three years, as leader of the king's loyal opposition, the position he resigned last year. I shall not try to eulogize the many merits of so fine a gentleman and statesman, but I cannot let this opportunity go by without acknowledging his sterling qualities. I have often heard it said that a man is not appreciated until he is dead; but so far as the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett is concerned, he is very much appreciated while alive, and I believe that his name will go down in history as an outstanding statesman and gentleman and a great Canadian Prime Minister.

May I say a few words also with reference to the present leader of the king's loyal opposition in the house (Mr. Manion). I have been in this chamber during the sessions of this eighteenth parliament. During that time I have endeavoured to do my best, and I believe the same is true of every other Conservative member. Our numbers are not very great, and each of us has had to put his shoulder to the wheel; but may I say that since the present leader of the opposition, with his charming disposition, his wonderful personality, his gifts of magnetism and leadership, his power to engage the co-operation of all members of his party, has held his present position, I have never seen such enthusiasm as exists to-day among all our members.

We have seen terrible happenings in Toronto during the past week. Nothing of the kind has occurred before in that city. It is a direct reflection on the inactivity of the present government in connection with unemployment, especially among the youth of our country. I refer to the arrest of a number of young unemployed single men. A few weeks ago, on the orders of the day, I spoke on their behalf to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), and what has happened since makes me wonder where we are going under the administration of this do-nothing government, which leaves our youth to suffer under the appalling burden of unemployment. There is one period in a man's life which either makes or breaks him—the period between seventeen and twenty-one. During that time a young man is moulding his future, and if he is allowed to go about in idleness there is a great possibility that he may do something which will injure him for the rest of his life. May I again urge that the government take immediate action to eliminate, as far as possible, this trouble and not spoil the lives of thousands of fine young Canadians who, if they are given a chance, provided with some useful employment, and not allowed through idleness to fall by the wayside, may be occupying to-morrow the seats which we hold to-day.

I desire to make a brief reference to the recent trade treaty. To my mind, when the government enters upon treaty making with the United States it is going into pretty capable company, engaging with pretty clever people, people who generally make treaties for the United States and do not worry about the interests of any country other than their own. I do not intend to labour this matter, but I am concerned when I see the quotas which are being put upon exports of our goods to the United States. Imports to Canada from the United States are mostly manufactured lines, and all the restraint that appears to have been placed by way of quota or any other deterrent upon their goods is the dumping clause. That seems to be the only thing we have done to hinder manufactured goods from being brought into Canada from the United States and taking away the employment of our workers in various lines of industrial production. Last fall, when I made several hundred calls in my riding, I discovered that in the industrial sections more men would be laid off because of this new trade treaty and the removal of the three per cent excise tax.

May I suggest to the government that as soon as possible they take action to abolish this burdensome sales tax of eight per cent which is a direct charge on all the citizens of this dominion. I have been waiting to hear that some legislation in regard to this matter will be introduced in the near future. It is very likely there will be an election before long and the government have made some reductions in the sales tax, but I think they should go further and assist the overburdened taxpayer by removing the tax altogether. In this connection I might quote from a letter, dated January 30, 1939, which I have received from the sales tax repeal association of Bay street, Toronto. It is a long letter and I shall read only a part of it. In reference to the eight per cent sales tax it says:

> Not content with charging interest on overdue sales tax, the delinquent is liable for double the tax due, a fine in addition, and imprisonment, and no judge is allowed any discretion in the matter.
> Can you imagine any more outrageous treatment of small dealers and struggling concerns than such penalties? These men are not crooks but good citizens, yet they are really treated as worse than criminals.

I shall not go any further in that connection. There is one thing I would mention, however, with regard to the relief problem. This has been a great problem to every municipality throughout the country. Organizations have been set up in every town and city to urge upon the government that they take over all, or at least a part of the relief burden, but so far only a small concession has been made, and most of the burden remains on the municipalities. If the government would remove this tax upon the municipalities, this would solve the housing problem and give employment to thousands of workers, and in a very short time we would return to prosperity. I do not think there is any doubt about that. Both the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) have endeavoured to put many schemes into effect, but they have been only partly successful. I suggest that from the standpoint of the private citizen and the businessman, it would be a sound principle to remove the heavy relief tax on properties and buildings. If that were done, building work would be proceeded with and there would be no question of unemployment.

One matter I cannot allow to pass without some comment is the radio tax. I protested last year against the increase in the fee from $2 to $2.50 per set, and where a man has more than one set he has to pay more. I was successful in having the minister agree that where an indigent person on relief had a radio it should not be necessary for that person to buy a licence in order to use his radio. That was only proper and I was pleased that the minister granted the request.

Another subject which I brought up was the freedom with which inspectors could enter private houses. On that point I received support from many hon. members. After all, no matter how small it is, a private house is a man's castle and he should not be bothered by having people running in and out of his home without proper authority. On that occasion I suggested to the minister that there should be an order from a supreme court judge, because I thought that would have a deterrent effect on inspectors. In this respect the minister did not fulfil his promise. When he brought in his bill I was sorry to see that he had omitted that part of it. I shall not go any further now on the radio question; I shall discuss that later when the estimates are under consideration.

I have tried to be as brief as possible. In my opinion the forty minute rule was adopted for speakers who have some special subject to explain—cabinet ministers and the like—and I am sure that the session could be considerably shortened if hon. members would be brief and not exceed the forty minutes. If hon. members would curtail their remarks as far as they reasonably could, there would be a saving of many thousands of dollars to the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Clarke) and other members representing urban ridings in Ontario have expressed great concern over the disastrous results to industry from the 1935 United States-Canada trade agreement, and their apprehension of the impending results, equally disastrous, that will flow from the three-way agreement that has recently been consummated. I have some figures which will possibly put their minds at rest on that score. If they turn up the record of industrial building during the period of the Bennett administration and then look at the record of what has happened since in such building, I think hon. gentlemen who sit across from me will have their minds put at rest in regard to the effect of the trade agreement on industry. During the ten year period ending in 1930 Ontario industries expended an annual average of a little more than $15,000,000 on capital outlays for factories, warehouses and the like. Then during the five year period of the Bennett administration what do we find? We find that in 1931 industry was so confident upon the coming into power of the Bennett administration that it cut its expenditures on factory buildings in half. In that year industry expended $6,836,000 on capital outlay. In 1932 we reached an all-time low, less than $2,000,000, the figure for that year being $1,871,000. In 1933 there was some recovery; $4,700,000 was expended. In 1934 we slipped again, down to $4,306,000. In 1935 we slipped further, to $3,645,000. For the five years the total spent in Ontario on factory and industrial construction was $21,358,000, or a yearly average of $4,271,600.

After the Liberal administration came into office in October, 1935, and negotiated the United States trade pact of 1935 which came into force on January 1, 1936, what happened? We all know that capitalists spend money in expanding their factories only when their business is expanding and when they have confidence in the future. In 1937 Ontario industries were so impoverished by the trade agreement and their owners so alarmed that in that year they actually increased their factory construction expenditures to over four times the 1931-35 average, or an amount greater than was spent in any year during the Bennett administration. In 1937 Ontario industrialists spent $17,933,000 in factory construction work. We not only equalled the average annual construction for the ten-year period from 1921 to 1930, but exceeded that average by over $2,000,000. This voluntary response by Ontario industry, in my opinion, answers once and for all the Tory charge that the United States trade agreement was harmful to industry in Canada. I suggest that it also accounts for the fact that the new Great Britain-United States-Canada trade agreement has met with practically no criticism by industry. But one thing left unexplained is the loud and continuous complaint by Conservative members with respect to the treaty. The reason for this I quite confidently leave to the good judgment of the electors.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 2, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

CENTRAL FINANCE CORPORATION

REFERENCE OF PRIVATE BILL TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City) moved:

That the private bill intituled "An act respecting the Central Finance Corporation, and to change its name to the Household Finance Corporation of Canada," filed with the clerk of the house on January 19, based on the petition read and received by the house on January 26, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for a report on the filing of said petition and the deposit of the said bill and for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable.

Motion agreed to.

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT

MOTION FOR REFERENCE TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE—PRECEDENCE OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, as I have given the required notice under the rules of the house, I now desire to move, seconded by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas):

That the public accounts and the report of the auditor general for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1938, together with a copy of the agreement between the government and the John Inglis Company of Toronto for the manufacture of Bren machine guns, the report of the royal commission dealing with said agreement and all related documents, evidence, vouchers and exhibits, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

I have already stated my reason for moving this reference to the public accounts committee, and I do not intend now to deal with the matter at any considerable length. I wish merely to refer to the remarks of Commissioner Mr. Justice Davis—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish in any way to interrupt my hon. friend in presenting his motion, but if he is about to debate the motion I am afraid that the resolution of this house, which has been concurred in, with respect to the debate on the address, would preclude such debate at the moment. The house has already agreed:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of bills, until disposed of.

[Mr. Cleaver.]

If my hon. friend is simply making a motion to refer the two documents he has mentioned to the committee on public accounts, that would be a routine motion and I think it might be permitted to pass; but if he is wishing to debate the subject at the present time I am afraid that he would be out of order, until after the completion of the debate on the address.

Mr. MacNEIL: I agree with the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. STEWART: No.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Just a minute, Mr. Speaker. On the point of order, I wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that according to standing order 38 "the following motions are debatable," and it includes a motion—

(k) For reference to a committee of a report or any return laid on the table of the house.

So that this motion is debatable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes.

Mr. MANION: I object to its passing without debate. If it is to be carried, Mr. Speaker, it will be carried after debate, not before.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is quite right in saying that the motion is debatable, and that is the reason I interrupted the hon. member to draw to his attention the fact that he could not debate it, according to the resolution which the house has already passed, until we have disposed of the debate on the address. If he wishes to make a formal motion the house can debate the motion, or decline to, as it wishes: the documents are on the table and they can be referred to the committee at once.

Mr. MANION: It is not a case of accepting or declining the motion. The question is whether the motion shall or shall not go through without debate. My submission is that this is such an important question that the place to discuss it is not behind closed doors in a packed committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: I do not use that expression offensively. I withdraw the statement; I did not mean that. What I was thinking of was a committee which is four or five against one on this side of the house, and that is not the place to discuss a matter of this kind. The place to discuss it is in the house. As far as this motion is concerned I have no objection to its ultimately being adopted, but only after it is debated in the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is quite within his rights if he wishes to take objection to the motion being put at the present time, and the government is quite prepared to meet him in that regard; but it will have to stand, then, until another day.

Mr. STEWART: Assuming the motion were passed and the report were referred to the public accounts committee, would that prevent discussion of the subject matter of the report in this house on other occasions—on estimates, and going into supply?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is an old parliamentarian; I should think he may have referred to the rule even before I did. He knows very well that when a matter is referred to and is being considered by the committee, that precludes discussion on it by the house until the committee has reported.

Motion stands.

ASSESSMENT UPON OWNERS OF OBSTRUCTIONS TO ASCENT OR DESCENT OF FISH IN STREAMS

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 15, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MICHAUD: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend paragraph (b) of section 57 of the Fisheries Act. It is a minor amendment. As the section now reads, it has been assumed in some quarters to mean something different from what apparently was intended when it was passed by parliament. The purpose of the bill is to make the meaning of the section clear to all concerned.

Section 57(b) provides for the payment of compensation by people who build or place in rivers obstructions which prevent the fish from ascending or descending. I am told that when the law was enacted it was intended that an annual sum should be paid by these people. To-day they claim that they can comply with the provision of the act by paying a lump sum, and the purpose of the act is to correct this interpretation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FOREIGN POLICY

DECLARATION OF THE STATUS OF CANADA IN TIME OF WAR

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 16, respecting the status of Canada in time of war.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to make clear and declare to the other nations of the world the status of Canada in the event of war.

The bill consists of only one section, which declares that:

> Canada shall not assume the status of belligerent otherwise than by a declaration of war made by his majesty with specific reference to Canada and only on the advice of his majesty's government in Canada.

The declaration contained in the bill rests upon the constitutional basis that Canada is a sovereign nation in personal union with the other nations that make up what is termed the British commonwealth of nations, all owing allegiance to his majesty. Canada has complete autonomy over every aspect of her affairs, whether internal or external. This autonomy extends to the declaration of war. The bill defines the only manner in which a declaration of war can place Canada in a state of belligerency, namely if a declaration is made by his majesty with specific reference to Canada and on the advice of his majesty's government in Canada. It is the opinion of a good many Canadians that this declaration of status should be made now, in a time of peace, so that it may be known to the rest of the world. The bill is an assertion of the right on the part of Canada to decide whether Canada is at war or not.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISHING INDUSTRY

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT TO DISCUSS MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE—LOSS OF LOBSTER TRAPS AND EQUIPMENT ON WESTERN COAST OF NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance. The matter is—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not think that at this stage of the proceedings the hon. member is entitled to ask to move the adjournment of the house. The motion should have been made under the head of routine proceedings.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Speaker, standing order 31 says:

> Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order 15) has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

This is before the orders of the day are entered upon. The matter that I desire to bring before the house—although not until I have obtained leave in the parliamentary way—is the dire distress of the lobster fishermen in the constituencies of Halifax from Cole Harbour to Hubbards, which is adjacent to eastern Lunenburg county line, in Queens-Lunenburg, and Shelburne-Yarmouth and southeastern Digby.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It does not seem that there is any regular order of the day. There is a special order of which the subject matter is the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The house having already entered upon the consideration of its business, the hon. member is not in order in bringing up the question at this stage.

Mr. FINN: Will his honour the Speaker tell me when it should be brought up?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should make the motion on the opening of the house, under routine proceedings.

Mr. FINN: The acoustic properties of the house will have to be improved. We cannot hear.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED PREPARATIONS ON COOPERATIVE BASIS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to read a brief news dispatch and on it base a question to the Prime Minister. In the Vancouver Sun of January 28 there is a dispatch from Washington, D.C., the opening sentence of which I will read:

> Quietly, without need of treaty or negotiation, the United States and Canada are preparing to defend this continent from invasion, on a joint, cooperative basis, the armies and navies of both working together by definite plan.

I am not asking the question by way of adverse criticism, but I should like to know whether this statement is correct and whether there are any commitments involved.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A question of such importance as the one which the hon. member has asked is one that I should not like to answer offhand. I should like to see the statement and read it carefully. I gather, however, that the purport of the question is this: Are there any commitments on the part of the present government with the government of the United States in respect of the defence of the Pacific coast. If that is the question I answer that there are no commitments that I am aware of, and I think I should be aware of any if there were.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There was the other prior question which I asked as to whether it was correct that there is an arrangement to defend this continent from invasion, involving joint cooperative action, or to what extent the statement is correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should think that an arrangement would be in the nature of a commitment and, I repeat, there is no commitment. I have not the least doubt that there has been an exchange of information between the authorities in the United States and the authorities in Canada with respect to matters of common concern; in any event, that would be most desirable; but beyond exchange of information on matters of common concern I think I can assure my hon. friend that there has been nothing that could have the semblance of a commitment of any kind.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT AND OTHER BUSINESS FOLLOWING ADDRESS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Some days ago, just after the beginning of the debate on the address, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a question with reference to the business that would be taken up following the close of this discussion, and he mentioned that in all probability the trade treaty would come up for consideration. So far as one knows now, the vote in the present debate will be taken either this afternoon or this evening. Has the Prime Minister made any change in his plans? If not, will he tell us whether we shall proceed to-morrow with the trade treaty in the event of the debate concluding to-day?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If I remember rightly, when I replied to my hon. friend's question on the previous occasion I intimated that if we concluded the debate towards the end of a week we would not in that week go on with the trade agreement. I might take advantage of this opportunity to mention that, to-morrow being a government day, the government would like, if possible, to proceed with such business as appears under the head of government business, and to that end I intend later to ask the permission of the house to proceed to the order for government notices of motion in order to advance three or four resolutions. I had intended asking the house for permission to have the resolutions advanced a stage to-day so that to-morrow they might appear on the order paper under government orders. The resolutions will be found at page 34 of to-day's order paper. I would also ask my hon. friend —I do not suggest that he give me a reply at the moment; I simply mention the matter now so that he may have time to think it over—whether we might also have permission to go into committee of supply on the estimates of some department should the other business be summarily concluded. In that event we should like to take the estimates of the department of national revenue or those of agriculture.

Mr. MANION: I am afraid my right hon. friend is developing a rather subtle sense of humour; we are not likely to get into supply to-morrow. May I ask him which of these government notices he proposes to go on with? He need not tell me now, but perhaps he will this evening.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We propose to take up the second resolution, which requests that the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan the sum mentioned in the resolution. That is one. Another is the bill respecting the Ottawa corporation agreement. The Minister of Justice has a bill with respect to penitentiaries. It is the resolutions with respect to these three which the government have in mind.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is only a resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is simply a resolution. What we wish to do is to inform the house that His Excellency the Governor-General has been advised of these resolutions.

Mr. MANION: I merely wanted to know what the government's intentions were. I do not want to cause any trouble in the house; I like to help everything along.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. E. Matthews for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Manion, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): I wish to direct attention to one way in which every hon. member may make a personal contribution to the solution of the problem of unemployment, but before proceeding I concur heartily in all the complimentary remarks that have been made with reference to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address, to the new leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Manion), and to the two new cabinet ministers. May I be permitted also to say how pleased my constituents were to learn of the restoration to health of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). We hope that he will long enjoy good health so that he may be able to carry the very onerous responsibilities of his office.

At this time I should like to join with other Canadians in expressing our delight at the proposed visit of the king and queen to Canada this year. I do not know of any king and queen in the past who have so captivated the hearts of Canadians as have their majesties. Perhaps it is because, through the use of the radio, we were all permitted to share in the coronation ceremonies. Perhaps it is because of their wholesome family life, of which we are all so proud. Perhaps it is for both reasons.

We have listened to many fine speeches in this debate. Many of them will read particularly well in the ridings for which they were intended. It would almost seem as if a general election is in the offing. Let me say at once that I hope the people of Canada will not be subjected to the upset and turmoil of a general election until we have had an opportunity to weigh by actual experience the value of the new three-way trade agreement. I do not know of any safer way of arriving at a correct conclusion with respect to any subject than by actual performance. Actual performance is very much safer than prophecy, especially where the prophecy has a political tinge.

Every member of this house who has spoken in the debate has commented upon the serious problem of unemployment. I wish to offer a suggestion whereby I believe every member can make a direct contribution in his own riding toward the solution of the problem. I refer to the employment of men by house builders. This government cannot claim all the credit for the present national housing act, because in 1935 the then Bennett administration realized that the construction trades were lagging far behind the general recovery which was just commencing to be felt in this country, and a special committee on housing was set up. We are indebted to that committee for some very valuable findings of fact:

1. At that time over $60,000,000 annually was being spent to maintain the building trades in idleness. Over sixty per cent of our then unemployed were dependent upon the building trades for employment.

2. We had a shortage at that time in Canada of over 55,000 houses. That shortage has since grown to over 80,000.

The records of the bureau of statistics as to house building confirm these figures. I take first a long ten-year period in order to determine if possible the normal annual house-building needs of Canada. I have actual figures of the yearly construction of houses during the period from 1921 to 1930, and I ask leave to put these figures on the record without taking the time of the house to read them.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member can do so only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. CLEAVER:

House Construction in Canada
1921-1930 Inclusive

1921	$ 76,655,000
1922	104,202,000
1923	97,645,000
1924	91,225,000
1925	96,490,000
1926	109,562,000
1927	124,940,000
1928	139,166,000
1929	128,901,000
1930	93,292,000
Total	$1,062,078,000

From these figures it will be seen that the yearly average of house-building during this period was $106,207,800. These figures I submit establish conclusively the fact that our normal quota of house-building in order to keep up with our normal demands should be rather better than $100,000,000 worth annually.

Coming to the period of the depression and succeeding years we have the following figures for 1931 to 1938:

1932	28,893,000
1933	23,930,000
1934	30,588,000
1935	36,409,000
1936	42,858,000
1937	56,207,000
1938	55,025,000
Total	$355,594,000

Yearly average, $44,449,000.

It is therefore perfectly obvious that during the last eight years we have been building less than half our normal housing requirements.

[Mr. Cleaver.]

The present house shortage is not as apparent as it would be under normal conditions, on account of unemployed people being forced to live under very crowded conditions. At the time this special committee sat to investigate the housing problem we had over 11,000 people living in one room per family. Just imagine, one room per family to live in, eat in and sleep in. Other thousands of our people were doubled up two and three families in a house. Figures as to this condition for all Canada are not available, but the city of Toronto took a census, and in that city alone it was found that over 8,500 families were living two and three families to a house. People do not voluntarily live under such conditions and just as soon as men regain employment they will demand homes of their own, and we shall not have the houses for them.

I need not draw attention to the fact that such crowded living conditions are not conducive to good health, nor are they conducive to good citizenship.

Turning again to the report of the committee we find figures as to infant mortality. For 1933 the infant mortality rate for the entire city of Toronto was 6·34 per cent of the births occurring there in that year. In comparison with that figure take one of the crowded areas of the city, the Moss Park division of ward 2, where the infant mortality rate was double the rate for the entire city. And this high mortality rate caused by overcrowding is not confined to infants; it applies to adults as well. Figures for Canada apparently were not available, but the committee in its report gave the figures for the city of Glasgow. In Glasgow where families were living under crowded conditions, one family to a room, the death rate was 2·59 per cent, whereas when families were living under normal conditions for that city of four rooms to a family the rate was only 1·08 per cent, or less than half. I shall not weary the house with crime figures, other than to say that in the crowded areas the crime percentages are simply appalling, over the entire field of crime, from murder down to juvenile delinquency.

Now when we required the houses and when we were spending $60,000,000 annually to maintain the building trades in idleness it seemed to me nothing short of sheer folly to do nothing about it. In 1936 I felt that something should be done, that we should at least spend some of the $60,000,000, that we were spending to maintain builders in idleness, to stimulate the building industry and put the men to work. I so intimated in 1936, but received very little support at Ottawa. So I went back to Burlington, my home town, and discussed the matter with our municipal council. Burlington is at the head of lake Ontario, and has about 3,500 inhabitants. Burlington decided to try a modest scheme of bonusing house building. Like every urban municipality in Canada Burlington had hundreds of vacant lots to which the municipality had obtained title through tax sales. Some of the lots had been worth $600 to $800 each in normal times, but we decided to give them away for $50 to anyone who would build a house of specified value within one year. As a result of this plan nineteen new houses were built in Burlington in 1937. During the preceding six years only four houses had been built in the town, an average of less than one a year. Hon. members can thus see what we were able to do by just a little bit of stimulus or bonus to the house building trade.

Eighty per cent of the cost of every house of moderate price is labour, direct or indirect. This figure was definitely ascertained and reported on by the committee in its 1935 report. The direct labour is that employed where the house is built; the indirect labour is that employed in the manufacture and fabrication of building materials to the point where they can be used in construction. I refer to the labour employed in the manufacture of bricks, lumber, flooring, sash and doors, trim, plaster, hardware, plumbing supplies and the like. Hon. members will see that this little experiment of ours meant $72,000 worth of new payroll expended somewhere in Canada. Or, expressed in human terms, we put ninety men to work in profitable employment at $800 a year, and I take that figure because that is the average sum paid to wage earners employed in the building trades, according to the bureau of statistics.

Let us look now at the tax results in Burlington. We not only took men off the relief rolls and consequently reduced our relief expenditures, making a saving to the taxpayers in that regard, but in addition Burlington is receiving every year about $2,499 in new tax money from the houses which were built in 1937. It is true that we had to write off between four and five thousand dollars of tax arrears on the vacant lots which we gave away in 1937 but who will say it was not good business? And this reduction in taxation, this improvement in conditions in a municipality, leads to still further building. In 1938 we went further still; in our little town we had twenty-four new houses built, and right now, in midwinter, there are six houses under construction, with twelve further sales completed ready for construction to commence in the spring.

I have given our experience in Burlington to show what can be done, and now I should like to discuss the matter from a national standpoint. If we could increase house building in Canada even to our normal requirements, without overtaking any of the eighty thousand houses we are behind, it would mean an annual increase of $50,000,000 a year. Expressed in wage rolls it would mean an annual increase of $40,000,000, and expressed in human terms it would mean fifty thousand men taken off relief and put to profitable employment at $800 a year. I should like to place on record also at this time the all-inclusive figures of the construction trade. Up to this moment I have been dealing simply with housing construction. Taking the same ten year period from 1921 to 1930, the figures are as follows:

1922	331,843,000
1923	314,254,000
1924	276,261,000
1925	297,973,000
1926	372,948,000
1927	418,952,000
1928	472,033,000
1929	576,652,000
1930	457,000,000
Total	$3,758,049,000

The yearly all-over average on construction work in Canada during that period was $375,804,000. Again taking the eight year period of the depression and the years following, that is, from 1931 to 1938, the figures are as follows:

1931	$ 315,482,000
1933	97,290,000
1934	125,812,000
1935	160,305,000
1936	162,588,000
1937	224,057,000
1938	188,277,000

During that period the yearly average was only $175,835,000. In other words from these figures it is clear that over the whole construction field we are down about two billion dollars annually. If all the construction trades could be brought back simply to normal, without catching up on the slack at all, we would add 125,000 men to our employment lists and would take that many men off the relief rolls. That figure is made up in this way: $50,000,000 worth of additional house building, with an eighty per cent labour content, would mean 50,000 men put to work. Then $150,000,000 of additional industrial, business and engineering construction work, with a forty per cent labour content, would put 75,000 men to work, or a grand total of 125,000 men.

This government has gone perhaps as far as it should at present to stimulate personal endeavour in industry. (1) The government has taken off the eight per cent sales tax on all building material. (2) It has granted a tax subsidy with respect to all new homes costing $4,000 or less, built in municipalities which have qualified under part 3 of the act by making $50 lots available to builders in reasonable quantities. (3) It has made loans available in almost all communities, to all credit-worthy people who wish to build. (4) It has made two per cent money available as an indirect attack on our slum problem. The rest, Mr. Speaker, I submit is up to us, and just to show how badly we private members of this house have fallen down in our part of the responsibility I want to give the figures of the municipalities which have qualified for the tax subsidy under part 3 of the act. That legislation has been in force now for seven months. Yesterday I received from the Department of Finance a letter in which the figures as to the municipalities which have qualified to date for this tax subsidy were given as follows:

New Brunswick	1
Quebec	0
Ontario	12
Manitoba	4
Saskatchewan	5
British Columbia	2

In other words we have a grand total of 33 municipalities out of 4,346 municipalities in Canada. I submit that this constitutes a direct challenge to every member of this house to take off his coat and go to work. It is time, I suggest, that we stop criticizing the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) for what he has done or has not done, and assume some of the responsibility ourselves. In my riding I have found that better results can be obtained when politics are removed and when prominent Conservatives join with prominent Liberals in these meetings. Councillor Rennie of Burlington, who is president of the Conservative association, deserves a great deal of the credit for what we have been able to do in that town, and I am glad to take this opportunity of acknowledging that fact. He has also gone with me to address meetings throughout the riding in connection with the housing question. My good friend the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) is joining me at Georgetown at a meeting soon to be held there in order to discuss this matter, and I in turn am quite prepared to go with him to any part of his riding for the same purpose. If the members of this house could only become sufficiently interested to pull their weight in connection with this problem, what a refreshing thing it would be!

I am firmly convinced that one of the strongest forces retarding recovery in Canada to-day is fear. If all hon. members of this house would call a political truce in discussing our problem of unemployment—

Miss MACPHAIL: And every other problem.

Mr. CLEAVER: I agree—and present a united front to combat unemployment, I believe that very substantial and very lasting results could be obtained. So far as I am personally concerned I am quite willing that the Conservative party or any other party should have all the credit for curing unemployment in this country as long as all our people are put to work. I do not know of any sadder thing in human experience than to see a father of young children denied the right to earn for himself and his family an honest living through his toil. In my opinion present living conditions in Canada are a challenge to our Christian civilization. Are hon. members going to accept that challenge and do their part to help, or are they going to content themselves with simply criticizing those who are trying to do their best?

Hon. J. EARL LAWSON (York South): Mr. Speaker, in speaking the other night on the order before the house the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) referred to the triplet of defeated candidates for the Conservative leadership who were sitting in support of the new leader of the official opposition. I desire to take this opportunity to assure the hon. member for Brant that he will find those triplets not merely sitting in support of the new leader of the official opposition, but loyally and actively supporting his cause, particularly because he has those very human qualities of friendship and understanding which endear him to all members of the National Conservative party which he has the honour to lead.

With respect to the leader of the opposition may I heartily endorse what has been said in the house by the other two of the triplets. I suggest to the hon. member for Brant that in his observations he missed something; he failed to observe that there were five candidates for the leadership of the National Conservative party. Now that the hon. member who has the honour to lead the party has been chosen, he is attracting to the National Conservative party more votes than the famous quintuplets are attracting tourists to Callander. If any further evidence were required as to the forward march of the National Conservative party I would quote from the writings in 1927 of a Liberal member of the house. The article was written on the eve of the Conservative convention held in Winnipeg in 1927. After the hon. member had outlined the causes as he saw them for the former defeat of the Conservative party, he then proceeded as follows:

> Now, as I have outlined the causes of defeat of Toryism wherein lies the remedy? Soft words butter no parsnips. More people perish from fear of the scalpel than from septicaemia. The remedy must be heroic. Toryism cannot play both ends against the middle and win. The way to tolerance is the road to understanding. Wisdom must come to Toryism before the people think of giving it power. It should prove its fate by selecting as its leader one from the province of Quebec, a Canadian of French origin, and a Roman Catholic in religion.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the new leader of the National Conservative party has nearly all those qualifications. And who, do you think, was the hon. member of the house who uttered those prophetic words?—none other than the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Deachman). So for once in my life I find myself in agreement with the hon. member in that the Conservative party is on the road to power following the next election.

I was indeed disappointed when I listened to the speech from the throne, because I fully anticipated that in view of the developments last year before the special committee of the house on radio, and in view of the public outcry there has been against the administration of radio and the functioning of the bureaucracy of the broadcasting corporation, the government in the meantime would have devised and proposed some measure to deal with the situation.

By reason of temporary illness I was not present in the house when the discussion with respect to prohibiting Mr. McCullagh from expressing his views over the air with respect to national problems was at its height. On this occasion I have no intention of repeating any of the arguments so ably made on that occasion by other hon. members. I could not however but be impressed by the absurdity of the position taken by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the government in defence of the bureaucratic and undemocratic attitude in respect of the administration of radio. I for one will not allow the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to create a false impression in the country through the resounding declaration he made in the house that the government proposes to give the people's representatives in parliament an opportunity to deal with the situation. In reply to some speeches which had been made the Prime Minister said a committee of the house would be set up to consider the subject matter, and he went on to say:

> Every opportunity will be given hon. gentlemen opposite to name their members on that committee.

What a concession! Was there ever a time in the history of this supposedly democratic institution of parliament when the respective parties in the house were not given the opportunity of naming members who should represent them on any committee of the house? The Prime Minister went on further:

> An opportunity will be given to the committee to call the general manager, the governors and any others connected with the corporation, and they may go very fully into all the rules and regulations which have been drawn up.

What a privilege is being granted by the Prime Minister! Think of the absurdity of setting up a committee of the house to inquire into the action of a government-created body, and to be allowed no evidence and no witnesses except those who compose the very body with respect to which the inquiry is being held. At least in the words of the declaration of the Prime Minister this session as spokesman for the government he has been more frank with hon. members and the people of the country than he was last session when a similar committee was set up. At least on this occasion by his words he lets us know in advance that the committee is to be a glorified whitewash brush for the purpose of whitewashing the administration of the radio corporation and the government. To accomplish that purpose last session it was necessary to rely upon his Liberal supporters in the house who were members of the radio committee to do the whitewashing job. I propose to take a few minutes to demonstrate what was done at the last session.

On February 7, 1938, it was ordered by the house that the select committee on radio broadcasting appointed to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records. I ask you to note the lack of limitation so far as the order of the house was concerned as to what persons, papers and records might be sent for. On the face of it the committee had wide power to send for persons, papers and records. Now let us see what happened.

The very first witness called before the committee was Mr. Brockington, K.C., chairman of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. He proceeded in his evidence with a sticky laudation of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) and of the present government, and then he purported to read what he alleged to be an excerpt from the minutes of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which excerpt declared, in part, the intention and the policy of the government with respect to radio.

After Mr. Brockington had finished his evidence I asked that the minutes of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation be filed with the committee and be available to its members. Who do you think was the first hon. member of this house to object to our having access to the minutes? The Minister of Transport himself. To permit a witness to read an excerpt from a document and not allow the inquiring tribunal to have access to that document is so offensive to every principle of British justice that I insisted that the committee be put on record in connection therewith, and so I moved, seconded by my colleague from Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber):

That the minutes of the meetings of the board of governors be filed by the governors with the clerk of the committee for the information of the members of the committee and be made available to members of the committee.

That motion was defeated by a vote of nine to two. Let me read to you, Mr. Speaker, the names of the hon. members of this house who voted against that motion and made it impossible for the committee to have access to the minutes of the broadcasting corporation. They were the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Ahearn), a Liberal member supporting the government in this house; the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Bertrand), a Liberal member supporting the government in this house; the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis), a Liberal member supporting the government in this house; the hon. member for Spadina, a riding in the city of Toronto (Mr. Factor), a Liberal member supporting the government in this house; the hon. member for Algoma West (Mr. Hamilton), a Liberal member supporting the government in this house; the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Howe)—the hon. Minister of Transport, the responsible minister of the crown; the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston); the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. MacKenzie), a Liberal member supporting the government in this house; and last but not least the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon), officially the assistant whip of the Liberal party in the House of Commons.

Those who voted in favour of the motion were my colleague, the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber), a Conservative member, and I.

[Mr. Lawson.]

Again I call attention to the fact that the order of this house gave power to the committee to send for papers and records.

Mr. FACTOR: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. LAWSON: Yes.

Mr. FACTOR: Did not the order of reference limit us to investigating financial and other operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Mr. LAWSON: I shall deal with that at some later stage. I should like to do it now but my time is limited. While the question is on my mind, let me say to my hon. friend that there was nothing more important before that committee than the finances of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, because it was proposed to increase the licence fees payable by the people of this country from $2 to $2.50, and to make them pay a separate licence for each radio set.

The order of reference gave us the widest power to call for persons, papers and records. I ask, how could evidence be obtained as to whether or not the radio fees should be increased against the taxpayers if no evidence was allowed except that of those who are in the pay of the broadcasting corporation?

But the matter did not end there. After the committee had listened at every sitting to the board of governors of the broadcasting corporation, to the general manager, the program director, and all those who were most interested in supporting the very system and the very administration which the committee was appointed to investigate, the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien), a Liberal member supporting the government in this house, proposed to close off the inquiry and to draw up a report. I pointed out to the committee that opportunity should be given to hear from those who had knowledge of broadcasting and who were not in the pay of the government. I took occasion to point out to the committee its position in these words:

I again say that this committee is not in a position to judge whether the expenditure proposed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the development of radio, and by reason of that expenditure—therefore the necessary increase in licence fees is justifiable or otherwise when we have only had the opportunity of hearing one side of the case.

Several excuses were offered by members of the committee, who by the way were not Conservative members, to prevent other evidence being called; hence I moved:

That the chairman or president of the broadcasting association of Canada be requested to appear at his own expense before this committee as a witness, with respect to the subject matter of the order of reference to this committee.

To the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) went the distinction of objecting to that motion, the hon. member for Essex East also being a Liberal member supporting the government in this house. The hon. member is qualified as a lawyer, and the plain wording of the order of this house was that we had power to send for persons, papers and records.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. LAWSON: I am sorry I cannot, because I should not be able to finish my speech unless the house granted me unlimited time, in which event of course I should be delighted to answer any questions.

Nevertheless, despite the wording of the order of reference, the chairman of the committee, the Liberal member for Provencher, ruled that my motion was out of order. And so again we forced it to a vote, and this time the ruling which prevented us from calling any other witness was sustained by six to two. Let me read you the names of the members who supported the chairman in his ruling: the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard), a Liberal member supporting the government in this house; the hon. member for Spadina, a Liberal member supporting the government in this house; the hon. member for Algoma West, a Liberal member supporting the government in this house; the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Patterson), a Liberal member supporting the government in this house; and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), also a Liberal member supporting the government in this house. Those who voted for the privilege of calling witnesses other than officers of the broadcasting corporation were the late lamented Mr. Alex. Edwards, then the hon. member for Waterloo South, a Conservative, and I.

In these circumstances I retired from the committee and refused to attend any further sittings to draw up a report, as a protest against the steam roller tactics adopted by the supporters of this government in that committee. Then imagine my surprise as I read that in this house the Minister of Transport had the effrontery in making a speech here to declare—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. gentleman—

Mr. LAWSON: —that a committee of this parliament—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LAWSON: I trust, Mr. Speaker, that this will all be deducted from my time.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. LAWSON: If it comes off my time, I shall be delighted.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I just want to ask a question. If the hon. member does not want to—

Mr. LAWSON: A number of hon. members want to ask me questions.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Was not the hon. member aware that he could make a motion to have the order of reference enlarged, which he did not do?

Mr. LAWSON: Whether an hon. gentleman had knowledge that he could move to have it enlarged has nothing to do with the subject matter. It was down towards the end of the session. The order was already—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The hon. member had the privilege, just the same.

Mr. LAWSON: Wait a minute, now. The order was already on the order paper. The order which had already been made by this house was as wide in its terms as it was possible to be. There were no limitations on it. If we had come back to this house we should have been met with the declaration that the order was as wide as it could be and there was no necessity of amending it.

When I was interrupted I was saying that I was amazed at the effrontery of the Minister of Transport when, speaking on the subject of radio in the house this session, he intimated by his words that any committee appointed by this house this session would be, as in the past, unanimous in making its recommendations and supporting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. HOWE: On a point of order, may I ask the hon. gentleman to read what I said?

Mr. LAWSON: I was just going to do that. The Minister of Transport has not been here long enough to learn that I never make a statement without backing it up with a quotation. The minister, dealing with the appointment of the committee, said that the committee would be appointed and that—

> A committee of this parliament will at this session examine the policies of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and report on their wisdom. I have no personal doubt that, as in the past, the report of that committee will be unanimous and an endorsement of the present Canadian Broadcasting Corporation policies including those now under discussion.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the committee's reports were not unanimous in the past. It was not unanimous last year; and one of the policies then under discussion was that of preventing a responsible citizen of this country from having access to the air to express his views.

I observe that the other evening the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McNevin) stated that I had retired from the radio committee last year for political purposes. I reply to him, we shall take good care that in the next election the facts and circumstances which I have to-day recorded in this house will be brought to the attention of his constituents, and we will let them decide who has been playing with the radio committee in this house for political purposes.

The minister indicated to the house that one of the reasons for refusing chain broadcasting to an individual who was willing to pay therefor was that to do so gave a preference to wealth to express its views as against one who had views to express and who, being poor, had not the same opportunity. So the people believe that the government and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, in view of their present performance, are sincere in that demagogic declaration of policy? Let me call your attention to some facts. Mr. McCullagh, having been refused a chain of stations over which to broadcast his views, because of wealth, has been able to circumvent the principles laid down by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and this government, by the use of more wealth, by having recorded each week on separate individual records what he proposes to say the following Sunday and then shipping them all over the country, paying the customary shipping charges, to separate individual broadcasting stations where they are run the following Sunday afternoon.

Mr. MICHAUD: That defeats the hon. member's argument.

Mr. LAWSON: Oh, no.

Mr. MICHAUD: Oh yes, it does.

Mr. LAWSON: Not a bit of it. I am testing the sincerity of the government in their declaration.

Mr. HOWE: Will my hon. friend explain what the government has to do with it?

Mr. LAWSON: Well, yes; I will try. And again I am being thrown off my argument. I was going to deal with it in due course. In the first place the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was created by this government.

Mr. MICHAUD: By the house.

Mr. HOWE: By parliament.

[Mr. Lawson.]

Mr. LAWSON: Oh, that is an old song, an old story. Every time anything happens it is done by parliament. How is it possible to put anything through this house that has not the approval of the government, with its one hundred and seventy-odd members out of a total of two hundred and forty-five—

Mr. HOWE: It had the unanimous approval of parliament.

Mr. LAWSON: —which the people of this country returned in 1935; and they have been regretting it ever since. I should like to come back to this point a little later.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the pension commission?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LAWSON: Mr. Speaker, I only wish I had your assurance that you would extend my time. I should like to deal with these gentlemen who are interrupting.

To come back to my point: Mr. McCullagh desires to broadcast his opinions to the people of Canada. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the government—I will come later to why the government is in it—in effect say to Mr. McCullagh: "You cannot do it, because we will not allow you to broadcast over more than one station at a time by means of a connecting wire running from one station to another across the country." The truth of the matter is that Mr. McCullagh has made a farce of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation regulations—and these regulations and by-laws must be approved by this government—and a farce of the government, because it lacks the courage and the backbone to stand for that which it declared to be a sound principle; it fails to take any action to prevent those regulations from being circumvented. The government has awakened to a realization of the fact that the people of this country will no longer tolerate the curtailment of free speech, and the government has neither the courage to carry out its declared principle and intention, nor the grace to admit its mistakes.

I for one am not grieving about Mr. McCullagh making a monkey out of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and this government, because I think that for the first time since 1935 they have been put in the exact category to which they belong. But I tell you what I do object to. One of the fundamental principles of any democratic system is that if you have a law you enforce that law irrespective of whether the one who is evading it is a newspaper publisher or the poorest man on the street. And when this government and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation permit an evasion of any principle which they have laid down in rules and regulations, they are inculcating in the mind of the public a disrespect for the laws of democracy and destroying a fundamental principle of that democracy.

But the issue between Mr. McCullagh and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is by no means an isolated instance of the discriminatory, bureaucratic and indefensible attitude of the corporation. Let me give you one or two others.

In 1937 I had occasion to rise in my place in this house and to protest against a Protestant minister being put off the air because of sermons which he was preaching, and in some parts of the country I was accused of bigotry and prejudice. Well, by a strange turn of the wheel of fortune I rise on this occasion in defence of a Roman Catholic priest, because the same principle applies. Father Lanphier in Toronto was recently banned from the air because he delivered a sermon against communism on a Sunday when a communist candidate was running for election on the following day, Monday.

Mr. MARTIN: That was not the reason.

Mr. LAWSON: That was the reason set out by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. MARTIN: Read the reason.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no; it was not the reason.

Mr. LAWSON: I raise no objection to that. I wish I had time—

Mr. HOWE: Go right along.

An hon. MEMBER: Take all the time you want.

Mr. MICHAUD: Take your time.

Mr. LAWSON: The constant interruption of my hon. friends puts me very much in mind of a small boy who sat beside me in school in the days when we sat two at a desk.

Mr. MICHAUD: You are wasting your time now.

Mr. LAWSON: I am surprised at the lack of dignity on the part of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud).

Mr. MICHAUD: Well!

Mr. LAWSON: This boy had a boil on a part of his anatomy which I need not mention, and I noticed that any time I touched that boil he set up a terrible howl. I think my hon. friends are very much in the same position to-day in view of their action with respect to the radio. But to come back to what I was saying.

Mr. MICHAUD: Very dignified, for an ex-minister.

Mr. LAWSON: I am not protesting against Father Lanphier being banned from the air on this occasion for a specific breach of a specific regulation. In fact, I congratulate the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation upon its common sense in last week reestablishing him on the air after one month's penalty for a breach of that specific regulation. But I observed that Father Lanphier made the statement that he was not returning to the air until certain terms and conditions were settled with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Now it is with respect to that business of terms and conditions that I wish to protest.

Father Lanphier was previously prohibited the use of the air by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and I read the reasons they gave for that prohibition—no, excuse me. He was prohibited from the air and subsequently reinstated after representations were made by the radio league of St. Michael's church, Toronto, and this was the promise exacted from Father Lanphier by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation before he was permitted to return to the air: That he, Father Lanphier, would confine himself in his broadcasts purely to religious subjects and avoid politics and controversial theories in economics. Well, if Father Lanphier, because he is a religious teacher, is not to be allowed to broadcast in his sermons matters touching upon politics and controversial theories in economics, then I ask, why has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation permitted my friends of the Social Credit party to broadcast for the past two years in the province of Alberta? Let us look facts in the face. Social credit was first introduced and sold to the people of Alberta from the pulpit or platform of the Prophetic Bible Institute, and for the last two years addresses have been broadcast almost every Sunday by Mr. Aberhart or by the provincial secretary of Alberta, addresses which are mixing up general politics and controversial theories in economics. I am not saying a word in the way of criticism. I am trying to defend the principle of their being permitted, and to stop the gagging of people in this country who wish to use the air and the facilities of the radio.

My hon. friend wanted to know why I said the government was responsible. I will tell him why. In the first place, the government, or this parliament if you will, created the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation when it fixed its powers by statute, and its by-laws have to be approved by the government. And did not Mr. Brockington, when he was before the committee, as I previously stated to-day, tell us that the Minister of Transport attended the first meeting of the governors of the corporation and informed them what the policy of the government was with respect to broadcasting? As this government created the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, so it can alter the powers of that body by limitations upon it, or destroy it if it so desires, by the introduction of legislation in this parliament; and I say that this government cannot absolve itself from and dodge its responsibility by taking the attitude that has been taken in this house on more than one occasion, on one occasion at any rate, by the Minister of Transport, namely, that the government has no responsibility for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and metaphorically washes its hands of all responsibility. It does that every time public pressure becomes too great.

A certain gentleman, Mr. Speaker, tried that same tactic nineteen hundred years ago. Pontius Pilate, charged with the responsibility of pronouncing judgment upon the greatest man who ever inhabited the earth, literally sent for a basin of water and washed his hands because he had not the courage to do his duty and discharge his responsibility. He has gone down through nineteen hundred years of history as a horrible example of refusal to discharge responsibility. I leave it to this government to decide the position it will occupy in the future history of Canada.

In the rest of the time at my disposal I wish to deal with one reference that is contained in the speech from the throne. The speech states:

> Legislation will be introduced to establish a defence purchasing board with power to purchase equipment for the defence services and to ensure that, where private manufacture is necessary, profits in connection with such are fair and reasonable and that the public interest is protected.

I presume that the proposed legislation is the result of the recommendation of the royal commissioner who investigated a private contract entered into between this government and a gentleman by the name of Mr. Hahn, which is popularly known as the Bren gun contract. I believe there are sharp differences of opinion in this country on the question whether or not all instruments and munitions of war should be made by the government in government arsenals and factories, or should be made by private industry. There are those who believe that no profit should be made out of instruments or munitions of war and that therefore they should be manufactured by the government in government arsenals. There are those who believe that if they are manufactured by the government you will not get efficiency, and such people say that the only way to get efficiency is by the competitive system. I believe all people are agreed that there should be no profiteering in munitions or instruments of war. Well, that raises several questions. If they are to be produced by private industry, what measure of profit is to be allowed? If they are to be produced by government, what is the measure of cost? If they are to be produced by private industry, what manufacturers are to be given the preference? Are contracts to be awarded to the lowest bidder under sealed tenders, irrespective of what plant or equipment he may have available? If the contracts are not to go to the lowest bidder under sealed tenders, how on earth are you ever going to prevent political patronage?

I have a suggestion to offer to this government and the country. We have a railway problem. Every year the taxpayers are called upon to put up between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000 to pay the deficits of the Canadian National Railways. I believe there is a sincere desire on the part of all thoughtful men to reduce deficits and thereby reduce taxation. One factor contributing to the large deficits of the Canadian National Railways is the overhead on idle shops, factories and plants. I want to recount the shops which at the time of formation of the Canadian National Railways were available in the central region alone—I have not time to go all across Canada. In the central region there were at the time of formation six shops. One was at St. Malo, near Quebec city, with, capacity for 1,000 men per shift employed in repair and construction. Another was at Point St. Charles, near Montreal, owned by the old Grand Trunk. Another was at Stratford, Ontario, also owned by the old Grand Trunk, and another at Leaside, near the city of Toronto, owned by the Canadian Northern. The plant at Leaside I believe has capacity for about 1,000 men per shift. Then there was a shop at London owned by the old Grand Trunk, and one at Joliette, Quebec, owned by the old Canadian Northern. My information is that the shop at Joliette is completely closed and idle, that the one at Leaside is used only for the repair of steel freight cars, and the one at London for the repair of steel passenger cars. None of these shops is operating at anything like capacity. Each is equipped with lathes and much machinery which I am told would be useful in the manufacture of instruments of defence. The Canadian National has available, and I assume the other railway also has, large staffs of expert mechanics, most of whom are suffering from lack of employment and many of whom are on relief rolls.

Mr. HOWE: Has my hon. friend any proof that railway shop men are on the relief rolls? Give me one example. There is a dearth of skilled men in this country to-day.

Mr. LAWSON: I frankly admit that I have no proof. I know this, that by reason of the recent change, whereby instead of car repair men getting so many hours' work a week, full time is worked now by some on the basis of seniority, a great many men who are not high enough in the line of seniority do not get any work at all.

Mr. HOWE: From the railway.

Mr. LAWSON: From the railway is what I am talking about. That condition exists in the riding adjacent to mine, which I previously represented.

I have only a few minutes left and so must hurry on. Why not have our munitions and defence equipment manufactured as far as possible in our railway shops, on a basis of cost of material and wages plus a fair return for plant, machinery and overhead? This would assist in relieving the burden of taxation upon the taxpayers and in providng employment for that army of skilled mechanics who depend upon the railways for work.

I do not want to discuss the Bren gun report at this time, but it was on a cost plus basis. If the Bren contract was an improvident one, then we should have no more like it. If it was a prudent contract, how much more prudent it would be to give that work to our railways on a similar cost plus basis so as to relieve the burden of taxation and provide employment for skilled railway mechanics. I regret I have not the necessary technical knowledge to determine the extent to which the idle plant of the railways could be utilized, or the benefits which would be obtained by the taxpayers, or the number of skilled mechanics who would be provided for. But I am satisfied from inquiries I have made that the scheme is feasible.

Now, sir, a young newspaper publisher, an energetic young business man, to whose radio addresses I have previously referred, has intimated that our public men to-day are sadly lacking in concrete proposals to solve our national problems. It is to these we should apply ourselves, instead of spending our time, as he says, in playing the game of party politics. I put it to the government and the members of this house: Let us accept that challenge. If the government want to make a contribution to the solution, or at any rate partial solution of some of Canada's problems, why not set up a committee to study the feasibility and advantages of the scheme I have just outlined? I am confident that such efforts on our part would be a great deal more advantageous than anything produced as a result of the time now spent by committees in studying abstract questions which will not in this country call for practical action for ten years to come.

Mr. J. A. BONNIER (St. Henry) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, my first duty is to congratulate the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) who proposed and the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) who seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The seconder is a young man whom I met some twelve years ago during a trip to Europe. His courtesy and dignified manner impressed me. Meeting him again twelve years later as a fellow-member of the house, my opinion of him has not changed. The passing years have not taken from him any of the qualities which led me to the first opinion I formed of him. He has a bright future before him. He is certainly destined to replace the old fighters who have so long worked for the welfare of the country. These men are wearing themselves out, and when exhaustion forces them to lay down their arms it is men like the hon. member for Stormont who will worthily replace them.

I am astonished at the lack of solicitude for Montreal shown by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh). It is a strange thing indeed to object to the improvement of one's own city. What can be the reason of the hon. member's objection to the construction of a terminal for the Canadian National Railways? He should at least admit that the project will be most useful inasmuch as it will provide work for citizens of Montreal at a time when everyone is anxious to do away with direct relief. But, apparently, he will criticize anything. Last year also he, no doubt, criticized public works allotted to my constituency.

I wish to thank the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) for their assistance in obtaining works for my constituency. With their aid it was an easy task to convince the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) of the necessity of providing a population of about 50,000, trapped so to speak south of Lachine canal, with adequate means of reaching the centre of the city. The hon. member for Mount Royal again criticized the project. But the Minister of Transport readily saw the reasonableness of my request, made in my name as well as on behalf of the citizens of St. Henri, for an adequate outlet as in other parts of the city.

I take this opportunity also of expressing my gratitude to the minister of transport for having started the construction of a tunnel on St. Marguerite Street, and another at the corner of Notre-Dame and St. Ferdinand Streets, one of the spots where traffic is jammed, where tramways serving the west end of the city were constantly blocked and which badly needed such an improvement. I wish to thank the minister for his favourable treatment of our request. All those works are in progress, with the exception of the Lachine canal project. According to the engineers in charge of that project, the plans, on which they are working since the month of July, will soon be ready. Then tenders will be called, the contract will be given and the work started.

A railway terminal is also essential to a city of the size of Montreal and nobody is justified in criticizing that project. We should be proud of the metropolis of Canada. It is entitled to an adequate railway terminal as much as any other lesser city. Every citizen of Montreal should be glad of the improvements undertaken by the government in that connection.

Many hon. gentlemen opposite have had a good deal to say about our national debt. Is it not a fact, though, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservative party is solely responsible for the entire gross debt of the country? When the Laurier government went out of office in 1911, the debt stood at $350,000,000, which is the amount of the debt of Montreal to-day. But, between 1911 and 1921, the Conservative government added to that debt every year, until it reached approximately two billions.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: There is the war debt.

Mr. BONNIER: We are ready to discuss it. It is always said that for purposes of war nothing is too much. But war was made a business speculation. Such was the Conservative record at the close of the Great War. Between 1921 and 1930 the Liberals reduced the debt. They brought the sales tax down from 6 per cent to 1 per cent. But what did the Conservatives do when they came to power in 1930? They restored the sales tax to 6 per cent and increased the national debt by $800,000,000. Whenever the Conservatives take over the administration of the country they increase the debt.

The other great drain on our finances is the railway debt. It is an elephant indeed. But who left us this elephant? The Conservatives. Let not my hon. friends opposite complain of the debt. All I ask of them is not to seek to regain power in order to increase it still more.

[Mr. Bonnier.]

Mr. WERMENLINGER: Is the debt not increasing now?

Mr. BONNIER: Take our good province of Quebec which during 39 years of Liberal administration was the least indebted of all the provinces and the only solvent one. Under the present Union Nationale administration, which is a Conservative administration—for a party does not change its character by changing its name—the province is sinking deeper and deeper into debt, and the Liberal party, which will soon be returned to power, will have to restore the provincial finances.

Mr. Speaker, I now desire to discuss another subject, the National Housing Act, under which the government lends money at 2 per cent, in order to encourage house-building. This law works to the prejudice of owners of old buildings, who have had to borrow in the past and now have to pay 7 or 8 per cent and even more.

The government has already decided that it was illegal to lend money at a rate higher than 8 per cent. The small property-owners wish the government to go even further and declare it illegal to lend at a higher rate than 5 per cent. Such action would keep them from falling into the bankruptcy which threatens them. These small owners who after long years of hard work have managed to save enough money to build their own homes are faced with the loss of their property. I do not see anything to prevent the government from granting the request of these worthy citizens. I should be grateful for whatever can be done for them.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to record my opposition to all immigration at the present time. If those who sought to come to Canada were real farmers who would settle on lands awaiting cultivation, it would not be so bad. But it is well known that the Israelites—the Jews, as they are commonly called—cannot adapt themselves to farm life, and their admission in large numbers would simply increase the number of unemployed in our cities. For this reason I am strongly opposed to all Jewish immigration to Canada.

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) in congratulating the government upon its reference to the fishing industry in the speech from the throne. The reference I have in mind reads:

> Continuous improvement in the position of the fishing industry as a whole has been reflected in annual increases for the past few years in the aggregate amounts received by the fishermen from their work. The Department of Fisheries have given and will continue to give increased attention to the problem of marketing. The government have also assisted fishermen substantially through direct aid.

I have gone back over the records of speeches from the throne for a number of years, and I have found no reference to the fishing industry as such. This means that the present government has taken particular cognizance of the industry and is paying more attention to it than any other government has done. I can well remember the lack of interest shown in this particular industry by previous governments, particularly the Conservative government which held office between 1930 and 1935. In those years the Department of Fisheries was the neglected child in the federal family. It was carried from one doorstep to another, and apparently was considered more of a nuisance than an industry which required special attention and care.

First there was a minister, then an acting minister—and I think the word "acting" was particularly appropriate. We then had another acting minister and, finally, on the eve of the election, we had a minister. The record is interesting, and I shall place on Hansard the names of the officials I have just indicated. First there was the Hon. E. N. Rhodes, who was appointed August 12, 1930, and continued in office until February 2, 1932. He was followed by the Hon. Alfred Duranleau, a Minister of Marine who was appointed acting Minister of Fisheries on February 3, 1932, and held the office until November 16, 1934. He was followed by the Hon. Grote Stirling, a Minister of National Defence, who was appointed acting Minister of Fisheries on November 17, 1934, and held the office until August 13, 1935. Finally a real Minister of Fisheries was appointed on August 14, 1935, and held office until the resignation of the Bennett government on October 23, 1935. Therefore it was not surprising to us in the maritime provinces to hear the then Prime Minister say at Bridgewater just prior to the election, "I do not know what remedies should be applied to assist fishermen." I want to remind hon. members that when the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) took office there was nothing but lack of interest, lack of system and lack of policy in the department. The Department of Fisheries had been forgotten and abandoned, and as a result, particularly in the years 1933, 1934 and 1935, the fisheries were at their worst in the history of Canada. We had experienced five years of drifting, and nothing had been done.

On the other hand I have had occasion in the interests of my constituency to follow the ideas and the policies developed by the present minister and, in my opinion, no minister has been more attentive or more sympathetic, or has taken greater interest or been more anxious to help than the present Minister of Fisheries. There seem to be people, most of them sitting on the opposition benches, who are oblivious to the most commonplace things. They do not seem to see the things they do not like to see, unless their attention is directed to them specifically. With this in mind I propose briefly to survey what has been done by the Department of Fisheries since the present Liberal government took office in 1935.

First of all, an advertising program was inaugurated for the purpose of increasing the consumption and sale of fish. In this connection $175,000 was spent in 1936, $100,000 in 1937 and $150,000 in 1938. We obtained valuable concessions in the trade treaties with the United States. Make no mistake about this, that those concessions were brought about largely through the demands and the policies of and the interest taken by the department. I say that to a great extent this is so, and I shall speak in greater detail in regard to the treaty when it comes before the house for special consideration.

Then, there have been cooperative educational facilities, fish transportation facilities, and a certain amount of price fixing from certain areas. We have had assistance given to needy fishermen through loans with provinces. We have had a survey of markets, including Puerto Rico, Central and South America and Cuba. We have had assistance to needy fishermen by way of direct aid. We have had help in renovating gear and equipment. All these are new developments, so far as the Department of Fisheries is concerned, and they indicate a policy of direct help to the fishing industry. Certainly these activities indicate a change from the old policy of restriction and control to one of expansion and development. I want particularly to emphasize the fact that policies which have been in force for over half a century, in the manner I have indicated, are not changed easily or perhaps as quickly as we may wish. Vision and courage are needed to bring those changes about.

As a result of the measures I have just indicated, and the natural ability of the fisherman to look after himself, according to the last survey I have been able to obtain, namely that of October, 1938, we had in Canada only 529 fishermen in receipt of urban aid, to which the dominion government contributed. In Nova Scotia, out of 22,023 persons employed in the fishing industry there were only thirty-eight receiving through municipalities or provinces material aid to which the dominion government had contributed a portion of the cost. I refer to aid to which contributions had been made by the federal government through the Department of Labour. I want it understood that I am not including in those figures the help which is given by municipalities or provinces and of which no records of total numbers are kept by various poor boards, overseers of the poor, or otherwise.

There is no doubt that the fishermen of Canada are the ones who to-day are showing the most resourcefulness and tenacity in the struggle for a livelihood. We who were born in the kingdom by the sea know and understand this quality and trait. The fisherman is always ready to gamble everything he has and to risk his life to provide for his family. But world trends and extreme conditions he cannot overcome, and I want to bring to the attention of the house an emergency situation which has arisen in my constituency where a helping hand must be extended to the fishermen.

I refer to conditions resulting from the storms on December 6 last, and subsequent days. The fishermen in my constituency depend largely upon catching lobsters by means of trap and gear, so-called, the season being from December 1 to June 1. The fishermen in large numbers equip themselves at the opening of the season with traps and gear, chiefly through credit extended to them by merchants and suppliers, and after they have earned money by way of their catch or otherwise, they repay their creditors. But in latter years credits have been more difficult to obtain, and last year in particular, merchants and suppliers found it very difficult to supply the lobster fishermen at the opening of the season.

That was the situation, and with the season opening on December 1, we had on December 6 a storm the like of which we have rarely seen in the maritimes. This was followed a few days later by another one. The storm came at a most unfortunate time; in some districts a large number of fishermen, as a result of the loss of their traps and gear, found themselves unable to earn a living and repay their creditors or to purchase new traps, and they had simply to go on as best they could with what was left, or stop altogether.

I visited different parts of the shore during the storms, and just to indicate the type of storm we have on the Atlantic coast, and this one in particular, at Port Maitland in my constituency I am sure the waves at high tide on the day I was there were breaking and throwing mist a height of at least one hundred feet. That was the type of storm which the fisherman's equipment had to stand up against, and as a result of the storm, lobster traps were drifting about and rolling along the shore everywhere in a tangled mass of traps and ropes and buoys. The loss in my constituency amounted to 44,440 traps, of an estimated value of between seventy and eighty thousand dollars. This of course, directly affected the livelihood of a large number of fishermen.

I should mention the fact that the Minister of Fisheries immediately asked for a survey of the conditions; he has shown great concern over the plight of the fishermen, and has been most anxious to cooperate. I appreciate some of the difficulties and obstacles in the way; but the fact still remains that a large number of the fishermen cannot re-equip themselves, and in western Nova Scotia a new situation has arisen. We have never before been in a position where we could not equip ourselves to carry on, which is the case at present with a large number of fishermen.

Our fishermen have resourcefulness, courage and pride that have enabled them in the past to keep off relief. One family would help another; one relative would help another, and the young would support the old, but I am sorry to say that these qualities have been sorely tried by this last catastrophe. Just to indicate that quality in our people, let me point out that for a population of some 150,000 from Halifax county west, this government has expended by way of direct delief less than $5,000 since 1930—a remarkable record and one that, I think, should be encouraged and serve as an example for other parts of Canada. My people have believed in toiling. They have believed in following the road of hard work rather than in branching off on the road of relief. They have believed in being able to manage and control their own livelihood, rather than in depending on welfare workers. They are proud of their independence, and are anxious to maintain themselves. All they need is the equipment with which to carry on their livelihood.

We are not asking for direct relief. What we are asking for is ways and means to enable our fishermen to earn a living so that they can keep themselves off the relief rolls. I have already said that the storms last December were extreme ones, and any help that is given would have to be considered absolutely exceptional because of the emergency. The conditions are so extreme that large numbers of our people cannot help themselves in the situation in which they find themselves to-day, and I therefore urge upon the government the necessity of finding a way to enable the towns and the municipalities in my constituency to reestablish the fishermen who have suffered the losses I have indicated, so that once more they may be able to earn their own living instead of being forced to take direct relief. I think this assistance is necessary in addition to what has already been announced in the way of road work.

I have great confidence in the municipal officers in my constituency. I have had a great deal to do with various councils, and taking these municipal officers as a whole I believe that they are as good as any that can be found in Canada from the standpoint of an understanding and a knowledge of the people, and a sense of fairness and responsibility. I believe there are none better, and if the distribution were made through these officials there would be no delay and no extreme expenditure in investigation or distribution. Nor would there be any political patronage, and here I want to say that if any money is given, every dollar of it should go to the needy fishermen themselves; for the storm, like the dew from heaven, fell upon all of them alike, and all should be treated in a fair and equitable manner according to their necessities.

I do not suggest that cash be given out; I would suggest rather that materials be provided on the recommendation of municipal officials or municipal councils, and under the supervision of fishery officers for the different districts. I say the fishery officers should supervise this work because they have already made a detailed survey, and it is important that the situation be taken care of without any loss of time. I felt at one time that advances made should be by way of loans. I have become convinced that under existing conditions this is impossible, and that on account of the emergency situation and the exceptional circumstances the fishermen should be provided with equipment in the manner indicated, without obligation. With all the energy and seriousness at my command I ask the government to look upon this situation as an emergency and give relief to enable these people to carry on.

Passing from the question of fisheries, I think I should say something with regard to the remarks we have heard in some speeches in connection with the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I have listened to criticisms by my hon. friends in the opposition ranks. They referred to the lack of a program in the speech from the throne. They also criticized the government for its tariff policy, and they seemed to take a great deal of pleasure in dropping here and there a hint of disloyalty in the Liberal ranks. I want to remind them that they were once responsible for the preparation and planning of speeches from the throne. I think it well to examine these past addresses with a view of showing what they did, what policy they had when they were at the helm and were controlling the ship of state. Before doing that, however, it is wise and, I think, proper that we should realize what the situation was in 1930 and see what was said by the then opposition as to what they were going to do and what their policy was. I shall then go on and attempt to show what they did, what they admitted in the speeches from the throne that they could not do, and their lack of ability to cope with the situation in which they found themselves in contrast with what they promised the people before they were in power.

First, I think it is wise to refer to the principal speeches they made and the talk of the Conservative party all through the campaign.

> We pledge ourselves to a policy of protection for Canadians in the development of our natural resources, our agricultural and industrial life, and our consumers from exploitation.

In other words, from the beginning, through the years, and at the present time so far as I can see, the policy of the Conservative party has been one of protection by means of the tariff. That was their attitude back in 1930; that was their main pledge, in the words which I have indicated, and that pledge was referred to by the then leader of the opposition in these words:

> These pledges I have made and by them I stand or fall. . . . I have said that in my every action that must be my guide. . . . I preach one policy and I will practise one and one alone, the upbuilding of Canada and the ever closer cooperation of its parts, so that through their mutual help and mutual advantage the whole will grow into a power which laughs at adversity and triumphs over all the evils that prey upon disunion.

The Conservative party, if elected, was going to bring into force a power which would laugh at adversity chiefly by putting into practice the policy of protection. Conditions were represented as critical, and they were going to blast their way into the markets of the world. I think that sometimes we should refer to these matters. They are apt to be forgotten, and if we are to judge what is to be the record of the Conservative party in the future it is right to go back and see what they said and what they did in the past.

With regard to the representation by the Conservative party of conditions as they were before 1930, I intend to quote from a few newspapers, and these all relate to speeches made just before the election of 1930. On July 17, at Sarnia, the then leader of the opposition, afterwards the Prime Minister, said:

Canada is now in a critical condition. Unemployment exists on a scale which never before was known in the history of this country. All this by reason of the policies of the Ottawa government.

At Calgary on June 12, 1930, he said:

This is a new country and there is no excuse for unemployment in Canada if a government does its duty.

Then at Chatham on July 11, 1930:

I propose, if elected to power, to call a session of parliament immediately after July 28th to deal with the unemployment problem, to authorize national undertakings which will give work to our workmen. Side by side, I propose to have enacted such measures as will give Canadians fair competition and equal opportunity with the nations of the world. Then the bogey of unemployment will be destroyed.

Again at Moncton, July 10, 1930:

The Conservative party is going to find work for all who are willing to work, or perish in the attempt. It is going to call parliament at the earliest possible date after July 28th and take such steps as will end this tragic condition of unemployment and bring prosperity to the country as a whole. . . . Mr. King promises consideration of the problem of unemployment. I promise to end unemployment. Which plan do you like best?

Then followed on June 17 the famous quotation about blasting their way in the markets of the world.

At Quebec on July 14 their leader made this statement:

I do not want place and power over broken promises.

That was the picture before the general election of 1930. That was what the people of Canada heard and that is what they expected. They expected that an end would be put to unemployment; that ways would be found in the markets of the world for the sale of our products, and they were very anxious to see what the Conservative party, when it came into power, had to offer them when they came into power. I shall briefly go over the speeches from the throne and indicate what I think was the gist and substance of them as regards the main items having to do with unemployment and this blasting into world markets about which they talked. This is what we find in the first speech from the throne, on September 18, 1930:

The necessity for dealing with exceptional economic conditions with the resulting unemployment has induced me to summon you at an earlier date than would otherwise be necessary. Measures will be submitted for your consideration, including amendments to the Customs Act and the customs tariff, which it is anticipated will do much to meet the unusual conditions which now prevail.

When they were talking of ending unemployment; when they pledged themselves to blast their way in the markets of the world, they had one thing and one alone to offer, namely to raise the tariff, and that is just what they did, except that they voted, I believe, $20,000,000 for public works. But if they were going to end unemployment and establish entirely different conditions, we should have seen some changes proposed in the speech from the throne the following year. What do we find? On March 12, 1931, this is what they say:

It will be your privilege to consider certain measures designed by my ministers to ameliorate existing conditions.

That is all they did after nearly a year in power. They were then going to "ameliorate" conditions. Next year they say:

You enter upon your duties at a time of continuing and universal economic disturbance and distress. World conditions are beyond the control of the Canadian people.

They were then getting to the point where it was evident that the raising of tariff barriers and the voting of money for public works had not ended unemployment. The plan they had, if they had any, was not working, and they now admit that conditions in Canada are beyond their control. In October of that year they say:

The problem of unemployment continues to receive the anxious attention of my ministers. Under the powers granted them at the last session of parliament, they have been able to develop further, in cooperation with the provinces and municipalities, a scheme of direct relief to be put into operation during the autumn and winter months to the extent required by prevailing conditions.

That was in the third speech from the throne. Hon. members will notice that they started by raising tariffs; in the next speech from the throne they declared that they would ameliorate conditions; then in the third speech they come forward and say they will have to give direct relief. To be frank, in 1934 there is an indication of some improvement, and I think it can be said honestly and fairly that the speech from the throne pictured conditions as they then existed, and perhaps the improvements that had taken place. Generally speaking, I believe we can go by what is contained in the speech from the throne as indicating conditions prevailing in the country at the time the speech is delivered. This is what they said in 1934:

You are summoned for the dispatch of public business at a time when there are sound reasons for believing that the world is gradually returning to economic stability. I congratulate you that such improved world conditions are reflected in Canada by expanding trade, improving revenues, increasing employment, and a more confident outlook upon the future. Canada occupies a leading position amongst those countries where the evidence of a return to permanent prosperity is most convincing.

But the best part of it, the treasure of them all, comes in 1935. As I say, they started in 1930 to raise tariffs. In 1931 they said that they would ameliorate conditions; in 1932 they said that conditions were beyond control; then in 1934 they said that conditions were good. But in 1935 they tell us that it is impossible to indicate anything except that conditions are getting hopeless and that something new must be discovered. Something different has to be brought forward. Hon. members will recall the assault that was made upon the capitalist system in 1935. This is what was said then:

In the anxious years through which you have passed, you have been the witnesses of grave defects, and abuses in the capitalist system. Unemployment and want are the proof of these. Great changes are taking place about us. New conditions prevail.

They were going to remodel the capitalist system; they were going to revamp it, and everything was going to be in order. We were going to have prosperity. Let us see what happened as a result of the attack upon the capitalist system through the social legislation that was passed, a great deal of which proved to be ultra vires. I cannot explain it better than to use the words of the then leader of the opposition when he travelled through the country in 1930 uttering words of eloquence such as the people had not heard before. At Guelph he said:

Whenever you have a convert doing something that he has not been brought up to do he will always make a mess of it.

That indicates exactly what happened in consequence of the attack upon the capitalist system through the social legislation of the Conservative government.

That, briefly, is the general picture given by the speeches from the throne during the Conservative regime from 1930 to 1935. I do not wish to labour this point, but I might compress into a few sentences the situation during those years. This was what the Conservative party promised to do: "We are going to have a definite plan and we are going to end unemployment. We are going to blast our way into the markets of the world and bring about prosperity in this country." Well, they got into power and at once raised tariffs. They voted $20,000,000. The next year they said that things were not in very good condition. Then they said they would ameliorate conditions. From then on they forgot tariffs because they realized that the raising of tariffs got them nowhere as a remedy. When they went before the people in 1935 the people told them exactly what they thought of their policies and ideas.

You will ask me, Mr. Speaker, What does this show? I suggest that hon. members will find it profitable to read the speeches from the throne during the Liberal regime. If they do, they will find what was done in those years. In January, 1936, we find that there is a realization on the part of the Liberal party that conditions are bad, and they so declare. They got into power in October, and in January of the following year we find this in the speech from the throne:

Unemployment continues to be Canada's most urgent national problem. While there is an increase in the number of persons employed, the number of those on relief shows no abatement.

That was a statement of conditions as they were when the Conservatives went out of power. In January, 1937, the speech from the throne contained this statement:

The year just closed has witnessed a steady improvement in conditions throughout Canada, and has borne testimony to the beneficial effects of the fiscal policies of the administration, and of other methods employed to achieve national recovery. A very definite restoration of confidence is in itself an augury of the continuance of recovery.

Here we find, after one year of Liberal administration, an indication of improvement in conditions. Then, in January, 1938, we find conditions reflected as follows in the speech from the throne.

It is gratifying to note that during the past year there has been a further substantial advance in Canada's economic recovery. Revenues have reached new levels. Trade with other countries has materially expanded. There has been a general increase in employment and a marked decrease in the numbers receiving unemployment aid.

Again, a further improvement in the state of things, as a result of those Liberal policies for which the people were looking. And, finally, in the speech from the throne now under review we find on the major problem the following statement:

The dominion government have taken active measures to stimulate private employment through the home improvement plan, the National Housing Act and the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act. Under these measures certain local taxes have been assumed, and loans made to individuals, organizations and municipalities. The sales tax has been eliminated on important building materials. Special aid has been given to the mining industry by subventions, tax exemptions and improved transportation facilities. . . .

Notwithstanding the embarrassments, and handicaps encountered in coping with the problem of unemployment, it is gratifying to be able to record, that, during the past year, there has been a material reduction in the number of those receiving agricultural aid, and a reduction also in the total number of those receiving public assistance due to unemployment and agricultural distress.

There again we have a sign of continued improvement, the result of Liberal policies. As I said before, the speech from the throne, generally speaking, gives an indication of conditions as they are throughout the country. No government would have the effrontery to go before the public with a speech from the throne which was contrary to the facts. The Conservatives themselves, in the years between 1930 and 1935, were compelled to admit that conditions were unfavourable. Comparing the two records we find that one shows uncertainty, and a gradual loss of ground, the other a steady improvement indicating a knowledge of conditions.

When I hear hon. gentlemen opposite criticizing the government I look around to see whether they have anything new to offer. I have been sitting here for three years listening for something besides tariff barriers and generalities from the opposition, but nothing new or different has come. They have nothing to offer us different from what they had in 1930. What have they more than they had in 1935 to make the people believe that they are worthy of confidence? I have never heard of any definite plan or policy except raising tariffs. When they were in power they forgot it after two years and were groping around in 1932. Take the Conservative platform, to which they more or less tied themselves or which they promised to put through. I admit it is a pretty much confused document and it is hard to know where the ties are. They tried to cover everything; it is as confused as any document could be without being too ridiculous.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have to inform the hon. gentleman that he has exhausted his time.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Let him finish his speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. POTTIER: I am much obliged. I find in that platform just two things. One is:

> This National Conservative convention declares its continued adherence to its traditional policy of fostering and sustaining by fiscal protection Canadian labour and Canadian industries—

The same thing as we had in the speeches before 1930. Then we come to employment, a hopeless plan, a lot of language, but in brief it contains promises—

> (a) To institute and support projects looking to the development of our natural resources. . . .
> (b) To provide a non-partisan department of government to provide for the administration of unemployment relief throughout Canada. . . .
> (c) To encourage and support throughout Canada a plan of national unemployment and retirement insurance;
> (d) To cooperate with provinces in a scheme of apprenticeship to industry, assisted by government subsidy. . . .
> (e) To make federal grants for scholarships to young people who show ability and merit. . . .

That is the Conservative plan for taking care of unemployment. As for (a) it is nothing new; it is what they were saying in 1930. As for (b), the nomenclature may be different, but the present employment commissioner is one they appointed themselves. They promised to encourage and support a plan of national unemployment and retirement insurance, but in the platform they carefully avoided pledging themselves to make the necessary constitutional changes, so there is difficulty about carrying that out. As to assisting the provinces in apprenticeship schemes, this government is doing that, as well as making grants for scholarships. I suppose we shall find the opposition going to the country on that platform, unless they decide to throw it away and build a new one. It is the same as they had in 1930, and I believe that the answer the people gave in 1935 will be the answer the opposition will get again when the government decides it is the right time to go to the country again for continued confidence.

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (Wellington North): First I must congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion). I knew him in his palmy days in college when he was stepping out on the threshold of life, before the snows of age had fallen on his brow, when he had a look of innocence and buoyancy—

Mr. MANION: He is just as innocent yet.

Mr. BLAIR:—before he was involved in Tory intrigue. Nevertheless I wish him all the success I can wish any Conservative leader. That is not saying too much.

Much to my surprise the Conservatives have discussed the unemployment problem. It seems to me that is one question they should feel embarrassed about and hang their heads in shame and keep away from. There are things in my life that I do not want my friends to talk about, and if I were a Conservative unemployment is one question that I would warn them not to draw to the attention of the public. That must be a sore point in the mind of any Conservative.

There is, however, a redeeming element in the Conservative party. They know a good Liberal. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) who is just leaving his seat was raised a Liberal, and the leader of the opposition was raised a Liberal. Any Liberal on this side of the house who is inclined to Toryism will find many vacancies over there; they might need some more Liberals.

Mr. MANION: We shall get plenty of them after the next election.

Mr. BLAIR: He would indeed be an optimistic prophet who would prophesy anything like that, not a Jeremiah at any rate.

When the Conservatives came into power in 1930 the unemployment situation was not bad. The Mackenzie King government had it well in hand. But from the howl that the Conservatives raised from the housetops one would have supposed the country was going to ruin through unemployment. As a result they gained office, and immediately called a short session; they were going to cure unemployment at once and could not wait for the usual time of the session. They called their short session, and did they deal with unemployment? They thought they did, in a Tory fashion. They raised tariffs ever so high, with the result that 100,000 more people were without employment. Next year they said, "We will deal with it again," and they raised the tariff again, resulting in 100,000 more unemployed. In my own stubborn way I advised them to raise it again; they did so, and there were 100,000 more unemployed. By this time the number of unemployed had mounted to some 600,000 and was still going strong. So I do not like the way the Conservatives have of talking in the house—

Mr. SPENCE: Does the hon. member think we like his way?

Mr. BLAIR: Of course I do not expect they are talking to please me, nor am I talking to amuse them particularly. But I should like to see them lay a foundation for their arguments. I would advise them to look into the statistics provided by the department of which Mr. Coats has charge and find some foundation for their speeches. Mere expressions of opinion are not of much value; there should be a proper foundation and logical sequence. When the statistical foundation is laid hon. members can tell the house and the country what they think, but it is useless to give opinions without any foundation.

I should like to give certain figures from the bureau of statistics in regard to unemployment. I wonder if with the consent of the house I can place them on the record, or must I read them?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Put it on the record.

Mr. BLAIR: The figures are as follows:

(000's omitted)

These figures show that in 1929, during June, July, August and September, the number of unemployed was less than 50,000. That is about the normal number of unemployed in Canada. In June, 1929, it was 47,000; in July and August, 49,000, and in September, 48,000.

Mr. MANION: That was in 1929?

Mr. BLAIR: Yes, under a pure Liberal administration. I do not want anything adulterated.

Mr. MANION: What about 1930?

Mr. BLAIR: That was a mixture, and we do not want it. I want to take an unadulterated Liberal administration and report thereon. In 1933 I find that during one of the comparable months the number ran over 600,000. Just imagine; these people were going to relieve unemployment, yet they had over ten times as many unemployed as in 1929! How were they trying to do it? They were raising tariffs sky-high. That is an old Tory cry; if you give privileges to the moneyed classes you are going to help the poorer classes. I wonder how even a fellow born and bred a Tory could think of such policies. I have, and always had, great personal respect for Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. I must admit, however, that his judgment was often very bad, and I often thought that was due to pressure being brought to bear upon him by Toronto. I always think of Toronto as the worst hotbed of Toryism in existence, and I am afraid that if the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) lets Toronto have anything to do with him, it will ruin the Tory party in a short time. Toronto has destroyed two or three would-be leaders already, and it can destroy two or three more. They are not straight even between themselves. There is treachery on all sides. They will stick the harpoon in their own leader. I have felt sorry, because of the treachery that existed within the Conservative party, for some of these men who were special friends of mine. I thought it was a downright shame, because I do admire honour among people, even among robbers.

Unemployment to-day is not so bad as the Conservatives are trying to indicate. At present, during the winter, 14·5 per cent of the wage-earners are unemployed. According to the bureau of statistics, even in ordinary times between seven and eight per cent of the wage-earners are unemployed during the winter. In the United States they have, in proportion to population, twice as many unemployed as we have. Other countries have been mentioned here, where it was said there was no unemployment. I feel sure—though I should not say that, because you may believe a lot and know very little—that there is no person in this house who wants our unemployed to be looked after as the unemployed are treated in Germany, where they are put into camps.

There is one way by which unemployment could be helped to a very great extent. I believe the employers should look after their unemployed much more than is the case at present. I believe there should be a certain amount of cooperation along this line; and if industry does not look after its people in a democratic country like this, the people will ask the government to take over industry and look after the employees. On the farm the horses work all summer, but when winter comes the farmers do not ask the government to feed the horses. These men who are employed by firms in the cities—and I am not thinking only of Toronto—should be looked after during the winter, just as the farmer has to feed even his horses during the winter. These men should be kept working, even though it may be for only a few days a week.

I believe a good deal could be done to relieve unemployment by encouraging the sons of farmers to stay at home. I think we have pampered industries in the cities so much that farmers' sons are leaving home and trying to get work in the urban centres. If the government would loan money to farmers' sons so that they might live on farms near their fathers, these young men could use the implements and machinery on their fathers' farms and could operate very nicely. If that could be done and the money loaned at a low rate of interest, say three or four per cent, it would mean a great deal to this country and certainly would remove many young men from the ranks of the unemployed. Many farmers' sons are in the cities looking for soft, white-collar jobs, where they do not have to work very hard and will get decent salaries. Many city fellows do not do enough to keep themselves healthy, and naturally these farmers' sons would like to get those jobs. We have pampered industry and oppressed the farmers too much, and now we are at the stage where farming is going downhill rapidly. The Right Hon. Mr. Bennett realized that very well, and he passed the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, which was the rottenest act ever put on the statute books of Canada. It encouraged treachery and dishonesty and destroyed the spirit of our people.

Mr. STEWART: It is not off the statute books yet.

Mr. BLAIR: I think it is. It is not operative now except with regard to cases not disposed of.

Mr. STEWART: It is off with regard to Ontario only.

Mr. BLAIR: I mean in Ontario and Quebec. Be that as it may, I give Mr. Bennett credit for passing that act. Why? Because he brought the farmers to such a desperate situation. He would not sell their stuff when it was jamming up the markets. He did not open up markets for the commodities the farmers produced. In 1930, when we had opportunities to sell our goods in the United States, the Tories seemed to think that would be an awful disgrace. I heard one Tory address a meeting. He said, "Think of these good Canadian cows going over to the United States," and he had the people with tears in their eyes. What did they expect to do with our cows? Any man who would come to my riding and say we should not have trade treaties with the United States would do me a great deal of good, because the farmers there have made considerable amounts of money by selling their cattle, pigs and sheep in the United States during the last few years.

Here is another silly idea. The Conservative party have introduced some absurd things into this house, but the worst I ever heard of is the idea that trade is war. We are trying to enter into a trade treaty with the United States, and we are told that trade is war. We negotiated the imperial agreements. Was the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett going to war with the British government when he concluded those agreements? The expression that trade is war should be expunged from Hansard, and those who made it should contradict it, because it is the silliest idea I ever heard of. A farmer and his wife go to town and trade their milk and eggs for merchandise. What are they doing? Are they at war? To me, war means slaughter and murder, and I do not believe that term should be used.

Another time, however, when the Conservatives were just as silly was when they said the depression was due to overproduction. Well, you know, that was awful. We had years of abundance, when there was prosperity, but according to the Conservatives that brought on a panic. I think the only time Mr. Bennett was angry at me was when I told him that I was going down the road one day and I saw a squirrel on a fence. The squirrel was weeping bitterly. I said, "What is the matter?" He said, "There is going to be a famine." "Why is there going to be a famine?" "Too many beechnuts; too many beechnuts." Yet the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was travelling from coast to coast with that same philosophy, and the Conservative party were backing him up.

In Toronto on a Saturday night—and I could name some hon. members who were on the platform with him—he told the audience that the depression was the result of overproduction. That was the harvest-home festival weekend. On Sunday those same Tories were sitting in church, as the preacher was fervently praying for an abundant harvest to gladden the heart of man. The Almighty Himself would not know what to do with the Tories of Toronto. He could not. They were saying one thing and praying another. You could not tell what to do with them.

That political philosophy in Toronto is the silliest concoction of ideas ever put together. I cannot understand it, and I never shall—but I have tried. We need trade in Canada. We are a farming country, and we cannot eat all we produce. To suggest that we can would be absurd. I should like to have seen the house cleaned out of some of the old guard who were backing the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and his policy of "no truck or trade with the Yankees." He would not trade with Russia because they did not observe the marriage laws. He would not trade with Japan because the standard of living there was too low. He would not trade with Germany because she was the cause of the last war. He would not trade with the United States—"No truck or trade with the Yankees."

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member should not repeat that because he knows he is wrong.

Mr. BLAIR: He would not deal with New Zealand, our own sister dominion. Why?—too much butter. Trade with New Zealand was four times to our advantage, but the Conservative party would not trade with her. They did not want to go to war with New Zealand. I wish the Conservative party would withdraw that statement, that trade is war.

But I would suggest that the minister who is in charge might help Toronto, just the same. I see the threat of this folly but I also see the loan sharks of Toronto bleeding the heart and soul out of the people of that city. I have many friends there, because I lived there for some years. I should like the ministry, by some method, to put the harpoon into every loan shark in Toronto. I hope the government will pass a law or do something to put into the present law teeth which will take hold of the fellow who is running the small loan company and operating as a loan shark. Those people would sell a man a piano this year and come back in four or five years and take his home.

Mr. STEWART: And the piano too.

Mr. BLAIR: Now, I must conclude, for this reason—

Mr. SPENCE: What is the hurry?

Mr. BLAIR: I should like to mention the difference between trade and commerce under the Liberal party and under the Conservative party. I do not ask hon. members to accept my opinions. I have referred to the bureau of statistics, because I should not like to express an opinion unless I had some figures behind me to verify what I may say. I have figures showing the exports of Canada between 1929 and 1938 to the United Kingdom, the United States and other outside countries. These figures show clearly how great have been the benefits derived by trade with other countries.

Mr. HARRIS: The imperial trade agreement of 1932.

Mr. BLAIR: Does the hon. member want the figures for 1932?

Mr. SPENCE: Read them all.

Mr. BLAIR: In the fiscal year 1928-29, the last unadulterated year of Liberalism before the Conservative government took office, trade with the United Kingdom was, in round figures, $429,000,000, whereas in the next year, under a Conservative government, it dropped to $281,000,000. In the next year it was $219,000,000.

Mr. SPENCE: What year is the hon. member at now?

Mr. BLAIR: In 1931-32 it was $174,000,000; in 1932-33, $184,000,000; in 1933-34, $288,000,000. Then the country got sick of the Conservative government.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Down! Down! Down!

Mr. BLAIR: In 1935-36, there was an increase to $321,000,000; in 1936-37, an increase to $407,000,000; and in 1937-38, an increase to $409,000,000.

Mr. STEWART: What about the empire trade agreements?

Mr. BLAIR: Does it mean nothing to the country that millions of dollars are coming into it? And yet we hear that trade is war! When we get these millions of dollars from Great Britain we are at war with Great Britain. When we get millions of dollars from the United States we are at war with the United States. We have sold thousands of our cattle to the United States, through Buffalo. Stop it! That is war!

And one hon. member, who is in the house now, advised the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) to go to work as chore boy under the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). What was the good of a Department of Trade and Commerce? He was advocating war.

Mr. HARRIS: To help him.

Mr. BLAIR: I have the hon. member's speech in my hand. Then, when Mr. Cordell Hull was here on a visit, one of the hon. members from Toronto said, "I view with alarm the visit of Cordell Hull to Canada." Yes, he viewed with alarm the visit of a friendly ambassador to Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Who said that?

Mr. BLAIR: What is Tommy Church's constituency?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Broadview.

Mr. BLAIR: Broadview?—the name is a misnomer. There is no "broadview" about that—it is one of the narrowest things I ever heard, in regard to Americans. And we are at war with them, because Cordell Hull comes to visit us! There are views which I wish, for the sake of civilization and for the sake of common decency and courtesy, could be erased from Hansard, and those are some of them.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in these the closing moments of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I wish to address the house from the standpoint of a business man. As a business man I am obliged from time to time to supervise advertising matter and to write letters, and I always endeavour to approach my subject and to present my thoughts in such a way that the one whom I am addressing will understand what I am placing before him. Particularly have I in mind my own business.

We are gathered here from all parts of Canada to deal with important national questions, and our criticisms should be constructive and our policies advanced in such a way that they will be understood by the public. But I have sometimes wondered, as I have sat here since the opening of parliament, whether the messages which have gone forth from this house from those taking part in this debate, on the government side and from the opposition and the two other groups represented in this chamber, were calculated to bring about the best results from the standpoint of the nation. Are they going to have a good or a harmful effect upon our citizens as a whole? Are they going to help mould the lives of our youth so that they will be better citizens of the future to occupy the seats we are endeavouring to fill here? I wonder also what has been the effect upon the average mature mind of the messages which have been broadcast from this house, through the press and by other means, as to our willingness to cooperate with the government in bringing about those results which are so much to be desired, conditions being as they are in this country to-day.

I sat and pondered this question, Mr. Speaker, and I was impressed by the thought which the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) brought before parliament, a thought which, I believe, is in the minds of many. Are we here to fight one another in regard to policies, or are we here to co-operate in offering constructive criticism and constructive policies which will be helpful to the government, instead of doing as has been done so often—I say this with all due respect for the views held by the various groups in this house—unfairly criticizing, apparently with the one thought in mind of obstructing the various measures brought forward by the government? I believe the thought expressed by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce is in the minds of a great many people throughout Canada. I do not wish to compliment her particularly upon her speech; but I do think she was talking good common sense, and it is common sense that is going to help Canada to prosper and bring about a return to better days. If we use common sense, instead of offering unfair criticisms, I believe our efforts will be better appreciated by the people outside this house.

I was also impressed by a statement I saw in the newspapers, credited to one of the veteran members of this house, that he did not think the country desired this continual repetition of compliments paid by the various speakers to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I sincerely trust the hon. members will not misunderstand me or think I am lacking in courtesy, but it does appear to me that it would be sufficient if the giving of the compliments usually paid to the mover and the seconder were restricted to the leaders of the various parties—the leader of the government, the leader of the opposition, and the leaders of the other two groups, or their representatives. I think that would be quite sufficient to bring to the attention of the people that the speeches of the mover and seconder were appreciated. On the other hand I think it is only fair that the mover (Mr. Matthews) and seconder (Mr. Chevrier) should know that we, the other hon. members, appreciate the time and thought they put into their addresses and that our compliments are extended to them in all sincerity. I think that is all I need to say on that subject, or members will begin to think I am like some others and the country perhaps feel that this is just another collection of words, but I thought it was necessary to put these views before the house. I am satisfied at least that I am reflecting the views honestly held by many outside parliament as to our methods of carrying on the nation's business.

I always hesitate, Mr. Speaker, to advance views held by any particular section of our nation; for I realize, whether it be a question of tariffs or taxes or social measures or a trade agreement, that the nation as a whole must be considered. We are gathered here, not as representatives of any particular section only, but as representing also Canada as a whole from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and our suggestions offered in good faith and sincerely and honestly may be helpful in bringing about a solution of our problems.

Coming as I do from the maritimes I listened with deep interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and to the views expressed by the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. McAvity), who very frankly and, may I add, very fairly, put before the house problems affecting particularly the eastern maritimes. I, sir, wish to bring before the house certain matters pertaining to the eastern maritimes, and perhaps more especially the province of Nova Scotia, with a view to something helpful being done for that particular section of the country.

I should also like to make mention of the able address we heard this afternoon from the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier). The hon. member is well acquainted with the fishing industry of our province and well versed as to the needs of the fishermen. He is therefore well able to speak with authority on that subject, and when one so well qualified to speak addresses the house on the needs he knows so well, I think the government would be well advised to take his suggestions into careful consideration.

We from the maritimes, and particularly from Nova Scotia, do not perhaps press our claims as strongly upon the government as do members from other sections of Canada. Listening to the discussions in the house from year to year we cannot help but be impressed by the manner in which western members advance the claims of that section of the country. Perhaps it is because we are a little backward in the extreme east that we do not press our claims as strongly; but we have in the east pressing problems which affect our fishermen, farmers, miners, and lumbering interests in Nova Scotia, and which are, I am pleased to say, receiving the attention of the government. I have in mind, for instance, the trade agreement which was recently concluded with the United States, but I propose to speak of that at a later date.

I was especially pleased to note that the speech from the throne made reference to a matter that is of great importance to our section of the country. I refer to the West Indies trade treaty. As is mentioned in the speech from the throne, notice has already been given, effective December 31, 1939, terminating this agreement. I feel it is proper that views held in connection with such an important matter should be made known to the government, so I am venturing to touch upon it at the present time.

Trade with the West Indies is of vital importance to the eastern maritimes, especially to the port of Halifax. Halifax merchants for many generations have been actively engaged in this particlar trade, and they know what is needed to further its development. I remember that in 1924 certain definite recommendations were made to the government of that time. An exceptionally strong committee, composed of men who had been engaged for years in the trade between Halifax port and the West Indies, was appointed by the Halifax board of trade to go into this matter, and they did so very thoroughly. Not only did they gather data from our own province and the adjoining provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, but they sought to find out what effects such a trade would have on the rest of Canada, and they compiled and forwarded to the government recommendations which, I think, if they had been carried out would have been of material benefit to our province, to the maritimes in the east and to the whole of Canada.

It is with this fact in mind that I make this suggestion to the government, and particularly to our own minister, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), whom we in the maritimes hold in very high regard. We can approach him in a spirit of brotherhood as one who knows our problems and who is always willing and ready to cooperate with us in regard to them. We sincerely hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), when the time arrives to discuss the details of such an agreement, will call into consultation men from Halifax who have an intimate knowledge of the trade requirements and the relations between Canada and the West Indies. I might say that the report of the committee I have mentioned was unanimously approved by the council of the Halifax board of trade and also by the council of the Saint John board of trade. We are agreed in regard to the requirements so far as the maritimes are concerned.

This matter touches us from the viewpoint of the potato market, whose needs were so well placed before the house a few days ago by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Douglas). He pointed out the advantages of the market not only in the West Indies but in Cuba. I could also mention the advantages, from the fishermen's standpoint, of a trade agreement. These two considerations in particular should receive careful attention by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I stress especially the importance of having persons familiar with the trade situation sit in with the government in discussing the details.

Another question, which concerns equally the maritimes and the progress the maritimes must make if they are to advance as we hope they will, is that of transportation. I was pleased the other evening, to hear the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) allude to the promise made at the time of confederation with regard to our railway system. Coming as it did from an Ontario member, the remark showed the proper spirit. I feel that we should have a complete link from the Atlantic to the Pacific serving us in the maritimes in such a way as to permit us to place our goods in the eastern and central markets quickly enough to enjoy a profitable business. We can do that only if we are provided with a transportation system sufficiently rapid to enable us to place our products in a good state of preservation on the central market. I have in mind, of course, that important commodity, fish. I would ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) to give this question his careful attention.

I realize that I must touch carefully on the subject of transportation. Its pros and cons are being discussed by the best brains of the country. The biggest men in the transportation business are making radio speeches and sending broadcasts of printed speeches as regards amalgamation, some advocating it, some opposing it. We in the maritimes look on the question of amalgamation in what is perhaps a rather distinctive way. We know it was a vital instrument in connection with the confederation pact. We realize that there are deficits from year to year, but we also realize the high position in which the Canadian National railways stands to-day. That remark may be subject to criticism, but I would make a comparison of the various railways in order to justify my position. The justification lies in the relation of the railway deficits to the amount of new national wealth and national income available through the carrying of the railways into different parts of Canada. It is not only the private capital invested in the railways which is to be considered; it is not solely a matter of profit upon expenditure for railways or the actual earnings of the capital structure, but rather the increased wealth which is derived from the advancing of transportation facilities into sections which have not as yet been fully developed.

The vast bulk of goods for internal and external trade is moved by railway, and no other form of transportation in existence or in prospect is physically capable of handling the tonnage. Trucks have taken profitable short-haul package freight from the railways, leaving them carrying long-haul bulk commodities on which the business and the very existence of the country depends, and at rates so low that the carriage constitutes a subsidy to the business interests. That the present rate structure will not permit a return on railway investments is shown by the fact that in the first six months of 1938 eighty-six per cent of the railways of the United States failed to meet their fixed charges. In 1938 the United States railways failed to meet fixed charges by $125,000,000, and a total of 111 companies, including thirty-nine class A roads, were in receivership. That is a matter which should receive the careful attention of those who are so ready to criticize the earnings of the Canadian National Railways. This was all under private ownership, because private interests control the railways in the United States. We are in a somewhat different position. In Canada, along with the private railway system, we have our publicly owned railways. In Canada, with a much smaller population per mile and a more rigorous climate, it is obvious that the increasing failure of railways under private ownership to meet fixed charges will become more pronounced as time goes on. It would appear that the day of fat dividends in railways is over.

Let me ask: Are the troubles of the Canadian Pacific Railway caused by these general conditions, or is their spokesman right in blaming the government-owned Canadian National Railways. As regards the statement that great savings could be made and dividend payments resumed through amalgamation and the abandonment of certain railway mileage, it would seem that the resumption of dividend payments is increasingly remote, because private ownership cannot accomplish this elsewhere, as is shown by the facts I have already quoted in connection with the United States roads. The argument in regard to large savings was not substantiated before the senate inquiry last year.

I place these facts before the house so that hon. members will not be so ready to criticize unfairly our own Canadian National Railways. In the United States the abandonment of railway mileage not paying fixed charges has invariably resulted in a short time in wholesale business bankruptcy, a serious fall in property values and a loss of population in the communities affected, which did not oppose abandonment. The abandonment of certain lines in the United States was not opposed, and the tearing up of rails that took place was generally followed by a depression in business and a fall in property values. I suggest, therefore, that before the abandonment of lines is seriously considered this fact be borne in mind. The abandonment of lines in the United States was, in nearly every instance, the result of advances made by truck transportation, and we are facing the same situation in Canada to-day. Our roads are being honeycombed by trucks carrying freight in competition with the railways, taking the profitable business and leaving the very necessary long haul for the railways.

It is to be noted that in 1920 the privately owned roads of which the Canadian National railway system is composed had, under private ownership, a total operating deficit of $35,000,000, not to mention those which had defaulted on capital investment. From 1923 there has never been an operating deficit under government ownership; on the contrary, there have been operating profits totalling in excess of $360,000,000.

To any one who examines the monthly and yearly statistics set out under various headings for comparison of operations of railways in Canada, the United States and other countries, it is evident that the Canadian National Railways ranks with the best. Propaganda to the contrary cannot be supported by facts. Statements are frequently made in regard to the yearly deficit of the Canadian National Railways, and this, I would point out, is caused, as I believe all will appreciate, largely by interest charges on the capital investment of the former privately owned companies which were taken over under the one management.

In the United States and elsewhere, continued failure to meet fixed charges has resulted in bankruptcy and receivership, the capital structure being written down to a figure consonant with the operating revenues, and the original investors taking the loss. I need not point out that if this had been done in Canada the financial structure of the Canadian National Railways would appear in an altogether different light to-day. It would have been a great deal better for our country and we should have had a truer picture. I would suggest to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) that though he has made advances—two years ago he did make advances in connection with the financial set-up, which were carried into effect last year—he should go still further and write off wherever possible. It is true that there are some capital investments which cannot be written off; but he could go a long way further in this direction, so that the general public would have a truer reflection of the actual workings of the Canadian National Railways.

It was decided, rightly or wrongly, not to do this in the case of the privately owned systems of the Canadian National Railways. Whether that was justified; whether it was done to save privately owned investments, I am not in a position to say. Operating revenues do not meet similar overhead charges on other roads and cannot have done so in the case of the Canadian National Railways, with the result that the deficit on capital investment is piling up and is being compounded. I might speak at some length on the compounding of deficits caused by increasing deficits in the capital structure, but I shall not discuss that question now. The advocates of amalgamation have offered no solution of this problem of capital investment indebtedness. On the contrary it would appear that they naively expect the government to retain these obligations and hand over the very considerable operating earnings of the system to the proposed amalgamated management. Can it be that they also expect the government to take over the capital investment obligations of the Canadian Pacific Railway without a writing down and without even the prospect of getting any of the operating surplus? Can propaganda, however dressed up, put over such a scheme? If it does, though I do not think it can, it will at least have trouble in convincing anyone with ordinary sense that this scheme will do otherwise than further embarrass the government and increase its obligations, and it will afford relief to no one except the holders of Canadian Pacific railway bonds and stocks.

In conclusion, with respect to the railway question, I would point out that it is estimated that for each dollar invested in railway construction in Canada there has been created ten dollars of national capital wealth. The efficiency of the Canadian National Railways has steadily and progressively been bettered under government management. It now stands in the front rank. Its property and equipment have been well maintained, and it is in an excellent position to take full advantage of increase in the volume of traffic. For instance, last fall business conditions turned upward, with a marked increase in traffic, and net revenue for October amounted to $4,650,000, the largest for any month since 1929, showing that there is nothing lacking in the operating efficiency of this system. The ability to respond so quickly to increased traffic gives an indication of the potential earning power of the Canadian National Railways.

[Mr. Isnor.]

Hon. members may wonder why I give this background of the Canadian National Railways. I am interested because the port of Halifax is the eastern terminus of that railway system. I am interested to see as much traffic as possible go through our Atlantic ports. I feel that with the Canadian National making such a good showing as far as its Canadian lines are concerned, the Minister of Transport would be well advised to consider seriously doing away with the existing lines of the Canadian National in the United States. I have particularly in mind doing away with the terminal at Portland. I would advocate this even if these lines showed a substantial surplus of earnings; but I am reliably advised that such is not the case, that on the contrary they show a decided deficit. In view of this and the urgent need of employment for our waterfront workers, stevedores and men who handle railway freight, I would urge the Minister of Transport to give this suggestion very careful consideration. Why should we ship our goods through United States ports? There should be no need for doing so when we have such excellent ports as Saint John and particularly Halifax. So I leave that suggestion with the Minister of Transport, confident of his capacity to make it a reality. I hope to see railways, steamship lines and airways, and, I trust, later, highway transport, all under his direction. He should not feel satisfied until he has linked the Atlantic with the Pacific by a transportation system that will be satisfactory to every section of our country.

I should like to have touched on the recently consummated trade agreement between Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom, and the benefits accruing to the eastern maritimes particularly in respect to fish, potatoes and lumber, and even apples, because I believe that one goes with the other. While there is no direct increased benefit for the apple grower under the recent trade treaty, the advantages gained in respect to fish and lumber will go a long way to help us by creating additional trade which will be extremely beneficial to our section of the dominion.

I should like also to have gone into the question of defence in relation to the Atlantic, but there will be opportunity for that when the defence estimates are before us. I feel I should not sit down without expressing appreciation to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) on behalf of those living on the Atlantic coast for so generously considering that part of the country. Our defences were sadly lacking. We have defences, perhaps better than a good many are aware, but they need to be brought up to date. I am pleased to note in the estimates that a sufficiently large sum has been made available, and I feel sure that our Atlantic coast will be put in a position at least to help defend the rest of Canada, if necessary, although I hope that necessity will never arise.

How any thinking member, in the face of the many important matters mentioned in the speech from the throne, can rise in his place and talk about the speech not containing anything worth while is beyond me. Instead of finding fault it would be better to listen and read and pick from the speeches of those who have endeavoured to offer constructive thoughts, the ideas which, when put together, would lead to a brighter and better Canada.

In conclusion, may I say that the views represented in parliament by the various groups simply reflect a cross section of nation-wide opinion. We are no different from what we were when elected in 1935; we are just human, striving to carry out our duties honestly and sincerely. We are no worse—no better perhaps—than those who are using the radio and newspapers to tear down without a plan of rebuilding. The public listen, smile, and say, "Yes, there is a lot of truth in what that fellow says, but why does he not give us a complete plan and specifications by which to build a stronger Canadian structure?" Would it not be far better if radio critics and others would unite in bringing out the good things about our Canada, following the line recently adopted by Canadian Industries Limited in a recent newspaper advertisement, which reads:

"The brightest spot on earth."

The start of another year is a good time for stock-taking, and when we do it on a national scale we see that Canada is literally "the brightest spot on earth."

Many things have contributed to Canada's progress. Nature put vast oceans to the east and west of us and history placed a friendly neighbour on the south. History also tells us that our forefathers were rugged men, capable of enduring the hardships of founding a new homeland. Experience, passed on to us from those pioneers of our two great races, has helped give us courage and determination to carry on against every obstacle. Back of all this we have supplies of natural resources which are the envy of all.

We have these things, and yet, perhaps we are too close to them. We take for granted those things which look so priceless to the outsider, when, if we will but believe it, we have "the brightest spot on earth" for our home—Canada.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I must apologize for taking up any more time of the house at this stage, but since there is plenty of time for the vote this evening there is one subject with which I wish to deal briefly; not because it is my desire to speak again, but because of an attack made upon me in this house by an hon. member of the Liberal party, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank). Before dealing with that subject, however, I wish to say that after an absence of three years I have been pleased generally with the conduct of the debate. Practically all hon. members have spoken on a reasonably high plane. That is as it should be. I believe that as far as we are able we should avoid misstating facts, falsifying the record, or anything of that sort. We may misinterpret each other's acts; I may attack my right hon. friend upon interpretation I put on some of his acts, but I shall at all times avoid misrepresenting anything he has done.

May I at the same time thank hon. members of all parties and all sections of the house for the kindly reception they have given me upon my return to the house, and the kind words so many have spoken of me. There are, however, always one or two, even in small groups, who cannot avoid flinging mud. Let me say now that I have no intention at any time of permitting anyone to fling mud at me, in the hope that some of it may stick. I will correct such statements on every occasion, no matter who the hon. member may be who makes them.

The hon. gentleman to whom I refer, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, made some charges against me, and if I were guilty of them I would not be fit to sit as a member of this house. In order that I may not be accused of misquoting him I shall read his words. Speaking of myself, he said:

He was Minister of Railways during those five years, and during those years the Canadian National Railways were systematically sabotaged.

A little further on he said:

I draw the inference from his conduct as Minister of Railways that the systematic sabotaging of the railway that went on during those years was largely attributable to him.

I contradicted that and said:

That statement is absolutely untrue. There was no sabotaging of the Canadian National Railways at any time.

Mr. Maybank: It was sabotaged from the day the late government came into office until the day it went out.

Mr. Manion: That is not true.

A little further on he said:

But from the moment he took over that portfolio—

Speaking again of myself.

—the manner of carrying on the business of the railroad was changed. We know that the men who were working for the railway during those five years were trembling every day that he went to his office as Minister of Railways. Certainly what I said in regard to telegraph and express business is true, and in the light of that it is a reasonable inference to draw that this was the first step towards complete amalgamation.

Those are some of the statements the hon. gentleman made about myself, and of course I use the expression "honourable gentleman" in a parliamentary sense.

An hon. MEMBER: Easy; he is not here.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman is not here; but he did not know whether I was going to be in the house when he attacked me so violently, misstating facts and accusing me of doing things which, as I said, would not be done by anyone worthy to sit in this house. If any man within or without this house, any Canadian, wilfully sabotaged the Canadian National Railways he would not be fit to bear the name Canadian. I say that here to-night.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not say that.

Mr. MANION: I quoted his words. He accused me of sabotaging the Canadian National Railways and said the government of which I was a member sabotaged the railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But not my hon. friend. It was a charge against the previous government.

Mr. MANION: Oh, no. I read the words and I do not wish to read them again. If the right hon. gentleman will look up what I read from the speech of the hon. member, he will see that the whole blame was placed on my shoulders. If, however, that were all, perhaps I should not mind so much; but since the hon. gentleman spoke in this house and made that charge—that false charge—it has been spread across this country by means of the radio. In addition to that, other charges of a like nature were made against me during the campaign in London. I was charged with the same thing. I was accused of closing the shops of the Canadian National; I was charged, as the hon. gentleman charged me, with trying to force the amalgamation of the railways, and I was accused of crucifying Sir Henry Thornton. The campaign carried on against me there was the most vicious one in which I have ever taken part, and I have been in quite a number. Let me give the house one illustration. In the railway station at London there is a plaque in honour of Sir Henry Thornton. Two or three nights before the election there was a religious ceremony held beneath that plaque, and I have before me a statement which was made at that time by a gentleman who, I suppose, from his standpoint, spoke in good faith.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I may interrupt for a moment, I hope my hon. friend will make it clear, before he begins to quote what may have been said by different persons who participated in that campaign, that he had no Liberal opponent in that by-election. So I assume they were not Liberal speakers.

Mr. MANION: Quite. I am sorry I did not say that; I took it for granted that everyone was aware of the fact that I had no Liberal opponent. I have already thanked the right hon. gentleman and his party for their courteous treatment of me at that time. I do not wish to get into anything controversial, but these charges all link up in the same way. I am referring now to the charges that were made by the supporters of the candidate who ran against me in London.

Mr. DUPUIS: What party?

Mr. MANION: The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. This is what was said by the gentleman who, so far as I remember, spoke at the so-called religious ceremony:

> Yet in spite of all the late Sir Henry did for the C.N.R., for Canada and for the British empire, he was crucified for no other reason than he was too progressive.

Of course anybody who knows anything realizes that the "religious" ceremony was a sacrilege; that it was put on not for religious purposes but absolutely for the purpose of playing politics. And that was only part of it. At that time not only was I charged with all the crimes of which I was accused by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre; I was charged with opposing old age pensions, unemployment insurance, the organization of bank employees, and, in fact, all social legislation. And I say here to-night that every one of those charges, without exception, was just as false as was the charge made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre against me with regard to sabotaging the Canadian National Railways. The object, of course, is clear to anyone. The object was to capture the labour and Canadian National railway votes in big railway centres. London is a big railway centre; so is Winnipeg, and there are others as well. So, since these arguments no doubt will be used on other occasions, I intend to put the true story on the record. I hope it will not take very long; and then if others make statements against me that are false, at any rate I shall know the term that should be applied to them, even if I cannot use it in this house.

The reply I desire to make deals merely with the facts. I want to say again, sir, what I have said in other places, that I am prouder of the work I did for the Canadian National Railways between 1930 and 1935 than of anything else I have done during the twenty years I have been in public life. Far from attempting to sabotage the Canadian National Railways, we did much to help them, and I will prove that. Sabotaging means wrecking. What kind of Canadian could he be who would attempt to wreck the Canadian National, owned by the government of Canada, which means by us? It is our railway. To my mind an attempt to sabotage that railway would be both disloyal and unpatriotic; and I repeat that it could be done only by a man who would be unworthy to sit in this house.

The Canadian Pacific is also a great Canadian institution, and certainly I do not think any hon. member who merits the word "honourable" before his name would think of intentionally damaging either of these two great railway companies. What I did for the Canadian National Railways, or at any rate what I as minister helped to do, was to put the Canadian National in an economic operating condition, and I shall endeavour to prove that. Indeed, I think I can bring that proof from the mouths of the Canadian National officers themselves. Mr. Fairweather appeared before the senate railway committee last year and was in the witness box for over a day. In number 7 of the proceedings before that committee, Mr. Fairweather is reported as follows:

> When the depression hit us we started to reduce expenses everywhere we could find them, and we did reduce expenses to such an extent that in 1937 we handled the same gross revenue with $20,000,000 less of operating expenses.

I think that is sufficient proof. In the evidence before that committee a number of statistics were cited, and the actual figures are given in regard to the cost of operating the road, and the returns. I should like to put those figures on record. In 1931 the income of the whole Canadian National system was, in round figures, a little over $200,000,000. In 1937, six years later, the income was $198,000,000 odd. The two figures are so close that Mr. Fairweather made the statement that the income was the same in those two years. Then, the expenses in 1931 were $199,000,000, and in 1937, $180,000,000 a difference really not of $20,000,000, as Mr. Fairweather states, but of $19,000,000. After all, sir, that surely is absolute proof that the economies I frankly admit of forcing upon the Canadian National Railways were necessary. The fact that they could do the same business in 1937 as in 1931 for $19,000,000 less surely shows that there were wild extravagances—those are words I have often used—in the handling of the Canadian National Railways when we came into power in 1930. That to me is a justification of our whole position.

There is a deficit this year which may amount to $50,000,000. Instead of that deficit of $50,000,000 there would have been that other $19,000,000 more, or roughly $70,000,000. The railway question to-day is a serious one in this country. Everybody realizes this, and people are realizing it more and more. There has been a great campaign carried on for the unification of the railways. The greater the deficit, the greater the feeling among business men particularly that something must be done with these railways. So that in correcting those extravagances and in bringing down legitimately the expenses of the Canadian National Railways—we started it, and my hon. friends are carrying it on; I am not suggesting anything to the contrary—those who did it were the real friends of the Canadian National Railways. We were not saboteurs—if that is the proper word—but we were friends of the Canadian National Railways.

I am not going to discuss the railways in detail, but the reason the railways are in difficulties to-day is very clear. First, there was a great deal of over-building. Second—and this is the big question to-day, the main reason for the present difficulties of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway is that automobiles came into competition. There was the expansion of the automobile industry to contend with. We have the fact that large numbers of people are to-day travelling in automobiles rather than on the railways. Again, much of the freight for short hauls is carried by trucks.

I am going to mention at this point—and I have the information in the same lot of tables—a startling fact which struck me when I was reading the evidence last year with respect to the Canadian National Railways. I refer to the figures respecting the numbers of passengers carried. I hold in my hand a document showing the figures which were given before the senate committee. They are startling figures and to a large extent show the reason why the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway are encountering a great deal of difficulty to-day in financing. In 1923 the passengers carried by the two railways numbered 38,000,000. In 1937 there were only 18,000,000, or less than half the number carried in the earlier year.

That to a large extent is the answer to the troubles of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways and, indeed, to the troubles of all the railways on this continent. I say that because the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific most certainly are not the only railways on the continent which have had their troubles. A book I picked up the other day showed the figures for the United States. I have reference to the magazine called Time published in the United States. The figures therein quoted show that the United States railways in 1922—just one year before the figures I have cited for Canada—carried a total of 537,000,000 passengers, while in 1937 they carried 251,000,000. Again we have a figure which is less than half, or the same proportion exactly as were carried by the Canadian railways.

That answers, largely, the whole trouble of the railways on this continent. Figures in the same table show the interesting fact that the freight carried on the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways was less in 1937 than it was in 1923. This is an extraordinary fact, considering that the country has developed somewhat, but nevertheless clearly indicates the reasons why the railways are in difficulties.

So far as sabotage is concerned, I deny it absolutely and unequivocally; I resent very much the suggestion by anybody—and it is made so far as I know by only one man of all the speakers, and there were over one hundred of them—and I resent the charge very much. I hope that all hon. members even for political reasons, will not descend to that depth of attack in the future.

In regard to jobs, I was accused by the same hon. member—I read the statement a moment ago and it is unnecessary to read it again—that so long as I was Minister of Railways no Canadian National Railways employee could come to the office in the morning without wondering if he would have a job in the department. I had nothing to do, in any shape or form, with the job of anybody in the Canadian National Railways. It was entirely the management which looked after that. I am sure the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) will say the situation is the same to-day, and I shall believe him if he says so. The jobs in the Canadian National Railways are entirely in the hands of the management. Then, why charge me with taking away the jobs of men on the road? There was a depression which started in 1929 and which continued downward until 1933. During that time large numbers of men were laid off from the service of both roads. But this had nothing to do with me. I never interfered in any manner or form with the employees of the Canadian National Railways. I had no power to do so. I would probably have been told by the management to attend to my own business, and rightly.

Twice when we were in power I tried to get a favour from the Canadian National management. I mention these instances, because they were the only exceptions. One had reference to a doctor in the west—I shall not give his name or the place from which he comes. But he was a friend of many years, and a Liberal in politics. A certain organization, which had no right to interfere in the Canadian National Railways, attempted to have this man laid off. When we first came into power Sir Henry Thornton came to me and told me that this organization was trying to get this man dismissed, with which action he did not agree. He said, "What is your feeling?" and I backed him up. I knew the man, personally. He had gone to school with me. I had a personal friendship for him, and I have yet. Sir Henry felt the same way, and the man was kept on. But when Sir Henry Thornton left and we appointed the late Judge Fullerton as chairman of the board, one of his first acts was to dismiss this man. I protested. Without my knowledge, Mr. Bennett, who knew the man, because he had come from his section of the country, made similar protests in connection with what he, too, considered an unjust dismissal. This man had been a life-long Liberal and had come from a Liberal family. We both protested, but we did not succeed in having the man retained, and he has been out of a job ever since.

The only other interference I ever attempted was with respect to a man who came from the constituency of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe), namely, that of Port Arthur. This man was a watchman who had been laid off because of age. A number of his friends approached me at the time, as minister. Every hon. member coming from a railway constituency has no doubt had a similar experience. Probably the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. McKinnon) has sometimes done it. It was requested that this man be given an extension of time for a period of one year. That is commonly done—but in this instance it was refused. I found out afterwards that in that very year, when they refused to extend his time for one year, they had retained over four hundred employees in similar circumstances. The company did not in fact save anything by their action in regard to this man. The truth is that they lost money because they had to pay him his pension as well as pay the man who replaced him. I repeat that in the year when they refused to extend his time they extended the terms of over four hundred other employees. Yet I was refused. So far as I remember those are the only occasions in my term as Minister of Railways and Canals that I in any way attempted to interfere.

I will admit this, that I did interfere with headquarters. I endeavoured to bring down and did bring down the salaries of men at headquarters. To my mind most extravagant salaries were being paid, salaries which were not necessary at all. I will admit, too, that I succeeded in bringing down those salaries. I have stated on other occasions, and I state again to-night, that in salaries at headquarters alone we cut off over $1,000,000 in expenses. In other words, we decreased salaries by over $1,000,000, and I believe we improved the efficiency of the road by so doing.

So far as wages are concerned, may I point out that I had nothing to do with them, neither has the present Minister of Transport. I never did interfere with wages, and I am sure he has not interfered with them. Neither of us would have had the power to do so.

Then the depression came on in 1929. It began a year before my hon. friends opposite left office, and it continued until 1933. On account of the huge losses which both railways were facing, it was found necessary to try to impress upon the management that they must cut down expenditures. It was to this cutting of expenses that I referred a few moments ago. Possibly I would do well to give one or two illustrations. One man in particular—and I can give his name, because he is not now in the country—a Mr. Gaston, was drawing $62,000 a year. Why he was being paid that amount I could not find out. The people who complained to me about Gaston were the president and officers of the Canadian National Railways. They told me he was getting $62,000 a year and doing nothing for it, and he was lording it over them all, to use an expression of the street. He was dismissed and sent back to the United States, from where he had come.

Another man named Hummel was getting $35,000 a year, and he was sent back. Without any reflection upon my friends opposite I say that on the railway at that time there were a number of officers from the United States who were not necessary, and who were drawing large salaries, and we sent a number of them back to the United States where they belonged.

This was the only interference we made with the management of the Canadian National. We did that through the board of directors, as we had a perfect right to do. There is nothing wrong with the present minister protesting to the board, if he thinks they are too extravagant, and asking them to cut down expenses. If they are extravagant, in his opinion, he is not doing his duty if he does not protest. I did protest and brought about a great many of these changes.

I want to make it quite clear that in speaking of Americans I have not and never did have any antagonism to them, but at the same time I do believe that our Canadian National, and the Canadian Pacific for that matter, can be run just as well by Canadians as by anybody from any other country in the world.

Another charge was that I closed the railway shops in various sections of this country. I do not think it was the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) who made that charge, but some other hon. member did. Some of the shops of both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific were closed; but far from closing them, I actually arranged with the government of which I was a member, to lend the two railways money, hundreds of thousands of dollars, to keep the shops going. In fact we were criticized for lending money to the Canadian Pacific. My hon. friends opposite have done a certain amount of that since they have come into office, but we did it when conditions were bad; when the shop men were in a terrible plight. We did lend money to the two railways to help them keep their shops going, and the money was paid back in full by the Canadian Pacific.

What they were referring to in London, I believe, was that we had given contracts for building freight cars and engines outside the railway shops. But that has always been done. Only within recent months contracts amounting to some millions of dollars have been given by the present management for building cars, and perhaps engines, by private companies. I am speaking subject to correction; but I read the item in the press, and I take it for granted that it is true. I offer no criticism because that is the proper thing to do. We have in this country a number of big car manufacturing companies. Have they not some rights? I know that this action was protested by some men working for the Canadian National and by some men on the Canadian Pacific who contended that the railways should build these cars in their own shops. We did give the railway shops some of that sort of work to do; but they did not have the equipment, and it would have taken millions of dollars to install the equipment. On the other hand, there were companies like the Canada Car, the National Steel Car of Hamilton, the Eastern Car, the Canadian Locomotive Company of Kingston, and other large Canadian companies, and it would have been most unfair to these companies—

Mr. MUTCH: Why?

Mr. MANION: Because, after all, the people who have put their money into Canada Car, National Steel Car and these other big Canadian companies I have mentioned, are Canadians too, and, in addition, their employees have rights. Surely we do not owe everything to the employees of the two railways. There are other Canadians just as good as the railway men.

Mr. MUTCH: How about the rights of all the people of Canada who, as we all know, have invested their money in the Canadian National?

Mr. MANION: On the contrary, most of the money invested in the Canadian National came from the United States, and eighty-five per cent of the money invested in the Canadian Pacific is money from England. I am not belittling the bondholders at all. But I say that we took hundreds of thousands of dollars out of the treasury to keep the railway shops open and to pay the deficit on the Canadian National. I have forgotten the exact amount, but hon. gentlemen opposite will have to supply the deficit for last year amounting to approximately one million dollars a week. So I repeat, without any offence to the men on the Canadian National and the men on the Canadian Pacific, that these other large Canadian companies have been established for the purpose of manufacturing railway cars, and they and their employees have rights too.

By the way, I should like to interject that the management of both railways were insistent that these contracts should be given to these companies because they contended that these companies had been built up for that purpose, and that if we destroyed them—and Canadian Car had been closed for four or five years—there were no other private companies in Canada to do this work. These private companies had a great many employees who had been out of work a long time, longer than most of the men on the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, and they naturally had to be taken care of.

Another charge related to amalgamation. The hon. gentleman accused me directly of starting the amalgamation of the two roads when I brought in the two bills for the consolidation of the telegraph and express business of the two railways. Before dealing with that, I should like to show the attitude of this party towards amalgamation.

[Mr. Manion.]

Let me recall to hon. gentlemen that in the first place we brought in a bill in 1933, which was passed, the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, the last clause of which, clause 27 of part IV, reads as follows:

> Nothing in this act shall be deemed to authorize the amalgamation of any railway company which is comprised in National railways, with any railway company which is comprised in Pacific railways—

That means the Canadian Pacific Railway.

> —nor to authorize the unified management and control of the railway system which forms part of National railways with the railway system which forms part of Pacific railways.

That is perfectly clear, and that was put in by us in the act of 1933. But that is not all. The speech of the former leader of this party has been many times quoted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask my hon. friend, was not that clause put in as an amendment from the opposition of that day?

Mr. MANION: I do not think so.

Mr. EULER: It was put in at the instance of the opposition.

Mr. MANION: I am not going to quarrel with that statement because I do not recall the exact circumstances. At all events the government of the day took responsibility for the legislation, and at that time we had almost as big a majority as hon. gentlemen opposite have.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MANION: Not quite as large, but we had 140 members and the government now has only about 170.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: Wait until the next time, when we will change that.

Mr. DUFFUS: We have 180.

Mr. MANION: That is far too many. At any rate we were in power at the time this clause was put into the bill. I am not going to dispute with my hon. friends who say that it was their clause. If the government had not agreed to it, it would not have been put in. I want to be quite fair. I shall be glad to have the records searched because frankly I do not recall it as hon. gentlemen opposite give it. At any rate that clause is in the bill, and we put it in there; there is no doubt about that.

Then my former leader, Mr. Bennett, made a speech in Winnipeg laying down the policy from which we never departed. Everybody remembers the phrase: "Amalgamation never; competition ever." We never at any time departed from that.

Finally there was the resolution passed at the national convention of the Conservative party last July. I thought I had it here, but I cannot lay my hand on it at the moment. At all events the convention passed a resolution absolutely opposing anything in the way of amalgamation or unification of the two railways. Everybody knows that. I am not going to argue it. We are on record over and over again as opposed to amalgamation or unification or anything of that sort. I do not think I should have to be arguing the question at all. I have been opposing unification since 1934.

Mr. MUTCH: Will my hon. friend permit a question while we are on a discussion of the subject of what happened to the railways? During the period that my hon. friend was Minister of Railways, why were twice as many Canadian National trains cut off from Saskatchewan as compared with Canadian Pacific trains?

Mr. MANION: Well, I did not have anything to do with the cutting off of trains, but I assume that it was for the reason that the Canadian National Railways thought there had been too many trains and that perhaps they had better cut some of them off. I had nothing to do at any time with cutting off any trains at any place. That was the function of the management. If they cut them off, my hon. friend had better protest to the management. It is the same management now as it was when we went out of power.

I have just said that I have opposed unification since 1934. Incidentally, although I do not want to get into a political controversy, I have not noticed any ministers of this government opposing it. I believe that my right hon. friend is opposed to unification, but I should like to hear him say so sometimes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I do.

Mr. MANION: I am afraid the right hon. gentleman is speaking below his breath. He has not been saying it at any place I know of, and I challenge him to do so now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say it now.

Mr. MANION: I am glad I have been able to stir up the right hon. gentleman to something, because I am afraid that he has not been saying it, nor has any member of his government that I can recall, in several years.

Mr. HOWE: No one has ever questioned the position of the Liberal party.

Mr. MANION: Well, I think they had better begin to question it. As a matter of fact, the only man in this house who ever came out for amalgamation was the Minister of Trade and Commerce. (Mr. Euler).

Mr. EULER: But always under public ownership.

Mr. MANION: All right. But I do not know that the men who would be put out of work by the amalgamation of the two roads would care much whether they were put out through government or through private ownership. I say that my hon. friend is the only member that I know of who has ever come out flatly for amalgamation.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend is quite wrong. There used to be an independent Conservative member from Toronto who was strongly in favour of it.

Mr. MANION: Who was he?

Mr. EULER: Mr. W. F. Maclean.

Mr. MANION: Oh, well, Maclean is dead long ago.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps it might be unfair to say that there are some other members of his party who are dead but who don't know it.

Mr. MANION: I don't know whether the hon. gentleman refers to me, but if he thinks that I am dead and don't know it I hope I shall let him know the contrary before this session is over. Billy Maclean, however, has been dead for ten or fifteen years, and if we have to hunt in the grave for a Conservative who supported amalgamation I think it reinforces my argument. I was afraid my hon. friend might contradict my statement, so I brought his speech here, but I do not need to read it. At any rate, out of the two hundred and forty-five members of this house only one has come out for amalgamation or unification. This house is a pretty good cross-section of the country, and I think it is well worth the while of those who believe in unification to remember that fact. I did not intend, however, to go into that, especially.

I wish now to deal with the bills which I tried to introduce into the house in 1934. I tried, but I was stopped. I did, however, bring them before the committee. I am going to deal with this incident as honestly as I have dealt with all these questions. In 1934 the express bill and the telegraph bill were brought to my attention by Sir Edward Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and by Judge Fullerton, then chairman of the Canadian National Railways. Both these gentlemen wrote me exactly the same letter asking me to introduce those two bills into the house. I protested that they should do it themselves.

I will give the evidence of that fact, but first I shall give a brief survey of the circumstances. They claimed that it was too late for them to introduce those measures as private bills. They said that to do so would cost them $11,000, and they asked us as a government to bring them in. I took them before the select standing committee on railways and shipping on June 20, 1934, without having introduced them into this house. That was a rather informal proceeding, but it was done because the committee was sitting and I thought it should know what suggestion had been made by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir Edward Beatty was not present, but Mr. Fullerton attended for the Canadian National Railways; Mr. Apps, representing Sir Edward Beatty, appeared for the Canadian Pacific Railway; Mr. Hungerford was also present for the Canadian National Railways, and they supported those bills.

May I interrupt for a moment my line of argument to say that I did not think, when the two railways asked me to introduce these two bills, I could have refused. I have thought a great deal over the matter, and I do not believe I am wrong in suggesting that if the heads of the two railways were to come to the Minister of Transport and ask him to bring forward some bill which—as in the case of those bills—was not in conflict with anything the government had supported, he could refuse to do so. I think he would be in exactly the same position as I was in at that time. A minister of railways is the minister of all the railways in Canada. In this house he is the mouthpiece of the Canadian National Railways, but he deals as far as the government is concerned with the other railways of the country as well, and practically the only other railway is the Canadian Pacific Railway.

I am going to read part of the evidence, the only part which bears on the matter, from the minutes of the meeting of the standing committee on railways and shipping on June 20, 1934, which is towards the end of the session. I shall quote myself. I said to the committee:

Gentlemen—The two railways wrote me some time ago and in a moment I will read the letter, and when I do so if you will transpose the words "express company" for "telegraph company" that will cover the letter in both cases. The Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National have got together and they want to unite into subsidiary companies their express companies and their telegraph companies—communications as they call them—as two separate companies. I will read one of the letters they have written to me, and the other is exactly the same except that it deals with the other question. This letter is signed by Mr. Fullerton and Mr. Beatty for their prospective companies the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, and it is addressed to me:—

"We are enclosing herewith draft of bill incorporating the Canadian Railway Express Company which our companies desire to have passed at the present session of parliament as a means of implementing the recommendation of the royal commission on transportation respecting the conduct of express business of the two companies.

"You will observe that the proposed legislation is simply the incorporation of the new company with the requisite powers to carry on the express business of the two companies if, as and when the trustees of the Canadian National and the directors of the Canadian Pacific determine that this should be done.

"We regard it as essential that the legislation should be passed at the earliest possible moment in order to expedite whatever measures of economy and efficiency our two companies may jointly decide should be adopted."

This is signed by Mr. Fullerton and Mr. Beatty. The same letter refers also to the communications company except it is communications instead of express.

I shall read another paragraph. It is myself speaking again.

They should have brought them in as a private bill, which I prefer they should do. However, they pointed out in the first place there were some heavy fees which, of course, parliament could have waived, amounting to something like $11,000. In addition to that there were the delays that could not have been got over this session. I am willing to bring these in as government measures, but since this committee was sitting I thought I should lay these bills before this committee and have a gesture of approval in a general way. The bills are here; I have four copies; they have not been introduced—

To parliament, I meant.

—but I have them ready to introduce this afternoon if the committee agrees. I might read one of the bills for you—they differ only in so far as one deals with "express" and the other with "communications"; otherwise they are practically the same.

I do not need to read any more. That is the introduction, the informal introduction of the matter to the railway committee, on which were sitting the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power), and, I believe, the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray); probably he was not there that day, because his name does not appear on the record, as it usually did when he was present. These hon. members and others were on that committee. I repeat that I dealt informally with those bills before the committee in order to get the opinion of the committee. The only protests made against the bills came from one Conservative, Doctor Price, and one Liberal, Mr. Hanbury, former member for Vancouver-Burrard. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) and the present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) took part in the discussion. The former asked a question with respect to the allotment of stock. He wanted to be sure that the Canadian National would be on the same basis as the Canadian Pacific, and rightly so. The Minister of Pensions and National Health took no attitude against the bills.

Mr. POWER: He took the hon. member's advice. It is always so good.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member's defence is always good, too. That, however, is a little aside. As hon. gentlemen know, there was a dinner to-night to the returned soldier members of the house, and the Minister of Pensions and National Health defended me in a mock case in which I was charged.

Mr. POWER: The hon. member had better hire me again.

Mr. MANION: He defended me so well that I was acquitted. As I say, Mr. Speaker, no one opposed the bills except Doctor Price of Moncton, and Mr. Hanbury of Vancouver. And they did not oppose them on the ground that there was any danger of amalgamation of the railways. Doctor Price took the view, in which he was supported by Mr. Hanbury, that the effect of such legislation would be to cut down the telegraph service in the maritimes. Apart from that, however, he offered no opposition. Mr. Hungerford took part in the discussion. Perhaps I might quote my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have before me certain passages which I have marked. I am not trying to misrepresent him or anyone else, and naturally not myself. Let me quote:

Hon. Mr. Euler: Before I say anything about the control of that company, I would like to ask whether that, in any sense, comes in any conflict with the clauses of the bill we put through last year?

He is referring to the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific bill.

Hon. Mr. Manion: No, that was about amalgamation. I will read that clause. I have it marked. It says in clause 27, part 4....

Then I read the clause which I have quoted to the house. I continued:

I read that clause which enabled it; it is under part 2, clause 16 in regard to cooperation.

And then I quoted the clause:

—without restricting the generality of the foregoing, any such measures, plans or arrangements may include and be effected by means of—

(a) new companies controlled by stock ownership, equitably apportioned between the companies.

Let me next quote what Mr. Hanbury said:

Mr. Hanbury: I would be interested in knowing whether the railway commission has any control over the rates of the telegraph and express companies and the services that they shall render. Perhaps Judge Fullerton can give us some information on that.

Hon. Mr. Fullerton: They have over the rates, certainly.

Mr. Hanbury: Not over the services?

Hon. Mr. Fullerton: I am not sure about that.

Mr. Hanbury: I find myself to a considerable extent in agreement with Dr. Price, but perhaps I am on a little different basis from him in that regard. I did not favour the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National bill last year; I opposed it. . . . True, I recognize the bill passed last year did contemplate such amalgamation as is now suggested; whereas the bill contemplated and forbade any amalgamation of the railway services. If I accepted these bills, it would simply be on this basis, that the legislation is now in effect, and it is perhaps not our duty to put any impediments in the way of the railway companies carrying out the wishes of parliament as expressed in the bill. But my personal view of this matter is, I am opposed to it; I do not think it is true economy, and I think that the people of Canada would suffer from the lack of competitive services in the future.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Mr. Chairman, I have always in the past, as I think many of the committee know, been in favour of doing everything possible to effect economies on the Canadian National Railways; and to that extent, I am entirely in favour of any legislation that may carry out that intention. The only thing that occurs to me in connection with the bill is this: in the new company, the only shareholders will be the C.P.R. and the C.N.R., I take it. Is that correct? They are the only ones that may be shareholders?

Hon. Mr. Manion: Of course, they may issue capital or preference stock, so I suppose they may sell it.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I think the committee should know whether it is the intention that this new company shall consist only of the C.P.R. and the C.N.R., or whether the outside public will be invited to subscribe.

Without going further, I repeat that the hon. gentleman took the attitude, which I think was a right one, that the Canadian Pacific Railway should not have any greater share than the Canadian National. The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) was also on the committee, and I shall quote what he said:

Mr. Bothwell: I should like to ask a question in regard to those two departments, the telegraphs and express departments. Have those two departments been losing the Canadian National and the C.P.R., or have they been paying their way? I think the committee would like to get information in connection with that.

Mr. Fairweather: That is a very difficult question to answer.

The facts are as I have stated. The only objection came from one Liberal, Mr. Han-bury, and one Conservative, Doctor Price. Neither the Minister of Pensions and National Health, nor the Minister of Trade and Commerce, nor anybody else objected to those bills except from the point of view of their working out in detail. No one in the committee expressed any opinion which suggested that there was anything wrong with those bills.

The next step in the process was to bring them into the house. As I say, the committee raised no objection. Doctor Price and Mr. Hanbury took exception to them only on the ground that they would result in a diminished service. That was June 20. On June 21 I attempted to introduce them into the House of Commons. May I quote what I said on that occasion:

> The bill, for leave to introduce which I am now asking, commits no one to anything; it is simply an enabling bill, the purpose of which is to permit the companies, if finally they come to an agreement, to carry out this measure. They have not yet come to such agreement and there is no certainty that they will; but both railways, through Mr. Beatty and Mr. Fullerton respectively, have written to me asking me to introduce these two bills and to endeavour to have them adopted by the house. . . .
> The government had no information in regard to the matter, because the railway companies did not request us until very recently to introduce these bills. Apparently they had not arrived at the position of discussing an agreement of this kind until quite recently, when they wrote to me, and naturally I preferred that they should submit the bills themselves. They could have done so except for want of time, and they have asked us to deal with the matter.....
> Mr. Gray: Is this bill a first step towards the amalgamation of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway?
> Mr. Manion: This is not a step towards the amalgamation of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I shall explain the matter when it is before the house, but I may say that what is contemplated here is permitted under the act of last year with respect to subsidiary companies.

The present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I believe, was the only one who objected to the bills being introduced without notice, and, of course, it was his right to do so. Then on June 25, four days later, I withdrew the bills. I shall read everything that appears in Hansard with respect to them. That was the day I withdrew them. I quote:

> On the order for the introduction of bills to incorporate Canadian Railway Express Company and Canadian Communications Company:
> Hon. R. J. Manion (Minister of Railways): Regarding these two bills, the government was asked by the two railway companies to introduce them, as they regarded it as essential that enabling legislation should be made available to expedite whatever measures for unified operation the two companies might decide jointly to adopt with respect to the two subsidiary services referred to. However, latest information intimates that no agreement has as yet been reached or is in prospect of being reached at an early date, if at all. Therefore the matter cannot be said to be one of immediate urgency. For this reason the government does not intend to proceed with these bills.

I withdrew the bills. That is the whole record of them. Though I have not read all the discussion before the railway committee, I have given the gist of it and I have read practically everything pertinent that appears in Hansard indicating why we withdrew them. They were withdrawn because they were not justified. I discovered, after the letters had been written to me, that no agreement had been reached. For that reason we did not introduce them. They had nothing to do with the amalgamation of the railways. I have shown that we were opposed to amalgamation, and evidence to that effect appeared in our legislation. We were against amalgamation, and I trust there will be no more misquotations.

So far as cooperation is concerned, it was recommended by the Duff commission which examined fully the whole railway problem of Canada, and it was inserted in the bill in 1933, which bill was intended in part to give the railways an opportunity to cooperate.

Finally the railway labour unions of Canada put on record last year before the senate committee their request for cooperation. I have their statement right here and it may be well to read it. One of the labour leaders showed me the statements himself and indicated that they were favourable to cooperation. This is the statement:

> Memorandum of comments and recommendations.
> Submitted by the dominion joint legislative committee of the Railway Transportation Brotherhoods and the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, to the special committee of the senate appointed to inquire into and report upon the best means of relieving the country from its extremely serious railway situation and financial burden consequent thereto.

I shall give just two quotations which cover their recommendations about cooperation.

> In the review and comments here submitted, we have endeavoured to bring to your attention the effects upon the Canadian people as a whole which, in our opinion, would occur from amalgamation, unification, abandonment or further pooling of services. If, in the judgment of those in authority, there must be further cooperative measures, effect to such action should not be taken unless and until provision is made whereby labour's interests are protected and compensated for loss. In the consideration of any such measures, railway labour will be found ready and willing to sit down with others concerned and give sympathetic consideration to all practical and humane proposals submitted.

On another page they say as follows:

It is respectfully submitted on behalf of railway labour that if the interest on capital expenditures for unused power and rolling stock of the railways, or of unused plant or equipment in industry, due to depression or falling off of business, constitutes legitimate overhead charges against the consumer, it seems to logically follow that unemployed workers from similar causes should have an equally legitimate claim upon a larger share from industry as compensation for the loss of employment opportunity. Moreover, in any further cooperative measures involving labour displacement, definite provision should be made for equitable treatment to railway labour by compensation from the industry for any and all loss of employment opportunity.

With that I fully agree. I know no reason why, if those who propose unification take the attitude that men displaced must be cared for, those who suggest cooperation should not take the same attitude. There are opportunities for cooperation; we see them all around us: two ticket offices down here on Sparks street within a couple of hundred feet of each other, and a similar situation in practically all the big cities of Canada. There is the Montreal terminal, the hotels in Vancouver—the recent agreement by the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific in regard to using one hotel instead of two is one of the best illustrations of what cooperation could do. All those measures could be carried out without hurting anyone, particularly if the men were cared for as proposed by the labour men, with which proposal I entirely agree. So far as enforced cooperation is concerned, there were those of us who thought that since the railways did not show much sign of voluntary cooperation, enforced cooperation might be worth considering. But in view of the attitude taken by Sir Edward Beatty, speaking for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company before the senate committee, enforced cooperation appears to be out of the question.

Two other points I want to raise. One is the "crucifixion" so-called of Sir Henry Thornton. The statement has been made many times; it was made in the London by-election and made all across this country; on one occasion I remember I was charged with killing Sir Henry Thornton. The fact is that Sir Henry Thornton resigned and a year later he died of cancer. I did not have much to do with that. And never in the years I knew Sir Henry Thornton did I have a cross word of any kind with him. We were good friends throughout, despite the fact that I accepted his resignation. I say to-night what I have said in many places—and I think I have written it once or twice—that he was a very able man; that he brought about in the Canadian National Railways an esprit de corps which was of great value, and did good work in many ways. But I have pointed out—and it was no discredit to him—that he had this fault, that he did not know the value of money. I doubt whether anyone in this house who knew him well would think of contradicting that statement in view of the decreases in cost of operation amounting to $19,000,000, in view of the extravagance in such things as hotels, the Montreal terminal proposals to cost some $50,000,000, the building of those ships on the Pacific. In view of that, I do not think anyone would say that I am unjust in saying that extravagance was his great fault.

There was one other matter that was not his fault, namely, that there was not proper control over Sir Henry Thornton. He was a dominating personality and took complete control of the board of directors instead of their controlling him. As a result there was wild extravagance in the Canadian National Railways under his regime. One of the hon. members for Halifax referred to the fact that there were a great many defunct railroads unloaded on the Canadian National which are unprofitable and on which the Canadian National has to bear the capital charges. Practically every down-at-heel railway in this country was taken over by the Canadian National; most of them never paid their way. But there were other things—and in this I am a little critical—

Mr. YOUNG: Does my hon. friend suggest that Sir Henry Thornton was responsible for taking over those defunct railways?

Mr. MANION: He was, at any rate, partly responsible, because he was the head of the Canadian National. If I must give an answer to my hon. friend—I do not like to, because it will not please him—the people really responsible were the government which he supports.

Mr. DUNNING: Surely my hon. friend does not mean to imply that there were anywhere near the number of so-called defunct railways taken over during Sir Henry Thornton's management as were taken over when the Canadian National system was originally put together. And certainly this government was never responsible for that.

Mr. MANION: Oh, quite right; in 1919 when all the railways were taken over, I suppose those railways were greater in length than the defunct railways taken over when the hon. member was Minister of Railways. I was not going to mention my hon. friend, but he was Minister of Railways when all these extravagant outlays were made by the Canadian National, and he was the man who should have held Sir Henry back from the wild extravagance that went on.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to defend at any time anything I ever put before this house. And my hon. friend never opposed any of them.

Mr. MANION: Well, perhaps that is true. My hon. friends were the government, and conditions in the country were pretty good. But they took over all the defunct railways, as we well remember, nearly all that were left when the Canadian National was organized. Take, for example, the Quebec Southern. I looked over the file, and I must say it was disgraceful; that railway was taken over when my hon. friend was Minister of Railways.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. MANION: I do not blame him for taking them over, but I blame the parties who pressed the government to do it and the government which permitted them to press it into taking over this lot of defunct roads which became a charge on the Canadian National. Probably Sir Henry Thornton should have put his foot down and said, No; but while the railway administration, like these other boards and commissions, was theoretically independent, they were subject to the government.

Mr. DUNNING: In the interest of accuracy I must say again that my hon. friend's expression "defunct railways" is entirely incorrect. The number of railways taken over during the time I was Minister of Railways in the former government of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was in fact very small indeed compared with those which had been taken over by the preceding administration.

Mr. MANION: Oh, I do not compare the railways that I described as defunct, with the whole Canadian National. I do not agree to-day that the old Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk should have been taken over by this country. I do not want to go into that question now, but I say they should have been allowed to go into bankruptcy.

Mr. DUNNING: So do I. I said so at the time.

Mr. MANION: I agree with the hon. gentleman. I was a member of the house then; but I was a young member, had been a member for a year, I did not presume to put my opinion up against that of senior men, or the government of that time; but, looking back, I think they should have been allowed to go into bankruptcy. But my hon. friend was Minister of Railways in 1929. In 1929, a pre-election year, between $200,000,000 and $250,000,000 was added to the debt of the Canadian National Railways in all kinds of political expenditures.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. MANION: Oh, yes. I have put them on record, and my speeches will show them. I could give the record very easily. I did not want to get into this, but my hon. friend would interrupt me though I was not mentioning him at all. He was Minister of Railways at the time. I repeat, in that one year, the year before the election of 1930, they added to the debt of the Canadian National Railways by upwards of $200,000,000. I used the figure of $250,000,000 on another occasion here, but perhaps I was in error by a few million, so I shall cut it down to between $200,000,000 and $250,000,000. Not only that; but between 1921 and 1930, when the party of my hon. friend was in power continuously except for a few months in 1926, they added $32,000,000 to the annual interest charges of the Canadian National Railways. During a number of those years the hon. gentleman was Minister of Railways. In that time $20,000,000 was added to the interest owing to the bondholders and $12,000,000 to the interest on money owing to the government.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would my hon. friend be good enough to tell us how much was added to the annual income of the railway during those years?

Mr. MANION: There was a good deal added to the income of the railway during those years, yes; but so far as I remember—I am speaking from memory but I think I am correct—in only two years in all the time the Canadian National Railways have existed have they paid their interest charges; so my hon. friend was not doing so well. But at any rate my hon. friend who asked me the question would not deny that in the nine years between 1921 and 1930 there was $20,000,000 added to the annual interest payable to bondholders and $12,000,000 to the annual interest on money owing to the government, so that was a pretty good piece of work. Take, for example, the Montreal terminal. Does anybody suggest to-day that a $50,000,000 expenditure on a Montreal terminal, such as was started in 1929 and on which $17,000,000, I think, was spent before we came into office, was justified?

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemount) We deserve it.

Mr. MANION: You may deserve it for unemployment relief, but I do not admit that $50,000,000 was ever justified at any time for one station for the Canadian National Railways in the city of Montreal. I do not notice any of the ministers saying they think it is justified, as my hon. friend does; but probably he is thinking of the votes that would be forthcoming as a result of the work on the terminal.

Mr. DUNNING: For a station, did my hon. friend say?

Mr. MANION: For a terminal, mostly a station.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. MANION: Yes, yes. I know just as much as my hon. friend does about this railway. I shall not take a back seat to my hon. friend or anybody else in this house on this railway question. I know it pretty well.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not want my hon. friend to take a back seat, but some of us know a little about it.

Mr. MANION: I am not questioning that.

Mr. YOUNG: Did my hon. friend vote against that $50,000,000 when it went through this house?

Mr. MANION: I have repeated in this house that during those years the Canadian National was so strong under Sir Henry Thornton that I do not suppose I did; I do not suppose anybody did. Conditions in Canada were pretty fair, and we were not questioning these expenditures. But the fact that I did not happen to vote against it, does not lessen the mistake. I have made mistakes in my time, and I cannot say positively but that I might have done the same if I had been minister; I do not know. I do say, however, that the fact that I may have made a mistake or that I did not vote against it does not justify my hon. friends in adding from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000 to the debt of the railway in one year, and certainly it does not justify the construction of a $50,000,000 terminal in Montreal. If that were justified, I would ask my hon. friends this: We have been out of power since 1935. We stopped work on that terminal in either 1930 or 1931; I do not remember the exact time, but it was probably 1931 when we halted further expenditures on it. About $17,000,000 was the amount that had been spent on that work prior to that time, which would leave $33,000,000 to be spent to complete it. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been in power for nearly four years, and why is it that they have not completed the terminal? If it is justified, why did they not complete it? They knew it was never justified. That is why they did not continue the work and complete it, and that is the whole reason. By the way, in reference to the hon. gentleman who has been asking me questions, may I say that there was no greater extravagance ever committed, in proportion to size, than the construction of the hotel in Saskatoon at a cost of $4,000,000. The hon. gentleman comes from Saskatoon.

Mr. YOUNG: It did not cost $4,000,000.

Mr. MANION: Well, it did. The hon. gentleman had better look up his figures.

Mr. YOUNG: I know them pretty well.

Mr. MANION: It was pretty close to $4,000,000.

Mr. YOUNG: It was a long distance from $4,000,000.

Mr. MANION: Then perhaps that was because we cut it down.

Mr. YOUNG: That was what was wrong with the Canadian National all the time; you were cutting them down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MANION: I do not mind the hon. gentleman getting a little excited. He is fighting for Saskatoon, and I do not blame him.

Mr. YOUNG: Fighting for what is right.

Mr. MANION: That is debatable. There was nothing right in building a $4,000,000 hotel in Saskatoon when the best they could possibly have supported there, according to what I am told by the best hotelkeepers in this country, was a $1,000,000 hotel. Perhaps $4,000,000 may be the wrong amount, but I am using round figures.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend does not think very much of the city of Saskatoon.

Mr. MANION: I think a great deal of Saskatoon, but my hon. friend is just trying to play a little cheap politics now. I am just as honest about the city of Saskatoon as I am about the city of Montreal; that is all. I want to ask, Mr. Speaker, if that $50,000,000 expenditure in Montreal was justified in 1929, why has that work not been completed since 1935? It must be because the government did not feel that it was justified, and I quite agree with them. I am not criticizing them for not finishing it. But I do criticize them in this regard, that within the last few weeks the head of the Canadian National Railways has stated that they are going to spend $12,500,000 on that terminal over a period of three years. That will bring up the expenditure to about $29,000,000 or $30,000,000, instead of the $50,000,000 originally contemplated. That amount is to be spent over three or four years. But the strange thing about it is that some of the ministers of this government were so prophetic a year or two ago when the hon. member for St. Henry (Mr. Bonnier) was seeking election. One of the ways whereby he got votes was through promises made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) and the hon. gentleman sitting beside him, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), both very good friends of mine. They went there at that time, as they will not deny, to help elect the hon. member for St. Henry. That was in January last. They have nothing to do with the railway, neither of them being Minister of Transport, and I do not know why they had any right to make such statements, or how they could know it. But the fact is they made promises that this work would be commenced before the next election. I have their promises here, and perhaps I had better quote them. I am looking now at the Montreal Gazette, a great friend of my hon. friends opposite. On January 17 the Gazette said:

Cardin Backs C.N.R. Pledge

Before the next federal elections come, the Canadian National railways will have their central station in Montreal, declared Hon. P. J. A. Cardin, Minister of Public Works, as he wound up the Liberal campaign in St. Henry division last night—

He knows how to wind up a campaign. I am told he is the best stumper in Quebec.

Mr. HOWARD: And the best of it is that he carries out his promises.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend says the Minister of Public Works carries out his promises; but this has nothing to do with public works; he is making a promise for the Minister of Transport, a promise that the Minister of Transport, if anybody, had a right to make. I continue quoting:

At an afternoon meeting in Atwater Market Hon. Fernand Rinfret, Secretary of State, had made a similar pledge to the two thousand electors who attended. Both statements clarified and amplified the declaration of Mr. Rinfret on Friday that the Liberal government would "fill the hole on Dorchester street."

That was on January 17. Two days previously the Secretary of State is quoted, according to the same newspaper, the Gazette, as follows:

Mr. Rinfret said the tunnel under the Lachine bridge to connect St. Paul with St. Henry ward would be brought to fruition shortly.

May I ask the hon. member for St. Henry if the tunnel has been built?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MANION: I thought they always kept their promises. My hon. friend said that the Liberals always kept their promises. They still have a few months to go before the next election, so they may start the work after all.

He also stated the abandoned Canadian National railway works project conceived prior to 1930, and which involved disappearance of the level crossings in St. Henry, would also be resumed, and this would mean an end of the "hole" on Dorchester street. . . . "I declare that while the federal government is anxious to restore conditions by providing as much employment as possible, there is no intention to allow one man to starve in Canada."

I do not think there should be any starvation under a Liberal regime.

"So long as there are unemployed there will be direct relief for men, their wives and children. We will do our part, and if the municipal powers, and provincial powers should become fatigued, be tranquil. While there is a single unemployed, the federal government will see to their sustenance. It is not an independent who will do that. It is not a man—"

This is Mr. Houde—

"—isolated from all parties who can do anything. He may make eloquent speeches, even enact farces, but I am authorized to repeat to you that as long as there are unemployed in Montreal, even if we are alone, the federal government engages itself on honour to give sustenance to him, his wife and children."

And yet the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), when I asked him the other day about conditions in Nova Scotia, and called his attention to a telegram I had received,—no wonder he looks down at his book—told me that that was the duty, as I should know, of the province and the municipality. He had better fight it out with the Secretary of State over there.

Then, this was stated—and I believe it is by the present Secretary of State, one of the two gentlemen over there—and they won the election, too.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: But we won in Waterloo South. The election in question was against Mr. Houde. This is the statement I find:

Pledges action on C.N.R. The government of which I am a part will settle this problem of the Canadian National Railways, and the level crossings. We will fill the hole on Dorchester street, and solve the problem of the approaches thereto.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is the hon. gentleman against the terminal in Montreal?

Mr. MANION: I am certainly against $50,000,000 being spent on the terminal, just the same as the hon. member's own party is against it. Otherwise something would have been done in the last four years. The party opposite has been in power for four years.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is the hon. gentleman satisfied with the station in Montreal?

Mr. MANION: No, I am not satisfied. I do not think that hole in the ground should be left. But certainly I do not like to overtax the dominion on account of the Canadian National Railways, for political purposes. I say here solemnly to-night to those who are the friends of the Canadian National Railways, and particularly to the employees of that railway system, that the surest way to destroy the system is to play politics of that kind with it.

Then we have this humorous side of the matter. To show how far-sighted my hon. friends opposite are, politically, Mr. Hungerford has said, on their behalf, that $12,500,000 will be spent over a period of three or four years. Not only do they provide at this time for the coming election, but they are providing for the next one, too. I must confess that some day I am going to ask them to start a summer school at Port Hope for Conservative politicians. We know nothing about playing politics, when it gets down to that sort of business.

But I must say seriously that there is no surer way of destroying the Canadian National Railways than by playing politics of that kind with it. There is a campaign going on across the country, one which is gaining ground among business men, without doubt, for something by way of unification of these two railways. And with the increased deficit of the Canadian National Railways, $10,000,000 more than last year, as it is reported, and with these increased expenditures for political purposes in connection with the filling of this hole in the city of Montreal there is the great danger that the Canadian National Railways will be destroyed by those who claim they are its friends.

I would not have taken so long, Mr. Speaker, but hon. members opposite have had some responsibility for the length of my speech. I have, however, almost finished, and I shall leave plenty of time to take the vote to-night. I wish to repeat that the depression came upon us in 1929. The Conservative party was elected in 1930, and we were forced to bring about economies. We did that for the Canadian National Railways and, to their credit, my hon. friends opposite to a large extent have carried on in the same manner. I think, generally speaking, they have played a pretty fair game in the country. I do not think they have been doing much in the way of politics—until now, in connection with that hole in the ground in the city of Montreal.

I come back to the matter at this time because my observations were interrupted by the Minister of Finance. I was discussing the suggestion that Sir Henry Thornton was supposed to have been crucified by me. I said to the directors that they must bring about economy. We were being asked to put up too much money at a time when relief was costing so much. I pleaded here, with the railway committee which was sitting in the house, to cut the extravagant expenditures. But Sir Henry Thornton declared, in a manner which he had of opposing economies, against these economies. I could repeat what I said earlier—and it is the only word I would say against him—he seemed to lack sufficient knowledge of the value of money, whether his own or anybody else's.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Would the hon. member permit a question? What is the value of money, may I ask?

Mr. MANION: I can quite understand my social credit friend asking what is the value of money, because if there is anybody on God's green earth that does not know the value of it, it is the social credit party.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I was simply looking for enlightenment. That was a cheap, political answer.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member says he was looking for light. I can understand why any social crediter would be looking for light. If there is any group which sees darkness more completely around it than the social crediters, I do not know who they are. But if the hon. member—

Mr. LANDERYOU: But the hon. member has not answered the question yet.

Mr. MANION: Well, I suggest that the hon. member go and ask Mr. Aberhart.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I believe I could get an answer from him.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member says he believes he can get an answer. I place his answer on Hansard, because I think it should be there. The people of Alberta have been looking for that answer now, at $25 a month, for a long time.

Mr. FAIR: I would ask the hon. member how that $25 a month for the people of Alberta is going to be paid, after the mess this government, and the party of which the hon. member is leader, made of the railways?

Mr. MANION: During the rest of the session I am going to try to show the mess that the leader of the present government has made of things. Surely the hon. member did not expect me to stop my discussion of the railways to explain what money means? Every other hon. member in the house but the hon. gentleman in question knew what I meant when I said that Sir Henry Thornton did not know the value of money.

Mr. SLAGHT: Leave Sir Henry alone—a dead man.

Mr. MANION: I am not saying anything against anybody. But I do not need any instructions from the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, about ethics or anything else. I just make that suggestion to him, and I do not think I need any instructions from him at all as to how I should treat either the dead or the living. I am not saying anything offensive about Sir Henry at all. I am pointing out the opinion of everybody else in Canada, from the right hon. gentleman before me right down to the ordinary employee in the Canadian National railways.

Now, I had better finish, because we want to vote to-night.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the hon. member finishes, I should like to ask a question. An article from the Gazette which I have in my hand has refreshed my memory. I wonder if he is the same Doctor Manion who is quoted in the Montreal Gazette of November, 1927, as having said in Toronto:

> I believe the Conservative party has been too honest in the past. Our party in the past has been too honest in strictly defining its position and policy on controversial and sectional questions.

Mr. MANION: Yes, I am the man who said that, and I believe it yet. I shall explain that statement, since the hon. member has raised it, although it has nothing to do with the railways. I should like, however, to give an answer to my good friend over there. I said a few moments ago I wished the Liberal party would establish a summer school for Conservatives at Port Hope and let us go there to learn politics, because they play them so well. In that remark I was referring to the stupid habit, to my mind, of some Conservatives of occasionally grabbing controversial questions and jumping into them without any reason at all for discussing them at that particular time. I do not see the reason for my hon. friends opposite—they are a little wiser than we are in that respect—or for ourselves jumping into all kinds of controversial questions and insisting on fighting them to a finish when there is no occasion for a fight at all. It is just shadow-boxing. That is what I was referring to, and I am not ashamed of it at all.

I hope I shall not be interrupted any more, Mr. Speaker, because I wish to get through.

I could not get Sir Henry Thornton to agree to any compromise. I pleaded with him, but he refused. The directors appealed to me. They said they could not bring about economies because he opposed them. Finally, after the discussions—I want to be careful of my words—before the committee which brought out many extravagances, Sir Henry Thornton came into my office and told me he wanted to offer his resignation to me; after talking it over, he asked me if I would agree to his getting a bonus of some kind—I forget the exact word—when he resigned, and I said I would. We gave him altogether over $100,000; I think it was $125,000. He had Britton Osler, a lawyer from Toronto, working for him, and it took about a month. Finally we gave him, I think, about $125,000; at any rate it was over $100,000. At no time did Sir Henry Thornton and I have words about it.

I simply say, Mr. Speaker, that the $19,000,000 that I have shown of economies between 1931 and 1937 were justification to us for the pressure we put on the Canadian National Railways for economies. It was justification for my pressing Sir Henry Thornton to agree to economies. If Sir Henry Thornton had agreed to economies at headquarters—which had nothing to do with the men—I admit frankly, he would never have reached the stage of putting in his resignation or had any difficulty whatsoever. He and I were good friends, and before I sit down I take the liberty of quoting him. Here is his statement taken from the Canadian National Magazine. Sir Henry Thornton, as president of the road, was speaking of the Minister of Railways of that time—myself. Sir Henry said:

> I should like to take this opportunity of saying that I have served under a number of ministers of the crown, but I have never served under one for whom I had more real affection than for the present incumbent of that post. We have in him one who ardently desires the welfare of the Canadian National Railways system, one whose heart beats with ours and one who, in addition to the performance of his ministerial duties, is likewise a really fine friend.

Perhaps it is not modest of me to quote it, but I think it is only fair to do so because of the charges that have been made against me.

Those are the facts, Mr. Speaker, and I have presented them as honestly as I know how. If, after this, statements are made to contradict them, all I have to say is that if they are made by members of this house, at any rate they will be stating what they know to be not true.

In regard to the subamendment submitted by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, which will be voted on shortly, I have only a word or two to say. Let me first read it:

> That the amendment be amended by adding the following thereto: "We are of the opinion that these conditions can be remedied only by the effective control of financial institutions and monopolistic enterprises which are exploiting the Canadian people."

Whether accidentally or intentionally, and I imagine accidentally, the language of the amendment is confusing. It says:

> We are of the opinion that these conditions can be remedied only by the effective control of financial institutions—

That is part of it. Then it goes on, in the same sentence, it is true:

> —and monopolistic enterprises which are exploiting the Canadian people.

If they had said that conditions could be remedied by the effective control of monopolistic enterprises, I think the whole house could agree with the sentiment behind that; but when they say "effective control of financial institutions," I do not think the language expresses their thought. Anyway it does not express mine, and so far as I am concerned I am not going to support it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is there a comma after "financial institutions"?

Mr. MANION: Not in this copy I am reading from.

Mr. COLDWELL: Therefore does not the modifying clause modify both "financial institutions" and "monopolistic enterprises"?

Mr. MANION: Whether the comma is in or out, and I do not think it makes any particular difference, I think the subamendment is badly worded. I do not think it is the thought of the hon. gentleman who moved it. If it is, at all events it is not my thought. I cannot support it anyway. I am naturally going to support my own amendment.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am moved to address you very briefly because of the fact, as stated by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) this evening, that it was my good or ill fortune to be Minister of Railways for Canada during the period of greatest expansion of the Canadian National railway system.

My hon. friend has pointed out that during that period the investments of the Canadian people in the Canadian National Railways grew very rapidly. That is correct. What he did not point out was that during that period the revenues of the Canadian National Railways grew very much more rapidly.

When my hon. friend spoke of the addition of interest charges during the period from 1925 to 1930, he omitted to state that the ability of the railway company to carry interest charges grew during that period to such a point that for the only two years in the history of the system we had a net return over and above the amount required to pay the interest. This does not mean that I think my judgment, or the judgment of the management of the Canadian National Railways, or the judgment of the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or the judgment of nearly all the industrialists and financiers of Canada, was quite accurate during that period as to what was coming four or five years later. Is it any disgrace to admit it? Hon. gentlemen who were members of this house during that period will remember my experience of coming here as Minister of Railways to propose the building of branch lines, and what was the response of the house, and particularly the response of hon. gentlemen opposite? Always demanding more and more, year after year.

Mr. MANION: I do not remember that I ever did, but I am not going to quarrel with my hon. friend.

Mr. DUNNING: That was the attitude of the opposition. The then member for Inverness comes to my mind, and others would come to mind if I were not speaking extemporaneously.

In respect to the taking over of defunct railway lines, during the period for which

I was responsible as minister we took over the Gaspé railway line. Will any member of this house rise in his place to-day and say that the Gaspe line should not be a part of the Canadian National railway system? During my period as Minister of Railways we also took over the Inverness railway. Will any member rise in his place and say that the Inverness railway should not to-day be part of the Canadian National railway system?

An hon. MEMBER: Better not.

Mr. DUNNING: During the same period hon. members, the Alberta members, will remember the great competition which was developing between the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National with respect to getting into northern Alberta with their respective lines. They will remember the pressure that I as minister endeavoured to exert to prevent useless duplication by the two railways, and the two of them jointly bought out the railway lines then owned by the government of Alberta. Will any hon. member to-day say that the Northern Alberta railway should not be a part of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways? I am sure he will not.

And there, Mr. Speaker, is a complete list of the so-called defunct railways with the exception of the Quebec Southern from Montreal northwards; and in that connection may I say that there was no political pressure from any quarter with respect to it. Time after time during three years Sir Henry Thornton pleaded with me to agree to and to recommend to the government the taking over of that road because of the advantages, demonstrated by his technical men in great detail, which it was supposed would come from it.

Mr. MANION: May I interrupt my hon. friend? I do not wish to bother him; but I have looked over that file, and not only was there political pressure but I can name one of his colleagues who used it and who is sitting within a few feet of him now. Sir Henry Thornton opposed it over and over again, and finally accepted under political pressure.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, if there were political pressure on Sir Henry Thornton I was not aware of it. There was none on me. I can only affirm that Sir Henry Thornton during several years urged repeatedly that it be taken over. At any rate I have reduced the defunct railroads to that one. Apparently my hon. friend would say that the Quebec Southern should not be part of the Canadian National Railways.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. CARDIN: And that road is a paying proposition to-day.

Mr. MANION: I do not think any railroad they took over is a paying proposition. None of the three the hon. gentleman has mentioned is, and I am also certain the Quebec Southern is not.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend can argue that from now until doomsday—

Mr. MANION: We know now who was the minister who put the political pressure on the hon. gentleman to take it over.

Mr. DUNNING: We can argue from now until doomsday whether a particular piece of the Canadian National Railways is or is not a paying proposition. But, as was put to me in the house many times by hon. gentlemen on the other side, there was with respect to these matters, branch and other lines, an obligation on parliament to serve the Canadian people with equipped transportation facilities, and never was it expressed more strongly; never was I subjected to more criticism. My hon. friend speaks with some heat —and I can understand it—of accusations against himself of sabotaging—I think was the word—the Canadian National Railways; but does he not remember how all across this country it was published during the years 1927 and 1928 that I, because of alleged friendship with the Canadian Pacific Railway, was hindering Sir Henry Thornton's great scheme of expansion of the people's system.

Mr. MANION: I never said it.

Mr. DUNNING: Probably not, but my hon. friend's friends did, and the press which supported his party did. I went through that experience, Mr. Speaker. That is one of the things which is inseparable from government ownership and the discussion of a government-owned enterprise in a democratic assembly. We have to take it whether we like it or not. Whether we are here or hon. gentlemen opposite are here, the people's representatives will speak their minds and the minds of their people, will give vent to the suspicions which they entertain, and all our complaining in that regard will not make a bit of difference.

Let me make just one observation with regard to political promises. I know my hon. friend will forgive me for reminding him of some of his own. I am sure he remembers going to Manitoba. I am sure he remembers categorically promising that if his party were returned to power in 1930, the Mafeking cut-off would be built.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, I absolutely deny that I ever made any such promise. I admit the promise was made in that election, but I never made any such promise.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend made it in his address in the town of Dauphin during the election in 1930.

Mr. MANION: I made no such promise; I make the statement again. Just because a couple of ministers over there make the statement that I made that promise does not prove it. I state that I did not make the promise. I think I ought to know something about my own promises.

Mr. WARD: If I may be permitted, I was present—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WARD: —and I will take my oath that the hon. gentleman who is now leader of the opposition did say, speaking in Dauphin town hall, that if he were returned to power, his party would build the Mafeking cut-off and it would be built forthwith.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. gentleman who rose in his place and said I made that promise to bring forward the quotation that I made such a statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: No, I am not unfair enough to ask him to do it now—that is a fancy trick such as we get from hon. gentlemen opposite—but we are just beginning this session; we have plenty of time, and I ask him to bring it forward at the proper time and show me where I made it.

Mr. DUNNING: Now that this Donnybrook is over, may I continue? I merely cited an instance which, whether my hon. friend was guilty or not guilty, was certainly widely published at the time. I called upon my own memory with respect to it and got it confirmed by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) who says he heard it there. We shall, however, allow the hon. member for Dauphin and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) to settle that between themselves. All I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, is this, and this is the really serious word. The administration of a great public utility demands a degree of restraint on the part of all of us to which none of us in this parliament has so far proved equal. That is my firm belief. No matter which party of us is in opposition, we do belabour the government politically with respect to the administration of this great utility. That has been the history to date. I mention it merely in order that in this time of great difficulty we may all look at it—and I do not except hon. gentlemen in the corner; they are not any more righteous than the rest of us in that regard; I include everybody, including myself. There is no subject about which in the interests of Canda we require more heart searching than in regard to statements we make with respect to the conduct of our great publicly owned utility. That is all I want to say. I have spoken quite extemporaneously, because my hon. friend referred to these matters.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to call attention to a remark made in this debate this afternoon with reference to myself by the hon. member for Wellington North (Mr. Blair) which I think, when his attention is called to it, he will withdraw. The short statement which the hon. member made at ten minutes to six, when I was not in the house, was that—

> . . . one of the hon. members from Toronto said, "I view with alarm the visit of Cordell Hull to Canada." Yes, he viewed with alarm the visit of a friendly ambassador to Canada.
> Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East): Who said that?
> Mr. Blair: What is Tommy Church's constituency?
> Mr. Lapointe: Broadview.
> Mr. Blair: Broadview?—the name is a misnomer. There is no "broadview" about that —it is one of the narrowest things I ever heard, in regard to Americans. And we are at war with them, because Cordell Hull comes to visit us! There are views of things which I wish, for the sake of civilization and for the sake of common decency and courtesy, could be erased from Hansard.

Mr. Speaker, I never on any occasion made remarks like that. I have too much respect for the famous statesman who was visiting the university of Toronto to receive a degree. Also, I have welcomed and received thousands and tens of thousands of Americans and conventions as I lived in a city near the border, and this is the first time in all these long years I have been in the public service that it has been suggested that a discourteous remark of that kind had been made by me about any of them. May I say to the hon. member that he did not have a newspaper in his hand nor did he read from one. He never read such an article, and no newspaper ever published such an article. What I did say was this, after referring to the very fine reception at the university accorded to a distinguished and honoured United States citizen: I said that I viewed with alarm the effect which I believed the Anglo-American treaty would have on empire preferences, on the Ottawa agreements, and on acute unemployment in Toronto. No reference was made in that connection to the distinguished statesman the hon. member mentioned: Mr. Cordell Hull. He has not the paper, cannot produce it, and never saw any such statement in any paper. I have too high a regard for that distinguished statesman and for the American people to make such an absurd statement anywhere. I have welcomed tens of thousands of American visitors at conventions in a long public career, and never on any occasion have I shown any discourtesy to or any disrespect for the great nation which they represented and which I hold in the highest regard. If the hon. gentleman will say the same thing outside the house to-morrow, I will immediately sue him for libel and slander. He never saw such a statement in any paper, and his memory is not correct.

Mr. BLAIR: I simply gave a report which I saw in a paper. The hon. gentleman says he did not say it, and I accept his word and apologize.

Motion (Mr. Matthews) agreed to.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are of the honourable the privy council.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house will, on Monday next, resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): This is just a pro forma motion, is it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The rules provide that once the address has been agreed to, the next order of business is to constitute the committees of supply and ways and means.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house will, on Friday next, resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

MAIN ESTIMATES 1939-40

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the message of His Excellency the Governor General, together with the estimates presented on January 25, 1939, be referred to the committee of supply, with the exception of items Nos. 442, 443 and 454.

He said: I might explain that the items excepted are those which are later to be referred to the special committee on the Canadian National Railways.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Would my hon. friend have any objection to the house proceeding to government notices of motion so that we might introduce the three resolutions under that heading?

[Mr. Martin.]

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): To-night?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MANION: I think we have been here long enough.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would take only about two minutes, but if there is objection to introducing them I would move that the house do now adjourn.

Mr. MANION: What will be the business to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To-morrow we shall take whatever business appears on the order paper. We shall start at the beginning and go right on, just in the order in which it appears.

Mr. MANION: I assume the government will introduce the three government orders to which the Prime Minister has just referred?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was what I wanted to do, to take up the three government notices of motion in order that we might be in a position to bring them on to-morrow. All that is necessary is for the house to permit the ministers to state that His Excellency the Governor General has been informed of the subject matter of these resolutions and recommends them to the house. Then to-morrow they would appear under government orders, but if we cannot do that they will just stay where they are.

Mr. MANION: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and I have made long speeches to-night, and I think we need a rest. We had better leave it until to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well. I move that the house do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11.02 p.m.

Friday, February 3, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS AND REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL —REFERENCE TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to notice given I move:

That the public accounts and the report of the auditor general for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1938, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, yesterday, having given earlier in the week the notice required under the rules of the house, I endeavoured to move a motion which was read to the house, and on your order it was allowed to stand. I submit that on this occasion my motion has priority to that which has been introduced now by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) inasmuch as the first part of my motion deals with a reference to the public accounts committee of the public accounts and the report of the auditor general.

Mr. DUNNING: On the point of order, I also gave notice several days ago of my intention to move this motion. From my point of view it is a formal motion, one which it is my duty to move.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It has to be done.

Mr. DUNNING: It must be done, I think. I am not interfering at all with my hon. friend.

Mr. MacNEIL: May I have permission to move my motion?

Mr. FINN: I think that—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MacNEIL: I desire to move, seconded by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas):

> That the public accounts and the report of the auditor general for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1938, together with a copy of the agreement between the government and the John Inglis Company of Toronto for the manufacture of Bren machine guns, the report of the royal commission dealing with said agreement and all related documents, evidence, vouchers and exhibits, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

I have already declared my views with regard to this situation. I do not intend to weary the house at this stage with any needless repetition. I merely point to the fact that on page 35 of the report the Hon. Mr. Justice Davis says very definitely:

> It will be for those charged with the responsibility of dealing with the facts, i.e., the government and parliament, to examine and study them and to take such action . . . as they may see fit.

I submit that this house cannot evade its responsibility in respect of the specific issues referred to parliament by the commission, namely, one, as to whether or not the possibilities of public manufacture or manufacture in publicly controlled factories were fully explored by the government instead of resorting to—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Are there any other hon. members who wish to speak to the point of order? The hon. member has given me a motion to be presented, but I have not yet put it.

Mr. DUNNING: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no point of order.

Mr. MacNEIL: The second specific reference is contained on page 35 of the report wherein parliament is asked to judge whether the conduct of the individuals concerned was above question. I wish to make it clear that the question of personal corruption and graft is not a matter of reference to the committee, but there is a necessity for inquiring as to whether or not accurate statements were made.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would direct the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the motion he has handed me for presentation to the house is in one respect similar to a motion already moved by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). Standing order 47, paragraph 384 reads:

> It is a rule in both houses, which is essential to the due performance of their duties that no question or bill shall be offered that is substantially the same as one on which their judgment has already been expressed in the current session.

A motion was presented by the Minister of Finance and adopted by the house, and as I read the motion which the hon. gentleman now proposes to submit, it is substantially the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On the point raised, may I say, Mr. Speaker, that, as I see it, the essential feature of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) is to get a certain agreement referred to the public accounts committee. When that agreement is before the committee he wishes also to be sure that the public accounts of the year and the report of the auditor general have been submitted. The Minister of Finance, following the customary procedure in this house, immediately after the committees of supply and ways and means had been set up, tabled the public accounts and the auditor general's report and requested that they be referred to the public accounts committee, which committee was constituted some days ago. That part of the motion of my hon. friend has now been complied with, but what he is mainly after is the reference to the public accounts committee of the contract with the John Inglis Company Limited, also the report of the royal commission on the Bren machine gun contract. That is the part of his motion which my hon. friend is concerned about, although it refers also to the other two reports. As regards the other two, I submit it is raising a question on a mere technicality and the house should not pay attention to that aspect of it, but should allow the hon. gentleman to proceed with his motion.

Mr. MANION: Before you give your ruling, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I entirely agree with the Prime Minister. The motion of the Minister of Finance is a pro forma motion and while there is some overlapping, it is not intentional.

Mr. SPEAKER: It would be better if the hon. member deleted the words having to do with the reference of the public accounts and the auditor general's report to the public accounts committee.

Mr. MacNEIL: I was under the impression that I was following the prescribed formula necessary to secure reference of the matter to the public accounts committee. I thought that in order to attain this end it was necessary for me to introduce my motion with the preface which it carries. I understand the Prime Minister agrees that there is no overlapping.

If I may proceed, the third issue which should be referred to the public accounts committee, and on which parliament was asked to judge, was whether adequate reasons existed for the failure of the interdepartmental committee to report back to the government when the system of supervision of contracts broke down. Reference to this will be found on page 41 of the commissioner's report.

The fourth point is whether the procedure followed in negotiating the contract protected the public interest. That reference is on page 49.

The fifth and final specific reference is whether proper steps were taken to ensure proper discharge of the responsibility assumed in the selection of a favoured contractor. That reference will be found on page 50.

I wish to add, before I take my seat, that in my opinion it is the responsibility of this committee to examine the system of awarding contracts of this kind to ensure that the operation of political patronage does not in any way prejudice the public interest. I submit that the proper method of inquiry is through a standing committee of this house. It may not be necessary to review all the evidence that was heard before the commissioner, but certain facts have been cited, and starting at the point where the commission left off parliament should deal with the matter in a very searching and adequate way. I submit that this matter should be referred without delay to the standing committee on public accounts with instructions to go into it thoroughly and report back to the house thereon, and I so move.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I rise not in any way to oppose the motion of my hon. friend, but rather to remind him that the government indicated some days ago that they were quite prepared to support his motion and to allow it to carry. In fact, when my hon. friend sought yesterday to have the motion carried without debate, the government acquiesced at once, and only because of an objection raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) has the motion not already carried and the reference been made to the public accounts committee. An objection having been raised to having the motion carry without debate, I feel I should say a word or two regarding the circumstances which governed the actions of the administration in having the matter referred to in the motion already inquired into.

As the house is aware, the occasion of the inquiry was the publication in Maclean's magazine, on September 1, of a sensational article entitled Canada's Armament Mystery. This article attracted a great deal of attention in the public press. It did not contain any charges, but it had allegations of a sort which were calculated to create suspicion with respect to the manner in which government contracts in connection with armaments and munitions were being awarded or carried out. When this article appeared inquiries were made immediately of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), of myself and others as to what we thought about it. As I recollect, the Minister of National Defence was on his way back from British Columbia to Ottawa when he was interviewed by a reporter of one of the newspapers and asked what he thought about the allegations that were made in the article. The minister replied that he thought that, as soon as parliament met, the article itself and all matters to which it referred should be made a subject of reference to the public accounts committee and the fullest possible inquiry made by the committee into the particular contract to which the article referred, namely, the contract respecting the manufacture of Bren machine guns which had been awarded to the John Inglis Company Limited. That was the minister's position the moment he saw the article.

As I have said, the article was published on September 1, and the minister reached Ottawa a few days after. When he arrived in Ottawa there was a meeting of the cabinet which he attended. He brought the matter up for the consideration of the government, and he felt, and other members of the government felt, that if this article with the allegations it contained were to go without investigation until parliament reassembled, which would be some time in the new year, there would immediately be created in the public mind considerable concern over these allegations and it would be assumed that the government was seeking to avoid inquiry into the matter. The government took the alternative course of not delaying for one moment the matter of instituting an inquiry, and adopted the course which would afford the most effective means for the fullest and most searching kind of inquiry, namely, an inquiry under royal commission by a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada.

I ask hon. members if it is not a fact that had there been no judicial inquiry into this matter up to this time, the government would long ere this have been charged with having waited until this parliament met before having any inquiry made into the allegations. That is undoubtedly the indictment which we would have met as soon as we assembled here, that serious charges had been made against the Department of National Defence on a matter connected with that department at a time when conditions in the world were very critical, and that we had allowed months to pass without having any inquiry made. The government felt that the matter was all-important, in the sense that it was desirable that any ground even for suspicion concerning the conduct of the minister or any member of his staff or anything that had been done or left undone by any official of the government should be immediately known or removed and not permitted to remain a matter of conjecture. The government therefore decided to have a royal commission appointed at once.

In connection with the appointment of the royal commission I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the government selected as the commissioner one holding such a high judicial position and so well known by the citizens of Canada generally that there could be no doubt in the mind of anyone as to the appropriateness of the appointment for an inquiry of the kind. The government made its selection from the personnel of the Supreme Court of Canada. May I also draw to the attention of the house the fact that the judge of the Supreme Court selected was not a member of the judiciary who had been appointed under a Liberal administration but one who owed his appointment to a Conservative administration, an administration of which my hon. friend the present leader of the opposition was a member. I think I am right when I say that throughout Canada generally it was felt that if the government had searched the country over, no single person, unless it were the chief justice himself, could possibly have been chosen who would have been regarded as so completely disinterested and so well qualified to perform the function of commissioner in an investigation of this kind as was Mr. Justice Davis.

The article as I say appeared on September 1. It was on September 7 that the commission was issued to Mr. Justice Davis. The commission opened its proceedings on September 19; the proceedings continued until November 24; on December 29 the report of the commissioner was presented. It was immediately translated into French, printed in both French and English, and was tabled the day after this house began its session. I ask if more expedition to have all the facts brought out in the inquiry made available to this House of Commons when parliament met, was possible.

I have mentioned the eminent suitability of Mr. Justice Davis as commissioner, and the expedition with which the whole inquiry was conducted. I should like to emphasize as well the thoroughness with which the investigation was carried on. Perhaps before indicating what Mr. Justice Davis himself felt about the thoroughness of the inquiry, I might give to the house the text of the order in council pursuant to which the commission was appointed. The order will indicate more clearly than anything else the scope of the authority which the commissioner had in conducting the inquiry. The order is dated the 7th September, 1938, and is as follows:

P.C. 2251.

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated September 7, 1938, from the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister, representing that a certain Canadian periodical publication, dated September 1, 1938, contained a general article under the caption "Canada's Armament Mystery," purporting to have been prepared by Lieut.-Col. George A. Drew.

The Prime Minister observes that the author criticized some of the provisions of a certain contract executed on the 31st day of March, 1938, and tabled in parliament on the 29th day of June, 1938, made between His Majesty the King represented by the Honourable the Minister of National Defence for Canada and John Inglis Co., Limited, whereby the company undertook to furnish to His Majesty a certain supply of Bren machine guns for the use of the defence forces of Canada; numerous allegations relating to the negotiation, the terms of the contract and transactions thereunder, were made by the author as a result of which considerable public interest has since been evinced.

The Prime Minister is of opinion that a full and complete inquiry should be set on foot with the least possible delay in order that the public may be fully informed of the circumstances surrounding the making of this contract and the terms thereof.

The Prime Minister, therefore, recommends that the Honourable Mr. Justice Henry Hague Davis, a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, be appointed a commissioner under Part I of the Inquiries Act to inquire fully into the preliminary discussions and negotiations leading up to and the completion of the said contract, and into the shareholdings and the transactions, if any, in the shares or securities of the said company, and the connection or activities, if any, of any member of the House of Commons in the discussions and negotiations leading up to the said contract or in the affairs of the said company or in the sale of shares or securities of the said company, and generally to inquire fully into all matters relating to the said contract and to the affairs of the said company and to the steps taken to protect the public interest; and to report upon the same.

The Prime Minister further recommends that the commissioner be authorized to engage the services of such technical advisers or other experts, clerks, reporters and assistants as he may deem necessary or advisable.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendations and submit the same for approval.

(Signed) H. W. Lothrop,
Asst. Clerk of the Privy Council.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: Did the commission which was issued follow in exact terms the last half of that order in council? Without discussion, I would just say that the commissioner's attention would not be directed to the order in council but rather to the terms of the commission issued to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not the commission before me, but I should think it would have followed the terms of the order in council. If it did not, I shall read to my hon. friend in a moment a letter which I personally sent to the commissioner at the time I transmitted to him a copy of the order in council appointing him a commissioner. The letter made clear to Mr. Justice Davis that if in the course of the inquiry any more latitude were required for investigation of any phase of the matter, the government would see that it was accorded to him, and if necessary to this end, his commission would be amended accordingly.

When the order in council was passed, the matter being one of great public interest, I released to the press from the office of the Prime Minister a statement making perfectly clear the desire of the government that the inquiry should be as complete, comprehensive and thorough as it was possible to make it. The statement I think appeared in all the papers of the country, but I shall read it to hon. members in order to refresh their memories:

On Thursday last the Honourable Mr. Mackenzie, Minister of National Defence, on behalf of the government, announced that a royal commission would be appointed to undertake as soon as possible an inquiry into the allegations made by Colonel George Drew in Maclean's Magazine of September 1st, regarding the contract made by the National Defence department with the John Inglis Company of Toronto for the manufacture of Bren guns.

At the request of the Prime Minister, Mr. Justice Davis of the Supreme Court of Canada, has agreed to undertake the inquiry. Mr. Justice Davis has done so on the understanding that he receive only his out-of-pocket expenses.

The Honourable J. L. Ralston has been retained as counsel for the government to assist the commission.

The reference to the commission, while it does not specifically mention the article in Maclean's magazine, has been made broad enough to cover all of Colonel Drew's allegations, as set forth therein. This being its purpose, should it appear to the commissioner in the course of his inquiry that the terms or wording of the reference are to this end inadequate in any particular, the reference will be enlarged as, in the opinion of the commissioner, will serve adequately to meet its intended purpose.

The government hopes Colonel Drew will appear before the commission and give all the assistance he can in substantiation of his allegations. Further, the government would be prepared to pay the reasonable expenses and remuneration of counsel for Colonel Drew, should he wish to engage counsel to assist him.

As soon as the preliminary work of organization of the commission is completed, the inquiry will commence. This, it is expected, will be not later than the 19th instant.

In the troubled world of to-day, the Canadian people reluctantly have shouldered what is, for them, a very considerable burden, for the purpose of national defence. The Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence, and the government as a whole, desire that in all the defence measures that may be taken by the government, not only shall there be no wrongdoing, but no suspicion of wrongdoing. The Canadian people are entitled to this. The article published by Colonel Drew cannot but create suspicion on these matters in the minds of the Canadian people. For this reason the government desires that the inquiry be conducted as expeditiously and as thoroughly as possible.

Mr. MANION: I did not quite catch what my right hon. friend said at first. Is that a letter to Mr. Justice Davis or a statement to the press?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a statement which was given out to the press from the office of the Prime Minister on September 7; but when I communicated with Mr. Justice Davis in regard to his commission and the order in council which was passed in reference thereto, I enclosed a copy of that statement so that Mr. Justice Davis would see clearly what was in the mind of the government with respect to the scope of the inquiry, the thoroughness with which we expected the investigation to be made and the readiness of the administration to enlarge the commission in any way, at any time should he deem that course necessary in order to give him all the scope possible.

Mr. MANION: If I might ask one further question, was a copy of that statement also sent to Mr. Ralston, the government counsel?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Ralston would, I presume, have seen the statement in the press; there was no special copy sent to him as far as I recall. Since my hon. friend has mentioned Mr. Ralston I might inform the house that Mr. Justice Davis was prepared to accept the work of the commission only on the condition that he should receive no remuneration for his services but merely that his out-of-pocket expenses should be met. Colonel Ralston was appointed by the government to assist the commission. Colonel Ralston also regarded the matter as one of public duty at a time of great concern in the country, and he also agreed to act as counsel to assist the commission, but only on the condition that he would not be given any honorarium or remuneration for his professional services but allowed simply such expenses or disbursements as might be incurred in the course of the inquiry.

The letter I wrote Mr. Justice Davis was as follows:

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, September 8, 1938.

The Honourable Mr. Justice Davis,
361 Mariposa Road,
Rockcliffe,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Mr. Justice Davis:

I have pleasure in enclosing a copy of order in council P.C. 2251, covering your appointment as a commissioner to inquire fully into the circumstances of the contract with the John Inglis Company for the supply of Bren machine guns for the use of the defence forces of Canada. I enclose, as well, a copy of the statement given to the press following the meeting of the cabinet yesterday.

I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to express the deep appreciation of my colleagues and myself of your willingness to undertake this public duty. I need scarcely add that you will have the full support and cooperation of the government which, above all else, desires that the inquiry be carried out in a manner which will meet with the entire approval of the Canadian people.

With kindest personal regards,

Yours very sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

The reply by Mr. Justice Davis to this communication was as follows:

Judges' Chambers
Supreme Court,
Ottawa
September 10th, 1938.

The Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

My dear Mr. Prime Minister,

Your letter of the 8th instant, enclosing a copy of order in council P.C. 2251 covering my appointment as a commissioner to inquire fully into the Bren machine guns contract, as well as a copy of the statement given to the press, have been duly received.

I particularly note your assurance of the full support and cooperation of the government in the work of the commission and please accept my assurance that I do value the expression of the appreciation of yourself and your colleagues in my undertaking the work.

I was made fully aware by Mr. Crerar on your behalf of the government's attitude in the whole matter before accepting the commission and it was such that it became, with the full concurrence of the chief justice of the court, my plain duty to accede to your request under the special circumstances.

Yours very truly,

H. H. Davis.

The reference to my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) in that letter arises from the fact that my colleague was acting Prime Minister during part of the time I unfortunately was indisposed, when this matter first came up. At my request he went to confer with Mr. Justice Davis and with the chief justice with respect to securing, if possible, the services of Mr. Justice Davis for the work of the commission.

Just here I should like to say how much the government appreciated Mr. Justice Davis undertaking this task as a public duty, and also the kindness of the chief justice, the Right Hon. Sir Lyman Duff, in allowing one of the members of his court, at a time when the court was pressed in its work, to give the necessary time to conduct this all-important inquiry. Both the chief justice and Mr. Justice Davis were actuated, I know, by the highest motives of public service, and I think I should express to each of them the appreciation not only of the government but of this house in not having hesitated to inconvenience themselves to the extent they did in being prepared to have the work of the commission taken on by a member of the court as well as for the valuable public service which was thereby performed.

What I have read indicates, I believe, as clearly as anything possibly could that it would have been impossible to have given any commissioner more complete authority to inquire into every phase and aspect of a situation than was given to Mr. Justice Davis.

I think there is no question but that the commissioner so understood his powers, and that he conducted the inquiry in a manner which would enable him to say to the government that the whole task had been performed very thoroughly. I should like to read what Mr. Justice Davis himself has said with respect to the thorough manner in which the inquiry was conducted. The house has before it the report of the royal commission on the Bren machine gun contract, and at page 4 hon. members will find the following statement by Mr. Justice Davis:

> The commission opened on September 19, 1938, and concluded on Thursday, November 24, 1938. The taking of testimony and the argument of counsel occupied thirty-six days. With the exception of Major General Caldwell (then master general of the ordnance) of the Department of National Defence, whose illness prevented his being examined at any time during the sittings of the commission, every one who it was thought might be able to throw light on the subject of the inquiry gave testimony voluntarily.
> It was not necessary to issue a single subpoena to enforce the attendance of any witness. Your commissioner is satisfied that all available documents in any way relevant and material to the subject matter of the inquiry were presented to the commission.

And later, at page 52, in the concluding portions of the report Mr. Justice Davis emphasizes again the complete nature of the inquiry, in the following words:

> All the sittings of the commission were public and your commissioner was pleased to hear counsel characterize the inquiry at its close, as "a most searching and thorough inquiry."

Just in passing I should like to direct attention to the words of the commissioner wherein he states that all the sittings of the commission were public. In so doing I must refer to the somewhat hasty remarks made yesterday by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) when he said that in having the matter referred to the public accounts committee it was being referred to some "packed committee" which would hold its proceedings behind closed doors. I was pleased to notice my hon. friend felt he had used an exaggerated and unwarranted phrase at the time, and withdrew it. The point I wish to make clear at this time is that the public accounts committee does not operate behind closed doors. The inquiry by the committee will be as much in the open as was the inquiry before Mr. Justice Davis.

Further, I would point out with respect to the composition of the committee that, so far as representation from the different sides of the house is concerned, it will be precisely the same proportions and follow the same rules as have been followed in setting up all committees in previous sessions and in all parliaments.

There is only one other matter to which I should like to refer—because I do not think this is the occasion on which to debate any phases of the report. My opinion is that matters therein referred to come up more properly at other times. The motion now before us has regard to the reference of the John Inglis Company contract, and one or two other matters, to the committee on public accounts. Inasmuch, however, as the leader of the opposition has indicated that it is desirable to have a debate on the motion in its present form, nothwithstanding the acceptance by the government of the motion in its entirety, and the fact, as has been already pointed out, that part of what is requested in the motion has already been met through the tabling of certain reports and their reference to the public accounts committee, I believe I should at once read to the house what the commissioner has to say with respect to the conduct of the Minister of National Defence, the conduct of officials in the minister's department and of others of the public service whose action in some particular would seem to have been called in question by the allegations in the article which occasioned the appointment of the commission.

I direct the attention of the house to what is said at page 51 of the report. Before reading may I repeat that the commissioner indicated nothing had been left undone which he thought could have been done, that the inquiry was as searching as it possibly could be, and that everything which was considered relevant was fully inquired into. The commissioner says:

> There is no evidence that any member of the Senate or of the House of Commons of Canada was admitted to any share or part of the contract, or to any benefits to arise therefrom, or had been promised or given any suggestion that he was to have any share or part of the contract or was to be admitted to any share or part of the contract, or to any benefit to arise from the contract.

Then a little farther on he says:

> There is no evidence that any senator or member had any connection with or took any part in the affairs of the company or in the sale of shares or securities of the company.
> I think it right to say that there is no evidence (nor is there in the evidence any ground for suspicion) that the minister or the deputy minister or any officer or official of the Department of National Defence was guilty of any act of corruption or anything in the nature of corruption.

I have felt it desirable to place this quotation from the report before hon. members, particularly because of the intimation made by the leader of the opposition that despite its acceptance by the government we are to have a debate on the motion at the present time.

May I conclude my observations by drawing the attention of hon. members to the rules of the house with respect to committees appointed to inquire into particular matters. I raise the point I do because I believe it suggests something that possibly the leader of the opposition as well as many other hon. members may have overlooked. It is a point which I believe is important to bring to their attention before the debate proceeds further. Subsection 2 of standing order 63 with respect to select special committees of the house, as it appears in Beauchesne's parliamentary rules and forms, is as follows:

> It shall always be understood that no member who declares or decides against the principle of a bill, resolution, or matter to be committed, can be nominated of such committee.

Citation No. 625, which is explanatory of the rule, is as follows:

> The term "select" committee, is usually applied to designate a committee appointed to consider a particular subject, on the occurrence of the occasion for its appointment, as where a committee is appointed to consider a petition or memorial, or to make inquiries into a particular subject. Select committees are sometimes turned into standing committees by subsequent references to them relating to the same subject.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that the committee on public accounts is not a select special committee, but that it is one of the standing committees of the house. As I have just indicated, however, a select special committee may become a standing committee. I submit, however, that the principle is precisely the same with respect to what should govern the action of hon. members in discussing a matter which is being referred to any committee, for purposes of investigation and adjudication.

The public accounts committee will have in its membership several hon. members of the house and, when this motion carries, the committee will have referred to it the contract in question and matters relevant thereto. Each hon. member of the committee will be expected, on his honour, to investigate fully the matter which has been referred to the committee of which he is a member. He will be expected, as one who is privileged to sit on the committee, to form his judgment with respect to what should be reported to the house. The house in turn will be expected to consider, with the regard that is due a report coming from the public accounts committee, what is sent to it by members of that committee as a result of the special opportunity they have had to inquire into all aspects of the matter referred to them.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not sure I understand the Prime Minister. Does the right hon. gentleman say that any hon. member who might now, during this stage of the debate on the resolution, take a position opposing the reference to the public accounts committee, would be prohibited from sitting on that committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, no. I am glad the hon. member has raised a question with respect to the possibility of any hon. member opposing the reference to the public accounts committee. I think it is quite possible that after the very thorough inquiry made under royal commission by Mr. Justice Davis it might have been expected by some that the government, particularly when parliament is sitting and has many important duties to perform, would have opposed a second investigation which was likely to occupy a great deal of time and involve a heavy expense, and one which would go over the same ground. Some hon. members may have thought that for these reasons the government would oppose a motion to refer the matter to a committee.

Had the government taken that stand, of course we would have expected hon. members to debate at great length the question whether or not we were justified in refusing to have the matter investigated a second time by a committee of the house. But the government is not taking that stand. On the contrary it is agreeing to the matter going for further inquiry to the public accounts committee, and the matter is going to a committee which will have the fullest rights of inquiry. The government will expect the committee to perform the duty which falls upon all committees, namely to report back to the house the results of its inquiry. When the committee's report is received in this house there will be an opportunity afforded to debate the whole question at any length that hon. members may wish. We are not seeking to shut off debate on this question. Least of anyone do I wish to shut it off, but I do wish to point out to the house that the inquiry before the public accounts committee will of necessity run over very much the same ground as has already been gone over. It will involve a great deal of the time of hon. members of this house and particularly of the minister, as well as of members of the public service when there are many serious matters for us to discuss here, and to be attended to elsewhere. The time for general debate it seems to me is when the committee has reported.

The point I am raising for consideration at the moment is whether hon. members have considered their position in entering into a debate at the present time on a matter that is to be referred to the public accounts committee and possibly determining by the remarks that they may make what their attitude will be in that committee, thereby prejudging the whole matter. I have no desire in any way to preclude debate. The hon. member for Vancouver North has moved that a certain matter should be referred to the public accounts committee. His motion was in proper form, and so far as I was able to hear what he had to say in supporting his motion, he gave no expression of view which could prejudice his position if he were on the public accounts committee. What I am concerned about is that some other hon. members in the course of debate at this stage may without realizing the significance of their actions commit themselves by their expressions to such an extent that every man, woman and child in this country will know that they have arrived at a particular attitude which they intend to maintain in the committee, and that the committee therefore would lose in the public mind if not also in fact the judicial aspect which it ought to have.

I think that the matter is sufficiently clear. As I say, if it were a special committee of the house being appointed for this purpose and to which this reference was being made, no hon. member who had expressed views in this house which prejudged the situation would be entitled to sit on that committee. I submit that in this particular case, seeing that the reference is specific, the public accounts committee is, as regards the position of those who may serve on it, very much in the same position as if the reference had been to a special committee. The underlying principle is the same. I regard the matter as being sufficiently serious to warrant a step which will enable hon. members to consider their attitudes carefully before they begin to speak in the course of the debate. In order to give them that opportunity I propose to move the adjournment of the debate with a view to having it continued on Monday next instead of proceeded with this afternoon, and I move accordingly.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): On a point of order, before the motion is put, because that motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion for the adjournment is not debatable.

Mr. CAHAN: The reference the Prime Minister made cannot be applied to hon. members who are members of a standing committee of the house. The paragraph of standing order 65 which he read makes it very clear that it refers to a special committee and does not refer to a standing committee of the house. Paragraph 2 of standing order 65 reads:

> It shall always be understood that no member who declares or decides against the principle of a bill, resolution, or matter to be committed, can be nominated of such committee.

That refers to the appointment of a special committee to consider a special bill, resolution or matter. After the discussion regarding the appointment of a special committee, it is clear from this that no person who has declared against the principle of a bill, resolution or matter can be appointed as a member of that special committee. But that does not refer to a standing committee of the house because such a committee is already appointed. It is open to discuss before that committee any matter that is properly before it by order of the house. In this case the fact that this matter is being referred to a standing committee instead of a special committee shows that the members of that standing committee are not now precluded from expressing opinions with regard to the subject matter. I suggest that the statement just made by the Prime Minister is by way of intimidation rather than enlightenment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend were not such an old member of this house and usually such a gentleman I would ask him to withdraw his remark that I am trying to intimidate the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Withdraw it.

Mr. CAHAN: I have not suggested that. Perhaps the word "intimidate" may be too strong and I shall withdraw it. But he was trying to influence members of the committee who might speak on this motion and so preclude them from exercising their ordinary rights and privileges in discussing the motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will take the trouble to read in Hansard what I have said he will see why out of respect for his years I did not interrupt him while he was speaking. He has repeated exactly what I said and made very clear. I stated in the plainest possible language that there was a difference between a standing committee and a select committee; that the members of a standing committee were free, despite what they might say, to be on that committee, but that if they were members of a special committee to which a particular matter had been referred they would not be allowed to sit on the committee if they in any way had prejudged the matter during the course of a debate. I was pointing out that to all intents and purposes the principle was the same—

Mr. CAHAN: That is where in the application of the rule I differ entirely.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —in regard to a matter which is being referred specially to a committee. My hon. friend may take a different view of it when he comes to speak, but I say to him that if in the course of his remarks he, because of the latitude which is permitted him in debate, prejudges the issue which is being referred to the committee, the public itself will form its own opinion as to how unbiased he is likely to be as a member of the committee.

Mr. CAHAN: I am quite willing to submit my reputation to the public.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If hon. members wish to divide and enough of them will rise, to indicate that such is their wish, the house will have a division.

Mr. HEAPS: I would just point out to the Prime Minister that the only objection taken is to the fact that the Speaker has not called for the ayes and nays.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour of the motion will please say aye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the ayes have it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

Motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) agreed to on division, and debate adjourned.

LOAN OF $750,000,000

TO MEET LOANS OR OBLIGATIONS, TO PURCHASE UNMATURED SECURITIES, AND FOR GENERAL PURPOSES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada, and also for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada, and for public works and general purposes.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FISHING INDUSTRY

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT TO DISCUSS MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE—LOSS OF LOBSTER TRAPS AND EQUIPMENT ON WESTERN COAST OF NOVA SCOTIA

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I draw attention to a matter which I think his honour the Speaker may have overlooked. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) had risen on motions to discuss a matter which he wished to discuss yesterday but was then too late in bringing up. I think the hon. member is entitled to speak on motions before we proceed to government notices of motion, under orders of the day.

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I desire first to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I rise for the purpose of asking your leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance. The motion is seconded by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard). The matter I desire to place before the house, in order to establish my right to go on with it under my motion is the distress amongst the lobster fishermen, particularly in the province of Nova Scotia, from Cole Harbour in Halifax county to "Hubbard's" and from there down through Lunenburg-Queens, Shelburne-Yarmouth and that part of Digby county which is part of Shelburne-Yarmouth county.

The severe losses which were sustained by the lobster fishermen from a terrific gale on December 6, which was a major disaster, deprived these fishermen of their pots, equipment, and gear, and to-day they have no means whatever of replenishing or renewing that equipment in order that they may earn a livelihood. Along the shores of my own constituency—and I believe the same situation exists in other constituencies along the coast —utter privation, want and distress prevail. In my own constituency the lack of nourishment of those who live along a part of that rockbound coast is such that tuberculosis has cast its gloom. Sisters of Charity, two graduate nurses and a dietitian were sent into those districts. Two hundred quarts of milk and cream are being sent to the homes where this dread disease is taking toll.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has not yet had leave to move the adjournment of the house. I have not received a statement as to the urgency for adjournment.

Mr. FINN: I believe the rule says that a motion to adjourn the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance shall always be in order, and that no second motion to the same effect shall be made. It goes on to say later that in the motion you must give your preliminary grounds in order to show the reason, the cause, and the necessity of moving the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should state the matter that he wants to put before the house, and he is then supposed to hand the motion to the Speaker with a statement as to the urgency of the matter. He has not done so yet.

Mr. FINN: Well then, after these few preliminary remarks of mine as to the matter of urgency, I will hand to your honour the Speaker my reasons as set out in the motion, seconded by my hon. and genial deskmate—not classmate—the hon. member for Kamouraska.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have received the statement and have considered the remarks of the hon. member. I do not think the matter is of such urgent public importance that it is necessary to adjourn the house on that account. It may be a matter of urgent local importance, but that is not sufficient to sustain the motion.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Speaker, I did not catch what your ruling is. It is pretty hard for us in this chamber to hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: I said that I did not consider the matter one of urgent public importance and therefore, according to the rules, I was not bound to read the statement.

Mr. FINN: All I say, Mr. Speaker, is that I consider it is of sufficiently urgent importance, although of a local character—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have given my decision.

Mr. FINN: —in one province.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have rendered my decision.

[Mr. Finn.]

Mr. FINN: I appeal, Mr. Speaker, from your ruling. It is the first time I have ever done so, but I must do it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I do not know whether your honour has given a decision, but I would support the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) in the submission that he is making, that it is a matter of urgent public importance. It has affected a large section of an important industry in eastern Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, according to page 72 of the rules, if an hon. member asks for leave of the house, and it is granted, I believe he has the right to proceed. I understand that the hon. member has the leave of the house to proceed, and with all deference I suggest that he be allowed to go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: If twenty hon. members will rise to support the motion it will be considered.

And leave having been granted:

Mr. MANION: On a point of order, while I entirely agree with the decision of the house, and recognize that some of my hon. friends opposite were trying to help the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) to proceed, I should like to draw attention to the fact that when once a ruling is made by Mr. Speaker it is not, I imagine, in order for three or four hon. members to rise in their places for various reasons and again debate the matter.

Mr. FINN: The rules provide for that.

Mr. MANION: The rules do not provide that after Mr. Speaker has decided a question, that question can be again discussed. I am not objecting to the matter being proceeded with; I am very glad to have the hon. member go on, but I thought I should bring the point to the attention of the house.

Mr. FINN: The remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition are very much like those of the gentleman who, when he was dying, was asked where he wanted to be buried with relation to his two wives. He said, "I want to be buried between the two of them, but with a little cant towards Kitty."

I could not do better than read to the house my reasons for invoking standing order 31. This is addressed to his honour the Speaker and the hon. members of the House of Commons assembled, and reads as follows:

Ottawa, February 3, 1939.

To His Honour,
The Speaker,
The honourable the House of Commons in parliament assembled:

My reason for invoking the standing order, No. 31, of the parliamentary rules, and asking for leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance is as follows:

The lobster fishermen of the constituencies of Halifax county (from Cole Harbour to Hubbard's Cove, which is adjacent to the eastern Lunenburg county Line), Lunenburg-Queens, Shelbourne-Yarmouth, and south-eastern Digby are in a sorry plight because, through an act of God, a terrific gale which raged along the coast line in the first week of December, 1938, destroying their lobster pots, gear and equipment, taking away from them their means of livelihood and bringing to them, their wives, and families, as a consequence, privation, hunger, and mental suffering.

The provisions of The Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1938, is abortive in its provisions to meet the absolute need of re-establishing the said fishermen, in their industry, and to provide them with the means of earning their livelihood, and to enable them to provide the bare necessities of life for their families.

In fishing villages along the coast line from Cole Harbour to Hubbard's there is not only dire distress, but death following in its wake —tuberculosis has become rampant through under-nourishment and the lack of necessary home surroundings.

This has become so alarming that two Sisters of Charity, graduate nurses, and one other Sister, a graduate dietitian, have been sent into those districts, without earthly reward, of any kind, to allay this disease. Two thousand gallons of paint were contributed but the houses were in such a poor state of repair it was useless to carry on the work.

Two hundred quarts of milk and cream are being sent from Halifax by people with human hearts to help bring back to strength and health those who are now suffering.

Prompt action, therefore, on the part of the government, through the Department of Fisheries is urgently and immediately required.

R. E. Finn,

A Member of the House of Commons of Canada, representing the constituency of Halifax county, Nova Scotia.

I have received nothing but the most courteous treatment and the greatest cooperation from the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) in this matter. He has been most sympathetic throughout. But a monkey-wrench was thrown into the machinery by the premier of Nova Scotia, who I regret to say would not agree to the expenditure of any money, either by way of loan or gift such as is given by the governments of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick in cooperation with the federal government. When he asked the Minister of Fisheries to allow him to use this money to dig ditches and cut bushes on the highways down on the western shore of my constituency of Halifax, the request was refused, and he immediately applied to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), under the act respecting unemployment and agricultural assistance, for money to spend on the highways for the purpose he had in mind. The Minister of Fisheries is the one who knows the conditions that exist there. They are under his jurisdiction and not under the jurisdiction of any other member of the government of Canada.

There was put through an order in council which was tabled, and it was found that in the contingency fund there was only $20,000 left. The premier of Nova Scotia in the telegram directed to the Minister of Labour stated that at that time the loss was $125,000.

Mr. ROGERS: I know my hon. friend wishes to have the record accurate. The statement was not that only $20,000 was left in the contingency fund, but from what remained of the contingency fund it was found advisable at that time to allow only the additional sum of $20,000 for the purpose indicated.

Mr. FINN: I accept the correction, but I do not think the difference is one over which I need lose any time or cause any further debate. I am only pointing out that this $20,000 distributed among Halifax, Lunenburg, Queens, Shelburne, Yarmouth and a part of Digby fishermen would not provide two days work for the fishermen who live on the rock-ribbed coast of Nova Scotia, and I say further that it is in the form of direct relief, when it should be a grant to reestablish the fishermen in their calling.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. member permit a correction? It is part of a much larger sum which is being expended by the government of Nova Scotia in those sections.

Mr. FINN: The minister is correct. I do not wish to befog the issue or to misconstrue the intention of the premier of Nova Scotia. Fifty per cent is also put up, which makes $40,000 in all. But even taking that, it would not give a week's work to the fishermen, and then they would have to use that money to live. They desire to go lobster-fishing, on the first day of March, four miles off the coast, and they have not the traps, nor the anchors or the floats. They must go into the woods and cut trees; laths, nails, corks, and so on, must be bought. They must paint their traps and get things ready so that when the weather becomes milder they can take up their vocation again. When I tell you that in that storm over 100,000 lobster traps were absolutely destroyed, 44,000 in Yarmouth and Digby alone, and in Lunenburg and Queens and in the western part of Halifax, 100,000 traps, 200,000 buoys and 100,000 floats; when you consider the dire want of these people, their worry in face of these conditions, and so on, you will appreciate the appeal that I make.

Some people have said to me in defence of a policy in which I do not concur, "Well, the fishermen have not said very much about it." No, they go their weary way; and with this great gale many of them went down in their boats, there to remain until the final judgment day when they shall arise from the bottom of the deep to appear before their God. This is not a matter that should be treated lightly, and I am sure the Minister of Fisheries desires to do his part. The same can be said of the Prime Minister, because there is no hon. gentleman sitting in this house who has a more human heart than the Prime Minister. In making this appeal I ask that serious and immediate consideration be given by direct contribution, not by putting money in the hands of the fishermen, but through the materials necessary to enable them to make their pots, gear and other equipment, so that between now and the first of March they can get that equipment into shape to begin their work.

I wish to thank the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) for the manner in which he expressed himself this afternoon in this house, for his sympathy with the plight of the fishermen. I wish also to thank the Minister of Labour for his contribution, but it is not adequate. The money I believe is available in the fisheries department to-day to put up seventy-five per cent in cash under present legislation, as a gift, not by way of loan; the remaining twenty-five per cent to come from the province of Nova Scotia. There are only two roads open in reference to this matter. One road leads to success, bringing happiness to the homes of the fishermen through conditions of life that are bearable, and eliminating in some degree suffering and want. The other road leads to political oblivion for those who stand in the way. One of these two courses must be pursued.

I do not mention this with any reference to the present government of which I am an enthusiastic supporter. When this urgent condition exists, as it does, and for some reason unknown there is an attitude which is not in harmony with the finer qualities of the human heart, then I say that if necessary we should interpret section 91 of the British North America Act which defines the federal powers and recognize the "fisheries" as a matter that comes under the federal jurisdiction. We should not draw fine distinctions between fisheries and fishermen. There is no difference between fisheries and fishermen when a fisherman is found with undersized lobsters in his possession; that is not regarded as a matter to be prosecuted by the provincial authority, but is dealt with by the federal authority on the report of their inspector, and by the magistrates in Nova Scotia. If a fisherman is liable to penalties for breach of regulations made by federal authority under the Fisheries Act, then I say it is too fine a distinction, a distinction without a difference, to say that fishermen are not part of fisheries and therefore it is not possible for the federal Department of Fisheries to deal with this matter solely but only in cooperation with the Nova Scotia government.

In conclusion, I thank you, sir, and thank hon. members of the house on all sides, because I do believe, have believed all my life, that when the human heart is touched there is an immediate and automatic response. The conditions in my constituency are as I have described them. I shall not undertake to speak in more than a general way, because this motion is not debatable. But last evening the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier) said that this matter could not be dealt with except by direct aid through proper channels, and he intimated through the municipal councils. I agree with that. It showed a sympathetic interest on his part, and sympathetic interest was shown by the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of National Revenue who came to my aid. And when I have the Minister of National Defence behind me it is not a Bren gun, but a man in the real sense of the word, and when the Bren gun is fired the report will sound from one end of Canada to the other and will result in only one thing. I hope I am not going to be on that committee because I might be biased, but the opposition will find that our powder was dry and that the Bren gun will be fired if the occasion arises. I hope the occasion will not arise.

I ask the support of all hon. members on behalf of this motion.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): I am sure I voice the sentiments of hon. members when I say that the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) is to be commended for having brought this matter to the attention of the house. At the risk of repeating what he has already said perhaps I may relate briefly the facts, and give a resumé of the situation as presented to the Department of Fisheries and as it is known to-day by that department.

In the early part of December a storm of unusual severity struck the Atlantic coast, not only of Nova Scotia but of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick; and on the western coast of Nova Scotia it was particularly severe. The result was that the fishing gear of the lobster fishermen, who had their traps in the water just a few days, suffered extensive destruction. As soon as the storm subsided, instructions were given the officers of the department to make a survey of the situation and report the extent of the damage and the extent to which the fishermen were affected. So far as Nova Scotia is concerned, after several days of survey and checking and re-checking, the total damage was estimated at somewhere between $100,000 and $125,000 representing destruction of boats and gear, but the major part being in the destruction of lobster traps.

The obligation concerning fishermen, their persons and property, has always been understood and interpreted, by those who preceded me in the department ever since it came into existence, to be primarily a provincial obligation. Since this parliament, for the last three years at least, has deemed it advisable by supplementary appropriations to grant sums of money to help reestablish needy fishermen in their occupations, these moneys have always been distributed under agreements entered into with the provinces concerned. The provinces recognized their primary liability and accepted the money voted by parliament simply as a contribution to help them discharge this obligation.

Mr. CAHAN: Does that refer to fisheries? Is the minister now dealing with fisheries as fisheries?

Mr. MICHAUD: With individuals, whether they are considered as fishermen or as citizens. But in the present instance a suggestion was made to the authorities in Nova Scotia, as well as in other provinces where fishermen had been affected, that in view of the magnitude and extent of the damage and the need of the fishermen at the present time, part of the money appropriated by this parliament might be used to help repair the damage, to the extent that they should deem advisable. The suggestion was made that the contracts or agreements could be extended, modified or amended to meet the situation. The province of Nova Scotia asked us for time to consider the situation, and a few days later, towards the end of December, we were informed that they did not think it advisable in view of local circumstances to give individuals grants either of money or of material with which to repair their fishing gear, but that they had decided that the best course to follow was to enable these people to work in order to earn sufficient money during the winter months to buy the necessary material to rebuild their traps.

Well, Mr. Speaker, always respectful of provincial autonomy, we did not like to disagree with the provincial authorities, upon whom we considered, rested the primary obligation of dealing with the situation, but we told them that if they decided to take advantage of the money voted by this parliament to assist fishermen we were ready to contribute even to the extent of seventy-five per cent of whatever disbursements they might have to make in the circumstances.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister tell us what extra work the government proposed to give these people to enable them to earn this money?

Mr. MICHAUD: As stated by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn), and as recited in the order in council which is being tabled, according to the information given me by the minister of health of Nova Scotia, who also heads whatever provincial administration there may be with regard to fisheries, I understand that the work is in the nature of road-building or preparing the foundations for road-building in the counties where the fishermen were affected by the storm. I do not know the exact nature of the work, but it is understood and admitted to be in the nature of road work.

Mr. FINN: And ditching and cutting trees.

Mr. MICHAUD: The premier of Nova Scotia asked the Department of Fisheries if the money voted by parliament could be applied to the work he intended to make available in order to give these people a chance to earn money with which to repair their fishing gear. After looking into the matter we found that parliament voted the money for certain purposes and that it would be difficult to apply to the construction of roads in Nova Scotia money voted for the reestablishment of fishermen. The premier of that province came to Ottawa to interview the government, however, and came to an agreement with the Department of Labour under which some of the money voted by parliament for the relief of unemployment in Canada should be made available to the province of Nova Scotia in order to enable them to carry on the work they had in mind. An appropriation for this purpose had been made earlier in the year, so there was already in existence between the dominion and the province an agreement in that regard. The government of Nova Scotia suggested that if a certain additional amount could be made available it would be sufficient to meet the situation, having in mind that a contribution of at least fifty per cent would have to be made by the province before it would be entitled to receive this money from the dominion

So we have this situation at the present time. The government of Nova Scotia has admitted its responsibility and has stated that it desires to discharge this responsibility in a certain way. The Department of Fisheries has money which may be made available for certain purposes but which we find cannot be expended in the manner desired by the province. However, negotiations are not at an end, and various suggestions have been advanced to the provincial authorities by means of which in our opinion they could take advantage of the money which this parliament was kind enough to appropriate for the purpose of reestablishing fishermen in their calling. Negotiations are continuing, in the hope of convincing them that as long as they can comply with the terms under which this money was voted by parliament, the money is at their disposal. I am sure this house will agree that is the most that can be done by the government or this house unless the terms of the appropriation are changed and we are allowed to expend the money for purposes other than those for which it was voted. Unless that is done the hands of the Department of Fisheries are tied; we cannot touch that money which is in the treasury. However, the treasury of the dominion has been tapped; in other words money has been offered to the province of Nova Scotia with which they claim they can meet the situation and remedy the conditions complained of, in the manner they have selected.

So far the Department of Fisheries has never dealt directly with individuals as long as the provincial authorities recognized their responsibility and were willing to cooperate with us in disbursing the moneys voted by parliament. Of course we always made it a condition that they should supplement with money of their own the amounts appropriated by parliament, because theirs was the responsibility and we did not want them to run away with the idea that the responsibility was ours. We have not taken the legal, technical attitude; we have never tried to take refuge behind the terms of the British North America Act. Whenever a disaster has occurred of national importance, or of such magnitude that the provinces could not either borrow the necessary money or obtain credit in order to meet the situation, as the house well knows, the dominion government has always helped the provinces. The province of Nova Scotia stands in no different position. Our attitude toward that province is no different from what it has been toward other provinces. If we are told that the province is not in a position to help those people, it will be our duty to consider whether or not we should step over their heads and deal directly with the individuals.

That is the situation, placed before the house as briefly as I could put it. I hope negotiations will continue, that the situation of those people who have suffered and who are greatly handicapped will be corrected, and that they will be placed in a position where, when the next fishing season opens, they can earn their livelihood as they have done in the past.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN ((St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, the subject is one which is very interesting to me because I believe I am personally familiar with every port and village along that coast. This is not the first time that violent tempests have swept the coast and caused grave destruction of, shall I say, the plant necessary to carry on lobster and other types of fishing. But I believe the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) has shown, by the confused manner in which he has discussed the subject, that he is labouring under very great difficulties in explaining the government's neglect in this particular instance. The hon. member is one for whom I have very high esteem. He is a graduate of my own university, and he certainly could not have passed the examination so well as he did in that university without knowing that the sea coast and inland fisheries are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.

This parliament has made many innovations and many irruptions into provincial rights by voting large sums of money which I have thought were beyond the power of parliament to vote, for the purpose of carrying on services which are peculiarly and necessarily—I might say exclusively—provincial. Section 91 of the British North America Act makes the situation clear. I shall not quote the whole section but only the part pertinent to the matter before us:

> . . . It is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say—

And going down to item No. 12:

> 12. Sea coast and inland fisheries.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does that include relief to the Nova Scotia fishermen?

Mr. CAHAN: That certainly includes the relief of the industry. Certainly the fact that this parliament has exclusive legislative jurisdiction with respect to sea coast and inland fisheries, notwithstanding any other provision of the British North America Act implies—

Mr. POTTIER: Did the hon. member—

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend can keep his seat for the moment. Notwithstanding any other provision of the British North America Act, it is certainly clearly enunciated in section 91 that sea coast fisheries are within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of this parliament. Certainly parliament may properly vote any sums of money which are necessary or deemed expedient with regard to a service over which it has absolute control. That, I suggest, cannot be controverted.

Now, why all this worry about negotiations with the provincial government? Here is a great calamity which has overtaken one of the sea coast fisheries of Nova Scotia, resulting, as the minister has said, in the destruction, to the extent of $150,000 in value, of the implements necessary to the fisherman in carrying on his vocation. It is admitted clearly by the minister that the fishermen themselves have not the means to replace the necessary plant and equipment which have been destroyed. If it had been a calamity which had overtaken some other country, such as one which occurred recently in Chile, we could, as we have in times past, under an assumption of authority, and for the sake of overcoming the results of a great disaster, vote sums of money to relieve a foreign people engaged in a foreign industry over which we have no legislative control.

Mr. FINN: The explosion at Halifax.

Mr. CAHAN: But here is a case in respect of which clearly and plainly parliament has legislative jurisdiction. It has within its power the right to vote moneys to sustain this industry in any way parliament may deem advisable. Therefore, why labour the discussion by bringing in votes which have been made on the motion of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) to assist in road building in Nova Scotia, a project over which we have no control and with which, according to our legislative jurisdiction, we have nothing to do? Why bring in confusing discussions about road grants when parliament, and particularly the government, which is the executive committee of parliament, is face to face with the results of a great disaster which has overtaken the people engaged in fishing on that southern coast of Nova Scotia?

It is true that parliament may not have voted moneys in the past because it was not anticipating a calamity of that extent. It may be true that last session no appropriation was made which could properly be devoted to the purposes suggested. But that vote of last session is not the only remedy. This calamity occurred long before this parliament met. The facts were known by the minister at least two months ago, if my memory is correct. He had investigations made and he knew the facts then. Grants could have been made by a special order of the governor in council to relieve the distress in a temporary and preliminary manner until such time as parliament could meet to deal adequately with the matter. Parliament has now met, and I suggest there is no reason in the world why, being cognizant of the facts, there should be any excuse for delay in parliament giving the necessary relief by appropriating by a vote, outright, the moneys necessary to reestablish these fishermen, if such procedure is deemed advisable. The minister has very frankly stated his views as to the extent of the disaster. Parliament certainly should provide, by some measure, adequate advances to these men to enable them to reestablish themselves before the next fishing season.

I have not consulted the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) about this, but I believe hon. members on this side would be willing to support a vote sufficient to relieve the fishermen who suffered such destructive damage. We all know the extent of the storm which swept along the Atlantic coast from Florida to Nova Scotia and did so much damage.

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I referred to this matter yesterday and I had intended that my remarks at that time should cover my feelings with regard to the catastrophe at present under discussion. I know, however, that the people of my constituency would want the picture shown as it really is, and that benefits be given to all who have been anxious to co-operate and assist in this particular matter. I have in mind certain of the remarks just made by the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn), and I should like to refer to them. They constituted a more or less indirect attack upon the premier of Nova Scotia.

Mr. FINN: Not an attack, an assertion.

Mr. POTTIER: I feel that I should speak in connection with this matter because the people in my constituency have suffered greater loss than the people in any other constituency in Nova Scotia. I took down the remarks of my hon. friend rather hurriedly. The first remark that impressed itself upon my mind was his statement that the premier of Nova Scotia had thrown a monkey-wrench into the machinery of relief.

Mr. FINN: Hear, hear.

Mr. POTTIER: I did not interrupt the hon. member for Halifax. Apparently he did not need my help when he was talking and I assure him that I do not need his when I am talking. He said also that there was a wrong attitude of heart and mind on the part of the premier of Nova Scotia, one not in keeping with the situation. I followed this matter from the beginning. I viewed the storm when it occurred on the coast and I have been in frequent telephonic communication with the premier of the province. I have had several interviews with him at Halifax and as a matter of fact I received a telegram from him to-day which was delivered to me just as I came into the house this afternoon. I shall refer to this telegram later on. It is my feeling that attacks upon public men who are doing their duty as they see it are not in keeping with the proper action of an hon. member when representing a situation, regardless of whether it refers to his own or some other constituency.

Mr. FINN: That is the hon. member's viewpoint. It was not an attack; it was a sincere criticism.

Mr. POTTIER: I may say quite frankly that I do not approve the methods being adopted in Nova Scotia in providing assistance by way of road work. I feel that material should be provided, and I said so yesterday. I still think that would be the best method, but that does not say that the premier of Nova Scotia is wrong because he adopts some other methods. That does not say that he is throwing a monkey-wrench into the machinery or that he is lacking in the proper attitude of heart and mind. We in Nova Scotia feel that in the person of the premier we have one who has a warm heart and who has always been willing to cooperate and assist in relieving the effects of any disaster that might occur. He has shown evidence in that regard.

Mr. FINN: He has not shown it in this instance.

Mr. POTTIER: When the senior hon. member for Halifax says that the premier apparently lacks the proper attitude of heart, I want to remind my hon. friend that in the last two and a half years a total of $580,000 has been spent by Nova Scotia by way of loans and bonuses to these fishermen. Never before has a provincial government spent one dollar to assist the fishing industry in the manner I have just mentioned.

Mr. FINN: Oh, yes, the Murray government did.

Mr. POTTIER: That indicates the feeling of the premier toward this industry. The senior hon. member for Halifax says that material should be provided. That is what I think, but the premier of Nova Scotia says that road work should be provided in an amount equal to the losses sustained. There is one advantage in that method. More money will be given to the fishermen than would be given in the furnishing of materials.

Mr. FINN: Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. POTTIER: Go ahead.

Mr. FINN: As a member representing a fishing county which had a loss of $44,000, I should like to ask my hon. friend whether he thinks the spending of $40,000 on the doing of preliminary work for semi-permanent highways is helping the fishermen? If that is what he wants to convey to the fishermen in his constituency, I do not want to do it.

Mr. POTTIER: If the hon. member wants to make another speech he will be given an opportunity.

Mr. FINN: I do not want to make a speech, but I do want fairness.

Mr. POTTIER: All I say to the senior hon. member for Halifax is that there is no intention of spending only $40,000. Apparently he does not understand the situation. I have in my hand a telegram which I received from the premier of Nova Scotia just this afternoon, from which I quote as follows:

> We will spend in storm swept areas amounts of money on highway work at least equal to amount of loss.

Whether that is $40,000, whether it is $150,000 or whether it is $200,000, that is what they are going to do. There is some advantage in providing work equal to the amount of the loss. If we provided materials, that would mean we would provide only the value of the material and the work would have to be done by the fishermen. A trap is worth about $2, whereas the material in the trap is worth a little over $1.

Mr. CAHAN: What was the loss along the Yarmouth-Shelburne coast in the constituency which my hon. friend represents?

Mr. POTTIER: There were 44,000 traps destroyed. If new traps are to be provided they will cost between $70,000 and $80,000, but the material alone will cost between $40,000 and $50,000.

Mr. CAHAN: That is in the hon. member's own constituency?

Mr. POTTIER: In my own constituency.

Mr. CAHAN: I suppose that is not a quarter of the entire loss?

Mr. POTTIER: That is at least two-thirds. I am subject to correction, but I understand the damage from the storm to be as follows: Twelve thousand dollars in the county of Halifax; $6,000 in Lunenburg.

Mr. FINN: How much in Halifax?

Mr. POTTIER: Twelve thousand dollars. Apparently the hon. member does not know the loss even in his own county.

Mr. FINN: My hon. friend thinks he knows it all, but I wonder.

Mr. POTTIER: Six thousand dollars in the county of Lunenburg; $12,000 in Queens; $43,000 in Shelburne; $40,600 in Yarmouth; and $9,737, I think, in the county of Digby. That is the loss. The major damage in the county of Digby happens to be in the district of Clare which I have the honour to represent at the present time. So, if you provide just the material, these men are going to have half of what they get if they do road work. I do not know whether I am making myself plain. I do not think, therefore, it is justifiable to say that any person who is willing to help the fishermen to the extent that they are going to get nearly twice the value of material that goes in the trap is throwing a monkey-wrench, or is lacking in heart and mind.

Mr. FINN: Oh, forget the monkey-wrench.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POTTIER: As regards the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), I respect his knowledge and experience in this house, and I would with great temerity refer to the interpretations he has made of the British North America Act. He may be right. I remember, however, in 1933, when there was a Conservative government, the municipal council of the town of Yarmouth had several meetings, which I attended, arising from the losses and distress of the fishermen, and they wrote to the Department of Fisheries at that time. But, as I remember it, word came back that it was directly a matter of local and private concern, they were sorry, but the federal government could do nothing about it.

Mr. MICHAUD: Property and civil rights.

Mr. POTTIER: Yes, property and civil rights, and the federal government could do nothing about the matter. It is too bad that at that time they did not bring the matter to the attention of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, because in those days we were in as much need as we are at the present time.

Mr. CAHAN: What was the nature of the disaster?

Mr. POTTIER: We had storms, and prices were bad.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not dealing with prices, but what was the storm?

Mr. POTTIER: We had meetings of the board of trade. The fishermen were in a sorry plight on account of weather conditions.

Mr. CAHAN: That may be. That is another question.

Mr. POTTIER: I remember particularly the reference there. At that time it was on property and civil rights; there were no references at all to other sections of the British North America Act.

Mr. CAHAN: Because the issue presented was entirely different.

Mr. POTTIER: I do not think it was, and I am suggesting that that was the attitude of the then government. It is easy when you are out of power to say "do so and so" when you have not done it when you were in power.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding about the loss, let me say that about one-third of the traps were lost. A number of lobster fishermen, it is true, lost very few traps, but I called up the supervisor the night before last in order to be sure I was getting the right picture.

Mr. FINN: The hon. member got busy late.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POTTIER: I object to the remarks of the senior hon. member for Halifax. Apparently I began looking into the matter sooner than he did, and he did not even know the loss in his own county.

Mr. FINN: Yes, I did. I was here last December looking after the matter and conferring with the Minister of Fisheries when the hon. member was in Yarmouth.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare has the floor.

Mr. FINN: And I did it out of my own pocket.

Mr. POTTIER: I was here twice last fall on this matter. In order to be fair to myself I think I should say that I was here and interviewed the minister in regard to it, and he can substantiate my statement. I have also had several telephone conversations and telegrams and have written a number of letters in regard to the matter.

Mr. FINN: I was here three times.

Mr. POTTIER: On the question of damage, in some of the districts the fishermen have lost about one-third of their traps—which is serious. It means this, that in each village, some being worse off than others, there are fishermen who will not be able to earn sufficient to carry on if some help is not given. That is the situation as I understand it, and I know whereof I speak.

The lobster fishing season starts on December 1 and goes on to June, 1, but the practice has been to fish through the month of December, at least in the majority of cases, until the storms come; then they are held up during January and February. They start again March 1 depending on the depth of water and on how rough the seacoast is, but generally speaking March 1 is about the time when lobster fishing starts in the open. This is the situation: If the lobster fishermen are placed now in a position to fish by March 1 the situation will be looked after. The difference between the premier of Nova Scotia and myself is that we do not agree on the method. I think the senior hon. member for Halifax and I say that we should provide material to the men and that they should do the work to put up the traps. On the other hand, the premier of Nova Scotia says we should give them money for work on the road in the value of the traps, which is perhaps more than we are asking for the fishermen.

Mr. FINN: How does the hon. member figure that out?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POTTIER: Because the premier would be paying them for the labour that goes in the traps.

Mr. FINN: By working on the roads.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POTTIER: I know that my people would want to be fair to the premier, and let me say in justice to his qualities that we consider him the best premier in Canada and one of the greatest premiers we in Nova Scotia have had since Joseph Howe.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to say a few words on this important question, although not because I know very much about it. I admit frankly that I am not as familiar with it as were hon. gentlemen who spoke from the other side and as is my hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) who spoke on this side. I am particularly glad however to be able to say a word on this matter in support of my hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Finn). I have known him for many years. Long years ago he and I were members of this house. We come from the same race, and we have the same sweet, charitable, kindly disposition.

Mr. HEAPS: And never interrupt.

Mr. MANION: At any rate I have a strong and friendly feeling for the hon. member, and I am glad to be able to support his proposal. My knowledge of Nova Scotia comes from various visits to that province where, as in the other provinces of the maritimes, the beautiful countryside and the kindly, charming and hospitable people have won my heart on many occasions. I believe I have visited the maritimes ten or a dozen times, and always I have come back thinking highly of those provinces and realizing fully why they have given so much to the cultural, the educational, and, in general, the highest life of this great dominion.

To get to the subject in a rather general way, when I was in the maritimes on the last occasion, I believe in September or October, although I do not recall the exact period, the question of the condition of the fishermen in the maritimes and particularly in Nova Scotia was prominent in the press and on the lips of the people. Indeed there was quite a row going on down there, in which, I am sorry to say, I took no part. It was a row between those who said the conditions of the fishermen were very bad and those who, apparently, contended they were not so bad. Being, as I have said, of the same extraction as the senior member for Halifax, I naturally favour the under-dog anyway, and I found myself entirely in accord and sympathy with the writers—some from Ontario, some from Halifax and other parts of Nova Scotia—who took the side of the fishermen in dire want, so it was said, in the various ports of that province.

The other day I had a letter from a friend with whom I have corresponded a good deal, an outstanding man in Nova Scotia who has been taking a strong attitude with respect to the needs of the fishermen. He is one of those who do not agree that there is too much maudlin sympathy extended to these fishermen, and I must confess that in large measure my sympathy for them has been the results of the educational effect he has had upon me. He wrote to me before this incident occurred; at any rate his letter had no reference to the question which is now under discussion in this house. He informed me that some of the fishermen of Nova Scotia earned only $50 per annum after paying cost of gas and bait. In other districts they received from $100 to $150, while in the better localities their earnings amounted to about $400. I know nothing about the facts, but I do know a great deal about my correspondent, and I can assure the house that he keeps himself well posted upon all subjects that relate to the welfare of those delightful provinces by the sea. I am sure he is correct in the information he has given me. My hon. friend nods his head. I listened to him carefully and I must admit that I knew more about the subject after hearing the senior member for Halifax. There seemed to be some controversy, but I could follow the senior member for Halifax rather better. I have no doubt, however, that both hon. gentlemen representing that constituency are equally sympathetic to the fishermen there.

On this question there seems to be more unanimity in all parts of the house than is usual on matters of this sort. As the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George pointed out, we are prone continually to take a deep interest in the condition of people in remote parts of the world. We readily throw up our hands in horror at some catastrophe in some far away land, and very often I have seen us collect money for floods in China, for example, as the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) points out, have money voted by parliament. Since, therefore, everyone seems agreed on this question, I should like to see the minister give the assistance asked for. He would certainly get the support of this entire party if he decided to give at the earliest possible moment this much-needed aid to people who are our fellow-Canadians. Sometimes I am ashamed to think of the riches we possess when I reflect upon the extreme want that exists in some parts of the country, and though my hon. friends to my left take, in my opinion, a radical view of some matters I confess that I sometimes find myself sympathizing with them. In this rich country of ours with our immense resources, a huge area with a small population, it does seem strange that there should be so many people in want. Anything that is done by this government, anything that is done by the minister on this occasion, will receive the support of the party with which I am associated.

When I was in Nova Scotia I heard a great deal about the work done by the cooperatives, the university of St. Francois Xavier—I do not know whether I am pronouncing the word correctly.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): You pronounce it as I do.

Mr. MICHAUD: In Ireland they say St. Francis.

Mr. MANION: They all refer to the same saint. The saints do not quarrel over nationality as much as we do. While there, I heard a great deal about the splendid work done by the cooperatives and recently I had a visitor whom I have no doubt many hon. gentlemen have seen—Doctor MacDonald, head of the extension department of that university, which is doing so much to foster a better feeling of constructive cooperation among those people instead of allowing them to descend to the extreme radicalism which is inevitable where people are in great want and believe that they are not receiving what is justly due them. And there are so many people in the country to-day who are in that condition. I was therefore delighted both to read and to hear of the magnificent work that is being done by the extension department of that great university, small in size but highly important from the standpoint of what it is achieving.

If the government, in the estimates that we shall have before us shortly, would increase the amount which I believe is granted the university for extension work among the various people in the three maritime provinces, I am sure it would meet with general approval.

Mr. MICHAUD: It has already been done.

Mr. MANION: I am delighted to hear it.

Mr. REID: That gentleman is now among the fishermen of British Columbia.

Mr. MANION: I am indeed pleased to hear that the amount has been increased, because one thing that appeals to me in the admirable work which is being done by the university is the fact that while the institution is Catholic basically, the work of the extension department is being carried on indiscriminately among people of all nationalities and creeds, and it is helping to promote a greater understanding among Canadians of all classes than can be found in some sections of the country.

In conclusion, may I say that I simply rose to add my voice sincerely to what has been said. I appreciate the remarks of the senior member for Halifax, and I assure the minister that he can count upon support from us in any efforts which he makes to relieve the distress that exists. I frankly admit that I have a great deal more sympathy for the sufferers from this catastrophe than I have for people in other countries. We have the needy close at home and they should be nearer to our hearts than those in distant lands.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): The discussion has taken a somewhat wider range than I expected it would when I said that in my opinion the matter was one of urgent public importance. The reason that I supported the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) in moving the adjournment of the house was that I knew, as other members from Nova Scotia know, of the storm that took place a few months ago and the damage that was done. The extent of the damage has not been definitely ascertained, but it is supposed to be in the neighbourhood of $125,000. It has been intimated to me that it does not exceed $100,000, though it may be more than that. While it is not definitely, it is approximately ascertainable.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier) has told of the distribution of the damage. Unfortunately for his constituency the greater part of it is in Shelburne and Yarmouth with some in Clare and Digby. His constituency is by far the greatest sufferer. The house is disposed to be sympathetic; the government is disposed to be sympathetic; and all members of this parliament as well as members of the legislatures of the maritime provinces realize that the income received by fishermen on the Atlantic coast of Nova Scotia is very low. Conditions among these people have been a matter of concern to the Minister of Fisheries and to the government from the time it assumed office.

I do not think the immediate question is primarily a constitutional one, nor is it a question whether we are sympathetic with the fishermen, because we are. The immediate question is a practical one. As the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare pointed out, these fishermen at the present time are not engaged in fishing; they will not be engaged in fishing until March 1. They find that in some districts one-third, in other districts one-quarter, of their traps were destroyed by this storm. The question is how to help them reestablish themselves. Two views are expressed as to the method we should adopt: One view is that we should resort to direct relief; the other is that indirect relief is the better method. It seems to me that the issue is just as simple as that. Is this an occasion for the administration of indirect relief or direct relief? The province will do everything it can, I am satisfied, and this government will do everything it can, I can assure the house. The question is as to the method to be followed.

Whatever the constitutional position is—and I must say I never before heard the view expressed that was enunciated by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) to-day; this particular kind of situation has always been regarded as one to be dealt with by the provincial authorities—but whatever the constitutional position, we must work in cooperation with the provincial government in a case of this kind. This government did so in the case of New Brunswick; it did so in the case of Prince Edward Island, and it must do so in the case of Nova Scotia. Even if it were a government of which we disapproved we would do so; if we were dealing with a premier whom we did not like we would do so; but where we are working with friends in whom we have confidence there is certainly no reason why we should work at cross-purposes with the government of Nova Scotia. Therefore we must examine with respect and with care the proposals of the government of Nova Scotia. That government has its men on the ground; it has its local members to consult, who know conditions there, and they have come to the conclusion that the best way to deal with this situation is by indirect instead of by direct relief. The premier of Nova Scotia proposes to spend a substantial sum of money on work in these very districts, so that these very men who have lost their gear will have an income from which they can make good their losses. Perhaps the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare did not say it, but I can say that men are at work at the present time. The premier of Nova Scotia tells me that 750 men will be at work next week and that this number will probably be increased as the necessities of the case require.

I am like the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare in that I find it difficult to sit silent when I hear hostile criticism of the premier of Nova Scotia. His qualities of heart and mind are well known not only in Nova Scotia but all through Canada. I know of the attention he has given to this matter, the study he has given it, and I know of his deep human sympathy in this situation. When, after his study, he says that the best way of dealing with it, having in mind his and our responsibilities and the future, is by instituting a works program through these districts so that these men will be able to earn money with which to replenish their gear, I do not think we should break the rule that has been followed since confederation and step in and work at cross-purposes with him. For that reason I am in accord with what the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) has said.

I am not criticizing the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) for bringing this matter up or expressing his views; I am not criticizing the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare for holding certain views in the matter, but the situation is being dealt with carefully, sympathetically and sincerely, and, I think, in a practical manner. It may be that further developments will cause some change to be made in the present arrangements, or some addition to be made to the expenditure. It may be that we shall find some way to use part of the fisheries vote which the minister says he has been advised is not available for assistance in road work. Money has been paid to the government of Nova Scotia to assist, not only the $20,000 mentioned, but $50,000 before that; it was before the storm but nevertheless $50,000 of a special grant of assistance was paid to Nova Scotia, and I can assure the house on behalf of the government that we shall do our best to work out ways and means of meeting the situation, in cooperation with our friends in the province in whom we have confidence.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to say only a very few words on this matter. First, I would commend the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) for bringing it to the attention of the house. I am sure that many hon. members know more now about this catastrophe—it is nothing short of that—which happened on the Nova Scotia coast than they knew before this discussion was brought on. We know approximately the extent of the damage. What is more to the point, and more satisfactory so far as the group to which I belong are concerned, is that the government has taken cognizance of the situation and is desirous of helping. It is not my intention to enter upon any discussion as to how that help should be given; it would be presumptuous on my part to do so, because I do not know the facts. But I think we shall all give our hearty approval to anything that the government may do, and, as the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) has already said, we think that anything done should undoubtedly be done in cooperation with the provincial government.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I am deeply interested in this problem. I am also deeply interested in the way it is proposed to spend this money. I am inclined to sympathize with the proposal of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier) that there should be a direct issue to the men concerned of half of the cost of the traps. At the same time I have of course no desire to interfere with the administration of Nova Scotia by the premier of that province. But two or three things come to my mind as a result of experience I have had with similar situations. We in the west have been sufferers for a long time and have learned something about relief, direct and indirect. I gather from the remarks of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) that it will be necessary to put into the hands of these sufferers at least $63,000 to enable them to procure the $125,000 worth of traps which they have lost. I understand from the remarks of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare that half the cost of the traps is for material and the rest represents labour which the fisherman himself can contribute. I gather then that there must be $63,000 issued to the sufferers.

The first thing I wonder about is this: Will each of these men who suffered a loss find himself able to obtain work on these road projects? If there is any considerable number who for any reason whatever will find the work not available to them, then the effort to give them relief is not going to effect its purpose; there still will be a good many sufferers. I have seen this, in similar cases, work out many times in my own constituency and my own province. It is going to be an exceedingly difficult matter to devise and design a road project of such a kind and in such a geographical location that it will make available to each of the sufferers along that long seacoast sufficient work to enable him to earn enough, net, to buy his traps. That is the first serious difficulty in the way of the indirect relief proposal.

There is another matter which has been forced upon my mind through experience. We may design a works project; we may say, "Now, we are going to spend so much on this road," and we assume that a certain part of that money will go into the hands of the labourers. It not infrequently works out that after the road is planned we put on a number of high class machines which eat up a great deal of the money in gasoline and repairs of various kinds, and which also displace a large number of the very men whom the project was designed to assist. We have learned in my province in three or four years a great deal regarding this matter. I might just give an illustration. When we set out to build roads we hired men, teams and scrapers and let them build the roads. Then we found that the roads which were built, compared with the roads constructed with modern, high class machinery, were very expensive, and the result was that the government came in for much criticism. I fancy the same consideration in large measure will affect the men in charge of building these projected Nova Scotia roads. The result will be that if the men in charge do not use machines in constructing the roads they will be in difficulty, and if they do the men will not get the work.

Mr. ILSLEY: My information is that there will be practically no machines.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That helps considerably.

Mr. FINN: How can they dig ditches in rock without machines?

Mr. BLACKMORE: There may be some who fancy I have had no experience in these matters, but I have had a little. I know there are all kinds of machines. Last night I saw pictures of a wonderful machine which I thought could never work. I never knew they had a machine that could go through a forest and prepare the way for back-fires, until I saw the picture of such a machine last night. In these days they have machines that will do nearly everything, but the men do not get the work. That is a serious matter, which I would draw to the attention of hon. members, because it might result in the expenditure of this money not achieving the desired object.

Then there is another matter. If these men live at a considerable distance from the proposed roads it is of vital importance that we know whether or not their transportation expenses to the project and back home again are to be borne by the men employing them or by themselves. If those expenses are to be borne by the sufferers, then those who live fifty or sixty miles away from the proposed projects will use up all their earnings in transportation costs and will not have sufficient left to enable them to accomplish the object we had in mind in designing the work.

There is another thing that frequently eats up the money. Sometimes when the road project is planned we allow the cost of material, machinery, and all that kind of thing, to be taken out. Then, from the standpoint of the men, there is another fact. When the men get to the work, are they to be provided with board and lodging? I have known some of the most glaring injustices to result from a situation such as this: A man would be told that he would receive so much an hour. After he had reached the scene of the activity, after paying his transportation cost, he would be told that he had to pay so much a day for his board, so much a day for his lodging, and sometimes so much a day for his blankets, the result being that what the man had left over would hardly keep him in chewing-gum.

All these matters have to be considered, I believe, in connection with this project. While I am speaking I wish to express, through the members who represent the sufferers, my group's deepest sympathy with them in their sore trial, and I should be pleased if the hon. members would convey that expression to these people. We westerners have had plenty of suffering; we know what it is. We appreciate the courage the people in the east have always shown. We realize there are no finer people in the Dominion of Canada than they. Now that their turn has come to suffer, we hasten to lend our support to whatever measures and whatever expenditures this parliament may find necessary in order to supply them with adequate means of fitting themselves to gain a livelihood. I personally will support any proposal the minister may see fit to introduce, as will my group, and we can speak for the whole of the people of Alberta, whose sympathy will be right with those who are stricken. But I should like to feel sure that the money is going to get into the hands of the people who need it, and not into the hands of a number of people who will try to get jobs, such as contractors, sub-contractors, sub-sub-contractors, timekeepers and the like, all of whom, as we know from bitter experience, somehow do manage to figure in altogether too many propositions of this kind.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, on this question we seem to find a spirit of harmony and accord in reference to the desirability and the need of doing something effective for those who suffered in this disaster. I think we might go one step further and say it is generally recognized that a disaster has occurred which is out of the ordinary, and that it is not a matter of day-to-day routine in connection with this most unfortunate question of relief.

Looking at it, therefore, from that angle, I ask myself the question: What is the best thing to do under the circumstances? As the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) who has just taken his seat has asked: What is the most effective way in which we can render help? I have a good deal of respect for the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), particularly for his native fairness in expressing himself. At the moment, however, I find myself in direct opposition to his view when he says that this is peculiarly a provincial matter. The fact that it happens to be on the coast of Nova Scotia geographically makes it provincial. But from the point of view of administration I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) that it comes within the direct purview of the dominion authorities. In other words, it is of a nature where we as a parliament may deal directly with it.

I agree with the Minister of National Revenue that so far as possible in all such matters we should act in harmony with the provincial governments. I have no desire or disposition to criticize the provincial government, nor must anything I shall say be interpreted as any reflection upon the premier of Nova Scotia or the government of that province. But before making a suggestion I should like to review briefly the two suggested methods of assistance, roads or traps. If we adopt the method of helping these men and their families by road work, it seems to me that a danger arises. The men must live while they are working on the roads. Any work on the roads given by way of relief, of which I have known in Canada, has resulted in very little more being given to the individual than merely enough to live through the period of time during which he has actually been engaged on the work. In other words, I do not think we should assume for a moment that a man will save enough out of the small wages he may get on road work to reequip him in his industry, and supply him with the instruments to carry on his work. I think there is a very grave danger in following that course in this instance.

I shall not repeat the arguments or the suggestion of the hon. member who has just spoken, but so far as helping the lobster fishermen who have suffered from the disaster by giving them road work is concerned, I must say I think it would be a mistake. Let us see what they require. Hon. members opposite will correct me if I am wrong. Usually these lobster traps are set out—I believe that is the term. In this disastrous storm many were swept away. In other words, the instruments used by the fishermen for their daily toil have been destroyed. They are lost—gone. The main object we should have in mind is to replace the instrument which has been lost, or, in other words, to reinstate them in their normal positions as lobster fishermen. That, I believe, is what we are aiming at. I suggest, therefore, that if we could supply the lobster fisherman with the equipment peculiar to his vocation as a fisherman we would be doing him more good than by giving him a job on the road.

Here is another thought: We will assume the road work is to be done by hand work, and that no machinery will be used. Every man would have to have a wheelbarrow, a shovel and a pick. I venture to say that the wheelbarrow, shovel and pick would make up a substantial portion of the cost of restoring his fishing equipment. I say it would be far better to spend our money on equipment he could use in gaining his livelihood, rather than on equipment for road work. I am going to suggest, without any intention of expressing an opinion different from that of the province, that we should allow the province to give whatever relief it wishes, by way of road work or in any other manner it may choose, and that in this instance the federal government should go directly, as it has the power to do,—in fact I think it should do it as a duty—to the assistance of the fishermen, by supplying them with new equipment to replace that which has been lost and, if necessary, in addition to that give them such further relief as may be required.

The suggestion has been made that the assistance will not be required until March. I look at the calendar and I see that to-day is February 3. It will be only a very short time until March. By the time the money is granted, distributed and in their hands the first of March will be upon us.

Another point to be remembered when speaking of fisheries is this. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier) said it was the custom to fish in November and December; then in January and February to lay off because of prevailing stormy weather, and then to begin again on March 1. Knowing something about the habits of fishermen, I know it is essential that the moment fine weather comes they be in a position to take advantage of it, so that there is no time to be lost in rendering this assistance as early as possible.

I make the suggestion that as a parliament we should give the assistance direct. I would suggest that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who is now in his seat, should bring down a supplementary estimate in the current year 1938-39, which does not expire until March 31, —he could bring it down tomorrow, if he wished—wherein he would make a definite and direct grant to be expended for the assistance of these fishermen.

There is no doubt that the livelihood of these and other fishermen, along the Atlantic coast in particular, has been so precarious for so many years that very few of them have any margin of safety. In fact I believe it could be stated that the great majority of them are living below the line of reasonable subsistence. That in my view is a fair statement of the case. Therefore they cannot absorb the results of a disaster; they are not in a position to do so, financially or otherwise. There should be no delay; parliament should act. There has been a disaster. We all recognize it, and we fully sympathize with the victims. Let us act, and act quickly, effectively and directly in the matter, as under the constitution of Canada we have the power to do.

Mr. POTTIER: I understand the hon. member suggests furnishing material for the traps. Is that his suggested remedy?

Mr. STEVENS: I would hesitate to be dogmatic on the point, because I am not altogether familiar with the details in connection with the equipment which would be required. I do not know exactly the manner of the setting of the traps. I do know something about the crab traps on the Pacific coast, which are movable and can be set out. But if these lobster traps are like salmon traps I realize it would be a different matter.

May I make myself quite clear in this: I would not discriminate between the material and the work. I would say that we should place the fishermen in such a position with their traps that they may be able to carry on their fishing operations on March 1.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) upon bringing this matter to the attention of the house. I am sure he will agree with me when I say that all hon. members seem to be in favour of taking immediate action to do something for the fishermen who are suffering as a result of a terrible storm. Various proposals have been offered, as the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has said, such as the building of roads and the reestablishment of these people in their vocation by supplying them with the necessary equipment. It should be apparent to all hon. members that a road building project at this time of the year is not at all feasible. How are you going to build roads with these poor, ragged fishermen who have had no experience in road building?

Mr. MICHAUD: Do not be ridiculous.

Mr. LANDERYOU: They have had no experience in the building of roads as they are being built to-day. In the building of roads to-day more machinery than hand labour is used. What a picture there would be with these fishermen in their rags and tatters building a road with shovels and wheelbarrows with weather conditions such as they are at this time of year. They would be paid perhaps forty or fifty cents an hour, and from these earnings they would have to supply themselves with sufficient money to get back into the fishing industry in the spring. It would be just a waste of time and hon. members know it.

I am delighted to know that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) is beginning to see the light. He now recognizes that one of the most valuable things we could do at the moment is to give a little money to the fishermen. The problem is how to put this money into their hands. What has been offered would be only a palliative to meet the urgency of the situation. I have been talking to some of the farmers of Ontario. One in particular told me he was living on a farm that his grandfather had carved out of the wilderness. I asked him if he was eating all the fish he would like to eat, and he told me he could not buy the fish he would like to provide for his family because his overhead was too large and his income too small. That precluded any possibility of his buying the fish caught by the fishermen of Nova Scotia. I find the same thing true about the fishermen. They cannot buy the dairy products produced by the Ontario farmers. The Halifax Herald has been carrying numerous articles describing the suffering, misery and want that exists in Nova Scotia among the fishermen and miners.

Mr. POTTIER: Has the hon. member ever been in Nova Scotia?

Mr. LANDERYOU: I have never been in Nova Scotia, and I have never suggested that I have. I am simply referring to editorials which appeared in the Halifax Herald and other periodicals published in that province.

Mr. POTTIER: I suggest that the hon. member visit the maritimes and see the fishermen and miners there.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I think the senior member for Halifax has stated the case very fairly. If my hon. friend (Mr. Pottier) is suggesting that these people are not suffering, I should like to have more evidence than the mere question whether or not I have been in Nova Scotia. That has nothing to do with the matter. Neither the fishermen nor the farmers have sufficient purchasing power. The fishermen are without fruit, butter and eggs because they have no money. The farmers are without fish for the same reason. These men are living in hovels. I saw some pictures of the homes in which these fishermen live, and they are nothing but hovels.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has recognized that there is a housing problem in this country, and he has had legislation passed to deal with it. Our lumbermen are without fish while the fishermen are unable to buy the products of the forest. I suggest to the government that they take steps to increase the purchasing power of the consumer so that our fishermen, our farmers, our lumbermen and the people in other sections of the country may be able to buy what they need. They may not be suffering from the catastrophe of a storm, but they are suffering from a catastrophe brought on by this rotten financial system. I am glad to know that there are many hon. members who are beginning to take cognizance of that fact. Even the leader of the opposition has suggested that may be we are not so far wrong in urging that the greatest problem facing Canada to-day is the need of increased purchasing power for the consumer.

Mr. MANION: I said that long before the hon. member ever said it.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I am glad to hear that the hon. member recognizes this need. If he studies the matter a little further and begins to realize the value of money, then I may find myself more in agreement with him than I am at the present time. I urge the minister to do whatever he can for these people who are apparently suffering more than the people of any other section of Canada. Do not start building roads with hand labour at this particular time of the year. I have had experience in that type of work. I have worked on some government projects put under way to ease the problems of the unemployed. I have in mind a particular project carried out in Calgary promoted by the previous government under the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. Barracks were built in Calgary at a cost of $1,250,000. The unemployed were given an opportunity to work with picks and shovels, and right beside them was an idle ditch digging machine. Was that used? No. How long did these men have an opportunity of working? After two or three weeks it was all over. Fifty per cent of the money they received was turned over to the city to pay arrears of taxes on the homes they owned. They were no better off when it was all over than they were when it started. As the hon. member for Kootenay East said, they receive only enough to keep them going for the duration of the job. When the job is finished they are all through. That is the situation that will come about in Nova Scotia. After the road building is over these men will have no money with which to buy traps. I suggest that the minister should provide them with traps, provide them with money with which to buy equipment, and then give them a little additional purchasing power so that they can buy some of the commodities produced elsewhere.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If the debate had concluded I was going to make a suggestion to the house which I believe would have met with the general approval of hon. members. The order paper is pretty well loaded up with questions and notices of motions for production of papers. I had thought that with the consent of the house we might, notwithstanding we were near the time of the six o'clock adjournment, proceed to those orders immediately and that when they were discharged I would move the adjournment of the house for the remainder of the day. That would ensure hon. members having information which they may wish to have in their possession before the week is out. This procedure would I believe meet with general approval.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to and respect for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), I desire to raise a question of privilege. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier) has misrepresented the statement I made to-day with reference to the premier of Nova Scotia. The same thing has been done inferentially by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley). When it was said by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare that they had spent over $200,000 and did not that show human interest, let me say I was not referring to any previous action of the premier of Nova Scotia or of his general administration of the affairs of that province. But if my hon. friend knew that I had several interviews with the premier, and that I felt that, when the Department of Fisheries was ready to hand over seventy-five per cent of the cost of reestablishing the fishermen—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. FINN: —then I was—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member. He has stated his point sufficiently, but he cannot make a speech.

Mr. FINN: All I desire to say is that the statement of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare and, inferentially, of the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) that the premier of Nova Scotia had thrown a monkey-wrench into the machinery in this particular case—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I must correct my hon. friend. I never referred to the premier of Nova Scotia.

Mr. FINN: I meant the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), not the Minister of National Defence, who is too Scotch to do anything of that kind.

Mr. DUNNING: Let the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. FINN: Yes. In order that the business of the house may be proceeded with under the rules, I have pleasure in withdrawing my motion.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): Before the hon. member withdraws his motion—

An hon. MEMBER: It was withdrawn.

Mr. KINLEY: I was on my feet before he withdrew his motion.

An hon. MEMBER: It is six o'clock.

Mr. KINLEY: Well, if it is six o'clock, all right, but this is rather an important matter. I am interested in it, and so is my constituency, but I am not going to delay the house with any extended remarks. I think we must cooperate with the government of Nova Scotia. While fisheries is a matter of federal concern and federal jurisdiction, the care of the fisherman and his family is a matter of civil and property rights, and for that reason the provincial government has a degree of responsibility. This government have from the outset laid down the policy that in matters of relief they must cooperate with the provincial governments. They have done so, and the provincial governments have paid to the fund one-half of the amount required. All I wish to say at this time is that I hope the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) will be generous in dealing with this matter, that he will continue his negotiations with the premier of Nova Scotia, and that he will see to it that whatever is necessary in the interests of the fishermen to protect and help them in this disaster will be done.

The Nova Scotia minister of public health comes from my own riding. His department is directly responsible for relief projects. I have discussed this matter with him several times, and I know they have difficulties. It is not just as easy as we think it is, talking here at a distance. But I believe that the minister of health of Nova Scotia is sympathetic to the fishermen, because he comes from the greatest fishing county in Canada; that the premier of Nova Scotia is deeply concerned in the condition of the fishermen, and that the federal government will do their part in trying to wipe out the damage which has been done by this disaster to the lobster fishermen.

Motion (Mr. Finn) withdrawn.

Hon. Norman McL. Rogers,
Minister of Labour for Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.

Will you kindly grant appointment for Saturday next at your convenience for me and members of board of control to discuss unemployment relief works program.

R. C. Day,
Mayor.

Ottawa, November 22, 1938.

His Worship Mayor R. C. Day,
City Hall, Toronto, Ontario.

Your night letter received. You are no doubt aware that all funds voted by parliament for this fiscal year for unemployment purposes have been allotted to provinces for disbursement under provisions of agreements concluded with them. This department does not enter into direct negotiations with municipalities in connection with unemployment matters but only with provincial governments. Honourable Eric Cross is to meet me November 29 and I would suggest that your representations should be made to him so that if they meet with approval of provincial government he may transmit them to me. If projects you have in mind are to be undertaken under provisions of Municipal Improvements Assistance Act approval by provincial government is essential. Should you present proposals to provincial government I will be pleased to receive copy of these for my information.

Norman McL. Rogers,
Minister of Labour.

The national registration of recipients of aid to which the dominion government contributed shows that there were in the city of Regina a total of 316 young women, 16 to 29 years of age, on aid and reported fully employable in the month of September, 1938. Of this total 218 were reported to have never been gainfully employed.

4. The urban classes did not commence until October, 1938, but there have been 36 young women in training in the city of Regina since that time, 8 of whom have been placed in employment.

Mr. CRERAR: I have had some inquiry made into the matter of answering this question. I find that there would be literally thousands of documents to be copied. With the existing staff it would take a very long time to do this work, and if additional staff were put on it would still take a considerable time. I suggest to the hon. member that he might drop the motion and take the matter up with the secretary of the fuel board, who might be able to give him the information he wishes to secure.

Mr. PELLETIER:

For a copy of all documents gathered during the course of investigating the financial set-up of the Dominion Steel and Coal Company, or its subsidiaries, before the payment of subsidies on coal.

Mr. CRERAR: There is difficulty in understanding just what the hon. member refers to. There has been no investigation into the financial set-up of the Dominion Steel and Coal Company. In connection with arriving at the subventions which should be paid, the fuel board has obtained certain information of a confidential nature, which I should not feel at liberty to bring down. I might suggest to the hon. member that if he would see me some day about this, perhaps I could satisfy him.

Mr. PELLETIER: I gather from the minister's answer that there has been no investigation of the financial set-up of the company.

CANADA-UNITED STATES-GREAT BRITAIN TRADE TREATIES

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

For a copy of all correspondence, papers, letters and telegrams exchanged during the years 1937 and 1938 between the honourable the Minister of Finance or his department, or any officer thereof, and all industries or commercial companies or organizations or labour organizations, in respect to requests for hearings in connection with the trade treaties between Canada, the United States of America and Great Britain.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. DUNNING: I ask that this motion be allowed to stand. I spoke to the hon. member about it. It would mean the copying of about five thousand documents.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 6.25 p.m.

Monday, February 6, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. LACROIX

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In connection with a petition which I presented to the House of Commons, protesting against immigration, the Toronto Globe and Mail of February 1, 1939, in an article headed "Muddying Welcome on Canada's Mat," used the following expressions with regard to my race and myself:

> The experience of the Canadian Indians has been exceptional. Mr. Wilfrid Lacroix of Quebec-Montmorency should try to remember that fact, suppress his ancestral consciousness of guilt and approach the problems of to-day and Canada's part in their solution, not as a robber bent on holding his spoils from other robbers, but as a civilized man charged with a civilized man's duty to civilization. . . .

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to remind the publisher of the Globe and Mail that he is totally ignorant of Canada's history, for, had he opened its finest pages, he would have noted the obscure heroism of our early evangelists and missionaries, such as the Reverend Jesuit Fathers and others who, by dint of persuasion and unparalleled personal sacrifices and aided by brave colonists whom I am proud to own as my ancestors opened this vast continent to Christianity and civilization.

Long before the ancestors of the publisher of the Globe and Mail landed in this country, my forefathers had by their gigantic labours already made it a nation. And if he will accompany me to the old cemeteries of Quebec province he will find inscribed there names of which Canadian history is proud.

The publisher of the Globe and Mail having dared to compare the members of my race to robbers, I am compelled to remind him that those who made the most brilliant contribution to our confederation, which permits us to sit here to-day, are Canadians of French origin.

May I also remind the publisher of the Globe and Mail that those who defended with the greatest tenacity against the Americans at the battle of Quebec, the last parcel of British territory left on this north American continent, were French Canadians, many of his ancestors having fled the city.

Allow me to tell him also that by writing such nonsense the Globe and Mail is not working for unity in this country and that if his paper has any honour it will retract its words.

STANDING COMMITTEES

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Lacroix (Quebec-Montmorency) be substituted for that of Mr. Girouard on the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to.

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR REFERENCE TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Friday, February 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacNeil:

That the agreement between the government and the John Inglis Company, of Toronto, for the manufacture of Bren machine guns, the report of the royal commission dealing with said agreement, and all related documents, evidence, vouchers and exhibits, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): On Friday last the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke on this question at some length. He discussed the report in a general way and I intend to do likewise.

With one of his remarks, to the effect that in appointing Mr. Justice Davis he was sure he had selected as commissioner one who would be satisfactory to the country, I am in complete accord. Mr. Justice Davis without doubt was satisfactory to all. His reputation is of the highest, I entirely agree with the Prime Minister that he could not have chosen anyone more satisfactory unless it were the chief justice himself; and indeed I think that Mr. Justice Davis was just as satisfactory as the chief justice himself would have been in that case.

The Prime Minister mentioned the fact that Mr. Justice Davis had been appointed to the bench by our party. That I think was hardly necessary, because I believe that generally speaking, the judges of the higher courts of Canada whichever side appoints them, are honourable and entirely beyond partisanship after their appointment to the bench.

The Prime Minister's speech seems to me to show the need of discussion of this question here in the House of Commons, not by a committee such as the standing committee on public accounts. The Prime Minister referred to an expression I used some days ago somewhat hurriedly, the term "packed committee." As I said at the time, I used the expression in no offensive sense. What I meant was that that committee, composed as it is under the rules of the house of fifty members, would consist of eight members of our party, three of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and three of the Social Credit party—that is, fourteen representing all the different opposition parties to thirty-six on the government side. A committee made up in these proportions, as it would be under the rules, is likely to be a little more partisan than is the House of Commons itself, because in committees party feeling runs strongly; it always has. At the moment I do not recall any public accounts committee, set up in the manner in which this has been set up, bringing in any report against the government of the day. What I really mean is that the committee would be so overwhelmingly of one party that there would not be the same freedom of discussion as there is in this house.

One thing in the Prime Minister's speech to which I think I should take exception was the reference to a rule affecting any special committee that might be set up. He pointed out that if it were a special committee instead of a standing committee, there is a rule which provides that if hon. members commit themselves strongly on one side they should not be appointed as members of the committee. That is correct in reference to a special committee, but, as pointed out by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), it does not refer to a standing committee. Although I did not think of the same word as that used by my hon. friend, "intimidation," the thought ran through my mind that the reference made by the Prime Minister in that regard might rather tend to frighten all of us, and particularly those in the opposition sections, from free participation in the discussions. I thought it a little unfortunate that the Prime Minister should have made that reference, because the rule does not refer to a standing committee. It is true that any special committee might later be turned into a standing committee, but as the committee stands at present the rule does not apply to it.

The anxiety of the Prime Minister and the government as a whole—although they made no fight for it—to have this question passed to the standing committee at once, without discussion, struck me as more or less indicative of a desire to bury the whole report. After all, this question has been investigated by a commissioner, who, we all agree, is an outstanding man. There were counsel for the various parties; the government had three counsel, there was counsel for the Inglis company, including Mr. Hahn; counsel for Cameron, Pointon & Merritt, and Mr. Plaxton, counsel for the Maclean Publishing Company and Colonel Drew. So there were plenty of counsel. The commission sat for over two months and the cost was over $15,000. There is every reason for believing that the matter was so thoroughly investigated that it would not appear to be necessary for a committee of the house again to go over the whole matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The figure of $15,000 was the cost up to the date of the asking of the question. There may be more. We have not the final figures.

Mr. MANION: That was up to the first of February; so it was a fairly expensive investigation, although the Prime Minister tells us neither Mr. Justice Davis nor Colonel Ralston took anything for themselves. We have before us the report, made after very full investigation; therefore I ask why the report should be submitted to a committee, whatever committee it may be, with the heavy expense involved for the calling of witnesses again and going over the same ground, a rehashing of the same matters in dispute. It seems to me that parliament is the forum to deal with it. The report is now submitted to the jury of this parliament, and through this parliament to the people of Canada whom we represent.

I repeat that in view of all the facts this is the place to discuss the whole question. Therefore I am opposed in a general way, I regret to say, to the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). His speech in the debate on the address, in which he reviewed the whole Bren gun question, was a splendid effort, to my mind one of the best and most effective speeches I have heard in this house. But his motion does not strike me as the preferable way of dealing with the matter at this time.

Now to deal with the report itself. When it first came out, indeed before it was made public, information was given through the press, I do not know by whom, that the report was a complete exoneration of the government in so far as the Bren gun contract was concerned. To my mind that was merely propaganda. Far from this report being a complete exoneration of the government and those associated with the giving of this contract, it seems to me it is a complete condemnation of the government, as I shall prove before I finish. It is true that there was no evidence of corruption, but no one had charged corruption. I do not charge anything in the way of corruption now. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) quoted from page 51 of the report, where Mr. Justice Davis eliminated anything in the way of any suspicion of corruption. I accept that; far be it from me to suggest anything to the contrary. But, sir, there are fifty-two pages in this report, and I venture to say that on at least forty of them there is an absolute condemnation of the minister and, through him, of the government for having made this contract at all.

I say that Mr. Justice Davis, for reasons with which I shall deal briefly, felt that he could not come out and say distinctly that he condemned the minister or the government; he did exonerate them, of course, from anything in the nature of corruption. But in dealing with the methods by which the contract was put into effect he could not come out frankly and say what he thought, because of the arguments placed before him by various counsel, including government counsel, so he did it in a sort of subtle manner, by painting vignettes which he hung on the wall for each of us to see and come to his own conclusion.

After reading this blue book I should say that Mr. Justice Davis is an author of distinction. In many ways it is a little classic, a most fascinating, interesting and well-done booklet. But it has just a touch of subtlety so that one has to study it a bit to see exactly what Mr. Justice Davis means. Once one has read it, however, as I intend to read a few selections from it to-day, I think what Mr. Justice Davis had in the back of his mind but does not express in the booklet is so clear that one needs very little imagination to understand at what he is pointing. Indeed, sir, I think you could open this book almost at random and find that it condemns—by inference—the method by which this contract was negotiated. But I ask this: if he did not mean to condemn the methods followed in negotiating this contract, what was his purpose in giving what I have called these vignettes? What was his purpose in putting those in the book? If it was not done in order that we might draw an inference, then the only conclusion I could arrive at would be that it was a lot of padding. I know Mr. Justice Davis slightly, more by reputation than personally, and I know that he would not put mere padding in this blue book. It is a complete condemnation of the department, even at page 51, the same page from which the Prime Minister quoted as to the exoneration so far as anything in the way of corruption was concerned. That is where Mr. Justice Davis recommends a defence purchasing board. I should like to read a few sentences, to give the gist of what he recommends at page 51:

> What is plain to me at the end of this long inquiry is this: that if the policy of private manufacture of war munitions and armaments is to be continued in this country—

Then I jump a few lines.

> —the purchase or production of such munitions or armaments should be put into the hands of an expert advisory group of competent business men—a capable and experienced manufacturer, a commercial lawyer who has had a wide practice in dealing with large commercial contracts, a representative of labour and say a chartered accountant who has had experience in the examination of substantial business transactions.

Then he adds:

> These persons should constitute a board (which might be known as the "defence purchasing board") and be made directly accountable to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not a condemnation; it is a recommendation.

Mr. MANION: Yes, it is a recommendation as to the appointment of a board, but it is a condemnation of the defence department. That is my conclusion. If it is not a condemnation of the defence department, why does the report specifically state that this defence purchasing board should not be left in the hands of the Department of National Defence, which is the department dealing with such matters as munitions and armaments? Why does he say it must be put under the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Read on.

Mr. MANION: I do not want to read it all. Anyone can read it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to read too much, but I will read the next sentence:

> It is no reflection upon the technical skill and knowledge of the military officers and officials of the Department of National Defence to say this—

He exonerates them as far as technical skill and knowledge go, but just the same he says this defence purchasing board should be put under the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance, and not under the Minister of National Defence. We will draw our own conclusions, as my hon. friends have a perfect right to draw theirs. I have drawn mine, and it is very clear to me what that means. To me it is a complete condemnation of the Bren gun contract and the methods by which it was negotiated. And I say, sir, that the whole report, with which I shall deal briefly, is a devastating condemnation of the department and of the government of which it forms a part.

Perhaps first I should give a few dates with which we will be dealing as we go along. The contract was made on March 31, 1938. It was announced in the press on May 5, a little more than a month later, and was tabled in parliament on June 29, nearly two months later. Though parliament was sitting all that time, it was not tabled until two days before parliament prorogued. I do not know whether any explanation has been made as to why it was not tabled long before the end of June. I ask myself—and I am not doing this in order to be unfair—whether it was because it was not considered desirable to table the contract until just before the house prorogued. That is a question one naturally asks; the minister will be able to answer it. I do not know the reason; I am asking the question. The article in Maclean's magazine, by Colonel George A. Drew, was published on September 1, 1938. These are four dates that it is well to keep in mind. It is now five months since the article was published, but until the Prime Minister spoke the other day he had made no pronouncement in regard to this matter. It is true that he appointed this royal commission, but what I find a little queer about the royal commission—or perhaps the word "queer" is not right; what I find a little strange about the royal commission is that although the commissioner was instructed to give his opinions, he was urged by all counsel, including government counsel, that he must not do so, that the only thing he should do was to set forth the facts. I should like to read what I think the Prime Minister read the other day, from page 4 of the report, where Mr. Justice Davis said:

> The said commission required and directed your commissioner—

Then I assume this is a quotation:

> —to report as speedily as possible to our governor in council the result of his investigation together with the evidence taken before him and any opinion he may see fit to express thereon.

That is wide open; I agree that nothing could be more open. But, sir, if you turn to page 31 you will find that counsel argued against that. There the commissioner states:

At the conclusion of the long hearing, however, counsel in their arguments (excepting Colonel Drew) raised all sorts of objections to your commissioner commenting upon the evidence or expressing any opinion he might see fit to express thereon (though expressly directed by his commission to do so) or making any recommendations as the result of the investigation.

Then he quotes various counsel, starting with Mr. Geoffrion, who appeared for the John Inglis Company. He states that Mr. Geoffrion pointed out that this commission, as I suppose is the case with all commissions, was subject to the Inquiries Act, and Mr. Geoffrion quoted section 13 of that act as follows:

No report shall be made against any person until reasonable notice shall have been given to him of the charge of misconduct alleged against him and he shall have been allowed full opportunity to be heard in person or by counsel.

A little further along, on page 32, he again quotes Mr. Geoffrion, as follows:

You can report the facts, but if the facts of the report necessarily involve a charge of misconduct, you cannot.

And further:

You are limited in your power to find facts, but your inability to find facts against us.

Then further:

The question as to what extent . . . pressure was a factor in getting the British contract is out of your jurisdiction.

That is by Mr. Geoffrion.

Then he quotes Mr. McRuer, and I will cite one or two sentences. On the same page the commissioner says:

Mr. McRuer argued that the words in the order in council "to report upon the same" mean that your commissioner is to report the facts that he has found disclosed in the inquiry.

He then quotes Mr. McRuer:

". . . it cannot mean any more than to report the facts Otherwise the government would be asking you, Mr. Commissioner, to comment on the facts, to express an opinion on the facts. . . . I think it would be most unwise to ask you, Mr. Commissioner, occupying the high judicial office that you do, to make comments or express opinions that would lend weight to one side or the other in the debates that may follow. That is for the House of Commons. You are asked to report the facts, you are asked to report the evidence, and the opinions to be formed will be for the House of Commons, for the people at large, and for the press.

The commissioner then quotes Mr. Parkinson, who represented Messrs Cameron, Pointon and Merritt and the law firm of Plaxton and Company. I will read just one sentence from what Mr. Parkinson said:

"I submit that section 13 means that you must not make any adverse comments."

[Mr. Manion.]

The answer might be made to me that these counsel all represent interested parties. But we pass on to government counsel I assume Mr. Ralston, although there were three counsel for the government, Mr. Ralston, Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Dumoulin. The judge writes as follows:

During the opening of Mr. Parkinson's argument, just before the adjournment on the afternoon of November 23, 1938—

By the way, just a couple of days before the commissioner finished his work.

. . . I asked counsel for the government to define in due course what attitude they were taking as to the limitations put upon the scope of the commission by Mr. Geoffrion, Mr. McRuer and Mr. Parkinson. At the noon adjournment the next day government counsel stated that they were afraid that there was not very much that they could contribute in the way of a concrete suggestion, because . . .

And these are their words:

. . . after all it is a very general and very indefinite subject, having regard to the terms of the order in council.

I again quote Mr. Justice Davis:

As to sections 12 and 13, the position taken . . .

By Mr. Ralston:

". . . was that an adverse report of misconduct against any person was prohibited by the statute."

I take it that these are the words of Mr. Ralston:

". . . it seems to me that one must say that the scope of your final action is no more and no less than is connoted in the word 'report' in the statute, and that power of reporting is always subject to the provisions of section 13 prohibiting reports in respect of misconduct."

While government counsel said that there was no desire on their part "to whittle down your jurisdiction; nor is there any power or authority to extend it," their submission was that "this is a factual inquiry and not an inquiry in which opinions are asked or are involved, that is, opinions upon particular subjects."

Later in the report he gives his conclusion after listening to all these different counsel. Government counsel very strongly took the attitude that the commissioner had nothing to do but report the facts, so the fact that he did not give any opinion about the conduct of the government in letting the contract—or giving it, if you will—is due to this argument of the different counsel. On page 35 the commissioner says:

Having fully weighed the objection advanced on this ground . . . I have come to the conclusion that it is inexpedient to comment upon the evidence in respect of its bearing on the conduct of the individuals concerned.

That is very definite. Then he goes on:

The facts are all in evidence; and as said by government counsel in opening their argument "so far as the facts are concerned, there are very few which are even in dispute."

He adds:

I cannot myself recall at the moment any fact to which direct proof was adduced that is in dispute. It will be for those charged with the responsibility of dealing with the facts, i.e., the government and parliament, to examine and study them and to take such action, if any, thereon as they may see fit.

I have read enough, I think, to give the gist of the attitude which was taken by the different counsel. The reason I have done so is that, no matter what instructions were given to Mr. Justice Davis, government counsel took the attitude that he must not express opinions—contrary to the instructions given by the Prime Minister in his letter to Mr. Justice Davis; and when the Prime Minister was speaking the other day—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I interrupt the hon. gentleman? The reason was that there were no charges made; and that is Drew's fault, and nobody else's.

Mr. MANION: I am not charging corruption, neither is George Drew doing so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The law is the law; we cannot get away from it.

Mr. MANION: We will deal with the facts as we go on. There are no charges of corruption. I am not making any; but we shall have plenty of charges, before we get through, in regard to the conduct of the department in giving this contract.

While the Prime Minister was speaking he read a letter—a very fair letter—which he wrote to Mr. Justice Davis, and the press release he gave out. He told Mr. Justice Davis that he was enclosing the press release.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And the order in council.

Mr. MANION: Yes, of course; the order in council was enclosed too. Then I asked him if he had sent a copy of the same letter and the same release to Mr. Ralston, and he said, no, no special copy was sent. Then he added:

Mr. Ralston would, I presume, have seen the statement in the press.

I could not help thinking then, and I repeat it now, that that is a most extraordinary way of giving instructions to counsel. Why a press release rather than a direct letter? And certainly since he was sending this press release to the commissioner himself, and since counsel was being appointed, why did he not send the same thing to counsel and let him understand the matter thoroughly, rather than depend upon counsel's reading the press report? He might easily overlook at a time like that a newspaper statement. Mr. Ralston is a busy man. At all events it was without effect on Mr. Ralston, who made his attitude so clear and expressed it so strongly that Mr. Justice Davis accepted it and gave no opinion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was just wondering whether my hon. friend thought it was part of my duty to instruct counsel. I should not think so.

Mr. MANION: It was the duty of somebody to instruct counsel, if not of the Prime Minister, then of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) for the Department of Justice, or of somebody else. Anyhow we have no information to the effect that Mr. Ralston was instructed. Even if he were instructed respecting freedom of opinion which Mr. Justice Davis was given, he paid no attention to it, and like the other counsel, did all he could—and I am making no reflection upon them—to stop Mr. Justice Davis from giving the opinions which the judge obviously wished to give. So that Mr. Justice Davis had to give them by inference, by little pictures and extracts from the evidence from which we could draw our own conclusions. In other words, what I find myself asking is this: Was Mr. Justice Davis instructed by letter to do one thing, and then was the whole investigation so hedged around by legal difficulties that Mr. Justice Davis could not make a proper investigation and a proper report?

Mr. CLEAVER: I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but will he permit a question?

Mr. MANION: This is a serious discussion, and I do not want to be interrupted very much. I will let the hon. member ask his question, but I do not intend to be diverted to all kinds of other issues.

Mr. CLEAVER: Just so that we shall not misunderstand the attitude of the hon. gentleman, I should like to ask him whether he quarrels with the rule of law laid down by section 13 which he is discussing, namely—

Mr. MANION: I am not discussing the section. Let the hon. gentleman take his seat. If he wants to make a speech on the rules of law he can go ahead later and make it.

Mr. CLEAVER: I understood the hon. gentleman was going to permit a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The leader of the opposition has the floor.

Mr. MANION: In other words I find myself asking, was the whole investigation turned into a farce, in this way: that Mr. Justice Davis apparently desired to give opinions but was influenced so strongly by the views I have quoted, including the views of government counsel, that he did not, presumably, dare to do so? What was the attitude of the Department of Justice in the conflict between the argument of counsel and the order in council? The Prime Minister knows far better than I do that an order in council authorizing a legal investigation by a royal commissioner selected from the bench would probably be drawn up by the Department of Justice. I find myself wondering whether the Department of Justice made it clear to the government that, despite the letter of the Prime Minister to Mr. Justice Davis, this investigation would be hedged around by legal technicalities to such an extent that Mr. Justice Davis could not give what he thought was a just opinion. However, I am going to proceed with the case.

Here is what we find in the report. First, there was no competition. The matter was limited entirely to one man, Major Hahn, D.S.O., M.C. Without doubt this man had a splendid war record and there is nothing against him personally so far as I know. But the fact that a man has a splendid war record does not necessarily mean that he is capable of manufacturing Bren guns. I suppose there are at least thirty or thirty-five members in this house who are returned men, many of them with records just as good as Major Hahn, but I should not like to ask them to manufacture Bren guns. There was no competition of any kind. That is one of the strange things about this whole matter.

The only business experience that Major Hahn had, so far as the record shows, was in connection with one venture—and may I say that I did not attempt to plough through four or five thousand pages of evidence, therefore I am confining myself to what Mr. Justice Davis says in his report. Major Hahn went into radio manufacturing. It is claimed that it was radio assembling, but it does not matter; he was selling radios as a manufacturer, if you will. Later on he went into the business of manufacturing other electrical appliances, such as washing machines. He continued in this business for about ten years. When the crash came in 1929 and 1930 the company began to get into financial difficulties, and it was finally necessary to sell out to the Rogers Majestic Company. The sale was handled in such a way in 1934 that the creditors of the company received only twenty cents on the dollar. This was the company of which Major Hahn was the head. Perhaps there is no disgrace in that; people in many walks of life have had to do the same thing, but neither is it a recommendation sufficient to make Major Hahn the only business man in this country who should be chosen to manufacture Bren guns. On page 8 of the report it is stated distinctly that he was the only man who was given an opportunity I quote from the top of page 8:

> Notwithstanding that the contract involves the expenditure of several millions of dollars by the Canadian government, no industrial producer (other than Major Hahn) was consulted by the Department of National Defence as to the proposed manufacture of Bren guns for the Canadian government or invited to give competitive bids or terms of manufacture. Nor did anyone so far as the evidence shows, ever visit any industrial plant (except Inglis) to consider the possibility of production of Bren guns in Canada. Mr. Hellmuth put certain questions to the minister in this connection to which, with the answers, I now refer:—
> Q. You did not give anybody else a chance?
> A. Nobody asked for it.
> Q. Mr. Minister, what I want to get you to answer is this: You never did attempt in any method or any way to see what any one of these dozen or more well known companies, with skilled labour, skilled mechanics, who had been working in precision steel—well, let us take the automobile industry which makes the very closest parts and closest tolerances—no effort was made of any kind to see what they could do?
> A. The answer is "no." I do not think it was practicable.

That evidence proves that only one was given this opportunity. There was nobody else in competition with him.

Finally an order for 7,000 Bren guns was given on a cost plus basis. Major Hahn had a plant, the old Inglis boiler plant, which was reported as being capable of making boilers and certain other types of heavy machinery such as turbines. Certainly the plant at that time was not capable of manufacturing munitions, shells, Bren guns or anything else of the kind. It had been closed for two or three years. Many other plants in Canada were operating on precision steel, as they term it—automobile plants for instance. Mention was made of the Steel Company of Canada, the Dominion Bridge Company, and a number of others, any one of which would have been better able than the plant which Major Hahn had, to do such fine work as the making of machine guns.

On top of that evidence there is the strange circumstance that the minister himself in giving evidence—and I believe the Prime Minister said the same in the House of Commons last year—took the attitude that the manufacture of munitions of this kind should be done under government ownership. I shall quote from pages 10 and 11 of the report.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has suggested that I made a particular statement during last session. I do not recall at the moment having made that statement, and unless my hon. friend is sure of it—

Mr. MANION: I shall try to find it. If the Prime Minister says he did not say it, I am not going to question his statement, but I know the minister said that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not say I did not, but I cannot recall that I did.

Mr. MANION: I cannot lay my hand on it at the moment. I was criticized the other evening because I asked someone to quote me. Now the Prime Minister has put himself in the same position; not a bad game.

As appears on page 10 of the report, the Minister of National Defence was examined by Mr. Hellmuth. This statement is made on that page:

Under examination by Mr. Hellmuth, the Minister of National Defence said that he had stated in the House of Commons last year (1937) that he believed in public ownership, personally, through and through in regard to armaments; "and I still say so." Mr. Hellmuth proceeded with some questions to which, and the answers, I now refer:

Q. I put it before you here, that the best plan is government ownership?

A. I thoroughly agree with you.

Q. So that there will be no inducement for people to make money out of necessities which arise from war?

A. Mr. Hellmuth, as a matter of an ideal objective, I completely agree with you.

Then lower down in the same report it is stated that General Ashton—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will you finish the answer, please?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend can finish it. I am not going to read the whole report. Does the minister deny that he said that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On a point of order. My hon. friend, I am sure with the best intentions in the world, has read only part of the reply I made to learned counsel. Would he be good enough to quote the entire reply?

Mr. MANION: I shall read the remainder of the statement which shows absolutely that the minister favoured manufacture by the government.

An hon. MEMBER: An ideal objective.

Mr. MANION: I have it right here and I shall quote it. I have the minister's remarks last year as reported in Hansard where he came out quite clearly for that. I am not so sure of the Prime Minister, but I am sure of the minister. Here is the rest of the answer:

—but you should read carefully the recommendations made by a distinguished committee to us early in 1937, in regard to ways of dealing with practical necessities of the Department of National Defence. You should read that.

I do not see where that is a contradiction of what I said. The minister will have an opportunity to put his case before the house. I am not going to read the whole report.

I was going on to show that General Ashton and General McNaughton both favoured the doing of this work under government ownership. I quote from page 10 of the report:

The minister said that General Ashton (the then chief of the general staff) was very insistent upon the development of government arsenals and that the former chief of general staff, General McNaughton, evolved a very comprehensive scheme for Valcartier which would include practically all the requirements of the Canadian Forces.

I find myself wondering why General Ashton and General McNaughton were not called before the commission. Incidentally I might mention here that South Africa and Australia both manufacture munitions in their own plants.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I say to my hon. friend that General Ashton's testimony was offered to the commissioner.

Mr. MANION: There is no doubt that it was offered, but he was not called as a witness.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was not the government's fault.

Mr. MANION: I mentioned that he was not called, that is all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I tell my hon. friend also that these big interests which he has mentioned were all ready to give testimony with regard to public tenders, but they were not called.

Mr. CAHAN: That would depend upon government counsel.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It did not.

Mr. MANION: Since the question is very apt, I shall say now what I intended to say later on. I made it my business to ask six of the outstanding manufacturers in this country as to their ability to manufacture Bren guns. They had all read the press reports of the inquiry, which were very popular reading during the fall months. With the exception of one, they all answered that they could. One said he could not, but the others all said they would be willing.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will my hon. friend be kind enough to let us have the names?

Mr. MANION: No, I will not. I am going to try to treat with every respect my hon. friend over there who is interrupting so freely, but I think he had better treat me in the same way. I am not going to hand out names of companies to this government, and then if they have a job, have these people forgotten. No, I am not going to do that.

It is pointed out by the judge that the whole plant of the Inglis company costs only $120,000, or some such figure. But the argument the minister made against government ownership was that it was going to cost $30,000,000 to $35,000,000.

Then on page 11 the statement made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on April 2, 1937, is quoted:

Mr. Mackenzie King: For some months past an interdepartmental committee has been going very carefully into the whole question of the control of profits with respect to munitions of war.

I am quoting this to give his viewpoint. A little further down he says:

At the present time, in a time of peace, the government is proceeding on the theory of permitting competition with reasonable remuneration, the work to be subject to inspection and audit.

Then a little further down:

I can assure him—

I do not know of whom he is speaking, but I presume it was somebody who had asked the question:

—I can assure him that the whole question is one to which the government is giving careful consideration, and that it will continue to do so. We agree with him in asserting the principle that no profits should be made out of war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: I agree with that. I join with the right hon. gentleman on that question. I have taken the same attitude right along. I took it in Geneva, in 1934, as the head of the Canadian delegation to the League of Nations. Many other public men have taken the same attitude, so there is nothing new in that. I am merely pointing out that the Prime Minister took exactly the same position.

The next point to which I want to draw attention—it is a little out of chronological order—is a letter written by Mr. Plaxton, the hon. member for Trinity, to the Prime Minister, dated August 24, 1936, and it appears on page 17 of the report. I quote from the report:

Mr. Plaxton wrote a letter to the Prime Minister (Exhibit 336) on August 24, 1936. This letter was written by Mr. Plaxton while he was in Ottawa, and at the request of his brother, Mr. Herbert Plaxton, who had telephoned him from Toronto. The letter reads as follows:

"A group of friends of mine in Toronto are equipped fully to manufacture munitions."

I emphasize that—"equipped fully."

Their plant is located in my constituency.

We know very well that that statement was just not true, to put it in the simplest language. They were not equipped fully. They had this more or less broken down Inglis Company plant. That letter was deceiving the Prime Minister; whether intentionally or not, I am not discussing. I am simply stating that the letter was deceiving the Prime Minister. The letter also says, "A group of friends." Now the group was Major Hahn, a brother, or two brothers, of the member himself, and the firm of Cameron, Pointon and Merritt, in Toronto. That was the group.

I turn to the next page, and I quote the evidence given by Mr. Plaxton, the member for Trinity. This is from page 18 of the report:

Mr. Plaxton was asked during his evidence who were the "group of friends" of his in Toronto who were fully equipped to manufacture munitions at the time he wrote the Prime Minister on August 24, 1936, and his answer was:

"A. I was speaking as of that date of Major Hahn, Cameron, Pointon and Merritt, and Mr. Herbert Plaxton.

Q. And Mr. Gordon Plaxton?—A. No, not at that time.

Q. They were the group of friends who were fully equipped to manufacture munitions?—A. Yes.

Q. Where?—A. At the Inglis plant.

Q. How did you know that?—A. Well, I did not. I assumed as of that date that, speaking from memory, the deal was virtually concluded or had been—I was not definite as to any date."

That is the answer of the hon. member for Trinity.

The Prime Minister replied to the letter of the hon. member (Mr. Plaxton) on September 12, 1936, about three weeks after he had received it. The Prime Minister said in his letter to Mr. Plaxton—I hope the house will forgive me for saying "Mr. Plaxton" instead of the hon. member for Trinity, but it makes the record more clear—Mr. Plaxton having asked him if Canadians had the right to get contracts from the British government:

It would be necessary—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest that my hon. friend read the beginning of that paragraph.

Mr. MANION: Certainly. I was quoting only the part that was pertinent to my argument. The paragraph begins:

I may say, in reply, that we see no reason why a Canadian firm established for the manufacture of munitions should be precluded from obtaining orders from the British government. It would be necessary, of course, to see that it was distinctly understood that such orders as were obtained, were at the instance of the firm itself and not either directly or indirectly, at the instance of the government of Canada.

I interject now that Hahn would never have had a look-in of any kind with the British government if it had not been that he was pushed in by the Minister of National Defence—none at all.

Now in regard to Major Hahn, I want to give his record briefly. He called with my hon. friend from Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) on the deputy minister of national defence on October 9, 1936. Apparently he saw the Bren gun sitting there in the office, and he borrowed it, although it is specifically stated in two or three places in this report that there were secrets that had to be kept in connection with the Bren gun. But apparently, without any great trouble, he walks into the office of the deputy minister and sees the Bren gun, and they give him every encouragement. They send the gun to Toronto for him to examine. On October 19, 1936, ten days later, Major Hahn came again to Ottawa. He was staying at the Chateau Laurier. He and Mr. Plaxton asked the minister to join them, which he did, and the minister gave him, as a result of that visit, a letter of introduction to Mr. Massey.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I gave it to Mr. Plaxton.

Mr. MANION: Was the letter of introduction on behalf of Mr. Plaxton or Major Hahn?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): For Major Hahn.

Mr. MANION: It was a letter of introduction for Major Hahn. Then on November 10, 1936, about three and a half weeks later, Major Hahn was in England, and these are the facts: On November 10 Major Hahn was made government representative, and if I mistake not he was made government representative by the Prime Minister himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. MANION: Then I will hold that point in abeyance, but I think I am right. It was the Prime Minister as Secretary of State for External Affairs. I will come to that in a few moments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Department of External Affairs communicates on behalf of every department. It is quite possible that the defence department had asked for some word to be sent through the Department of External Affairs to the British government, and to that extent my hon. friend's statement would be correct.

Mr. MANION: I will deal with that point right now, although it means I shall have to anticipate somewhat. When Major Hahn and Mr. Plaxton got over to London they called on Mr. Vincent Massey. He is a very capable civil servant, and he showed intelligence in this matter. He did not, on the word of the Department of National Defence alone, want to push Major Hahn along too fast. Mr. Massey had been asked to get appointments with the British War Office for Major Hahn, so Mr. Massey cabled to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Ottawa this message, which appears on page 24 of the report:

Secret 396. Have received to-day following request in a wireless message direct from National Defence, Begins:

"Please request Major Hahn now in England to communicate with me through your office in cypher his impression as to possibility of producing Bren gun in Canada. This is urgent and ask him to give details such as time required for delivery and estimated cost. Ends."

In order to obtain information desired, War Office must be requested to give Major Hahn, as representative of the Canadian government, access to information of a secret nature which normally is not given to other than government officials.

Major Hahn also informs me that Minister of National Defence has requested him to obtain, if time permits, all available information regarding manufacture of tanks and shells which would also necessitate similar requests from the War Office.

Before making any application to war office, would appreciate instructions. Would be grateful for such instructions by to-morrow if possible.

This message was transmitted by External Affairs to the Department of National Defence, and, in reply, is a cable (exhibit 99), on November 10, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the High Commissioner in London.

That is the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MANION: It goes on:

Secret. Your cablegram 9th November 396. Have discussed matter with Minister of National Defence. You might request war office to give Major Hahn, as representing Canadian government in this particular, any information which they consider desirable and necessary to enable National Defence to reach conclusion on possibility produce Bren gun in Canada. It is not desired to request furnishing of information on any article other than this gun.

Surely the Prime Minister does not deny that he made him the representative of the Canadian government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Exactly as this communication states. As Secretary of State for External Affairs, I passed on to the high commissioner in London the wishes of the Minister of National Defence in this matter.

Mr. MANION: I was merely stating a fact, which is there in black and white, absolutely undeniable, that the Prime Minister, as Secretary of State for External Affairs, made Mr. Hahn the representative of the Canadian government. Nobody else did. Furthermore, I emphasize it, since the Prime Minister appears to wish to get out from under. I do not blame him much if he has read the report, but since he takes that attitude I emphasize it, because it has gone all over the country that apparently it was the Minister of National Defence who made Major Hahn the representative of the government. It was the Prime Minister. I believe the Prime Minister got false information or he would not have done it.

Now, I have gone ahead of my story, because I did not intend to deal just here with that aspect of the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend notes the significance of the words "in this particular"?

Mr. MANION: Yes, and that in itself is a reflection upon the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why?

Mr. MANION: Because the department was asking that Major Hahn be given information regarding shells and various other things, and the Prime Minister limited him to Bren guns.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was the most urgent requirement at the moment.

Mr. MANION: Argue that between yourselves. I will read a few more bits of evidence. I am afraid I shall have to go back because I got ahead of my story in consequence of this interjection, which I did not invite. I was simply stating a fact which appears in the report:

Then on October 19th, 1936, Major Hahn, Mr. Cameron (of Cameron, Pointon & Merritt —Toronto stock brokers) and Mr. Hugh Plaxton, were in Ottawa and had an interview with the Minister of National Defence in his suite in the Chateau Laurier hotel.

As a result on October 19th, 1936, a letter of introduction addressed to the Hon. Vincent Massey, High Commissioner for Canada in London, was given by the minister to Mr. Plaxton—exhibit 135. I will not read the letter; there is no necessity. I will turn now to page 19:

When the minister was asked in his evidence—

Remember, he had given a letter of introduction for Major Hahn, and yet in his evidence we find this:

When the minister was asked in his evidence:

Q. When did you first meet Major Hahn?

His answer was:

A. To the best of my recollection I met him first of all in May of this year (1938). But last week I was corrected when I was informed by Major Hahn himself that he was introduced to me in 1936, and I heartily accept his recollection.

I do not question that except to observe that it seems strange that the minister should forget that he had given a letter of introduction to someone whom apparently he had not remembered meeting.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I gave some to your colleagues.

Mr. MANION: Well, that is all right. The hon. gentleman probably knew my colleagues but apparently he did not know Major Hahn.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I did not know the friends of my friend's colleagues. Ask the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). I gave a similar letter.

Mr. MacNICOL: A letter of what?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A letter of introduction to friends of yours of exactly the same type.

Mr. MacNICOL: To what purpose?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): John T. Hepburn of Toronto.

Mr. MANION: When this difference is straightened out I will go on.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Let us have fair play.

Mr. MacNICOL: A letter in what connection?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have a copy of it if my hon. friend requires it.

Mr. MacNICOL: It will be all right to read it.

Mr. MANION: Then from Hansard of last year, at page 4524, to emphasize the attitude taken by the Minister of National Defence, I quote what the hon. gentleman says:

I want to say in the second place that the minister cannot take the slightest credit for the contract, and the minister never sat in on any of the consultations, and never met Major Hahn until after the contract was signed.

That is his statement. The Minister of National Defence so stated last year as reported in Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver) What was that?

Mr. MANION: I will repeat it. Emphasizing the evidence that the minister gave before the commission is the statement which he made as reported in Hansard. There was an argument with Mr. Bennett about the Bren gun contract, and at page 4524 of Hansard the minister is reported to have said:

I want to say in the second place that the minister cannot take the slightest credit—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is right.

Mr. MANION:

—for the contract, and the minister never sat in on any of the consultations, and never met Major Hahn until after the contract was signed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And that is my recollection at the moment.

Mr. MANION: I do not question the hon. gentleman's recollection, although he has a bad memory.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend must accept my statement.

Mr. MANION: I am accepting his recollection but I simply say—

Mr. CAHAN: It does not represent the fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I corrected it voluntarily myself in sworn testimony when I was apprised to the contrary.

Mr. CAHAN: It does not represent the fact.

Mr. MANION: Surely a letter of recommendation of that kind should be regarded as more sacred than to be given to someone whom the minister did not even remember. He said he did not know Major Hahn last year. Last year, in the House of Commons, he said he did not know him until after the contract was signed, and yet in 1936 he gave this gentleman a letter of recommendation. On page 19, the report states:

Following upon the interview with the Minister on October 19, 1936, and without waiting for the report of the inspector who had been asked by the department on October 10 to inspect the Inglis plant in Toronto there was sent by the Deputy Minister of National Defence to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, on October 20, 1936, the following letter (exhibit 74), suggesting, in view of Major Hahn's early departure for England, the desirability of communicating with the high commissioner as soon as possible.

The letter says in part:

Major J. E. Hahn, D.S.O., M.C., a former officer of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and representing a reliable group which controls certain manufacturing plants—

Note the plural.

—capable of manufacturing armament and munitions located in a large industrial centre where the labour and material factor is stable and favourable, has been in communication with the department.

And Mr. Justice Davis, on page 21, draws attention to this. He says:

It is to be observed that the letter states that Major Hahn represents a reliable group which controls certain manufacturing plants capable of manufacturing armament and munitions located in a large industrial centre where the labour and material factor is stable and favourable.

Then the deputy minister appeared before the commission. He was asked:

Do you mean to say now—

That is, two years later.

—that when you wrote that letter on October 20 you did not know the names of the individuals who made up that group?—A. No, I did not, but I did know that Major Hahn was a leading figure in the whole thing, he had a controlling interest and he had grouped with him worth-while people, which is the natural thing.

Q. How did you know that—A. I was told it.

Q. By whom?—By himself and by Mr. Plaxton.

Q. Anybody else?—A. No.

And further:

Q. You did not know on October 20—

That is 1936:

—who Major Hahn's associates were? Do you know now who Major Hahn's associates were, in the enterprise?—A. I am not certain that I do know who they are now, no.

This was two years later, last October. A little lower down the commissioner reports:

The deputy minister had asked Major Hahn on his first visit on October 9, 1936, that the Inglis plant be inspected and that was done by the resident inspector (aircraft inspection detachment) at Toronto, whose report is dated October 21, 1936.

That is an interesting date. He gave the letter to the under-secretary of state on October 20, 1936, and he did not get the report on the plant until the following day, yet he says he not only had the plant but he had plants. And the report said in part:

This plant is primarily equipped for the manufacture of boilers, turbines and the working of heavy plate generally. All equipment is in reasonably good condition, considering the length of time it has been in use.

The machinery at present in this factory with few exceptions, is unsuited for the manufacture of aircraft, but it might be used for the manufacture of tanks or shells.

Yet it, or Major Hahn, is said to be fully equipped to manufacture a much more delicate implement than tanks or shells, namely the Bren gun. Then he goes on and says:

It was October 26, 1936, that Major Hahn, Mr. Gordon Plaxton and Mr. Hugh Plaxton left for England.

Then lower down on page 23:

Major Hahn and Mr. Hugh Plaxton called upon Mr. Massey, the High Commissioner, upon their arrival in London and gave to him the minister's letter of introduction (exhibit No. 135). Major Hahn was given to understand, he said, that an appointment would be arranged for him at the war office and after waiting for something over a week he says he became "very, very impatient, I am afraid," and he telephoned the Minister of National Defence in Ottawa from London. Mr. Hugh Plaxton says he was in the room with Major Hahn when the latter was telephoning to the minister. Major Hahn said he had a curt reply from the minister and that Mr. Hugh Plaxton then sent two cablegrams—one to the minister and one to the deputy minister, both dated November 9 (exhibits 82 and 204). The next day Major Hahn was made the representative of Canada in this particular; i.e., the Bren gun (exhibit 99).

I said the Prime Minister had appointed him, and that is the fact as shown in this record—that he was appointed the representative of the Canadian government so far as the Bren gun was concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt there to make it perfectly clear? That statement from myself to Mr. Massey was:

You might request war office to give Major Hahn, as representing Canadian government in this particular, any information which they consider desirable or necessary—

Note the words, in just one particular, and any information which they consider desirable or necessary.

—to enable National Defence to reach conclusion on possibility produce Bren gun in Canada.

Simply to get information to enable the Canadian department to reach a conclusion on possibility of producing in Canada. But not to get contracts.

Mr. MANION: Why should not the Canadian government get its own information? But I have not misrepresented the Prime Minister. I quoted his words. When I say that he appointed Major Hahn representative of the Canadian government, no word he has said contradicts that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just for one particular purpose, to obtain information to send to the Department of National Defence to enable the department to make up its mind.

Mr. MANION: Since the right hon. gentleman is cross-questioning me, does he know Major Hahn?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I never met him.

Mr. MANION: I thought so. Yet, having never met him and without knowing him he makes him the representative of the dominion government. Does my hon. friend think that was a wise thing?

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I have to limit any communications I have with the high commissioner in London to those concerning gentlemen I know, I am afraid it will be found such a rule places an impossible restriction on a prime minister.

Mr. MANION: Letters from the right hon. gentleman to the high commissioner in London deal with a great variety of subjects, but it is not very often that any government makes anyone who is not in the civil service or employed by it a representative of that government to act on anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It depends on the extent of the representation.

Mr. MANION: I do not need to argue any further; the story speaks for itself.

Then on page 28 the report states:

The minister and the deputy minister were examined as to their knowledge of the "reliable group which controls certain manufacturing plants." The letter of October 20, 1936 (exhibit 74) having been read in full to the minister, Mr. Hellmuth asked him:

Q. Did you know at that time who Major Hahn's associates were?

A. No, and I do not know now.

A little further down the question is put to the minister by Mr. Hellmuth:

Q. I would like to have that question answered, with all due deference. I would like to know whether you knew whether Major Hahn had or controlled any plant or plants.

A. Not to my own knowledge—certainly not.

Q. Do you know whether he had any company at that time?

A. Not to my knowledge, no.

Q. When did you find out that Major Hahn had associates, and who they were?

A. I did not know who they were until the article referred to in this investigation (i.e., in MacLeans magazine).

Q. So that we may say the contract—at the time the contract was signed you had no knowledge of who his associates were?

A. That is quite correct.

Q. Nor had you any knowledge of who the reliable group were?

A. Quite correct. I accepted the reliable supervision of men in whom I had absolute confidence.

Q. I am asking you if you knew of any of these. Did you know what experience Major Hahn had in the manufacture of precision steel?

A. No, not to my own knowledge.

Q. Did you know what his previous industrial experience or activity had been?

A. No, not to my own knowledge.

And on the next page:

Q. So that you are still—I do not wish to say this at all offensively—you are still in the dark as to who these associates are and the group behind him?

A. I think we all are.

The deputy minister swore that he too did not know who were the "reliable group" which controlled certain manufacturing plants.

Now, that is an interesting picture. They recommend Major Hahn very enthusiastically, send him across there to get information from the British government, make him a representative of the Canadian government, yet two years later none of them appears to know who Major Hahn's associates were, who this "reliable group" were, where these plants (plural) were—in fact there were not any "plants," there was one plant in Toronto. In addition there was pressure put on the British government in regard to this. For instance at page 44 the commissioner said:

That the Canadian department pressed the war office in the matter up to at least November, 1937, is frankly admitted. The minister stated the situation generally in these words in his evidence:

. . . it was a sustained endeavour to press the British authorities for a decision as to whether they would produce in Canada or not.

How do these words fit in with what I quoted the Prime Minister as saying, that Major Hahn must get the contract himself without the Canadian government intervening? And further down:

As early as December 24, 1936, the minister had revised and approved a letter (exhibit 107) to External Affairs requesting that a cable be sent to the government of the United Kingdom. . . containing these words:

Canada is prepared to proceed if war office can place initial order for not less than 5,000 Bren guns.

Then on April 20, 1937, the deputy minister wrote Doctor Skelton, the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, as follows:

On discussing the matter with my minister this morning he requested that I explain the great importance and urgency of this problem and to request that immediate action be taken to assist Major Hahn who evidently intends to remain in London for a few more days.

Then further down:

A good many communications passed directly between the department and Colonel Loggie, who was sent by the department to London in October 1937. Colonel Loggie is a senior Ordnance corps officer and has his office in Canada House, London. This was the first time that the department had appointed an ordnance officer to London. Although communications could be sent by the department to London through the government naval wireless without any charge, the evidence discloses several transatlantic telephone calls at critical periods from the department to Colonel Loggie costing, for instance, in one case $77 and in another case $42 and others at $28 and $35 (exhibits 266 and 267) of which conversations no records were kept by the department.

That is unnecessary waste.

Mr. CAHAN: That is the commissioner's report?

Mr. MANION: Yes, that is the commissioner's report. Then on page 47 he continues:

As appears from the communications quoted above, the war office as late as February 3, 1938 (exhibit 190) was still adhering to its desire to deal with the Canadian government and not with a Canadian manufacturer direct.

And lower down:

It clearly results from the evidence that the department having introduced and sponsored Hahn to the war office and the war office having in November 1937 (after a full year of pressure by the department upon it) expressed its readiness to negotiate with the Inglis company for the production of 5,000 guns. . . .

And a little lower:

. . . the department felt it was really not in a position to propose to the war office the consideration of another contractor. Much stress was laid during the evidence and on argument upon what was termed the "pressure" from either the war office upon Canada or from Canada upon the war office, subsequent to the war office cable to Canada of November 9, 1937 (exhibit 182).

Then the commissioner adds:

That pressure from Canada upon the war office during the period was continuous is in my view the proper inference from the facts directly proved in evidence.

Then over on the next page he says:

No substantial objection can be taken in my view to the provisions of the Canadian contract—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: Just a moment:

—though in the absence of any competitive bids or terms of manufacture I am unable to pass upon the substance as distinct from the form of the contract.

I do not hear any "hear, hears" about that.

It is important, of course, that the contract be a good and businesslike contract; but what is more important after all is whether the procedure adopted in making the contract was that best calculated to protect the public interest and to secure the confidence of the people of Canada that there would be no improper profiteering in the private manufacture of war armaments for the defence of the country.

And the commissioner adds:

That is a question upon which the government and parliament, in the light of the evidence brought before the commission, must pass.

So, sir, here was probably a vast business coming from the United Kingdom in the manufacture of munitions. Confidence is necessary on the part of the United Kingdom in their record, is it likely that there will be confidence in the government or the Canadian people? I doubt it very much. Then on page 42 there is another statement I want to put on the record:

During the last week of August, 1938, an advance copy of Colonel Drew's article that was to appear in Maclean's magazine came to the attention of the deputy minister and other department officials. As a result of a conference with Major Hahn in Ottawa at that time a letter was taken subsequently from the company (exhibit 43) dated September 3, 1938—

That was before the investigation, remember.

—fixing the amount of the maximum overriding profit accruing to the company under the contract; the provision in the contract being thought susceptible of a construction by which the company might get a larger profit.

In other words, without saying so, he suggests loose construction of the contract. I have seen an estimate made in the press, though I do not know whether or not it is accurate, that the new arrangement with Major Hahn saved this country something like $250,000 in possible extra profits that he might have received if that letter had not been signed. So it must be said, whatever else has happened, that Colonel Drew has saved the people of Canada quite a vast amount of money.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It has cost them far more.

Mr. MANION: What has cost who far more?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I will develop that later.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman will have plenty of time to explain what he means. Then the commissioner adds:

No lawyer (excepting Colonel Orde who as judge advocate general has multifarious duties and would not claim to be a commercial lawyer) passed upon the intricate terms and conditions of the contract for the department; apparently the Department of Justice was not consulted. The minister said he never went over the proposals of Major Hahn in detail.

There are two other points and then I will be getting close to my conclusion. One other person who apparently advised the department in connection with this matter was a young gentleman named Lieutenant Jolley, a graduate of McGill. Lieutenant Jolley graduated in 1933, when he was twenty-three years of age, which would make him just over twenty-eight years old to-day and twenty-six years old when these negotiations were started. Here is what the commissioner says about Lieutenant Jolley, at page 35:

As already mentioned, several written proposals to the Department of National Defence were made by Major Hahn, or by the company which he and his group incorporated, during dealings with this government and with the Canadian people. After this, in view of this the year 1937, commencing with proposal "B" submitted December 29, 1936. These were analysed and examined mainly by Lieutenant Jolley, who worked alone on these different proposals down to the first part of December, 1937. It was essentially a matter for practical business judgment and experience. Lieutenant Jolley was twenty-three years old when he graduated at McGill in 1933.

That made him twenty-six years of age when this matter was being considered; yet he was the special adviser for the department.

Mr. GARDINER: Pitt was only twenty-four when he was prime minister of England, and he won a war.

Mr. MANION: I do not suppose my hon. friend is claiming that we have another Pitt in Lieutenant Jolley. Perhaps we have; I am not saying anything against this young man, but he had just graduated from college. The hon. gentleman who just interrupted me has had a great deal of experience in handling men. If he were back as premier of Saskatchewan I am sure he would not call on a young man just out of college to give him special advice on a subject which, as the commissioner said, required legal knowledge, business knowledge and mechanical and engineering knowledge as well.

Mr. GARDINER: I have often received good advice from young fellows.

Mr. MULOCK: What experts in the British war office examined the contract?

Mr. MANION: I am not dealing with the British war office; my hon. friend can do that. Then the commissioner goes on:

Lieutenant Jolley impressed me as an earnest and scholarly young man, skilled in his own technical branch. But he was obviously without the business experience and judgment necessary for dealing with a proposed business contract of an intricate nature involving the expenditure of millions of dollars.

This is the commissioner speaking.

At the conclusion of his evidence I said to him:

"Q. . . . there seems to be a good deal of responsibility upon you by way of analysis of all the different proposals which were made in your report. Of course I have not evidence yet as to whether or not your reports were acted upon, but I am asking you if . . . prior to December, 1936, you really had any experience in dealing with contracts of this kind?" To which Lieutenant Jolley very frankly answered: "No, I had not."

That is another illustration, sir. There is another group with which I wish to deal, and then I shall have dealt with most of the evidence upon which I wish to touch.

The interdepartmental committee has been very much in the limelight; the minister quoted it on many occasions. It was made up of men like Doctor Skelton, Loring Christie, Doctor Clark, Colonel Orde, Fraser Elliott, and in this case the deputy minister of national defence, who was chairman. Of this interdepartmental committee I say at once that these are among our very ablest and most outstanding civil servants. But in this case, I repeat, the deputy minister of national defence was chairman. It was the deputy minister who was doing even more pressing in this regard than the minister himself. The deputy minister controlled the actions of this committee, as will be found in the evidence which I intend to quote. Of course it is always subject to the government, but at the same time the deputy minister was chairman and he showed his control. At page 37 the commissioner quotes Mr. Fraser Elliott, who was in the witness box for quite a long time; I do not know how long, but at any rate a day or two. In giving his testimony Mr. Fraser Elliott said that—

. . . after the chairman, the deputy minister, had opened the meeting with a general statement indicating the purposes for which the meeting was called > the committee began to take an active part in the sense of asking questions and getting to grips with the problem. In so doing the committee indicated that competitive bids should be one of the main considerations, and one of the first considerations.

A little further on he speaks of competitive bids again, and then on page 38—

> The committee appointed a subcommittee of three, of whom only one was a member of the original committee, for consideration and study and report.

Further on:

> The subcommittee made its report on January 13, 1938 (exhibit 50). The report contained in part the following:
> Having in mind the main committee's suggestion that competitive bids be called for, the subcommittee, as an indication only of the names of concerns from whom competitive bids might be asked, mention the Steel Company of Canada, Dominion Bridge, Canadian Car and Foundry Company, Limited, Bertram Company, National Steel Company, and possibly automobile manufacturers who undoubtedly have suitable plants and precision tools, together with such others as, in the opinion of the main committee, might be asked to tender.
> The subcommittee appreciate that time is an essential factor but inasmuch as the duration of the contract is from five to six years, the suggestion of a delay of two to three months to allow intending bidders to gather essential information does not appear to be unwarranted under the circumstances and in view of the amount of money involved in the contract—

It might be interjected here that according to this very contract between the department and Major Hahn no guns need be delivered for three years from the date of the contract; the delivery of some five hundred guns any time within three years would fulfil the terms of the contract. So here was a contract the performance of which did not need to be started for just under three years. Yet the deputy minister of national defence kept pressing his opposition to anything in the way of competitive bids.

Later in the report the commissioner says that a second meeting of the interdepartmental committee on the proposed contract was held, and the question was asked:

"What was the main subject of discussion at the second meeting, Mr. Elliott?"

Mr. Elliott replied:

"Competitive bids and why the John Inglis Company should get this contract, the financial status of the company and a number of other things. . . .

"The committee wanted to get price comparisons from other competent companies. They felt the lack of them in considering this individual contract. They kept urging for some method of competitive bidding and comparative prices being entered upon."

Over on the next page the deputy minister as chairman of the meeting is referred to. Mr. Elliott continued:

"The chairman indicated that he had an understanding—exactly how it was acquired I do not know—from England that they would not deal with any other firm."

Pressed as to exactly what was said, Mr. Elliott put it this way:

"I said as a statement of fact that the chairman stated to us that he believed, or he was of the opinion, whichever way you wish to put it—he believed that England would not place the contract with any other company in Canada."

The commissioner goes on:

> Mr. Elliott said that the suggestion was then made that a cable be sent to England to ascertain definitely England's position in respect of competitive bids.

Mr. Elliott is quoted again:

"The chairman pointed out that to ask such a question at this juncture might endanger the placing of the British order, and endanger thereby the loss which he obviously was anxious to save Canada in the cost of the machinery and equipment.

And over on the next page—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Let the hon. member finish that quotation. The cable was actually sent. Would he mind finishing that paragraph?

Mr. MANION:

> The committee nevertheless did not take such notice of that opinion as to withdraw their desire to have the cable sent. They were willing to risk the danger. The form of the cable was then drafted.

However, it is not given here. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) tells me that the cable was not sent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was.

Mr. MANION: The commissioner then goes on to say that Mr. Elliott stated:

"An important matter then developed, so far as the committee was determined by the chairman indicating that responsibility for the way in which this particular company had been selected necessarily rested with the Department of National Defence."

Mr. Elliott said that the chairman (the deputy minister of national defence) pointed out that

"his department had followed the practice of the British government where competition is not always obtainable, and they unhesitatingly go into non-competitive contracts in order to secure their requirements. In this particular case the British government had picked the firm to manufacture its guns."

Lower down:

In view of the deputy minister's statement, Mr. Elliott said that the committee "practically reorientated itself in respect of the whole matter.

"We stated in the meeting at that time that if the department took the responsibility, then there could no longer be any objection. That was a fait accompli, and we had to meet it."

On the next page, page 41, Mr. Elliott is reported to have said:

"The committee gave the opinion that it was difficult to conceive that the war office was willing to deal only with one Canadian company, and that company in point of fact, as we stated, recently having gone through receivership."

He goes on:

"The committee pointed out that there had not been received from England a categorical denial that they would not deal with any other company. We therefore suggested a further wire or cable asking them, 'Will you or will you not deal with a selected list of companies?' That was quite a thing to raise, after the several cables that had passed."

He gives the numbers of these cables, and goes on:

Mr. Elliott said that the committee's suggestion of a further wire gave great concern to the chairman.

And Mr. Elliott is quoted as saying:

"He really felt so strongly about it that it amounted to a suggestion that we must not do it. And the committee accepted that. Then again, the committee dealt with the possibility of changing the war office's determination not to deal with other companies. We stated that if it could not be otherwise, then again we would have to agree to giving the contract to the John Inglis Company."

Mr. STEWART: So the cable was not sent.

Mr. MANION: The commissioner goes on:

The system broke down when the committee failed to report back to the body that had created it.

That is the story of the interdepartmental committee.

One more quotation from Mr. Justice Davis and I shall have finished. On page 49, in closing his report, he says:

No substantial objection can be taken in my view to the provisions of the Canadian contract. . .

I have read this already, but I will read it again:

. . . though in the absence of any competitive bids or terms of manufacture I am unable to pass upon the substance as distinct from the form of the contract. It is important, of course, that the contract be a good and businesslike contract; but what is more important after all is whether the procedure adopted in making the contract was that best calculated to protect the public interest and to secure the confidence of the people of Canada that there would be no improper profiteering in the private manufacture of war armaments for the defence of the country.

That is a question upon which the government and parliament, in the light of the evidence brought before the commission, must pass.

Mr. Justice Davis repeats again and again that it is up to the government and the parliament of Canada. On page 50 he says:

What is obvious, of course, is this; that if the government has an article to be manufactured for which by its very nature it is not practicable to call for tenders and the policy of private manufacture is to be adopted, then at once the heaviest sort of responsibility falls upon those charged with the duty of selecting the individual, firm or corporation to manufacture the article. The question is: Were proper and sufficient steps taken in this case to discharge that responsibility? Upon the whole evidence, that is a question for the government and parliament to pass upon.

As one of the members of this house I would certainly say that "no" is the answer to that question.

The government and parliament have all the facts. I have given from this fifty-two page report what I think are the outstanding facts, and therefore I say, why should a committee be appointed? There has been already great expense. It would mean that the evidence would be repeated, and without any doubt it would end—I say this not disrespectfully—in the old way that all these committees do end, that is in a political whitewash.

What conclusion can we come to after all this evidence? If Mr. Justice Davis wishes to find only as the Prime Minister quoted the other day from page 51, that there was no evidence of corruption, why did he include all these pen pictures of startling incidents shown in the evidence? It does not require much imagination to answer that question. The reason was that he considered the whole thing was irregular. I have touched on some of these points; but almost every page, nearly every paragraph in the report, criticizes the whole deal. It receives the greatest condemnation, as I have already mentioned, in the suggested appointment of a defence purchasing board, which by the way was recommended as far back as November 1936 by the conference of defence associations of Canada and was recommended in February 1938 by the artillery association; but nothing has been done until now.

My submission is that the whole report is one of political patronage in its worst form, favouritism to one man, Major Hahn; injustice to other industrialists far more capable and fully equipped—which Major Hahn was not; deception of the Prime Minister in the letter from the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton); of the interdepartmental committee by the various statements made to it by officers in authority; of the British government; and of the people of Canada. Has the Prime Minister—I ask this in all sincerity—read the report completely? Frankly it seems to me impossible that he could have read the report and not have condemned the whole deal.

Has he followed public opinion in the press? Take for example the two papers in this city, the Journal and the Citizen; the two newspapers in Winnipeg, the Free Press and the Tribune; the Toronto Telegram, the Financial Post and Saturday Night. These, to name only a few, as well as other papers across the country, have condemned the deal. In the debate on the address, I twitted the Prime Minister upon being too much interested in external affairs to be really interested in or understand internal affairs and the needs of the people, and upon not having been within a thousand miles of his own constituency since the last election. In reply, he said:

> The position of the leader of a government in Canada to-day is not unlike that of the captain of a ship when the ship is in a storm. The captain of the ship must not be spending his time wandering among the passengers on the decks; his place is at the helm.

Well, we have 11,000,000 passengers on the ship of state which the right hon. gentleman is controlling at the present time; over 800,000 are on relief and over 450,000 unemployed, and they are not in a very docile mood to put up with such matters as this Bren gun contract. Indeed the right hon. gentleman's metaphor was not a particularly happy one, because in a modern ship the captain does not stay at the helm; he has helmsmen to do that. He goes down among the passengers daily, inspecting the vessel, and what is more, he keeps his eye on the crew—a very important thing to do. I think it about time that the captain of this ship of state took a look at his crew and at the passengers. Does the Prime Minister endorse these pernicious proceedings? I use the word "pernicious" advisedly because to me that is what they are. Does he endorse the unfair methods by which Major Hahn was selected from among all the business men of this country, a man who, as Mr. Fraser Elliott said, had gone through receivership? A man who at that time was not manufacturing anything, so far as I know? So far as the record shows he had been idle between 1934 and 1938 and had had no experience in manufacturing anything of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Who else in Canada had?

Mr. MANION: There were many firms in Canada which had had experience in manufacturing shells and munitions. During the last war a number of large companies were manufacturing shells on a huge scale.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. MANION: They have precision tools. Mr. Justice Davis himself mentioned a number of companies which were capable of doing it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He did not.

Mr. MANION: I read the list a few moments ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will my hon. friend please read the evidence correctly?

Mr. MANION: Does the minister suggest that this Major Hahn, who was not a manufacturer, was the only man in Canada who could do this?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Certainly not.

Mr. MANION: That is all the answer I need. There were any number of companies. I make this statement: There is not a manufacturing company in Canada, not a company manufacturing steel products of any kind—and there are many of them—which was not far more capable than Major Hahn of carrying out this contract. I ask the Prime Minister: Does he approve—and I know he does not in his heart—of patronage of this sort, particularly patronage in munitions?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where is the patronage?

Mr. MANION: Does the minister suggest that he does not know where the patronage is?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I defy my hon. friend to prove it. I defy my hon. friend to prove any patronage.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton), who is in his seat now, brings in a friend of his and he gets the Minister of National Defence to help him out—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Your friend, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), brought in a friend who got the same sort of letter.

Mr. MANION: But he did not get a contract for Bren guns. I say now that there never has been a more shameful piece of patronage. I can understand a certain amount of patronage in other matters, but not in munitions. I do object to one man in all this country being chosen, while other industrial people are ignored, and given a contract totalling several millions of dollars. In the estimates this year there is a total of $63,000,000 for the Department of National Defence. If it is not the biggest, it is at least one of the biggest spending departments in the government this year. I meant to look that up, but I omitted to do so. We hear a lot of criticism of the Hudson Bay Railway which cost only $50,000,000. I say "only" when the fact is that that is a huge sum of money, but compared with this it is a lot less.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Do you object to this?

Mr. MANION: Do I object to what?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To the vote for defence.

Mr. MANION: I will tell you what I object to: I object to the minister over there having anything to do with it. Since he is fishing for answers, I shall give him some. I was leaving the minister largely alone, and was dealing with the government as a whole. I am ready to answer any question which he chooses to ask. I say this is a shameful contract which the Inglis company, which is Major Hahn, received. The Department of National Defence has no right to spend this $63,000,000. We hear a great deal about the deficits of the Canadian National Railways. The deficit last year was $42,000,000. This vote for national defence is fifty per cent greater than the deficit on our national railways. Is this money to be spent in this manner? What confidence can the people have in this government after these facts have been disclosed? They were not known to the people generally because as soon as the report was issued the Minister of National Defence or some of his friends made it their business to put out a story all across Canada that they were exonerated. I will admit that in so far as any corruption is concerned, but there was not complete exoneration. There was absolute condemnation of the whole deal by Mr. Justice Davis.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where is it?

Mr. MANION: On forty of the fifty-two pages.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where is it?

Mr. MANION: I am not taking any different attitude with regard to munitions from that which I have taken for years. At the League of Nations in 1934 I took the attitude on behalf of the dominion government that there should be nationalization of the manufacture of munitions. I think my right hon. friend has taken the same attitude on some occasions, and the Minister of National Defence has taken it on a number of occasions. A few months ago in London, speaking before the Kiwanis club, and again in Toronto before the Commercial Travellers' Association, I took the same attitude. I took the same attitude and put myself on record in my speech in the house at the opening of the session. I said that huge profits in munitions were repugnant to the people of this country. I said it was like taking blood money, that it was profiteering in patriotism. I went on to say that munitions for Canada should be manufactured without profit, that the manufacture of munitions for Great Britain should be so completely controlled that an absolutely fair deal would be given to the British government. I said that we should have the absolute confidence of the British government and that we must have a new deal in munitions.

This is not ordinary government business. No one can deny that this is a question of life and death, a question of peace and war; it is a question of the life of our boys. It is a question of the safety of this country, and perhaps it is more than that, it is a question of our freedom as a nation. Are we going to carry on as we have? Surely not. The Prime Minister has expressed high ideals on democracy and on social justice, and so do I. I say that if we are to preserve democracy, if we are to preserve our social system, these ideals will have to be lived up to better than they have been in the past. And this applies not only to my right hon. friend and his government, but to other governments as well.

The Prime Minister alone can clean this up, and he must clean it up. On this depends the faith of the people of Canada. On this depends national unity and understanding. On this depends confidence in the parliament of Canada, indeed confidence in the whole British parliamentary system. People across the country are asking themselves if democracies are worth while, if they are comparable with dictatorships. We all know that our democracies have very serious defects. As I have said many times, if we do not cure these defects, then to my mind the end of democracy is in sight.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister can clean this up, and he can do it quickly. There is only one way in which he can do it, and that is by cancelling the Bren gun contract. There need be no injustice done to Major Hahn and the John Inglis Company in that action. Out of pocket expenses could be paid. The work that has been done need not be lost because the government can expropriate the plant. To my mind that is the only way in which the confidence of the people of this country in our democratic government can be restored. That being my opinion, I desire to move, seconded by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) that the motion be amended as follows:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the first line thereof be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "In view of the evidence produced before the royal commission the opinion of this house is that the agreement made between His Majesty the King, represented by the Hon. the Minister of National Defence, and John Inglis Company, Limited, for the manufacture of Bren machine guns, should be cancelled."

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) is what is called a routine motion. It is a motion to refer a certain matter to a committee of this house. Under the rules of the house this motion is debated on routine proceedings, and not in the ordinary way as are other motions of which notice is given by an hon. member.

The amendment which is proposed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) would have the effect of changing the motion before the house into one which could not be debated on routine proceedings. The motion of the hon. leader of the opposition asking that a certain step should be taken by the government is a motion that should be put under notices of motions, like all other resolutions proposed by members of the house, and I submit that it is out of order.

I wish to call the attention of your honour to citation 132, page 41 of Beauchesne, which describes what is a motion allowed on routine proceedings:

> The motions allowed on routine proceedings are motions relating to the business of the house and for the discussion of reports from committees.

Obviously the motion before the house, if the amendment of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition is accepted, is no longer a motion that comes under routine proceedings. I would also call the attention of your honour to citation 397 of Beauchesne:

> An amendment must not raise any question which by the rules of the house, can only be raised by a distinct motion after notice.

The motion of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, just like any similar motion proposed by a member of the house, could not be moved without notice, and the fact that he tries to substitute his motion for that of the hon. member for Vancouver North, which could properly and did properly come under the routine proceedings, does not give any validity to the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has confused two things. He has quoted a rule applicable to motions brought before the house under routine proceedings, and then applied it to a motion which is already properly before the house. The closing words of the right hon. gentleman that the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) was properly before the house marks the point of departure in this matter. To quote again the standing order which the right hon. gentleman cited, and referring to citation 130 we read:

> The house may, by unanimous consent or upon motion after forty-eight hours' notice, make such alterations in the order of business as it deems advisable.

No one would contend for one moment that the motion we are discussing, the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North, is not properly before the house with the full consent of parliament, because the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself emphasized the other day that he was most anxious that the resolution should be considered; so I assume, your honour, that the motion is properly before the house.

The question now arises whether the motion which is offered as an amendment may be properly entertained by your honour. If we turn to standing order 48 and certain citations thereunder it will be found, I think, that this amendment is in order. Standing order 48 reads:

> When a question is under debate no motion is received unless to amend it.

The motion of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition is to amend the original motion before the house.

Then citation 394 of Beauchesne states:

> A motion may be amended: (a) by leaving out certain words; (b) by leaving out certain words in order to insert other words; (c) by inserting or adding other words.

The amendment follows the usual course followed in this and other parliaments, in that it leaves in the word "that," which has always been considered sufficient to maintain the status of the original motion, and then it proceeds to strike out all the words after "that" and to insert certain other words in place thereof.

Citation 395 of Beauchesne has this to say:

It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed.

No one, I think, will argue that this amendment is not relevant. The motion under discussion is to send a certain report to a committee of the house, and the amendment says that in view of all the evidence which has been produced—and this point was emphasized the other day by the Prime Minister—and in view of the consideration given to the evidence in the report of the commissioner, which the original motion suggests should be referred to a committee, it is unnecessary to refer such report to a committee because we have already sufficient evidence before us to warrant parliament in now indicating to the government that the contract be cancelled forthwith. So the amendment is strictly relevant to the question.

Citation 395 of Beauchesne continues:

Every amendment proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if agreed to by the house the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

No one will deny that this amendment is both intelligible and consistent—possibly a little too intelligible.

Then citation 400:

An amendment that is merely an expanded negative cannot be proposed by the chair.

That, of course, is one of the most commonly accepted rules and is frequently applied. It cannot be argued that the amendment is a negative motion.

Mr. DUNNING: Positively.

Mr. POWER: Read it.

Mr. DUNNING: The motion is for consideration by a committee. The amendment is a direct negative.

Mr. MANION: It is more than a negative.

Mr. STEVENS: Let us examine that point. The motion is that:

. . . the agreement between the government and the John Inglis Company of Toronto for the manufacture of Bren machine guns, the report of the royal commission dealing with said agreement and all related documents, evidence, vouchers and exhibits, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

That is the motion, and the amendment is that:

In view of the evidence produced before the royal commission the opinion of this house is that the agreement made between His Majesty the King, represented by the honourable the Minister of National Defence, and John Inglis Company Limited, for the manufacture of Bren machine guns, should be cancelled.

That is, the amendment invites parliament, instead of dealing with this contract and report by reference to a committee, to deal with the matter here. That is not a negative. It is an amendment offering an alternative method of dealing with the question.

Mr. POWER: What words are proposed to be stricken out of the original motion by the amendment?

Mr. STEVENS: All the words after "that," which is the usual practice quite commonly followed both in this house and elsewhere. In this connection, citation 406 of Beauchesne reads:

The object of an amendment may be to effect such an alteration in a question as will obtain the support of those who, without such alteration, must either vote against it or abstain from voting thereon, or to present to the house an alternative proposition either wholly or partially opposed to the original question.

That covers exactly the point made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and the hon. gentleman who interrupted me a moment ago. It is within the rules of parliament to propose an amendment as an alternative proposition either wholly or partially opposed to the original question. I submit, therefore, that the amendment must be considered as in order.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has cited standing order 48. It is unfortunate that he did not consult standing order 50, which reads:

A motion to refer a bill, resolution, or any question to the committee of the whole, or any standing or special committee shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

That is clear enough.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a question of considerable importance and I shall have to defer my decision.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend's point is still stronger than mine.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall defer decision for the time being.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I direct attention to citation 400, which the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has indicated:

An amendment that is merely an expanded negative cannot be proposed by the chair.

My hon. friend asked the house to notice particularly that citation. The motion before us is to refer a particular agreement to the public accounts committee. The amendment is to annihilate the agreement altogether. Surely that makes the amendment an expanded negative.

Mr. STEVENS: Citation 406 offers a new alternative.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to join with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) in protesting against what seemed to me to be an effort on the part of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to curtail discussion. He quoted a rule which applied to a special committee and then said that in this instance the public accounts committee was in very much the same position as a special committee. If his reasoning applied, no hon. member who might express views in this house which prejudged a situation would be entitled to sit on that committee. If that rule of the Prime Minister were made general it would be quite impossible to carry on the business of almost any committee of this house. For example, there is no subject on which feeling runs higher than that with regard to privileges and elections. How could it be possible for the committee on privileges and elections to discuss matters in which a large number of members who were vitally interested had already expressed themselves? Take the committee on railways. In the past there has been a good deal of discussion with regard to branch lines and so on. Does the Prime Minister suggest that anyone particularly interested in the question would be debarred from taking part in the work of the railway committee? Almost everyone has some definite ideas with regard to railway amalgamation or even railway co-operation. Does that mean that no one with definite ideas should sit on the railway committee? And what about the committee on banking and commerce? I am quite sure that the whole Social Credit party would be absolutely debarred because they have definite ideas, as indeed many of us have. Unfortunately, perhaps most of the members of the house have definite ideas along orthodox lines especially when it comes to finance. Are they to be debarred from sitting on the banking and commerce committee on any special question that may come up there?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is misconstruing what I said. He is speaking about the general powers of committees. My point was with respect to a specific matter, where anyone had committed himself in respect to a specific matter, and the question of his serving on a committee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My point is that a great many specific matters come before the committees which I have just enumerated. If the general rule which the Prime Minister is seeking to lay down were adopted it would mean that the house could not carry on its ordinary committee work. The Prime Minister seeks to lead us to believe that the work of this committee will be judicial. I question that very much. The work of the committee, if this motion is carried, is to find out whether public money is being wisely expended, and if somebody's toes are stepped on in the course of finding that out, all the worse for that person. The committee is not in any sense a judicial committee.

I did not think the Prime Minister was well advised in what he stated with regard to the member of the supreme court who was appointed as commissioner. He urged that this judge would be completely disinterested because he had not been appointed under the Liberal administration but had been appointed by a Conservative government. It seems to me there is an inference there that the people generally would not have had the same confidence if the judge who was selected had been appointed by a Liberal administration, and I respectfully suggest that after that statement the Prime Minister will have to be careful in his future selections to see that any judge who is chosen for any such position is one who has not been appointed under a Liberal administration. Otherwise, the public will draw their own conclusions.

I am in favour of the reference of this whole matter to a committee, because so far it has been quite impossible for the house to secure full and accurate information. In view of the large sums involved in the contract, my point may seem to be unimportant; but I think, in harmony with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) has said, it is essential to maintain confidence in the parliamentary system.

The situation which I wish to emphasize is very important, because it involves the rights and privileges of the house. I refer to the minister's answers to my questions last year. My colleague a few days ago, on the orders of the day, asked a question in order that there might be no misunderstanding as to the accuracy of the record. The minister gave no satisfactory information; he simply reasserted that the statements were "honestly, honourably and truthfully made."

I submit that such vehement protestations do not inspire confidence but rather tend to create the suspicion, "methinks the lady doth protest too much." I cannot know what is in the minister's mind; I cannot say that I am very much interested in that. It may be that the minister is ignorant in this matter; it may be that he has been misinformed; but the fact is that the house is entitled to certain information and the house has not received that information. Indeed, it received what I regard as misleading information. The minister's original statement, with regard to the Bren gun, as found in Hansard of 1938 at pages 2912 and 2913 is very sketchy indeed. He asserts:

> The Canadian government has let a contract for 7,000 Bren guns to a firm in Toronto, the John Inglis Company Limited, I believe it is.

That is very offhand. One might judge that the minister knew the situation in only the most casual way.

Then came rumours that there was something very strange about the Bren gun contracts. And I asked these questions, answered in the house on June 22:

> 1. Was Major James Hahn appointed by the Canadian government to go to England in 1937 and 1938 to make a survey of munitions production for the purpose of advising the Canadian government?
> 2. If so, were his expenses paid by the Canadian government?
> 3. What were the terms of Major Hahn's employment?
> 4. At what date did Major Hahn cease to be employed by the Canadian government to advise on munitions and begin negotiating for production by him of Bren machine guns?
> Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver):
> 1. No.
> 2, 3 and 4. Answered by 1.

It seems to me that the minister hides behind technicalities. Apparently I should have included in my question the year 1936. In his evidence as reported at page 2356 the minister said:

> The question refers only to 1937 and 1938 and in my judgment the question is absolutely properly replied to or answered.

Well, if that is the kind of answer we are to be given, in the future we shall always have to put in a great many dates or general statements, such as "in the year 1936, 1937, 1938 or 1939 or any other year." I suppose that is the only way to get a definite and reliable answer from the minister. Major Hahn was apparently a promoter, then a representative of the government in one particular, and again a probable contractor.

This house has a right to know about such an arrangement. That was the reason for my questions.

Let us look at this question of dates. On October 19, 1936, there was a letter of introduction from the minister to the high commissioner in London. On November 10, 1936, there was a cable from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the high commissioner asking the latter to arrange with the war office to supply information regarding the Bren gun to Hahn, "as representing the Canadian government in this particular." On December 5, 1936, Hahn wrote a letter to the minister enclosing a voluminous report of his investigations. On December 7, Hahn was in conference with officers of the Department of National Defence. On December 29, 1936, Hahn submitted a written proposal. In May, 1937, during the imperial conference the minister was informed by the deputy that Hahn was making progress with the war office. He therefore became, in the words of the minister, at least so far as they were concerned "a probable contractor." That was in May, 1937, according to the minister himself. Up to that time presumably Hahn was a representative of the Canadian government. And the minister goes on to say:

> I asked the deputy minister myself immediately to obtain for me some details of his company and of his financial standing.

Incidentally may I note that it was not until May, 1937, when Hahn became "a probable contractor" that the minister sought to find out anything about the details of his company or his financial standing. But I go on with these dates: In June, 1937, Hahn and the deputy minister were in England together. They saw the officials of the war office together. Remember that the minister had stated it as his opinion that Hahn had ceased to be a representative of the government and became a prospective contractor on December 5. That is the date of the report to the department of his investigations in England. He adds, however—I quote the minister himself—

> On December 5, I take it in my judgment. It is a matter of opinion and argument.

Despite the admission of the minister that the point is one to be argued, a matter of opinion, he comes out in this house with his categorical "No" with regard to the whole series of questions. The second question I asked was:

> 2. If so, were his expenses paid by the Canadian government?

The answer is:

> Answered by 1.

Let me point out that in 1937 Hahn put in a bill for legal fees amounting to something like $6,500; yet according to the minister he was no longer a representative of the government but only a probable contractor. Also he put in a bill for $7,191.31 for travelling expenses to England in the middle of 1937. I would ask the minister whether Mr. Hahn was then a representative or a potential contractor. My question covered that period. Curiously enough, on this particular trip Hahn was said to be on private business. During the discussions regarding his contract Major Hahn was in Ottawa from March 14 to 18, 1938, and later submitted his bill for $326.80. It is true there is no evidence that I can find as to whether or not these bills were paid, but that does not alter my argument.

There is still another item that is of general interest to the public of this country with regard to moneys to be paid by the government to the company. Turning to the agreement we find at page 5 that:

A sum not exceeding $20,000 in respect of actual cost of preliminary investigation, planning and engineering services carried out by the party of the second part prior to the execution of the agreement as evidenced by vouchers—

Let me emphasize that. This large amount of $20,000 was to be granted for services rendered prior to the execution of the agreement. Yet the whole transaction was brushed aside by the minister in his answers to my questions by that one word "No".

My question No. 3 related to the terms of Major Hahn's employment, and I submit that this was not covered by the answer to question No. 1; it was a wide-open question, a very important one. But all the minister does is to say "No." Yet a few minutes later on that self-same day the minister said emphatically with regard to this same Bren gun matter that there was not the slightest intention to misrepresent the situation. I read the minister's own words as reported at page 4120 of Hansard of 1938:

I want to assure my hon. friend that there was not the slightest intention to misrepresent the situation.

Again a little later:

There was not the slightest intention to suppress nor was there a suppression of any information, in the slightest degree.

The minister, I may say, succeeded admirably in doing what he says he had not the slightest intention of doing; he succeeded in misrepresenting the situation to this house and in suppressing information that was highly necessary if we were to make an intelligent decision on the question at issue.

This brings me to another point. During the discussion of the defence estimates Mr. Bennett had asked whether the order from the British war office had not been secured through the good offices of the Department of National Defence. The minister replied, as reported at page 3555 of Hansard of 1938:

No; as a matter of fact I think negotiations were carried on entirely by the company's representative in England for the last two years, since 1936.

A week later I followed this up by a question with regard to United Kingdom munitions, and was told that the Department of National Defence played no part, directly or indirectly, in those negotiations. Let me read the Hansard report in order that we may be quite sure:

I have seen the article referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and I wish to assure him at once that the Department of National Defence has played no part either directly or indirectly in these negotiations. With reference to any orders to be placed in Canada, we have no more information than is in possession of the hon. member who asked the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is right; "to be placed."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister concluded:

I think that that is as definite as I can make the statement.

And the minister still maintains that position.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is true, as the minister says, that the contracts were signed separately. It may be true, as he asserts, that he has no knowledge of the signing of the contracts. In that regard he may be correct, but I ask the minister, whether as he affirmed the other day, he had been answering the questions "honestly, honourably and truthfully." I am afraid that the house will be inclined to ask how honestly, how honourably and how truthfully. The house itself, and the public, must be the judge of that. Consider his own statements. Let me read from Hansard for 1938 at page 4120. I questioned him:

I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence, as it is asked both in the despatch and in a long editorial in the Free Press of last Monday, how he reconciles this state of affairs with his statement across the floor of the house to me the other day when he said:

"With reference to any orders to be placed in Canada, we have no more information than is in possession of the hon. member who asked the question."

Apparently there has been a joint arrangement between the British authorities and the Canadian authorities, together with a loan of certain machinery from Quebec. If that statement is correct, how does the minister reconcile this seemingly very careful arrangement, and the signing of the contract, with his statement to me that he knows nothing more about the matter than I do?

The minister replied:

If my hon. friend will look over the discussions which took place in committee of supply when my own estimates were under consideration, he will find that in response to the question of some hon. gentleman opposite, details were very carefully stated at that time. There was no cooperative contract—

I call the attention of the house to this:

There was no cooperative contract; the contract with the war office was signed by the Toronto firm entirely separately from the contract with the Canadian government; but, as the result of the two complementary contracts being signed, there will be a saving to this government of over one and a quarter million dollars.

Later on he did seem to give some indication that there had been negotiations, for he said:

I say now in regard to these contracts that there has never been a cooperative effort between the British war office and the government of Canada except in regard to the Bren gun—

That was the very item and the only item under discussion. That is a most peculiar statement, which really I fail to understand. As I said a moment ago, it may be true that the contracts were signed separately, but there is very full evidence on the record showing joint consultation, cooperation and pressure prior to the contract. Take the report of the commissioner, from which I read this extract from the evidence:

Under such an arrangement guns sold to the Canadian government would carry their proper pro rata preparation cost. There are other obvious details which can be dealt with once the general basis has been found acceptable.

That is on page 26. Then on page 27:

—for cooperating in the form of "educational orders."

Then Mr. Geoffrion said this:

These two contracts are so fearfully interwoven that you cannot touch one without touching the other.

That is on page 32. Again on page 43 there is another interesting extract:

Then on March 28 or 29 Colonel Orde went to Toronto to represent the department in settling the terms of the British contract so as to make it uniform, so far as possible, with the Canadian contract.

All I can say is that if the minister does not know about the contract he should have known something about it. I want to read that passage once again:

Then on March 28 or 29 Colonel Orde went to Toronto to represent the department in settling the terms of the British contract so as to make it uniform, so far as possible, with the Canadian contract.

Yet the minister dares to assert even today, as I understood his interruptions, that he knew nothing about it, that he had no more information than I had. The deputy minister, in his letter to the high commissioner's office on May 20 said in part:

For the reasons which I have outlined, the department ventures to suggest that it would be preferable to have the war office contract conform in detail with the one which the department has executed, but of course this is a matter for the war office to determine, and it is understood that the contractor will accept any changes by way of clarification which are desired.

That is on page 44.

That the Canadian department pressed the war office in the matter up to at least November of 1937 is frankly admitted. The minister himself stated the situation generally in giving his evidence, in these words:

—it was a sustained endeavour to press the British authorities for a decision as to whether they would produce in Canada or not. That is the tenor of all the correspondence for nine or ten months in 1937—a sustained endeavour to obtain a decision from the war office as to whether or not they would place an order for Bren guns in the Dominion of Canada. That was carried on until November of 1937, I think.

Then the commissioner states:

That pressure from Canada upon the war office during the period was continuous is in my view the proper inference from the facts directly proved in evidence.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I confess myself to be utterly nonplussed. Whatever his motives may have been or whatever his capability may be, the minister did not give the house satisfactory information and, further, information to which the house was clearly entitled. All I can say is that the situation is a serious one. If the house loses confidence in the statements of the minister in the Bren gun affair, how can we have confidence in his statements when his estimates again come up for discussion in this house? It is especially serious when the minister is so largely responsible for the greatly increased estimates for national defence which are being presented to the house this year. I would urge that it is not merely the minister who is concerned in this matter; if the government maintains present arrangements, it must accept a very, very serious responsibility.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, as you are reserving decision on the validity of the amendment which has been moved by my leader, (Mr. Manion) I shall not deal with that as I had intended to, but will refer to the motion itself, the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), that the contract and the commissioner's report should be referred to the committee on public accounts.

On the last occasion that this matter was before this house, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) read from the report the reasons why the government had created a royal commission, and he read also the terms of reference which had been given to that commission—terms of reference so wide, I think, as to satisfy the general public of Canada that the investigation which was about to take place would be wide and general and that the report which would follow it would give the views and the opinion of the commissioner on the facts collected.

The Prime Minister went further than that, and explained his reasons for selecting the commissioner. He read a copy of the letter in which he expressed his appreciation that the particular commissioner had accepted the task, and he also read a statement which had appeared in the press at the time of the institution of the commission in which the view was expressed that the government would be ready to enlarge the scope of the inquiry if in the opinion of the commissioner that was necessary.

After thirty-five meetings of the commission, when all the evidence which appeared to be forthcoming had been laid before the commission, counsel one after another, began to make representations to the commissioner giving him advice as to what his report must not contain. My leader has referred to them, but I wish to emphasize one or two points which they raised.

First, counsel representing the John Inglis Company drew attention to the fact that the commissioner must suppress the word "misconduct"; he must go even further than that; he must see to it that he did not imply misconduct so far as that counsel's clients were concerned. He said—I am referring to page 32 of the report:

> You are limited in your power to find facts, but your inability to find facts against us.

Then he made the reference to the fact that the British contract was outside the commissioner's jurisdiction.

Counsel who was affiliated with him in the representation of the John Inglis Company supported the views of the first counsel and also emphasized the fact that nothing outside the collection of facts should be contained in the commissioner's report.

Then, counsel for Plaxton and Company and the stockbrokers of Toronto, goes so far as to say that the commissioner would be forbidden to make a report against this counsel's clients. While this counsel had begun to address the commissioner, the commissioner asked the counsel for the government if he would be prepared to express an opinion with regard to limitations which might be put upon his, the commissioner's, words and the following day that counsel did express his opinion. It will be found at the top of page 34, and it is very much to the same effect as that of the other counsel. It is not very clear to follow, but he does make the point:

> While government counsel said that there was no desire on their part "to whittle down your jurisdiction; nor is there any power or authority to extend it.

I suggest that with these views coming at the end of thirty-five days of inquiry, it was scarcely likely that the commissioner, at that late date, would turn to the government for an extension of powers to enable him to give the type of report that I for one, as a member of the general public of Canada, would have expected that commissioner to give. The commissioner does restrict himself; he restricts himself to the extent of saying this:

> Having fully weighed the objection advanced on this ground—

That is the charges of misconduct.

> —as well as the weighty consideration brought to my attention by counsel that the rights of the individuals interested in the contract might become the subject of legal controversy elsewhere, I have come to the conclusion that it is inexpedient to comment upon the evidence in respect of its bearing on the conduct of the individuals concerned.
> The facts are all in evidence; and as said by government counsel in opening their argument
> > So far as the facts are concerned, there are very few which are even in dispute.
> I cannot recall myself at the moment any fact to which direct proof was adduced that is in dispute. It will be for those charged with the responsibility of dealing with the facts, i.e., the government and parliament, to examine and study them and to take such action, if any, thereon as they may see fit.

I turn to page 50 and quote again the words of the commissioner:

> What is obvious, of course, is this: that if the government has an article to be manufactured for which by its very nature it is not practicable to call for tenders and the policy of private manufacturer is to be adopted, then at once the heaviest sort of responsibility falls upon those charged with the duty of selecting the individual, firm or corporation to manufacture the article. The question is: Were proper and sufficient steps taken in this case to discharge that responsibility? Upon the whole evidence, that is a question for the government and parliament to pass upon.

That is the gist of the report of the commissioner. And the Prime Minister's wish is that this matter should be referred to the public accounts committee. Rarely if ever in my fourteen years in this house has the public accounts committee met; but from a reading of Canadian political history in years before that I find that the public accounts committee has been the ground for the fiercest sort of political battle. The government of the day would have the majority representation on that committee—

An hon. MEMBER: On every committee.

Mr. STIRLING: —and the object of the government supporters on that committee would be to ensure as far as they could, by such means as were at their disposal, that criticism of the government of the day should not be contained in the report of that committee. The public accounts committee as set up is composed of thirty-six Liberals, eight Conservatives, the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) and two of his associates, and three members of the social credit group. I cannot bring myself to believe that any further light will be allowed to be shed on this matter by government supporters if it is sunk in the public accounts committee. If the commissioner had had suggested to him by government counsel that he should not report thus, and he had to content himself with collecting facts and emphasizing them as he did most notably, I do not consider that there will be any probability that we shall be allowed to be told in the public accounts committee some of the things which will have to be told before the public of Canada can really understand this matter.

Every time I read or think of this matter I ask myself: Why was Major Hahn selected? How did he become the favourite of the government? When the minister's estimates were before the house last session, reference was made by myself to an investigation which was being carried on as to the potentialities of Canadian industry as far as the manufacture of munitions, guns and other armaments was concerned. At that time I asked him if the Bren gun contract was a case in point. I asked if the Bren gun contract was one of the pieces of work undertaken as a result of the findings of the committee of inquiry into industrial possibilities, and the minister answered that it was.

Shortly after the minister took charge of the department he started this inquiry. I do not know the number of firms which had been investigated at the time Major Hahn was introduced to him, but by the time the contract was signed between seven and eight hundred firms had been investigated as to their potentialities. I am of opinion that at the time the introduction took place the minister must have been in possession of facts which would have led him to believe that Major Hahn was far from being the only possible contractor for this purpose. But he was selected and he proceeded to England. Accompanying him was a letter of introduction which the minister had written and which he tells us was written on behalf of a man whom he did not know. It was a letter of introduction which was to take Major Hahn as far as the high commissioner's office in London. About the same time as that interview the deputy minister of national defence wrote a letter to which reference has been made already. This letter, to be found on page 20 of the report, was addressed to the under-secretary of state for external affairs. Its object was to enable the under-secretary of state for external affairs to prepare the high commissioner for the coming of Major Hahn so that the doors of the war office might be opened to him. The question of the inaccuracy and misleading nature of that letter has been drawn already to the attention of hon. members and I shall not stress this any further.

It should be remembered that at this time the deputy minister of national defence, upon whom the minister so properly relied and for whose work the minister properly takes full responsibility, was able to associate himself in this ordnance matter with the master general of the ordnance. The master general of the ordnance had been retired in 1934, I think it was, and given the customary twelve months' leave of absence. The Liberal victory occurred in 1935, and just before his year of leave had expired the position of master general of ordnance which had been abolished was recreated and this general officer was made master general of the ordnance. The deputy minister could scarcely be expected to carry all the details of Bren gun supplies in his head, but we must assume that the master general of the ordnance was in a position to keep the deputy minister straight on the matter. It is most unfortunate that the master general of the ordnance was not able to appear before the commissioner to give evidence of a technical nature which in the ordinary state of affairs he would certainly have done. Unfortunately his condition of health prevented his appearance. I draw no inference nor do I make any suggestion; I simply say it was most unfortunate under the circumstances that the evidence of the master general of the ordnance in connection with gun making was not available to the commissioner.

When Major Hahn reached London he found that the doors of the war office were not open and that he was unable to make the contracts he desired with the senior officers in London having to do with matters of defence. The high commissioner did not see fit to give him an entrée. Becoming disappointed with the delay, he telephoned long distance to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). The Minister of National Defence did not seem particularly ready to help him. So the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) sent two cables which are mentioned in the report. Immediately the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is the Prime Minister, sent a cable which has been referred to already and which indicated that he had taken Major Hahn under his wing to the extent of representing that he was Canada's representative in this particular Bren gun matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I just direct my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the cable to which he refers as having been sent by myself was sent in reply to a cable to me from the high commissioner? It was not sent as a result of a cable from anyone else. The high commissioner cabled to me and there was a reply within twenty-four hours as he would expect.

Mr. STIRLING: If I may turn to that page of the report for a moment.

Mr. MANION: That does not change the question at all.

Mr. STIRLING: I have said that immediately after the two cables from the hon. member for Trinity were sent, the Secretary of State for External Affairs sent the cable referred to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has before him the report of the commissioner and he will see that the cable which the Secretary of State for External Affairs sent was sent on November 10. It was sent in reply to a cable which had been received from the high commissioner on November 9, the day before. So far as cables from any other source were concerned, they had nothing whatever to do with my reply. I had no knowledge of them and could not have.

Mr. MANION: Except that the right hon. gentleman by his cable made Major Hahn the representative of the Canadian government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not follow the Prime Minister's interjection. My statement is true in fact. The hon. member for Trinity telegraphs the Minister of National Defence and his deputy minister on November 9, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs cables the high commissioner on November 10.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Connected in point of date.

Mr. STIRLING: I never said there was any connection between the two but in point of date.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But—

Mr. STIRLING: Allow me to make this speech. I make the statement that immediately after these two cables came the cable from the Prime Minister to which I am referring.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But my hon. friend will not say that the cable to which I replied was a cable from the high commissioner. My cable was to the high commissioner, and had nothing to do with any other cable.

Mr. STIRLING: I have not been suggesting that it was to the high commissioner, the hon. member for Trinity or anyone else. I merely drew attention to the fact that immediately afterwards, in point of chronology, the Prime Minister's cable went to London. The Prime Minister took this selected, favourite contractor under his wing as Canada's representative for the Bren gun.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, my hon. friend is not accurate when he says "as Canada's representative for the Bren gun," because the cable read:

> You might request war office to give Major Hahn, as representing Canadian government in this particular—

Just one particular question.

Mr. STIRLING: And that was the Bren gun.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It continues:

> —any information which they consider desirable and necessary to enable national defence to reach conclusion on possibility produce Bren gun in Canada.

Not to give Major Hahn any contract.

Mr. MANION: What was the object of the introduction?

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Speaker, am I making this speech or am I not? The Prime Minister has introduced this interruption four times now, and everything I have said so far has been absolutely accurate.

Mr. EULER: With a wrong inference to be drawn.

Mr. STIRLING: Then I am very sorry for my hon. friend's mind. I am not suggesting any inference whatever in the matter. Canada's representative "in this particular" is referred to in this cable; "in this particular" refers to matters connected with the Bren gun, and Major Hahn had gone to London, as shown by the letter from the deputy minister of national defence to the high commissioner for the purpose of going into matters connected with the Bren gun, to ascertain the possibility, speed, and so on, with which they could be made in Canada. There has been no inaccuracy in my statement.

We reach then the position that the Prime Minister has taken up in that cable, and I find it extremely difficult to equate the Prime Minister's position in this matter with the position that I have understood him previously to take in this matter of contracts, profits to be made from contracts, and particularly profits to be made from munitions contracts, because in his statement to the house in April, 1937, which was the first session of parliament after these events began to occur, he told the house:

. . . the government is proceeding on the theory of permitting competition with reasonable remuneration, the work to be subject to inspection and audit.

By taking Major Hahn under his wing, the contractor that the minister had selected and had made favourite in this matter, the Prime Minister is shutting the door on competition. I find it very difficult to make these varying views of the government fit.

Mr. MANION: They do not fit.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. STIRLING: Just before six o'clock the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was interjecting into my remarks his views with regard to the cable sent by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the high commissioner on November 10, and I think I understand now what the right hon. gentleman was referring to. He took it that I was connecting that cable with the one sent by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton). That was not at all my intention. I was dealing merely with the matter chronologically. Whereas these cables were of November 9, this was the tenth; and the Prime Minister is quite right in pointing out that his cable of November 10, sent from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, was in reply to the cable of November 9, which he had received from the high commissioner.

Let us see how the Prime Minister's cable answered that of the high commissioner. The high commissioner, after referring to a wireless message from the Department of National Defence with regard to the possibility of producing the Bren gun in Canada, cabled the Secretary of State for External Affairs in order to obtain information:

In order to obtain information desired war office must be requested to give Major Hahn, as representative of the Canadian government, access to information of a secret nature, which normally is not given to other than government officials.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Prime Minister, replying to this cable of November 9, acknowledges receipt of it; says that he had discussed the matter with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), and continues:

You might request war office to give Major Hahn, as representing the Canadian government in this particular—

And so on. I do not know in what way that will assist the Prime Minister in the position which he occupies, but it is quite correct that the one cable was in reply to the other.

I want to turn once more to the position occupied by the minister with regard to his choice of Major Hahn; for the first mysterious part of this whole mysterious question is: How and why was Major Hahn selected? I drew attention this afternoon to the fact that the minister, in the house in the session of last year, had replied to me that the Bren gun contract was one of the results of the work of investigation of the committee of inquiry into industrial possibilities, which certainly led me to suppose that as a result of the committee's inquiries Major Hahn had been discovered. I am afraid that after reading the contents of this report I cannot any longer hold that view.

I want now to draw attention to the position taken by the interdepartmental committee. The Prime Minister, just about the time he sent that cable to the high commissioner requesting that Major Hahn be selected as Canadian representative "in this particular", came to the conclusion that it was desirable to have a special committee set up which should inquire into the existing procedure for letting armament contracts. That was an important committee, the chairman of which was Doctor Skelton, and there were various most responsible members of the civil service thereon. It reported in a very few days that "the problem appears to be essentially an administrative one," and that seems to dismiss the special committee. In consequence of that report, what is known as the interdepartmental committee was created by the government by order in council on a certain date mentioned, and the Minister of National Defence was its chairman.

It is interesting to note that this interdepartmental committee did not hold its first sitting until just one year after the Prime Minister had made up his mind that a special committee was necessary, and at that first sitting, to quote from the report in which the commissioner refers to the evidence of Mr. Elliott, the latter said:

The committee began to take an active part in the sense of asking questions, and getting to grips with the problem. In so doing the committee indicated that competitive bids should be one of the main considerations, and one of the first considerations. We pointed out that there was a number of very substantial subsisting companies in Canada that were manufacturing precision tools, and had had experience in what we thought was this line of work. We felt that they should be consulted and given an opportunity to submit competitive tenders. . . . The committee also thought there would be considerable time required for further consideration of the contract.

Mr. Elliott went on:

It early became clear to all members of the committee that there were two phases under consideration. One phase was that there might be competitive bidding . . . The second phase was the study of the terms of the contract in itself.

The committee therefore appointed a subcommittee of three, of whom only one was a member of the original committee, for consideration and study and report. Mr. Elliott said:

We recognized that we did not have the time to go into the necessary details to bring out the information in the form that we should have it. Therefore we simply asked this subcommittee to act as a sort of specific informer in connection with the terms of this contract and such other thoughts as might come about in the analysis of the contract for our guidance in considering this matter as a committee.

The subcommittee made its report a few days later, and that report contained in part the following:

Having in mind the main committee's suggestion that competitive bids be called for, the subcommittee, as an indication only of the names of concerns from whom competitive bids might be asked, mentioned—

The Steel Company of Canada
Dominion Bridge
Canadian Car and Foundry Company, Limited
Bertram Company
National Steel Company

and possibly automobile manufacturers who undoubtedly have suitable plants and precision tools, together with such others as, in the opinion of the main committee, might be asked to tender.

And then the subcommittee proceeds to deal with the details of the contract.

The second meeting of the interdepartmental committee was held on January 24, 1938, and Mr. Elliott was asked:

Q. What was the main subject of discussion at the second meeting, Mr. Elliott?

A. Competitive bids and why the John Inglis Company should get this contract, the financial status of the company and a number of other things.

The committee wanted to get price comparisons from other competent companies. They felt the lack of them in considering this individual contract. They kept urging for some method of competitive bidding and comparative prices being entered upon.

Again I remind hon. members that the minister's investigating committee of inquiry had by that time unearthed a considerable number of firms in Canada capable of taking on this very work. But Major Hahn was the selection.

The deputy minister, as chairman of the meeting said he felt that while competitive bids are always desirable, in this case there was a record of a substantial saving, a potential saving to the government, and that, together with the pressure from the war office for action, to get on with the job, we should enter into consideration of the terms of this contract with the Inglis Company.

And then Mr. Elliott refers to the fact that because of his official connection with income tax affairs he was aware of certain difficulties which the old John Inglis Company had met with. Mr. Elliott continued:

The chairman indicated that he had an understanding—exactly how it was acquired I do not know—from England that they would not deal with any other firm.

Pressed as to exactly what was said, Mr. Elliott put it this way:

"I said as a statement of fact that the chairman stated to us that he believed, or he was of the opinion, whichever you wish to put it—he believed that England would not place the contract with any other company in Canada.

Mr. Elliott said that the suggestion was then made that a cable be sent to England to ascertain definitely England's position in respect of competitive bids.

The chairman pointed out that to ask such a question at this juncture might endanger the placing of the British order, and endanger thereby the loss which he obviously was anxious to save Canada in the cost of the machinery and equipment. . . The form of the cable was then drafted."

And we know the cable was amended with the subsequent approval of the committee, and was sent.

Then the deputy minister happened to meet Major Hahn in Ottawa. He had not been called before the committee, but at Major Hahn's suggestion the committee had been continued. Major Hahn unexpectedly goes to England, and is back on February 18, before the third meeting of the committee. That was February 25. Mr. Elliott said:

The committee then swung into the repetition of this statement, namely the fact that competitive tendering had not been entered into by three or four companies capable of manufacturing guns and that that was one of the main objections still tentatively retained by members of the committee.

An important matter then developed, so far as the committee was determined by the chairman indicating that responsibility for the way in which this particular company had been selected necessarily rested with the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Elliott said that the chairman—the Deputy Minister of National Defence—pointed out that—his department had followed the practice of the British government where competition is not always obtainable, and they unhesitatingly go into non-competitive contracts in order to secure their requirements. In this particular case the British government had picked the firm to manufacture its guns.

By the Commissioner:

Q. Just a minute; the British government had done what?
A. Picked the firm.
Q. In this case?
A. Yes.
Q. In this case the British government had done that?
A. Yes, that in this case the British government had picked the firm to manufacture guns, and that they had made the best possible deal with that particular firm.

Then Mr. Elliott described how that completely reorientated them in respect to the whole matter. The interdepartmental committee assumed that the Department of National Defence took at least that onus off its shoulders. I would remind hon. members that the minister in his evidence said that he made himself responsible for all the doings of his officials; that he accepted the reliable supervision of men in whom he had absolute confidence, and that he was leaning on the recollection that he knew that in the end the whole situation was to be thoroughly reviewed by the subcommittee of the interdepartmental committee. Yet the work of the interdepartmental committee at meeting after meeting was to the effect that they were not satisfied, and were not going to let the matter go because they were not satisfied. Once again the committee wanted to cable to London; they wished the cable definitely to ask the war office, "Do you adhere to the view that you must deal with that selected contractor or not?" That cable was never sent.

The motion is to refer this matter to the committee on public accounts. I have already indicated that I would have absolutely no faith in that treatment of this matter. I wonder whether in this regard members of the government recollect, as I certainly believe they must, that the Prime Minister and his 179 followers in this house occupy those seats under the sufferance of 46 per cent of the electors who voted Liberal in 1935, and that 54 per cent of those who voted in 1935 voted against Liberal candidates.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to be able to speak on the amendment to the motion which was moved by my honoured leader (Mr. Manion). But as you, sir, have reserved your opinion on this matter, I am forced to speak to the motion itself, which is to refer the matter of the Bren gun contract to a standing committee of this house. I am sure that all hon. members have noted the almost acrobatic willingness of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) to have the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) carried, and thus to have another extensive and expensive investigation conducted, which in the opinion of many of us would be a great redundance. Last autumn there was a most thorough investigation by a royal commission presided over by no less a gentleman than a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada. The inquiry was characterized by the virtue of completeness, and that virtue is best expressed in the words of Mr. Justice Davis himself at the conclusion of the report, when he says:

All the sittings of the commission were public and your commissioner was pleased to hear counsel characterize the inquiry, at its close, as "a most searching and thorough inquiry."

Mr. Justice Davis states at the commencement of his report on page 4:

Your commissioner has had the assistance of the Honourable J. L. Ralston, K.C., Mr. L. A. Forsyth, K.C., and Mr. Jacques Dumoulin, K.C., appointed by the government of Canada as government counsel and to assist the commission; Mr. Aimé Geoffrion, K.C., and Mr. J. C. McRuer, K.C., who appeared for John Inglis Company, Limited; Mr. I. F. Hellmuth, K.C., who appeared with Colonel Drew, representing both Colonel Drew and the Maclean Publishing Company Limited which published the article in Maclean's Magazine which gave rise to this inquiry; and Mr. H. F. Parkinson, K.C., who appeared for the legal firm of Messrs. Plaxton & Company and for Messrs. Cameron, Pointon & Merritt.

The commission opened on September 19, 1938, and concluded on Thursday, November 24, 1938. The taking of testimony and the argument of counsel occupied thirty-six days.

Then later:

Your commissioner is satisfied that all available documents in any way relevant and material to the subject matter of the inquiry were presented to the commission.

The evidence taken before your commissioner extended to 4,122 pages of stenographic notes besides the documentary evidence, which was filed in 388 exhibits, and the argument of counsel was extended in the stenographic notes from page 4123 to page 4711 inclusive, all of which is returned herewith.

It is obvious that in the opinion of the learned justice the whole matter of the Bren gun contract has already been thoroughly threshed out; that the evidence compiled, as well as the report of the royal commission itself, are available to this parliament, and that any further investigation is merely unnecessary repetition at the public expense. I absolutely agree with the commissioner that there is no need whatsoever for this matter to be referred to a committee of this house, standing or special; that the evidence at hand supplies all the information necessary to any action which this house wishes to take in this matter. Let it be further borne in mind that on page 35 of the report the commissioner states:

> The facts are all in evidence; and as said by government counsel in opening their argument:
> So far as the facts are concerned, there are very few which are even in dispute.
> I cannot myself recall at the moment any fact to which direct proof was adduced that is in dispute. It will be for those charged with the responsibility of dealing with the facts, i.e., the government and parliament, to examine and study them and to take such action, if any, thereon as they may see fit.

Also on page 49 of the report:

> The contract is not for a fixed sum: it is on a cost plus basis. It is admitted that we do not know how much the guns are going to cost. There are of course adequate powers of inspection, supervision and control vested in the department under the contract and with the estimates from Enfield of what the guns there are costing it should be possible to keep actual costs here well within bounds.
> No substantial objection can be taken in my view to the provisions of the Canadian contract; though in the absence of any competitive bids or terms of manufacture I am unable to pass upon the substance as distinct from the form of the contract. It is important, of course, that the contract be a good and business-like contract; but what is more important after all is whether the procedure adopted in making the contract was that best calculated to protect the public interest and to secure the confidence of the people of Canada that there would be no improper profiteering in the private manufacture of war armaments for the defence of the country.
> That is a question upon which the government and parliament, in the light of the evidence brought before the commission, must pass.

It is obvious then and beyond argument that Mr. Justice Davis considers that parliament may act upon this matter with the information at hand and feel fully satisfied that they are possessed of all the important factors relative to this unfortunate situation.

A study of the evidence and the commissioner's report reveals facts which, with the procedure followed up to the time of the signing of the contract itself and the nature of the contract, fully justify the amendment to the motion which was introduced this afternoon and which is still before the house, to the effect that the contract signed between the Canadian government and John Inglis Company Limited should be forthwith cancelled.

Let it be borne in mind that the Bren machine gun is an instrument of war, invented in Czechoslovakia and further developed to conform to British conditions. The agreement between his majesty's governments in Great Britain and the dominions for the manufacture of this gun for his majesty's forces at home and abroad covered not only the gun itself but the tripod and the filling machine as accessories. One of the conditions of the agreement is cited by Mr. Justice Davis at page 5 of the report:

> . . . such manufacture shall be in a factory operated by the government in question.

Also in a memorandum dated June 3, 1936, from the director of mechanization and artillery in the Canadian Department of National Defence to the master general of the ordnance, it is further stated:

> The privilege of so doing (i.e., production in Canada) was vouchsafed to the Canadian government by the War Office when it acquired the rights of manufacture from the patentee, the only stipulation being that such production must take place in a government-owned factory.

That is also on page 5. The Minister of National Defence and his deputy have stated what they consider to be their reasons for departing from this procedure; but the two reasons given, first, the vast expense to the Canadian government for the erection of plants for the manufacture of this gun, and, second, that Major Hahn was the only gentleman with whom the British government would deal, have fallen down miserably and have been found to be hopelessly unfounded! Thus perforce we should return at once to the highly desirable position of manufacturing these guns free from private enterprise and the obvious feature of profit to individuals in the manufacture of arms. Later in the course of my remarks I plan to deal more fully with that point.

Now to return to the contract itself. In the article by Lieutenant-Colonel George A. Drew which appeared in Maclean's magazine in its issue of September 1, 1938, various statements were made in regard to the contract which were not contradicted or disproved in any shape or form by the prolixious evidence given by the various witnesses at the inquiry. Let me quote a paragraph or so, starting at page 2 of the article:

> It is true that there is a provision in the Canadian and English contracts which appears to limit the profit to ten per cent with an over-all limitation of $457,000 for the 12,000 guns covered by the two contracts, but there is another provision which overcomes that limitation. Section 6A provides that when the company is in production a "standard cost" for each gun shall be agreed upon, based on the costs up to that time. If after that time costs are reduced below that standard cost, the company shall receive one-quarter of the difference, in addition to its other profits. As the costs during the experimental stages are bound to be higher than when normal production has been reached, it is clear that this is likely to add a very substantial figure to the profits.

Was that statement disproved? It was not. Then again:

Agreements providing for production on a "cost plus" basis are not at all unusual. But many of the items on which the ten per cent profit is allowed in this contract are extremely unusual. Profit is in no way limited to actual factory costs. For instance, the government pays the salaries of executive officers of the John Inglis Company Limited, although their activities are not confined to the manufacture of machine guns. It also pays travelling expenses, and under the contract Canada would pay two-thirds of the cost of travelling which might be necessary to England or Czechoslovakia, where the gun originates. Not only that, but both salaries and travelling expenses are paid by the government from the date of the contract whether any machine gun is ever delivered or not. It is doubtful if such a contract ever was signed in Canada before. But even that is not enough. The company receives from the government as part of its "cost plus" profit, ten per cent of the amount of these salaries and travelling expenses from the date of the signing of the contract.

Other unusual items to be paid by the government, and on which ten per cent profit is also to be paid, are legal fees; telephone, telegraph, and other office expenses; cost of light, heat and power; of all plant alterations (including even the cost of removal of any or all machinery which may ever be removed), and the cost of all tools, dies, jigs and gauges, whether bought from the company or manufactured by the company itself, if they are to be used in the production of Bren guns. Nothing is forgotten. The government even pays for all cartridges and explosives used in testing the guns before delivery. The government, or rather the Canadian public, pays everything, and then pays a profit as well to the company of ten per cent of the amount of these already remarkably generous payments.

The least that can be said is that the contract is extremely favourable to Major Hahn and his company. Even if the contract is cancelled before the company gets into production, the company will receive $43,750.

If the contract is cancelled to-night, Major Hahn and his associates receive $43,750!

The reason for this generosity is not given. As the government pays all costs of installation of machinery, of the machinery itself, and even of its removal, as well as profits and salaries in the meantime, the public might be inclined to think that it had already done enough for Major Hahn and his company. But the contract says that there must be a substantial profit in any event.

Has any one statement of those I have just read been disproved?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

[Mr. Massey.]

Mr. MASSEY: It was not. I have read the evidence, and it was not. May I ask the minister what statement was disproved?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Three of those statements were disproved. I shall deal with them later on.

Mr. MASSEY: I see; that is very interesting. I will admit that the profit feature was changed after this article came out, if that is what the minister means. Certainly that was changed, and I shall come to that in a moment.

Let me read further from the same article:

There are several other interesting features of this contract. For instance, the Inglis Company Limited is to be equipped not only for the production of Bren machine guns, but also for the production of Enfield rifles and other small arms. In each case every cent of cost of machinery and installation is to be paid by the public. That being the case, the public has the right to know what the plans of the department are for the purchase of rifles and other small arms to replace the obsolete weapons with which our forces are now equipped. As the cost of 200,000 rifles, which would be our approximate requirements, would be at least five million dollars, further interesting prospects of profit are opened to our new armament producers.

Another provision which requires some explanation is the undertaking by the government to grant a licence for the manufacture of the Bren gun for a period of ten years, although the contract calls for the delivery of all the guns now ordered within five years and four months. There must have been some reason for granting the licence for the longer period and making it renewable at that time. Is this contract only for part of orders the government intends to place? If so, what further orders are contemplated As the Canadian public will be paying for any further guns it has the right to know.

Was any statement therein contained contradicted by evidence given at the inquiry? The minister remains silent. Was any statement there made shown to be in error? It was not. The minister remains silent again.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MASSEY: I am sorry; I did not wish to take advantage of the minister, but he could not have answered in any other way. It is evident, then, that in connection with this contract there are some very unusual, unfortunate features which, to say the least, are open to serious criticism. It is not without peculiar significance that immediately after the appearance of this article, as I said a moment ago, the contract itself was altered. We find that statement at page 42 of the report:

During the last week of August, 1938, an advance copy of Colonel Drew's article that was to appear in Maclean's magazine came to the attention of the deputy minister and other department officials. As a result of a conference with Major Hahn in Ottawa at that time a letter was taken subsequently from the company (exhibit 43) dated September 3, 1938, fixing the amount of the maximum overriding profit accruing to the company under the contract; the provision in the contract being thought susceptible of a construction by which the company might get a larger profit.

It is extraordinary, is it not, that so important a change in a contract was made only and immediately after the appearance of an article which was damaging and which proved to be absolutely accurate, an article which appeared in a national magazine of wide circulation.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of the newer members of this house. I have not had the long and hoary parliamentary experience of many hon. members here.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The hon. member is doing very well.

Mr. MASSEY: I thank my hon. friend. Perhaps my idea of this chamber and its functions is too altruistic and too pristine; but for the three sessions I have had the privilege of sitting in this chamber I have been under the impression that our deliberations should have been characterized by an effort, on the part of all of us who take part, at frankness and straightforwardness and that no attempt should be made by any hon. member, let alone a minister or the Prime Minister, to mislead the house; that questions asked in the public interest should be answered in the public interest; that inquiries of a minister should be answered accurately without any attempt to mislead. I have always felt that, and have accepted the answers by the ministers to questions upon the order paper as being predicated upon that basis. It may be I have assumed that position because I am naive in this house, but I have at least that hope for our deliberations.

But, in the matter of the Bren gun there have been statements made and answers given to questions submitted by hon. members that have certainly misled the house. The Minister of National Defence states with some heat that his statements in answers to questions have been "honourably, honestly and truthfully" made. I want him to understand that I do not challenge that for a single moment; but I do say to him that, as one reviews his statements of last year in the light of the evidence submitted to the royal commission, it is obvious that either one of two things has happened: First, that he has been victimized by a lack of information—which is his own fault—or, second, that he himself has been misled—which also is his own fault. So it is his own fault in either case.

Let me review the sequence of events in this house towards the end of last session relevant to this matter. In a copy of Hansard of June 22, 1938, on page 4118, I read:

Mr. Woodsworth:

1. Was Major James Hahn appointed by the Canadian government to go to England in 1937 and 1938 to make a survey of munitions production for the purpose of advising the Canadian government?

2. If so, were his expenses paid by the Canadian government?

3. What were the terms of Major Hahn's employment?

4. At what date did Major Hahn cease to be employed by the Canadian government to advise on munitions and begin negotiating for production by him of Bren machine guns?

Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver):

1. No.

2, 3 and 4. Answered by 1.

I admit at once that the answers of the minister to the questions I have just read are accurate, but poisonously accurate. It is obvious that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) was asking if Major Hahn had been a representative of the Canadian government. That was the question. Unfortunately, however, he specified 1937 and 1938, so the minister answered "No." Major Hahn was, however, until December 5, 1936, about three weeks before 1937, a representative of the Canadian government to the British war office. Thus I declare, that question 4 which I have just read, "At what date did Major Hahn cease to be employed by the Canadian government to advise on muntions and begin negotiating for production by him of Bren machine guns?" is not answered by the "No" which is given in answer to the first question. Major Hahn visited England subsequently to December 5, 1936. I should like to ask the minister, had the British war office been informed that Major Hahn was no longer the representative of the Canadian government? Was official word sent from his department subsequently to December, 1936, to the British war office that Hahn had ceased to be the representative of the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my hon. friend had studied the evidence, which unfortunately he has not, he would find that the answer is there.

Mr. MASSEY: I have studied the evidence very carefully, too carefully for the minister.

I found no evidence that the British war office was officially informed that Hahn was not a representative of the Canadian government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is definite evidence in the record asking the Canadian government subsequently to send a definite representative of the Canadian government to the negotiations.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, I shall come to that. In the eyes of the British war office Major Hahn continued to be the representative of the Canadian government in all his trips to England. He was received accordingly and was treated as such. Therefore I say that the answers given to the questions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre are grossly misleading and should at least have been qualified by a statement of the Minister of National Defence when submitting his answer of June 22, last.

The opinion I have just expressed is that of a new member of this house; and lest I be accused of presumption or lack of knowledge, let me read to the house an editorial appearing in a newspaper which I do not think any hon. member can question is virtually the organ of the Liberal party in the prairie provinces. Certainly the Winnipeg Free Press could never be accused of Conservative tendencies; it could never be accused of supporting the Conservative party; nor has it ever disclosed any such desire. I have in my hand an editorial taken from the Winnipeg Free Press of October 27, 1938, headed "Mr. Mackenzie's Evidence":

There will be no satisfaction and much regret over the remark made by the Hon. Ian Mackenzie, Minister of National Defence, during his evidence before the Bren gun inquiry, that he was satisfied the statements he made in the House of Commons were correct. The fact is that very essential information was withheld from the house, which rose without the faintest idea of the most important circumstances surrounding the letting of the contract to Major Hahn.

This was hardly the fault of the members of the house. Various men made strenuous efforts to get at these facts. They failed because Mr. Mackenzie eluded them by making replies which, though perhaps technically justified under the rules of the house, were not justified at all when the public interest is considered.

Later in the same editorial:

On the same day that he "answered" Mr. Woodsworth's question he told the House of Commons this:

"I want to assure my hon. friend that there was not the slightest intention to misrepresent the situation . . . There was not the slightest intention to suppress nor was there a suppression of any information in the slightest degree."

Twelve days later, on July 1, he went back over ground he had covered before, and recited his explanation of how Major Hahn got the contract. This has already been quoted by the Free Press. It is worth repeating once more:

"Major Hahn went to England in 1936 and evidently made a favourable impression upon the British people. He also had access over there to the specifications of the Bren gun. I want to leave the idea with the committee that these are secret specifications and we had no control over them. It is quite possible they would not be available to any competitor of the firm that got the contract."

Consider these two statements were quoted, and consider the facts as they have since been brought out. We have Mr. Mackenzie's assurance that nothing whatever has been suppressed. Then we have his statement about Major Hahn's stand-in in London and the drag he had with the war office. Is there anything here to suggest to anyone that Major Hahn got the inside track because he was put there officially by the defence department? Is there anything on the record of Hansard to show that Major Hahn was treated by the British war office just as one more Canadian promoter until cabled instructions were received to consider him an official representative?

The impression Mr. Mackenzie left on the house—and it is difficult to imagine that so practised a debater would leave an impression on his audience other than that he wanted to leave—was that, quite independently of the Canadian government, Major Hahn had made "a favourable impression upon the British people." We now know, of course, how that came about. Major Hahn "had access to the specifications for the Bren gun." How did he get them? We now know, though the House of Commons did not. "It is quite possible the specifications would not be available to any competitor." We should say not; not after all the Department of National Defence had done for Major Hahn! But did Mr. Mackenzie breathe a word of all this to the House of Commons? Not one word. Why?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He had nothing to do with that. That is what my hon. friend does not know yet.

Mr. MASSEY: I know, as I said a moment ago, too much. I know I sat in the House of Commons last session; I listened to the statements of the minister; I left this chamber without any idea that any condition such as this existed, and I based my opinions on the minister's statements, in which I had confidence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does my hon. friend say that our Department of National Defence have control over these specifications?

Mr. MASSEY: They seem to have had a great deal of control over the specifications. I have read the evidence and that is why I make the statement I do. I have in my hand Hansard of July 1, 1938. I turn to page 4523, on which Mr. Bennett is reported as follows:

Mr. Bennett: The second point I desire to raise is much more serious. It has to do with whether or not we should have the private manufacture of arms in this country. The real truth is that the papers brought down, dealing with an agreement in connection with the manufacture of Bren guns, contemplates a profit of ten per cent.

Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver): No. That is the outside limit, but it actually works out much less.

Mr. Bennett: I should say they contemplate a possible profit of ten per cent. Time after time we have had discussions with respect to that matter; articles and indeed volumes have been written as to the evil effects of this practice upon the general life of the country. Yet we have made a bargain with a private enterprise, through a man untrained in this particular job, who has nothing to do with manufacturing, who has taken the old, second hand machinery of the John Inglis Company, which everyone in Toronto knows is obsolete, and to that we have added about $250,000 worth of our own machinery.

The minister states that the contract does not contemplate a profit of ten per cent. His actual words were, "That is the outside limit, but it actually works out much less." How can the minister possibly defend that statement under the terms of the contract itself? It is not there in the contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was in the evidence.

Mr. MASSEY: It was not in the contract when the minister made that statement in the house because that very point was altered in the contract on September 3, 1938.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is an entirely untruthful statement. The evidence of Mr. Sharp before the royal commission was that the profit was only 7·76 per cent.

Mr. MASSEY: Does the minister say the report is untruthful? There was the statement which I read a moment ago.

Mr. DUNNING: Read where it says the contract is changed.

Mr. MANION: Thanks to George Drew's article, it was changed.

Mr. MASSEY: I quote again from the report:

> During the last week of August, 1938, an advance copy of Colonel Drew's article that was to appear in Maclean's magazine came to the attention of the deputy minister and other department officials. As a result of a conference with Major Hahn in Ottawa at that time a letter was taken subsequently from the company (exhibit 43) dated September 3rd, 1938, fixing the amount of the maximum overriding profit accruing to the company under the contract; the provision in the contract being thought susceptible of a construction by which the company might get a larger profit.

What is the matter with the statement being made that the company got a larger profit?

Mr. DUNNING: That was not the language used by my hon. friend. He said the contract had been changed, but the commissioner does not say that.

Mr. MASSEY: It certainly has been changed by letter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Poisonously inaccurate.

Mr. MASSEY: Poisonous to the contract. The words are, "the provision in the contract being thought susceptible of a construction by which the company might get a larger profit." Does that mean the contract was changed or was not?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. MASSEY: Then the contract is worse than I thought it was if that has not been changed. Of course it has been changed. I quote again from page 4523 of Hansard of last year, Mr. Bennett speaking:

> . . . machinery of this kind is entirely obsolete, that long since its obsolescence has been such that it would be no longer regarded as satisfactory for the purpose.
> Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver): I may say that the technical advice is to the contrary in regard to this particular machinery.

The evidence produced before the commission disclosed that the resident inspector, aircraft inspection detachment, at Toronto, made a report which appears in part on page 22 of the report of the commission. I quote:

> This plant is primarily equipped for the manufacture of boilers, turbines and the working of heavy plate generally. All equipment is in reasonably good condition, considering the length of time it has been in use.

In other words, it is fine machinery for the shape it is in. The report continues:—

> The machinery at present in this factory with few exceptions, is unsuited for the manufacture of aircraft, but it might be used for the manufacture of tanks or shells.

Precision work to limits of one ten-thousandths of an inch is to be done in some instances, and yet we have machinery to be used in the manufacture of tanks and shells.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Surely my hon. friend knows that machinery is not being used for the manufacture of Bren guns.

Mr. MASSEY: The report continues:

> There is no design staff at present employed and the total number of work men now employed consists of three men as factory maintenance staff.

Now what is the question?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Surely my hon. friend knows that the machinery referred to in that report of October, 1936, is not being used to manufacture Bren guns.

Mr. MASSEY: I hope not as I have seen it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It could not be.

Mr. MASSEY: That goes back to the letter from our hon. friend, the member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) about his fully equipped plant.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There was no plant in Canada equipped to manufacture Bren guns.

Mr. MASSEY: There was and is plenty of precision machinery in Canada. Like the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) I had the privilege of graduating in engineering. I have worked in machine shops and I think I know something of machine tools. There are plenty of machine shops in Canada capable of producing Bren guns. I am not a lawyer; I am an engineer. I make this statement in the face of what the minister said. A statement has been made which is shown to be unfortunately in error by the evidence submitted to the commission. Let me read again from Hansard, page 4524. The Minister of National Defence is reported as follows:

With reference to the contract for Bren guns, I want to say immediately that it is a very important question. I suggested myself very early this session that all these contracts could very well be examined by either the public accounts committee or a special committee of this house. I feel it is due to myself as minister, and to the department, that there should be a complete investigation from the business point of view, because I do say this, that from the business point of view this is one of the finest contracts that was ever signed in the public interest of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So it is.

Mr. MASSEY: "One of the finest contracts that was ever signed in the public interest of Canada." Does the minister say that to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I certainly do, and it never was challenged for one second before the commission.

Mr. MASSEY: That is all I want to know. I just want to have that on record. Then the minister goes on, as reported on the same page:

I want to say in the second place that the minister cannot take the slightest credit for the contract, and the minister never sat in on any of the consultations, and never met Major Hahn until after the contract was signed. The contract was discussed by an interdepartmental committee which was formed about two years ago.

The evidence given before the inquiry disproved that absolutely, for the minister claimed under examination that he did not remember the incident of meeting Major Hahn. Some hon. members may say that failure of memory on his part is a small matter, but I say it is no small matter in any way, shape or form. There is the fact that on October 9, 1936, Major Hahn was introduced to the deputy minister of national defence; and even though the deputy minister knew nothing about Major Hahn except that he had been introduced to him by the hon. member for Trinity, a secret Bren gun was sent to Major Hahn in Toronto for dismantling and examination. A secret war piece which had been given into the custody of the Canadian Department of National Defence by the British war office was sent to an unknown in Toronto for dismantling and examination. Does the minister deny that statement? Further evidence was brought forward to show that Major Hahn was introduced to the Minister of National Defence in his apartment in the Chateau Laurier on October 19, 1936. After five minutes the minister gave Major Hahn a letter which subsequent events proved served to pave the way for Major Hahn to become the accredited representative of the Canadian government to the British war office. He was accredited by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself. Let me read the letter, which appears on page 17 of the report. It is dated October 19, 1936, and is addressed to "Dear Mr. Massey." May I say that is not the member for Greenwood; it is the high commissioner in London. The letter reads:

The bearer of this letter, Major J. E. Hahn, D.S.O., M.C., is in England to investigate the manufacture of all classes of munitions and armaments. I am anxious that he be afforded every facility and access to enable him to ascertain and bring back complete manufacturing data and costs governing manufacture of munitions and armaments.

How can it be said that in connection with so vitally important a matter as the manufacture of the Bren gun, such an all-embracing document can be given to a private citizen and yet the experience be forgotten by the minister? The agility and facility of his brain have never been questioned in this house. The best thing that can be said is that here is a manifestation of the most extraordinary careless dealing and the most extraordinary disregard of public interest. Let me quote again from page 4524 of Hansard, the minister speaking:

Major Hahn went to England in 1936 and evidently made a favourable impression upon the British people. He also had access over there to the specifications of the Bren gun. I want to leave the idea with the committee that these are secret specifications and we had no control over them.

No control over them! Yet they were sent to an unknown in Toronto. I quote again:

It is quite possible they would not be available to any competitor of the firm which got the contract. I want to say this: Once we were informed by the war office of the attitude of the British government we went into figures with the Enfield factory in England which produces those guns at the rate of fifty a week—

Here again is an extraordinary statement, that Major Hahn went to England, saw the British war office, was admitted to the Enfield factory and given the specifications of the Bren gun. That is a statement of fact. But how did this happen, and why did this happen? Why was it Major Hahn? Because Major Hahn was the accredited representative of the Canadian government, accredited by the Prime Minister himself; and with him, and with him only, would the British government deal. The British government did not deal with Major Hahn because they liked him or thought him to be the proper man as a result of their own opinion. The British government dealt with Major Hahn because, I repeat, he was the accredited representative of the Canadian government, and had received the benediction of the Prime Minister in this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope that my hon. friend will not think, because I am not interrupting him every time he repeats that statement, that I agree with him every time he repeats it.

Mr. MASSEY: I am simply stating the facts, and there can be no mistake about that, because the evidence is right here in the report on page 24.

What is back of this? Major Hahn arrived in England, accompanied by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) and his brother, Mr. Gordon Plaxton. Let it be said to the resounding credit of the high commissioner in London that he refused at first to accept Major Hahn or to pass him through to the British war office until he was satisfied that Major Hahn was properly credentialed, and a delay ensued during which the major became, in his own words, "very, very impatient." There were telephone calls and cables until at last a cable from the high commissioner in London was sent to the Secretary of State for External Affairs—in other words, the Prime Minister—and Mr. Massey was answered by the Prime Minister as follows:

Secret. Your cablegram 9th November 396. Have discussed matter with Minister of National Defence. You might request War Office to give Major Hahn, as representing Canadian government in this particular, any information which they consider desirable and necessary to enable National Defence to reach conclusion on possibility produce Bren gun in Canada. It is not desired to request furnishing of information on any article other than this gun.

Under such circumstances, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious, then, that Major Hahn was not accepted as the representative of the Canadian government when he first arrived in England; that later he was established as such by a cable in code from the Prime Minister; and it was then, and only then, that he was received by the British government and given secret information.

What is the significance of this? The significance is that upon this thin and slender thread, the all-embracing decision to depart from the policy of arms manufacture by the government to arms manufacture by private citizens for profit was arrived at by the Prime Minister, by the Minister of National Defence and by the Department of National Defence.

Let us now return to the evidence. The interdepartmental committee objected strenuously to going forward in this matter without competitive bids, but they were told by the deputy minister of national defence, who presided at the sittings of the interdepartmental committee, that the British government had picked the firm with which they were going to deal. Let me turn to pages 40 and 41 of the report, where I quote the commissioner:

Mr. Elliott said that the chairman (the deputy minister of national defence) pointed out that "his department had followed the practice of the British government where competition is not always obtainable—"

Mr. SPEAKER: I must inform the hon. member that he has exhausted his time.

Mr. MASSEY: I should like a moment or two, Mr. Speaker, to finish if I may, just one more sentence.

An hon. MEMBER: Just one sentence.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. All during the debate on the address it became the practice of speakers to say that they would like to continue for just a little while; and the unanimous consent of the house having been obtained on the understanding that they would speak only a few sentences more, my observation was that they continued for a long time thereafter, thereby prolonging the debate. In this particular instance, lest I be misunderstood, let me say that I am not going to make any objection to the hon. gentleman continuing. I am rather enjoying the remarks he is making—he is adding nothing to the debate—but I do want to register my objection to the practice that is growing up of a speaker exceeding his forty minutes. The rule imposing a forty-minute limit should be observed or we should abrogate the rule.

Mr. MANION: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that while it is true that a number of members on this side of the house were permitted to exceed their forty minutes, many more members on the other side of the house were given the same privilege. I just want to have the record kept straight.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: While everyone is contributing to this discussion, might I draw attention to the fact that there is a rule which says that newspaper articles should not be read in the house. The greater part of my hon. friend's speech has been taken up with quotations and reading editorials. If he had confined himself to oratory and left quotations alone, he would have had plenty of time.

Mr. MASSEY: In reply to the Prime Minister I turn to page 305 of Hansard where I find that the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle) spent a good part of his time in quoting a rather objectionable article which appeared in Saturday Night, and he was not called to order. I also find that the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Mallette) as reported at page 208 of Hansard, read in full a most objectionable and unfair editorial in the Montreal Gazette, occupying two full pages of Hansard, and he was not called to order. The rules of this house apply to all members or to none.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I cannot understand the heat or passion of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey). He was allowed to proceed and read his article.

Mr. MASSEY: Speaking further on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I object to being singled out by the Prime Minister and reminded that I had been reading from editorials, when he made no mention of other members who had done the same.

Mr. SPEAKER: I always endeavour to put the rules into practice, but there are cases where unanimous consent is given to an hon. member to exceed his forty minutes. I am in the hands of the house as to whether the hon. gentleman should continue. I have always endeavoured to apply the rules fairly.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have not the good fortune to know either Colonel Drew or Major Hahn. I am speaking now within my memory, and of course I might find myself eventually in the same position as the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), in that someone might have inadvertently introduced me to him, and so I may be corrected; but at the moment I do not know either of these gentlemen.

There has been a great deal of discussion about a very important question, namely, the defence of Canada, hinging largely on the names of these two particular individuals, more especially about the name of Major Hahn. I should like very much, before this debate is concluded, to be satisfied why so many members on the other side of the house hold such antagonistic views towards that gentleman.

Mr. MASSEY: I never expressed any in any shape or form.

Mr. MANION: I praised him.

Mr. GARDINER: The whole argument so far has revolved around the fact that this man got a contract from the Department of National Defence. The discussions which have taken place in connection with that contract were given rise to largely by an article which appeared in Maclean's magazine under date of September 1 last, which article by the way, Mr. Speaker, made no charges against anyone but did give expression to quite a number of insinuations which might be taken by the general public as indicating that there was something wrong, if no actual charges were made.

Very shortly after that article appeared, we had a commission appointed by the government to inquire into the insinuations which had been made and into the contract which had been entered into. After many sittings of that commission had been held; after the commission had found it unnecessary to subpoena any witnesses in order to get them to appear before the commission because all witnesses came quietly of their own free will when called upon to do so; and after they had listened to the evidence from day to day, the commission itself decided that there were no charges and no findings to be made, against any individual, and that there were no charges and no findings to be made in opposition to the contract which had been entered into. So that we are in the position, after having read the article in Maclean's magazine and after having listened to the evidence before the commission, where no proven evidence has been brought forward against either the contract itself or any individual who was associated with that contract or with the government or with departments of the government in negotiating the contract.

Then the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) presents to the house a resolution which calls for the placing of this contract for further inquiry before a committee of the house. The government takes no exception to that motion. The government is quite prepared to have this contract inquired into to the heart's content of any member of this house or of any person outside this house, whether such persons are interested in newspapers or are other private individuals in Canada.

Well, the opposition—that is, the official opposition—comes along with an amendment in these terms:

In view of the evidence produced before the royal commission, the opinion of this house is that the agreement made between His Majesty the King, represented by the hon. the Minister of National Defence, and John Inglis Company, Limited, for the manufacture of Bren machine guns, should be cancelled.

We have before us at the moment an amendment calling upon the house to cancel the contract with regard to which even the article in Maclean's magazine has not made any particular charges; with regard to which those who appeared before the commission did not make any charges; with regard to which the commission itself did not make any charges. We are asked, rather than to send it for further inquiry to a committee of this house, to cancel that contract forthwith. Well, if that does not raise some questioning in the minds of hon. members as to what all the noise is being made for with respect to the individual Major Hahn, then I cannot understand what would raise that sort of questioning in the mind of anyone.

We listened this afternoon to a good deal of discussion beginning with the address of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) with regard to this matter, and even yet I have to hear any condemnation of the contract itself from the individuals who have been addressing this house. They have insinuated certain things and drawn certain pictures, so to speak, using, in order to describe those pictures, certain terms which even members of this house do not understand. They have left inferences with regard to what the contract may have in it; but I repeat that no one has risen in his place and told us what the terms of the contract to which they take such serious exception are.

I wish to go over some things that have happened in recent months in connection with matters of defence to see if I cannot reason out for my own instruction the position with respect to this contract. I wish to indicate the position I have taken in connection with this contract from the beginning and the position which I hope the house will take with regard to it. There has been a great deal of discussion respecting what has appeared in Maclean's magazine, and the hon. member who has just taken his seat has quoted extensively from it. I shall not quote from it, but I wish to direct attention to the fact that at the end of that article there are some twenty questions stated in such a form as to leave the insinuation that something might be wrong in connection with the matters referred to in every one of those questions. In the centre of that group of questions, beginning with number three and extending to the end of question twelve—there is some reference to it in later questions also—there is a group of questions all of which refer to the activities of certain private individuals who had to do with the formation of a company in the city of Toronto which eventually got a contract for the manufacture of Bren guns. There has been a great deal of quoting of the report in order to try to indicate that certain statements made by the commissioner in his finding had to do with everything that is in this report. If hon. members will turn to page 30, they will find the following:

A large portion of the evidence—

Here let me point out that the part of the report which I am about to read is separated from what goes before by asterisks.

A large proportion of the evidence taken before the commission was in connection with the facts leading up to and the purchase of the assets of the old John Inglis Company by Major Hahn and his associates, the financial structure of the new company, the shareholdings of the new company, the consideration given for the allotment and issue of the shares of the new company, the incorporation and organization. . . .

And so on. Then at the bottom of the paragraph there is this reference:

Mr. Geoffrion, who appeared with Mr. McRuer for the John Inglis Company, stated that, for purposes of argument, Major Hahn and the John Inglis Company may be identical, because he was the spokesman of the company and the party in control. Mr. Geoffrion, relying upon sec. 13 of The Inquiries Act, R.S.C., 1927, ch. 99, argued that as no charges of misconduct had been laid or been formulated during the inquiry, no report against any person can be made by your commissioner.

Then later:

Mr. Geoffrion said:
No charges being laid, no report of misconduct or no report can be made against us, because there was no charge of misconduct, and no notice to us.

"Us" there refers to his clients; and as one reads through statement after statement by counsel who appeared before this commission, one finds that they are referring to private clients who retained them to appear before this particular commission. The finding is finally made by the commission that in relation to these matters having to do with the formation of a company in Toronto, and with the individuals who formed the company, he is not making any findings because no particular charges were made against these individuals.

It should be clear to any member of this house that there are many things which he and I might wish to criticize with regard to the formation of companies from one end of the country to the other, companies dealing with the manufacture of machinery of different kinds, companies for the purpose of carrying on financial operations, companies for the conduct of many affairs. I could make many criticisms to-night from the floor of this house with regard to the formation of many such companies, but such criticisms would not have anything to do with many of the activities carried on by these companies when once they are set up, unless we are prepared in this house and elsewhere to change the whole company law of the country and make it impossible for people to set up companies under the forms which were followed in this particular instance.

It was proper for the commissioner on that occasion to make that reference, but it was entirely improper for the leader of the opposition this afternoon to say to the members of this house, and through the house to the people of Canada, that these statements were made by counsel on behalf of their clients apparently for the purpose of frightening the commissioner. I can think of no more slighting statement that could have been made against the chairman of any commission that ever sat in this country than to suggest that any counsel appearing for anyone could frighten the commissioner when making a finding in connection with this or any other matter.

Mr. MANION: I made no such suggestion, in any shape or form, about frightening the commissioner. I did quote Major Hahn's counsel, but I also quoted Colonel Ralston, the government counsel, who took exactly the same attitude.

Mr. GARDINER: I think when my hon. friend reads Hansard to-morrow he will find that he did convey the inference I have just stated. To say that when the commissioner was not in a position to make findings he drew pictures and placed those pictures on the wall before us so that we might come to our own conclusions—if that is not insinuating that the commissioner did not have the back-bone to give his own opinions in regard to this matter, I do not know what the hon. gentleman meant. I am not going to insinuate that the commissioner showed any such spinelessness in connection with this investigation. He carried on the investigation as it should be carried on; he brought down his findings as they should be brought down, and his findings give pictures quite different from those drawn this afternoon by my hon. friend. For example, my hon. friend spoke of the young gentleman who was sent to England to study the manufacture of guns, munitions and machines of war for the government of Canada. He read certain parts of the report of the commissioner in order to convey the impression to this house and this country that this young man was not capable of giving advice to the government in connection with that matter.

Mr. MANION: He admitted it himself.

Mr. GARDINER: Who appointed this young man? The government of which my hon. friend was a member appointed him in 1933.

Mr. MANION: Not in connection with Bren guns.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, turn to page 5 of the report and see what they appointed him for:

> Lieutenant Jolley, of the Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, presently employed in the branch of the Master-General of Ordnance of the Department of National Defence, who received his technical education at McGill university where he graduated with honours in mechanical engineering in 1933—

Taking the same course as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey).

Mr. MASSEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. GARDINER:

> . . . was sent to England in August, 1934—

Mr. DUNNING: Emphasize that date.

Mr. GARDINER:

> . . . was sent to England in August, 1934, to receive instruction at the Military College of Science at Woolwich to qualify him for the position of ordnance mechanical engineer. He took a year's course at the government instructional centre at Woolwich arsenal.

Then the commissioner goes on to say that they did not study small arms there; and he continues:

> From Woolwich he went to the royal small arms factory at Enfield, which is the government factory for the production of small arms in England. Here he was given the opportunity to have a prolonged tour through the various sections of the factory in order to obtain an intimate knowledge of the processes of the production of small arms generally. He spent a portion of the time with the cost accountant's branch and worked with the personnel engaged in obtaining the costs of the various components at that time going through the factory. The period Lieutenant Jolley was at Enfield was from September 19, 1935, to July, 1936. At that time the royal small arms factory were engaged in preparing the design of tools—

My friend says we had the tools in Canada even before this time, but here is what is said:

At the time the royal small arms factory were engaged in preparing the design of tools and the methods of production which would enable them eventually to produce the Bren gun in relatively large quantities.

This young man was there when this study was going on for the first time in Enfield in order to prepare British mechanics and engineers to produce this gun in England.

He says that at Enfield his chief interest was in getting as much information as he could on the basic equipment of machines and tools which are required for small arms production generally.

Well, whether the young man was twenty-three when he went there or is twenty-nine now or whatever age he may be, every man in this house knows that every factory which is making articles from precision steel in this country to-day is employing young men from twenty to thirty-five or forty, years of age and after that age they let them go. Why? Because that kind of work is a young man's job. It is young men who are doing the work at the factory being opened in Fort William; it is young men right across this country who are being trained to-day in these very things, to make the machines, the aeroplanes and all the equipment which will be required in the next war, if it comes. That is a young man's job. As I said this afternoon, when other countries have been in the midst of great difficulties before, they have called upon young men; and if this country goes into a war it will not be the men over twenty-nine who will be conducting it, it will be the men under twenty-nine. Most of them will be around twenty years of age. It is therefore important that they should know something about the guns, how they are made, how they are prepared, and something about what is going to happen if this country ever goes into a war. There is one other thing—

Mr. MANION: Before the hon. member leaves that, would he read what the commissioner said at the bottom of page 35 about the young man?

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend read that this afternoon. I am not going to take time to read it again. I am giving the information in regard to the young man that appears on the first page—

Mr. STEWART: But the hon. member is not giving all that is in the report.

Mr. GARDINER: That information convinces me that the young man has had the training; seeing that my friends opposite appointed him, I assume he had the intelligence in the first place, and with the training he has had, he should know more about the Bren gun than any other man in Canada, whether he be an official of the department or of this company.

Then the commissioner goes on to say:

No contract for the purchase or production of the Canadian defence requirements of the Bren machine gun was made however until March 31, 1938.

On the next page of the report the commissioner goes on to deal with the statement made by an important official of the department at that time as to what would be a proper policy in Canada in connection with the making of munitions and machinery of war. The commissioner said:

There were read into the record extracts from memoranda produced by government counsel, made by the then Chief of the General Staff, Major-General E. C. Ashton, to the Minister of National Defence (exhibit 281). From a memorandum of January 27, 1936, the following:—

> Our greatest need is a proper arsenal capable of manufacturing up to 8-inch gun ammunition and large enough to supply our annual expenditure. We have no small arms factory and are therefore unable, as the Australians are, to manufacture rifles or machine guns. It was proposed to erect a small arms factory at Valcartier after the ammunition group had been completed; the majority of the necessary machinery is available from the old Ross rifle factory.

Well, I hope we are not going to be told that after the experiences of the last war those who designed the Ross rifle are capable of producing for Canada in the future that which we desire in the way of armaments. It requires something more than machinery, apparently, to produce a rifle which will work when used in the trenches. Our men who were in the trenches during the last war and were armed with Ross rifles made by this machinery of which they speak had to throw the rifles themselves at the enemy.

Mr. COLDWELL: How can the guns be any better?

Mr. GARDINER: Everyone knows that no particular success was made of making rifles at that time. Then the memorandum goes on to say:

There is no reason why suitable guns should not be manufactured in Canada and Canadian workmen receive the advantage of the expenditures which will be involved. As a first requisite, the completion of the proposed arsenal, with facilities to manufacture a small number yearly, is of the greatest consequence. Once the manufacture has been studied and perfected the personnel trained in the government factory will be in a position to instruct and supervise the operations of civil firms to whom contracts could be let for further supplies.

That was the policy outlined by certain officials of the department in 1936. This system which was outlined by the officials of the department at that time would require a vast amount of money to put it into operation. I notice that the minister himself, appearing before the commission, said that certain parts of it would require an expenditure of some $35,000,000.

Mr. STEWART: That is for the whole of it.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not for the whole of it. I have no doubt that in order to carry to completion, over a term of years, the program which was outlined by the officials of the department at that time, it would cost this country not $35,000,000 but $200,000,000 or $300,000,000. And when this government came to the house during the first session of this parliament to ask for $25,000,000 for national defence, what was the position taken by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil)? What was the position taken by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell)? What was the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps)? What was the position taken by all hon. members of the group sitting opposite and to the right of the official opposition? Every one of these hon. members was against the expenditure of even the relatively small amount of money that was being proposed at that time. Then what was the position taken when we came to the house in 1937 and asked for $37,000,000? The attitude was exactly the same.

In 1936 members of this government were in England, and on that occasion I had the privilege of sitting in the House of Commons and listening to Sir Thomas Inskip. I have brought with me to-night a copy of the English parliamentary debates for July 20, 1936, in which Sir Thomas outlines the practice and policy of the British government in connection with matters such as we are discussing to-night. In opening his speech he remarks that it is peculiar that for the third time he has to outline his program to the House of Commons. Apparently they took some convincing over there, as they do here, but probably ultimately we shall also have them convinced here. He says:

New sources have had to be opened. It is not as easy as some hon. members think to open new sources of supply for munitions. I say that not to excuse any delay, but in order that the matter may be seen in its true proportion. If I may take as an example one set of munitions, which I mentioned last time—shell and shell components—there are certain firms, of course, that are accustomed to produce them. They know the technique, they are familiar with the processes, they have the plant, they have received orders in the past, and they need no education.

And listen to this:

But the new firms which are to undertake the completion of what is really a formidable program have not only to be inspected, but they have to be classified. They have to be examined for their capacity, they have to learn to understand and to operate the processes shown in the manuals that have had to be prepared.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GARDINER: Listen to this, those who say "hear, hear":

Draft heads of agreement have to be considered, and any hon. member who thinks that you can immediately increase the output of shell and shell components by running over the country giving an order to any engineering firm of experience—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GARDINER: Listen to this:

—giving an order to any engineering firm of experience—

Giving an order to those who are making motor cars, for example, and all that kind of thing.

—can be but little familiar with the processes to which I have referred.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GARDINER: And I repeat that statement to my hon. friends in this house. If they think that you can go about this country giving out contracts to people before they have been given some training, in order to bring about the production of these different commodities, then they are going to find themselves in considerable difficulty. I continue quoting:

I am happy to say that these preliminary stages, inevitable and elaborate as they are but still only preliminary, have been passed. Fifty-two new firms have been offered contracts for the supply of ammunition, and of those fifty-two firms, at any rate up to ten days or a fortnight ago, fourteen have accepted term contracts.

Then he goes on to say that in developing this policy other companies must be still further trained, and points out that it is impossible to have what we call competitive bids in connection with a business of this kind; that in times of peace a government has to allow for reasonable profits in connection with contracts of this sort. Draft heads of contracts must be drawn to meet different situations, and by that process they get the production of their munitions and machinery of war.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if in 1936 I went to England convinced that government ownership and control of a plant in this country for the production of munitions would be a good thing under certain circumstances, I came back convinced that the British had had far more experience in this matter than we; that they found themselves confronted with a world situation which required them to develop the production of the machinery and munitions of war in the ordinary factories throughout the country, and that in order to get that done, they had to go into those plants, educate some of the staffs, reequip some of the plants with machinery and set up facilities by means of which the munitions of war could be produced. And that is what they did.

Some of my hon. friends opposite have been shouting to this government that we should show closer cooperation with the old country; that we should coordinate our efforts more closely with theirs. Here is one opportunity of coordinating our efforts without doing any injury to the national feelings, or to the feelings of any particular section of this dominion, and, while coordinating our efforts with theirs, we have an opportunity to develop our own industry so that in more peaceful times than we are enjoying at present we can go on to greater and greater development here.

Not so very long ago I said somewhere in this country—not while I was making a speech by the way, but while I was sitting at a table talking to a group of individuals—that what we wanted in Canada to-day if we were going to bring British settlers here from the industrial areas of England, was the transfer of some of the capital of Great Britain to this dominion. Immediately my hon. friends, particularly those over in the far corner on the opposite side, thought of capital as something in the form of money, something you could pick up and carry round with you. But the capital of the industrial areas of England is the machinery of production and the buildings that have been constructed to house that machinery. That machinery and those buildings, Mr. Speaker, represent the surplus labour of generations of Britishers who have established the industrial sections of that country. What I say is this, that when we are faced with great difficulties such as those that are present in the world to-day; when we are faced with great threats such as we have in the world to-day, it is time to take advantage of our opportunities, and, while taking advantage of our opportunities, to give assistance to the industrial centre of the empire by seeing to it that some of these industries are carried on in Canada; for in carrying them on here we shall be transporting to this dominion not only the people who carry on those industries, but also the capital that has been built up through generations. By that method we can bring the men and women who are going to eat the foodstuffs of this country right to the areas where those foodstuffs are being produced; we can put them to work developing our natural resources, instead of going on generation after generation supplying the needs of 30,000,000 industrial people from a country with only 10,000,000, located hundreds of miles away, and then wondering why there are threats of war from the thickly populated areas of this world.

This government entered into a joint contract with the British government to make guns which are needed by both governments, in one of the great cities of Canada where unemployment has been rife and where men are looking for work. My opposition friends who have been shouting, in Toronto more than anywhere else, that what we need is more cooperation with Great Britain, have seen one of their leading periodicals publish an article which insinuates all kinds of things. I say "insinuate" advisedly. I have had some experience with this periodical. On one occasion they wrote one of these insinuating articles with regard to me; inside an hour after it appeared on the news stands of my home city it was taken off the news stands, and my friends who publish this particular periodical took the trouble to send me the man who wrote it. He came half way across Canada to see me to find out what was wrong with it. When he came into my office and asked me what was wrong with it, I said, "There isn't anything wrong with it; I got more publicity out of this article than I ever got out of anything that was written about me in my life. I have found for the first time how many friends I have in my own city." Before that magazine had been on the news stands for an hour men were telephoning my office to ask me if I had read Maclean's magazine. I thought Maclean's magazine had really published something which was worth reading. I said, "No, I really do not waste much time reading it." "Well," they said, "you ought not to read it to-night because it says some terrible things about you, and we have put it off our news stands." This came from men who were not political friends of mine but who had read the article, as well as from friends. Having had that experience, I suggest to this house that this periodical is insinuating again, insinuating about the Minister of Defence (Mr. Mackenzie)—I do not know why—insinuating with regard to Major Hahn, who has entered into this contract. Let us look at what the commission's report says about Major Hahn. Not knowing Major Hahn, I can say freely what I am about to say. If hon. members will turn to page 12 of the report they will find some remarks in regard to him. I have not time to read all of these, but I want hon. members to read this. The deputy minister said, at page 15:

Major Hahn, he said, had come in to see him to ascertain whether there was any business which the department was giving and in which he might be interested.

It is interesting to note that this was on October 9. It is also worth noting that the evidence shows that this plant was arranged for by Major Hahn in July and August of that year. On October 9 he called at the office of the deputy minister.

Major Hahn, he said, had come in to see him to ascertain whether there was any business which the department was giving and in which he might be interested. He mentioned aircraft, the possibility of making aircraft, and making shells or military equipment.

It appears that Major Hahn did not go there to get the contract for the Bren gun. He went there to make general inquiries from the department as to whether there was anything he could make that the department required. I have no doubt that a great many men have done that. The gentleman who got the letter of introduction through the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) came there to make the same kind of inquiry. Well then, the question in the evidence is:

"Q. Did the Bren gun come up as a topic of discussion on that occasion?

A. Yes, very much.

Q. Will you just tell the commissioner how the discussion came up and what was said?

A. I had had one of the two guns we had mounted in my office. I had wanted to see it myself and it was mounted in my office. Anyone entering for those two or three days could see the gun. On seeing the gun both of them (Mr. Plaxton and Major Hahn) went over to it, looked at it and asked what it was. I told them it was the new Bren gun. I do not believe that either of them had ever seen the gun."

Mr. STIRLING: Or heard of it.

Mr. GARDINER: Listen to the next paragraph:

"They were much interested in it, particularly Major Hahn, who understood what it meant. He made inquiries as to whether the gun would be used in the Canadian army, where it was being used, where we would buy them and points related to the possible future use of the gun. I told them we had no funds with which to buy Bren guns. I told him that possibly, as in the other items, England might be interested. I was referring all comers to England as a possible market. I did tell him undoubtedly the gun would be used in the Canadian forces, but when, I did not know. . ."

Major Hahn told the deputy minister at the time (i.e. on October 9, 1936), that he thought he could make the gun and he wanted to inspect it to see whether or not he could make it, and Major Hahn asked for an opportunity of inspecting the gun closely. The gun was then sent by the department to Toronto, where Major Hahn "and not more than two engineers or mechanics" could inspect it under arrangements to be made by the District Officer Commanding.

That is the whole story. My hon. friends talk of mechanical engineers and men who can use the instruments required for the moulding of precision steel; but I refer them to the fact that what any factory in this country requires first is a manager, the man who can see the possibilities in things of this kind, the man who can go out and arrange for production, build up the necessary equipment and machinery and acquire a factory with which to do the work. I believe, without knowing anything about it, but being satisfied that I know the higher officials in the departments of government in Ottawa, whether they were appointed by previous governments or this government, that Mr. Hahn sold himself to the officials of the Department of National Defence as a man capable of doing a job of that particular kind. My hon. friends say he was not chosen in England. Are they trying to tell us that Sir Thomas Inskip, Mr. Ernest Brown and others in England did not make exactly the same kind of investigations?—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has exhausted his time.

Mr. GARDINER: May I finish this sentence? I claim they did—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GARDINER: —and found that this was a man quite capable of doing the job. The reports shows they did.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in the course of the remarks made this afternoon by my right hon. leader (Mr. Manion)—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Right honourable!

Mr. MacNICOL: He will be "right honourable" after the coming election—the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) interrupted the remarks. The leader of the opposition had been speaking about a letter of introduction given by the minister—I should like the minister's attention—to Major Hahn to take to England, and the minister rose to say that he had given letters of introduction to friends of the leader of the opposition's friends. On being asked, to whom? he said, "Ask the hon. member for Davenport." He added, "I gave some letters of introduction to friends of your colleagues." I asked the minister to whom he referred; for I often give letters of introduction, not only to ministers but to managers, to people who I feel are entitled to receive letters of introduction. At this point I may tell the minister, or any other minister, or anyone else who receives a letter written by me as an introduction, that he can publish it to the world. I asked the minister this afternoon to rise in his place and read the letter. If I gave a letter to Mr. John T. Hepburn, it would perhaps be along this line. I have not the letter, so I do not know just what I wrote.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is absolutely no objection whatever to the terms of the letter.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear the minister say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I commend my hon. friend for his industry in giving a letter.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. John T. Hepburn is the president of the John T. Hepburn company, a company which has had a distinguished record for the last thirty-three years. The president came from Scotland, started with very little and built up one of the best concerns in Canada which has been operating continuously for thirty-three years. At the moment it employs about 250 men and it has employed as many as 500. I think it was very thoughtless of the minister to mention the president of a great concern like that in connection with the gentleman to whom he finally gave this contract. A little later on, replying to something the leader of the opposition said, the minister said that I had taken Mr. Hepburn into his office. I never was in the minister's office in my life, nor have I ever taken anyone there. I am going to ask him to withdraw that remark for it is now in Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my hon. friend will look up Hansard I think he will find I said that he wrote a letter introducing Mr. John T. Hepburn.

Mr. MacNICOL: You said that I introduced Mr. Hepburn in your office. I never was in your office. I am sure you gave Mr. Hepburn a nice letter, for he was worthy of it. I understand he was going to England at the time of the coronation. During the dinner recess I took the trouble to telephone Mr. Hepburn to ask him about the letter. He said the minister had given him a very nice letter, but unfortunately when he arrived in England he found it had been addressed to the wrong person. He could not use it because he wanted to see someone in another department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The letter was given at your request nonetheless.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thank the minister for his courtesy.

Mr. DUNNING: He got some business too.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not know anything about what he did. He certainly did not do any business as a result of the letter he got from the department.

Mr. MANION: He did not get a gun contract.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to refer to one or two things the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said during the course of his speech. If I understood him correctly he said that we of the official opposition had not given loyal or fair support during the last two or three years to the defence estimates.

Mr. GARDINER: I was referring to the people in the far corner on the opposite side.

Mr. MANION: I understood the minister to refer to our side of the house.

Mr. GARDINER: I was referring to the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and I named some members.

Mr. MacNICOL: While we have been in opposition we have given hearty support to the militia estimates. Then I understood the Minister of Agriculture to say something about the cost of the proposed factory in Canada. Perhaps I might have his ear now because I do not want to have to say this the second time. He read a statement from the report that a plant capable of manufacturing munitions would cost from $30,000,000 to $35,000,000. I should like to read the paragraph in the report; it follows:

> The minister said that General Ashton (the then chief of the general staff) was very insistent upon the development of government arsenals and that the former chief of general staff, General McNaughton, evolved a very comprehensive scheme for Valcartier which would include practically all the requirements of the Canadian forces.

The minister did not mention this when he was talking about the plant that was purchased. I looked into the report and I found that what would cost between $30,000,000 and $35,000,000 was a comprehensive scheme which would include the manufacture of all the requirements of the forces. That did not refer in any way to the Bren gun contract, unless it were proposed to manufacture the Bren gun in that plant. The next paragraph in the report states that a new plant, apart from the land, would cost approximately $120,000. That is not $30,000,000 or $35,000,000. I think the minister is unfair to give out a statement like that and not state what the $30,000,000 to $35,000,000 are for. What is going on in Toronto at the John Inglis plant? I know the plant quite well, for I have been in it hundreds of times.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I must correct my hon. friend. He will find in the sworn evidence given before the commission that I stated that according to the minutes of the defence council these figures were submitted, and were concurred in by the recent chief of the general staff, General Ashton.

Mr. MacNICOL: That was to cover the manufacture of everything.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was for what they called the grand arsenal scheme at Valcartier.

Mr. MacNICOL: We are talking about the Bren gun.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There was never any suggestion that the $35,000,000 applied to Bren gun manufacture.

Mr. MacNICOL: That was the inference given out here. I started to say that I knew something about the John Inglis plant.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want to misrepresent. What I did a few moments ago was read to the house the full policy that was outlined in 1936 by General Ashton. He outlined a policy which I said would take, not $35,000,000 but $200,000,000, in my judgment.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MacNICOL: Shall I read what General Ashton said? It was to be a comprehensive scheme. Then the next paragraph goes on to speak about the cost of the new Bren plant being $120,000.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not what I was speaking about.

Mr. MacNICOL: The permit taken out in Toronto to cover the addition to the John Inglis plant is for $50,000. I saw the report the other day. This addition was in the form of a shed being erected between two buildings, one side of the shed facing south.

Mr. PLAXTON: How many buildings are on the property?

Mr. MacNICOL: You will have to give a speech and you can tell all about that. This whole business is the result of your monkeying with things you should not have monkeyed with.

Mr. SLAGHT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) wants to say anything, he can say it later. He has a pretty sharp and witty tongue. I do not care what he wants to say, but I should not be interrupted while I am speaking. You can say any mortal thing you want to say about me. I have nothing to hide. I am not mixed up with any government contract and I am not defending anybody. My hon. friend is ready to defend anyone who comes to him for defence. I have such a high regard for his ability to defend people that if I ever got in trouble I would ask him to defend me if he were free.

The minister said something about British plants. When I was in England two years ago I visited a number of plants and I discussed with the officials the very point raised by the Minister of Agriculture. While there I listened to a debate in the House of Commons in connection with the removal of certain plants adjacent to London which were engaged in the manufacture of munitions. In Slough and other districts adjacent to London many plants had been erected and it was thought advisable that some of them should be moved farther away from London. I suggested to some of these officials that perhaps they could erect new plants in Canada. I may say to the minister that a number of these men told me that if any scheme could be worked out whereby a new plant could be erected in Canada and the necessary trading arrangements made, they would be glad to do it. As he and everybody else knows, they are moving their plants not only outside London but away north of Birmingham, and some of them have been moved north into Scotland. I think it would be a good scheme to induce British manufacturers to move out into this country. I would much rather have done that than induce three or four men, without a plant, and without machinery to operate a plant, to try to manufacture the Bren gun. I would have tried to encourage the manufacturers of the Enfield arms to build a branch plant here.

Mr. GARDINER: Is what we are doing not exactly what they were doing?

Mr. MacNICOL: You did not do it. You got hold of a man who made radios and got him to go into the armament business.

The Minister of Agriculture referred to my giving a letter of introduction to the Minister of National Defence. I would not hesitate two seconds to give a man dealing in wheat or flour a letter of introduction to the Minister of Agriculture. If every member of this house who has written a letter of introduction to a minister were asked by you, Mr. Speaker, to rise in his place, three-quarters of the membership of this house would have to rise. There is no crime in that, and I do not want any wrong inference to be drawn from that side of the house from the letter of introduction I wrote for John T. Hepburn.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I assure my hon. friend that there was not the slightest inference in the world with respect to himself.

Mr. MacNICOL: Thank you. I would expect a brother Scot to say that.

I want to deal now with two or three other matters. The company with which I was associated for a great many years bought a great number of boilers from the John Inglis plant, and I can say from my knowledge of the John Inglis plant that it was a fine plant for engines and boilers and heavy steelware. The Inglis family were a fine family, and it grieves me to see the Inglis name, which has meant so much in the city of Toronto for so long a time, dragged into an affair like this. I knew the father, John Inglis, and I knew Mr. William Inglis who died, I think it was in 1935. They were very, very fine men, and it is a grief to every man who knew that family to have their name dragged into this affair, and as an old friend of the family, I am very, very sorry that the company which has taken over the plant was permitted to use the name Inglis. Give it any other name than the highly respectable name of Inglis. I am not saying that those who took it over were not respectable; but the Inglis name had a fine record, and I never like to see an old established name like that used for any other purpose.

Something has been said about plants not being asked to tender for manufacturing the Bren gun. This afternoon, when my leader was speaking, he asked the Minister of National Defence if he denied that other manufacturers could make the Bren gun, and the minister replied, "Certainly not." I too would say, "Certainly not." I have been connected with the iron and steel business for many years and know a great many men who are in that business, making all kinds of precision tools and machinery that requires the finest of tools and the finest of mechanics, and I could name without hesitation many firms which could manufacture the Bren gun. When I was home on Saturday I took the trouble to ask two firms if they could manufacture the Bren gun. I do not want to mention their names, but I asked them if they could make the gun in their plant or on their property. They are both well known, reliable firms making various lines of machinery that require precision tools, and both answered without hesitation: Yes, they could have done so. That is one of the things I find fault with about this contract. It was given without tenders being invited, and at least twenty companies which could have made the Bren gun were not invited to tender at all. I have no doubt that when the Minister of National Defence rises to speak he will give his reasons why tenders were not invited. But speaking as a business man, engaged in large business for twenty-five years, I would say that at least twenty companies could have made the Bren gun with some alterations in their plants. It is not necessary for me to read their names.

I know that the minister's department two or three years ago made an exhaustive survey of the industrial plants throughout Canada, and there is to-day in the department a compilation of their equipment and capacity, and what use could be made of these plants for military purposes. That report has been referred to several times since it appeared in the press on November 2, 1938, and I shall not take time to refer to it in more detail here.

I want to say a word or two on the method of letting tenders on a cost-plus basis. I do not approve it. I have had a great deal to do with business in my time, and I have always objected to having anything done on a cost-plus basis. I venture to say that in the Inglis plant in Toronto or in any plant where something is being manufactured on a cost-plus basis you will find people falling over one another. The cost-plus basis just invites adding to the cost of the article; but let your contract by tender and you get a right price.

I am going to tabulate, in chronological order, the various items referred to in the commissioner's report, so that the whole Bren gun business will be plain for all who wish to read.

On May 24, 1935, the British government made an agreement with the patentee of the Bren gun, whose plant was established, I believe, in Czechoslovakia.

In August, 1935—I have not the precise date—two Bren guns were ordered shipped to Canada, according to the report.

On February 27, 1936, the high commissioner in London advised this government that, with regard to the agreement that had been entered into, Canada herself might manufacture the Bren gun, but if the Bren gun were made over here, she should take particular care to see that the gun was made in a plant operated by this government. That is one point which I should like kept firmly in mind, and it is brought up again and again in this report, that the Bren gun, if made here, must be manufactured by the government under its own supervision.

On March 18, 1936, the director of mechanization asked the judge advocate to study the agreement for Canada.

On March 19, 1936, the judge advocate replied.

On April 6, 1936, the John Inglis Company went into liquidation, and now commences the long story of the John Inglis Company.

The report says that late in March or early in April, 1936—it must have been early in April—Messrs. Cameron and Herbert and Gordon Plaxton were considering the Inglis plant, with a view, I suppose, to purchasing it.

On April 22, 1936, Major General Ashton wrote re the Bren gun and pointed out that the gun would have to be manufactured according to the agreement in a plant operated by the government.

On June 3, 1936, the Department of National Defence set its requirements at 7,000 Bren guns.

In June, 1936—the precise date is not given in the report—Mr. Herbert Plaxton interested Major Hahn in a proposal to acquire the Inglis plant, which was then in the hands of the receiver.

In July or August, it does not appear which, Major Hahn decided to become interested in the Inglis plant, with Messrs. Cameron, Pointon, Merritt, and Herbert and Gordon Plaxton.

In August, 1936, Lieutenant Jolley returned from England. Lieutenant Jolley is an able man and I like what the report says about him. I like the way in which the Minister of Agriculture spoke about him. When it became necessary to send a man to England, why therefore did the government not send Lieutenant Jolley instead of Major Hahn and some others?

On August 24, 1936, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) wrote to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a letter which has been quoted and which, therefore, I shall not quote again. The Prime Minister replied on September 12 and was cautious, as he should be. He went to considerable pains to point out to the hon. member for Trinity that certain methods should be followed. But I was very much surprised to read in the report that on September 15, after receiving the Prime Minister's letter of September 12, the hon. member for Trinity sent the letter to the Minister of National Defence.

On October 9, the report records that the hon. member for Trinity and Major Hahn met in the deputy minister's office and, while there, saw the Bren gun.

On October 10 the department very wisely sent an inspector to investigate the Inglis plant. At that time the department must have had a full report with reference to that plant, because such a report must have been sent in by the inspectors who had been authorized to inspect all plants in Canada.

On October 19 Major Hahn, Mr. Cameron and the hon. member for Trinity saw the minister.

On October 19, it does not say whether before or after that visit, an offer was made by Messrs. Cameron, Pointon, and Merritt to buy the Inglis plant. The offer was to acquire the plant for $250,000 and that was accepted by the Toronto General Trust, I presume on the same date.

On October 19 the minister gave his letter of introduction to Major Hahn, and on October 20 the deputy minister also gave a letter of introduction.

On October 22, Mr. Nurse declared that the interest he held in the Inglis plant as trustee for J. D. Cameron, Herbert Plaxton and others was transferred into a new company capitalized at $1,200,000.

On October 23 the chief aeronautical officer reported in reference to the Inglis plant. What does he say about this plant? It has been quoted before but I think it should be read again. It will be found on page 22 of the report. He says in reference to this firm:

> This firm is equipped to do heavy engineering work, boilers, etc. The shops would require to be stripped of their equipment to be suitable for aircraft construction. The shops are more suitable for shells, gun carriage, etc., than for aircraft or aircraft engines.

I know that during the great war the Inglis company did make a vast number of shells for shipment overseas.

On October 26 Major Hahn, the hon. member for Trinity and Mr. Gordon Plaxton sailed for England.

On November 9, the hon. member for Trinity sent two cables from England, one to the minister and one to the deputy. As they have both been read I shall not quote them again.

On November 10 the cables were replied to, making Major Hahn representative of the government.

On November 16 the Anglo-Engineering Company was incorporated to hold some shares of the John Inglis Company.

On November 23 the British Engineering Company was incorporated, having 200,000 shares of one dollar each.

Having been associated with an old-line company that had been in business since 1884, and having customers from one end of the country to the other, I am perfectly at a loss to understand why there should be any necessity whatever for the incorporation of all these companies for the making of the Bren machine guns.

On March 5, 1937, an interdepartmental committee was set up.

On June 4 the company's name was changed to the John Inglis Company. That is something which I very much regret, and I say so in view of the fact that this was an old-established firm and one that was highly respected.

On December 17 another company was set up, Investment Reserves Incorporated, to act as trustees for certain shares in the John Inglis Company.

On January 5, 1937, the interdepartmental committee met to discuss the Inglis contract.

On January 13, a subcommittee of the interdepartmental committee made a report. What did they say? At page 38 of the report this statement appears, that various other companies might have made this equipment, or should have been asked for bids on the equipment; and they discussed the subject of competitive bids, the question why the John Inglis Company should get this contract, the financial status of the company, and a number of other things. Now that is what the public wants to know. The people want to know why only one company was allowed to have the privilege of manufacturing these guns, especially a company that was not in the business, certainly not in the manufacturing business. They might have been getting ready to manufacture, but they were not actually doing so.

On January 24 the interdepartmental committee discussed the question why other companies were not invited to tender.

On March 22 the contract was authorized, and on March 31 the contract was signed. On April 1 the plant commenced operating.

That is the chronological order as far as I have been able to trace it from the report, giving the various dates of the transaction. The Minister of Agriculture made reference to the Ross rifle, and that recalled to my mind what I heard in Toronto on Saturday last from a man who has two sons who, in the event of war, would likely enlist or be enrolled in the forces. This gentleman said to me: "I am horrified to think what might happen to my sons because I have a clear recollection of what happened in connection with the Ross rifle in the great war." As the Minister of Agriculture said, soldiers threw that rifle away. As we read at that time, a great number of Canadian soldiers lost their lives through the inefficiency of the Ross rifle. What assurance is there to-day that the Bren will be worth a fig? At the time the Ross rifles were made, the Ross rifle factory at Quebec was supposed to be equipped with the finest machinery, but apparently it was not able to turn out guns which were reliable. What assurance is there that the Bren guns made in the old John Inglis plant will be any better? They would perhaps, however, be too heavy for the soldiers to throw away. I hope these guns will be efficient; I trust they will, but what assurance have we that they will be any better manufactured than the old Ross rifles were? That is a question that disturbs the people of the city from which I come.

I appreciate the fact that the government gave the contract, when it did give it, to a plant in Toronto. I am one of those who firmly believe that everything that can be made in this country should be so made; I know there were at least a score of plants in Canada at that time which could have gone into making Bren guns without too much change, companies with which I am well acquainted myself. So that the government has to answer that question why one company only, and that one apparently organized on purpose to make Bren guns, was given the opportunity to tender on the Bren gun, to the exclusion of several old-established companies.

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): This debate has arisen on a motion by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) that the Bren gun investigation report should be referred to the standing committee on public accounts. When the motion was made the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke on it; since then many other members of the government have also spoken, and they all insist that they have carefully read the report and found absolutely nothing wrong. If that be the case they must have been wearing rose-coloured glasses when they read it, because it is evident from the report that there certainly are things which need correction in connection with this matter. I am surprised at the attitude taken by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion). He began by saying that in his opinion the commissioner had been limited in several ways in making his report. For example, he continuously referred to parts of the report quoting arguments presented by various counsel. For example, Mr. Geoffrion, counsel for one of the parties concerned, said to the commissioner:

> No charges being laid, no report of misconduct or no report can be made against us, because there was no charge of misconduct, and no notice to us . . . and I say on the record, as it is now made, it is completely ultra vires, and it is of course inconceivable that there should be a report of misconduct, as there has been no charge.

He also said:

> Under the circumstances, so far as Major Hahn and the John Inglis Company are concerned, I suggest—and I suggest this most emphatically—that there is absolutely no jurisdiction in finding misconduct of any sort on his part.

But the subject of public concern is, in my opinion, that at the conclusion of a long hearing, counsel in their arguments, except counsel for Colonel Drew, raised all sorts of objections to the commissioner commenting on the evidence, or expressing any opinion that he might see fit to express, or making any recommendation as a result of his investigation, although he was expressly directed by his commission to do so. Further on we find this statement by Mr. Geoffrion to the commissioner:

> You can report the facts, but if the facts of the report necessarily involve a charge of misconduct, you cannot.

It seems to me that the meaning of the word "misconduct" certainly has something to do with the interpretation which the commissioner might place on the argument of counsel. If misconduct simply means that there is something directly wrong with the minister or with the contract, it is possible that the commissioner could not have looked into it from that particular angle. But if misconduct means that perhaps the negotiations leading to the letting of the contract were not conducted as they should have been, then it is my opinion that the commissioner should not have been influenced by the argument of counsel. There is, however, no evidence that he was. But I feel inclined to ask this question: In view of the fact that this statement was repeated to the commissioner so many times by various people appearing before him as counsel, is it possible to believe that the commissioner felt there were certain questions which, in the light of representations made by counsel, he should not ask? I doubt that, however, because the commissioner has stated that the inquiry was open. But in the light of the arguments presented by the leader of the opposition I fail to see why he should not be willing to let the matter go to the committee.

The other day the Prime Minister said something in connection with what might be the rights of hon. members if this investigation were put before a select committee of the house. I admit that at that time the words of the Prime Minister seemed to put a certain restraint upon hon. members of this house. I felt that if I went ahead and spoke in this debate regardless of the words of the Prime Minister, perhaps I should be exceeding what would be considered proper by him. I recalled, however, that perhaps the Prime Minister was following the tactics sometimes used by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) who at times rises in his place and thunders at the house, telling hon. members what dire things will happen to them if such and such a course of action is followed. As a case in point, I should like to quote a few lines from Hansard to show the attitude that is sometimes taken by the Minister of Finance, which perhaps influenced the stand taken by the Prime Minister the other day. In 1938 we find the Minister of Finance, in an endeavour, I imagine, to compel some hon. members to realize the dire danger of some things which they were doing, thundering out these words, as reported at page 474 of Hansard for February 15, 1938:

> May I point out that in an authoritarian state a man who said what the leader of the opposition said would by now be in another sphere; he would have been "liquidated" or—what is the other word?—"purged." As for my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) what would have happened to him I shudder to think.

Remembering the words of the Minister of Finance I thought the Prime Minister was perhaps following in his footsteps and in that manner trying to tell us not to do something which he felt should not be done.

I listened with great care to the argument of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that someone in this house was criticizing Major Hahn. As far as I am concerned I am not worrying about Major Hahn, but in the light of the report on the Bren machine gun the question that concerns us is what will happen to the money which shortly will be in the hands of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), if such things as this are permitted to go on. True, no one has found any corruption of any kind; no one has ever suggested any corruption, but I am sure we are all agreed that the method by which this contract was negotiated is not a method which should be followed in a democratic country. That is the point at stake, rather than the reputation of Major Hahn or anybody else, and I submit that when the Minister of Agriculture dwelt on that point he failed to touch the argument at all. The minister also referred to the inference left by the leader of the opposition—of course according to the minister—

An hon. MEMBER: Look at the paper.

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes; I will look at the paper and get it right. The minister referred to the inference left by the leader of the opposition during the course of his speech. I suggest that if there were any such inference, it was no worse than the inference suggested by the leader of the government himself when he referred to the political affiliations of the judge appointed to conduct the inquiry. It seemed to me that when the Prime Minister stated that this judge was not of Liberal origin or appointed by the Liberal party, that he was a Conservative, it must have meant to the people at large that some doubt must be reflected upon those who had been appointed under a Liberal administration. It did not seem to me that the Prime Minister should have made any such reference, because it does cast some sort of reflection upon the Supreme Court of Canada. I have always felt that once men have been appointed to such exalted positions, they leave behind all their political partisanship and become solely interested in justice, no matter who may be concerned.

It might be well to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman who was retained as counsel for one of the interested parties, namely Mr. Geoffrion, is the gentleman who last year was engaged by this government to present the case of the federal government to the Supreme Court of Canada in the matter of the reference of certain statutes of the province of Alberta. This is probably simply a coincidence, but I mention it in passing because I feel that it might be a good thing if it were more widely known.

In my opinion the purpose of this debate is not simply to find fault with any minister of the government but to make sure, by referring the matter to a properly constituted committee of this house, that we in Canada may be absolutely sure that there is no tinkering, shall I say, with anything having to do with the question of munitions or the awarding of contracts. Probably the Prime Minister remembers very well what occurred in this house last year during the course of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The then leader of the opposition made certain charges having to do with graft and political corruption. I said he made charges, but I should have said he made insinuations. At that time I suggested to the leader of the government that perhaps it would be best to ask the leader of the opposition to prove those charges and thus clear the atmosphere. There might not have been anything to them, and perhaps the whole thing would have died away. I believe if that course had been followed, such occurrences as we are discussing to-day might not have taken place.

Mr. BRADETTE: Oh, no. You thrive on scandal.

Mr. PELLETIER: I admit, of course, that this investigation does not concern any scandal, but the very fact that a committee had investigated political patronage naturally would have tended to restrain the ministers from considering granting favours to certain political friends. I agree with the Minister of Agriculture when he says Major Hahn simply sold himself to the Department of National Defence. Of course he sold himself, with the assistance of one of the supporters of this government. That was the way in which the thing was done, and perhaps if my suggestion last year had been adopted this situation would not have arisen.

I know very well it is the desire of the Prime Minister to have absolute integrity on the part of his government and to have nothing wrong with any contract dealing with the question of armaments for this country. In this connection I submit the following for his consideration; the commissioner made the following recommendation:

What is plain to me at the end of this long inquiry is this: that if the policy of private manufacture of war munitions and armaments is to be continued in this country (a question of administrative policy for the government and parliament to determine), once the requirements are determined by the Department of National Defence the negotiations leading up to and the making of contracts between the government and private manufacturers either for the purchase or production of such munitions or armaments should be put into the hands of an expert advisory group of competent business men—a capable and experienced manufacturer, a commercial lawyer who has had a wide practice in dealing with large commercial contracts, a representative of labour, and say a chartered accountant who has had experience in the examination of substantial business transactions. These persons should constitute a board (which might be known as the "Defence Purchasing Board")—

Knowing as I do the sincere, earnest desire of the Prime Minister to bring about such a happy situation, I suggest that it would be a wonderful gesture on his part if he were to arrange to have such a board properly constituted and to have it report not only to the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance but also to the leader of the opposition and to another member representing the independent groups in this house. Handled in that way, with such an open-handed gesture, I feel sure that this question of political patronage in connection with contracts would never again arise in this country. That is simply a suggestion; I realize that it might not be advisable from the point of view of the government, but I believe at a time like this the government would be quite willing to put aside questions of party and rise to greater heights for the sake of the economic welfare of the Canadian people. I feel confident that if such a plan were accepted by the Prime Minister, it would at once remove all doubt in the minds of the people of Canada in regard to the handling of matters of this kind. There is no doubt that to-day many people are questioning themselves and others with regard to what is happening in connection with contracts of this kind. People are too prone to go around the country saying, "Oh, sure, somebody is making money out of this thing, and we have to pay for it in taxation, or perhaps with the lives of our sons or husbands." It is only right that they should ask themselves such questions, when they read the report of the Nye committee of the United States senate. Anyone interested in this question of the private manufacture of munitions will find a great deal of interesting reading in that report. No doubt that question will be discussed by the committee, and perhaps a recommendation will be made that there should be no private gain in the manufacture of armaments. That I do not know; nevertheless one cannot help but be struck by words such as these, from the report of the committee to which I just referred:

—it is clear that the private shipbuilders should very definitely be policed in any and all moves made by them or through them to confuse public defence needs with their private profit, or should be cut off entirely from the building of ships for the navy.

Of course this part of the report refers particularly to the navy, the shipyards, the building of battleships and cruisers, and armaments of that kind. But armaments are armaments no matter whether they are Bren machine guns or boats, and the people never like to make that kind of expenditure unless they feel it is absolutely necessary. That is why I say to the Prime Minister that if he were to follow, perhaps with certain modifications, the suggestion which I have made, he would at once remove from the minds of the people of this country any thought that there might be anything wrong with the handling of contracts of this kind.

Undoubtedly we shall have occasion later on to refer once more to the findings of this commission, when the report comes from the committee to which it is intended it shall be referred. I believe that nothing is to be lost by referring this report to the committee. I cannot agree with the leader of the opposition when he says that the debate arising out of the report has finally cleared the atmosphere. In my mind too many doubts have been raised to be left where they are; they need to be cleared up; and I feel that the only possible place to clear them up is where members of a committee have free access to all documents and have the power to bring before them any person whom they may see fit to call. I repeat this because there may have been the thought in the mind of the commissioner that he was precluded by a section of the Inquiries Act from asking certain questions which otherwise he might have asked.

I conclude these few words in the hope that the Prime Minister will give serious consideration to the suggestion that I have made, because I believe that only by rising above political lines shall we be able to retain the confidence of the people of this country with regard to armament manufacture.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I have read the report and I believe the people have read it. I can come to only one conclusion, that we should have the full discussion on this matter which we are having. The people demand a full discussion right on the floor of this house, not in any committee. I do not want to take any chances of having discussion blocked by technicalities. We want to have the scope of discussion as wide as possible.

The impassioned speech which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made on this motion sounded to me, a new member, like intimidation. I am sure some other hon. members felt the same way, but I can assure him that I am not intimidated. He said, as reported at page 596 of Hansard:

> What I am concerned about is that some other hon. members in the course of debate at this stage may without realizing the significance of their actions commit themselves by their expressions to such an extent that every man, woman and child in this country will know that they have arrived at a particular attitude which they intend to maintain in the committee, and that the committee therefore would lose in the public mind if not also in fact the judicial aspect which it ought to have.

I do not believe the discussion will lose any judicial aspect if it is conducted on the floor of this house. What I am more concerned about is that if this contract is referred to a committee which will be composed of some thirty-six members of the government and only fourteen members from other parts of the house, every man, woman and child will not know the facts. The Prime Minister knows he need have no fear, because before this discussion is over every man, woman and child in this country will know the facts and will be able to judge for themselves whether this contract is good or bad.

There is no need to refer this contract to any committee. It is bad. Anyone reading the report and studying it knows it is bad. It should be cancelled. Any man of the ability of the Prime Minister knows it is bad. Why refer it to the public accounts committee? Why go to the expense of a further investigation? The facts are all before us in the report. The evidence is there. Why not now cancel the contract? Is the Prime Minister not apprehensive about its being carried out? If he is, he had better cancel it. What about the cost of production? Suppose we examine for a few minutes the stock set-up of the company. I draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that 250,000 shares are issued to the John Inglis Company at $6 a share. That amounts to $1,500,000, made up as follows:

58,333 shares of treasury stock at $6	$349,998
5 shares held by various people	30
191,662 vendors' shares at $6	1,149,972

What did they pay for these 191,662 shares? They paid $100,000, or a little more than fifty-two cents a share. Some treasury stock was sold for $231,000, at between $6 and $7.50. Nevertheless Major Hahn and his associates paid only a little more than fifty-two cents. The profit on the transaction, at $6 a share, was $1,049,972. If we take into account that they had to pay $100,000 for that stock and they made that profit, it was given them for the Bren gun contract.

It has been argued that it would be very costly for the government to undertake this contract. Yet all the real cash it was proposed to carry on with was the proceeds of the treasury stock, between three and four hundred thousand dollars, plus the $100,000 cash, or about $500,000. The argument that it would be too costly for the government to carry out this contract does not hold good, because it would cost them only $500,000 plus what they have put into it, and if the government had taken the contract themselves they would have saved the $1,149,972 which these other fellows are going to get. I shall speak again about that a little later.

Did the Prime Minister instruct counsel? He said he did, according to a press report. Who employs counsel? The Prime Minister. Who should instruct counsel? The Prime Minister. He asked if it was his duty. He should not need to ask; he should know. Possibly he will appoint another commission to tell him whether he should instruct counsel. On page 50 of his report Mr. Justice Davis states:

> The question is: Were proper and sufficient steps taken in this case to discharge that responsibility? Upon the whole evidence, that is a question for the government and parliament to pass upon.

He says that is a question for the government and parliament to pass upon. That object can be attained only by full discussion without limit as to scope. The public are demanding it, and they are entitled to it. How were the individual firms or corporations selected? Were they selected as a result of a departmental investigation? I quote from page 2912 of Hansard of May 16, 1938, as follows:

> Some eighteen months ago an industrial survey was commenced under the direction of the master general of the ordnance. Speaking in round figures, I believe about 700 firms in various parts of Canada have been surveyed with reference to their potential capacity for production in any particular direction in the event of a national emergency.

That is a statement by the minister. If the Inglis company were picked out as a result of this investigation by the ordnance branch, then it is an insult to the abilities, the capacities and reputations of the 700 firms investigated. I cannot think for one minute that the ordnance branch could have been so inefficient as to place the John Inglis Company at the head of the list of 700 odd firms which had been investigated. If they did, then we certainly need a clean-up in the ordnance branch. These are days of national emergency. What is the use of investigating 700, 800 or a thousand firms and then pigeonholing the investigation? That is something I cannot understand. Perhaps that will come out in the discussion on the floor of this house. This plant was inspected in October, 1936, at the request of the deputy minister. I quote from page 22 of the report as follows:

This plant is primarily equipped for the manufacture of boilers, turbines and the working of heavy plate generally.

I ask hon. members if the Bren gun resembles a turbine or a boiler, or if heavy plate is used in its manufacture? I quote:

. . . it might be used for the manufacture of tanks or shells.

Does the Bren gun look like a tank or a shell? I do not think it does. This plant was not the best plant in Canada. What are the main requisites for the manufacture of the precision parts in a piece of mechanism like the Bren gun? They are knowledge, experience and skilled workmen. Did the Inglis company have any of these? I quote again from page 22 of the report:

This factory is at present inoperative and has not been in operation since April, 1936. There is no design staff at present employed and the total number of workmen now employed consists of three men as factory maintenance staff.

These are the workmen and this is the equipment which formed part of this fully equipped factory or factories which were controlled by Major Hahn and his group. These are the factories which were chosen to manufacture this piece of precision mechanism. The deputy minister said that they had surveyed nearly a thousand plants. I submit that that survey of a thousand plants was disregarded entirely. Why was that survey disregarded? That is something which parliament should find out. I quote a question and an answer reported on page 29 of the report as follows:

Q. But there were firms in Canada who had been doing very delicate steel operations for a great many years, were there not?

A. In my judgment it had nothing whatsoever to do with the question, because for this reason, that any company in Canada could not undertake this particular contract unless there was a greater volume of production to reduce the cost of production—and that was essentially a vital factor in the whole thing.

[Mr. D. G. Ross.]

That was the minister's judgment. He said that any company in Canada could not undertake this particular contract unless there were a greater volume of production to reduce the cost of production. It would be too expensive. How ridiculous it is to talk about the cost of producing these guns and the cost of putting up a plant! The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) certainly left in some of our minds an impression that it was going to cost some $30,000,000 or $35,000,000, or possibly $200,000,000, in his judgment. What was to happen to all the money that was to come from the promotion of the sale of this stock? Was there to be profiteering? All they paid for the 191,662 shares which they got was a little over fifty-two cents per share. What was paid for the treasury shares which were sold to the public? The public paid between $6 and $7. Did they not have in their minds that these 191,662 shares would go up in value? Do you think they were not looking for profit? Not only did they get these 191,662 shares, but as time goes on those shares might be worth $10, $15, or even $20 each. Is that making armaments for this country without profit? The minister gave his judgment with respect to the cost of production and stated that was why he did not ask other firms to do the job. How did he know what the cost of production was going to be? None of these firms had a chance to bid on the Bren gun contract. None of them was asked.

It may be said that possibly some of these firms would not go into production unless they got a big profit, but when I was home over the weekend I took the trouble to go round to several of these firms. Again I do not wish to mention names, but I was assured that if the manufacture of armaments in Canada were necessary, and if it was put up to them, they would manufacture armaments at a very small profit. They also felt that the manufacture of these armaments would be just as much for their own benefit as for the benefit of all the rest of the community. They would be willing to enter into contracts. They would get a group together to manufacture Bren guns, and they would not be paying out profits by way of stock promotion.

Mr. MANION: Of a million dollars.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): A million dollars profit by way of stock promotion! Parliament has to find out why these firms were not approached. There is a great deal in this report about why they were not approached, but I think we need to know a little more about it. The great thing to-day is that this country needs these guns. The minister himself says that they are of vital necessity to Canada. I am sure that if this contract were cancelled, there would be no difficulty at all in getting the manufacturers of this country together, telling them that there was an emergency and that guns were needed, and in having them manufacture all the guns that were needed. After all, Mr. Speaker, who is it that understands the manufacture of these things? Is it this gentleman who is a manufacturer of radios or refrigerators? What does he know about the heat-treatment of steel and alloys and precision steel down to the ten-thousandth of an inch? All he knows is no more than our young friend, Mr. Jolley, a graduate of my own university, knows, and Mr. Jolley is a good man. I know something about him, and he does know something about the manufacture of this stuff.

Canadian manufacturers are keen to manufacture all our defence requirements, and they do not want profits. They want to keep their workmen employed. We do not want profits out of armaments in this country. We do not want to make money out of blood. Our own manufacturers would do this job for you if you would only give them a chance, but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that they have never had a chance. The Department of National Defence is responsible for that. I repeat, it is the Department of National Defence that is responsible.

I wish to quote further from the report with reference to the interdepartmental committee. That committee had somewhat the same ideas that I have expressed. They would have been able to find out the same sort of thing that I found out, and I am perfectly sure that they would have found that there would be no difficulty in getting our own manufacturers to make these guns. I know they could have got a group of manufacturers together to manufacture these guns, in a government-owned factory, if you like, and these manufacturers would give all the assistance that was necessary to the government to have these guns manufactured in Canada; but as long as we are going to have patronage in the manufacture of armaments in this country we are not going to get some manufacturers to sacrifice their chances, just at their own expense.

Let me quote from page 37 of the report:

We—

That is the interdepartmental committee:

We pointed out that there was a number of very substantial subsisting companies in Canada that were manufacturing precision tools, and had experience in what we thought was this line of work. We felt that they should be consulted and given an opportunity to submit competitive tenders.

That is a pretty strong statement. I think it would take a great deal of persuasion to turn these men away from that attitude. They had evidently gone into this matter carefully, and they knew what their duty was with respect to the situation. They realized the seriousness of it. They are the highest type of men we have in Canada, and why was not their recommendation acted on? Why did somebody override them? What was the reason for their advice being disregarded? Parliament wants to know why. We do not want to take this thing into some committee, with a preponderance of government members, and be choked off, as so often happens in these committees, by technicalities being raised and things of that sort. We want a thorough discussion of the whole matter on the floor of this house, so that every man, woman and child in this country will know about these things. How can we ever expect our young men to enlist in the militia when they hear about this kind of thing; when they know this sort of thing is going on; when they know of the patronage that exists in the Department of National Defence? Look at the regiments in Toronto! How are they now? Away down below strength. How are they treated? They cannot get boots or anything at all. It is disgraceful. What an opportunity the Department of National Defence has to do something for these young fellows!

I see it is eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

CONTRACT AND SUPPLEMENTARY CORRESPONDENCE TO BE TABLED

Mr. STEWART: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence to lay on the table a copy of the Bren gun contract?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was done on June 29 of last year, but if the clerk is not seized of it I would be most happy to get a copy or two for my hon. friend.

Mr. STEWART: And would he also lay on the table any supplementary letters or otherwise with respect to changes made in the contract?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I know of none, but I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. MANION: The one my hon. friend is referring to is the change that was made after the article in Maclean's magazine.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A letter?

Mr. STEWART: I should be very glad if the minister would lay on the table a few copies of the contract and that supplementary letter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be very glad to do that to-morrow afternoon.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 7, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. FINN

NOVA SCOTIA LOBSTER FISHING INDUSTRY—ARTICLE IN HALIFAX CHRONICLE OF FEBRUARY 4

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: We are not on the orders of the day yet.

Mr. FINN: I draw your attention, sir, to citation 170:

It is the practice in the House of Commons to bring up a question of privilege after prayers, and before the house has taken up the orders of the day.

Therefore I am in order.

My question of privilege is based on an article appearing in the Halifax Chronicle of February 4, which contains reference to proceedings which took place in this house on Friday last on the debate concerning the reestablishing of the lobster fishermen in their industry. It is headed, "Premier answers Ottawa comment," and goes on to say:

For more than eight years "the overwhelming majority of those unemployed in Canada or those otherwise in unfortunate economic circumstances have declared they prefer work to doles," Premier Angus L. Macdonald of Nova Scotia said to-night.

He was commenting on a discussion in the federal house to-day on the Nova Scotia government's plan to provide a "road works project" for fishermen who lost pots and equipment in November and December gales.

Repeatedly labour unions or associations, unemployed groups, social workers and others have urged that work be provided wherever possible. In the case of the storms in November and December in Nova Scotia the Nova Scotia government has endeavoured to pursue this policy. It endeavoured to provide work instead of doles or hand-outs.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

If this can be called throwing a monkey wrench into the machinery, the government here is prepared—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Would the hon. member state his question of privilege?

Mr. FINN: The question of privilege is that the premier of Nova Scotia has absolutely misrepresented me in saying that I threw a monkey wrench into the machinery, I being in favour of the dole. Nothing of the sort. I made my position on that point very clear in the debate in this house. In a letter which I addressed to His Honour the Speaker on the moving of the adjournment of the house on February 3, 1939, I said:

The provision of the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1938, is abortive in its provisions to meet the absolute need of reestablishing the said fishermen in their industry, and to provide them with the means of earning their livelihood, and to enable them to provide the bare necessities of life for their families.

During the debate I said:

But a monkey wrench was thrown into the machinery by the premier of Nova Scotia . . .

Then the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) in the debate on my motion on February 3, said:

Since this parliament, for the last three years at least, has deemed it advisable by supplementary appropriations to grant sums of money to help reestablish needy fishermen in their occupations . . .

And he adds that these moneys have always been distributed in the provinces where there was the need.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the premier of Nova Scotia goes on further to say, and it is a direct charge against myself, that I was not in Halifax when the storm took place, and that I had not any information in reference to it; in fact his inference is that I do not know the needs of my constituency.

Mr. POULIOT: The storm took place in the house.

Mr. FINN: Well, perhaps a storm did take place when I spoke, but a tremendous gale takes place when the hon. member who has just interrupted me rises—or perhaps something more in the nature of a cyclone.

I may say for the information of the house that I was here in Ottawa for nearly four weeks in November attending to departmental matters with the various departments and again on December 8 after the December gale, conferring with the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. member has stated very well his point of privilege.

Mr. FINN: Perhaps that is your honour's opinion, but it is not mine.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the house is satisfied, so I would ask the hon. member to resume his seat.

Mr. FINN: I desire to say further that I was in Ottawa two days after the storm in December, coming here from Halifax, and that I sent the following telegram to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud)—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has made his point of privilege clear to the house and to the country, and in justice to himself I would ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. FINN: If that message will rebound from here to Nova Scotia I shall be satisfied.

Mr. CHURCH: You can never answer a newspaper; it always has the last word.

STANDING COMMITTEES

BANKING AND COMMERCE—STANDING ORDERS—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Ilsley be substituted for that of Mr. Rutherford on the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

That the name of Mr. Golding be substituted for that of Mr. Rutherford on the select standing committee on standing orders.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

INDUSTRIAL LOAN AND FINANCE CORPORATION—REFERENCE TO STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Outremont) moved:

That the private bill intituled An Act respecting Industrial Loan and Finance Corporation, filed with the clerk of the house on January 31, 1939, based on the petition read and received by the house on February 2, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for report on the filing of the said bill and for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Might I ask, just for information, whether this is a method of introducing a bill without complying with the ordinary regulations for this session—that is, accepting the bill as being in order by virtue of the fact that it was introduced in a previous session?

Mr. VIEN: No. The bill was deposited with the clerk of the house a little late, and under the rules of the house it must be referred to the standing committee on standing orders before it can be introduced in the house.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I have no objection.

Motion agreed to.

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT

CONTRACT AND SUPPLEMENTARY CORRESPONDENCE TABLED

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): I table herewith the return asked for last evening by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), containing the agreement, a copy of which he requested, and also a letter referring thereto.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR REFERENCE TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Monday, February 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacNeil:

That the agreement between the government and the John Inglis Company, of Toronto, for the manufacture of Bren machine guns, the report of the royal commission dealing with said agreement, and all related documents, evidence, vouchers and exhibits, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Manion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the debate proceeds I think this would be the appropriate time for me to render my decision on the point of order raised yesterday in regard to the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion).

The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) has moved to refer to the public accounts committee the Bren gun agreement, the report of the royal commission dealing with said agreement, and all related documents, evidence, vouchers and exhibits.

The hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) has moved as an amendment that the said agreement be cancelled.

The motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North proposes to refer the agreement to the public accounts committee. The amendment proposes to cancel it, thus defeating the purpose of the main motion.

Can the motion be amended in the manner proposed? I do not think so. In the parliamentary debates of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, 4th series, volume 146, at page 990, I find that a motion was made for the appointment of a select committee—

—to consider the agreement of the 2nd day of February, 1905, between the Postmaster General and the National Telephone Company, and to report whether it is desirable in the public interest that the agreement should become binding. (Lord Stanley.)

Mr. Kearley (Devonport) proposed as an amendment that — —having regard to the public statement of the Postmaster General, under no circumstances can any alterations be made in the agreement with the telephone company to which he has given his assent, this house fails to see the necessity for the appointment of a committee to consider it.

The deputy speaker ruled:

I may point out to the hon. gentleman that this amendment will not be in order. It is a direct negative, but he will be at liberty to make his speech.

In the light of this decision I believe that the amendment proposed by the hon. the leader of the opposition for the cancellation of the agreement destroys the object of the main motion, when an alternative proposition is not permissible, and is in the nature of an expanded negative. I must therefore rule it out of order.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Without reflecting in any way upon yourself, Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances I feel it my duty to appeal from your ruling.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) having proposed an amendment to the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) and Mr. Speaker having decided that the said amendment was out of order, Mr. Manion appeals to the house from the said decision of the speaker.

The house divided on the question: Shall the decision of the chair be sustained? And the decision of the chair was sustained on the following division:

PAIRS

(The list of pairs is furnished by the chief whips.)

Messrs:

Elliott (Middlesex West)	Brooks
Mallette	Wermenlinger
Bertrand (Prescott)	Baker

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): I was paired with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Baker). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain Mr. Speaker's decision.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, before the adjournment last evening I had said a few words about the actions of the interdepartmental committee in connection with this contract. I pointed out during the course of my remarks that the promoters of this company had paid $100,000 for 191,662 shares of vendors' stock. This stock had a value of $6 per share, or $1,149,972, showing a profit of at least $1,049,972. The value of these shares had been established by the sale of treasury stock to the public at from $6 to $7.50 a share. Either the promoters made a profit of at least $1,049,972 or the public which purchased these treasury shares was gypped.

I should like to know whether these facts were brought to the attention of the interdepartmental committee when they were asked to give their opinion as to the advisability of giving this contract to Major Hahn and his associates. Did they know what profit was to be made by this promotion? Were they told that the promoters were to use not more than $500,000 in cash—the amount that was necessary to purchase the Inglis plant and provide working capital—to put this plant in production? I understand that under the contract the contractors are to receive ten per cent on all machinery which goes into the plant. The real money to be used in the production of these guns is only $500,000. I submit that if the interdepartmental committee had known that, there would have been no doubt as to their decision as to whether this contract should be awarded to Major Hahn and his associates, whether tenders should be called for, or whether the guns should be manufactured in our own arsenal. I am sure they would have decided that it was unnecessary for the government to allow a contractor a profit of $1,049,972 simply by his being awarded a contract. If they had known the small amount of money required to do this work they would have said: The government will manufacture these guns because the government can borrow money at three per cent for this purpose.

Going a little further, the interdepartmental committee were told that the British government had picked a contractor and would deal with no other firm. Now who was it that picked this contractor? The Prime Minister of this country picked him. He appointed him, by cable, to be Canada's representative. I say that the firm of John Inglis Company was forced on the British government, as shown by all the records, all the correspondence, and all the telephone conversations, code messages, and so forth, contained in the commissioner's report, and because of that the interdepartmental committee's hands were tied; for they were told that the British government would deal with no other firm.

Now let us look at the background of Major Hahn. He has an excellent war record. I do not know him personally but I hear that he is a very fine man. In the evidence it is pointed out that in 1934 the claims of the creditors of his company amounted to around $140,000. Over-expansion and the depression no doubt were the causes of the company's difficulties at that time, and that is not to his discredit. He compromised with his unsecured creditors for twenty cents on the dollar, and then sold out the assets of his company to the Rogers company, guaranteeing the payment of twenty cents on the dollar of his company's $140,000 of liabilities. The shareholders of his own company received one share in the Rogers company for ten shares of Major Hahn's company.

Again I say I have nothing against Major Hahn. I am just stating what is in the evidence. But this is the successful business man who was given carte blanche to the British war office with respect to Bren guns, and given access to all the secrets that he must have in order to make a contract with Great Britain for these guns. Again I ask, why was he picked by the British government? It is said that there may have been some delay in connection with the manufacture of these guns. It is said by some people that there may have been some detrimental factors with respect to receiving orders from the British government. I say now, Mr. Speaker, that the facts with respect to this contract, and the stock-jobbing that went on in connection with it, were bound to come to light sooner or later, and how much more it would have been to Canada's discredit to have them come to light later instead of coming to light and being settled now! Let us cancel this contract and get our credit with Great Britain straightened out. Let us start the manufacture of these guns ourselves, in our own arsenals, and make them without a profit. If we do that, I am perfectly certain that we shall get orders from Great Britain to make Bren guns for her, if we can do the job properly, and we ought to be able to do it with the brains and ability we have here.

As I said before, this is strictly a stock-jobbing promotion from start to finish, based on profits accruing from the manufacture of implements of war, and every hon. member of this house knows it. All that the promoters had to find was an old building and a pay-roll to a matter of $500,000. The government paid for the machinery, and the government could just as easily have found that $500,000 and used it for putting a government arsenal into production. That would have saved ten per cent commission, as well, on the purchase of all the machinery which was going into this plant.

What about the actual cost of production of these guns? We hear rumours from time to time about the cost of production, running all the way from $250 up to $1,500 and $1,600. I do not know how much they cost, but I do know that there are plenty of industrial experts in this country who could give us an accurate estimate of the cost of producing them. There would be no difficulty in that, and if it was pointed out to our manufacturers that these guns are vital to Canada, I do not think there is a single industrial concern in this country which would not be only too glad to offer its services with respect to cost. Furthermore I am perfectly sure there is not a single one of these firms that would not be glad to give every bit of advice it possibly could with respect to putting a factory of this kind into operation.

There is a "but" to that, a great big "but," and that is patronage. You will not get co-operation from any industry in this country so long as there is patronage in the Department of National Defence, patronage in connection with the awarding of contracts for the instruments of war—a profit of $1,049,972. The safety of our democracy is at stake. We must have no such patronage in the Department of National Defence. Democracy is founded on votes. Votes are being coerced through patronage. The Canadian taxpayer is paying for the patronage, and by that our democracy is endangered. Let us cancel the contract.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the summer I received a gift from Maclean's magazine. It was a reprint of the article published by Mr. George Drew, of notorious fame. He did not proceed in the article by means of accusations. He proceeded in the article, just the same as he did before Judge Davis, by insinuations. His article of nearly four pages contains two paragraphs referring to one of our esteemed colleagues in the House of Commons. I shall read them because at the time I was under the impression that the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) had been guilty of some kind of misdemeanour or offence against the House of Commons Act. There is nothing worse, Mr. Speaker, than to proceed by insinuation, because you do not know what the accuser means by his insinuations. If there is a direct accusation, you can answer it; but there is nothing worse than putting doubts into the minds of the people.

Here are paragraphs 12 and 13 of the conclusion of the article:

> 12. How does the government explain the fact that four of the seven directors of this enterprise are employees in the office of Plaxton and Company?
> 13. What is the position of Mr. Hugh Plaxton, M.P., in the office of Plaxton and Company, and what has it been at all times since Plaxton and Company began acting for the armament company which now has the contract?

This is the insinuation that was made by that notorious George Drew who, by the way, is a very good looking fellow—but there is no beauty contest to-day. In connection with these paragraphs 12 and 13 of the conclusion of this article we must read four paragraphs of the report made by Commissioner Davis, one of the learned judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. I was really surprised when I read that part of the report of Commissioner Davis, because it destroys entirely the whole insinuation of which George Drew himself was guilty. He was the guilty party in the matter.

Now let us give the Honourable Mr. Justice Davis an opportunity to remove all doubt concerning the integrity not only of the hon.

member for Trinity but of all members of the government and of all members of this house. At this point I must say, before reading what Mr. Justice Davis has to say, that the members of the House of Commons must be proud of the fact that they have been exonerated by a judge who is supposed to have no political affiliations and who was appointed by the Tories themselves. This is what Mr. Justice Davis has to say:

There is no evidence that any member of the senate or of the House of Commons of Canada was admitted to any share or part of the contract, or to any benefits to arise therefrom, or had been promised or given any suggestion that he was to have any share or part of the contract or was to be admitted to any share or part of the contract, or to any benefit to arise from the contract.

The evidence relating to the activities of Mr. Hugh Plaxton prior to the making of the contract has already been set out or referred to in this report, and with that exception (and excepting of course the minister presiding over the Department of National Defence) there is no evidence—

Mark you, there is no evidence.

—that any member of the senate or of the House of Commons of Canada had any connection with or took any part in the discussions or negotiations leading up to the contract.

There is no evidence that any senator or member had any connection with or took any part in the affairs of the company or in the sale of shares or securities of the company.

I think it right to say that there is no evidence (nor is there in the evidence any ground for suspicion) that the minister or the deputy minister or any officer or official of the Department of National Defence was guilty of any act of corruption or anything in the nature of corruption.

I have just this to add to the mention of the name of the deputy minister of national defence. All those who were with him at the front—and my brother was three years with him; he was wounded at Vimy when under his command—speak very highly of the integrity, the ability and the efficiency of the deputy minister of national defence, General LaFleche; and the way in which Colonel Drew proceeded against him was absolutely shameful. There are, of course, other officials of the Department of National Defence to whom I cannot pay the same compliment. General LaFleche is straightforward and honest, and he has that great quality which we do not always find among the chief officials of all departments of the government. He is loyal to his minister and he has been all the time. He has a splendid military record, but I will not insist on that.

Now here is the report. It speaks for itself; and of course if I read what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) said yesterday, Judge Davis is an honourable man. I do not know him personally, but I presume he is. I have the word of my hon. friend for it that he is. At page 641 of Hansard of yesterday the leader of the opposition made this statement:

With one of his remarks, to the effect that in appointing Mr. Justice Davis he was sure he had selected as commissioner one who would be satisfactory to the country, I am in complete accord.

In the words I have just quoted the leader of the opposition was referring to the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The hon. gentleman then goes on at page 703:

Now to deal with the report itself. When it first came out, indeed before it was made public, information was given through the press, I do not know by whom, that the report was a complete exoneration of the government as far as the Bren gun contract was concerned. To my mind that was merely propaganda. Far from this report being a complete exoneration of the government and those associated with the giving of this contract, it seems to me it is a complete condemnation of the government, as I shall prove before I finish. It is true that there was no evidence of corruption, but no one had charged corruption.

Observe, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman says that no one had charged corruption. It is true there was no evidence of corruption.

It is true that there was no evidence of corruption, but no one had charged corruption. I do not charge anything in the way of corruption now.

We do not find the assertion only in the words of Mr. Justice Davis; we find it on the lips of the leader of the opposition, and what the hon. gentleman says confirms all that I have stated, that Colonel Drew had made no direct accusation but had proceeded by way of insinuation because he could not prove his charges. The leader of the opposition repeats three times that there was no evidence of corruption. He says:

I do not charge anything in the way of corruption now. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) quoted from page 51 of the report, where Mr. Justice Davis eliminated anything in the way of any suspicion of corruption. I accept that; far be it from me to suggest anything to the contrary.

Why then do they argue if they cannot prove corruption?

But, sir, there are fifty-two pages in this report and I venture to say that on at least forty of them there is an absolute condemnation of the minister and, through him, of the government for having made this contract at all.

I have the report in my hand. This is the report submitted by Commissioner Davis. It is an edition which was printed by Mr.

Patenaude, printer to the king's most excellent majesty. I recognize it as the only report given by Commissioner Davis; I do not accept as Commissioner Davis's report the other edition which has been compiled with amendments by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. He was not a commissioner in this matter, and he has no right to put any words into the mouth of Commissioner Davis. But he does. I think it is clear what Commissioner Davis had in the back of his mind in speaking as he did at page 703. It is not expressed in the booklet, but one needs very little imagination to understand what he is pointing to. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has a quality that his immediate predecessor never had—

An hon. MEMBER: Imagination.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, no; much more than that. His illustrious predecessor was full of imagination, he had too much sail for the rudder; but the present leader of the opposition has a quality which he shares with sheiks of Arabia—he is a mind reader. I suggest to him that he read the mind of his colleagues, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), and even the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), who is sitting next to him. In the mind of my hon. friend the dean of this house he will find wisdom, but not in the minds of all the other hon. members who support him in the house.

Now, sir, you must consider two things in this discussion. You must consider in the first place this blue book, which is the report made by Commissioner Davis, and which speaks for itself; and in the second place you must consider the very same report which has been transformed into Tory propaganda by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition and all his satellites. Therefore I shall not attach much importance to the propaganda booklet. I am more interested in what my hon. friend said when he was speaking for himself than in his interpretation of the opinion given by the commissioner. In fact he did not interpret it; he made it. I would ask the Prime Minister if there was only one commissioner, Mr. Justice Davis, or if there were two, Mr. Justice Davis and the leader of the opposition; and if so, when was the leader of the opposition sworn as commissioner in this case? If he was a commissioner, why did he not present his report with that of Judge Davis? It would not be precisely a minority report; it would be a most extraordinary report, a report to the effect that Judge Davis is at the same time right and wrong. He is right when he says there is nothing dishonest; that he says under his own name. But watch the back of his head. The trouble is all there; it is the old saying, nella coda sta il veleno—in the tail the poison.

According to the Financial Post there is mounting opinion on the Bren gun contract. We have received reprints of editorials from newspapers across Canada. But it is easy to provide "mounting opinion." Once I attended a meeting, and the gentleman who had to speak had nothing to say. Pointing to his opponent he said: "Look at that gentleman! Ladies and gentlemen, you know what he has done; you yourselves have never done it, your children have never done it, but he has done it. Why did you not do it? Because you did not feel like doing it, but he felt like doing it and he should be blamed very severely for that." What had he done? Nothing. And public opinion was so much aroused against that man that he could not speak in reply. Well, that is the way Colonel Drew was speaking, before he quit. And that is the way my hon. friends on the other side of the house are speaking now.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has a strong objection on one point mostly—he will correct me if I quote him inaccurately. He said: The curse of democracy is patronage. My hon. friend is strongly against patronage. He made a strong case yesterday, a very strong case. He said, as reported at page 657 of Hansard:

> My submission is that the whole report is one of political patronage in its worst form, favouritism to one man, Major Hahn; injustice to other industrialists far more capable and fully equipped—which Major Hahn was not; deception of the Prime Minister in the letter from the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton)—

It was a kind of deception which was not dishonest, according to Commissioner Davis, but it was deceit just the same.

> —of the interdepartmental committee by the various statements made to it by officers in authority; of the British government; and of the people of Canada. Has the Prime Minister—I ask this in all sincerity—read the report completely?

Anyone who knows the Prime Minister would know that he had read the report from the first line to the last.

> Frankly it seems to me impossible that he could have read the report and not have condemned the whole deal.

There is a very good reason for that; it is that he read the report and did not see into the back of the head of Commissioner Davis.

There is another thing that is most interesting. My hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) said:

Where is the patronage?

Mr. Manion: Does the minister suggest that he does not know where the patronage is?

Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver): I defy my hon. friend to prove it. I defy my hon. friend to prove any patronage.

Why did the Minister of National Defence show so much annoyance about it? If it was patronage, patronage is not so bad after all. Patronage is the rewarding of friends who have fought for us in political campaigns. And when it is within the law there is no need to be scandalized about it. I remember that one who was guilty of patronage, who gave jobs to forty-seven or fifty-seven of his relatives, was my very dear friend the former premier of Quebec, Mr. Taschereau. Once I received a telephone call from the Minister of Justice asking me to speak at Quebec, at the Arena. It was a huge meeting, ten thousand people were there, the meeting was broadcast; it was in the midst of the provincial election campaign of 1931. Everyone I saw—I had to see the barber in the hotel, I was driven to the Arena in a taxi—was speaking about Taschereau having so many relatives employed in the provincial government. They said, "it is shameful." I said, "It is pretty bad." And I went to the meeting to defend the Taschereau candidate. I said: You say Taschereau is guilty of nepotism. It is true. But others are worse. He has forty-seven or fifty-seven relatives in the employ of the provincial government. That sounds very bad; but I know of one who was actually prime minister of Canada and who gave his brother-in-law a job that meant more in the way of financial return than all the Taschereau family together would receive. And at the time of the appointment of Mr. Herridge my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) was supporting Mr. Bennett, together with the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart); my dear friend the dean of this house, the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White), the various members for Toronto, the whip of the Conservative party, dear Davenport and Greenwood and Vancouver. They were all supporting Mr. Bennett and they found nothing bad in that. Moreover I was just about to speak during a very important debate when Mr. Bennett in the most tragic voice, like Father Barrett of the Barretts of Wimpole Street, said, "We must adjourn. I have to go to the hospital." He was going to the hospital to see poor dear Mr. Herridge, and strangely enough the fact that Mr. Bennett went there cured Mr. Herridge immediately, so that now both gentlemen can make speeches three times a day. But Mr. Bennett had to adjourn the debate in order to go to see his brother-in-law in the hospital.

Just here I should like to refer to what Lady Beaconsfield did on one occasion. She had accompanied her husband to the House of Commons at Westminster where he was to deliver a most important speech, and on arriving there caught her finger in the door of the carriage but did not say anything because she did not want to disturb him before he made his address. But instead of quoting history let us come back to patronage. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition made a distinction between patronage at large and patronage with regard to the manufacture of munitions, and in that I think he was right. At page 658 of Hansard he said:

I can understand a certain amount of patronage in other matters, but not in munitions. I do object to one man in all this country being chosen, while other industrial people are ignored, and given a contract totalling several millions of dollars.

Well, patronage is the same thing whether it has to do with munitions or anything else, according to the argument of my hon. friend, but he says it is worse in regard to munitions. Why? It is exactly the same thing, according to his own argument. He must remember that the Union government which he supported was most extravagant in regard to munitions. May I recall to him Miss McAdam's life saver with a hole in it? It was a marvellous shield, a shovel with a hole in it, and an enormous quantity was bought by the Union government, just to encourage Sam Hughes' secretary. And the leader of the opposition knows very well that the burden that is so heavy on our shoulders to-day is the war debt. The government he supported at that time may have used one-third of that tremendous amount of money, totalling more than two billion dollars, for real war purposes; one-third was wasted, while the other third was stolen by bandits and gangsters. He knows that, but nevertheless he supported that government.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. friend but I should like to keep the record straight. I do not know anything about the matter he mentioned a moment ago, but since the hon. gentleman says so I presume it is correct, because I have great confidence in him. But I was at the front when the government was carrying on the war, and I was not supporting any government until 1918.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank my hon. friend for what he has just said, but coming back from the front in Europe he should have been in the front in Canada to fight such a rotten government.

An hon. MEMBER: You did not go across.

Mr. POULIOT: Each in turn. Now, if my memory serves me aright, in 1934 the present leader of the opposition was Minister of Railways and Canals. The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), who was also in the house at that time, spoke about patronage, and the leader of the opposition had to defend his own position. Here is what he said about patronage, and it is as sweet as milk and honey:

I admit frankly, however, generally speaking, that so far as the appointment of workers on works of my department in the city of Ottawa or elsewhere is concerned, we very frequently do accept the recommendations of the Conservative committee. What is the use of implying anything else, because everybody knows, as the Minister of Public Works has pointed out, that the same charge was made from our side of the house against the last government?

That was on February 16, 1934, and appears at page 651 of Hansard for that year. My hon. friend is like me; he is always sincere and honest, and he went on:

I say quite honestly and quite sincerely that there is no difference, generally speaking, between the system which obtains under this government and that which obtained under the previous one. Not only that, but I believe generally speaking there is a good deal to be said in defence of the practice. I do not mean to suggest that when a man is destitute he should not be given consideration; many of them are. Irrespective of a committee in this city I have on a number of occasions given positions to men who, it was represented to me, were in destitute circumstances.

I pay tribute to his good heart on those occasions, but this reminds me of the overture to a famous opera, I think it is Tannhauser. I am not sure about that, because I am not strong on music, but I remember how the voices of good and evil are heard at the same time. My hon. friend heard the voice of good that was in his own conscience and his own heart, but at the same time he was listening to the voices of those around him who were seeking patronage. Then, as he defined it at page 658 of Hansard for yesterday, patronage consists of choosing one man in this country while other industrial people are ignored, giving this man contracts totalling several millions of dollars. I will not say that he has always given contracts involving such sums, but I should like to mention here one instance out of thousands that could be mentioned. My hon. friend remembers when his leader, the lamented Mr. Bennett, gave a contract to the Foundation Company for $2,000,000 at Saint John, New Brunswick, without calling for tenders. I hope if the public accounts committee investigates the Bren gun contract it will get down to real business and investigate the awarding of that contract as well. That is one case; I could give others. Then I quote again from page 651 of Hansard for 1934:

That often occurs, I have not any doubt, in the Department of Public Works, my own department and in others. But, generally speaking—

Mark this.

—generally speaking, it is obvious that the government in power, whether it be Liberal, Conservative or even a government of my hon. friends in the corner—when, a thousand years from now, they gain power—will probably do likewise. It will naturally give consideration to its friends. I do not think any just criticism can be levelled at that.

This is for patronage. But there is something more, Mr. Speaker—something that astounded me. We have discussed—not I, but hon. members opposite—the Bren contract, without ever seeing it. That is incredible. In fact several members from both sides of the house spoke yesterday and I shall deal with them in turn afterwards. At page 695 of Hansard I see the following:

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence to lay on the table a copy of the Bren gun contract?

Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver): That was done on June 29 of last year, but if the clerk is not seized of it I would be most happy to get a copy or two for my hon. friend.

At noon to-day I phoned downstairs to get that very contract, and I was told that it had been gone for half an hour. Therefore all the hon. members who spoke on the Bren contract never read it.

Mr. MASSEY: It was tabled last year.

Mr. POULIOT: I take the word of the hon. member, but I wonder if he stayed long enough after the session to study it. And besides that, he is not a lawyer, and he has no authority to discuss the legal side of any contract—although he will.

Mr. MASSEY: Then my hon. friend has no right to discuss the engineering.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member has just made the statement that no one had read the contract. I say it is not right that all the hon. members who have spoken in the debate should be charged with not having read the contract. It was open to all of us; it was available to all.

Mr. POULIOT: It was open to all hon. members, but it was locked in that room downstairs, according to the statement I had at twelve o'clock to-day. No one got it until eleven-thirty. Who got it I do not know. But perhaps they are mind readers and can read a contract that is in a steel locker.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, as one who spoke, and as one who is concerned with this thing, I had access to the document some days ago and took my quotations from it. I think it is unfair for the hon. member to cast aspersions on hon. members who have spoken.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) knows very well that I would not cast aspersions upon him. I take what he says. If he did that, and if the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), who has just risen in his seat, has read the contract, then they are the only two who have.

Mr. MASSEY: Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. POULIOT: Now, leaving aside the legal side of the contract—

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Speaker, I demand that the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) withdraw that remark. I have read the contract.

Mr. MacNEIL: I wish to inform the hon. member that I obtained from the clerk of sessional papers a copy of the contract, which is still in my possession.

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friends have the contract, so much the better for them. But I regret to say that they have not understood a word of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEWART: And you laugh at that.

Mr. POULIOT: There is another point to consider in this matter—

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Speaker, no hon. member of the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MASSEY: —can make an insinuation about me—

An hon. MEMBER: He did not insinuate.

Mr. MASSEY: —nor can he make a direct statement involving me which is not in accordance with the facts, without withdrawing it; and I demand a withdrawal of the statement of the hon. member for Temiscouata that I have not read the report.

Mr. POULIOT: I submit I have not anything to withdraw. The house has to decide, from the hon. member's speech, whether or not he understood it.

Mr. MASSEY: On a point of order—

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Greenwood has the floor.

Mr. MASSEY: The hon. member has made a statement which I demand he withdraw.

An hon. MEMBER: What?

Mr. MASSEY: That I have not read the contract.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He has withdrawn it.

Mr. MASSEY: Understanding has not anything to do with it; that is a matter of opinion. It was the first thing—

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, if I am allowed by the house to give an expression of my views, may I say that most hon. members confuse points of order and questions of privilege. A point of order may be well taken when an hon. member uses language which is unparliamentary, and therefore an hon. member may have to withdraw any unparliamentary language. But an hon. member need not withdraw to please another hon. member. The hon. member for Greenwood is a member of the house, as I am. I state something and he denies it. The statement is there; that is enough. I did not use unparliamentary language.

Mr. MASSEY: A minute ago the hon. member for Temiscouata referred to the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre and Vancouver North, saying that these two hon. gentlemen were the only ones who spoke yesterday who had read the contract. I demand that that statement be withdrawn.

Mr. POULIOT: And I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to tell the hon. member to keep the peace.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I think the hon. member, who is an old parliamentarian, knows he must accept the statement of the hon. member.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He has.

Mr. MANION: When the hon. member for Greenwood made the statement that he had read the contract, the hon. member for Temiscouata said he had not. In fact, he says none of us had. The hon. member for Greenwood says he did, and I think the hon. member for Temiscouata should accept that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He accepted it.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Greenwood reminds me of the country lawyer who was arguing a case before a judge. After he had won his case, the judge said, "Why do you argue any more?" "Oh," he said, "I have a fine speech, to please my client."

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to accept the statement—in fact I am prepared to thank the hon. member for Temiscouata for insinuating that I have already won my case.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. POULIOT: This is childish. We will continue, and talk seriously.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He has been interrupted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time! Time!

Mr. POULIOT: By leave of the house, may I finish?

Mr. MANION: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What about interruptions?

Mr. MANION: We were not given leave yesterday. The hon. member for Greenwood was not given leave yesterday.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He should not interrupt, then.

Mr. MANION: When a misconstruction of fact is made, he has a right to interrupt.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) will pardon me if I do not attempt to follow him in what he has been saying.

Mr. POULIOT: You should finish my speech.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am glad he gave members on the government side a good laugh. Some of them were looking as though they needed it pretty badly.

Mr. BRADETTE: You need a laugh once in a while yourself.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): As the seconder of the motion to refer the matter to the public accounts committee—

Mr. DUNNING: And which you voted against.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): —and as a member of the public accounts committee I wish first of all to take issue with the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) last Friday when he stated, in effect, that members who expressed themselves in this debate might possibly preclude themselves from being members of the public accounts committee.

Mr. DUNNING: He did not say that.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is in fact what it meant.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it is not.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I would like to point out that at least in the last two or three years that has not been the practice. Questions have been referred to standing committees of this house after being discussed pro and con and after hon. members have expressed very definite opinions thereon. A resolution was moved in 1936 with reference to the high price of farm machinery. It was referred to the agriculture committee despite the fact that some hon. members had expressed themselves thereon. Last year and the year before a private bill having to do with small loan companies was referred to the banking and commerce committee after very strong and violent opinions had been expressed on both sides of the house. I think it should be made clear that the committee to which this matter is to be referred is not a judicial body. It is a committee of this house set up for the purpose of investigating, in this case, a contract, and to see whether or not the public interest has been properly guaranteed and the money of the taxpayers properly spent.

Last night the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated that the members of this group had voted against increased defence estimates in 1936, 1937 and 1938, and he went on to say:

> Every one of these hon. members was against the expenditure of even the relatively small amount of money that was being proposed at that time. Then what was the position taken when we came to the house in 1937 and asked for $37,000,000? The attitude was exactly the same.

May I point out to the Minister of Agriculture that the members of this group stated then, and they have stated oftentimes since, that the reason they could not and would not vote for increased defence estimates was, first, that they wanted a statement of the government's foreign policy in connection with which these defence estimates would be used and, second, that they wanted a guarantee that the very things which have come to light as a result of this Bren gun inquiry would not occur in Canada. In my opinion the whole Bren gun inquiry is the best vindication of our consistent opposition in this house to increased defence estimates.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is why you are asking for the investigation?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I turn to the report itself. In my opinion the full intent and purport of this report has never been appreciated. When it first came out headlines appeared in many of the newspapers. For instance, the Montreal Gazette of January 14 contained these headlines:

Bren gun contract held valid; full exoneration is given Mackenzie and Lafleche.
All charges fail.
Davis report clears everyone concerned in affair.
Ottawa is gratified.

Headlines such as these are misleading. In the first place no decision was possible with reference to the actual contract itself. I refer to page 49 of the report on which the commissioner is reported as saying:

I am unable to pass upon the substance as distinct from the form of the contract.

What the house is mainly concerned with and what the public accounts committee will be concerned with is not whether the contract was technically legal but whether the substance of it was such as to safeguard the interests of the Canadian people. As the commissioner says:

That is a question upon which the government and parliament, in the light of the evidence brought before the commission, must pass.

The commissioner had no power to pass upon the substance of that contract; he could pass only upon its form. As has been pointed out by other hon. members—I am not going to quote this report to death—from pages 31 to 34 will be found argument in which counsel pointed out to the commissioner that he had no jurisdiction to find misconduct because no charge of misconduct had been laid. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was speaking the other day he referred at some length to the wide terms of the reference, and yet I find this at page 33 of the report:

At the noon adjournment the next day government counsel stated that they were afraid that there was not very much that they could contribute in a way of a concrete suggestion, because after all it is a very general and very indefinite subject, having regard to the terms of the order in council.

As was pointed out by one counsel, I believe Mr. Hellmuth, usually when a royal commission is set up there is provision for suggestions with regard to future conduct, but there were no such provisions in the terms of reference in this particular case. May I point out that the Davis commission was a fact-finding body. It was not empowered to express opinions. It was not empowered to draw conclusions or to state whether one form of policy was better than another possible alternate form. What the commissioner did was to gather data, assuming throughout that the conclusions to be drawn would be drawn by parliament and by the people of Canada. There are many references to this. For instance, Mr. McRuer is reported on page 32 as having stated to the commissioner:

That is for the House of Commons. You are asked to report the facts, you are asked to report the evidence, and the opinions to be formed will be for the House of Commons, for the people at large, and for the press.

On page 35 I find the same thing. On page 50 I find these words:

The question is: Were proper and sufficient steps taken in this case to discharge that responsibility? Upon the whole evidence, that is a question for the government and parliament to pass upon.

I submit that the statement made when this report was first published that it was a whitewash, that it exonerated everybody, was not well founded. The commissioner did what he was supposed to do. He gathered the data and he left it to this parliament, to this government and to the people of Canada to arrive at conclusions based upon the data which he had collected and verified. He assumed throughout that he was gathering the data so that someone else could formulate a conclusion. Nowhere did he attempt to formulate conclusions with reference to policy and the safeguarding of the interests of the people of Canada.

The Prime Minister said the other day that there might be some people who would think the government was right in refusing a second investigation. I am sure that those who were responsible for moving this motion had no idea of a second investigation being held—not at all. The facts have been collected. Yesterday the leader of the opposition said that there was no value in threshing over old straw and calling witnesses again. Nothing was farther from our minds. The data are there; I believe there are some thirty-four volumes of evidence. The material is at hand, but at the present time there is no one empowered to draw conclusions or pass opinions on it. That is why we are asking that the matter be referred to the public accounts committee. We believe that in such a committee conclusions may be drawn and opinions expressed as to whether or not the public interests of the people of Canada have been properly safeguarded.

Referring to certain speakers who had preceded him, the Minister of Agriculture made this statement, to be found at page 679 of Hansard:

They have left inferences with regard to what the contract may have in it; but I repeat that no one has risen in his place and told us what the terms of the contract to which they take such serious objection are.

I propose to deal with only one phase of this contract—although there are many others to which we take serious objection—namely that the giving of this contract was a departure from declared policy in two particulars. I shall deal with them in order.

First, why was there a departure from the declared government policy of manufacturing munitions in government-owned plants? Hon. members will remember that the report points out on page 5 that the original agreement between the Dominion of Canada and the patentee provided that —such manufacture shall be in a factory operated by the government in question.

That was not done. Why was it not done? It is part of government policy, because on page 10 of the report the Minister of National Defence makes that perfectly clear. I quote:

Under examination by Mr. Hellmuth the Minister of National Defence said that he had stated in the House of Commons last year (1937) that he believed in public ownership, personally, through and through in regard to armaments; "and I still say so." Mr. Hellmuth proceeded with some questions—

The answers to which I shall not bother reading, but will summarize by saying that in them the minister reiterates the view that he is in favour of the manufacture of munitions and guns in government plants.

The minister gives two reasons why there was a departure from this policy, and again I quote from page 10:

Q. So that there will be no inducement for people to make money out of necessities which arise from war?

A. Mr. Hellmuth, as a matter of an ideal objective, I completely agree with you; but you should read carefully the recommendations made by a distinguished committee to us early in 1937, in regard to ways of dealing with practical necessities of the Department of National Defence.

And the minister goes on to say:

You should read that.

That was the first reason given by the minister. I should like to refer the members to that report made to the minister in 1937. I have here a summary of it as it appears on page 2288 of the evidence. It was a committee that was set up under the chairmanship of Doctor Skelton. It was an interdepartmental committee, but we will call it the Skelton committee in order not to confuse it with another—the other—interdepartmental committee that was set up later on. The minutes of this committee were read into the records of the commission. They begin by saying that in 1937 a resolution had appeared on the order paper of the House of Commons—the resolution happened to be my own—calling for, in the event of war, the conscription of the economic, transportation and natural resources of Canada for the duration of the war. In the minutes the committee go on to say that there is a growing opinion in Canada that steps should be taken to take the profits out of war and out of preparation for war, and in view of that the committee made a number of concrete proposals. I shall not give them all, but I should like to read one or two.

Proposal No. 6 was this:

One proposal . . . to place manufacture of arms entirely in hands of state . . . the committee is unable to support such a proposal as being practicable under present conditions in Canada but there might be a case for some moderate extension of present government arsenals.

Then proposal No. 7:

The committee considered whether new legislation to control private profits might be attempted at this juncture, but they feel unable to suggest any specific legislative measures . . . which could be regarded as workable or effective.

In proposal No. 8 they say that the problem is an administrative one and that:

Control of profits and prevention of excesses can be most efficiently provided by appropriate administrative practice on the part of departments responsible for placing contracts and orders in defence program.

In proposal No. 9 they say that there is no hard and fast rule; that sound financial principles are proper safeguards. In proposal No. 13 are given a number of suggestions which Mr. Elliott, the income tax commissioner, had been asked to draw up, based on the experience that had been gathered during the last war. Mr. Elliott made a number of suggestions and submitted a report, and I just want to draw the attention of the house to one or two of his suggestions. One was that there should be caution to see that "share capital be not inflated by goodwill and other intangible values—that is, make certain that the value behind the share is cash or an asset having real value and paid for in cash or kind of equivalent value." He suggested also that there should be caution as regards salaries paid to executives and shareholders. Certainly these last two suggestions of Mr. Elliott have not been very closely followed.

I come back now to the minister's reasons. The minister says that his first reason for departing from declared government policy was the report of this committee. But this committee said that there might be room "for a moderate extension of government-owned arsenals." That was not done. Why was it not done?

The minister moves on to his second reason. He says that there were two schools of opinion in the department. He says that the chief of the general staff, General Ashton, and the former chief of the general staff, General McNaughton, had both been in favour of the manufacture of arms in government-owned arsenals, but there was another school of thought in the department that was headed by the deputy minister of national defence, which was opposed to the other. I want to quote just one sentence from a letter of the deputy minister of national defence to the under-secretary of state for external affairs. He says:

> An arrangement by which the government would take over such a plant and operate the same with its own employees as if it was a government-owned plant does not particularly commend itself to the government.

Here you have in the department two points of view. You have an interdepartmental committee saying that the government-owned plant could extend on a moderate scale, and two high officers of the department, General Ashton and General McNaughton, both favouring that, and the minister pledged to it so far as his declared policy in this house is concerned; and you have the deputy minister opposed to it.

But the minister says the main reason was that they did not have any money. I read now from the bottom of page 10 of the report:

> The minister said that General Ashton (the then chief of the general staff) was very insistent upon the development of government arsenals, and that the former chief of general staff, General McNaughton, evolved a very comprehensive scheme for Valcartier, which would include practically all the requirements of the Canadian forces.

Then the report goes on to quote the minister:

> That was considered after I went into the department, and I found that the cost of it would be something between $30,000,000 and $35,000,000. With my meagre $25,000,000 or $30,000,000, what could I do with a scheme like that?

Then this is what the commissioner said:

> But the testimony given before the commission established that only 60,000 square feet of space was necessary for the purpose of production of the 7,000 Bren guns for Canada as well as 5,000 guns for the war office and that an entire new building (apart from land) would cost approximately $120,000. In proposal "B" of Major Hahn (exhibit 11) of December 29, 1936, the building was shown at an estimated cost of $104,196.40.

I submit that on the minister's own evidence, both as to the report from the Skelton committee and as to the expense involved, we have not had any satisfactory explanation why the government's declared policy of manufacturing munitions and arms in government-owned plants was not carried out.

I move to the second departure from policy. Why was there a departure from the government's declared policy of competitive bidding? In the case of the Bren contract there was, first of all, favoured treatment of one manufacturer and one company. That goes almost without saying. One individual, on the basis of a letter of introduction from a member of this house, was brought into contact with the minister and the deputy minister of national defence, was given first of all snapshots of a gun supposed to be secret and allowed to take it for examination, and was later given a letter to bring him into closer contact with the British authorities. I have no quarrel with that, but when that letter of introduction was not sufficient for him to get the contacts he required he was made a representative of the Canadian government; and from that time on it is very difficult to determine when he is a private contractor seeking a contract and when he is a government representative. It is a sort of "off again on again gone again Finnegan" combination. The most amazing thing of all is that favouritism was shown to the extent that this person —I do not know him personally and I do not cast aspersions upon him; I am dealing with the government, because they are the responsible parties—who was given preferred and favoured treatment throughout, submits expense accounts for work done which in the main was being done in order to procure contracts for himself and the firm of which he was president.

At page 2200 of the evidence I find that there were vouchers of claims up to $20,000 submitted by the John Inglis Company. On October 9, 1936 there is an item of $79.95 and a charge for Major Hahn of $50. This question is put to the deputy minister:

> Q. Is this the same day on which Major Hahn called at your office and saw the Bren gun set up?
> A. Yes.

Here we have an account for a man calling at the office of the deputy minister to get an entree into the munitions business. An account was submitted! In the same evidence, under exhibit 262, there is a charge of $326.80 between March 14 and March 18, 1938, account rendered for expenses incurred while being at Ottawa to get a contract out of which he was to make a living.

I submit that any group of fair-minded people would say that this was preferred and favoured treatment. No one else in Canada in that business got treatment like that. And may I point out that there was no bidding. No one else was informed that the government intended to go into the manufacturing of Bren machine guns. I refer the house to page 29 of the report. The Minister of National Defence is being questioned by Mr. Hellmuth. I quote:

Q. There was never the slightest effort, was there, to interest or invite any of these firms to tender, or to make an offer to manufacture the Bren gun?

A. No, I do not think there was.

No one was informed; and yet we find on page 8 this question put by Mr. Hellmuth:

Q. You did not give anybody else a chance?
A. Nobody asked for it.

Well, no one could ask for a chance when no one knew that the government had in mind the manufacture of these guns, according to the minister's own statement. I wonder if the minister honestly meant a statement like that, that nobody had asked for a chance. Are we to assume that from now on all companies in Canada who have facilities for manufacturing munitions are to come once a month or once a week or every day, up to this house and to ask, "Are you manufacturing Bren guns to-day?" Is it to be a sort of Fuller brush pedlar idea? Nobody asked for it! They could not ask when the government had not announced their intention of manufacturing these guns.

It is sometimes said that no one else could make these guns. That was said so often that finally the commissioner began to lose his patience, and on page 1949 of the evidence he said. "Don't be talking to me about one source of supply. I do not want to hear it again. It is ridiculous." Of course it was ridiculous.

I might point out that the objections I am stating to the fact that there was no bidding did not come only from outside the government. There were serious objections among the officials comprising the interdepartmental committee set up by the Prime Minister to investigate the matter. I refer now to the evidence at page 1948. This is from the minutes of the interdepartmental committee set up to act in conjunction with the department of National Defence in giving munitions contracts, and this is what the deputy minister of finance had to say. I am quoting from page 1948:

Doctor Clark then stated that his only objection to entering into a contract with the John Inglis Company was the fact that competitive tendering had not been entered into by three or four other companies capable of manufacturing guns, explaining that he could not, as a member of the committee, take responsibility for the way in which this particular company was selected.

That is pretty strong language. The deputy minister of finance, Doctor Clark, one of the ablest economists in Canada, said that he could not take responsibility for the manner in which this business was being handled because there was no competitive bidding. Now I submit that the government have a right to tell us, and to tell the public accounts committee, why no tenders were called for. We have a right to know whether the situation was carefully canvassed with reference to all outside manufacturers of munitions, in order to ensure that the taxpayers were getting full value for their money. We have a right to know why an objection made by perhaps the ablest business man on the interdepartmental committee was overruled and ignored. We have a right to that knowledge.

I wish to call the attention of the house to this fact, with reference to the officials concerned on the interdepartmental committee, that on two scores their desires and their opinions were either ignored or overruled. As I have said, the committee is on record as in favour of a somewhat moderate extension of the present government arsenals. I refer the house to page 2288. General McNaughton and General Ashton were in favour of it. The government is on record in this house as being in favour of it, and the only person on record as not in favour of the manufacturing of guns in government plants is the deputy minister of national defence. And yet, in spite of that, there was no attempt to carry out the declared policy of manufacturing in government-owned plants.

The officials on the interdepartmental committee were in favour of competitive bidding. They could see no reason why the Inglis company should receive preferred treatment. I quote from page 37 of the report, where there is a reference to the testimony of Mr. Elliott:

Mr. Elliott, in giving his testimony, said that after the chairman (the deputy minister) had opened the meeting with a general statement indicating the purposes for which the meeting was called the committee began to take an active part in the sense of asking questions, and getting to grips with the problem. In so doing the committee indicated that competitive bids should be one of the main considerations, and one of the first considerations.

And the deputy minister explained that this could not be done. Why? Again I quote Mr. Elliott, page 39. He said that——in discussing the financial status of the company, the history of the John Inglis Company was adequately disclosed to the chairman—

That is the deputy minister.

—namely, the essential point being that it was known that it had been in receivership.

Mr. Elliott continued:

> The chairman indicated that he had an understanding—exactly how it was acquired I do not know—from England, that they would not deal with any other firm.

Pressed as to exactly what was said, Mr. Elliott put it this way:

> I said as a statement of fact that the chairman stated to us that he believed, or he was of the opinion, whichever way you wish to put it—he believed that England would not place the contract with any other company in Canada.

That was a serious statement. The interdepartmental committee were apparently not very well satisfied.

Mr. Elliott said that the suggestion was then made that a cable be sent to England to ascertain definitely England's position in respect of competitive bids.

> The chairman pointed out that to ask such a question at this juncture might endanger the placing of the British order, and endanger thereby the loss which he obviously was anxious to save Canada in the cost of the machinery and equipment. The committee nevertheless did not take such notice of that opinion as to withdraw their desire to have the cable sent. They were willing to risk the danger. The form of the cable was then drafted.

The deputy minister (but not without the subsequent approval of the committee) amended their draft cable before it was sent (exhibit 188). Moreover, the deputy minister sent a very long cable himself at the same time to the war office.

In order to keep the record straight I want to say something about these cables. I have copies of them here. I have the cable that was sent by the interdepartmental committee after it had been altered by the deputy minister, of course with the sanction and approval of the committee. It is found at page 1578 of the evidence. It is as follows:

> Kindly advise by cable production cost in England of Bren light machine gun specifying which major cost factors have been taken into account and given percentage of each cost factor to the whole. Also the production schedule to which the figures apply. If exact figures are not available close approximation would be much appreciated. This suggestion on agenda discussed to-day by interdepartmental committee when advisability of obtaining tenders on cost plus basis from limited number of selected companies including John Inglis Company was considered. It is private and not public tender that is intended. The committee would like to know if this would affect the placing of your order in Canada realizing the probable delay incurred thereby. This information is for confidential use . . . interdepartmental committee which is working on proposed contract.

I would draw the attention of the house to the words that were inserted at the instance of the deputy minister of national defence: "from limited number of selected companies including John Inglis Company"; also: "It is private and not public tender that is intended."

I have here the reply of the war office and also the private cable sent by the deputy minister of national defence to the war office to explain the one that had been sent by the interdepartmental committee. And I have the reply that came back to the deputy minister from the war office. My time is getting short, so perhaps I cannot read it, but after very carefully reading these cables from beginning to end I defy any hon. member to find any indication that the war office stated at any time that they were not willing to deal with any company other than the John Inglis Company.

On the basis of that statement and of his insistence the deputy minister either ignored or overruled the two wishes expressed by the interdepartmental committee; one for a moderate extension of government-owned arsenals, and the other for the principle of competitive bidding.

What was done about this other statement of Doctor Clark? I quote from page 1949 of the evidence:

The Chairman—

That is, the deputy minister.

—reminded the members that on a previous occasion the precise question came up as to whose responsibility it was for picking a likely firm to manufacture the gun, and at that time, some six months ago, he told the committee that his department would have to take the responsibility.

At page 1952, in reference to Doctor Clark, the minutes say:

> He stated that he wished it understood by the public and the government that the committee had reviewed the financial aspects of contracts such as this, and considered them fair and reasonable—

I am quoting now the statement of Doctor Clark.

—but in this contract he stated that he would not say that they are.

And what happened? The chairman, that is the deputy minister of national defence—then explained that the wording of the report to council was not such as to involve the members of the committee in matters of choice. . . .

What was this committe set up for? When they had finally come to certain conclusions and the deputy minister of finance said he would not accept responsibility for this method of selection, that he did not think it a good business arrangement, the deputy minister of national defence overruled him and said that his department would have to accept the responsibility and that the members of the interdepartmental committee had no power of choice. What power had they?

One thing more. Was any report ever made by this interdepartmental committee to the government? I have here in the evidence the statement made by the Minister of National Defence himself, as found at page 2364, where he says:

The only report I ever received was from the deputy minister who was chairman of the interdepartmental committee.

And that was a verbal report. He never had a brief from the committee. That interdepartmental committee was set up by the government to safeguard the interests of the people of Canada. Did the Prime Minister ever get a report? Did the Minister of Finance ever get a report? No. But his deputy minister had objected to this contract as an unbusinesslike arrangement. Did other members of the cabinet know that perhaps the finest financial mind among the government's officials objected to this method of selecting the company? Of course they did not. I doubt if the Minister of National Defence himself knew it; all he knew about was the verbal report given to him by the chairman of the committee, the deputy minister of national defence, who throughout the sittings of this committee had ignored and overruled the opinions expressed by members of that committee.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I have to inform him that his time has expired.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): We are discussing a motion by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) to refer what is known as the Bren gun agreement to the standing committee on public accounts. It will be noticed that no instructions are included in this motion. I propose, before I take my seat, to suggest an amendment which I hope will be acceptable to the house. What I shall say this afternoon will be uttered in as dispassionate a manner as possible. I should like to discuss the question frankly and in a way to appeal to the good judgment of the government themselves and hon. members of the house. Obviously I cannot cover all the ground, or any very large portion of it, in the time available to me; so I am not contending that my argument to-day will be a complete argument of the case. I should like to base what I have to say upon a paragraph which will be found on page 50 of the report of the royal commission on the Bren gun contract, and which has already been referred to by a number of speakers. There, referring to the question whether an article should be manufactured by the government or by private interests, the learned judge says:

. . . the heaviest sort of responsibility falls upon those charged with the duty of selecting the individual, firm or corporation to manufacture the article. The question is: Were proper and sufficient steps taken in this case to discharge that responsibility? Upon the whole evidence, that is a question for the government and parliament to pass upon.

As far as I am concerned as a member of this house I accept my own responsibility to review this situation, as advised or suggested by the learned judge who presided over that commission.

Before discussing the contract, which I propose to do, I should like to make a brief reference to the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), that in submitting the reference to Mr. Justice Davis, the commissioner, he enclosed in his letter a press release; and the right hon. gentleman suggested, as I certainly inferred, that he thought this was quite sufficient. I am not quarreling with him in that regard, Mr. Speaker, but another press release was given out from the Prime Minister's office at the conclusion of the inquiry. That second release was sent throughout the length and breadth of Canada; the general headline based upon the wording of that release was the term "exoneration," with the inference that everything connected with the Bren gun contract had been satisfactorily explained to the commissioner.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that my hon. friend is entirely wrong. There was no press release sent out from my office at the end of the inquiry. I want to make that emphatically clear; there was nothing authorized, directly or indirectly. The only statement that went from my office was that the report was in my hands and that no one had seen it.

Mr. STEVENS: I accept the right hon. gentleman's word unreservedly, but in justice to myself I must say I was told that the dispatch carried by the Canadian Press was handed to them by the private secretary of the Prime Minister. I may be wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is absolutely wrong.

Mr. STEVENS: I accept the Prime Minister's statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can assure my hon. friend and the house that no statement was given by me or any of my secretaries.

Mr. STEVENS: It would be interesting, I think, to know where that statement came from. It came from some source associated with the government. The question, however, I was going to ask was: When that latter release to the press was given out, wherever it came from, was it first submitted to the learned judge who presided over this commission, in regard to its accuracy or its harmony with his findings? I doubt whether it was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend too often—

Mr. STEVENS: I have accepted my right hon. friend's explanation without reserve.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point I want to bring out is this: For myself I could never see that there was any authority for that statement from any source. Such reports as appeared seemed to me to be something that some member of the press itself had sent out, without authority from any source.

Mr. STEVENS: I shall check the source of my information, but of course in the meantime I accept the right hon. gentleman's word on the matter without reserve.

Conditions in Canada in regard to defence have been represented as serious, and this year we are asked to vote $63,000,000 for the purpose of defence. What we are doing in this contract is initiating a practice. We are laying the foundation of a practice to be followed in the expenditure of this huge sum of money. If this contract and its method, style, form and nature are now approved and accepted, then we can take it that in the expenditure of that part of this $63,000,000 which goes to this class of work, the same sort of policy will be followed. Therefore in my opinion it is extremely important that we, the houses of parliament, should be satisfied with the basis on which we are now entering upon a huge expenditure which may be followed in subsequent years by still further expenditures, since this is a ten year contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. STEVENS: I am coming to that, if my hon. friend will permit me. If that be so, it means that in future years we are going to follow the same practice we are here following. I mention that merely because it emphasizes the importance of this contract.

There are three ways in which we could approach this great, serious task, which on several occasions the right hon. Prime Minister has indicated he considers a very onerous and grave responsibility. There is government production; there is contract by tender, or there is the cost-plus basis with a selected contractor. These are three methods; there may be others that modify them to a certain extent. I want to get to the contract itself; so I am not going to take time just now to argue as to the advisability of public production. Let us assume that we are going to accept the principle of production by private concerns. In that case I submit, and if time permitted I think I could demonstrate fully, that it would be infinitely preferable to place this or similar orders with a number of firms qualified to do the work.

Let me just indicate briefly, by way of illustration, what I mean. I am not a technician, so I may speak rather recklessly in this regard; but I understand that in a gun of this kind there is the tripod, or whatever the thing rests upon; there is the rough frame of the gun, what might be called the stock, and then there is the barrel, which is a comparatively simple article to manufacture. Then somewhere in that gun, as in all weapons of this kind, there are some intricate parts which must be manufactured. There would be no difficulty in giving to certain firms orders for barrels and to other firms orders for tripods or frames. These are simple articles. Of course they must be made right, but there are scores of firms who could manufacture that sort of thing. Then you come to the intricate part, which I am told calls for perhaps fifty, seventy-five or one hundred gauges, the most delicate instruments it is possible to procure. I am told that in some forms of production over a hundred, and perhaps two hundred, gauges may be required for different parts which are of an exceedingly delicate nature.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): More than that; three hundred and ten, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. STEVENS: In any case my hon. friend will agree that it is an extremely delicate process. Great care should be taken, in dealing with this part of the work, to select a firm that not only is organized to-day to do this class of work but also has a staff accustomed to it, such as superintendents, foremen of machine shops or portions of machine shops and experts of that kind, of course over and above the experts who understand the complete article. I submit that we might have borrowed from the old country—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have; three of them.

Mr. STEVENS: Very good—experts who would advise with those who are competent to carry on this work. But my point is that, with the utmost respect and consideration for the group who secured this contract, it cannot be argued for one moment that they had any organization. They had no organization, whereas on the other hand we might have gone to one of a dozen firms in this country whom I could name, who are engaged in precision tool work of some kind, who have the experts, who, under the leadership of the ordnance experts brought from the old country, could have taken up this matter very quickly and readily, and who have the organization and the nuclei at least of a plant for the purpose.

It is said that this is a good contract. Well, I have read over the contract, and I think it is a good contract—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: —for the contractor.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

An hon. MEMBER: Too soon.

Mr. STEVENS: And I will point out why. In making that statement I am not casting any reflection upon the contractor. His business was through his solicitors, and it is common knowledge that a man will get the best contract he can. I have read the contract with care, and I believe it is an excellently drawn contract, for the contractor. In some respects of course it protects the interests of the government. That we would expect. But I believe I shall show, before I take my seat, that there are provisions in the contract which are at least questionable—I shall just put it in that way.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who spoke yesterday on behalf of the government, suggested that nothing had been said against this contract by Colonel Drew; that nothing had been said against it before the commission by any witness—in brief that nothing had been said against the contract. I shall suggest a few things—and the minister invited us to make suggestions—which I think should make us pause before we sanction or place the approval of parliament on the Bren contract.

In the first place it is a contract giving a licence for ten years. The contract states:

> The terms of this licence shall be for a period of ten years from the date hereof.

And then it says that the terms of this licence may be renewed or extended for a further period of ten years. It may be argued that the licence is not an exclusive licence—and, by the terms of the contract, that is true. But it would be hard to persuade me, when I read the whole contract, that it is not intended to be what is virtually an exclusive licence. Or, I will go farther: If under the terms of the contract the government, as they are bound to do, supply all the machinery for the production of the gun—and those are virtually the terms of the contract—how on earth could anyone else get into the game, after the manufacturing gets under way? How could that be done, unless the government repeats, with a second licencee, the same thing they did for the original licencee? So, whether or not the licence is exclusive in its terms, it is exclusive in its nature, and in the facts surrounding it. That is my first objection.

My second objection lies in the following:

> The party of the second part—

That is the company; really it is Major Hahn.

> —undertakes and agrees with the party of the first part to manufacture 7,000 of the said Bren gun, as defined in schedule 1.

And then it says:

> There will be installed in the buildings made available by the party of the second part the machinery, tools, dies, jigs and gauges necessary for the manufacture of the said Bren gun, in accordance with exhibit A attached and forming part of these presents, it being expressly agreed that the machinery therein mentioned when so installed shall be capable—

Mark these words:

> —of being utilized to produce Enfield rifles, pistols and other small arms as well as parts and components thereof.

Obviously the contract contemplates its extension to include the manufacture of articles other than Bren guns, or that language would not be in there.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not necessarily.

Mr. STEVENS: Again I agree with the minister. But with an exclusive contract financed by the government of Canada and with machinery supplied by the government of Canada—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And Great Britain.

Mr. STEVENS: —surely it is not going to be suggested that in connection with a company equipped, as they say it must be—it is obligatory on the contractor—to manufacture Enfield rifles and pistols, no one contemplates giving them that work to do. Is the government going to set up another manufacturer, in the same way? Not at all. The minister knows that once the contract was running smoothly—and it would have been, had we not interfered—there would have been an extension of the contract to these other lines.

I may say it was the talk around Ottawa last May and June that this firm was on the way to being a real munitions producer and was going to get other work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On a point of order, the minister knows nothing of the kind. There have been no obligations, nor has there been any permission of any kind whatsoever given, with reference to this firm, in regard to any other contract.

Mr. STEVENS: Delete that clause from the contract, then; it is not necessary. Let us delete it. I object to the contract because that clause appears in it.

Then the next point:

As compensation for the said machinery, tools, dies, jigs, gauges—

And so on.

—the party of the first part shall pay to the party of the second part an amount computed on a basis of two-thirds of that set out hereunder, of which the said two-thirds shall be payable by the said party of the first part in the manner hereunder set forth—

This point has already been dealt with by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas).

1. A sum not exceeding $20,000, in respect of actual cost of preliminary investigation. . . .

I object to that, and I will point out why. There is not a manufacturing concern in Canada which does not at times come to Ottawa. It is open to any manufacturing concern in Canada to come to Ottawa, as they do by dozens, always paying their own expenses. They consider such expenses out-of-pocket, day-to-day expenditures incidental to business. It is absurd for the taxpayers of this country to be asked to pay $20,000 for "planning and engineering" services, entirely apart from the contract. That is important, and is another of my objections.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Did the hon. member read the evidence in regard to that?

Mr. STEVENS: I have read the evidence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What was it?

Mr. STEVENS: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have only forty minutes in which to speak.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am sorry.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not mind being interrupted, but I do wish to do the job the Minister of Agriculture, or some other member, invited me to do. I have read the evidence. But I say I object to that provision, because I think it is unreasonable. I think it is unfair to the government. It is something which is not done commonly in connection with business of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It has not been done.

Mr. STEVENS: No, I would not be surprised if this sum were not paid; and I would say the minister should be commended if, after this exposure of the matter, it should not now be paid.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The suggestion never came from me.

Mr. STEVENS: It is in the contract, and I am bound by—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The suggestion never came from the Canadian government, either.

Mr. STEVENS: There are in the contract many things which I certainly hope were not suggested by the Canadian government.

But let us go on.

2. The actual cost to the party of the second part of such machinery, tools, dies, jigs and gauges as it procures from outside sources.

I am not taking great objections to that, so long as the principle I have indicated is adopted. Then:

The actual cost—

And I am reading this for a purpose.

—to the party of the second part of such machinery, tools, dies, jigs and gauges as it manufactures.

And then comes this:

Such other costs, as are set out in section 5 of this agreement, as are properly chargeable under this contract in the fulfilment by the party of the second part of its obligations up to date of commencement of manufacture of the Bren gun.

That is one of those omnibus clauses which allow a contractor to work in what we commonly call, in government contracts, overages.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not necessarily.

Mr. STEVENS: Incidentals. It is a covering clause and I object to it. The next clause, however, is illuminating. It reads:

Ten percentum of the actual cost of tools, dies, jigs, and gauges purchased by the party of the first part or the party of the second part; ten percentum of the actual cost to the party of the second part in respect of such tools, dies, jigs, and gauges manufactured by it as mentioned in paragraph three of this section; ten percentum of such costs as are mentioned in paragraph four of this section.

Paragraph four is the one to which I have just referred, under which obligations up to the date of commencement of manufacture, not mentioned under the $20,000 clause, are covered. They are to get ten per cent of that as well.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is the British practice.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not care whether it is the British practice or not; I object to it. Here is another point to which I object:

The party of the first part shall also pay the cost of such conversion of the plant of the party of the second part as is in the opinion of the party of the first part necessary or advisable in making the said plant suitable for the carrying out of the terms of this contract but no such cost shall be repaid to the party of the second part, except such as has been given prior approval by the party of the first part.

It may be argued quite properly that this is a fair clause, but my point is that it was represented that this firm or this group of individuals had a number of plants equipped for this purpose. It was stated in 1936 that there were a number of plants equipped for this purpose, but here in 1938 we are agreeing under a contract to pay all the costs of equipping and converting this plant. I should like to quote from a letter of October 20, 1936, from the deputy minister of national defence to the under secretary of state for external affairs. This letter appears on page 20 of this report, and I quote as follows:

—and representing a reliable group which controls certain manufacturing plants—

Plural.

—capable of manufacturing armaments and munitions located in a large industrial centre.

By no stretch of the imagination can it be said that this plant was capable of manufacturing munitions.

Mr. GARDINER: Did they not do it during the last war?

Mr. STEVENS: The minister asks, did we do it in the last war?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. GARDINER: No, this plant.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the hon. member know anything of its record?

Mr. STEVENS: I know the record of the plant and I knew the late Mr. Inglis quite well. It is a splendid company, but it is not equipped for the manufacture of munitions of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why not? Does my hon. friend know anything of the record of this company during the late war?

Mr. STEVENS: They manufactured shells and other kinds of munitions, but they did not manufacture this gun.

Mr. GARDINER: What the hon. member has just read does not mention the Bren gun; it refers only to the manufacture of munitions and armaments.

Mr. STEVENS: The people of Canada are to pay the total cost of converting this plant into a munitions plant. I pointed out further that the group which got this contract represented that they had a plant suitable for the manufacture of munitions. The next point to which I object is this:

The party of the first part shall pay the cost of dismantling and moving the same as well as the cost of replacing in its original condition, subject to reasonable wear and tear, such property of the party of the second part as has been originally moved or shifted by reason of the installation in the plant of the party of the second part.

That may be considered a normal clause to have in a contract provided you accept the principle that you are going to take a plant not suitable for manufacturing munitions and convert it at public expense into one suitable for that purpose. If you accept that position then you must accept the position of replacing it in its original condition if the contract is cancelled. But I object to that particular part of the contract. Reference is made to the price of the said Bren gun and spare parts thereof as ordered by the party of the first part, but I cannot cover all this long list. I shall, however, cover a few to which I take exception. One clause reads:

(a) The sum of all costs, as hereinafter defined, properly incurred in connection with the manufacture of the said Bren gun and spare or component parts thereof.

Then the contract enumerates certain exemptions such as sales tax, royalties, licensing fees and, mark you, interest on bank loans. That is covered by paragraph four of subsection (a) of section four. Then on page ten of the contract we find a clause dealing with interest on bank loans which reads:

Interest on bank loans raised by the party of the second part for the purpose of providing any additional plant which may be required and approved by the party of the first part.

First, it exempts interest on bank loans, and then this clause is included. I object to the apparent contradiction, not to say deception, in those two clauses. Then it goes on:

It being expressly agreed that the total amount payable under this clause and under section 3 (e) (5) of this contract shall not exceed the sum of two hundred and sixty-seven thousand dollars ($267,000) in respect of seven thousand (7,000) guns as defined in schedule 1 attached hereto.

It has been emphasized over and over again that a limitation is placed upon the profits of this company, that limit being put strictly at $267,000. The house will notice a qualifying phrase in section 3 (e) (5). In other words, it exempts from this limitation that section to which I have already referred, namely, section 3 (g) which deals with the cost of dismantling and depreciation, which are exempted. The limitation does not protect the country against additional expenditures in connection with those operations. Here again I object to the form of the contract.

I turn now to later clauses in the contract dealing with depreciation in the value of the buildings. The contract states:

The annual rates of depreciation to be allowed shall be 2½ per cent on brick or stone buildings, five per cent on wooden buildings, and ten per cent on machinery, other than on machinery referred to in section 3 hereof.

There is already included in the contract wear and tear brought about by manufacturing the gun. Anyone who knows anything about industrial plants and the setting up of depreciation accounts in the operation of a plant, knows that when a plant is in operation it is maintained. This plant is to be maintained throughout the whole term of the contract at the cost of the people of Canada. Yet in addition to that, depreciation such as I have mentioned, particularly ten per cent on the machinery, is to be allowed. Wear and tear, lubrication and other things are provided for in the contract; we are paying for renewal and maintenance, and in addition we are to pay ten per cent depreciation on machinery.

My time is almost exhausted, and I come now to one point that I desire to make. In the schedule, named exhibit D, we have an extraordinary statement:

Schedule of deliveries from date of execution and delivery of the attached agreement:
24th-36th month inclusive, 1,000 guns—

That is, three years from last March, 1,000 guns; next, four years from last March, 3,000 guns; next, five years from last March, 6,000 guns; and next, five and a half years from last March, 2,000 guns. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we are told that the reason why this contract was made was the pressure of time, the immediate need, the danger, and here we have the first gun coming in three years after the signing of the contract—no, the first 1,000 guns are to be delivered three years after the signing of the contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver:) Will my hon. friend compare that with the record of any other country?

Mr. STEVENS: Here are the facts. The minister may in his own mind justify it, but I am questioning it.

Mr. SLAGHT: The statement of the hon. gentleman is inaccurate, and he ought to withdraw it and read the contract. Three years, he said, before the first gun is to be delivered.

Mr. STEVENS: I corrected that, and said 1,000 guns to be delivered within the three years.

Mr. SLAGHT: No; 1,000 to be delivered within twenty-four to thirty-six months. Read the contract.

Mr. STEVENS: That is three years. I read exactly what is here: 1,000 guns to be delivered twenty-four to thirty-six months after the signing of this contract. Make whatever you like of it.

My time is almost gone, and I should just like to make this observation in the few minutes remaining before I read my amendment.

I think the contract is an improvident one. I want to say this to the Prime Minister: I am not at all disposed to attack the good faith of the minister or his staff; but I do say that the record of the evidence, of the interdepartmental committee, and the observations of the learned judge who drew up that report, must raise in the minds of anyone who will read it grave doubts as to the wisdom of this contract. I have gone through it myself with some care. I have touched hastily on only a few points in connection with it. My opinion is that this contract should be cancelled; we can pay the necessary compensation that might be warranted, and then let us start this big expenditure of $63,000,000 on a sound basis. This contract is the most unfortunate basis from which Canada could possibly launch forth upon an expenditure of $63,000,000.

One reason why we do not approve of this matter going to the public accounts committee as proposed by the motion, is that there are no instructions given to the committee. The matter simply goes to the public accounts committee, and we all know what happens in committees. It is extremely difficult, with one party having an overwhelming majority on the committee, to get an impartial discussion. This house is the place in which the discussion should take place.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You are having it now.

Mr. STEVENS: We are having it now. I come now to my amendment, and I am sure the Minister of National Defence will welcome this. We think this amendment is preferable to the motion because it lays on parliament all the responsibility, and we want to say to those who proposed the motion, in perfectly good faith, that while we do not wish the matter to go to the public accounts committee, we shall certainly support the motion for sending it there if all our efforts to get the matter dealt with on the floor of this house are defeated. We want to make that very clear. All the essential facts are before parliament. Everything we can possibly ask for is in the evidence and in the report, and so I now move, Mr. Speaker seconded by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White):

That all the words after the word "to" in the fourth line thereof be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"The committee of the whole house, with instructions that the committee consider the advisability of cancelling the said contract."

The amendment seems to arouse the mirth of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). Apparently he does not agree with his deputy on this matter. The motion, Mr. Speaker, will then read:

That the agreement for the manufacture of Bren machine guns, the report of the royal commission dealing with said agreement and all related documents, evidence, vouchers and exhibits, be referred to the committee of the whole house with instructions that the committee consider the advisability of cancelling the said contract.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment is properly discharging the responsibility placed upon parliament by the learned judge who presided over the royal commission.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I refrained from participating in the debate on the address, feeling that the wealth of numbers and material from all quarters of the house had made a sufficient contribution to the discussion at that stage; and having so refrained, I desire the house to know that I expect to be able to represent the views of my riding of Parry Sound from time to time as specific matters come before us.

Not having addressed the house before this session, may I crave its indulgence to digress for one moment to pay a tribute to the hon. leader of his majesty's opposition in this house (Mr. Manion). I have not had the privilege of knowing him intimately for very long, but I may say that he has a personality which has entirely captured me so far as his demeanour, his sense of humour, and all those good qualities we like to find in our fellowman are concerned. If during the course of my remarks in this debate I find it necessary to criticize his public utterances and conduct and to refer, perhaps shortly, to some doctrine that he has laid down in the book which he wrote for the guidance of the people with regard to the vilification of public men in public office and with regard to other topics that seem to me apropos to this debate, he will understand, I know, that there is nothing personal in what I say but that it is his public utterances and his public desire to instruct the people of Canada with which I quarrel.

We find ourselves, Mr. Speaker, engaged in a serious debate. Being, I find, a member of the public accounts committee, I shall, in reviewing now some phases of this question, endeavour so far as possible not to pass final judgment upon the contract under review, and not to pass final judgment upon the report of the Hon. Mr. Justice Davis, which has been so much discussed. But I do propose to endeavour to have the members of this house and incidentally the people of Canada, understand the genesis and the raison d'être of the fuss that has been raised in its various forums and the history with regard to the contract for the manufacture of Bren guns.

I propose to charge the young man who wrote this article with having done so for a purely political, partisan purpose. I propose to take this house, if I may, to a convention room in the Royal York hotel on November 9 and to quote a statement made by the young gentleman in bidding for the leadership of his provincial party, a statement he made with reference to this matter which will stamp him in language that I would refrain from using. I propose then to deal very shortly with the course adopted before the royal commission, and then, if time permits, with the course adopted by the hon. gentlemen who occupy the front benches opposite, and who have made such eloquent speeches in denunciation of our beloved Minister of National Defence of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie).

Let me first make reference to some pages of what I regard as a most entertaining and delightful book. I regret that my hon. friend opposite who wrote it, in addition to his ripe and wide experience in many phases of life, had not had the privilege of spending ten years of his life, as I did of mine, with the miners and prospectors of northern Ontario. If anything could have widened his experience and improved his book it would have been that. An interesting topic which the leader of the opposition purports to deal with for the instruction of his readers is found at pages 271 and 272 where he deals with the vilification of public men. At page 271 he points his thesis by writing of an experience. Let me read what he says:

> On one occasion many years ago, while idling in the smoking room of a pullman car, I listened to a conversation in which politicians were roundly condemned for their "grafting and crookedness," the critics not being aware that a member of the house was among them. Getting tired of their criticism I turned to the loudest among them and said.
> "I happen to come from Ottawa—know many members very well—and am convinced that as a class they are as honest as other men. Would you mind telling me upon what you base your statements that members of parliament are grafters and crooks?"
>
> "I am sorry, sir," he replied apologetically, "but I have nothing whatever to base them upon. I have heard others say the same thing, and was merely repeating their statements."
>
> Upon such gossip does reputation often founder! It is as unwise as it is unfair that vilification of this kind should be indulged in, certainly unless one can prove his accusation to be true.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. SLAGHT: There is some more wisdom laid down in this same volume. The hon. gentleman has undertaken to tell us what the duty of an opposition in parliament is, and I trust that his extended experience in that capacity may not be cut short too soon. I should like to make a brief reference to what he says in this book. At page 275 I quote:

> From 1926 to 1930 we spent four more years in the shades of opposition. It is a free-lance life, with plenty of opportunity for criticisms and little real responsibility for the proper carrying on of national affairs, for the party in power makes it a question of honour to have its own way. An active opposition may be of great use to a government and to a country if it uses its powers of criticism in a sane and constructive manner—

I call attention to the next few lines, which contain the nut in the coconut of this debate:

> . . . but few oppositions worry overmuch about constructive suggestions, aiming rather to point out the blunders of a government, and rarely showing sufficient generosity to praise worthy actions.

Mr. MANION: I wrote that right after I had observed my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) in opposition for five years

Mr. SLAGHT: I take it the hon. gentleman was sincere, after his experience in opposition, when he related what he and his confreres thought was the duty of an opposition. I do not agree with him and I do not commend his view to the youth of Canada as indicating the duty of an opposition. If he will search the records of British parliamentary life he will find that the best tradition in England dissents entirely from such a statement as that which he has written.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Speaker, just after the house took recess several hon. members asked me for the name of the book from which I had quoted, which name I inadvertently omitted to state. The name of the book is, "Life is an Adventure;" the author is the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), and it may be procured at any reputable bookshop for the modest price, I understand, of $2.50. I assure my hon. friend I am seeking no part in the royalties.

I stated that this whole Bren gun agitation was, in my view, inspired by purely political motives, and I propose to spend the few minutes at my command in outlining my reasons for making that statement. We had a scholarly and interesting address from the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) just before recess. I disagree with most of what he said, but in these times of war and strife I feel that the house should be congratulated upon the fact that two of the great parties of Canada have found peace and are now under the one banner: the great Reconstruction party and the great Conservative party—the National Conservative party.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Formerly the Liberal-Conservative party.

Mr. SLAGHT: I have not always agreed with the hon. member for Kootenay East, but I think it is to his everlasting credit that in this debate he was quick to dissociate himself from his new-found leader in his imaginative and bitter criticism directed against the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). We did get a clue from the speech of the hon. member for Kootenay East as to the inside workings of this Tory cabal to destroy the Minister of National Defence. In the course of his remarks he was, as I noted it, referring to the contract, and he said or predicted: "Once this contract is running smoothly, which it would have been had we not interfered," then so and so would follow. There is the clue to the situation, and the disturbance in Canada for the last eight months: "Had we not interfered it would have been running smoothly." No truer word has been uttered in this debate. Notwithstanding the admitted interference, for purely partisan purposes I repeat, the contract has been, to the disappointment of my hon. friends opposite but to the great satisfaction of the people of Great Britain and the British war office, running more than up to date on its commitments.

Let me digress for a moment to refer to the evidence of Mr. Gillespie who was called as a witness. He has been and is in charge of the John Inglis plant for the production of these guns. I refer to page 3091 and following pages of the evidence taken before the commission.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is Mr. Gillespie?

Mr. SLAGHT: I am glad to tell the hon. member who Mr. Gillespie is and then to tell him what he says. Mr. Gillespie was for thirty-eight years in the employ of the British war office. He was for eighteen years in charge of the royal small arms factory at Enfield, the greatest munition producing factory in the British empire. He agreed to come to this country and undertake the supervision of this contract in the John Inglis Company's plant for the life of the contract, and the British war office released him to Canada for that purpose. His duties in the royal small arms factory at Enfield were—I paraphrase the evidence—to develop the manufacture of all sorts of small arms and machine guns, guns that would take the ordinary rifle cartridge. His evidence discloses that he was sent by the British Ministry of Munitions to the United States, to help them with their difficulties in regard to small arms, and spent some time in various factories there, including the Winchester repeating arms factory at Schenectady, the Remington factory at Ilion, and the Savage company. What does that gentleman say, compared with the slanderous imputations from the other side of the house that this firm and its equipment are not capable of producing the Bren gun as required by the terms of their contract? At page 3106 we find the following, in reference to the Inglis organization:

Q. And from your experience with them here what do you say as to their efficiency as engineers in charge of production, or in charge of planning for production of Bren guns?

[Mr. Slaght.]

A. I would say they are one hundred per cent.
Q. One hundred per cent?
A. Yes.
Q. Well that is pretty good.

The Commissioner: As the school boy says, it is not good, it is perfect.

That is the testimony of a man who is qualified to speak. We have discovered in our midst a young engineer. Let me say that while I disagree with 99 per cent of what he said I think he made a masterly presentation of a bad case, as he is always capable of doing. I have complimented him upon that; I regard him as one of my friends in the house, and I hope I am right in that. But are we to take the speeches of young engineers and of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house who have achieved a great deal in their respective spheres, and throw out the testimony of a man who is preeminent in the manufacture of munitions in the British empire to-day? The people of Canada will not take long to choose.

Mr. MANION: Did the hon. gentleman say that Mr. Gillespie is the head of the Inglis company?

Mr. SLAGHT: No, my friend misunderstood me. He is lent to the Inglis company by the British war office.

Mr. MANION: But he is in charge of the Inglis company now, do I understand?

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes, and he was there when they opened the doors and put these workmen to work, and has been there ever since. He was called to testify, and the arrangement is that he stays until this contract is fulfilled.

Mr. MANION: And I understand in that evidence he is speaking for a company which he is managing at the present time? I understood the hon. member to say that this gentleman is manager or superintendent or something for the company at the present time; is that right?

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes, for the John Inglis Company; that is right.

Mr. MANION: So he was speaking of his own company when he said it was so up to date.

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes, but does my friend suggest that he prevaricated? He speaks with a record of thirty-eight years in the British war office behind him.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Was he engaged before the contract was signed; was that one of the reasons?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SLAGHT: No, I want to answer.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Was this man Gillespie signed up with the company that received the contract, prior to their getting the contract?

Mr. SLAGHT: No. Let me tell my hon. friend that when the British war office notified the Canadian defence department that they had made a satisfactory draft contract for the production of Bren guns for them in Canada, concurrently with that they said, "We will give you our best man to see it through."

Mr. GARDINER: Cooperation with the British by hon. members on the other side!

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): The hon. member is sure—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) has the floor. If the hon. member wants to put a question to him it can be done only with his consent.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I do not wish to take up the time of the speaker, being very well acquainted with him for a number of years—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I have only one question: Is the hon. member quite positive of what he is saying?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This interruption has taken three minutes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SLAGHT: Let me answer my hon. friend. I believe, definitely, that I have stated the facts. I have studied the evidence, and I think if my hon. friend has read it—which I very much doubt—he will find that the statement I have made is absolutely correct. We can all make mistakes here and there, but let my hon. friend read the evidence, and then point out the mistake.

That, Mr. Speaker, brings me to a point with which I had not intended to deal here. My hon. friends on the other side of the house, in all their criticism, have failed to tell us one thing. In the friendliest way I challenge the leader of the opposition if he has read the evidence—which I doubt—to tell us what part the British war office took in scrutinizing the contract which they made, which is on all fours with the Canadian contract under attack except as to the quantity of guns and except as to one provision which we put in for the protection of the government of Canada, and which the British war office did not even insist upon. It is all very well for my hon. friend to say to me, "Oh, you can deal with that." If he wants to present a fair case to the people of Canada, why does he criticize Mr. Orde, who, as I understand it, was a Conservative appointee?

Mr. MANION: I did not criticize Mr. Orde at all.

Mr. SLAGHT: Why does he suggest that the experts in Canada, legal, engineering and otherwise, made any error in advising their government to enter into this contract? Does he forget that for long months the British war office, whose experience goes back a hundred years, whose expert engineers and legal counsel I say transcend a hundredfold all the carping criticism that came from the other side, scrutinized a similar contract, which now bears the signature of the British war office and which they desire to have carried out? Why not be fair? Why sit down without dealing with that point when invited to do so? Under his theory of the duty of an opposition does he present the carping criticisms and refuse to acknowledge the good that may lie in the subject under discussion? That is not his exact language, but it is a paraphrase of his conception of the duty of an opposition, and he has demonstrated it to the *n*th degree in his conduct during this debate.

Now let me get to my real point, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. SLAGHT: Thank you—and it is this: From the day the Maclean's article was published it was a plan and scheme conceived in the brain of the young man who wrote it, for what fee has never yet been disclosed—my hon. friend says $500. I do not know. It might have been $500, or it might have been thirty pieces of silver. I am not sure as to which it might have been. But let me tell my hon. friends across the way that from that very day there has been a consistent cabal to close the plant of the John Inglis Company.

Mr. HARRIS: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us something about fees.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HARRIS: Fees; he knows about fees. What was the fee that the author got? I am asking the hon. gentleman a question. Will he tell me what the fee was for the Maclean's magazine article?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SLAGHT: What is the hon. gentleman's question?

Mr. HARRIS: Would the hon. member tell us what was the fee for the article to which he referred?

Mr. FRASER: The hon. member knows that now; why is he asking?

Mr. HARRIS: No, I do not; I am asking for information. We have an hon. gentleman speaking who knows more about fees than all the rest of this House of Commons put together. Tell us about the fee; tell us what it was.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not a proper question.

Mr. SLAGHT: When my hon. friend finds me accepting a fee to traduce a contract that is on all fours with a contract entered into by the British war office, which means a supply of guns and ammunition for the mother country when she is in dire need, then he can bring in any criticism of me he wishes.

Let us see what George Drew wanted, and I would ask hon. members to notice the date I am about to mention. An interview appeared in the press on September 1, 1938. That interview was with Mr. Dingman of the Globe and Mail staff, appearing in the Globe and Mail of September 2. The heading is:

Drew Demands Work Stopped on Bren Guns. Would Close Inglis Plant till Probe of Deal is Concluded.

That is a significant date, September 1. A reference to the report of the commission will show that the report was brought in on December 29. If George Drew had had his way the Inglis plant would have been closed down for three months and twenty-seven days so that a young politician might become leader of his provincial party. Will any hon. gentleman across the way dare state, now or later, that he approves such a demand? The question answers itself; no. Did Colonel Drew consult the British war office as to what effect it might have on their plans if the Inglis plant were closed for four months? Certainly not.

Mr. MANION: It could be closed for four years and make no difference.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend has now allied himself, as I hoped he would not, with an attempt to close the Inglis plant when the British war office had urged that the work be carried on. This young gentleman did not stop at that. We all know of the two months during which the inquiry proceeded, in which he took a prominent part as counsel. We know that he is a member of the bar of Ontario, and we know that members of the bar, both British and Canadian, have a clear understanding that matters sub judice, as it is said in law, or matters which have not been finally dealt with by a tribunal before which evidence has been presented, should not be discussed in public, certainly not by a counsel engaged in the case and certainly not by a quasi litigant or accuser.

Let me take you, Mr. Speaker, to that historic room in the Royal York hotel where so many of my Ontario friends on the other side gathered on December 9, and bear in mind that the report came out on December 29. In his bid for leadership of the provincial party, at a convention where Bren guns and federal matters were not apropos unless they were dragged in for political purposes, this young man made a startling statement. This time I quote from the Toronto Telegram. Some of my hon. friends were there, and to their credit I believe their hearts stood still and they were shocked when they heard this utterance. The leader of the opposition smiles his usual bland and delightful smile. If he was in the room and did not rise and protest he should be ashamed of himself. At this time all the evidence was in; the commissioner was doing his best to make up his mind, to deal with a difficult task and prepare his report, and this is what this young gentleman said:

You have heard of the Bren gun inquiry.

It does not say, "cheers," but the reporter may have missed the cheers.

There is no doubt what is going to happen on that subject. There will be no Bren gun contract with the government when the next session opens.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He is a prophet.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Ordering the judge.

Mr. SLAGHT: Well, what was it? In the first place it was an arrant falsehood. Does anybody quarrel with that statement? In the second place it was a bid for provincial leadership. Does anybody quarrel with that statement? In the third place—

Mr. CASSELMAN: He was then the leader.

Mr. THOMPSON: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. THOMPSON: I know the hon. member wants to be fair. I was at that convention, and this was after the convention was over.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. THOMPSON: It was the night meeting, after he was appointed leader.

Mr. SLAGHT: There is one gentleman who was there. Did he rise and say, "How do you know?" Did he say, "You are discussing a matter that is sub judice?" Did he say, "Look out, Mr. Drew; your statement is going to be published in every newspaper in Germany to-morrow morning?" No, he did not say that.

Mr. THOMPSON: He made the statement after he was appointed leader.

Mr. SLAGHT: Well then, it is all the worse, because it ties the hon. member in with him. I assume the hon. member was a supporter of his, in his acquiring leadership.

Let me then in all seriousness point out to the house what happened. If he had had his way he would have shut the Inglis plant for the four months. He could not do it.

Mr. HOMUTH: Hear, hear.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend says, "Hear, hear." May I name him, because I want his name on Hansard. The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) says, "Hear hear," that the Inglis plant should have been closed for four months, when the British war office were urging by telegram, and everything else, "Get out those Bren guns as fast as you can."

But that was not all. The torch was thrown to the boys at Ottawa—"Let us cancel the contract."

Mr. PERLEY: "The Shadow knows."

Mr. SLAGHT: "Let us cancel the contract." Eight months of production, which Mr. Gillespie says has been right up to date—one hundred per cent—although I did not read further extracts in which he said that the contract is right up to the minute. But the statement is there. The torch is thrown to Ottawa, and to my amazement and surprise hon. gentlemen opposite want now to cancel the Bren gun contract with the Inglis company.

I wonder if the five friends of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, knowing his views on patronage, which the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) exposed this afternoon, whispered to him, "Let us get this contract cancelled—out of the way. We would like to nibble at it."

Mr. MANION: What five friends?

Mr. SLAGHT: The five gentlemen whose names the hon. member refused to disclose; the gentlemen who were jealous, apparently, because they could not get a chance at it, the contract. How can I name his five friends, when he is ashamed to name them himself?

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is much more I can show to you, but—

Mr. MacINNIS: What have you shown?

An hon. MEMBER: Nothing.

Mr. SLAGHT: Let me digress to say this—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. member is a virile young member of the house, and I like him and his interruptions. I want to say before I am shut off that, having regard to the situation in Canada to-day, I believe the position of the two groups in the opposite corner of the house is entirely different from that of the Conservative party opposite.

An hon. MEMBER: They are playing politics.

Mr. SLAGHT: Of course they are playing politics. I believe that the report of the commissioner was one which made it perfectly proper and right for my hon. friends in the far corner to ask parliament to look further into the matter. I regret we are going to waste time to do so. Someone has said we have most of the facts, but my friends are within their rights, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was gracious enough to say that they could have his support. I do not want anything I say to-night which shows the history of an infamous cabal to apply at all to either of the groups opposite to my right.

Now, let me say just a word about two friends of mine, the first of whom is the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton). Just a word as to him. I suggest his whole course in the matter, as disclosed by the sworn testimony, has been actuated by one motive, and one motive alone, namely the desire to serve his own people in Trinity constituency in Toronto. He has been completely vindicated by a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada. Is it for that desire that he is to be pilloried and torn to pieces, with barbed and poisonous insinuations—the imaginings in which the leader of the opposition said he deals. His imagination led him to paint a vivid picture of things that the learned judge did not say. He could not quarrel with the things the learned judge did say. With all his fire and eloquence he was pointing to the wall behind me, and he had me turning round in my seat to look at the five portraits the judge had painted.

Mr. MANION: Did the hon. member see any of them?

Mr. SLAGHT: No, I did not see any of them; that is the point. And without the slightest desire to be offensive let me suggest to the hon. member that he is suffering from "political delirium tremens." In another month we shall find him pointing to rats under his chair.

Mr. MANION: Is that what one sees when one has delirium tremens?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend is a greater authority than I am. I never have enjoyed the privilege of having that disease, and I know he never has.

Mr. MANION: Then I would say my hon. friend is very lucky.

Mr. SLAGHT: There is a cure for it; if you are suffering from it, you can be cured.

An hon. MEMBER: Pink elephants.

Mr. SLAGHT: But to be cured you must repent, and to repent you must confess. Repentance without confession is an empty vessel. One way for my hon. friend to confess is to confess his political sins to the Speaker of the house. And I will invite him, on a future occasion when we deal with tariff matters, to make full repentance and to endeavour then, if he can, to get absolution from the people of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. SLAGHT: I wonder—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Speaker, I hesitated to interrupt the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) while he was speaking, but I understand from the rules of order that it is unparliamentary to impute motives to any members. He stated repeatedly during his speech that those of us on this side of the house who have spoken spoke from purely political motives. I ask that that statement be withdrawn. I refer to standing order 41, citation 297, which reads:

> The imputation of bad motives, or motives different from those acknowledged, misrepresenting the language of another—

And so on. The remarks of the hon. member were unparliamentary and called for prompt interference, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has not mentioned any statement by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) which refers to him personally and, therefore, I do not think the point of order is well taken.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MASSEY: The hon. gentleman referred particularly to those of us who had spoken. I am one of those and I refuse to have any member of this house accuse me—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MASSEY: —of speaking from purely political motives.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Parry Sound did not mention the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey).

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Even that would not be out of order. Speaking from political motives is not out of order, and I wish that no other motives could be attributed to me.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion to refer this contract to the standing committee on public accounts. As I understand the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), along with the contract will go the auditor general's report. In my opinion the Bren gun contract which we are now discussing is in effect only an incident. It seems to me that this house is now under an obligation to look into other phases of the expenditures of the Department of National Defence. We can begin where the Davis report left off.

I do not propose to follow the hon. member who has just taken his seat except to say that learned counsel as he is, he played up a few arguments which might possibly catch the ears of his listeners. I would merely point out that he made a great play of the fact that interference with this contract would result in slowing up the British rearmament program. Has he read the contract? If he has he knows that it calls for the first delivery of guns in twenty-four or thirty-six months. That being the case, how can any action of this parliament at this time slow up the delivery if, as we have been told, this concern is ready, willing and able to manufacture machine guns for delivery to the government?

I contend that in the light of the existing records of the department, of this house and of the interdepartmental committee from which the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) quoted this afternoon, the matter of the Bren gun would seem to be most extraordinary. In view also of the replies which have been given at various times to questions asked in this house, one is forced to the conclusion that the minister either paid little attention to the affairs of his department and signed important documents without understanding them, or failed to give this house proper and adequate information when called upon to do so. As a matter of fact,

I believe that the first mention of the Bren gun in this house was made by myself almost two years ago. I find that on February 22, 1937, after discussing rumours that certain factories were to be called upon to make munitions, I asked a question of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). As reported on page 1108 of Hansard of that year I said:

. . . are we experimenting with any guns produced in Czechoslovakia? I have in mind the Bren machine gun. If so, what are we paying for these guns?

To this question the minister replied as follows:

I believe it was the year before last that two were ordered by the department; ten more are now on order. The Bren is a new automatic machine gun which up to now has been manufactured in Czechoslovakia. I understand that the rights of the manufacturer have been purchased by the British government and that they are to construct as soon as possible a factory in the United Kingdom for the extensive production of that type of gun. The department has been looking into the question with a view to having the gun manufactured in Canada.

The minister said that the department had been looking into the question with a view to having the gun manufactured in Canada. As a matter of fact, the Davis report shows that the high commissioner wrote from London on February 27, 1936, a year before, concerning this particular matter. We find the following on page four of the report:

By letter dated February 27, 1936 (exhibit 68) the office of the High Commissioner for Canada in London advised the Secretary of State for External Affairs of the Canadian government that in connection with the adoption of the Bren light machine gun by the British army an agreement, dated May 24, 1935, had been made by the secretary of state for the war department with the patentee embodying the terms and conditions under which the gun could be used and manufactured by the secretary of state for war and a copy of this agreement, together with a copy of a letter from the war office dated February 26, 1936, were enclosed. Particular attention was drawn, in the high commissioner's letter, to the statement in the war office letter that in making the agreement opportunity was taken of including therein provision to enable his majesty's governments in the dominions, in the event of their adoption of the gun, to take advantage of the terms of the agreement should they desire to do so. The agreement covered the patented invention for the machine gun itself as well as a certain tripod from which the gun could be fired and a filling machine for use in connection with the gun. One of the conditions of the said agreement relating to the possible manufacture of the said gun by the dominions was that such manufacture shall be in a factory operated by the government in question.

The statement "such manufacture shall be in a factory operated by the government in question" stands out in the report. The Davis report goes on to say on page five:

As early at least as June 3, 1936, the actual requirements for Canadian defence were put at approximately 7,000 of these guns.

The minister stated that the Bren gun production was our most vital necessity in the Dominion of Canada. Nearly nine months later he merely stated that the department had been looking into the matter, and a little later, on the same evening, February 22, 1937, I asked the minister:

What company has secured the manufacturing rights of the Bren gun?

Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver): None so far. Several have been endeavouring to do so.

That is, to manufacture the Bren gun in Canada.

Let us now turn to the report of the Davis commission, and what do we find? The minister stated on the stand that no one had asked for an opportunity to manufacture the Bren gun. I ask, having in mind those two statements, how can it be said that the evidence given before the Davis commission was correct? Or, if the minister on the occasion of his appearance before the Davis commission was giving an accurate statement of what was a fact, why were we told in the House of Commons a year and a half before that there were persons who were desirous of manufacturing the gun? I say, as my leader pointed out in relation to the questions which he asked last June, that the answers are grossly inaccurate and misleading.

Now let me turn to the evidence, where we find this, that following the interview with Messrs. Cameron, Hahn and Plaxton, the minister wrote the following letter—I am quoting from page 19 of the report, but first let me read the introductory paragraph:

Following upon the interview with the minister on October 19, 1936—

That is the interview to which I have just referred.

—and without waiting for the report of the inspector who had been asked by the department on October 10 to inspect the Inglis plant in Toronto, there was sent by the deputy minister of national defence to the under secretary of state for external affairs on October 20, 1936, the following letter (exhibit 74) suggesting, in view of Major Hahn's early departure for England, the desirability of communicating with the high commissioner as soon as possible.

Then follows the letter:

Sir,—

I have the honour to refer to previous correspondence pertaining to the Bren light machine gun, following on which the Department of National Defence has been investigating the question of the manufacture of this gun in Canada. Major J. E. Hahn, D.S.O., M.C., a former officer of the Canadian expeditionary force, and representing a reliable group which controls certain manufacturing plants capable of manufacturing armament and munitions located in a large industrial centre where the labour and material factor is stable and favourable, has been in communication with the department.

I would draw again particular attention to the phraseology—"a reliable group which controls certain manufacturing plants"—when as a matter of fact the group was not known to the minister or known, apparently, even to the deputy minister, and moreover when it did not possess a single plant equipped to manufacture the Bren light machine gun. I say that this statement sent overseas was certainly misleading. A little later in the same letter we find this:

In this connection the department must consider the possibility of the gun being manufactured in a plant or plants other than government owned, such as for example those controlled by Major Hahn and his associates.

If ever a misleading communication were forwarded from the Dominion of Canada to the motherland, certainly this communication was of all of them one of the most misleading, and I say that on that account alone the deputy minister should be disciplined, and that the minister, who says that he takes responsibility for this letter, was either ignorant of the facts, negligent of his duty, or incompetent, and therefore should not continue to hold the position which he holds to-day.

That I submit, Mr. Speaker, is the only conclusion which can be drawn from the evidence and from this letter in particular. Why, it implies that Major Hahn and his associates had plants and were a reliable group. How did the minister or the deputy minister know that they were even financially reliable; for it was not until May, 1938, that confirmation of financial reliability of Major Hahn was submitted in a letter from the Bank of Montreal. And yet in the face of those facts we have a letter of introduction going out which, to my mind, was a strong recommendation of Major Hahn and his associates.

Moreover, what plant had they? This letter is dated October 20, 1936, and it was not until the day before, according to the report, that the representative of the bondholders accepted the offer made by the Hahn interests for the Inglis plant. Moreover the plant was being investigated by an inspector under the department. His report was already on the way, available in a day or so, and yet in the face of what must have been knowledge that this report was in hand, this letter was sent out for the guidance of those overseas who would have something to do with the placing of the contract.

So I say that when on the other side of the house it is said that the Davis report is a vindication of the minister and of his department, it would seem to my mind to be, on the other hand, a serious questioning of the minister and of his department; and we who are members of this parliament are called upon to adjudge the issue. I want to say to hon. gentlemen opposite that speeches of the type we have heard to-night will not help because in those speeches the points at issue are not taken up. This afternoon we enjoyed the sallies of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), but he did nothing to refute the arguments of those who have condemned this contract. To-night we heard the hon. gentleman who preceded me, the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), who, as I said earlier, like a clever counsel, was quite obviously doing his best with a bad case.

Mr. GARDINER: His speech will be remembered long after that of the hon. member.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is quite possible. It will be remembered by those who delight in that kind of cheap political claptrap.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he considers absolute proof that the men loaned by the British war office regarded this plant as suited to the purpose, as cheap political claptrap?

Mr. COLDWELL: I would say that the British war office had no other advice than the kind of advice that was tendered in the letter which I was discussing, and that was distinctly misleading advice.

Mr. GARDINER: They had the advice of one of their own appointees.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not know who the gentleman was.

Mr. GARDINER: He was mentioned; the hon. member was not listening.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am going on the evidence that was submitted to the commission.

Mr. GARDINER: That evidence given before the commission was read to the house to-night.

Mr. COLDWELL: In any event the judge did not think it worth while to mention him in his report. That is not the only matter which, in my opinion, should be referred to the committee—not to rehash the evidence that was given before the Davis inquiry, but to see that similar incompetence does not occur in connection with further huge expenditures that are contemplated. It seems to me that the Bren gun contract has served a useful purpose in bringing before this house the necessity of careful inquiry into expenditures that have been made or are about to be made by the present Minister of National Defence. Millions of dollars have been appropriated for defence since the war; many millions have been appropriated in the last two years, and yet over and over again we are told that this country is defenceless. Is it not about time that parliament made a thorough inquiry and investigation into how these expenditures are made, and into those who are responsible for making them? I say that inquiry into this contract is necessary because perhaps it may become a typical contract, and we do not want that to happen. That is why I am warmly in support of the motion of my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil).

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) last evening criticized us for opposing increased defence estimates. At page 682 of Hansard he is reported as saying:

> And when this government came to the house during the first session of this parliament to ask for $25,000,000 for national defence, what was the position taken by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil)? What was the position taken by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell)? What was the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps)? What was the position taken by all hon. members of the group sitting opposite and to the right of the official opposition?

The minister will perhaps remember when I remind him what that attitude was, and I will quote from Hansard of 1937. When the hon. member for Vancouver North spoke he made a statement on behalf of the group with which he is associated and at page 882 of Hansard he is reported as saying:

> I submit that one of the first and most necessary contributions to national defence, and one that should be made before we pay over additional millions, is so to purge the present establishment as to place it on a businesslike and sensible basis. Eliminate patronage, social nonsense and obsolete military routine and there might be some opportunity for men in that department to do something, men who have some technical knowledge and grasp of the requirements of national defence. If the country wants defence, there might then be some hope of its getting money for its money.

That was one of the grounds upon which we opposed those estimates; and if hon. members will look through the discussions during these three years they will find that points similar to those contained in the statement which I have just read were made over and over again by members of this group. The second point upon which we opposed the estimates was the fact that no one knew exactly how these armaments were going to be used, what the foreign policy of the government was, or what the policy of the British administration which the government was following happened to be.

Last night the Minister of Agriculture quoted Sir Thomas Inskip as he spoke on July 20, 1936, in the British House of Commons. The minister said that he was there. I ask him, did he hear the speech which immediately preceded that of Sir Thomas Inskip, the speech of the leader of the Liberal party in Great Britain, Sir Archibald Sinclair? It is strange to me that in debates on foreign policy the government of Canada, which calls itself Liberal, always quotes the leaders of illiberalism in Great Britain. I have before me what Sir Archibald Sinclair said and I am going to put it on the record. Sir Archibald, in the summer of 1936, said almost in identical language exactly what this group has said in this house in connection with our defence estimates.

Mr. GARDINER: I stated that last night.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. GARDINER: I pointed out that the opposition had opposed it on three occasions and this was the third occasion on which Sir Thomas was trying to disprove their statements.

Mr. COLDWELL: And I am pointing out that if the Liberal leader in Great Britain—

Mr. MARTIN: We are not obliged to follow him.

Mr. COLDWELL: Pardon me?

Mr. MARTIN: Surely there is no obligation on the part of this house to pay lip-service to a leader who happens to bear the same name in another country?

Mr. MacINNIS: There is no danger.

Mr. COLDWELL: Liberalism, as I have understood it in Great Britain, has stood for something; in Canada it is simply a meaningless name. That is why I will place on the record what Sir Archibald said, in order to show that a government of Canada which calls itself Liberal follows on the contrary the foreign policy of a British government which is far removed from Liberalism in its widest and best sense.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member does not agree with it in either country.

Mr. COLDWELL: Sir Archibald Sinclair said this:

My vote on the reduction of this estimate to-night—

It was a defence estimate.

—will, however, depend—and indeed on some of the other estimates—upon the minister's answers to the questions which I have asked him.

Exactly what we said.

It will depend, above all, on his willingness and ability to give clear and direct assurances to this committee that British armaments will never be used, except in accordance with the covenant of the League of Nations, and that the government recognize, as an imperative and urgent duty, the creation of a system of collective security under the auspices of the league, so that British armaments shall be used, not for selfish or imperialistic aims, but to uphold the rule of law against arbitrary force, and thus to maintain peace on the only firm foundation, that of justice, and to avert the catastrophe of war.

The minister stated last night that we in this group had consistently opposed the defence estimates, and asked upon what grounds we opposed them. I point to the two main grounds that I have given, and they will be found embodied in the records of this house. In my opinion no group criticizing any estimates has ever had a clearer vindication of their opposition than can be found in the report of the Davis commission. It is all very well to say that the report found no one guilty of misconduct. That is not what the commission was charged with doing. The form was reported upon; "the form, not the substance, of the contract." Upon the substance we in this house, and through us the people of this dominion, must judge. So our attitude on defence estimates throughout has been vindicated by what we are now discussing.

In closing I say that a matter of this kind at the present time in the Dominion of Canada, or in any other democratic country, is to be deplored, because it tends to undermine faith in our democratic institutions and in those who are charged with the responsibilities of government. Matters of this sort do more to undermine what we loosely term democracy than all the propaganda that can be sent from over the seas. It enables some to point the finger of scorn at parliament, and to say, what we need is a certain type of so-called big business men in this house. I venture to say that those who would institute the rule of big business would also stifle free discussion.

I am persuaded that if we want to continue the institution of parliament, we who are within these walls at the present time must judge a matter of this kind not from any preconceived notions that we may have but according to the material before us. In my opinion the commissioner places the questions clearly before this house, and we have to answer them. Be that as it may, I say that at least the report of the commissioner, the evidence given before him and the airing which has been given to the evidence in this house this week, have certainly undermined the confidence of the people of Canada in the Minister of National Defence and in those who serve immediately under him. I think it probable that until this debate occurred in this house the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was not altogether aware of all that was in the evidence and in this report. I am quite sure that many hon. members were not conversant with it. Those of us who had read some of the evidence—I had not read all of it for there are many volumes—have from hour to hour during the past two days heard evidence and conclusions based upon that evidence of which we had no knowledge before. So I am urging that the motion now before the house be adopted, and that, not a rehash of the evidence given before the Davis commission be undertaken, but that the operations of the Department of National Defence under the present minister and those who serve immediately under him be thoroughly inquired into by the public accounts committee.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Reference has been made two or three times to-day to Colonel George A. Drew. I do not rise for the purpose of defending Colonel Drew; he has shown on many occasions that he is quite capable of looking after himself. But I do say that Colonel Drew has an enviable war record; he with many others belonging to our artillery and other defence units has been working for years to perfect the defences of Canada and put them on a businesslike basis. Colonel Drew's only motive in taking up this matter was his interest in the defence of this dominion. The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) and the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) caused considerable laughter this afternoon and evening on the government side. I can easily understand how they appreciate that; it was like balm to their frayed nerves. It may be all right on ordinary occasions of debate to have a laugh. But to my mind this matter is too serious to laugh at, and this government cannot laugh off the seriousness of it. The fact of the matter is that not one speaker on the government side has yet dealt with this contract in detail or refuted the charges made by hon. members on this side of the house.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is for the hon. member to prove the charges.

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member for Parry Sound made reference to Mr. Gillespie's evidence. So did the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). What did Mr. Gillespie say? He said that these men had the ability to produce Bren guns. So have fifty other men in Canada, one hundred per cent ability to produce them. Mr. Gillespie did not say they were in a position to do so; he did say they had the ability to do so. The hon. member for Parry Sound challenged us to say whether or not we would say that the factory should be closed. I said yes, and I say it again. The people of Canada will say, "Close the factory." There are many Liberal members in this house who wish this thing had never occurred. When the hon. member for Parry Sound speaks so much of the British empire and our responsibility in helping to produce guns to defend that empire, let me say this: God help the empire if they are going to depend for their defence on some Bren guns delivered in twenty-four or twenty-six months from now.

It is difficult for any hon. member, from his place in this house, to discuss certain phases of government business which, unfortunately, have caused the people of this country to think there is something materially wrong in the Department of National Defence and with those men to whom we entrust such important questions. For many years, ever since confederation in fact, we have had prime ministers with characters above reproach, and in that category I include the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). He knows only too well, however, that there are times when those who support prime ministers are not always as careful as they should be in their governmental actions. In this particular instance I do not believe the Prime Minister was cognizant of what was going on. He was not told the truth; he was kept in the dark. But I do say this about him, that after he had declared the policy of the Liberal party in connection with a matter which was of such prime importance to Canada and the empire, this was one matter to which he should have given exceptional scrutiny before he ever became a party to the signing of a contract such as this.

What precipitated this whole mess, because that is what it is to my mind? It was the Drew article in Maclean's magazine. It was admitted in evidence that as a result of the publication of this article, one clause was cleared up within a day or two, which action it is quite generally understood saved this country and this government the sum of $250,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Absolute nonsense.

Mr. HOMUTH: My hon. friend says that is nonsense. This whole thing was nonsense, and the worst nonsense of all was that he should be a party to the signing of the contract.

This afternoon the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) referred to the reports that went throughout this country after the report of Mr. Justice Davis was submitted, and the Prime Minister stated that no report had been given out from his office. The strange part of the whole matter, Mr. Speaker, is that a synopsis of the Davis report was handed to the press fifteen minutes after the Bren gun report was handed to them, and I am told on good authority that this synopsis came from the headquarters of the National Liberal Federation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, what nonsense.

Mr. HOMUTH: I have in my hand a copy of the synopsis of the report which was handed to the press gallery, and it was clearly understood that it came from the National Liberal Federation. If it did not come from there, did it come from the government? If it did not come from the government or the National Liberal Federation headquarters, where did it come from? Who took the trouble to prepare it and hand it to the press, fifteen minutes after they received the report? That is the story which was broadcast throughout Canada to the effect that the Bren gun report was a whitewash, and so on; and the people of the country believed there was nothing to it at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend speaks about a synopsis of the report.

Mr. HOMUTH: I have it right here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot ask him to read it at the moment, but certainly I should like to hear anything published prior to the report being issued, which could be considered as an exact synopsis of the report. There were all kinds of guesses by journalists as to what was in the report, but I would repeat to my hon. friend what I said this afternoon, that the report was delivered to me personally and was in my possession, and no one outside saw the report. I am sure the judge of the supreme court did not give it out; I know I did not give it out. It was in my possession until sent to be printed. Any reports that appeared in the press were pure conjecture; they could not have been taken from the original.

Mr. HOMUTH: I still maintain that a copy—

Mr. MARTIN: Oh, accept the Prime Minister's statement.

Mr. HOMUTH: I still maintain that a synopsis was handed to the press. Here is a copy of it, and I understood that it came from National Liberal headquarters. If it came from there, what right had they to know anything about the Bren gun report before the people of Canada did?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The report covered ninety typewritten pages. How could it possibly be synopsized in fifteen minutes?

Mr. HOMUTH: So there is the story that went out across this country.

When we start to delve into the report, we begin to see just what a terrible mistake the Department of National Defence made. There are in Canada a great many industries capable of making Bren guns. They do work in steel that is much more intricate than the manufacture of a Bren gun. After all, what is there to the Bren gun? The important part is the alloy and the fact that the barrel is interchangeable. Steel companies throughout this dominion do more intricate work, and I venture to say that if they had been given an opportunity to tender on these guns the government would have obtained them for at least half the amount they are going to cost this country under this contract. More than that, these people would not have asked to be paid a large sum of money for getting government patronage, which is really what happened with Major Hahn and his associates.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On a point of order, does the hon. gentleman know that the prices are regulated by the comparative Enfield prices?

Mr. HOMUTH: The minister himself does not know as yet what these guns are going to cost this country, and by the time they get through monkeying around, putting machinery in the Inglis plant and paying for it, paying for everything else in connection with it and taking it out again, we shall not know anything about the cost until the whole deal is through.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend does not want any guns; that is obvious.

Mr. HOMUTH: My hon friend does not seem to be very anxious, from the way they are playing around with them.

What I wanted to deal with particularly, Mr. Speaker, was the financial set-up of this whole matter. Everybody agrees, as I think members of the government will agree—they will not say so, but deep in their hearts I think they believe it—that this is a bad contract. It has got them in wrong with the Canadian people. The government are sick and tired of it. They are jittery; they are nervous; one would think they were sitting on a hot griddle, and before this affair is over they will be on a much hotter griddle. But it is important that we point out to the people of Canada just what wizards of finance can do, because the men behind this matter certainly would be wizards if they were able to accomplish what they set out to do. For that very reason, to protect the investing public of this country, to protect the taxpayers, to protect the very thing that is so important, namely the defence of Canada, this contract ought to be cancelled and the whole affair cleared up.

What do we find? I will show that in this set-up we had Mr. Hahn; we had the brokers, and we had the three Plaxton brothers, two of whom, I believe, are lawyers and the other a member of this house. Two of those brothers received an issue of shares in the company. One received 9,814 shares and the other received exactly twice as many. The other one got the patronage. So that we have two Plaxtons for profit and one Plaxton for patronage.

If the investigation had not been held, if the Drew article had not appeared, what would have happened to the investing public of the dominion? Had they purchased these shares, which were to be sold, what would they have paid for them? Some that were sold were sold as high as $7.50 a share. We know what happens on stock markets. We know what can be done with shares on stock markets. What would the investing public of Canada have paid for the shares? We do not know; it is problematical. But certainly they would not have got them very cheaply. And if this was the only contract the company was going to have, then, Mr. Speaker, what were those investors going to have when the contract was over?

It is strange to hear hon. members opposite clapping their hands and cheering when their colleagues discuss this matter, because who has condemned mergers, combines and watered stock more than hon. members of the Liberal party? Particularly do I say this about hon. members who come from western Canada, who are always pointing to the great industrial organizations of the east and describing them as mergers and combines which are sucking the very lifeblood from Canada. And yet here is one worse than any we have ever seen. Here is one with the water running over, capitalized to the extent of $1,500,000. Mr. Speaker, if this Bren gun contract was the last one the company was going to get, what would the investors have had? The machinery belongs to the government. All the investors would have had to show for their investment would have been the walls of an old, unused, broken-down boiler factory. That is what they would have had for their investment. If the Drew article did nothing else, I believe it did stop the investing public of Canada from being swung into such a scheme as that.

There is this further important point, and it is a very important one: When the contract was completed the government would have all the machinery. Where?—in their plant? No; in a plant owned by somebody else. They would have had to pay the government to move that machinery to their own warehouse or storehouse, and would have had to pay for every bit of repairs which might have been occasioned as a result of moving the machinery. If they tore up a floor to loosen a piece of machinery they would have had to refloor.

How could any member of the government tell the House of Commons or the country what these Bren guns would cost? They do not know. They do not know what it would cost to move the machinery back, if they ever did so. But were they going to move the machinery back, or were the machines going to remain in their place? And much of the $63,000,000 we are going to be asked to vote for defence purposes would go into more contracts for the same company. Therefore they would have a real gold mine in the John Inglis Company.

Furthermore, I cannot see anything in the contract saying that the company could not go ahead and manufacture arms for other countries. There is in it a clause which says they may go ahead and use the machinery and equipment belonging to the government of Canada, but they would have to arrange a rental with the government. How do we know? After all, these men are not fools. In fact, after all the laughing this afternoon and this evening I begin to realize that the only ones who have the right to laugh are the fellows who got the contract with the government.

Mr. Speaker, how do we know but what this very same company would be manufacturing arms and munitions for some country which might be a potential enemy of Canada? We do not know, and to my mind there is nothing in the contract to protect us against that possibility—except that the government have to pass upon it. And if they passed upon that in the same way as they passed upon the contract, then we have no assurance as to what would be done.

I believe it is important that the country should know in detail how a small group of Toronto men, with an Aladdin touch in eighteen months, beginning on October 19, 1936, out of $100,000 cash and an old, unused boiler factory, have created a $1,500,000 corporation, complete with plant, buildings and heavy machinery, a corporation holding two machine gun contracts to a value of five and a third million dollars, from the Canadian and British governments. The contract with the Canadian government was the one investigated by Mr. Justice Davis.

These men paid $100,000 in cash and $150,000 in six per cent bonds for the old John Inglis Company. It had been closed down and was in the hands of the receiver. Actually the group created a new John Inglis Company, with a capital stock of 250,000 shares at $6 per share, or $1,500,000. The payment of the $100,000 cash became a charge on the treasury of the company. Mark that: It became a charge on the treasury of the company. The new company eventually paid the $100,000 out of the funds which the organizing group paid into its treasury in return for treasury stock. The $150,000 of six per cent bonds remained a first mortgage against the assets of the new company, which the group own, lock, stock and barrel.

The puzzle of figures—and it is a complicated puzzle—produced by the inquiry is really due to the involved corporate machinery employed by Major Hahn and his associates in setting up this company. I shall deal with those gymnastics in a little while. In reality, however, the idea behind the matter, stripped of its obscurity, was simply this: Major Hahn and the two Plaxton brothers, Herbert and Gordon, lawyers in Toronto, together with the Toronto brokerage firm of Cameron, Pointon and Merritt, through an intermediary, one Nurse, an employee of the brokerage firm, on October 19, 1936, bought from the official receiver the old John Inglis plant. Nurse and his firm, for Hahn and the Plaxtons, agreed to pay $100,000, spread over instalments up to February 6, 1938, and $150,000 in six per cent bonds. It might be interjected at this point that later, on the witness stand, Major Hahn testified that an old appraisal made in October, 1929, of the old Inglis plant as a going concern, fixed the then value at $1,327,000, exclusive of land.

A first payment of $500 was made on September 22, 1936. The next payment of $2,500 was made on November 9 of the same year. A third payment of $1,000 was made on May 10, 1937. Thereafter payments ranging up to $3,500 were made at intervals, but up to the time the Bren machine gun contract was signed only $46,500 had been paid. In the meantime the new John Inglis Company had been organized. On March 31, 1938, the day the government signed the Bren gun contract, the company itself made the final payment of $53,500.

These people then made the final payment on this factory which had been represented to the British war office and to a committee here made up of civil servants as an industry equipped to make Bren guns. Of the first $46,500 of cash payments the books of Cameron, Pointon and Merritt—this is all from the evidence—credited Major James E. Hahn with $26,416.86; Gordon Plaxton with $3,616.67; Herbert Plaxton with $3,616.67, and the firm itself with $10,850. An investigation carried on by Mr. Hoult showed that these moneys were likewise applied on the books of the new Inglis company as payment on account of the undertaking of Hahn and his group to purchase 58,333 shares at $6 par value. The final payment of $53,500 on the cash purchase price of the old company's assets was made directly from the treasury of the new John Inglis Company.

Here is another point which is perfectly clear. The total capital of the new Inglis company was 250,000 shares at $6 par value, or $1,500,000. Of this $1,500,000 of capital stock Major Hahn and his group took for themselves 191,662 shares of $6 par value, or a total of $1,149,972. This was stock for which they paid nothing. This stock has been termed vendors' stock. Excluding five qualifying shares which were given to the nominal original directors who came from the office staff, the group left in the treasury 58,333 shares of $6 par value which they agreed to buy at par, paying in instalments. To put it more plainly, this group held seventy per cent of the total capital stock of the company—

Mr. MANION: For nothing.

[Mr. Homuth.]

Mr. HOMUTH: For nothing, and they had agreed to buy the other thirty per cent and to pay the money into the treasury in order to operate the company. This money was to go into the treasury to operate the company; yet the government was buying all the machinery for the plant. These people had all these shares for nothing, and then they were going to buy the others in order to put money into the company with which to operate. Who would not take a contract like that from a government? I wish I could get two or three to-morrow.

May we go on? Up to September 15, 1938, it was shown that the group had paid in $231,198 on the 58,333 shares of $6 treasury stock which had a total value of $349,998, which they were obligated to buy. On that date they owned outright a $1,500,000 corporation, its assets and stock for that amount of money, subject to the payment of a balance of $118,000 on the treasury stock. The initial cash payment of $100,000 had been charged against these treasury funds. In the meantime 3,855 shares of treasury stock had been sold to the public and a few brokers for $27,041. The public paid $7.50 a share for its stock. It is easy to fill in the details when you get the framework.

Though the Hahn-Inglis corporation set-up was engineered with four corporations, one functioned only to take the group's subscription for $349,998 of treasury stock. Another functioned as a temporary holding company for the huge block of $1,149,972 of vendor's shares taken by the group. The third corporation was the machine which created the stock expansion, and the fourth was converted into the John Inglis Company. There is the picture. If ever there was a piece of manipulation for the purpose of watering stock of a company, this gives the picture. This is something to which western members can point with pride. They can point to this as showing how their government gives a large contract. I have given the exact picture of this whole affair.

The stock expansion corporation was the British Canadian Engineering Company which was incorporated on November 23, 1936, with an authorized capital of 200,000 shares at $1 each. Mr. Nurse, an employee of Cameron, Pointon and Merritt, who had bought in the old Inglis property, made an agreement, of date October 22, 1936, with Major J. E. Hahn and his employers to turn over to this British Canadian Engineering Company, when incorporated, the properties of the old Inglis company. One interesting paragraph in this early agreement of October 22, 1936, made nearly eighteen months before the Bren gun contract was signed, reads:

> John D. Cameron, H. A. W. (Herbert) Plaxton and the persons they represent, together with Major Hahn "are interested to manufacture war machinery, equipment, munitions and supplies or products of all kinds, and to act as agents, intermediaries or otherwise in obtaining, introducing or placing business or orders for war machinery, equipment, munitions and supplies or products of all kinds as may be furnished, dealt in, manufactured or supplied by other persons, firms or corporations whether in the United Kingdom, dominion of Canada, United States of America or elsewhere, and the parties hereto have agreed to incorporate, organize and promote a limited company for the above purpose."

In other words, these people were organized to make munitions, and in this contract there is nothing which says that they cannot use the Canadian government's machinery to make munitions for some foreign power. When one follows this thing through one begins to realize that here was a group of men without a plant and without any particular engineering ability. One had been mixed up with a radio company and the others were lawyers and brokers. These men come to this government, and the government points to them and says to the British war office, "Here are the only men who are capable of making Bren guns in Canada." If ever there was an insult to the heads of industry in this country, that was it. All one has to do is read the contract. Read what the deputy minister of defence said in his evidence. Read what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) said in his evidence. Read what some hon. members opposite have said in the house. One cannot help but feel that these men considered the heads of industry and the workmen in industry in this dominion absolutely incompetent to do a job like that.

As the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) said this afternoon, manufacturers come to Ottawa to see all departments of government. They pay their own expenses to come here to bid on contracts in order to get government business. All this government had to do was to say to the steel manufacturers of this country: We want these guns made and we want other arms and munitions made. These men would have come here. The heads of industries in Canada are loyal enough to give of their time, of their experts and of their office staffs and to spend their money to help the Department of National Defence to build up an effective defence force. Yet the Minister of National Defence and the deputy minister of national defence say to our Canadian manufacturers: You are not competent; we cannot trust you with this job; it is too intricate a job for you, and we are going to give it to a man who had a radio company that failed, to a couple of brokers and a couple of lawyers, and the patronage is going to a member from the city of Toronto. That is the story in a nutshell.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the members of this house cannot help but feel that the contract is not only improvident but unfair to the Department of National Defence, because it is going to be years before we get guns. They are now buying the machinery in spite of the Davis report. The government would not wait. Mr. Justice Davis in his report did not exonerate the government from responsibility for the contract. Corruption, no; he said there was no corruption. That is quite true, but he did not exonerate the government in any other way. What he did say to them was this: Here is your baby; this is your child. In a very subtle way he said: It is a little dirty and messy; it ought to be cleaned up, and it is up to parliament and the government to do the job.

There is only one way to do the job, Mr. Speaker, and that is to cancel the contract. I think the Prime Minister himself should unhesitatingly say: I will agree to cancel the contract and to create a munitions board. Not a purchasing board, Mr. Speaker, because patronage would be just as vicious under a purchasing board. But let the Prime Minister and his government say: We will create a munitions board and give them the right to handle the whole business, so that we can clean this thing up and once more give the people of Canada some confidence in the Department of National Defence.

Mr. ERNEST BERTRAND (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the hon. member who has just preceded me (Mr. Homuth), I was reminded of the well known saying that you must not take yourself too seriously; but in French we go one step further and say: Do not take yourself for somebody else. After hearing the hon. member ask that the Bren gun contract be cancelled, in spite of the vote that the house gave this afternoon, I might say to him: Do not take yourself for anybody else, because you are not yet on this side of the house.

If we were going to add to the cost of the Bren gun contract what this debate is going to cost the country, the promoters would be much richer than they are going to be with the contract as it stands to-day. We can well say, now that we have the report of the Hon. Mr. Justice Davis, that this whole affair is a tempest in a teapot.

We are talking of a contract and of nothing else. It is not important to know who opened the door, whether it was the minister, the deputy minister or the hon member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton). We have a contract before us and we have to examine it.

But before going into the contract I want to say something which is dear to the province of Quebec. There are very few high officials of this government who enjoy a higher reputation than my friend Major General LaFleche. From the fall of 1914, when he attended his military school to get his lieutenancy, right down until to-day with the high rank he has now attained, his life has been, I think, a true expression of patriotism and of outright devotion to his king and country, and to his position he brings a very well-balanced intelligence and devouring energy. It would take more than the libellous pen of Colonel Drew to break that reputation so far as we are concerned, and we all applaud Judge Davis when he says in his report:

> I think it right to say that there is no evidence (nor is there in the evidence any ground for suspicion) that the minister or the deputy minister or any officer or official of the Department of National Defence was guilty of any act of corruption or anything in the nature of corruption.

And it is well for the hon. minister to say that corruption has never been charged against anybody. They are going into their second trench of defence. When this article of Colonel Drew's came out, rumours were going around that there was a mighty scandal in this affair, and that Colonel Drew would prove it. We have the idea that this attempt to discredit Major General LaFleche is due to the fact that Colonel Drew and the Tories, and especially the Tories of his species, because there are good Tories, could not reconcile their ideas with the fact that Major General LaFleche is the head of a big spending department and yet of French extraction.

Mr. MANION: Nonsense.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): All right, but this was in the air last year, and we were all prepared for it.

Mr. MANION: That is filthy stuff.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The rumour was all around that there was going to be an attack upon General LaFleche. The hon. leader of the opposition was not in the house then.

Mr. MANION: I never knew of any such thing.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I said the hon. gentleman was not in the house. Well, it came out this year; it came out, if you will pardon me, Mr. Speaker, like an abscess, and it is not surprising because Colonel Drew is the man who said in Plainfield, Ontario, in November, 1936:

> It is not unfair to remind the French that they are a defeated race and that their rights are rights only because of the tolerance by the English element who, with all respect to the minority, must be regarded as the dominant race.

We put two and two together; we put this together with the rumour that we heard last year.

Mr. MANION: I think in justice to an absent gentleman, and a man who is just as courageous as General LaFleche, it should be said that Colonel Drew has denied that over and over again, and his denial has been accepted. There is an attempt being made now to make this an attack on the French Canadians. My wife is a French Canadian, and I would be ashamed to have anything to do with an attack on her race. I think it is filthy to attempt any such thing as my hon. friend is doing right now.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Colonel Drew is not here to deny it. This statement that I have read has been published in every newspaper and I never saw a denial of it.

Mr. MANION: He has denied it many times.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Well, I think he should deny it once more. All through his article that we were called upon to read before it appeared in the magazine there appeared to be jealousy of the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) and of his deputy minister, who have started doing something for national defence.

Several years ago Colonel Drew wrote that nothing was being done with regard to the defence of Canada, and as soon as something is started he condemns it. I have read the charge before the commission, and I have never found so many silly arguments put together, all of which prove the futility of his accusations. One of his points is that the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) tried to deceive the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) because, when he talked about this affair, he wrote "plants," plural, instead of "plant," singular, in his letter, although there are eighty acres of buildings in the old Inglis plant.

There are quite a number of arguments like that in Colonel Drew's charge before the commission, but I shall not take up the time of the house in discussing them. It has been said that a promoter is a man who, having an idea, meets another man who has money and seeks to deal with him, with the result that the man who has the money is left with the idea and the man who has the idea is left with the money. Colonel Drew, I understand, was superintendent under the Security Frauds Prevention Act, and this definition, in the work he had to do, must have stuck somewhere in his brain, because the main crime of Major Hahn and his group seemed to be that they were promoters. I am quite sure that Colonel Drew illustrates the meaning of the word "promoter" which I have just given to the house.

I wish to put on Hansard what the late Sir James MacBrien said about Major Hahn. Of course, to-day some hon. members who are attacking the contract are not aware of what Sir James MacBrien thought of Major Hahn. Let me quote Sir James MacBrien:

> It will be a source of satisfaction to many Canadians who served at the front in the recent war to learn that a book on The Intelligence Service within the Canadian corps has been written by Major J. E. Hahn, D.S.O., M.C. There are few Canadian soldiers so well qualified as he to write a book on this important branch of the military work as it was organized, developed and carried out in the Canadian corps during the course of the great war. His record at the front was a brilliant one. Except for periods when he was incapacitated through wounds, he served continuously with the Canadians in France and Belgium, and he has the honour of being one of the original members of the first Canadian division. A considerable portion of his service was as an intelligence staff officer with various formations, where he learned in the school of practical experience. Therefore, he brings special and valuable knowledge to bear on the subject of which he writes.

I wanted to put this on the record because of the attack that has been made against Major Hahn. The fact that a man was at one time a radio manufacturer, in the bad days while hon. gentlemen on the other side were leading the affairs of the country, with the result that his business went into receivership, is no reason why he should be blamed. I quite understand that these hon. gentlemen, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members, who are trying to have the greatest human quality, ambition, disappear from this good earth, are continually branding successful business men as public enemy No. 1, 2 or 3. I can understand that they might yell "shame." They are so narrow-minded that they would not even allow a business man to earn the income tax which they will require him to pay if, as and when they get into power.

Major Hahn got my friend the hon. member for Trinity to introduce him to the Minister of National Defence in order to get the contract. Where is the hon. member who has not solicited government contracts for some of his constituents? Is not a contract like the Bren gun one the best thing that could be secured for a constituency in which there is a labour element, such as Trinity? Let the electors of Trinity answer the question in the near future; but I do not advise Colonel Drew to run in Trinity in the next general election for the federal house, nor do I advise him to approach the district in the provincial field.

The question is not whether the contract should have been given to somebody else; it is whether there is ground for suspicion in the granting of the contract. I quoted the words of Mr. Justice Davis as to suspicion. The only points at issue, all of which have been answered by the commissioner to the complete exoneration of the Minister of National Defence and of everyone concerned, are the following: Is the contract a good one for the government? Is it being carried out according to schedule? And was the government right in not calling for public tenders?

The government had machinery that was idle in Valcartier and the government needed Bren machine guns. It would have cost a tremendous amount of money to build a government-owned plant, which might have been put only to temporary use. Every business man will understand that such a plant owned by the government could not have been used for anything but arms and munitions, and that the plant could not have been used to compete in the production of any ordinary line of steel products as against private producers. In this case the overhead expenses would have been exceedingly high, almost prohibitive. It was necessary to induce a manufacturer whose overhead expenses were partly absorbed by the manufacturing of some other goods to enter into a contract, and Major Hahn was found to be the proper man.

The statement to the public that the John Inglis Company had reorganized solely for the Bren gun contract is a premeditated misrepresentation. The commercial budget for the next five years provides for a business which is almost as high, apart from the Bren gun contract, as was done in the last good years of the John Inglis Company. It was furthermore discovered that the Canadian government and the company would both greatly benefit should a contract be obtained from the imperial government, then in dire need of help for the manufacture of arms and munitions. Major Hahn went to England with the necessary credentials to deal with the war office. He was found trustworthy and able to fulfil a contract for the manufacture of 5,000 machine guns. It is absolutely impossible to criticize this Canadian contract without at the same time criticizing the imperial contract. It has no bearing on the case, that Major Hahn went to England with the hon. member for Trinity or anyone else, or whether he waited five, ten or fifteen days before presenting his credentials. The net result is that he succeeded in bringing to Canada a good contract, which, coupled with the Canadian contract, will provide in Toronto a new industry and work for the citizens and at the same time lend a helping hand to the harassed war office.

During the inquiry an attempt was made to leave the public under the impression that the Department of National Defence had made a gift of the Valcartier machinery to the company; the hon. member who spoke before me (Mr. Homuth) repeated somewhat the same thing. Nothing is more—I would say more cowardly false. The machinery is lent to the company and, with the new machinery, remains entirely the property of the Canadian government. No hon. member has mentioned that in this discussion. Although one-third of the cost of the new machinery is paid by the war office, it remains the property of the Canadian government when the contract is terminated; and one-third of the cost of tools, et cetera is also paid by the war office, although they remain the property of the Canadian government. The Ross rifle plant furnished about one hundred machines out of four hundred required for the fulfilment of the contract. The Ross rifle machinery is valued at $212,000, while the new machinery is worth $964,000. By the signing of the contract the Canadian government immediately gained one-third of this amount, that is $321,000, plus one-third of the tools, dies, et cetera, worth more than $200,000. The argument that the government pays for everything, and a profit in addition, is childish in the light of these facts, and would not deceive even a village half-wit. What does it matter whether the government pays half the cost of the machinery or all of it? The profit is calculated on the cost, but the rental value of the machinery belonging to the government does not enter into consideration so far as the cost of production is concerned. This is one thing that hon. members who criticize the contract do not dare to say. The cost is calculated on the company's share of the assets only, not on the government's portion. If the plant and machinery were the property of the government, the profit would be calculated only on the cost of raw material, wages, and part of the overhead. It is absolutely unfair to compare this, a cost-plus contract, with a contract that a manufacturer would obtain if he were coming here. On a cost-plus contract the government has to pay all the cost, even the expenses of the man who went over there to learn what the Bren gun was. Now Mr. Sharp of the income tax branch calculated that the maximum profit would be 7·76 per cent, which is less than a reasonable profit in that kind of industry, as every business man will agree. Beyond all this there is a stipulation as to the maximum possible profit, $267,000, which is substantially less than 10 per cent.

Suffice it to say that Judge Davis, who cannot be said to be in the remotest way partial to this government, made three findings that have not been referred to by hon. members on the other side. These are that the contract was not subject to suspicion; that there were adequate powers of inspection, supervision and control; and that no substantial objection could be taken to the provisions of the contract. In view of this it cannot be said that the contract is not a good one for the government, as in fact it was found to be by the commissioner. In a cost-plus contract any good business man would charge depreciation on his machinery, and a fair rental value. Instead of being a gift to the John Inglis Company the use of the government's machinery reduces the cost and therefore reduces the profit. That made the Department of National Defence a partner in the contract. This is one point that I would ask my hon. friends the social crediters to remember, because that the government should own the plant is their ideal. Under this contract we can well say that Major Hahn is simply an employee of the government, working on a job basis. Everything belongs to the government except the machinery that was there which is going to be used.

It is a good contract. In spite of the fact that the inquiry was a serious handicap to its fulfilment, and that Colonel Drew and so many others asked that the work be stopped, work has been proceeding at high speed. Major Hahn got hold of Mr. Gillespie, the best expert of the Enfield plant, who had already planned the production of Bren guns in England, and the work under the contract is right up to schedule. When hon. gentlemen criticize and say they are simply putting the machine on in the plant, they are not absolutely fair. This is one contract, but it may well be divided into two. The simple fact of collecting all this machinery, assembling it and putting it to work is a big undertaking in itself. If it had to be done afresh it would take at least a year and a half or two years to get this plant together and ready to operate. There was no similar plant in Canada. When one considers the importance to Great Britain of having these Bren guns in the shortest time humanly possible, are we not justified in saying that the meagre pay given to Colonel Drew for his magazine article seems like treason money? It is not surprising that Colonel Drew's name is so well known in fascist circles in Canada. I suppose this is another statement that Colonel Drew will deny; but pamphlets were circulated in my province, and I have one here, in which Colonel Drew is named as one of the adepts of the fascist movement in Canada. This booklet is entitled, "Fascism over Canada," an exposé by Fred Rose, and on page 45 I read this:

> But Arcand and the forces of reaction have many other supporters in high places. Colonel George A. Drew is one of the people who is working for an alliance with Hepburn in Ontario and for a national government in Canada that would pave the way for fascism. The colonel travels from place to place, and under the guise of defending democracy, slanders most viciously all true democrats. Mr. Drew is honorary president of the Canadian Unity League, an organization financed by International Nickel for the purpose of combating trade union organizations. Such anti-labour organizations, using different names, exist throughout the country and are closely linked with the fascist movement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the hon. gentleman if that is by Fred Rose, the communist writer?

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear. No doubt it is.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I do not know Fred Rose, the communist writer. I know Fred Rose who wrote this book; I do not think he is a communist. If he is, I am surprised at the hon. member asking me; he should tell me whether he is a communist or not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member will be padlocked.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I am not afraid.

Was the government justified in not calling for tenders? To have an idea of what delay means in this matter I might say that twenty-one Bren guns were ordered by the national defence department from England at the beginning of March, 1937, and they were delivered in January of this year, although pressure was applied to expedite the order. One must keep in mind that this government had to deal with the war office and could not open the secret specifications and manufacturing processes to any firms that were not first accepted by the war office.

On February 4, 1938, Sir Harold Brown cabled Colonel LaFleche as follows:

> Must emphasize that any further delay may adversely affect the proposal. In this connection firm having done necessary technical investigation obviously has the advantage.

That firm was Major Hahn's. Then Colonel Loggie cabled General Caldwell as follows:

> Re visit war office affecting gun I am of firm opinion that immediate action is essential and that any delay will jeopardize whole transaction.

These gentlemen who were representing the war office were in a hurry, much more so than was Colonel Drew, who wanted to close the plant here. The war office made it absolutely clear, in February, 1938, in a cable sent by Sir Harold Brown to the deputy minister of national defence:

> —as regards alternative tenders several months would necessarily be required for another firm to study job before making reasonable tender. This delay would be fatal to British interests in scheme.

These three cables have not been mentioned very often by those who criticize the contract; yet they are the three things that explain why bids could not be invited from the general public. There had been an extended correspondence for the purpose of obtaining the consent of the British government to the calling of tenders. Before Hahn could get the specifications it was necessary to make him an official representative of the Canadian government; otherwise the war office would not give them. The manufacturing processes, called working specifications in England, were only furnished to Major Hahn upon execution of the contract. They were never even nominally in the possession of the defence department until that time. I do not remember who it was that made it almost a crime for this government to nominate Major Hahn as Canadian representative in London in order to deal with the British war office. Major Hahn, with his remarkable war record, was the man designated, and he fully deserves the confidence that the Canadian government has reposed in him. As I said before, he was also found trustworthy by the imperial government which, as I understand it, was not born yesterday. When they trust somebody, and award a contract of such value, they take some care and make some investigations somewhere. It is not for us to know where they made those investigations, but we are certainly justified in giving our confidence to Major Hahn. Then Sir Harold Brown cabled General LaFleche on February 9, 1938:

> Draft of Bren gun contract with John Inglis Company now agreed in detail by war office.

They were waiting for the Canadian government to conclude its contract, and the Canadian government was assured that the imperial contract with the war office would be signed if the Canadian contract was signed. This is clear evidence that the imperial government would not allow competitive bids, and if it would not do so the national defence department could not allow them either.

I am one of those who believe we still have a good deal to learn from British methods of doing things, and I would not dare to criticize those methods in a field in which we are still in our infancy. The Tories, to whom nothing is good unless it comes straight from the British isles, are apt to forget this at times. After all, we remember the purchasing of horses and potatoes without tenders. Not only were there no tenders called; the merchants were told to sell their merchandise through middlemen. There are no secret specifications in the breeding of horses or the growing of potatoes. Therefore I say that the question of the secrecy of the specifications, the necessity of moving quickly and avoiding delays and the sine qua non condition of the imperial government left the national defence department no other alternative, and on this point, as on so many others, the commissioner has completely upheld the government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not contend that there were no other manufacturers who could have satisfied the government as to their capacity to fulfil such a contract; but there is no proof whatever that anyone else did inquire about the matter or attempt to get the contract, and I for one am absolutely satisfied with the manner in which our government exercised its discretion. If to avoid a possible charge of political patronage this present government has to sign its contracts with social crediters, C.C.F.-ers and/or Conservatives, it is going to be too bad for more than half our Canadian citizens. When it was announced over a year ago that Great Britain would have aeroplanes and munitions manufactured in Canada, I read very little criticism and a great deal of praise. If this government had not taken the appropriate steps, instead of having them manufactured in Canada we would have had to buy the Bren machine guns somewhere else, and I do not know where, because England had its hands full with it own munitions program. Canada would have lost the English contract, which, after all, is going to be a factor in the labour world. In the opinion of many business men Colonel Drew's unfounded criticism and its repercussions might have resulted in many other contracts for arms and munitions being lost to Canadian manufacturers. So I say it is impossible to criticize this Canadian contract without explicitly criticizing the imperial contract as well.

I take this opportunity of congratulating the Minister of National Defence upon his courageous stand in these difficult circumstances. National defence has been terribly neglected since the great war. No one ever thought there would rise up aggressive nations which would challenge the combined forces of democracy; but when nations such as Germany, Italy and Japan are asking for territory and threatening to invade French colonies and even part of France itself; when they call for a new distribution of wealth, meaning territories, it is time for us who have such a large territory with such a small population to realize more than ever that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in the debate because I felt that during this session the question of the Bren gun contract would be dealt with again. But it is a matter of regret, I think, to every member of this house that more than twenty years after the end of the greatest conflict ever known, once again in this year 1939 we are faced with the spectre of that most diabolical organization known as the munitions manufacturers. After the experience not only of our country but of every other country in the world with the private manufacturer of arms and munitions, I thought there would be no more. During and before the war we had the experience of munitions manufacturers bleeding the nations white, cheating and chiselling on the taxpayers of this and every other country; an organization which knows no national boundaries but which has scuttled more peace conferences than any other body of men in existence. It was responsible for the failure of the League of Nations. More than that, it has played nation against nation.

The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Bertrand, Laurier) mentioned the group to which I belong, and drew the inference that we believed in the ownership of factories and the means of production. There is a great deal of merit in the ownership of the means of production, although hon. members in this group have never emphasized it. But if there is any industry in Canada which should be controlled and owned by the government, certainly it is the armament industry.

This was not a business deal; it was a gift to the John Inglis Company, so that at least their future prosperity would be assured.

I only wish that even half the terms or considerations so generously offered to the John Inglis Company could have been given to those people who during the past ten years have received very little consideration in the House of Commons. I refer to the youth of Canada. It is astounding to sit here day after day and listen to hon. members supporting the government defending a contract of this kind.

I have not gone through the whole of the report with great care, but from reading it once through one sees even on the surface some very objectionable features in the contract. The commissioner was instructed to report speedily to the governor in council and, having heard the evidence, to express any opinions he may have formed. But an endeavour was made to persuade him to express no opinion. Why?

The commissioner has placed before hon. members a document which gives the house an opportunity to judge for itself. As one hon. member put it to-day, we are the judge and jury. Another rather startling piece of evidence was the fact that a washing machine manufacturer was the Canadian representative to the British war office. I venture to predict that if this investigation continues much farther the sale of washing machines will rise sharply, because there will be a demand for them to wash out the dirty linen which will be the result.

May I place on Hansard some extracts which indicate the feelings of the people of Canada concerning contracts of this kind. Canadians are heartily sick and tired of paying through the nose for armaments. In passing I should not overlook the point that no tenders were called for. No other industry in this country had an opportunity to tender for the manufacture of these guns. As yet we have not had an explanation as to why that was done. It is not even the practice in government business to give a contract without at least calling for tenders from others who may wish to participate.

Another point on which I should like further information is whether or not the John Inglis Company sublet any contracts to others. I ask that because I know that on many occasions in connection with cost-plus jobs the "plus" is greater than the stated amount in the contract, and is a factor which the government or any investigating body may have difficulty in uncovering. Arrangements can easily be made whereby a sub-contractor supplying materials for the finished product could, unknown to the government, charge more. This has been more or less common practice in connection with cost-plus jobs.

In the Financial Post of January 22, we read the following:

Bren Inquiry Amply Vindicated.

The report of Hon. H. H. Davis on the Bren contract provides sensational corroboration for every charge made by Colonel George A. Drew in the Maclean's magazine article that precipitated the inquiry. It goes further and brings out evidence of incompetence on the part of the Department of National Defence.

Justice Davis finds no evidence of "corruption" but no corruption was charged in Maclean's magazine article or anywhere else, so far as the Financial Post knows. The commissioner finds it "inexpedient" to comment upon the actions of Minister of Defence (Ian Mackenzie); of General LaFleche, his deputy; of Hugh Plaxton, Toronto M.P., who figured so prominently in the contract negotiations or of Major Hahn, who got the contract in such a mysterious way.

But while the commissioner accepts the legal position raised by counsel representing the Inglis and Plaxton companies as to the limitations of the report he could make and as to his being prevented from making a finding which criticized anyone, he isolates and publishes the evidence that will enable any citizen or member of parliament to judge for himself whether Mr. Mackenzie and his deputy were or were not derelict in the awarding, without tender, and without careful selection of the contractor of this, the first important munitions contract in Canada since the rearmament program began.

The importance of this investigation does not lie so much in this one isolated contract. With events as they are to-day in the world there is every indication that we as part of the British empire shall from year to year, unless conditions in Europe change for the better, increase our appropriations for armaments. I believe Colonel Drew has performed a public service in having brought about the investigation. Without it the evidence now before the house would not be public property, and there might be a repetition of the condition which existed in Canada during war years. It was only after the expenditure of huge sums of money by the government that it became publicly known that exorbitant prices had been charged for war materials.

This is what the Winnipeg Tribune has to say, under the heading, "Ian Mackenzie Should Resign"—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should not quote newspaper articles making personal allusions to a member.

Mr. POOLE: I shall submit to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I have listened to many newspaper extracts being read in this house during the past few days.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order and it is my duty to inform him.

Mr. POOLE: I would draw your attention, sir, to the fact that the hon. member who preceded me quoted from a communist newspaper.

Mr. SPEAKER: Had I been in the chair I would have stopped him.

Mr. POOLE: We shall forget about newspaper comments for the moment, but there will be more of them in the future. The important matter before parliament at the present time is to remember the conditions which were brought about in the armament industry during the war and to see that they are not repeated. I think the best way to go about that and to see that the public shall not be victimized is for the government to cancel this contract and assume whatever loss may be incurred. I believe that would be cheaper in the long run. We should give serious consideration to utilizing the plant and equipment there is at present in Canada. Much of this is wholly or partly idle. There are many men in this country who have a certain training which would be useful to the production of Bren or other guns. We have the Canadian National railway shops and thousands of idle men. Surely these buildings and this labour could be utilized. We could provide our own equipment. If that were done, there would be no necessity for investigations of this kind.

It is well known that the armament industry in general has contributed nothing toward peace, but has fomented war and internal strife wherever possible. The time to stamp out that sort of thing is now, not ten years hence. You cannot help people by expressing platitudes and regrets. Let each and every party in this house remember what occurred in the past and provide for the protection of the public in the future. The time to do it is now. It is an iniquitous practice, in my opinion, to let contracts privately for the manufacture of armaments. We are laying the foundations for the growth of the most insidious organization the world has ever known.

For further information in this regard I would refer the hon. members to the report of a committee which sat in the United States to study the munitions industry and report on the activities and sales of munitions companies. This report contains quite recent evidence and tells of the activities of these people at Geneva. It describes how they supplied both China and Japan with arms and furnished both sides in Spain with armaments. They are said to have fomented strife in the South American republics. There is no reason to believe that an armament industry which might be created in this country will be any different from any other armament industry. As a matter of fact, the industry has within itself the seed of all these things. It can afford to pay thousands of dollars to lobbyists in order to persuade influential members of parliament and those in responsible positions in government to pass certain laws to give it liberty to extract its dreadful toll over a long period of years.

I said when I rose in my place that I was not going into the details of this contract. My only reason for rising was to sound a warning. While I did attempt to quote some newspaper articles, I must say that I am not impressed with all of them. I know that political advantage is taken of a matter of this kind. It is in the interests of the Liberal party to remedy the condition that exists. I feel that there are many members who sit on the government benches who believe that we should be most careful in handling the production of armaments and munitions. The time has arrived when these matters should be under the control of the government. It is in the public interest that this work should be done in our own factories. Only in that way can we be assured that there will be no recurrence of the iniquitous practices of the past.

On motion of Mr. Turgeon the debate was adjourned.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Public Works on behalf of his majesty to enter into an agreement to pay to the corporation of the city of Ottawa the sum of $100,000 for the year ending July 1, 1939.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CREATION OF DEFENCE PURCHASING BOARD TO ENTER INTO CONTRACTS FOR MUNITIONS, EQUIPMENT, MATERIALS AND SUPPLIES

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a defence purchasing board with exclusive power, subject to approval of the governor in council, to enter into all contracts for the purchase of munitions, equipment, materials and supplies required by the Department of National Defence in cases where the expenditure exceeds $5,000; to provide safeguards to assure that such munitions, equipment, materials and supplies shall be purchased at a reasonable cost to the government and without unreasonable profit to any manufacturer or supplier thereof; to provide that salaries, wages and other expenses of the board shall be payable out of moneys appropriated by parliament.

To authorize the governor in council to borrow such sums of money as may be required to pay expenditures of the Department of National Defence which are chargeable to capital account in the appropriations provided by parliament for the said department; and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to retire in ten years the said sums borrowed for capital expenditures of the said department, together with interest thereon at three per cent per annum.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PENITENTIARIES

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION WITH POWERS OF ADMINISTRATION AND CONTROL

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a commission with power under the Minister of Justice to administer, control and manage the penitentiaries; to provide for salaries of the commissioners and assistant commissioners; and, generally, to repeal and reenact with consequential amendments the Penitentiary Act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO EXTEND AVAILABILITY OF BALANCE OF APPROPRIATION FOR THE NEXT FIVE FISCAL YEARS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (for Mr. Rogers) moved that the house go into committee to-morrow to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Technical Education Act to make available, for the purposes of the act, any portion of the unexpended appropriation during the period of five years succeeding the fiscal year ending March 31, 1939.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government would have liked to move the house into committee of supply to-night, not with a view to taking supply this evening but solely in order that some supply may be taken up in the latter part of the week should we be through with the Bren gun debate before Thursday or Friday. I understand that hon. gentlemen opposite do not wish the government to take any supply at this stage, and if that is the case I would move the adjournment of the house.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the attitude that has been taken both by this group and by the party to my left has been taken because private members' resolutions—nobody is to blame for this—have been practically pushed off the order paper. There were no private members' resolutions taken on Monday; the situation will be the same to-morrow, and private members felt that they had some rights to demand for their resolutions on the order paper. The taking of supply was not particularly objectionable so far as we are concerned except from the standpoint of private members, and I just wanted to make that clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to the hon. leader of the opposition that as far as private members are concerned, Wednesday is their day, and their right to debate private members' motions on Wednesday will not be affected at all by our going into supply to-night. Monday also is private members' day, and that would not be affected by our taking supply to-night. But on Friday, which is not private members' day at all but a government day, we might wish to take supply, say in the evening, and we would be precluded from doing so without unanimous consent if we had not previously called an item in one or more departments on Monday or Tuesday. It is a technical rule the house has imposed, but perhaps when the time comes the house will be willing to give us unanimous consent to take supply on Friday should we be short of other measures to take up on that day.

Mr. MANION: Can the right hon. gentleman tell me in what order these government resolutions will be taken up to-morrow if we get through with the discussion on the Bren gun?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government resolutions will not be touched at all. It will be private members' day, and their resolutions will be taken in the order in which they appear on the order paper. I have just been anticipating the business for Thursday and Friday.

Motion agreed to, and the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Wednesday, February 8, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR REFERENCE TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacNeil:

That the agreement between the government and the John Inglis Company, of Toronto, for the manufacture of Bren machine guns, the report of the royal commission dealing with said agreement, and all related documents, evidence, vouchers and exhibits, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stevens.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on this matter I am going to try to represent the opinions of my own section of the country and at the same time be true to the oath of office which I took before occupying my seat in this house.

There is no doubt that when the article in question appeared in Maclean's magazine last September, the article with which the whole country is now familiar, the minds of the Canadian people were troubled. A good many of them did not see that article when it was first published, but I believe later on the publishers of Maclean's magazine found it possible to spread the article into every section of the country. To anyone who took the trouble to read it, however, it was plain that it contained no concise accusations but only insinuations against people in the public life of this country. more particularly in regard to the Department of National Defence. Something had to be done; the newspapers were asking for action on the part of the government. Then, a very few days following the publication of the article, the newspapers of Canada were unanimous in praising the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for appointing a royal commission. That step was taken at once, and by that action the Prime Minister and the government showed themselves ready and willing to get to the bottom of all these insinuations or so-called accusations.

On Friday of last week the Prime Minister again showed his honesty and sincerity of purpose in connection with all matters having to do with the administration of this country and the government departments when he stated in the house that he did not wish in any way to curtail discussion on any important problem. He also made it clear, however, that the best body to deal impartially with a question such as this was a committee appointed by the House of Commons, which naturally would be the public accounts committee. No one could take objection to or umbrage at such a statement or the taking of such action. Public opinion as expressed by the press of the country was unanimous in commending the action of the Prime Minister on this occasion.

But it is easy to build up partisan capital. The Prime Minister last fall in appointing a royal commissioner was careful to select a man who—not mentioning his political affiliations—was highly respected in his own profession and had made a name for himself as a lawyer in Canada. However, I was dumbfounded when from every section of the opposition I heard the action of the Prime Minister challenged, and heard the references that were made to his statement not that the commissioner was the supporter of any particular party but simply that he had been appointed by the late administration. I could easily visualize what bitter criticism there would have been had a man been selected who before his appointment had had Liberal inclinations. I repeat that the people have been absolutely satisfied, in their own minds, that the Prime Minister of Canada and the government as a whole wanted to have justice meted out, and to go thoroughly into the accusations that were made.

Frankly in a discussion of this kind I do not like the atmosphere of the House of Commons. Allegations of scandal have been made in a good many instances. I do not believe the country wants to hear discussions of that nature carried on by the opposition for days and weeks.

Before I proceed farther I want to ask a question of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). Last week it was published in every section of the press of Canada that he had been threatened by a prominent man of the Liberal party. I would like the hon. member to give us the name of that prominent man.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A prominent official of the house.

Miss MACPHAIL: Well, I guess you have the right party, anyway.

Mr. BRADETTE: I did not ask a question of the hon. member for Grey-Bruce; I asked it of the hon. member for Vancouver North. It was said that he had been threatened. This is absolutely unfair—unfair to his reputation, unfair to the government, and unfair to parliament as a whole. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) smiles. Yesterday the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) gave us some of the philosophy of life of the hon. leader of the opposition, so far as the conduct, behaviour and policy of an opposition are concerned. I believe it will be good reading for the young members of his own party, to show the attitude he takes, but they cannot agree to such a philosophy.

I was five years in opposition, Mr. Speaker, and I believe I could say that—

Mr. LENNARD: You may be there again.

Mr. BRADETTE: I want the hon. member to speak louder.

Mr. LENNARD: You will be there again.

Mr. BRADETTE: Well, I do not think the hon. member is a very good prophet. I never opposed a government of the day just for the sake of opposing it.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member is a perfect saint.

Mr. BRADETTE: I want the hon. member to get up and repeat what he said just now, so that he may show his face to the house. We can easily see their line of conduct. Last week there was a Conservative caucus, and I believe hon. members opposite, in their action in opposition, are following the principle of their leader. This is the press report which was published in the newspaper Le Droit of February 2, 1939. The heading is as follows:—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. PELLETIER: One of the members of this group tried last night to read a quotation from a newspaper, but he was not permitted to do so. The same ruling should apply to all hon. members.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am satisfied to state simply the contents of the article. It says that the Conservative party is very happy about the present depression in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BRADETTE: There it is in black and white. And so the party follows implicitly the policy of its leader.

Mr. MANION: Did they have a representative at our caucus, do you suppose?

Mr. BRADETTE: Apparently it was given to the press by one of their own members, by the sanction of the caucus.

An hon. MEMBER: Promises put you in power.

Mr. BRADETTE: We can easily see right through all the policies of the Conservative party for the last ten years. We all remember the famous campaign they tried to run on the customs scandal. We remember in the following year the Margaret and the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), again a question of scandal. We remember what one of the members of the Conservative party said in North Bay, when he accused the whole of the public servants of this country.

An hon MEMBER: Beauharnois.

Mr. BRADETTE: You remember the Beauharnois scandal—I am speaking about that now and how they throttled that. What they did made it a good deal worse than what it was previously. Everyone knows that. And during the last two years in the House of Commons we had the spectacle of the then leader of the Conservative party and his supporters—trying to bring about a solution of the problems of this country?—no, no; trying to bring about scandals and to cast slurs upon the parliamentary system of Canada.

Again we had the sorry spectacle, in five successive weeks, of the then leader of the opposition, in the kindness of his heart, and in the light of the great friendship he professed for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), trying to place that public servant in the infamy of scandal. He tried for four or five weeks, talking about a yard of gravel, penny ante stuff, bitter, unfounded denunciation, while all the time we were trying to solve the problems of this country.

Mr. MANION: I would like the hon. member to make it clear that he is not referring to me.

Mr. BRADETTE: I do so. I am not referring to the present leader of the opposition, but I will refer to him now. Ever since he was made leader of his party we have heard of scandals. They have been capitalizing on the depression, the same as the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has been doing, for the last ten years. I repeat that—capitalizing on the misery of the Canadian people, on every occasion and under every circumstance that they could. At least one thing is in the favour of the group in the corner; certainly they never have had the responsibility of government. That would have sobered them up. But members of the Conservative party did have the responsibility of government, and when they had that responsibility they asked for cooperation from us, and they got it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BRADETTE: They laugh; but he laughs best who laughs last. Their hon. leader is laughing now. I well remember the spring of 1935 when their then leader brought forth the new magna charta of his own party. He came to the house with a program of a new social order, one which was absolutely in sympathy with our own policies. The government of that day—even the present leader of the opposition, then sitting on this side of the house as minister of railways and canals—accused us of not opposing enough the government of the day. Was that not cooperation with a vengeance?

Mr. MANION: It is imagination with a vengeance.

Mr. BRADETTE: No. I was there, and I am not imagining things, I can assure you.

An hon. MEMBER: Was the hon. member—

Mr. BRADETTE: I would ask the Social Credit party to mind their own little boat. The late lamented Sir George Perley, who was taking the place of the prime minister, who had taken ill about Easter time, accused us bitterly of not opposing the government enough. If that was not the best kind of cooperation a government could expect, then I do not know what they expected; and they received the same treatment during the five years that they were in power.

The leader of the opposition gave us his opinion as to the best speech delivered in the present session on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. To some extent I have no quarrel with him. He said that in his opinion the best speech had been delivered by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). I cannot agree with him on that score. In my opinion the best speech from the opposition side was that delivered by the hon. member for Yukon (Mrs. Black). She did not attempt to raise the dust of scandal; she did not try to embarrass the government in its efforts to solve the problems that are facing the country at the present time, although she criticized some of the government's actions. She spoke as a true representative in this parliament of her constituents and the people of Canada. She told the house that some responsibility rested upon the government. That is quite true, but it rests also on all individual members. She also told us she felt that in some instances it was our responsibility that young people of Canada should be told that they had a duty toward themselves as well as toward our institutions as we know them.

The leader of the opposition gave us a sort of lecture which was made up of nothing but insinuations. He made no direct accusation. He made it plain that he was absolutely certain that there was no corruption as far as the Bren gun contract was concerned. I ask and the people of northern Ontario ask why the time of the house is taken up in this way when we should be trying to solve the problem of unemployment, the problem of agriculture, and the other problems that face this dominion. This action is being taken simply as political strategy on the part of the opposition. I make this declaration and accusation deliberately. The leader of the opposition spoke his mind very openly. He said, speaking of the commissioner, that Davis "did it in a sort of subtle manner." That is a fine phrase to come from the mouth of the leader of the opposition in connection with a matter of this kind. That is a fine thing to say about a man who is recognized as having given his best for successive weeks, and as being absolutely fair to everyone concerned. The present leader of the Conservative party, a party which once was great, has this to say about Mr. Justice Davis. Later on he called this a game. Certainly, it is a game which he has been playing since last Monday. It is a game of political strategy. He said he wanted to go ahead with his story. It was a biased story he told, but not a wonderful story for the people of Canada to read and agree with. If it were possible for all the citizens of Canada to be here during this debate, I am sure they would realize that we are not fulfilling our duties as we should, and that this discussion is absolutely futile.

Mr. MANION: Just now particularly. Why does the hon. member not deal with the charge?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is no charge.

Mr. MANION: The charge of blundering and bungling.

Mr. BRADETTE: Who brought up this discussion before the House of Commons?

An hon. MEMBER: The government.

Mr. BRADETTE: Who is responsible for the debate of the last three days?

Mr. MANION: We are.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am glad to hear that. I know I am expressing the sentiments of ninety per cent of the Canadian people who deplore such foolish actions on the part of the opposition.

Mr. BARBER: Why does the hon. member not answer the argument?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is no argument.

Mr. BRADETTE: There has never been one. We have heard many speeches from the opposition since the beginning of this debate, but the only one which was at all practical was that delivered yesterday by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), who scrutinized certain factors in the contract. We find a very strange situation in this debate. The Conservative party, which is in favour of national defence, finds it necessary as a matter of political expediency to work hand in glove with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the Social Credit party. I saw hon. members opposite going into a huddle yesterday, but I have not found out what it is all about. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation apparently is playing into the hands of the opposition. This may be political expediency because we must admit that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is one of the most militant parties in the House of Commons at the present time. But they are against national defence, although at the time of the Ethiopian war they were willing to impose sanctions against Italy. That would have amounted to a declaration of war against Italy. This is the same party which during the crisis last year over the Japanese situation sent a telegram to Mr. Attlee, leader of the Labour party in the House of Commons of Great Britain. This telegram read:

> Large numbers of Canadians deeply shocked by recent developments in Britain government's foreign policy which entirely disregard interest of dominions and betray democracy. We look confidently to labour party to champion genuine collective security and constructive peace policy.

This great pacifist party were willing to impose sanctions against Japan; they were willing to prevent the exportation of war materials. They knew that this would have simply meant a declaration of war on Japan.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Nonsense.

Mr. BRADETTE: Who said "nonsense?"

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I did.

Mr. BRADETTE: Then the hon. member is not responsible for what he says. The hon. member should know that. These hon. members who do not want this country to have any national defence are willing to work with the opposition during this debate. But they are ready to vote against their own resolution which shows their sincerity.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not true.

Mr. BRADETTE: It is absolutely true. You cannot explain that away no matter how hard you try.

Mr. MacNEIL: On a point of order; the hon. gentleman's statement is inaccurate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacNEIL: I ask the hon. member to withdraw his statement. We voted in connection with a ruling of the chair.

Mr. BRADETTE: I have nothing to withdraw. I have been in this house long enough to know something of the rules. I know that when hon. members vote for an amendment to a resolution they have moved, they are voting against their own motion.

Mr. MacINNIS: We did not vote for the amendment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Why did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) go out?

Mr. BRADETTE: Apparently the Conservative party expects to win the next election because of a scandal. I am no prophet, but I am sure they will be out of luck, because the Canadian people want more than the talk of scandal. We have heard the statement made time and time again by the opposition that there was no corruption or anything with which to reproach anyone in connection with this matter. I believe the Canadian people are fully seized of the situation and satisfied on that score. Let me say that if I thought for one moment—I am accepting full responsibility for my words in this instance—that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) or the deputy minister of that important department had been guilty of any breach of faith, I would be the first one in this house to ask for the resignation of the minister. I am sure that many other hon.

members on this side would be of the same mind. I remember the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who said that the party might go down to defeat, but we could never allow high ideals and principles to be cast away. That is also the stand of the Liberal party in this connection.

I have great respect for the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). I have always listened to his remarks with attention and, I believe, with some benefit to myself. But when he spoke the other night he had this to say:

> That is the gist of the report of the commissioner. And the Prime Minister's wish is that this matter should be referred to the public accounts committee. Rarely if ever in my fourteen years in this house has the public accounts committee met—

It certainly has met on several occasions. The hon. member continues:

> —but from a reading of Canadian political history in years before that I find that the public accounts committee has been the ground for the fiercest sort of political battle. The government of the day would have the majority representation on that committee—

Mr. STEWART: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRADETTE: I hear the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) say "hear, hear."

Mr. STEWART: I have been there.

Mr. BRADETTE: So have I. I must have been fooled because for five years when my Conservative friends were in power I sat on some committees. I was interested in the work of those committees and I never thought for one moment that those committees were being used for political purposes purely and simply.

Mr. STEWART: Who said they were?

Mr. BRADETTE: I was a member last year of several committees. For instance, there was the superannuation committee which sat for weeks on end. On that committee there were Conservative members and members of other parties in this house, but I do not think there is a single member who will say that we played politics on that committee.

An hon. MEMBER: Sure.

Mr. BRADETTE: Who is the hon. member who says "sure"? I want him to rise in his place and show himself. But he will not do it. There were no politics played on that committee, and if we can have no faith in the committees of this House of Commons we might just as well abandon the Canadian parliamentary system.

Again, how logical are the Conservative members with themselves? They do not want this question to go to the public accounts committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BRADETTE: They want it discussed on the floor of this house, where it is absolutely impossible for us to get all the data and information we should like to have. They know that perfectly well. Suppose a vote is taken in the house; we know the wonderful work that has been done by the Minister of National Defence and by his deputy, the great work that the minister has accomplished in the last three years since he took over the Department of National Defence in the moribund, sadly neglected state in which it was left by the former Conservative government after they had been five years in office, although what they did may have been right from the point of view of economy; after all that the minister has done for the department, with its numerous ramifications in every section of this great country, surely he is entitled to a word of praise, and would hon. gentlemen opposite expect us to vote against the minister and against the government? I say most emphatically no.

I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that if they will only be fair to themselves and with the institution of parliament, not one of them would have the audacity to say that a committee of this house is purely and simply a political battleground. If it is, Mr. Speaker, then so far as I am concerned I want my name to be erased from any committee of this house of which I am a member.

I was astounded at the hon. member for Yale, who did show some statesmanship as a minister of the government, making a charge of that kind, which was simply saying to the people of Canada that our parliamentary system is not worthy of being continued in existence any longer. I have sat with Conservative members on different committees, and they were fair and unbiased in their consideration of matters coming before such committees. I have also sat with members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in the committees of this house, and they too were fair and unbiased. The same will hold true again when this matter is referred to the public accounts committee. But you can never please hon. gentlemen opposite primarily for the very good reason that they want to make political capital out of the situation. The government appointed as a commissioner to inquire into this matter one of the best qualified judicial minds in the country, and still hon. gentlemen opposite are not satisfied with the report that he has made and submitted to parliament for discussion in the house.

I want now to deal briefly with some of the facts that were brought out in the report.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRADETTE: My friend of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation party says "hear, hear." Only a short time ago one of their members criticized the house because we enjoyed a smile, but let me tell the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and his party that it would be better for them if they too would smile sometimes instead of trying to capitalize on misery. It would be better if they had red blood running through their veins insead of "blue ruin" at all times. They have tried to make political capital out of the Bren gun contract.

I ask the hon. leader of the opposition now, if the Bren gun contract were cancelled, can he tell us where he would get the Bren gun made more cheaply?

An hon. MEMBER: Sure.

Mr. BRADETTE: Then go ahead and tell us.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What is the cost at the present time?

Mr. BRADETTE: It is stated in the contract.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is not.

Mr. BRADETTE: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, it is; and that just shows how unfair hon. gentlemen are in their criticisms. They criticize the price when they do not even know it. They criticize the contract when they have not even seen it. The contract states that for the first 1,000 guns the price is to be $487; for the next 3,000, $314; for the next 6,000, $294; for the next 2,000, $294.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They never heard of that before.

Mr. BRADETTE: No, they never heard of that before.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is that all they cost?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot ask a question except with the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I was given his permission, Mr. Speaker, and I ask him now, will he give the total cost?

Mr. BRADETTE: I am sorry I cannot hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I asked, what is the total cost?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would remind the hon. member that the house is not in committee, and he cannot ask questions without permission.

Mr. BRADETTE: In this discussion—

Mr. STEWART: Comedy!

Mr. BRADETTE: I want the hon. member to retract that statement. His party is wholly responsible for that debate. I was going on to say, Mr. Speaker, that the great Conservative party, which has been so loyal at all times so far as British and Canadian interests are concerned, is slipping very badly at the present time. The problem of the Bren gun is not like any other question arising in connection with some other department.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRADETTE: Someone says "hear, hear," and I assume he is absolutely in agreement with me because in this discussion parliament should be fully seized of the seriousness of the international situation. Let us never forget in our discussion of this matter that in the British war office and in the Department of National Defence in Canada there are records which must of necessity remain secret and departmental. This is so true that we find in countries like Germany and France their own citizens have been gaoled and executed for giving away to other countries secrets relating to armaments. I see the leader of the opposition laughing. Is he laughing at that statement?

Mr. MANION: No, I am laughing at the hon. member.

Mr. BRADETTE: I can tell the hon. gentleman that he looks very, very undignified before the Canadian public at the present time, when he makes such personal reflections. Would he say that there is no secret in the whole Department of National Defence that should not be kept secret from the public?

Mr. MANION: I will answer the hon. gentleman's question. When I was overseas defending the secrets of this country, my hon. friend was flitting around Canada doing nothing.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am going to answer my hon. friend. I was in uniform. I went to enlist voluntarily. If I did not do any active service it was on account of defective eyesight. I want the leader of the opposition to retract his statement. Parading their loyalty like peacocks! The people are sick of that kind of stuff; the real returned man will never make a statement like that made by the leader of the opposition. Let him withdraw it. I tell him again that there are some secrets which the British war office does not disclose, and the Department of National Defence has matters which remain departmental secrets.

Mr. MacNEIL: Except for Major Hahn.

Mr. BRADETTE: Just imagine the hon. member making such a statement at the present time. It needs a great deal of patience sometimes not to say what we have in our minds on certain matters; capitalizing on these little things and not giving to hon. members the right to state their honest opinions. The hon. member for Vancouver North knows well that France, Great Britain and Australia have some secrets that they will never allow to be made public. They will allow them to be disclosed to a parliamentary committee sitting in camera, but never to the wide world. Hon. members know that perfectly well, but never mentioned it during the present debate. On a good many occasions during the hearings of the commission the deputy minister was shaking his head from the sidelines because of infringement on some of the departmental secrets. Surely the leader of the opposition will not try to bring up against General LaFleche what he tried to throw at me a moment ago.

Mr. MANION: I did not reflect on General LaFleche at all in any shape or form.

Mr. BRADETTE: These are matters that we must not forget. My hon. friends have made great capital out of Major Hahn. As far as I am concerned I have no brief for him; I never met him. But what has he done to be pilloried and crucified for, as he has been during the past three days? Has he not a good war record also? Is it not true that he is a good citizen and even a good industrialist and manufacturer?

An hon. MEMBER: We do not know.

Mr. BRADETTE: My hon. friends do not want to know; that is why. There is none so blind as those who will not see. Then in Lieutenant Colonel Drew's article insinuations and reflections are made against the reputation of a whole family. After knowing what has been brought out, having read the report of the commissioner, I must say to the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) that if I had been in his position I would have done exactly what he did. No hon. member, no party, not even Colonel Drew has the right to make insinuations against a whole family. What crime has the hon. member for Trinity committed? Only the crime of trying to work for his constituency, to bring an industry to the city of Toronto. I did not think they were so well off there as far as employment is concerned that he did wrong in that. Is there anything wrong? The leader of the opposition said there has been no corruption. It is true some details of the contract have been criticized; there are varying opinions pro and con, but have my hon. friends ever been in a law court and listened to the pleadings on one side and the other where a contract is involved? In this instance the opposition have never been fair; they are simply trying to pollute the mind of the Canadian people, and falsify the import of the report. They have not listened to the debate in this house for the last three days with an open mind, because if they had they would not be able to make political capital out of the situation as Colonel Drew has done.

Coming again to Major Hahn, after reading his testimony before the royal commission I am convinced that he is a capable man qualified to have and complete properly this contract. He was able to convince the British war office of his competency and to get also a contract from Great Britain which provides employment for our Canadian people, and, what is more, opens the way for further similar and other contracts.

Let me say a word about the conscription of industry. It is interesting to see the most reactionary party hand in hand with the radical party in this house urging the nationalization of industry. I am quite open-minded on the question of nationalization of war industries. But in Canada we are in the happy position that as far as socialism, communism, fascism and nazism are concerned, we can let other countries experiment with them. As regards munition manufacture we have the experience of France, that great ally of Great Britain. They have their popular front, a radical and labour government; they nationalized their aviation industry, and I refer to a report that was given dealing briefly with that matter.

One of the legacies of the popular front, state manufacture of armaments, has been held responsible for France's weakness in aircraft. This in turn was a compelling factor in the acceptance of the Munich agreement.

This should show my friends of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation that public ownership in certain industries is not desirable. On this matter even the interdepartmental committee were not in agreement. My hon. friends who are in favour of the nationalization of the munitions industry have been against all the votes for national defence; yet they would have this country enter upon an expenditure, for equipment alone, of at least $100,000,000. It is well to look before we leap on that important question, and I am speaking in all seriousness.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BRADETTE: A fine laugh I get from the other side. I am speaking as a democrat, a Liberal and a progressive in making that statement. Governments have the human failings that others have. No one can make me believe that if in the present instance the government had started to build the Bren gun, the guns could have been produced in any shorter time or at a cheaper price. We all saw something of the orgies of profiteering during the great war. In northern Ontario the provincial government experimented in mining under so-called public ownership on a small scale in the silver mining industry in the district of Cobalt, where it was a complete failure. When an opportunity arises, I hope to be able to enlarge on that question of public manufacturing of war material.

Mr. J. A. MARSH (Hamilton West): The observations I have to make will be very brief. On several occasions I believe I have violated in some measure the tradition of this seat I now hold. I believe my predecessor was once heard to say from this desk that if he ever spoke more than fifteen minutes he hoped some one would ring the bell on him. And it may be within the memory of the house that it did happen on one occasion that someone with a sense of humour rang a bell in the lobby.

This matter that we are debating calls for some heart-searching. It behooves every hon. member, whether in the government or the opposition, to do that heart-searching. I will speak on the principle of this question rather than the details and the evidence; the latter has been amply covered by hon. members.

I am mindful of the fact that some twenty years ago almost half a million young men, the flower of Canada's manhood, left these shores to fight for Canada and the empire. They wore army boots on which exorbitant profits had been made, and they ate bully beef, some of which was not fit to eat, but on the profits of which men at home had waxed sleek and fat. I believe it is the mind and will of every hon. member of this house and every man in a position of leadership in this country and every last man, woman and child in Canada that this shall not be repeated in the year of our Lord 1939. I am equally sure that the brave soldier sitting on the government benches as Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) will do everything humanly possible to see that it does not happen again; for I believe he has qualities of mind and heart that will enable him to do a good job.

An hon. MEMBER: That could not have happened with a Liberal government.

Mr. MARSH: It has happened here and now; make no mistake about that. For the last two days we have been engaged in debate on this report and I defy anyone who has read it from cover to cover not to condemn the way in which this contract was handled.

Mr. HOWARD: That is your opinion.

Mr. MARSH: The evidence has been gone into very fully by various members. The member for High Park (Mr. Anderson), the member for London, our leader (Mr. Manion), the member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross), the member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), our orator friend the member for South Waterloo (Mr. Homuth), have all gone into the evidence, and, I believe, have dealt with the matter strictly on the evidence. They did not attempt to lay any smoke screen across the issue as some hon. gentlemen have done. Usually I am a great admirer of the legal mind, but I must confess that when the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), who I am sorry is not in his place, said to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) that he had made a masterly presentation of a bad case, I could not help thinking that the member for Parry Sound himself had made a marvellous effort on no case at all. He was simply laying a smoke screen. Then there was the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). I am quite an admirer of his, but I submit that yesterday when he spoke we were treated to a pantomime, because the merits of the case were not discussed. And now we have listened to the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). The legal mind was in operation, going through marvellous mental gymnastics, but not dealing with the evidence. The member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) was right yesterday when he remarked that it was a good thing that we have had a laugh, because, goodness knows, there have been some serious faces and some very much embarrassed people in this house in the last few days, and they have not been on our side.

Mr. GARDINER: You should sit over here and see what we see on your front bench.

Mr. MARSH: We soon will.

Mr. EULER: You don't see them.

Mr. MARSH: Now here is a contract awarded to a boiler factory, a broken-down boiler factory at that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh no.

Mr. MARSH: Well, there is nothing in the evidence, and no arguments have been advanced, to the contrary.

Mr. GARDINER: They made munitions all through the last war.

Mr. MARSH: Yes. That was twenty-five years ago but there has been a great change in the manufacture of instruments of war.

Mr. GARDINER: And no one has made any since.

Mr. MARSH: I repeat, here is a broken-down boiler factory receiving a contract for the manufacture, mark you, of a deadly, delicate precision instrument, where tolerances of a thousandth of an inch are a common practice. I say that this is a form of departmental stupidity which I am utterly at a loss to understand. At the same time there are throughout Canada many firms in our cities, in Toronto, Hamilton, London, Welland, St. Catharines, capable of making precision ordnance and making it well.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where?

Mr. MARSH: I have already told you. If the hon. gentleman would like me to enumerate some of the plants I should be glad to do so. This business was handed for negotiation to a man who had had no experience in the making of munitions of war. It was given to a company which was not equipped to turn out a product of this sort, a firm of very doubtful financial responsibility. I suggest that this is not a very auspicious start in the spending of $63,000,000.

I said that I would not go into the evidence, but inasmuch as some exception has been taken to what I have said I think I ought to refer to one part of Mr. Justice Davis's findings:

> Notwithstanding that the contract involves the expenditure of several millions of dollars by the Canadian government, no industrial producer (other than Major Hahn) was consulted by the Department of National Defence as to the proposed manufacture of Bren guns for the Canadian government or invited to give competitive bids for terms of manufacture. Nor did anyone, so far as the evidence shows, ever visit any industrial plant (except Inglis) to consider the possibility of production of Bren guns in Canada. Mr. Hellmuth put certain questions to the minister in this connection to which, with the answers, I now refer:—
> Q. You did not give anybody else a chance?
> A. Nobody asked for it.

I will not give what follows; it is simply an elaboration of what I have read. Sir, I would not buy a pair of boots in that way with my own money; how much less should the department use the taxpayers' money to buy instruments of war? I submit that the stewardship of money is not a virtue in the department. If it is they have not shown it in this contract. The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) wrote to the Prime Minister a letter a part of which I will read:

> A group of friends of mine in Toronto are equipped fully to manufacture munitions. Their plant is located in my constituency. They have asked me to ascertain whether or not the government's policy permits of the obtaining of orders from the British government. I shall appreciate greatly receiving your advice in this regard.

That is the evidence of the hon. member for Trinity: "We have a plant, we are equipped." Well, now, the resident inspector in Ottawa, appointed as inspector for the department of ordnance, made an honest report with reference to this same plant. Here is the report:

> This plant is primarily equipped for the manufacture of boilers, turbines and the working of heavy plate generally. All equipment is in reasonably good condition, considering the length of time it has been in use.
> The machinery at present in this factory with few exceptions is unsuited for the manufacture of aircraft, but it might be used for the manufacture of tanks or shells. . . .

I interject: how much less capable of being used for precision machinery like the Bren gun.

> This factory is at present inoperative and has not been in operation since April, 1936. There is no design staff at present employed and the total number of workmen now employed consists of three men as factory maintenance staff.

And yet this is the plant which is equipped to manufacture the Bren machine gun. A question has been asked: What firms in Canada could make this gun? It is brought out in the report of the commission that a number of firms which are set out, such as the Dominion Bridge Company, Bertram Company, The Steel Company of Canada, Canadian Car and Foundry Company, Limited, the National Steel Company, and others, are skilled in the manufacture of precision articles of steel of one kind or another, and that with very little additional tooling equipment could be harnessed to fulfil the contract.

It has been stated in the press that the Prime Minister and the cabinet were prepared to whitewash the department and had done so. I did not believe that when it came out in the press; I wanted to be fair and to see how the matter would be treated in this house. But since hearing the arguments yesterday and the day before, and again to-day, I am convinced that undoubtedly there has been an effort to whitewash the department. If that is so I would suggest that they bring in a brand-new barrel of whitewash if they have any hopes of restoring that pristine purity and whiteness from the present shade of tattle-tale gray. If this government has whitewashed the department and the minister, why has a purchasing board been advocated? Why another commission to be added to the multitudinous number of other commissions that have brought forth so much criticism from the taxpayers on former occasions?

I am not opposed to the appointment of a purchasing board, although I would much rather see a munitions board entirely devoid of political patronage. But in the establishment of a purchasing board or of a munitions board the government has found it necessary to take away from the department the power to purchase, which is a long piece removed from whitewashing. The point is that someone in the Department of National Defence, I know not who, authoritative enough, powerful enough to negotiate a contract, has made a sorry mess of things in this Bren gun contract. It is bad enough for the taxpayers of Canada to be dipping into their pockets and pulling out a million dollars a week for a publicly owned railroad; but it is doubly bad for money to be improvidently spent in a contract such as this, and I will tell you why. Underneath, overhead and all around every dollar spent in national defence may be the blood of Canadian young manhood. Mr. Speaker, I hesitated to rise in my place and condemn this contract. I believe throughout Canada to-day we must do everything possible to build up the faith of our people in such a department as the Department of National Defence. Had there been a time of crisis I should not have spoken, but perhaps it is best that this thing has come to light, so that other similar contracts may not be let. There are plenty of departments I would rather have attacked than the Department of National Defence, for the reason that the people of Canada must be taught to have confidence in men in public places, and especially in this minister and this department.

While I am on my feet—and this does not particularly relate to the amendment—may I suggest that the government cannot economically and intelligently compete with private industry in the making of munitions. Our factories have lathes, milling machines, drills, shapers, punch presses, and so on. They have the necessary foundation work for precision machinery, and they have the necessary automatic machinery. So, with the possible exception of small arms, I think the government should not go into the munitions business. But may we make sure of this, that such business be let by contract, after tenders have been called, so that private industry may be allowed to compete. That is the only way we can buy munitions intelligently; and, contracts having been let, may every last piece, every last shell, every last machine and every last gun come up to specifications. This government and the Department of National Defence can see to it that there is no profiteering in connection with war materials.

Mr. MARTIN: If the hon. member will permit a question, what is the practice in Great Britain and the United States?

Mr. MARSH: The practice in Great Britain is very different from the practice that was followed in the letting of this contract. I should like to point out to the hon. member that before a firm is selected to make any kind of war machinery or shells for the British war office, that firm is thoroughly investigated.

Mr. MARTIN: If the hon. member would permit one more question, is it not a fact that this contract was given by Great Britain?

Mr. MARSH: This contract was given by Great Britain after the government of this country, backed by the Minister of National Defence, the cabinet and the Prime Minister, had suggested it to the British government. That is the answer, on the evidence that was brought out in this inquiry.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend say that I suggested a contract to the British government? If he does I wish he would show me where that appears in the evidence.

Mr. MARSH: No, Mr. Speaker, I did not suggest that. I did suggest that Major Hahn went over, according to this evidence, with the complete benediction of the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is absolutely incorrect as well; but what my hon. friend has just said is entirely different from what he said a few moments ago.

Mr. MANION: Hahn was made the representative of the Canadian government by the Prime Minister himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member spoke about a contract. There was no contract in existence, or drafted, or even thought of at the time; absolutely nothing.

Mr. MARSH: At least he went over as Canadian representative, to negotiate a contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, he did not go over as Canadian representative.

Mr. MANION: He was made the Canadian representative right afterwards.

Mr. MARSH: Then I am correct in saying that he was made Canadian representative right after he got there?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is evident that my hon. friend does not know the facts or he would not have to ask such questions.

Mr. MARSH: After the discussion we have had here during the last two days, based on this blue book, during which the members on this side of the house have dealt essentially with the facts, while the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) dealt with a smoke screen and the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) entertained us in pantomime fashion, I suggest that there has been nothing wrong with the arguments presented from this side. If I understand the English language at all, as I read this report it is a condemnation of the government from cover to cover.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is the common thought of all that there should be no profiteering in Canada in connection with war supplies. What man can be called a Canadian who will make or take blood money? But here is a million dollars of profit on a stock transaction pertaining to a $5,000,000 contract. Is that economy? Is that a proper stewardship of money? Is that Canadian? I suggest that it is not, and I urge that this thing that has happened must not happen again.

Mr. A. G. McAVITY (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, with no previous knowledge of shell manufacture, using the broken down boiler factory that has been mentioned so often, using a cement factory and under similar conditions, Canadian manufacturers during the last war produced munitions to the value of over a billion dollars. I joined the imperial munitions board shortly after the war started. I was superintendent of production; I think I know whereof I speak, and I may say that I have heard a good deal from the other side which to me is utter nonsense. Shell shipments from Canada increased from $5,377,000 in 1915 to $19,942,000 in 1916 and $23,782,000 in 1917. In 1917 we received orders to slow down in Canada, because we were shipping more munitions than they required. It was easier for me to speed up production than to slow it down, with my temperament, so I put in my resignation to the chairman, who paid me a tribute on the back of a cigarette case which I still carry occasionally, and which is inscribed with these words:

In grateful memory of unfailing support in a difficult task.

I left the munitions board, Mr. Speaker, thinking that the United States would want our production; and certainly our people who had been set going wanted to keep going. This was arranged. The Canadian government sent a trade board to Washington; I worked on my own, and I received the first order from the United States ordnance department for munitions to be made in Canada. The total of United States munitions contracts with Canada amounted to $232,168,000. Many of those contracts were cancelled because of the armistice, but shipments to the United States, which commenced early in 1918, reached a total of seven million shells, in addition to two million shell forgings and other material. The total orders shipped from Canada by the imperial munitions board amounted to $1,200,672,412.78. In 1916 the total exports to the United Kingdom were $451,852,399.

Mr. SPENCE: Get up to date.

Mr. McAVITY: The imperial munitions board shipments were $296,505,257: Is that not a large percentage of the business of that time? I shall come up to date in a minute.

Mr. GARDINER: He did not know that.

Mr. McAVITY: Much has been said about the suitability of the John Inglis plant for the manufacture of Bren machine guns. I knew William Inglis in 1905, and for many years I did business with him. He was one of the first manufacturers to take an order from Sir Alexander Bertram to manufacture shells. What did he have then? He had the same boiler factory we have been talking about. I will pay this tribute to him, that he was a first class manufacturer, and did splendid work. When Mr. Inglis and other gentlemen who undertook to manufacture shells, but who had never seen a shell before in their lives, took their first order, what did they do? They were practical men. They wanted to see a shell to see what it looked like. They wanted to visit factories to find out how shells were made. There was no difficulty about that, because it was very easy for Sir Sam Hughes and Sir Alexander Bertram to arrange for these gentlemen to go to the Quebec arsenal, where Colonel Lafferty showed them how shells were being made. They were shown only a few shells.

What happened in this case? Major Hahn wanted to manufacture Bren guns. What was the natural thing for him to ask? He wanted to see the gun made. First of all, he wanted to take it apart. He did that. He examined it, and then he went to England to see it made. I am asking if that is not what a practical man would have done. Is that not what a man who wishes to make an article he does not know much about would have done? Before he had gone very far he said, "I want to see the gun made." He went to England but could not gain admittance to the arsenal. Hon. members know what arsenals in the old country are like; it is difficult to get in. Nothing daunted, however, he went to the high commissioner's office and asked for a pass to gain admittance to the arsenal. That is all this amounts to, if one takes the trouble to read it through. The high commissioner cabled back, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) very properly replied. Surely no person can take exception to the cable, if he reads it in that light. It was a pass to the works at Enfield. That is the way I read it, and I believe that is exactly what was meant.

This whole matter has become befogged with a great mass of detail which confuses the ordinary man. I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me that was a perfectly reasonable and practical procedure, and the man did the right thing when he went to see the gun made. The manufacturer now in question is the type of man I would have selected to make shells in 1914, because it was just that type of man who produced results.

Frank P. Jones, president of the Canada Cement Company, operating a cement factory in Montreal, asked to be allowed to make shells. We gave him an order, and he was one of the best manufacturers we had. He did not have a factory at all; but he produced one, and in that factory he manufactured shells. He made special machinery, and was the first man to use female labour in operating shell lathes on the heavy calibre 9·2 shells. I could mention a number of others who did the same thing, manufacturers who had had no experience but who, with no difficulty, became excellent production men.

To-day there is no factory in Canada equipped to manufacture the Bren gun. All the equipment must be created. So far as I have described the proceedings, surely this man has gone about the matter in the right way. Apparently Major Hahn went to England with a tentative order to make shells for the Canadian government. Although the order had not been signed at that time, at least he was expecting to get it. When he saw the gun being manufactured in the Enfield plant he was quite convinced he could make it and, what is more, convinced the British authorities as to his ability to do so. He developed a tentative order from them to make an additional 5,000 guns. In doing that be pointed out that by making 12,000 guns the price could be reduced to both Canadian and British governments. Surely there is nothing wrong with that.

Then Major Hahn returned to Canada—and what was he faced with? He was faced with an interdepartmental committee asking that tenders be called. At that stage of the game, I ask the house, how could tenders be called? It was an impossible proposition.

Mr. HOMUTH: Why not?

Mr. McAVITY: I will show why not: This man had won the confidence of the British war office, and had a tentative order from them for the manufacture of 5,000 guns. He also had a tentative order from the Canadian government for the manufacture of 7,000 guns. How could you put any other manufacturer in the same position, in the event of inviting competitive tenders?

Mr. HOMUTH: Nonsense.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Why, then, did the government appoint the interdepartmental committee?

Mr. McAVITY: I wish to return to the argument about the plant. There has been a great deal of talk about a broken down boiler factory. Let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that it was not from the lists of old-time manufacturers, who had been in business for a hundred years or more, that the best manufacturers of shells were obtained. Those manufacturers were too conservative in their methods. I remember distinctly two firms in Brantford, namely, Gould, Shapely and Muir, and the Waterous engine works.

both with high standing, each of which received a comparatively large order from General Bertram for 50,000 of the 4·5 shells. In the same city of Brantford was the small firm of Kerr and Godwin, a firm which was almost unknown and one with less than a dozen employees on its payroll. Subsequently they secured an order from the shell committee for the manufacture of 10,000 shells. My memory as to the figures may not be exactly right, but I believe I am not far out. Kerr and Godwin had the right driving force. They got mechanics and machinery, and before the two well known firms had shipped 100,000 shells Kerr and Godwin had shipped 150,000. That is the type of firm we need to produce shells.

Mr. HOMUTH: What has that to do with this contract?

Mr. GARDINER: You would not know, anyway.

Mr. McAVITY: I did not hear the hon. member. The suggestion has been made that we should have a government arsenal. I believe the chief of staff suggested that an expenditure of between $30,000,000 and $35,000,000 should be made. Might I point out that an arsenal capable of producing a billion dollars worth of shells would cost a great deal more than $35,000,000. I would think it would cost something nearer $350,000,000—and we certainly do not want to create any more white elephants of that kind to feed. It would be a white elephant in peace times.

I say we do not need an arsenal, and I believe that in continuing the practice we have followed we are following the practice of the rest of the world. Germany is mobilizing industry; France is mobilizing industry; the United States is mobilizing industry, and Canada must do the same.

Mr. HOMUTH: Just one.

Mr. McAVITY: May I pay tribute to the Department of National Defence for the work they have done. They have prepared a careful survey of all the manufacturing plants available in Canada. If a condition of war should arise again they will not be in such a muddle as that in which our Tory friends found themselves in 1915, when they were faced with the shell inquiry, the discarding of Oliver equipment, and other troubles. The Department of National Defence will have an organized plan through which it will be able to make use of industry, right from the start, and without any of the difficulties formerly experienced. In that connection I quote the words of Mr. David Lloyd George. He said:

> Our eyes were at first shut to the vital importance of war material and the difficulty of improvising its production. The realization of what the enemy had done in this direction during years of stealthy preparation for the "day" came as a shock perhaps even greater than that caused by the discovery of his numerical strength, and was followed by the painful awakening as to what we had to undertake in order to catch up.

Certainly we are in a much better position to-day than we were in the fall of 1915 when our Tory friends were completely bewildered and confused by that rugged individualist Sir Sam Hughes who then had charge of affairs.

Much has been said of the cablegram which was sent, but as I have already said, it was nothing more or less than an application for a pass to permit Major Hahn to visit the Enfield works to inspect the manufacture of the gun. That is the way I read it. If my hon. friends opposite want an explanation of what happened in the last war, I would point out to them that the imperial munitions board was a branch of the imperial government headed by the Right Hon. David Lloyd George. Let me say to them that the then Prime Minister, Sir Robert L. Borden, came to our office to see our chairman with contractors and urging shell contracts for them. I think the same applied to every member of his government and almost every member of the house at that time. They were trying to get contracts from the imperial government. There is a precedent for you.

I have seen the contract which has been criticized by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens). I had a hand in making a thousand of contracts for munitions. I sat in and helped to make contracts with the imperial munitions board and the United States department of ordnance, and I never saw any contract which so rigidly ties down the manufacturer as does this Bren gun contract. Mr. Justice Davis rightly says:

> No substantial objection can be taken in my view to the provisions of the Canadian contract.

I assume that no exception was taken to the provisions of the British contract. The commissioner says further:

> There are adequate powers of inspection, supervision and control vested in the department.

In my opinion if the contract is rigidly enforced there will be little, if any, profit for Major Hahn and his associates. In connection with profits, and following my argument as to how a manufacturer with plenty of force and vim who controls a large organization can carry out this work, let me refer to the late Sir Frank Baillie. What did he know about manufacturing munitions? What did he know about manufacturing anything before he was given an order for cartridge cases for the imperial munitions board? Yet he was one of the most successful and most conscientious contractors that we had. When Lord Rhondda came to this country Sir Frank Baillie said to him that they were paying too much for these cartridge cases. He told him that if he was given an order for a million cases at the set price, he would turn back whatever profit he made after keeping accurate costs. These cases were costing $1.75 each; the order totalled $1,750,000, and he handed back $758,000.

A suggestion was made by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) that the railway shops should be turned into arsenals. I would point out to him that the railway shops were not used during the last war to any great extent for the simple reason that they were required in order to keep the locomotives and cars in running order. Transport is just as important as anything else.

Mr. LAWSON: There is no war on just now.

Mr. McAVITY: But you do not want to have them manufacturing war materials and not be available if we do have a war. Since hon. gentlemen opposite have not made any constructive suggestions I should like to put on record one or two things which I believe could be profitably taken from our last experience in mobilizing industry.

I would urge upon the government the importance of not letting mechanics leave the country in the event of a crisis. We need all our mechanics for our mobilization scheme. Anyone can run a motor car, but how many can repair one? Similarly, anyone can run a shell machine, but how many can set one up? The hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding) knows all about that, because he was in the shell manufacturing business. If you have mechanics to set up these machines, if you have them tooled properly, a woman or a one-armed or one-legged man can run them. Then you would not need to hold back any volunteers or conscripts. But you must have mechanics and you must have foremen, because, like the sergeant in the army, the foreman is the backbone of any mobilization scheme.

Some valuable suggestions were made by the Hon. R. H. Brand, a member of the imperial munitions board. He resided in England and maintained contact with the minister of munitions. In his report made after the war he had this to say:

In the first year or so of the war the possibilities of munitions making in Canada were not by any means fully recognized in England, and very large orders were placed in the United States which it would have been to everyone's interest to place in Canada. When once a huge program had been started in the United States it was a matter of some difficulty and many months to get it transferred to Canada. Other British departments similarly ignored the great assistance that Canada could be to them. For a good many months I urged unsuccessfully on the board of trade that Canada could build ships to assist in meeting the submarine crisis, and on the war office and the admiralty that Canada could provide not only aeroplanes but an air force. Even in December 1916 the board of trade informed me that they did not require any ships, and it was only after the ministry of shipping was formed that the board was authorized to begin a building program in Canada. Similarly it was only when the air board, the forerunner of the air ministry, was formed that serious attention was given to the possibilities of Canada in this direction. I was so convinced of the importance of this matter that I appeared before the air board to urge it at its first meeting. Shortly afterwards a program was agreed upon and the board was instructed to begin building aerodromes and aeroplanes.

If relations in future are to be close between the different governments of the empire—

That is why I am reading this because that is what we are interested in.

—and between different departments of those different governments, an effective liaison service will be absolutely necessary. The imagination and foresight of human beings are limited, and of civil servants as much as other classes of the community. If the imperial munitions board had had no representative of its own responsible to it, and there for the one purpose of interpreting its wishes and wants and difficulties to the ministry of munitions, friction would have been constant and inevitable. The officers of the ministry were overwhelmed with their own duties; they did not know Canada; they did not understand their problem, or their way of looking at matters; they did not realize that cable correspondence between men 3,000 miles apart is the most fruitful mother of misunderstanding. This is not said in any way to magnify the importance of my office. It is a fact. The trouble can easily be overcome by each department of each government having its own representative in close touch with it, and responsible to it to interpret its wishes in the other country.

I sincerely hope that the government will try to keep the authorities in England fully informed, either through the high commissioner's office or by some other means, as to our ability to produce shells. I hope that by some means or other this discussion on the Bren gun can be kept from their notice, because it certainly will not do us any good. We should point out to the British authorities that we are better prepared to-day than ever before because we have made a complete survey of our industrial organization. We have more metals available to-day than ever before. The comparative figures in connection with zinc, nickel, lead and copper are quite surprising. I should like to give the figures for 1914, 1918 and 1937. I am giving the figures for 1918 to show that even under the pressure of war the supplies were comparatively low. The figures are:

	1914 Pounds	1918 Pounds	1937 Pounds
Zinc.	7,246,053	35,083,175	370,418,073
Nickel.. ..	45,517,937	92,507,293	224,790,974
Lead.	36,337,765	51,398,002	411,221,232
Copper. ..	75,735,960	118,769,434	531,041,878

I would just say in connection with this table that we have by long odds the largest nickel production in the world. Lead, of course, is an important factor in the making of shrapnel, but most important of all the metals is copper, which is used for cartridge cases and fuses. In copper we were able to get up production only to 118,769,434 pounds in 1918, but the figure stands to-day at 531,041,878. So I say that we are in a much better position to-day than before, in that we have our own metals and our own mechanics, and our men will give a good account of ourselves.

There is one other item that I want to mention in connection with the whole problem of national defence, and it is a matter which I do not think has been seriously considered to date, I refer to the equipping of our more important ports so that in time of emergency certain specified terminals or areas can be completed on short notice for the use of the army, the navy and the air force without in any way disturbing the commercial activities of the port.

For many years the important United Kingdom and continental ports have always taken this problem into consideration in port development. In the United States, for the last thirty years or more, the United States army corps of engineers have had control of this problem. The policy developed by the United States government was to build army and navy base terminals at the more important ports. These terminals were leased to commercial enterprises during peace times, but could be taken over by the military authorities at once in the case of any crisis.

At practically all the terminals at the more important Canadian ports nothing has been done, and if it is found necessary to commandeer existing facilities for war purposes it will undoubtedly seriously disturb their commercial activities. Also these terminals are not equipped for operations under war-time conditions. The handling of high explosive munitions and supplies of one kind or another is a highly technical matter, and, particularly with respect to munitions, a dangerous operation. We certainly should not risk a repetition of the Halifax explosion.

It seems to me very important that in the scheme of national defence the situation with regard to port and terminal facilities at our national ports should be reviewed, and operating orders should be in the hands of a responsible person so that the various harbours involved would be able to change over from ordinary commercial harbours to a war-time basis without the inconvenience that was experienced during the last war.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to approach this delicate subject in as dispassionate a tone and tenor as possible. Like the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) it is not my intention to be personal, and I hope that no one in the house, neither the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) nor any other member, will construe the remarks I may have to make as in any way reflecting on their personal character or characteristics. I have a public duty to perform, and I shall endeavour to perform it to the best of my ability. If I err in my judgment I know that my constituency will hold me responsible. Human flesh is subject to the frailties of conditions and times, and in a moment of weakness we are all likely to make errors which later we attempt to retract.

I was hoping that as this debate progressed we might observe some symptoms from the government benches of light beginning to dawn, some indications that they realized that a serious mistake had been made and were prepared to remedy a condition that was not conducive to the good of Canada. It was my privilege, Mr. Speaker, to be in attendance for several sessions at the Bren gun inquiry, and I had the opportunity of observing the various witnesses and noting the remarks made by counsel and from the bench. In speaking on this subject I am therefore not totally unaware of the subject matter of the report; for I have had the privilege of reading it, and noting very carefully some particulars of it, and I also had the privilege of listening to the testimony that was given before the commissioner from time to time.

This is serious matter that we are discussing. I do not think anyone in the house will gainsay that statement. A condition has grown up which, unfortunately, must be rectified.

The Bren gun was first discussed, I understand, back in 1936. The defence department became interested in it, and later, in 1938, after a lapse of almost two years, a contract was entered into with a firm known as John Inglis Company Limited to manufacture Bren guns for the government of Canada and for the British war office. I should like for a moment or two to strip this whole undertaking of its frills, verbal and otherwise, and examine the bald facts in connection with the Bren gun transaction.

Mr. GARDINER: You will have to answer all the speeches made on the other side, then.

Mr. WALSH: I am fortunate, Mr. Speaker, in that I have little to answer from the other side of the house. They have put up very little argument as yet, although most of the speakers on the other side, I notice, have been very astute lawyers, able to defend a type of case where the going is rather difficult. I commend the government for their ability to raise speakers of that type and press them into service. But what we should like to hear from the other side is a definite argument to offset those which have been advanced from this side. The facts and figures in connection with this contract have been very impressively placed on record, but they have not been dealt with by speakers on the other side of the house. Anyone who has been reading Hansard for the past two or three days, with any degree of non-bias, will readily agree that the speeches of hon. gentlemen on the other side have been made, not in defence of the contract entered into, not to combat the statements made from this side of the house, but merely to gloss over the conditions as they really exist. They have made a vain attempt to apply a coat of veneer to a rough and unfinished surface, and that coat is not sticking, as they will realize when they confront their public.

Let us now examine this Bren gun contract. The government decided that they would manufacture and use this Bren gun. A person was selected, Major Hahn. As any business corporation or organization would do in a delicate proposition of this kind, one involving the spending of millions of money, one would think the government would be very careful to select a person or organization equipped in every way to handle the contract they were seeking to place. But, instead of that careful investigation, instead of selecting an established firm or an individual who was qualified technically and otherwise to handle a matter of this kind, they selected Major Hahn.

An hon. MEMBER: He was qualified.

Mr. WALSH: Major Hahn was not qualified; he did not pretend to be qualified; he never said he was. Major Hahn had no experience in machine shop work or in the manufacture of munitions or implements of war.

Mr. HOWARD: Did the hon. member not hear the last speaker?

Mr. WALSH: I heard the last speaker; I paid little attention to his argument because it was not founded on facts. His premises were wrong to start with; therefore the rest of his argument was completely unsound.

Mr. DUNNING: He had the misfortune of understanding this industry.

Mr. WALSH: He understands certain features of the industry, but he does not understand the Bren gun or the Bren gun contract. That is what we are discussing. And we are discussing this contract in the light of to-day, not in the light of experience of twenty or twenty-five years ago. Major Hahn had a splendid war record; he had one experience in business, namely the manufacture of radios; that was his qualification to apply for the contract for the manufacture of Bren guns. He did not even have a plant; he had no equipment; he had nothing whatsoever to commend him to the Department of National Defence except a recommendation from the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton). With that recommendation he obtained the ear of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), of the deputy minister of national defence, and he obtained the entrée into channels on the other side that finally led to his getting the contract.

Mention has been made in this debate of the attitude of the British war office. I leave it to hon. members on both sides of the house; here was a man who went to England with official introductions and who received through the high commissioner's office other letters of introduction. He was accompanied by a Liberal member of the Canadian parliament, accompanied also by the brother of that member, a lawyer. He was also blessed, as few other people are blessed, with official recognition by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), a recognition which very few people in this country could obtain. I wish to read again this cablegram from the Department of External Affairs, over which the Prime Minister presides, which gave Major Hahn his official introduction. Hon .members must bear in mind that Major Hahn was in London; the war office in London refused to interview him except in the presence of an official of this dominion, and in order to consolidate his position over there, in order to facilitate his entrée, this cablegram was dispatched. It may be found at page 24 of the royal commissioner's report:

> Secret. Your cablegram 9th November 396. Have discussed matter with Minister of National Defence. You might request war office to give Major Hahn, as representing Canadian government—

Mark that.

> —as representing Canadian government in this particular, any information which they consider desirable and necessary to enable National Defence to reach conclusion on possibility produce Bren gun in Canada. It is not desired to request furnishing of information on any article other than this gun.

There he was, officially recognized, a potential contractor, a man who was seeking to obtain a contract from our government. This cablegram was dispatched from the Department of External Affairs, no doubt at the instigation of the Prime Minister. Major Hahn was there under those circumstances. Can one imagine a business firm conducting an important piece of business in that way, to a potential contractor, one seeking favours, an official introduction and hence an entrée into the very heart of the empire and to establish his standing? My hon. friends on the other side say, we could not do very much; he was the man selected by the British war office. The British war office would never have selected Major Hahn but for the recommendation of the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister of Canada. Major Hahn would never have obtained entrée to the war office in Great Britain if he had not had this recommendation and had not been officially endorsed as a representative of this country by the Prime Minister, who did it after consulting with the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. WALSH: Surely.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would anyone else from Canada have got that entrée to the war office without some introduction from some authority in this country?

Mr. WALSH: That is the point I am trying to make, that neither Major Hahn nor anyone else would get the entrée to the war office unless he was armed with an official message of that kind from the Prime Minister of this country. So there he was, a potential contractor, looking for a contract from the government. He was there armed with an official message from the Prime Minister giving him this entrée, when other people who would have desired such an entrée could not possibly obtain such credentials, nor would they request them.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Perhaps my hon. friend will permit one more question. Is he opposed to anyone from Canada getting any entrée to the war office in order to learn—

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): He did not say that.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): My hon. friend said that no one from Canada could get that entrée without an introduction. I am asking whether he would approve anyone from Canada being able to get that information from the war office.

Mr. WALSH: I always take this stand, that whatever is granted to one individual should be open to every Canadian citizen of the same standing.

Mr. DUPUIS: The war office did not want it.

Mr. WALSH: No, and they did not want this, but it was given to them. Major Hahn was thrown at the war office; they received him because he was the accredited representative of the Canadian government in London at that time. That is why he was received, and that is why they placed in Major Hahn that trust which they otherwise would not have placed.

Let me now read a brief statement from the report, found at page 43. The Minister of National Defence is speaking:

> I may say, so far as I am concerned, I have the utmost trust and faith that this is a good contract for the people of Canada, because I am sure that the war office people and the British people, with their wonderful experience, knowledge and training would not enter into a contract which was not for the public good. I rely very much upon their judgment, as well as upon the integrity of my own officers, and the supervision and jurisdiction of the interdepartmental committee.

There are several inexactitudes in that statement. In the first place he is relying on the opinion of the war office, and the war office had this Major Hahn thrust upon them by officials of the dominion. In the second place he also relies upon the supervision and jurisdiction of the interdepartmental committee, and he never received a written report from that committee in connection with the Bren gun. He received merely a verbal report from the chairman of the committee. If hon. members will look at the minutes of that committee they will see that there was a marked conflict of opinion as between the chairman and the other members of the committee.

I wish to refer very briefly to certain statements that were made in this house last evening. I believe it was the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) who referred to Colonel Drew as a "young gentleman," and he suggested that he would not discuss that gentleman "in language I must refrain from using." I have more faith in the hon. member for Parry Sound than to suppose he would ever use language anywhere that he would not use in this house.

An hon. MEMBER: He might.

Mr. WALSH: I do not think so. I do not believe that any member of the house would use unparliamentary language anywhere at any time.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is great faith.

Mr. WALSH: I have more faith in the hon. member for Parry Sound than he has in himself. He goes on to refer to Colonel Drew in most undesirable terms and endeavours to make the people believe that Colonel Drew had used the Bren gun for the purpose of raising himself to the leadership of the provincial Conservative party in Ontario.

Mr. HOWE: And so he did, absolutely.

Mr. WALSH: The statement which the hon. member for Parry Sound last evening attributed to Colonel Drew was made at a banquet which followed the convention at which he was elected leader.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Still more reprehensible.

Mr. WALSH: He prophesied that this contract would be withdrawn by the present government; but apparently he was speaking with an air of optimism, having more confidence in the courage of the present government than the people have at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the hon. gentleman pardon an interruption? Just as I came into the chamber he said that no report was made.

Mr. WALSH: No written report.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There were two different reports submitted to the government before the contract was signed.

Mr. WALSH: I am only reading from certain statements which were made—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be glad to give the hon. member copies of both reports.

Mr. WALSH: —to the effect that no written report bearing on the contract was placed in the hands of the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. They were asked for by the minister, delivered to the minister, and submitted by the minister to his colleagues in the cabinet before the contract was signed.

Mr. WALSH: As I always do, I accept the word of the minister unreservedly. I do not desire to put on the record anything that cannot be regarded as a truthful statement.

I was very much surprised, and, indeed, hurt, when the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Bertrand) dragged into the debate the suggestion that it was being carried on with a view to casting a reflection on a French-Canadian. Surely the hon. gentleman did not intend to convey such an impression. I have known the hon. member for Laurier as crown prosecutor in Montreal for many years, and he has lived as a neighbour of mine for a considerable time. I am absolutely certain that he had no intention of deliberately raising the race cry in a matter of this kind. I hope he will take advantage of the first opportunity to retract a suggestion that can only lead to disunity in Canada. We all know that we need more unity and harmony than we have at the present time. I say, I was dismayed when I saw a suggestion of this kind dragged into the debate. It made me feel that the arguments which were being put forward by the other side were deplorably weak. When I was at college we were told that when we had a very poor case, a hopeless case, we should use the argumentum ad hominem. The sort of argument to which I have referred above is lower still, and I hope that the hon. member on another occasion will see fit to explain exactly what he meant in the reference he made last evening to French-Canadians.

There is one other matter to which I must refer, and I regard it as one of the most serious sides of the contract. It has been stated in this house by more than one speaker that it is a good contract. It has been said that when the contract is completed the company will make a profit of 7·76 per cent. That is a reasonable profit. It is a small profit considering the work which they intend to do. But speakers on the other side fail to take cognizance of the real situation, and I want to state clearly that situation this afternoon. Something should be done not only to stop stock manipulations of this sort in company development, but the practice should be stopped forever in Canada, for all company promotions.

Stock manipulations of this kind should not be tolerated in a young and growing country like Canada; we cannot afford it; and this is one of the worst examples we have ever had. The only thing I regret, so far as Colonel Drew's article is concerned, is that he did not postpone the publication of it for another two months. Had he done so he would have seen where the greater part of this money that was going to be absorbed by the promoters was going. The article was sprung two months too soon.

Mr. MARTIN: Why?

Mr. WALSH: If he had postponed it he would have seen exactly where the money went.

Mr. MARTIN: Why did he publish it?

Mr. WALSH: Lack of fore-knowledge most likely. The hon. member for Parry Sound refers slightingly to the fee which Colonel Drew received for this article; but it is nothing in comparison to the fee which the hon. member from Parry Sound receives from time to time for defending certain types of mining manipulators in this country, and yet he casts a reflection on Colonel Drew for a small fee he received for writing this article.

Mr. PLAXTON: The hon. member charges that the hon. member for Parry Sound has acted for manipulators of stock markets in connection with mining. I would ask him to name one.

Mr. WALSH: I had in mind Solloway, Mills. I should like to receive just one-tenth of the money he has received for fees from that one liquidation—I would be set for life. I find that the shares issued were 191,662 shares of vendor's stock for this company. This vendor's stock was issued to the promoters without any money being advanced. I should like hon. members to bear that in mind: 191,662 shares of this stock, with a par value of $6 per share, were given to these four or five promoters without a cent of money being turned over by them. That represents about seventy per cent of the interest in the John Inglis concern. If you would convert that into figures you would see that this stock at $6 per share would have a par value of $1,149,972, and it should be remembered that just previous to the stock being withdrawn from the market it had sold for as much as $7.50 per share, while the rumour on the street was that it was going to $20. Can you figure the profit that these promoters were going to make? Last evening the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Bertrand) referred to the miserable 7·76 per cent—

[Mr. Walsh.]

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would my hon. friend give us the page of the report to which he is referring?

Mr. WALSH: I am discussing something which is not in the report.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I should like to know on what page of the report he finds those figures, because I should like to study them.

Mr. WALSH: My hon. friend will find the figures in the evidence given before the commissioner by the accountant who was engaged by the commission to check these figures. They are all there, and I guarantee that I have given them exactly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does my hon. friend mean that there was something in the evidence in regard to $20 a share?

Mr. WALSH: Oh, no, I was merely drawing an inference; I mentioned that it was street gossip.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, street gossip.

Mr. WALSH: Let me repeat what I have said, because some of my hon. friends on the other side do not seem to desire to get this into their heads. There were 191,662 shares of this company, representing seventy per cent of the stock, issued to these four or five promoters without a cent of cash being paid, and those shares had a par value of $6. I stated that they had sold for as much as $7.50 a share, and that rumours on the street were that they were going to boost those shares to $20. That is the statement I wish to place on Hansard, and it can be verified by almost any stockbroker in the city of Toronto and by many in the city of Montreal.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There is nothing in the report about it.

Mr. WALSH: It is all there, if my hon. friend will take time to read the evidence. The remainder of the shares, treasury shares, totalled some 58,000, and these were to be paid for by these gentlemen; that is, they were to put cash into the treasury for 58,000 shares. That does not mean that they themselves were going to put in the cash. They intended to sell those 58,000 treasury shares and put that cash into the company. Then, by selling those shares, they would gradually create a market for their 191,000 shares, and that would be their profit. I want to make this statement, and I make it knowing that I am doing so on the floor of this house—

Mr. DUNNING: What did the judge say about that?

Mr. WALSH: The judge did not comment on much of the evidence that was given; he left it to parliament and this government to draw their own conclusions. This debate is going on to-day, as it has gone on all week, because this government did not have enough courage to sift and analyse the report and place the blame where the blame really belonged, or to revamp the Department of National Defence into an effective, efficient department which would carry on the work it is intended to carry on to the best possible advantage both of this country and of the empire at large.

Mr. MARTIN: Why not make a charge against some member?

Mr. WALSH: I think I have issued enough charges already, and I am not charging anything for them; I am not a lawyer. This company was merely a promotion scheme. These men were creating an industry that did not exist. They were a group of promoters. If a group of us here wanted to manufacture Bren guns I would put up whatever money I could raise; four or five of us would put in our money and go into business, if we could get a contract. Is that not sensible? That is the way business should be conducted; that is the way ordinary business is conducted. What did this company do? They turned around and issued treasury shares; they issued shares to the promoters and then, in order to hide it all away—and perhaps the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) can laugh this off—they created another company, Investment Reserves Limited, in which the 191,662 shares were placed to the credit of these men, as follows: J. E. Hahn, 107,964 shares; Cameron & Company, 39,256 shares; Herbert Plaxton, 19,628 shares, and Gordon Plaxton, 9,814 shares, a total of 176,662 shares credited to these individuals in Investment Reserves Limited.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What did the judge say about that? He was charged with investigating the issuing of shares.

Mr. WALSH: I would ask the hon. member for Melfort to go down and read the evidence. It is all downstairs. This report contains only the briefest reference to the evidence, which fills thirty or forty volumes.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): On a point of order, the hon. member who is addressing the house referred to me—

Mr. WALSH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is raising a point of order.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. gentleman has referred to me and has asked what I have to say about that statement. My thought is that I would like to know what was said by the commissioner who was charged with the investigation—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WALSH: I have referred the hon. gentleman to the evidence, and this is all in the evidence.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): My point of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I find that the commissioner was charged to inquire fully—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) to state his point of order briefly.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yes, sir. The commissioner was authorized "to inquire fully into the preliminary discussions and negotiations leading up to and the completion of the said contract"—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. In my opinion that is not a point of order.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I will demonstrate the point of order to the house if you will permit me to quote ten more words.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WALSH: I have accounted for over 176,000 of the 191,000 shares, leaving 15,000 to be accounted for. They are being held in reserve by Investment Reserves Limited for the people whom I have named and will be distributed, according to the provisions of the contract, as soon as the 58,333 shares have been paid for.

That is what I want to impress upon this government. It is not the 7·76 per cent they are going to make on operation; it is the scheme of these promoters to extract from the public of Canada a sum of well over a million dollars, which they propose to divide among themselves. There is no gainsaying that; there can be no contradiction on that point. I defy any member on the government side to point to anything wrong in that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I say it is absolutely impossible.

Mr. WALSH: The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) is convicted by the evidence that was given before the commission by an accountant appointed by the commission itself. The evidence is clear; we do not need anything more than we have there. If this had been a straightforward transaction there would have been one incorporation, that of John Inglis Company Limited, capitalized at $250,000, and the money would have been subscribed by the promoters or others interested in investing their money. That would have been the end of it. But instead of that they proceeded to manipulate the stock of this company, issuing a large block of shares to themselves—watered stock, bear in mind—which they were going to distribute when the market became available for such distribution, as it would after the sale of the treasury stock. That is the point I was trying to make, and the one which I hope I have made abundantly clear to every hon. member.

Mr. DUNNING: Where did the judge say that? At what page is it to be found?

Mr. WALSH: It is in the evidence downstairs.

Mr. MANION: There are four thousand pages of evidence; the commissioner could not put it all in the report.

Mr. WALSH: There is another point I should like to impress upon the government. Referring to page 51 of the report I find this:

> What is plain to me at the end of this long inquiry is this: That if the policy of private manufacture of war munitions and armaments is to be continued in this country (a question of administrative policy for the government and parliament to determine)—

Apparently the commissioner was thoroughly persuaded that as yet no policy has been determined by the government.

Mr. DUNNING: Where does he say that?

Mr. WALSH: The conclusion is here. He says, "A question of administrative policy for the government and parliament to determine."

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. WALSH: Apparently nothing has been shown to satisfy him that it has been determined.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WALSH: I should like to hear a statement from hon. members opposite as to whether the government intends to pursue a policy of private manufacture of armaments, or one of public manufacture, or a policy which embraces both. I should like to hear it, and so would the electors of Canada. I think we have a right to a clear statement on a matter of that kind.

Mr. ROWE: (Dufferin-Simcoe): Silence again.

Mr. WALSH: The government say there is no want of confidence in the report of the commissioner. Surely if anyone reads the report intelligently he will see on almost every page an expression of want of confidence. I read again from page 51:

> . . . the negotiations leading up to and the making of contracts between the government and private manufacturers either for the purchase or production of such munitions or armaments should be put into the hands of an expert advisory group of competent business men. . . .

What more do you want than that in the way of condemnation of a government? Does the commissioner recommend that the Department of National Defence should continue as they have been in the past? Did he find this Bren gun contract so satisfactory that he raised his hand and pronounced a blessing upon the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) and the government, to which he belongs? He did nothing of the kind. He was not called upon to do that; neither was he called upon to condemn. But in these words he draws attention to the inefficiency and incompetency of the Department of National Defence and suggests that a new system should be followed.

It will be noted that the new board the appointment of which he suggests is to report not to the Minister of National Defence but to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) or the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Could there be any more thorough condemnation of the actions of the Minister of National Defence and his associates than is to be found in that paragraph? And I could read other paragraphs from the report which speak in the same way.

In closing may I emphasize this point: I have pointed out that this was a promotion scheme. I have set out the weaknesses of the arguments—in fact, the lack of arguments—of hon. members opposite. I have pointed out that indirectly the commissioner condemns what has been done by the Department of National Defence, and I feel that if my conscience is to dictate my action I must ask the Prime Minister to remove from office, as he would have been removed if he had held office in England, the Minister of National Defence.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. WALSH: On account of inefficiency and incompetency in the administration of his department. I say that with the utmost consciousness of my position.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WALSH: I have every confidence that the Minister of National Defence—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Let him go ahead.

Mr. W. P. MULOCK (York North): Mr. Speaker, I have been keenly interested in the debate on the Bren machine gun in which hon. members from both sides of the house have taken part. May I in the first place congratulate the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. McAvity) upon the very excellent, clear and lucid statement of facts which set at naught in a businesslike way many of the attacks made by hon. members opposite. As he has dealt with arguments of hon. members opposite in a definite manner I shall deal with an aspect of the contract which so far as I know has not been mentioned in the house.

As yet no credit has been given to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) for using his judgment in picking the Bren machine gun. I find considerable criticism of the contract by hon. members opposite, and may I say in passing that I believe they would have been fairer if they had mentioned that the minister had picked probably the finest machine gun in the world, and one which has been adopted by the British army. We find this at page 4 of the report:

> What is known as the Bren gun is a light machine gun, a weapon invented and patented in Czecho-Slovakia. The information given the commission was that the weapon which eventually became the Bren gun was demonstrated to the British government in 1930. It was then known as ZB 26. It was introduced by the Czecho-Slovakian firm and was brought to the attention of the British and was tried out in England. There were several details in the gun which had to be modified to conform to British conditions. Between 1930 and 1935 the gun was modified and changed and eventually became the Bren gun in its present form, and during that period it was subjected to very severe tests in England the result of which was that it was considered satisfactory and suitable for the purposes of light automatics better than anything else available.
> The suitability of the said machine gun and the urgency of its purchase or production for the use of the defence forces of Canada was common ground with all parties represented before the commission.

In view of that statement in the report it is hard to understand how hon. members opposite could endorse the suggestion that the Inglis plant should be closed down for months, when they are engaged in the manufacture of machine guns for the British and Canadian governments.

After the contract was signed attacks were made through Maclean's magazine, and by Colonel George Drew, speaking throughout the country. As a result of those attacks a royal commission was finally asked for. The request for the commission was promptly acceded to by the Prime Minister—probably a lot more quickly than some of the critics had hoped. What do we find? The powers given to the commissioner were wide; there was no attempt by the Prime Minister or the government to restrict the course of the inquiry. On the contrary they welcomed a full investigation. One of the terms of reference stated the commissioner was to report as speedily as possible to the governor in council the result of his investigation, together with the evidence taken before him, and any opinion he might see fit to express thereon. I believe hon. members of the opposition must agree that the Prime Minister and the government took the right attitude in granting a commission, and gave ample powers to the commissioner appointed.

Was the commissioner satisfactory? One of our most respected judges, the Hon. Henry Hague Davis of the Supreme Court of Canada, was named commissioner. I do not believe hon. members opposite can find any fault with his appointment. He was called to the bench by a former administration, and I do not think hon. members can claim that during the hearing of the evidence there was any tendency towards protecting the Minister of National Defence. All members must be satisfied in that respect.

Let me say this to hon. members. When they criticize the Minister of National Defence they should take into account the conditions existing in the world at this time and the condition in which the minister found the department when this government assumed office in 1935. So that hon. members of this house and the people of this country may know of some of the troubles with which the minister had to contend in his efforts to protect this country from attack, I think there should be put on record the condition of the Department of National Defence when the previous government left office. The minister is in his seat and I ask him to correct me if I am inaccurate in any statement I make in regard to the efficiency or lack of efficiency of the defence services of this country.

I shall deal first with the naval service. Barracks, dock yards and shore equipment were antiquated and inadequate. The naval magazine at Esquimalt had been condemned as far back as 1905.

In the militia service there was not a single anti-aircraft gun, although four had been ordered the year before by the previous government. In field gun ammunition the stock was less than ninety minutes' firing for guns inherited from 1918, less than half the "equipment ammunition" supposed to travel with the guns. There were no reserves. The field artillery was unsuited for mechanical traction and was outranged by from 3,000 to 6,000 yards. The coast defence armaments were obsolescent and defective. Firing practices had been curtailed, these instructions having been given in order to save the guns. The gunners were not receiving proper training. In the mechanical transport there were only a few tractors for permanent force batteries. There were no tanks or armoured cars, and no tractors for heavy guns or non-permanent field batteries. In connection with anti-gas defence there were not sufficient gas masks for the permanent force, and there were none for mobilization. No steps had been taken to provide other forms of anti-gas defence. There were no manufacturing facilities in Canada for the production of rifles, machine guns or artillery. The dominion arsenal was equipped only to manufacture rifle ammunition and a limited amount of field ammunition.

The reorganization of the militia had been recommended in 1932 and approved by the government, but no steps had been taken in the matter. Militia training had been so much restricted that many officers had had no experience in commanding troops on manoeuvres, nor had they had the opportunity to acquire the power of leadership by actual practice. The training of officers and non-commissioned officers in administrative duties had been neglected, and the majority of men in the ranks had had little or no experience in handling rifles. The training efficiency was approximately 17 per cent.

We come now to the air service. There were only twenty-three aircraft of service type, all obsolescent. None are suitable for active service to-day and are useful only for training. There were no air bombs available in Canada for immediate use. There were no aero engines, and the development of an industry would take two years. No steps had been taken in connection with industrial mobilization to survey the country's industrial resources for national defence.

During the Brandon by-election the government was charged with being a "do-nothing government." Now certain hon. members are criticizing this government and the Minister of National Defence for doing something. May I point out that in 1930-31 the combined votes for the three defence services of this country amounted to $22,163,500, and in 1933-34 they had been reduced to $13,002,484. The vote for air services was reduced from $7,475,700 to $1,697,000 in the same period. These are some of the things with which the Minister of National Defence had to deal. I think everyone will agree that he had a lot of trouble on his hands when he took over the department, which to say the least was not in the best of condition.

In making this contract he had the advice of loyal and experienced men. I assume they were loyal and experienced as many of them had been appointed under former administrations. I think he had a right to rely on the advice of the interdepartmental committee. If you condemn the Minister of National Defence, at the same time you must condemn the interdepartmental committee.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, no; he did not take their advice.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. member is entirely incorrect. That statement is absolutely untruthful.

Mr. MULOCK: Since this debate started there has been an attempt, not only in this house but outside, to create a more or less political villain. Unfortunately the person through whom the government was to be attacked is the Minister of National Defence. In times like these I think criticism might well be tempered with a realization of the conditions prevailing throughout the world and the fact that all democracies are now threatened with demands by totalitarian states. It seems to me to be a sad reflection on our democratic system to see dictatorships going ahead with their arming while we in this House of Commons are arguing over where we are going to get some guns. Surely there can be no doubt in the minds of the people of the danger that threatens this country, the British empire, and all the democracies. We all hope and pray that we shall never see again the condition that existed during the last war. We all hope and pray that this country will never be plunged into another war, but at the same time I do not think that the democratic peoples of the world are prepared to bow the knee to the dictatorships, whether they be nazi or communist.

We are hearing every day of the great preparations being made by the war machines of the world. May I say to hon. members that Germany can lose a war and recover, but the British empire can lose only one war. Then the empire would be split up. I think we would be much better occupied in this House of Commons in trying to expedite the preparations to defend ourselves from attack than in stirring up these bickerings over what form of contract there should be for the supplying of machine guns.

Mr. JAQUES: Where is the money to come from?

Mr. MULOCK: It will come from the wealth of this country, not from paper money backed up with I.O.U's.

May I say in conclusion that in view of the attacks made and the innunendoes cast, this matter should be referred to the public accounts committee with the idea of making clear to the people of this country that this contract is in the interests of the Canadian people and of national defence. I sympathize with the hon. minister that in these trying times, when Canada and the empire have been faced with war—and it has been nearer than many have realized—he should have been faced with an investigation and have had all these attacks made upon him. I intend, Mr. Speaker, to suport the resolution to refer this matter to the public accounts committee.

Mr. A. MacG. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, as this is the first time that I have spoken in the house this year I should like to congratulate my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon being elected the leader of his party. He and I are of the same profession. I have known him for a considerable length of time, and have always found him most genial. I trust that in his present position he will retain his usual genial nature which he has preserved for so long a time and that, indeed, he may retain the seat and the office he now holds for an equal length of time.

I have been very much interested, as have all hon. members, in the discussion which has been taking place in the house during the last week. I was interested in the article appearing in Maclean's magazine, written by Colonel George Drew. An advance copy of the article had been sent to me, I assume because it was thought I did not read the magazine at all, and the first impression I gained was that apparently the magazine itself was anxious to have some such propaganda to increase its circulation. The second thing which struck me was that there must have been some necessity compelling Colonel Drew to write the article, and later on it developed that there was. There was an island over there upon which stood the Conservative citadel. He wanted to get into that citadel, and his article was the approach, what might be called the Drew bridge, over which he hoped to reach the citadel. Later on he was elected leader of the Conservative patry in Ontario, and so far as I am concerned it will always be my belief that this article was written in order that he might get the publicity he required to place him in that position.

When I first read the article I was inclined to approach it, as I do a great many other matters, in a critical attitude. I never believe in accepting anything from any source without first investigating for myself whether or not the contract is a good one.

Perhaps I might explain to the house why I was more critical in this matter than usual. I remembered that we had a war before. I remember the contracts that were given in that last war. I remember the horse contracts; I remember the boot contracts; I remember the shovel contracts; I remember the bacon contracts; I remember the potato contracts; I remember the munitions contracts; I remember that all these contracts were given to people in Canada without any proper supervision, and that enormous profits were made out of these contracts, and I declared then, and I have declared ever since, that it should be absolutely understood in connection with any more war or munitions contracts to be placed by this country every possible safeguard against undue profits must be taken.

What happened later, after those contracts had been given?—and I would like to remind my hon. friends opposite of this. After all those vultures had gathered together their profits from those contracts the government of that day, not content with that, and when everybody else in the dominion was getting poorer and poorer every day, gave to these people who had made such tremendous profits out of munitions contracts of one kind or another, the opportunity to buy tax-free bonds, so that the country was not able to get back any of the money which these people had taken. It is little wonder therefore, Mr. Speaker, after the experience we have already had with war contracts, that we should be critical of any contract for munitions or war supplies given by any government at this particular time.

There has been some criticism made of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for his appointment of the judge as commissioner, and who that judge was. Let me say this, that the Prime Minister was not fearful of appointing a judge whom he himself and his government had previously appointed. Not that at all, but I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to every hon. member, that had a judge who had been appointed by the Prime Minister been chosen to head the commission investigating the Bren gun contract, the very first thing we should have heard from this country would have been that a commissioner had been appointed who had previously been appointed by the Prime Minister himself. Is there any hon. member who doubts that?

Let me give the house my experience before even the judge was named. I heard in the constituency in which I live, and I heard of it in other constituencies, that in all probability a judge of that kind would be appointed who would do the bidding of the Prime Minister and of the government. Let me go further and say that after the present judge was appointed the commissioner—and he is a judge with as fine a record and character as can be found in this country—before they knew his political persuasion, some people were saying: Well, this man having been appointed by the present Prime Minister you can be prepared for a report of the kind that the present government would like. When I pointed out to them that the circumstances did not happen to be as they thought, that the commissioner had not been appointed a judge by the present government, they were confounded. But if someone else had been appointed you would have heard the same kind of talk from coast to coast, just as surely as we are sitting here debating this matter to-day.

To touch on one or two points that have come up in this debate, criticism has been made of the reply that was given by the minister to a question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The question asked at that time was answered correctly. It was answered, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) said, "poisonously accurately." I wonder what kind of answer hon. members expect. Do they expect correct answers to questions asked? I would say this to any hon. member who criticizes that answer, that perhaps they are suggesting that the government should anticipate that hon. gentlemen do not ask the questions which they really desire to ask and that they should be given answers sought in spite of their own stupidity; in other words, that they were not sufficiently capable of putting the questions which they wished to ask. Surely no hon. member would criticize the minister or anyone else for giving a correct answer to the question which was asked.

[Mr. Young.]

There has also been criticism of the letter which the minister gave to Major Hahn, and which is referred to on page 17 of the commissioner's report. It is dated October 19, 1936, and reads:

> Dear Mr. Massey:
> The bearer of this letter, Major J. E. Hahn, D.S.O., M.C., is in England to investigate the manufacture of all classes of munitions and armaments.

Again I ask, is there any hon. member in this chamber; is there any person in this country who would take even the slightest exception to a letter of that kind? I am informed that many others have had similar letters on many occasions. If any hon. member takes exception to that, let him now rise in his place or for ever after hold his peace. Yet the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) is criticized for giving that letter. Mr. Speaker, there is no answer.

Mr. WALSH: Why does the hon. member not present some arguments in connection with the contract?

Mr. YOUNG: I listened very carefully this afternoon when the hon. member spoke, trying to find whether he had any arguments, and I found he had none.

Mr. WALSH: I should not expect certain hon. members on the other side to find anything.

Mr. YOUNG: All we have heard during this debate from the other side has been just what Colonel Drew offered: accusations and insinuations. They have never yet taken that contract, analysed it and said, this is wrong, or that is wrong, or some one has got some graft here or there. My hon. friend who just interrupted me pointed out where he thought there was some stock manipulation.

Mr. WALSH: The hon. member knows about it too.

Mr. YOUNG: I know nothing whatever about it.

Mr. WALSH: Well, the hon. member should look into it and then deal with that subject.

Mr. YOUNG: I leave it to my hon. friend to say whether or not he has. I know nothing about stock manipulation; but I say that even if the situation were as he tried to make it appear this afternoon, not a solitary dollar more would be charged against the government. It could not be. I am not concerned whether that plant cost $1,000, or $100,000, or $1,000,000.

Mr. WALSH: The hon. member should be.

Mr. YOUNG: That remark shows me that the hon. member does not understand the contract, knows nothing about it. Whether the plant cost $1,000,000 or $100,000,000 cannot add one cent to the cost of the guns, because there is a stated specific cost per foot for the factory space used in the production of the Bren machine gun, and that amount of space occupied will be under the control of the Department of National Defence. It cannot possibly add one dollar to the cost, no matter what suggestions my hon. friends may try to put forth for the people of this country. If there was any stock manipulation—of which I know nothing—that is not going to cost the people of this country anything.

Mr. WALSH: Read the evidence.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend unfortunately has not read the evidence—

Mr. WALSH: Yes, I have.

Mr. YOUNG: —and if he had he would not be able to interpret it properly. I have been in this house for some time, but during this debate I have seen the most astounding exhibition that I have ever seen since I have been a member of this house.

Mr. WALSH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I wish to have certain words spoken by the hon. member deleted from the record.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Keep on wishing.

Mr. WALSH: The hon. member stated that I would be incapable of understanding what I read.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a well known fact; it does not require any proof.

Mr. HOWE: Let the hon. member state his experience in stock transactions.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the point raised by the hon. member is a point of order.

Mr. WALSH: Well, I do, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry if there are so many hon. gentlemen who do not seem to understand anything.

Mr. YOUNG: I have seen in this house in the last few days a most astounding spectacle. I have been here for a number of years, and there are certain principles and practices and rules of procedure that are observed. Whenever anything comes up that hon. members want fully investigated and all facts brought out, what do we do? We appoint a committee and refer the matter to it in order that all the facts and relevant information may be disclosed. My hon. friends try to suggest that the evidence is in the report of the commission. Certainly there is some evidence there, but there are so many things not before the commission, as exemplified in this debate, that the only way to get them is to send this report to the committee. But what have my hon. friends done? They have done everything they possibly can, within and without the rules, to prevent this from going to the committee. Why? Because they know that at this time the Bren gun is being made, in spite of what they are saying, and the last thing in the world hon. members want to know is the whole of the facts in regard to this contract. Why? The other day the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) made a motion, which the government accepted, and what was the result? Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friends voted against your ruling that their amendment was out of order. If the challenge to your ruling had been successful, what would have happened? The logical conclusion is that if the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) had carried they would have destroyed the very motion that they themselves wanted passed.

Let us be honest; let us be sincere; let us face facts as we should face them. If hon. members really believe that this is a bad contract, let it go to the committee where all the facts can be brought out and later brought before the house and before all the people of this country, and let the contract be judged on its merits. But apparently that is not what hon. members opposite want. They want to make it appear that this commission arrived at no full and final conclusion with regard to the contract. Did the commissioner say that there was anything wrong with the contract? Nothing wrong whatever. Have any hon. members opposite who have spoken found anything wrong with the contract? Nothing whatever. Did the commissioner find any evidence of graft or corruption anywhere?

Mr. WALSH: There was no charge of graft or corruption.

Mr. YOUNG: That is the trouble, there is no charge about anything, nothing but accusations and insinuations. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Marsh) said that we had to whitewash the government. What did he mean? Did he mean that there has been so much mud-slinging in the last few days that a little whitewash was needed? There has been nothing but accusations and insinuations; no evidence of any kind at any time that hon. members were trying to analyze the contract and find out whether it is bad or good, or whether any hon. member in connection with the contract had not done his full duty. The people of this country will judge what the intent of the opposition really is. If the intent were to find out whether or not this was a good contract, what was the obvious thing to do? Every hon. member would be voting to send it to the committee in order that all the facts could be brought out and everyone would know them. But of course they do not want that. One or two hon. members went back to Toronto and then came here and said that others would have taken this contract. I think that is true. But how was the contract given to Major Hahn? As the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) said last night, Major Hahn has a fine war record, a fine character, is an able executive. He went to the Department of National Defence and saw a gun standing there, mounted. He said, what is this? He looked at it and right there his genius was displayed, because he believed he could make that gun. So he asked the department to have it sent to Toronto where he might investigate it further.

Then he went to the old country; he wanted to have access there to see how the gun was made, and after having seen the gun made he concluded that he could make it in Canada. Then what did he do? He impressed the British government with his ability, a government that has been entering into contracts of this type for years and years, hundreds of years; he "sold himself" to the British government, and succeeded in getting a contract for 5,000 guns from them. Then what? Supposing there were some bad faith about it, would he then have asked for the loan of a man who had been doing this work in a British factory for the last thirty-eight years to take charge of a plant here and have first-hand supervision of the whole operation? That is not the action of a man who was trying to do a wrong thing by this country. There is every evidence that he went about the matter in the most business-like way in order that he might do, not only for this dominion, but for the British government, the finest piece of work a man could perform.

One serious thing about this discussion is this. In Canada, where there is a great deal of unemployment, we have under this contract the first opportunity of making some munitions for the British government, and the discussion that has taken place in this house will tend to discourage more of the same thing. This discussion will have a greater influence in that direction than anything else, and the Conservative party will be responsible. They have taken upon their own shoulders a load of responsibility which they will not be able to shake off.

I believe that we have here in Canada the brains, ability, material and machinery, to do a great deal of this manufacturing, and if the once great Conservative party, the present party being a mere remnant of its former self, had been assisting in the good work rather than trying to hinder it they would have shown themselves much better citizens than they have been demonstrated to be.

This is a serious time. A few years ago I would not have been found declaring in this house that we ought to be making munitions, because I thought then that the possiblity of war was entirely removed from the nations of the earth. But with thousands of others who think as I do I say that it is incumbent upon us to build up our national defences. Therefore, it is a sorry sight to see the great National Conservative party spoiling every chance we have in this country of improving our own condition. While I hope that there will never be any use for these implements of war, at the same time I sincerely hope that if war comes we shall not be found wanting as we were many years ago.

I should very much like to feel that in a matter of great importance to the country, such as this, we could have had, the Liberal government could have had, the full co-operation of all hon. members. It is most unfortunate, however, that we find hon. members opposite doing everything they can to frustrate any effort that is made. When this question went before the royal commission an exhaustive investigation was held. The commission sat for many weeks, and what was the verdict? It can be summed up in the last sentence or two of the report in which the commissioner says:

> I think it right to say that there is no evidence (nor is there in the evidence any ground for suspicion) that the minister or the deputy minister or any officer or official of the Department of National Defence was guilty of any act of corruption or anything in the nature of corruption.

In other words, the commissioner said, "I find no fault with this man," echoing the greatest words ever pronounced in the most solemn tribunal that ever sat in this world. And what do we find immediately afterwards? We find that the Tory rabble from coast to coast cries, "Crucify this man!" The leader of the opposition introduces a motion asking that we crucify the contract, and the second stage would be to "crucify the minister," notwithstanding that the commissioner has declared that he finds no fault with him. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) would have the minister crucified right now. I say, Mr. Speaker, that we are fortunate in having as Minister of National Defence the type of man who is at present the head of that department. I am in a position to say that last September, after getting out of a sick bed, I journeyed to Ottawa and called on my good friend the minister in his room at the hotel. My wife was with me. In the report the commissioner recommends a board, and hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to suggest that this reference is unfortunate so far as the Minister of National Defence is concerned. What did the Minister of National Defence say to me in his room in September? He said, "Doctor Young, if there is one thing I would detest more than anything else it is that in any contract with which I have anything to do there should be any undue profit from any source, and I think it would be a fine thing to have some board established to which all these contracts could be sent instead of having them dealt with by the minister." That was his suggestion last September, and there is nothing in the report that was not already suggested to me by the minister himself. Does that suggest that he himself wishes to control any part of munitions contracts in order that he might do something which might not be recognized as proper? I submit the evidence is that he absolutely desired the very thing which the commissioner reported and the government accepted.

Mr. STEWART: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a fair question? Will he give any reason why the minister did not make that suggestion to the commissioner?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I can tell my hon. friend the reason. My colleagues will bear me out that I placed the suggestion before them at the time, and discussed with the Prime Minister the possibility of making the suggestion to the commissioner, but I thought as a responsible minister of the crown it was not my place to make such a recommendation to a responsible commissioner.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend opposite is paying me a compliment when he suggests that I could read what was in the minister's mind.

Mr. MANION: You read ours. I do not know why you could not read the minister's.

Mr. YOUNG: If there was any time in the history of our country when we should not have such a frivolous discussion as this, that time is now; and if hon. gentlemen are sincere in saying that they wish to know all about this contract, the proper thing for them to have done was to support the motion to have the matter go to the committee so that we would have known exactly what the situation was.

It is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 9, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REFUSAL OF BROADCASTING PRIVILEGE TO PUBLISHER OF TORONTO GLOBE AND MAIL

The order having been called for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. MacNeil for reference to the public accounts committee of the agreement between the government and the John Inglis Company for the manufacture of Bren machine guns, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stevens.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, before the house proceeds, I desire to submit a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). I have given him notice, but I am sorry to say—

Mr. SPEAKER: The order of the day has been called, and we are proceeding with it. The hon. member cannot put a question unless he obtains the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SLAGHT: With the permission of the house, the question is as follows, directed to the Minister of Transport: Has the minister taken any steps to bring to the attention of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the technical regulations of the corporation which resulted in the refusal of permission to Mr. George McCullagh to broadcast addresses over privately-owned networks, the manuscript of which addresses he had offered to submit in advance?

I regret I have not given longer notice to the minister. I informed him only a few moments ago of my intention to put the question.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, after the first broadcast I did call the attention of the general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to the inconsistency of the ruling of the board as it worked out in actual practice. I also suggested that there had been a lack of notice, which had perhaps involved all parties to the broadcast in a rather untenable position. I suggested to the general manager that he should consult his board as to whether or not the new ruling was properly applied in the McCullagh case. The general manager did get in touch with his board, or with such of them as he could reach, and later advised me that the board had decided not to change its ruling in that instance.

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR REFERENCE TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacNeil:

That the agreement between the government and the John Inglis Company, of Toronto, for the manufacture of Bren machine guns, the report of the royal commission dealing with said agreement, and all related documents, evidence, vouchers and exhibits, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stevens.

Mr. A. MacG. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock last evening I was discussing the Bren gun contract and pointing out the very strange tactics of the opposition. I should like in the few minutes I have left to sum up the argument I was making.

The motion before the house is to refer to the public accounts committee the Bren gun contract and the report of the royal commission in regard thereto, so that it may be fully investigated, if further investigation be necessary. The Conservative party has very strenuously opposed the motion. Why, then, do they not accept the verdict of Mr. Justice Davis, the commissioner, who said that he could not find any evidence of wrongdoing on the part of the minister, his deputy, or any other official, or any member of the House of Commons or of the Senate? The commissioner went further and said—this is the limit to which any man could go—that there was not even a suspicion of any wrongdoing. This is the finest testimonial of character and high purpose which any man could receive.

As to form and substance of the contract the commissioner did say, "upon the whole evidence, that is a question for the government and parliament to pass upon." Let us accept that view. Then what should we do? What has always been the practice in this house when a particular matter had to be investigated? Send it to a committee, of course, where all the evidence given before the commission could be studied and, in this case, in addition the further evidence which is now available. From press reports which I read carefully I noted that the commissioner did not think it necessary to admit evidence to say how good the contract was. I most certainly have no criticism to offer on that account. His conception of his duty was to find out if there was any wrongdoing on the part of anyone, not to find out how good the contract was. He found there was no wrongdoing or suspicion of wrongdoing on the part of the minister, his officials or any member of the House of Commons or of the Senate.

There is much evidence to be submitted to show this contract to be an excellent contract, and this is the reason why the leader of the opposition and his party do not wish this whole matter to go before the committee. They know that after all the evidence is heard the public will brand their speeches in this house this week, filled as they were with insinuations and veiled accusations, as being of a type used by cheap Tammany ward politicians. If there is honesty of purpose in their actions they should all vote to send this to the committee where the whole facts can be reviewed and where witnesses will have the right and the opportunity to be heard. Their tactics will be condemned not only by this house but by the people of this country.

Many references have been made to the fact that there was no competitive bidding on the contract. What did government counsel propose doing before the commission about this? They wished to bring contractors from this country and the United States to prove that in a contract such as the Bren gun contract competitive bidding would be impossible of accomplishment. The witnesses were all present and ready to give evidence. After considering this proposal the commissioner decided against calling such witnesses, and so did Colonel Drew. The experience of Great Britain for over a hundred years demonstrates clearly that in such cases competitive bids are impossible.

In conclusion let me say to the leader of the opposition and to his party: In the interests of this country, stop this petty quibbling, these unwarranted insinuations. After all, the Conservative party in the past has had a noble tradition. The hon.

gentleman is a new leader; let me suggest to him that he start on a high plane, and not in cheap ward politics. His party is really worthy of a better effort than is now being displayed.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I let the hon. gentleman get away with it when he said that our charges were like cheap Tammany ward politics, but he has just repeated that about myself and I demand that he withdraw his remarks.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the rules would declare that remark offensive or unparliamentary.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman applied the words directly to me. I let him get away with it once but I do not think he should be permitted to do it the second time.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand him to apply them especially to the hon. member, but rather to the whole party.

Mr. MANION: His first application was to the whole party. I do not quite get the point that it is more offensive if applied to me personally. At any rate, this time he has applied it to me personally. However, if that is satisfactory to the hon. gentleman he is quite welcome to use it.

Mr. YOUNG: I would suggest to the leader of the opposition that I am thinking of him as a leader of a party. I stated my conception of the whole argument advanced by the Conservative party during this week, and I believe I will be upheld not only by the members of this house but by the people of the country.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this debate is certainly the strangest that has taken place since I came into this house, and I believe it is one of the strangest on record. A magazine article appeared which caused a good deal of comment. The article confined itself to vague insinuations; it made no charge of wrongdoing. However, the government felt that since the matter had been brought before the public, the public were entitled to the fullest possible explanation of the situation behind the article. As a result a justice of the Supreme Court of Canada conducted an investigation which lasted for a number of weeks. Throughout that investigation no charges of wrongdoing were made. The judge submitted his report, and in it he said that there was no wrongdoing on the part of the minister, the deputy minister or any official of the department or any other person. Nevertheless, the report having been submitted, we have had hon. gentlemen opposite discussing this matter for several days. Here again each member who gets up is careful to say that he makes no charge of wrongdoing. We have heard from the opposition only vague charges of inefficiency in dealing with this contract, and a blackguarding of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). It is with the charge of inefficiency in connection with this contract that I wish to deal.

I may say, and I think all hon. gentlemen will agree with me, that the purchase of arms and munitions has always been a difficult matter for a government to deal with, and the situation is far more difficult in peace time than it is in war time. In time of war, a volume of munitions can be contracted for which will warrant the setting up of the particular equipment and organization required for the production. Most of the buying for my own department, and I imagine the same thing applies to other departments of government, is a comparatively simple matter because generally the articles being purchased are in ordinary commercial use and are such as can be secured from the general stock of the manufacturer. But no one stocks arms and munitions of warfare of the type useful in the situation that confronts us at present. The result is that it is necessary to make special arrangements for the manufacture of these articles.

I have had some experience with this type of purchasing. Like the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) I received a training as an engineer, but unlike the hon. member for Greenwood I practised my profession for many years. I practised it in a highly specialized field and in that practice I had to purchase equipment which was not of standard manufacture, but which had to be designed in my own draughting room and constructed in the factories of Canada. It so happens that a large portion of that equipment was manufactured in the particular plant under discussion, the plant of the John Inglis Company of Toronto. We have heard it referred to as a broken down plant, but I know it as one of the best equipped of the boiler plants and machine shops in the Dominion of Canada. In my practice it was one of three plants in Canada which was capable of turning out a large order of mechanical equipment for a grain elevator. In my practice it has supplied equipment of that type worth several hundreds of thousands of dollars. I took enough interest in the matter a short time ago to visit this so-called decrepit and broken-down plant, because I wished to confirm my opinion that it was still capable of efficient production. To my surprise I found that the Bren gun was not being made in the Inglis plant as I knew it. That plant was being used for the purposes for which it had always been used, the normal production of boilers and special types of mechanical equipment. But I found that a new plant had been built as an addition to the Inglis plant, and that this addition was of most modern factory construction, of concrete, and with the best of ventilating and lighting systems, and I learned that the Bren machine gun was to be manufactured in that new portion of the plant. I found that that plant was being filled with the special machinery required to carry out the Bren gun contract, with the most modern lay-out that could be used for that type of production. This, then, was the broken-down plant that has been referred to so frequently by hon. gentlemen opposite in this debate.

Hon. gentlemen opposite take the view that they were able to handle their purchases of munitions without any difficulty whatever, but I think we have only to look at the appropriations of the various years to find why that was the case. Going back ten years we find that the defence appropriation in 1929 and succeeding years was as follows: in 1929, $20,000,000; 1930, $22,100,000; 1931, $18,900,000; 1932, $15,000,000;1933, $13,000,000—I imagine the purchasing problem in that year was confined to buying postage stamps; in 1934, $13,3000,000; 1935, $17,000,000; 1936, $25,500,000; 1937, $35,500,000; 1938, $35,500,000.

There is one thing that I wish to call to the attention of the house, and that is that at this moment all of us are defence-minded. We have all seen the threat of war come almost to the boiling point and then cool down, and we have all felt very thankful that something was being done to provide an adequate defence for this country. I just wish to remind hon. members that it was the present Minister of National Defence who started the machinery which is bringing Canada into a position in which she can defend herself against attack.

Now let us examine the particular transaction under consideration from the point of view of lack of efficiency. In 1933 Lieutenant Jolley was sent to England to investigate the small arms situation. In August, 1935, he visited the Enfield plant in England, which was just then beginning to set up for the manufacture of the Bren gun. In July, 1936, Lieutenant Jolley returned to Canada and reported to his department that the Bren gun was a distinct advance on other types of machine guns and would be the type required in Canada for defence purposes.

Some two months later, two machine guns were received in Canada from Czechoslovakia, sent out for inspection, I presume, by arrangement of the Department of National Defence officials acting on the report of Lieutenant Jolley. There was nothing secret about those guns. As I say, they came, not from England, but from Czechoslovakia. England at that time had not completed the equipment of her factory and had not produced a Bren gun. These Bren guns were set up for the inspection of the defence department. Major Hahn came to Ottawa about that time looking for business for his plant, as hundreds of others were coming to every department of the government looking for business for their plants. Major Hahn saw the gun in General LaFleche's office and immediately was interested in it; for he thought that that was a type of arms which his plant was equipped to manufacture.

Mr. CAHAN: Equipped at that time?

Mr. HOWE: I said he thought it was equipped—he was interested in it at that time.

Mr. CAHAN: I have a higher opinion of him than to think he had any such idea.

Mr. HOWE: It was explained to Major Hahn at that time that the department had no plans for procuring this gun, that they had simply brought it out for inspection. However, Major Hahn decided that he would put himself in a position to manufacture the gun, when the time came, by the ordinary methods used by any manufacturer; that is, he determined that when the time came he would know more about the process of manufacture of that particular gun than any competitor in his field.

Mr. HOMUTH: May I ask the minister how Major Hahn knew that that opportunity was going to come?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. HOMUTH: I won't sit down.

Mr. HOWE: What is the question? Mr. Speaker, I object to interruptions from this bird of passage.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The minister has described an hon. member as a bird of passage. The hon. member who just sat down (Mr. Young) described me as a cheap Tammany Hall politician, and the hon. member (Mr. Howe) talked of our blackguarding the Minister of National Defence. All these expressions, I submit, are unparliamentary and I object to their being used of any members of this party. If that type of rough language is going to be used, we can use it too. I ask, Mr.

Speaker, for a retraction of that disrespectful remark, a bird of passage, made by the minister and applied to an hon. member of this house.

Mr. HOWE: I withdraw the remark, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And the leader of the opposition should withdraw the threat he has just made. He has no right to threaten the house.

Mr. MANION: Better be a little more careful, then, of your language. We can use the same kind of language too.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Too much heat.

Mr. MANION: Not much light from my hon. friend.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Nor from you either.

Mr. HOWE: Major Hahn proceeded with the thought in mind that he would put himself in a position to manufacture the Bren gun, and he proceeded to England to learn as much as he could of its manufacture. He had a letter of introduction, and we have been told that that letter of introduction was patronage. Now I once gave a letter of introduction. It was addressed to an acquaintance of mine holding an official position in England. The man to whom I gave it was interested in obtaining an order for aeroplanes. When he returned to Canada he told me that my letter had been most helpful; and I assume that on that ground I am charged with patronage. The letter I gave was given to a gentleman who happened to be, in 1930, the dominion treasurer of the Conservative party. That is how much "patronage" there is in that type of letter. I believe that any member of the government would be glad to give a letter to any man visiting England for a purpose which is beneficial to the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MANION: And make him a representative of the government, as the Prime Minister did?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. THOMPSON: And pay his expenses?

Mr. HOWE: That is not so, as my hon. friend knows. In March of 1938 the government was in a position to order Bren guns: in other words, it had reached a stage in its armament plans where it could afford to spend the money necessary to purchase this equipment. When the time came, Major Hahn was in exactly the position in which, in 1936, he had started out to place himself. He knew the type of equipment required for the manufacture of Bren guns. He had so strongly impressed himself on the British government that he had a contingent order from Britain for an additional 5,000 guns, and he came before the Department of National Defence in a position in which no other Canadian manufacturer could possibly place himself. It is strange to be told that so many plants could manufacture this gun, when there is no information that any rival manufacturer had taken the slightest interest in this branch of manufacturing in the time intervening.

Mr. STEWART: None of them knew anything about it.

Mr. HOWE: We are told that there were any number of plants in Canada which could have manufactured this gun; that is, they could have just taken it in as a matter of routine.

Mr. STIRLING: Oh, no.

Mr. HOWE: That statement, of course, is absolutely ridiculous.

Mr. STIRLING: That is not being suggested.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HOWE: I venture to say that, if any other manufacturer had been approached to manufacture the Bren gun, his first questions would have been, what do I have to do? What kind of equipment is required? What kind of lay-out do I need? Do I have to build a new factory? What is this all about? Major Hahn knew the answers to those questions, and as a result he got the order.

A contract was drawn up to cover this work. Obviously the work had to be on a cost plus basis. No factory in Canada would have been able to tender on any other basis, because the production costs of that piece of equipment could not possibly be known to any manufacturer. A price might have been obtained, but certainly it would have been made high enough to amortize all the equipment required and to ensure the manufacturer against all the hazards of this new type of production.

As I have said, a contract was drawn up. Mr. Justice Davis tells us his findings as to that contract. He says:

> The contract is not for a fixed sum; it is on a cost plus basis. It is admitted that we do not know how much the guns are going to cost. There are, of course, adequate powers of inspection, supervision and control vested in the department under the contract and with the estimates from Enfield of what the guns there are costing it should be possible to keep actual cost here well within bounds. No substantial objection can be taken in my view to the provisions of the Canadian contract, though in the absence of any competitive bids or terms of manufacture I am unable to pass upon the substance as distinct from the form of the contract.

Mr. Justice Davis said he could find no objection to the terms of the contract.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Oh, no—the form of the contract.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) finds a great many objections to the form, but I must say that I have studied it and having some professional knowledge of contracts, I take the view of Mr. Justice Davis.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister permit me? I objected not to the form of the contract but to the substance of it.

Mr. HOWE: Well, I really do not know how the hon member distingushed substance from form.

Mr. STEVENS: They are entirely different.

Mr. CASSELMAN: The commissioner did.

Mr. HOWE: I should be interested if someone would pick out the substance and separate it from the form.

It has been taken for granted in this house that the contractor will receive as a result of his work a profit of about 7·6 per cent on his cost. I am not prepared to admit even that, because I notice a clause in the contract having to do with rejects. The contract provides that unless the number of rejects can be kept down to that of other plants in efficient operation, the cost of those rejects can be charged up to the contractor, and, in fact, his whole plant taken over and the contract completed by others. It seems to me that is a hazard, and a very serious hazard, to those who hold this contract, and one that might very easily call for insurance in the margin of profit allowed.

Having had some experience in placing these contracts, I venture to say that no manufacturer in Canada, who has a plant in actual production, would want that kind of contract. I have put it to a number of my friends in the manufacturing business, and I have never found one who, when he was pinned down to it, would admit that he would take this contract into his plant. I met in Ottawa one or two contractors who came here prepared to give their evidence before the inquiry that they would not want that type of contract in their plant, and that it was not a favourable contract as far as the contractor is concerned.

So much for the charge of inefficiency against the minister. We all know that when a department is stepped up, from the level at which this department was operating in 1933 and 1934, to two and a half times the former expenditure, all details in that department may not be handled efficiently. When a departmental budget is enlarged to four or five times the size it was a few years ago, some additions of course are necessary. The Minister of National Defence had called the attention of the government to the fact that his purchasing staff was inadequate to handle the volume of work thrown upon it, and himself had suggested such a purchasing board as was in vogue in 1917. Mr. Justice Davis recommended in his report that type of board. I am sure that no hon. member on this side of the house, and least of all the Minister of National Defence, would quarrel with that finding of Commissioner Davis. Just how that can be twisted into a charge of inefficiency against the minister I am at a loss to understand.

Now, what is the effect of all this debate about the Bren gun contract?

Mr. DUNNING: It has made one man a leader of the Tory party.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend says that it has made one man the leader of the Tory party in Ontario; and I think that that fact has so strongly impressed itself upon others in this house that it has had a good deal to do with the length of this debate. One thing it certainly has done: it has tended to prevent the government from arriving at its goal of obtaining 7,000 Bren machine guns. The hon. member for Kootenay East said that if it had not been for hon. gentlemen opposite, this contract would now have been working smoothly. I am glad to be able to tell him, in consequence of my call at the plant, that the contract is working smoothly. I was told there that it was expected that parts for the Bren machine gun would be produced next June, fifteen months after the signing of the contract. So it has not had the effect it reasonably could have had in slowing down production on this particular contract; rather, it has had the effect of stopping the flow of orders from Great Britain for munitions manufactured in this country. Before this inquiry started munition orders were flowing here, small orders, it is true, because the buying of munitions in peace time must necessarily be made through small orders. If Canada should not be called upon to go to war, the present purchase of 7,000 Bren machine guns may last for a decade or two. If war comes, an immediate production of many times 7,000 will be required. No small part of the defence of Canada is in building up the productive capacity of manufacturing plants to be available in time of war.

At the completion of this contract we shall have a plant built specially for the manufacture of Bren machine guns. When this contract is finished the plant will be turned to other uses, but if at any time in the future more Bren machine guns are required, we shall have the plant that built them, the machinery that was used in their manufacture, and we will place that plant in production in short order. That is an important part of Canadian defence.

When Britain places an order for munitions or for aeroplanes to be manufactured in Canada the output is for Great Britain, but it does this for Canada: it establishes plants in Canada with productive capacity available to Canada in time of need; and whatever may be said about British orders in this country as a contribution towards relieving unemployment, they have a real use to Canada as a defensive weapon. It is a calamity to this country that this flow of orders from Great Britain should be stopped. If for no other reason, this matter of the Bren gun should be allowed to drop, and the defence department permitted to get on with its business, which is so important to the safety of the country at this time.

I could perhaps discuss some of the side issues—how much stock was sold and at what price; but what has that to do with the production of Bren machine guns? Does the buyer examine the financing of a company before placing an order with it? What a buyer is interested in is the productive capacity of a plant and the ability of the management to fill his order. If stock was sold, the sale of that stock was regulated not by this government but rather by the provincial government. A statement was made that there were street rumours in Montreal that the stock would sell at $20 a share. Those rumours could have been dispelled quickly if people had looked up the ruling of the Ontario securities commission limiting the sale price to $7.50 a share. I should be glad—but, no; I will not say anything more about rumours. I might have to retract.

I do not wish to pursue the matter further, but I do submit that the Minister of National Defence has been unfairly attacked from the point of view of efficiency in connection with this Bren machine gun order. I suggest that the requests for his resignation are an attack upon him personally which is not justified by anything that has happened in respect to this order. I sincerely hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will examine their position and ask themselves whether they are doing something worth while for Canada in keeping up this propaganda. I trust that the defence plans of the country will be no longer held back because of this discussion.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I hope to be able to address the house briefly upon this important subject without calling names, without questioning motives, and dealing only with facts. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) has taken another course; I do not propose to follow his example. He spoke about the appropriations in years gone by for defence purposes and compared them with the appropriations that have been made during the past few years.

Let me point out to him and to this house that the conditions are altogether different. When the appropriations to which he refers were made, the program of the British empire and of the dominions was, as he knows perfectly well, in the direction of disarmament. That is the program that was supposed to be in effect throughout the world. We were relying upon the collective security of the League of Nations and if he will look at Hansard he will find that there was considerable criticism of even those small appropriations. And much of that criticism came from the other side of the house.

As I have said, conditions have changed entirely. We have had to adopt another course, and following the example of Great Britain our appropriations for national defence have had to be substantially increased. There was some criticism of them even from that side of the house, in 1935 and even in 1936. The next session that opposition was not quite so strong, but I am not sure that the hon. gentleman will not find some criticism from his own side of the house of the appropriations for national defence. I hope that before the session is over we shall be able to find out just how much Canada has got in the way of effective preparation for the defence of the country out of these large appropriations.

The Minister of Transport says that he gave a letter of introduction, and that what was done in this case was nothing more than what he did. Well, the extraordinary character of the letter given in this case was that Major Hahn, to whom it was given, was made a representative of the Canadian government in this matter—made so by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is entirely wrong, and my hon. friend knows it.

Mr. STEWART: I do not want to argue with my right hon. friend; the record is there. It has been read several times, and I submit that is the effect of it. I leave it to hon. members to draw their own conclusions as to the effect of that letter and the language used in it. That letter placed Major Hahn in an exceptionally favourable position, a position of which he took full advantage, a position in which no other possible competitor was placed, a position to which no competitor could attain. Then Major Hahn followed up that advantage. He came back to Canada with that knowledge and maintained his preferred position.

The minister spoke about the increased expenditure of the last few years. I submit that the fact that expenditures have increased is a further reason for adhering to sound business principles; that the greater your appropriation, the more your expenditures increase, the more need there is for the observance by the government of sound business principles.

Mr. HOWARD: As you did under the Public Works Construction Act.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, all right; three or four years have passed and there has not been anything very wrong shown in connection with the expenditures on public works. No commissioners have been appointed to investigate, and there has been no adverse report.

Mr. FRASER The people gave you an adverse report in 1935.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, and they are going to give you one at the next election.

Again, the Minister of Transport said that the effect of this investigation might be to stop the flow of munition orders from Great Britain. I say that unless the situation is cleaned up, the manner in which this contract was dealt with will have done incalculable harm to the prospects of Canadian manufacturers getting business from Great Britain.

Mr. FRASER: George Drew will have to answer that.

Mr. STEWART: Here again I am sure that the people will draw their own conclusions from the manner in which this contract has been let.

We have had rather a long debate on this subject, and it is difficult to summarize the arguments that have been made and to crystallize the opinion of the house in connection with it. The question is, what action should now be taken? The main facts are not at all in dispute. It is perfectly clear that in February, 1936, the Canadian high commissioner in Great Britain notified the Canadian government, as set out on page 4 of the report, that the Bren gun was available, that it had been adopted as a weapon by the British government. And the report went on to say that:

> Particular attention was drawn, in the high commissioner's letter, to the statement in the war office letter that in making the agreement opportunity was taken of including therein provision to enable his majesty's governments in the dominions, in the event of their adoption of the gun, to take advantage of the terms of the agreement should they desire to do so. The agreement covered the patented invention for the machine gun itself as well as a certain tripod from which the gun could be fired and a filling machine for use in connection with the gun. One of the conditions of the said agreement relating to the possible manufacture of the said gun by the dominions was that such manufacture shall be in a factory operated by the government in question.

Naturally the question arises right there: Why was this provision not followed up? Why was not this adopted as a matter of policy? That is only one of the questions which arises in connection with this contract.

The next fact that is perfectly clear is that the Canadian Department of National Defence, upon the return of Lieutenant Jolley in August, 1936, had full information in connection with this Bren gun, but no contract for the manufacture of the gun was awarded until March, 1938. It seems a long lapse of time. The evidence shows that Lieutenant Jolley had prepared plans of a building that might be used for the manufacture of this gun. The contract which has been the subject of investigation involved the expenditure of millions of dollars. If there is any principle that is well established in connection with the administration of public business it is that where possible public tenders should be invited, particularly where the amount involved is large.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the hon. member's record?

Mr. STEWART: My record is there, and I point out to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) that under the act I had no alternative whatever; it is provided in the public works act that for any expenditure over $5,000 public tenders must be invited. And they were invited in all cases.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am speaking of the Department of National Defence.

Mr McLARTY: That is not in the Public Works Construction Act.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, that principle was followed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Never.

Mr. EULER: Will my hon. friend say that after tenders were received the lowest tenderer received the contract?

Mr. STEWART: Not in every case.

Mr. EULER: Not in any case.

Mr. STEWART: The contract was always awarded at the amount of the lowest tender.

Mr. HOWARD: Talk about patronage!

Mr. STEWART: It was not patronage at all. I may tell my hon. friend why that course was adopted.

Mr. EULER: We know.

Mr. STEWART: We thought it unfair, and I appeal to this house if it would not be unfair, to allow one contractor to have four or five big contracts and others not have any.

Mr. HOWE: That is not the reason the treasurer would give.

Mr. STEWART: There was a distribution of these contracts, but always on the basis of the lowest tender.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Never, not in national defence.

Mr. STEWART: I am not speaking of national defence. I am speaking of public works, that is the point; and I know exactly whereof I speak.

Mr. POWER: Will the hon. member deny that under the public works construction acts specifically the right was given to the government not to call for public tenders?

Mr. STEWART: It may have been, in some cases.

Mr. POWER: Certainly; it was given specifically.

Mr. STEWART: Given by the house, with the approval of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Not by the house.

Mr. STEWART: I was dealing with the fact that no contract was let until March, 1938, and that the contract involved the expenditure of large sums of money. But the sound principle of inviting tenders was not followed here. The Minister of National Defence admits that that principle is sound, but he thought it was not practicable in this instance. He said there was only one man who asked for the opportunity of tendering. Well, are we to have the principle applied that only those who ask are to have the privilege of tendering on contracts such as the one in question?

It is said the construction of buildings for arsenals would involve a large expenditure of money In giving his evidence before the commissioner the minister rather approved of the manufacture, where practicable, in government-owned arsenals. He said however that a very large expenditure would be involved and that his appropriations were small. The chief of staff made a report in which he outlined a plan for the construction of arsenals which would take care of all requirements and which would have cost $20,000,000 or $30,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was $30,000,000 or $35,000,000.

Mr. STEWART: We will not quarrel about a few millions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And that was the former chief of staff.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, the former chief of staff. But the evidence taken before the commissioner shows that to construct a building suitable for the manufacture of Bren guns would not cost more than $120,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where is that?

Mr. STEWART: In the report; in the evidence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where is that?

Mr. STEWART: It is there. That is substantially what is said.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where? Please read it.

Mr. STEWART: At page 11 we find this:

During his testimony the minister said:

"I may say very definitely that the plan of government ownership as such has never been definitely abandoned; it has just been postponed because of the financial stringency which was particularly embarrassing to the Minister of National Defence."

And again:

But the testimony given before the commission established that only 60,000 square feet of space was necessary for the purpose of production of the 7,000 Bren guns for Canada as well as 5,000 guns for the war office and that an entire new building (apart from land) would cost approximately $120,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is the building alone.

Mr. STEWART: That is what I said.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The building alone; not the plant.

Mr. STEWART: It does not take much land for a building of that sort.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That does not cover the cost of machinery, as the hon. member must know.

Mr. STEWART: The government had a lot of machinery. It was supplying a lot of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, no.

Mr. STEWART: The government is supplying machinery in this instance.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, but it did not have it.

Mr. STEWART: Whether the government had it or not, they are acquiring it and putting it into this plant.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The two governments.

Mr. STEWART: So there is no saving of expenditure in that connection. The next step was that the interdepartmental committee was appointed and set up. Major Hahn proceeded to advance his project, and matters moved along for a period of about a year. It was when they were getting down close to the letting of the contract that the interdepartmental committee came into the matter. This thought naturally occurs to one: Why were they not brought in much earlier? Why was it that it was not until just about the time the contract was to be closed that the interdepartmental committee was consulted? Their view at that stage was that tenders could and should be invited. It was intimated by the deputy minister that the British government were not in favour of inviting tenders. The committee suggested that a cable be sent, and that was done. Then they suggested that another cable be sent asking categorically whether the British war office had any objection to inviting tenders from a selected list. That was not sent. The position was taken by the deputy minister that the government assumed the responsibility for the line of action ultimately taken. The committee acquiesced in that, and tenders were not invited. Then the contract was awarded, and we are now dealing with the report of the commissioner made after investigation and consideration of that contract.

The suggestion has been made that the report and the contract be referred to the public accounts committee. Let us consider what would probably happen if that were done. I want to point out here that in the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) and in the terms of the notice of motion appearing in the votes and proceedings under the name of the Minister of National Defence there is a complete absence of any instructions or directions to the public accounts committee as to what it shall do or how it shall proceed. In fact, the formula which has been followed for years in connection with the reference of the report of the auditor general to the public accounts committee has been adopted. We know what has happened in years past in this connection. No action whatever has been taken.

What is the public accounts committee to do? Are we to send the report to that committee and leave it to decide what course it shall pursue?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise to a point of order. A few minutes ago the hon. gentleman said that the second cable was not sent. I desire to refer the hon. member to exhibit No. 224 in which it is stated that two cablegrams were received by the war office from the deputy minister of national defence.

Mr. STEWART: In the evidence it is stated that it was not sent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The exhibit reads in part:

> Later in the afternoon of February 2 I was called to Sir Harold Brown's office and was shown by him two cablegrams which had just been received from the deputy minister of national defence.

Mr. STEWART: In the report it is stated that that course was not adopted. Mr. Elliott in giving his evidence said that the final cablegram was not sent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Look at the exhibit. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I wish to have the record clear.

Mr. STEWART: That is my recollection of it.

Mr. CAHAN: The minister is referring to an entirely different incident. The commissioner has reported upon one, and the minister is referring to another.

Mr. STEWART: This is found at page 41 of the report:

> The committee pointed out that there had not been received from England a categorical denial that they would not deal with any other company. We therefore suggested a further wire or cable asking them, "will you or will you not deal with a selected list of companies?" That was quite a thing to raise, after the several cables that had passed.

The report then gives the dates of the cables, and continues:

> He really felt so strongly about it that it amounted to a suggestion that we must not do it. And the committee accepted that.

The committee accepted the chairman's ruling that they must not do it, and it was not sent. Does the minister admit the accuracy of that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, and I shall deal with it later on.

Mr. STEWART: I was dealing with what followed after that. We come then to the point where this interdepartmental committee had to deal with the matter. Notwithstanding their strong desire, there was no change in the attitude of the deputy minister and the contract went to Major Hahn.

When interrupted I was dealing with the reference to the public accounts committee. Assume that by the adoption of a motion, whether that of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) or that of which notice has been given by the Minister of National Defence, this report and the evidence is sent over to the public accounts committee. The reference will be made without any instructions whatever. Let us imagine we are having a meeting of that committee. How long will it take to determine the procedure? I can visualize that taking some days. We must not forget the small number of members who are not on the government side. These members are also on other committees and therefore may not be able to attend the meetings of the public accounts committee from day to day. Quite often there is a conflict in the times of meeting of different committees. I wonder how long it will take the committee to determine what the procedure will be?

Then when that is determined, how long will it take to carry out that procedure? When that is done, how long will it take us to adopt a report? When a report is adopted, it will have to be brought back to this house, and then we will be right where we are to-day. I suggest that that course is a futile course. It will all come back and we will be at the same stage that we are at now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend if in the circumstances he is going to vote to refer it to the committee?

Mr. STEWART: It will be seen in the end how we shall vote. As I have said, the report of the committee must come back to this house for final determination. We have had the evidence and we have had the report. The main facts are not in dispute, so why not face the situation and deal with it now? Why not decide whether the contract is good or bad, whether it should be approved, condemned or cancelled? I say that in the public interest we should have prompt action. I suggest to the Prime Minister that he consider introducing a resolution approving the contract so that the issue may be decided fairly and squarely and finally and without delay. There should be no more uncertainty and futility. Let us choose between futility and finality in connection with this issue. Let us get it over with.

I was surprised that when the Prime Minister read this report he did not at once take proceedings to have the contract cancelled. I cannot think of anything that would have done more to restore public confidence in his government and in the Department of National Defence. The contract contains certain provisions dealing with possible cancellation. They are vague and indefinite, but I have no doubt that cancellation could be made on terms that would be fair to the contractor. At the same time that the contract is cancelled, let the doors of the courts be opened to the contractor, and if his hands are clean he can obtain damages or compensation on the basis provided for in the contract.

One firm and one firm only had a chance to tender for this contract. Let me ask three or four questions. Why was the recommendation of the British government that these munitions be manufactured in a government arsenal disregarded? Why were tenders not invited? Why was Major Hahn introduced to the department as he was, and why was he introduced by the department and by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the British government and given a preferred position over all others? There is only one answer that fits all these questions, and that answer is consistent with the action taken by this government. From the beginning it was the determination and intention to give this contract to Major Hahn and to no other person. That is the only answer that is consistent with the whole record and with the findings of the commissioner.

I contend that having regard to the present state of public opinion with respect to profits from war expenditures that is a very bad situation. The public desire competition in the letting of contracts, and they are particularly insistent on that in respect of contracts having to do with war expenditures. In my opinion the best way to restore the confidence of the public would be to wash the slate clean and start all over on a sound basis of public competition or competition by a selected number of firms capable of doing work of this kind. This contract was given to a firm which had no experience, no plant and no equipment. Everything points to a determination and intention on the part of the government to give the contract to one firm and one firm only.

What should be done under the circumstances? I submit that this is not a matter for further investigation by the public accounts committee. It is a matter for direct action, and that is the course I urge should be taken even at this late day.

I do not propose to take up any more time in a discussion of this matter. As I have said, the main facts are not in dispute. What action shall we take? I have the utmost respect for the public accounts committee, but I repeat that a reference to that committee without instructions would be pure futility. It will get us nowhere. The report will come back to the house in the dying days of the session and we will be faced with the very situation that faces us to-day. Let us clean it up now. Let us meet the situation and discharge our duty as members of this house.

If, sir, the suggestion of the Prime Minister is well founded that if we express an opinion on this question we would not be impartial and could not properly serve on the public accounts committee, I do not know how a quorum in the committee can be secured, because many hon. members have already expressed their opinions. For my part I have an opinion and I propose to express it. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this contract was conceived in the iniquity of public patronage and born in the sin of disregard of public interest and public duty.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we have been debating for a week the resolution of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) that the report of the royal commission on the Bren gun contract, with other relevant material, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts. I had not intended to take part in the debate because I felt that the members who spoke from the group to which I belong had stated the facts clearly and fairly; but so many attempts have been made by members opposite to becloud and confuse the main point at issue that I think it is necessary that certain facts should be emphasized so that the real issues involved may not be lost sight of.

First let me say that I am supporting the motion made by the member for Vancouver North to refer the report and other relevant material to the public accounts committee. We are opposed—and I am speaking now for the group as well as for myself—to the amendment because we do not think that the committee of the whole house is the proper or the best place to discuss such a matter.

This group was twitted yesterday by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) for voting against your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on a former amendment.

Mr. BRADETTE: Voting against your own motion.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. MacINNIS: I am coming to that. The hon. member contended that we voted against our own motion. Our own motion, sir, was not in question. The matter in question was a ruling of the chair, and we voted on that as we saw fit. As a matter of fact, if the government wishes to annul the contract we have no objection, but we have no hope and we do not believe that the government will do that because they are too far committed now. We voted against the ruling of the Speaker because we did not intend to allow ourselves to be put in a false position before the country on this matter. Hon. members opposite may be incapable of learning, but we are not. We still can learn, and we have a vivid recollection of how our position on the Bank of Canada bill was misrepresented in the country by gentlemen opposite in 1935, when we voted to sustain the chair on a freak motion moved by the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). We are not going to get into that jackpot again, and if hon. gentlemen opposite insist on playing that game we have no recourse but to do the same to protect ourselves.

The hon. member for Cochrane referred also to our support of collective security. I should like to tell him that we are not a bit ashamed of supporting collective security, and the reason we have increasing armament appropriations before this house is that collective security has broken down. Let my hon. friend remember this, that as surely as we are creating armaments, just as surely we are going to use them. I should also like to draw something else to his attention which perhaps he did not notice, and that is that there is very little likelihood that in the Dominion of Canada we shall have for very many years to come the need of 7,000 machine guns. But 7,000 machine guns are being produced, and it is not likely that they will be used by Canadian soldiers inside the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. BRADETTE: How do you know that? How about 1914, at the opening of the great war? What did you do?

Mr. MacINNIS: What did I do? I minded my own business, and that met with the approval of the authorities.

Mr. BRADETTE: My hon. friend misunderstood me. I was referring to the situation that developed in 1914. There was no personal reflection intended whatsoever.

Mr. MacINNIS: My conscience is so clear on the matter that no personal reference would touch me anyway.

We are convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the public accounts committee is the proper place in which to go thoroughly into every phase of the Bren gun contract and all matters relating thereto. We are making no bones about that, and we shall do everything we can to get all the information possible out of the investigation.

In the order in council appointing Mr. Justice Davis to inquire into this matter it is stated:

The Prime Minister is of opinion that a full and complete inquiry should be set on foot with the least possible delay in order that the public may be fully informed of the circumstances surrounding the making of this contract and the terms thereof.

I think the Prime Minister is to be commended for the prompt and decisive action that he took in the matter.

I wish to deal now with the commissioner's report, certain points of which I wish to emphasize, and it is because I wish to emphasize them that I am taking up the time of the house. If the report is not as full and complete as we would like it to be, I am sure that it is not the Prime Minister's fault; that is, it is not because of any fault arising out of the order in council appointing the commission; neither do I think it is the fault of the commissioner. From reading the press at the time of the inquiry I am convinced that the commissioner would have liked to make a more definite report than he did make, but he was impressed by the contrary opinions of counsel who appeared before him at the inquiry. I am confirmed in this opinion by the commissioner's own words at page 35 of the report. The commissioner states:

Having fully weighed the objection advanced on this ground,—

That is, that he could not make a report definitely implicating anybody or charging anybody with wrongdoing.

—as well as the weighty consideration brought to my attention by counsel that the rights of the individuals interested in the contract might become the subject of legal controversy elsewhere, I have come to the conclusion that it is inexpedient to comment upon the evidence in respect of its bearing on the conduct of the individuals concerned.

Not because there was nothing to comment on, but because, in his opinion, it was inexpedient so to comment. It seems abundantly clear to me that the reason the commissioner did not comment on the evidence was that to do so was not within the terms of the commission given him. However, in my opinion the commissioner did comment by inference, and commented so clearly that they who run may read and they who read may run. I read the report when it was first tabled; I have, of course, referred again and again to certain parts of it since this debate began, and I am convinced that in his report, which, considering the length of the inquiry and the volume of the evidence, is a brief one, the commissioner dealt only with the pertinent issues in the investigation.

Naturally the steps leading to the signing of the contract are first touched on. The commissioner points out that the British government had acquired from the patentee the rights to manufacture the Bren gun, and that by the terms of the agreement the governments of the dominions had the right to manufacture the guns provided that they were manufactured in a factory or factories operated by the governments concerned. The report reads:

"The privilege of so doing—

That is, the privilege of producing the gun in Canada.

—was vouchsafed to the Canadian government by the war office when it acquired the rights of manufacture from the patentee, the only stipulation being that such production must take place in a government-owned factory."

The commissioner then refers to the information which the Department of National Defence had or could have had with regard to the Bren gun. He refers at length to Lieutenant Jolley, of the Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps. This reference to Lieutenant Jolley is significant, because he gives to this one phase two pages of the fifty pages which constitute the report. He sets forth this officer's qualifications and experience, and states, on page 6:

During his study at Enfield, the Bren gun was not actually in the process of production, but plants were being made for its production at that time. "They were working out the design of tools, fixtures, gauges, etc., and were planning the actual system or series of operations on each component which was to be used when the factory went into production on the Bren gun." They had not progressed sufficiently far to give him any indication as to the quantities of machines which they would require or to give him any details of the processes of production. However, he did get the range and types of machines which they were planning to use in the production of Bren guns. He saw the gun complete and studied it in detail "from the point of view of the design characteristics of the gun and the tolerances of the components and the general requirements of the finished gun." He put the date of his study of the Bren gun as June, 1936. He said he was particularly interested in the Bren gun because it was a new weapon that had just been adopted something like a year before (speaking of June, 1936) and everyone was very keen about it in Enfield as well as in other parts of England. He said he wanted to get as much information as he could, not only of the gun itself, but also of the production methods in case it might be required at some future date. Lieutenant Jolley, assumed that it was quite likely that the Bren gun would become standard equipment in Canada at some future time. He returned to Canada in August, 1936, with a general working knowledge of what might be expected if the Bren gun were to be produced in Canada. With the possible exception of other officers who had attended courses in England, he was the only Canadian officer who had seen the Bren gun at that time, as far as he knew. Lieutenant Jolley has been employed since his return in the office of the Master-General of Ordnance.

Then the commissioner points out:

The Department of National Defence therefore had, on the return of Lieutenant Jolley from England in August, 1936, very considerable knowledge and information available to it for the consideration of the problem of the production in Canada of its actual requirements of Bren guns.

Despite that fact—I am quoting again from the report:

No contract for the purchase or production of the Canadian defence requirements of the Bren machine gun was made however until March 31st, 1938, when a contract was made between the Canadian government and John Inglis Company Limited of Toronto, a company incorporated and organized by Major J. E. Hahn and associates.

Why all this delay? From what later transpired and what has now been brought out, obviously the cause of the delay was that the Department of National Defence was so busy from August, 1936, to November, 1937, putting pressure on the British war office to allow the manufacture of Bren guns in a private factory, so that a special, selected contractor could get his feet in into the patronage trough, that they had no time to get on with the business of organizing, with the knowledge and information available, for production in a government-owned plant.

Hon. members opposite accuse us of delaying or hampering the production of munitions. We are not responsible for the delay; it took place long before we had any knowledge of what was going on.

The commissioner then comments on the fact that although the contract involved several millions of dollars, competitive tenders were not called. His own words, appearing on page 8 of the report, are these:

Notwithstanding that the contract involves the expenditure of several millions of dollars by the Canadian government, no industrial producer (other than Major Hahn) was consulted by the Department of National Defence as to the proposed manufacture of Bren guns for the Canadian government or invited to give competitive bids or terms of manufacture. Nor did anyone, so far as the evidence shows, ever visit any industrial plant (except Inglis) to consider the possibility of production of Bren guns in Canada.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is an amazing situation. For notwithstanding the factors concerned, not the slightest attempt was made to get competitive bids, although several million dollars were involved. The commissioner did not comment on the conduct of persons, but in my opinion this paragraph in the report speaks volumes and it is one of the reasons why the report should be referred to the public accounts committee, to see whether we cannot find out the causes underlying this strange way of carrying on public business. The reason given by the Minister of National Defence in his evidence for this remarkable state of affairs passes all understanding and knowledge. The commissioner must have thought the reason strange. He emphasized it in the report. He calls attention to the question asked by Mr. Hellmuth:

You did not give anybody else a chance?

And the minister's reply was: "Nobody asked for it." I have not the pleasure of Mr. Justice Davis's acquaintance and I do not know how he would react when faced with an answer such as this, but I am almost sure that he must have made some inaudible, but emphatic comment. Could hon. members before this report appeared imagine a responsible minister giving such a childish naive answer to the question why government business totalling several million dollars was given to a favoured company without an attempt being made even to inquire whether other firms could do the work? Are we to understand that is to be the future policy of the government with reference to government contracts and business? If it is not to be the future policy of the government, why was it followed on this occasion? Are we to understand that before anyone can get business from this government he must be introduced by a Liberal member of parliament and have friends inside the service to push his case? That way of doing business is bad at any time and under any circumstances, but it is most heinous in a matter such as this.

The minister said that he favoured public ownership in connection with the manufacture of armaments, and he says that he still maintains that position. But his activities do not square with his assertions. He favours public ownership; that is what he says; and failing that he favours competition. But he ends up by adopting a policy which is neither public ownership nor competition but unadulterated patronage. He then tries to hide behind a smoke screen which he has laid himself—that he could not get the money. The commissioner however does not let him get out of sight. Of course, he does not comment; he merely states the facts. I will read from the report. The commissioner's remarks will be found at pages 10 and 11:

The minister said that there were two very definite schools of thought in the department and that he assumed all responsibility. One school, he said, was headed by the then chief of general staff and the other by the deputy minister, for both of whom he said he had equally great admiration.

Evidently the chief of general staff did not have as much influence as the deputy minister of the department.

The minister said that General Ashton (the then chief of the general staff) was very insistent upon the development of government arsenals and that the former chief of general staff, General McNaughton, evolved a very comprehensive scheme for Valcartier which would include practically all the requirements of the Canadian forces.

What he said was:

That was considered after I went into the department and I found that the cost of it would be something between $30,000,000 and $35,000,000. With my meagre $25,000,000 or $30,000,000, what could I do with a scheme like that?

The commissioner does not let him get away with that, although he does not make any comment on personal conduct. The commissioner says:

But the testimony given before the commission established that only 60,000 square feet of space was necessary for the purpose of production of the 7,000 Bren guns for Canada, as well as 5,000 guns for the war office, and that an entirely new building (apart from land) would cost approximately $120,000. In proposal "B" of Major Hahn (exhibit 11) of December 29, 1936, the building was shown at an estimated cost of $104,196.40.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Does my hon. friend think that the two are speaking of the same thing? Is not the minister speaking of an arsenal to handle all requirements, while the commissioner is speaking of a plant to handle small machine guns?

Mr. MacINNIS: That is the smoke screen. The minister is speaking of a complete plant, but this is not necessarily a complete plant. It is only a small part, and instead of requiring thirty or thirty-five millions, or two hundred or three hundred millions, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said the other evening, it would take very much less. Possibly a million and a half or two millions would have started the thing going and we would be very much further ahead than we are now. It is pointed out to me that the commissioner said $104,000, but that is for the building. And in any event the Canadian government and the British government are paying for the machinery, and we do not know what it will cost.

This brings me to the queer case of Major Hahn. The appointment of Major Hahn as the government's representative at the war office in Great Britain is to me one of the most amazing things in the political history of Canada. First we hear of the major when he is introduced to the deputy minister, General LaFleche, by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton). According to the evidence General LaFleche had not previously met or had any communication with Major Hahn. This introduction of Major Hahn to the deputy minister took place on October 9, 1936. A few days afterwards we find that the Minister of National Defence had his first meeting with Major Hahn. He was introduced by the member for Trinity on October 19, 1936. On this occasion, according to Major Hahn's own evidence at page 18 of the report, he met the minister and said he was going to England and that he wanted a letter, and he got the letter. The minister had never seen the man before and when questioned some time later he did not remember having met him or having given him the letter. Consequently Major Hahn did not make much of an impression on the minister, which seems very strange.

Now we come to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister had never met Major Hahn at all—I do not know whether he has met him yet. He did not even have the opportunity or pleasure of an introduction by the hon. member for Trinity yet we find the Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs, on November 6, 1936, sending the following cablegram to the Canadian high commissioner in London:

Secret. Your cablegram 9th November 396. Have discussed matter with Minister of National Defence. You might request war office to give Major Hahn, as representing Canadian government in this particular, any information which they consider desirable and necessary to enable national defence to reach conclusion on possibility produce Bren gun in Canada. It is not desired to request furnishing of information on any article other than this gun.

It will be noted that the cablegram is marked "secret"; I do not know why. It was sent in code by the Prime Minister, and made Major Hahn a representative of the Canadian government at London, where he would have access to secrets of the war office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I stop my hon. friend at that point? He read the cablegram quite correctly, but the inference he is drawing from it is not correct. Major Hahn was made a representative of the government for the purpose only of obtaining certain information to enable the defence department to make up its mind on a certain course; nothing else. My hon. friend has no right to go beyond what he read.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am glad to accept the right hon. gentleman's correction. Major Hahn was representing the government in a certain particular; I stated that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A particular set forth in the cablegram, and for reasons specifically set forth in it. And in regard to the secrecy, I think my hon. friend will appreciate that practically all communications that pass between governments go as secret messages and in code, otherwise they would be open to every telegraph office in the world.

Mr. MacINNIS: But in view of the fact that no one knew who Major Hahn was I do not see the reason for the secrecy. That is the peculiar part about the whole thing. It is like the babes in the wood.

Now these are facts which cannot be contradicted: that the Prime Minister had never met Major Hahn and did not know anything about him except what he may have ascertained from the Minister of National Defence; that the Minister of National Defence did not know anything about Major Hahn except what he had heard from his deputy minister; that the deputy minister did not know anything about him except what he had heard from the hon. member for Trinity or was told by Major Hahn himself, as he said on the witness stand. Yet the proceedings were characterized by the utmost formality and secrecy. I have on occasions taken part in mock parliaments, but it seems to me this sort of thing reduces ordered government to a mockery and the administration of public business to a farce.

I mentioned earlier in my remarks that pressure was brought to bear on the British war office by the Department of National Defence, first, to allow the Bren gun to be produced by a private company, and, second, to have the war office place an order for 5,000 guns with a private company. That assertion is borne out by the commissioner's report at page 48, where he said:

> It clearly results from the evidence that the department having introduced and sponsored Hahn to the war office and the war office having in November 1937 (after a full year of pressure by the department upon it) expressed its readiness to negotiate with the Inglis company for the production of 5,000 guns, and the negotiations having proceeded to the point where on February 9, 1938 (exhibit 218) a draft contract with the John Inglis Company had been agreed in detail by the war office, the matter had been brought into such a posture that the department felt it was really not in a position to propose to the war office the consideration of another contractor.

That is why the interdepartmental committee fell down. And the year lost in putting pressure upon the war office is also the reason we are so far behind as we are at the present time.

In conclusion I wish to read the recommendation made by the commissioner, found on page 51 of the report. The minister and the government and the Liberal party claim that this recommendation exonerates the minister and the department from any and all blame in connection with this contract. In my opinion this, taken with the other points which I have dealt with, constitutes the most emphatic condemnation of the minister and the department. The commissioner states:

> What is plain to me at the end of this long inquiry is this: that if the policy of private manufacture of war munitions and armaments is to be continued in this country (a question of administrative policy for the government and parliament to determine), once the requirements are determined by the Department of National Defence the negotiations leading up to and the making of contracts between the government and private manufacturers either for the purchase or production of such munitions or armaments should be put into the hands of an expert advisory group of competent business men—

He goes on to state the kind of business men he has in mind, and continues:

> These persons should constitute a board (which might be known as the "defence purchasing board") and be made directly accountable to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance.

We must bear in mind that the commissioner was inquiring into a contract which came under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence. After careful and prolonged inquiry he recommends in effect that, if there are to be any more contracts, the negotiating of them should be transferred to the Department of Finance, or to a department directly under the Prime Minister himself. In my opinion this clearly indicates that the commissioner was not satisfied with the contract or the way in which it was negotiated by the Department of National Defence, of which the minister is the political head. That is the inference I draw from it. The report gives a very clear indication of what the commissioner would say, had he not thought, as he said, that it would be inexpedient to comment on the evidence in respect of its bearing on the conduct of the individuals concerned.

It is for these reasons that we of this group maintain that it is in the public interest that this contract and all related material should be referred to the standing committee on public accounts for further investigation.

Mr. H. J. PLAXTON (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I rise to declare my position before the house in this matter. The motion which has been made for further investigation is thought by many to be unnecessary. However, a further investigation is to be held. I shall welcome it as I welcomed the previous investigation. I shall be available before the public accounts committee at all times when I may be required. I shall be glad to testify either under oath or under my responsibility as a member of the House of Commons.

It has been indicated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the proposed motion to refer the matter to a committee will receive the support of the government. That being so I have carefully considered the proper course for me to adopt, and have concluded that I should reserve my address on this matter until after the hearings of the committee and until after the committee has reported back to the house. I may say I have reached that conclusion most reluctantly, because I have been here day after day since the debate began, ready to speak on the motion before the house. But I submit that to be consistent with the best traditions of British parliamentary practice, the course I have decided to adopt is in all the circumstances the proper one. Let me make it clear however that at the proper time, when this matter returns to the floor of the house, I propose to make a very definite and full statement with regard to the entire situation. I do ask the committee composed of members of the house of all shades of political thought to meet and to deal with the matter with every possible dispatch.

Until parliament has finally passed upon the matter I submit harm is being done to workmen in Toronto and to Canada's relationship to the British empire in respect to that most vital problem of to-day, rearmament and defence.

Mr. H. R. FLEMING (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to participate in this debate or to speak respecting the Bren gun. But after listening to speeches made by hon. members of the opposition I felt I owed it to the people who have sent me to parliament as their representative, and to myself as well, to make some comments.

I suggest that the terms of reference to the public accounts committee should not be limited to circumstances surrounding the gun contract alone. The committee should have the widest possible powers to inquire into the entire system of awarding government contracts. I am in complete accord with what was said on Monday last by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), that all these contracts should be referred to the public accounts committee. The Star-Phoenix, a widely read newspaper in Saskatchewan, states in a leading editorial that we should go the whole way, that the reference should go deeper than simply making an inquiry into the Bren gun contract, and should cover the entire period from the great war to the present time.

I realize that on the order paper, in the name of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), there is a resolution in which it is proposed to set up a defence purchasing board. I believe that board should have been set up at the very beginning. I was pleased yesterday to hear the minister say that that had been his idea, but that he had not so stated before the royal commissioner because as a responsible minister of the crown and a privy councillor he could not commit the government until he had consulted with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

I say there should be a most careful examination not only of this contract, but, as the Star-Phoenix has pointed out, of other contracts as well. Yet, the mere fact that this contract has been brought to public attention is no reason for the government to jump, like a fly on a hot griddle, to any extreme measures. If one method of procedure has been found to be irregular—and there is nothing so far which shows that it was—there is no assurance that any opposite method would be completely satisfactory. That is to say, if the government intends to embark upon a policy of manufacture by the government of implements of war, or if it is proposed to establish a public arsenal at Valcartier, the question arises whether or not the location would be proper from a strategic standpoint.

Might it not be well to have public arsenals situated throughout the length and breadth of Canada? If such arsenals were set up, to all intents and purposes the employees working in them would be civil servants. We would have to provide them with schools, churches, places of recreation and medical and dental attention. Of course, if the arsenals were erected in well established communities we would not have to supply those facilities, because they would already be provided. If the manufacture of war materials becomes a public venture, we should not have all our eggs in one basket, but should scatter them throughout the length and breadth of the dominion.

If I had been placed in a position similar to that of the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) and an opportunity had been given to me to get work for the people in my constituency, I am proud to say I would have been the first one to try to obtain that work for them, and would have raised heaven and earth in my efforts.

Many people seem to be of the opinion that any point in Canada would be a suitable place to set up one of these arsenals. May I point out, however, that in view of the advances which have been made in modern warfare, and particularly in air forces, we must be very careful to see that our arsenals are protected, and that they are placed at points where they will involve the least possible danger to the civilian population.

Then, too, the financial burden to be borne by the taxpayer must be considered. I have given the matter careful thought, and I can think of no place better suited for a public arsenal than the constituency of Humboldt, which I have the honour to represent. On various occasions in the house the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has said that the present government is trying to destroy private enterprise. Mr. Speaker, here is a private enterprise, and this government is not trying to destroy it. While I can well understand the stand taken by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, with their belief in complete public ownership, I do say, in answer to those who have tried to create in the minds of the electorate ideas for the advancement of their own political ends, that the Liberal party should not be intimidated into formulating a hasty policy.

If I thought there was anything wrong with the contract; if I thought there had been any graft or corruption in connection with it, I would rise in my place to oppose it. I am not hidebound to any political party. Since I have come to the House of Commons I have had a free rein. Never once since I have been a member has my leader, or the minister from Saskatchewan, or any other member of the government, suggested to me what particular line I should take in connection with any question which has come before the house. If I had anything against any member of the government I would not be afraid to take a pot shot at him.

An hon. MEMBER: With a Bren gun?

Mr. FLEMING: With a Bren gun. After all, this royal commission that was set up made a searching and far-reaching investigation. The report has been quoted quite often, but I should like to quote shortly from page 52, as follows:

> All the sittings of the commission were public and your commissioner was pleased to hear counsel characterize the inquiry, at its close, as "a most searching and thorough inquiry."

After reading that statement and after listening to the dignified and gentlemanly statement made some days ago by the right hon. Prime Minister, I fail to see where any blame can be attached to any member of this house, any member of the government, to any member of the Liberal party no matter what lowly position he may occupy. From the moment Colonel George Drew's magazine article appeared, suspicion was created in the mind of the public that graft and corruption were rampant in connection with the awarding of government contracts. Frankly I think irreparable damage has been done by that article. I am sure that if this contract were suddenly to sprout wings, some people would not admit it past the portals of heaven.

Politics and politicians are always suspect because certain individuals in order to gain political preferment are always ready to sacrifice truth upon the altar of wild statements. Even the opposition is exposed to that. A few days ago the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) complained bitterly in this house that he had been accused of sabotage in connection with the Canadian National Railways. I would be willing to wager with him that for every person he finds who remembers his denial, he will find another who believes that there must be some truth in that allegation, otherwise it would never have been made. I am particularly concerned with this Bren gun contract because Maclean's magazine has a widespread circulation within my constituency. In his magazine article of September last, Colonel Drew made no direct charges. As the minister said, his article was filled with misstatements, half-truths and vicious innuendoes. No series of denials will ever wipe out entirely the bad taste which that article has left in the mouths of the Canadian electorate. It is just as difficult as trying to answer the question, "Have you stopped beating your wife?"

Without anticipating the findings of the public accounts committee, I wish to state emphatically that I believe the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence and all the officials of the government acted not only in good faith but in a manner which showed that they were attempting to obtain a good bargain and a good deal for the Canadian people. It must be remembered that we were in the initial stage of a development in connection with which Canada had little experience. The contract met with the approval of the British war office which has had hundreds of years of experience in letting similar contracts.

Was there any reason to believe that the Canadian committee erred? That committee was composed of a number of well known government officials. One member was a distinguished soldier and administrator, Major General LaFleche. Another member was Doctor O. D. Skelton, a former professor at Queen's university, from whom I learned my political philosophy. He is a man of the highest attainments and has been recognized as such by the leaders of both great political parties. Mr. Fraser Elliott, K.C., is a man who has few peers in his own field in the world. Doctor Clark is another former professor of political science at Queen's university whose capabilities are unquestioned. Surely no one can point the finger of scorn at any of these impartial civil servants.

It is difficult to understand why this storm over this contract has arisen except for the fact that it is meant to provide political capital. It is a bold-faced attempt to embarrass the government and the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Might I ask the hon. member a question? Did the committee he mentioned approve the contract?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) may put a question to the hon. member who has the floor only with his permission.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member gave the names of different members of the interdepartmental committee. He told us that that committee had signified its willingness to approve the method by which this company obtained the contract.

Mr. FLEMING: Certainly they did. They are all high-minded public officials.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Doctor Clark objected to the contract.

Mr. FLEMING: He did not.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is not a question.

Mr. FLEMING: No one would believe him.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member made a reference to myself which was quite audible in this part of the chamber, and that reference was most unparliamentary.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What did he say?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He said that no one would believe me, and I ask him to withdraw that remark.

Mr. FLEMING: I heard the hon. member make statements during the last by-election in Humboldt which were absolutely untrue. He told the people that if they elected the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation candidate, the price of wheat would go up ten cents.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And it did. I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that remark.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming) made any such remark, I did not hear it.

Mr. FLEMING: I will withdraw it, provided he can substantiate his statement as to the price of wheat. There are certain sections of this country which will rise like fish to a bait whenever you mention graft and corruption. They believe that if you cry "wolf" often enough someone will be eaten. The attitude of the Tory party is so inconsistent. As long as I can remember I have seen the Tory party waving the union jack and wrapping the flag of freedom about them, and I cannot understand why they are now waving the red flag at the British government.

Mr. SPENCE: Oh, you are talking nonsense.

Mr. FLEMING: The opposition has asked that we should bolster up our armaments; but no sooner does this government start to create defence consciousness in all parts of Canada, no sooner does it attempt to preserve private enterprise, than we hear the cry throughout the length and breadth of this country that there is wholesale profiteering. The Tory party are trying to choke their own baby to death in its cradle. Yet, Mr. Speaker, on thinking this over I am not surprised at the attitude of the Tory opposition because they are playing the same old game they played in 1917. We remember what they did in that year. They sent Protestant ministers to the old province of Quebec to try to make young French-Canadians enlist. The same old game is being tried at the present time. They are trying to catch the government between the scissors of nationalism and the necessity of rearmament. The government has tried to create in the minds of the public the necessity for rearmament and to have all parts of Canada united. They are not trying to ostracize one part of this country.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the other evening mentioned a violent, vicious attack that was made by that slander sheet from Toronto, Maclean's magazine. The same magazine and its subsidiaries are preaching national unity to try to hold confederation together, but on each and every occasion they have tried to split confederation. If you will go back with me, sir, to 1923, you will find in Maclean's magazine of July 1 of that year a most vile and vicious attack upon French Canada, one of the most vicious attacks that anyone could ever read, and it appeared in a serial entitled, "The Bond Triumphant." It was an attack upon that saintly and world-famous member of the Catholic church, Bishop Laval. It was an attack against the religious orders in the province of Quebec. That, Mr. Speaker, was in 1923, and if you will read that article and a few subsequent editions you will find that it had to be taken out of the magazine because it caused such a revulsion of public feeling across the whole north American continent.

Is it any wonder, then, that that scandal sheet would print this scandalous article which Colonel Drew wrote to make a vicious attack upon the only French-Canadian deputy minister in the public service.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

An hon. MEMBER: That is wrong.

Mr. FLEMING: I could say, Mr. Speaker, that that is cheap, or something like that. It is the same old tactics the Tories employed in 1917, when they tried to get their wedge in at a time when the government of this country was endeavouring to bring about a united Canada. Knowing the attitude of the present Prime Minister with regard to government contracts and all public expenditures, I ask what better statement could be made by any high-minded Canadian than that which was made by the Prime Minister at the time the order in council was passed, and which he repeated to the house on Friday last:

> In the troubled world of to-day, the Canadian people reluctantly have shouldered what is, for them, a very considerable burden, for the purpose of national defence. The Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence, and the government as a whole, desire that in all the defence measures that may be taken by the government, not only shall there be no wrongdoing, but no suspicion of wrongdoing. The Canadian people are entitled to this. The article published by Colonel Drew cannot but create suspicion on these matters in the minds of the Canadian people. For this reason the government desires that the inquiry be conducted as expeditiously and as thoroughly as possible.

We hear so much about political patronage, Mr. Speaker, that I was glad to hear someone rise in his place in the house the other day—I believe it was the hon. member for Témiscouata—and say that he was not afraid of government patronage. I have never been afraid of government patronage, and I do not think the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) is afraid of it because the first job he ever got he obtained from the dominion government, and that is according to his own book, "Life is an Adventure," where he says:

> The Conservatives were in power at Ottawa, and Sir Sam Hughes (who after my election to the House of Commons, in 1917, became one of my best friends) did not seem very willing to give a position to a Liberal candidate.

The hon. gentleman was a Liberal candidate at that time.

> Considerable correspondence passed between us, but the wires I was able to pull were not very powerful, until at last, during a dispute in the house, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Liberal opposition leader of that day, taunted Sir Sam that most of his appointments went to Conservatives, to which Sir Sam replied that if the Liberal leader would name any man whom he wished appointed to a post in the army, he (Sir Sam) would appoint him.

That was government patronage. The hon. leader of the opposition has risen to a high place within his party, but he had to pull wires to get this job—

Mr. MANION: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. friend, but in justice to me he should make clear what position I was looking for. If he does not do so, perhaps he would permit me to say that the position I was seeking was to be a surgeon in the army.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes, a job in the army.

Mr. MANION: Not a job; I did not need a job in the army. I was doing a $15,000 cash practice, and I gave it up to become a medical officer in the army.

Mr. FLEMING: I correct my statement that it was a job. It was an appointment, and he had to pull wires to get this appointment.

Mr. MUTCH: I would like to suggest to the leader of the opposition that some of us were able to get jobs in the army for very much less money without any contract or any pulling of wires.

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Rowe) will permit me, might I say that my good friend the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming) did not quote quite accurately the statement I made to the house yesterday with reference to discussions pertaining to the proposed defence purchasing board. I want it to be very plainly disclosed to the house that my colleagues and myself and my leader discussed this matter as a question of policy before the royal commission on the Bren gun was ever set up or even thought of. It was considered to be a question of government policy for consideration by this parliament, and it was discussed, not as a result of this commission, but before the commission was even thought of. As a matter of policy, I thought it was not my duty as minister to make any suggestions on matters of policy to the learned judge who was appointed to make this inquiry.

Mr. P. J. ROWE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), in addressing the house last Thursday on his resolution, made it very clear to hon. members that the commissioner had placed squarely before parliament the following issues:

1. Whether the Bren gun should be produced by the government in publicly-owned factories or through private manufacture.

2. Whether the conduct of the individuals concerned was above question.

3. Whether adequate reasons existed for the failure of the interdepartmental committee to report back to the government when the system of supervision of contracts broke down.

4. Whether the procedure followed in negotiating this contract protected the public interest.

5. Whether proper steps were taken to ensure discharge of the responsibility assumed in the selection of a favoured contractor.

A number of government supporters have repeatedly pointed out that no finding of misconduct has been made against any individual. But the commissioner makes it very clear, on page 34 of his report, that having in mind the limitations imposed on him by the statutory authority under which the inquiry was held—to use his own words—

> I have come to the conclusion that it is inexpedient to comment upon the evidence in respect of its bearing on the conduct of the individuals concerned.

Therefore I say that in my opinion the government supporters are quite in error in suggesting that the absence of charges by the commissioner means lack of justification for charges.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), speaking on February 6, said, as reported at page 679 of Hansard:

> I have yet to hear any condemnation of the contract itself from the individuals who have been addressing this house.

I have read the contract, and there are many features of it which I unhesitatingly condemn. But as my colleagues and others have thoroughly discussed most of the sections to which I also take exception, I shall deal only with the part relating to the stock transactions which finally resulted in the incorporation of the present John Inglis Company. This will involve the fourth point mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver North. In order to make clear just what the commissioner thought about the stock transactions, I am going to place on the record, if I may, an excerpt from the original evidence, at pages 956 to 961 of the record.

This question was asked by Mr. Forsyth, government counsel, of Mr. C. F. Elliott, dominion income tax commissioner.

> Q. There was some mention in your cross examination—I am not going to quote it—which I should like to call to your memory. It was suggested to you that there were a number of shares outstanding, as per the Dun and Bradstreet report. You made an answer to my learned friend Mr. Drew in which you referred to the fact that a stopper had been put in. I just want you to explain what you mean by the word "stopper."
> The Commissioner: I think I observed to the witness that his evidence disclosed that he had information—it may have been accurate—that the company had 220,000 shares issued. I asked him if he had interested himself, or if the members of the committee had interested themselves in knowing who were the holders of those 220,000 shares. That observation was made after the witness had spoken of the relation between the number of shares and the $1,280,000. I have his answer on that, which I need not repeat. I do not know that anyone asked him, and I am quite willing for you to do so, if any effort was made in the public interest to avoid having those 220,000 shares becoming the subject matter of transactions, we will say, on the stock exchange.
> Mr. Geoffrion: There is no evidence that they will become the subject of transactions.
>
> The Commissioner: I am just asking if he anticipated any such thing, or if the committee anticipated providing any protection. I see there is a clause in the contract and if you want to read that it will be all right. However, I do not think it has any bearing on my question at all.
> Mr. Forsyth: I do not think you are referring to the same examination, Mr. Commissioner. I remember that Mr. Elliott developed the idea that the company could increase its capital and so on.
> The Commissioner: They have protected against that by providing a clause in the contract that the company is not to issue or sell any shares, bonds, securities, etc., of the company, directly or indirectly, without the approval of the government. But that does not in any way affect the 220,000 shares issued and outstanding. The question I was trying to ask the witness this morning—I left the answer then because of the thought that they had no interest really in the directors or shareholders. What I was getting at was the fact that these 220,000 shares might be sold publicly on the market at a future date and I wanted to know if the committee visualized that problem and if they took any competent measures in the public interest to control that situation so that there would be no public trading of those shares.

Mr. Forsyth then questioned the witness as follows:

> Q. Mr. Elliott, you used the word "stopper" in connection with this, and I presume you were referring to a clause in the contract. Have you the contract before you?
> A. Yes.

Q. Would you indicate the number of the clause to which you were referring? Am I correct in assuming that you were referring to a clause as a stopper?

A. Oh, yes. That is correct. It is the second paragraph of section 1. Shall I read it?

Q. If you do not mind.

A. This is a proviso which reads:

"Provided further, that notwithstanding the provisions of anything herein contained, the said licence shall be subject to cancellation if in the course of the period thereof the party of the second part should sell shares, stocks, bonds, debentures, notes or other like securities to the public, directly or indirectly, or through the medium of other companies the proceeds of which are not directly applied to the business of the party of the second part and there remain applicable for use in the carrying on of said party's business, then the licence shall cease unless before the issue of such security instruments the consent to the issue thereof has first been secured from the party of the first part."

Mr. Drew: That section obviously has no relation whatever to the 220,000 shares you have mentioned?

The Commissioner: Of course it is subject to argument, but it is perfectly plain that that clause refers to the issue by the company and sale by the company. I am not stopping you, Mr. Forsyth, but I must tell you that I am still groping in the dark to find out whether the committee ever visualized the problem that there was a possibility or a probability that the then issue of 220,000 shares out of the total authorized of 250,000 shares might become the subject matter of trading on the public exchanges or in a private way as war stock. I want to know if the committee ever visualized that and, if so, what did they do?

Mr. Forsyth: You have heard the discussion—

He is still questioning Mr. Elliott.

—and the question raised as to the possible disposition of the 220,000 shares of stock issued, as per the Dun and Bradstreet report. The possibility was mentioned in your cross-examination this morning of a further increased capital. The point now is: Did the committee visualize—to use the commissioner's words—dealings in the 220,000 shares already issued and which might be objectionable, from the public point of view? Is that a fair way to put it, Mr. Commissioner?

The Commissioner: Yes.

The Witness: They visualized that and many other related matters of a similar character.

By the Commissioner:

Q. In what way did you deal with it?

A. By inserting in the paragraph which I have just read.

Q. That is your answer to the question?

A. I would—

Q. That is either the protection you took or it is not?

A. That is the protection we took after discussing it at great length.

Q. As a member of the committee you had it in your mind that that was sufficient protection for the problem which you say you envisaged?

A. When you say "sufficient protection," if I were writing that myself I would catch the ideas as we had them presented that night in the committee. I would write it out and I would polish it and re-polish it until it would contain fully all our views and all my comprehensions as to the various ways in which capital could be sold to the public, either by writing up the present stock, increasing it and so on. So that when you ask me if that was completely my idea or the committee's, the answer technically is, No. We would have liked to have had time to polish and re-polish it, but we had to pass it that night. I hope it carries the main idea of a means of stopping it, but technically I could not say that it is perfection.

Q. Whatever your thoughts were that night, they must be plain to you now that that clause does not affect or attempt to affect the sale of the then issued 220,000 shares?

A. Not the 220,000, no, but it would affect, I think, a split of them and issuing three for one or something like that. That is perhaps a question of interpretation.

Mr. Forsyth: As a matter of fact I do not know that I would agree with you, Mr. Commissioner, or with the witness on that. I think it is a subject for later argument.

The Commissioner: I think it is as plain as day. I do not think there is any use splitting hairs as to what it says.

That is the opinion of the commissioner as to the protection of the public in the matter of disposing of the vendors' shares. I was surprised at the absence in the commissioner's report, of any extended comment on the stock transactions, but apparently he had in mind two things. The first was the limitations I have already referred to which he believed were imposed upon him by the statute under which the inquiry was held, and the second would probably be the fact that he did not want to clash with the jurisdiction of the Ontario securities commission. The great insistence of various counsel upon the point of there not being any comment indicated to me beyond question that they were perfectly well aware what kind of comment the commissioner would make if he felt privileged to do so. Anyone who reads the evidence and arguments of counsel relating to the financial and stock transactions, and noting the commissioner's comments thereon, will not be left in doubt as to what he thought. A clear profit of over $1,000,000 in the stock transactions alone plus $467,000 of operating profit under the two contracts, or total profits of at least $1,467,000 on an investment which, including the proceeds of sale of treasury stock, was not more than $500,000, means profits of 285 per cent on that transaction. How could that be described as other than one of the most heartless and barefaced pieces of profiteering in the history of Canada? And this is the contract which the minister has described as one of the finest. If it is correct, that this is one of the finest contracts ever signed by the department, I tremble to think what we shall find when we come to look into others.

To show that the government was in possession of complete information and knowledge as to how to prevent stock watering and excessive profits, I wish to place on the record part of a memorandum furnished the interdepartmental committee by Mr. Elliott, dominion income tax commissioner. Mr. Elliott explained that during the great war the department had considered the various ways by which firms and individuals who were profiteering out of war contracts had sought to evade payment of income tax. Among other things he therefore proposed the following in reference to the amount of capital to be employed. He said:

Let the amount of capital to be invested by the contractor be predetermined, certified by recognized authorities and approved by government officials before or at the time the contracts are made. Thus, inflation of capital assets, goodwill and other undesirable tendencies after the contract has been given might be avoided, and also there might be avoided an unfair and excessive profit based on inflated values. Make certain that the value behind the share is cash, or an asset having real value.

At page 2294 of the evidence, government counsel questioned the minister about this report. Mr. Ralston, examining the minister, asked:

Q. Now, Mr. Mackenzie, that report was transmitted to you. What did you do with it?
A. I carefully perused it personally—it was of great interest to me.

But after coming into possession of this carefully prepared information, which showed in precise detail exactly how to prevent this stock watering, what did the minister do? Well, the evidence shows that he did everything possible to assist this contractor in accomplishing his purpose. Despite the fact that the minister had repeatedly declared his belief in the public ownership and operation of plants for the manufacture of war materials—at page 10 of the commissioner's report we read that the minister said, in reply to a question by Mr. Hellmuth, that he believed in public ownership through and through—the evidence shows that his department exercised constant and unremitting pressure on the war office in England to have them negotiate a contract with Major Hahn, a private manufacturer, who had neither the equipment nor the experience to do the work. Evidence of this will be found on page 48 of the commissioner's report. Speaking in the House of Commons on April 2, 1937, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said:

We agree with him in asserting the principle that no profits should be made out of war.

At page 2148 of the evidence, I quote as follows from a memorandum sent by the chief of general staff to the master general of ordnance, under date July 11, 1936:

I still feel that a small arms and munition factory should be established capable of making revolvers, rifles, and automatic rifles including the Bren gun.

Why, in the face of all this, did the government not carry out its own publicly professed policy and the advice of its own technically competent civil service advisers? Surely no informed person would dare to deny that public opinion in Canada is overwhelmingly in favour of eliminating profits from the manufacture of war materials. The only reason given by the minister is, to use his own words as quoted in the report at page 11, "financial stringency." Yet he signs a contract with a private manufacturer under which the Canadian taxpayers furnish this man with a complete outfit of machinery; pay him $10,000 a year, and in addition provide him and his associates with stock watering profits of over $1,000,000 and an enormous operating profit as well.

I have listened with amazement during this week, as speaker after speaker has unfolded this story of the plunder of the Canadian people, with the active assistance of the government. I want publicly to thank Colonel Drew for bringing this matter to light. At both the 1937 and 1938 sessions I placed resolutions on the order paper demanding that a committee be set up to study this very question, but each year parliament prorogued without even discussing it. Now we find that these shameful things were going on at that very time. Speaking in the house on Tuesday, February 16, 1937, just two years ago, I referred to the profits made during the last war by private firms in both the United States and Canada. I pointed out how twenty-two meat packing firms, sixteen cotton yarn manufacturers, thirty-nine garment manufacturers, fifteen steel plants and rolling mills, and 135 coal producers in the United States reported to the government profits of 100 per cent or more, while twenty-one firms reported profits of over 500 per cent but under 1,000 per cent, and fourteen firms reported profits of over 1,000 per cent. I pointed out also how 21,000 new millionaires were created in the United States and between 600 and 700 new millionaires in Canada. And while this was going on, every day while the great war lasted, 20,000 men and boys were killed, wounded or taken prisoner, and during the course of the conflict 40,000,000 people died of wounds, famine and pestilence. To meet the total cost of the war, $337,000,000,000, would require a payment of $20,000 an hour from the birth of Christ to the end of the world war. Then, with particular reference to profiteering in Canada I said:

What guarantee can the government give that there will be no war profiteering? What assurance is there that at this very moment our natural resources are not being turned into instruments of war? What firms in Canada are at present engaged in the manufacture of armaments, munitions and war supplies for Great Britain or any other countries? What profits are actually being reaped by Canadian concerns through the provision of such materials? And—perhaps more serious than all else—what guarantee have we that our youth will not be expected to face the very arms and be targets for the very munitions that are now being exported from this country?

The government did not answer these questions; they were not willing to take even a few days to investigate them in accordance with the terms of my resolution. I am therefore supporting the motion to refer this contract to the public accounts committee, where I hope we shall be given an opportunity to investigate these matters fully.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), speaking in Edmonton on March 6, 1938, is reported in the Edmonton Bulletin of March 7 as having stated, "The real evil is an unequal and uneven distribution of purchasing power," and he added, "Progressive Liberalism, animated by its basic belief in 'equality of opportunity and equality of sacrifice' will relentlessly labour for a more equitable distribution of wealth." And the paper added that this statement was made amid ringing applause. I wonder whether that audience would have applauded so loudly if they had realized that, as a result of the policies of the Liberal party, after seventy years of "relentless labour" in support of those policies, at the very moment the hon. gentleman was speaking, 4,000 families in Canada were receiving average incomes of $150,000 a year each, 16,000 families were receiving an average of $39,000 a year each, 536 persons had in their bank accounts, on an average, $287,500 each, while at the other end of the scale Canada's 3,000,000 farmers were receiving an average income per family of $474, and 98 per cent of all the wage-earners in Canada were receiving an average income of $668 a year. The way the minister "labours relentlessly" for a more equitable distribution of Canadian wealth, based upon "equality of opportunity and equality of sacrifice," is to hand a fat contract to a bunch of stockbrokers, lawyers and armament racketeers to enable them to plunder the Canadian people out of a million dollar stock watering profit, besides enormous operating profits, to be added to their already large incomes.

Why is it that public opinion on this continent is so thoroughly aroused against profiteering in armament making? In my opinion it is undoubtedly on account of the wide publicity given to the Nye committee findings in the United States, and to disclosures made in the French Chamber of Deputies and the British House of Commons. And Colonel Drew, in his article in Maclean's magazine and others which he has written in the past, and other writers of books and articles, have done a great deal to arouse public opinion by bringing these matters to light. It was because of this aroused public opinion that our representatives at the League of Nations assembly have always advocated public ownership and operation of armament factories. We all know the story of Sir Basil Zaharoff, who made a fortune estimated at from two hundred million to a billion dollars from the sale of the instruments of death, and as a reward was knighted by the British government; how he was consulted in 1917 when there was a possibility of achieving peace through the intervention of the United States, and Lord Bertie, British ambassador to France, recorded in his diary, "Zaharoff is all for continuing the war jusqu'au bout." It is not surprising that an armament racketeer should want to continue a murder racket out of which he was making millions of dollars a month, but how do we explain the fact that he was a close confidant of the British Prime Minister; that he was consulted as to whether or not the war should go on; that he was knighted by the same Prime Minister as a reward for his "services" and that later from the hundreds of millions of dollars reaped in that harvest of death out of the blood, tears, agony, disease, debt and death of the world's common people, he endowed chairs in literature at Oxford university and the Sorbonne, naming them the "Foch" and "Haig" chairs to perpetuate his gory fame?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was discussing the activities of armament manufacturers, and the manner in which they have managed to worm themselves into the confidence of governments and, incredible as it may seem, to become the close personal advisers of ministers of war and prime ministers. The manner in which Major Hahn became the representative of the Canadian Department of National Defence and also won the confidence of the British war office suggests that while the original Zaharoff has long since gone to his well deserved reward, his familiar technique and his spirit go marching on.

Before leaving the subject of Zaharoff, and to indicate the way in which armament racketeers go about their work, may I quote a passage from Guiles Davenport's book Zaharoff published by Messrs. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard. I quote the following from page 157:

> Sir Frederick Borden, Minister of Militia under the Laurier government of Canada, was in London several years before the world war. He was royally fêted by the directors of Vickers. Concluding a formal dinner one evening, he was surprised to hear an unnamed Vickers director use these words, "Business is bad. But how could it be otherwise with a man like Campbell-Bannerman in office? Why, we haven't had a war in seven years!"
> That same evening Sir Frederick heard variations of the same complaint from several Vickers men, who were as one, agreed that "Campbell-Bannerman was constantly upsetting their plans with talk of disarmament."
> Surely disarmament could have held little appeal to Zaharoff and his associates if they are to be judged by such expressions of opinion.

It is also a matter of record that this same ghoul controlled banks and newspapers in France, Greece and other countries, since armament racketeers find it necessary to be in a position to mould public opinion so that people will think what they are told to think.

The Minister of National Defence expresses great confidence in the ability of the British government. At page 2389 of the evidence, in reply to a question from Mr. Hellmuth, the minister is reported as saying:

> I think too highly of the British to think that they would take anybody else's viewpoint but their own; they are pretty canny people over there.

I agree with the minister, that they are indeed "canny"; for they are even more zealous than he appears to be in the interest of the armament manufacturers. May I tell the minister that over in Great Britain they go in for armament profiteering in a really big way. I pointed out to the house a few days ago a quotation from a London magazine entitled Peace, in which it was stated that the armament profiteers have never in history, not even during the great war, reaped such a harvest as in the past twelve months. The total profits of thirty important iron and steel companies were placed at £11,747,074 in 1937, an increase of 239 per cent over the profits made by the same companies in 1934, while at the same time 90 per cent of the British people cannot afford the $12.50 a week for food which is considered necessary for an adequate diet. Thirteen and a half millions of them are undernourished, and thirty-four million out of their forty-six million people have to live on an average per family income of less than $500. In his speech in the United States senate on March 6, 1934, Senator Gerald P. Nye, in calling for an arms probe, pointed to the fact that Armstrong-Vickers considered $4,500,000 a year profit so unsatisfactory that insurance against its dropping below that figure was taken out with the Sun Insurance Company. He also mentioned that among the prominent shareholders of Vickers or allied concerns in 1932 were the Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Austen Chamberlain, M.P., winner of the Nobel peace prize in 1925, Sir John Simon, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and a long list of politicians, clergy and members of the aristocracy.

An article appearing in the magazine Ken of November 3, 1939, by Ladislas Farago refers to the fact that Neville Chamberlain, the present Prime Minister of Great Britain, has 833 preferential and 5,414 ordinary shares in Imperial Chemical Industries. This company is engaged in the manufacture of war materials, and interlocks with International Nickel.

I think we should consider ourselves fortunate that we have an opportunity to nip these budding Zaharoffs before they have a chance to entrench themselves too deeply in our national institutions. We certainly have nothing to learn from European politicians and armament racketeers.

In 1921 the League of Nations commission which had been appointed to inquire into the problem of the private manufacture of arms came to the following conclusions:

> 1. That the armament firms have been active in fomenting war scares and in persuading their own countries to adopt warlike policies and increase their armaments;
> 2. That armament firms have attempted to bribe government officials both at home and abroad;
> 3. That armament firms have disseminated false reports concerning the military and naval programs of various countries in order to stimulate armament expenditure;
> 4. That armament firms have sought to influence public opinion through the control of newspapers in their own and foreign countries;
> 5. That armament firms have organized international armament rings, through which the armaments race has been accentuated by playing off one country against another; and
> 6. That armament firms have organized international armament trusts which have increased the price of armaments to governments.

I have referred to the fact that over a million dollars in stock profits were made by the present Inglis firm, and I wish now to place on the record evidence as to just how that was done. I quote from sessional paper 92A, volume 23, for Friday October 28, 1938.

Mr. J. E. Hahn was being questioned by Mr. Hellmuth, as follows:

Q. He was selling for roughly speaking $1,400,000, leaving out the $30, what he purchased for $250,000, is not that so?
A. That is correct.
Q. That is about six times what the property was acquired for?
A. That is correct—what I believe its value to be.
Q. I did not ask you that question, Major Hahn. Don't you think you can answer my question?

In conclusion I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence to explain just why Mr. Elliott, in giving his evidence as to supplying memoranda to the interdepartmental committee, made the statement to which I referred this afternoon to the effect that he and his assistants were not given sufficient time so to draft the clauses to be inserted in the agreement that the public might have been properly protected.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I desire immediately to thank the Canadian Commons for the kind heart which it always retains. I think it is immediately a recognition of the most unfair attack made in the course of Canadian political history. In my judgment, sir,—and I desire to-night to discuss the issues as fairly, calmly and moderately as I can—there has never been in the whole course of our Canadian history—and I am a great lover of that history—a more sustained campaign of political calumny than has been directed against the present Minister of National Defence and the officials of his department.

I do not think the reputation or personality of a minister is very important in this debate. There is something far more vital and far more important to the Canadian people, and that is the permanence and the security of the department over which I temporarily preside. And that department is being assailed at the present time from two angles. During the course of this debate we have seen the most sinister alliance in this house, one attack coming from a peculiar political philosophy, to your far left, Mr. Speaker, a philosophy which has attacked my estimates in the last three years with a sustained malevolence, and the other coming from the old Tory party of Canada, which did more to destroy national defence between 1930 and 1935 than was ever done before in the history of the Dominion of Canada.

I feel like following the admirable course followed by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) and deferring my observations until the standing committee on public accounts has reported back to this house. But I have been entrusted by my Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as well as by my colleagues, with the support of this House of Commons and the confidence of this country. I want to assure my hon. friends in the Commons to-night that George Drew was not the Minister of National Defence for the Dominion of Canada. The splenetic dominie, the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh), is not the Minister of National Defence for Canada. This quibbling romancer, the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), or his cynical colleague, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), is not the head of the Department of National Defence. Mr. Ian Mackenzie, of loyal highland Scotch descent, is the Minister of National Defence for the Dominion of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Scotland for ever.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, Scotland forever, and I do not need anything from the Prussian mentality of the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth).

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a question of privilege. I never ask any quarter from any political opponent and I am not asking for quarter now. The hon. member has made—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. HOMUTH: He called me a Prussian.

An hon. MEMBER: No, he did not.

An hon. MEMBER: Prussian mentality.

Mr. HOMUTH: I was born a Canadian and my people were born Canadians. I want the minister to retract that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As a result of the knowledge I have I say now that the hon. gentleman who arrived here only a week ago has never been loyal to party or principle in all his life.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. HOMUTH: I certainly am.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I want to say to my hon. friend that when new members come into the Canadian House of Commons they are supposed to exercise ordinary courtesy and display ordinary decency and common sense.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the old ones?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am in the judgment of the house when I say that there has never been a more vindictive attack made upon anyone than that which has been made upon me by this man who has just come into the House of Commons.

Mr. HOMUTH: Try to refute me.

Mr MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend has said nothing worth refuting.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order. I thought the minister was going to withdraw his statement.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Withdraw what?

Mr. MANION: The statement was made that the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) was never loyal to any party or principle in his life. If there is anything unparliamentary that could be said, that is it. I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to keep order in this house, and I submit that the minister must withdraw those words.

An hon. MEMBER: Not at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise again to a question of privilege. I ask the Minister of National Defence to withdraw the remark he made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If those in opposition—

Mr. MANION: I want a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not been able to hear what the minister has to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The declaration of political principles made by the hon. member for Waterloo South in years gone by—

Mr. HOMUTH: And I have lived up to every one of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): —in which he attacked in the most unblushing terms the Tory party to which he now pays allegiance—

Mr. MANION: I appeal for a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friends evidently desire to interrupt the course of my remarks.

Mr. MANION: Are we going to have a ruling?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have been under attack.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I understand it, the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Waterloo South are taking exception to the remark made by the hon. minister regarding the loyalty of the hon. member for Waterloo South.

Mr. HOMUTH: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I understand it, the loyalty of the hon. member has never been attacked by the hon. member who is speaking. He referred to certain matters which he knew about the hon. member, but that is not saying that the hon. member is disloyal.

Mr. MANION: He did not say he was disloyal. He said he had never been loyal to any party or principle. What kind of man is not loyal to any principle?

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand him to say he was not loyal to principle. I understood him to refer to the political loyalty of the hon. member, which is a different matter.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a question of privilege and ask that Hansard be read so we can see whether the hon. minister said that I had never been loyal to party or principle.

Mr. SPEAKER: That has never been done before in the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have been attacked and vilified for a whole week in this house and when I endeavour to assert my position—

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege to ask if you are going to rule whether the Minister of National Defence must withdraw the statement he made.

Mr. SPEAKER: There was so much noise that I could not hear the last statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If it will assist in the obvious reluctance to hear the minister under attack, I shall be very glad indeed to withdraw the word "principle" in regard to the remark I made with reference to the hon. gentleman. I trust that will assist us all in proceeding with the discussion of the issues under consideration.

May I outline to my colleagues what has occurred with reference to the issues now in debate? In the first place, last September in a nickel journal there was an article written by a man called Drew in which he did not have the manhood to make charges against the gentleman who is now addressing this house. Replete as that article was with insinuations, innuendoes, assumptions and allegations, when that man came before the royal commission which was appointed promptly by the Prime Minister he never called a single witness. He never brought a single person, not one individual, in the whole Dominion of Canada, to prove any insinuation or assumption or innuendo or allegation that he had made in that article.

Hon. gentlemen opposite speak about tenders. There were present before that royal commission seven witnesses called by that most brilliant and gallant fellow, Layton Ralston.

An hon. MEMBER: Another grafter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is not a finer Canadian to-day in any province than Colonel J. L. Ralston. So high was his sense of public duty and public service that he undertook his duties in this particular investigation without a single cent of remuneration to himself for the long ten or twelve weeks of the investigation here in the city of Ottawa. And yet somebody called a man like that a grafter.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence).

Mr. SPENCE: He made thousands before that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If he made them he had qualifications for making them, better than my hon. friend has.

Mr. SPENCE: No doubt, but he got them just the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) has moved a resolution to refer to the public accounts committee certain developments resulting from the royal commission. Let me recount what has taken place.

As soon as this article was published, the government immediately granted a royal commission presided over by one of the ablest jurists in the Dominion of Canada, and the only thing the Tory party has done in this debate in the Canadian Commons has been to attack the report of Mr. Justice Davis, who was appointed by their own administration in 1935.

Look at the consistency of this thing, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Vancouver North, who has done more to destroy the Department of National Defence than anyone else by his resolutions in the last three years moved a resolution to refer this question to what? To a standing committee of this house for further investigation. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) moved an amendment to have the matter discussed in this house. Well, while that amendment was defeated, it was at the same time carried because they have had all the discussion and all the debate, and more than they wanted, as they know now to their cost, right here in the House of Commons.

Mr. MANION: No. You have had more than you want.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, I have not. I stand here to-night and I say I have nothing to retract, nothing to explain.

Then we find my ancient and honourable friend from Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), whom I have met before in combats on the hustings, moving another amendment, and what was that? Yes, I will meet him again if he dare come into Vancouver Centre, and I challenge him to come and fight me there on this very issue in the next election. What was his amendment? It was an amendment to have this question referred to a committee of the whole house. Every member of this house knows that as soon as the estimates of the Department of National Defence are moved into committee of supply, every single detail of this and any other contract can be questioned in committee of supply. What do they want? Do they want a parade of the permanent officers of the department before the bar of this house, in committee of the whole? That is the silliest, most nonsensical, most ridiculous amendment ever produced for the consideration of this house. I am surprised and somewhat sorry that my hon. friend from Kootenay East, because I must commend the restraint and the dignity of his speech, was conscripted by his party to submit to this house an amendment of such a superbly and supremely asinine quality.

Here we have, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver North. Here we have that grand aggregation of red-flaggers.

Mr. COLDWELL: Defend your position. Never mind us.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am trying to defend Canada, and you are doing your damneddest to destroy my efforts. That is what you are doing, you and your ilk. We have the semi-communist wing of Canada—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The minister has designated our group here as a semi-communist organization. That is absolutely untrue, and I ask that that statement be withdrawn.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I have the greatest pleasure in accepting the apology of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I ask that that allegation be withdrawn. I am not one of the new members of the house; I have been here long enough to believe that on the whole the members of this house are fairly decent, and I think the Prime Minister will agree that it is not right that even his minister should be allowed to make statements that are untrue. I say that that statement is untrue, and I ask that the minister withdraw it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my hon. friend objects to the appellation, "semi-communist," I do most willingly and with the utmost alacrity withdraw it; but I do say this, that there have been evidenced in Canada in recent months elements of a semi-communistic nature that have been endeavouring to tear down what this government has been trying to do, namely, to build up national security, national defence and national welfare in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, all I ask is that the statement made by the minister be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. gentleman rising to speak on a question of privilege?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the same question of privilege. I have stated that the statement made by the minister is absolutely untrue and I ask that he withdraw it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He has withdrawn it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Unconditionally.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understood the minister to withdraw it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not so understand it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We all did.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not understand that the hon. member is in contravention of the rules of the house in speaking of certain elements that have been disruptive and doing work of a semi-communistic nature in this country. I do not think his remarks were directed to the hon. gentleman who has just risen.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre went on to speak of certain elements that were creating difficulties. I have nothing to do with that latter statement of his, but previously the minister distinctly made the statement in reference to our group that we were semi-communist.

Mr. DUNNING: He never mentioned your group.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the member for Winnipeg North Centre heard what the minister said. He said that he would withdraw the remark with alacrity and he did so completely. Then he went on to speak of conditions in this country, not in this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand that those conditions applied to the hon. gentleman who raises the question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my hon. friend has any doubts at all, I repeat the withdrawal that I made some minutes ago. But I say this—and I know whereof I speak—that there are to-day in this dominion elements that are endeavouring to tear down what we are endeavouring to build up for the security and welfare of our people. I say to my hon. friends of the Tory party opposite —and I know whereof I speak; for I have here the record of cold facts—it is all very well to speak about world ideas developing towards international disarmament, but between 1930 and 1935 the Conservative party in Canada did more to destroy national defence than has been done by any party since confederation. The facts speak for themselves. Last year they said, "Oh, do not put defence into politics". What have they done? Not only have they tried to destroy those gallant fellows, the permanent officials of national defence, who cannot speak for themselves; they have tried to destroy the minister. The minister is really of no importance except purely temporarily in relation to the conduct of national defence. There is something more vital, more enduring, more abiding for the security of the Canadian people. Do not disturb or destroy the morale and fibre of our great Department of National Defence.

I come to the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), to the first amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), to the second amendment of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), and, now, to the findings of the royal commission. What were those findings? There were two essential points. No wrong-doing—not the finding my hon. friends hoped for—and, nothing wrong with the form of the contract—which hon. members opposite have been attacking all week. Every Tory in the house has been attacking during the last five days the findings of Mr. Justice Davis.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MANION: We have been supporting his findings.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The leader of the opposition so far forgot himself, when he could not find anything to attack in the actual findings, as to picture imaginings, figments of his own fertile Hibernian imagination, in place of the findings of Mr. Justice Davis. I desire to say this: As far as my conduct of affairs has been concerned it has been honest, honourable, and devoted wholly to the public service and the public interest.

In my sworn testimony I told the royal commissioner how the letter of introduction was given; how Major Hahn went to England; how he found it impossible to get access there to information which he, in a spirit of great national service, offered to the national defence department—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Hon. members may laugh, but that is the truth.

Mr. SPENCE: No wonder we laugh at that, coming from a brilliant man like the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): —how in 1937, during the time of the imperial conference, a definite policy was laid down with reference to the Canadian government acting as agents for the acquisition of munitions or supplies; how the war office telegraphed here on November 9, 1937, and told the Canadian government that they were definitely placing an order with this particular company for 5,000 Bren guns; and how from then on until, on March 17, the contract was signed, the pressure was entirely from the war office upon Canada and not from Canada upon the war office. To-night we have this situation, that for the first time since the war we have joined hands with the motherland in a contract to get guns for the defence of Canadian boys, and the Tories assail it and attack it as something vicious and malicious in every detail. The vital factor in this situation is that the contract was authorized by the British government by telegram on November 9, 1937, months before the contract was signed by the government of Canada, and that as a result of these complementary contracts we are to-day saving the taxpayers of this dominion over $1,300,000 in the actual cost of production of these guns.

Then the opposition ask, why no competitive bids? But when the experts were called, Colonel Drew was asked—it can be seen in the evidence—"Do you wish to hear these men?" and he said, no. The man who made the accusations, the man responsible for the insinuations and innuendoes, when he was asked if he would like to call these many industrialists of Canada who were suggested by the interdepartmental committee, answered, no. What is my hon. friend's answer? My hon. friend said the other day that he knew of five firms. I should like to see them called.

The hon. member for Vancouver North spoke of "rampant political patronage." I defy him now to prove any suggestion of political patronage in regard to this transaction and this contract. Let me remind the house of what I said last year when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), for whom I have great personal respect, had asked certain questions of myself as minister. Answers were made to those questions. He is an old parliamentarian; he has been in this house longer than I have; he knows how answers are prepared to questions put to ministers. Immediately I saw that he criticized the answers which were given him, I got in touch with the highest qualified officials of this house, and I was told that the answers were absolutely properly and correctly made. I can assure my hon. friend now as I did a year ago that if there was, not suppression, but any lack of enlargement of information, it certainly was not at the desire of the Minister of National Defence. From the first day to the last I have had nothing to conceal with regard to this matter. The subject of contracts was discussed in this house on February 14, 1938. Here am I, the Minister of National Defence, the apostle of deceit, speaking in reply to Mr. Bennett, my much esteemed friend who has now gone to other spheres of activity.

Might I suggest to my right hon. friend that I would be very willing indeed, if he would be good enough to specify any particular contracts, to get the information as soon as possible. I would suggest also to members of the house that in order that information may be made readily available to all members, all these contracts, or as many of them as may be considered necessary should be referred to the public accounts committee.

That was the statement of the present Minister of National Defence on February 14, 1938, in answer to a motion of the then right hon. member for Calgary West. All these contracts were tabled. Those which were not tabled at the close of the session were tabled on the first day of the present session. Then there was a press release on May 5, 1938, which was in evidence before the commission, and which gave all the information about this particular contract relative to Bren guns. And then there was a discussion.

Mr. DUNNING: This house was still in session.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was presented to the Canadian Press and circulated all over Canada two months before this house rose.

Who dares accuse me of concealment or evasion? Again, in this house on June 22, 1938, the hon. member for Vancouver North asked questions which were fully answered. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked questions which were answered in detail and he was referred to the discussion that took place on the estimates. So that on five different occasions during last session every opportunity was afforded every member of this house to hear every single detail with reference to this contract. And now they say that the Minister of National Defence was endeavouring to conceal some of the essential elements and principles, and fundamental features of the contract.

In regard to the contract itself, I said in this house last year that I thought it was one of the best contracts ever signed for Canada; I say that to-night from my place in the house, and I know what the opinion of eminent business men is with regard to the contract. Even Drew before the royal commission, when he came to discuss the contract itself, spent exactly two and a half minutes in referring to its clauses and details. It is a contract that has been carefully prepared in the public interest of the dominion. It is a contract that is much stiffer in its provisions than the contract signed by the British government with the same contracting firm.

As regards the activities of Major Hahn, they ask, why select Hahn? I say, why not?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why not? He is a gallant Canadian soldier and a former intelligence officer, a man of principle, integrity and loyalty, an astute industrialist and an able business man.

An hon. MEMBER: Good brains!

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, a man who served overseas. And then, because of some malign and nefarious motive which I cannot understand, it is said, "Oh, there is something sinister here; why select Hahn?" I do not know Major Hahn very well, but I do know from reports which I have received that the preparations of that firm with respect to their schedules having reference to this contract are up to date, and they will be delivering spare parts for the Bren gun by July next, beating all records of Enfield and of Australia in connection with the production of Bren guns. That is the answer.

There is possibly not much more that I can say at this stage, but I want to repeat what I said at the commencement of my remarks. Since I was honoured by the most brilliant Prime Minister that Canada has ever had—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Since I was honoured by him with the administration of a portfolio—it was not at that time as important as it is now, having been somewhat neglected by those who preceded us, but to-day it is second in importance possibly only to that presided over with equal ability by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning)—I have regarded the obligation as a matter of sacred public trust, and I still so regard it, despite the present attitude of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Speaker, I have the greatest admiration for this country, for your wonderful race, who for one hundred and fifty years have been the pioneers of settlement, the race that has produced great missionaries; and in the last one hundred and eighty years my own people of the British motherland have given us our institutions of British freedom and our parliamentary liberties—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): —something which the Tories are trying to suppress and destroy at the present time. I say that a sinister combination of fascism and communism will never destroy the efforts of a free and unfettered Liberalism.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Profiteers will.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will my hon. friend rise in his place?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Weyburn again.

An hon. MEMBER: Make a charge.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will he rise in his place?

An hon. MEMBER: Shame; you haven't enough courage to make a charge.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Do you want me to help you with your speech?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Stand up.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I repeat, sinister influences cannot destroy or disturb or impair or retard the considered conclusion and determination of Liberalism in Canada to provide such measures of national defence and security as will preserve the welfare and well-being of our Canadian people.

Possibly more than anyone else in this house I have endured the slings and arrows of outrageous Tories in the last few days, but personal attacks upon myself are of minor consequence. But when this debate is concluded; when a new measure is to be introduced for the establishment of a defence purchasing board for Canada, I do appeal to all parties, to all members in this house, to unite their voices and their forces to ensure that that board will be above any suspicion and beyond all reproach, and that in conjunction with it the Department of National Defence shall be permitted, after these malicious, vicious and meretricious attacks, to carry on its real work in preparing the defence of this dominion. I appeal to my hon. friends who have practically all spoken in this debate, except that grand old Nestor who is to succeed me, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan)—

Mr. CAHAN: Postpone the compliments, until you have heard what I have to say to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do appeal to all my hon. friends opposite, when this debate has been concluded and these issues are decided; when these disputations are ended, to unite in that task which is the grandest of all, the defence and security of our common country and heritage.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I trust that I shall not be provoked, by the language which the minister has used, ostensibly in self-defence, into making any similar characterization of him or his colleagues. This debate on the report of Mr. Justice Davis, and the terms of that report, have served to bring into notice two or three facts which are commendable and satisfactory. It has revealed that in the person of Lieutenant Jolley of the Canadian ordnance corps, now employed in the ordnance branch of the department, we have a young officer who by his intelligence and industry has laid the foundation for what I believe will be a very successful career in the civil service and the military service of this country. I do not know him; but, on reading the evidence which he gave and having in view the circumstances under which he gave it, I am glad to have it known that there exists a young officer of his character and attainments in that branch of the service. Then there is another young officer, with whom I am not acquainted, Colonel Orde, judge-advocate general of the Department of National Defence, who was called upon without any expert assistance to draft a very important contract. From personal experience I know something of the difficulties which he encountered, having no expert advice in that matter. I have no desire to commend myself in any way, but I have drawn more contracts dealing with munitions than almost any number of other lawyers in Canada. In the early months of 1915 I drafted contracts representing many tens of millions in value for which the British government was paying contractors in the United States. On account of having been one of the firm of attorneys formerly employed by the war department and the admiralty for some years, I was asked to see to the proper drafting of those contracts; contracts dealing with the intricate machinery of war, as delicate and complex, I have no doubt, as that of the Bren gun. But I had the good fortune, having so insisted, to have at my elbow some of the best expert advice, and to that expert advice is due the fact that those tens of millions of dollars worth of contracts, although some of them appeared in the courts, were never seriously brought into issue in the courts. Therefore I know something of the position of Colonel Orde, whom I judge by his evidence to be a young lawyer—

An hon. MEMBER: Not so very young.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know how old he is, but I understand he is a young gentleman.

Mr. POWER: Aged forty-five perhaps.

An hon. MEMBER: Or fifty.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, even that is young. I am grateful that they have these young men who are growing up and developing, for the performance of essential duties in that branch of Canada's service. Then there is another gentleman whom I knew quite intimately at one time as Colonel LaFleche; he is now General LaFleche. In the province from which I come General LaFleche and all those officers who served with him during the great war, and especially some of his colleagues in the famous 22nd regiment, are regarded with the highest possible esteem by all sections of our community. Having read a considerable part of the evidence, I suggest that no reflection can be cast upon General LaFleche, deputy minister of the Department of National Defence, who, loyal as he was in his military service, undoubtedly was equally loyal as the deputy of the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). Knowing and appreciating General LaFleche to be a man of honour, I think it is clear that in all he did he believed he was carrying out the policy of the minister of the department and the instructions which the minister had given in the carrying out of that policy. Therefore any criticisms of the actions of the deputy minister must be met by the minister himself, who in his evidence has said that he takes full responsibility.

The commissioner, Hon. Mr. Justice Davis, was appointed by order in council. In that order in council he was instructed to inquire into and report upon the steps to be taken to protect the public interest. He was dealing in a large way not only with the past, but with events of the past in relation to the future, so that the future policy of this department and of the government may be carried out effectively in the best interests of the country. This commissioner reported that he had spent thirty-six days in the taking of evidence and hearing counsel; that there were 4,122 pages of notes of evidence and 588 pages of the stenographic report of argument of counsel. To my mind—and I am expressing my own personal view—after that exhaustive examination into the facts, nothing essential to the discussion of the problem and our final decision upon the issues raised can be obtained by a reference to a standing committee of this house. In fact Mr. Justice Davis reported:

> Your commissioner is satisfied that all available documents in any way relevant and material to the subject matter of the inquiry were presented to the commission.

The real issue is, not whether more evidence is required in order thoroughly to elucidate this problem, but whether, taking into consideration the full report of the commissioner, there is evidence upon which the government of this country should take action, and, if there be failure on the part of the government, what action the parliament of this country should take, there being always in the background the knowledge that in the last resort the Canadian public will give their decision at the polls upon such issues as are presented. As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)—and I wish to commend his actions in certain respects—early in the history of the Bren gun was evidently anxious to ascertain whether or not the Department of National Defence was taking all due precautions to protect the interests of the government and thereby the interests of the country.

He had known, as we all know, that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) came to us accredited as a brilliant student and a graduate of the university of Edinburgh, one which all we Nova Scotians hold in the highest esteem, because the university which many of us attended and from which we graduated was really a branch of that great university of Edinburgh. In my day the professors, with few exceptions, were Edinburgh men. But the minister came also having some political experience in British Columbia, and I believe that he had some experience in the war, although I have no knowledge of what his war record was.

When he was appointed Minister of National Defence neither the Prime Minister and his colleagues nor the people of Canada knew whether this famous classical scholar from Edinburgh would prove adequate for the competent and effective administration of what was then becoming one of the most important branches of the administration of government in this country. It was a testing time for the minister. And I submit that the commissioner, well aware of the importance of that issue has decided—and I shall try to show where it is decided—that the Minister of National Defence has proved careless, negligent, incompetent and disqualified to carry out the administration of that high office, in the interests of the people of Canada and of the government which he represents.

Evidently the Prime Minister was somewhat anxious because he took what seemed to be the unusual course of appointing a special committee of which his own deputy, Doctor Skelton, was chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): General LaFleche.

Mr. CAHAN: I am talking about the Prime Minister's committee.

Mr. POULIOT: No; it was Nestor.

Mr. CAHAN: The Prime Minister appointed a special committee, of which his own deputy was chairman, to inquire into certain matters with regard to the furnishing of munitions and contracts relating to munitions, with the various departments of government, especially the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Justice Davis states that that special committee reported to the Prime Minister that the problem appeared essentially to be one of administration. The problem in the mind of the Prime Minister was as to whether or not there was adequate and competent administration of that great department. To him that was not a minor care, but rather a chief care, because as Prime Minister he has a responsibility with regard to the general supervision of all departments. No sooner did that special committee of the Prime Minister report than the matter was again discussed in council by and between the Prime Minister and his colleagues. While we are not admitted to council and have no shorthand report of the discussions which take place, we do know there was an order in council passed, namely order in council P.C. 439 of March 5, 1937, which was put in evidence before Mr. Justice Davis as exhibit No. 46.

This order in council provided for the appointment of a special interdepartmental committee to consider ways and means with respect to the letting of contracts, the preparation of contracts, the signing of contracts, and as to making due provision against profiteering in munitions contracts. That interdepartmental committee was appointed and proceeded to function. May I say now by way of commendation that, having read the report of what took place before that committee and the action taken by it from meeting to meeting, I think the Prime Minister and the government are to be congratulated upon having men in the civil service who have not only the intelligence and the experience but the courage necessary to take the action they did take, action which was a real condemnation of the policy which the Minister of National Defence proposed to pursue.

Mr. STEWART: And did pursue.

Mr. CAHAN: Proposed at that time to pursue. Although I shall not read the whole of the order in council I shall read clause 2, which provides:

That the duties of this committee shall be generally to study and classify from the financial point of view the various requirements which the government's defence program involves, and when it is considered by the department concerned that effective competitive tendering cannot be secured in regard to any of its requirements, to formulate or advise upon such principles and safeguards, whether of a general or specific nature, which in this connection the committee considers should be observed, and to communicate to all departments concerned such information in this respect as the committee considers should be in their possession.

As a matter of fact, that committee met, and we have the evidence of Mr. Elliott of the Department of National Revenue, a gentleman whom all admit to be one of the most competent officers of the civil service at this date, with regard to proceedings before that committee. At pages 587 and 588 of the evidence Mr. Elliott states:

The committee began to take an active part in the sense of asking questions, and getting to grips with the problem. In so doing the committee indicated that competitive bids should be one of the main considerations, and one of the first considerations. We pointed out that there was a number of very substantial subsisting companies in Canada that were manufacturing precision tools, and had had experience in what we thought was this line of work. We felt that they should be consulted and given an opportunity to submit competitive tenders . . . The committee also thought there would be considerable time required for further consideration of the contract.

Mr. Elliott had this to say further of the meeting:

It early became clear to all members of the committee that there were two phases under consideration. One phase was that there might be competitive bidding, and it was the unanimous and earnest desire of everybody on the committee to secure competitive bids if possible. The second phase was the study of the terms of the contract in itself.

Then he goes on to say that of that committee a subcommittee made a report on January 13, 1938, which was put in as exhibit 50. The report reads in part as follows:

Having in mind the main committee's suggestion that competitive bids be called for, the subcommittee, as an indication only of the names of concerns from whom competitive bids might be asked, mention—

The Steel Company of Canada,
Dominion Bridge,
Canadian Car and Foundry Company, Limited,
Bertram Company,
National Steel Company,

and possibly automobile manufacturers who undoubtedly have suitable plants and precision tools, together with such others as, in the opinion of the main committee might be asked to tender.

That is included in the report of the main committee which was to be made to the various departments. It states that it was possible to obtain competitive bids and mentions a number of companies from which those bids might be obtained. With respect to that, this question was asked Mr. Elliott:

Q. What was the main subject of discussion at the second meeting, Mr. Elliott?

A. Competitive bids and why the John Inglis Company should get this contract, the financial status of the company and a number of other things.

The committee wanted to get price comparisons from other competent companies. They felt the lack of them in considering this individual contract. They kept urging for some method of competitive bidding and comparative prices being entered upon.

Undoubtedly that report was available to the Minister of National Defence. In fact, when the interdepartmental committee was dealing with such an essential question as whether or not the Department of National Defence was being adequately and competently administered, the Minister of National Defence should have been most urgent to find out and ascertain definitely and clearly the opinion of the interdepartmental committee. In fact, under the terms of the order in council appointing the interdepartmental committee he was bound to seek its advice and to give attention, although not exclusive attention, to that advice. I should like to quote a question put to the minister, which appears on page 8 of the report. It is:

> Q. You never did attempt in any method or any way to see what any one of these dozen or more well known companies, with skilled labour, skilled mechanics, who had been working in precision steel—well, let us take the automobile industry which makes the very closest parts and closest tolerances—no effort was made of any kind to see what they could do?
> A. The answer is "no." I do not think it was practicable.

I think that answer is sufficient to condemn the Minister of National Defence if it is alleged that he is a competent administrator of his department. Any man who knows anything of the possibilities of the manufacture of precision steel in this country knows that with our skilled mechanics—it is true that some of them are leaving to go to Great Britain—we can perform work of this kind efficiently and effectively with preliminary organization.

Let me relate an experience I had in connection with placing munitions contracts in America. I was in London in December, 1914, and as I was either going to or returning from the contract department of the war office, I was approached by someone representing the navy. He told me that they had learned I was from Canada, and he wanted to know if I could tell them if a factory could be found in Canada to manufacture a special instrument required by the navy. It was to be kept a secret and they were wondering whether it could be manufactured in Canada. I asked what tools and machines would be required, and when I was told, I gave him the name of the Robb Engineering company, at Amherst, Nova Scotia. I told him that I thought he would find that factory equipped with machines and men capable of manufacturing the instrument they required.

Mr. HOWE: Not as well equipped as the Inglis company.

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend does not know very much about it. It was better equipped. Two experts were sent out from the naval department to see the machinery at Amherst and I saw the report they made to the naval officers to the effect that there was not a single factory in England, outside Woolwich, so well equipped for that work.

Mr. POWER: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not answering questions at the present time.

Mr. POWER: I just wanted to know if they called for tenders?

Mr. CAHAN: They found out that this company could do it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: On that point I can give my hon. friend considerable information if he wishes it. They did call for a tender from the Amherst factory, and that tender was compared with the prices or the costs in the government factory. They found they could be produced at Amherst for less than they were being produced at home.

Mr. POWER: Does my hon. friend approve that?

Mr. CAHAN: But we know what the practice is. There has been some question as to that; I can deal with it because after contracts to the amount of nearly $100,000,000 had been placed in the United States I was appointed as chairman of a board to see that those contracts were properly filled, and I know how the contracts were placed. They were placed, not by public tender in the United States, but we ascertained from the best information we could obtain the names of three or four or five companies who could manufacture the particular instruments required. Then we made inquiry into the financial standing of those companies; then competitive bids were obtained as between three or four or five competitive companies until we ascertained what bids were available; and in any doubtful case we compelled the prospective contractor to put up a bond of a guarantee company or a trust company for the due performance of the contract. I sometimes think that bonds of that kind in connection with work of that nature are futile because changes are often made as the work proceeds, and any change that is made in the terms and conditions and specifications tends to annul the contract. But there is this safeguard, that the guarantee company or the trust company which guarantees the contract has to make again, for the second time, a thorough investigation of the financial standing and mechanical ability of the company tendering. Nothing of that kind was followed here.

Mr. GLEN: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not going to answer any questions. I ask the Speaker to maintain order, because my time is rapidly passing.

The Prime Minister realizes, he must have realized because he is an experienced and competent administrator of the office of Prime Minister, what is necessary in such matters, and when the Minister of National Defence was off his job, as he appears to have been during the whole course and term of the Bren contract discussion, the Prime Minister was on the job, and he stated, as it appears on Hansard:

At the present time, in a time of peace, the government is proceeding on the theory of permitting competition with reasonable remuneration, the work to be subject to inspection and audit.
