I could go on and quote from the Prime Minister other statements to the same effect. He was in accord with the report of the special committee of the Prime Minister's office, that this was after all a problem of administration, and therefore he followed that course with respect to the other committee, the interdepartmental committee, which was to determine how effective administration could be procured, to the end that the necessary armaments and munitions might be obtained by the government, and obtained without undue profit on the part of the companies.

The Prime Minister had something further to say on September 12, 1936—and remember that the present Minister of National Defence was appointed to his office only in October, 1935, and in appointing him to that position the Prime Minister must have had some doubts. He knew, as we all do, that the Minister of National Defence was a great classical scholar, but that he had had no administrative experience before that, except such as he might have had as a lieutenant or captain in the king's service overseas. The Prime Minister also knew the qualifications essential for the position. It was not an ordinary appointment.

In the experience which I have had—and it is over fifty years since I sat in the press gallery here, and I think I have known every administration since, and largely the personnel of them all—ministers are appointed to office sometimes because of their good looks, sometimes because of certain popular qualities, sometimes because they are good public speakers able to deliver such a stump speech as that to which I am replying to-night, which we have just heard from the Minister of National Defence, and sometimes they are appointed for other qualities. But when it comes to two or three of the more important departments, the Prime Minister in selecting his cabinet is always desirous of obtaining men well qualified by intelligence and by experience to be competent administrators of such special departments.

The Prime Minister as early as 1936 was anxious to obtain, first, possibly, from his own committee, and second, from the interdepartmental committee, information on which the Department of National Defence might proceed carefully and effectively with the work. The Prime Minister received on November 9, 1936, as appears at page 24 of the report of the royal commission, a cablegram from the high commissioner in London, reading in part as follows:

In order to obtain information desired, war office must be requested to give Major Hahn, as representative of the Canadian government, access to information of a secret nature which normally is not given to other than government officials.

And the Prime Minister replied, on November 10, 1936, as appears at page 24 of the report:

You might request war office to give Major Hahn, as representating Canadian government in this particular, any information which they consider desirable and necessary to enable National Defence to reach conclusion on possibility produce Bren gun in Canada.

I am not emphasizing that from the point of view from which the previous discussion has proceeded; we will let that rest for the moment. But the Prime Minister felt that the department must be thoroughly provided with all the information necessary or expedient in order that it might proceed with such a matter as the manufacture of the Bren gun and the placing of contracts with other factories for its manufacture in Canada. Major Hahn, on that telegram, was admitted to the war office and into consultation with regard to the Bren gun. That is clear from Colonel Vanier's letter to Hahn of November 11, 1936, away back a long time ago, not long after the Minister of National Defence assumed office. Colonel Vanier says:

The war office have been requested to give you any information which they consider desirable and necessary to enable the Department of National Defence to reach a conclusion in the above matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but I am told that he has exhausted his time to speak.

Mr. CAHAN: Might I be allowed a few minutes more, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member can proceed only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I thank you. There will be ample opportunity again, because I can speak on the main motion, and I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any occasion in the House of Commons which is just as important as the one that is before the house in this debate. I say that because it is probably one occasion, and possibly the only one, when a major party in the house has refused to accept the findings of a royal commission as determining an important public matter in an extremely critical time not only for our own nation but for the peace of the whole world.

When the matter first arose it came in the form of an article published by an outstanding Canadian public man in a journal of general circulation throughout the dominion. It was probably one of the most critical articles that had ever been published in condemnation of a minister of the crown and a department responsible for the defence of the nation. The course taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has been commended by everyone.

This article, not by formulated charge but by innuendo and inference, was, I think, intended to and, I firmly believe, did convey to the minds of everyone who read it that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) was unworthy of public confidence; that there had been a granting of contractual privileges and an expediture of public moneys that were not merely negligent but fraudulent and designed to injure the public well-being and the public treasury for the benefit of persons preferred as friends of the administration.

It is true that since this debate has developed in the house, and after the findings of the commission, the more moderate attitude adopted by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has been taken. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) also changed from the attitude of the article. I want to say that innuendo can be more deadly against public men than direct charges, because there is no limitation to the imagination aroused by innuendo, and there is nothing defined for the one suspected to meet. So we find the leader of the opposition declaring, "I am not charging corruption, neither is George Drew doing so."

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is not in line with the statements of the distinguished colonel. He is on record. Let us look at what he has to say about General LaFleche, the deputy minister of national defence and one of Canada's most distinguished veterans. He has been described by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George as "the most honourable of men." Let us look at the record. At page 4300, in his charge to the commission, Colonel Drew says:

> Whether it be from the point of view of business interests, industrial efficiency or national security, nothing can be said, I submit, to justify this contract in any way. It was conceived in sin, born in iniquity and cloaked in fraud.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Shame.

Mr. McGEER: He could go no further than that, for that charge is all inclusive. No man associated with that contract so described could, in the mind of the distinguished gentleman making such a charge, be anything but guilty of creating and being the fraud that cloaked the whole contract. Let us look further. At page 4299 he deals more specifically with the minister and the deputy minister:

> I submit that every step which LaFleche has taken in the negotiations leading up to the Bren gun contract is, on the evidence, open to very grave suspicion, and I ask you to so find.
>
> I submit that for the part he played Mr. Mackenzie is open to even more severe condemnation.

At page 4294 he said:

> I submit that from the beginning to the end LaFleche's evidence is not to be believed.

Is this not a charge of corruption?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to draw another matter to your attention. It has been stated that the commissioner was unable to find as he would have found with regard to individuals had it not been for the objection raised by the counsel for the government on the interpretation of section 13. To whom were those objections as to technical interpretation addressed? To some innocent individual who was to be influenced by the argument of counsel? No, Mr. Speaker—to one of the most gifted and distinguished members of the Supreme Court of Canada, who was better able to interpret the law, the order in council and the commission under which he was functioning than any counsel in the room. But what I want to point out is that, had the distinguished colonel been correct in his submission, it was the duty of the commissioner to report that fact to the government, because no man whose evidence from end to end could not be believed when it was taken under oath could sit or hold a responsible position in any department of the government service.

We got a finding upon that point, and the finding is clear. At page 51 of this report of which we have heard so much the distinguished jurist says:

> I think it right to say that there is no evidence (nor is there in the evidence any ground for suspicion) that the minister or the deputy minister or any officer or official of the Department of National Defence was guilty of any act of corruption or anything in the nature of corruption.

It is important that if there is anything wrong in the administration of the Department of National Defence it should be corrected at this particular time or at any other time; but it is equally important that if there are people in the land who are willing to cast suspicion and unwarranted condemnation upon the department at a time as critical as this they should be exposed. And that is why this matter should now go before the public accounts committee for investigation.

At page 642 of Hansard of February 6, the leader of the opposition says:

> Mr. Justice Davis eliminated anything in the way of any suspicion of corruption. I accept that; . . .

Normally that would end the matter; but the leader of the opposition qualifies his acceptance of Mr. Justice Davis's finding, which finding completely exonerates the government, the contract, the minister, the deputy minister, the interdepartmental committee, Major Hahn and the John Inglis Company, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) and every other member of the House of Commons and the Senate. The finding is a complete exoneration, but the leader of the opposition says this, and I think it will be regarded as one of the most extraordinary statements ever made on the floor of the house:

> I say that Mr. Justice Davis, for reasons with which I shall deal briefly, felt that he could not come out and say distinctly that he condemned the minister or the government; he did exonerate them, of course, from anything in the nature of corruption. But in dealing with the methods by which the contract was put into effect . . . he did it in a sort of subtle manner by painting vignettes which he hung on the wall for each of us to see and come to his own conclusion.

Mr. Speaker, you might open the commissioner's report at random and find that it condemns by inference the methods by which this contract was negotiated.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGEER: The leader of the opposition says, "hear, hear"; but probably time and reflection will have their effect. I should like to take the time to congratulate him upon his distinguished career and to wish him success in the future; but I know something of the weaknesses and the failings, and something of the troubles to which dynamic Irish minds are subject, and therefore I say in all sincerity that, largely, his success is measured by the degree to which he uses the brakes that are necessary for all Irish leaders. That puts this matter in an extraordinary light because we are in a new world as it were; we are in a new land and time as far as judicial interpretation or the interpretation of judgments is concerned. By this process of reasoning which the leader of the opposition has developed, where you repudiate the considered, signed statement of "not guilty"—

Mr. MANION: So far as corruption is concerned, yes, that is correct.

Mr. McGEER: —and by using pictures that illuminate the language of the author, you say to the judge, "Oh, yes, you said 'not guilty', but I am taking your vignettes, for therein I see 'guilty' ". Well, I think we are extremely fortunate in Canada in having a dual language nation. I am tardy myself in beginning, but I believe that every Anglo-Canadian in this dominion would be greatly improved if he learned to read, write, speak and think in the language of old France, just as I believe that every French-Canadian in this great dominion would not suffer from being able to do the same thing in the language of the other race. But I draw the line at this picture language. I do not want to have to plead, in courts where we are going to interpret judgments, in a language of pictures inspired and excited by Irish suspicion that travels at 200 words a minute. There is great danger in his introduction of new ideas; but I say, "Holy Moses, Mr. Leader of the Opposition, don't venture into new languages, we have enough now".

There is another matter in regard to which I think the leader of the opposition has erred, and it is this. He says that we must ignore the finding of the commission to the point of cancelling the contract. It is quite easy to assume the responsibility for cancelling contracts when you do not have to pay the compensation for the cancellation. This is, of course, a contract with the Canadian government. It may produce a profit and it may not.

Mr. MANION: Oh, yes, there is ten per cent plus anyway, so there is a sure profit.

Mr. McGEER: Well, let me say something else to my hon. friend: You will never listen yourself into difficulties; by your present remarks you have shown that you have not read the contract, or that you cannot understand what you have read. I think this contract is one of the most dangerous from the point of view of the contractor that was ever signed, particularly in the light of the attitude of the opposition and in the light of their hopes of the coming election which will take place before this contract is completed. And then there might be a Pharaoh come into power who knew not Joseph.

Mr. WALSH: There will be, not might be.

Mr. McGEER: Another prophet! The contract provides that all acceptances and rejections are under the control of the Department of National Defence. A comparatively small percentage of rejections in a highly technical weapon could wipe out not only the company's entire profits on this contract but involve it in a very substantial deficit. Then, if this contract were cancelled by us, what would be the attitude of the British government? Our contract is complementary to theirs in that they get the benefit of a price much lower than it otherwise would be. They would say to this government, why did you cancel it? We could not say for fraud, because that has been cleared away. We could not say for default, because there is a finding of the commissioner on that point which more than clears the contractor. The evidence on that is found at pages 3105 and 3109, and was dealt with by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) last Tuesday evening. It shows that Mr. Gillespie, with thirty-eight years' experience in supervising the production of small arms for the British government, who was lent by the British government to supervise the establishment of this secondary base of supply in Canada, questioned by Colonel Ralston, answered as follows:

Q. And from your experience with them here what do you say as to their efficiency as engineers in charge of production, or in charge of planning for production of Bren guns?
A. I would say they are 100 per cent.
Q. 100 per cent?
A. Yes.
Q. Well that is pretty good.

And the commissioner intervened with this comment:

As the school boy says, it is not good, it is perfect.

What ground then is there for cancellation of this contract? There is no fraud; there is no default. And we have a finding from the commissioner that this contract contains every safeguard needed to protect the government in the matter of developing a correct and proper price, and further the Department of National Defence have Bren gun production costs in the British publicly-owned factory at Enfield to serve as a check on costs here. What more need there be?

But let us assume we are going to cancel the contract, as the leader of the opposition proposes; who is going to pay the bill? The government could not cancel the contract without expropriation proceedings; they could not cancel it without subjecting the cancellation to the review of our own courts and the ultimate review of the privy council. Cancel the contract and you become at once liable not only for the entire amount of the estimated profits to-day, but for the amount of the profits on the British contract as well. Would you wipe out anything else? Yes. One of the great advantages of this contract is something for which we owe a great debt of gratitude to Major Hahn and the deputy minister of national defence. If hon. members will keep quiet and keep their ears open they will know more when I get through than they did when I started, because I propose to deal with this issue on the facts and on the merits. If hon. members on the other side will listen they will be more inclined to support the work of Major Hahn and the deputy minister than to condemn. They obtained from the British government a contract which makes Canada a secondary supply base for arms for the British empire. We have a finding on that, very definitely set out in the report of the commissioner. The commissioner also finds that by bringing this contract to Canada the 7,000 guns on order will be produced at a saving of $1,300,000 to the Canadian government. The commissioner points out that Mr. Elliott of the Department of National Revenue gave evidence that the saving on capital cost to Canada, which joins with the British government in buying the machinery and at the end owns it all, will be $551,000. That evidence was not disputed and was accepted by the commissioner. And the evidence of Enfield experts and others, which also is not disputed, was that the total cost of production of 7,000 guns under the joint contract will be $800,000 less than it otherwise would be.

Yet we are to throw that away. And what then is the message that goes from Canada to England if the proposal to cancel the contract arbitrarily on the basis of imagination and this picture language and suspicion were followed, what report goes to the motherland? That it is not safe to look upon the Dominion of Canada as a secondary supply base for arms for empire defence? Here is the error into which the leader of the opposition has fallen. To repudiate our Department of National Defence by cancelling this contract would carry with it the inescapable and appalling consequence that we at the same time repudiate the British war office, who signed an almost identical contract with the same company. If there is any justification for the statement recently made by the premier of Italy, that the democracies are too stupid to have any attention paid to them, such an act as that proposed by the leader of the opposition would justify that remark.

One or two other matters I would like to deal with. They say there was gross misrepresentation on the part of the minister and the deputy minister in that it was represented to the war office that this was a firm competent and qualified to produce arms and munitions. My hon. friends say that was false, but we have the findings of the commissioner on that.

The commissioner finds that it was abundantly clear that long before the Bren gun contract was ever thought of, Major Hahn and his associates were negotiating for the purchase of the John Inglis plant. The John Inglis company plant consists of fourteen different buildings. It was the outstanding Canadian munitions plant during the last war, and its engineers declare that to-day its equipment is in better shape than it ever was.

What did Major Hahn do? Did he go to England and depend upon the letter of introduction and recommendation from Canada? No, not at all. He took with him a complete book of photographs showing every detail of the plant he proposed to use. He took with him, according to the findings of the commissioner, the blue-prints of every building and of every machine, and the capacity of each of them. He took also the reference of his bankers, the Bank of Montreal, of Canada. These records of the plant were handed over to the officials of the war department at Enfield for investigation. It was in the light of that situation, the placing of the facts openly before the war office, that he was able to secure the confidence of the war office officials, and on November 9, almost a year after they had secured the ownership of the plant in Toronto, to have a telegram forwarded to the Department of National Defence that the war office were prepared to let a contract to the John Inglis Company for 5,000 guns.

Mr. WALSH: Five thousand guns.

Mr. McGEER: Yes, 5,000 Bren guns.

An hon. MEMBER: What does the hon. member think he said?

Mr. WALSH: The hon. member said "dollars."

Mr. McGEER: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, no—bad hearing.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member does not understand him.

Mr. McGEER: I shall have to put it in picture language. On top of that, Major Hahn then returned to Canada, and said, "Here we are; I have a contract from the British war office. If you are willing to come in with them we can go ahead and make Canada a secondary base of supply, thereby guaranteeing to the dominion at the lowest possible price these 7,000 guns which could not be secured in any other way."

What is wrong with that? "Oh, but," my hon. friends say, "you did not call for tenders." Terrible! Let me say this: Any man in Canada who had the initiative of Major Hahn could have got the same support and the same opportunity of going to England with the support of this government to bring contracts to put workmen to work in Canada. After he did that work, and produced results, my hon. friends turn round and say, "Well, now, you must let somebody else come in"—on this product of Major Hahn, and Major Hahn alone.

With whom did he compete? British labour opposed that contract coming to Canada. The Birmingham Small Arms Company insisted that it be let to a factory in Birmingham. Major Hahn was able to point out that there would be two great advantages in having this development under way in Canada. It would start the dominion towards developing its own means of defence, and it would provide something now recognized as essential to old country security, namely a base of supply in Canada which would be more secure than anything which exists in the British isles to-day.

That was the work which Major Hahn did. My hon. friends turn round and say, "Oh, well, they bought this old boiler factory." They bought and put into condition a plant with an appraised value of more than one and a quarter million dollars. They have capitalized it as a going concern at that value. They have put into the company $250,000 out of the $300,000 working capital which they agreed to raise in cash. They have sold no stock that has not been within the price fixed by the Ontario commission which has authority to say whether or not a company shall sell stock, and at what price. They are operating under conditions, not that they cannot sell stock, but that if they dare to use this contract or licence for the purpose of exploiting the stock market, such licence is subject to cancellation. What greater guarantee can the investing public have than, in addition to the securities commission of Ontario, this right held by the national government to cancel the licence and destroy the company if there is any exploitation of public funds of investors in Canada.

The Bank of Montreal is even more guilty than we are, because it has not only advised the war office that the company is qualified, capable and competent but also declared that it has personally investigated the finances of the company and knows that the company is quite qualified to carry out the contract. Yet, Mr. Speaker, they say "let us cancel the contract."

When the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) was advising our distinguished leader how to select ministers, and particularly a minister of national defence. I have the greatest respect and the highest regard for the hon. member, and I do think that to-night he has given us an exhibition of what elder statesmanship has to offer to legislative assemblies, in the dignity, in the reserve and in the repudiation of his own associates, who charge fraud, by innuendo, to the point of cancellation. But, Mr. Speaker, I could not help smiling a little. I wondered just what rules governed the appointment as Minister of National Defence of that great and distinguished statesman and soldier the late Sir Sam Hughes. Certainly he was a man of great energy, great ability and great force. He had all those qualities of stump speaking that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George condemns as the reason why the present minister should go.

To anyone who has examined it, the purpose of the government is clear. The contract is not a public ownership contract, but as between private operation and absolute public ownership it stands out as an outstanding example of the Swedish compromise of partnership with the government, with absolute control in the government.

I do hope this matter will go to the public accounts committee so that it may be dealt with on its merits. I do hope that the house will recognize the seriousness of the situation which exists, and that it will also recognize that there are great problems of social needs, great problems of human welfare, great problems of municipal needs and other problems of development with which we might deal, and that this matter will not be allowed to monopolize more time than is necessary to bring our national defence system into the highest state of perfection. The people of Canada are expecting the House of Commons to move into action on all the problems of the day, and we shall do little but serve the subversive forces of the nation if we haggle in parliament over partisan advantage. There are hustings for that kind of thing. The hustings would have been the place for most of the speeches we have heard from the opposition in this debate.

A little later on I hope to pay my tribute to the Minister of National Defence, to the deputy minister, to the Department of National Defence and to this government for the great change that has been made during the last few years in the defensive forces of this country. I believe that out of this debate will come a need for greater defensive power, a need which for the time being at least will compel us to forget the balancing of budgets and come to a realization that as other nations have found a need of great programs of defence and great programs of service, we in Canada must go along with the times and see that our monetary technique as well as our defence technique are adjusted to the needs of the nation.

Mr. A. B. HYNDMAN (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at length in this debate. At the outset I should like to correct the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) who said that those of us who have spoken on this side have attacked this report. No speaker on this side of the house has attacked the report of the Bren gun commission. I have listened attentively to the speeches delivered from the other side of the house and from this side. In none of the speeches delivered from this side was anything said detrimental to the character of the Minister of National Defence or the deputy minister. The whole speech of the minister to-night consisted of praise for himself. Look out for the man who has to do that. We all know he is a Scotchman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HYNDMAN: I can well remember when there was not so much cheering after a speech by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer). What we on this side of the house have been criticizing is the ignorance of the Minister of National Defence toward his duties, as has been brought out very clearly in the report of the commissioner. I notice that in their defence of the Department of National Defence the Liberal party put up a number of able lawyers to speak during the last day or so. They put up the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), and the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). What did they say in their speeches? The hon. member for Parry Sound did little but criticize the language of the contract. I well remember the provincial election of 1934 when the hon. member for Parry Sound said over the radio what he was going to do if the Hepburn party were returned to power. He said he would not charge any fees; yet he has drawn down close to $40,000 for the work he has done for the provincial government.

Then we had the hon. member for Témiscouata. I well remember when the report of the employment commission was brought in and how he received it. I remember he threw it on the floor of the house. Then he brought up the question of patronage. He mentioned the brother-in-law of the former Prime Minister, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. I want to tell the hon. member for Témiscouata that the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett is going to bring great honour to this country. If I am not mistaken he will become a member of the House of Commons in England, and it would not surprise me in the least if he became Prime Minister of England. Then we had the hon. member for Cochrane. In order to cover up this report, he started a flag-waving act. He introduced patriotism into this debate. Why should that be introduced? I wonder if the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Bertrand) and the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Vien) agree with the statement made the other day by the mayor of Montreal.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. HYNDMAN: I am glad to hear that. Nevertheless, they are the godfathers of the mayor of Montreal. They nominated him for the mayoralty and they supported him during his campaign. Why have they not risen in the house to condemn the mayor of Montreal for what he said the other day? He said that if England and Italy were ever at war the sympathies of the French-Canadians would be with Italy. Why has the Minister of National Defence not condemned that statement? I claim that that is a very unpatriotic statement by the mayor and that these hon. members whom I have mentioned should rise in their places and state whether or not they agree with it.

Mr. FRASER: He was the leader of the Tory party for a while.

Mr. HYNDMAN: Let me tell the hon. member who has just spoken that not only did the mayor have the support of the hon. members I have mentioned, but he was elected by the Liberal vote in Montreal and by the promise of this government to spend $12,000,000 on that hole in that city. That was the statement he made on the night of his election. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard told us to-night that others had a chance to get this contract. No one knew about the contract except Major Hahn. The members of the Liberal party who have spoken claim there was no reason for competition, but in spite of the advice which came to the Minister of National Defence from various sources which I shall enumerate, the contract was given to a private corporation.

First of all, we had a fine interdepartmental committee set up for this very purpose, and they recommended that the contract be awarded by tender. Second, we have Major General Ashton, chief of the general staff, recommending a government-owned factory. Third, we have the British government insisting that the Bren gun be manufactured in a government-owned plant. Fourth, and not least, we have the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) recommending that tenders be called, and we have the Minister of National Defence agreeing with him. Let me quote from page 11 of the report to bear out my statement. Speaking in the House of Commons on April 2, 1937, the Prime Minister had this to say regarding munitions contracts:

> At the present time, in a time of peace, the government is proceeding on the theory of permitting competition with reasonable remuneration, the work to be subject to inspection and audit. . . . We agree with him in asserting the principle that no profits should be made out of war.

I am sure every hon. member agrees with that. Then we have the Minister of National Defence agreeing with the Prime Minister. In his evidence before the commission the minister stated that that statement of the Prime Minister was in agreement with his own views. Yet when it came to awarding the contract they did not adopt that course. Why? Well might we ask why, and the country at large is asking why. It appears that the reason was that the Minister of National Defence seemed set on giving the contract to Major Hahn. The minister in his evidence said that no one had asked for a contract. I think that is a most childish answer. Let me read the minister's evidence. He was answering questions put by Mr. Hellmuth. Mr. Hellmuth asked:

> You did not give anybody else a chance?

And the minister's answer was:

> Nobody asked for it.

Nobody asked for it! Mr. Hellmuth went on:

> Q. Mr. Minister, what I want to get you to answer is this: You never did attempt in any method or any way to see what any one of these dozen or more well known companies, with skilled labour, skilled mechanics, who had been working in precision steel—well, let us take the automobile industry which makes the very closest parts and closest tolerances—no effort was made of any kind to see what they could do?

And the minister's answer to that was:

> No.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that this is a peculiar way for any government to do business. There is a contract to be let; a member of parliament brings down a man, introduces him, and he gets the contract.

Let us look at the contract and let us look at Major Hahn. I quote from page 15 of the report:

On seeing the gun both of them (Mr. Plaxton and Major Hahn) went over to it, looked at it and asked what it was. I told them it was the new Bren gun. I do not believe that either of them had ever seen the gun.

Some man to give the contract to for manufacturing the Bren gun when he had never seen it before! It was a man by the name of Major Hahn who was brought down and introduced by a member of parliament to the deputy minister, a man who, as has often been pointed out here, was a radio salesman. He had bought, I will not say an old boiler factory, but a boiler factory which had been closed, and he formed a company, which I must say at the present time looks a fairly good investment. The company consists mostly of Major Hahn with a few office boys and girls, and they will make on the 191,622 shares of stock alone, if they sell them at $7.50 a share, $1,341,634. I consider that really good business.

But what strikes me most in this report is that the Minister of National Defence did not know Major Hahn, and he did not know what was going on. I prove that by quoting from page 28 of the report, where Mr. Hellmuth is questioning the Minister of National Defence:

Q. I am asking you if you knew the personnel of the reliable group?
A. No.
Q. You did not know that?
A. No.
Q. I would like to have that question answered, with all due deference. I would like to know whether you knew whether Major Hahn had or controlled any plant or plants?
A. Not to my own knowledge—certainly not.
Q. Do you know whether he had any company at that time?
A. Not to my knowledge, no.
Q. When did you find out that Major Hahn had associates, and who they were?
A. I did not know who they were until the article referred to in this investigation (i.e., Maclean's magazine).

So thank goodness that Colonel Drew, who has been under criticism in this house, did write that article because at least he drew this man Hahn to the attention of the Minister of National Defence. The evidence continues:

Q. So that we may say the contract—at the time the contract was signed you had no knowledge of who his associates were?
A. That is quite correct.

I think that proves, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of National Defence—and he takes responsibility for this contract; he cannot blame it on his deputy or anybody else—knew absolutely nothing about the contract and knew nothing about Major Hahn.

Let us look at the contract. As far as I can see, from looking over the contract, it has been drawn up by capable lawyers, and I venture to say that technically it is sound. But if I were a manufacturer I would be pleased indeed to get a contract such as this, because according to it, as I figure it out, the government provides everything and Hahn gets the cream. And who is he getting the cream from? He is getting it from the taxpayers of this country. They are the ones who are going to pay the bill. And what confidence, I ask, are the Canadian people going to have in the minister and in the Department of National Defence when he comes to parliament and asks for $63,000,000 to be spent on national defence?

I am going to make two recommendations. They are recommendations that have already been made. They are very brief, and I agree with both of them.

First, I am going to make the recommendation that Mr. Justice Davis makes on page 51 of his report, where he says:

The purchase or production of such munitions or armaments should be put into the hands of an expert advisory group of competent business men—a capable and experienced manufacturer, a commercial lawyer who has had a wide practice in dealing with large commercial contracts, a representative of labour, and say a chartered accountant who has had experience in the examination of substantial business transactions. These persons should constitute a board (which might be known as the "defence purchasing board") and be made directly accountable to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance.

In that last sentence the commissioner is advising the setting up of a board responsible to whom? Responsible to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. If he could see nothing the matter with this contract, why did he not say that the board should be responsible to the Minister of National Defence? But no, he advises that it be taken out of the hands of the Minister of National Defence and put under the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance.

The other suggestion is this: We have the Prime Minister in the speech from the throne suggesting that at this session—

Legislation will be introduced to establish a defence purchasing board with power to purchase equipment for the defence services and to ensure that, where private manufacture is necessary, profits in connection with such are fair and reasonable, and that the public interest is protected.

I contend that these two statements, the one from the Prime Minister and the other from Mr. Justice Davis, are enough in themselves to cause criticism of the workings of the Department of National Defence. I agree with the suggestion that has been made by my honoured leader. I would not go so far as to say that the Minister of National Defence or his deputy should be discharged, because in a way they—especially the minister—knew nothing of what was going on, but I will say, and I think the Prime Minister will find that the people are demanding it, that this contract must be cancelled. We must restore the confidence of the people in the national defence department. One has only to refer to what happened in the old country. When inefficiency was shown in the department charged with defence matters, the British Prime Minister was not long in discharging the responsible minister, Sir Thomas Inskip. To restore the confidence of the people in the department, I repeat, this contract must be cancelled.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, by reason of certain statements made during the course of the debate I am prompted to say a word or two in an attempt to clarify certain issues. I moved the motion of reference to the public accounts committee, and in doing so, endeavoured to state in the simplest possible terms the reasons for the introduction of that motion. The debate since that time has traversed a very wide field, a much wider field than was anticipated. I desire, as I have said, as briefly and simply as possible to bring the discussion back to the central issues, issues which have been largely disregarded, issues which have not been fully and adequately explained and concerning which in some respects no explanation at all has been offered by supporters of the government's policy.

I feel it necessary to explain to the house the motives which prompted me to discuss this contract. I do so because the suggestion has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite that this has been something of a monstrous conspiracy to embarrass the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), to defame his character, and to harass him at this time as he is attempting to repair the defences of this dominion.

There is no such conspiracy. But if the minister is in touch with public opinion to-day; if he is alert to discern what is taking place throughout the country, he must realize that this very effort he has made to make Canada defence-conscious has, by the same token, impressed upon the country the importance of his duties and responsibilities. A strict accounting may be demanded for every move he makes, because of the extraordinary power he wields at this time on behalf of the dominion.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) took pains to refer to the Ross rifle deal in the last war. It is significant that he did so, in view of the fact that the very machinery which manufactured the Ross rifle has been shipped to the factory of the John Inglis Company in Toronto.

Mr. GARDINER: I should just like to point out, in view of some newspaper publicity which has been given to the idea just now expressed, that what I stated was that you require more than machinery in order to make good guns of any kind, and Mr. Hahn was an addition to the machinery.

Mr. MacNEIL: Well, the minister can explain his own statement. I just said it was significant he referred to that in view of the fact that the machinery used in manufacturing the Ross rifle was shipped to the John Inglis Company in Toronto. I mention this to point out that this deal is almost on all fours with the Ross rifle deal of years ago: that at that time there was the definite determination to rely on private manufacture; that at that time there was the definite effort to secure a complementary order from the British government; that the deal was proceeded with by the Canadian government of that day largely because of patronage considerations, with the result that British government inspectors were rejecting rifles which were issued to the Canadian troops—issued with results which were well known to all those who served in the great war.

If the house will pardon a personal reference, I desire to say that I was privileged to serve as a machine gunner in the last war. The machine guns with which we were originally equipped were provided by private manufacture; and in looking up the record of this house, the journals, and copies of the orders in council dealing with the purchase of the machine guns, I find that through patronage influence sales were made in opposition to the opinion of the British war office. What was the result? I participated in the result, and for that reason I am concerned as to the outcome of the deal which we are discussing to-day. At a crucial moment, when we were required to protect the infantry occupying a position which was almost untenable, we could not make four guns do the work of one under active service conditions, by reason of faults in design, construction and manufacture; and the mudholes which we occupied at that time became a veritable shambles because of the failure of that equipment to operate. Prominent senior officers were cashiered over that episode, and I should not be blamed by the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence if I hold vividly in recollection the memory of comrades who went gallantly to their deaths because they were furnished with faulty equipment by private manufacture resulting from a deal of this kind.

I have in mind a conversation with a gentleman having some responsibility to the reading public of this country, who introduced himself to me. "MacNeil," he said, "I hope this matter will be cleared up to the satisfaction of the people of Canada. Despite all rumours in circulation as to my motives in giving some publicity to sensational statements, I want to make clear my personal interest in this matter. I have a son, MacNeil, of military age, and God forbid that he should be called upon to serve in the defence of this country while the back-door of the Department of National Defence is open to a lot of grafting leeches." And I said, "Amen." Many hon. members in all quarters of the house echo "amen" in their hearts in regard to such a situation. The point at issue is this, that a department susceptible to influences made manifest through the negotiations leading up to the execution of this contract, is certainly a department susceptible to influences which led to such ghastly results in 1915.

I am reminded of the statement made in this house by a gentleman who was then the member for Red Deer when he pleaded with the Prime Minister of the day to take suitable action that the gaze of the men in the field would not be turned on the horrors exposed in the public accounts committee of 1915.

I did hope that instead of the undignified performance in this house to-night by the Minister of National Defence, he would, by some guarantee, some frank explanation, by action rather than by blustering rhetoric, assure the people of Canada that there would be no recurrence of the terrible state of affairs which existed in 1915. When hon. gentlemen opposite say that charges should be made beyond those already contained in the commissioner's report, I wonder if our standard is lower than it was in 1915. It is within the memory of members of this house that when the seventh report of the public accounts committee was tabled in 1915 and the motion for concurrence was made a short debate ensued in which Sir Robert Borden and Sir Wilfrid Laurier participated; and the then Prime Minister of Canada rose in his place and made it clear and unmistakable that he would not condone or compromise in any way with any suggestion of irregularity or fraud in war purchases. Although no charges were formulated; although no members had been named up to that time, as far as I am aware, he expressed his grave disapproval of the actions of two well-known members of his party, with the result that they were drummed out of public life.

If one reads the memoirs of Sir Robert Borden it is interesting to note that he made it clear that he would not only refuse to compromise with irregularity in the matter of war purchases but would insist, as in fact he did insist, and so instructed the Minister of Militia and the then Solicitor General, that there should be no dealings with middlemen, brokers and promoters, and that their profits would have to be cut out. And never have his political opponents suggested anything against his personal integrity. On many occasions, acting as Minister of Militia, he did enforce his rulings in that regard.

I trust that the Prime Minister will make available to succeeding generations important documents in regard to which a full disclosure may not be made at this time, in order that the verdict of history may deal fairly with the crises of our day. But I do appeal to him that a definite guarantee be given now, a guarantee which has not yet been given, and that a frank and full explanation be made. All that I ask is a clean deal for men who may have to take arms in defence of the country. But there is no clean, straightforward dealing when we have, as we now have, financial manipulation, bartering with company promoters and lack of faith in established Canadian industries.

I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but the Minister of National Defence suggested in the course of the debate that no one has done more than I have to destroy defence. Surely he did not mean that. I share his pride in highland Scotch ancestry and his pride in the contribution made by the highland Scotch to the upbuilding of this dominion. I am not so certain that I have the same pride after listening to the emotional outbursts which to-night characterized almost his entire speech. I also share with him appreciation of the fine qualities of our French-Canadian compatriots, but if he reads carefully the record of the statements that I have made in this house he will recognize that I have never, at any time, opposed all defence. I could not be disloyal because of the very roots of my existence. I am Canadian-born and the background of all my activities is associated with the development and welfare of this country. I have stated repeatedly that it is the responsibility of any government to provide reasonable defence against external danger, but I did question defence expenditures because of the lack of policy which made it impossible to distinguish between defence and offence. I also questioned the competency of officers because of the definite evidence similar to that which is now disclosed in the commissioner's report, that men in high places disregarded the policies enunciated in, and accepted in good faith by, the House of Commons.

The minister says that there is not even the shadow of political patronage in connection with this contract. May I ask him: If there was no political patronage, why did he take this matter in 1936 out of the hands of the interdepartmental committee set up by the Prime Minister to guarantee the Canadian public against such deals, and practically until 1938 refrain from consultation with that committee with respect to the particular contract which was negotiated? Why did he delay consultation with that committee until he was committed to a contract with the John Inglis Company? What conclusion can we reach after reading the evidence given before the commissioner, when we read of the way in which Major Hahn was introduced to the department under the most favourable political auspices? Major Hahn wanted the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) to accompany him to England because he might be useful, and suggested that his expenses might be paid. These facts appear in the evidence which has been tabled. How can he possibly deny that there is any shadow of political patronage? What evidence has he introduced to refute the statements made on this side that political patronage was the predominating consideration throughout the negotiations prior to 1938? The minister carefully refrained from giving an explanation with regard to the main issue. My respect for the minister would have mounted considerably if he had taken the issues one by one and made a frank statement and explanation.

He said in this house, as on the stand, that he stood for the policy of public manufacture so far as the primary implements of war are concerned. This country was committed at Geneva to the public manufacture of armaments. The Prime Minister has repeatedly assured the house that he intended to pursue such a policy. That is the issue, an issue which the minister made no attempt to discuss. He did not explain why he deviated from the policy of public manufacture. It is true he mentioned the limitation of appropriations made by parliament. He said he had an estimate furnished him that called for $30,000,000 or $35,000,000, and when that was traced to the minutes of the defence council it was found that the estimate related to a group of manufacturing establishments that would meet the entire requirements of all the Canadian forces. The evidence of the chief of general staff and of other senior officers shows that they urged, as the British government urged, for public manufacture in factories operated and controlled by the government. Without an explanation to the public he abandoned only too readily the policy which he enunciated in the house.

No explanation has been given by the minister as to why he deserted the system of competitive bids. He said on the stand that it was the next best alternative to public manufacture. Why, then, did he abandon it when the interdepartmental committee set up by the Prime Minister to protect the public interest urged repeatedly that comparative prices be obtained? He has challenged us from time to time to name firms competent to manufacture Bren guns. Well, the experts on the interdepartmental committee named five or six firms. After a survey made of industrial institutions, government plants, in this country, why did he not seek to avail himself of the machine shops under the control of the government—for example, the machine shop at Prescott equipped for the production of lighthouse instruments, the machine shops of the Canadian National Railways, the equipment already at Valcartier and Lindsay?

And he proceeds to declare, without relation to the evidence, that this contract has saved this country something like a million and a half. It does not require a lawyer or an expert accountant, but just a little common sense, to understand the situation. Consider the evidence given by Gillespie, who has been quoted frequently. Gillespie explained that at Enfield they had two years investigation and testing in cooperation with the factory in Czechoslovakia and when they proceeded to manufacture the component parts of the Bren gun at Enfield they found themselves practically half-way there, because they had the machinery and equipment. I should like to hear the minister explain why, with any established firm as suggested by the interdepartmental committee, it would not be possible to use the equipment they had for working with precision steel, provide them with the equipment that the government had at Valcartier, with reimbursement as promised in the contract by joint arrangement with the British government for new machinery required, and secure deliveries at a much earlier date than possible with the John Inglis Company.

In this connection I am interested in the manner in which the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) skirted round this point in quoting from the evidence. Speaking of the ability of the John Inglis Company to manufacture this Bren gun, as reported on page 720 of Hansard, he quoted from the evidence given by Gillespie. No one questioned Gillespie's competency, but I point out that in reading his evidence it is clear that Gillespie was referring then only to the ability of three engineers, Ainsworth, MacLaghlan and Gazey. He said they were quick on the uptake; sure they were, 100 per cent; but that had nothing to do with the ability of the John Inglis Company to go on with the manufacture, because a few pages further on in the evidence he states that they were making satisfactory progress and perhaps they might be able to make deliveries according to schedule. Why are these matters not dealt with more frankly?

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman desires to quote Gillespie accurately he will read his evidence to the house, because Gillespie said nothing of the sort. He did not say "perhaps" they might; he said they were up to their commitments 100 per cent, and would have no difficulty in producing full results.

Mr. MacNEIL: I read the evidence as reported on page 3105, and I am quite as capable of drawing my own conclusions from the evidence as is the hon. gentleman who has interrupted me. My point is that the portion of the evidence quoted by the hon. member for Parry Sound related to the ability of three engineers now in the employ of the John Inglis Company. But later Mr. Gillespie gave evidence which showed that they were not at that time equipped as my hon. friend desired to give the house to understand when he spoke.

Mr. McGEER: Would the hon. member—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McGEER: On a question of privilege, I ask the hon. member if he will allow me to quote the report on that.

Mr. MacNEIL: Yes.

Mr. McGEER: The record of that is to be found at page 3109 of the evidence.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no question of privilege in that.

Mr. McGEER: I understood that the hon. gentleman said he would grant me the privilege of quoting the record.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman consents I have no objection.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. McGEER: Surely hon. members of the opposition cannot deny me that right.

Some hon. MEMBERS: We are telling you to go ahead.

Mr. McGEER: Mr. Gillespie said:

> I have said before the people who are handling it are quick on the uptake, I think they will be able to produce the work all right. I have no fear in that direction at all.
> Q. No fear in that direction at all?
> A. No, they will work to the program.

There is no "perhaps" about it.

Mr. STEWART: They "will."

Mr. MacNEIL: If the hon. member reads on, he will find that they were not then equipped to proceed with the manufacture of Bren guns. Mr. Gillespie was dealing solely with the ability of three engineers.

Mr. DUPUIS: The hon. gentleman was not equipped to come to this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MacNEIL: The minister has given no adequate explanation with reference to the definite statement of the commissioner that the system of supervising the contracts broke down. The minister said in answer to a question in the house yesterday that he had received reports from the interdepartmental committee and he transmitted those reports to the defence committee of the cabinet. At page 2364 of the evidence he is reported as saying:

> The only report I ever received was from the deputy minister who was chairman of the interdepartmental committee.

And we find him referring definitely to the fact that the minister received reports not from the committee as such but from the deputy minister in relation to the activities of the committee.

I see, Mr. Speaker, it is eleven o'clock.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it is not. Question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Only with unanimous consent.

Mr. MacNEIL: Owing to the interruptions I have been unable to conclude the remarks I intended to make and I ask you to call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member calls it eleven o'clock and wants to speak to-morrow, I cannot prevent his doing that, under the rules of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member adjourns the debate, does he?

Mr. MacNEIL: I desire to conclude my remarks, but it being eleven o'clock—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MacNEIL: —at least I have the privilege of moving the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In regard to to-morrow's business I assume the first order will be to continue the present debate. That will be the first motion called. But Friday is not a very good day on which to take a division of the house on as important a matter as this, and I understand a number of hon. members would much prefer that the debate should be continued on Monday rather than to-morrow. Therefore it would be the government's intention to-morrow, after the hon. member who has just spoken has finished his remarks, to have someone follow and adjourn this debate and then continue with the orders of the day which appear under government orders.

In that connection I should like to ask hon. members whether, provided we get through the government orders before the day is over, they would not permit us to go into committee of supply to take up some of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The only object of asking this is to expedite the business of the house. We can easily adjourn the house if that is preferable to hon. members, but I would point out that so far the government has not been able to take up one single item of business. We have been here over four weeks and all the time has been taken up with private discussions; there has not been one item of government business taken up thus far. I am asking if we might begin to-morrow with supply if we get through the few resolutions which are on the order paper.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to start an argument at this time of night, but the right hon. gentleman says we have not taken up any public business. I consider this the most important business—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I did not say public business, I said government business. I am pointing out that we have now had a month in which private members have practically had control of the house, and the government have had no chance to get on with any of its business. We should like, if we can, to fill out a full day to-morrow, if that is agreeable. We are, however, entirely in the hands of the house.

Mr. MANION: It is understood then that to-morrow, after the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) has finished his remarks, this debate is adjourned until Monday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will be adjourned by the speaker who follows him. What about supply? Is there any objection on the part of hon. members to having supply taken up to-morrow—not more than one item? We need not take the whole day; but what the government would like to do is to run through the order paper, paying attention to those items appearing under government orders. We would not take up the act to amend the Pension Act, but we could take up the other two bills on the order paper. Then we could consider the resolutions which are there, exclusive of the one respecting the defence purchasing board. Then, when we have concluded the resolutions, if time permits we would like to occupy the balance of the day with the committee of supply, Department of Agriculture.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the Prime Minister not rather optimistic in thinking he can get through all those resolutions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may be, but I do not think they are contentious.

Mr. STEVENS: Some of them are.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If they are, of course we shall not get into supply.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think at this stage the Prime Minister should ask that. One or two private members' days have been ruled out already, and the order paper is full. It is becoming a weighty document. And this very matter which is being put off, through no fault of hon. members in this group—we are willing to take a vote to-morrow, as far as that is concerned—

Mr. DUNNING: We wanted one to-night.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am willing to stay here and take it, as far as that goes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CAHAN: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. STEWART: The debate is adjourned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MANION: The house stands adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Friday, February 10, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth) presented the first and second reports of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the reports be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

DEATH OF POPE PIUS XI

EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY OF GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND HIS MAJESTY'S LOYAL OPPOSITION

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and on his behalf, I desire to communicate to the house the contents of a cablegram which was sent this morning by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Ottawa, to His Britannic Majesty's minister, Vatican City. It reads:

Ottawa, February 10, 1939.

Will you kindly convey to His Excellency the Secretary of State of the Holy See the following expression of sympathy of the government of Canada, in the bereavement occasioned the Vatican City and the Roman Catholic church by the death of His Holiness Pope Pius XI.

"The government of Canada desires to associate itself with the governments of other countries in expressing its sense of the loss sustained in the death of His Holiness Pope Pius XI. The profound sorrow felt by members of the Roman Catholic church in all parts of the world will be shared throughout Canada where the devotion of Pope Pius to the spiritual progress of mankind had gained for His Holiness nation-wide admiration and esteem."

To these words of the leader of the nation I desire to add my own personal tribute to the memory of the great pontiff who died yesterday.

In the hours of great crises His Holiness Pius XI has always been a fine model, a powerful personality.

Amidst the disorders generated by war, misery and unemployment, he has preached the crusade of public salvation, defending the family institution, defending order, labour and social peace, fighting all that leads to anarchy, hatred and the domination of blind force. He has consistently defended those who were persecuted and oppressed.

A friend of social progress and modern institutions, he has published pastoral letters and encylicals which are monuments to economic and social reform based on justice, charity and human brotherhood.

He was a great religious leader. He will be remembered as the Pope of Peace, of the poor, and of working men.

I am sure I am reflecting the views of all the members of this house in expressing our sorrow and our deep regret at his demise.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, in the unavoidable absence of the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Manion), I wish to express on his behalf and on behalf of my colleagues and myself, our profound emotion upon learning this morning of the passing from this life of Pope Pius XI. His holiness was a great churchman and a brilliant scholar, who was preeminent in his devotion to the welfare of all classes and conditions of our fellowmen.

As the sovereign pontiff of Vatican City, his influence was ever exerted with the political leaders of all nations for the preservation of peace. As the ecclesiastical head of over 350,000,000 of peoples of all the races of the world, every important movement for the spiritual, moral and social improvement of all classes and conditions of mankind, enlisted his sincere sympathy and his earnest support.

As a prelate of fervent, personal piety and devotion, his compassion was ever extended to the poor, the sick and the afflicted.

As an eminent Christian gentleman, he showed us all an example of steadfast faith and fortitude under physical suffering that continued for several years until there was granted to him a peaceful release late last evening. We unite with all other Christian peoples in our expression of sympathy for all adherents of the Roman Catholic church in their grievous sorrow, and in our gratitude for his personal example of devotion to duty amid the manifold turmoils that have beset this world during recent years.

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT

The house resumed from Thursday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacNeil:

That the agreement between the government and the John Inglis Company, of Toronto, for the manufacture of Bren machine guns, the report of the royal commission dealing with said agreement, and all related documents, evidence, vouchers and exhibits, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stevens.

PRIVILEGE, MR. GARDINER—NEWS ARTICLE IN REGINA LEADER-POST OF FEBRUARY 7

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a news article which appeared in the Regina Leader-Post of February 7, purporting to be an account of my speech delivered in this house as reported in Hansard of February 6. It says in part:

Mr. Gardiner attempted to pour ridicule on a report made by Major General E. C. Ashton, chief of the general staff, for proposing a small arms government factory at Valcartier.

That statement is absolutely false. I pointed out that Major General E. C. Ashton's proposal, made after this government took office, for the purpose of reestablishing defence in Canada, would involve an expenditure of at least $200,000,000. I further indicated that those now attempting to delay this expenditure had opposed even the small estimates of two and three years ago.

I referred to the Ross rifle incident to indicate that even good machinery was not sufficient to guarantee production of Bren guns that would work. You require management, designers, and engineers who know their job. At no time and in no word did I ridicule or attempt to ridicule a report made by Major General E. C. Ashton.

This newspaper report is on a par with most of the misrepresentation which has been peddled to the west regarding discussion of this contract.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR REFERENCE TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I was about to say when the house adjourned last evening that the most disturbing feature of this debate has been the attitude taken by government supporters. We have met with nothing but evasion with respect to the issues presented to parliament by the commissioner. In the hectoring language employed by the minister (Mr. Mackenzie) last evening we recognize the old technique of abusing critics instead of answering criticism. The issues originally stated by the commissioner, and by many members on this side of the house, are still before parliament without any adequate explanation by the government. No criticism could be more destructive of confidence in the defence establishment of this country than the demeanour and words of the minister last evening. He cannot prove to the country that he is right by the threat to knock off heads, although I notice that his unparliamentary language is not reported in Hansard.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) stated last evening that in his opinion it was extraordinary that members on this side of the house did not accept the findings of the royal commission. It is his misapprehension on this point that undermines his argument. We do accept the findings of the commissioner. It is because of those findings that we may legitimately ask for further inquiry into the matter, and direct criticism against government policy.

The commissioner made findings on two points. He found that there was no evidence of personal corruption. We accept that finding and have stated so over and over again in this house. We now marvel that government supporters have laboured this point. They must be uneasy about the transactions reported.

The commissioner also found that there was the necessity to recommend the appointment of a defence purchasing board, to provide for a drastic change in the system of awarding contracts of this nature. We accept that finding, and point to the fact that by such finding he condemned the system now in vogue.

The remainder of his report is mainly a citation of facts of which direct proof was given, and with regard to which he reported there was no dispute. He pointed to the responsibility of parliament to pass judgment based on the evidence, and because of that I moved the motion which is now before the house.

I again direct attention to the main issues at stake. Whatever may be said for or against the contract, in its substance or form, we must concern ourselves, as the commissioner did, with administrative faults and government policies disclosed during the negotiations leading up to the execution of the contract during the period prior to March 31, 1938. The real issue is whether this country should have established public or private manufacture of the primary implements of warfare, and not all the blustering eloquence of the minister can conceal the fact that he has reversed his policy in this regard. In his remarks last evening he condoned the making of profits in the manufacture of armaments for this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MacNEIL: As he shook his fist in this direction and alleged attempts to destroy defence measures, I might remind him now that nothing will wreck defence more certainly than profiteering in war supplies. Nothing will do more to lower the morale of those who may be required to risk their lives in the defence of the country than the knowledge we now have that his department is in alliance with armament racketeers. He has given a plain indication that so far as he is concerned he will make no attempt to establish equality of duty and sacrifice in the event of war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is not correct; that is all.

Mr. MacNEIL: He expressed resentment that this discussion has delayed the plans of the department with regard to deliveries of Bren guns. He omitted to mention that this is the first opportunity we have had to discuss the matter with all the facts before us.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why?

Mr. MacNEIL: The delay of which he complains actually occurred between July, 1936, and March, 1938, when the house was without knowledge of these negotiations, and because of the determination to place this contract to the best political advantage. Members of this house are in no way responsible for the fact that deliveries of the assembled guns will not be made until the latter part of 1940.

I will go a step farther. We will ask the minister in the public accounts committee to confirm or deny the reports that even now the Bren gun is regarded as an obsolescent weapon.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Absolutely incorrect.

Mr. MacNEIL: The British government is continuing production of the Bren gun, but is it not also providing for the production of a still more modern and reliable light machine gun? Technological advance has been rapid in the armament industry during recent years What assurance have we that, by reason of the policies pursued by the minister, we will not be stuck, to use the language of the street, with 7,000 guns as obsolescent in 1941 as the Lewis gun is to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is my hon. friend suggesting for one second that the Bren gun is not a most modern, efficient weapon?

Mr. MacNEIL: That is what we intend to ask.

Mr. DUNNING: And therefore we should do nothing.

Mr. ILSLEY: Because the hon. member intends asking.

Mr. MacNEIL: In the light of our experience with the Ross rifle we intend to ask the minister in the public accounts committee as to the accuracy of these reports.

Mr. YOUNG: Does my hon. friend know of a better gun?

Mr. MacNEIL: The minister's eulogy of Major Hahn will prompt further investigation into the representations made by Major Hahn to the department and the British war office as to his financial stability and his business connections. When he first went to England he was the head not of the John Inglis Company but of the British Canadian Engineering Company. He was not the head of a company worth two million dollars, as the prospectuses issued on behalf of his company at that time would seem to indicate. As far as the evidence shows, no attempt was made to correct the false impressions created within the British war office at the outset of negotiations. He was simply a promoter astute enough to expand a thirty dollar cash consideration into a financial transaction on paper involving $1,400,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Did Colonel Drew write what the hon. member is reading?

Mr. MacNEIL: I am making this statement on my own responsibility. The minister can make his.

The minister gave no answer to our question as to why it was necessary to set up a series of dummy companies, unless to conceal profitable trading in stock issued. The minister knows as well as I do that in the not too distant future those who have participated in this deal will reap a rich reward quite apart from the profits guaranteed by the contract for the manufacture of the Bren gun.

When the minister repeated his statement of a former occasion that this was the finest contract ever made on behalf of the Dominion of Canada he attempted to justify that statement by asserting that it has effected a saving to the country of something like $1,300,000. When we break this figure down in the light of the evidence given by members of the interdepartmental committee, we find that they claim a saving of capital expenditure of something like $551,000 because the British government will pay one-third of the capital investment. We find that another saving is claimed of $864,000 because the John Inglis Company will carry out a complementary order for the British government. According to the evidence the estimated cost of making 7,000 guns would be $5,402,000, and the estimated cost of making 7,000 guns as part of a production of 12,000 guns would be $4,537,000.

I refer again to the evidence which discloses that the British government in the original agreement with the patentee made provision for manufacture in the dominions provided such manufacture would be carried on in government-operated factories. I submit that this same saving, or one even greater, could be achieved under public manufacture. If the British government was willing to invest over half a million dollars in the capital outlay of a private enterprise to secure a secondary source of supply, it is safe to assume that they would be much more willing to extend the same assistance to public enterprise. It follows that we could have made the same saving on capital expenditure in a government-operated factory. If the British government were willing to place an order for 5,000 guns with a private firm, they would have placed the same order with equal alacrity with a government-operated factory. It follows that we could have made the same saving, under public manufacture, on production.

In addition, under public manufacture, this country would have saved the profits allowed to the John Inglis Company under the contract. Whatever may be said about separate contracts, the contract from the British government was negotiated with the aid of the Canadian government. The minister stated, in answer to a question put last session by the then leader of the opposition, that it was not through the good offices of the Canadian government, although it has been clearly proven in evidence that Major Hahn acted, while a potential contractor, as the accredited representative of the Canadian government in respect of the Bren gun deal. As a matter of fact the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) described it as a joint contract. If we are to have such joint contracts, why should we have such hypocrisy about the matter? It is vastly preferable that we should accept orders from the British government for manufacture in government factories than that we should be involved in a profiteering deal such as we are discussing.

I propose to vote against the amendment because I consider it hopeless to continue a satisfactory inquiry into the matter in committee of the whole because of the attitude taken by the government. I can only hope that by persistent endeavour in the public accounts committee the truth about the situation will be made known to the public.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Hear, hear. So do we.

On motion of Mr. Pouliot the debate was adjourned.

NAVAL SERVICE ACT

SANCTION BY PARLIAMENT OF ACTION BY NAVAL FORCES OTHER THAN FOR DEFENCE

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 17, to amend the Naval Service Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Explain.

Mr. MacNEIL: The purpose of this bill is to amend the Naval Service Act to make it conform with the present constitutional status of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is this the same bill as was introduced last year?

Mr. MacNEIL: It is the same bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT

SANCTION BY PARLIAMENT OF PLACING MILITIA ON ACTIVE SERVICE BEYOND CANADA

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 18, to amend the Militia Act.

He said: This is in identically the same terms as the bill I introduced last session.

The purpose of the bill is to amend the Militia Act to make it conform with the present constitutional status of Canada as recognized by the resolutions of the imperial conference, especially in 1926, and by the statute of Westminster, 1931. Its object, further, is to provide that Canada shall not become involved in any war beyond Canada without the sanction of parliament.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

CONSTRUCTION OF WORKS AND PRODUCTION OF ARMAMENTS THROUGH GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 19, to amend the Department of National Defence Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Explain.

Mr. POOLE: The purpose of the bill is to provide that moneys voted by parliament for national defence purposes shall be spent by the government, through its own agencies and under its own control.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT FILM ACTIVITIES—INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE TO CENTRALIZE DISTRIBUTION

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to create a national film board empowered and directed to review and report on government film activities and to discharge such other duties as the governor in council may request; and to authorize the governor in council to appoint, and determine the salary of, a commissioner, to be the chief executive officer of the board. Also to provide for the appointment of an interdepartmental committee to centralize government film distribution.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

RADIO BROADCASTING

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER ANNUAL REPORT AND REVIEW AIMS AND POLICIES OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved:

That a select committee be appointed on radio broadcasting to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies and aims of the corporation and its regulations, revenues, expenditures and development, with power to examine and inquire into the matters and things herein referred to and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, and to send for persons, papers and records; and that the said committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Ahearn, Beaubien, Bertrand (Laurier), Bouchard, Dupuis, Factor, Hamilton, Héon, Howe, Isnor, Johnston (Bow River), Lawson, MacKenzie (Neepawa), MacMillan, Martin, Patterson, Pottier, Ross (Moose Jaw), Slaght, Stevens, Thompson, Turgeon, Woodsworth, and that the presence of at least nine members shall be a quorum of the said committee and that standing order 65 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL VISIT TO CANADA

SUGGESTED STRIKING OF SPECIAL DECORATION FOR DEFENCE FORCES AND EX-SERVICE MEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the government. In view of the fact that a British reigning sovereign has never before been in Canada, and in view of the approaching visit of their majesties this year, will not the government consider the striking of a special decoration, to be awarded to all members of the defence forces of Canada and all ex-service men in Canada?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I suggest that this question be accepted as a notice of motion. The hon. member will receive an answer at the proper time.

CATTLE SHIPMENTS

QUOTA PERMITTED TO ENTER UNITED STATES UNDER TERMS OF TRADE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Is the quota of 60,000 head of cattle per quarter which is allowed to enter the United States under the terms of the new trade agreement exhausted for the first three months of 1939? I should also like to ask if the shipments from Mexico help to make up this quota allowance.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is, yes. The quota ran out towards the end of the month. I believe the statement is somewhat as follows:

United States cattle imports, 700 pounds and over, for the month of January, 1939

	Number	Percentage
Canada	30,246	55 per cent
Mexico	24,769	45 per cent
Total	55,015

It has been the practice of the United States government to give notice of the running out of the quota a few days before the end of the quota is reached. The quota in this instance was 60,000. This notice was given when the number stood at 55,015. But a settlement on the basis of the reduced tariff is made as cattle go in, from that time on, until the number reaches the 60,000 mark. The quota will divide somewhat in the proportions of 55 per cent and 45 per cent.

I might add that there is a provision in the agreement whereby, if quotas work out as this one apparently has, through consultation with the United States government, an arrangement may be made with regard to it in order to make it work as it was intended to work. Officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce and of the Department of Agriculture have already been in Washington, and I believe I can go so far as to say that satisfactory arrangements are in process of being made. An announcement will be made shortly with regard to the whole matter.

Mr. SENN: Was it the intention that Canada should enjoy the whole 60,000 per quarter, or otherwise?

Mr. GARDINER: No. Under the old agreement, the one which existed before, provision was made whereby the quota would be for all the cattle imported into the United States. In practice it worked out that the cattle came from Mexico and Canada, and exactly the same terms are in the present agreement. In this particular year the cattle which were prepared to be sent across the line immediately the agreement came into effect were apparently considerably greater in number in Mexico than in previous years.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO BROADEN SCOPE AND CLARIFY CERTAIN FEATURES OF THE ACT

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—"Drug."

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister give a sort of general résumé of the act, so that as we proceed we may understand the object of the bill?

Mr. POWER: I shall be pleased to do so. In the bill it is proposed to broaden the scope of the Food and Drugs Act. As will be seen in the first section of the bill, the meaning of the word "drug" is enlarged. It is to take in such things as surgical materials, including sutures and bandages sold as sterile, thereby giving some control by the department of the sale of articles of this description which are sometimes found to be non-sterile and therefore dangerous. It is intended also to give control over diagnostic extracts used in detecting food allergy and introduced into the body through abrasions made in the skin. It will affect glandular extracts administered to produce effects upon the body, even when no diseased condition exists, and will apply to household chemicals, including disinfectants such as javelle water, chloride of lime and cockroach powders. To improve the statutory means for protecting the purchasing consumer against injury to health and against deception in food and drug products, authority is sought to deal in greater detail with matters such as packaging and labelling, advertising, adulteration and the use of dangerous materials. It is sought to obtain some control over cosmetics, which have not hitherto been under the control of any department. Certain matters pertaining to imports and exports are also dealt with, in recognition of international trade practice.

If my hon. friend wishes I could perhaps indicate to him some of the deleterious materials which are to be found in cosmetics. Cosmetics comprise creams, depilatories, shaving creams, hair dyes, eyelash and eyebrow dyes, eye preparations, nail preparations, rouges, et cetera. All these have been known to contain substances which are injurious; some have actually caused blindness. Creams may contain harmful or irritating substances such as mercury or carbolic acid. Depilatory creams may also contain sulphides causing skin burns and rashes. Shaving creams are also marketed as depilatories and for softening the beard, and shaving creams sometimes contain injurious substances. Hair dyes are known to contain lead, arsenic, mercury or other injurious substances. I have a long list of substances which might be introduced into cosmetics and cause injury.

I can assure the committee that there is no intention to deprive the fair sex of their inherent right to use any artificial expedient to enhance their natural beauty, but it is intended that they should get a fair break when they purchase articles of that kind, so that at least they may do so with the assurance that some protection is afforded them against illness or injury.

Mr. BARBER: I think the minister will agree that his department has had the full cooperation of the pharmacists throughout this country in regard to legislation which has been brought down in previous years. I believe that this measure also, the greater part of it, will receive the cooperation of that profession. There is a certain section, of which I suggest there might be some amendment to remove possible hardship or misunderstanding as far as the profession is concerned. But I shall reserve my remarks on that until we come to the section.

Mr. MARTIN: This may not be the right time—perhaps I should have done it earlier—to suggest to the minister that this bill should be referred to the banking and commerce committee in order that opportunity to be heard may be afforded to parties who approve the general purport of the bill but would like to offer suggestions based upon their experience in the trade. In my own constituency there is a large company interested in the manufacture of many of the commodities affected by the proposed legislation. While it is their feeling that generally the bill is to be commended, there are some particulars in which their experience and assistance might be of value. If the minister and the committee should not agree with the suggestion that the bill be referred to a standing committee of the house, I shall have at a later stage in the proceedings certain amendments to suggest. But I rise at this time mainly to ask the minister for an opportunity of having this matter referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Why banking and commerce?

Mr. MARTIN: Well, any committee of the house which might have some concern with it—if not banking and commerce, perhaps public accounts, or a special committee.

Mr. POWER: I think I can say frankly that so far as the principle of this bill is concerned we have had the support of the manufacturers of preparations and of the Canadian Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association, which includes them all. But on certain sections of the bill I have had representations which indicate the opinion that the powers sought to be obtained from parliament to make regulations is perhaps too arbitrary. I have no objection to making the greatest possible effort to meet those objections. I propose to introduce an amendment to section 5, subsection (k), which is the one to which objection was taken. We shall come to that subsection in a minute, but perhaps I may have permission to say that under section 5 power is given to the department to make regulations prohibiting the sale or defining the conditions of sale of any substance as a food or drug, or to restrict in like manner its use as an ingredient. It was represented to me, and I think very properly, that this power of regulation would be excessive, and I have been asked to specify that the substances to be covered by these regulations should be qualified by some such word as "deleterious," or their "indiscriminate use" possibly dangerous to the public or prejudicial to health. I think we can work out an amendment along those lines which, if it is not entirely satisfactory to everyone concerned, will at least meet the wishes of this committee.

In reply to my hon. friend who asked that the bill go to a committee, I am at a loss to know to which of the standing committees it could be referred. I doubt whether it would properly come under the jurisdiction of the committee on banking and commerce. With regard to setting up a special committee, it seems to me the committees of the house will be pretty busy this year with others matters, and it would not be desirable to set up a special committee for the purpose of dealing with one or two subsections of a bill which, however important it may be, can hardly be said to be important enough to keep hon. members away from the sittings of the house. Personally I have no objection to its going to a special committee, but I should like to have an expression of opinion from hon. members as to whether they consider it should be so committed. I believe we could go along and make some progress with the bill, and if there is objection to any section or subsection I shall be quite willing to meet hon. members or those on behalf of whom they speak and endeavour to iron out the difficulty. The Canadian Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association did in fact meet the officers of my department yesterday and had some discussion with them. I cannot say that they were satisfied, but I think on most points there was substantial agreement. On the subsection mentioned a moment ago I do not think they agreed, but I am quite willing to hold that over for further discussion.

Mr. BARBER: I do not see any particular reason why the bill should be referred to a special committee if the minister will undertake to make a few minor amendments. As he has mentioned subsection (k), I should like to suggest to him a wording something like this—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POWER: Would my hon. friend wait until we come to that?

Mr. BARBER: The minister referred to that section.

Mr. POWER: I was discussing it only in general terms, in regard to sending it to the committee. We will come to that later.

Mr. GREEN: Will the provision respecting material that may be used for "disinfection in premises" or for the control of vermin cover the disinfection of homes? In Vancouver a few months ago several children died as the result of getting into a house that was being disinfected. Will this amendment give the department any control over disinfectants used for such purposes?

Mr. POWER: We are endeavouring to obtain control of the disinfectant itself, not the manner in which it is applied, that is to say, the precautions which should be adopted when disinfecting is going on, or after disinfection. I would say that would be almost entirely covered by police or municipal regulations. We would control the strength, if I may put it in non-technical terms, of the material; but I doubt whether this federal department could set up guards to prevent people from going into a house that had been disinfected.

Mr. GREEN: But can you say what disinfectant shall or shall not be used for these purposes?

Mr. POWER: I hardly think we could; I do not think we have any authority under the act. The word "drug" here includes any material that may be used for disinfection in premises in which food is manufactured, prepared or kept, or for the control of vermin in such premises. I do not know that we could interefere with the municipal health authorities in their work of disinfecting houses or in the selection of the particular kind of disinfectant which they should use. I am afraid we would not have authority to do that.

Mr. GREEN: Under this section you are taking power to control the material used in premises in which food is kept. Would it not be wise to extend that to cover any premises in which people live?

Mr. POWER: I hardly think we could go that far. This control which we wish to exercise is control over certain insect poisons which in appearance resemble food materials. I think it was in Vancouver that an incident occurred not very long ago in which I believe cockroach powder was mistaken for baking powder, and several fatalities resulted. Some of these insect powders resemble starch, baking powder and flour, and we hope to be able to perhaps give instructions to the manufacturers that they must label these insect powders or colour them so that they will not be dangerous. Ordinary insecticides used in agriculture are controlled by the Agricultural Pests Control Act, but that does not cover the poisons employed in households, restaurants, hotels, food warehouses and factories. Certain poisons used for the destruction of rodents are likewise so dangerous to human beings that they should not be employed except in places where there is no possibility of food being contaminated. That is the object, so far as they are concerned.

Mr. McCANN: How does the minister expect to control the use of these poisons, except through the sale, if they are allowed to be sold?

Mr. POWER: Through the sale only, and of course, as I suggested, we might insist that the manufacturers colour these insecticides so that they will have a different appearance from materials used as food.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—"Medicine", "cosmetic", "manufacture".

Mr. MARTIN: Subsection 1 reads: "Manufacture means manufacture for sale." I do not suppose the intention is that sales to physicians or hospitals should be included. Would it not be better to have this subsection read: "Manufacture means manufacture for sale to the general public"? Any drug may be sold to a physician or hospital, and obviously the purpose of the legislation is to protect the public, rather than those who may be presumed to know the character and chemical content of the commodity sold.

Mr. SLAGHT: Would this subsection prohibit the manufacture of a drug which is being distributed free, the cost of which is being defrayed through philanthropy? I have in mind an instance in which that is being done. I do not propose to mention the drug or the present manufacturers of it, but with the approval of the department this drug has been manufactured for some two and a half years and distributed through physicians only, free in all cases. That has been made possible through the very generous contributions of a philanthropist in Philadelphia, outside this country altogether, and it would seem to me a pity if, perhaps by inadvertence, this amendment should go so far as to make it illegal to continue to manufacture and distribute this product, which in my view, after considerable investigation, has great therapeutic value. The minister may or may not have considered the effect of this subsection in an instance such as I have outlined.

Mr. POWER: Some time ago our attention was directed to the matter to which my hon. friend refers, and we in the department had some doubts as to whether we had any authority over the free distribution of products which were still, so to speak, in their experimental stage. We came to the conclusion that it was doubtful whether we had any authority, but in order to make the matter clear the definition herein contained was introduced, which is not the full dictionary value of "manufacture." Taking the full definition, we probably would cover the point raised by my hon. friend, and in fact would go beyond it. Probably we would go into the private business of physicians who compound their own prescriptions, and incidentally, perhaps, charge something for the medicine which they give the patient as well as for their services as physicians. We felt that it would be too much to ask the department to go into that field; therefore we confined ourselves to the words "manufacture for sale," so that if there is no sale involved we have no jurisdiction over the operation.

The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has suggested that we extend the definition of "manufacture" to cover manufacture for sale to the general public. Many products which are packaged and sold to physicians carry more or less misleading advertising. In most cases the physician has not the laboratory or instruments at his disposal with which to test the claims made for a particular product. I should think that a large number of the medical profession would be ready to give the department the right to check up on some of the claims made for certain materials and substances. It would be extremely difficult to have one rule for the physician and hospital and another for the general public. As I have said, many physicians, particularly those in rural districts, have no means of testing these products. We would be assisting them if we could submit some of these materials to laboratory tests in Ottawa or in other parts of the country. For that reason I regret that I cannot agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I have some doubt as to the definition of "medicine" in subsection (j). It appears to me that if the word "stimulating" were added after the word "restoring" the whole definition would have greater value. The three words now used do not entirely cover the field.

Mr. POWER: I imagine that the word "modifying" would cover "stimulating."

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): "Modifying" seems to suggest modifying downward rather than upward.

Mr. POWER: I have no objection to putting in the word "stimulating" if my hon. friend wants it in, but I do not think it would make any difference. I believe the present definition is broad enough. "Modifying" means to modify either by lessening or by increasing.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I do not think there is any word in the definition which definitely covers the meaning of "stimulating." I make that suggestion.

Mr. MARTIN: Has the minister given consideration to the constitutionality of this whole provision? It will involve some violation of the private property principle of the British North America Act. Has the Department of Justice given consideration to that aspect of it?

Mr. STEVENS: This is only a definition.

Mr. MARTIN: I am just using this section as an opportunity of making a comment. As the minister is anxious to cooperate in the matter, will he allow this paragraph (I) to stand?

Mr. POWER: I have no objection, but I must say to my hon. friend that it will take a lot of argument to convince me that the definition is not a correct one, in view of the purpose sought to be attained by the section.

Mr. HOWDEN: The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) referred to substances which might be distributed gratis to the public. As I understand it, if such a substance should have a deleterious effect or non-desirable content, this department would have no control.

Mr. BAKER: Because it is not sold.

Mr. HOWDEN: Because it is not sold.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps I can answer my hon. friend. Section 31 of the Food and Drugs Act as it now exists reads:

> No person shall distribute, cause or permit to be distributed from door to door or in a public place or on a public highway or through the mail, any sample of any drug: provided that this section shall not prevent manufacturers or wholesale dealers from distributing samples by mail or otherwise in compliance with individual requests for same, or from distributing samples to physicians, veterinary surgeons, dentists, registered nurses, hospitals, or to retail druggists for individual redistribution to adults only.

I do not think that covers the point raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. HOWDEN: If the Food and Drugs Act does not contain a provision for the control of such, shall we say, philanthropic distribution, then I suggest that an amendment should be made to the act.

Mr. POWER: I am afraid that if such an amendment were made we should be accused of endeavouring to obtain jurisdiction over research laboratories and the work of private physicians. After all, many physicians are devoting a great deal of their time in an effort to bring about better conditions in the medical field. The department may not be qualified to pass judgment on a new product manufactured by a laboratory because it may not have been brought to our attention, either here or elsewhere. I can see difficulties in the way of carrying out the suggestion of my hon. friend, but I have no objection to submitting it to the officers of the department. When we return with this bill I can let him know whether it will be possible to meet his wishes.

Mr. HOWDEN: The department now has full control over such substances as may be sold; the department certainly controls the sale of any doubtful substance or one which may be dangerous to the public if consumed, and it seems reasonable that it should have control over distribution without sale. I merely suggest that the department should take authority to control such distribution.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. LANDERYOU: There are provisions in the act to control the sale of many materials used in medicine, but is there any provision in the act, and if not does the minister contemplate putting one in, for control to prevent people from being exploited by exorbitant prices? For instance, it is a matter of common knowledge that aspirin tablets can be made for eight or ten cents a hundred, yet they are retailed at twenty-five cents for a box of twelve; and coloured water is being sold at high prices.

Mr. POWER: I should like to have controlled what has been called the cosmetic racket, where ten or fifteen cents' worth of powder and grease is sold for four or five dollars. But I doubt whether the federal parliament would have authority to fix those prices, and I should hate to have control of the department which fixed the prices of such materials. If for the moment we see to it that there are no substances in food or drugs or other articles of the kind which might be deleterious to human life, I think we shall have gone about as far as we can. I have every sympathy, however, for the plea of my hon. friend.

Mr. LANDERYOU: In other words, the minister is doubtful whether we have the constitutional right to fix prices. In the province of Quebec an act was passed to fix the price of shoe repairs, and I read in the press—I have not studied the evidence—that the legislation has been set aside by a court decision as ultra vires of the provincial government. Just how far does the minister believe we can go in fixing prices in respect of the manufacture and sale of these ingredients?

Mr. POWER: I do not know. I should not be prepared, either now or perhaps at any other time, to give a legal opinion as to the value of the decision given by the courts with respect to shoe repairs and its effect on price-fixing in respect of other articles. I will not go so far as to say whether or not this parliament has authority to fix prices, but I do know that as a matter of public policy, price-fixing is extremely difficult to carry out, and for the moment at least I should not like to undertake it. If we fixed prices of cosmetics we should probably be asked—and the public would have a right to ask it—to fix the prices of nearly everything else. I do not know that I should be prepared to go into the job of fixing the price of sausages and any number of other articles of food which the hon. gentleman might mention. I do not wish to attempt it at the moment, anyway.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Would it be fair to say that the minister would be in favour of regulating prices to prevent such exploitation of the consumer as is taking place in the sale, for example, of cosmetics and many drugs?

Mr. POWER: It rather appeals to me as a theory, but I do not know how it would work out in practice. I have an amendment to paragraph (j) of section 2, which I will ask my colleague to move.

Mr. DUNNING: I move that paragraph (j) be amended by deleting the word "or" in the third line and adding the words "or stimulating" before the word "organic" in the third line of the said section.

Mr. STEVENS: How will it read now?

Mr. POWER: It will read:

(j) "medicine" means any substance or mixture of substances that may be used in restoring, correcting, modifying or stimulating organic functions.

Mr. STEVENS: The amendment does not fit in.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): The proper place for "stimulating" would be after "restoring."

Mr. POWER: We will let the clause stand and I will see that it is drafted to meet the wishes of my hon. friend.

Section stands.

On section 3—Regulations.

Mr. GREEN: Why is the word "net" used in the second last line before "contents"?

Mr. POWER: Because under section 7 (f) of the Food and Drugs Act, they are exempted from the necessity of giving a statement of weight, measure or number on the package or container, packages and contents which are under two ounces. In view of the fact that cosmetics are put up in packages of very small sizes we now intend—we may have some difficulty in achieving it—to insist that the makers of cosmetics give a statement of the weight, measure or number on even the small containers. We are therefore inserting in the bill a provision which will force the manufacturers of cosmetics to do what manufacturers of other articles are compelled to do under the Food and Drugs Act.

An hon. MEMBER: That is so that the lady will know what her lipstick weighs?

Mr. POWER: Exactly—the weight of lipstick on the lips.

Mr. GREEN: The words "net contents" really mean weight, measure and number.

Mr. REID: I hope the minister will give consideration to the size of the lettering required on the container. One almost requires a microscope to read the statement of ingredients, which the manufacturer wants you to skip, on some of these packages.

Mr. POWER: That is true.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Paragraph (b) reads:

(b) respecting the packaging and labelling of any article of food or drug and the design of any such package or label with a view to preventing the public or the purchaser being deceived or misled as to the character, strength, quality or quantity of the article and requiring, notwithstanding anything contained in paragraph (f) of section seven of this act, a declaration of net contents upon any package containing a cosmetic;

I find myself in accord with the section, although I repeat that I should like to have the minister consider the insertion of words which would prevent exploitation in respect of price.

Mr. POWER: I am sorry I cannot do that. But we are doing this—and perhaps this will meet the views which have been energetically expressed by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens). In practice we have been endeavouring to prevent misrepresentation in packaging. That is to say, certain things are sold in large packages on which the contents are properly described, but the packages are only half filled. I believe the term is "slack filling."

Mr. STEVENS: Deceptive.

Mr. POWER: I believe the technical term used in the trade is "slack filling." We have in some cases prevented that. We have made seizures of packages which did not contain a quantity sufficient to fill the box. We are not sure whether we have legal authority to do it, and we are endeavouring by this section to get it.

As to fixing prices, again I am sorry to say that I do not think I can agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I suggest that we could request the manufacturers to print on the package the actual cost of the materials which go into the manufacture of cosmetics and drugs. It would not necessarily mean setting the price, and the people would be protected from exploitation by knowing the actual cost of the ingredients used. As the minister has said, they may throw together a little chalk and some other cheap ingredients and offer them at three or four dollars an ounce. Could not the government insert a provision which would force these exploiters of the consumer to state the actual cost price of the ingredients —not necessarily the cost of their overhead, if they wished to separate the items—which go into the manufactured drug?

Mr. POWER: There is an old rule, caveat emptor. After all, if we by regulation go to the extent of seeing to it that the product is pure and that the quantity is that which is specified on the package, really the responsibility for the price he is going to pay devolves on the purchaser. With every sympathy for the suggestion of my hon. friend, I think if he will allow us to go to-day as far as we are going in this bill, in years to come perhaps we may be able to meet his wishes by amendments to other legislation. I doubt whether an amendment of the Food and Drugs Act alone would be sufficient to bring about such a price regulation as, to be effective, would need to be general.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Does the minister think it is better for the consumer to be deceived or misled as to strength or quality, or deceived or misled as to the actual value of the article he is buying? Which does he think is the more dishonest proceeding?

Mr. POWER: Frankly I would not judge as between standards of morality or honesty. My hon. friend may have standards which differ entirely from mine. My standards might not fit the peculiar puritan mentality of my hon. friend, and his—perhaps—more narrow ones might not fit my wider views of morality and honesty.

Mr. LANDERYOU: That is not what I meant. Why not give this protection as regards both phases? I am not going to say which we should preferentially protect. But here is the point. Many people in Canada to-day have hardly enough money to buy necessary food, clothing and shelter, to say nothing of drugs and other preparations; nevertheless they do it. Millions of dollars are spent on cosmetics by flappers and others.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit a question? What does "flapper" mean?

Mr. LANDERYOU: It is a term which has been given to young girls who use cosmetics and articles of that kind. Not being as expert in these matters as is my hon. friend, it is rather difficult for me to tell him.

Mr. MARTIN: I thank the hon. member for his information.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are usually called "chickens," are they not, Mr. Chairman.

Mrs. BLACK: With all due respect to the minister and to the hon. member who has just spoken, I think I may be allowed to say that I know as much about cosmetics as any man here. I use lipstick when I like it; I do not care how much it weighs, or how little. The hon. member has spoken of flappers and of young people. The girls of to-day, and the same applied even to those of my day, from the time they are old enough to know anything about titivating, want a little powder. In my day we used rice powder, or even corn starch. To-day the girls want a pretty compact; and if I like a compact I do not think about what I am going to get inside of it. Let me give hon. members a practical demonstration. I open my bag, I take out my compact, and I use it as much for the show and the beauty of it as for what it contains. While unfortunately I am not a flapper, I believe the minister can protect us by seeing that we do not use poison,—

Mr. POWER: That is it.

Mrs. BLACK: —as we would if we used preparations containing arsenical ingredients.

An hon. MEMBER: That is the idea of the bill.

Mrs. BLACK: Finally, after giving an example of what is fairly good, I will leave the matter in the hands of the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is a pretty nice box, too.

Mr. LANDERYOU: This is not a question of a difference of opinion about the morals of the business; my contention simply is that we should give the consumers protection as regards price. I again ask the minister to consider the advisability of protecting people against price exploitation. I do not think such action would necessitate the establishment of just prices for sausages or anything else except the items under discussion. Let manufacturers be forced to place on the carton the actual cost of the ingredients.

Mr. WALSH: The hon. member who last spoke used the term "consumer". I am at a loss to understand to whom he refers—whether it be the person who purchases the article and applies it to her face, or the person who might otherwise come in contact with it. Personally I think the minister is going quite far in protecting both parties if he protects against serious danger to the person who uses cosmetics. I am sure that the person who is anxious to use them will be wise enough to see that she gets what she is looking for and is able to pay for it. If she cannot afford a four dollar or three dollar article she will accept a product that costs a dollar and fifty cents. As she grows more accustomed to cosmetics and wealthier in this world's goods, she will protect herself to better advantage when she can afford to go into the higher priced field. I believe that the hon. member's question has been amply answered by the minister, and that sufficient protection is being given under the amendments which have been proposed.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Regulations.

Mr. KENNEDY: Does not the last part of the paragraph refer only to a dominion analyst, and exclude provincial or municipal analysts? Would it not be better to change the wording so as to designate any qualified analyst as a dominion analyst?

Mr. POWER: Our inspectors are comparatively few in number, and it sometimes happens that sampling and other operations, through an unavoidable combination of circumstances, must be carried on during the absence of an inspector. Tentative arrangements have been made from time to time to cover this difficulty, but they have been without statutory authorization. The statute provides that in certain circumstances the inspector shall take certain action, and we wish to enlarge the number of people who may be named as inspectors. There is no question of any new appointments in the department. The change is made so that, if necessary, our officers may be named as inspectors for purposes of prosecutions or making seizures.

Mr. KENNEDY: I agree with that. But the term "dominion analyst" means an employee of the dominion government. It may at some time be necessary for a municipal or provincial employee to act as dominion inspector. Could the wording not be changed to "designating any qualified analyst"?

Mr. POWER: Did the hon. member read the section? That is what it is for.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I can understand what is causing the difficulty of the hon. member. One finds some trouble in understanding the underlined words, in view of what is said earlier in the section. I am not sure that I see the connection. As I read the section it does not seem to be in harmony with the underlined words.

Mr. POWER: We had no authority to name any of our own people as inspectors, until we took it under this act. An inspector means any person duly appointed for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act. It would have been necessary for me to go to the civil service commission and obtain the appointment as inspector of a special man. Under the authority conferred by the bill it will be possible to take any of the qualified officers of the department, and to say, "You are an inspector for this purpose." Otherwise I would have to name a new inspector under the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. STEVENS: That is, any dominion analyst may at any time be authorized to act, under the terms of the act.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We are wondering whether or not this means the minister could select an inspector appointed, for example, by Ontario or Saskatchewan, or an inspector in the employ of some municipality, and whether that inspector could act as a dominion inspector. The wording does not make it clear.

Mr. POWER: I can see that perhaps there would be some administrative difficulties in our appointing as inspectors people named by some other authority. We feel that with the extra authority given to us by the section we will have less trouble than we had before. It is only a technical requirement and is intended to cover cases where an inspector has specific duties to perform under the provisions of the Food and Drugs Act. For instance it would apply to section 9 of the act which has to do with the procuring of samples. In the different cities of the dominion we have what are known as food and drug inspectors. It is their job to procure samples of foods or drugs from persons who may have such articles in their possession for purpose of sale, or exposed for sale. The inspector may procure such articles either by purchase or by seizure. We want to enlarge the field of the inspector so that a dominion analyst, for the purpose of giving evidence in a court, could, if we so desired, be called an inspector. That is all we wish to do under this section of the bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Regulations.

Mr. MARTIN: The minister has given the impression that because of a desire for greater clarity in connection with the section he proposes to let this matter stand.

Mr. POWER: I propose to let paragraph (k) stand.

Mr. MARTIN: With that in view I wish to offer two amendments in respect to the same matter, so that the committee may be given an opportunity to consider which is the more desirable, if indeed either of them is desirable.

Paragraph (k) as it now stands gives the governor in council unlimited powers of prohibition and of determination of conditions of sale, not only of dangerous foods and drugs but also of perfectly harmless ones. I think clearly the intention of the section is to restrict the regulation to harmful substances, and with that in view I would suggest an amendment along these lines:

Prohibiting the sale to the general public or defining the conditions of sale to the general public of any substance dangerous to life as a food or drug, or restricting in like manner its indiscriminate use as an ingredient in the manufacture of food or drug.

After the word "substance" I have suggested the addition of the expression "dangerous to life," the intention being to guarantee the protection of society against substances which may be dangerous to the lives of individuals.

Mr. McCANN: Why not substitute the word "health" instead of "life"?

Mr. MARTIN: With this suggestion before us in writing we can see it in proper perspective. Then, there is the stronger suggestion that after the word "substance" as it appears in paragraph (k) of the section we add the words "injurious to life or health" or, perhaps, the words "the indiscriminate use of which may be dangerous to life or a menace to the public" I suggest that we should have an opportunity to have the proposed amendments before us in writing, together with others which may be suggested, so that we may have a clear perspective of the whole thing.

Mr. POWER: I shall be glad to consider the suggested amendments.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently paragraph (j) provides for the licensing of manufacturers of cosmetics. The explanatory note states that not only are manufacturers to be licensed, but also the sale must be licensed. Which is correct?

Mr. POWER: I do not think it is intended to go so far as to license the sale. The intention at this time is simply to ask the manufacturers of these preparations to take out licences, so that we may have some means of control.

Mr. BARBER: Would that be the same as under the Proprietary and Patent Medicines Act?

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. POWER: We are not going as far as that goes. Under that act I understand they ask for a licence number for each preparation. It is very difficult to do that here, but we want to know who are manufacturing these articles. Then, if we find through our inspectors or otherwise that some of these are dangerous, we have some hold on the manufacturer by telling him that we will not renew his licence another year. These are yearly licences. I do not know that we could license the sales of an individual preparation.

Mr. GREEN: Should not importers be licensed also?

Mr. POWER: We have a section for that in the Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. STEVENS: I quite agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green)—

Mr. POWER: The explanation is bad.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but is it clear that importation is controlled as carefully and fully as manufacturing? Otherwise some of the variety chain stores, which sell a great deal of cosmetics, might import goods which were not properly controlled.

Mr. POWER: Section 10 of the Food and Drugs Act provides that:

Any inspector when authorized thereto by the minister shall have the right to examine any customs entries of imports of food or drugs into Canada and to take samples of any food or drug sought to be imported into Canada and to submit such samples for analysis to a dominion analyst for examination and report.

2. In any case where samples are taken such food or drugs shall not be delivered to the importer or consignee until the dominion analyst has reported upon the samples taken.

3. If he reports that the food or drug is adulterated or misbranded, such food or drug shall not be admitted into Canada for use as a food or drug.

Mr. STEVENS: But that will not cover the matter. Under this clause you are making it mandatory to license the manufacturer. I am not objecting to that. But what the minister has just read is permissive only; an inspector "may" if he wishes—

Mr. POWER: When authorized.

Mr. STEVENS: But there might be a hundred importations which would pass without any inspection at all. The imported article ought to be subjected to just as close regulation as the article made in Canada.

Mr. POWER: Under clause 6, section 10A of the bill provides that:

10A. The department may order that the manufacturer of any article of food or drug shall furnish a declaration in prescribed form asserting that the article in question as manufactured by him has been made in accordance with all requirements of this act and the regulations thereunder, and if importation is sought for any shipment of such article of food or drug, customs entry shall be refused if the shipment invoices and bills of lading are not accompanied by duly certified copies of such declaration.

We take power to ask the importers to give us much the same assurances and guarantees as the Canadian manufacturer is obliged to give. If it is not strong enough I am willing to strengthen it. I agree that we must watch importations just as much as articles of Canadian manufacture. There is no question in my mind as to policy.

Mr. STEVENS: There should be just as exact and mandatory powers. You are going to license, and that licensing will apply to all manufacturers; there will be no escape. But both the clause previously read and this one provide that the department "may" order; it is not mandatory. If the licensing feature is adopted there should be a licence before anyone could clear from the customs or sell an imported article.

Mr. POWER: I am quite willing to let the paragraph stand and consider that feature, because I repeat that we have every intention of making the regulations as drastic for those who import as for those who manufacture. We shall do whatever we can to see that they are subject to exactly the same regulations.

Mr. GREEN: The proposed section 10A provides for a declaration by the manufacturer, but not the importer. So there is no direct control over the importer.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are not on section 10A yet.

Mr. GREEN: But the minister referred to it.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that paragraph (j) stands?

Mr. POWER: Paragraph (k) stands.

Mr. NEILL: Before paragraph (k) stands I wish to call attention to this illustration of what I have so often complained of, the tendency of departments to introduce a bill dealing with some specified change, which is thoroughly discussed and agreed on, and then along about the end to slip in a little clause giving the department power to make regulations under the act, and under these regulations they go to work—wide open—and very often make practically a new act. In some instances it is totally at variance with the act passed. I may give two illustrations. Some years ago we passed an amendment to the shipping act, about as big as a family bible. Two years later I and others were met by indignant vessel owners asking, "What on earth have you done? Here is a regulation which, if we follow it, makes it absolutely impossible to use the boat for the purpose for which we want it," fishing or some other purpose. Then we look the matter up and find that we were not a party to that at all; it was done under this power of putting in regulations.

Another case arose in the last few weeks. Apparently power was taken in connection with this matter of drugs to prohibit the importation of a certain drug. It is administered by the Department of National Revenue. A man wrote to me saying, "I have been taking a certain drug, you know how crippled I used to be." He had some form of arthritis or sciatica, I know he was badly crippled. He tells me, "I have now been able to throw away my crutches. I used to be able to get this preparation in Toronto, but they stopped making it and referred me to a firm in the States. I bought some from them, but it was held up by the customs on the ground that it was prohibited." I made inquiry and the answer was that an exaggerated statement was made about it on the label they called it a "cure," and in the opinion of the official of the department it was not a cure. But the man who took it said it was a cure. It was a case not of saying the stuff was deleterious, but simply that the advertisement on its face said it was a cure, and they objected to that as an exaggerated claim. Now that unhappy man has to go without something that he believes cured him. It may be a case of faith-healing, but he knows that it made him better. A provision like that would never have gone through this house; it was done under a regulation.

Paragraph (k) deals with "sale of any substance as a food or drug." "Any substance"—it might be potatoes. That is going further than the original act. It defines half a dozen things in regard to which regulations may be made, but none so sweeping as this little paragraph.

Then I call attention to another phase. How are we to discover these things? This deals with any substance of food or drug. How is the general public to be advised of it? Ordinarily at least we would have the protection of having it published in the Canada Gazette, and while ordinary people do not read the Canada Gazette perhaps the newspapers would copy it. But under section 3 of the Food and Drugs Act the only obligation to publish regulations made under it in the Canada Gazette is limited to those made under paragraphs (a) and (b). If we are going to do anything so drastic as give the government or the department power to prohibit the sale or define conditions for sale of any substance used as a food or drug, at least it ought to have that much publicity that it would be published in the Canada Gazette. It would require amendment of this paragraph and of section 3 of the original act. Will the minister look into that? Because if it is carried out in the terms of paragraph (k) it will be quite drastic.

Mr. POWER: I have every sympathy with my hon. friend's point. Many a time when I was sitting on the other side of the house I had things to say about the bureaucratic system of passing legislation and then providing by regulation that almost anything could be done. It was for that reason that, when my attention was called to paragraph (k), I agreed to endeavour to meet the wishes of those who might represent that it was too wide. But, by way of excuse or justification, I submit that it would be absolutely impossible to make statutory enactments for everything that might come up under a food and drug act.

Mr. NEILL: I admit that.

Mr. POWER: With the advance of science; with new discoveries in these lines, it would be absolutely impossible—without coming to the house perhaps every six months for amendments—to cover everything. After all, the object of this legislation is to protect the public health. In some instances it is essential that some power and authority rest with the officers of the department in order that they may be able to exercise their function of protecting the public health. I do not know how we could carry on the administrative functions of this department unless we had certain power to make regulations under the statute. It would be impossible. The whole difference between the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and myself is the extent to which the authority given by parliament should go. I do not want any excessive authority, I am sure, but I believe we should have such authority as will enable the officers of the department by regulation to carry into practice what I consider are the wishes of the members of this house.

Mr. NEILL: At any rate the minister would consider publishing the regulations in the Canada Gazette? That would not cost much.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. POWER: I think that is provided for, is it not?

Mr. NEILL: Not under section 3 of the old act. It only says those under paragraphs (a) and (b) must be published; not the others.

Mr. POWER: As a matter of actual practice we have extended it to others, I am informed by my officials, but I see no particular reason why we should not consider publishing in the Canada Gazette all the new regulations; as a matter of fact, I am informed that this is what we do now. I would not, however, object to another amendment providing that all regulations should be so published.

Mr. BARBER: Before paragraph (k) is permitted to stand, when this bill was introduced earlier I suggested that I would present certain amendments. The hon. member for Essex East has presented one amendment which I think came from the same source as mine, and all I wish to do now is submit that these powers should be restricted to the regulation of harmful substances. As the paragraph reads, it undertakes to restrict the use of what might be termed harmless drugs. Bicarbonate of soda or epsom salts might be included, even, and I do not think that is the intention of the department. So I believe, if the first amendment were accepted, it would cover the case.

Mr. POWER: I shall be glad to consider the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. MARTIN: An analysis of the whole act will reveal provisions for prohibiting false and exaggerated claims. Having that in mind I suggest that paragraph (m) be amended to read: "respecting false, exaggerated or misleading claims which may be made for any article of food or any drug." That would be consistent with the general provisions of the act dealing with false and exaggerated claims in connection with any commodity.

Mr. POWER: What is the objection to the present paragraph?

Mr. MARTIN: I do not think it is sufficiently far-reaching, nor do I think it is consistent with the basic provisions of the act.

Mr. POWER: I shall be glad to let paragraph (m) stand also.

Section 5 stands.

On section 6—department may require declaration by manufacturer.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps the hon. member for Kootenay East would prefer to have this stand also.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not want to delay the minister, but there is the point that was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I think if the minister would have a careful examination made of the last four lines of the section, in order to try and harmonize them with the first part of it, it might be helpful.

Mr. POWER: Very well; the section will stand.

Section stands.

On section 7—Offence.

Mr. HAYHURST: Section 32A provides:

> Every person shall be guilty of an offence under this act who advertises any food or drug in a manner which is in any respect misleading or likely to create erroneous impressions regarding its value, composition, merit or safety—

In regard to the composition of a drug or a cosmetic, is there any provision in the act which will protect the public health by requiring that the ingredients entering into a cosmetic, let us say, shall be given on the label?

Mr. POWER: Under the regulations we can require that to be done, but I do not know that we would go to that extent in connection with all cosmetics. In some instances it would be very difficult to have all the ingredients enumerated on the package.

Mr. STEVENS: You prevent the use of injurious ones.

Mr. HAYHURST: You might have the manufacturers mention the injurious ones.

Mr. POWER: We are preventing the use of injurious ingredients altogether, if we can. This is principally to cover advertising by device, which has not been covered so far.

Mr. STEVENS: I think a great deal of discretion should be exercised in administering this section. Sometimes the inspectors, who, after all, are in the position of a judge, arbitrarily interpret the regulation under the very broad wording:

> Every person shall be guilty of an offence under this act who advertises any food or drug in a manner which is in any respect misleading or likely to create erroneous impressions—

That is language which it is almost impossible to define. The courts will interpret this fairly, but very often these matters do not get to the courts. The inspector goes in and says, "This is wrong; cut it out," or "We will not allow you to sell this." And of course a great many of those who handle these commodities do not want to challenge the inspector and fight it out in the courts; they want to conform to the law. Very often the inspectors are a little too arbitrary, shall I say, or too exacting, and a great deal of restraint should be exercised in regard to this discretion.

Mr. POWER: We endeavour to use a great deal of discretion; but my hon. friend will agree that one of the great complaints we have heard in recent years is that advertisers sometimes run wild in the claims they make on behalf of food products and cosmetics, and we must take some authority to regulate that. I quite agree with my hon. friend that a great deal of discretion must be used. After all, advertising is a fair, legitimate commercial business, and we must not interfere too much.

Mr. GREEN: It seems to me that the section goes very far. I would ask the minister to consider whether it would not be better to delete the words "is in any respect" as applied to "misleading." Those words do not appear in the corresponding section 32 of the act.

Mr. POWER: We put them in purposely.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that the three words "in any respect" cover a great deal of ground.

Mr. POWER: I quite agree that you can fool some of the people some of the time, but you cannot fool all of the people all of the time. The intention of the department is to prevent people from being misled by claims which are not warranted, in connection with food or drugs or cosmetics. In order to do that we must have wide authority, but, on the other hand, that authority should be used with discretion. As the hon. member for Kootenay East pointed out, very few of these cases ever reach the stage of prosecution. What happens is that we call in the person or the firm advertising in this way and say: "Look here, you are claiming too much; we think you are trying to fool the people; there is such a thing as playing the game fairly; will you please delete from your advertising such and such a paragraph or such and such words?" We have not had any great difficulty in the matter, but we want to have some kind of stick which we can use in case we need it.

Mr. GREEN: You would still have the stick in the words, "misleading or likely to create erroneous impressions." With the words "in any respect" in the section, it means that a person would be found guilty even if making only the slightest mistake in a description.

Mr. POWER: Does my hon. friend wish this section to stand?

Mr. GREEN: Yes.

Section stands.

Sections 8 and 9 agreed to.

Progress reported.

LOAN OF $750,000,000

TO MEET LOANS OR OBLIGATIONS, TO PURCHASE UNMATURED SECURITIES, AND FOR GENERAL PURPOSES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada, and also for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada, and for public works and general purposes.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, this is an extremely important motion. It is not extraordinary in its form, and I want it understood clearly that I am not rising to find any particular fault with the manner of its introduction or with its form. The resolution is quite a normal one for this sort of thing. We are being asked to give the Minister of Finance absolute authority to borrow and use $750,000,000 for the purposes indicated. I have no doubt that when we come to the committee stage the minister will outline in detail the purposes for which he intends to use these large sums. My purpose in rising is to draw attention in a broad and general way to the principles which have governed our dealings with matters of this kind, and to invite the discussion of hon. members thereon. I should like to ask the house to consider with me a few questions. I shall express my views in regard to these questions as I proceed.

First, what is the policy of the government in respect to government financing? When I say "government" I am not using the term in any critical sense. I might just as well have asked, what is the policy of Canada? Much the same sort of policy which the minister will perhaps follow in dealing with this matter has been followed by previous governments. In common with other countries, during the past few years we have passed through a period of transition. We are to-day operating under an entirely different economic structure from what we were fifteen, twenty or twenty-five years ago. The control of finance to-day is different from what it was before. This change has been a gradual and evolutionary process, but it has been very real. I think one of the things we must do to-day is to try to adapt our present modern economic, and particularly our financial machinery, to the needs of the times.

At this point let me say that I am not inclined to share the views of some that the financial machine—I could refer also to the economic machine, but we are speaking of finances—of to-day is outmoded, or that we have not a good machine or a good system. I am inclined to the view that we have an excellent financial machine, that is, the banks, trust companies, loan companies and the various other methods by which it operates. But I have some doubt whether that machine is geared to modern needs. That is something which we ought to consider very carefully. So I ask the question: What is the policy of the government in respect to government financing?

I shall pause here and ask three questions. Are we going to New York for this money? Are we going to seek to raise these finances within Canada by domestic loans? Are we going to seek this money in the London market? These are the three possible markets where finances can be secured. In regard to the first method, I think we ought to ask ourselves this: If it is contemplated to raise these finances in New York, is this the wisest course? I am quite aware that it may be suggested that by merely mentioning these matters we are endangering the credit of Canada, but I do not think so. There is no such intention. I want to ask this question in a rather searching way, but I ask it with a perfectly clear mind, with no prejudices, and without reflection upon anyone: In view of economic conditions prevalent to-day, is it wise to go to New York for this money? Then we should ask this question: What is our present indebtedness to the United States? I am not going into a great deal of detail.

Mr. DUNNING: If I am not answering my hon. friend at this stage I hope he will remind me when we get into committee, because I shall be glad to give him that information.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, I am mentioning it now to give the minister an opportunity when we come to the committee stage to deal with these questions more in detail.

I ask, what is our present indebtedness to the United States? I have not analysed the public accounts so as to give it from a dominion government standpoint; but taking it from the broad, general, national standpoint, we owe to the United States in the way of bonded indebtedness or high-class securities, government, private and corporate, roughly speaking, about four and a half billion dollars, and that has been substantially the amount for the last ten years. In some years it has varied somewhat; for instance, there is a slight diminution this year, which should not amount to much more than twenty or thirty million dollars.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend must not forget to qualify that figure by Canadian investments in the United States. That is a very important qualification.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course, there is a substantial investment by Canadians in the United States; nevertheless the fact remains that we have a substantial mortgage indebtedness to the United States, particularly in public and semi-public financing, such as dominion, provincial and municipal, also public utilities, and especially large power corporations, and pulp and paper company securities.

I am under the impression—I am not going to dogmatize—that as a going concern Canada has borrowed from the United States just about as much as she ought to borrow, having in mind the trade relations between the two countries.

Mr. DUNNING: I agree entirely.

Mr. STEVENS: I think that is a fair statement.

Mr. DUNNING: Not speaking governmentally, but as a people, on all accounts.

Mr. STEVENS: I am speaking simply as a Canadian, not in a political sense.

How are we going to repay the United States or repay any other creditor? We must repay—and I am sure my hon. friends opposite will welcome this statement—our debt with goods. That, I think, is almost platitudinous. Nevertheless it is a vital statement when we are faced with this particular problem. Over a long period of about fifty years—I think we should take a fairly long view in these matters—I found, when I checked it up some time ago, that we had an adverse balance of trade with the United States, limiting the term to trade in commodities, amounting to about two hundred million dollars a year. That has been a pretty definite trend. While in recent years there have been fluctuations, the adverse balance remained very steady for a great many years. Of course, during the years when the adverse balance was steady year after year, those were periods when we were borrowing most heavily from the United States, and of course the amounts we borrowed were reflected in imports. But that having been the trend year after year for some fifty or sixty or seventy years, I believe that we have come to the time when we ought carefully to analyse and review the economic relations of Canada and the United States, and certainly before we make any new extensive borrowings there.

But in addition to trade balances, in addition to the interest on the four and a half billion dollars that we owe to the United States, and repayments of principal on that capital, because year after year a portion of the capital must be repaid, we have certain services such as insurance, because a large number of our people have policies in the Metropolitan Life, the Travelers Insurance Company, the Guarantee Company, and so on, large insurance companies with head offices in the United States but doing business in Canada, and the Canadian premiums flow over to the United States. Of course, there is a reserve held in Canada and all that sort of thing; nevertheless this service constitutes an indebtedness to the United States which must be recognized. On the other hand, of course, there are certain imports, shall I say, of credits, such as the purchase of United States securities by Canadians, services by Canadians to Americans, and some insurance which may flow from the United States to Canada.

But, if we take it by and large, there is no doubt that the United States is a very heavy creditor of Canada, and our exports of goods have not in my opinion anything like kept pace with the requirements of meeting these other obligations. Therefore I am convinced that we ought to approach the United States authorities very frankly; for I suppose we are their most cherished debtor and the best trader they have, except on occasion Great Britain; but undoubtedly we are a good customer and a good debtor of the United States. We have paid our debts and are looked upon as a pretty safe investment. So the United States as a nation ought to be definitely interested in Canada, and we should discuss with them our situation with a view to enabling us so far as possible to pay our indebtedness to them through the export of goods.

I go a step further and come to the next question. How are we going to raise this $750,000,000 in Canada? Is that the program or policy? I am going to say something in respect to that which I have hesitated to say for the last couple of years. It has been on my mind to say it, but I have hesitated because one may be misunderstood, yet it is something that I think ought to be said.

If we are thinking of raising this sum or any large portion of by domestic loan in Canada we ought to pause and ask ourselves definitely, and ascertain exactly, what effect upon our economic structure raising these domestic loans in Canada has had in the past, and what is likely to be the effect if we raise this proposed issue in Canada at this time.

Let me give the house a few figures which are easily grasped and yet they are to me among the most vital factors that ought to be studied to-day in connection with our economic life. In 1926—I take that year as the one commonly accepted by economists to-day as the zero or standard year for economic tables—the banks of Canada held dominion and provincial government loans of $324,000,000; in 1931, the amount was $396,000,000—virtually no increase, or a very slight one. But in 1936 the banks held dominion and provincial government loans of $1,097,000,000, and in 1938 the banks held dominion and provincial government loans, together with treasury bills, amounting to $1,287,000,000. I pause there to point out that there was a jump between 1931 and 1936 of about $700,000,000, and that was the period in which we floated a domestic loan of $600,000,000, around 1932 or 1933—I am not sure of the exact date. That domestic loan in Canada is reflected largely, I think, in the amount held by the banks, because when we float these loans in Canada it is very necessary, as I believe the minister will agree, for him to ensure their success, and this is done now by the Bank of Canada, and formerly through the finance department, ensuring that the banks and insurance, loan and trust companies will absorb the issue, whatever it may be.

Mr. DUNNING: I would not accept that fully. It requires qualification.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not going to quarrel over that to-day; but generally speaking, whoever issues the loan, the finance department or the Bank of Canada, must have received assurances that the loan will go over, and you can only get that assurance by the banks and others more or less undertaking that they will absorb the issue.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEVENS: My language may be unfortunate, but I think I am not very far out. Anyway we shall not quarrel about that point. Let us come back to the facts.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps, in order to avoid a possible wrong impression, my hon. friend would permit me just one word on that point. In connection with a popular issue through the Bank of Canada to-day and for some time past, dealers all over Canada become the purchasers. What you might call institutional purchasing is a relatively small proportion of the whole. But, if my hon. friend will permit me to say so, he is right in a different way. Undoubtedly a great many purchasers of bonds finance their purchases by arranging for a part of the sum of money required by way of a loan from a bank or trust company. But the banks themselves cannot give us any assurances at all—

Mr. STEVENS: No; I said "banks, insurance companies, trust and loan companies;" I should have added, of course, brokers. In any case the figures show that the banks were a tremendous factor, because the amount of the banks' holdings of dominion and provincial loans between 1931 and 1936 jumped $700,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. STEVENS: Let us turn to the other side of the picture. In giving the next set of figures I want the house to remember that this is the vital, day-to-day business of Canada to which I am about to refer. In 1926 commercial loans by the banks amounted to $983,000,000. In 1931 they were $1,141,000,000. In 1936—and remember the jump on the other side, from $396,000,000 to $1,097,000,000—commercial loans had dropped to $707,000,000; and in 1938 the figure, as I have it here, was $731,000,000. I think that is of about October, and represents a fair average of the year. They were up a little at the end of December and January.

Mr. DUNNING: Rising.

Mr. STEVENS: But for my purposes these figures may stand. They are accurate, although they may not be right up to the minute.

What does this mean? It means that to-day or in the latter part of 1938 loans by our banks to commercial institutions were $250,000,000 less than in 1926, or about thirteen years ago.

Let me make it abundantly clear that I am not now reflecting on the banks. I believe that as sound, careful, well administered institutions they are as good as any banking system in the world. Not for one moment should we disregard that fact. But what I ask myself is, have we as a country followed a financial policy or practice which is permitting the banking and other financial institutions of this country to function so as to maintain a maximum of service to the commercial interests of Canada? I confess that three years ago, the first time I got these figures out, I was quite startled. I have studied them ever since.

Mr. DUNNING: They were much worse then.

Mr. STEVENS: No, they were not.

Mr. DUNNING: Between 1931 and 1936 there was a very considerable drop, and then a rise again.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; well, the rise is not very marked.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not big.

Mr. STEVENS: I ask my hon. friends—keeping in mind the object I have, to see whether the financial credit structure is functioning to-day so as to give a maximum of service to commerce—whether these figures are not startling. Let me make it abundantly clear that I am not criticizing the banks, because I believe that we as a country, whether we did it consciously or not, have pressed on the banks our government securities, and I am firmly convinced that to-day the banks are holding too large a quantity of dominion and provincial government securities—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: —for somewhere around October or November last, the figure, I believe, was $1,087,000,000. It is not very much different to-day. Some say that this means a liquid condition of the banks. It does not mean anything of the kind, because we know, if the banks undertook to sell, that is to liquidate, any substantial proportion of the bonds they hold, they would break the bond market.

Mr. DUNNING: The liquidity does not, of course, arise from that fact.

Mr. STEVENS: Very good. The Minister may argue that the banks may come to the Bank of Canada, deposit bonds and secure currency for them. As a matter of fact, I have other figures, not under my hand, but I can give them from memory. They show this startling situation. I have been told that there was no shortage of funds for commercial loans. That is the assurance we were given. It is further stated that there is no need for the issue in Canada of a larger amount of currency in the hands of the public. That statement is commonly made. All right. I view these facts which I have just given. Then I view this fact, that the circulation of currency in the hands of the public in Great Britain amounts to about $41 per capita; in the United States, to about $42 per capita; in Australia, to about $40 per capita—in all instances the amounts are translated into dollars—but in Canada over the same period it amounts to less than $22 per capita. I ask myself this question. Here are three countries, similar to ours in their economic structure and their financial system; yet each of them has in the hands of the public about twice as much as the per capita amount in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: But do not Canadians use commercial bank notes as part of their currency?

Mr. STEVENS: Does my hon. friend mean cheques?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I mean notes of the commercial banks.

Mr. STEVENS: That is included.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is it?

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, yes. Those are figures I worked out, through the bureau of statistics, of the currency of all kinds in the hands of the public.

Mr. DUNNING: All forms of authorized currency.

Mr. STEVENS: In the compilation which I have in my room—it is quite an elaborate sheet—we relate exactly the same conditions and the same type and form of circulation in the four countries I have mentioned. I am not prepared to say that it is right or wrong, but I do say that the factor I have mentioned, of the paucity of bank credits to commerce and the heavy holding of government bonds, provincial and dominion, by the banks, plus the other factor of the low per capita circulation of currency in the hands of the public, challenge the study and attention of the best minds in this country, because my own feeling is that there is something definitely wrong.

Let me go one step farther. I go over the affairs of Canada and ask myself: What is wrong? This is perhaps platitudinous, but I must repeat it: We have a great country, one with marvellous resources. We have man power; we have brains; we have machinery, and we have a financial structure second to none. We have everything which ought to make a great and prosperous country, but it is not functioning. There is something wrong.

I believe my hon. friends to the left have a certain foundation for their theories which is perhaps worthy of thought and consideration. I tell them frankly, as I have told Major Douglas, Mr. Aberhart and other leaders in the movement, that I cannot understand the application and the working out of their theories. I do not make that observation offensively. But there is this to say, that obviously the burden of debt, the high rates of interest and the paucity of purchasing power in the public, are factors which are vitally affecting Canada to-day, factors which my hon. friends constantly emphasize and which form the basis upon which they erect their theories of credit.

I am not prepared in any dogmatic way to say what ought to be done, but I do say now to the minister. to the government and to parliament—

Mr. LANDERYOU: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to finish this statement. I do say to the minister and to the house that at this time, when we are facing the borrowing of this $750,000,000, we ought to give careful study to the factors to which I have referred. Now, the hon. member had a question, although I have not yet completed my observations.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Has the hon. member any concrete proposals to offer as a substitute for the principles we have stated definitely in the house?

Mr. STEVENS: I will say this to the hon. member—and in saying it I do not wish to appear rude either to him or to the minister —that I have some ideas. I doubt very much, however, whether it is worth while giving expression to them here.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I think it is.

Mr. STEVENS: What I am about to say may sound a little vainglorious, but may I put it in this way: If to-morrow I were in the position of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), I know certain steps I would take which I believe would be helpful.

An hon. MEMBER: Let us have them.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not prepared to give them at the present time.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I was interested in the hon. member's statement with reference to the different amounts of money in circulation in the different countries. Is the velocity of turn-over relatively the same in those countries, or is it higher in Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: That is a tough one.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, it is a tough one. The question of velocity is perhaps one of the most intricate of all questions in connection with credit and monetary matters. May I point out that the velocity in Canada has varied in the last ten years from seventeen to twenty-six times. I think at present it stands at about twenty-two, or in that neighbourhood. But, so far as I am able to ascertain, the velocity is not very much different in any of the four countries to which I have referred, although I would be inclined to say that in all probability the velocity in Great Britain would be greater than elsewhere. In the eastern states it would be greater than in the western states. But if we take the United States as a whole, the velocity there would not be much, if any, greater than in Canada. But if it were greater it would only emphasize the differentiation to which I have referred.

I wish to turn more directly to the resolution which calls for the raising of the very large sum of $750,000,000. I find that the funded debt of Canada is, in round figures, $3,252,000,000. The maturing bonds in the next year or year and a half, so far as I can learn from the public accounts, stand at about $425,000,000. Then there are treasury bills amounting to $150,000,000. These two items call for about $575,000,000, which leaves $175,000,000 out of the $750,000,000.

When we come to the committee stage I should like the minister to be prepared to answer this question: What is this additional sum to be used for? We find reference in the resolution to "public works and general purposes." Perhaps I am now getting out of the realm of wholly impartial economic discussion and approaching that of political—

An hon. MEMBER: Politics.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, politics, if the hon. member likes that word. I am wondering whether or not in the closing session of this parliament we are going to be treated to very rich supplementary estimates, and whether in this authority to borrow $750,000,000 we are providing the minister with a mighty handsome election fund.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is it a hope or a fear?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member for Kootenay East does not mean that.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, I am just a little concerned.

Mr. DUNNING: Not in relation to this matter.

Mr. STEVENS: I have noticed the words "general purposes" and have studied them with care. I have a high appreciation of the wonderful virtues of the Minister of Finance, and of his transparent honesty. But when I see the expression "general purposes" mixed in with a sum of around $175,000,000—

Mr. DUNNING: But this is not the authority, and the hon. member knows that. The authority must be specific.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, no, not so specific. Of course, we shall see when the bill comes. I have the act, and I shall read it. I do not wish the minister to misunderstand me, because what I am saying is not said by way of carping criticism. I believe we must look at these things seriously. The resolution refers to "public works and general purposes," and also "The Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931," which I have in my hand. Section 13 of that act, the authority under which the minister is asking power to borrow, and the authority which will govern, reads:

(1) The governor in council may, from time to time, as the interests of the public service require, change the form of any part of the then existing funded debt of Canada, including any securities for which Canada is liable, by substituting one class of the securities aforesaid for another, if neither the capital of the debt, nor the annual charge for interest is thereby increased.

That is, the minister may refund or manipulate so as to get a lower rate of interest—a perfectly proper procedure. Then, the section states:

Provided that in any case where securities bearing a lower rate of interest are substituted for securities bearing a higher rate of interest, the amount of the capital may be increased by an amount not exceeding the difference between the then present value of the security bearing the higher rate of interest and that of the security substituted for it.

That, of course, is perfectly clear and one of the provisions which no doubt the minister has in mind. Then follows the subsection stating that no substitution shall be made, and so on. Then we find this, under section 14:

(1) The governor in council may, from time to time, as the exigencies of the public service require, in the event of the consolidated revenue fund being at any time insufficient to meet the charges placed thereon by law, direct the proper officer to raise, by temporary loans chargeable on the said fund, or by the issue and sale or pledge of securities, in such manner and form, in such amounts, for such periods, and at such rates of interest, as the governor in council directs, such sums as are necessary to enable the said fund to met such charges.

That is a wide open power. Of course, the matter has to be reported to parliament; I do not question that fact. What I say is that in this resolution we are giving the minister very wide power. The reason why I emphasize this now is that he may favour the house, or the committee when we reach that stage, with as full a declaration as possible of the distribution of these funds when they are borrowed.

With no intention of delaying the house, I feel that we should pause before this resolution is passed and give consideration to the broad question of the policy of this country in connection with its finances, and I see no better place to do it than here. When we come to the budget discussion there will be all kinds of, shall I say, political prejudice, which will influence the debate. But there is no reason why we should not under this resolution consider carefully the policy of Canada and the general principles upon which we shall authorize the government to carry on this very large financing measure.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): It was my intention to be prepared, and I am prepared with respect to almost all, if not all, of the matters mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), to give information to the house in the committee stage. I think it would be more convenient for hon. members as well as for myself if we could take questions and answers in that institution of the house which is adapted for that purpose, rather than have a general exposition by myself just now, interrupted as I know it would be by requests for information; it would be easier, I believe, for everyone concerned to deal with that in committee. I have only this general observation to make. I know the hon. member for Kootenay East did not wish to convey the impression that this resolution precedes legislation of a new kind, or represents any departure in method of using the machinery we have for taking care of financing the needs of the country in so far as those needs require to be met by borrowing.

Mr. STEVENS: I said so.

Mr. DUNNING: My friend said so quite plainly, but one or two of the questions might have raised implications of a different kind. The Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act is our general controlling financial statute. It is the statute which places upon the government and the Minister of Finance precise limitations as to the exercise of the financial functions of government. Then parliament itself from session to session decides by individual vote in the estimates precisely what sums of money shall be spent. So what we are here deciding is not that $750,000,000 shall be spent; we are here deciding upon the method of raising $750,000,000. In other words, this is not a voting of expenditure, but the provision of means whereby the expenditures authorized by parliament at various times may be met whenever the necessity arises to borrow. I wanted to clear the air to that extent.

With respect to all the matters of detail mentioned by my hon. friend, I would appreciate it if hon. members interested in them would permit me to answer them in committee. I have all the information before me. It would help materially. There is no intention on my part to avoid discussion—quite the reverse—with respect to what ought to be from time to time the financial policy of the country. Indeed I make, with some trepidation, a suggestion, speaking now with respect to financial methods and what we should do from time to time in that regard. The hon. member for Kootenay East mentioned various matters which he said we as a parliament should examine carefully and endeavour to decide as matters of policy. Nearly all the matters to which my hon. friend made reference are of necessity under continuous study and examination, not only by the officers of the Department of Finance, but particularly by the officers of the Bank of Canada. The suggestion I thought of making is that it might be a good idea to give the officers of the Bank of Canada opportunity to appear, say before the banking and commerce committee, not for the purpose of the kind of discussion which might create impressions detrimental to our credit abroad, but for the purpose mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay East. In that way his suggestion with respect to the desirability of wider public information as to financial methods—I prefer to use the term "methods" rather than "policy," although it is difficult to decide where method ends and policy begins—might be met without detriment to the best interests of Canada. I make that suggestion without having consulted the governor of the bank; it may be that he would not care to do it, but after all he, like myself, is a servant of the public and I am sure would take the same attitude. While the governor or his officers would have to be allowed discretion with respect to giving certain kinds of information the giving of which might be prejudicial to the interests of the country, I am convinced that if that could be done the understanding by hon. members of this house of financial operations connected with the government of Canada, as well as the much broader aspect of general economics of the country in relation to government finance, might be much improved. I say that with no reflection upon anyone, but just throw out the suggestion.

Meantime, with regard to this authority, I would say before we get into committee that our funded debt maturities, irrespective of any new money which may be required to meet expenditures authorized by parliament, and including issues which are callable prior to 1940, which of course we must take into account in order to be able to substitute securities bearing a lower interest rate if there is opportunity to do so, down to December 31, 1940, amount to $649,000,000. In addition we have $155,000,000 of treasury bills outstanding at the present time, so it will be seen that this $750,000,000 will not provide an election fund—my hon. friend was not serious about that, I know—because, in fact, the total maturing and callable securities prior to December 31 of next year amount to $804,000,000.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. HARRIS: Would the election fund make up the difference?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid the election fund which would be arrived at by that method would be a debit instead of a credit. I shall be glad to give detailed information regarding any bond issue or any aspect of the matter when we reach the committee stage. I do not suppose I can get the bill introduced tonight, but there will be two other opportunities for discussion, on second reading and in committee of the whole, which is virtually the same as being in committee of the whole on the resolution.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): I had intended asking the minister a question which is important to me because I intend to speak on this matter before we get into committee. Would the minister, in the short time left before six o'clock, break down the $750,000,000 and give me a rough estimate of the amount of money that will be used internally and the amount to be raised externally to meet these obligations? I will put it in this way: What portion of this amount can be met internally, with Canadian funds?

Mr. DUNNING: That is just why we have the committee stage, Mr. Speaker; there is a great deal of information of that kind that I may give, and one question will lead to another. I never evade a question, as my hon. friend well knows—

Mr. LANDERYOU: I am not suggesting that; but I intended to speak on the resolution.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member may ask his question immediately the chairman takes the chair.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I really intended to speak on this resolution before we went into committee, but since it is five minutes to six I would ask that it be called six o'clock.

Mr. DUNNING: Surely we can get into committee of the whole.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not six o'clock yet. The hon. gentleman may speak.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Perhaps I am wrong, but I had the understanding that it was impossible to enter into a general discussion of the principle in committee of the whole.

Mr. DUNNING: No; that is just what we are there for. My hon. friend is quite wrong. There will be no possible limitation of his right to speak merely because we are in committee on the resolution. The reason for getting into committee is to permit the question and answer method. That is all.

Mr. CAHAN: In committee he may speak as frequently as he wishes.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: Now, if my hon. friend will ask his question again, I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I wanted to have a break-down of this $750,000,000 in order to ascertain what portion of it can be met in Canadian currency.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will forgive me if I say his question is not really intelligible. If he means what portion of the maturing indebtedness of Canada which this authority is sought to meet, at least in part, is due in terms of Canadian funds, what portion is due and payable in terms of United States funds, and what portion in terms of British funds, I have that information.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The resolution reads:

—seven hundred and fifty million dollars for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada, and also for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada, and for public works and general purposes.

I want to know what portion of this can be met in Canadian funds. For instance, if the obligations can be met in United States and Canadian funds, I want to know what portion of this $750,000,000 can be met in Canadian funds.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot say what portion can be met in Canadian funds; that will depend upon the financial condition of the treasury from time to time during the period we are operating under this authority. But I can tell my hon. friend what amounts are due in United States, Canadian and British currency, during the period between now and December 31, 1940. In London we have no issues within that period which fall due for payment; but we have two issues in connection with which we have the right to call the outstanding bonds, by the terms thereof. If we decided to call we would have $137,000,000 plus $93,000,000, in round figures, to meet in London in terms of British funds. During the period in question we have no maturities in United States funds and none callable in terms of United States funds. So, with the exception of $137,000,000 plus $93,000,000, the balance of $649,000,000 is due in Canadian funds, roughly about $400,000,000 in Canada, and over $200,000,000 in London if we exercise the call privilege with respect to those securities. In addition, of course, there is $155,000,000 of treasury bills, which are wholly within Canada. These are three months bills, in connection with which I follow the practice of calling for tenders each three months and thus renewing, if you like to use that term, the obligation in terms of Canadian funds.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at six o'clock.

Monday, February 13, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 20, respecting Central Finance Corporation and to change its name to Household Finance Corporation of Canada.—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City).

Bill No. 21, respecting Industrial Loan and Finance Corporation.—Mr. Vien.

DEATH OF POPE PIUS XI

LETTER FROM THE APOSTOLIC DELEGATE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, February 11th, 1939.

Hon. Pierre Casgrain,
Speaker of the House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker,

The official commemoration of the August Pontiff Pius XI, made in your honourable House of Commons on Friday the 10th instant, was an eloquent tribute to the memory of the great Head of the Catholic church and generous and indefatigable Protector of suffering humanity.

I wish to offer my deep and heartfelt thanks for this expression of sympathy on the part of the House over which you so worthily preside. I am sure that it will be appreciated at its true value by the noble Canadian people.

Deeply appreciative of the call you were so kind as to make at this legation, I beg you to receive, Mr. Speaker, the expression of my best sentiments.

(Signed) Hildebrando Antoniutti,
Apostolic Delegate.

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT

The house resumed from Friday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacNeil:

That the agreement between the government and the John Inglis Company, of Toronto, for the manufacture of Bren machine guns, the report of the royal commission dealing with said agreement, and all related documents, evidence, vouchers and exhibits, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stevens.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, to say a few more words about the Bren gun contract required inspiration, so I went home and spent yesterday in that loveliest spot in all Canada, at Rivière du Loup. I met there scores of good Liberals, and they asked me to convey a message of kind remembrance and best wishes to our revered chief, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and also to our beloved Quebec leader (Mr. Lapointe), who is celebrating to-day the thirty-fifth anniversary of his entrance into parliament.

There is nothing so interesting, Mr. Speaker, as to talk with good old Canadians who are full of wisdom, well informed on Canadian problems, and who follow politics very closely. A few of them asked me this question: How is it that Judge Davis during the first thirty sittings of the Bren gun probe was so suspicious of the Plaxton family and so hard on General LaFleche, and then afterwards seemed to change his mind, and declared that there had been nothing corrupt in the Bren gun matter, and that he could blame no official of the Department of National Defence for corruption? I find the answer in the official report of the thirty-second day, November 8. I quote from page 4039:

The Commissioner: ..... My feelings are really not in connection with the details at all. The picture is so changed. However—that is a matter for argument.

What I am very much surprised at is that learned counsel who appeared for the different parties at the probe did not call earlier for the evidence of one man who was responsible for the drafting not only of the Canadian contract but also of the British contract. At page 3948 the commissioner said:

I do not know yet, from the evidence, who was the solicitor really acting for the government, the Department of National Defence.

That was left in the shade, probably because every counsel was afraid of the kind of evidence which was to be given by the one who is not a judge or an advocate or a general, but who is the judge advocate general.

[Mr. Speaker.]

At page 800 of Hansard of February 9 the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) said this:

Then there is another young officer, with whom I am not acquainted, Colonel Orde, judge-advocate general of the Department of National Defence, who was called upon without any expert assistance to draft a very important contract.

Then, speaking for himself:

I have drawn more contracts dealing with munitions than almost any number of other lawyers in Canada.

And then:

But I had the good fortune, having so insisted, to have at my elbow some of the best expert advice, and to that expert advice is due the fact that those tens of millions of dollars worth of contracts, although some of them appeared in the courts, were never seriously brought into issue in the courts. Therefore I know something of the position of Colonel Orde, who I judge by his evidence to be a young lawyer—

An hon. Member: Not so very young.

Mr. Cahan: I do not know how old he is, but I understand he is a young gentleman.

Mr. Power: Aged forty-five perhaps.

An hon. Member: Or fifty.

Mr. Cahan: Well, even that is young. I am grateful that they have these young men who are growing up and developing, for the performance of essential duties in that branch of Canada's service.

At pages 3950 and 3951 of the record of the evidence appears this statement by Colonel Orde:

Mr. Ralston: How long have you held the position of judge advocate general?

A. Since February 1, 1920.

What are the functions of this official?

Mr. Ralston: What are your duties as judge advocate general?

Listen, Mr. Speaker:

Colonel Orde: Generally, the superintendence of the administration of naval, military and air force law, and reviewing and recording proceedings of court martials, and advising and performing duties in relation to matters of a general civilian and legal nature in the department, as they arise. . . . I took that from the king's regulations.

By the Commissioner:

Q. It is quite an undertaking, is it not, for one man?

A. It is a fair sized job. However, I have assistants. I have help in the office.

What is that help? According to a chart which was tabled in the civil service committee last year, on July 1, 1938, his staff was one clerk, grade 4, and one stenographer, grade 3.

What is the staff of the office of judge advocate general in England? There is in the first place the judge advocate general, Sir Henry MacGeagh; a deputy judge advocate general, C. L. Stirling; deputy judge advocates, first, O. C. Barnett; second, Hon. T. D. Freeman-Mitford, and an officer in charge, military deputy of the judge advocate general, Colonel H. S. Barrett. That is for the army. In the admiralty there is a judge advocate general for the fleet, who lives at Greenwich, J. G. Trapnell, K.C., and a deputy judge advocate, Paymaster Captain A. F. Cooper, O.B.E., R.N. Who is Colonel MacGeagh? I quote the following particulars:

MacGeagh, Colonel Sir Henry Foster, K.B.E., cr. 1930; C.B.E. 1919; K.C. 1924; T.D.; Judge Advocate General, H.M.'s Forces (Army and Royal Air Force), since 1934; b. 21 Oct. 1883; o.s. of Foster MacGeagh, late of Hadlow Castle, Kent; m. 1917, Rita, o.d. of late William Kiddle of Walbundrie, New South Wales. Educ.: St. Paul's, Magdalen College, Oxford; rowed in Magdalen College eight, head of the river; honours degree history, B.A. 1905. Barrister-at-law of the Middle Temple, 1906; South Eastern circuit; member of the Council of Legal Education; bencher of the Middle Temple, 1931; held commission in territorial army (London Rifle Brigade), 1909-23; regular commission in the rank of colonel, 1923-34, when retired from army on appointment as Judge Advocate General; served European war, France and Flanders, 1914-15 (Bt. Major, C.B.E., 1914 star and clasp); military assistant to the Judge Advocate General, 1916-23; D.A.A.G., 1917; assistant adjutant-general, war office, 1918-23; Deputy Judge Advocate General British Forces in China (Shanghai Defence Force), 1927; military deputy of the Judge Advocate General (war office and air ministry) and in charge of the military and air force department of his office, 1923-34. Address: 33 Dover Street, W.1; 2 Barden Court, Temple, E.C. Clubs: Carlton, Conservative, Leander.

Barrett, Colonel Hugh Scott, C.B.E., 1937; T.D.; military deputy of Judge Advocate General of the Forces, and officer in charge of military and air force department of his office since 1934; b. 3 March 1887; y.s. of late Sir William Scott Barrett and Julia Louisa Colville; m. 1916, Dorothy. d. of late Rev. A. E. Farrar; three s. one d. Educ.: Aldenham School; St. John's College, Cambridge (scholar). Called to bar, Inner Temple, 1911; Northern circuit; commission in 6th (Rifle) Battn. The King's Regiment (Liverpool), T.A. 1910-23; regular commission, 1923; served European war, France, 1915-18 (O.B.E., despatches twice); D.A.A.G. 1919; Deputy Judge Advocate General, Army of the Rhine, 1920-23, China 1927-28, Egypt 1935, Palestine 1936. Address: St. Nicholas, Kingswood, Surrey. T.: Burgh Heath 451. Club: United University.

Trapnell, John Graham, K.C. 1931; Barrister-at-law; Recorder of Plymouth since 1932; Judge Advocate of the fleet since 1933; b. 25 May 1875; s. of Caleb Trapnell, Stoke Bishop, Bristol; m. Ethel, d. of Thomas Chappel Gardiner; two s. Educ.: Harrogate college; King's college, Cambridge. Called to bar, 1903; joined the Western circuit; naval service, European war, lieutenant, R.N.V.R. Address: 1 Temple Gardens, E.C.4. T.: Central 8557; 25 Holland Park, W.11. T.: Park 6951. Clubs: Royal Air Force; Hampshire County, Winchester; Royal Yacht, Southampton; Royal Western Yacht, Plymouth.

In the Royal Air Force there are thirty-two officers of high rank who are in charge of contracts, and especially there are fifteen senior contract officers. In Canada we have the judge advocate general, one clerk grade 4 and one stenographer grade 3. I hope that the house will have no objection to my placing upon Hansard the few lines which contain the details of the officers of the directorate of contracts under the air ministry.

Mr. SPEAKER: To do so will require the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: The details follow:

The Royal Air Force

Directorate of Contracts under the Air Ministry Director
Principal deputy director
2 deputy directors
1 principal assistant director
5 assistant directors
15 senior contract officers
1 principal accountant
4 senior accountants
1 principal technical costs officer
1 deputy technical costs officer

Turning to the record of the commission, at page 3951, I quote:

Mr. Ralston: When did any matter relating to the Bren gun first come to your attention, officially?

A. In March of 1936—I think it was March 19, 1936; it had to do with the licence matter.

Q. I am dealing with the licence matter.

The Commissioner: I am anxious to have it.

At page 3952 Colonel Orde said:

October . . . 1936 was the first time I had heard of Major Hahn having a connection with the Bren gun.

Q. Did you know Major Hahn before that?

A. No.

Q. You did not meet him personally until when?

A. November 19 or 20, 1937.

Q. Thirteen months after?

A. Yes.

At page 3953 Colonel Orde said:

On October 19, 1936 . . . The Master General of the Ordnance, General Caldwell, spoke to me in the matter of licence, generally, with which I had dealt about four or five months before—in the month of March, before . . . General Caldwell, if I remember rightly, spoke to me; and I am not sure whether I saw him alone, or who it was mentioned the matter.

He was not sure about it.

By the Commissioner:

Q. I suppose it was vague at that time?

And at page 3954:

Colonel Orde: Yes, it was pretty vague. So far as I was concerned, just an isolated incident in the course of my work . . . The instructions I got from somebody—and as I say, I am not sure whether it was General LaFleche or General Caldwell, but it was one or other of them—

By Mr. Ralston:

Q. But were they both there, or only one?

A. I cannot remember whether I saw them together, or whether I saw General Caldwell alone. I think I saw them together in the deputy minister's office. But it is a very vague recollection.

By the Commissioner:

Q. Well, that is enough; you cannot remember every detail.

Colonel Orde: It is very vague. I remembered being instructed to write a letter to the Under Secretary of State, bringing up the question of Major Hahn's visit to England, his interest in the Bren gun, and also dealing with the patent situation which I had mentioned two or three weeks before, or a few weeks before, to General Caldwell,—or, rather, which he had mentioned to me. And I assumed at that time that the only reason I was acting as scrivener was that I had to do with the patent end of it, which was my particular function. I either made some notes of my own of the conversation, so I would have the matters here for the purpose of drafting the letter, or was given a draft of a note which had been prepared by somebody else. Again I do not quite remember that. But I certainly had, when I was dictating the letter, something in the nature of a note.

. . . . .

Mr. Ralston: All he says is that he does not know whether the note was made by himself, or handed to him.

Colonel Orde: Yes, that is correct,—

He said there was only one and now there are many.

By the Commissioner:

Q. Why would they not write the letter themselves? Why did you have to write it?

. . . . .

Colonel Orde: Because a portion of it had to do with the patent situation, which is very technical.

By the Commissioner: There was not anything in the letter of October 20, of that kind?

Colonel Orde: Yes.

It was so technical that the commissioner, who is an experienced judge of the supreme court, did not see it.

Mr. Ralston: Yes, about three-quarters of a page.

The whole letter will be found at page 20 of the report.

Colonel Orde: An analysis of sections 11 and 12, which are more or less of a jig-saw puzzle . . . I did not draft the letter that night. I drafted it, I find, in the morning of the 20th . . . It is obvious, from my secretary's notes, that in the course of dictation I would say something and then say to her, "Strike that out," and I would substitute something else. It is all full of interlineations . . . In the course of my dictation I would dictate a phrase, we will say, and I will say, "We will not put it that way; we will put it some other way." And the fact, also, that I had something in writing in front of me at the time I was dictating the letter is indicated by the appearance in her notes of the initials "J.E.H."

By the Commissioner: Whose initials are those?

Colonel Orde: She would not have been able to have written the name out in full in the copied letter unless she had something written down—Major Hahn's name in full.

At page 3958:

Mr. Ralston: I understand you to say you must have had some note somewhere where Major Hahn's name was written out in full.

Colonel Orde: Yes, so that she would know how to spell it.

Mr. Ralston: Have you the idea, Mr. Commissioner?

The Commissioner: I did not have a correct impression. I thought Major Hahn had left a memorandum.

Colonel Orde: No, not at all...when the revised draft was completed I took it to the master general of the ordnance, initialled it myself and took it up to him, and he initialled it, and it went down to the deputy minister's office in the ordinary course.

Hon. members must understand the position of the deputy minister and that of Colonel Orde. Colonel Orde is the only official lawyer in the Department of National Defence, and the house has heard what his duties are, according to his own evidence—tremendous duties. The deputy minister is not a lawyer and has therefore to go to Colonel Orde every time he requires legal information or advice, and when a thing is suggested by Colonel Orde or approved by him and goes to the deputy minister it is supposed to be legally correct. To continue:

Mr. Ralston: When next did you have anything further to do with the Bren gun matter?

Colonel Orde: I think about November 19, 1937.

Mr. Ralston: Did you have any interviews with Major Hahn in the meantime?

Colonel Orde: No, I had never seen him. I had no interview with any of the Messrs. Plaxton in the meantime.

At page 3961:

By the Commissioner: May I ask this: if the witness was not called upon up to, we will say, November 19 of 1937, to look over these draft proposals, who with legal knowledge in the department would, if he did not?

This confirms what I have just said.

By Mr. Ralston: You heard the question.

Colonel Orde: Yes. So far as I can see from the record, which I have only seen during the course of this inquiry in its complete shape, there was not any real call for any legal—

The Commissioner: I do not want your opinion as to whether or not there was need of a solicitor, or for anybody looking at it. That is a matter which I will have to look into, and will have to say something about. But I am putting this question to you: If between December, 1936, and November, 1937, the numerous draft proposals which were being considered by the department were not submitted to you for legal consideration and advice, was there anybody else in the department to whom they would be submitted?

Colonel Orde: No; I think the first time I saw any of these proposals, or what appeared to be the draft of a formal instrument, was in October. I found that out from the files of October of 1937.

The Commissioner: You have told me that up to this time, at November 19, 1937, you really had no knowledge of the proposals except vague departmental rumours.

Colonel Orde: That is correct.

The Commissioner: I am not complaining about it; I am not criticizing you. I am just trying to find out whether any solicitor had anything to do with it for the department.

The commissioner himself was puzzled about what had happened and he had as witness the man who had drafted both the British and the Canadian contract. At page 3962:

Mr. Ralston: Did you get any information from anybody else other than the dpeuty minister of the master general of ordnance which went into the preparation of that letter of October 20?

Colonel Orde: No, not at all.

Mr. Ralston: Now, then, you did have a discussion about November 19, 1937, with regard to the Bren gun matter? With whom was it, and what took place?

Colonel Orde: The deputy minister asked me to come down to his office. Major Hahn was there and he introduced me to him. That was the first time I had met Major Hahn. He stated that they were discussing in a mere crystallized form, or in some crystallized form, the question of certain proposals which Major Hahn had made. Major Hahn came back to the office with me. His first suggestions were that there be one contract for the 12,000 guns, the government of Canada being the contracting party with the John Inglis Company, and that we would sell 5,000 of those to the War Office. I said, my instructions were that that would not be acceptable, and I proceeded to work out with Major Hahn in a very rough form the mechanics of the proposition, namely, that there would be a separate contract between ourselves and the John Inglis Company and another contract between the War Office and the John Inglis Company, and any interlocking arrangement which would have to be made as between the War Office and the department would be effected by mutual arrangement between the two.

By the Commissioner: I believe I did not hear you correctly. I have it this way: "His first suggestion"—that is Major Hahn's—"was that there would be one contract."

Colonel Orde: It was, yes. He may have had some draft which he had prepared with him, showing it.

At page 3970:

Colonel Orde: It was the first draft I had made in connection with Bren guns. I had made several other cost-plus contracts prior to that for other articles.

The evidence shows that later he could not tell about what articles; it was perhaps a couple of cost-plus contracts that he had made.

It was the first contract I made or drafted as between the Secretary of State for War and the John Inglis Company.

At page 3971:

I think I had no draft of the British contract before me.

At page 3974:

I said yesterday I had suggested that there would be two independent contracts which would necessitate arrangements between the war office and the Department of National Defence.

The Commissioner: Why did you take part in the drafting of the British contract with the John Inglis Company?

Colonel Orde: For the reason that if these were separate contracts there would be only one type of gun manufactured by the contractor, and the contractor would not know out of a particular batch of these guns whether some were intended for us or some intended for the war office.

That is absolutely foolish because it was one type of gun that was being manufactured by the company, part of the product being for delivery to the Canadian government, and the other part to the British government. The second reason is just as foolish as the first. Colonel Orde's answer continues:

And it was necessary that the provisions of the contract be as parallel as possible. Otherwise, if there were separate inspection systems set up you would have great chaos in the method of inspection, and the method of checking and accounting.

That is equally very foolish. Then at page 3975 there is a question to Colonel Orde by the commissioner:

Q. What was your intention as to this draft contract, the one drafted as though the British government were going to sign it? What was your idea? What was going to happen to that draft?

A. What do you mean—

Q. Were you going to send it to the war office?

A. We were under no circumstances going to send it to the war office. That was for Major Hahn, and I handed it to him, and what he did with it was no business of ours.

Here is the judge advocate general of the Department of National Defence drafting a contract for the personal use of Major Hahn. Here is another question by the commissioner on page 3977:

Q. Only you and Major Hahn working out the drafts together, on the 19th, 20th and 21st?

A. Yes. And then I sent them up to the Master General of the Ordnance, where they belonged.

And then an answer by Colonel Orde on page 3979:

On December 22 I made revisions of several of the provisions of the first draft.

Look at that, Mr. Speaker. There are many eminent counsel like yourself, in this house, and there are also many business men. I ask them to consider the actions of this man who holds the high position of judge advocate general in the Department of National Defence. Look at how he does his work. His answer continues:

They were just made on slips of paper, and they were either handed to Colonel Dewar or they were cut out and pinned to the earlier draft.

Lots of pins. Pins are dangerous for balloons. Then we find the following on page 3984:

The Commissioner: I am attaching some consequence to this thing. Was it the draft agreement, that is exhibit No. 33, plus these revisions Colonel Orde made that went to the interdepartmental committee?

Mr. Ralston: I hesitate to make any statement without having compared them; I would have to compare them to see. I am afraid I have assumed that was so.

The Commissioner: I have assumed that too, but it may not be correct. I do not think Colonel Orde probably knows. What has been interesting me for some time is what was the document that the Department of National Defence sent on to the interdepartmental committee, who stood behind it, who said, "Well, now, if it were not for the interdepartmental committee, why we would pass this, but as a matter of fact it has got to go in there and there it is." That is the point. I am assuming, unless someone should tell me to the contrary, that Colonel Orde's draft of December 22, being exhibit No. 33, plus the revisions of November 22, 1937, was the document that went on to the interdepartmental committee.

The Witness: I am practically certain that was what happened because soon after the committee met I was making some further amendments. I was working on a draft which embodied my draft of the 22nd November, plus the amendments of the 22nd December, plus some further suggestions.

And then another question by the commissioner to Colonel Orde, as reported on page 3985:

Q. I was wondering if Colonel Orde, before he was dealing with the drafts, whether he saw the memorandum of December 10, 1937, which is exhibit No. 31. He may not have had it before him, but just before we pass on I should like to clear up that. That has been in my mind. That is the memorandum, I think, by the Master General of the Ordnance. It is a memorandum by someone.

Mr. Ralston: It is a memorandum of the Master General of the Ordnance.

The Witness: I do not remember particularly seeing this particular memorandum. I saw during the course of my duties numerous memoranda, but I cannot identify them by reference to any particular dates.

By the Commissioner:

Q. Look at the last paragraph and read it and see if you recall that that was before you at the time?

A. I may have seen it later. I remember seeing it some time.

Q. You do not think it was there when you were making the draft?

A. Oh, no, I mean it looks familiar and I may have noticed it when glancing through the file.

Q. Was there any discussion around that time, in the month of December, 1937, or January of this year, with reference to the last paragraph?

A. I have—

Q. Do you remember whether there was any conversation with you as to whether that was wise or unwise, whether it might be well to have it stricken out before it went to the interdepartmental committee as an unwise suggestion?

A. I do not remember anything, I do not remember myself.

Q. You do not remember any discussion?

A. No.

Q. Have you the right paragraph, the one that deals with the chartered accountants?

A. Yes. It reads—

Colonel Orde then read the paragraph dealing with the employment of a reliable firm of chartered accountants. The questions by the commissioner continue:

Q. You do not recall that?

A. I have a vague recollection of hearing something discussed, but only informally. It never came to my attention.

By Mr. Ralston:

Q. I was asking you about interviews with Major Hahn during the period in which the interdepartmental committee were considering the Canadian contract. Did you have discussions with him?

A. Oh, I had numerous discussions with Major Hahn and the deputy minister, either in the deputy minister's office or consequent upon Major Hahn's seeing the deputy minister and being instructed to see me.

It is probable that at times Major Hahn went to the deputy minister's office, but as his visits related to the legal part of the contract the deputy minister always referred him to the judge advocate general, Colonel Orde. I ask hon. members to listen to this so that they will be in a position to see whether Colonel Orde is to be credited in connection with his interviews with Hahn. The evidence continues on page 3987:

By the Commissioner:

Q. Over what period?

A. Running from somewhere in January until I think towards the end of January.

And again on page 3988:

By Mr. Ralston:

Q. Just to clear that up. To go further with that. Does that mean you had no interviews with Major Hahn in February?

A. Oh, I had some. I learned subsequently Major Hahn had come to England somewhere towards the end of January and that is why the interviews stopped then, at least for the time being.

Q. Did you have some interviews with him again in March?

A. I had some with him in February, around the end of February, after his return from England, and in March.

He had intimated before that his interviews were from the beginning to the end of January. The evidence continues with a question by Mr. Ralston:

Q. That is what I wanted, the period over which you had those interviews.

The Commissioner: Did Colonel Orde keep any diary or contemporaneous memoranda from which he can refresh his memory in any way, or does he just base that on memory?

The Witness: I wrote during that period two or three memoranda which I think are already in as exhibits.

By the Commissioner:

Q. They were contemporaneous?

A. Contemporaneous.

Q. That refreshes your memory?

A. That refreshes my memory.

Then on page 3990 there is the following:

The Commissioner: That is, he had no interviews with any solicitor representing Major Hahn or the John Inglis Company in connection with the Canadian contract?

Mr. Ralston: In connection with the Canadian contract.

I must explain here that Mr. Lash, K.C., was appearing on behalf of the British government as well as on behalf of Major Hahn, When Mr. Orde met him, he did not meet him in his capacity as counsel and solicitor for the British government, but only as counsel and solicitor for Major Hahn. Then, again on page 3991, a question by Mr. Ralston:

Q. Did he ever tell you that Mr. Plaxton was engaged as a legal representative, until at the time I was going to deal with, that is March 17?

A. No knowledge of any connection with the Plaxtons at all.

That is to be noted. The evidence continues:

By the Commissioner:

Q. Did you have any indication, as far as the Canadian contract is concerned, by correspondence that Blake, Lash, Anglin & Cassels were acting?

Listen to how he answers this question:

A. It is rather hard to describe the situation. Major Hahn was continually up and down between Ottawa and Toronto and he was in and out of my office so many times. He would dash back with some suggested change and then he would come back two or three days afterwards. I do not know whether it is in order to mention it, but Mr. Lash's firm had been engaged in connection with certain other contracts of a similar type and I derived considerable comfort from knowing that Mr. Lash was at the other end of it.

Here is the judge advocate general of the Department of National Defence, who is entirely and absolutely incompetent, and who takes comfort from the fact that he is helped by counsel acting for the other parties. It is enough to disbar any lawyer whose name appears on the law list, and I do not see why this has not been brought out by other members who have spoken previously. It is something formidable. Here we have a man who, according to the evidence, can hardly sign his name, who cannot draft a contract, who has had no experience. You know the number of people who are engaged in that sort of work in the British war office, the British admiralty and the British air force. Here we have that man with a grade 4 clerk and a grade 3 stenographer, both of them incompetent, both making plenty of mistakes which were the cause of trouble. He cannot do anything; he has to rely on counsel for the other party to do his own work. I continue quoting:

By Mr. Ralston:

Q. Did you ever discuss the contract with the Department of Justice?

A. No.

Q. Did you ever see Mr. H. A. W. Plaxton as the representative of Major Hahn previous to the signing of the Canadian contract?

A. No.

Then it goes on:

By the Commissioner:

Q. Why did you leave in the clause:

The party of the first part will provide or grant to the party of the second part an exclusive licence to manufacture the Bren gun in Canada.

Who told you to do that?

A. Instructions that I had got previously.

My time is not up yet, Mr. Speaker, but it soon will be, and I wonder if the house would have any objection to letting me finish reading this part of the evidence, which may take about fifteen minutes. I do not intend to say anything that will hurt anyone, but I want to put on record part of the evidence which is now downstairs and which is very difficult for hon. members to obtain.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I continue:

Q. You were solicitor for the—

A. I was the solicitor.

Q. Had you no realization of what an exclusive licence in Canada to manufacture the Bren gun meant?

A. Precisely, Mr. Commissioner.

Q. Who told you to put it in?

A. It was put in earlier. If you will look at the draft that was considered at the interdepartmental committee, at the first meeting that the committee had had, I think in January, and the clause that was inserted in there at the request of this officer, whoever it was, who saw me on December 22, you will notice there that there was an exclusive clause in that.

Then I quote from page 3996:

A. . . . . Unless I was instructed to the contrary I was not going to remove anything on my own volition. I never liked it.

Here is a matter not of right or wrong but a matter of liking or not liking it. Then at page 4006:

By the Commissioner:
Q. Did you have to say up until three o'clock in the morning that time while the committee was meeting?

That was in the middle of March.

A. Yes, sir. I was there until three o'clock and I left my office at a quarter to eight the following morning. I was present in my office.
Q. And there were communications passing to and fro between the interdepartmental committee and yourself?
A. That is correct, sir. Sometimes they would send a note up, other times I would get a phone message to attend and I would go down and attend.
Q. And you were there until three o'clock in the morning?
A. I was.
Q. Great haste, was there not?
A. Very much so.
Q. Did you understand you had to stay up all night until three o'clock in the morning?
A. Well, I was instructed by my chief to attend and be on hand as the committee needed me.

There was the judge advocate general; there was the interdepartmental committee that was helping him with that contract, and the work of this gentleman and of the committee was so slow that after four months they had nothing ready in finished form. Therefore the deputy minister told the judge advocate general to stay that night in order to have it finished ready to present to council the next day. Apparently the British government was very anxious to have this contract completed.

Q. Whom do you mean by your chief?
A. The deputy minister of the Department of National Defence.

Then in discussing the work of the interdepartmental committee and also the work of the judge advocate general in drafting the contract, the commissioner said:

I am inquiring into the competency of those charged with the responsibility of drafting the contract.

Then, at page 4011, the commissioner continued:

Q. I am thinking of the hour. You worked through until 7.30 in the morning?
A. I did, sir.
Q. I sympathize with you very much. I sympathize with you very, very much. And you had no other legal help in this matter?
A. No.
Q. You just worked all night trying to put the document in the best shape you could?
A. There were two mistakes.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Q. You tried to put the document in the best shape you could? You were directed to stay to do this? I think you said, "I was directed to do this or required to do this." By whom?
A. My instructions from the deputy minister were that this had to be ready for cabinet council at eleven o'clock the following morning.
Q. That is the system?

He had to work all night because he had done nothing useful in the previous four months. Then I quote from page 4021:

A. I attended a conference with Major Hahn and Mr. J. F. Lash, K.C., in the suite of offices of Blake, Lash, Anglin & Cassels.
By Mr. Ralston:
Q. Is that the first time you saw Mr. Lash in connection with this matter?
A. Yes.

That was March 28 or 29, in reference to the British contract. Then at page 4045 there is a letter from Colonel Orde to Major Hahn, an official letter which is extended in the evidence; and do you know how the judge advocate general, counsel for the Department of National Defence, addressed Major Hahn? Was it "Dear Major"? Was it "My dear sir"? No; it was "My dear Jim." He had known Major Hahn for only four months, but apparently they became very intimate.

Then at page 4048 there is a reference to the proposed British agreement which was made subsequent to the final draft of the Canadian agreement. Incorporated in the draft of the proposed British agreement were the changes which were consequential upon the interdepartmental committee meeting. Then Colonel Orde continued:

. . . I took one copy of this draft, of the proposed agreement which I called my working copy, which had in it the various changes discussed at the meeting—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry but the hon. gentleman has exhausted his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. POULIOT: Shall I go on or not?

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot allow the hon. member to proceed except with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. gentleman has the unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then the hon. member must resume his seat.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Pouliot) in congratulating the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) on celebrating his thirty-fifth wedding anniversary and his entrance into parliament. Sometimes, as I realize that the years are slipping by—because I am only a couple of years behind my right hon. friend—I wonder if we should extend congratulations or commiserations on our birthdays and various other anniversaries. However, so far as congratulations are of any use, I offer mine to the right hon. gentleman and hope he may enjoy many more years of great happiness.

I rise a second time in the debate, Mr. Speaker, because I feel that the issue should once more be clarified. It has been to my mind so confused that the air needs clearing. I suppose, sir, it is fair to say that it has been confused intentionally. There has been an injection of extraneous matters of all kinds, attacks personal and political upon many of us on this side of the house, no doubt with the object of confusing the issue, hiding the facts, disguising the irregularities, concealing the incompetence, and distracting attention from the method of awarding the contract.

I have listened to nearly all the speeches made on all sides, and in all sections of the house on this question. While on this side of the house—and I include all parties on this side—different speakers criticized the contract and the manner in which or method by which the contract was awarded, to my mind they criticized fairly the whole proceeding. But from the other side, from the Liberal benches, there came practically no answer of any kind, except abuse. All of them were like that, except in the case of two speeches. One of those was entirely abuse, and so it is not therefore an exception. One of the two to which I last referred was a studied legal argument. The one which was worst, I am sorry to say was delivered by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) himself. In my opinion, undoubtedly the best speech was made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), who spoke on Thursday night. In fact, I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was the only speaker on that side of the house who at all adhered to the charges, if we may term them such—or to the statements made by myself and others on this side of the house. He was the only one who got away from personal and political abuse, and the only one who really attempted in a legal manner to build up a case on behalf of the government.

So far as the minister's speech was concerned, he never touched the issues at all. His speech was made up of abuse, of name calling, of protestations of honesty and of unparliamentary remarks. I have been in the house now for twenty or twenty-one sessions, I believe it is, and I say without hesitation that never in all those sessions have I heard anything approaching, in unparliamentary language, the minister's speech.

But he was not alone in that. Here are some of the terms which flew across the house at us, from various speakers—some from the minister and some from others. These are the terms which I jotted down: "Cheap Tammany Hall politicians." "Sinister alliance" between ourselves and members to my left. Incidentally in that regard I recall that between 1921 and 1925 the right hon. gentleman who now leads and then led the government (Mr. Mackenzie King), was very glad to have alliances with the same group, the third party. It was not termed a sinister alliance at that time; what can be wrong in my hon. friends to my left and ourselves taking the same attitude on a question such as this?

Other terms used were in regard to the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth)—"a bird of passage," "Prussian mentality," "never loyal to any principle." The same hon. member who used the "bird of passage" phrase, namely the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) called us blackguards. Another speaker,—I think it was the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) spoke of a political cabal.

Those terms have been used as a defence for this indefensible contract. Fortunately—and I say it is fortunate—some of the terms used by the Minister of National Defence have been expunged from Hansard—against the rules of the house, incidentally. They have been expunged I think for the good of Hansard. It is better perhaps that in years to come readers of Hansard should not think that such terms would have been permitted in the parliament of Canada. So that the expurgated edition of Hansard is probably all to the good so far as that is concerned.

But, sir, I do say this: it is no wonder that the Vancouver Sun, ordinarily an outstanding Liberal organ, spoke of the brawling in parliament, and of the vulgar personalities cast across the floor of the house by an hon. gentleman who comes from the city in which that paper is published. They added that there is still a strong suspicion of gross political patronage in the awarding of the contract, and they say that the contract was improperly awarded, and that abuse of this kind does not hide the facts.

I want to say with all due respect that I think it is time we had decorum in the House of Commons. In the past week, I think there have been more justifiable appeals against unparliamentary language, and fewer appeals upheld, than I have ever known in the whole of my parliamentary life. If we are to build up the reputation of parliament and help the progress of public business, I suggest that more severity be used in the future, particularly in connection with name calling and unparliamentary language.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard I believe made the only real attempt to defend the contract and the proceedings leading up to it. He emphasized the few favourable points, and there were very few. Naturally he ignored the unfavourable evidence, and used his celtic wit to cover up the weaknesses of his case. He quoted in favour of the case only one section of the report, that section which has been so often quoted—the one paragraph pointing out that there was no corruption.

In the Parliamentary Guide I note that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard describes himself as by trade an iron moulder and by profession a lawyer, which to me explains a rather interesting point. When I was out in Vancouver a few months ago, being interested in this picturesque gentleman—

An hon. MEMBER: You are interested in pictures, too.

Mr. MANION: So is Judge Davis; he is interested in pictures. My hon. friends opposite are not interested in pictures. All they are interested in is the one part of the report exempting them from corruption. They showed a very distinct disinclination to discuss the rest of the report, which is made up of pictures.

But, as I have said, the Parliamentary Guide has described the hon. member as by trade an iron moulder and by profession a lawyer. When in Vancouver I asked about him and his ability as a lawyer, and somebody said that the lawyers claim he is a very good iron moulder, and the iron moulders claim he is a very good lawyer.

An hon. MEMBER: That is smart.

Mr. MANION: However, I agree with the iron moulders. I agree with them that he is a very good lawyer, if I may judge from the case he put forward the other day.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. REID: He was a good iron moulder, too, for I worked for him.

Mr. MANION: I just wanted to say I had so much confidence in him as a lawyer, after listening to him defend this case, that if I am ever accused of murder—and particularly if I am guilty—I will hire him to defend me.

There is one other speech I wish to mention, and that is the speech of the Minister of Transport, who, I regret, is not in the house. He was the one who used the word "blackguarding," and called the hon. member for Waterloo South "a bird of passage." The Minister of Transport has been in the House of Commons and in the public life of Canada only about three and a half years. Prior to that time he was in business, looking after his own affairs as an engineer, and, if rumour is correct, building up quite a comfortable fortune. Over a period of twelve years the hon. member for Waterloo South has been serving in the parliamentary halls of this country—nearly four times as long as the Minister of Transport has served. I think therefore that some of the minister's speech was more particularly out of place, because of that fact. I suggest that in all probability the hon. member for Waterloo South, who has served twelve years, will still be serving in the parliamentary halls of this country when the Minister of Transport is not.

An hon. MEMBER: In what party?

Mr. MANION: At the present time he is supporting ours, and I have no doubt that he will continue to support ours. The fact that a man changes his party is no disgrace. Wasn't it Lincoln who said that anybody who has not a little more brains to-day than he had yesterday has no brains at all? And I believe it was Morley who once said, "Anybody who wants my discarded opinions can have them," and I say the same.

In the case before the house the Liberals have ignored the issues altogether. They have ignored the report with the exception of three paragraphs which deal with members of parliament and senators not profiting by the contract, and with the "no corruption" paragraph.

They based their replies largely on personal and political abuse, on affection for the minister, and on the tu quoque argument, that from 1914 to 1918 there was graft and profiteering in war contracts. I know nothing about that. I do not deny it, but I do say this: if that was true in war time, it is all the more important in peace time that we should avoid all grafting and suspicion of grafting.

My book was also quoted freely by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I have no objection to that. In the book I pointed out some of the duties of an opposition, but there are men much more prominent in public life than I who have discussed that question. I well remember that Stanley, the so-called Rupert of debate, said that the duty of an opposition is to oppose, and that dictum has been often quoted. But in quoting my book hon. gentlemen opposite omitted to mention entirely a paragraph which shows that when I wrote that book, at a time when I was not even dreaming of being leader of this party, I had the same opinions that I have now with regard to profiteering in munitions. This is the paragraph, to which I refer:

> If ever again men are compelled to risk their lives at a dollar a day, others who do war work at home should be put absolutely upon the same basis, and no one permitted to profit in any manner whatsoever by war.

Mr. POWER: What page, please?

Mr. MANION: Frankly, I do not know. I have not read the book, I was so sick and tired of reading the proofs.

Mr. POWER: Pity us, then.

Mr. MANION: Well, you do not have to read it. In fact, I warn my hon. friends over there that if they go on quoting from my book I am going to take revenge by turning some of my party on the Prime Minister's book. I tried to read it myself, and as I once told the right hon. gentleman, I got only half way through. That is as far as I ever got.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Which one of the three books?

Mr. MANION: I am speaking of Industry and Humanity. I have not read the others.

I did not intend to speak long, but if my hon. friends opposite insist on helping me out I am afraid I shall have to take more time.

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that the opinion I expressed in the paragraph I have just quoted from my book was just as sincere then as the opinion I hold now, and my opinion now is just as sincere as it was then. I believe the one thought that is in the minds of the people of this country to-day, and particularly of the young men who may have to risk their lives if ever we are so unhappy as to have to take part in a war again, is that no one should make money out of war. That I believe is the desire of all of us, and I shall quote the Prime Minister before I sit down as taking exactly the same attitude, although I cannot understand why after taking that attitude, he permits such a contract as this to be made.

There was only one member opposite from the province of Quebec who raised the race cry in this debate. He claimed that we were making an attack on General LaFleche because of his race. But the hon. member who is just now taking his seat, the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming), who belongs to the same profession as I do, not only repeated the race cry but as well went on to attack me for using patronage to get a job, as he put it. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I was giving up what was for a young man a very lucrative medical practice to get a job in the army. That was the patronage I was looking for; that was the job-hunting I was doing.

We were also told that we were trying to destroy the minister and the deputy minister. I say that they have both been friends of mine in days gone by, and I think they are yet. As a matter of fact, we appointed the deputy; I do not know whether that fact has been pointed out. He had a very fine record, and I have a very high admiration for him, and my opinion is that the reason he acted so strangely in regard to Hahn is that he was being pushed forward by his minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not true.

Mr. MANION: The minister denies that, and I do not wish to misrepresent him. But irrespective of what the deputy minister did, it is the government of the day that is responsible—not only the minister. The deputy minister has been a friend of mine for many years and I have the utmost respect for him. Personally I made no attack on him whatever, and I do not think anybody on this side of the house, in any of the parties here, attacked him personally. We merely directed attention to the action taken by the department in an effort to give the contract to Hahn.

There have also been several wicked attacks on Colonel Drew, who is another fine soldier with a very fine record. Whatever Colonel Drew did he certainly performed a service for this country, inasmuch as he saved this country a lot of money—a quarter of a million dollars, as I have seen it claimed—by causing another letter to be drawn up as a supplement to the contract. In addition, I believe that his article will make any government in power in this country in the future more careful in the letting of contracts for munitions of any kind.

Then there was a defence by several hon. gentlemen opposite of Major Hahn and the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton). So far as Major Hahn is concerned I did not attack him; I have not attacked him. I think he was just a shrewd business man who saw in the hon. member for Trinity an instrument at hand to help him get a government contract. He found the government even more pliable as an instrument than the hon. member for Trinity, so he went right ahead and got the contract. That is all we can say about Major Hahn. I do not know him; I have never met him. In that respect I am in the same position as the Prime Minister, except that I did not appoint him as representative of Canada to get secret information from the British government, as did the Prime Minister.

But all these defences or so-called defences that hon. gentlemen opposite have put up, even that of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who has just sat down after making an attack on another official of the Department of National Defence, are no defence at all of the awarding of this contract. They are no defence at all, to my mind; they are just an attempt to confuse the issue. Every speaker from the Liberal party, with the exception of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, ignored practically fifty pages of the report and tied his whole case to three short paragraphs which disposed of the charge of corruption.

Now I am going to attempt to define the issue, which is not that of corruption or graft. The issue in a sentence is the whole method of buying munitions at a time when, because of threats of dictatorships against democracy, we in Canada, a peace-loving people, are forced at a cost of tens of millions of dollars to arm in our own defence in order to maintain our freedom as a nation. That is the issue so far as I see it. Are we going to place our very life as a nation in jeopardy through politics, patronage, and favouritism, as in the Bren gun contract? Or, are we going to rise above that low level and act as a united people in building up our defence of all kinds—doing it fairly, honestly, sanely, without profit, so far as is humanly possible—giving our citizens at the same time a chance to show that they love sufficiently this Canada of ours to bend their energies, without the profit motive, to a great national endeavour on behalf of the safety of our country? If the Bren gun contract is any criterion, then we are going to take the low road of private profit and personal selfishness. But I refuse to believe that such is the desire of the great masses of our people.

I insist, sir, that our business men and all others are only awaiting the clarion call of national service in order to answer it enthusiastically, honestly, and loyally. The government supporters say that in the last war patronage and war-profiteering were rampant. I do not know whether they were or not. I was not here. But if that charge is true, there was at least the excuse of a great crisis and a great danger because of Canada's participation in the war. Even if the charge be true, is it then necessary that we must again, in peace time, continue to wallow in the mire of filthy profiteering while the very lives of our youth and the very existence of our beloved Canada are at stake?

I say now, sir: let the Prime Minister rise to this challenge and I will stand beside him and back him completely in the noble work of not only declaring our high principles as Canadians, in this regard at least, but of living up to those principles.

How then does this contract, and the procedure leading up to it, conflict with the issue as I have defined it? To learn that we must study the whole report of Mr. Justice Davis, the royal commissioner who investigated the Bren contract. It is true he says that no member of parliament or senator is to share in the benefits of the contract, and he adds that there has been no corruption. He makes these statements in three short paragraphs on page 51. But on nearly all the other pages he shows the gross irregularities that led up to the consummation of the deal. For example, the report shows clearly, among other things:

1. That the methods leading up to the signing of the contract and the method of giving it were unfair;

2. That Hahn, whom apparently no one knew, except Mr. Plaxton, was shown great favouritism;

3. That thereby other industrialists, much better equipped, were given no opportunity to compete with Hahn.

4. That Major Hahn, although unknown to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of National Defence, was made by the Prime Minister the representative of Canada in order to give Hahn access to secret information from the British war office;

5. That Hahn and his fellow promoters were placed, through this contract, in a position to make more than $1,000,000 out of stock for which they paid nothing—this in addition to the profits of the contract itself.

Perhaps I should correct that. They paid an average of 52 cents a share and some of it sold for over six dollars a share, or over one million dollars of profits to them. This in addition to the profits of the contract itself.

These are a few of the aspects of the deal which seriously undermine the confidence of the Canadian people, not only in this deal but in the whole method under which tens of millions of dollars of this year's estimates are to be spent in purchasing munitions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope my hon. friend will make it clear that these are deductions of his own, and not findings of the commissioner.

Mr. MANION: Well, I think they are the findings of the commissioner.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where?

Mr. MANION: All right, we will deal with them as we go along. I know how quick the right hon. gentleman is to contradict statements. I have the proof here; I was not going to quote it, because the matter is so clear there is no dispute about it. It is on page 24.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not speaking of an individual quotation; I am referring to these four or five different inferences which my hon. friend drew as he was speaking.

Mr. MANION: I am going to prove the inferences. In fact I am going to prove them and a lot of others as well. Neither the right hon. gentleman nor any one on that side of the house has risen and refuted —not one. The right hon. gentleman is now getting out from under. He has risen not once, but at least fifteen times to contradict hon. members on the statement that he appointed Major Hahn as representative. He said he meant that he had not appointed Hahn to get some information from the British war office, but when he saw I had the evidence he wanted to get out from under.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I meant what I said, and what I said will appear on Hansard.

Mr. MANION: Well, here is the concrete information. The High Commissioner in London, Mr. Massey, had been asked by the Minister of National Defence to get Hahn inside information, to obtain for him entrance to the war office. Hahn states, according to this report—and I am sticking to the report—that he got very impatient because Mr. Massey was not getting him the appointments he had promised. Finally Mr. Massey cabled to the Prime Minister. The cable, dated November 9 is set forth in the report. I will not read it in full but Mr. Massey quotes the cablegram of the Minister of National Defence to him of that day to get Hahn in communication with him, and then he adds—in his cablegram to the Prime Minister, who is the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

> In order to obtain information desired, war office must be requested to give Major Hahn, as representative of the Canadian government, access to information of a secret nature which normally is not given to other than government officials.

That is the part which applies to my statement. I will read that sentence again:

> . . . access to information of a secret nature which normally is not given to other than government officials.

And the Prime Minister, as Secretary of State for External Affairs, the following day sends a cablegram making Hahn representative of the Canadian government. I do not need to quote it unless the Prime Minister denies the cablegram. I simply say that he made Hahn the Canadian representative to get this secret information from the British war office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What my hon. friend just said is quite different from what he said a moment ago. This was to get information, not to get a contract.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will read the cable which was sent, and the reply, he will see that the purpose was to get information to enable the Department of National Defence to reach its own conclusions with reference to a certain matter,—namely the possibility of producing the Bren gun in Canada—nothing else.

Mr. MANION: The cable was to get Hahn the information. The Prime Minister asks me to read the cablegram, and I will read it:

> . . . Your cablegram 9th November 396.

That was the cable which was sent by the high commissioner to the Prime Minister.

> Have discussed matter with Minister of National Defence. You might request war office to give Major Hahn, as representing Canadian government in this particular, any information which they consider desirable and necessary to enable national defence to reach conclusion on possibility produce Bren gun in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION:

> It is not desired to request furnishing of information on any article other than this gun.

What are my hon. friends saying "hear, hear" for?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is just to get information solely for the purpose of considering the possibility of producing the Bren gun in Canada—nothing else.

Mr. MANION: Not to get information, but to make Hahn representative of the government of Canada; to enable Hahn to go in—in the words of the high commissioner—"as representative of the Canadian government" to get "access to information of a secret nature which normally is not given to other than government officials." That was the point, and it is clear. The Prime Minister has been jumping up from his seat—I have watched him rise about fifteen times—to contradict and to try to get out from under. Why, if there is not something wrong with the contract, is the Prime Minister continually trying to get out from under?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: I do not think that the loud laugh proves anything. It is simply that the Prime Minister made Hahn the representative of Canada, when without his being made Canada's representative Hahn would never have got the British contract. By the way, some hon. member on the other side said that that contract was given to Hahn before the Canadian contract. As a matter of fact it was given four months after the Canadian contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The promise of it was not.

Mr. MANION: I do not care about promises. If we go into promises in addition to all this I do not know what we shall have.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If the hon. member reads the evidence he will find that he is wrong there.

Mr. MANION: No, I am not wrong. I am as right on this point as I am on the others.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I inform my hon. friend that a telegram came from the British war office on November 9, 1937, to the effect to give a contract for 5,000 guns to the John Inglis Company.

Mr. MANION: The minister had an opportunity the other day to put some of this matter on record. Instead of doing so he indulged in a tirade against us on this side. I read from page 42 of the report:

The Canadian contract was authorized by order in council P.C. 561 of March 22, 1938.

A little later on:

The war office contract—

That is the British contract.

—which was complementary to the Canadian contract, was not signed until July 15, 1938—

Almost four months later.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is right.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MANION: What is the use of quibbling about the details? It is just a quibble by which the Prime Minister tries to get away from the fact that he appointed Major Hahn as the representative of this government. That to my mind is one of the most extraordinary things in the whole proceeding; and I believe that the Prime Minister is ashamed of it. When I accused him of it the other day in the house he said—at first—no, he had not done it. He feels to-day, I think rightly, that he should not have made a perfect stranger Canada's representative. There are all kinds of employees of the Department of National Defence from the deputy minister down, who are outstandingly able men.

Mr. McLARTY: May I ask my hon. friend a question on this matter? This was for the manufacture of the gun, not considering it from the standpoint of technical efficiency?

Mr. MANION: What did Major Hahn know technically about the manufacture of the Bren gun until this government taught him, sent him over to learn about it in England? Surely my hon. friend the newly appointed minister does not suggest that no one of the outstanding servants of the Department of National Defence could not have gone over, quite as well as Major Hahn, and obtained that information.

Mr. McLARTY: There was one sent over, previously, and this was from the standpoint of manufacturing, not as to their technical efficiency.

Mr. MANION: Major Hahn had never manufactured. All he had done was to assemble radios, and when he was assembling these for ten years he or his company went broke and he paid twenty cents on the dollar. That is his record. I say that there are in the department this very day and there have been all along public servants like the deputy minister and various others who could have obtained the information and come back and laid it before the department. Industrialists could then have been called in just as the British government did in the matter of aeroplanes, and the whole thing would have been carried out in an absolutely upright manner and aboveboard.

We have had in the research department for some time one of the greatest soldiers in the British empire, Major-General McNaughton, a man who is not only an outstanding soldier but a Master of Science from McGill university. He is at the head of the National Research Council. He used to be chief of general staff.

My former leader, Mr. Bennett, said many times that he had been informed by British soldiers that Major-General McNaughton was the best military man in the British empire. I cannot pass judgment upon that statement but I do know at any rate that Major-General McNaughton has a magnificent war record. Why did not the government send him over to get the information needed? Major Hahn is not a scientist. He is a lawyer by profession. Why was he sent? Why did not the government enlist the services of Major-General McNaughton and have him bring back the necessary information and submit it to the department, and then have industrialists called in? If that course had been followed the government would have obtained the same sort of efficiency as was secured in connection with British aeroplane contracts for which the government there set up a board in Canada.

Major Hahn and his associates could have made a million dollars out of their stock dealings. At the price of the stock they stood to make a million dollars. These are a few of the aspects of the deal that seriously undermine the confidence of the Canadian people, but there are many other similar phases of the subject with which I shall deal briefly.

These points have all been brought to the attention of the government and of the house, most of them by myself, a good many of them by other hon. members including my own followers, and none of these points have been dealt with by hon. members opposite. They have confined themselves to the three paragraphs that exempt the persons involved from the charge of corruption. My hon. friends opposite have never tried to refute any argument advanced on this side. For my own part, in my first remarks I limited myself to the report itself. I gave chapter and verse for every statement I made, and I did not make any statement on my own authority. All the statements I made were based upon the authority of the Bren gun report as submitted by Mr. Justice Davis, the commissioner, and not one of the points that I established has been dealt with in the many speeches that have been made by my hon. friends opposite in supposed refutation of the arguments advanced against the government.

My criticism is against the government as a whole and not against the minister particularly for his action. I say that the whole government is responsible. Now what were the statements I made? Let me give a synopsis of them. First, I said the Prime Minister was deceived by the hon. member for Trinity when that hon. gentleman wrote him in 1936, two and a half years ago, that a group of friends of his had a fully equipped plant in Toronto for the making of munitions. As a matter of fact the plant is not yet fully equipped; it is only being equipped at the present moment. Nor is it manufacturing munitions to-day. It was not fully equipped and therefore the hon. member deceived the Prime Minister. He rose in his place and expressed himself in a brief, dignified speech of three and a half minutes. I do not wish to do this young man any harm, but he never touched that charge made against him, and nobody has. Does anyone deny that he deceived the Prime Minister?

Mr. HOWE: The plant is as fully equipped as any plant in Canada.

Mr. MANION: It was not. My hon. friend who is an engineer should know better, and he does know better. It was a boiler factory and had been closed for a couple of years.

Mr. HOWE: It was a machine shop.

Mr. LENNARD: Some of the machinery ordered for this plant has not been made yet.

Mr. MANION: As my hon. friend says, some of the machinery ordered has not been made yet. It was not fully equipped to manufacture Bren guns.

An hon. MEMBER: That has not been said.

Mr. MANION: If he had said that it was as fully equipped as other plants in Canada there might be an argument, but he said that it was fully equipped. That is the first charge, and there has been no denial of that statement. And the deputy minister later, no doubt basing his statement upon the assurance of the hon. member for Trinity, spoke of a reliable group controlling plants—they had become plural by that time. In the second place, there was a letter of introduction given to Major Hahn by the minister—a letter of introduction given to a man who was unknown to the minister. The minister said, a year and a half afterwards, that he did not know this man. So that he was unknown to the minister, to the deputy minister, and to the Prime Minister. In the third place, there was this unknown man being made a representative of Canada. To me this is the most extraordinary proceeding in the whole transaction. I have the evidence here and I have given it, and I suggest that the reason why the Prime Minister has been trying to get out from under the position of having made this man the representative of Canada in this matter is that he realizes that he made a serious blunder. The next statement I made was that pressure had been put upon the British government, because the commissioner says in the report at pages 47-48:

As appears from the communications quoted above, the war office as late as February 3, 1938 (Exhibit 190), was still adhering to its desire to deal with the Canadian government and not with a Canadian manufacturer direct.

That was more than a month before the contract was signed by the Canadian government. And the Prime Minister, in reply to the letter from the hon. member for Trinity asking whether Canadian firms might obtain orders from the British government for the manufacture of munitions, said, as quoted in the report:

It would be necessary, of course, to see that it was distinctly understood that such orders as were obtained, were at the instance of the firm itself and not either directly or indirectly, at the instance of the government of Canada.

Major Hahn would never have got a contract from the British government without the support of the government of Canada. He was pressed into the contract, and the government of Great Britain, the war office, was fighting against it up to a month before the Canadian contract was let, and did not award their own contract until four months later. The Prime Minister in the House of Commons on April 2, 1937, a year before, had said, in reply to the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation:

We agree with him in asserting the principle that no profits should be made out of war.

But how can you take profits out of war without nationalizing the industry? That is the only means by which profits can be taken out of war, by some form of nationalization. The minister himself is quoted at page 11 of the report, referring to this very statement of the Prime Minister which I have just quoted:

The Minister of National Defence said in his evidence before the commission that that statement was in agreement with his own view. The minister said that there had been no change in the actual policy of the government, or of himself; that government ownership is the best and that the next is competition.

But they did not have either; they had neither government ownership nor competition but resorted to a form of patronage and favouritism; and the claim that Major Hahn was appointed merely to get information on behalf of the Department of National Defence is to my mind ridiculous and unfair. It is ridiculous because the department, as I have said, had at their disposal many men whom they could have sent to England. They could have sent over men who were better equipped both mentally and by training than Major Hahn. And it is unfair to the other industrialists of the country that one man, without any special training, should be picked out and given peculiar rights, pushed forward by this government and made a special representative of Canada to obtain secret information from the war office in Great Britain.

The charge has been made from the opposite side that this discussion in this house has had the effect of suspending the flow of contracts from Great Britain. I say that is mere balderdash. The surest way of getting contracts from the British government is to demonstrate to them that they will get a fair deal over here, as in the matter of aeroplanes.

Mr. GRAY: Are they complaining about this contract?

Mr. MANION: Well, my hon. friends opposite seem to imply that because they say that this discussion was preventing us from getting contracts. Half a dozen hon. members have said so.

Mr. GRAY: Future contracts.

Mr. MANION: I deny it. I repeat, the best way of securing contracts is to let the British government know that they will get a fair deal.

Another statement I made was that this was patronage, and the minister replied heatedly that it was not. What is patronage? My definition of patronage is that it is favouritism to friends of the government in connection with government business to the exclusion of all others. I think that is a very simple definition. Surely this is favouritism to friends of the government in connection with government business to the exclusion of all others. What makes it worse is the fact that it is patronage in connection with munitions, something which should be above and beyond politics.

Then I made a statement about Lieutenant Jolley. I simply quoted the commissioner who pointed out that Lieutenant Jolley was inexperienced. Some hon. member then said, forsooth, that I was making an attack on youth. As a matter of fact I made no attack on youth. I know something of the problems of youth. I have three youths myself who have had their troubles in getting established in life. I know something first-hand about the problems of youth, and I have every appreciation of the difficulty of those problems. I based my remarks on the statement of the commissioner, who said that obviously Lieutenant Jolley was without the business experience and judgment necessary for a job such as he was given.

I said that there was no competition in connection with a contract where millions were involved. I said it was an injustice to others, many of whom were more capable than Major Hahn. I pointed out that Major Hahn had no special experience for this work.

Then I pointed out that this was a cost-plus contract with ten per cent going to Major Hahn. There are times when cost-plus contracts cannot be avoided, but I do not admit that this was necessarily such a time. A cost-plus contract is one of the most dangerous types of contract to give unless you are very sure of the man to whom you give it. There is generally an inclination to increase expenses under the contract, because the higher they are the greater the profit. Ten per cent on the cost of the work was allowed by this contract. Such a contract is always undesirable if it can be avoided. It was stated that there was no competition possible. If there was no competition possible as far as price was concerned, there must have been competition in connection with the percentage allowance. There may have been many who would have been willing to take this contract on a 7½ or 5 per cent basis instead of ten per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is what it is, 7·76 per cent.

Mr. MANION: My friend says that, but I cannot find it. I based my statement on the contract, which says that it is ten per cent. I am going to deal with the matter on the basis of ten per cent. There may have been someone willing to take it for five per cent. There are outstanding men in this country who are patriotic and loyal enough to be willing to come forward and get together an organization to make these munitions without profit at all. That is what should have been done.

In connection with the interdepartmental committee the commissioner states—I do not intend to read the whole report—that they were given much misinformation with regard to the British government's preference for Hahn. He said also that they were overruled with regard to competitive bids and that their efforts were rendered futile by the attitude taken by the Department of National Defence. I ask, why the hurry? Under this contract no guns were to be delivered until the lapse of nearly three years, at which time some 500 odd guns were to be delivered. So far as the Canadian contract was concerned, they were within its terms if within two or three days before the end of three years they were able to make this delivery of guns. That is my understanding of the contract. Since it was to take three years to make delivery, why the hurry?

I pointed out also that the placing of the defence purchasing board recommended by the commissioner under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance rather than under the Department of National Defence was a complete condemnation.

Now I intend to touch upon a few points in the contract itself. I did not deal with these the other day. I had read the contract at that time, but since then I have read it again two or three times. I am going to point out a few items in the contract which seem rather extraordinary to me. So far as my experience goes, and I have had some experience as a minister in awarding large contracts, there is nearly always a clause in these contracts which forces the contractor to give something in the way of bond or marked cheque, sometimes for twenty-five per cent of the value of the contract, which is retained until the contract is practically completed. There is nothing of that sort in this contract. The financial solvency of the contractor is not assured so far as the government is concerned.

Then the licence is for ten years, and may be renewable for further periods of ten years. That makes it appear as though this is to be a continuing business which will go on for a very long time. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) referred the other day to the fact that the contract allows the costs of preliminary investigation. I venture to say that there is not a day in the year with the exception of Sunday on which there are not business men in the city of Ottawa looking for government business. Never in my life have I heard of a contractor or business man being paid his preliminary expenses for coming down here to look for a contract from the government.

The minister says the profit is not ten per cent, but 7½ per cent. I do not quite follow him, but at any rate a percentage is allowed on everything conceivable. To my mind, the provisions are far too wide. For example, under the contract he gets ten per cent on the cost of tools, dies, jigs and gauges purchased by the government. Can anyone tell me what justification there is for that? One of my hon. friends has just placed in my hand a clipping from the Globe and Mail of January 27, to the effect that contracts for a little more than $64,000 had been let in connection with machinery for this work. This is not a criticism, it is merely a statement of fact. It reads:

> Ottawa, Jan. 27.—Six Canadian firms have been awarded contracts to supply machinery required in connection with the manufacture of Bren machine guns, national defence department announced to-night.

The total figure given is $64,776, and this amount is to be paid by the Department of National Defence. Can anyone tell me why Major Hahn should get ten per cent of the cost of machinery purchased by the department? Yet there is a clause in the contract stating that. Surely there is no justification for it. He gets his percentage, whether it is 7½ per cent or 10 per cent I am not arguing at the moment, on salaries, on wages, on travelling expenses, on maintenance and repair of plant, on insurance, on depreciation, on legal fees and on the interest on bank loans in some cases, when made for additions to plant. Major Hahn is to get his percentage on all these items. That is covered by the clause to which I have just referred. The government buys the machinery for the plant and he gets his ten per cent. Then in case he is not sufficiently covered, there is a blanket clause to cover a lot of other things. Perhaps I should read this clause, which appears on page 10 of the contract.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Did the hon. leader of the opposition say that it is ten per cent on the capital cost of the machinery?

Mr. MANION: I have the contract here. Perhaps I should read the clause. It appears on page 5 and is as follows:

> Ten per centum of the actual cost of tools, dies, jigs, and gauges purchased by the party of the first part or the party of the second part;

The party of the first part is the government, and the party of the second part is Major Hahn. He gets ten per cent of the actual full cost. Then the clause goes on to deal with the other things to which I referred.

Mr. McGEER: That does not include the machinery.

Mr. MANION: It includes some material bought to manufacture that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Read the evidence on that point.

Mr. MANION: I am not going to plough through nearly five thousand pages of evidence; I am going by the report and by the contract. The only attempt that has been made by my hon. friends on the other side to read the evidence, has been made in an effort to cover this up with words.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The public accounts committee certainly will do it.

Mr. MANION: Let them go ahead and do it.

Mr. MacLENNAN: I do not take up much of the time of this house, and I would like to ask a question. I think the hon. gentleman ought to listen to the explanation in connection with that item. What is the explanation of the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition that Major Hahn apparently was to get some percentage of the money that was to be paid?

Mr. MANION: I am afraid this is not much of a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think that is a proper question.

Mr. MANION: I do not say this with disrespect, but I do not think it helps matters at all. The hon. gentleman has an opportunity to make his own speech; I am sure he is not going to make mine.

Mr. MacLENNAN: It was only to help the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MANION: I did not see much sign of it.

Then the government pays the cost of converting this factory into a gun manufacturing plant. Naturally, with all these things to be considered, the cost of the guns is unknown. I have heard it stated frequently, and I think the minister stated, that the cost of the guns is known. It is not; no one knows to-day what the guns are going to cost. Then, sir, on page 12 of the agreement there is a joker clause, which provides for payments in addition to the ten per cent, and I am sticking to the ten per cent because that is the figure used throughout the contract. Not only will the government have to pay that; under certain conditions they will have to pay more. It is stated that a standard price will be set for these guns; once that price is fixed, whether or not he gets anything in addition, will depend upon what Major Hahn does in regard to manufacturing costs. He can get a higher percentage if he manufactures these guns for less than the standard cost. Who is going to set that standard? It will be set by the minister and his department and Major Hahn. There is a very grave opening, to my mind, for some very peculiar work. This looks to me like a sort of joker in the contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I may tell my hon. friend that that was inserted by the interdepartmental committee against the actual objections of the officials of the Department of National Defence, in conformity with the British practice.

Mr. MANION: I am glad to hear my hon. friend say that, but if it was inserted against their wishes they should have had the courage to stop it from being inserted. The interdepartmental committee was overruled in almost everything else, and I do not see why the department or the government should let themselves be governed by the committee in this regard.

Mr. McGEER: Would it not be fair to say that this incentive clause was demanded by the British war office; that the Canadian department objected to it and the British war office insisted on that incentive clause being included?

Mr. MANION: I am afraid the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) and the minister will have to fight that out between themselves. The minister says it was inserted on the insistence of the interdepartmental committee; the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard says it was inserted by the British war office. I do not care by whom it was inserted; I do not think is was necessary. I think this man Hahn was making plenty out of this contract without the insertion of any such clause.

Then there is another extraordinary clause, to me the most extraordinary of all. My hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard made a very fine speech on this subject, on which I complimented him before he came in. Incidentally he was the only speaker whom I did compliment.

Miss MACPHAIL: They should make him Minister of National Defence; he was the only one to offer any sort of defence.

Mr. MANION: I wish, however, when he made his defence, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, with his fertile Hibernian brain, had dealt with the contract itself. Knowing contracts fairly well, as he does, I have no doubt he could have pointed out some of the bad points as well as the few good one he was able to find.

On page 14 of the contract there is one of the most extraordinary clauses I have ever seen, and I should like to read the important part of it to the house. I should like to know what it means, and I would like my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard, or any member of the government who can do so, to explain it. It provides:

—the party of the second part—

That is, Major Hahn.

—hereby agreeing that it will not employ any person on or in respect of any of the work required under this contract, or allow any person to have access to the plant wherein the manufacture of said Bren guns is being carried out unless and until it has furnished in writing to a party to be designated by the party of the first part—

That is the government.

—the name, address, and other particulars,—

Politics, I wonder?

—as may be required by the party so designated of each such person, and said party has approved of such person being employed on or having access, as the case may be, to the said work and plant.

That appears in the middle of page 14 of the contract.

Mr. McGEER: If my hon. friend would accept an explanation of that clause—

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman has made his speech, and I am going to explain this clause. During the course of his remarks my hon. friend said a man never listened himself into trouble, and I pass the advice back to him now. I listened to him fairly patiently the other night. When I read that clause I asked what it could mean but this: it simply says that Major Hahn or the John Inglis Company—and I am referring to Major Hahn as the John Inglis Company—cannot hire anybody without the consent of this government. They have to give the name, address and other particulars, to somebody designated by the government, before ay person can be hired.

Mr. ROGERS: I should like to ask one question. As I read it, the first part of that clause entirely explains it:

The party of the second part undertakes and agrees not to disclose or communicate any information concerning the said Bren guns to any unauthorized person or persons, nor shall they permit any unauthorized person or persons to have access to that part of their plant where said Bren guns are being constructed during the construction of the said Bren guns—

Then it goes on to the section quoted by my hon. friend, but why did he not quote the whole clause?

Mr. MANION: I did not quote it because I did not choose to do so. I allowed my hon. friend to quote it, but I should not have done so; he is following me and he can deal with it. I say that is not the case; I say secrecy has nothing to do with it. I say that is a political patronage clause for the purpose of giving this government an opportunity to hire its own friends. That is the only thing I can read into it. All they had to do was say that no one but Canadians could be hired, if they wanted to be particular; they could have seen that the employment was restricted to Canadians. Why should this government, in a contract given to a private individual, want the names, addresses and other information of all those to be employed? Incidentally some of the members from Toronto tell me that this is what is being done at the present time; that unless you are a Liberal you do not get a job in the Hahn plant right now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I assure my hon. friend that that is not with my knowledge.

Mr. MANION: That may be; I am not questioning that. I am simply saying it is probably with Mr. Plaxton's knowledge. He is the local member. And by the way, since hon. gentlemen opposite are asking me questions, I should like to know who is the man designated by the government. They say somebody has to be designated, and I should like to know who it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think there will be about thirty inspectors and auditors altogether.

Mr. MANION: But in regard to the employment?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have no knowledge at all.

Mr. MANION: Apparently someone is to be designated. To me that is the most extraordinary clause in the whole contract. Then there are a few other clauses on which I should like to touch. The government may cancel the contract, but if they do so Hahn receives $43,750; that is, if they cancel it before he starts to deliver these guns. If it is cancelled after he has started to manufacture them he receives more. If this contract is to be cancelled at all, supposing it should be cancelled by the government for cause, why should Hahn receive anything? Why should it be written into this contract that if it is cancelled before he begins to manufacture these guns he will receive $43,750? To my mind these provisions are sufficient to illustrate the preferred position of Hahn.

Then I should like to ask another question, touching a matter which I mentioned during my previous remarks. In his speech the other day the minister made no reference to it; neither did anybody else. This contract was signed by the Canadian government on March 22. It was tabled in the House of Commons on June 29, three months and seven days later. Why was it not tabled when it was signed? The house was sitting.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was never asked for.

Mr. MANION: Is that a proper answer, that it was never asked for? This contract should have been tabled immediately after it was signed, but it was not tabled until three or four days before the house prorogued, for the purpose of preventing discussion on the contract. Undoubtedly, sir, that is the whole answer. I say the whole matter was clumsily—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise to a point of order. On May 5 a press release was given to the press of Canada giving details of this contract. On May 16 the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) asked a question of me, and in my reply in this house I gave details as to this contract.

Mr. STIRLING: And on the point of order, if I may say so, the minister promised then to table the contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I said I should be glad to.

Mr. MANION: The contract was not tabled until two or three or four days—two days, I am informed—before the house adjourned, anyway. So that the whole affair had not a good appearance.

Then there was the stock promotion. These gentlemen—Major Hahn, the Plaxtons and Messrs. Cameron, Pointon and Merritt, a firm of stockbrokers in Toronto, got stock sufficient to give them nearly—indeed, over a million dollars in profits over and above what they paid for the stock. They paid around $100,000 for it, at 50 cents a share, and they could have sold it—they did sell some of it—at between $6 and $7 a share. So they stood to make over $1,000,000 in profits.

No Liberal standing upon the other side of the house has either endorsed or denied that statement. It was put on record by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) and the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh). I did not mention it in my previous remarks, but it was put on record, and nobody has discussed it. I hope the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), when he is on his feet, will give his opinion with respect to a contract for munitions which is framed in such a manner that the holders of that contract, before the plant is equipped, can clean up a million dollars, for nothing. They can put a million dollars in their pockets.

If that is the opinion of this government, then I say it is not the opinion of the people of Canada that that should be allowed. I say it is repugnant to the ideals of the Canadian people. If my hon. friends opposite are reading the press of this country to-day they will get that opinion clear enough, even from Liberal papers,—the Vancouver Sun, the Winnipeg Free Press and this very morning from the Ottawa Citizen.

I have received letters by the score. In fact, I have one in my pocket from a young man in which he says he is thirty-three years of age. This man lives in Montreal—I do not know him—and he says, "If this country is in danger I want to fight for it, but I don't want to fight for a lot of blood-sucking profiteers back home, for whom I would be risking my life." That is the attitude the young men have and if we are going to give them confidence in democratic institutions, confidence sufficient to make them loyal to their country, we must stop such dealings as this.

The Prime Minister took the same attitude in the house. He said no profits should be made out of war. I have already quoted his words, as they appear in Hansard of 1937. With the Prime Minister's ideals, against profits being made out of war, I wholly agree. But in this declaration, as in so many others, his actions do not agree with his expressed principles. I said on an earlier occasion that he was a theoretical reformer but a practical reactionary. I say in this instance that he is a theoretical idealist but a practical politician. If his ideals interfere with politics, then so much the worse for ideals. That is the only conclusion I can come to.

This contract is irregular. It shows the possibility of huge profits in stock deals, in complete contradiction of the ideals expressed by my right hon. friend. I have quoted statements of my own wherein I have expressed myself contrary to those methods. I have put on record my remarks in the book I published. I put myself on record in 1934 before the League of Nations, and in various other places. My proposals were that the contract should be cancelled, that Major Hahn might be recompensed if necessary, that the government should take over and carry on the work and that it should expropriate the plant. I pointed out, as I point out again, that there need be no delay in connection with the construction of these guns. It would suit the British government, because it has been pointed out over and over again in the report—certainly it has been stated clearly by Mr. Justice Davis—that the British government did not want to deal with a private contractor at all. They wanted to deal with the government of the day in Canada. I said this in closing my remarks—as I am about to do now:

> This is not ordinary government business. No one can deny that this is a question of life and death, a question of peace and war; it is a question of the life of our boys. It is a question of the safety of this country, and perhaps it is more than that, it is a question of our freedom as a nation.

That has been described by someone as drawing a long bow, and the suggestion is made that I was exaggerating. Am I exaggerating? I am going to put on record one statement I have in my hand which has nothing to do with the Bren gun contract, but which does deal with the defence of Canada. I hold in my hand a publication known as the Canadian Defence Quarterly. It is described as,—

> A magazine published for the purpose of providing a medium for the free discussion or expression of views on matters of interest in connection with defence.

At page 54 is an article by a young man—well, I suppose he is a young man; I do not know him. His name is Flight Lieutenant A. Carter, M.M.—Military Medal—Royal Canadian Air Force. I will read two paragraphs of his observations with respect to defence. He says:

> When the railway terminal was taken to Churchill and the grain elevators built, the transportation of grain and other produce by the shortest route from western Canada to Europe became a reality.
>
> However, this is also the shortest route from Europe to western Canada; not only that, but with the development of long range high speed aircraft, this route makes it possible for an enemy to establish bases near enough to permit of the bombing of all industrial centres from Quebec city to Fort William and, operating from off Churchill or Port Nelson on the west coast of the Hudson bay, even Winnipeg itself.
>
> Ships laden with aircraft, equipment, fuel and bombs could enter the Hudson bay via the north Atlantic and the Hudson strait, anchor off Churchill or Port Nelson and from this floating base assemble long range bombers which would necessarily have to be float planes or flying boats owing to lack of possible landing fields in this part of the country.

I will not read more, but I will show a map to hon. members and, in a few words, I will describe it. In this article Flight Lieutenant Carter sets out a map of the Hudson bay area, including Hudson bay and James bay, jutting down into the central part of the Dominion of Canada. He gives certain mileages—and I must say that I had them checked up, because I could not believe my eyes, although I thought I knew my geography fairly well. He gives the mileages from bases in Hudson and James bays, bases to which there is nothing in the world to prevent a German boat, or any other war ship, coming during a time of war. For instance, if a ship could escape, as did the Emden, during the early months of the last war, it could reach these points in Hudson and James bays. There would be nothing in the world to prevent them. We have nothing by way of defence at Hudson strait, Hudson bay or James bay.

On the map he sets out some mileages from points on Hudson bay and James bay, where he says an enemy ship could establish a base and enable enemy aircraft to make flights to some of the main centres of Canada. A aircraft carrier could discharge its aircraft and, from these places in Hudson bay and James bay, attack the different points in Canada. Would it surprise hon. members opposite to know that from Charlton island, down in the lower end of James bay, it is only 500 miles to where I am standing at this time?—just 500 miles. To Quebec, it is 525 miles; to Montreal, 525 miles; to Ottawa, 500 miles; to Toronto 550 miles, and to Niagara Falls—the farthest point—600 miles. To Sudbury, where we find the International Nickel Company, a huge industrial organization, it is only 400 miles. The mileage to the Abitibi dam is not given, but, following the scale used, it would appear to be about 150 miles. To Fort William it is 500 miles. Then, from a point in Hudson bay, namely from Churchill, it is 625 miles to Winnipeg, 600 miles from Port Nelson to Winnipeg and the same distance from another point farther down the coast of the bay.

In other words, an enemy ship could come across the Atlantic ocean and nothing in the world could stop it. It could go into Hudson bay or James bay and, with aircraft, operate over a long range, even as far as Niagara Falls. Those enemy aircraft could fly down and destroy Niagara Falls and Ottawa. They would travel a distance of only about 600 miles each way, or a total of 1,200 miles—and what is that, to-day, in view of present flying possibilities? They could destroy Ottawa, Montreal, Quebec, Toronto and Niagara Falls, none of which is more than 625 miles from the landing point.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What about the British and United States navies?

Mr. MANION: The British and United States navies existed in the early months of the war. But at that time the Emden went all around, to different parts of the world, and did a great deal of damage. There is nothing in the world which would stop such a raid. I am simply showing the possibilities which have been pointed out by this gentleman in the pages of the Canadian Defence Quarterly. I state these facts to show that I am not exaggerating when I say that this may mean the very life of our defence, and the very existence of our country as a nation.

So I submit that this is one of the most important questions before the Dominion of Canada at the present time. What condition are we in to protect ourselves? What condition have we got into, through the expenditure in the last two years of something like $70,000,000? I am told we are in a very, very poor condition. I have discussed the matter with various people who are much better informed in that regard than I am.

In view of these and many other facts I ask if the Prime Minister can sit quiet and endorse this deal? After all, it is his responsibility.

May I make it perfectly clear to the house and to the country that we have been discussing this important matter from the standpoint of what is best for Canada in defence, and of the method of providing munitions for that purpose.

My object, and the object of this party, is to insist upon the honest spending of the huge sums of money which are allocated for the defence of Canada.

I repeat now what I said in my last speech in this chamber, and on other occasions outside of the House of Commons, that there should be absolutely no profits whatsoever for anyone in the production of munitions to be used for the defence of our own country. That has been my attitude for nearly five years, and I am prepared to-day on behalf of this party to adhere now and in the future to that position. The attitude of our party is one of determination to stop, once and for all, any patronage or profiteering in munitions contracts.

Let the Prime Minister make any proposal he wishes to do away with such methods as the Davis report has revealed, and we will unhesitatingly support him.

In conclusion, may I say that this party has done what it conceives to be its duty. We cannot stop the reference to the public accounts committee, on which we have eight members out of fifty, and I assume the question will go to that committee. To that I have no particular objection, but I have no hope that the public accounts committee will add anything to the information already given to us by the Davis royal commission.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) has said just now that he believes the issue in this debate ought to be more clearly defined. I agree wholly with that. He has said that there has been a confusion in the minds of some who have spoken as to what is the real issue in this debate. I agree with that too. But I would suggest to him that the confusion, such as it is, to which he has referred, has not been limited by any means to those who have spoken from this side of the house, and I would add further, that he himself cannot escape his share of responsibility for having not clarified the issue in the first instance.

He has said just now that the form and substance of this contract constitute the real issue before us at this time. Am I correct in that?

Mr. MANION: No, that is not correct.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, my hon. friend did suggest that a few moments ago.

Mr. MANION: I gave the issue as I see it.

Mr. ROGERS: And he admitted a little later that when he spoke to this house in connection with the main motion more than a week ago, he had not read the contract at all.

Mr. MANION: I did not admit any such thing. The minister is entirely wrong. I said I had read the contract then, and I have read it three or four times since. I had read the contract. I do not want my hon. friend to misquote me. I read to the house what the issue was. I have a copy of what I said before me. I allowed the minister to rise and give a quotation while I was speaking, so perhaps he will allow me to read again what I said was the issue. It was this: The issue in a sentence is the whole method of buying munitions at a time when, because of threats by dictatorships against democracy, we in Canada, a peace-loving people, are forced at a cost of tens of millions of dollars to arm in our own defence in order to maintain our freedom as a nation. That, Mr. Speaker, is the issue.

Mr. ROGERS: I think my hearing is fairly good, and when I listened to my hon. friend he certainly did state that when he spoke to the house before he had not read the contract.

Mr. MANION: I did not state any such thing. If I did, I would have stated what was untrue.

Mr. ROGERS: I am willing to accept my hon. friend's word, if he says that, but I understood him to say that he had not read the contract.

This debate has continued now for something more than a week, and I am sure there are many in this house and beyond it who believe that every legitimate public interest would have been served if the questions at issue had been discussed over a period of two days, with a subsequent reference of all matters in dispute to the public accounts committee, as proposed originally by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil).

Why has this not been done? The reasons are abundantly clear. The leader of the opposition has preferred to prejudge and anticipate any report that might come from the public accounts committee. He has asked for the cancellation of a contract which was not condemned by the royal commissioner who was appointed to inquire into that contract and the circumstances surrounding its negotiation. At the same time the hon. gentleman has opposed, by implication at least, any further investigation of this contract and allied matters by a properly constituted committee of this house; and in this rather strange and devious course he has been aided and abetted throughout by members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, including the hon. member who moved the original motion to refer this question to the public accounts committee.

In the face of these facts, it is small wonder that we on this side of the house who are as anxious, as we have proved, as any members of this house to have this matter thoroughly investigated, are convinced that members of opposition groups have now replaced, as it were, what was at first the paramount consideration in their mind—the reference of this matter to the public accounts committee for further investigation—with considerations of immediate political advantage. I say this with some regret, but I question if any other conclusion can be drawn from the debate as it has developed in this house during the past week. It is not easy to see any good reason for the objection taken by the leader of the opposition to the reference of this question to the public accounts committee. The reason he gave—

Mr. MANION: I do not object now, if I may say so, but I want it properly discussed in this house, not drowned in the committee.

Mr. ROGERS: If my hon. friend wishes to make another speech, that is his privilege.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend himself interrupts very often.

Mr. ROGERS: But the reason he gave is not one which could be accepted by any member of this house, and I am going to recall that reason to the mind of my hon. friend. He said in effect that he did not want an investigation by a packed committee behind closed doors. Those were the words he used, and I suggest to him that in making that statement he did not bring credit either upon himself or upon the party he leads in this house. As a matter of fact, his attack was not merely upon the public accounts committee, but upon the entire committee system as it is practised under our parliamentary system. If what he said is correct of the public accounts committee now, it was true of the public accounts committee under any previous administration; and if it can be applied to the public accounts committee, it can be applied, I submit, to every committee of this house. My hon. friend in stating that he is not prepared to have this matter referred to the public accounts committee because that committee is a packed committee, and because, as he suggested, it met behind closed doors, which is absolutely incorrect, as he well knows, has by any rule of estoppel precluded himself from referring in the future any matter to any committee of this house.

Mr. MANION: That is just nonsense.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend expresses entire lack of confidence in any investigation that might be given to this matter by the public accounts committee.

Mr. MANION: That is different. I agree with that, but not as regards any other committee of the house. My hon. friend said that I condemned every committee of the house. I did not do any such thing.

Mr. ROGERS: How does my hon. friend distinguish between one committee and another?

Mr. MANION: If my hon. friend wants an answer I shall give it to him.

Mr. ROGERS: They are composed in entirely the same manner in accordance with the practice in this house and the practice at Westminster.

Mr. MANION: Does my hon. friend want an answer?

Mr. ROGERS: Let me put this question to the members of the opposition groups: From the moment that Colonel Drew wrote his article and it appeared in Maclean's magazine, has there been the slightest reluctance on the part of this government to submit this question to the most complete and exhaustive investigation? Was there any delay in creating the royal commission? Was there any lack of care in the selection of the royal commissioner? Was there any restriction put upon the terms of reference which would in any way prevent the commissioner from making a finding upon the facts?

Mr. MANION: There was by the counsel.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall deal with that in a moment. The answers to these questions are, I suggest, clear and conclusive, but apparently they have to be repeated again and again in order to correct the impression which speakers from the opposition are attempting to have go out from this house to the country. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) put the position in the clearest possible light when he opened this debate on February 3. I quote his words:

> The article was published on September 1, and the minister reached Ottawa a few days after. When he arrived in Ottawa there was a meeting of the cabinet which he attended. He brought the matter up for the consideration of the government, and he felt, and other members of the government felt, that if this article with the allegations it contained were to go without investigation until parliament reassembled, which would be some time in the new year, there would immediately be created in the public mind considerable concern over these allegations and it would be assumed that the government was seeking to avoid inquiry into the matter. The government took the alternative course of not delaying for one moment the matter of instituting an inquiry, and adopted the course which would afford the most effective means for the fullest and most searching kind of inquiry, namely, an inquiry under royal commission by a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada.

So far as I can recall, the only objection taken by anyone to the form of the original inquiry by Mr. Justice Davis was that raised by the leader of the opposition when he suggested that the commissioner had submitted under pressure of counsel to a restriction of the scope of his findings. I do not wish to misquote my hon. friend, and I shall give his exact words on that point, on page 706 of Hansard:

> In other words I find myself asking, was the whole investigation turned into a farce, in this way: that Mr. Justice Davis apparently desired to give opinions but was influenced so strongly by the views I have quoted, including the views of government counsel, that he did not, presumably, dare to do so?

Those are the words used by my hon. friend when referring to this matter.

No one who has even a slight acquaintance with Mr. Justice Davis would believe for one moment that he would be influenced by counsel against his better judgment, and I suggest that it is a reflection on him even to make a suggestion of that kind. The truth is that any restrictions accepted by the commission were not imposed by counsel at all but were based upon the provisions of the Inquiries Act, combined with the fact that Colonel Drew, with more caution than he usually displays, failed to make any specific charges against any individual in the article published in Maclean's magazine. So that the suggestion of my hon. friend that it was counsel who imposed a restriction upon the commissioner is surely very wide of the actual facts.

Mr. MANION: Would the hon. gentleman quote—I shall not quote it—what Mr. Justice Davis said about that on page 35 of the report?

Mr. ROGERS: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have read the report; I am capable of forming my conclusions from the report in the same way as my hon. friend has done, and I suggest to him that it was for the commissioner to decide—

Mr. MANION: According to the report, he did decide.

Mr. ROGERS: —after arguments of counsel, whether or not he could deal with charges which had not been made specifically by Colonel Drew in the article written in Maclean's magazine. There was no restriction imposed by counsel, least of all any restriction imposed by the government. The only restrictions accepted by the commissioner were those implicit in the terms of the Inquiries Act.

Let me turn now to the issue which is actually before the house in this debate. Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to state the issue as I see it, even as, a little while ago, he stated it as he saw it. In simple terms the issue before us is this: In the light of the report made by the royal commissioner on the Bren gun contract, should that contract be cancelled forthwith, or should the contract itself and the several questions referred by the commissioner for the consideration of parliament be referred to the public accounts committee for further investigation and report? These are the two alternative procedures before the house at the present time. In his original amendment my hon. friend proposed that the Bren gun contract should be cancelled forthwith. When that was ruled out of order, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) moved another amendment which, I suggest, was in effect for the same purpose, namely to bring about the immediate cancellation of the Bren gun contract; whereas the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) who moved the original motion suggested that the report on the contract and allied matters should be referred for investigation to the public accounts committee.

In the first place neither the report of the commissioner nor anything that has been said in the course of this debate can be urged in justification of the cancellation of the Bren gun contract. There are only two sufficient reasons which might be given for the cancellation of this contract. The first is that the contract is tainted with fraud and corruption, and the second is that in substance it is not a good contract. I think at this point it might be useful to refer to what was said a little while ago by the leader of the opposition with respect to charges that had been made by Colonel George Drew, charges which subsequently were fully investigated by Mr. Justice Davis. The leader of the opposition has said that he is now making no charges of fraud or corruption with respect to the Bren gun contract. In the most recent issue of Maclean's magazine I read these words:

> There is not one word in the Davis report which disputes the facts disclosed in Maclean's article.

But I suggest that one thing which has led to the confusion in this debate is this, that members on the opposition side have been dealing in large measure with the evidence brought by Colonel Drew before the commission, and have been ready to draw inferences from that evidence which were entirely rejected by the royal commissioner, Mr. Justice Davis. Maclean's magazine refers to the facts having been fully borne out by the investigation. But it was not the facts alleged by Colonel George Drew in the article which he wrote in Maclean's magazine that caused the most damage in this country, and my hon. friend, I am sure, is fully aware of this. What really tended to create suspicion and undermine confidence in the Department of National Defence were the insinuations and innuendoes which were drawn from those facts by Colonel George Drew. I suggest that the whole purpose of the article written originally by Colonel Drew and published by Maclean's magazine was to prove that there had been fraud and corruption in connection with the Bren gun contract.

Mr. DUNNING: To make the Canadian people think so.

Mr. ROGERS: Undoubtedly that was the impression which was sought to be created in this country by the publication of the article by Colonel George Drew. If there was any doubt on that matter, it was dissolved by the charge made by Colonel Drew to the commissioner in the course of the investigation. Colonel Drew attempted to prove fraud and corruption in this contract and he failed completely to do so. That was the purpose of the attack on the minister and the Department of National Defence. That was the impression which was sought to be created in the country by the proprietors of Maclean's magazine. If I am asked why these specific accusations were not made in the original article, the answer is so clear that he who runs may read. Colonel Drew knew that what he wrote in that original article would expose him to the law of libel and slander, and he preferred apparently to damage other reputations rather than risk his own. He knew equally that what he said in the course of the inquiry before Mr. Justice Davis would be protected by the privilege which surrounds judicial proceedings.

Mr. CAHAN: No, no. The minister certainly cannot go that far. Even a commissioner is not protected.

Mr. ROGERS: I am going to refer in a moment to what Colonel Drew said.

Mr. CAHAN: I have read a judgment of the judicial committee to the effect that the commissioner himself is not protected by any privilege.

Mr. ROGERS: If it was not the intention of Colonel Drew to prove that there had been fraud and corruption in connection with this contract, how else can one account for his boast, given at the Ontario Conservative convention, that the contract itself would be cancelled before the opening of this session of parliament? Surely it would be only upon the basis of some fraud or corruption in connection with the contract that any government would have been justified in cancelling it, particularly in view of its close connection with the contract let by the British war office. If there had been fraud or corruption in connection with this contract it would have been condemned with equal vigour on all sides of the house. But upon that point the commissioner has left no one in doubt. The leader of the opposition apparently objects to the repeated reading of that section of the report which deals with this important matter, but I suggest that if this entire question is to be placed fairly before the people of the country it is well that we should remember three things: First, that it was the intention of this article in the first place to create the suspicion that there had been fraud and corruption in connection with this contract; second, that all the evidence in the matter was brought before the commissioner; and, third, that the commissioner found that there was no evidence which would justify even the suspicion of fraud or corruption. These are his words:

> There is no evidence that any member of the Senate or of the House of Commons of Canada was admitted to any share or part of the contract, or to any benefits to arise therefrom, or had been promised or given any suggestion that he was to have any share or part of the contract or was to be admitted to any share or part of the contract, or to any benefit to arise from the contract.
>
> The evidence relating to the activities of Mr. Hugh Plaxton prior to the making of the contract has already been set out or referred to in this report, and with that exception (and excepting of course the minister presiding over the Department of National Defence) there is no evidence that any member of the Senate or of the House of Commons of Canada had any connection with or took any part in the discussions or negotiations leading up to the contract.
>
> There is no evidence that any senator or member had any connection with or took any part in the affairs of the company or in the sale of shares or securities of the company.
>
> I think it right to say that there is no evidence (nor is there in the evidence any ground for suspicion) that the minister or the deputy minister or any officer or official of the Department of National Defence was guilty of any act of corruption or anything in the nature of corruption.

Surely in the light of the evidence brought before the commissioner, and in the light of his own findings, it could not be suggested for one moment that there was the slightest ground for the cancellation of the Bren gun contract because of any taint of fraud or corruption.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister is trying to clear up the situation, and I should like to understand whether from his standpoint the granting of special privileges to one individual would come in any way under his terms of "fraud" and "corruption?"

Mr. ROGERS: Upon that point I should say that all the evidence was before the commissioner as to the method of negotiation of the contract, and the commissioner found no evidence of fraud or corruption with respect to that. I should think that would answer my hon. friend completely. The commissioner says further at page 49 of the report:

> No substantial objection can be taken in my view to the provisions of the Canadian contract, though in the absence of any competitive bids or terms of manufacture, I am unable to pass upon the substance as distinct from the form of the contract.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is that not the point?

Mr. ROGERS: I am coming to that:

> It is important, of course, that the contract be a good and businesslike contract; but what is more important after all is whether the procedure adopted in making the contract was that best calculated to protect the public interest and to secure the confidence of the people of Canada that there would be no improper profiteering in the private manufacture of war armaments for the defence of the country.

I have read the entire paragraph given in the report. We will take it for granted, as it ought to have been taken for granted from the beginning of the discussion, that there is no ground whatsoever for the cancellation of the contract upon the basis of its having been tainted in the slightest degree with fraud or corruption.

That brings us to the question of the substance of the contract, as to whether it was in all the circumstances a good contract. The leader of the opposition said that there had been some confusion in the minds of speakers in this chamber with respect to the matters that were really at issue, and I have no doubt that he had in mind that this house had not given sufficient attention to the substance of the contract. Well, I have followed this debate carefully from day to day and certainly the suggestion of my hon. friend did not apply to a number of addresses given from this side of the house by those who were competent to refer in an authoritative manner to the provisions of this contract. I have in mind the speech from the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. McAvity), the speech of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), and the speech of my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). These men spoke either as engineers or as lawyers with respect to both the form and the substance of the contract, and I recall that the member for St. John-Albert stated that the practice followed in the awarding of the contract did not differ in any important respect from the procedure followed in the letting of contracts by the imperial munitions board during the last war. Not only that, but the Minister of Transport, who is an engineer of long experience, also stated, after a thorough examination of the contract, that in substance it was the kind of contract which would be regarded as a good one had it been entered into by a private corporation in this country.

There is the further question whether or not this contract ought to be rejected simply because it was not given after competitive bids. There are large questions of policy involved in any suggestion of that kind, and that question of policy has been discussed to a limited extent in the course of this debate. It is stated against the method actually followed that it involved the giving of a special privilege to one selected contractor, and the suggestion was made that this practice of necessity should be condemned, because it assumed the form of political patronage. Now, it does seem to me, as one examines the question in terms of policy, that those who say that we should manufacture all munitions directly in government factories are at least logical to this extent, that by that method one would avoid any suggestion of patronage. But I have not heard it suggested seriously by anyone who has taken part in this debate that in the light of the urgency of the last two years and the critical position of international affairs it would have been wise or practicable for this country to accept the delay that would have been consequent upon the manufacture of Bren guns in a government factory which did not at that time exist.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the minister explain why not?

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend is fully aware of the fact that the arsenal at Valcartier deals with the manufacture of ammunition but to my knowledge, at any rate, has nothing to do with the manufacture of guns. The plant at Lindsay was dismantled at the close of the war and was not equipped to produce Bren guns; and for a government to set up an entirely new factory to manufacture guns of this kind—

Mr. HOMUTH: May I ask—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. HOMUTH: I just want to ask this question. Is it not a fact that they have built and are equipping an entirely new factory for the purpose?

Mr. ROGERS: The question of policy has been discussed before in this house and will be discussed again. It may be discussed very properly before the public accounts committee. The negotiations with respect to this matter, let us remember, continued over a period of two years.

An hon. MEMBER: Three years.

Mr. ROGERS: Three years, if you will. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) stated that in theory he favoured government manufacture of munitions, but at the same time he was obliged to take account of practical necessities. Can my hon. friends point to any other country such as Great Britain or the United States, which under the conditions that have existed during the last few years have taken the position that all munitions should be manufactured directly by the government. I know of no such country. It has been found necessary in both Great Britain and the United States to mobilize private enterprise in order to ensure that there shall be that constant supply of munitions which is absolutely necessary to maintain the security of the country.

Mr. COLDWELL: France is doing it.

Mr. BRADETTE: Look at the mess she got into.

Mr. ROGERS: France is not dependent on that alone. In recent months France was faced with a complete stoppage of munitions probably because of the very policy which she had then adopted. I admit without question that there are strong arguments to be brought forward on the side of government manufacture of munitions, but so far as the immediate need is concerned I am not convinced by any means that it would have been feasible for this country to have manufactured Bren guns in the manner thus indicated.

I want to go further. If you rule out government manufacture of munitions, there is only one other method I know of which excludes completely the possibility of the kind of charges of patronage which have been brought against the present contract. That other method would be open tenders by public advertisement. I have not heard it suggested by anyone in this house that this would have been either a wise or a practicable method to have followed in the present instance. What has been suggested in this house as an alternate procedure which might have been followed in connection with this contract? The other day the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) when discussing this matter suggested that the proper way to have dealt with it would have been to invite tenders from half a dozen industrial companies. Am I correct in that?

Mr. STEWART: That was just one method. There was also that of public tenders.

Mr. ROGERS: I think I am correct in saying that he thought it was the best method.

Mr. MANION: It would be better than only one.

Mr. ROGERS: Would the hon. member for Leeds suggest for one moment that by inviting tenders you would exclude the possibility of patronage? I ask that question deliberately. Some years ago my hon. friend presided over the Department of Public Works at a time when the Public Works Construction Act was passed. I am sure he is fully aware of the fact that by inviting tenders from a number of selected contractors not only do you not exclude patronage, you promote it.

Mr. STEWART: I want to say to the hon. gentleman that I am not aware of anything of the kind. In the Department of Public Works the method was public tenders; I do not know about the other departments.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. ROGERS: I have no desire to labour this here because I want to deal rather with the question of principle, but my hon. friend did suggest that the proper way to avoid patronage was to invite tenders rather than to give a contract to some particular person who was selected for the purpose.

Mr. STEWART: One person, yes.

Mr. ROGERS: I suggest that by no means is his method a remedy. I have in my hand a long list of contracts which were let by him during 1934 and 1935. In each instance the contract was either not awarded to the lowest bidder, or given at the lowest price to someone who was not the lowest bidder.

Mr. STEWART: Exactly. I said the reason for doing that was to prevent one contractor from having too great a number of contracts, but the contract was always given at the lowest price.

Mr. ROGERS: What are we to understand from that? Is the money voted by parliament for unemployment purposes to be used to satisfy contractors, or is it to be used in the most economical way for the purpose intended? I find it difficult to understand the reasoning of my hon. friend on that point.

Mr. HOWE: It is not very good.

Mr. ROGERS: Surely the question of the substance of this contract is one that can be considered far more effectively, not behind the closed doors of the public accounts committee but in the clear, open light of the public accounts committee and under conditions which will permit hon. members to obtain all the information they may desire from the officials of the Department of National Defence. One of the recommendations contained in the report of the royal commission has some relation to the matter I have just been discussing. That recommendation is that there should be set up a national defence purchasing board to be responsible directly to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). That question was one which had been considered by the Minister of National Defence before the inquiry by Mr. Justice Davis. The minister has already stated in the house the reason why he did not think it wise to make that suggestion while giving his evidence before the commission. There certainly has been no delay on the part of the government in accepting that one specific recommendation by Mr. Justice Davis. Certainly, so far as the future is concerned, the setting up of a board as recommended by the commission would remove to a large degree any suggestion of patronage in connection with the awarding of munitions contracts.

Despite what he said a few moments ago I doubt very much if the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) would lend himself to the view that with the present state of world affairs and with the present urgency connected with the manufacture of armaments it would be feasible for this country to enter upon the manufacture of armaments in government factories exclusively. Mind you, when I speak of armaments I refer not merely to guns but to shells and aircraft. He knows perfectly well that just recently the British government let large contracts to private companies in Canada for the manufacture of aircraft. No one would believe for a moment that it would have been possible for those contracts to have come to this country if we had been entirely dependent upon government factories for the manufacture of our own aircraft.

These questions are questions of policy referred by Mr. Justice Davis to this parliament for consideration. They have rereceived some consideration during the course of this debate. They can be investigated further by the public accounts committee, and they can be discussed again when the report of that committe comes before this house. But I suggest that there has been nothing said either during the early course of this debate or to-day by the leader of the opposition which justifies the cancellation of the Bren gun contract, either on the basis of its having been tainted with fraud or corruption or on the basis of its not being a good contract in substance.

May I suggest this finally? From the outset this government has recognized the danger, not merely to the Department of National Defence but to our democratic institutions of government, of permitting suspicion to surround the administration of any of our great public departments. The suspicion caused by the article written by Colonel George Drew, if it had been allowed to continue without immediate inquiry, would have undermined the usefulness of the Department of National Defence. And believe me, what one might describe as the poisonous smoke fumes of rumour and suspicion have done more to impair democratic institutions in this country than any consuming flames of corruption or malfeasance in high places. We owe it to ourselves as a parliament and as a government to see that there is no cause for suspicion; that charges, when made in good faith, are given immediate investigation; and that if fraud or corruption should be found, it should be dealt with summarily and completely.

This government, I suggest, in the course of what has happened with respect to this inquiry, has given evidence of its good faith. We have done everything possible to facilitate investigation and remove suspicion, and I suggest that the tactics adopted by the opposition at least point to this, that they have been ready to delay further investigation and preserve suspicion. In the long run I have no doubt whatever as to the verdict of the country upon the propriety of the two alternative courses that have been followed, on the one hand by the government and on the other by the opposition.

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, the debate on the motion concerning the Bren gun contract has been before this house now for ten days, and during most of that time I have tried to listen carefully in order to understand, if possible, the motives behind the speeches and demands being made from various parts of this chamber. I am glad to have heard from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) to-day the issues at stake, as he described it; but I am sorry that he read so quickly that it was impossible for me to take down what he called the real issue. I think, however, after all my listening during the past few days I have arrived at an understanding of the real issue as it is seen by the official opposition.

I am going to deal with that later on, but I am sure I have an understanding of the real issue as it is seen by my socialist friends, because the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) put it very clearly when he said that the real issue, in a nutshell, was whether munitions or guns should be supplied by privately owned or government-owned factories. That is quite clear and I want to deal with those two points. In doing so, I should like to go back to other statements made by hon. members on both wings of the opposition, in order to see what they thought about munitions, Bren guns and other matters two or three years ago. In the meantime I want to convey to the house my impression of the genesis of the row that has been before us for ten days and to give my opinions as they have been clarified by reading, thinking and much listening. I want to thank my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) for the advice he gave the house the other day, that one can never listen himself into trouble, because I have been doing a great deal of listening.

I think it is well known and understood that the real cause of this discussion arose when an ambitious politician in the province of Ontario found it necessary to earn some kudos. A convention was to be held at which a permanent leader was to be chosen for his party. It was charged by many that the then leader of the party was too matter of fact and lacked colour. We all know that the leader of the provincial party at that time, who has sat in this house for many years, was a man whose word was reliable and who described conditions as he saw them. He was not a lawyer-writer or a pamphleteer; he was a farmer, in touch with realities and with the soil that kept him sane. But this aspirant to that post wanted to displace him, and to do so he had to stir up something sensational. There was not much use in talking against the government of Ontario, because it had been endorsed by the people of that province only recently, so the natural thing to do was to turn to the dominion government, then in office for three years, which in the natural course of events would within a year or two have to go to the country for re-election. But he did see in Ontario one example, after which he patterned his conduct. He saw the young, brilliant, aggressive, successful premier of that province, who had captured the imagination of the people of Ontario as probably no other leader had since confederation, so he thought he would follow that pattern as far as possible. But he forgot that the successful premier of Ontario, with all the audacity of his sensationalism and all his brilliancy, had one thing that was not possessed by this aspirant to public office. That was the ability to gather facts which he could present against a moribund government, and evidence that would stand up under any investigation which might be held. But this political writer got in touch with a magazine that has always been opposed, in a greater or lesser degree, to Liberal parties and Liberal policies, and sold this article containing these insinuations.

Mr. LENNARD: That shows their good sense.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Well, possibly it does. I am not going to prejudge the contract at the present time. A little while ago the leader of the opposition said that hon. members on this side had not defended the contract. The issue is not the defence of the contract; the issue is and has been whether or not this contract should be referred to the public accounts committee for further study in regard to points with which the commissioner himself said he would not deal because they were matters for the goverment and parliament to consider.

Circumstances as well as time furthered the ambition of Mr. Drew. From 1920 until about 1933 the minds of people in Canada and elsewhere were filled with visions of collective security. The people of this country, together with the people of all the democracies, wanted to be sure that peace would reign in our time. Defence expenditures and preparations were reduced to a minimum. Until 1930 not much money was spent by the defence department of Canada, and from 1930 to 1935 still less. That suited most Canadians who were sincere lovers of peace, as we all are, who thought they could safely afford to trust to the goodwill of other nations and spend no money on our defence. So, at a time when social services were costing hundreds of millions of dollars, defence was being neglected; and because the Canadian people were not defence conscious and were in a state of apathy, little was said about the matter.

But what happened in 1935? A young and brilliant man was appointed Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). He knew something of the realities of war. He knew it was not sufficient for the people of Canada to be peace-minded or to want to live at peace with their neighbours, in order to ensure peace. He knew that in common decency and in the exercise of common sense the government and parliament must do something, even if it were only to compel respect for Canada's neutrality, were such desirable.

In 1936 the Department of National Defence asked for and secured additional grants. We thought at one time and we have heard hon. members from the far corner say—from my socialist friend's corner, I would tell the hon. member of the social credit party who queries me; I would not confuse him with any others—that we have the British navy and the power of the United States to defend us. That situation has changed very greatly in the past three or four years. We have seen that Great Britain's naval power has sufficient to do to defend her own interests, without being handicapped by defending Canada. While we know the United States will do everything it is possible for one friendly country to do for another, in the event of aggression, yet there are some things Canada must do for herself, if she is going to retain her self-respect, and if she is going to help the United States, if we were allied with them in the event of any difficulty.

What other changes have come about? We have seen fleets of aircraft flying the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. Soviet fliers flew across the north pole, en route from Moscow to California. Our boasted defence by three oceans, one on each side of us and one to the north, has been made less secure through inventions and developments of the past few years.

Canada has had to face a change. All right. Three years ago an increase was asked in the estimates for the Department of National Defence. A further increase was asked two years ago; there was one a year ago and this year another increase is requested from the people of Canada and we find this debate arising out of these facts. This is natural, because we have it on the best authority in the world that where expenditures of that kind are being made there will the critics seek to find trouble; for wherever the carcass is, there shall the vultures be gathered together.

In this department, which was beginning to rebuild outside mere routine organization, it was thought there might be the possibility of finding something out of place. No one thinks of looking for much trouble in the Post Office Department, because it has been operating for many years, handling the same matters on a large scale throughout the country. The routine is set and established. We had the case of the Department of National Defence following a new procedure when it began to take steps in connection with the purchase of aeroplanes, the appointing and training of the personnel for aircraft, the buying of artillery, machine guns and ammunition of different types. There is the possibility, despite the highest qualifications, of honest mistakes being made and of judgment, even when quite honest, not being very sound. That is where the public is more easily led to believe that there might be something wrong.

Not only in the article published in Maclean's magazine has suspicion of that kind been stirred up. Three years ago my hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation kept asking hon. members on this side of the house: "Against whom are you arming?"—indicating there was no need for arming. But the minister went on with his job. Shortly after he commenced we found opposition to his efforts—and of course the leader of the opposition of to-day is not responsible for that. But we heard his predecessor in the house uttering veiled charges, making insinuations, throwing around innuendoes, and using expressions which led some of my friends in the social credit party who had more recently come to parliament to rise in their places and ask when the charges made by the right hon. gentleman who then led the opposition would be dealt with.

As a matter of fact, he made no charges. He was too skilled a politician, lawyer and parliamentarian to make any charges concerning which he did not have evidence. But he misled hon. members into thinking that he had charges up his sleeve. Suspicion grew, because it found food to feed on in the minds of two classes of people, namely those who could not expect a Grit government or the Liberal party to do anything rightly, and those who are so constituted that they could see no good which could come from spending money on the national defence of Canada, believing that we should trust to collective action for our defence. Those two types of individuals have been glad to hear aspersions cast upon the personnel of the department and upon the principle of spending money for enlarged defence. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) took the right course—every hon. member agrees that he did—in appointing a royal commission, so that the whole matter might be sifted out.

One of the other circumstances in connection with the charge was that the Bren gun, the contract concerning which was to be investigated, was a new weapon. People in Canada did not know about it. For five years it had been under trial. It had been improved and modified after invention and before it was sold to the British authorities. It was adopted by Great Britain, and it was later decided that Canada should acquire 7,000 of those guns. I need not say more about that, because it is agreed by the commissioner, and those qualified to judge, that the Bren gun is going to fill the bill. Before I take my seat I shall have a few words to say about the attempt made by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) to question the assurance of the British government and war office on the value of the Bren gun. I am not very much surprised, because it is part and parcel of this same kind of balderdash, as the leader of the opposition calls it, that is talked about defence in Canada. But I do say it is going too far to say that this government has been deceived by the British government, which is in a much better position to judge than we are, and I say an attempt should not be made to stir up suspicion in the minds of the Canadian people in that connection.

Major Hahn came to Ottawa and saw a sample of the gun. He thought it would be a good thing for himself, or for any other man, to secure the right to make that gun in Canada. I am quite sure he also thought, in view of the very high testimonial given to him by hon. members directly opposite, that it would be, as well, a patriotic thing to do. I know there are some people who sneer at patriotism and who like Johnson describe it as the last refuge or the last resort of a scoundrel. But in Canada there are many patriotic industrialists, just as there are patriotic people in the primary industries. Major Hahn decided that he would equip himself with knowledge, and fit himself by investigation.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, before six o'clock I was pointing out how Major Hahn went to London and by means of an introduction to the war office secured permission to visit the Enfield factory and was there able to gather a certain amount of information. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), just before he finished speaking, dealt with the necessity of having a pass for entering the Inglis plant at Toronto, but I think that is exactly in line with what happened to Major Hahn in England. He could not get into the Enfield plant without first securing an introduction to the war office, and if you or I, Mr. Speaker, were to seek to enter that plant we would rightfully be told to show our credentials before we could go through it. We in this country do take a little exception to a thing like that because we have not been accustomed to it, but anybody who knows what is going on in Europe must realize the necessity that exists there, and the increasing necessity there will be here, for these precautions. One point that is evident is that Major Hahn undoubtedly sold himself, as the phrase is, to the British authorities as a man who could be useful to them in securing a secondary supply of munitions in Canada.

In reply to the leader of the opposition, who said that it was months after the Canadian contract was signed before the British contract was signed, which is true, I would point out that according to the report:

> It was on November 9, 1937, that the war office had informed the department by cable that the British government was then "ready to negotiate" for the purchase of five thousand Bren guns to be manufactured by the John Inglis Company subject to some substantial reduction in cost.

That agreement was made and is now being carried out in the new part of a plant that had been arranged for by the new Inglis company long before there was any expectation that they would be manufacturing Bren guns.

I am going to deal very briefly with a few items in the report, some of which have already been discussed, and some of which have been emphasized, but others not.

On page 49 of the report we are told that there was a saving of something like $1,300,000 by the Canadian government going into a joint contract. It is true the contract is on a cost-plus basis, and that no one knows what it is going to cost us. No one in North America has ever yet made such a gun, and at the time of making the contract the British war office was not able to state its costs. The Enfield factory was just going into production. So no blame should be attached to the government at Ottawa for giving the contract on a cost-plus basis.

Second, the commissioner points out:

> The estimated profit to be made, according to evidence before the commission, will not exceed 7·76 per cent.

Many of my Conservative friends admit that this is not an unreasonble profit. The hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh), speaking in the house the other night, said that it is a reasonable profit. He went on to say:

> It is a small profit considering the work they intend to do.

As a matter of fact, unless these guns are manufactured with the greatest possible care and in a most efficient manner the company is liable to find itself with very severe losses under the terms of the contract.

The commissioner, among other things, says in his report, and this is worth while emphasizing to the house:

> Everyone who it was thought might be able to throw light on the subject of the inquiry gave testimony voluntarily. It was not necessary to issue a single subpoena to enforce the attendance of any witness. Your commissioner is satisfied that all available documents in any way relevant and material to the subject matter of the inquiry were presented to the commission.
>
> The suitability of the said machine gun and the urgency of its purchase or production for the use of the defence forces of Canada was common ground with all parties represented before the commission.

I think it is extremely desirable that we should have that knowledge. Again he says:

> The facts are all in evidence; and as said by government counsel in opening their argument, "So far as the facts are concerned, there are very few which are even in dispute."
>
> I cannot myself recall at the moment any fact to which direct proof was adduced that is in dispute.

To quote again from the commissioner's report:

Mr. Elliott said that the chairman (the deputy minister of national defence) pointed out that "his department had followed the practice of the British government where competition is not always obtainable, and they unhesitatingly go into non-competitive contracts in order to secure their requirements. In this particular case the British government had picked the firm to manufacture its guns."

And apparently that fact was not in dispute.

I am going to pass over the remarks of the commissioner in dealing with the fourth and last meeting of the interdepartmental committee which prepared the contract and finished its work just before three o'clock in the morning of March 17, 1938. But from November 9, 1937, the British war office put pressure on the department here to get the contract signed and to get it under way.

A good deal has been heard about pressure being applied by the Department of National Defence of Canada on the war office, but that pressure was in regard to one thing only, as I read in the report. The war office authorities were queried time and again whether or not they were going to place orders for guns in Canada, not urging them to place orders in Canada, but asking them whether they intended to do so or not, following negotiations with respect to the matter at an earlier date.

I quote again from page 49 of the report:

On the question whether tenders should have been called for, government counsel argued that there was ample evidence on which it could be found that a specialty of this kind (i.e., the Bren gun), a new art in Canada, is not a subject for the calling of tenders from manufacturers; that it has to be dealt with on a cost-plus basis, at least in the initial stages.

Evidence was offered by government counsel to that effect, and the commissioner in his wisdom thought it was not necessary to receive it. He says at page 50:

The more I think of it, the more I can see the almost endless scope of such a line of evidence—one manufacturer saying one thing, and another manufacturer saying something else, one manufacturer actuated by one set of considerations and another manufacturer actuated by different considerations. Where am I going to stop? This may land me in a hopeless and endless controversy.

What is obvious, of course, is this: that if the government has an article to be manufactured for which by its very nature it is not practicable to call for tenders and the policy of private manufacture is to be adopted, then at once the heaviest sort of responsibility falls upon those charged with the duty of selecting the individual, firm or corporation to manufacture the article.

Again he says:

There is no evidence that any member of the Senate or of the House of Commons of Canada was admitted to any share or part of the contract, or to any benefits to arise therefrom.

The commissioner says that apart from the member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton), and, of course, the Minister of National Defence:

There is no evidence that any member of the Senate or of the House of Commons of Canada had any connection with or took any part in the discussions or negotiations leading up to the contract.

There is no evidence that any senator or member had any connection with or took any part in the affairs of the company or in the sale of shares or securities of the company.

I think it right to say that there is no evidence (nor is there in the evidence any ground for suspicion) that the minister or the deputy minister or any officer or official of the Department of National Defence was guilty of any act of corruption or anything in the nature of corruption.

The commissioner also says on page 35:

No charge of misconduct, however, were formulated against any particular person.

When you read the insinuations contained in the original charge, and then read the judge's statement that no charges of misconduct were formulated against any particular person; that there is no evidence, nor is there in the evidence any ground for suspicion that any member of parliament or senator or officer or official of the Department of National Defence was guilty of any act of corruption or anything in the nature of corruption, it makes it still more amazing, Mr. Speaker, that there should be such a fuss cooked up over this matter.

Time is passing rapidly and I must leave out many of the items with which I was going to deal.

As I understood the speech of the leader of the opposition to-day, it was—I could not write it down as fast as he read it—that the contract was unfair because it had been given to Major Hahn and not given to somebody else; that it placed other industrialists at a disadvantage in not getting a share of the contract; furthermore that Major Hahn or his company might make a profit of a million dollars through the transaction in addition to the real profits, and it was unfair that this should be done. I can quite understand the indignation of someone waking up and finding that another has got ahead of him. There is an old proverb that it is the early bird that catches the worm.

Mr. HARRIS: The profit.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member for Danforth I think will agree with me that any man who has shown himself to be the kind of man my Conservative friends say Major Hahn is, with the courage, faith, initiative, energy and those other qualities that make a go-getting salesman, the type of man who has helped build up industry in Canada and who, long before the task comes along, prepares himself for a task that may have to be done, is the type of man who is entitled to a reward when the opportunity offers. I say further that if we had more of that enterprise in Canada to-day that we had forty, fifty and a hundred years ago we should be the better off for it. I notice that my Conservative friends—and I do not want to quote the statements of many of them because it would take too long—were very moderate indeed in the last few days in dealing with these matters regarding Major Hahn.

In connection with the sale of stock I want to quote a few words of the attorney general of Ontario. In a speech made by him on January 31, he said:

> Shares representing more than 73 per cent of the authorized capital stock of the John Inglis Company, Toronto, are held in escrow in the Bank of Montreal and cannot be dealt with without consent of the Ontario securities commission, Attorney General Gordon Conant said to-day.
>
> "Obviously these 184,000 shares are an ample guarantee that the control of the company will never pass to any foreign interests," he said....
>
> Mr. Conant said Colonel George Drew, Ontario Conservative leader, was "very bold and extravagant" in his statements on his recent northern Ontario tour in connection with the Inglis company, holder of a federal contract for the manufacture of Bren machine guns.
>
> The Inglis company treasury received approximately $246,000 for 41,000 shares, said Mr. Conant. Only 4,000 of these shares were sold to the general public and none at more than $7.50 a share "which clearly indicates there has been no high pressure salesmanship."
>
> Mr. Conant said the Inglis company has 150 workers and expects to engage 600 by fall, "thus making a substantial contribution to the solution of our unemployment problem."

Our Conservative friends have complained about the transactions and have charged that the Inglis company is organized for no other purpose than to make guns and munitions. They also said that neither Hahn nor Inglis had made Bren guns before. But neither had anyone else in Canada or on the American continent. I have here an advertisement showing that the Inglis company—> —are designers, engineers and manufacturers of machinery and equipment for mine, mill, power plant and factory.

>
> Our skilled staff of experienced technicians is at your service. We invite particulars of your requirements.

So that, after all, the making of Bren guns is going to be part of their business and not by any means all of it.

I must hurry on as quickly as I can in order to do what I promised at the beginning of my address—to discuss the real issue as given to this house by another group of members of parliament. I find that two years ago, when we were discussing a small increase of defence, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Woodsworth), opposing those armaments, said this:

> We are to repel attacks from without, we are told. I am sometimes accused of being an idealist, but to-night I should like for a few minutes to be very practical indeed. I would ask the minister and the house whether we expect any European country to attack us. Would Germany attack us? Would Italy attack us? I do not think for a moment that the great United States to the south of us, with its Monroe doctrine, would permit anything of the kind. You may say: Well, but you are simply depending upon another nation. I am not particularly concerned with what the implications of all that kind of thing may be, but I submit that if we are thinking about some foe from Europe we are putting up a hypothesis which has no basis in fact.

I shall now refer to a speech by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), based on another article of the same George Drew, in Maclean's magazine, entitled "Our Bow-and-Arrow Army," wherein he spoke of the poor equipment of the Canadian militia, the hollow-chested youths; and how ill-fitting the uniform was, as if that was a matter of any importance. Then the hon. member quotes an article by Mr. Wayling under the heading, "We are too fat to fight." He was not referring to some of my hon. friends or myself.

Mr. HEAPS: Or to the leader of the group!

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Hon. members know the amazing basis of his story: that during the war we had no more than 300 units and they were all engaged in battle overseas or training to go over, while in peace time we had five or six to eight hundred units, and it was because we had so many units we were too fat and we were not getting our value out of them. Of course in peace time, with units scattered all over Canada in order to appeal to local patriotism and local convenience, we are bound to have a fairly large number of units, but that does not mean that we are handicapped. Mr. Wayling, however, provided part of the inspiration which the hon. member for Vancouver North had at that time.

Let me now quote what the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation said in 1936, as reported at page 3197 of Hansard:

We alone are not in position to hold off any and all comers. On the other hand . . . I think we are secure in our position on this continent . . . We are a great deal safer without an army than with an army . . . I oppose military expenditure.

Mr. HEAPS: What has that to do with the motion?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am leading up to the reason for the attack on the contract.

Mr. HEAPS: What has all this to do with the motion to refer the matter to the public accounts committee?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): A little later the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) stated:

I am in agreement with Mr. Woodsworth that Canada's best defence at the present time is its defencelessness . . . A country the size of Canada with its diverse peoples and small population is best defended if we rely on our weakness physically and our good will as a good world neighbour rather than attempt to ape the military powers of the European countries.

A little later on the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) said, in answer to someone on this side or a member of the opposition, that the people of Rosetown-Biggar knew their member to be a confirmed pacifist. That is quite all right; it is a proper attitude for him to take if he sees fit. But at the same time these extracts indicate that there was much objection to any increased expenditure for armaments. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, on February 19, 1937, said:

That is the position we take. I do not need to reiterate. I think it is simple nonsense to be spending as much as we are.

Mr. Mackenzie King: If dangers increase, hon. members who support this amendment will say: Oh, we never opposed the amount of money that the government was proposing to spend for defence.

Mr. Woodsworth: You will see when we come to it.

And that, mark you, was at a time when Canada was spending $1.41 per capita for defence; Sweden, of which we hear so much, $4.95; Switzerland, which has not had a war for a century, $7.56; the United Kingdom, $14.14; and France, $16.79.

The hon. member for Weyburn said, as reported at page 1059 of Hansard, February 19, 1937:

It—

The amendment.

—states two things clearly, first that this group is opposed to increased expenditure for military purposes.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), in taking his stand, namely the stand that he could not, at that time of crisis, oppose the estimates, drew from the hon. member for Weyburn the statement that it was only the increased estimates he was opposing, not the regular estimates. The hon. member for Macleod was not quite satisfied with the economic policies of the government, but he would not assume the responsibility of voting against that measure of increase.

On February 10 of this year the hon. member for Vancouver North said:

Nothing will do more to lower the morale of those who may be required to risk their lives in the defence of the country than the knowledge we now have that his department is in alliance with armament racketeers.

I went to the dictionary to find what a "racketeer" was, and I read as follows:

Racketeer. One who singly or in combination with others extorts money or advantages by threats of violence or of unlawful interference with business (variously defined in recent legislation in various states of the United States of America).

How, in view of the fact that the judge declared there was no evidence or suspicion of corruption in the evidence received before him, hon. members of this house can say these things, and many more I should like to quote if time permitted, passes my imagination! Every time we talk like that, it makes it more difficult to come to a proper understanding of what is really important. One of the worst speeches, from that standpoint, which has been made in this chamber for some time was that of the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Rowe). Speaking a little earlier in the session I said I regretted I could not compliment him upon having gone to a better place than he had been in, but I feared he had gone to a poorer one instead. My statement was verified by what happened, because he spoke as follows:

The Minister of National Defence expresses great confidence in the ability of the British government. At page 2389 of the evidence, in reply to a question from Mr. Hellmuth, the minister is reported as saying:

"I think too highly of the British to think that they would take anybody else's viewpoint but their own; they are pretty canny over there."

I agree with the minister, that they are indeed "canny"; for they are even more zealous than he appears to be in the interest of the armament manufacturers. May I tell the minister that over in Great Britain they go in for armament profiteering in a really big way.

Later on he quotes from a speech made by Gerald P. Nye in the United States senate in which that gentleman mentioned——that among the prominent shareholders of Vickers or allied concerns in 1932 were the Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Austen Chamberlain, M.P., winner of the Nobel peace prize in 1925, Sir John Simon, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and a long list of politicians, clergy, and members of the aristocracy.

May I say that the British people have not yet reached the stage where they will condemn anyone for trying to do his part to make it possible for the country to defend itself in time of danger. In reply to my Conservative friends' contention that Major Hahn or the John Inglis Company should not have been given the contract because they had never manufactured arms before, I would point out that in an earlier day in the history of Canada if the government had taken that view, the Canadian Pacific railway would not have been built. If they had said that there was an objection to the fact that an ex-Hudson Bay Company trader and a bank manager were organizing the company, Canada would have suffered in consequence. If no progress is to be made except by those who are already engaged in a particular line of endeavour, then the future of the country will never be assured. The progress that this dominion has made has been as a result of the enterprise of pioneers and those who were prepared to undertake ventures other than those with which they were already familiar.

Let me say this in conclusion. On a certain day in September last year, as I listened in Saskatoon to the voice of the tyrant of Berlin as he addressed his people, stirring up their feelings against the democracies of the world, I could not help reflecting upon what had taken place in this house for two years and the opposition that had been brought to bear upon the government because, as the hon. member for Vancouver North said, the real issue was whether this armament should be made in a private or a government-owned factory. When I thought of such a reason, not a matter of importance, even though it is opposed to Marxian socialist ideas; when I thought of all that opposition that was thrown up in the path of the minister because a slight increase in armaments was asked for; when I thought of the helpless position of the people in Czechoslovakia after the defection of Austria, I was thankful that I had put no hindrance in the way of the minister but had given him what help I could in the house. Czechoslovakia would not have been in the situation in which she finds herself to-day had the line between her and Austria been defended.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are we armed to take part in any European war?

[Mr. Malcolm McLean.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It is well for us—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. Time.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) has exhausted his time.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to ask the hon. member if he thinks we are armed for a European war?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It is well that we have not on our conscience—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): —any delay or obstruction in asking the Canadian people to prepare some defence for the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), speaking this afternoon in the course of the debate, used these words:

> But, sir, I do say this, it is no wonder that the Vancouver Sun, ordinarily an outstanding Liberal organ, spoke of the brawling in parliament, and of the vulgar personalities cast across the floor of the house by an hon. gentleman who comes from the city in which that paper is published. They added that there is still a strong suspicion of gross political patronage in the awarding of the contract, and they say that the contract was improperly awarded, and that abuse of this kind does not hide the facts.

I should like my hon. friend to produce the date and the text of that article in the Vancouver Sun.

Mr. MANION: I cannot produce it at the moment because it is in my room. As a matter of fact, I did not go beyond quoting it in a rough way because we are not allowed to quote in extenso from newspaper articles.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does my hon. friend still aver that this article appeared in the Vancouver Sun?

Mr. MANION: I think it did. I certainly have the paper in my room.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have the most reliable information from the editorial director of the Vancouver Sun that the article never appeared in that paper.

Mr. MANION: I assume I shall be permitted a little later to say a word in reply.

Mr. D. J. HARTIGAN (Cape Breton South): Before dealing with the question before the house I wish to refer to a few statements made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) this afternoon when he rose to give a resumé and a criticism of the various speeches that have been made on this side of the house. He took occasion at the same time to eulogize all the speeches which had been made on the other side, and in that way he sought to cast the blame for all the differences of opinion that have arisen, and for all that has happened in the house during the debate, on those members who have spoken on this side. First of all, he announced to the house this afternoon—anyone who was here and heard him will verify what I say—that he was speaking for the various groups on the other side. I have very few notes, and I am not going to go back over old Hansards and thresh again the straw that has already been threshed over and over again, because this debate has degenerated into a play of words; but the hon. gentleman said he was speaking for the various groups on that side. He did not tell us whether that was of his own volition or whether he was appointed to act as spokesman for them.

Mr. MANION: I have never said I was speaking for any group. I said I was speaking for my own party.

Mr. HARTIGAN: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I think it can be verified by reference to Hansard that he said he was speaking for the other groups.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must take the word of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. HARTIGAN: It would not be the first time that statements were changed in the house, not only in speeches by members on this side of the house but in speeches by members on the other side.

Mr. Speaker, there is one serious matter with which I wish to deal before I proceed with my speech. The leader of the opposition this afternoon laboured the point and tried to create the impression that the disturbance, if you may call it so, or the talk that is going around, is about some bitter remark made on this side of the house by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), and that the onus for that statement lies on this side. I take exception to that. The other night when the Minister of National Defence was speaking and the honoured name of Colonel J. L. Ralston was mentioned, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) sang out, "Another grafter." I ask you, Mr. Speaker; I ask any returned man in this house, whether there was a statement more calculated to upset the mental equilibrium of a returned soldier. Medically, we know that returned men are jealous of the good name of those who played their part in the world war, and I was amazed that the returned men in this house took so calmly the statement that came from the other side, "Another grafter." Who would be the others? They would be the Minister of National Defence, the leader of the opposition, I assume, the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) and every other returned man.

Mr. SPENCE: You are a bad guesser.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Is that the attitude of the hon. member for Parkdale? I am loath to believe that that represents the sentiments of the people of his constituency or of the province of Ontario. I certainly know this, that Colonel Ralston needs no word of mine to defend him. If you asked any returned man from Nova Scotia to the Pacific, whether the statement, "another grafter," is correct, I venture to say it would be answered by a vociferous and indignant "no" that would roll from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I have been in places in the section from which I come where if that statement were made at a meeting it would have been followed by immediate action, the meeting would have broken up in a riot. That is why I say the returned men in this house deserve to be congratulated upon the equanimity and coolheadedness they displayed when that statement was made.

I wish now to deal briefly with just a few salient points of the contract, looking at it as I think the Canadian taxpayer will look at it. The sentiment in Nova Scotia is that, in the first place, once this contract was signed, there should never have been a royal commission to investigate it. Their sentiment is that, having a Minister of National Defence of the type we have, and a Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) whose motives are of such a high character that everyone feels that nothing deceptive would be tolerated by him, why was there any necessity to appoint a royal commission? And why the necessity of sending the contract to the public accounts committee? On careful analysis I think it will be agreed that a great deal of harm may come from sending this matter to the public accounts committee.

Mr. MacINNIS: Quite likely.

Mr. HARTIGAN: The point I want to make concerning the contract is that the defence and the criticism, if you may call it either defence or criticism—because we have had as much defence as criticism coming from the opposite side—resolve themselves merely into a play on words; we get words, words, words all the time. For instance, during the hearing some lawyer, probably, to be impressive if not dramatic, took up the point of precision steel. We heard that term played on, it was grabbed with avidity by many hon. members and there was a play of words about precision steel. After all, precision steel is only a matter of calibration. Precision steel can be made at any plant in the country; we know that. The most ignorant person in the house, I suppose, if such there be, would know that. I am giving credit to hon. members of the opposition that they know it too, as well as we do. Then why this play of words over precision steel? Again they made much of the fact that the patentee of the Bren gun specified that it should not be made anywhere but in a government-owned factory. But they never told the people of this country what we find on page 27 of the report:

> . . . that while the deputy minister and Major Hahn were in England in June 1937 the deputy minister set in motion steps with the war office to obtain permission from the patentee in Czechoslovakia that would enable the Canadian government, if it should so desire, to place a contract with a private manufacturer.

They sought to give the people the impression that this gun could not be manufactured except in a government factory.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask who asked that permission?

Mr. HARTIGAN: Yes. It says that the deputy minister used his good offices; he and Major Hahn were in England at the time.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the deputy minister of national defence?

Mr. HARTIGAN: Certainly, the deputy minister of national defence; who else should be more interested than he? We shall come back to that in a little while. To develop all the different angles of this contract and elucidate all the principles involved would take far more than forty minutes. One thing goes without saying, from the standpoint of the taxpayers of Canada—and after all it is the taxpayers of Canada who are concerned with this contract, not just a few industrialists, friends of some hon. members in this house; they are not the type of people who are so much concerned. I am speaking from the point of view of the general taxpayer. I am not going to take time to read the articles of reference, but I think everyone will concede that the terms of reference were sufficiently broad that all facts and factors entering into the negotiation and signing of this contract could be brought out, and I call attention to the fact that during all that hearing there was never any specific charge brought forth or proven by Colonel Drew, the writer of the article in Maclean's magazine, who is charged with being the instigator of the hearing.

That hearing took up a great deal of time and cost the people of this country a good deal of money, and for the past ten days we have been arguing and debating this question, yet the opposition have not been able to point to any instance of corruption or graft. Certainly we had statements hurled across the floor of the house, but they were absolutely without foundation, none of them being of sufficient importance to warrant sending this question to the public accounts committee. On the other hand the Prime Minister is so desirous that it shall be subjected to the utmost scrutiny that he prefers to send it there. I cannot see what results will come from sending it to the public accounts committee except possible harm to the national defences of Canada, because what I fear is that the public accounts committee will be made a hotbed from which will be disseminated unpatriotic thoughts, and words and deeds derogatory to the good name of Canada. Canada desires to have the co-operation of the British government in establishing here a secondary source of supply for munitions; yet at its very inception we have the insidious work of those who are against it. Need I tell the Canadian people or hon. members that we have, we must have and we are led to believe we have, in this house, hon. members who are not unanimous as to how this country should be run, how the national defence of this country should be conducted, and whether it should be conducted in the interest of the British empire or not.

We have heard statements made in this house with regard to the heavy pressure that is brought to bear on hon. members. Certainly a great deal of political pressure must have been required to bring about such a revulsion of feeling on the part of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor) for example, that he had to withdraw from his party. If we recall the speech that hon. gentleman made in this house on February 3, 1938, I believe we should view with alarm the proposal that this investigation should be continued before the public accounts committee. I assume there will be reports of the proceedings before that committee, and those reports will be sent all over the country. I think we should have some fear in regard to what may be brought out in the committee and the indiscreet manner in which they may be spread all over the country.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) belaboured a point in connection with what he said was a peculiar provision of the contract, stipulating that the government, or some designated person, had to know who worked in the munition factory. If the hon. gentleman read the speech of the hon. member for Nanaimo last year he would realize why hedging clauses were necessary in regard to who went in and out of that place. And then the hon. gentleman must know that sabotage is rampant throughout England as well as here. It has happened on other occasions and it can happen again. But the hon. gentleman was more concerned with picturing in his microphotographic mind the possibility that this might be used for political purposes. Such is not the intention at all. The department must take some precautions.

I have already referred to page 27 of the report which deals with the possibility of placing a contract with a private manufacturer. Another point that strikes me is that on November 9, 1937, the cable announcing the British decision to manufacture in Canada designated the John Inglis Company. That cable was exhibit No. 182, and is referred to at page 47 of the Davis report. Then on February 9, 1938, Sir Harold Brown cabled General LaFleche as follows:

—draft of Bren contract with John Inglis Company now agreed in detail by war office.

There again the John Inglis Company was specified. When that cable came, the matter was still under discussion in Canada; the interdepartmental committee had been dealing with the contract from January 5 to March 17. On page 47 of the report I find this:

British government has approved negotiations as to second source supply of Bren guns in Canada—

That is an important statement.

—war office is now ready to negotiate for purchase of 5,000 Bren guns manufactured by John Inglis subject to some substantial reduction in cost.

There was some question in regard to cost, but they agreed to a second source of supply in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who sent that cable?

Mr. HARTIGAN: That was from the war office.

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Yes. Read the report. I have almost finished dealing with this report, but there is one other section to which I should like to refer. It is wonderful to think how much has been drawn from this small book by various speakers in this house. They could open it at any place and make a speech on it. This is what the commissioner says, at page 50:

The more I think of it, the more I can see the almost endless scope of such a line of evidence—one manufacturer saying one thing, and another manufacturer saying something else, one manufacturer actuated by one set of considerations and another manufacturer actuated by different considerations. Where am I going to stop? This may land me in a hopeless and endless controversy.

The commissioner realized that he would get no unanimity of opinion at that inquiry. It was just like any court, where you never get both sides to agree. With Colonel Drew and his crowd on one side—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Drew did not want the manufacturers called; do not forget that. Drew was asked if he wanted them called and he said no. That is in the evidence.

Mr. HARTIGAN: There was no possibility of any unanimity of opinion even among those who were called, and no one saw that better than the commissioner who was investigating the whole question.

The main point of the whole report is the finding, which has been read a dozen times. I am going to quote only one or two words from it, in order to keep the record straight in regard to what I was saying about the concern of the taxpayers of this country. It is wonderful that there was a finding at all. How many commissions, among all those appointed during the past fifty or sixty years, have made findings as complete as we have in this report? If you go back over them you will see that there have been very few. The commissioner said:

The evidence relating to the activities of Mr. Hugh Plaxton prior to the making of the contract has already been set out or referred to in this report, and with that exception (and excepting of course the minister presiding over the Department of National Defence) there is no evidence that any member of the senate or of the House of Commons of Canada had any connection with or took any part in the discussions or negotiations leading up to the contract.

There is no evidence that any senator or member had any connection with or took any part in the affairs of the company or in the sale of shares or securities of the company.

I think it right to say that there is no evidence (nor is there in the evidence any ground for suspicion) that the minister or the deputy minister or any officer or official of the Department of National Defence was guilty of any act of corruption or anything in the nature of corruption.

That is all I have to say about that report. I think that covers the main points of what the people of Canada are thinking—with one exception, and that exception is this: What is the cost to the Canadian people? That would be a pertinent question for the taxpayers to ask. That is probably what most people have in their minds. They are not so much concerned with who will get the contract, whether it consists of a few hon. members on the other side of the house and their industrialist friends, or whether it is given to someone on the Pacific coast or on the Atlantic coast.

I, for one, come from the Atlantic coast, where we have great steel works. I am interested in seeing secondary supplies of munitions manufactured in Canada. As they are manufactured in greater quantities those men in Canada who are acquainted with the manufacturing processes will come in for their share of the steel work, and will supply their share of the steel used in manufacture of munitions. Everyone who has the interests of the steel workers of Canada at heart must realize that fact.

I think it was Mussolini who said that he did not fear the democracies because the democracies are dumb. I was wondering whether he was afflicted with the same picture disease which has been manifested so often, and whether in that mood he had visualized oppositions in this House of Commons, and did not fear them. I think one of the first questions which should be asked, the answer to which the people of Canada have a right, is this: On a comparative basis what did the Canadian government pay for Bren guns already in the country? That would be a pertinent question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my memory serves me correctly, it was about $1,000 or $1,200.

Mr HARTIGAN: I investigated that matter—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Each.

Mr. HARTIGAN: —in the minister's department, and I found out in that department that the cost of the first two guns was $1,500 each.

An hon. MEMBER: From the war office.

Mr. HARTIGAN: The next ten guns cost $1,100 each.

[Mr. Hartigan.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is correct.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Twenty-one guns arrived only a few days ago, and they will cost in the vicinity of $1,000 each.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is correct.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Has the opposition asked for a comparative statement of prices? On the figures given by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) the other evening, one can find, through an arithmetical calculation, that the government might anticipate that the guns manufactured in Canada in conjunction with the British order would cost in the vicinity of $400 each. There is quite a difference there.

One hon. member opposite, from the Conservative benches, referred to the boots and shoes which were worn in the last war. One has a fair indication of the chaotic state of brain of hon. members opposite when they throw up anything which happened in the last war, at a time when they were directing the affairs of the nation. They should think of the shell game, and what happened in connection with that nefarious contract at the time of the last war. Worse than that, they should think of the deal made for the Ross rifle, which has left such a stench and has had such an effect on the olfactory sense of the Canadian people that the odour still remains.

Those are matters of which they should think when they throw taunts across the floor of the house, suggesting things of which we have been guilty, and making the suggestion that we are guilty of everything that has happened. The Liberal government, as stated by the responsible minister and by the Prime Minister, has taken a stand that it will not manufacture Bren guns down to a price, but rather that it will manufacture up to a standard. That is the meaning the general public can take out of the government's attitude. That is why the country will have confidence that the guns in process of manufacture will measure up to a standard. That will be done because, if for no other reason, by means of a complementary contract the British government has become a party.

There are those who take the view that because certain persons interested in the manufacture would not have a chance to tender or to bid on supplying a secondary supply of ammunition, we must perforce kill the contract at its inception. Even the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh)—and I give him credit for it—discussed the matter a few days ago and agreed there should be private contract. I agreed with him. The hon.

member always makes an interesting and scholarly speech. That man who said in all fairness, "Yes, it should be let to private firms," was exercising good judgment.

Here we have some advocating private tender and others advocating government manufacture of munitions. Do they think we have reached a modern utopia in Canada, remembering the experience in the past in connection with great utilities, whereby under governmental operation we could operate at a price less than 7·7 per cent over cost? I do not think there is an hon. member opposite who, speaking fairly and honestly, will claim that with government operation, considering all that would have to be done in the re-establishment of new plants, the cost of those guns could be kept down. As was insinuated this afternoon by the leader of the opposition, maybe someone would tender for 5·2 per cent over cost. That would be bringing it down to a price.

I think there is not a Canadian who will deny that 7·7 per cent over cost is a reasonable and logical allowance for profit, when profits are limited as to amount. When the opposition began its criticism of the Bren gun contract I think the imaginative faculty of the leader of the opposition was running away with him, and he visualized the Bren gun contract as something leading him into the Elysian fields, and probably on to the treasury benches. I say to the leader of the opposition in all fairness, and as kindly as possible, that he should view the matter from a different angle; that he should reorientate himself and visualize the Bren gun contract going to a committee of the house, not as something which would lead him to the treasury benches. He should visualize it as a two-edged sword, a broken reed or a perfect boomerang. Those are the ways I would advise him to visualize it. I say that to him for this, if for no other reason, that not a Liberal on this side of the house need be ashamed—

An hon. MEMBER: I believe that.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Well, we cannot very well depend upon the hon. member's belief, because it runs to pictures. There is not a Liberal member on this side of the house but can and will on the platform in any part of the country, east, west, north or south, defend the Bren gun contract. They will defend it in the interests of the Canadian taxpayer, if for no other reason than that it is predicated upon the fact that the British war office has taken part in it. Surely hon. members do not mean to say that those people can be turned around by a minister from one of the colonies or from any of the departments in any of the component parts of the British commonwealth of nations. I do not think the imaginations of hon. members would run that far.

But I do say that if we predicate the value of the contract, as every red-blooded Canadian will, upon the fact that it has stood the test of the British war office, surely there must be some virtue in it. We are far away from the days when the Conservative party had other leaders. I cannot visualize the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, for example, rising in his place here and saying that he would link forces with the subversive group in this house to take action against the British government.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I want to know what the hon. gentleman means when he says that the Conservatives are linking up with a subversive group in this house.

Mr. HARTIGAN: This afternoon—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the words, "subversive group."

Mr. HARTIGAN: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw them on the demand of the chair. But I say that so long as that speech of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor) of February 3, 1938, remains and is available on the pages of Hansard, we are entitled to believe that there are subversive influences in this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HARTIGAN: I did not say where.

Mr. COLDWELL: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, as a member of this house—and it is a question affecting the privileges of this parliament; the hon. member says that there are subversive influences in this house. I submit that that statement is unparliamentary and should be withdrawn.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that perhaps the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Hartigan) was referring to racketeers with whom we were told this government was in alliance.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member for Cape Breton South to resume his seat please. I do not think the hon. member should use the expression "subversive" as applied to any group or any member of this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. HARTIGAN: I have already said that I withdraw it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The expression "subversive" as applied to members of the house or to any group in the house should not be used by any member.

Mr. HARTIGAN: All right, Mr. Speaker, I have already withdrawn it.
I was going on to say—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has exhausted his time to speak.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) drew to my attention a few moments ago a telegram which I understood him to say intimated that the quotations I gave this afternoon were not from the Vancouver Sun. Is that right?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. MANION: I have the clippings here, and while there is no name on them I thought they were from the Vancouver Sun because I was informed by a note from a friend of mine that they were. On the side is written, "Not bad from a Grit paper." I will tell the house what I quoted. I said the heading of the article was, "Brawling in Parliament," and I quoted a word or two saying that there were vulgar personalities used by the minister, and gross political patronage. That is my complete recollection of what I quoted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does my hon. friend still say that that is from the Vancouver Sun?

Mr. MANION: The minister says that he has received a telegram from the editor of the Vancouver Sun saying that these quotations are not from that newspaper. I cannot contradict that, and I accept the minister's word without question. The only thing I can do, after having cited the quotations—and there is a good deal worse in the clippings than I have mentioned,—is to adopt them as my own, and so I adopt them as my own.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker, affecting the privileges of this house. Any hon. member referring to any quotation in this house is required by the rules of parliament to produce to the house proof of the authenticity of his quotations, and I ask my hon. friend now to produce to this house evidence of the authenticity of the statements which he quoted in the debate this afternoon.

Mr. MANION: I have produced the clippings. I have them here, and the minister can look at them. These editorials were sent to me and it was stated to me that they were from the Vancouver Sun. I accept the statement in the minister's telegram from the editor of the Vancouver Sun that they are not from his paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where are they from?

Mr. MANION: They are from Vancouver, I understand. I have already stated that I quoted them in good faith as supposedly coming from the Vancouver Sun. The minister says that he has received a telegram from the Vancouver Sun denying that they are from that paper, and I accept that. And to exonerate all the newspapers I accept responsibility myself for all these statements. I do not know what more I could do.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I accept immediately my hon. friend's statement that he quoted the editorials in good faith, but on a point of order I submit that under the rules of this house when an hon. member purports to read editorial comment from any journal he should immediately submit proof of its authenticity to the house or have the quotations expunged from the records of Hansard.

Mr. MANION: I did not read anything from the papers. I quoted the headlines verbatim. I did not read statements from the press at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, the record of Hansard, while not yet official, shows that my hon. friend said that he quoted this comment as from the Vancouver Sun, and I submit that it should be expunged from Hansard because the quotation was improperly and inaccurately made to this house. I ask for your ruling, sir.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. leader of the opposition state where the quotations were taken from?

Mr. MANION: I have said they come from a friend of mine. I do not choose to give his name. I have them here in my hand now, and I quoted them correctly.

Mr. SPEAKER: What paper are they from?

Mr. MANION: I do not know. I have them here and the minister can read them. I adopted the statements as my own.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is enough. Let it go.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Stevens) which was negatived on the following division:

YEAS

Messrs:

Anderson
Baker
Barber
Black, (Mrs.) (Yukon)
Brooks
Casselman
Church
Esling
Graydon
Harris
Homuth
Hyndman
Lennard
Lockhart
McGregor
MacNicol
Manion
Perley
Ross (St. Paul's)
Senn
Spence
Stewart
Thompson
Tustin
Wermenlinger
White—26.

NAYS

Messrs:

Ahearn
Beaubien
Bertrand (Prescott)
Black (Chateauguay-Huntingdon)
Blackmore
Blair
Blanchette
Bothwell
Bouchard
Boulanger
Bradette
Brunelle
Cardin
Cleaver
Cochrane
Coldwell
Coté
Crerar
Damude
Davidson
Deachman
Denis
Deslauriers
Donnelly
Douglas (Queens)
Douglas (Weyburn)
Dubuc
Dupuis
Dussault
Elliott (Kindersley)
Euler
Evans
Fafard
Fair
Farquhar
Ferguson
Ferland
Ferron
Fiset (Sir Eugène)
Fleming
Fontaine
Fournier (Hull)
Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemount)
Francœur
Furniss
Gardiner
Gariépy
Gladstone
Glen
Golding
Grant
Hamilton
Hansell
Hanson
Hartigan
Hayhurst
Heaps Howden
Hurtubise
Ilsley
Isnor
Jaques
Jean
Johnston (Bow River)
Johnston (Lake Centre)
Kennedy
King, Mackenzie
Kirk
Kuhl
Landeryou
Lapointe (Matapedia-Matane)
Lapointe (Quebec East)
Leader
Leduc
McAvity
McCallum
McCann
McCulloch
McDonald (Pontiac)
McDonald (Souris)
McGeer
MacInnis
McIntosh
McKenzie (Lambton-Kent)
MacKenzie (Neepawa)
Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre)
MacKinnon (Edmonton West)
McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River)
McLarty
MacLean (Cape Breton North-Victoria)
McLean (Melfort)
MacLean (Prince)
McLean (Simcoe East)
MacLennan
MacMillan
MacNeil
McNevin (Victoria, Ont.)
McNiven (Regina City)
Macphail, (Miss)
McPhee
Mallette
Marshall
Matthews
Maybank
Mayhew
Michaud
Mills
Mulock
Mutch
Needham
Neill
O'Neill
Parent (Terrebonne)
Patterson
Pelletier
Pinard
Poole
Pottier
Pouliot
Power
Purdy
Quelch
Reid
Rennie
Rhéaume
Rickard
Rinfret
Robichaud
Rogers
Ross (Middlesex East)
Ross (Moose Jaw)
Rowe (Athabaska)
St-Père
Sanderson
Sylvestre Telford
Thorson
Tomlinson
Tremblay
Turgeon
Turner
Veniot
Ward
Warren
Weir
Winkler
Wood
Woodsworth
Young—149.

PAIRS

Messrs:

(The list of pairs is furnished by the chief whips.)

Dunning — Stevens
Howe — Stirling
Elliott (Middlesex West) — Massey
Gray — Lawson
Fraser — Héon
Macdonald (Brantford City) — Walsh
Tucker — Marsh
Slaght — Brown
Taylor (Norfolk) — Green
Howard — Clarke (Rosedale)
Lacroix (Beauce) — Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe)

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the main motion.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): This motion is for the reference to the public accounts committee of the agreement between the government and the new John Inglis Company for the manufacture of Bren guns.

Upon due consideration of the relevant facts, it seems to me that no public interest is likely to be served by such a reference, and indeed such a reference in my opinion will only serve to obscure the real issue which is now before the government and the house.

The public accounts committee is a standing committee of this house, and all relevant expenditures may be fully investigated by that committee without such reference being made. But, as I shall attempt to show, the real issue is not an issue that can be considered by the standing committee on public accounts. Moreover, such a reference will preclude discussion in this chamber of far more serious issues which arise out of the report of Mr. Justice Davis, the commissioner, who was appointed to inquire fully "into all matters relating to" the Bren gun contract and the steps taken to protect the public interest, and to report upon the same.

The commissioner has reported that all available documents in any way relevant and material to the subject matter of the inquiry were presented to the commission, and he has reported several thousand pages of oral evidence and of argument of counsel. I have already reviewed in an earlier debate the precautions taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to safeguard the public interest; his appointment of a special committee of which his own deputy, Doctor Skelton, was chairman, and the report of that committee that the problem appeared essentially to be one of administration; that is whether under the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) an adequate and competent administration was being or was likely to be obtained. The report of that special committee was undoubtedly made known by the Prime Minister to his colleagues in council and more or less thoroughly discussed. Thereupon the government, sitting in council, by order in council P.C. 439 appointed an interdepartmental committee to formulate and advise upon the principles and safeguards, whether general or specific, which should be observed to protect the public interest, and to communicate the same to the Department of National Defence and to any other department concerned. Thus far the Prime Minister and his colleagues appear to have taken reasonable precautions.

The commissioner indicates very fully in his report that that committee earnestly desired to secure competitive bids, and made persistent demands to that effect. The commissioner reports, on page 41, that:

> The Minister of National Defence did say that he was informed in a general way, not in great detail, of the progress of the discussions in the committee by the deputy minister . . .

It would reasonably have been expected that the Minister of National Defence would have informed himself from day to day of the proceedings of that interdepartmental committee, before which his methods of administration were clearly on trial. But he gave no concern to its proceedings although he had himself sufficient information to put him upon inquiry. He appears to have been utterly indifferent. The commissioner also reports, at page 42, that:

> The minister says he never went over the proposals of Major Hahn in detail.

The minister also states, as reported at page 8 of the commissioner's report, that he never attempted in any method or in any way to comply with the demand of the interdepartmental committee for competitive bids from other well known companies, with skilled labour and skilled mechanics, who had been working in precision steel. He merely answers, without making any personal inquiry whatever, "I do not think it was practical." Again he declared, in answer to a question:

> Q. There was never the slightest effort, was there, to interest or invite any of those firms to tender or to make any offer to manufacture the Bren gun?
> A. No, I do not think there was.

At page 41 the commissioner reports that:

> There is not a suggestion that the members of the government ever heard of these difficulties which confronted the committee or of the attitude that was taken by members of it to the proposed contract.

That is, the commissioner expressly states that there is not a suggestion in any of the evidence adduced that the other members of the government ever heard of the difficulties before the interdepartmental committee and the demands of that committee with respect to the placing of these contracts. Certainly in view of all the circumstances leading to the appointment of that committee it was the bounden duty of the Minister of National Defence not only to keep himself fully informed but to have kept the Prime Minister and his colleagues fully informed of the views of that committee. But that duty he entirely ignored, and all the precautions and salutary safeguards taken by the Prime Minister were completely disregarded by the Minister of National Defence, apparently without the knowledge of the Prime Minister or of his colleagues. It is this defiant dereliction of duty on the part of the Minister of National Defence that Mr. Justice Davis sought to bring clearly before the government and before parliament in the report which he has submitted. Therefore the commissioner reports, page 35:

> The facts are all in evidence . . .
> So far as the facts are concerned, there are very few which are even in dispute.
> . . . It will be for those charged with the responsibility of dealing with the facts, i.e. the government and parliament, to examine and study them and to take such action, if any, thereon as they may see fit.

That I conceive to be the primary duty which confronts the Prime Minister and the members of his government.

Again at page 49 the commissioner reports:

. . . I am unable to pass upon the substance as distinct from the form of the contract . . . but what is more important after all is whether the procedure adopted in making the contract was that best calculated to protect the public interest and to secure the confidence of the people of Canada that there would be no improper profiteering in the private manufacture of war armaments for the defence of the country.

That is a question upon which the government and parliament, in the light of the evidence brought before the commission, must pass.

So says the commissioner selected by the government and appointed for the purpose of making this inquiry and report. In fact the Prime Minister had previously declared in the House of Commons on April 2, 1937, as reported in Hansard, page 2697, that:

At the present time, in a time of peace, the government is proceeding on the theory of permitting competition with reasonable remuneration, the work to be subject to inspection and audit.

That declaration of government policy is in accord with the report of the special committee appointed by the Prime Minister to consider these matters, that "The problem appears to be essentially an administrative one." The interdepartmental committee were therefore fully in accord with the policy announced by the Prime Minister. That policy the Minister of National Defence deliberately disregarded, without ever consulting the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the government. Such action on the part of the Minister of National Defence calls for summary action on the part of the Prime Minister, who should call for the minister's resignation forthwith, or else the Prime Minister, by condoning the minister's conduct, must assume full responsibility before parliament and before the electors of this country.

Mr. Justice Davis on page 50 of his report says:

Your commissioner took the position that—It is at least a plausible view that the question whether tenders should be called for in such a case is a matter of administrative policy, upon which competent opinion is, or may well be, divided, and one therefore peculiarly for the government and parliament.

That was a matter of public policy, therefore, respecting which the Prime Minister, I believe in good faith, had already made the solemn declaration to parliament which I have already quoted, and in the carrying out of which he would have certainly had my full support and, I am confident, the support of an overwhelming majority in parliament. But at page 50 the commissioner adds that if——the policy of private manufacture is to be adopted, then at once the heaviest sort of responsibility falls upon those charged with the duty of selecting the individual, firm or corporation to manufacture the article. The question is: Were proper and sufficient steps taken in this case to discharge that responsibility? Upon the whole evidence, that is a question for the government and parliament to pass upon.

And in summarizing his views the commissioner continues:

What is plain to me at the end of this long inquiry is this: that if the policy of private manufacture of war munitions and armaments is to be continued in this country (a question of administrative policy for the department and parliament to determine), once the requirements are determined by the Department of National Defence the negotiations leading up to and the making of contracts between the government and private manufacturers either for the purchase or production of such munitions or armaments should be put into the hands of an expert advisory group of competent business men—

Then he adds:

These persons should constitute a board (which might be known as the defence purchasing board) and be made directly accountable to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance.

And the commissioner proceeds:

It is no reflection upon the technical skill and knowledge of the military officers and officials of the Department of National Defence to say this for it is a matter requiring quite a different training and knowledge and quite a different experience from military training and experience.

The appointment of such a board is a matter to be discussed at the proper time. A resolution is already on the order paper with respect to a bill to be introduced, and upon that resolution or upon the bill no doubt ample opportunity will be afforded to discuss this matter. I may say, however, that the appointment of every such board is, in some measure, a blow at responsible, respresentative government and a step in the direction of the adoption of fascist administration and government in this country. But it is clear that the commissioner, having heard and reflected upon all the evidence which was adduced by counsel, has definitely concluded that the present Minister of National Defence is not only incapable but is disqualified from administering his department even with the assistance of such a board. Therefore the minister advises that such a board, if appointed, should report to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance.

I urgently protest against the adoption of any such makeshift policy as that suggested. The Prime Minister's duties, as we all know, are not only numerous but very onerous indeed. The Minister of Finance is already overburdened. The real remedy is for the Prime Minister to ask the Minister of National Defence to resign forthwith and to appoint in his stead a minister who is competent to administer the affairs of that department. As I have already stated, the Minister of National Defence has proved inattentive and neglectful of his primary duties, and, on the whole, has shown himself incompetent for the efficient administration of the most important work of his ministerial office. The next step is to fill the vacancy by the appointment of a new minister who will not persistently defy the Prime Minister of the country and his colleagues in the government, but who, in consultation with them, will carry into effect the policies which they have fully considered, adopted and confirmed.

That, it seems to me, is the primary issue which the commissioner, Mr. Justice Davis, has presented to the government, in the first place, and then, if the government fails of action, to the parliament of this country. The Prime Minister will not satisfy public opinion, and I cannot believe that he will full satisfy his colleagues, until he has effectively dealt with a recalcitrant, defiant and incompetent minister. If that minister is really sincere in the professions and protestations which he made to this house on Thursday evening last; if he really, sincerely desires, despite his manifest ineptitude and inefficiency, that proper measures may now be taken, quoting his own words—

—to provide such measures of national defence and security as will preserve the welfare and well being of our Canadian people—

—then he should forthwith place his resignation in the hands of the Prime Minister. Possibly now a less onerous post may be found for him by the Prime Minister. I certainly do not wish him any ill personally.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, laugh. I have seen something of life; I have had under my administration many thousands of men. I have found in the best of them frailties and I have found in the worst of them many good qualities. I do not say that the present Minister of National Defence may not have some subordinate place in the administration of the affairs of this country, but he certainly has not lived up to the duties and responsibilities of his present office. If he is retained in that office it will undoubtedly result in this, that the people of Canada will no longer have confidence in the administration of the Department of National Defence.

The Prime Minister and his colleagues, having access to more definite and more reliable information than is available to other members of this house, have declared during recent years that for the adequate defence of Canada large expenditures upon armaments are necessary. We have voted the moneys so far requested. We are now about to be asked for additional appropriations, to a very large amount. In the existing conditions of increasing national debt and ever-increasing and now almost intolerable burden of taxation, these additional expenditures upon armaments and munitions are only justified by the prospective imminence of war and by the necessity of our unanimous action in making adequate preparations for the defence and security of Canada. No unity in Canada is possible, and no adequate preparations can be made, unless the government as a whole and the Department of National Defence in particular have the complete confidence of the people of our country.

Any confidence that did formerly exist has been dissipated by the report of Mr. Justice Davis, the commissioner selected by the government, by his impeachment of the conduct of the minister as disclosed in that report, and, further, I may say, by the minister's vituperative address of Thursday evening last, portions of which have been deemed unfit for publication in Hansard of the Commons.

The people of Canada will not be united in making adequate preparations for defence, much less in entering upon a war of defence, while the administration of the Department of Defence is in charge of the present minister. The issue which Mr. Justice Davis has presented is now clear, and the responsibility of dealing with that issue is placed, under our constitutional form of government, primarily upon the Prime Minister. Our people are looking to him, and many are fervently praying that he may now have courage adequate to his responsibility. If he fails to measure up to his responsibilities, then it is that the parliament and people of Canada should take action, as recommended by Mr. Justice Davis.

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, the course of this debate has taken a rather strange line of procedure, finally to culminate in this extraordinary appeal to parliament to judge the outcome of proceedings which are to be referred or are now being referred to be dealt with by the public accounts committee. Granted everything that has been said on the other side of the house, what possible basis can there be for this judgment before the committee's findings are made to parliament?

I want to draw the attention of hon. members to some of the dangers of responding too readily to that type of partisan appeal. On many occasions we have heard references to the report. To-night special reference was made to the report at page 42. I should like to quote the finding of the commissioner with regard to the minister's attitude. That finding is taken from page 2334 of the evidence, and is as follows:

The minister said he never went over the proposals of Major Hahn in detail.

"I had infinite confidence in my technical advisers and also in the final jurisdiction and supervision of the interdepartmental committee which I was largely instrumental in creating myself."

Let me say that this is the conduct of the minister which is being condemned to-night, and the attitude upon which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) asks the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to dismiss the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie).

Let me put this to hon. members: Here is a highly technical proposal. It is not a matter upon which the minister is supposed to be able to form opinions. The question was: Could a patented gun of a highly technical nature be more advantageously produced by the selection of a contractor and the cooperation of the government with that contractor, than by the old system of public tender? Here was the one exception to the general line of contractual relationships that even the Department of National Defence might enter into which required, not the dictatorial assertion of the authority of the minister, but the untrammeled action of the technical officers of the department, along with the supervision of the interdepartmental committee which was there, not to be told by the minister what to do, but to say whether or not what the technical officers were doing was worthy of their support.

There are some other statements which have been made which are just as far away from reason as this extraordinary demand. Let me put this to hon. members: Supposing the minister had gone in and had dictated the policy of the interdepartmental committee; supposing he had dictated upon technical matters the policy of technical officers—that, I submit, would have been political interference that this whole procedure of interdepartmental committee and technical officer advice was designed to avoid. It was the kind of conduct which, had it been perpetrated by the minister, would have warranted the very action for which my hon. friends are now asking.

I wish to place before the house some facts which I think are pertinent to this particular issue. The first of these are contained in the letter dated October 29, 1936, of the Minister of National Defence to the Prime Minister, which states:

My dear Prime Minister:

May I suggest that at your earliest convenience we have a short meeting of the defence committee. One of the questions I should like a decision on is in regard to the following: What should our policy be with reference to the supply of munitions or small arms. The chief of the general staff believes that Canada should be self-sustaining, and that we should proceed with the work at Valcartier. The completion of the ammunition building there will entail an additional $5,500,000. Some members take the view that this money could be better spent in cooperation with private firms. The chief of the general staff believes that our policy should be to have a government factory both in regard to munitions and also in regard to small arms, but to cooperate with industry as far as possible.

It will take from two and a half to three years to complete the ammunition building at Valcartier. In the meantime, of course, the government could give orders to private firms on the definite understanding that in case of any emergency arising these firms would be taken over and controlled by the government during the time of the emergency.

That letter clearly placed before the government the disagreement in the Department of National Defence as to public ownership of arsenals, as to the practical possibility of public ownership with the funds which were available, and the views of those who wanted to use the available funds to get the best possible results. It was then, I understand, that the Skelton committee came into being. That committee recommended against the development of public ownership of arsenals in Canada.

But there is a document exhibit No. 46, before the commissioner, under date of March 5, 1937, in which the Minister of National Defence secures a policy which is incorporated in an order in council of that date which I should like to read into the record:

Certified to be a true copy. The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated March 2, 1937, from the Minister of National Defence stating that an interdepartmental committee formed under the instructions of the right hon. the Prime Minister to consider certain questions pertaining to the control of profits on government armament contracts, has in its report suggested that there be instituted a standing interdepartmental financial committee to assist the officials charged with the placing of contracts under the defence program, and that such a committee "might study and classify the requirements of the defence program from the financial point of view, and formulate or advise upon the financial principles or safeguards to be observed in placing contracts of various types, and as to rules of procedure."

That it was also suggested that this committee "might be available for consultation upon the financial aspects of any unusual specific cases or conditions arising from time to time, and that it would be limited to this function of assisting in the prevention of undue profits, that is to say it would not be concerned with other aspects of the defence program."

The minister—

That is the Minister of National Defence:

—is of the opinion that a committee whose functions and duties would be generally as set out in the suggestion aforesaid would be in the public interest, and therefore, recommends:

1. That there be formed a committee to be known as the interdepartmental committee on the control of profits on government armament contracts, said committee to consist of one representative from the Departments of Trade and Commerce, Labour, National Revenue (income tax), Finance, and the deputy minister of national defence and one official or officer of the Department of National Defence, with the deputy minister of national defence as chairman of said committee.

2. That the duties of this committee shall be generally to study and classify from the financial point of view the various requirements which the government's defence program involves, and when it is considered by the department concerned that effective competitive tendering cannot be secured in regard to any of its requirements, to formulate or advise upon such principles and safeguards, whether of a general or specific nature, which in this connection the committee considers should be observed, and to communicate to all departments concerned such information in this respect as the committee considers should be in their possession.

3. That such departments of the government as have occasion to make purchases of armament and/or mobilization stores, and/or to arrange for services directly or indirectly connected therewith, be directed to refer to said committee all questions relating to scales of prices, quotations, and similar financial matters whenever it appears or seems to appear that prices quoted for any articles, stores, etc., which are sought to be purchased are not obviously fair and reasonable.

4. That the committee shall be authorized to obtain from any department of the government such information regarding the matters coming within the scope of its duties and functions as it deems necessary, and that it shall have power to call before it any officer, official or employee of the government of Canada or of the naval, military or air forces of Canada, for the purpose of obtaining advice or information with respect to any of the matters wherewith the committee is empowered to deal.

What I want to point out is this, that the members of that committee had unlimited powers under the order in council. Now I come to the men who formed that committee. They are:

National Defence: Lieutenant Colonel L. R. LaFleche, deputy minister; Mr. Charles Burns, assistant deputy minister, with wartime experience as director of contracts.

Finance: Doctor W. C. Clark, deputy minister, with Doctor A. K. Eaton as an alternate, in the event of Doctor Clark's absence. Doctor Eaton is one of the senior officials of the finance department and is known as taxation investigator.

National Revenue: Mr. Fraser Elliott, K.C., commissioner of income tax, in addition, Mr. Ronald Sharp, chief inspector of income tax, assisted Mr. Elliott and served on a subcommittee which examined certain contracts, including the Bren gun contract.

Trade and Commerce: Mr. H. Marshall, in charge of internal trade statistics.

Labour: Mr. C. W. Bolton, chief statistician.

There is the strongest possible non-partisan official committee appointed to guard against and prevent in every way abuses from any profiteering or from any untoward action on the part of the Department of National Defence or any other department. The committee's powers were unlimited. It has been said time and time again in this house that this committee never reported to the government.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGEER: My hon. friend says, "hear, hear." I think it is unfortunate that there should have been so many members speaking from the other side of the house who are clearly not conversant with the important facts about which they were speaking.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, and I am not doing it except for the reason of setting the record right. At page 41 of his report the commissioner states:

The system broke down when the committee failed to report back to the body that had created it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the hon. leader of the opposition please read from the evidence.

Mr. MANION: I have no objection, but I have not the evidence before me.

Mr. McGEER: There are some things that are not open to argument; there are other things that it is not necessary to argue. What I want to put before the house and read into the record are the reports that were made to the minister and to the government from the interdepartmental committee and filed as exhibits before the commissioner.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And printed in the evidence, and filed as exhibits at the minister's request.

Mr. McGEER: At the minister's request. I come first to exhibit 243. It is a report to the hon. minister from the interdepartmental committee under date of March 21, 1938, which was the day before the governor in council passed the order in council authorizing the execution of the contract, which was not executed until March 31. Here is exhibit 243, on file before the commission. The interdepartmental committee is reporting to the hon. Minister of National Defence:

The interdepartmental committee on the control of profits on government armament contracts has, during the last three months, at numerous meetings, considered in minutest detail all the aspects and factors leading up to the manufacture in Canada of Bren guns including the various methods possible which, with their advantages and disadvantages were fully weighed. In view of the experience of the war office in these matters and the position it took, the committee reached the conclusion that the placing of a contract on a cost-plus basis with a selected firm whose capabilities in the opinion of the war office and of the department are satisfactory, was the most practical course of action to be adopted in the circumstances.

The draft contract now before privy council represents the views expressed by the committee which considered it clause by clause in meticulous detail. The committee, after exhaustive examination of the financial aspects as reflected in the draft unanimously expressed the opinion that they are fair and reasonable.

L. R. L.
Deputy Minister.

The initials are those of Colonel LaFleche, deputy minister, and chairman of the interdepartmental committee.

Mr. MANION: What is my hon. friend reading from, may I ask?

Mr. McGEER: From an exhibit that was filed before the commission, exhibit 243. Now does any hon. member on the other side of the house rise to say that the deputy minister and chairman of the interdepartmental committee misrepresented the conclusions of that committee to the minister, because we have it from a great many hon. members on the other side of the chamber that the deputy minister is a man of honour whose word is to be believed?

Mr. WERMENLINGER: We admit that.

Mr. McGEER: You admit that.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: Certainly.

Mr. McGEER: Well, I am glad of that—

Mr. WERMENLINGER: I refer to the deputy minister.

Mr. McGEER: —because that must place the report before the minister in such a light that the Minister of National Defence was justified in acting upon it.

Mr. STEWART: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McGEER: That was another story.

Mr. STEWART: Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McGEER: Just a minute. I want to put this on record without interruption, and when I have finished, if there are any questions, I shall be glad to answer them. I am not now making a speech; I am merely putting on record some facts which need neither speech nor argument to make them worth while and valid.

But the minister was not satisfied with that synoptic report. He went back to the deputy minister and said that he wanted a report in detail. I wish now to read in detail the report upon which the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the cabinet acted: it went before the commissioner and was filed as exhibit 244. The evidence is that it was the report upon which the Prime Minister and his colleagues advised the governor general to pass the order in council authorizing the execution of the contract.

As desired by you, a report on the Bren—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the hon. member please repeat those words: "As desired by you"?

Mr. McGEER: Yes. At the request of the Minister of National Defence. The suggestion that there was no disclosure is unwarranted because it is untrue, and in all the calumny of the personal attack that has been made upon the Minister of National Defence, the most contemptible is that he failed to disclose the facts which are so fully reported to the government in this report.

As desired by you—

That is, the Minister of National Defence.

—a report on the Bren light machine gun question is respectfully submitted:

As far back as the summer of 1936 the Department of National Defence came to the conclusion that it would be necessary to arm the forces with the Bren gun and that 7,000 of these guns would be required. A few model or specimen Bren guns were ordered and it early became clear that Canada could not look to the manufacturing establishment of the government of the United Kingdom as a certain or timely source of supply reasonably safe from possible enemy action. The two model guns which we now have were not made in England but in Czechoslovakia where they were invented; the Enfield plant near London cannot satisfy the United Kingdom government's requirements before several years. You will not want me to go too deeply into the difficulties which have been encountered in this connection by Great Britain, but the fact that the United Kingdom is not only willing but anxious to order 5,000 Bren guns from a Canadian manufacturer is of the utmost significance. Direct advice to this effect, with corroboration from our Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps officer stationed at Canada House, London, has been received, also similar advice to the effect that the treasury in London has approved the war office proposal.

In view of the present situation, as mentioned in the next preceding paragraph, which, although anticipated here long ago, materialized slowly and after long and unexpected delays, it was deemed advisable, even in 1936, to consider the possible necessity of having our requirements manufactured in Canada. The probable difficulties of the position of the United Kingdom were surmised here from the beginning. Because of known variations in cost factors (labour, for instance), heavy outlays for machinery, et cetera, that would be required if the guns were to be manufactured in Canada, it was known that Canadian production costs would be much more than the English production cost, if only 7,000 guns were to be made in Canada it was believed that the cost would be prohibitive under normal conditions. Such has turned out to be the case, to the extent that the placing of the 5,000 order in Canada will save something more than $1,000,000 in cash to Canadian taxpayers. It is impossible to translate into dollars the other advantages to Canada whether financial, or, very important, the extending of our means of defence. Perhaps to mention one other advantage will suffice, i.e., that we will get the guns more quickly than would otherwise be possible; there will remain in Canada the plant and acquired skill in the production of this weapon.

When the matter was first considered, it was not then believed that there would be long delay in receiving favourable or at least definite advice regarding the placing of an order by the government of the United Kingdom, the advisability of having the guns produced in a dominion arsenal, by private industry following invitation to tender or by a selected manufacturer who would produce the guns under the close financial and technical supervision of the Department of National Defence, on a cost-plus basis, was carefully considered. The latter method was chosen as the one which would bring quickest results, would be the most economical, would most easily permit of termination of activity, and would be one which would commend itself to the war office.

It is the practice in England to select the contractor when, as in the case of the Bren gun and many other articles required for defence purposes, to have the contractor proceed on a cost-plus basis. This, when it is not possible to say what a fair and reasonable firm price is. This procedure permits sound planning against an emergency or war. In the case now under discussion, the president of Messrs. John Inglis Company Limited, Toronto, Ontario, James E. Hahn (Major, D.S.O., M.C., Canadian expeditionary force) called at the war office in October or November, 1936, and undoubtedly created a most favourable impression there and with the technical officers of the Enfield plant, with the result that of a number of Canadians who have displayed an interest in armaments, Major Hahn is one of the few who has proven satisfactory to the war office if an offer of a contract is to be taken as the indication. The prospective contractors were equally acceptable to the department and their continued interest in the matter, despite delays vexatious to all concerned, was reassuring.

It may be added that Major Hahn has visited England several times and has acquired a great deal of extremely valuable information concerning the manufacture of the Bren gun. The departmental proposal was brought before the interdepartmental committee on the control of profits on government armament contracts and there given minute attention which has resulted in a draft agreement which would limit the financial returns to the company to an extent greater than the agreement which has been found acceptable by both the war office and the treasury people of the government of the United Kingdom.

Mr. MANION: Whose statement is that?

Mr. McGEER: I will tell the hon. gentleman when I have finished reading it.

The Department of National Defence has spared no effort to acquaint the members of the interdepartmental committee with all possible facts and information concerning the proposed agreement. The members of the committee, including a subcommittee, individually and collectively, have been extremely painstaking and cautious in their approach to the subject. Some members insisted that a cost-plus contract be submitted to tender by selected Canadian firms.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There you are. There is "concealment"!

Mr. McGEER:

It being the expressed wish of a majority of the members, this was referred to the war office officials with the result that they nearly dropped the matter. It had been arranged through proper channels that the Department of National Defence ordnance office in London, as an observer, attend the discussions on this particular point. All reports were painfully to the effect that if such action were taken it would mean the immediate and complete loss of interest on the part of the war office. Whatever the reasons for delay in arriving at a decision up to a short while ago, London evidently cannot or will not place an order in Canada unless it can do so immediately. All concerned in the department here, including myself, quite understand and agree with war office officials; the members of the interdepartmental committee who desired that the point be referred to London accepted the war office decision when the committee again took up the details of the proposed agreement.

What I want to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, is that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George demanded that the Prime Minister call for the resignation of the Minister of National Defence because he had not acquainted the government with these very facts, facts that went before the government in this report and were filed there before the government acted. Surely the time has come when in the face of a report of this kind members who charge a minister of the crown with deception by not informing the government of the facts have little regard for the right of the Minister of National Defence at a time like this to be free from having suspicions cast upon him that are not warranted by the facts.

Mr. MANION: What has the hon. member been reading from? Surely we have a right to know.

Mr. McGEER: I wish to compliment the leader of the opposition on putting upon the political records of Canada one of the finest Irish bulls that ever went into print. Speaking to the Minister of National Defence about the editorial from Vancouver, which did not come from Vancouver, "Why," he says, "Mr. Speaker, I did not quote the editorial; I merely read it verbatim."

Mr. MANION: I did not say that at all. I wish to correct that statement. I did not say that I quoted it verbatim. I did not pretend to quote it verbatim. I took some of the words and used them, adopting them as my own. I never made the statement attributed to me.

Mr. McGEER: Collectors of Irish bulls will find that in Hansard.

Mrs. BLACK: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I myself sent that editorial to the leader of the official opposition. That editorial was printed in the Vancouver News-Herald.

Mr. McGEER: We have passed the editorial stage. We are now at the stage of the bull in the china-shop. I took a great deal of time to tell the house that I was reading from the report made by the interdepartmental committee to the minister and presented to the government, upon which they acted when they passed the order in council authorizing the execution of the contract, filed by the minister before the Davis commission as exhibit 244.

Mr. MANION: Why does it always say "myself"? In that report, again and again, says "myself." Is it the deputy minister?

Mr. McGEER: That is the reason why this kind of material should go to a committee where it can be analyzed properly. I do not blame the hon. member for not wanting it to go to a committee, but it is going there.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I ask a question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. Sit down.

Mr. McGEER: To continue:

> The last meeting of the committee was held on March 17, 1938, when all remaining clauses of the proposal were passed. Major Hahn was called into the discussion during the latter part of the deliberations.
>
> The principal features of the proposed contract, as passed by the interdepartmental committee, and recommended to you by me, are:
>
> The contractor to manufacture in Canada 7,000 Bren light machine guns and parts, as ordered by national defence according to available funds.
>
> Contractor to have ten-year non-exclusive licence. (This is effectively controllable by national defence through war office, and is subject to cancellation for cause, including increase of company's capitalization without consent of department.) Licence renewable by mutual agreement.

The essential feature of that report is to be found in the fact that the demand of a majority of the committee at one stage for tenders was properly placed before the government, and the government were advised that this committee, after full consideration of all the facts, had decided to accept the war office recommendation for the selection of the Inglis company under the direction of Major Hahn. Again, I say: Whether the minister was correctly advised or not may be one issue; but whether or not the minister and the government had a right to act upon that kind of report made by a responsible officer, who the other side declares is honourable and worthy of every respect, can no longer be an issue.

Upon what is a minister to act if he cannot act upon the written reports of the chairman of the interdepartmental committee, the deputy minister of national defence? Will any hon. gentlemen on that side say that this report is untrue; because to do so is to change completely their acceptance of the capability, honesty and integrity of the deputy minister of national defence? Well, if it is true, what was wrong with the minister and the government in acting upon it?

Mr. MANION: Because they took the responsibility, not the deputy minister.

Mr. McGEER: Then we shall come to one or two other incidental facts. This is the finding of the commissioner upon the interdepartmental committee's dealing with the question of tenders. Let me quote from that finding of commissioner Davis at page 40:

> Mr. Elliott said that the chairman (the deputy minister of national defence) pointed out that > his department had followed the practice of the British government where competition is not always obtainable, and they unhesitatingly go into non-competitive contracts in order to secure their requirements. In this particular case the British government had picked the firm to manufacture its guns.
>

By the Commissioner:

Q. Just a minute; the British government had done what?

A. Picked the firm.

Q. In this case?

A. Yes.

Q. In this case the British government had done that?

A. Yes, that in this case the British government had picked the firm to manufacture guns, and that they had made the best possible deal with that particular firm.

That is the finding of the commissioner at page 40. Is that finding correct? We can go to this imaginary picture language and say that the commissioner did not mean to quote that to be believed; that he meant something else. Let us turn to pages 46 to 47 where he refers to the first cablegram from the British war office. I quote:

It was on November 9, 1937 (exhibit 182) that the war office had informed the department by cable that the British government was then "ready to negotiate" for the purchase of 5,000 Bren guns to be manufactured by the John Inglis Company subject to some substantial reduction in cost.

That is the finding of the commissioner. Then he quotes Sir Harold Brown's cablegram to the department in detail.

Mr. STEWART: May I ask the hon. member a question? Will he read the finding of the commissioner at the foot of page 47?

As appears from the communications quoted above, the war office as late as February 3, 1938 (exhibit 190) was still adhering to its desire to deal with the Canadian government and not with a Canadian manufacturer direct.

Mr. McGEER: I am reading the sections that are pertinent to the matter I have under consideration.

Mr. STEWART: The hon. member is leaving out what is pertinent.

Mr. McGEER: The commissioner has definitely found that the war office, rightly or wrongly, under pressure from this government or anyone else, did decide to select the John Inglis Company.

Mr. MANION: Under pressure, yes.

Mr. McGEER: What is the accusation, that this government in Canada is running the war office in England?

Mr. MANION: They were in this instance.

Mr. McGEER: Do not be foolish. No one in Canada would believe that.

Let us come now to the other point about this particular issue. The committee did demand tenders; they did demand that the war office be requested to agree to a tender program, and they cabled a request to that effect to the war office. And what happened?

[Mr. McGeer.]

Here is a request under date of January 26, 1938, from the interdepartmental committee. It reads:

It is private and not public tender that is intended. The committee would like to know if this would affect the placing of your order in Canada realizing the probable delay incurred thereby. This information is for confidential use of interdepartmental committee which is working on proposed contract.

What was the answer of the war office to that?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt, but the hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. McGEER: I should just like to finish this.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk): The reply from the war office was:

Must emphasize that any further delay may adversely affect the proposal. In this connection firm having done necessary technical investigation obviously has the advantage.

Also, on February 5, 1938:

As regards alternative tender several months would necessarily be required for another firm to study job before making reasonable tender. This delay would be fatal to British interest in scheme.

Then there is Colonel Loggie's report to the secretary of Canada House. Colonel Loggie was the ordnance representative. His statement is contained in exhibit 224 as follows:

5. In his cabled reply, a rough draft of which was shown to me, Sir Harold emphasized the necessity of the immediate completion of a satisfactory agreement and mentioned the fact that a firm having carried out technical investigations obviously had the advantage, or words to that effect.

6. Sir Harold mentioned that should further delays occur a serious situation would arise in that the Enfield plant would be idle or nearly so before a Canadian entered production. He felt that unless immediate action was taken by the Canadian authorities the war office might be obliged to withdraw from participation in the scheme. I took occasion to ask him that in the event an auxiliary source of supply was established in Great Britain whether tenders would be invited or a suitable firm selected. He said, "We would select a firm."

The house divided on the motion (Mr MacNeil) which was agreed to on the following division:

YEAS

Messrs:

Anderson	Black (Mrs.) (Yukon)
Baker	Blackmore
Barber	Blair
Beaubien	Blanchette
Bertrand (Prescott)	Bonnier
Black (Chateauguay-Huntingdon)	Bothwell
	Bouchard

Boulanger
Bradette
Brooks
Brunelle
Cardin
Casselman
Church
Clarke (Rosedale)
Cleaver
Cochrane
Coldwell
Coté
Damude
Davidson
Deachman
Denis
Deslauriers
Donnelly
Douglas (Queens)
Douglas (Weyburn)
Dubois
Dubuc
Dupuis
Dussault
Elliott (Kindersley)
Esling
Euler
Evans
Fafard
Fair
Farquhar
Ferguson
Ferland
Ferron
Fiset (Sir Eugène)
Fleming
Fontaine
Fournier (Hull)
Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemount)
Francœur
Furniss
Gardiner
Gariépy
Gauthier
Gladstone
Glen
Golding
Gosselin
Grant
Graydon
Green
Hamilton
Hansell
Hanson
Harris
Hartigan
Hayhurst
Heaps Hill
Homuth
Howe
Hurtubise
Hyndman
Ilsley
Isnor
Jaques
Jean
Johnston (Bow River)
Johnston (Lake Centre)
Kennedy
King, Mackenzie
Kirk
Kuhl
Lalonde
Landeryou
Lapointe (Matapedia-Matane)
Lapointe (Quebec East)
Leader
Leduc
Lennard
Lockhart
McAvity
McCallum
McCann
McCulloch
Macdonald (Brantford City)
McDonald (Pontiac)
McDonald (Souris)
McGeer
McGregor
MacInnis
McIntosh
McKenzie (Lambton-Kent)
MacKenzie (Neepawa)
Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre)
MacKinnon (Edmonton West)
McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River)
McLarty
MacLean (Cape Breton North-Victoria)
McLean (Melfort)
McLean (Simcoe East)
MacLennan
MacMillan
MacNeil
McNevin (Victoria, Ont.)
McNiven (Regina City)
MacNicol
Macphail (Miss)
McPhee
Mallette
Manion
Marshall
Matthews
Maybank
Mayhew
Michaud
Mills
Mullins
Mulock
Mutch
Needham
Neill
O'Neill
Parent (Quebec West and South)
Parent (Terrebonne)
Patterson
Pelletier
Perley
Pinard
Poole
Pottier
Power
Purdy
Quelch
Raymond
Reid
Rennie
Rhéaume
Rickard
Rinfret
Robichaud
Rogers
Ross (St. Paul's)
Ross (Middlesex East)
Ross (Moose Jaw)
Rowe (Athabaska)
St-Père
Sanderson
Senn
Spence
Stewart
Stirling
Sylvestre
Taylor (Norfolk)
Telford
Thauvette
Thompson
Thorson
Tomlinson
Tremblay
Turgeon
Turner
Tustin
Veniot
Vien
Ward
Warren
Weir
Wermenlinger
White
Winkler
Wood
Woodsworth
Young—187.

NAYS

Nil.

Mr. HANSON: Ten days of unnecessary expense to the Canadian taxpayers.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the hon. member talking about?

Mr. HANSON: I want it recorded, too; ten days of unnecessary expense.

Mr. MANION: Why did the hon. member not make a speech when he could?

Mr. STEWART: Because he couldn't.

Mr. HANSON: The whole thing is silly.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 22, respecting the appointment of auditors for the Canadian National Railways.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. HOWE: This is the annual bill providing for the appointment of auditors for the Canadian National Railways. It is in exactly the same form as that of last year.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

REPEAL OF SECTION 106 OF ACT OF 1938

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 23, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. FAIR: The bill provides for the repeal of section 106 of the Dominion Elections Act, 1938. The effect of this section which was enacted last year, is to deprive electors of any control over the members whom they send to parliament.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What control have they now?

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. MANION: What will be the business to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING. Tomorrow we shall take up the resolution with respect to the trade agreement between Canada and the United States. I understand there is a desire not to proceed with the debate to-morrow in which event we would go on with supply, and take the estimates for the Department of Agriculture, Public Works or National Revenue.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, in regard to the desire not to proceed, I pointed out privately to the Prime Minister that when the empire trade agreements were introduced on a Wednesday, back in 1932, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who was then the leader of the opposition, took an adjournment of five days. And when the trade treaty of 1936 with the United States was introduced the right hon. gentleman who was then in my place took an adjournment of three or four days. To-morrow after the Prime Minister's speech I may make a few remarks, and then I shall suggest an adjournment for two days, until Thursday.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is fine.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Whatever is most convenient to my hon. friend will be suitable to the government.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Tuesday, February 14, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house will unite with them in the formation of a joint committee of both houses on the subject of the printing of parliament, and that the members of the standing committee on printing, viz., Messieurs Barry, Bertrand (Laurier), Casselman, Chevrier, Damude, Davidson, Denis, Douglas (Weyburn), Dussault, Elliott (Kindersley), Esling, Evans, Ferron, Fleming, Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemount), Gauthier, Green, Hansell, Hurtubise, Hushion, Jean, Kirk, Lapointe (Matapedia-Matane), Leduc, Lennard, Little, MacInnis, MacKinnon (Edmonton West), MacLean (Prince), McGregor, McIntosh, McKenzie (Lambton-Kent), McNevin (Victoria, Ont.), Marsh, Marshall, Mills, Moore, Mullins, Mulock, Mutch, Pinard, Purdy, Reid, Ross (St. Paul's), Ross (Middlesex East), Rutherford, St-Père, Taylor (Nanaimo), Thompson, Tucker, Tustin, Veniot, Weir and Winkler will act as members on the part of this house, on the said joint committee on the printing of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house has appointed the Hon. the Speaker and Messieurs Ahearn, Blackmore, Blair, Blanchette, Bonnier, Bothwell, Bouchard, Bradette, Brasset, Cameron (Hastings South), Casselman, Clark (York-Sunbury), Duffus, Emmerson, Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemount), Grant, Green, Hamilton, Hyndman, Johnston (Lake Centre), Kuhl, Lennard, MacInnis, MacKinnon (Edmonton West), MacLean (Cape Breton North-Victoria), MacLennan, MacNeil, Macphail (Miss), McCallum, Mallette, Martin, Moore, Mutch, Parent (Quebec West and South), Parent (Terrebonne), Raymond, Reid, Rennie, Ross (St. Paul's), St-Père, Spence, Walsh, Winkler and Young, a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the library of parliament, so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a joint committee of both houses on the library.

Motion agreed to.

COOPERATION OF PARTIES

REQUEST OF CERTAIN ELECTORS OF BROADVIEW AND OTHER TORONTO CONSTITUENCIES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition, in the form of letters and ballots, bearing some seventy names, voters in my constituency, and some hundreds of others, earnestly requesting me as a federal member to forget party advantage and cooperate for the common good—which I have always done, and I hope the government will do the same thing.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—MOTION FOR APPROVAL SUBJECT TO REQUIRED LEGISLATION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 17th day of November, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the trade agreement between Canada and the United States which was signed at Washington on November 17, 1938, was placed on the table at the opening of the session so that hon. members have had copies of it before them since that time. Incidentally I might remark that a month has elapsed since parliament opened.

Before proceeding to discuss the resolution I might say a word about the procedure the government is following in this matter. As hon. members will see, the resolution asks for approval of the agreement, but it implies that the agreement itself will be subject to further consideration by the house and that legislation will be introduced later to give effect to its provisions.

The purpose of the resolution is primarily to permit of debate dealing with questions of general policy raised by the agreement between Canada and the United States. If and when the resolution is adopted, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) will then ask that the house resolve itself into committee of ways and means to consider the agreement in detail and report on it. This will include, of course, the schedules which are attached to the agreement and which contain what is proposed in the way of changes of the tariff, the committee of ways and means being the committee of the whole house which has to do with all matters pertaining to the imposition and remission of taxation. This motion, I might say, is required under standing order 60 of the House of Commons. When the committee of ways and means has reported to His Honour the Speaker, a bill based on the resolution reported from the committee will then be introduced giving legal effect to the agreement. The bill will necessarily go through all stages in this house and in the other house, including again a consideration of its schedules in the committee of the whole. I mention all this lest there might be in the minds of any hon. members an impression that the government have taken upon themselves to do by executive authority what properly belongs to parliament itself. Nothing has been done by the administration with respect to the agreement which binds parliament to it, apart from such action as can quite properly be taken under general legislation already enacted by parliament.

It is true that the duties which are being reduced under the agreement, so far as Canada is concerned, have been reduced by order of the governor in council, but that order has been passed under authority of legislation enacted by parliament in the session of 1931 when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. At that time the government of the day led by the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett introduced an amendment to the customs tariff providing that where any country was able to obtain from another country reductions on Canadian products this country might make a compensating reduction. The words "reduction on Canadian products" were amended later, in 1935 I think it was, to read "concessions"; so that the customs tariff now contains a clause which permits the governor in council, wherever a concession is given by another country to this country, to grant by order of the governor in council a compensating concession.

So that there may be no doubt as to the accuracy of what I have just said, I shall read the section of the statute which deals with the matter. Section 11 of chapter 30 of the statutes of 1931 reads:

The governor in council may by order in council make such reductions of duties on goods imported into Canada from any other country or countries as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for reductions on Canadian products granted by any such country or countries.

In 1935 this section was amended by the following resolution in the budget:

Resolved, that the aforesaid customs tariff be further amended by deleting from section 11 thereof, the words "reductions on Canadian products" and by substituting in lieu thereof the word "concessions."

It is apparent, I hope, that any power which the present governor in council has exercised with respect to the reduction of duties has been taken under that general legislation.

One other matter that might occasion concern in the minds of some is the fact that certain modification in preferences has been made in the agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom. It may be thought that this action should not have been taken without the authority of parliament in the first instance. Here I would draw the attention of the house to the terms of that agreement.

The Canada-United Kingdom agreement has a provision which enables the parties, after conference, to modify the agreement in any particulars which may be of mutual advantage. I might say that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and the government of which he was a member were glad to avail themselves of that provision in the Canada-United Kingdom agreement of 1932 in order to obtain certain modifications in the preferences which had been granted to the United Kingdom in this country for the purpose of working out the agreement which at that time he was negotiating between Canada and France. Thus Canada was the first to ask the British government to permit it to take advantage of that clause in its agreement to modify an existing agreement. This fact placed the present government in a position where it would not have been at all easy to object when the British government itself asked this government to make such modifications in the existing agreement as would enable it to negotiate an agreement between the United States and Great Britain. I mention these points in advance so as to remove any doubts in the minds of hon. members that the government has proceeded in any particular beyond its immediate authority, or has taken from parliament any power with respect to the approval of this agreement in complete form before it actually becomes law.

Hon. members may ask, if this parliament should refuse to approve the agreement, what would happen to the numerous reductions that have already been made in the customs tariff. Well, what would happen would be that the reductions would cease to exist and that we should go back to the tariff schedule as it was on the first of January of this year, and the same would be true as respects concessions made to Canada by the United States. All that meanwhile will have happened is that for a period of a few weeks there will have been a reduction of duties both in the United States and in Canada on the articles specified in the schedules.

As I have said, after the committee have reported there will then be a further opportunity for hon. members to discuss any of the details of the agreement. I would point out, however, that it will probably expedite discussion and business generally if, when the schedules are before the committee of ways and means, they are examined very thoroughly, and the debatable points with respect to them discussed as far as possible at that time. Then, after the bill itself giving the effect of law to the agreement has been introduced, while there will be still another opportunity to discuss the schedules, hon. members will probably not feel the necessity so to do at that time. What I wish to make perfectly clear is that before members of the House of Commons are asked to give their final approval to the agreement, they will have had full opportunity to decide for themselves upon the merits of the tariff changes.

I mention this point because the government's procedure in this matter is different from the procedure of the government that was in office in 1932 when we had the Canada-United Kingdom agreement before us. It will be recalled that at that time the opposition of the day took strong exception to the course adopted by the then prime minister in asking the house in the first instance to accept the agreement in toto and then later to discuss the schedules attached thereto. In other words we were being asked to approve of an enactment which would put the agreement into force without knowing what the effect of the changes in the tariff were going to be. A different procedure was adopted in England in respect of the same agreement. All details of the tariff schedules were discussed in committee of ways and means before the bill itself giving legislative effect to the changes was considered by the British house. We are following at this time, as we did when we had the agreement of 1935 before us, the practice followed at Westminster.

As to the agreement itself, in a word, considering it in relation to the agreement of 1935, it constitutes an implementing of the pledge with respect to tariffs and trade which was given by the Liberal party to the country at the time of the last general election. While by itself it is not a complete implementing of that pledge, combined with the 1935 agreement and other changes in the tariff and its administration made by the present government, it carries out faithfully the undertaking then given by this party to the electorate of Canada. May I recall to hon. members the statement of Liberal policy with respect to tariffs as it was set forth by myself when in opposition in this House of Commons on February 27, 1933. In a statement of Liberal policy with respect to a number of outstanding problems there was one which had special reference to the liberation of external trade. In that statement, which was kept to the fore throughout the general elections of 1935 the Liberal party set forth its belief that trade was the basis of industrial and commercial development, and that what Canada needed was trade. Canada's need of trade was emphasized because of the fact that trade means increased production, increased consumption, increased distribution, increased transportation, increased employment, increase in the standard of living and consequently increased prosperity. The statement of Liberal policy went on to say:

> The Liberal party will promote trade with all nations and negotiate trade agreements with any countries willing to trade with Canada on a reciprocal basis.

I shall not mention this afternon other trade agreements that we have made while we have been in office, but the agreements with the United States of 1935 and of 1938 taken together are the outstanding trade agreements with a country that was prepared to trade with us on a reciprocal basis.

A further statement was that:

> The Liberal party will abolish the extravagant increases in the tariff made by the present administration—

That referred of course to the Conservative administration which was in office at the time the statement appeared and was being quoted.

> —which have had the effect of strangling trade, exploiting consumers and robbing the railways of business.

I have examined with some care the effects of the tariff changes that have been made by this administration since we came into office in October, 1935, the changes with respect to the British preference and with respect to the duties upon commodities coming into Canada from other countries. Briefly summarizing the whole position it may be said that the trade agreements completed since the accession of the present administration to office have effected a major reconstruction of the Canadian tariff. The rates of duty chargeable under the British preferential tariff on United Kingdom goods are on an average lower than they have ever been before, and the rates chargeable on United States goods have been reduced in two stages to a level that on most commodities is below that effective when the Liberals were last in power in 1930.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that is all I need say at the moment about the general effect of the tariff changes which we have brought about in one parliament. I doubt very much whether careful examination of the records of previous parliaments would disclose that in any two or even any three parliaments combined there was the extent of tariff reconstruction downwards and lessening of taxes on trade comparable to those which have been made by the present administration in the course of this one parliament.

May I next draw the attention of the house to the fact that reciprocal agreements with the United States have been sought by most administrations in Canada since confederation. There had been one agreement prior to confederation, which had shown the advantages of reciprocal trade with the United States, but that agreement ended in 1866, the year before confederation came into being. Since confederation there have been repeated efforts on the part of different administrations to effect reciprocal trade agreements with the United States. It is, I think, significant and worthy of note that the only successful attempts at negotiation were effected by previous Liberal administrations. The first of these resulted in the signing of a trade agreement between Canada and the United States during the administration of the late Alexander Mackenzie. That agreement was signed at Washington by the late Hon. George Brown for Canada and by Mr. Hamilton Fish for the United States, but the United States senate did not accept the agreement, and as a consequence those negotiations came to naught.

Then we had the all important agreement reached by the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his administration in 1911, a very far-reaching agreement of reciprocity in natural products between this country and the United States. I need not review in any detail what took place at that time in order to make clear why this agreement was defeated. On that occasion responsibility for the defeat did not rest with the United States. I recall the discussions quite well, for I was a member of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's administration at the time. The arrangement then reached was not a treaty to run for a number of years. It was felt that if a treaty were entered into for a number of years the opposition of the day would immediately say that we had bound ourselves irrevocably to the United States and that on this score the agreement might be defeated. The course adopted to avoid that sort of criticism was to provide that each country should enact its own legislation as agreed upon with respect to tariff changes; and that when each government had carried out its side of the arrangement, the terms of the agreement would thereby and then become operative and remain in effect as long as both countries believed it to be to their mutual advantage.

The United States passed the necessary legislation to admit Canadian products entry to the American market. When announcement of the agreement was made by the late Right Hon. Mr. Fielding in this House of Commons its members were as enthusiastic concerning it as any house of commons possibly could be.

But, as hon. members will recall, in that year Sir Wilfrid Laurier was obliged to attend an imperial conference in London, and during his absence there was formed in this country a group opposed to the agreement. The Conservative party of the day took it upon themselves to create an issue in the campaign which had nothing to do with the merits of the agreement from an economic point of view. They changed the nature of the discussion altogether and raised a political issue of loyalty to the British crown; they asked whether Canada was to continue to be a part of the British empire or whether Canada was to be annexed to the United States.

Mr. STEWART: And a good many Liberals helped them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the Liberal party of that day, there unfortunately were some whose views on this question, for reasons best known to themselves, came to differ from the views of the party generally, but there never was any question as to the position of the Liberal party of Canada itself with respect to the reciprocity agreement of 1911.

As I have said, when the agreement was introduced there was general enthusiasm on both sides of the house; but when it became apparent that it would be possible to make a political football out of what was a great economic reform the temptation of possible political success became too strong for hon. gentlemen opposite, and in the House of Commons after Sir Wilfrid Laurier's return the enactment of the necessary legislation was deliberately obstructed. The obstruction became so persistent that Sir Wilfrid Laurier dissolved parliament and went to the country on the agreement itself, the Liberal party staking its entire fate upon this great reform; more in the way of freedom of trade between Canada and the United States.

I remember very well hearing Sir Wilfrid Laurier say at that time that it would probably be at least a quarter of a century before another opportunity would come to Canada successfully to negotiate a reciprocal agreement with the United States. Sir Wilfrid pointed out what was all too true, namely that seldom in the history of the United States and Canada have governments been in office at the same time in both countries each of which was favourable to the lowering of tariffs. At that time there was in the United States a government that favoured the lowering of tariffs. In large part it was due to this fact that the Liberal administration of the day was able to make an agreement with the administration then in office in the United States.

Well it took about twenty-five years, almost to the year, to bring about that combination of circumstances again, with administrations in power in both countries sympathetic to a reduction of duties on products and other commodities passing across the international frontier. In the United States they have a government which has pioneered in its effort to bring about a reduction in trade restrictions, not only with its neighbours but with countries in all parts of the world. No man is more outstanding in world history to-day as a great reformer in the matter of the furtherance of trade between nations than Hon. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State of the United States. His example and his services to the world in this particular during this period of its trials, I think, are unparalleled by those of any other individual in his own or in any other country. Mr. Hull has believed and as consistently stated that the world was heading towards a condition of inevitable strife and war if the different countries continued to develop theories of economic nationalism and base their legislation upon those theories, becoming more and more nationalistic, more and more isolationist, and obliged in order to satisfy their peoples to resort, as a consequence of their restricted trade, to measures which were anything but in their real interest. For years past he has seen and pointed out to the different countries of the world that restrictions upon trade leading to increasing economic nationalism or economic imperialism were certain sooner or later to bring this world to destruction, and he has fought hard and valiantly to rectify the situation.

When the previous administration in this country—the late Conservative administration—were in office they had an opportunity to join with Mr. Hull and the United States government in effecting a measure of reform in the matter of greater freedom of trade between this country and the United States. The president had been given special powers by congress to reduce duties and by executive action to effect reciprocal agreements without the necessity of such agreements being submitted to congress for approval. There were certain limitations placed upon the powers given to the president. He was not authorized to reduce any duties by more than fifty per cent. He was not authorized to make an agreement for a period longer than three years, except with the understanding that it would continue thereafter subject to six months notice. But within these and certain other limits he had full authority to make reciprocal agreements with other countries. The late Conservative administration began negotiations with the United States for a trade agreement, and I should like to draw attention to the objective which they saw at the time as a part of the wisdom of successful negotiation. According to the correspondence which took place with the United States, they felt that a trade agreement would be mutually advantageous to both countries; but they went further and stated very clearly that they believed a trade agreement between Canada and the United States would have great international significance as well and might even be of service to the world. And may I say that they had all the advantages which the present administration has had in the personnel of those in the public service, skilled in negotiation, to help them in working out the details of an agreement.

Here may I pause to join in what was said by several other hon. members in the course of the debate on the address. I doubt whether any country has been more fortunate than Canada has been in the loyal, able, efficient and highly skilled service which has been rendered by members of the public service who assisted the ministry in negotiating the trade agreements at Washington. I do not think it is possible to commend these services too highly. In that statement I would include not only their services to Canada but may I say, along with their own negotiators, to the United States, because the benefits secured under these agreements are mutual. I would go further and include services rendered not only to Canada and the United States, but the United Kingdom and other countries as well. I do not believe a greater service could have been rendered by any three men at this time to the countries I have mentioned than has been rendered by Mr. Wilgress, Mr. McKinnon and Mr Robertson, the three able members of our public service who have had most to do with studying all implications and working out all details in the negotiation of the Canada-United States agreements.

As I have said, hon. members opposite had the services as we have had of these able men. They had before them, as a result of negotiations which ran over the greater part of one or two years, all the information and all the particulars necessary to enable them exactly to decide what benefits they could obtain and what advantages to Canada might accrue, were they to enter into an agreement with the United States. But as hon. members who sat in the parliament of that day will remember, we could never get any information from the prime minister of the day as to the progress of the negotiations. We could get no information as to how the administration was getting along. We were told that they were busily engaged—but nothing more. Parliament prorogued in July without obtaining any information as to the extent to which negotiations between Canada and the United States were likely to be successful.

During the campaign of 1935, which took place in September and October, the correspondence that had taken place in the previous year was made public for the first time. The correspondence went a long way towards disclosing what might be possible by way of advantage to Canadian producers, and of advantage also to Canadian consumers, were a trade agreement effected between the two countries. However, in the campaign no definite commitments were made by the Conservative party of the day. All they did was to exhibit to the electors what was alleged to be the course of negotiation up to that time.

I have in my hand the correspondence which took place between the government of that day and the United States government, as set out in an exchange of notes between Mr. W. D. Herridge, the then minister from Canada to the United States and Mr. Cordell Hull, the Secretary of State for the United States. Perhaps this would be as good a moment as any to see from what point of view the negotiations were approached, because it serves to throw additional light on the value of what has been effected since that time.

The first communication which set out the position of the then government of Canada was dated at Washington, November 14, 1934. It is signed by Mr. W. D. Herridge and is addressed to the Hon. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State for the United States, at Washington, D.C. In that note the minister of the day said:

> You will recall that when the Prime Minister of Canada visited Washington in April, 1933—

That was the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett—

> —at the invitation of the president of the United States, the development of trade between the two countries was sympathetically discussed.

It is interesting to note that that was as long ago as April, 1933. It was September of 1935 before this correspondence was given to the Canadian public. But as early as April of 1933 the President of the United States himself had approached the Canadian government with a view to seeing if it might not be possible to work out an agreement of reciprocal advantage.

> On April 29, 1933, Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Bennett issued a joint statement at the end of their conversations, which concluded as follows: "We have also discussed the problems peculiar to the United States and Canada. We have agreed to begin a search for means to increase the exchange of commodities between our two countries, and thereby promote not only economic betterment on the north American continent, but also the general improvement of world conditions.

Why was it that that very laudable aim was never in fact carried out or attained? The answer can be given in little more than a word. In that day there were in the government of hon. members opposite exactly what we see in the opposition before us at the present time—two wings of a party, the first of which was inclined slightly towards more in the way of freedom of trade. My. hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), I should hope, would have been one of that number having been strongly of that point of view at one time, and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) who, speaking the other day, pointed out that he thought his party had always favoured something more in the way of freedom of trade, and was rather favourable to a reciprocal trade agreement, would I hope have been another. But if we look across the aisle to where he sits we come to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan)—and, remember, he too was a member of the administration of that day. These three gentlemen were members of the same administration, an administration which had to do with the question of negotiating a trade agreement between Canada and the United States. What was the nature of the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George respecting a trade agreement with the United States, when he spoke in a previous debate of the present session? The hon. member has a number of pet aversions. I believe perhaps one of the strongest is his dislike of the United States, and particularly in those matters which relate to trade. He said in the house, and has said repeatedly outside of it, that there is no use in Canada trading with the United States, because we will always get the worst of it; in some way or another there is, he believes, an influence at work in Washington which makes it impossible for Canadians to protect themselves in the matter of their own interests.

Mr. CAHAN: No such words were ever said by me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not those very words, but that was the intent and meaning of what my hon. friend said.

Mr. CAHAN: And no such intent and meaning. I think Canadians, if they are of the proper calibre, can protect themselves in any situation.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might go over the entire number. However all I wish to point out is that there were several other hon. members in the cabinet of that day who held much the same view as my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George held then, and holds now, and has always held. I remember that the late Mr. Ryckman was one, and there were several others. I believe I could without much difficulty go over the ministry of the day and point out just how many would be absolutely opposed to any agreement with the United States and how many might be inclined to favour one.

Well, with a ministry divided in that way it is no wonder that the prime minister of the day was unable to enunciate any policy whatever.

Mr. MANION: Would the right hon. gentleman, after he finishes our side, describe the differences on his own?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "The differences on his own" are all reconciled, if I may say so. I might point out to the hon. member—well, I cannot say there was not one, although I am not certain at the moment there was, but certainly there was not more than one who did not wholeheartedly support the agreement we made with the United States in 1935. And that statement applies to a parliamentary party larger in numbers than any party which has ever sat in this House of Commons. As far therefore as the unity of the party is concerned, it has been pretty well illustrated. I believe my hon. friends will find at this time that ninety-nine per cent, if not one hundred per cent—I rather hope for one hundred per cent—of the party in this House of Commons will support the present agreement. I hope I have made myself clear as far as the solidarity of the party is concerned.

What I want however, to point out to my hon. friends opposite is that when it came to negotiating with the United States for a reciprocal trade agreement there was no division in the present Liberal cabinet over the attitude to be taken. We were a solid unit by way of standing together for the terms of the agreement which we were successful in negotiating and securing. The cabinet was as one, and that is why we succeeded where hon. gentlemen failed. As a party, we stood as a united force throughout the campaign in favouring a trade agreement with the United States. We made that profession throughout the campaign and later when a cabinet was formed to carry out the party's policies we who were its members lived up to our professions.

I remember very well that when this correspondence was published in some parts of Canada, it was not much referred to by speakers on the government side, although in others attention was drawn to the basis on which the government were negotiating. It was pointed out to the electorate in localities where it was thought the appeal would be effective, what better opportunities there would be to sell cattle in the United States, fish in the United States and lumber in the United States. It was pointed out that as authorized by the tariff act, there could be a reduction of fifty per cent on a specified number of natural products, including lumber, fish, potatoes, milk and cream, live cattle, a number of other agricultural products and several minerals, both metallic and non-metallic. The communication from which I quote was dated November 14, 1934. The election was not until October 14, 1935, but throughout that year nothing was given to this parliament when it was in session.

Mr. STEWART: Would the Prime Minister allow me to ask him a question, just to keep the record clear? Could he give the house the date upon which the president was authorized to negotiate on the terms as agreed to by congress? I think it was in 1934.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just pointed out that it was on April 29, 1933, that Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Bennett issued a joint statement as follows:

> We have agreed to begin a search for means to increase the exchange of commodities between our two countries, and thereby promote not only economic betterment on the north American continent, but also the general improvement of world conditions.

Mr. STEWART: I am asking for the date upon which the president received authority from congress to negotiate an agreement similar to the one negotiated in 1935. I believe it was in 1934.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was in 1934.

Mr. STEWART: Yes. In August, I think.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was plenty of time for the government of the day to have made an agreement if they had been united and of that mind and purpose.

Mr. STEWART: They had it pretty nearly closed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say in passing that it was stated at a previous session by the former leader of the opposition that this correspondence had been laid on the table of the house before the house adjourned in 1934. I questioned that statement at the time. I have since asked the clerk of the house if the correspondence was laid on the table and I have been informed that it was not. Certainly I have no recollection of its having been tabled, nor has anyone else. The campaign opened early in July, 1935. Parliament was dissolved on August 14, 1935, but it was not until September 9, 1935, that a press release of the correspondence was sent all over Canada for publication in the newspapers. It had been kept in storage for election purposes almost for a year. That release contained the correspondence which I have been quoting to the house. One letter to Mr. Cordell Hull was dated November 14, 1934; another letter from Mr. Hull was dated December 27, 1934, and the final communication was dated January 4, 1935. As my colleague points out, all that was pursuant to the authority which the president had to seek to negotiate an agreement with this country.

It is important to keep in mind that the entire correspondence was not given to the press until September 9, 1935, though it was all in existence on January 4, 1935. This parliament had no knowledge of it while the house was in session, but it was used throughout the final weeks of the campaign to imply, where it was likely to serve the purpose, that if the Conservative party were returned to power they would be prepared to go ahead with negotitions for what was in effect a reciprocity agreement. Others knew what to believe. I think it is perfectly clear that if the Conservative party of the day had been returned to power they would have been just as much divided after they came back as they were before. True to tradition, the protectionist interests of the government would have governed and we would have had no reciprocity agreement whatever.

Mr. MANION: May I just interject for a moment? So far as I recall, and I think I recall very well, there was no division in the council of Right Hon. Mr. Bennett.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there was no division, then it was because it was pretty well understood among themselves that they would not put any agreement into force before the date of the election, and that during the election they would make no promise to do it after.

Mr. SPENCE: Because they did not like the agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They did not like it, but we did. We took it and carried it through. The Tory party of Canada for years has never liked the idea of an agreement with the United States. Whenever that party occupies the treasury benches the public may look in vain for anything in the nature of an agreement ever coming into force. That was why with its willingness to negotiate it was possible for the present administration to effect an agreement in such quick order. I remember saying during the campaign that if the Liberal party were returned to power I believed that with the readiness of the United States to negotiate a reciprocal agreement, with what I knew to be the desire of the Liberal party in Canada to negotiate an agreement, we could effect an agreement in three weeks. We effected it inside of three weeks, for the very reason that we liked it. I may say to my hon. friends opposite that the country liked it. The country likes what has been done up to the present, and the country likes what we are doing to-day.

Mr. PERLEY: Time will tell about that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Time will tell about it?—no; let me tell about it right away. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been saying much about public opinion and of what the electorate thinks of these trade agreements. Fortunately we have a record of what the electorate thinks. The electorate has had excellent opportunities of considering the trade policies of both political parties over a period of a good many years. The trade agreement between the former Conservative government and Great Britain was affected in 1932. We who were of the opposition of the day took exception to many phases of that agreement on the score that in some particulars it was heading in the wrong direction. One was this. Preferences were not granted in that agreement by lowering the rate effective against the other parts of the empire which were receiving the preference. They were effected by putting up the rates as against all other countries. That was the great change in the method of granting preferences which came during the time that Mr. Bennett was in office. Our friends opposite talk about their being the ones who instituted preference. What they did was to institute an entirely new plan of raising tariffs under the guise of granting a preference. The preference owes its origin to Sir Wilfrid Laurier's administration in 1896. It was the Liberal administration of that day which was the first to grant to Britain and to other parts of the British empire a certain preference, and it did so by reducing the existing duties on their goods coming into Canada. It was the other administration, that of Mr. Bennett, which subsequently changed that method.

Mr. MANION: And got some return.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, we will see what the public thought of the return they got. I am coming to that now. From the time of the 1932 conference on there was a series of by-elections—quite a number—in this country at which the trade policies of the two parties were discussed, the Conservative party defending its policies with respect to higher tariffs, the Liberal party opposing them and taking the position I have cited here as having been given to this house by myself in a statement in 1933. From the time the conference of 1932 took place until the general elections of 1935 there were altogether seventeen vacancies which should have called for by-elections. As I have just said, in those by-elections which did take place the trade policies of the two parties were very fully discussed. What was the showing as the result of the vacancies and consequent by-elections of that period? As a matter of fact, for some time prior to the general elections of 1935 the Conservative party had given up fighting by-elections altogether; they had made up their minds that there was no use in trying to appeal to public opinion any longer on the score of tariffs; for they would be beaten every time. There were seventeen vacancies altogether and they allowed seven of these to remain. But what happened in the by-elections which did take place? There were by-elections in the following constituencies: Huron South; Yamaska; Restigouche-Madawaska; Mackenzie, Saskatchewan; Oxford South; Toronto East; York North; Frontenac-Addington; Elgin West; Kenora-Rainy River,—in all, ten by-elections. In those ten by-elections the Liberals held the five seats which they had previously had and gained four. The one and only seat which was held by the Conservative party was retained by a minority of votes. That was the position in ten by-elections, nine of them carried by the Liberals on their policies, and the one which was retained by my hon. friends opposite was secured by the hon. member for Toronto East (Mr. Church) in a three cornered contest by a minority of votes.

An hon. MEMBER: As a result of the depression.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was there in addition? As I say, they began to see what the public were thinking of their trade policies. Vacancies then occurred in the following constituencies—and what is doubly interesting about this is that in only one of these constituencies was the previous member a Liberal: Halifax; Long Lake; St. Denis; Algoma East; St John-Albert; Montmagny, and Simcoe East; seven vacancies, and not one of them brought to a test of public opinion by the party then in power. In other words, out of seventeen vacancies occurring in this House of Commons between the conference of 1932 and the general elections the Conservative party did not carry a single one except one by minority vote. That is how their trade policies and and their effects were viewed in the eyes of the people of this country.

Let us come to the present position. Since this present government came into office there have been, over a corresponding period of three years not seventeen, but twenty-five by-elections. By-elections have occurred in the following constituencies: Assiniboia; Queen's, Prince Edward Island; Portneuf, Antigonish-Guysborough; Victoria, British Columbia; Wright, Quebec; Gloucester: Ottawa East; Bonaventure; Hamilton West, Renfrew North; Cape Breton North-Victoria; Dufferin-Simcoe; Frontenac-Addington; Victoria, British Columbia; Lotbiniere; St. Henry; St. John-Albert; Argenteuil; East Edmonton; Queen's, Prince Edward Island; Brandon; Cartier; London; Waterloo South. What was the result of those by-elections? In six out of the twenty-five the Conservative party retained the constituency they had previously held. In one our social credit friends held their own. In eighteen the Liberals carried the constituency. In sixteen constituencies we held our own, and in two we made gains from the party opposite. With what result? With the result that while we had 178 of a following when we came into office—the largest following any government in Canada had ever had—we have to-day a following of 180 in this parliament, out of a total number of 245 and there was not a single vacancy when parliament reassembled at the beginning of this, its fourth session. The vacancy which has since taken place is the one which has been created by the recent resignation of the former leader of the Conservative party. Every seat in this house was filled when parliament met at the beginning of the fourth session, and we began this fourth session of parliament, with an increase in the government following of two seats above the number we had when parliament first met.

What has taken place in the period during which these by-elections were held? The people of this country had before them as an outstanding achievement of the present administration the trade agreement with the United States which was effected by this government immediately after coming into office in 1935. That agreement has been the subject of debate everywhere. And may I point out—as hon. members opposite know only too well—that in the city of Victoria, where this government carried the seat from the Conservative party, the then leader of the Conservative party went all the way from Halifax to Victoria to fight the issue of the trade agreement with the United States.

Mr. McGREGOR: Who went up to Waterloo?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will have to answer that. I did not go myself; I can tell him that. And what has happened since my hon. friend has become the new leader of his party? He has had his hand in some of these by-elections. One of them was in Brandon. There again the question of the 1935 trade agreement with the United States was a main subject of discussion at the time.

Mr. MANION: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes, it was, and it was known that there was to be another agreement to come along very shortly which would increase the benefits which had been derived under the previous agreements. The result was, as I have said, that in each of these two constituencies, Victoria and Brandon, the Conservative party lost the seat to the Liberal administration. I think the record of the by-elections speaks to hon. gentlemen opposite more eloquently than any words could possibly do, as to how the electorate of this country feel about the trade agreements which have been made with the United States, and which, as I have said, have been the main subject of discussion in at any rate most of these by-elections.

If the public have taken the view they have of the present administration it has certainly been in large part, because of the obvious benefits which have been derived by Canada from the government's trade policies, and from some of the other policies of the government. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been making the most of the difficult times we are in. They are times that are difficult the world over. They are less difficult in Canada, I believe, than in any other country in the world. What they might have been but for some of the reforms already effected by the present administration, I hesitate to say. If we had had no trade agreements, with the benefits which they have afforded to producers and the benefits they have given the consumers, in this period of difficult times, the situation for Canada would have been infinitely worse than it is.

Hon. members point to the falling off of trade in a particular year. The only way to view an agreement of this kind at all properly is to take its results over a period of years.

Everyone knows that last year there was a great recession in the United States. Everyone knows that there has been a great depression in our Canadian west, that that part of the country has been suffering from severe drought. These two factors alone account for what there has been in the way of a falling off of trade. Surely hon. gentlemen will not say that the recession in the United States or the drought in western Canada was due to the Canada-United Kingdom agreement which was made in 1932. No more were they due to the trade agreement of 1935. Misfortunes of this kind, are of a character which no country of itself has been able to prevent.

I have not time to-day to run over the advantages that accrued to producers and consumers under the first agreement, the agreement of 1935, but I wish to give now to this house some of the advantages which are certain to accrue to the producers and consumers of this country as a result of the agreement which we have before us at the present time, the 1938 agreement. I shall run over these as quickly as I can, but I think it is important that in considering this resolution the house and the country should know to what extent producers, and also consumers, who make up the whole population of Canada, are likely to benefit by the present agreement.

The criticism has been made that we have given certain concessions, and there will be an effort in the course of this debate to stir up sectional feelings because in some particular locality some one commodity may, to appearances at least, have been affected. Well, I wonder how any agreement could be made between countries unless there were some concessions on both sides. It all depends upon the extent of the concessions. It is true that Canada gave up certain preferences in the British market in order that the United Kingdom might make an agreement with the United States, an agreement which she could not have effected but for this action on our part. But if hon. members will examine the agreement they will find that we have received ample compensatory advantages in the United States and in the British market as a result of these concessions, and they will find also that in their effect upon any locality or industry the general result of the two agreements vastly outweighs any adverse effect that could possibly come in consequence of the agreement.

Let me cite some of the advantages. I venture to say that hon. members, though they are familiar in a general way with the terms of the agreement, will be surprised at their extent.

First let me say the leader of the opposition the other day took exception to a press release given out at the time that the agreement was negotiated at Washington; he called it propaganda and ballyhoo. I say to the hon. gentleman that if no release had been given out he would have been the first to complain that the government, instead of making known to the people of Canada the exact truth with respect to this particular agreement, had placed no facts before the public, and we would have been told that we did not understand the new democracy, which demands the fullest information with regard to everything that is done. I am going to place a copy of the press release on the table of the house and shall ask the clerk to see that copies which are available are distributed to every member in this house and in the senate so that hon. members may judge for themselves whether this is a statement of fact or ballyhoo and propaganda.

Mr. MANION: A mixture of both.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will be able to take his part out of the mixture and others will take theirs. He is welcome to the ballyhoo.

Mr. MANION: The ballyhoo was not meant for me but for the public.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will tell the house when he comes to it, the part that is ballyhoo, we shall thank him for so doing. What I wish to point out is that both in the United States and in Great Britain the same course was followed. The government of the United States issued a press release, a release two or three times the length of the one I have placed on the table of this house, which gave in detail a statement of the agreement from the government's point of view. In Great Britain a press release was issued with respect to the agreement between the United States and Great Britain. In an agreement affecting some 700 or more commodities, it would be extraordinary if something in the form of a press release were not needed.

Mr. CAHAN: Could the Prime Minister furnish a copy of the press release at Washington? It would be interesting for hon. members to read it also.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought from what my hon. friend said the other day that he had read it and was quoting from it, so surely there is no need to give him one.

Mr. CAHAN: But you might furnish it to the house as a counter-irritant.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me now discuss some of the benefits that come from the present agreement, so far as the Canadian producer is concerned. The Canadian producer in every part of the dominion will share in the benefits resulting from the agreement. For example, in the maritime provinces, the concessions with respect to fish will be found of the greatest benefit. Here I must emphasize again the fact that all that I am now setting forth in the way of benefit is in addition to what has already been obtained under the agreement of 1935. The benefits of the latter agreement remain in toto. The benefits I am speaking of now will be added to those of the 1935 agreement when this agreement is passed. I have already mentioned the concessions on fish. The reductions of United States duties on potatoes will be particularly appreciated in New Brunswick, and the fox farmers of Prince Edward Island will gain from the concession on silver fox furs. The producers of Quebec will gain from the reductions in the duties on maple products, on salted codfish, cream, milk, hay, buckwheat, certain types of paper, salmon and lumber. The producers of Ontario will benefit from the reductions on lumber, cattle and calves, cheese, bacon and pork, barley, clover and grass seeds, fresh water fish, paper, nickel, ferro-alloys, leather, and various manufactures of wood. The farmers of the prairies will gain from the maximum reduction of fifty per cent in the United States duty on heavy cattle and the enlargement of the tariff quota on this type of cattle, as well as through the concessions on horses, swine and pork, poultry, feed wheat, barley, oats and rye, feeds of various kind, and fresh water fish. British Columbia will be particularly benefited by the concessions with respect to forest products but will also gain from the concessions on salmon, halibut, fresh cod, sperm oil, zinc, cadmium, firebrick and limestone. Let me speak of a further advantage which will come under this agreement. Any advantage that is gained by Britain, for example, in her treaty with the United States will accrue to Canada under the most favoured nation exchange arrangement, which is part of the agreement.

Hon. members opposite have sometimes taken exception to the part of the agreement relating to most favoured nation treatment being accorded other countries. That principle was agreed to by their party when they were negotiating with the United States. Let me read what appeared in the actual exchange of communications which formed the basis of all subsequent negotiations:

> The mutual concession of tariff treatment as favourable as that accorded to any other foreign country;

Perhaps I had better read what precedes that. This is Mr. Herridge speaking on behalf of Mr. Bennett and his administration:

> I am authorized to put forward the following outline as a suitable basis for the negotiation of a trade agreement.

And the second feature is this:

> The mutual concession of tariff treatment as favourable as that accorded to any other foreign country; this means that Canada would extend to the United States its intermediate tariff, involving reductions from the present rates of duty on some 700 items, including both natural and manufactured products, together with a number of further reductions below the intermediate tariff rates through the extension to the United States of concessions made by Canada in trade conventions with foreign countries.

In other words, the most favoured nation principle was to be embodied in any agreement the previous administration might have found it possible to make. In addition to the benefits which we receive under our own agreement, we receive other concessions under the Anglo-United States agreement, which are extended to us under the most favoured nation clause. The chief commodities on which we receive concessions in this indirect way are books, manufactures of artificial abrasives, various types of leathers, boots and shoes, tobacco pipes, dressed furs, kippered herrings, biscuits, jellies, jams and marmalades, ginger ale, amorphous graphite and pig iron.

Now let us take the benefits to different industries in the country. Agricultural products on which we receive direct concessions include live cattle, swine, pork and bacon, cream, milk and cheese, poultry and eggs, horses, honey, barley, oats, buckwheat and feed wheat, mill feeds, mixed feeds and screenings, blueberries, strawberries and other berries, apples and cider, clover and grass seeds, potatoes, turnips, hay, maple products and silver fox skins.

Fishery products of almost every kind are conceded admission to the United States markets on more favourable terms. The most important concessions are those received on fish of the cod family—cod, haddock, hake, pollock and cusk, but valuable concessions have also been received on salmon, halibut, swordfish, mackerel, herring, fresh water fish generally, sturgeon and shellfish.

Forestry products receive concessions on lumber, shingles and many other manufactures of woods. The free entry of standard newsprint paper, which is the largest single item of trade between the two countries, is re-bound, and a reduction is made on uncoated printing paper, on hanging paper, and on some classes of tissue paper and crepe.

Mineral products, too, receive better treatment; reductions in duties being made on nickel, aluminium, zinc ore and metal, cadmium, feldspar, talc, certain forms of mica crushed limestone and lime, bentonite, salt crushed stone, firebrick and refractory cement Certain concessions are made on ferro-alloys and many important minerals are bound on the free list. A number of chemicals are bound on the free list or receive reductions in duty.

Manufacturers receive benefits as well. Manufactured products receiving concessions include whisky, patent leather, harness leather, skating boots, gloves made from horse hides or cow hides, hose and tubing of rubber, hose of vegetable fibre, pipe organs, lacrosse sticks, ice skates, woven wire cloth, axles, cast iron fittings for cast iron pipe, iron castings, moulding patterns, chains, electric washing machines, electric stoves, motor boats and yachts, while the free entry of agricultural implements is re-bound.

The fact is, then, that Canadian producers in vast numbers will be benefited by the concessions received from the United States in the new agreement. And may I point out particularly to my hon. friends sitting to the left on the far side that this means increased purchasing power, and increased purchasing power for no part of Canada more than the part from which they come.

Now let us speak of immediate advantages to the consumers, in addition to some advantages that will come in other ways. The consumers of Canada are more numerous than the producers, since every member of the community is a consumer. The consumers number over eleven millions, as compared with gainfully occupied producers numbering some four millions. The consumer as such benefits from concessions that are given rather than those that are received.

Probably the largest single concession to the Canadian consumer in the new agreement is the undertaking, in respect of all the items in schedule I of the agreement, to remove at the earliest opportunity the special excise tax of 3 per cent at present levied upon their duty paid value. This concession will necessarily apply to imports of all these commodities from all most favoured nations. It will involve a very considerable sacrifice of revenue, but consequently a very considerable reduction in the tax burdens of the Canadian consumer. As soon as the necessary legislation is approved by parliament the commodities included in schedule I, coming in from the United States and other most favoured nation countries, will be free of the special excise tax.

Here are some of the other benefits that consumers will derive from the agreement. Let me begin with food products. Important concessions have been made on these. United States fresh fruits and vegetables are made available on easier terms to Canadian consumers in those seasons when domestic products are not on the market, while the Canadian fruit and vegetable grower retains his domestic market in his own producing season. On a large variety of fresh vegetables the basic ad valorem rate is reduced from 15 to 10 per cent. United States oranges are admitted free of duty in the five months from December to April inclusive, while a duty of 35 cents per cubic foot is retained for the remainder of the year. The duty on fresh grapes is reduced from 1½ cents to 1 cent a pound in the period from July to January inclusive. Small reductions are made in the duties on dates and figs, and a reduction from 22½ per cent to 15 per cent is made in the duty on dried fruits, n.o.p. Rates on canned corn, beans and peas are reduced from 2 cents to 1½ cents a pound, and rates on canned vegetables n.o.p. are reduced from 27½ per cent to 20 per cent. Duties on many types of fish are also reduced; for example the rates on oysters in the shell are reduced from 22½ per cent to 15 per cent. In the sugar group a reduction is made in the ad valorem component of the compound duties on confectionery.

In respect of beverages and tobacco, the duty on whisky is reduced from $10 to $6 per proof gallon. The previous duties on cigarettes, $4.10 per pound plus 25 per cent ad valorem, are reduced to $3 plus 15 per cent.

In respect of clothing, considerable concessions are made in the duties on high grade manufactured textiles, such as come to us almost exclusively from the United States where they do not come from the United Kingdom. Duties on unbleached cotton fabrics are reduced from 20 per cent plus 3½ cents a pound to 17½ per cent plus 3 cents, and those on bleached or mercerized cotton fabrics from 22½ per cent plus 3½ cents per pound to 20 per cent plus 3 cents a pound. Moderate reductions are also made on printed or dyed cotton fabrics. The agreement also provides for the complete removal of the specific components of the present compound duties on clothing and wearing apparel n.o.p. of silk, artificial silk, linen and mixed fibres.

The specific duty of 25 cents a pound on knitted garments n.o.p. is removed, leaving an ad valorem rate of 35 per cent, and the duty on socks and stockings other than wool is also reduced. On leather goods there is a reduction from 35 per cent to 30 per cent on leather boots, shoes, slippers and insoles, while the rates on leather belting, leather garments and leather harness and saddlery are also reduced.

Other reductions are made upon various other types of consumers goods, including unbound books, printed matter and stationery, paper and paper products, wall paper, cameras and camera films, motion picture films, various drugs and chemicals, including proprietary medicines, dressings and bandages, soaps and soap powders, watch cases and clocks, sterling and other silverware, motorcycles, pianos and organs, trunks, boxes, handbags and other luggage, school chalk and jewellery.

Of recent years, the Liberal party has aimed throughout at the reduction of duties on the implements of production. I need not remind hon. members of the reductions made under a previous Liberal administration in what came at the time to be known as the Robb budgets, famous particularly for the reduction of duties on implements of production, as being of assistance alike to producers and consumers. It is significant that in regard to this agreement there are also reductions in tariffs on various kinds of producers' machinery and tools. Under the present agreement, from the farmers' point of view reductions are made in the duties on cream separators, dairy and creamery equipment, dairy hollow-ware, manufactured fertilizers of all kinds, sprays and insecticides, root and garden seeds, and practically all the hand tools used by the farmers, fruit growers and dairy men.

The mining industry will benefit from the lower duties on ore and rock crushers, stamp mills, rock drills, coal cutters and other articles of mining and metallurgical equipment. Reductions in the rates on diesel and semi-diesel engines and other heavy machinery will also be useful to the mining industry, as well as to the saw mills.

The lumbering and saw mill industries will benefit from the lower duties on locomotives and cars for use in saw mills. The fishermen will benefit from reduced rates on various kinds of tackle, net floats and steel trolling wire.

I have spoken of the benefit to the consumers, and given a long list of the articles on which duties have been reduced. But let me add the following items on which the Canadian home will also benefit from the reductions on many articles of household equipment. In this list are glass tableware and other cut glass ware, kitchen and other hollow-ware of aluminum, clothes wringers, electric and other refrigerators, furniture of wood or metal, rugs and carpets, linoleum and oil cloth. The Canadian office will gain from the reductions on typewriters and other office equipment.

Still other important reductions are made on raw chemicals, tin plate, stainless steels, steel pipes, aircraft and parts for use in the manufacture of aircraft, dynamos, generators and electric motors of all kinds, electric precision instruments, steel castings and frames for locomotives and tenders, steel pulleys, together with a general cut of fifty per cent in the duties on all unenumerated machinery of iron or steel of a class or kind not made in Canada.

On the whole this new agreement and the associated Anglo-United States trade agreement have been hailed throughout the democratic world, as well as in the contracting countries themselves, with high approval, from the economic as well as from the political point of view. These agreements represent a return to sound economics from the extravagant economic nationalism of the depression period. In each of the three contracting countries they reduce hundreds of duties and raise none. In Canada itself adverse criticism has been conspicuous by its comparative absence, and the reception of the agreements by leading business men and financiers has been almost uniformly favourable.

I have spoken of the economic aspect of this trade agreement, and in conclusion I should like to say a word—not much more than a word—with respect to the political aspect, using "political" in the broad sense of the word, as referring to the international significance of this agreement. Here may I say that in these days, when we hear from some quarters that there is a lack of leadership in Canada, Canadians might well take pride in the fact that it was a Canadian government which was the first to bring into effect with the great republic to the south a trade agreement which involved in world affairs at least a beginning on new and saner lines towards furthering good relations between nations. I think at this time the people of Canada might well be directed to see some evidence of leadership in a course of action by an administration which succeeded not only in effecting trade agreements between two neighbouring countries, one of them their own, of the mutually beneficial character of the two I have cited, but also in action by an administration which led unmistakably to the most important trade agreement of modern times, that between the United States and the United Kingdom. I do not stand here and make an unsupported claim for the party I represent that we helped make possible this agreement between Great Britain and the United States. The United Kingdom was the first to acknowledge the service rendered by Canada in that particular. The United States has done the same. During the course of the debate on the address I placed on Hansard a communication which I had received at Washington the day the trade agreements between Canada and the United States and the United Kingdom and the United States were signed. That communication thanked the Canadian government, in the name of the British government, for having made possible the agreement which was concluded by them at that time.

71492—58½

I want to emphasize the international significance of these agreements, because now we have to consider not merely the two agreements Canada has made with the United States, but the two agreements that are conspicuously before the world to-day, namely the agreement between Canada and the United States and the agreement between the United States and the United Kingdom. Those agreements are inseparable in the sense that neither could have been effected without the other. It is important to remember that it would not have been possible for us to have extended our own agreement beyond a certain time, except with the good will of the United States. Let it not be forgotten that the first agreement we made with the United States was for three years, subject to termination after that period by either party on six months' notice. Those three years were up on January 1 of this year. We also have a trade agreement with Great Britain, which expires next year. As far as those two agreements are concerned, notice in regard to one could have been given last year, and in regard to the other the agreement with Great Britain, notice of termination might be given this year, to become effective next year. I now ask: Where would this country be in the matter of its future trade if it had not sought to be accommodating when asked to cooperate and had not lent its good offices to those two great countries, who are our principal customers, and to whom we look, so far as trade is concerned, more than to all the other countries of the world combined? Where would we have been if we had not played the part which Canada, above all others, has an opportunity to play in this world to-day, namely that of interpreter, between those two great countries, and so far as possible a conciliator of their differences? I say one of the greatest achievements any government has ever had to its credit is that of having been able to play a part in bringing about a new situation in trade relations between such a great group of nations as Great Britain, the United States and Canada; and, as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has just said to me, not only a leading part but a decisive one.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

May I point out that before these negotiations took place the democratic countries of the old world were so concerned about the situation in Europe that England and France together asked the then premier of Belgium, Mr. Paul van Zeeland, if he would not undertake a commission to investigate and report on the possibility of persuading the great nations that for the good of the world in general they should seek to remove some of those restrictions on trade which were making for economic nationalism, an economic nationalism which many believed was bringing the world closer and closer to war. Mr. van Zeeland undertook that commission. It was an inquiry into the possibility of obtaining a general reduction of quotas and other obstacles to international trade. He was recently in Ottawa, where he spoke to a number of us with regard to these matters. At that time he said, as he has said publicly in the United States and elsewhere, that there had in the recent past been no contribution made to a solution of the problems of our day that he could think of that was comparable to that which had its outcome in these trade agreements between the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. His report on international economic reconstruction, which was published by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, is quite lengthy. I will not take time to read more than one paragraph. It was written before the United Kingdom-United States agreement had been negotiated:

> In the present state of affairs, the negotiation of bilateral commercial agreements, based on the most favoured nation clause, remains one of the most efficacious methods for reducing tariff barriers. . . . No one would underestimate the effect which would be produced—either directly, in its reaction on the two national communities concerned, or indirectly, in its repercussion on the whole world, by the conclusion, in a spirit of international collaboration, of a commercial agreement covering the wide range, between the two great Anglo-Saxon communities.

That was what Mr. van Zeeland reported as the result of his inquiries in different countries, that one could not overestimate the advantages to the whole world of an agreement of that character between those two great English-speaking communities could such be obtained. And what Mr. van Zeeland regarded as desirable is exactly what has now been done in an effort to produce a more satisfactory international situation. The Anglo-United States trade agreement could not have been concluded without the negotiation of the Canada-United States agreement and the acceptance by Canada of some modifications in the empire preferential system. Surely we can afford to view with pride a contribution, however slight, to so great an end!

May I now give, as coming with perhaps greater authority than words spoken by me personally at this moment, the expression to the world of the views of the governments concerned in these transactions, with regard to their international significance. On November 17, as hon. members will recall, the Canada-United States agreement and the United Kingdom-United States agreement were signed at Washington on the same day and at the same time. The representatives of the three countries were asked by the president of the United States to speak on that occasion and were thereby afforded an opportunity to indicate what in the opinion of these governments was the international significance of the agreements. If the house will pardon me I shall place first on the record a part of what I said on that occasion on behalf of the government of Canada, as expressing our conviction and what I believe is the conviction of the people of Canada with respect to the international significance of the agreements. I said:

On the earlier occasion—

Referring to the agreement of 1935—

—I also expressed the view that the benefits of our agreement would not be confined to trade. They have not been so confined. It is no exaggeration, but the simple truth, to say that the relations between the United States and Canada have never been happier than in the three years that have elapsed since November, 1935.

To-day's ceremony, has, fortunately, an even broader significance than that of three years ago. We have also just witnessed the conclusion of a far reaching agreement between the United States and the United Kingdom. There will be in Canada genuine satisfaction that in facing the problems of to-day the two countries, with whose fortunes those of Canada are so closely linked have effectively strengthened the friendly relations which have long prevailed between them.

It must be increasingly apparent that the stability of the civilization we cherish depends more than ever on the friendly association of the great English speaking nations of the old world and the new.

That statement is unquestionably true, and it is a very significant statement.

We cannot but be impressed by the fact that the occasion of our coming together to-day has been, in part at least, determined by the willingness of the sister nations of the British Commonwealth to facilitate a trade agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States. Our satisfaction at the conclusion of these long and arduous negotiations is all the greater because the agreements which have been reached are in no sense exclusive. Indeed their effects will be to remove many obstacles from channels of world trade. Their benefits will extend far beyond the limits of the three countries immediately concerned.

We cannot too earnestly hope that they will provide to other countries an example of the mutual advantages which flow from the broadening of trade relations not only in the realm of material well-being, but in the wider sphere of human understanding and good will.

I wish now to give to the house, in regard to the international significance of the agreements as viewed by the United States, the words of Mr. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State for the United States. I believe it would be impossible to cite any person whose words are more deserving of careful thought and consideration at this time. Mr. Hull said:

The two documents are of historic significance. Not only do they provide an instrument for an expansion of valuable commerce between the countries concerned, but they constitute an expression of determination on the part of three of the world's largest commercial nations to maintain and strengthen a sound and healthy basis of international trade. The conclusion of the two agreements is a forward stride of surpassing importance in the direction of a firm establishment of non-discriminatory treatment as the foundation of international trade relations.

These agreements furnish concrete and powerful support for a future trend of world developments along the lines of increasing understanding and cooperation among nations; of peace built upon order under law; of expanding international trade based upon fair dealing; upon equality of commercial treatment; and upon stability of those business conditions which are necessary if private enterprise is to flourish and thus to enhance the economic prosperity of each nation. Through the conclusion of these agreements, our three nations have given a new vitality to the basic principles of a civilized world order, the acceptance and application of which are indispensible to economic well-being and social security within nations, to peaceful relations between nations, and, therefore. to the continued advancement and progress of mankind.

I wish now to quote the words of the British ambassador, speaking in the name of the British government:

I wish to join with the Secretary of State in the expression of deep satisfaction at the conclusion of these agreements. The agreement which we have just signed relates firstly to the trade between the United Kingdom and the United States of America. It also relates to the trade of the United States with Newfoundland and the numerous territories which constitute the British colonial empire. We are glad that at this same moment the Dominion of Canada has signed a new trade agreement with the United States based on those principles which govern our own. And we gratefully acknowledge the contributions made by the dominions and India in order to facilitate the conclusion of our agreement.

As it is, the extent and variety of the trade covered are very great.

And then in conclusion:

On this sound and healthy basis trade will be facilitated, the prosperity of our peoples increased, and the arts of peace encouraged. I share fully the sentiments expressed by the Secretary of State as to the promise for improvement in relations among nations which grows out of international negotiations of the kind which have been so happily concluded between our two countries.

May I supplement the words of the British ambassador by these words which appear in a cable which came to me as Prime Minister of Canada from the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs in London, and which was received at Washington at the time of the signing of the agreements:

On occasion of to-day's signature United Kingdom-United States trade agreement I should like to express again to Canadian government cordial appreciation of their readiness to facilitate our agreement with the United States by consenting to such modifications of their rights under their existing trade agreement with the United Kingdom as were necessary to enable it to be concluded. It is our confident hope that agreement now signed together with complementary agreement between Canada and the United States which is being signed at same time will assist substantially in reducing barriers to trade and will thereby prove a real contribution to world appeasement.

In the opinion of this administration, we in Canada, because of our democratic and peaceful outlook upon world affairs and also because of our position as one of the world's largest traders with much to gain from the extension of world trade, were bound both by our sentiments and by our economic interests, to join with the two larger English-speaking democracies in promoting a policy of Anglo-Saxon friendship and of international goodwill. A policy of national self-sufficiency is out of the question for Canada which is peculiarly in need of international trade because of its enormous production of primary commodities and its relatively small population. Thus we cannot, like some other countries, pursue a policy of producing all that we consume and consuming all that we produce. Our whole economy, the prosperity of our vast wheat areas, our mines and forests and fisheries, and our far-flung transportation systems, are based upon the continuance of international exchange of goods on a great and growing scale. The restriction of international exchanges involves a declining standard of living, as the totalitarian nations have found to their cost. The increase of international exchange of goods involves a rising standard of living, not for ourselves alone, but for all peoples that are ready to join with us in removing the obstacles which at present obstruct the free course of international trade.

Canada, then, on both political and economic grounds, is committed to a policy of peace and goodwill, and of freer exchange with countries which will meet us half way. More especially are we committed to such a policy in dealing with the countries with which there can be no question of the disturbance of good political relations, particularly the countries included within the British empire, together with the United States. Nearly nine-tenths of all our international trade is already conducted with the British empire and the United States, and a considerable part of the remainder with the smaller democratic countries of Europe. Indeed, if it had not been for our empire and continental relationships, we should, as I have already said, have fared much worse than we actually did during the great depression.

So far as greater freedom of trade is concerned, we are always willing to add to these countries, other countries prepared to trade with us on a reciprocal basis, whether they be countries whose policies are guided by the same democratic ideas, such as France, the Scandinavian countries, Holland and Belgium, or countries with domestic policies differing from our own. We do not regret that such countries may derive some incidental benefit from the operation of the agreements recently concluded. We feel that if we take rather more of their products, they will take more of ours.

It is to be remembered also that the agreements command the full support of the other chief countries of the British commonwealth. In the old days it used to be claimed by some that in matters of trade Canada had a choice between the United Kingdom or the United States. Now we have chosen both. Our trade agreement with the United States has the full approval of the United Kingdom, and our preferential trade agreements with the United Kingdom and other empire countries have the full assent of the United States. We have made the best of both worlds, and have assisted the United Kingdom in securing freer access to the markets of the United States. Once again we have played the part of reconciling and interpreting the two great English-speaking nations to each other. The making of these agreements, especially when the world situation is so precarious as it unfortunately is, is an achievement of superlative importance, which will have its repercussions throughout the world in the next generation. In the present, each of us sleeps more safely in his bed because of the rapprochement between the world's two greatest democracies, a rapprochement that could not have been effected without the assent and the cooperation of Canada. If this administration were to end to-morrow, it would have its honourable place in world history on this score alone. That is the broad fact of the present situation. Like Canning, we have done our indispensable part to call into existence a "new world to redress the balance of the old."

It has been truly said that economic insecurity and depression are major causes of internal disorders and of international friction and economic warfare that sometimes develop into military warfare. Such insecurity and depression are frequently caused by excessive trade obstacles that prevent citizens of one country from exchanging products with the citizens of other countries. Removing excessive trade barriers, and thus permitting a greater exchange of goods to contribute to economic prosperity and security, is clearly a means of avoiding some of the deep-rooted causes of military warfare.

The trade agreements concluded between Canada and the United States, and Great Britain and the United States constitute the one outstanding contribution of our times toward economic disarmament. As such, they have immeasurably helped to create a basic situation more favourable to peaceful relations between nations. Let us say in conclusion, the agreements are proof of the feasibility of working out fair and friendly adjustments in the economic field which lessen the friction of conflicting interests and remove the risks of international misunderstanding. They represent the attainment of an objective in substantially reduced barriers to trade, toward which the commercial policy of the present administration has been steadily directed. It is deeply gratifying to the government that in our efforts to ensure, over a longer period of time, the advantages of wider markets to producers, and the advantages to consumers secured in the trade agreement of 1935, we were able, in a still wider arena, to further not only the ends of commerce and trade but the all important ends of international goodwill. No more important contribution toward a new order of relations between nations has been made at this critical period in the affairs of the world.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only five or ten minutes to-day, because it is understood, following the custom with regard to trade treaties, that there shall be an adjournment for a few days. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) mentioned this last evening.

I have listened with a good deal of interest to the speech of the Prime Minister, particularly to the last part. The first part of his speech was largely a political stump speech in which he brought out the story of the by-elections held during the past three or four years. Naturally he picked out those which were favourable. He made a very good story of it and I have no quarrel with it. If I wished I could deal with a couple of by-elections, such as the one at St. Henri, which certainly did not depend upon the trade treaty, and the one at Waterloo South, which did. However, I do not intend to waste the time of the house on those matters; I shall endeavour to speak entirely on the merits and demerits of the trade agreement.

The right hon. gentleman's peroration was largely oratorical, as is usual when he makes a speech of this kind. It was very well done, but I find myself just a little puzzled as to how he could get so enthusiastic over the peace which has been brought about between Canada and the United States. I think all hon. members of this house, and Canadians outside the house whose memories go back a number of years—my good old friend to my right can take his memory back perhaps fifty or sixty years—can remember many after-dinner speeches referring to the three thousand mile boundary line between Canada and the United States without a gun or fort of any kind on either side. So many speeches of this kind were delivered that most people reached the stage where they were sick and tired of listening to any mention of this "three thousand miles of undefended frontier". They were not sick and tired of the magnificent example which Canada and the United States has given to the world, but they were a little tired of listening to all this talk about it.

Going back into history, I cannot recall any time since 1812 when there has been any difficulty between Canada and the United States. This treaty, therefore, did not do much to bring about peace between Canada and the United States. So far as Great Britain is concerned I can remember an incident that occurred in 1913 when travelling by boat from Los Angeles to Vancouver and Victoria, I was in a group of Americans. As Canadians and Americans are very much alike, they took me to be a United States citizen and talked quite freely in my presence. At that time there was some little difficulty between the United States and Japan, the former having passed certain laws in connection with properties in California which were not pleasant to the Japanese. I well remember how pleased I was at the attitude of the Americans. They said that if there was any difficulty between the United States and Japan they knew they could count absolutely on the friendship of the United Kingdom.

I can remember pleasant relations springing up between the United Kingdom and the United States. It is quite true that the delightful relations which have existed between Canada and the United States for a hundred years did not exist between the United Kingdom and the United States much before the beginning of this century. But for the last thirty-five years at least there has been no indication of any trouble between the United Kingdom and the United States. An American senator said some years ago that the thought of war between the United States and Great Britain was absolutely repugnant to the people of the United States.

I mention this because it is the attitude that has existed for many long years. I do not want to puncture the bubble the right hon. gentleman has been blowing, but at the same time I do not think it is necessary to get quite so excited about the marvellous peace treaty which has been negotiated by the right hon. gentleman to keep the United States and Canada and the United States and Great Britain from going to war.

I do not intend to go on any longer to-day. There is nothing unusual or unfair in what I am proposing as to adjournment of the debate. When the empire trade agreements were introduced by Mr. Bennett on October 12, 1932, the right hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister was then leader of the opposition, and he took an adjournment of five days from October 12 to October 17. When the Canada-United States treaty of 1935 was introduced on February 25, 1936, the leader of the opposition of that time, Mr. Bennett, took an adjournment of three days. I am going to suggest that, with the consent of the right hon. gentleman, the government and the house, we be given the same adjournment that Mr. Bennett got at that time, namely three days, instead of the five as in 1932, in which event the debate would be continued on Friday next. With that suggestion I move the adjournment of the debate.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say at once to my hon. friend, as I said last night, that whatever would most oblige him the government will be happy to afford. This debate, then, will continue on Friday.

Mr. MANION: Unless the Prime Minister would prefer it to go over to the beginning of next week.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. MANION: Whichever will suit him.

Motion (Mr. Manion) agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON AND AFTER WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Wednesday the 15th February next to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence on Wednesdays over all business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope the government will not press this motion. So far the private members have had no opportunity whatever of introducing any of their resolutions. It may be said that there has been a debate upon the Bren gun matter which has taken considerable time, on a motion introduced by a private member. On the other hand the government itself was prepared to refer that matter to the public accounts committee, and hon. members on the government side took their full share in the debate. I cannot see, therefore, that private members can be accused of delaying the ordinary business.

It seems to me there is a danger that this house will be enabled to consider merely government business. The supporters of the government, who are in the vast majority, seem to be content, largely, to let the government bring forward whatever measure it pleases; we in the opposition are reduced to the position of simply criticizing what the government brings forward, and when the government does not bring forward a great deal we are in rather a hopeless situation. There are certain matters which we believe are of great interest to our constituents, and which we should like to discuss. I do not think that at this stage of the session we should have Wednesdays taken from us. I ask that the government do not press this motion.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I support the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) who has just taken his seat. As a matter of fact I do not suppose the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) expected that his motion would carry to-day. It is my recollection that all governments, when first they make this motion, expect it to carry with effect about two weeks later than the day they originally propose.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MANION: That has been my experience in the many sessions I have sat here. At any rate I think the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has very good grounds for saying that, owing not to the fault of the government but to other circumstances, private members have been crowded off the board. I support him and ask the Prime Minister to postpone the motion a little longer.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I support the stand of the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth). It seems to me there is developing in Canada the attitude that when people express the opinions of their particular constituencies they are wasting a good deal of time. All we need to do is to remember from what the word "parliament" is derived, and it will begin to set us right along this line. All we need to do is to remember that there are two or three nations which have completely dispensed with the disagreeable necessity of having people talk politically at all, and we can see the direction in which, probably, we are going. I have no desire to see any of the time of parliament or of the country used in vain, but for centuries it has been the policy of British peoples to allow all the people to have their say.

Since I have come into this house, and since the group with which I am associated have come here, we have studiously avoided taking part in discussions to which we felt we could make no worthwhile contribution. It has been evident, I believe, to all who have willed to notice it, that we have contributed very little to this Bren gun confab. That is in accordance with our policy. Speaking for my own group, we came here with a message to deliver, and the day will come, sir, when it will be realized that the message this group came to deliver is a message which should have been listened to long ago. For the day will come when it will be realized that here—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —lies the solution of the difficulty. Probably, Mr. Speaker, I am out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must keep to the motion before the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We just wish to back up the stand of the two hon. members who have spoken, to the effect that we should not be denied the privilege of using private members' day.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I wish to add my voice to the protest which has been made by those opposing this motion —which is just another instance of the ever-present and continual attrition which is taking away the rights of private members, which are really the rights of the common people, to express themselves. The actions and privileges of private members are sufficiently curtailed now, and hardly a session passes without an attempt further to curtail them. One of the most important privileges the private member, as representing the common people, possesses is the right of bringing in resolutions and having them debated and possibly voted on. At least that used to be one of the privileges, but it is being restricted more and more. I often wonder why the government—all governments, whichever happens to be in power—are so much against this; because it is the best way for them to hear and to get an insight into the wishes of the people, and that government is always wisest and most successful which keeps its ear to the ground and informs itself of the wishes of the people and keeps a little bit ahead of public opinion.

For our own protection, and largely for the protection of the larger parties in the house, we framed a lot of what we call standing orders—quite a big volume; there are 130 of them—and they are very strictly and rigidly enforced as regards the rights of the two major parties. But when it comes to the rights of the groups and of individuals it is quite a different matter. No rule can be amended affecting the rights of the two major parties in the house on the conduct of public business without having a committee of the house, which generally has to be unanimous, to agree on the change. But anything in connection with the rights of private members can be done by a mere vote in the house any day, upon the leader of the government giving two days' notice.

There used to be no limit upon the length of speeches of hon. members in the house.

That was changed and the time was confined to forty minutes. It is a very severe restriction.

An hon. MEMBER: Too long.

Mr. NEILL: We have a standing rule, number 15, which lays down very strictly the program for the complete week. It defines what shall be taken up on Monday, on Tuesday, and so on, and that procedure is very strictly adhered to. There would be a nice fuss if there was any proposal to deviate from it without unanimous consent. But in connection with this matter, the right of private members to bring in resolutions, it does not need general consent at all. The program as laid down provides that Monday shall be devoted to the introduction of private members' resolutions. Wednesday is only a half day and private members have Thursday for the first four weeks. But that is only a trick of language, because as a matter of fact it is not four weeks, but only three weeks. The first Thursday cannot be counted because private members cannot discuss any resolutions on that day. Why not be honest and call it three weeks? That was thought reasonable at one time and perhaps it was then, but the gradual increase in the number of groups suggests that greater opportunity should be afforded for private members to debate matters in which they are interested. After a time the government moves that one of the days allotted to private members each week be discontinued, and a little later another day is taken away. This means blocking discussion.

Before last session I placed a notice on the order paper at least six weeks prior to the meeting of the house. Under ordinary conditions, in any company or public board, notice of that length of time would be sufficient to get a motion heard; but although I placed my motion on the order paper six weeks before the house met it had only reached the top of the list, about to come on for discussion, when the Prime Minister rose and moved that all further private members' days be taken away. This year I thought I would make sure and I therefore placed a resolution on the order paper three weeks after the close of the house. That surely was plenty of time. On July 25 I sent the notice in. Now I am second on the list and my resolution may or may not be heard. I do not think it will be. And twenty-five members with resolutions below mine cannot possibly be heard. Thursdays we have already lost because we debated the speech from the throne and the Bren gun for three weeks. But we discussed the speech from the throne on the motion of the Prime Minister that it should take precedence, though he was well aware that in that way we were going to be deprived of three or four Mondays and Wednesdays. In the British Columbia legislature it is the custom—it is very frequently done, at any rate—to have a member or two speak on the address and then adjourn that debate and go on to some other public business on the order paper. But that was not done here; it never is, and in that way private members' days are taken away and they have no opportunity to discuss resolutions in which they are interested. The Prime Minister is now taking away one of the private members' days before we have had, even for one day, the opportunity to which we are entitled. This is the first time it has ever happened. We have not had a private members' day so far this session, and now, as the scripture says, the government is taking away the semblance of the privilege—"that which he seemeth to have." That is not democracy.

We have heard before, and I am sure the Prime Minister will tell us again, that there are a number of other opportunities available to us. One of these is the occasion when estimates are in committee of the whole. We are told that we can then deal with any subject in which we are interested. But that is limited by the fact that in committee there is a strict rule which provides that speeches in committee of the whole must be relevant to the item or clause under discussion. I have been caught in that way before. It may easily be that there will be no item in the estimates under which some particular subject which hon. members would like to discuss might properly be taken up, so that that outlet is closed. The other alternative is the time-honoured one, "Oh well, you can always discuss it on the motion to go into supply," that being the occasion on which under the old British tradition, members are allowed to voice grievances before granting supply. The answer is this. It is a well-known fact, indeed, it is one of the rules, that an amendment to the motion to go into supply constitutes a vote of want of confidence in the government. Can anyone expect therefore that members elected to support the government will take such a step when it might mean the defeat of the government? Still less can you expect the government to extend sympathetic consideration, let alone taking sympathetic action, on a resolution framed in such a way that, if carried, it would mean their own defeat.

That is why I say that we should not be deprived of these opportunities to introduce resolutions for discussion. Very often a resolution is brought in and defeated and on another occasion it is brought up again. The government hear what is going on and the people of the country become educated in the idea that is advocated and express their views privately to the government. Subsequently it may be brought forward in a more acceptable form and one or other of the parties adopts it as their policy. It is therefore educative and useful.

It may be said that a good part of the session has already gone and we have done nothing. But the address in reply to the speech from the throne is a part of the government's business. Apart from custom, there is no law that makes it incumbent upon the government, when they have little or no business of their own, to adjourn the house. They might go on to private resolutions. But they never do; instead they adjourn the house. There have been two Friday evenings that we could have made use of in the discussion of private members' resolutions, but on both occasions the house was adjourned.

Mr. DUNNING: By unanimous desire.

Mr. NEILL: We had not got into estimates, though that was not through any fault of the government; but the fact remains that the house was adjourned, and therefore two occasions were lost to private members. It will not do the slightest good to protest because the government have a majority and they can make up their mind to do these things, but I add my protest to those that have come from the other groups against having private members' days taken away so early in the session.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): The motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) must be considered in conjunction with the larger question of reorganizing the rules of procedure of the house. Private members' privileges are being taken away every year. I have a motion on the order paper and I have no objection to letting it go this year in order to get on with the business, because all these motions might be considered under the estimates; but we have a parliamentary constitution and we have rules, and yet private members have few or no privileges. Some ten years ago and almost every year since I introduced a motion which would have remedied the present situation, and in the last four years I have discussed the subject matter of that motion, namely, the revision of the rules of the house, together with constitutional reform, parliamentary reform, cabinet reform and law reform. It took three hundred years for parliamentary government to attain its present control over the budget and the executive, and in the struggle there was bloodshed. When parties cannot agree there is always trouble. The constitutional changes that have been brought about in the motherland have not come about without a great deal of sacrifice, and where two sides could not agree there was trouble, as in the case of the general strike in 1926 when troops were sent to the docks.

My proposal is that we should set up a committee to study the question of our rules and procedure, and of parliamentary, constitutional, cabinet and law reform, and reform in other directions. We have no control over the constitution or the exchequer at the present time. We are simply conducting post mortem examinations. For example, this afternoon we have been hearing something about an international trade treaty that was passed over the heads of parliament, and of industry and labour. I do not refer in any spirit of criticism to what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said, or done because I believe he did at heart what he believes to be right. But, I repeat, we should have a committee on law reform and on House of Commons reform to bring our proceedings up to date. On the order paper there are many bills having to do with the criminal code, bills embodying amendments which private members think should be made. Some of these are proposed by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and some by other hon. members, and in my opinion there should be a standing committee on legal bills and estimates to which these questions could be referred. There are a number of standing committees to-day. I have been a member of one committee that has not met in years, the public accounts committee. We should revise our ways of doing business and adopt the municipalities' plan of dealing with estimates. The heads of departments sit around a table with a committee and strike off thousands here and there, or perhaps half a million. The deductions are made by all with the officials present as a guide, and—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is wandering from the subject matter of the motion. The motion is to take away Wednesday as a private members' day.

Mr. CHURCH: I accept that ruling, sir; it is quite correct. But I say that this question of private members' days and the motions of private members on the order paper should be referred to some committee of the house, and the rules and regulations should be amended.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A good deal has been said on this motion with respect to the rights of private members. Odd as it may seem, I think something ought to be said as to the rights of the government. I must say in reply to hon. members opposite that I have most in mind at this moment what I think the people of this country will expect me to say. In the first place may I point out that it is over a month since this parliament assembled. In that time the government has not been able, until to-day, to bring forward a single government measure. That has not been the fault of the government but has been due to the fact that the entire time has been occupied by private members speaking in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and on the motions with respect to the Bren gun contract. It has been due to another fact, namely that while the government have sought in a courteous way to secure the cooperation of hon. members opposite in expediting business we have had no cooperation, but opposition. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has spoken about the adjournments which have taken place on Friday evenings. I asked hon. gentlemen opposite early in the week if they would not allow us to go into supply in one of the departments that we might have a chance under the rules to take up supply on Fridays, as is customary in this house. Hon. members know that for years past, in fact for all time, it has been a general custom of this house to reserve at least part of Fridays for discussion in committee of supply. But though the request was repeated later on we were refused that opportunity. That is one of the reasons why we did not sit on Friday night.

Mr. MANION: You could have brought up your other business.

Mr. STEVENS: Half a dozen resolutions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Supply was the important business.

Mr. MANION: So are the others, or they should not be on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows very well which is the most important business. Getting on with supply is one of the major obligations of a government. At the end of the session there is an outcry if the government have a great deal of supply left. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen opposite are framing their program in such a way that that may be the position when we get towards the end of this session, but if it is the position it will be entirely their own fault, not the fault of the government.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not fair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is perfectly true. We have not had opportunity thus far to get into supply at all.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not correct. At any time the government, with its huge majority, could have adjourned any debate and gone on with any business.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We could not have adjourned the debate on the address in reply, because a motion was carried by this house that it should have precedence over everything else. And I ask hon. members what would have been said of the government if we had, as suggested, adjourned the Bren gun debate.

Mr. STEVENS: You did adjourn it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: However, I am not anxious to get into any controversy or argument; I am simply stating the plain facts. I ask myself, what do the people of this country expect the government to do? Do they expect the government to be governed by private members, or by its own appreciation of the necessity of doing the business of this country?

Mr. STEVENS: To be governed by parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have been sent here for the purpose of carrying on the business of this country. The business of the country is not primarily private members' motions, it is the business which the government brings forward.

I come to what the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said, because I agree that this whole situation has a much larger significance than appears in this resolution. He said to-day that many assemblies in the world have been swept out of existence because the people thought they had become incapable of carrying on the business of government. That was his statement. There are a great many people in this country who are busily at work trying to develop a similar agitation against democratic government. I could direct his attention without much difficulty to agitation in some quarters to have it appear that this country is without leaders, that parliament is incapable of carrying on business and that we should have something different. It would be very easy to have the people content to slip into the fascist method of doing business should the country be given the impression that the government, because of the time taken up by private members, has no opportunity to go ahead with the business of the country.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) says they have been denied four private members' days this session. We have been denied, by the discussions that have taken place in this house, nine government days.

Mr. HEAPS: That is not quite correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is perfectly true. Look at the rules of the house which provide certain days for government business. We have not been able to touch government business on those days set apart as government days. Nine days have gone, some at least of which we should have had for government business.

Mr. MANION: Was not the Bren gun matter government business?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not government business at all.

Mr. MANION: It should not have been.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: An hon. member made a motion to refer the Bren gun contract to the public accounts committee. The government accepted that motion, and the motion should have carried then and the matter sent immediately to the public accounts committee. The time for the discussion, under the rules of the house, would be when the report of the committee came back. Hon. gentlemen would have had all the time they wished at that time to discuss the matter. No one knows that better than my hon. friend.

Mr. MANION: No, I do not know any such thing. The time to discuss it was the present time, if we desired to discuss it. That report was the result of a thorough investigation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After voting twice against the motion, my hon. friends turned around and supported the motion.

Mr. MANION: I did not vote against it. I voted for our own amendment, that is all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Another thing I wish to point out. There are two houses of this parliament, the Senate and the House of Commons. The cost of carrying on the work of parliament relates to both houses. Now thus far this session the senate, through no fault of the government, has had no legislation at all from this house. We have been unable to send any legislation across to the other house. They are adjourning again, waiting for legislation from this side. Private members' resolutions do not go to the other house.

Mr. MANION: Why not start a little business over there as well as here?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Each house manages its own affairs. It is part of my obligation, and I do it in no critical way, but from a sense of duty, to point out some of the circumstances governing this situation, which are responsible for the rules of the house being what they are. The rules of the house are to protect all hon. members, and by following them carefully and literally we shall get along much further with both private and public business. What I wish to make perfectly plain at this moment is that the government have been sent here by the people of Canada to carry on the business of the country, and the first duty of parliament is to get on with that business, no matter what anyone may say or wish. When private members, whether through resolutions or any other circumstances whatever, occupy the entire time of parliament so that it is impossible for the government to get on with a single measure, then I say the time has come for the government to take such action as is necessary and imperative to see that it can get ahead with the public business.

I have no desire to be arbitrary in this matter. If it will assist in restoring a sense of cooperation at the present time I have no objection to changing the date in this resolution from the fifteenth to the twenty-second. I think, however, that is as far as we should go at the present time. Monday still remains for a consideration of private members' resolutions. I have before me a record of the number of Wednesdays that elapsed in other sessions before the government took over that day, and I find several years in which there were only four. The record is as follows:

	Days
1931	4
1932	4
1933	3
1935	5
1936	3

And so it goes.

Mr. NEILL: But in no case has Wednesday been taken away before we ever had a single day's discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not gone through Hansard to see, as my hon. friend will probably understand. But may I point out that when the government does get on with its own business there is opportunity at those times, as has been pointed out, for private members to discuss many of the matters contained in their own resolutions, matters which are of great public concern. There is nothing which restricts private members from debating every question of government business.

My hon. friend speaks of the number of resolutions and says many of them will not be reached. When we find difficulty in discovering a proper procedure under our own rules we very often go, in fact it is one of the rules that we should go to the parliament at Westminster and see what procedure is followed there. What is done at Westminster with regard to private members' resolutions? Do they try to run through all that appear on the order paper and debate every resolution? They do not. They have a ballot; a limited number of resolutions are selected by ballot, and those are the only ones permitted to be taken up. If the rules and practices at Westminster were studied you would see wherein the present administration has been, if anything, more than lax in not insisting before this on the right of the government to get under way with its own business. It is not with any desire to curtail the opportunities of private members that I am asking the house to accept this resolution with the date amended to the twenty-second; it is simply because I know only too well that before this parliament ends every hon. member will be anxious enough to get through with government business as rapidly as possible.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): I certainly must correct the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in some of his statements. Let me say to him at once that I do not object very seriously to the practice of taking away Wednesday some time after the session has moved along and an opportunity has been given for the discussion of private members' measures, and later in the session taking away Monday, as is usual. But in the present instance I do not think the right hon. gentleman has been quite reasonable in his attitude.

In regard to last Friday, the government had on the order paper a bill regarding pensions, one with respect to fisheries, a resolution concerning the granting of $100,000 to the city of Ottawa, a resolution regarding the penitentiaries commission, a resolution concerning technical education, and I think also the resolution regarding the national film board. These were all before us on the order paper; they were reached; any one of them might have been called. The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) had his bill under consideration for some considerable time and then the discussion was adjourned because of questions that were put to him from his own side as well as from this side of the house. The minister, I think quite properly, let certain clauses stand, but there was no obstruction or difficulty; substantial progress was made. Then the resolution of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) with regard to authority to appropriate $750,000,000 was discussed and adjourned by the government. We could have gone on with that if the government had wished so to do. All these measures were there to be gone on with, last Friday.

Mr. MANION: The government was not ready.

Mr. STEVENS: Not only that; in other years I have seen it happen in the early part of the session, when the government business was not ready, that we would go right through the order paper to private members' resolutions. The Prime Minister repeatedly said that the government had been prevented from getting on with its own business. Control of the house is always in the hands of the government, and from my recollection that was never more so than it is to-day, having regard to the government's huge majority. The Prime Minister asks what we would have thought if they had suggested adjourning the debate on the address after passing the resolution at the commencement of the session that it should take precedence over all other business. That is the regular resolution, but it was not necessary. Four or five years ago we debated the speech from the throne over a period of weeks but as an ordinary item on the order paper, without a resolution establishing precedence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did my hon. friend approve of that?

Mr. STEVENS: I did not; generally speaking I prefer the present method. But there was nothing at any time to hinder adjournment of the debate by the government for the purpose of taking up any other matter. Certainly there was nothing to hinder adjournment of the Bren gun discussion at any time and the taking up of other orders of business. I want to make it abundantly clear that on Friday night the government were not prepared to go on with their business and that so far as we were concerned, there were five or six items which could have been proceeded with. We were quite willing to go on. In fairness to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) I must add that I believe there was a sort of understanding on Friday between the whips that the house should adjourn at six o'clock.

Now that the Prime Minister takes the attitude he does I think we should make it perfectly clear that had any such wish been expressed by the government we would have been quite willing to proceed with the business. My hon. leader was not here but I know that my colleagues and myself would have gladly agreed to go on. I am not reproaching the government for what it did, but I do say the Prime Minister is not treating the house fairly in seeking to lay the onus for all this on the shoulders of those who sit on this side of the house, because there was an abundance of government measures to proceed with had they so desired.

As to the suggestion that we are to have supply backed up until the end of the session, once again that is in the hands of the government. During the coming months they may do as they wish in connection with supply; and to say, after the house has been sitting for four or five weeks, that there is any question about the discussion of supply is drawing a pretty wild bow.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that it is not reasonable to ask this. He has consented to let the motion stand for a week. I think it would be quite proper to question it even then, because under the rules there is plenty of opportunity for government business to be proceeded with.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has already spoken on the motion.

Mr. CHURCH: I have just a brief question. Would the right hon. gentleman kindly give consideration later to the various suggestions advanced to-day with regard to the appointment of a small committee to revise the rules of the house concerning these matters and the functions of private members. As Edmund Burke says, "a private member is the connecting link between the government of the day and the electorate, and when he ceases to function, parliament is at an end."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be glad to consider the suggestion made, and also to see what Edmund Burke says.

Motion as amended agreed to, on division.

ROYAL VISIT TO CANADA

REFERENCES TO THE KING IN CERTAIN UNITED STATES PERIODICALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty) of which I gave notice yesterday. My question is with reference to the visit of their majesties, and with reference to certain publications which appear on news stands and reading rooms throughout the country. I refer directly to Scribner's magazine of February 11, particularly to page 16, a copy of which I gave to the Postmaster General yesterday. In that publication there is a statement that our king is a usurper, that he was a weak personality and only on probation, and that he is not the legal occupant of the throne. The article makes use of many other epithets which I know every Canadian would resent. Further, the text of the article was sent to Canada in a dispatch of a United States newspaper group, and was published in many Canadian daily papers.

Under the rules of the House of Commons no member may speak disrespectfully of his majesty or of any member of the royal family; yet periodicals, which have been commented on in England, are circulating here. Scribner's went farther in this article and published a lot of pictures from the Chicago Tribune—a mere invention.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to put the question directly to the minister.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to give the name of the author of the article. His name is Joseph Israel II, a publicist agent, with offices in the Empire State building, New York City. I would ask the Postmaster General to look into these articles and to prohibit them throughout Canada, as has been done in England. The king is beloved, and in time will equal his father in real qualities as a ruler.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I answer the hon. member? The Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty) was in the house a moment ago, but is not in his seat at the present time. I shall direct his attention both to the question and to the speech of the hon. member.

REPORTED INVESTIGATIONS BY MOUNTED POLICE RESPECTING PAST CANDIDATES FOR PUBLIC OFFICES

On the orders of the day.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): In this evening's Ottawa Journal appears a news item which is rather perturbing, as follows:

Special representatives of the R.C.M.P. are engaged in various parts of the country where the king and queen will visit checking up persons who have run for public offices in recent years, according to information given to the Journal. It is believed the purpose is to be posted on certain candidates whose election speeches and activities indicated views of an extremely radical tendency.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Hon. members laugh, but I suggest there is something here which is rather serious. I can quite understand that their majesties' persons must be protected, but this does not seem to relate to that. I am asking the government if instructions have been given to check up people because of their political views, and especially people who in the past have run for public office. I cannot quite understand it, and I think we ought to have a statement.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I shall take the remarks of the hon. member as a notice of motion, and will inquire about what is at the bottom of it. I can assure him however that he will not be among those over whom supervision will be exercised.

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT

COST OF INQUIRY—ACCOUNT OF L. A. FORSYTH, K.C., ASSISTANT GOVERNMENT COUNSEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). In view of the Bren gun contract debate, which concluded last evening, and in view of the statement of the costs of the inquiry as being, up to February 1, about $15,000, is it true, as stated in the Ottawa Journal of this morning, that L. A. Forsyth, K.C., of Montreal, one of the assistant government counsel in the inquiry, has submitted an account at the rate of $200 per day and expenses, amounting to $10,000?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I will make the same answer to the hon. member.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CABLEGRAMS REFERRED TO IN DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if he will have laid on the table of the house the originals or copies of the two cablegrams which were read last night by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson).

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member has not in mind just what was read. It was not a cable. I think the document to which the hon. member refers was a statement prepared by the deputy minister of national defence.

Mr. CAHAN: No; I had in mind those referred to and quoted at page 892 of Hansard. One was a reply from the war office on a certain day, and then apparently there was another reply from the war office on another day. Both are quoted, but only in one instance is the date given. The documents are not placed before us so that we can understand their relationship to other documents exhibited before the commission of inquiry.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to the hon. member that all the documents were placed on the table, and the ones he refers to must be among the number. They are exhibits.

Mr. DUNNING: They are exhibits of the inquiry.

Mr. CAHAN: They do not purport to be exhibits.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, certainly; they are numbered in each case.

LABOUR DISPUTES

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT MEDIATION IN CONNECTION WITH STRIKES IN KITCHENER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question, of which I gave notice, to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), and in his absence to the government? In view of the strike of the employees of the Dominion Tire Company on February 8, which was joined yesterday by the employees of the Merchants Rubber Company, both of Kitchener, Ontario, I desire to ask the government whether they have been requested to use their good offices to negotiate in this matter, or have offered to mediate, and if so what replies have been made or received?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am afraid I cannot answer the question at this time. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is not now in the house. No doubt he will be able to give the hon. member an answer to-morrow.

GERMAN ALLEGIANCE

DIPLOMATIC ASPECTS OF APPEAL TO CANADIAN CITIZENS FOR RELIEF ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to know if the house is aware that an appeal for the German national winter relief fund has been issued by the German consulate in Vancouver to Canadians of German origin, urging them to give tangible proofs of their unity with the homeland, and their support of the reunification of Austria and the Sudetenland with the German Reich. If so, does the government intend to deal with this action as a violation of diplomatic privileges?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to look into the question of the hon. member to see what is involved or implied before making a reply.

SUPPLY

DISTRIBUTION OF SEED GRAIN IN WESTERN PROVINCES—STATEMENT OF MR. T. C. DOUGLAS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn) Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I desire to bring up a matter which is of vital importance not only to the people I represent but also to thousands of others who live in the drought areas of western Canada. I have no wish whatsoever to hold up supply, and I shall take only a few minutes to present to the house what I believe to be a matter of urgent public importance. I refer to the need for relief seed in those areas of western Canada where, because of drought, rust and grasshoppers, the farmers will not have sufficient seed to sow their crops this spring.

I am aware of the fact that the distribution of seed comes within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. But I am also aware of the fact that during the past two years this parliament has passed a seed grain bill placing a federal guarantee behind loans for the purchase of seed in western Canada. Parliament has thus indicated its interest and its responsibility in the matter.

On January 27 of this year, as reported at page 380 of Hansard, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) asked a question of the government with respect to its intention in this matter for the present year. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) replied that no request had come to him for assistance in connection with the financing of seed grain purchases. I do not think the provincial governments, and especially the government of Saskatchewan, will be able to finance relief seed this spring, without federal assistance. I cannot but think that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has already discussed this matter with the western provincial governments. He must have some policy in mind regarding this important subject. It is because I should like to have him enunciate that policy at this time that I bring the matter to the attention of the house.

There are only three matters I should like to place before the government, the first of which concerns the urgent need for governmental assistance in connection with procuring seed for the farmers in the drought area this coming spring. It is a well known fact that the provincial governments, and particularly the government of Saskatchewan, are not themselves in a position to finance relief seed. Unless assistance is forthcoming from the federal government farmers either will have to procure their own seed, which means that many of them will not have seed, or will be compelled to go to the loan and mortgage companies for financing, a procedure which in my opinion would be a disaster in the extreme.

Last year a municipal secretary treasurer in my constituency showed me a note which had been sent to him by a mortgage company for a certain farmer to sign and return, for seed which they had supplied. The farmer signed the note at the rate of $1.70 per bushel for seed which he received at a time when wheat could be procured at the elevator for 74 cents per bushel.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): What kind of wheat?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am quite prepared to admit that it was probably better wheat. It was Thatcher seed.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I sold it for $2 a bushel last year.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am not interested in what the hon. member sold it for. I am simply pointing out that last fall this man received an average of 54 cents per bushel for his crop. In other words, he had to bring back about three bushels for every bushel he had received. If the farmer is to be dependent upon the loan and mortgage companies for financing spring seed he will be left open to victimization and exploitation. I think the farmers of western Canada should be told now whether or not any action will be taken, either by this government in cooperation with the provincial governments, or by this government alone, to see that they have seed for the coming spring.

Secondly, I wish to impress upon the government the need for haste in supplying the farmer with seed. Last year on March 11, a resolution was placed on the order paper giving advance notice of a seed grain bill. On March 21 it was withdrawn from the order paper, and on March 23 it was reintroduced. The matter was debated on March 25, and was finally passed with senate amendments on April 4, fully a month after the farmers should have had the seed on their farms. I am not saying this in any spirit of criticism; the thing has passed and there is no use in rehashing the matter, but I would remind the government that to all our requests for haste last year we were met constantly with the reply that the seed was at strategic points and could be given out on a few days' notice. We know now that in some districts the distribution was three or four weeks late. In one town in my own constituency the seed was distributed as late as May 8. Many farmers who lost their crops through rust and grasshoppers are absolutely convinced that they would have had some crop had they received their seed three or four weeks earlier. Let me draw to the attention of the government, particularly of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the fact that in six weeks from now the farmers will be getting ready for seeding and in eight weeks they will be on the land in some districts in Saskatchewan. At this time a declaration of policy ought to be made by persons in responsible positions.

The third matter I wish to place before the government is that facilities should be set up to enable farmers who have seed of a non-rust-resistant variety to exchange it for seed of a rust-resistant variety. Last fall it was stated repeatedly in western Canada that Thatcher wheat was being held throughout the west so that practically all farmers would be able to get it this spring. I hope that is so. If it is so, the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Finance ought to tell the people what facilities will be available, and how soon. Prompt action is necessary in this regard. If grasshoppers and rust are to be the menaces this summer that they were last summer it is very necessary that the farmers who have not rust-resistant seed should be able to exchange it on a bushel for bushel basis.

I urge the minister to make a statement to-day which will relieve the anxiety of the people in the drought areas of western Canada. All kinds of rumours are flying around. People write to tell me that they are sure they are not going to get seed. People are hearing different stories and they are not sure of the policy of the government. For instance, I came across the following statement in the Western Producer of February 2, 1939:

> No Provision for Seed Yet
>
> Taggart Charges Farmers did not Make Effort to Repay '38 Seed
>
> "There were too many farmers last fall who paid everyone else from their harvests and left the rural municipality and the government holding the bag on seed grain loans.
>
> "This year the municipality should let the individual know it is up to him to scratch up his own seed," said the Hon. J. G. Taggart, minister of agriculture, to the convention delegates of the central rural municipalities association meeting at Regina last week. "Out of $18,000,000 loaned in Saskatchewan for seed, of which only $3,500,000 was not guaranteed by the dominion, farmers repaid only about $250,000," he said.
>
> "So far," he added, "no arrangements have been made for 1939 seed grain financing."

That statement has caused widespread dismay among many farmers in my constituency, as well as in the surrounding constituencies. These farmers have not the seed necessary to put in a crop this year. Seeding is close at hand and many of these people are destitute. Their only hope of economic recovery is to obtain seed. With the prospects of a half decent crop they may be able to regain some measure of economic security.

I ask the government three questions. First, are they going to make provision for seed? Second, can there be some haste in the supplying of that seed so that it will be out in time? Third, will there be facilities to enable farmers to exchange non-rust-resistant varieties of seed for rust-resistant varieties, possibly on a reasonable basis such as bushel for bushel? I hope the government will make a statement through the Minister of Agriculture and assure the people of western Canada that this parliament and this government have not washed their hands of the matter, but are prepared to accept the responsibility which is really theirs of seeing that people who through no fault of their own have no seed will be given the necessary seed to enable them to rehabilitate themselves during the coming year.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

QUEBEC RAILWAY, LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY

Mr. CHARLES PARENT (Quebec West and South) moved the second reading of Bill No. 8, respecting the Quebec Railway, Light and Power Company.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHARLES PARENT (Quebec West and South) moved the second reading of bill 8, an Act respecting The Quebec Railway, Light and Power Company

He said: (Translation) Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to clarify section 8 of chapter 59 of the Statutes of 1895 by adding thereto subsection 2, authorizing the company, among other things, to operate auto buses in the territory which it now serves.

Although I am of opinion that section 8 of chapter 59 of the Statutes of 1895 does empower the company to operate auto buses, some lawyers consider that the clause is not sufficiently explicit and that it would be well to clarify it by specifying the powers granted to the company, as is done in the bill.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) (Text): I know of no objection to this bill, and my officers have none. In view of the fact that it is of public interest I am willing that the bill should be read a second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

CENTRAL FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. W. G. MACDONALD (Brantford City) moved the second reading of Bill No. 20, respecting Central Finance Corporation and to change its name to Household Finance Corporation.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): With reference to this bill, I should like to point out to the hon. member who moved the second reading that the principle involved in it was considered last session by the committee on banking and commerce. They made a report to this house, and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) introduced a bill of a general character which would govern these private companies' bills and regulate their rates to two per cent per month. This general bill was read the first time and laid over. I should like to ask the minister whether he intends to introduce that bill again, and what is the present policy of the government this session regarding these small loan companies. In these times of depression the people cannot pay the high rates of interest charged by these companies. They have no credit with the banks because they have no security, with the result that small industrial workers are compelled to go to these loan companies, to pay fabulous sums of money, and often have to borrow from friends and relatives to help pay the Shylock interest rates on their loans.

I have received several hundred communications or ballots about an address made the other night on the radio by a fine citizen of Toronto, asking what we, as private members, are going to do about over-government and over-taxation and to help conditions for the workers. Other members must have received dozens of similar letters. Some of them are from the very people who are affected by these companies, and who have been forced out of their homes through the foreclosure of mortgages. I have seen the operations of one or two of these companies in the city I come from, and I am astonished that they come to this parliament to get charters and franchises and are given power to lend money on chattel mortgages, bills of sale and lien notes.

Not by the wildest stretch of the imagination can these particular private bills of 1927, 1928 and 1929 be considered to be for the general advantage of Canada or within federal jurisdiction. Yet they come to this parliament, and they have got so many bills passed regarding this type of loan that I wonder what the provinces are doing, whether we have such a thing as property and civil rights in the provinces to give them control over this class of business. I should like to hear from the government what is to be its policy this session as to the general bill of 1938, which as I understand will provide some control as to rates over these companies when they are incorporated. Two per cent per month would be a universal rate, but an exorbitant one, when we consider how much money is hoarded in Canada, drawing no interest.

This matter was considered by the committee on banking and commerce of the senate, and a very valuable report was made last session by our own banking and commerce committee after a large number of prominent financial experts from the United States and elsewhere had gone most thoroughly into the matter. This bill might very well stand on the order paper until the government lays down what is to be the policy regarding a general bill. Will the general bill of 1938 cover all these companies or not?

As regards this bill No. 20, I can assure the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) that, on account of my respect and esteem for him personally, I should like his bill to go through without any opposition as far as I am concerned, but I cannot see my way clear to support the second reading until the general principle has been laid down, because for twelve years I have opposed all these small loan companies and their rates and methods.

This bill is intended to change the name of the corporation to Household Finance Corporation. Of course they want to change the name. This company has been doing business right in the city I come from. I know of some of the loans which have been made to industrial workers there, and well they might want to change their names—these shark loan companies which are charging such a huge rate of interest. After the very conclusive evidence given by various experts, the time has come for Canada to stop granting any more of these charters, to cancel some of them, and to send these people to the provinces where they properly belong to get whatever charters the provinces will give them.

I may say so far as this particular bill goes that I was in the house when this company got the franchise, and I opposed the franchise. The term "shark loan company" was first applied by me in the discussion of that particular incorporation, which was away back in 1928 or 1929. We were then in opposition, and the opposition took very strong grounds against bills of this kind. It was charged by our late leader that these were matters concerning provincial rights, inasmuch as no doubt they have up here such influence as to take their charter out of the jurisdiction of the Interest Act and of the Loan Companies Act and of the Usury Act. These companies have taken themselves out of the limits of those three general statutes in order to come under federal jurisdiction, and have created a law unto themselves to charge anything they like; they are under no restrictions at all.

I can see no good reason why this bill should be read a second time. I wish to know from the Minister of National Revenue if he is going to introduce his bill of last session, which was recommended almost unanimously to the house by the committee on banking and commerce. If so, when will the bill be introduced, and will it provide some regulation of these companies?

I see that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is here to-night. I am glad to see him here. For much of the time since I entered the house in 1921 he has been presiding most ably over the justice department, and in common with every other hon. member I wish to congratulate him on the thirty-fifth anniversary of his outstanding services to his fellow man. He has been a wise custodian of public rights and of legislation for the benefit of the working people of this country, and is a statesman beloved by all. While the Minister of Justice is not supposed to give, as a minister, legal opinions to the house, I submit that since he is leading the government to-night, he ought to let us know what will be done with the report of the banking and commerce committee last session regarding the small loan companies, and whether some restrictions will check these small loans to workers.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): In the first place I should like to point out that this is a matter for the Department of Finance rather than for the Department of National Revenue. In the second place, I think it is usual for the government's policy on these matters to be announced from time to time as and when the occasion requires, and I am afraid I cannot give the hon. gentleman any further and better answer than that to-night—that the policy of the government in regard to this matter will be announced in due course. The immediate necessity is to decide what to do with this particular bill, and I understand that the sponsor of the bill is moving that it be referred to the banking and commerce committee, as is usual with measures of this kind.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): This is a private bill dealing with only one company. Last year we had a number of these bills before the banking and commerce committee, and it was fairly well understood at the time that that committee would consider the principles underlying such bills and report to the House of Commons with a view to general legislation. I believe that there are evils in this small loan business which should be eliminated by this parliament and I am still of the opinion, as I was last year and the year before, that we should not now deal singly and separately with bills of this sort, but should again deal with the principle of the matter and endeavour to arrive at general legislation with regard to companies of this type. For that reason I am going to oppose this particular bill, though I would say that from the evidence produced before the committee there are companies in Canada which are not doing business in the manner in which this company is; and while perhaps in opposing a bill with respect to a company which may be giving better service than most of the other companies, one may be doing something that appears to be discriminatory, nevertheless I hold that the principle is greater than the individual case and that we should try at the outset of this session to arrive at some general legislation dealing with all the small loan companies subject to our jurisdiction, adopting a principle upon which such general legislation can be based. For the reason I have stated, I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques Cartier) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the committee on banking and commerce, of which I am a member, studied all these bills last year as well as in 1937. The house is aware that following prolonged deliberations and a careful study of the question the committee intended to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to bring in a general bill applicable to this company as to all similar ones.

On those occasions we were chiefly preoccupied with the rights of the provinces, for among the experts heard by the committee were representatives of Ontario, of Quebec, of Alberta and also, I believe, of one of the maritime provinces. The committee was unanimous in wishing to safeguard provincial rights. In fact that is what prolonged the discussions of last year. I therefore endorse the views of the two hon. members who preceded me, particularly my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) who is one of the most active members of the committee. Like him, I think we should either send the bill to the committee on banking and commerce or hold it until the Minister of Finance brings in a bill of general application.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I am opposed to the principle of the bill, but if it goes to a committee there is one thing which I think should be given serious consideration, and that is the advertisement that appears in newspapers and street cars under the name of this finance corporation, in which they say to the public something like this: "By special authority, rates of interest set by the dominion parliament." That is really saying to the public, "We have special authority to charge the rates we are charging, and therefore you are perfectly safe in doing business with us."

I do not believe that any company doing business as this company is should be allowed, shall I say, to mislead the people in that way. My own view regarding these corporations is that instead of throwing a lifebuoy to people in times of stress they are really casting upon them an added weight which makes them sink deeper in the mire. It does not lift them out. I am voicing my protest against this legislation as I did last year.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): We in this group are absolutely opposed to the bill. The rate of two per cent per month is exorbitant. We realize, of course, that that includes service charges, but we do not think that this parliament has the right to legislate with respect to service charges. That is a matter for the provincial legislature. Our view is therefore that if the government wish to pass further legislation they should enact that the rate of interest shall be, say, ten per cent per annum, and leave it to the provinces to cover the question of service charges. For that reason we are opposed to the bill.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): I think the government should disclose its attitude towards this class of legislation. It is unfair to turn down this bill and the other one of the same type which is on the order paper, in the absence of some declaration to the house as to the policy of the government towards legislation of this sort.

It is known in this chamber that I have opposed this sort of legislation for many years —not that I oppose the requests of this and other companies, but I am opposed to the principle of establishing a rate of twenty-four or twenty-seven per cent per annum for loans, putting the imprimatur of parliament upon that rate. I have taken that position for twenty-seven years. The first time I expressed that view was in 1912 when I sought an amendment to the Interest Act and what was called the Money Lenders Act at that time, and I have consistently taken the same position ever since.

This, I believe, is the fourth session that this and similar companies have been before parliament, but during the last two or three years, particularly last year, there has been a disposition on the part of the government to introduce general legislation covering the matter, and this company and the other company mentioned in Bill No. 21 held back for a certain time in the expectation that the general law would pass. Had the general law passed, they were not so particular except for a change of name or something of that kind; but some of these bills have been prepared so that they may have this power to charge two per cent per month in the absence of general legislation.

I suggest that the government ought to come forward frankly and say whether or not they are going to introduce again the legislation which was the result of two sessions of hearings before the banking and commerce committee of this house and also in one year before the banking committee of another place. The government should frankly declare its position on the matter.

There are two classes of borrowers that patronize this sort of loan company—and these companies themselves so inform me. There is what I would call the class A borrower, whom I shall describe in a moment, and this embraces the larger number. There is also the class B borrower, the smaller class. The class A borrower is the salaried person or some person with a known and fixed income, who temporarily has suffered reverse through illness in the family or perhaps some serious operations that call for extraordinary expenditure—the sort of person who the company knows is good. That class of borrower must pay the two per cent per month which really is applicable only to the second class. The second class comprises those who find themselves in difficulties through improvidence or carelessness, or, as often happens, probably through playing the race track or the stock market. It is not fair that the class A borrowers, who they know are good, with whom the records and evidence showed there was only a fraction of one per cent loss, a fraction so small that we were all surprised at it, should be penalized because there is a larger risk on the more improvident and careless borrowers whom I have included in class B.

For that reason I have taken the stand that we need in Canada facilities to enable the bona fide salaried man, with an assured income, a position and good character, to get money in cases of emergency on much easier terms, say seven per cent or something of the kind. It is true that one of the banks has already started a personal loan department. I believe that the government—I say this to the government as an institution, and not in any critical sense—might very well call in the bankers and see if they would not take up that line of business as a part of their duty to the country. I know they do not wish to do it, because it is small business, not very profitable, it may be; and perhaps they consider it a little beneath their dignity. But there ought to be provided in the urban districts the kind of legislation that we have in the rural credits act. Unfortunately the rural credits act, passed I believe in 1925, does not function, I think through lack of administrative interest in it on the part of this and previous governments. But this class of legislation, properly enforced, and with the support and interest of the government, might very well become an extremely useful form of assistance to needy borrowers.

Having said that much I want to make it clear that in spite of all my opposition to these measures, which at times has been definite and perhaps heated, I do not think parliament should just crowd them out or refuse to consider them. In justice and fairness we must listen to the requests of any body of people who are within the law. These people are within the law. They are within their right in coming to parliament, and I am not going to oppose the second reading of these bills. But I want to place on record my attitude and views in connection with this matter and to urge upon the government that either before these bills have second reading or before they are finally disposed of we have the assurance that the government will during this session introduce such public measures as may be necessary to deal with this very important question.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): These bills are a pair of twins, and each year they have been up I have registered my opposition to them. I have been one of those who advocated the lowering of interest rates and urged that the dominion government take the lead in that respect. We have now pretty well got that, and I do not see how we can open the other door and allow private corporations or any particular group of people to charge interest at the rates these people expect to get. I know a man who this summer paid $500, all but $40, for a piano, and he was not able to raise that $40, so he lost his piano and his money, with merely the promise that perhaps he would get a better rate next time. I have nothing but contempt for a corporation which, finding a man up against it in his endeavour to hold property of some kind, professes to be his friend and lends him money at a rate of interest that it is impossible for him to pay. That is selfishness run wild.

I have been asked why I was so strongly opposed to these corporations. It is because I have seen these people completely up against it and unable to pay the piper that I determined that if I ever got the opportunity I would hit this thing as hard as I could. If this bill goes to the committee it is all right, but if it is to go through now I shall oppose it as strongly as I can.

Mr. R. W. GRAY (Lambton West): Bills similar to this, as pointed out by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), have been considered by the banking and commerce committee for a number of years.

Some years ago I opposed the granting of a charter, but if I understand aright the bill now introduced by the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), the rate of interest provided therein is as was recommended last year by the committee on banking and commerce. Whether or not there is general legislation introduced this year dealing with the matter, these people for the last two years have come in good faith to this parliament, presented their bills and given their evidence before the committee, and it seems to me that no harm can be done in allowing the bill to go again to the banking and commerce committee.

I agree with the hon. member for Kootenay East that the time has come when general legislation should be introduced covering matters of this kind. There is a great deal to be said for legislation covering all these small loan companies. At the same time I believe it would be a mistake to defeat this bill on the motion for second reading. The bill has been presented in the form approved by the committee, and surely no harm can be done in allowing it to be referred; it can be decided in the committee whether it will be proceeded with or whether general legislation shall supersede it.

Mr. YOUNG: If this bill went to the committee would there be new evidence submitted this year beyond what was given last year?

Mr. GRAY: I cannot say. I doubt if much evidence could be submitted beyond what was given last year.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I think we all recognize that it is on the motion for second reading that the principle of a bill is decided upon, not in committee; that is where the details are supposed to be dealt with. I believe it is two years since the government promised us that we should have general legislation on this matter. Only this afternoon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was urging upon the house the responsibility of the government for carrying forward the affairs of the country. In this instance the government is distinctly responsible. And while, as my colleague behind me has said, I do not like voting against a particular measure in order to stop the general practice to which objection is taken, I see no other way of stopping it than by opposing it at this stage. The responsibility then is not upon the house; it is fairly placed upon the government, and they can bring down their general legislation.

It is all very well to say that this company has come in good faith to parliament; of course it has. Any group of men can come to parliament with various proposals, but it is for the house to say whether or not the principle underlying them is good. I do not see what else we can do at this stage than oppose the principle of the bill. We hope that before very long the government will introduce general legislation covering this matter.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I hesitate to speak on this question, as the minister in charge of this branch of government business is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) who to-night is unavoidably absent. I may however remind the house that if this bill is defeated the situation will remain as it is to-day. If I remember correctly, when a similar bill was discussed last year it was pointed out that whatever may be the demerits of the carrying on of business by such corporations, if this bill be adopted it will constitute a great improvement on the present condition. I am not a member of the banking and commerce committee and I do not know what took place there last year. I do remember that when the bill came back it could not be put through because time did not permit. I agree largely with the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens). I am opposed to anybody, corporation or individual, charging an exorbitant rate of interest. I am free to confess that in my early years I was a victim of that sort of thing. But I do not see what harm would be done by again sending this bill to the committee, if it is really an improvement on the present situation. There it can be discussed and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) can be heard as to whether or not there will be a general act introduced covering this field of activity. As to that I am not in a position to make any statement on the part of the government.

Under the circumstances I would vote to send the bill to the committee, without binding myself to support it if it is reported back to the house, particularly should it have the effect of making permanent a situation to which we all object.

Mr. D. A. McNIVEN (Regina City): I am opposed to this bill in principle. I believe the original mistake was made some years ago when these companies were incorporated and given special rights beyond the provisions of the Money-Lenders Act. It is very true that these two bills have been before the banking and commerce committee for the last two sessions, but it does not reflect very much credit upon us as a parliament that at this session we should be asked, by way either of special or of general legislation, to authorize a rate of interest of two per cent per month. If that is the only message we have for the people of Canada we cannot seriously complain if the people say it is too bad for us.

During the discussion last year we heard a great deal about the Russell Sage Foundation in the United States, which I understand is a very estimable institution and which has done a great deal of good work. But the remedies suggested by that foundation have not rectified the situation in the United States, and, that being the case, we can hardly expect them to meet with greater success here. I think we might well go to the banking institutions, which for a long period of years have received many concessions from the people of this country, and say that they should give greater consideration to this kind of business. I agree with the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) that the banks do not care to handle this business, but I believe our banking institutions could not make a greater contribution to the solution of the problems that confront us than by catering to and serving the people who ordinarily would be customers of institutions of this kind. I believe our banks are prepared now, as they have never been prepared in the past, for business of this kind. In the last three years they have lent some $24,000,000 under the home improvement plan at a discount rate of 3¼ per cent, and I understand that so far the losses have been less than one per cent. I was talking with a banker who had lent a very considerable sum of money under this plan, and he expressed surprise that the business had turned out so satisfactorily. Not a single loan was in arrears; not a single dollar had been lost, and he said, " We of the banking profession are overlooking a very profitable field for investment. If we did cater to that field we would have a profitable outlet for funds that we have difficulty in investing at the present time."

I noticed also that in the deliberations last year, as the hon. member for Kootenay East mentioned, there was an attempt to distinguish between the kinds of borrowers. There was likewise an attempt to distinguish between the companies doing this business, with one referring to another as money sharks and loan sharks. For the life of me I cannot see any distinguishing feature between companies that charge 24 per cent or more. There is a remedy in the Money-Lenders Act, where interest rates are specified. If some detail is lacking in that act at present let us put teeth into that statute and meet the situation by prosecuting those who are profiting through the difficulties in which unfortunate people find themselves.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, it seems quite obvious that there is a great deal of opposition to this bill. There is no doubt, as the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party has said, that if we send this bill to the banking and commerce committee we will adopt the principle. If there is one thing in which I believe the people of this country feel the government should give some lead it is this question of the curtailment of the interest that these companies charge. For three or four years the newspapers have been full of the discussion which has taken place both in the banking and commerce committee and in this house. I suggest that this bill be held up in order to permit the government to bring in some measure that will cure these evils. Or the banking and commerce committee might take up the question and recommend suitable legislation to the house. Surely we cannot pass this bill again and endorse the principle of usury which is practised throughout this country.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk). A year ago I spoke on a bill which was introduced respecting this company. The subject had been carefully studied by the standing committee on banking and commerce, which was very greatly divided in its opinions. The objection which I raised a year ago, and which I repeat now, was that if we passed this bill authorizing a monthly charge of two per cent, we would do so under our authority to deal with interest rates. We have by the Money-Lenders Act set a maximum rate of interest of twelve per cent per annum, and it would be a mistake on the part of this parliament to give its imprimatur to a higher rate of interest than that. The objection which I took a year ago was to the lumping of the total charge. I suggested that we might, in the general legislation which was before us, require that the rate of interest, as such, should be stated; that it should not exceed the rate of interest now set forth in the Money-Lenders Act, and that the balance of the charge, other than interest, might be left to the provincial jurisdiction.

This of course is a bill amending the charter of a dominion corporation, and the objection which I have to the bill in its present form is that it lumps the interest part of the charge with that part of the charge which is not interest. That, Mr. Speaker, is in my opinion objectionable. The rate of interest should be specified as not exceeding the rate now set by the Money-Lenders Act.

As the bill stands I shall feel it my duty to vote against the motion for second reading.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I feel that the government should entertain this whole question very seriously, and bring down legislation for discussion in the house. It seems to me that we have no right to stand at the back of those who would leech on the misfortunes of our people, and that is what these bills amounts to.

The suggestion of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) is very timely, and I find myself quite in agreement with the idea that the chartered banks could take this duty upon themselves. They may want to be high-brow about their work, but they are the manipulators of the currency and credit of this country. They are allowed to conduct their business as such, and this is directly one part of that feature of their work. It seems to me that in time to come if we are to leave the chartered banks in their present positions we shall ask them to undertake a great deal more work, not less, on behalf of the people.

I am definitely opposed to the principle of these bills.

Mr. A. MacG. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, last year when this or a similar bill was before the house it was sent to the committee on banking and commerce, where I understand it was given a great deal of consideration. I doubt whether if it went there this year any new facts could be elicited either for or against the bill, and it seems to me almost like a waste of time to send it to the committee again this year. No doubt there are persons who require or desire loans, in a small way, and who are prepared to pay a rate of interest higher than the banks charge. But so far as I am concerned I am definitely opposed to high rates of interest anywhere.

When this country pays above two per cent interest, I think it is too high. When the provinces pay a little more than that, perhaps, I think it is too high. When we are called upon by our banks to pay six, seven or eight per cent, I think it is too high. But when we are asked to pay two per cent per month—well, Mr. Speaker, I just simply cannot support any bill which follows a principle of that kind. I intend to vote against the motion for second reading.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee on banking and commerce it was my duty to spend a good many days listening to the evidence concerning these small loan companies. I hold no brief for them; I have never had to use them, and I hope I never will. But there are one or two points I should like to draw to the attention of the house.

I do not think it is quite fair to put down the rate of interest at twenty-four per cent per year. A man borrows $50 for a month, we will say, and at the end of the month he pays it back, the transaction having cost him one dollar. For thirty years I was in the habit of borrowing money from the banks, while carrying out my business as a farmer. I never paid less than eight per cent per year, and in the very nature of things I never could pay back in less than eight months. So that any money I borrowed from the bank cost me six per cent, because I could not pay it back in less time.

There is this further point to consider: These small loan companies lend their own money, or money which first of all they have to borrow. The bank does not do that; it creates what it loans, and the procedure costs it nothing. It creates costless credit, and I think that is an important point for consideration.

Then, there is this further matter for consideration: When a small loan company forecloses on a client, in the nature of things it is a public exhibition. The security is put out on the street for all the neighbours to see. When a bank forecloses it is a silent, secret process. Not even a man's wife may know that her husband's security has been foreclosed. As a matter of fact the bank already has the security in its safe, and all that happens is that it stays in the safe and does not come out.

As I have said, I hold no brief for the small loan companies. But I was struck during the time I spent in the committee on banking and commerce with the treatment which these companies received. One might think that in a sense they were criminals. Of course a loan shark is a criminal, but I do not think we can say that a company conducting business at the rate of two per cent per month is committing a crime. However they received no respect whatsoever, while on the other hand the banks receive all the respect in the world.

I do not think that is fair. I believe that for every man who has been foreclosed and put out of business by a small loan company there are a hundred who have been put out of business and had their security foreclosed by our banks. That is all I wish to say on the subject, but I thought it my duty to bring these few points to the attention of the house.

I repeat that I have no brief whatever for the small loan company. I never have used one, and I hope I never will have to.

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to express my appreciation of the very kind remarks made by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) about myself. I may say that I hold him in the highest regard and esteem. He was mayor of the city of Toronto for a number of years, I believe it was eight, during which time he gained the respect of the people of that city. Subsequently he was elected to this house, where he has gained the respect and admiration of all members. I am pleased to know that he will not support this bill for personal reasons. Far be it from me to want any hon. member, no matter how kindly he may feel toward me personally, to vote for any measure merely for personal reasons.

The hon. member for Broadview and other hon. members referred to the loan shark. In presenting this bill to the house for second reading I cannot express too strongly how I feel toward the loan shark. These people have been bleeding those who could not afford to pay. They have taken the small pittances of many working men, women and girls in order to swell their own coffers. I think all hon. members will agree with me when I say that something must be done to curb the activities of the loan shark. One hon. member has said, I believe it was the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), that during this last year the newspapers have been demanding action by this government in connection with the curbing of loan sharks. As he and other hon. members know, last year the banking and commerce committee was requested specifically to deal with this matter. Numerous hearings were held and many witnesses were called from various provinces and from different states of the republic to the south. I have not the report before me, but I recall that a representative of the attorney general's office of Alberta, I believe it was the deputy attorney general, appeared before the committee to advocate that the loan shark evil be curbed.

To-night the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) stated that in his opinion some of these loan companies were not as bad as other so-called respectable institutions. He contended that they were less drastic in their methods than some of our financial institutions. Whether this evil is in the form of a great financial institution, a chartered loan company or an individual, it must be curbed. These activities cannot be allowed to continue. The newspapers of the country, led by that great national paper the Globe and Mail, have advocated in the strongest terms that action should be taken immediately by parliament. I recall reading an editorial in that paper toward the end of last session advocating that action be taken immediately, and that if it were too late, then the government should bring in a bill at the next session.

Numerous speakers this evening have said that legislation should be brought down by the government. We are in the early days of the session and I agree that legislation should be brought down covering not only loan companies that come here for their charters, but those which receive charters from the various provinces. The legislation should control all companies and individuals.

I hope my position in this matter will be understood. I want to control the rates of interest charged and to prevent excessive rates and unscrupulous methods being followed by individuals and corporations. Hon. members will remember that last spring a number of prosecutions took place in the Toronto courts. Certain individuals and companies were accused of charging not two per cent per month, but, if my memory serves me correctly, ninety-seven per cent per month. Evidence was presented last year to the committee on banking and commerce that exorbitant rates of more than one thousand per cent had been charged.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): No wonder an hon. member says "shame." I join with him in saying "shame." That is the sort of practice which should be curbed. The incorporation of this company will be one method of preventing the charging of excessive rates of interest. It is one method of controlling the rates charged and the various activities of these companies.

SUPPLY

DISTRIBUTION OF SEED GRAIN IN WESTERN PROVINCES—STATEMENT OF MR. T. C. DOUGLAS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning for committee of supply.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was about to associate myself with the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) in his request that the government should make a statement with respect to the distribution of seed grain in those areas in the west which happen to require it for the spring seeding. The hon. member recited to the house what had taken place last year when the bill to provide seed grain was before the house, and how we facilitated the passing of the measure. Hon. members will recall that when the house was in committee I was asking the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) for certain information. The minister suggested that we should discontinue asking for information and facilitate the passing of the bill. We were told that we would later have an opportunity of getting the necessary information.

Although we facilitated the passing of that bill in good time, there was delay, as referred to by the hon. member for Weyburn, in the distribution of seed in some parts of Saskatchewan. I know of districts where seed was not delivered until after May 10. When it was not rust-resistant wheat that was seeded it was affected by the rust and subjected to the grasshopper infestation.

Mr. McNIVEN: May 10 is a good time.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): It was very late for last year. At Easter time when we were home, seeding conditions were good and wheat should have been in the ground. It is estimated by those who are in a position to estimate that the loss sustained by the province, and producers in particular, owing to the lateness of the seeding, amounted to thirty to forty million dollars. The question is already agitating the minds of the western farmer; for we know that in many places it has been taken up at conventions and other gatherings of farmers. I have here a report in the Regina Daily Star of January 31:

> Outlook for Provision of Seed Grain Gloomy.
> No plans yet but late Announcement may be made.
> Every bit of evidence on the question that can be picked up around the parliament buildings—
>
> In Regina.
>
> —points to a tough year for the Saskatchewan farmer who faces the coming crop season without seed.

Official statements on any plans for the distribution of relief seed the government may have in mind are singularly lacking. Honourable J. G. Taggart, minister of agriculture, from his seat on the floor of the legislative assembly room has bluntly stated the government is not in a position to make an announcement.

A little earlier than that, on January 26, is a report in the same paper of a request for early distribution of seed grain. The report is as follows:

> Directors of the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities, headed by J. J. McGurran, secretary, met members of the government Wednesday to discuss resolutions passed at a recent meeting in Regina.
> The directors asked the government to "immediately evolve" a policy of seed distribution, with provision for early delivery, with the price on a parity with market prices, plus "reasonable" distribution cost; that rust-resisting types be distributed at the same price the wheat board sells to millers, grades considered.

That shows, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers of the west are concerned and anxious, especially when what took place last year is fresh in their memories.

I might also remind hon. members that on January 27 of this year I asked the Minister of Finance if the government was giving any consideration to this matter and if representations had been made to them by the provincial government or any others in the west with respect to it; and on page 380 of Hansard the Minister of Finance stated that no request of which he had any knowledge had come to the government. In respect to that I was informed about January 15 or 16, by a member of a delegation that was in Ottawa meeting with the government, though not on this matter, that they believed that the Saskatchewan government had made a request for assistance in the amount of three and a half million dollars towards guaranteeing the banks, the province and the municipalities for distribution of seed this spring. I believe that my informant was a responsible person, and in a position to know; for he is associated with one of the largest grain-handling concerns in western Canada. The amount he mentioned would, I think, be adequate. It is about half of what was required last year for wheat alone. The present price at Fort William is about sixty-five cents as compared with $1.45 last year, and when one also considers that the area is not nearly as great this year, that amount should certainly be adequate.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not half of what they had last year.

Mr. PERLEY: For wheat, I think.

Mr. GARDINER: They had twenty-one million dollars last year.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, but that was for all grains.

Mr. GARDINER: Most of it was for wheat.

Mr. PERLEY: Well, I believe that the minister, who knows as well as I do the area which requires assistance this year, will agree that at the present price three and a half million dollars would be ample. I think farmers would be very well pleased if they heard that this government is prepared to guarantee that amount.

I think we should have had a report with respect to the distribution last year and who was responsible for the delay. We know that the provincial government and the wheat board have said that they were not responsible, and I have no doubt this government will make the same answer. Certainly the municipalities were not to blame, because they had their estimates in in good time, and it is due to this house and to western Canada to know where the responsibility lies.

Last year, speaking on this matter, I made the statement with respect to price that the wheat could have been delivered at $1.10 per bushel. I am still of that opinion. I followed the conversion of the option into the cash grain, and I was not refuted in my argument, which I think proved to be correct, that wheat could have been delivered to the farmer at $1.10.

I am very much disappointed with the price at which seed oats and barley were delivered last year. I regard 67½ cents to the farmer as very unreasonable. A lot of the oats required for seed were imported from the United States at a time when the market in the United States was 30½ cents for May oats, 42 cents for cash oats, and in the spring of the year the option never got above 33 cents. Allowing for the freight to North Portal and the further freight to the interior of the province where the oats were required, they could have been delivered at around 56 cents. It has never been satisfactorily explained why the charge to the farmer was 67½ cents.

It seems to me that this year wheat should be delivered as the hon. member for Weyburn has stated, on an exchange of bushel for bushel, a bushel of non rust-resisting wheat for a bushel of rust-resisting wheat. That is only fair, especially when we consider what the farmer paid last year. Certainly if the farmer is not in a position to exchange, and has to purchase, it should be delivered to him at the going price on the Winnipeg exchange. Taking the cash wheat at Fort William at 65 cents, that would net the farmer at the initial point about 55 to 60 cents, which would include the freight and the cost of distribution.

Mr. GARDINER: Freight both ways?

Mr. PERLEY: No, not at all. The minister knows I did not mean that. He knows enough about the business to understand I am referring to freight from one point in the province to the point where it is required.

Mr. GARDINER: May I just point out, in order not to have the matter misrepresented, that if you want seed grain in a locality there is in all probability no seed there; there is no wheat there; and if the wheat is shipped to a central elevator and then shipped back to another elevator you have freight both ways on it.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister knows quite well, I think, what I was saying and the interpretation to put on the language I was using. The cost of wheat at the elevator in which it is at the present time and what the board has paid for it would be 80 cents. The board is selling that wheat to the trade at 65 cents Fort William. When you take off the freight to Fort William and the cost of commission and so on, it would be about 50 cents in the interior where it is at the present time. Then add to that the freight which is required to take it from the place where it now is in the interior to the place where it is required for seed. I will allow 10 cents for that, 5 cents for distribution costs, and 50 cents, which is more than adequate, as the initial price, and we have 65 cent wheat. I think it is the duty of this government to see that the distribution this spring takes place at a fair and reasonable price to the producer requiring that seed.

The minister should also be very careful to see that the cost of the coarse grain seed shall be fair and reasonable. Oats have been delivered in the northern parts of the province at the elevators at from 11 to 15 cents a bushel, and of course there would be storage and cost of shipping from one point in the interior to the other point requiring the product. I submit the government should see to it that the oats this year are delivered at not more than 30 cents a bushel, instead of at 67 cents as happened last year.

I do not think it is necessary to delay the house at this time. The minister is well acquainted with the facts and he should be prepared to make a statement and to introduce the necessary bill as soon as possible. Considering the experience of last spring, more questions will be asked and more information will be required than was the case last year. With the experience of last year, and knowing what happened as regards delay and cost and so on, I suggest that this government should undertake the supervision and distribution as well as the control of price and deliveries this year. The hon. member for Weyburn indicated the importance of the matter and I think the position of the western producer at the present time should receive serious consideration. He is very much concerned because this is the 14th of February and it takes quite a time to distribute the seed and clean it. The farmers should know where they stand and what will be done. When the bill comes before the house I shall be pleased to do all I can to facilitate its passage, and I trust that we shall receive a reasonable amount of information regarding the matter.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The question of seed grain and seed grain supplies for the different provinces has been under consideration from year to year, at least ever since I have been in public life. It was one of the standing questions in 1914 and has been in quite a number of years from that date down to the present time. Last year I had applications from every province in Canada except Nova Scotia and British Columbia for assistance from the federal government in order to provide seed grain. When these applications came from Quebec, Ontario, Prince Edward Island and other provinces we gave the same answer to all—that the provision of seed grain to farmers in the different provinces of Canada has always been looked upon as a provincial responsibility and has always been taken care of by the provincial governments. The matter of financing has occasionally been assisted in by the federal government, but as regards the distribution of seed grain and the responsibility for securing seed grain for farmers, the provincial governments have taken care of that from one end of Canada to the other.

The question of seed grain is an annual problem in the province of Quebec, for example. As I understand it, year after year the government of Quebec has to go to Alberta or somewhere else in western Canada and purchase seed oats and have it shipped to the province of Quebec where it is distributed to the farmers, the cost being, I presume, charged to the farmers. On a number of occasions we have assisted in financing the provision of seed in the three western provinces, perhaps to a greater degree in Saskatchewan than in any other province, and last year we were required to supply more in the way of finances in order to take care of the seed grain situation in that province than in any previous year. There had to be found, in order to purchase seed and pay for its distribution last year, the sum of $21,000,000. Between $1,000,000 and $2,000,000 of that amount was provided by mortgage companies; about $18,000,000 was provided by municipalities. They borrowed the amount from the banks. About $3,500,000 was guaranteed by the province without any federal guarantee, and the other $14,500,000 was guaranteed by the government of Canada.

I believe it was the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) who said that the minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan, in a statement recently, said that only $250,000 of that amount was collected back last year. I think that is approximately correct so that there is still outstanding on the lands of Saskatchewan, as a result of loans made last year for seed grain, something in the neighbourhood of $21,000,000, in addition to all that had been lent in the years preceding that in order to provide seed grain.

It will be seen, therefore, that this is not a matter that can be considered lightly; it is not a question that we are asked to consider for the first time; and it is not a matter about which the farmers of Saskatchewan have to my knowledge been making any considerable complaint. I do not believe there are any considerable number of farmers in Saskatchewan, or Alberta, or Manitoba, who do not realize that somebody, somewhere, has been putting forth a sustained effort in order to make it possible for them to reseed their lands from year to year. There are no farmers in Canada who appreciate more thoroughly what has been done by the people of all Canada, and particularly what was done last year by the people of all Canada, in order to make possible the seeding of the land than the farmers of Saskatchewan.

In regard to the distribution of the seed, I do not think that any government ever undertook a task so great, of a similar nature, as the task that was undertaken last year by the government of Saskatchewan in the distribution of $21,000,000 worth of seed to the farmers of that province, and I can only say that if the worst that any hon. member of this house can say in discussing the matter now is that some farmer did not get seed until May 8th or 10th there is not very much reason for criticism with respect to the distribution of that seed. I venture to say that there is just about as much wheat seeded around the 10th of May in the average year in Saskatchewan as is seeded about any date.

If the seed was available by the 8th or 10th of May to all the farmers of Saskatchewan then the task was very much more efficiently carried out than I myself thought it was.

There is another way of looking at it. Had there been anything in the way of neglect on the part of the government or of anyone who was associated with the distribution of this seed grain, if one were to examine the records, one would expect to find that the acreage seeded last year was very much lower than otherwise would have been the case. But when we examine the record of the acreage seeded in Saskatchewan last year we find that it was only slightly below that of the previous year—less than one million acres below the previous year and less than one million acres below the previous ten year average. So I do not think any considerable criticism can be made with regard to the distribution of seed last year.

Coming to the present year I may point out that before November 21 last, the government of Saskatchewan made a very thorough survey of the situation existing in that province, and they indicated to the government of Canada the production of wheat per acre in the different municipalities. At the same time they called the attention of the farmers of Saskatchewan to the necessity of providing themselves with their own seed as far as possible for the coming spring. I should go back even further than that. Earlier than November the government of Saskatchewan came to this government and asked for assistance to keep the farmers through this winter. They said they would require $9,000,000 to buy food and clothing for the farmers of the province and their families who were without crops last year, and also to provide some feed grain in areas where there was none. The government of Canada made that money available to Saskatchewan, and at the time it was made available the provincial government made an announcement to the people of Saskatchewan. They said: The federal government have provided us with funds with which to maintain the farmers throughout the winter. It will be absolutely unnecessary for any farmer, in order to keep himself through the winter, to sell any of his seed grain. And because we are going to provide the wherewithal to live through the winter and feed the live stock we expect every farmer who had a crop of two or three or four bushels to the acre as a result of last year's seeding to retain that grain in his bins in order to be able to seed his crop this spring. I know from the few letters I am receiving to-day from the different parts of Saskatchewan as compared with what we received in previous years that the great majority—I would say 99 per cent of the farmers of Saskatchewan—have carried out these instructions and have the seed grain, if they grew it last year.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What about those who have not?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not intend to say anything to-night, and I hope no other member will say anything, that would tend to undo any of the good work that was done by the government of Saskatchewan in seeing to it that that seed grain was kept in the bins until next spring. We can argue ourselves black in the face as to the cost of wheat laid down at an elevator, but anyone who ever had anything to do with them knows that elevator companies—and the pools are no exception—do what every other business concern does. When they buy grain at a certain point and that grain is supposed to go to Fort William—and if it went there it would have to be shipped back to any locality to provide seed—nine times out of ten the farmer has to pay a considerable part of the costs on the grain both ways, no matter where it was loaded or was unloaded.

And there is another thing to be considered. On grain for export, either east or west, there is a special freight rate. But there are no special rates for shipping grain north and south across Saskatchewan. If you ship grain from Melfort in northern Saskatchewan to the southern part of the province it costs practically as much in many instances as it would to ship it all the way from the centre of Saskatchewan to the seaboard. In view of those facts it is impossible to stand up here and try to figure what the price of grain is going to be, delivered to a farmer, after it has once been in an elevator. Any man who has had any practical experience knows that he cannot speak in generalities about the cost. So what the government of Saskatchewan is saying to the farmers of Saskatchewan to-day is this: You can get that seed grain cheaper than anyone else. In spite of what has been said to-night I venture to say that there is not one farm in Saskatchewan to-day that is more than twenty or twenty-five miles away from seed grain, and I think I know the province fairly well; I have driven over it all.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What can they use for money? The seed may be procurable, but they need some assistance in financing.

Mr. GARDINER: The farmers in Saskatchewan are like farmers anywhere else. I know that as far as the farmers in the community in which I live are concerned, if there are farmers who have seed grain their neighbours are not going to have a great deal of difficulty in getting it and getting it into the ground, unless someone starts to do something that in the end will make the cost a great deal more than it would be if done in a spirit of cooperation. By stirring up too much discussion of this question at this time we are not helping the farmers of Saskatchewan, but are making it more costly for them to get the seed grain that they are going to require to seed their crops.

Past experience has shown that few if any farmers in Saskatchewan have ever gone without seed grain, and that they get the seed grain most cheaply when they are able to obtain it without its being put in elevators and taken out again. It will be found that if and when and where this seed grain is required there will be no serious difficulty experienced in getting it. On the other hand I hope that no one, provincially, municipally or otherwise, is doing anything which will leave the impression that seed grain is to be supplied this spring no matter what anyone may do with the grain he had last fall. I think seed grain will be found for those who are in absolute need of it. Some way or other money will be found to pay for it, but the announcement of definite methods for going out to get say $3,500,000 worth of seed grain at the present time to be distributed in Saskatchewan or anywhere else is not going to help the farmers; and it would cost this government, or someone in Canada, perhaps the provincial government or the municipalities, a great deal more than to proceed as the provincial government is proceeding to-day. We are fully informed regarding the situation in Saskatchewan, and the Saskatchewan government is fully informed. The farmers also are pretty fully informed regarding the situation, as some of the quotations from the press have indicated. If we allow the matter to be dealt with by the province it will be handled just as effectively as it has always been, and the acreage which should be seeded to wheat in Saskatchewan this year will be seeded, as it has been in the past.

Mr. PERLEY: Before the minister sits down perhaps he will permit me to ask two or three questions. He says there is not a farmer in Saskatchewan who is not within twenty-five miles of a supply of seed grain. Does he say that seed is all of a rust-resistant variety?

Mr. GARDINER: No, I would not say that is rust-resistant wheat. There is not rust-resistant wheat enough to seed all the farms in western Canada this year. And of course there are some people who would not seed rust-resistant varieties of wheat that some others are seeding at the present time. There are some farmers who would not sow particular kinds of wheat about which there is a great deal of discussion. After all, we get rust about once in ten years on an average, and there are some people who will sow varieties of wheat that are not called rust-resistant because of the higher yields they get with what they consider better varieties.

Mr. PERLEY: Can the minister give us any information as to who is holding the great bulk of the Thatcher wheat that is available for seed? Is it in the hands of elevator companies or of the wheat board?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would remind the hon. member that we are not in committee. This is not the proper time for questions of this kind.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I do not think anyone in this chamber desires to make things more difficult either for the minister and his department or for the farmers of western Canada than it is going to be in the near future. But I do think that to-night the minister has placed rather an optimistic picture before us. He says he is sure there are farmers who will have seed available for their neighbours who lack it, but it seems to me the difficulty is that unquestionably there were many thousands of acres last year that were seeded to marquis wheat on which no crops were cut, and where much of the wheat that was cut was of very low grade and probably very poor germinative quality. Consequently in those areas, if farmers are to be able to seed their land and look forward to the reaping of a crop, better seed will have to be provided than is in their immediate vicinity. The minister said he did not believe there was sufficient rust-resistant wheat in the province or the provinces to meet all the needs. I think that is probably true, but I believe there is at least a very large amount, which may cover a greater acreage than I have personal knowledge about at the moment. The minister ought to be, and I expect he is, much better informed than I am on that particular score.

Reference was made to the fact that collections on account of the seed that was supplied last year and in previous years were very bad. I think that is true, and the reason, of course, is the condition of the country, the poor crops, the series of crop failures, the low grades and the insufficient price. I know many members of parliament from eastern constituencies think the eighty cent price adopted by the government this year provided an amount sufficient to meet the requirements of the wheat producer. Well, I do not propose to go into that question to-night, because on the estimates and elsewhere we will have opportunities to take up that aspect of the problem. I would say, however, that if hon. members will read the very interesting report of the proceedings of the conference on markets for western farm products, which I believe was circulated to all members by the Manitoba government, they will find a very authoritative analysis of the cost of producing a bushel of wheat in western Canada on various types of land and various sizes of farms over average periods of years. They will see that according to Professor Hope, who made the analysis—and whose figures were not disputed even by representatives of the grain exchange who were there—the Saskatchewan farmer required an average farm price of approximately ninety cents a bushel. The eighty cent price is on the basis of Fort William, and from that you must subtract fifteen, sixteen, eighteen or more cents a bushel to see what the farmer actually gets.

Mr. GARDINER: That was on the poorest type of land.

Mr. COLDWELL: On average land, I think, according to Professor Hope.

Mr. GARDINER: It was forty-three cents on the best land.

Mr. COLDWELL: I mention that because it has been said to-night that the collections for the seed grain last year have been very poor. I am going to hazard the guess that they are going to be low in the future also, if the price of wheat remains where it is at present.

With regard to the particular matter discussed by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) and the minister, the minister said he had no complaints and no considerable number of applications.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say no complaints.

Mr. COLDWELL: Few complaints. I wrote "no complaints" in my notes.

Mr. GARDINER: Few as compared with other years.

Mr. COLDWELL: But there have been some complaints, and I am going to suggest that there will likely be a number of applications, particularly because of the fact that the farmers are anxious to obtain varieties of wheat that will resist rust. During the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I read into the record a resolution that I believe has been passed by a number of municipalities. If the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) were in his seat I would tell him, since he asked the question, that I have found out where that resolution was drafted. It was in the rural municipality office of Vanscoy, just a few miles west of Saskatoon, which happens to be in my own constituency, though I knew nothing whatever about the matter.

I think one should say that the Saskatchewan farmers are appreciative of what has been done for them in the past. But I would also emphasize the fact that last year in my constituency many of the farmers did not get their grain until about the 7th or 8th and up to the 10th of May. I think the minister will remember that I sent across to him wires from one or two points about that time or a little earlier. Last year the season was such that early seeding was the type the farmer wanted to do, and I think that accounted for some of the dissatisfaction.

Then we speak of the seeding last year, and the amount of it. I believe one of the principal reasons why much land was seeded last year was the failure of the year before. A great deal of land was ready for crop but, as I said at the outset, many thousands of acres of marquis and other varieties of wheat that were not rust-resistant were not cut last autumn, and the farmers who did not cut that grain will have no seed this spring. Those who had seed may have kept it, but those who had no crop have no money and can procure no seed. I do not know what information the minister may have, but in all probability a larger number of farmers than we think are in that position. And I regret to say this, that to my knowledge some of the farmers who were instructed to keep the seed in the bin, when they were pressed to meet their expenses or to meet bills and other obligations, unfortunately in many instances did part with the grain which they should have kept. But we have to bear in mind that they were under pressure not only from their creditors but from their families, many of whom lacked those things which are necessary to face a severe western winter.

So I say this problem ought to be discussed in the house in the way in which it is now being discussed. No one wishes to embarrass the government or the minister, but we do want the assurance that the matter is under consideration. In the light of the statement quoted by the hon. member for Weyburn, that of the minister of agriculture for Saskatchewan, I believe it was necessary that the matter be discussed here to-night. As I say, many of the farmers who did have some grain sold it to meet their running expenses and some of their obligations. As the hon. member for Weyburn has reminded me, even if they did keep seed for themselves, in all probability they did not keep sufficient to supply their neighbours also.

After the years of depression, of crop failures and of economic difficulties, during which this parliament has had to guarantee heavy loans for western farmers—$8,200,000 for the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan in 1937, and $16,400,000 or thereabouts in 1938—it is hardly to be expected that in one single year, namely this year, we should go down to relatively nothing at all. Many of the areas which have been affected in previous years are affected again. I think the minister's own constituency is probably one of the constituencies most seriously affected.

Mr. GARDINER: It is the worst.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think it is one of the worst.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not "one of the worst"; it is the worst.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, if it is not the worst, it is very close to it. I imagine the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly), the hon. member for Weyburn and the minister himself may have a little argument as to which of the constituencies is the worst.

Mr. GARDINER: No argument.

Mr. COLDWELL: But I am simply supporting the suggestion made by the hon. member for Weyburn that the matter be kept in mind by the house and the minister. We shall be interested to learn just what the government proposes to do if and when applications for assistance are made from the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the remarks made by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas). Rust, of course, is not generally speaking a major problem in Alberta, although last year heavy losses were sustained in the eastern part of the province, due mainly to late seeding. Therefore I hope if there are any supplies of rust-resistant wheat available that the minister may be able to follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Weyburn and make it available to farmers on a bushel exchange basis.

Mr. GARDINER: I think I should make the matter clear, in order to avoid any misunderstanding. The hon. member is appealing to the wrong minister. It is the minister of agriculture in Alberta to whom he should be appealing. We have nothing to do with that matter, from here.

Mr. QUELCH: But in view of the fact that the wheat board buys all the wheat, surely they must have large supplies of rust-resistant wheat on hand. Therefore it would be a matter of cooperation between the provincial minister of agriculture and the federal minister.

Mr. GARDINER: The provincial minister of agriculture can buy all the grain he can pay for from the grain board, just the same as anybody else buys it. We have nothing to do with that at all.

Mr. QUELCH: Provided they can finance it. And if the farmer has to buy it the cost would be considerably higher than if the exchange could be made on a bushel for bushel basis. When it is bought from the elevator there is an extra charge.

I wish to refer to the agreement between the provincial and federal governments last year regarding seed grain loans. The provincial government agreed to see that the maximum amount obtainable from borrowers was collected and paid into the proper account of the municipality. In view of that fact it seems very strange that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), speaking at Hanna in my constituency, deemed it advisable to criticize the government of Alberta for endeavouring to make the farmers pay back their seed grain loans. And it seems strange, too, that he should stress the fact that that was not being done in Saskatchewan. It seems strange to me that any cabinet minister should go into a province and criticize the provincial government for endeavouring to meet the terms of an agreement which has been made between that government and the federal government.

As a matter of fact his criticism was not sound because in the province of Alberta the farmers were only requested to repay their loans provided that they had threshed at least 800 bushels.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sure the hon. member does not wish to misquote what was said at that meeting. At the meeting I said that the federal government had no responsibility for making collections and that at that stage the provincial government was responsible for making them. First the municipality guaranteed the account, and they had to collect.

If they could not collect, the provincial government had guaranteed the account, and they would collect. If the provincial government was not able to collect and pay, then we came into the picture. I certainly said to that audience that when we came into the picture we would collect, if the others had not collected.

Mr. QUELCH: But it goes beyond that. May I read this from the agreement:

> The province shall cause each municipality and the minister of municipal affairs to collect all amounts due by farmers in respect of seed grain and other supplies distributed to farmers in connection with seeding operations during the spring of 1938 and to pay the amounts so collected to the appropriate chartered banks, and to this end the province shall appoint a number of inspectors adequate in the opinion of the Minister of Finance—

That is the federal minister.

> —to see that the maximum amounts collectable from borrowers are collected and paid into the proper account of the municipality.

They were compelled to do it, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, in order to comply with the federal agreement, they had to collect the maximum amount.

Mr. GARDINER: Certainly.

Mr. QUELCH: It is strange that the minister should criticize the provincial government for endeavouring to carry out an agreement which had been signed by both the provincial and the federal government.

Mr. GARDINER: In order to have the record straight, may I say this. I did not criticize, but we were being criticized for having collected these accounts, or trying to collect them. I explained that the time had not yet come for this government to collect them. I said that the government which was then trying to collect them was probably the municipal government, that if it got beyond that it would be the provincial government, and that if the provincial and municipal governments did not collect we would eventually have to do so. But I explained we were not in the field collecting, because it had not yet become our responsibility to do so.

Mr. QUELCH: It is unfortunate that the—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The discussion cannot go on in this way, because the house is not in committee. Hon. members are making two or three speeches, and under the rules they are not permitted to do so.

Mr. GARDINER: I was at fault, Mr. Speaker. I should have said that I was rising to speak to a question of privilege in order to correct a statement which had been made.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. JOSEPH NEEDHAM (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at length, nor shall I attempt to cover the ground other hon. members have already covered respecting the situation in Saskatchewan. There are one or two matters, however, which I wish to mention. In the last few years the situation in the northern part of the province has been getting more serious from year to year. There was practically no rust-resistant wheat in my constituency. There were one or two patches, the seed for which was sent in by the mortgage companies from their own farms. I have two patches in mind where rust-resistant seed was sown. In each case marquis wheat was sown on either side, and even with just the stubble showing, where rust-resistant had been sown the stubble was bright as a dollar whereas the other was quite black and had very little yield. As a consequence of this, that particular district is in far worse financial shape than it ever was before.

Perhaps the severest criticism to be heard in my district is of the attitude of the government in setting the price of wheat f.o.b. Fort William. Many think that that is unfair to the farmers. I do not know what the rate would be from eastern Manitoba to Fort William, but in my constituency it is 24½ cents. There is a distinct penalty placed upon those living in that part of the country.

Mr. LEADER: It is fifteen cents from the eastern part of Manitoba.

Mr. NEEDHAM: These men have to pay a penalty because they happened to homestead there.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Probably it is worth more to live there.

Mr. NEEDHAM: This is something I want to present to the government. I hope that in setting the price of wheat they will deal fairly with all the parties concerned. We had several intimations from the minister to-night that this is a matter primarily for the provinces. I should like the minister to make a statement of the services rendered by the dominion Department of Agriculture which could not be rendered by the departments of the various provinces. This question of where the responsibility rests is becoming more difficult of definition year by year. There is an increasing number of farmers who are convinced that there is a duplication as between the federal Department of Agriculture and the provinces. This belief is becoming more widespread year by year. We will soon be taking up the estimates and after looking through them I must say that with the exception of a few items, I cannot see anything that is not handled already by the provincial governments.

The question is being asked as to what plan the departments of agriculture, both federal and provincial, have to further the welfare of agriculture in this dominion. Is the minister working towards the objective of bettering the condition of agriculture? The following statement by Great Britain's minister of agriculture appeared the other day in the Western Producer:

> The objective for agriculture, Sir Reginald says, should be to secure a level of prices for farm products that will enable the farmer to conduct his operations in a scientific and efficient manner, to pay wages for his help that correspond to wages received by other skilled labour and to earn for himself a reasonable standard of living. That is the objective he set before the farmers of the empire.

The federal Department of Agriculture in cooperation with the provinces should map out a plan with that definite objective in view. This question has been raised ever since confederation, ever since the departments were formed. The condition of agriculture, both in the east and in the west, is such that some plan with a definite objective should be worked out. I feel like saying that I hesitate to give my approval to voting over nine and a half millions for the Department of Agriculture unless I am satisfied that that department is rendering a special service that warrants this expenditure. After all, if the dominion meets its obligations that money must be drawn from the provinces. The question in my mind is whether those estimates should be prevented from passing and the money left in the provinces. The question is whether the provinces could not administer this vote to better advantage.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—
1. Departmental administration, $120,005.

Mr. SENN: Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, this item raises the whole question of the activities of the Department of Agriculture, the manner in which they are conducted and the organization of the department. Some two years ago the announcement was made in the columns of the press that certain changes were to be made in the organization of the Department of Agriculture. Later on the minister was asked what those changes were to be and he requested that the answer should be allowed to wait until a certain item came up. Unfortunately that item did not come up in that year until the dying days of the session, and nothing was heard of the changes which were to be brought about. Last year the question was again asked as to the changes which were to be made and the additions to the service, if any, and the minister did make a short statement. In my opinion that statement was neither satisfactory nor at all complete. I ask the minister to give the committee and the country a real explanation of the change that has been made in the department, particularly through the introduction of a marketing branch, and some idea as to how it is being conducted and generally how the reorganization has been effected.

Mr. GARDINER: I think if my hon. friend will read the discussions at about this same stage last session he will find that the hon. member who is now asking the question asked it then, and an explanation was then given. I doubt very much whether I can add to it, but I am quite prepared to repeat it.

The set-up of the estimates this year indicates the intention of those of us who advocated and carried through the reorganization of the department. As I explained last year, in the estimates the items were put in the opposite way round to that which would indicate the intention of those who brought the reorganization about. This year the items appear in their natural sequence: administration service, science service, experimental farms, production service, and marketing service; and I think one has only to read those headings in order to realize that that is the natural set-up for an agriculture department. The first activity in connection with agricultural work is to make scientific investigations, not only as to what is being done in this country but as to what is being done under similar conditions in other countries, then to apply the results of that investigation on our experimental farms, and to carry that experimental work to its logical conclusion.

To illustrate, we may take the matter which was under discussion a few moments ago, that of work on rust-resistant wheat. First, certain investigations are carried out in connection with the research laboratories, not only on our farms and associated with our farm work, but also in connection with the research service generally. Then we take the results of that scientific work and apply it in the production of crops on the experimental farms. After we have produced the grain up to a certain standard and have classified it, we let it out to individual farmers to multiply it. When the grain is multiplied we distribute it in two or three bushel allotments to farmers all over the western provinces, and those men by the end of one season have their own seed produced on their own farms from the distribution which is made.

That is the early stage of the work. One could apply a similar explanation in connection with the development of live stock, poultry, fruit activities, and other pursuits related to agriculture.

Then with the experience we have gained through these scientific investigations and the experimental work, we go out through the country to try to promote production. It is in the promotion of production that we have the greatest degree of assistance from the provinces. Something has been said with regard to the overlapping of our work. There is no overlapping in the scientific work. There is cooperation. We carry on activities in both scientific and experimental work in cooperation with the provinces, at their universities and their agricultural colleges, and we cooperate with them in the production service. The very fact that we distribute rust-resistant wheat is in itself cooperation with the provinces in the matter of production. The fact that we send overseas and purchase sires for the horse industry or the cattle industry or the sheep industry or the swine industry, assists in production generally throughout the country.

Having produced the product which we think is suited to certain markets, we try to promote the sale of that product in those markets. The larger part of the production of our farms is sold, as all hon. members know, in the Dominion of Canada. There are only three products of which we sell the greater part outside of Canada: apples, a little over 50 per cent; cheese, about 66 per cent; and wheat, about 68 per cent, the greater part being sold in Great Britain.

Our marketing activities in so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned are largely in Canada. We have a certain set-up in the old country, headed by Mr. Allen, who was sent over there last year, and who previously had been associated with the agricultural college in Saskatchewan. He heads up the service there in attempting to find out what types of live stock, for example, will best suit the market in the old country; what forms for the making up of cheese, for example, best suit that market; and determining, too, what types of fruits please that market best. This information is passed back here, and then we utilize the different services to try to produce the kind of products which will best suit those markets, and utilize the marketing set-up to assist in selling them.

I would say that the difference between this set-up and the organization we had before is this. We emphasized live stock; we emphasized in another branch seeds of different kinds; we emphasized poultry in another branch; and these branches and many others were headed up by commissioners. We emphasized production and improvement in these different lines rather than what we are stressing to-day through the form of organization which is now in operation. To-day the things we emphasize are scientific investigation, experimentation, production, and marketing.

Mr. SENN: I thank the minister for his explanation of what is taking place in the department, so far as it has gone. However, these activities were largely carried on under the former organization. What I am trying to get at is this: where to go in the department when one wants certain information, or where any particular matter which one wishes to take up should be dealt with. Not so very long ago I heard a gentleman say that he came to Ottawa on some matter which had to do with poultry, and after telephoning here and there throughout the department he finally wound up in the seed branch, where he found the particular section of the department with which he wanted to deal. That is a difficulty which, as I see it, results from the lack of information which the minister has given up to the present. If you pick up the report of the minister for the last year you will find that the headings are just the same as they were previously. There is a live stock branch, a seed branch, a fruit branch, and so on down the line, with no difference or no discrimination because of the new set-up within the department.

Mr. GARDINER: It is just the same as it was last year.

Mr. SENN: I know it is the same. That is what we are complaining about. There should be some change. For instance, if you pick up the departmental directory you do not know to whom to appeal for any information you want within the department. Repeatedly I have called up one branch of the department and have been told, "Well, this is not the part of the department which deals with the matter at the present time." They refer me to somebody else; I speak to somebody else and find I am again in the wrong pew. That has happened repeatedly, not only to myself but to a good many other people. If the minister has made these changes it is necessary that he change the directory and revise his report so that when we come to deal with these matters we shall know with whom we are to deal and where we are to go to present anything we have to present to any branch of the department. That is the question I am asking the minister. What has been done in this respect? We want to be able to approach matters intelligently when we wish to deal with the department.

Mr. GARDINER: The set-up this year is exactly the same as it was when the estimates went through a year ago.

Mr. SENN: But we had the same difficulty a year ago.

Mr. GARDINER: The telephone directory is being reprinted at the present time and when that is through it will be simpler.

Mr. BROOKS: Following up what my hon. friend (Mr. Senn) has said, a good deal of useful literature is circulated by the Department of Agriculture, but when you want to get information and you telephone the confederation building you are told that you must go to some other building in the city, to some particular branch of agriculture, in order to get the information. The whole thing should be revamped so that when we get these requests—and I receive hundreds of them—they can be intelligently dealt with and the necessary information secured and passed on.

Mr. HAYHURST: With regard to salaries, the details of which are to be found on page 51, it would seem that the private secretary has been added to the staff.

Mr. GARDINER: The explanation is that they have to be on the staff a certain length of time before they are permanent. He is drawing the same salary and is the same individual, but he is now on the permanent staff.

Mr. COLDWELL: In view of the situation that is developing with regard to wheat, will the minister make a statement on the policy of the government in relation to the problem of wheat marketing, the attitude of the government towards the world conference, and allied matters, or shall we discuss these problems under these estimates? Is the minister prepared to indicate now whether or not he can make that statement?

Mr. GARDINER: These matters do not come under agriculture but under the Department of Trade and Commerce. The whole wheat question, the administration of the grain act, is under that department.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am aware of that, but the Minister of Agriculture, of course, is the minister who has charge of the acreage problem, the provision of seed and all matters which have to do with the growing of crops. The supplying of the money for the seed may be under the Minister of Finance rather than the Minister of Agriculture; I realize that. But the Minister of Agriculture is probably, at least from the point of view of those of us who come from the part of the country from which he comes, the one who might be able to discuss the matter from the standpoint of the wheat producer and give the committee, if I may say so without seeming in any way derogatory of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a better picture of the situation than perhaps could be given by any other minister. Can we have a discussion on these questions in the near future?

Mr. GARDINER: If I were to undertake to discuss the matter at the moment I should be completely out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I know that.

Mr. GARDINER: I hope to get my estimates through some time, and if I were to go so far astray as to discuss a matter of that kind under this item I should be giving a bad example.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not ask that. I asked if some opportunity would be given at an early day, apart from the estimates, for the minister to make a statement regarding the wheat situation and the government's policy. I simply wanted to know when we might have such a statement either from the minister himself or from some other member of the government.

Mr. GARDINER: There are private members' resolutions on the subject that will be reached sooner or later, and there are other occasions on which the matter can be discussed—when the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce are up, for example. I am not in a position to say when the matter will be discussed; it depends when these resolutions come along.

Mr. SENN: When the minister made his first statement he referred to the fact that an agricultural commissioner had been appointed in Great Britain, a Mr. Allen. I remember distinctly when the minister made that announcement in the house last year. He stated that this gentleman's work was largely to supply information to the Department of Agriculture. During the year he has no doubt made a number of reports to the department as to what has been going on in Great Britain. There was some argument last year as to the Shaw report and what it contained, the recommendations made, the conditions of trade over there and the activities of the Department of Trade and Commerce under the commissioner. Is the minister prepared to table the correspondence or the reports that have been made by the commissioner who was over there? It would greatly facilitate discussion when we come to consider marketing services under the department.

Mr. GARDINER: It would be quite a volume of correspondence. I do not know that there is any objection to bringing it down and making it available to the house, but it is in the form of letters that are coming in continuously from his office to the department here, and it has to do with such matters as the experiment we are now carrying on in connection with the sale of beef in Great Britain, which is a very interesting experiment, and other matters of that kind. All the information that is contained in the correspondence could be put in such a form as to be more helpful to members of the committee than it would be if the letters themselves were simply brought down. When we come to consider the estimates for marketing services, we might have available the reports on these different matters and have them produced at that time.

Mr. SENN: But that is what we should like to have at the present time. We should like to have the information sent by the commissioner to the Department of Agriculture. As the minister states, the experiment that is taking place in the shipment of chilled beef is important, and the committee is entitled to information.

Mr. GARDINER: With all due respect I do not think we should be in order in discussing that under this item. That should be discussed under marketing.

Mr. SENN: I am not asking that it be discussed at the moment, but the minister mentioned that Mr. Allen had been appointed and sent over there, and for the sake of facilitating matters I am asking that he bring down those letters for the information they contain. It would probably help in getting the estimates through, because without it we might ask a lot of questions which otherwise would be unnecessary.

Mr. BROOKS: We have heard the statement made that there is overlapping between the provincial departments of agriculture and the federal department. Where is the division of responsibility, and what officers would be responsible for the liaison between the federal Department of Agriculture and the different provincial departments?

Mr. GARDINER: There has been a committee acting for some years to carry on discussions between the different provincial departments and this department to avoid overlapping. The last gathering for general discussion I think was about two or two and a half years ago. At that time it was decided that there was no serious overlapping between the federal and the provincial departments of agriculture, and no additions to the activities of this department have since been made which would result in further overlapping than there was then.

The provincial departments carry on in connection with agriculture in much the same way as they do in connection with other provincial activities—taking care of educational matters for example. We have no educational institutions of the type of the provincial agricultural colleges and schools. All that type of work is done by the provinces. But the general experimental work on experimental farms is done by the federal department. In the production services a greater proportion of the work is carried on by the provinces than by the dominion. In matters such as the grading of farm products there would be overlapping but for the fact that most of the provinces have appointed our inspectors as provincial inspectors in order to do much of the grading work that is done within the provinces. We have and can enforce grades for interprovincial and export trade, but we are not able to enforce those grades within the provinces themselves. In that case the provinces enact legislation setting up the same grading system as we have, and then they ask our men to become their appointees and enforce the same grading services within the province. There is no overlapping in personnel, their work is done by men who are maintained by the federal government.

Mr. BROOKS: Have the federal or the local departments most to do with marketing?

Mr. GARDINER: We have the most to do with the marketing end. All grading services come under that. We do the work, but some of the legislation is provided by the provinces.

Mr. McNIVEN: The minister indicated that one of the branches of his department was scientific. Is any work being conducted through the minister's department or through the national research council to find other uses for wheat? What I have in mind is something similar to what is being done with the soya bean and the investigations of Doctor Carver to find new uses for the peanut. Is anything of that kind being done so far as wheat is concerned by the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. GARDINER: Taking the soya bean as an example we are carrying on experiments in its breeding and production in order to suit it to different climatic conditions. But research work with regard to uses of the soya bean is carried on by the research council.

Mr. McNIVEN: Under what department is that?

Mr. GARDINER: That is under trade and commerce, but reports are made to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. GRAYDON: I notice that a resolution which is on the order paper and may come before the house this session has to do with a system of dominion scholarships, a proposal which was very ably sponsored last year by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). Mention is made in the resolution of assistance in securing adequate academic training to enable young men and women to take their proper place as thoroughly trained leaders in industrial, professional and public life. Assistance is suggested for those who are unable to complete their courses in the various agricultural colleges of the dominion. In view of the large number of people who have taken a keen interest in the matter of scholarships, has the minister or his department given any consideration to the question whether or not assistance should be given by the Department of Agriculture in this connection?

Mr. GARDINER: As I said a while ago, education is under provincial control; we do not directly enter that field. But we do take into the service men who have benefited from scholarships, and from time to time promising young men who, we think, would be helpful in the service in years to come we send to the universities to instruct students and to work with those who are further advanced in certain lines; then we bring them back to the department in order to make use of their services. In that sense we assist them, because we pay their salaries while they are at the universities. But we have not put up scholarships.

Mr. BROOKS: In connection with education I notice that at the different experimental farms throughout Canada young men are attending short courses, sometimes for four or five weeks. Forty or fifty men are attending such a course at Fredericton. They are splendid courses and much valuable instruction is given. What arrangement is made with the local government for the payment of the expenses of these students who attend classes at the federal experimental stations?

Mr. GARDINER: We do not pay anything towards the expenses of the students. I understand that some provinces contribute towards the expenses of the students. But wherever we have men available we supply personnel to the provincial authorities for teaching these students, and pay them while they are doing it. And we supply our facilities at the different farms.

Mr. GRAYDON: In Ontario are any of these instructors taking part under dominion supervision in the various short courses conducted in the different counties?

Mr. GARDINER: There are some, but we are not in a position to cover the whole province. They go to Kemptville and from there to other places to assist, but we cannot cover all the classes conducted in the different counties.

Mr. GRAYDON: I believe very few educational activities, as far as young farmers are concerned, really bring about better results than the short courses conducted from time to time in the various counties of our province. Not only do they provide a type of education which is very necessary but in addition, from my experience over the last several years, they bring about a most remarkable advancement in community spirit as well. Over the years one can notice the general improvement which eventually comes to agriculture as a whole by virtue of the short courses that are given. I would suggest to the minister that any assistance he might be able to give in this work through cooperation by the federal department would be well worth while as far as the agricultural life of our dominion is concerned.

Mr. WOOD: I am interested in this discussion with regard to rural education, and I have listened carefully to the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite. But for some time I have taken the view that there is great danger of overlapping our activities, and I feel that the minister would not be well advised to endeavour to go into the educational field which is so well looked after by the Ontario department of agriculture.

I was also interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) who was concerned as to where he could get certain information. That is one field in which the Ontario department has had very considerable success. Anyone can go into the branch offices of the department and find racks of bulletins containing all the information that may be desired. I do not think it is the duty of the federal department to establish an information bureau especially for the members of parliament; that is not particularly our business. When we go home for week-ends we can go to the branch office and get any information we want.

I believe we spend a great deal of money unnecessarily because of the overlapping of these services. I sometimes question the advisability of maintaining a central experimental farm here in Ottawa when we have such splendid farms in each province. I sometimes wonder if that money could not be spent better in other directions. I do not claim to be an authority on the subject, but this is one of the things that come into the mind of the average farmer to make him wonder whether we are getting the best possible value for the money we spend. The government is asked to do so many things. A question was raised this evening in connection with supplying seed wheat, and as an Ontario farmer I marvel at the ability of our western men—whom I always look upon as masters of brilliant intellect—to be spoon-fed, as I think the hon. member for Parkdale put it a couple of years ago. No doubt that was how he came to coin the phrase. They expect the government to supply them with seed wheat. Down in Ontario we try to make our own effort, and I think the minister is to be commended on attempting to bring out a little self-reliance in some of these people, even though they may have to drive twenty-five miles. If they cannot afford to buy rust-resistant wheat why not do as I have to do when I want some new variety? I buy a bushel or two and sow it, and then I have my seed for next year. I have no money to spend extravagantly. If I want a team of horses I generally sell the $200 horse and buy $50 colts, and I think if the farmers in the west would do something like that they would not have so many difficulties.

I want to come back to the question of education. I hope the minister will not be induced, by the very able speech of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), to duplicate the educational activities which are so well administered by the province. I am quite a believer in the school of experience. So far as scholarships are concerned, I am doubtful whether any service could be rendered in that way. Not long ago my attention was drawn to the type of men who are at the head of the United States Steel Corporation and the Standard Oil Company. Of course this is a little outside agriculture, but they are two of the largest concerns on the north American continent. I noticed that the men at the head of those two firms were poor boys, raised on farms and having the benefit of only a very limited public school education. That would seem to prove that there is something in the atmosphere of the farm which, if properly applied, brings out the ability that is in a man. True, he must be able to develop his mental capacity, but I am not so sure that we derive any substantial results from some of these scholarships, which by the way are very expensive; I am not sure that those who have benefited have really made any important contribution to the nation as a result of these expenditures.

These are just some thoughts I have picked up from my association with men living in my own atmosphere, but I think they are worth considering. Let me say once more that I hope the minister will not be lured, by the fine speeches of those opposite, into broadening out into a wider sphere when I think perhaps we have too much duplication already.

Mr. LOCKHART: I would suggest that if any of the friends of my hon. friend try to get a position in the civil service in connection with agriculture he will see how far they get without a scholarship.

Mr. WOOD: I always sympathize with anyone who applies to the civil service commission or the government for a position. It is one of the last places I would want to work, and really I do not advise any of my friends to apply for government jobs.

Mr. SENN: I should like to take this opportunity of thanking my colleague and neighbour the member for Brant (Mr. Wood) for telling me just where I can get all the information that may be required in connection with agriculture throughout the dominion. I had thought, of course, that certain information could be better obtained from the federal department than could be found in the archives or publications of any particular province.

I have been surprised at the scope of this discussion, having in mind what the minister said a few moments ago when I was trying to get him to lay certain papers on the table. He said that request was rather wide of the mark in discussion of this particular item, but since then we have gone considerably further afield. The minister chose to ignore what I thought was a very reasonable request, that this information should be tabled, but I am going to make another appeal to him. After all, this gentleman is a paid official of the government; public money is expended in paying his salary and expenses, and I think the information he sends back to the Department of Agriculture should be made available to parliament. If there is anything that is confidential, that is a different matter, but I do not see why there should be anything confidential in a public servant giving information to his minister or to the department which he is serving. I make one more appeal to the minister to allow that correspondence and information to be placed on the table for the use of members of this house, because I think it will assist him in getting his estimates through.

Mr. GARDINER: I hope the hon. member did not think I was ignoring the matter. I simply stated that it was departmental correspondence. I do not know that it would be of any particular use to the house in its present form. I have no objection to its being brought down, which might be done through an order for return; or I can bring it down and lay it on the table when we discuss the matter again. However, I do think it would be very much more useful if, before bringing it down, we put the information in some sort of shape that would make it more easily understood. I do not think anyone would want to go through a file of departmental letters written back and forth, but if they are wanted I can bring them down.

Mr. SENN: I have no desire to embarrass the minister or to find out anything that is at all confidential. On the other hand the very remarks which might be most important might be left out of any report that was made. What the minister might consider unimportant other members of the committee might regard as important. I am making what I think is a reasonable request when I ask that the information be tabled.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—
218. General administration, $972,135.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Chairman, I desire only that the item be called; there is really no time for any discussion on it to-night. I would ask that it stand.

Mr. STEWART: Mr. Chairman, I would refer hon. members to a statement made last night at the adjournment hour, when the Prime Minister was asked about the business for to-day. The right hon. gentleman said:

Mr. Mackenzie King: To-morrow we shall take up the resolution with respect to the trade agreement between Canada and the United States. I understand there is a desire not to proceed with the debate to-morrow in which event we would go on with supply, and take the estimates for the Department of Agriculture, Public Works or National Revenue.

That is open to the interpretation of taking only one department. I have no objection to taking two, but I do not think we ought to go into more than two.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Did he say "or" or "and"?

Mr. STEWART: "Or."

An hon. MEMBER: "Or" means "and."

Mr. STEWART: It does not mean "and," in that connection.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Did the Prime Minister say "the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Public Works"?

Mr. STEWART: He said ".... take the estimates for the Department of Agriculture, Public Works or National Revenue." That means one department, if it means anything.

An hon. MEMBER: Two.

Mr. STEWART: We have admitted two.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): What is the matter with three?

Mr. STEWART: I think two is enough.

Mr. LAWSON: We can easily stop it by discussing the item which has just been called.

Mr. STEWART: We ought to go into two departments, according to the understanding, and no more. That is enough to keep us going.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is there a desire on the part of the acting leader of the opposition to take four departments to-night?

Mr. STEWART: I do not think that question requires an answer at all. If the hon. member was listening he would know I said that the Prime Minister's statement meant one department. Why should I say four departments?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It seems so foolish, when the department is available and when members are willing, that the hon. member who is acting as leader of the opposition should try to delay those departments getting into supply.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 292.

Mr. STEWART: What is that?

The CHAIRMAN: Public works, page 31 of the estimates.

Mr. LAWSON: We have not disposed of item 218 yet?

The CHAIRMAN: Item 218 was to stand.

Mr. STEWART: Are we going to follow out the understanding, or are we going to violate it? There is no desire to hold up the business, but the two departments taken will meet the requirements of the government to have something to deal with and something to discuss.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If the hon. member thinks there is a breach of any understanding, we certainly will not proceed. But really I do not see why we should not go into those departments, in order to be ready to go on with them when the time comes. No hon. member is losing any privilege or any right by permitting that. But if the hon. member insists—

Mr. LAWSON: We are losing the opportunity of discussing matters we want to discuss on going into supply.

Mr. ILSLEY: Do I understand, then, that the Department of National Revenue is before the committee, and that item 218 has been called?

Mr. LAWSON: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: And the question is whether items may be called in the Department of Public Works.

Mr. STEWART: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I presume the Prime Minister thought he had intimated that he wanted to go into the three departments named, but I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 292.

Mr. STEWART: Mr. Chairman, I renew my objection to the taking up of item 292, and say we should go back to the item in the Department of National Revenue. Surely these two departments will furnish ample material for discussion.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): All right, then.

The CHAIRMAN: Did the minister call another item in the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. LAWSON: The minister can go back to item 218.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. ILSLEY: We can discuss item 218, then, if hon. members wish.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LAWSON: Will the minister be good enough to make an explanation of this item? There seems to be some change in the classification of appraisers—either that, or there is a large increase in salaries. About one-third of the way down on page 138 there are items of $4,000, $16,000 and $19,000, in round figures, in the estimates for 1939-40. Then there is an item of $10,260 in the estimates for 1938-39, which does not appear in the figures for the ensuing year. Do those relate to the same subject matter?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; there has been a reclassification, which means that there are fewer customs reviewing appraisers, and therefore a decrease under that item. There are more dominion customs appraisers, and therefore an increase under those items. Unless there is some offsetting decrease elsewhere, which at the moment I do not see, there has been apparently a net increase.

Mr. LAWSON: Apparently the increase is in the neighbourhood of $30,000. That seems extraordinary in one year, by a mere reclassification, unless there are a great many more appraisers.

Mr. ILSLEY: The number is increased, as indicated in the first column on the page under the figures 1939-40.

Mr. LAWSON: Apparently there is an increase up to thirteen or fourteen, whereas previously there were only three. What is the reason for the increase?

Mr. ILSLEY: There have been some transfers from other classifications. For instance, lower down on the page there is a decrease of seventeen customs reviewing appraisers, grade 1. That is about three-quarters of the way down the page.

Mr. LAWSON: But right above that there is an increase of eight, again.

Mr. ILSLEY: There the balance is the other way.

Mr. LAWSON: And an increase of sixteen in the next item below that.

Mr. ILSLEY: One would have to go through all the items to see whether or not there had been a net increase.

Mr. LAWSON: Has not the minister available a memorandum showing the reason for these changes in classification, what the result has been, and how much more money it is costing the taxpayers?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It is not costing us more.

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been an increase in salaries for the appraisers branch. The authorized compensation for 1938-39 was $151,965.

Mr. LAWSON: That is for appraisers only?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is in the appraisers' branch. The estimated compensation for 1939-40 is $172,535. Part of that is accounted for by statutory increases which amount to $5,370.

Mr. LAWSON: That would leave about $15,000 for new employees?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is it.

Mr. LAWSON: How many new appraisers have been created—on balance, I mean?

Mr. ILSLEY: The $15,000 would not be entirely for new employees. There are increases in salaries.

Mr. LAWSON: I deducted the statutory increases.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are increases that are not statutory, due to reclassification of positions.

Mr. LAWSON: Could the minister tell me, on balance, how many more appraisers it is proposed to have for 1939-40?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. gentleman wants that exactly—

Mr. LAWSON: Approximately.

Mr. ILSLEY: Approximately there is no change.

Mr. LAWSON: There may have been one or two appointments, but nothing beyond that?

Mr. ILSLEY: That sums up the situation.

Mr. LAWSON: I understand appraisers are not appointed by the civil service commission.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, they are.

Mr. LAWSON: Do they not come under the national revenue act?

Mr. ILSLEY: They do, but I do not exercise my powers under that act. The civil service commission appoints them all.

Mr. MARSHALL: Has there been any general reduction in staff throughout the whole department?

Mr. ILSLEY: This item may be a little misleading. There has been a transfer of quite a number of officers from national revenue to trade and commerce. The statistical branch has been moved from national revenue to trade and commerce.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the minister is to be complimented upon not using his powers under the national revenue act. There is another matter I should like to discuss under this item. I should like to know who is responsible for the issuance of regulations in connection with appraisals, and so on, particularly in connection with the hundred dollar tourist exemption. Last year I drew the attention of the minister to the regulations that had been issued. For example, if automobile tires were on the wheels of a car they were dutiable, and if clothing was being worn it was dutiable. At that time the minister made a statement and I believe he read the regulation. As I recall it, the regulation is that an article can be brought in under this exemption if contained within baggage. I am sorry I did not bring the particular Hansard down with me, but as I remember it the resolution of parliament was that this exemption should include articles included in baggage. There is a distinct difference between "contained within" and "included in." An article might be shipped by rail and be included in, but not contained within, baggage. It seems to me that what has occurred in connection with this particular item is a gradual increase in the restrictions which has to a large extent eliminated the intention of parliament.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister says "no," but I put this before him so that he can clear it up. I note that the balance as between Canada and the United States is greatly in favour of Canada. American tourists buy much more in Canada than Canadian tourists buy in the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know, because there are no statistics to show.

Mr. COLDWELL: There are estimates.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have never seen any estimates of what the Americans buy here under the hundred dollar exemption.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have seen them from time to time. I think it is quite logical one should make such an estimate, because more Americans enter Canada to buy woollen goods, chinaware and other things. When Canadians from western Canada cross the border into the United States, very often they have no money with which to purchase goods in that country.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a greater variety of goods purchased in the United States.

Mr. COLDWELL: I just wanted to bring this to the attention of the minister. I notice that the United States regulations have been tightened up to meet ours. Not long ago an American tourist could enter this country, remain a few hours to purchase goods, and then go back. To-day he must remain forty-eight hours, the same as Canadians have to remain in the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: We did not tighten up ours.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am pointing out these things because I believe the intention of parliament was one thing and the regulations are another. I notice it is close to eleven o'clock, and I shall discuss this matter at another time. In spite of the fact that we talk about lowering the barriers against goods coming into this country, the method of appraising for duty purposes retains at all times about the same amount of protection as when we had a relatively higher tariff. I think that that is correct in many instances, although not in all.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 15, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—POLICY RESPECTING RECIPROCAL AGREEMENTS WITH OTHER COUNTRIES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With the permission of the house, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call attention to something I said in the course of the debate yesterday, which might have created an entirely erroneous impression and which, if it were not corrected at the earliest possible moment, might also occasion some embarrassment in the relations of Canada with other countries.

Speaking on the question of the government's policy with respect to entering into reciprocal agreements with other countries, I stated that our policy was to enter into reciprocal agreements with any countries that were prepared to enter into similar agreements with Canada, and I made that position quite clear in the following words:

Canada, then, on both political and economic grounds, is committed to a policy of peace and good will, and of freer exchange with countries which will meet us half way.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Then I mentioned the countries to which we feel more especially committed, and I went on to say:

So far as greater freedom of trade is concerned, we are always willing to add to these countries, other countries prepared to trade with us on a reciprocal basis. . . .

And I continued:

. . . guided by the same democratic ideas, such as France, the Scandinavian countries, Holland and Belgium. . . .

I had intended after mentioning these countries also to say that we were prepared to enter into reciprocal agreements with other countries that did not necessarily have the same domestic policies as we have, but I omitted to do so. I thought the matter was so important that in looking over the transcription of the reporter's notes last night I immediately made the necessary revision so that my second statement would be in complete accord with the first and would read:

. . . we are always willing to add to these countries, other countries prepared to trade with us on a reciprocal basis, whether they be countries whose policies are guided by the same democratic ideas, such as France, the Scandinavian countries, Holland and Belgium, or countries with domestic policies differing from our own.

That was what I intended to say, but in the haste of speaking I omitted to make clear the fact that the policy of the government is, as first stated, to make reciprocal trade agreements with any country, but not to regard the domestic policies of particular countries as a bar to entering into these agreements. I make this statement because Hansard had reported me correctly and the press has reported correctly what appeared in Hansard. I felt however, that unless this change were made immediately it might occasion embarrassment in some other parts of the world as well as here. The house will appreciate why I felt it necessary to make the correction at the earliest possible moment.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FARM IMPLEMENT AND TRACTOR PRICES

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Was a reduction made on the listed price of farm implements and tractors during the year 1938?
2. If so, what companies effected a reduction in their prices?
3. At what time of the year were such reductions made?
4. What is the amount of the price reductions on tractors, open gear-binders, closed gear-binders, ploughs, seed-drills and every other farm implement?

Mr. GARDINER: The information which would constitute an answer to this question is not available in a form which we could guarantee as being correct, and I suggest that the question be dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT—CONSTRUCTION OF DUG-OUTS AND DAMS IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What is the total number of dug-outs, and the total number of dams constructed in the province of Saskatchewan under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act since its coming into force?

2. How many dug-outs and dams were constructed in the said province during the year 1938, and what were the total costs of: (a) dug-outs, and (b) dams, during the said year?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Total number of dug-outs, 2,048; total number of dams, individual and community, 1,424; total number of dams, large projects, 34.

2. (a) 1,290 dug-outs, $95,719.54; (b) 790 dams, individual and community, $89,141.50; 19 dams, large projects, $231,501.91.

JAMES COYNE

Mr. PERLEY:

1. Was Mr. James Coyne, of Winnipeg, counsel or assistant counsel on any of the royal commissions which have been appointed?

2. If so, how much per day did he receive?

3. What total amount has he received as counsel or assistant counsel on any commission or commissions?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Assistant counsel, royal grain inquiry commission.

2. $10 per day living allowance, $50 per day legal fees.

3. Living allowance, $2,470; legal fees, $18,475; travel, $1,308.74. Total amount paid, $22,253.74.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT—SPECIAL PERMITS

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. How many special permits each year have been granted by the veterinary director general under section 93 of the quarantine regulations pursuant to the Animal Contagious Diseases Act: (a) in the township of Toronto, county of Peel; (b) in Ontario; (c) in Canada?

2. Before such special permits were granted, were the local municipal council or local board of health consulted in each instance?

3. If so, did the said municipal council or local boards of health approve the issuance of such permits?

4. What are the names and addresses of persons or corporations operating "piggeries" in the township of Toronto, pursuant to the aforementioned quarantine regulations?

5. Has the veterinary director general received any complaints or objections in writing or otherwise from neighbouring residents with respect to any of the said "piggeries" in the said township of Toronto?

6. What applications, if any, for further special permits in the said township of Toronto, are now under consideration?

Mr. GARDINER:

1.	(a)	(b)	(c)
1921-22	..	94	223
1922-23	..	40	138
1923-24	..	70	172
1924-25	1	20	61
1925-26	2	57	144
1926-27	..	65	159
1927-28	..	66	140
1928-29	1	65	150
1929-30	..	74	176
1930-31	..	48	119
1931-32	..	64	153
1932-33	..	46	127
1933-34	..	45	129
1934-35	..	44	143
1935-36	..	58	153
1936-37	1	43	120
1937-38	1	55	160
1938-39 to date	1	38	90
	7	922	2,557

(Figures for previous years not available).

2. No.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. J. Heck, Cooksville; R. McKay, Cooksville; J. A. Todd, Cooksville; R. Walton, Malton.

5. Yes.

6. None.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION EMPLOYEES

Mr. HARRIS:

1. What are the names of the paid employees, including the general manager and all others, of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation throughout the dominion?

2. What salary does each receive?

3. What living, travelling or expense allowance was each paid in the year 1938?

Mr. HOWE: This question refers to a matter of the internal management of an autonomous corporation. Inasmuch as a committee of this house has been appointed to investigate all matters affecting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I think we should take the same position as is taken in connection with the Canadian National Railways and decline to answer a question of this type.

Mr. MANION: I wish to protest against that attitude, without going any further into the question at the moment.

GORDON RESERVE, SASKATCHEWAN, WATER LINE

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Is a water line being built on the Gordon reserve in Saskatchewan?

2. If so, what is the name of the contractor?

3. What is the amount of the contract?

4. Does the contract contain a fair wage clause?

5. If so, what amounts per hour should be paid to single men and married men by the contractor?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Yes.

2. W. H. McDiarmid.

3. Approximately $2,800.

4 and 5. The contract was on a cost plus basis and the schedule of wage rates applicable to the work was as follows:

	Cents per hour
General foreman	80
Carpenter	70
Tractor operator	50
Motor truck driver	40
Labourers	40
Indian labour	20 to 25

SUPREME COURT BUILDING

Mr. GREEN:

1. Has a contract been let for the erection of a new supreme court building in the city of Ottawa?

2. If so, to what company?

3. What is the estimated total cost of the erection and furnishing of this building?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.

2. Anglin-Norcross Ontario Limited, of Montreal, the lowest tenderers.

3. $3,360,000, including surrounding terraces and underground garages.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS — FINANCIAL STATISTICS

Mr. WALSH:

1. What were the passenger revenues, passenger operating expenses, net revenues, and passenger operating ratios of the Canadian National for the years 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938 respectively?

2. What were the receipts from ticket sales at each of the stations of the Canadian National Railways in the city of Montreal which it is proposed to consolidate under the proposed tunnel development for the years 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938 respectively?

3. What was the amount expended on the Montreal terminals development under S.C. chapter 12, 1929, up to December 31, 1938?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. HOWE:

1. Passenger revenue: 1934, $16,331,229; 1935, $16,644,700; 1936, $17,021,746; 1937, $18,944,767; 1938, $18,096,849. These amounts do not include sleeping and chair car, mail, express and other passenger train service revenue.

No figures are available which correctly reflect the segregation of passenger operating expenses and passenger operating ratios.

2. It is not considered in the interests of the Canadian National Railways to give the information requested.

3. $16,651,345.

AUTOMOBILES ENTERING AND LEAVING CANADA THROUGH ST. LAWRENCE RIVER PORTS

Mr. CASSELMAN:

How many automobiles entered and left the country respectively, through the ports of Cornwall, Morrisburg, Prescott, Brockville, Gananoque and Kingston, during each of the calendar years 1936, 1937 and 1938?

Mr. ILSLEY:

	1936	1937	1938
Cornwall, Ont.
Canadian automobiles:
Inwards	18,927	21,816	20,874
Outwards	19,039	21,509	20,693
Foreign automobiles:
Inwards	18,558	24,012	20,325
Outwards	19,486	25,643	21,946
Morrisburg, Ont.
Canadian automobiles:
Inwards	3,195	3,030	3,252
Outwards	3,322	3,023	3,270
Foreign automobiles:
Inwards	4,601	5,514	4,929
Outwards	5,167	6,119	5,663
Prescott, Ont.
Canadian automobiles:
Inwards	8,972	10,207	10,033
Outwards	9,058	9,921	9,789
Foreign automobiles:
Inwards	16,062	17,130	13,408
Outwards	15,442	16,696	13,949
Brockville, Ont.
Canadian automobiles:
Inwards	3,593	3,721	3,110
Outwards	3,541	3,730	2,976
Foreign automobiles:
Inwards	10,508	11,687	8,426
Outwards	10,601	11,815	8,858

Gananoque, Ont

	1936	1937	1938
Canadian automobiles:
Inwards	1,031	1,046	698
Outwards	1,040	1,184	790
Foreign automobiles:
Inwards	6,540	6,928	4,709
Outwards	7,629	8,727	6,034

Kingston, Ont

Canadian automobiles:
Inwards	....	4	2
Outwards	4	8	3
Foreign automobiles:
Inwards	223	100	105
Outwards	93	136	132

IMPORTATIONS OF CEREAL GRASS

Mr. STEWART:

1. What is the total quantity of cereal grass imported during the year 1938?

2. From what country or countries were such imports made?

3. What is the rate of duty on such imports?

4. Is cereal grass used in the preparation of balanced rations for live stock and poultry?

5. What are the names and addresses of such importers?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. and 2. Imports of cereal grass not separately recorded. 3. Dehydrated cereal grass not further processed than ground or sifted has been rated free of customs duty under tariff item 535.

4. Yes.

5. Information not available.

IMMIGRATION FROM GERMANY AND AUSTRIA

Mr. HEAPS:

1. What was the total number of immigrants who came to Canada during the calendar year 1938 from Germany, including Austria?

2. How many were heads of families?

3. What are the occupations of those who arrived in the dominion?

Mr. CRERAR: The question in its present form cannot be answered, for the reason that the department classifies and keeps its statistics regarding immigration on the basis of racial origin.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

DOMINION HOUSING ACT—LOANS

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. How many loans were made in each year under the provisions of the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, in: (a) Peel county; (b) Canada as a whole?

2. What is the total amount so loaned in each year under the provisions of the said act in: (a) Peel county; (b) Canada as a whole?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. (a) Four loans, all for single family housing units, were made in Peel county under the Dominion Housing Act, as follows: 1936, 1; 1937, 1; 1938, 2.

(b) Loans made and family housing units provided under the Dominion Housing Act in each year were as follows:

	1935	1936	1937	1938
Loans	75	650	1,426	1,220
Units	99	934	1,961	2,301

2. (a) Amount of loans made in each year in Peel county was as follows: 1936, $3,000; 1937, $3,500; 1938, $6,788.

(b) Amount of loans made in Canada in each year was as follows: 1935, $525,070; 1936, $4,444,788; 1937, $8,066,195; 1938, $8,119,602.

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. Under the provisions of the National Housing Act, 1938, how many loans have been made in accordance with: (a) part one; (b) part two; (c) part three of the said act, (1) in the dominion, (2) in the county of Peel?

2. What is the total amount so loaned in each instance?

Mr. DUNNING:

(a) (1) In the five months of operation under the National Housing Act, 1938, part I, from August to December inclusive, 1938, 1304 loans providing for 1837 family housing units were approved in the amount of $6,522,347.

(2) In the same period approval was given to four National Housing Act loans providing for four family housing units and amounting to $16,956 in Peel county.

(b) No loans have as yet been made under part II of the National Housing Act.

(c) Loans are not made under part III of the National Housing Act. This part provides for the payment of taxes on new low cost homes on certain conditions as set out in the act.

NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. What persons constituted the Canadian employment commission?

2. What was the total amount paid to each of the commission members for salaries, living allowances, travelling and other expenses?

3. What recommendations, if any, made by the reports of the said commission have been put into effect by the government?

4. What was the total cost to Canada of the said employment commission?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Arthur B. Purvis, Montreal, Quebec; A. N. McLean, Black's Harbour, New Brunswick; Alfred Marois, Quebec, P.Q.; Tom Moore, Ottawa, Ontario; Mrs. Mary M. Sutherland, Wells, British Columbia; W. A. Mackintosh, Kingston, Ontario; E. J. Young, Dummer, Saskatchewan.

2.	(a) Salaries	Per diem allowance	(b) Living allowances	(c) Travelling and other expenses	Total
A. B. Purvis	Nil	Nil	Nil	Nil	Nil
A. N. McLean	Nil	Nil	Nil	$2,858 55	$2,858 55
A. Marois	Nil	$3,529	Nil	1,611 46	5,140 46
Tom Moore	$7,425	Nil	Nil	609 95	8,034 95
Mrs. M. M. Sutherland	Nil	9,445	Nil	5,117 80	14,562 80
W. A. Mackintosh	Nil	3,066	Nil	1,281 95	4,347 95
E. J. Young	Nil	4,895	Nil	2,518 80	7,413 80

Note.—P.C. 1140 of May 13, 1936, provided for remuneration at the rate of $20 per day and actual expenses, while engaged on the work of the commission, except Mr. Tom Moore, who was in receipt of a salary of $9,000, less 5 per cent, as a member of the employment and social insurance commission to February 29, 1937, and then received a salary of $675 per month from March 1, 1937, from the national employment commission. (P.C. 492 of March 30, 1937.)

3. Action has been taken to date by the government toward the implementation of the following recommendations of the national employment commission:

(a) a national registration and classification of all persons receiving aid to which the dominion government contributes;
(b) a farm employment plan and supplementary plans designed to provide winter employment for homeless adults;
(c) a home improvement plan involving a limited government guarantee to lending institutions in connection with small loans for home repair and improvement work made under terms laid down by the dominion government;
(d) appointment of a youth employment committee and a women's employment committee;
(e) a dominion-provincial program of youth training and rehabilitation of the unemployed;
(f) invitation to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec to confer with dominion officials on agricultural relief (invitation not accepted);
(g) a current audit of unemployment relief expenditures at the seats of the governments of the provinces.

In addition, the government has been guided in the determination of its policy by the recommendations of the commission with respect to modernization of the employment service of Canada, low rental housing, public works and coordination of aid.

4. $325,549.26 divided as follows:

	National Employment Commission	Registration Branch
Commissioners
Per diem remuneration and travelling expenses	$ 42,358 51	....
Youth Employment Committee
Living allowance and travelling expenses	14,401 68	....
Women's Advisory Committee
Living allowance and travelling expenses	13,149 92	....
Other expenses	103,413 06	$152,226 09
	$173,323 17	$152,226 09

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT—SASKATCHEWAN CONTRACTS

Mr. PERLEY:

How many contracts of any nature whatsoever were let by the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in the province of Saskatchewan for the period of January, 1938, to January, 1939?

Mr. GARDINER: 32.

SASKATCHEWAN RELIEF SEED

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. Has the Saskatchewan government made application to the federal government for assistance in financing relief seed for the farmers this spring?

2. If so, on what date was application made?

3. What other bodies have made representations of this nature?

Mr. GARDINER: I answered this question last night, in addressing the house, as far as it is possible to answer it at the moment.

BROADVIEW, SASK., LANDING FIELD

Mr. PERLEY:

1. Was a landing field constructed by the Department of Transport at or near the town of Broadview, Saskatchewan, during the year 1938?

2. If so: (a) what was the total cost; (b) who were the contractors; (c) what was the amount of each contract?

3. Was labour used, or employed, from the Broadview district?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The Department of Transport started the construction of an intermediate aerodrome near the town of Broadview, Saskatchewan, latter part of the year 1937. Completed May 15, 1938.

2. (a) Purchase of land (1937-38), $1,486.50. Civil aviation (1937-38), $17,891.91. Civil aviation (1938-39), as at November 30, 1938, $22,336.25. Total to November 30, 1938, $41,714.66.

(b) and (c).

Contract No. 30582—Contractor, William R. Webb & W. G. Wellbelove, Broadview, Saskatchewan. Consideration, $3,419.85. Description, erection of a radio meteorological building at Broadview (Ekapo), Sask., on the route of the Trans-Canada Airways.

Contract No. 30590—Contractor, William R. Webb & W. G. Wellbelove, Broadview, Saskatchewan. Consideration, $3,867.60. Description, erection of a radio beacon station, including the construction of four antenna tower foundations at Broadview (Ekapo), Sask., on the route of the Trans-Canada Airways.

Contract No. 30604—Contractor, Dorosz Brothers and Ross, Regina, Sask. Consideration, $16,902. Description, development of the intermediate aerodrome site at Broadview (Ekapo), Sask., on the route of the Trans-Canada Airways.

Contract No. 30835—Contractor, P. W. Graham & Sons, Limited, Moose Jaw, Sask. Consideration, $11,822. Description, erection of living quarters for the radio staff of air services, including two residences and a double garage at the intermediate aerodrome, Broadview (Ekapo), Saskatchewan, (using wood bevel siding).

3. Yes. All unskilled labour obtained from Broadview district; skilled labour required for certain contracts was obtained from outside points.

WEYMOUTH N.S., WHARF

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Did the government purchase from Gilbert Belliveau a wharf at Weymouth, Nova Scotia?

2. If so, what was the purchase price?

3. What area adjacent to the wharf, and used with it, is available for piling space?

4. What are the dimensions of the wharf?

5. From whom, and when, did Gilbert Belliveau acquire title to said wharf, and for what amount?

6. Was said wharf under lease to one Taylor when purchased by the government?

7. If so, has the lease to Taylor been continued or renewed?

8. What is the rental and duration of the lease, if any?

9. What amount has been expended on repairs to this wharf since its purchase by the dominion government?

10. Was consideration given to the purchase of a wharf in the same locality, known as the Dunbar wharf, and were there any negotiations by the government for its purchase?

11. Why did the government purchase the said wharf instead of the Dunbar wharf?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes, by expropriation.

2. $2,500.

3. None.

4. 266 feet long by 20 to 79 feet wide.

5. No information.

6, 7 and 8. Under lease to Weymouth Shipping Company. Lease not renewed.

9. None.

10. Yes, Dunbar wharf also known as Hankinson wharf.

11. Wharf purchased affords greater advantages to shipping and represents less maintenance costs.

RETIREMENT OF NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. LANDERYOU:

1. Will a plan be considered which, if pursued, would substantially reduce and eventually wipe off Canada's national debt? If so, in what manner will this plan differ from the policies pursued during the past thirty years?

2. Would the present financial policies now pursued by the present government, if continued for thirty, fifty or one hundred years, result in a complete retirement of Canada's national debt?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think this question is not in order, because it raises a question of policy too large to be dealt with in the limits of an answer to a question. In Campion's "An Introduction to the Procedure of the House of Commons", at page 128, paragraph 4 gives among examples of questions that are out of order, those—

4. Raising questions of policy too large to be dealt with in the limits of an answer to a question.

I think the question should be dropped.

MR. JUSTICE MITCHELL

Mr. LANDERYOU:

1. Has Mr. Justice Mitchell, of the trial division of the Supreme Court of Alberta, sat on any trial since he was appointed Chief Justice?

2. If so, when?

3. Does Mr. Justice Mitchell hold a position of administrator under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act?

4. If so, at what salary per diem?

5. Does Mr. Justice Mitchell also draw salary as Chief Justice of the trial division of the Supreme Court of Alberta?

6. If so, what salary does he receive?

7. How many judges have been employed on the trial division of the Supreme Court of Alberta during each of the past twenty years?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. No information.

2. No information.

3. No. He is chief commissioner of the Alberta board of review appointed under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

4. No remuneration is payable the chief commissioner but he is granted an allowance of $25 per diem and transportation while engaged on the work of the board of review, except when the board is sitting in Edmonton.

5. Yes.

6. $10,000 per annum.

7. 1918-19-20—None. 1921 to date—Six including chief justice.

(Note: Trial division of supreme court of Alberta established in 1921.)

[Mr. Cardin.]

THREE PER CENT EXCISE TAX—REVENUE FOR 1936-37-38

Mr. STEWART:

1. What is the total amount of revenue derived from the 3 per cent excise tax in each of the calendar years, 1936, 1937 and 1938?

2. What is the total amount of such excise tax in each of said years upon the articles mentioned in schedule one of the Canada-United States trade agreement, signed at Washington on November 17, 1938?

3. What is the total amount of revenue derived from said tax from all commodities free of duty in each of said years?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Calendar year 1936, $14,502,260.04; Calendar year 1937, $18,854,202.49; Calendar year 1938, $16,055,880.75.

2 and 3. Statistics are not kept relative to the amount of taxes collected on goods entered under the various tariff items.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT—PURCHASE OF FENCE POSTS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Were bluestone-treated poplar fence posts procured under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act at the stations of Porcupine Plains, Shelan, Steen or Bjorkdale, Saskatchewan?

2. If so, were said posts supplied under contract?

3. Who was the contractor or person who supplied them?

4. How many posts were supplied by this contractor or vendor?

5. How much did he receive for these posts at shipping points?

6. Was any material or equipment supplied or paid for by the government for the treatment of said posts?

7. Where were posts used?

8. What transportation costs, if any, were paid on these posts?

9. Were British Columbia cedar posts used in building a community pasture north of Gallivan, Saskatchewan?

10. What was the cost of said cedar posts at point of delivery for use at this pasture?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Yes—Chelan.

2. Yes.

3. William Tomchuk.

4. 79,080 posts.

5. $7,626.60.

6. Yes.

7. Reserve community pasture, quarantine reserve grazing area, Govenlock, Sask. R. M. of Coalfields No. 4, community pasture, Bienfait, Sask. R. M. of Laurier No. 38, community pasture, Radville, Sask. L.I.D.'s 17 and 47, community pasture, Val Marie, Sask. R. M. of Wreford No. 280, community pasture, Nokomis, Sask. R. M. of Oakdale No. 320, community pasture, Coleville, Sask. Battle Creek diversion canal, Consul, Sask. Battle Creek west outlet canal, Consul, Sask. Davis Creek diversion canal, Robsart, Sask. East end of Cypress lake canal, Robsart, Sask. Downie & Gap Creek canal, Maple Creek, Sask., Caron canal, Riverhurst and Central Butte, Sask.

8. $10,698.98.
9. Yes.
10. $3,290.08.

TESSIER, SASK., MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Who carried the mail from Tessier post office, Saskatchewan, to station, up to November 1, 1938?
2. What was his remuneration?
3. Were there any complaints regarding this service?
4. If so, by whom?
5. Who carries the mail now?
6. What is his remuneration?
7. Upon whose recommendation was this appointment made?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Mrs. L. J. Hamilton.
2. $249.60 per annum.
3. No.
4. See answer to No. 3.
5. George G. Saunders.
6. $195 per annum.
7. Mr. W. Richardson of Rosetown.

DOMINION EXPERIMENTAL FARM DRIVEWAY

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. What was the total cost of constructing the new driveway through the dominion experimental farm?
2. What was the cost of the stone used in such construction, and from whom was it purchased?
3. What was the cost of the surfacing on this roadway?
4. Were tenders called for this construction?
5. If so, what are the names of those who tendered, and the amount of their respective tenders?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. $159,784.81.
2. $5,135.48—R. R. Foster and Sons; Fraser Duntile Co.; Laurentian Stone Co.; Wright Bros. Supply; T. S. Kirby and Co.
3. $25,500.48.
4. Yes, for surfacing material; the work of laying was done by commission's own forces.
5. O'Leary's Limited, $5.55 per ton; Standard Paving Company, $5.80 per ton; Dibblee Construction Company, $5.80 per ton.

OTTAWA DRIVEWAY — ST. PATRICK — HURDMAN BRIDGES SECTION

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. What was the cost of the new driveway between St. Patrick and Hurdman bridges along the east side of the Rideau river?
2. From whom did the government obtain the land which makes up the parkway in the above location?
3. What price was paid for the property?
4. What was the total cost of such park and driveway?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. $33,742.95 (between St. Patrick and Cummings bridges).
2. Arthur Jolicoeur, Georges Roy, Rideau View Realty Company, and Town of Eastview.
3. $30,101.00.
4. $58,742.95.

GRANTS-IN-AID TO PROVINCES

Mr. LENNARD:

What were the total amounts of grants in aid furnished the different provinces during 1938 by the federal government?

Mr. ROGERS:

Agreements entered into with the provinces under the provisions of The Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1938, provide for contribution by the dominion of the following percentages of the material aid expenditures of the province and municipalities for the fiscal year 1938-39 or the maximum amounts indicated whichever is the lesser: Prince Edward Island—30 per cent or $48,000; Nova Scotia—30 per cent or $210,000; Quebec —30 per cent or $4,800,000; Ontario—30 per cent or $5,580,000; Manitoba—35 per cent or $1,980,000; Saskatchewan—35 per cent or $2,430,000; Alberta—35 per cent or $1,500,000; British Columbia—30 per cent or $1,380,000.

Material aid is not being distributed in the province of New Brunswick and in lieu of a grant-in-aid for material aid purposes a special grant-in-aid agreement has been entered into with that province providing for a dominion contribution of $225,000 towards expenditures incurred by the province during the fiscal year 1938-39 in carrying on or assisting in carrying on certain projects and works, or 50 per cent of said expenditures whichever is the lesser.

TOURIST TRAFFIC STATISTICS

Mr. LENNARD:

How many tourists entered Canada during 1937 and 1938, respectively?

Mr. CRERAR: 1937, 18,263,400; 1938, 17,106,987.

ASSISTANCE TO WESTERN DROUGHT VICTIMS TO LOCATE IN EASTERN CANADA

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Has the government assisted families from the western burnt out areas to locate in eastern Canada?

2. If so, how many families were affected, and to what extent was aid given?

Mr. GARDINER: The answer is no.

MUENSTER, SASK., MAIL CONTRACTORS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Who are the contractors for carrying the mail on routes Nos. 1 and 2, Muenster, Saskatchewan?

2. What were the dates upon which these contracts were made or renewed?

3. What are the salaries paid to the said couriers?

4. Were tenders called last year for the position of mail courier on route No. 3, Muenster?

5. How many tenders were received?

6. By whom were they submitted, and for what amount?

7. Who was the successful tenderer, route No. 3?

8. What is his present salary?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. No. 1, Joseph Storch; No. 2, Henry Washkosky.

2. No. 1, renewed October 1, 1938. No. 2, renewed October 1, 1938.

3. No. 1, $400 per annum. No. 2, $350 per annum.

4. Yes.

5. Eight.

6. Martin Weber, Muenster, $235; Joseph H. Korte, Muenster, $240; Edward Loehr, Muenster, $244; Ervin Steffen, Muenster, $248; Gesa Szautner, Muenster, $260; Theodore Torborg, Muenster, $349; Peter Weber, Muenster, $350; Raymond Hilgers, Muenster, $365.

7. Martin Weber.

8. $235 per annum.

GRAINGER—CARBON, ALTA., MAIL CARRIER

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

1. Who is the present carrier of mail between Grainger and Carbon, Alberta?

2. What is the salary paid?

3. On what date does the present contract expire?

4. What is the mileage of this route?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Alex. Hay.

2. $898.56 per annum.

3. 30th June, 1939.

4. 12 miles each way.

[Mr. Crerar.]

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—LOANS TO MUNICIPALITIES IN QUEBEC

Mr. BRUNELLE:

1. What municipalities, in the province of Quebec, took advantage of the National Housing Act, 1938?

2. How many applications for loans under the said act were granted in each such municipality, and what was the amount of each loan?

Mr. DUNNING:

1 and 2. The National Housing Act, 1938, which repealed and reenacted the Dominion Housing Act with important amendments, was passed on July 1, 1938, but lending operations under the new Act did not begin until about August 1, 1938. The details of loans approved from August 1, 1938, to December 31, 1938, in the province of Quebec, are as follows:

Location	No. of loans	No. of family housing units provided	Amount of loan
Arvida	4	5	$ 15,920
Baie Comeau	49	51	226,671
Beauport	1	1	3,000
Beauharnois	1	1	4,000
Bromptonville	1	1	4,000
Cap de la Madeleine	3	6	11,040
Chicoutimi	1	1	8,000
Cote St. Luc	6	6	24,000
Dolbeau	1	1	2,000
Dorval	1	1	3,300
Drummondville	1	1	2,160
Giffard	2	2	7,200
Granby	2	2	4,370
Grandes Bergeronnes	5	5	9,800
Hampstead	12	40	170,030
Hudson Heights	1	1	4,700
Hull	1	2	6,200
Hull Twp	2	2	9,500
Joliette	1	1	3,800
Jonquiere	1	1	2,400
Lachine	9	9	27,680
Lachute	1	8	12,000
Longueuil	4	4	14,040
Magog	1	1	3,500
Montreal	31	159	511,280
Montreal West	1	1	3,900
Mont Laurier	1	2	3,000
Mount Royal	30	36	211,700
Outremont	5	72	236,720
Plessisville	4	4	12,400
Pointe Claire	5	5	19,960
Pointe aux Trembles	1	1	3,000

Location	No. of loans	No. of family housing units provided	Amount of loan
Quebec	7	36	$ 127,540
Rosemere	1	1	5,500
Saraguay	1	1	9,000
Senneville	1	1	8,000
Shawinigan Falls	2	4	11,500
Sherbrooke	3	5	18,900
Sillery	22	25	139,858
St. Bruno	1	1	4,000
Ste. Foy	1	1	4,540
Ste. Genevieve	1	1	8,000
St. Georges de Beauce	2	2	4,000
St. Hyacinth	4	10	17,000
St. Jerome	1	2	5,000
St. Joseph de Grantham	1	1	2,250
St Lambert	2	2	8,000
St. Laurent	2	2	7,000
Strathmore	1	1	3,800
Three Rivers	2	2	8,000
Vaudreuil	1	1	4,000
Verdun	3	3	10,880
Ville St. Pierre	6	6	23,500
Westmount	1	1	15,000
Windsor	1	2	3,000
	256	544	$ 2,029,539

The details of loans approved in the province of Quebec to December 31, 1938, under the National Housing Act, 1938, and its predecessor act, are as follows:

Location	No. of loans	No. of family housing units provided	Amount of loan
Arvida	5	6	$ 20,420
Baie Comeau	104	106	417,180
Baie D'Urfe	2	2	9,150
Beauport	1	1	3,000
Beauharnois	1	1	4,000
Bromptonville	1	1	4,000
Cap de la Madeliene	3	6	11,040
Chicoutimi	1	2	8,000
Cote St. Luc	20	37	158,050
Dolbeau	1	1	2,000
Dorval	5	5	21,000
Drummondville	1	1	2,160
Giffard	2	2	7,200
Granby	2	2	4,370
Grandes Bergeronnes	5	5	9,800
Hampstead	61	137	$ 669,316
Hudson	1	1	3,500
Hudson Heights	3	3	12,700
Hull	1	2	6,200
Hull Twp	2	2	9,500
Iberville	1	1	7,700
Joliette	1	1	3,800
Jonquiere	1	1	2,400
Lachine	20	20	71,630
Lachute	2	14	24,000
Longueuil	5	5	17,040
Magog	1	1	3,500
Montreal	242	664	2,599,032
Montreal East	1	1	4,000
Montreal West	4	20	70,600
Mont Laurier	1	2	3,000
Mount Royal	148	219	1,223,881
Noranda	1	2	4,800
North Hatley	1	1	2,750
Outremont	57	221	956,960
Plessisville	4	4	12,400
Pointe Claire	21	22	79,276
Pointe Aux Trembles	1	1	3,000
Quebec	12	52	196,370
Rosemere	1	1	5,500
Saraguay	1	1	9,000
Senneville	3	3	22,250
Shawinigan Falls	3	5	19,000
Sherbrooke	8	18	65,028
Sillery	62	66	368,356
St. Bruno	1	1	4,000
Ste. Foy	3	3	19,757
Ste. Genevieve	1	1	8,000
St. Georges de Beauce	2	2	4,000
St Hilaire	1	1	5,000
St. Hyacinthe	4	10	17,000
St. Jerome	1	2	5,000
St. Johns	2	2	9,200
St. Joseph de Grantham	1	1	2,250
St. Lambert	4	4	16,000
St. Laurent	9	10	44,000
Ste. Rose	1	1	3,500
Strathmore	1	1	3,800
Three Rivers	2	2	8,000
Valois	6	6	22,440
Vaudreuil	1	1	4,000
Verdun	6	7	28,580
Ville St. Pierre	7	7	27,350
Westmount	11	11	128,725
Windsor	1	2	3,000
	889	1,744	$7,521,461

GRADING OF HOGS

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. How many official grades of live hogs are marketed in the abattoirs and stockyards of Canada?

2. What are the customary or official differential given or deducted for each grade?

3. From which grade of live hogs is each grade of Canadian Wiltshire sides as marketed in Great Britain manufactured?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Nine.

2. An official differential applies as between the bacon and the select grades, a $1 per head premium being paid on the latter. Differentials betwen grades other than selects and bacons are not official; they may be subject to change when the relative volume and percentage of such grades show substantial increases or decreases, and such differentials differ as between one market and another. The present differentials at Toronto are: butchers, $1.25 per head; lights, open; heavies, $2.50 per head; extra heavies, $1.50 to $2 per hundred pounds. These prices from the basic "bacon" grade.

3. Selects and bacons.

GRADING OF HAMS AND BACON

Mr. SENN:

1. How many grades or classifications of Canadian Wiltshire sides are shipped to the British market?

2. What percentage of our total shipments to Great Britain fell within each of the above grades or classifications?

3. What was the average price per pound realized for each grade or classification in the year 1938?

4. How many pounds of Canadian hams were shipped to Great Britain in 1938?

5. What was the average price per pound in the said year?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Six; with six weight divisions within each.

2. A1-47·8 per cent; A2-28·3 per cent; A3-14·3 per cent; B1-6·1 per cent; B2-2·5 per cent; B3-1·0 per cent.

3. Not available.

4. 33,613,012 pounds.

5. Average of weekly price for year £97 4s. per 112 lb.

CHURCHILL HARBOUR—IMPROVEMENT AND MAINTENANCE

Mr. PERLEY:

Was any portion of the vote passed in the estimates for improvements and maintenance of the harbour at the port of Churchill for the years 1937-38 not allocated? If not, why?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. HOWE:

The following information furnished by the National Harbours Board:

Amount voted for Churchill harbour in estimates for 1937-38: (a) Capital, $10,000; (b) Deficit, $242,000. Work provided under item (a) Carried out; (b) Actual deficit realized $140,889. Difference between latter figure and amount voted represents expenditures not required or deferred in view of restricted operations owing to short crop.

BESSBOROUGH HOTEL, SASKATOON

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley):

What was the total cost of the Bessborough hotel in the city of Saskatoon, including: (a) the cost of the site; (b) the cost of constructing the building; (c) the cost of the furnishings and equipment?

2. What were the gross receipts of the said hotel for the year 1937, and the year 1938, and what were the gross expenditures for operation, including salaries for the manager, assistants and staff?

Mr. HOWE:

1. As at December 31, 1938: (a) $130,188.76; (b) $3,036,304.93; (c) $400,965.93. Total, $3,567,459.62.

2. Gross receipts, 1937, $226,819.83; gross receipts, 1938, $224,206.88. Gross operating expenses, 1937, $244,951.11; gross operating expenses, 1938, $246,970.60. Operating deficit, 1937, $18,131.28; operating deficit, 1938, $22,763.72.

CANADIAN NATIONALS—PARTICIPATION IN SPANISH WAR

Mr. HURTUBISE:

1. Is the government aware of the fact that Canadian nationals have participated in the Spanish war?

2. Did the said Canadian nationals need permission from the Canadian government to enlist for said war?

3. If so, was any permission given to said Canadian nationals by the Canadian government to enlist for the said war?

4. If so, on what basis was permission granted?

5. If not, on what basis was permission refused?

6. How many joined: (a) with the Negrin forces; (b) with the Franco forces?

7. What help, if any, was given by the Canadian government to facilitate the movement of the said nationals to Spanish territory?

8. What help, if any, was given by the Canadian government to facilitate the movement of the said nationals back to Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Yes.

2. In July, 1937, the Foreign Enlistment Act, making it unlawful for Canadian nationals to enlist in the service of foreign countries, under certain conditions, was made applicable to Spain.

3. No permission was given.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Answered by No. 2.

6. No definite information.

7. None.

8. Following upon the decision of the Spanish government to return all foreign volunteers in its ranks, under supervision of a League of Nations committee, the Canadian government was asked by the non-intervention committee, through the British foreign office, to join with the European members of that committee in assisting repatriation. In order to determine promptly in each case the question of re-admissibility of volunteers to Canada as non-immigrants under the Canadian Immigration Act, the Canadian government through officials of the immigration department, undertook the examination in Spain and France of all volunteers who presented themselves for examination before sailing, but they declined to join members of the non-intervention committee in furnishing financial assistance for transportation or other purposes.

NON-IMMIGRANTS—PASSAGE OF THROUGH CANADA

Mr. PARENT (Quebec West and South):

1. How many emigrants of Hebrew, or other racial origins, landed at Halifax on their way to Australia during 1937, 1938, and 1939, to date?

2. How many of such emigrants sailed from Vancouver harbour on the way to Australia?

3. Was there a difference in number between those who landed at Halifax and those who sailed from Vancouver?

4. If so, were any searches undertaken to locate such missing emigrants?

5. Did the government confiscate the cash guarantee covering the passage of each such missing emigrant through Canada?

6. If such confiscation was made, what was the amount?

Mr. CRERAR:

1, 2, 3, 4. Immigration statistics are not kept in such a way as to provide answers to these questions. For many years non-immigrants, to which class transit passengers belong, have passed through Canada in transit to the United States, Australia, New Zealand, India, Japan, China and other parts of the Far East. We have no reason to suspect that any of the immigrants mentioned in Question 1 have remained in Canada. Care has always been taken to see that these have transportation and documents which will ensure their being able to reach their destinations. Whenever circumstances have arisen that might indicate an attempt to use the transit privilege as a means of remaining in Canada, steps have been taken to prevent that occurring. In 1924 an attempt was made by some Southern Europeans to effect illegal entry to Canada by declaring themselves to be en route to Australia. This movement was discovered in its early stages and those guilty were deported.

5. Cash guarantees or bonds are not taken in the case of persons in transit.

6. Answered by No. 5.

ROLLING HILLS IRRIGATION DISTRICT, ALTA.

Mr. QUELCH:

How many families: (a) from Alberta; (b) from Saskatchewan, have been selected for settlement in the Rolling Hills area of the eastern irrigation district, in southern Alberta?

Mr. GARDINER: (a) None; (b) 35.

MR. JUSTICE TILLEY

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. Has the government taken cognizance of the following news item in the Toronto evening Telegram of December 1, referring to Justice Tilley who, speaking at a St. Andrew's banquet, said: "Are we satisfied to let Great Britain and the United States protect us in case of trouble? I say we're not. Let us cut out politics altogether and be nationalists and imperialists and Scot, Irishman and Englishman, all stand on guard for the British empire! . . . We would form a labour battalion and set the young Canadians at work building fortifications on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts!"

2. Is a judge allowed to participate in a discussion of controversial political issues?

3. What action does the government intend to take in the matter?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I answer this verbally. To the first question the answer is yes; to the second the answer is no, and to the third the answer is that the Department of Justice will bring the remarks attributed to Mr. Justice Tilley to his attention and ask him for an expression of his views as to the propriety of his making such remarks, having regard to the judicial position he occupies.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—COMPETITIVE BIDS FOR MACHINERY

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale):

What means were used to obtain competitive bids in the purchase of machinery, parts and material by the Department of National Defence during the past three years?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): For many years, the departmental practice has been to invite bids direct from prospective tenderers. To this practice, there has been introduced during the last three years, the advertising in the public press of invitations to tender on the more important requirements of the department.

ROYAL VISIT TO CANADA—COMMEMORATIVE STAMPS

Mr. REID:

1. Will the Post Office Department issue special stamps commemorating the visit of their majesties to Canada?

2. If so, what denomination of issue are being considered?

3. When is it expected that the stamps will be available to the general public?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Yes.

2. 1-cent, 2-cents, and 3-cents.

3. At the time of the royal visit, the exact date to be announced later.

VANCOUVER, B.C., POST OFFICE—EMPLOYMENT OF RETURNED SOLDIERS DURING CHRISTMAS SEASON

Mr. GREEN:

1. How many returned soldiers were employed by the Vancouver post office for special work during the Christmas season, 1938?

2. What number of the soldiers so employed served with the Canadian forces during the great war?

3. What number served with the imperial forces?

4. How many of such returned soldiers were employed through the Vancouver honorary committee of the veterans' assistance commission?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. 337.

2 and 3. No information.

4. 201.

IMMIGRATION, 1938—RACIAL ORIGINS

Mr. REID:

1. What was the total immigration into Canada during the calendar year 1938, with regard to: (a) the countries; (b) the nationalities of all immigrants so entering during the said year?

2. Were any representations made to allow refugees from European countries to enter Canada without the said refugees having to comply with the regulations of the Immigration Act?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Statement attached. Information not available in form desired.

2. Many applications have been received in the immigration branch for the admission of refugees unable to comply with the immigration regulations.

Immigration to Canada, by racial origin, for the calendar year 1938;

	Via Ocean Ports	From U.S.A.	Totals
Albanian	10	..	10
Arabian	3	2	5
Armenian	4	2	6
Belgian	177	22	199
Bohemian	..	10	10
British—
English	2,257	1,906	4,163
Irish	398	732	1,130
Scotch	659	706	1,365
Welsh	75	55	130
Bulgarian	25	1	26
Croatian	283	4	287
Czech	170	2	172
Dalmatian	1	..	1
Dutch	200	136	336
East Indian	9	..	9
Esthonian	9	..	9
Finnish	67	14	81
French	139	910	1,049
German	588	514	1,102
Greek	121	9	130
Hebrew	456	292	748
Italian	367	61	428
Japanese	57	..	57
Jugo-Slav	221	4	225
Lettish	6	..	6
Lithuanian	39	8	47
Magyar	596	21	617
Maltese	1	5	6
Mexican	2	..	2
Montenegrin	8	..	8
Moravian	9	..	9
Negro	5	22	27
North American Indian	..	9	9
Polish	570	63	633
Portugese	1	2	3
Roumanian	109	4	113
Russian	151	14	165
Ruthenian	1,880	25	1,905
Scandinavian—
Danish	45	35	80
Icelandic	..	10	10
Norwegian	28	91	119
Swedish	18	98	116
Serbian	63	8	71
Slovak	1,505	18	1,523
Spanish	7	2	9
Swiss	50	8	58
Syrian	22	8	30
Total	11,411	5,833	17,244

BAYFIELD, ONT., RADIO RECEPTION

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Have any complaints been received by the Department of Transport, and/or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, regarding radio reception in the village of Bayfield, Ontario?
2. If so, what steps have been taken to rectify the difficulties?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No complaints of interference have been received by the Department of Transport from the village of Bayfield, Ontario, since May, 1938.

2. Investigation showed that complaint to be due to a fault in the broadcast listener's receiver, which was repaired by owner.

AIR DEFENCE EQUIPMENT

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. What is the number of modern fighting planes equipped with the latest fighting equipment and with a cruising speed of 250 miles per hour or more in Canada?
2. What anti-aircraft equipment of the latest type have we in Canada?
3. What anti-aircraft equipment of the latest device is on order, if any?
4. What steps are proposed to be taken, if any, to equip strategic points in Canada with anti-aircraft defences?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is the considered judgment of the government that it is not in the public interest to answer the question as asked.

PRINTING OF SPEECHES OF PRIME MINISTER AND MEMBERS OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. RINFRET: Mr. Speaker, a question put by the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor) was incompletely answered on February 3, 1939, and appears in Hansard No. 17 at page 687. This additional information from the Department of Mines and Resources completes the answer to the question.

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Did the king's printer print and/or distribute copies of speeches delivered by the Prime Minister: (a) on July 19, 1937, on his return from his majesty's coronation, entitled "Crown and Commonwealth"; (b) on July 30, 1938, at the Canadian Corps reunion in Toronto, entitled "The Struggle for Enduring Peace"?
2. If so, what was the cost of printing each of these speeches?
3. Were any copies of these speeches ordered from the king's printer by: (a) the Prime Minister; (b) the National Liberal Federation; (c) Senator Norman Lambert, or any other official of the National Liberal Federation?
4. If so, how many copies were ordered, and how much was paid to the king's printer or the receiver general for them?
5. Have any other speeches delivered by the Prime Minister or by any member of the government outside the House of Commons been printed by the king's printer?

Department of Mines and Resources:

1, 2, 3 and 4. No information.

5. Yes.

The addresses delivered by the Minister of Mines and Resources through the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation dealt with the present and potential value and development of Canada's mineral, forest, recreational, water power, and other resources; also with the Indians of Canada.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADA'S TRADE FOR 1938

Mr. TREMBLAY:

1. What was the total trade of Canada for the year 1938?
2. What is the amount of Canada's trade with each of the countries of the world for the same year?

EMPIRE EXHIBITION AT GLASGOW—COST OF CANADA'S EXHIBIT

Mr. HAYHURST:

1. What is the total cost to Canada of our part in the empire exhibition at Glasgow in 1938?
2. How many people were employed in the Canada building at the empire exhibition: (a) in the capacity of advertising or explaining the exhibits; (b) in any other capacity?
3. What salaries were paid to these employees?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—MONTREAL TERMINAL

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government given its consent to the proposed completion of the new Montreal terminal of the Canadian National railway? If so, at what cost, and on whose recommendation was the work asked for and started?
2. Will any plan of the said work be tabled together with the reports relating thereto?
3. Was parliament asked to sanction said work, and, if so, when?
4. Is the work to aid relief and relief unemployment?
5. Did the government meet the corporation of the city of Montreal, or others, on the subject?
6. Does the province of Quebec contribute anything to the cost of the work, or were they asked under relief and municipal assistance legislation to sanction or aid said work?

7. What sums have already been spent on this work, and by whose authority?

8. Has the Board of Transport for Canada been asked to sanction such expenditures or report on them or their necessity as recommended by: (a) Drayton Ackworth; (b) the Duff report on railways?

9. Will the cost of said work be raised by taxation from income or capital, or will it be raised from income from sales or income tax, or will part of it be raised for relief works by the government?

10. What efforts were made at coordination or to eliminate deficits before such work was started?

11. Have any objections to such work been received, and, if so, from whom?

12. Will any reports on relief or the necessity of relief works of this kind be tabled, and will other cities receive similar aid of unemployment relief works and be heard direct by the government instead of being directed to the provinces under the municipal assistance relief legislation?

13. What reports are in existence as to the financial, economic and engineering features of the work?

14. Will preference be given to Canadian labour and Canadian industries in its construction?

15. What other purely municipal relief undertakings and works in Montreal have been undertaken by the government either alone or in conjunction with the province for the last three years of record?

16. Does the action taken, or to be undertaken, now supplement the provisions made by the honourable the Ministers of Public Works and Secretary of State during the winter of 1938 in Montreal?

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT—COMMUNITY PASTURES IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. LOCKHART:

Under the provisions of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act—1. Have any community pastures been established in the vicinity of Govenlock, Saskatchewan?

2. If so, what is the total acreage?

3. If lands were acquired which were held under lease, what were: (a) the name or names of the leaseholders; (b) the dates the leases expired; (c) the dates when these leased properties were taken over?

4. Were any of the fences erected on the leased property by the leaseholders removed before the expiration date of the lease?

5. Has any compensation for the fencing removed been paid to any leaseholder?

6. If not, why?

7. Was any of the original fencing used to refence the property?

8. If not, why?

9. Was the refencing done by contract?

10. If so, what were: (a) the names of the contractors; (b) the amount of each contract; (c) the cost per mile for the refencing?

[Mr. Church.]

PRAIRIE RELIEF—PURCHASES OF FEED IN MONTANA AND OTHER STATES

Mr. PERLEY:

What amount of money, if any, was spent by the federal government for food, fodder and hay in Montana or other states of the union, for relief of stock in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta during the years 1937 and 1938?

HON J. L. RALSTON

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Has the Honourable J. L. Ralston been employed as counsel for the federal government on any commission or commissions since 1935?

2. If so, on what commission or commissions?

3. What remuneration did he receive in each case: (a) fee per day; (b) expenses and allowances; (c) total?

4. Is any amount still due him from the government?

5. If so, how much?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled.

INSURANCE STATISTICS

Mr. LANDERYOU:

1. What amount of insurance was in force in Canada in each of the last ten years under the following categories: (a) accident, including personal accident, employers' and property liability and accidental damage to personal property; (b) sickness; (c) falling aircraft; (d) earthquake; (e) aviation; (f) burglary; (g) explosion; (h) forgery; (i) fraud; (j) credit; (k) guarantee; (l) hail; (m) inland transportation; (n) live stock; (o) machinery; (p) personal property; (q) plate glass; (r) property; (s) sprinkler leakage; (t) steam boiler; (u) title; (v) tornado; (w) weather insurance; (x) any others?

2. What amount of this insurance for each of these categories was written by: (a) British companies; (b) foreign companies; (c) Canadian companies, for each of the last ten years?

3. What was the total amount of premiums in respect to the above insurances collected by each of these companies (British, foreign, Canadian) during each of the past ten years?

4. What was the total amount of net losses, including adjustment expenses in respect to the above insurances, sustained respectively in each of these categories by British, foreign and Canadian companies during each of the past ten years?

5. Can complete information on the above questions be obtained in any reports or publications prepared by the superintendent of insurance for the Dominion of Canada? If not, why is such information not available?

6. What was the total amount of taxes, licence fees, or other fees collected by the government of Canada or the provinces of Canada from the above companies during each of the past ten years?

Mr. LANDERYOU:

1. How many Canadian, British and foreign companies have been doing fire, life and automobile insurance in Canada under dominion licence during each of the past ten years?

2. What was the total amount of deposit by each of these companies held by the Dominion government and applicable to fire, life and automobile insurance, respectively, during the past ten years?

3. What was the total income to Canadian, British and foreign companies, respectively, from securities on deposit for each of the past ten years?

4. What was the total investment by Canadian, British and foreign companies, respectively, not including the deposit held by the government, for each of the past ten years?

5. What was the total iincome derived by each of such companies from above investments for each of the past ten years?

6. What was the total amount of fire, life and automobile insurance in force with each of these companies during each of the past ten years?

7. What amount of this insurance was in force with Canadian, British and foreign companies, respectively, who are listed as joint stock companies, reciprocal exchanges or other mutuals, during each of the said years?

8. What was the total gross premium income of each of these companies during each of the past ten years?

9. What was the total net premium income of each of these companies during each of the said years?

10. What were the total fire, life and automobile losses, including adjustment expenses, of each of these companies during each of the above years?

11. What were the total adjustment expenses of each of these companies during each of the past ten years?

12. What do such adjustment expenses consist of?

13. Do any of such companies conduct such insurance business in Canada without dominion licence?

14. What was the total amount of taxes, licence fees or other fees collected by the government of Canada, or the provinces of Canada, from each of these groups of insurance companies during the past ten years?

15. What were the actual salaries paid to the chief agents and other executives of these companies in Canada for each of the past ten years?

16. Is it possible to obtain the above information in any reports or publications prepared by the superintendent of insurance for the Dominion of Canada?

17. If not, why is such information not available?

GOVERNMENT PAYMENTS TO RAILWAY AND TELEGRAPH COMPANIES

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. What was the total amount paid by each department during the last fiscal year to: (a) the Canadian National railway; (b) the Canadian Pacific railway, for transportation, including sleeping car accommodation, parlour cars and special cars?

2. What was the total amount paid by each department during the last fiscal year to: (a) Canadian National telegraphs; (b) Canadian Pacific telegraphs?

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT—PURCHASES OF CRESTED WHEAT GRASS SEED

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. How many pounds of crested wheat grass seed were purchased under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act for 1938 fall seeding?

2. From whom was it purchased?

3. What was the date or dates of purchase?

4. What price or prices per pound were paid for this seed?

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION—REAL ESTATE PURCHASES

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. From whom did the federal district commission purchase lands for park purposes since its inception, and what prices were paid for same?

2. Have the federal district commission taken steps to secure the property of the Good Shepherd's convent, St. Andrew street, facing the river and adjacent to the park east of the Minto bridges?

3. What became of the lumber or building material from the buildings in Rockcliffe when the old buildings were demolished, and what price was paid for same?

4. Who secured the contract for demolishing these buildings, and when was this work completed?

5. Is the contractor still on the payroll of the government? If not, when was he relieved of his duties?

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BOARD STATISTICS

Mr. REID:

1. What were the number of applications made in each province during 1938 for loans under the Canadian farm loan board?

2. How many applications for loans were granted in each province for the year 1938, and what was the total amount of the loans granted in each province for 1938?

3. What is the total number of loans now in effect in each province, and what are the total amounts of loans outstanding in each province?

4. What amounts of money were collected in each province by the various branch offices of the Canadian farm loan board during 1938?

5. What are the numbers of employees engaged in each of the branch offices, and what remuneration is paid to each branch manager?

Mr. DUNNING: Return tabled.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN RECOGNIZED TRADES

Mr. LENNARD:

What effort was put forward by the Department of Labour to lessen unemployment in the different recognized trades during 1938?

Mr. ROGERS: Return tabled.

ADVERTISING AGENCIES EMPLOYED BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. CASSELMAN:

1. How many advertising agencies were employed by the different departments of the government during the year 1938?
2. What are the names of such advertising agencies?
3. What amounts have been paid to each?

DROUGHT RELIEF—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. QUELCH:

1. How many municipalities in Saskatchewan are getting federal drought relief?
2. What are their names?
3. What has the average yield and grade of wheat been in each of these municipalities during each of the past five years?

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE—PURCHASES OF MACHINERY

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale):

1. What was the value of machinery, parts and material purchased by the Department of National Defence directly from manufacturers in Canada during the years 1936, 1937, and 1938 respectively?
2. What was the value of machinery, parts and material purchased by the Department of National Defence from agents and jobbers during the same period?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This will be an order for return, but I point out that it will take a long time. There are thousands of orders to be investigated. I would be very grateful to the hon. member who asked the question if he would indicate what he means by the word "machinery." With this reservation I shall be glad to have the order passed.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE—IMPORTATIONS OF MACHINERY

Mr. LENNARD:

1. What was the value of machinery, parts and material imported by the Department of National Defence from the United States during the years 1936, 1937, and 1938 respectively?
2. What was the value of machinery, parts and material imported by the Department of National Defence from other countries during the same period?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Order for return, with the reservation indicated in regard to the previous question about purchases of machinery.

[Mr. Dunning.]

TORONTO POST OFFICE—TEMPORARY CHRISTMAS EMPLOYEES

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale):

1. How many temporary post office employees were engaged by the Post Office Department during the 1938 Christmas season in the city of Toronto?
2. What are the names and addresses of all such employees?
3. How many were returned soldiers?

EXTERNAL TRADE OF CANADA

Mr. VIEN:

1. What was the amount of external trade of Canada for each year from 1908 to 1938 inclusive, giving: (a) imports from each country; (b) exports to each country; (c) total trade with all countries; (d) balance of trade with each country; (e) total balance of trade with all countries?
2. What was, during the same period, at the end of each fiscal year, the amount of the gross and net national debt?
3. What was, during the same period, the total amount of revenues and expenditures, ordinary and extraordinary, giving amount of surplus or deficit?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MANITOU BEACH, SASK., BROADCASTING STATION

Mr. FLEMING:

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, specifications and other documents in the possession of the government with respect to the building of a broadcasting station at Manitou beach, Saskatchewan.

Mr. HOWE: I may say that the documents asked for are very voluminous indeed. The broadcasting corporation have no objection to bringing them down as soon as they can be typed, but it will be a very long process.

CANADA-UNITED STATES-GREAT BRITAIN TRADE AGREEMENT—CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

For a copy of all correspondence, papers, letters and telegrams exchanged during the years 1937 and 1938, between the honourable the Minister of Finance or his department, or any officer thereof, and all industries or commercial companies or organizations or labour organizations, in respect to requests for hearings in connection with the trade treaties between Canada, the United States of America and Great Britain.

Mr. DUNNING: I had a word with the hon. member in respect to this matter. In its present form the question will involve searching through possibly some five or six thousand documents and copying them all. He can get the information from the department, and if he finds in attempting to do so that he does not get just what he requires I would ask him to consider putting the resolution on the order paper again in another form which may be more easily complied with. I think the motion should be dropped.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—MONTREAL TERMINAL

Mr. CHURCH.

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports and other documents exchanged between the dominion government and the Canadian National railway and the city of Montreal and any other person or persons relating to the proposed $12,600,000 new Canadian National railway terminal, and also copy of list of contracts already awarded in relation thereto.

APPLE TREE COVE, LUNENBURG COUNTY, N.S.

Mr. BROOKS:

For a return showing, in detail, all moneys expended at Apple Tree cove, Lunenburg county, Nova Scotia, during the calendar years 1937 and 1938, including therein the names of foremen and workmen employed and the respective amounts paid to each, and the names of all persons from whom materials were purchased and the respective amounts paid to each.

EATONSVILLE, N.S., DAM

Mr. BROOKS:

For a copy of all payrolls in connection with the construction of dam, etc., at Eatonsville, Cumberland county, Nova Scotia, under the foremanship of Arthur McWharter.

WEST ADVOCATE, N.S., BEACH PROTECTION

Mr. BROOKS:

For a copy of all payrolls and accounts in connection with work to protect beach at West Advocate, Cumberland county, Nova Scotia, under the foremanship of Carl Knowlton, during the year 1938.

HIGHLAND NATIONAL PARK, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. BROOKS:

For a return showing all contracts in connection with the Highland national park, Nova Scotia, giving particulars: (a) to whom awarded; (b) amount of tenders; (c) expenditures in 1937; (d) expenditures in 1938.

DOMINION LOANS, 1938

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley):

For a return showing, in detail:

1. How many loans were redeemed, and how many refunded during the year 1938 in: (a) New York; (b) London.
2. Whether there was a forty million dollar refunding loan obtained in New York during November, 1938.
3. Whether this liquidated an internal or external debt.
4. Where the debt was held, and by whom.
5. Why the loan was not floated in Canada.
6. Whether it was offered in Canada.
7. What the total cost was for: (a) discount and commissions; (b) travelling expenses; (c) printing and stationery; (d) engraving; (e) fee for listing issue on the New York stock exchange; (f) postage and insurance; (g) exchange fees; (h) service of armoured car; (i) service of signagraph; (j) printing of listing application; (k) express and sundries; (l) interest yield; (m) gross percentage cost.
8. What the gross amount paid by us will be when the loan reaches maturity in thirty years.
9. What the net credit available was at the time of refunding for application on the issue liquidated.

ALBERTA DROUGHT AREAS—RELIEF

Mr. QUELCH:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters and telegrams exchanged during the months of September, October, November and December, 1938, and January, 1939, between the honourable the Minister of Agriculture, or his deputy, and the Minister of Health, of Alberta, in respect to the responsibility for relief in the drought areas of Alberta.

MILITARY DISTRICT NO. 10—SUPPLY OF BEEF, 1930-38

Mr. STEVENS:

For a statement showing the names of the firms requested to tender for the supply of beef to military district No. 10 during the years 1930 to 1938 inclusive and a statement showing what firm or firms received the contract and how much was the total amount paid in each year to the successful bidder or bidders.

CHILLED BEEF SHIPMENTS TO GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of the order in council and regulations of the agriculture department dealing with the experimental shipments of chilled beef to Great Britain; also a statement showing a list of meat packers making shipments and a copy of the contract or agreement between the government of Canada and such packers. Also a statement showing the quantity of chilled beef shipped, the date of shipment, the port of shipment, the price paid for the beef to the shipper and the price realized and the proportion paid by the government, if any, on each shipment.

WASHABUCK CENTRE, N.S., WHARF

Mr. STEVENS:

For a return showing the total amount expended on repairs to the government wharf at Washabuck Centre, Victoria county, North Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, during the year 1938 and up to the 1st of February, 1939, and more particularly showing the amount paid for labour remuneration of the foreman in charge and the cost of the materials used.

A CANADIAN FLAG

PROPOSAL FOR ADOPTION OF A FLAG SYMBOLIC OF CANADA AND HER PARTNERSHIP IN THE BRITISH EMPIRE

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, a special select committee be appointed for the purpose of considering the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag, representing Canada as a whole, thereby symbolizing the dominion as an equality partner in the commonwealth of British nations.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution advocating or sponsoring a distinctive flag for Canada, our dominion of "The North," our homeland, the senior equality partner in the British commonwealth of nations. The resolution speaks for itself and should appeal to every red-blooded Canadian and Britisher sitting in this national forum. Structurally the resolution is but a single sentence, so simple, so plain, so concrete and so positive that he who runs may read and understand.

This resolution may be looked at from two angles of reality: first, the thought or subject matter of the resolution; second, the external form which that thought should take. In other words the resolution has two sides, the one the thought or subjective side and the other the language or objective side. That has been the case all through the centuries with regard to any branch of art. Throughout the years, the great problem with regard to art has been to muster into the realm of time and space some great thought and then to objectify or clothe that thought in some simple, beautiful and enduring form. That is the problem before this house, in a heraldic way, in regard to a distinctive national flag. First, we must satisfy ourselves with regard to the subject matter or thought of the resolution and the principle behind it; then we must objectify that thought in such a way that we will evolve a distinctive flag that will be an honour to Canada at home, on the continent and beyond the seven seas.

It will be noticed, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution is in the singular number. That means that it deals only with a flag ashore, a flag on land that will symbolize Canada from ocean to ocean, from the great lakes and the St. Lawrence to the Arctic seas. The flag will have to symbolize the oneness of Canada, the integrity of this country in a territorial way, rather than any particular part or portion of it. It should not be a flag symbolic of the maritimes, the central provinces, western Canada or British Columbia but rather a flag that will express the sovereignty of the Canadian people.

In that connection may I also direct attention to the fact that the resolution does not deal with design. That matter was debated and discussed in this house last year and I would think it was practically settled that the question of design should be taken up in committee where time could be devoted to it and, as I believe, the problem could be quite readily solved.

It will be seen that the resolution points in clear and definite directions. First, the opinion of the house should be obtained on this important question. Second, this opinion should be obtained by a special select committee. Third, that committee should consider the advisability of adopting a distinctive flag. Fourth, that flag when evolved should represent all Canada; and fifth, that flag should also symbolize the equality partnership between Canada and the motherland.

Last year in the debate one hon. member who took part put forth the argument that the last two parts of the resolution were surplus material. I would say the last two parts of the resolution are not surplusage, and that they point in definite directions, first, as I have indicated, that the flag should symbolize all Canada, not only a part of it, and, second, that it should symbolize the equality of partnership between Canada and the motherland.

That, to my mind, Mr. Speaker, is important, because it clarifies the resolution and deals also with the thought that the two most important things to be symbolized are, first, the sovereignty of Canada as a nation and second, the fact that that sovereignty rests within the ambit of the British empire.

We have those who, taking their stand on the resolution, really and sincerely accept it. They accept it as the basis of any discussion dealing with a distinctive national flag. In my humble opinion, then, they who unreservedly endorse the resolution take the pathway leading to national hope, national faith, national cooperation, national unity, complete self-government, national vision, national equality, national cordiality and national light. But we have a group who say, "We are not going to accept that resolution. We are not going to take that pathway to nationhood. We are not going to take that pathway to the sovereignty of the Canadian people. We are not going to have our nationhood symbolized at home, on this continent or before the world." Therefore, for those who take that stand we would have to have the resolution rewritten. We would have to have it paraphrased in a negative sense. Then the resolution would read:

> That, in the opinion of this house, a special select committee be not set up to consider the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag, representing Canada as a whole, thereby symbolizing the dominion as an equality partner in the commonwealth of British nations.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, these oppositionists do not take the pathway to national hope, the pathway which leads to national faith, national cooperation or national unity—not to self-government or to national sovereignty, but a pathway along which Canadian destiny must assume a position of national inferiority, national suppression, national subordination of imperial ascendancy, that is a pathway of fear, despair, defeatism and darkness—yes, darkness. That is the position exactly.

But we have another group who say, "Well, we are not quite ready for a national flag yet. We are not opposed to it, in reality, but we belong to a group who say 'Now is not the proper time to deal with this question. Leave it off to a more propitious season.'" The viewpoint of that group would have to be epitomized before parliament and the country by adding another paragraph to the resolution before the house, reading something like this:

> And be it further resolved that in the opinion of this house the present is not the opportune time to consider the advisability of a distinctive Canadian flag, but that the matter should be left to a more favourable season, considering the serious conditions nationally and internationally prevailing.

There we have the three groups. But I have no hesitation in saying that the last group belongs to the second group, is within that category, and that, therefore, in reality we have only two groups with regard to this national question,—No. 1, those who are for it, and No. 2, those who are opposed to it. The words of the great poet Lowell come to my mind when I consider those two viewpoints:

> Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
> In the strife of Truth with Falsehood, for the good or evil side;
> Some great cause, the new Messiah, offering each the bloom or blight,
> Parts the goats upon the left hand, and the sheep upon the right,
> And the choice goes on forever 'twixt that darkness and that light.

May I ask then, Mr. Speaker, on which pathway of nationhood do hon. members take their stand? Are they going to take the stand along the pathway that leads straight to national sovereignty, to a full and free national life, or are they going to follow the opposite pathway, namely the road to national defeatism, sixteenth century colonialism and national darkness? That is the position in a nutshell.

Now, may I proceed from that point. It might be asked: For what does a distinctive flag for Canada stand? Well, the answer would be along the following lines: A distinctive flag for Canada would stand for individual freedom, national freedom, empire fellowship, consolidation of empire bonds, national unity, the rallying force in the defence of the nation in times of emergency, the common sentiment of the Canadian people, our past history, our past resolutions, our past achievements, the ideals that have made us national in the past, and ideals which will lead us to overcoming all that is ignoble, untrue, and all which is of a defeatist nature in the days to come. It would also exemplify the coronation oath which in 1937 was taken by his majesty, as king of Canada. That coronation oath was in harmony with the laws and customs of Canada. It is as follows:

> Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the peoples of Great Britain, Ireland, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa, of your possessions and the other territories to any of them belonging or pertaining, and of your empire of India, according to their respective laws and customs?

The answer was, yes.

Our national flag would stand for that epoch making event in the history of Canada and the empire. Further it would stand for equality of Canada with the motherland, and the upbuilding of the commonwealth of nations. Next it would stand for the statute of Westminster of 1931 by which Canada was designated not as a colony but as a sovereign nation within the ambit of the British empire. It would stand also for our devotion to Canada, our national advancement, our national pride, honour and glory.

Further, it would stand for the vicissitudes and upheavals from which we as a people have emerged prior to and subsequent to confederation in 1867. It would stand for the stirring history of centuries when early Canada was under the influence and sovereignty of imperial France, and when in navigation, exploration, discovery and colonization the foundation work of the Canada-to-be was grappled with in a spirit of unparalleled courage and devotion.

It would stand for the institutions of representative and responsible government, as factors in the democratic development of the country internally, imperially and internationally. It would stand for the Canadian people, their aspirations and visions of continental and world greatness. It would stand for the crown and the laws that bind us by golden chains in allegiance to the throne of Britain. It would stand for that spirit of sacrifice and service which in the late great war brought so many of our men to national consciousness and manhood, and caused so many of them to express a sincere desire for a nationally distinctive emblem.

Lastly, it will stand for the further sacrifices comparable with anything in the way of sacrifice in the history of pioneers; sacrifices of the intrepid missionaries and martyrs of Canadian history, the mutual sacrifice, courage, cooperation, service, forbearance, devotion and Canadian and British comradeship which must characterize us as a people if we are to aspire to and attain the great objectives placed within our reach by a thoughtful and beneficent providence.

Those are some of the things for which a national flag would stand. And I am sure that when we look at any one of them we will see an argument which should lead the Canadian people resolutely to take up this question and have it solved in the interests of one and all. May I go on from that point to the story concerning the movement for a distinctive flag, from the time of confederation to the present time? In 1867 we launched a young dominion upon the tempestuous seas of national life. In 1870, three years after confederation, the Macdonald government authorized a government service flag for government ships. The authorization was given on July 16, 1870. That flag consisted of a blue ensign, with the old coat of arms of Canada on the fly. In 1871 the people longed for a flag ashore. And what did they do? They had to do the best they could. They took the red ensign and flew that flag on shore. And so, back as far as 1870 and 1871, the Canadian people figured they had a distinctive flag of their own, although they have not one to-day.

On April 14, 1886, the blue ensign with the old coat of arms of Canada on the fly was authorized for government ships in territorial waters doing police duty. On February 2, 1892 the red ensign was authorized as the mercantile flag of Canada. In 1904 the merchant marine flag was flying on the old parliament buildings and across Canada from ocean to ocean. Canadian people looked upon it as their distinctive flag. But what happened in 1904? A minister of the crown, the minister of public works of that day, was taken into camp by a civil servant and the red ensign was insolently hauled down and the union jack put up. Why? Because at that time there was a movement of subordination and imperialism in this country from ocean to ocean. The effort was to keep Canada a colony, to keep her forever from being a sovereign nation. That idea still prevails. So down came what we considered as our national flag, and up went the flag of our motherland—not of Canada.

It was not the flag of empire, because the union jack is not the flag of empire. The union jack is the flag of the motherland and the colonies, that is all. But to-day it is the so-called official flag of Canada. It is not distinctive and it can never be a distinctive Canadian flag. Consequently action on this flag problem must be taken by parliament in order that it may be solved in the interests of the people. In 1911, after the union jack had been flying for seven years, it was made the official flag for Canada by authority of the secretary of state in London, and it has been the official flag of Canada ever since. In 1922 the old coat of arms was changed to the new coat of arms. The change took effect March 31, 1924. On our red ensign, our merchant marine flag, the new coat of arms took the place of the old. On January 26, 1924, the red ensign was authorized to be flown on the legation buildings of Canada. That is, it was to be flown on government owned and government occupied buildings beyond the shores of the dominion. That is the situation to-day.

The anomaly to which I drew attention last year when I was debating this question still exists. We have one official flag in Canada, the union jack, which is not a distinctive flag and which can never be a distinctive Canadian flag because it belongs to the motherland and to no other nation, and then we have another official flag flying outside of Canada. Why? Because the union jack cannot be flown outside of Canada; it is not distinctive enough. Therefore, the red ensign with the new coat of arms on the fly is flown on government buildings beyond the shores of the dominion, at Tokyo, Paris, London and Washington.

May I go on to show what took place in parliament? Parliament face to face with this situation had to do something. I felt that I, as an hon. member of this house face to face with this historical situation, should do something. In 1929, therefore, I placed a resolution on the order paper. That was not taken up and was found in the file of unfinished business at the end of the session. In 1930 another similar resolution was not reached, but was again found in the file of unfinished business at the end of the session. The question was debated in 1931, at which time I placed before the house the Canadian and British sides of our flag problem. This is all on record. In 1932 no action was taken. In 1933 the resolution was not pressed. In 1934 and 1935 the Conservative party took up the question in the house. However, there was no unity among the Conservative party on this question and the result was that in 1934 an adjournment of the debate took place and nothing further was done. In 1935 there was still consternation and confusion in the Conservative party with regard to the question. The result was that an amendment was moved. After a brief debate the amendment and the main motion were both withdrawn and the question was left undetermined. That is the story of the Conservative party with respect to a distinctive Canadian flag.

Last year I placed a resolution on the order paper. We had a debate thereon, but the resolution is before us again this year at the masthead of all other resolutions on the order paper. That is the place where it ought to be. I should like to see a distinctive flag flying at the masthead all over this country from one ocean to the other. That flag should symbolize the unity of this country at home and abroad.

That is the national and parliamentary story in connection with our flag problem. Let me go on now to tell what the weekly and daily press of Canada think about this important problem. Last year I placed on Hansard editorial opinions from ocean to ocean on this important question. I should like to supplement those opinions on this occasion. In the London Free Press of February 16, 1938, the following appeared:

> How by any stretch of the imagination such a flag could be interpreted as disloyalty or a movement towards separation is beyond our understanding.

It is beyond the understanding, too, of the average Canadian citizen. Then in the London Free Press of February 19, 1938, there appeared an editorial opposing the Hon. Howard Ferguson for the stand he had taken on this question. It reads:

> It may be that this is not the time to make such a change and that it might be interpreted in Europe among the enemies of the empire as a move towards separation, as Mr. Ferguson suggested. But we doubt whether either Hitler or Mussolini are bothering much about the character of a Canadian flag.

And a little farther on:

> We believe that Canada should fall in line with Australia, New Zealand and South Africa and have a flag that is distinctive, yet retaining the union jack. Much as we like Mr. Ferguson, we confess his argument did not impress us.

Then another editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of February 17, 1938, reads in part:

> Parliament has been excessively cautious and deliberate about the matter. The special committee will also give it thorough consideration, no doubt. It should be a very excellent flag.
>
> Fortunately, there is little of the old opposition left. And there is less indifference and more positive desire and recognition of the expediency, on all national grounds, of Canadians having an emblem of their own.
>
> May the committee soon be appointed and its work crowned with success!

And in the Ottawa Citizen of February 18, 1938:

> The McIntosh motion asks no more than the appointment of a committee to report on the advisability of a Canadian flag. Its duties will not embrace consideration of a design, which is a sensible limitation. But once the committee reports in favour—as it is almost certain to do, when at last it is named—the path will be open for the ending of an absurdity and the adoption of a flag which can be clearly distinguished among the flags of other nations.

The flag question is discussed again by H. B. Charlton, writing in the London Free Press of February 15, 1938. He said:

> The change in the constitutional position of Canada from a crown colony to a sovereign, independent nation, has been an orderly one, brought about by evolution, and not by revolution. The coronation of his majesty as King of Canada has emphasized the fact that Canada is the only nation in the world which does not possess or fly a distinctive national flag.
>
> The need of a Canadian flag is evident to all thinking Canadians. A country without a flag is like a man without a name.

The Kingston Whig-Standard of February 15, 1938, contained the following:

> It is absurd to argue, as its opponents do, that a national flag would mean a weakening of the ties of empire. If that were so, then the other dominions would have to be charged with a species of disloyalty. We need a national flag to serve as an emblem of our country, and we should have it for the sake of national respect at home as well as abroad. The union jack would then remain for us as the emblem of empire. There is no real and valid argument against it. The only question upon which there should be any reasonable ground for difference is as to its design.

In the Huntsville Forester an editorial appeared headed "Mr. McIntosh's fight for Canadian flag," and reading:

> A distinctive Canadian flag will make firmer the basis of our patriotism to both Canada and the mother country. It will ultimately emerge through the welter of irrelevant and misapplied reasoning, which have for too long a time delayed its achievement, and when finally an accomplished reality, Canada will owe much to the steady and intelligent persistence of Mr. McIntosh.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, a little lauding now and then is relished by the best of men.

Mr. MacNICOL: Give some to those who oppose it.

Mr. McINTOSH: Here we have another statement entitled "Re Canada's Flag." Mr. Wendell Clarke, of Ottawa, had been sent as a trade commissioner to Milan, Italy, and on his return to Canada he was presented with an Italian silken flag by the Ottawa Rotary Club. On that occasion Mr. Ainslie Greene —now Mr. Justice Greene—spoke as follows:

I would move that we return the compliment and send to our fellow-Rotarians in Milan a beautiful Canadian flag if we had such a flag —but we haven't! We could send them a union jack, but what sense would there be in that? They already have a union jack—sent to them by the London club. Is it not time that a movement was started for the selection of a Canadian flag?

The Brockville Recorder and Times, of February 17, 1938, makes this statement:

One of the strangest things about the opposition to a distinctive Canadian flag for use on land is that an equally distinctive Canadian flag for use on water has been officially in use for years without the slightest objection being made to it. If it is an act savouring of disloyalty for Canada to have a land flag, it must also be an act savouring of disloyalty for Canada to have a marine flag. But no person has ever made such a suggestion or proposed abolition of the marine emblem established to distinguish Canadian vessels from the vessels of other parts of the empire.

And a little further on:

Those countries—

That is, New Zealand, South Africa and Australia.

Those countries found no difficulty in selecting their flags.

Nor should there be greater difficulty in Canada, a part of the British Empire just as loyal as the sister dominions and just as devoted as they are to British connection, especially when it is generally agreed that the Union Jack should be a basic part of the new design.

The Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, in an editorial of February 16, 1938, says:

Inasmuch as coronation ceremonies showed clearly enough that the people of the United Kingdom would prefer that Canada have its own flag, it is difficult to see where anything in the way of cleavage would be indicated. It may be too, that to think, as these opponents evidently thought, adopting a flag would give encouragement to possible foreign enemy nations is a form of self flattery, an assumption that certain great nations are keeping a mighty close eye on Canada lest this young giant of the west rise up and fight wars that Britain shrinks from. That is decidedly silly.

Mr. Hugh Savage, long an advocate of a distinctive Canadian flag, speaking at Duncan, British Columbia, in January, 1928, said:

The establishment of a distinctive flag for Canada—

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would ask if it is in order for an hon. member to read from editorials in this house.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand that the hon. member was reading from editorials, but rather referring to articles that have appeared in the newspapers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think it is well for hon. members to realize that objection can be taken to reading from editorials only when they refer to a debate at present before the house. My hon. friend, I think, is reading from editorials of previous years.

Mr. McINTOSH: To proceed with the quotation, Mr. Savage spoke as follows:

The establishment of a distinctive flag for Canada was in line with the Kinsmen's aim "to foster and stimulate a spirit of true Canadian nationalism and patriotism as a nation within the British Empire and to establish unity of thought and purpose in the dominion."

Further on he says:

Lord Byng had said, "The one big thing for Canada is unity." In no better way could one work to this end than by urging the adoption of a flag for Canada, not to supplant but to supplement the Union Jack.

The Ottawa Journal of February, 1938, says this:

The question of whether we should retain the Union Jack as our national flag or have one distinctively our own has nothing to do with our British allegiance, or with our loyalty to the empire. Actually it is a practical matter, concerned chiefly with what is most convenient and sensible.

To discuss the matter on grounds of high patriotism or on grounds of a lack of it, with flamboyant talk about the "Union Jack being good enough for us," is just childish. The question of the Union Jack being good enough for us or not good enough for us doesn't enter into the matter at all.

The Ottawa Citizen of February 8, 1938, says:

The McIntosh motion asks no more than the appointment of a committee to report on the advisability of a Canadian flag. Its duties will not embrace consideration of a design, which is a sensible limitation. But once the committee reports in favour—as it is almost certain to do, when at last it is named—the path will be open for the ending of an absurdity and the adoption of a flag which can be clearly distinguished among the flags of other nations.

Then Eileen La Berge, writing to the Citizen on February 18, 1938, said:

In times like these, with democracy threatened from every side, it is very necessary to have our idealism clearly symbolized.

In these critical times clear-cut loyalties are essential, so let us hope that Mr. McIntosh, after ten years' great effort for a distinctive Canadian flag, will get the support he needs to help place our emblem proudly among the flags of the empire.

Here is another statement from the province of Quebec, from the Montreal Witness, which hits the point very well. The article says:

What is Canada's flag? We see this matter is again being discussed. It is high time. The neglect or shyness of this truly national matter by successive governments and parliaments shows how difficult it is amid the vicissitudes of ceaseless and absorbing party strife to get attention to a matter of real spiritual significance—we are not overstating the matter. It is high time, too, in view of the ignorant confusion and contempt for authority that prevail on this matter.

And further on, in the same article:

With what voice do Canadians shout: "The Maple Leaf Forever!" Thus to men in spite of themselves the most meaningless emblems go powerfully to the making of peoples, and he is no statesman who neglects them.

Here is a quotation from a flag day address by the late President Wilson, as reported in the National Geographic in 1917—I will read it although my time is limited:

This flag, which we honour and under which we serve, is the emblem of our unity, our power, our thought and purpose as a nation. It has no other character than that which we give it from generation to generation. The choices are ours. It floats in majestic silence above the hosts that execute those choices, whether in peace or in war. And yet, though silent, it speaks to us—speaks to us of the past, of the men and women who went before us and of the records they wrote upon it.

We celebrate the day of its birth; and from its birth until now it has witnessed a great history, has floated on high the symbol of great events, of a great plan of life worked out by a great people. We are about to carry it into battle, to lift it where it will draw the fire of our enemies. We are about to bid thousands, hundreds of thousands, it may be millions, of our men—the young, the strong, the capable men of the nation—to go forth and die beneath it on fields of blood far away. . . .

Woe be to the man, or group of men, that seeks to stand in our way in this day of high resolution, when every principle we hold dearest is to be vindicated and made secure for the salvation of the nations. We are ready to plead at the bar of history, and our flag shall wear a new lustre. Once more we shall make good with our lives and fortunes the great faith to which we were born, and a new glory shall shine in the face of our people.

The Paisley Advocate of November 4, 1937, his this to say:

So far as we can fathom, a flock of honorary colonels and superloyal imperialists, menially minded, have denounced the suggestion that Canada should have a flag. No real Canadian who loves his or her country and takes pride in being a member of the British commonwealth of dominions, should oppose the adoption of a purely Canadian flag.

My time is about up, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to say just a few closing words in connection with my appeal for a distinctive Canadian flag.

May I ask, sir, that the debate be carried on, on a high plane as was done last year? The manner in which the debate was conducted on that occasion was an honour to the members of this chamber. The tone was moderate, cool, calculated, and very many splendid thoughts were mustered into action on that occasion. May I anticipate a similar debate on this resolution.

The resolution before the house in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, ought to be sent to a special committee, and the quicker that is done the better. The anomaly which exists in this country with respect to a Canadian flag cannot exist very much longer. South Africa, Australia and New Zealand have all faced this question, and why cannot Canada forthwith face it like every other self-governing dominion? If we do, I am satisfied that the committee will report in favour of the resolution, and after it reports to this house I believe there will be no difficulty in having a committee set up that will evolve a national symbol that will symbolize our sovereignty as a people, the great past and the great future of our dominion, and the aspirations and ideals that will guide us in the years to come. Then, and only then, shall we be able to say, in the words of two verses of my own that I am going to quote, that we have lived up to the high ideals of Canada, past, present and future. The first verse of this poem tells about Canada's vast territory, a territory of world-wide fame, and the products of which have made us the fourth trading nation of the world:

My country has her acres vast,
Her wheat, and oil, and gold,
Her mountains rising to the stars,
Resources rich untold;
Her rivers, lakes and gurgling streams
From out "The North" they flow,
But, no distinctive flag has she,
Her nationhood to show.

And then the last verse:

And Canada, her faith has kept
In Empire, hearth and sky;
Her children too have scaled the heights
And writ her name on high;
So raise our own Dominion flag;
It hoist from shore to shore
To float at home and seas beyond
Till Time shall be no more.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): In commencing his speech the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) said something to this effect, that the resolution would appeal to every red-blooded Canadian and every red-blooded Britisher. I have risen to oppose the resolution, and I want to tell the hon. member that I am a Canadian of the fourth generation, I am red-blooded, and I am a Britisher by conviction.

Mr. McINTOSH: You will survive all right.

Mr. MacNICOL: If all the hon. gentleman has said is true, and if he has as I believe to be the case, the support of the government members in his argument, why does not the government, if it is not satisfied with the flag that is flying over Canada now take courage and introduce a resolution proposing a certain flag to be flown in this country? Why is it left to a private member to bring up a question of such vital importance? The government is used to shirking its responsibility and in this instance it is running true to form.

The hon. member said that the red ensign which formerly flew over these buildings for a short time was hauled down in obedience to some civil servant's orders. It was hauled down for the reason that it was not a land flag but a water flag. It should never have been flown over these buildings and was rightly hauled down. He also said that the union jack was not the flag of empire but the flag of Great Britain. Later on he read one or two editorials stating that the union jack was the flag of empire.

Now let me address myself to the resolution itself. I am going to give the opinion of the man on the street as I come in contact with him, and I met a number of them at home on Saturday last. What is he thinking about to-day? He is thinking about a job, an opportunity to earn a livelihood. There are over 400,000 Canadian workmen who are now unemployed, only too anxious to get work, if it can be obtained; yet in the face of their necessity, here we are discussing this matter for the next three hours, because the debate will not be concluded at six o'clock—

An hon. MEMBER: Private members' resolution.

Mr. MacNICOL: It will be discussed until six o'clock.

Mr. BRADETTE: Is the hon. member against private members' resolutions?

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. gentleman can speak after I have finished my remarks.

Mr. BRADETTE: And I will answer the hon. member all right.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are 400,000 unemployed who are looking to this house for an opportunity to work, and yet we are compelled to waste three hours this afternoon in discussing a resolution that could come up under more favourable circumstances.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Let us vote now.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. MacNICOL: I should have thought that this year, at least, in view of what is to take place this summer the hon. member would have refrained from introducing this resolution. I had hoped that when we are looking forward to a visit from the sovereigns of this dominion, such a resolution would not appear on the order paper.

The hon. member has been speaking lately in different parts of the country and recently appeared in the border city of Windsor where I believe he was howled down—

Mr. McINTOSH: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: —in his advocacy of a distinctive flag for Canada. He was howled down perhaps by the unemployed, because Windsor is full of unemployed.

Mr. McINTOSH: I rise to a point of order—

Mr. MARTIN: There are not as many unemployed now as there were when the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) was in power.

Mr. McINTOSH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to quote—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) wishes to state a point of order.

Mr. McINTOSH: The statement of the hon. member about my being howled down in Windsor, is an absolute falsehood, wherever he got it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, the hon. member has been reading a great deal of stuff a year old. I am going to read something which is fresh.

Mr. McINTOSH: Read the truth.

Mr. MacNICOL: This appears in the Toronto Telegram of January 31.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacNICOL: Hon. gentlemen can laugh when I get through reading it. It is a dispatch dated Windsor, January 31. It reads:

> Cameron R. McIntosh, Liberal member of the House of Commons for North Battleford, Sask., found opposition last night to his statement the union jack cannot serve as a distinctive national flag for Canada.
>
> Speaking to a Windsor service club, he ran into opposition at the conclusion of his speech.
>
> "This is no time to be bothered with such a trifling matter," said Lieut.-Col. A. S. Pearson. Lieut.-Col. Pearson said the time was inopportune as "foreign observers, not understanding, might interpret such action to indicate Canada would not stand with the empire in event of war."

Mr. McINTOSH: On a point of order. If the hon. member is through with that statement, I think it is necessary for him to accept my denial. There was some opposition in the meeting, but as to my being howled down, that is absolutely false whether the statement is made in the Telegram, or the Globe or any other paper.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the hon. member was not howled down he might have been. This motion has been introduced in the House of Commons for the eighth time; the sixth, I believe, by the hon. member who has brought it in to-day, and twice by the former member for Nanaimo, Mr. Dickie. I think it would be well to read the resolution we have before us to-day, and put beside it the resolution that was introduced by Mr. Dickie. The present resolution reads:

That, in the opinion of this house, a special select committee be appointed for the purpose of considering the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag, representing Canada as a whole, thereby symbolizing the dominion as an equality partner in the commonwealth of British nations.

When Mr. Dickie introduced his resolution I opposed it for different reasons from those that compel me to oppose the resolution now before us. Mr. Dickie's resolution read:

That in the opinion of this house a national flag representing the Dominion of Canada should be adopted, and that in any design for a Canadian flag the union jack must be conspicuous.

The resolution of the former hon. member for Nanaimo was at least positive; it stated what should be on the flag, but the resolution of the hon. member for North Battleford states little except that the flag should be representative of Canada as a whole. Perhaps a potato might do for Prince Edward Island, a fish for New Brunswick, a lobster or a tree for Nova Scotia, for Quebec a fleur-de-lis, and for Ontario something representative of a gold mine—

An hon. MEMBER: What about Toronto?

Mr. MacNICOL: For Manitoba a buffalo, for Saskatchewan a sheaf of wheat, for Alberta an oil well, and for British Columbia—

An hon. MEMBER: A Bren gun.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, some hon. member says a Bren gun, but maybe a fir tree. The former hon. member for Nanaimo was positive; he did ask for something pertaining to the union jack, or at least that the union jack should be conspicuous in the flag.

I will now state one of the main reasons why I am opposed to this resolution; it is because the government—and by the government I mean the Prime Minister, I at least give him credit that he does run his government—took this attitude. During the last debate on this matter, on February 14, 1938, he stated, as reported on page 438 of Hansard:

I would conclude this part of what I have to say with the observation that the continued use of the union jack gives a false impression abroad, and particularly in the country immediately adjoining. The use of the union jack on anything that is distinctively Canadian in the United States does not help to emphasize the individuality of this country or its distinct nationality; it helps to submerge them altogether.

Therefore, if I interpret the words of the Prime Minister correctly, he does not want on any flag of this country any representation of the union jack—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacNICOL: —because it might offend the people in the republic to the south.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He never said that.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the same sentiment which has been agitated outside this house by a strong and vigorous group of good citizens; I have no complaint to make about their integrity or sincerity any more than I have in regard to the hon. member who proposes this resolution. I believe the hon. member was sincere in everything he said and I respect his views. Mine are opposite, but I do not want to be censured because my views are opposed to his.

The Native Sons of Canada—and I am a native son of the fourth generation, and proud of it—sent out a catechism consisting of many clauses, No. 22 of which reads:

As Canada now has no national flag, should it, when adopted contain the union jack as a part of its design? No.

And the president or secretary of that organization, speaking in Winnipeg, later on said this in reference to the union jack being part of any Canadian flag:

It (the union jack) cannot form any part of our design.

That is one reason why I am opposed to this resolution. I do not know what a committee of this house might bring back to the house; I know what a committee in South Africa brought back. Read the debates that took place before that committee. There was a very bitter debate and stirring up of strife all over South Africa. And what did it result in? It resulted in two official flags, not one as the hon. member would have us believe; or if he did not say so, those who advocate a separate flag for Canada delight in saying that the great dominion of South Africa has its national flag. In South Africa two national flags fly side by side, the union jack on one flag pole and on the other flag the union jack forms about one-eightieth part.

The Prime Minister's statement, if I understood it correctly, is exactly in line with what the Native Sons of Canada advocate. To that I am unalterably opposed. I am ready to listen to reason in connection with a flag design, but I am wholly opposed to any flag flying over this country that has not the union jack as a large part of it. The Prime Minister dominates the government and every member of it; when he snaps the whip, every one of his 180 followers step up and vote as they are told, and so it would be in connection with this flag resolution if it came to a vote. If he is in earnest let him bring in a flag; it will not have on it any part of the union jack, if he meant what he said last year. That is one of the reasons I am opposed to this resolution and opposed to its going to a committee; I want the government to take the responsibility. If they bring in such a flag, then we shall have a real debate that will last not only for an afternoon but as long as we can stand on this floor to oppose it.

Mr. BRADETTE: What about the unemployed?

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall have a good deal to say about the unemployed. I have been associated with business and employment a great deal longer than the hon. member. It gives me a pain in the foot to hear men who have little knowledge concerning employment talking about unemployment. Leave that to men who know something about it. I was associated with the employment of a great number of men for many years.

What would go before a committee? I have had a sample flag sent to me for every line of pickles made by Heinz; fifty-seven of them. I am going to deal with several of them. Some have a good deal of merit; some I am not so strongly opposed to—I recognize ability. Others I am opposed to.

Mr. McINTOSH: Australia had thirty thousand designs to choose from. Sixty-five is not many.

Mr. MacNICOL: We shall have to get another line of pickles if we are to have sixty-five.

The first of these is the union jack defaced with a maple leaf in a white shield. The second has three bars with a maple leaf in the centre and a union jack in the upper main canton. The third is the red ensign with a white diamond on the field and a green leaf over the diamond. The fourth is again the red ensign, with a white circle on which there is a green leaf. Another has the fleur-de-lis round the outside—I am particularly fond of the fleur-de-lis myself and have no objection to it—and in the centre a union jack and a circle of maple leaves round the centre with a beaver in the centre of that. So we have a great many fine varieties sent to us. Another is a union jack defaced with the fleur-de-lis in the centre on a white or red spot. Another is a union jack defaced with a maple leaf in the centre, and another has the Canadian shield in the centre. Then there is one very beautiful design by a gentleman in Quebec on which the maple leaf is predominant together with the fleur-de-lis and some triangles of red and blue. Another design has "Canada" on the maple leaf on the field, and another, "Canada" on the union jack. In short, there is a host of designs. What would come back from a committee of the house it is not for me to say; it would depend altogether on the composition of the committee; but I know what came back from the committee in South Africa, which caused so much bitterness in that country. That is another reason why I am opposed to this resolution, I want to avoid anything which would bring in this country the bitterness that developed in South Africa.

Something was said about the merchant marine flag. The design of merchant marine flags throughout the empire is identical, apart from what is placed on the fly or field of the flag. All the merchant and government marine flags of the empire conform in design to the merchant and government marine flags of the homeland, which are the red and blue ensigns with nothing on the field. When you go to India, you have the red ensign with the star of India on the field. When you pass to New Zealand, again you have the red ensign with the New Zealand conception of the southern cross on the field. When you go to Australia, again you have the red ensign with the Australian conception of the southern cross on the field, and when you go to South Africa, the red ensign has the shield of that country on the field. So there is uniformity throughout the empire as far as the merchant marine flags are concerned, and there is the same uniformity with regard to government marine flags, which are those with the blue field. On land, however, there is not uniformity, and I am going to oppose any resolution such as this until such time as uniformity can be arrived at in some manner.

As I said a few moments ago, in South Africa they had a very bitter discussion on this question and wound up with two official flags. In New Zealand and Australia they have not the same difficulty that existed in South Africa or that we have in Canada, because the people of New Zealand and Australia are practically all of one race, so there is nothing to cause friction between them. In Canada—fortunately, I will say, because I am an admirer of all races—we have quite a number of nationalities represented by substantial portions of our population, people from Europe who have brought their wealth, background and strength to help build up this country. In New Zealand and Australia, as I see it, they have not land flag designs at all; there they fly the blue ensign, a marine flag design, as a land flag. Of course it is none of my business if they choose to do that, but the blue ensign is not a land flag. In Australia and New Zealand they fly the blue ensign defaced on the field by their respective conceptions of the southern cross. In India they follow another design altogether, and if I had to choose from all the designs I would select a design similar to that adopted in India, where since 1863 they have had as their governor general's flag the union jack defaced by the star of India and surmounted by the Tudor crown. Since 1900, I believe, that has been what they term their official land flag, but it is not one hundred per cent official. I have here a letter from the Indian office describing their flag, which states that the union jack is flown over high courts, chief courts and judicial commissioners' courts. Generally speaking, however, I believe they accept as their official land flag the union jack defaced by the star of India.

A year ago I believe the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), speaking on this subject, referred to Newfoundland. I do not take anybody's say-so for things; I find out for myself, and I went to Newfoundland. There, I may tell the hon. member for Cochrane, the union jack is the official flag on land, while on water they fly exactly the same design of flags that we use; that is, their marine flags are the red and blue ensigns defaced by their shield, just as the Canadian marine flags are defaced by what I believe is the most beautiful shield flown throughout the empire.

I am sorry to say that my French-Canadian friends to whom I have spoken are generally in favour of a change in our flag. For a moment or two I should like particularly to direct my remarks to my compatriots, for whom I have the greatest regard and warmest feeling as the oldest Canadians of all. In a word or two I should like to outline to them the suggestion that if anyone in Canada to-day should object to the union jack, it is the Anglo-Saxons. Every part of the union jack come from France. The three crosses were all brought to England by the French conquerors following 1066, or by what we call the Norman kings who reigned after that time.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would the hon. member tell us how the St. Andrew's cross came from France in 1066?

Mr. MacNICOL: If my hon. friend does not mind, I shall make my own speech. Many folks forget that England was conquered by the French and ruled by French kings for several centuries. Those French kings and their supporters implanted in England the culture of which we are all proud, and in addition gave us much of our flag. The three lions on our shield representing England; the one lion representing Scotland, the fleur-de-lis representing the French and the harp representing Ireland, all came from France. The maple leaves represent Canada; I suppose they are Canadian, but at least four-fifths of the shield came from France. The insignia of the single lion was brought over in 1189 and placed on the British flag of that date by one of the Norman kings. Then in 1198, I believe, it was changed to three lions, and later the single lion was given over to Scotland and the English kept the three lions for themselves. The fleur-de-lis was brought over by one of the Norman kings or a successor to the Norman kings, who had the good judgment to marry a French princess, or one whose mother was French. The only thing coming from Canada is the three leaves, while the Englishman and the Scotsman have nothing that did not come from France originally. So, if any members of this house should stand four-square for the union jack and our marine flags, it is the French-Canadian members, and I hope that when the vote is taken this resolution will be defeated.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the hon. gentleman who said "hear, hear" makes his speech he can say what he likes, and perhaps I shall have the pleasure of saying "hear, hear" to him.

Before this house discusses the question of a flag at all I think the government should assume its responsibility. That it will not do. In the second place, I certainly should like to see some uniformity throughout the empire. There is little now as to land flags. Canada flies the union jack; that applies also to Newfoundland. In India they have the union jack defaced by the Star of India.

In New Zealand and Australia they fly on land a marine flag defaced on the field. In South Africa they fly two flags. There is not much uniformity in that. But there is uniformity when it comes to the two marine flags, which are uniform throughout the empire. I dislike to say this, but I fancy that if the resolution went to a committee of the house we might get back a flag something like the one they have in South Africa, of which the union jack occupies only a small part.

Speaking last session the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave three or four reasons why he was opposed to our present design of flag. First, he referred to the legations. I said then, and I repeat to-day, that when any person is going to the legation in London, Paris, Brussels, Berlin, or wherever it may be—and I have been to a number of them—he does not go round looking for a flag, to find what flag is flying over the building. On the contrary, he takes a taxicab to go about his business at the legation.

I must recall to the hon. member who moved the resolution some facts concerning Canada House. I must inform him that the union jack flies on Canada House; I have seen it there. I saw it there throughout most of the coronation period.

Mr. McINTOSH: The hon. member did at the time of the coronation, but that is all.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, I am glad the gentlemen in control of Canada House had the good sense to stamp Canada as part of the British empire during the coronation period.

Mr. McINTOSH: The official flag of Canada on Canada House is the red ensign.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member has delivered his speech; I want to finish mine. I remember well the empire games which took place at Hamilton. I am not sure whether the whole world was represented, but perhaps an hon. member from that city could tell. I do know, however, that at those games, which I believe were world-wide in extent, the winners marched past the grandstand, and various flags passed by. There was little acclaim for any of those flags, with the exception of the one carried by the Scottish representatives. They carried the union jack, and received tremendous acclaim. I said to myself at the time—

An hon. MEMBER: Different from Australia.

Mr. MacNICOL: Both the Australian and the New Zealand flags were there, but they did not receive the acclaim received by the union jack at the head of the Scots. The objective in those games was to be a winner. No matter where that winner may come from, his reputation and that of his country are known everywhere. His winning is of more importance than the fact that he might be carrying a flag.

Something has been said about a lack of distinction, but I believe I have exploded that suggestion. The union jack and our coat of arms are distinctive of Canada. Something was said about cathedrals. So far as I have observed, battalion flags are shown in the cathedrals, although there may be some others. So far as I am concerned, the suggestion that we should fly flags in European cathedrals is not sufficient reason for changing the flag of this country.

Finally, I repeat my main objection, namely my objection to the statement made last session by the Prime Minister. I quoted it before, and I shall do so again:

> The use of the union jack on anything that is distinctively Canadian in the United States does not help to emphasize the individuality of this country or its distinct nationality; it helps to submerge them altogether.

In conclusion, let me say that if a committee were set up and the Indians, the first settlers of this country, were invited to take part in the debate before that committee, or to take part in a conference concerning the flag, I am convinced they would take the same stand as our brother black men in South Africa took. During the time of the debates in South Africa between the Anglo-Saxon Afrikanders and the Dutch Afrikanders, both of whom are equal and deserve unlimited respect, when the debate was hottest and little accord could be arrived at, the six million blacks of South Africa sent their chiefs to make their representations and demands. It is for that reason that the union jack does appear, even on the Afrikander flag. They demanded that the union jack be made part of the flag because they said they knew it stood for liberty and fair play, and without its appearance on their flag they would not know whether they would receive proper treatment.

If ever the time comes when there is any discussion before a committee in Canada concerning the flag, I hope our noble red men may be invited to give their opinions. I should like the successors to Brant and Tecumseh to present their opinions. I should like to hear the opinions of the successors of those Chiefs who left their beautiful homelands in New York and Indiana to come to the north side of the lakes and the river St. Lawrence so that they might obtain the protection of the union jack. I am satisfied that if they were asked their position they would take the same stand as was taken by their black brothers in South Africa, namely that the union jack should have a prominent place in this country.

I am opposed to the resolution going to a committee. If the government has the courage to discuss the matter, or if it wishes to have a new flag, let it present that new flag to the House of Commons.

Mr. R. S. WHITE (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, on two occasions in the last parliament I spoke in favour of the adoption of a national flag for Canada, that flag to be the union jack, with the emblem of Canada on the fly. I have seen no reason for altering that opinion. But I am convinced that in view of the present state of world affairs it is inopportune and inadvisable to proceed further with this matter.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in the debate, but certain remarks of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) compel me to do so. I may say immediately that I am in favour of the resolution before the house, and I am also in favour of the adoption by Canada of a distinctive flag.

I would invite hon. members to read the resolution carefully. It recites merely that in the opinion of the house a special committee be appointed for the purpose of considering the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag. I agree entirely with the former leader of the opposition, whom we may now call the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, as he is no longer a member of the house. Taking part in a similar debate last year he said the following, as reported at page 488 of Hansard:

It seems to me almost monstrous—

I am afraid the hon. member for Davenport will not like the word; it is not my word, however, but that of his former leader.

—that the House of Commons should deny the right of a committee to consider the advisability of our taking any step in the world.

And further on Mr. Bennett said:

After all, however, it does seem that we should have some method by which to identify ourselves in the eyes of those who look upon our bunting as it floats in the wind.

I visited Australia and New Zealand some months ago, and it would be a brave man indeed who would say that New Zealand was lacking in loyalty to the British crown. Yet New Zealand has a distinctive flag which they have adopted for a definite purpose. Australia, too, has a distinctive flag, and I do not think the casual observer would state that there is less devotion and loyalty to the British crown in Australia than in Canada.

I respect the other opinions that have been expressed, but for the life of me I cannot see how the adoption of the proposal of the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) could affect our relations with the mother country or the part we are playing in the British commonwealth of nations. I think it would be quite to the contrary. It would be merely symbolizing our position in the British empire. Instead of being an agency for disunion or disintegration a distinctive flag would show that Canada, which is a distinct entity with international rights and duties, is a member of the British commonwealth and wants to remain so.

Let me tell my hon. friend that he has misinterpreted the remarks made last year by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he infers that the Prime Minister said he would be opposed to the union jack being a part of the Canadian flag. That is another back-of-the-head view that my hon. friend has had; it is some more picture language. I know that the idea of the Prime Minister is, and this is my view also, that when and if a flag is accepted and adopted for Canada, the union jack will be a part of that flag. Our flag will be like the flags of other members of the commonwealth. I cannot understand this obstinate opposition; it will create disunion and lead to division in Canada. I ask the hon. member for Davenport to take my word for it that we will have a Canadian flag sooner or later. Like all the other steps which have been taken in our progress toward nationhood, this step must be taken in spite of the strenuous opposition of those who think we are giving up our connection with the commonwealth. It is just the contrary.

The British commonwealth is based on freedom, and I cannot see why we in Canada should act differently from the other countries in the British commonwealth of nations. The hon. member spoke of the empire games. I have attended many international and imperial gatherings. As late as last September I attended the meeting of the League of Nations at Geneva. The Canadian delegation was on the same floor of a hotel as the Australian delegation. It is the practice to put up the flag of each nation whose delegates are located in a particular hotel. Delegates from India were also there, and the different flags were flown. At the imperial conference all the other dominions had their own flags. I do not think anyone will question the loyalty of New Zealand. I know whereof I speak when I say that when there has been a conflict of view as to certain steps to be taken at the imperial conferences, New Zealand has always been very firm and has refused to accept innovations until she was convinced that they should be accepted for the sake of unity. New Zealand has her flag. Australia has her flag.

Some reference has been made to the fact that his majesty will visit Canada. The present king was in Australia in 1927 to inaugurate the new capital city of Canberra. I had the honour of representing Canada at that time. The king did not seem at all scandalized when the Australian flag was flown. I think a Canadian flag, with the union jack forming part, flying side by side with the union jack which will always represent the whole of the commonwealth, would make for the majesty and add to the greatness of the British commonwealth of nations. I was in Berlin in 1936 at the opening of the Olympic games. After the unveiling of the monument at Vimy I had three days before I had to catch my boat, and I attended this great event. There again all the nations of the world paraded with their flags.

Of course, we have our commercial ensign, but as my hon. friend has said, it had to be pulled down from the top of this parliament building because it was not a land flag. We had to take the union jack, the flag of the empire. I repeat that I cannot see the validity of the objections to this resolution. I tell my hon. friend that if he thinks this would be a sign of disloyalty or division, he is very far wrong as far as I am concerned.

Mr. MacNICOL: I never mentioned disloyalty or division; I never used those words.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I believe in Canada remaining a part of the British commonwealth of nations, and I shall always defend that view. I believe the future of our country is linked up with that institution, but I believe that for the sake of common sense we should show that we are a distinct part of the British commonwealth. What will my hon. friends on the other side who are so strong for a large navy have to show that the different units are Canadian unless those units are flying a distinctive Canadian standard?

Again, with respect to the objections of my friends opposite, I agree with Mr. Bennett, that it is—I will not say monstrous, but I will say it is not fair to prevent examination and consideration of this question by a committee, where, if the house will agree to such a committee being appointed, all the objections to the proposal may be thoroughly considered. I think it is a step which this house should take.

I cannot help remembering what took place yesterday, especially in view of the words of my good friend from Davenport that we are wasting three hours this afternoon in discussing this question. Yesterday I believe he was one of those who protested vehemently when the government wanted to take Wednesday for government business. If that had been done, and we had been allowed to do what we proposed yesterday, the time would not have been wasted this afternoon.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I correct the minister, and say I was one of those yesterday who hoped that the government would adhere to the terms of its resolution on the order paper to take to-day as a government day.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I see that he is often right, even if he is wrong in the present instance.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there would be nothing lost and nothing objectionable in allowing this resolution to go to a committee of the house for a report upon it. I am therefore strongly in favour of the resolution.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, after the speeches of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), I do not think we will ever let the old flag fall.

The question before the house has been introduced by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh). Toronto knows something about North Battleford because that city sent three or four regiments, the Battleford column, out there in the Northwest rebellion. They carried the union jack, and it was good enough for them in those days.

The motion of the hon. member reads:

That, in the opinion of this house—

And that is as far as he is going to get. It is only an opinion, and whether this house passes the resolution or not, I believe that the province of Ontario will never change the union jack. It should be our flag, as it has been in the past ever since this country has been a country. It is our flag and the flag of the empire.

The minister (Mr. Lapointe) wants a select committee of the house to examine this question. I have been a member of some of these committees. They are appointed and they meet, and when they are ready to conclude their business we generally find that it is the majority, representing the government of the day, whichever government happens to be in power, that writes the committee's report.

The resolution goes on to say that the committee should consider "the advisability of adopting a distinctive Canadian flag." Well, Mr. Speaker, we have a distinctive Canadian flag at the present time, the union jack. We have, in addition, two or three other distinctive flags.

The resolution, after all is said and done, largely resolves itself into a question of sentiment, and you cannot go against the sentiment in this dominion in favour of the flag which has protected our shores all these years since we have been a country.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, we have other distinctive flags. I saw two or three of them last week-end in the city of Toronto. First, there is the black flag of unemployment, representing people in want and all that. The unemployed are carrying the black flag and we should get rid of that first. Then we have the red flag of the bailiff—and we heard something about that last night—that red flag which dispossesses people of their house and property and puts their goods and chattels out on the street, on account of the depression and unemployment. Let us rid ourselves of that also before we change the union jack. Then we have the flag of separatism, and this resolution is about the wind-up in spreading separatism in this country.

The resolution goes on to say that it is advisable to have a distinctive Canadian flag "representing Canada as a whole." This proposed makeshift flag, because so many different designs have been suggested, might be called a crazy quilt. It might be all right to haul up on hallowe'en night, but as representing the whole Canadian nation, no, Mr. Speaker.

The resolution goes on to say that a distinctive Canadian flag would symbolize "the dominion as an equality partner in the commonwealth of British nations." Well, we may have equality of status, but certainly we have not equality of stature because we are depending on the mother country to preserve the civilization and liberty we enjoy. Let us pay for a fleet to protect our shores and trade routes. There is a difference between status and stature.

Resolutions similar to this have often been debated in the house, and the house has always failed to pass the resolution. I would point out that we have no mandate from the people of Canada to change the flag that has protected us for so long. No one proposed such a thing in the last election. And furthermore this resolution is introduced by a private member. Why do not the Minister of Justice and the cabinet take the responsibility for changing the flag? Then we would have a real union jack election all over this country. Why does not some member of the government rise up and say: We as a government are ready to change the flag. The government do not seem prepared to do anything about anything. Only yesterday, when they were asked that something be done about something or other, they were going to read Edmund Burke. That is twenty-four hours ago, and they are still reading it, and by the time we get a new flag they will still be doubting what their policy is. In my opinion, before any change in the flag is made, a member of the government should introduce the necessary resolution.

The hon. member who introduced this private resolution based it upon four or five principles. The first principle was to get the opinion of parliament. Now for this government to get the opinion of parliament seems to be a relic of the past. They got no opinion from parliament on their various treaties and on their annual estimates. We just conduct post mortems here. But now they propose to change all that practice and get the opinion of parliament about changing the flag. It would be far better if they sought the opinion of the electors of this country. They should decide this question if anybody should.

The next principle of my hon. friend was that this question should be considered by a special committee. I do not know what he wants a special committee for. A committee might well be appointed to get jobs for Canadians in Canada and do something practical. That would be better than a committee to change the flag.

The next principle was that a distinctive Canadian flag should be adopted to represent Canada as a whole. But we have always had a flag to represent Canada as a whole, and in my opinion it is the only one flag for Canada and the empire. We should have in this empire, one throne, one king, and we do not want half a dozen flags.

The next principle was that the flag should symbolize the dominion's equality of status in the commonwealth of British nations, and in a few moments I shall deal with that further.

The mover of the resolution gave a short account of the discussion of this question in the house last year. It also came up in 1929, and a committee was appointed consisting of seven departmental officials, but that was all that was done. The question has come up three or four times since I have been a member of the house, but nothing has been done.

We are apt to forget in all this discussion that our very existence depends upon our remaining in the British empire and having the protection of Britain and of the other members of the commonwealth. After all the eloquent remarks that we have had from the hon. member for North Battleford and others, Canada will not be talked out of the British empire by any change in status or in flag. She will have to be fought out of the empire. That is the only way of getting Canada out of the British empire, so far as Canadians in nine provinces are concerned. If Canada could have been talked out of the British empire, she would have been long ago.

I am opposed to any change of flag for any reason whatever. The union jack to-day represents equal rights to all and special privileges to none. It stands for freedom, justice, liberty, righteousness, honour and protection. It has a history and a tradition which are sacred to the people of Ontario, and so long as we remain part of the British empire we shall have all the military and naval forces on land and sea and air to defend our shores and safeguard our rights.

If Canada is to become a united people from coast to coast we must have greater loyalty to Britain, the British empire and the union jack in the future; and the best way to ensure all this is for us to retain the union jack as we have it. This matter has been discussed in our schools. In my opinion, in the schools to-day too much stress is placed on mere book-learning and not enough on education in patriotism, duty, discipline, sacrifice, and service to one's country—qualities which are indispensable in the present state of the world, and more important than book-learning. In the schools in Toronto the use of the flag has been extended to various activities, and that is something in the right direction. The flag is used on many occasions to mark the commemoration of important events in our history.

We should rejoice that we live under the union jack and enjoy the peace and security that we do. The flag has made us respected the world over. In view of certain opinions that have been expressed in the house, I think it would be interesting for me to quote a letter I have here from Mr. T. A. Beacock of Regina, Saskatchewan. He wrote to me from 1225 King street, Regina, on October 17 last, enclosing a copy of a letter he had received from the acting under-secretary of state, Mr. W. P. J. O'Meara, in answer to a question regarding an official flag for Canada. In his reply to Mr. Beacock the acting under-secretary of state, under date of October 13, wrote:

> I acknowledge the receipt of your letter of October 10th and its enclosures.
>
> In so far as this department is concerned there are no civil regulations governing the flying of flags in Canada. The union jack, however, is recognized as the flag to be properly and officially flown on land in Canada.
>
> As regards the Canadian red ensign there is no law prohibiting the flying of this ensign on land in Canada. The only regulation of which I am aware respecting the flying of the Canadian red ensign on land is a special order in council which permits the flying of the ensign over Canada House in London, and the Canadian legations at Paris, Washington and Tokyo. It is also flown on vessels of Canadian registry.

Something has been said by the mover of the resolution about the status of Canada. The trouble to-day is that we are tending more and more in this dominion to separatism. In fact, we have gone almost the full length of the road that leads to complete separation from the motherland. For example, as I said in the house a few years ago, in 1919 Canada signed the treaty of Versailles as a separate nation, and then a separate seat for Canada was demanded and secured at the assembly of the League of Nations. In March, 1923, the halibut treaty was signed at Washington by Canada as a separate nation. The imperial conference of 1923 affirmed the right of Canada to sign separate treaties. In 1924 Canada acted separately on the Dawes plan, and in that year Canada urged that the Colonial Laws Validity Act be repealed. In 1926 there was another imperial conference and the right was affirmed of each dominion to make separate and independent treaties not binding on any other country. We were given sovereign powers, and we saw the results in the Kellogg note. Separatism has gone far enough in this country. Some would abolish appeals to the privy council; others would abolish the office of lieutenant governor. Many innovations have been made during the last few years, with the result that we have nothing but a policy of separatism in this country, and this resolution, Mr. Speaker, practically says that Canada is a separate country from the mother country, like Spain or Ireland. We are bound to the mother country by ties of loyalty and affection. The governor general is also now merely a viceroy and removed from getting any advice from Downing street, and must get all his advice in Canada from our own cabinet. Ties of sentiment and appeals to the privy council now alone remain, and the latter is being attacked.

In this matter of status it would be well for us to see how far the tendency has gone in South Africa and the south of Ireland. The south of Ireland is a separate country the same as Mexico. They have abolished the office of governor general; they have abolished appeals to the privy council; they have removed the king's head from coinage and postage stamps; they have rid the country of British soldiers, and now they want to annex the six counties in northern Ireland. The statute of Westminster, in my opinion, has led to the desire for separate flags. It was passed over the people's heads to please southern Ireland and South Africa. Instead of having a separate flag; instead of taking up time discussing that question, it seems to me it would be far better for Canada to close up the embassies altogether. This division between the dominions and the motherland on embassies is extremely dangerous in time of peace and it would be more disastrous in war. Separatism is responsible for the pact made at Munich a few months ago, and with the pacificism in Canada it is not surprising that in England they are wondering whither Canada is going.

So far as South Africa is concerned, I should like to quote briefly from an article that appeared in the National Review of August, 1938. They have hauled down the union jack in South Africa. President Hertzog will not even take the privy councillor's oath. The National Review says:

A correspondent sends us a photograph from the Daily Express (Johannesburg) of the hauling down of the union jack just before a parade at which General Hertzog took the salute. The Daily Express, whose permission we have for reproduction, is a paper supporting General Hertzog, and their photographer caught a picture of the descent of the union jack just as it occurred. The caption under the photograph is as follows: "Just before General Hertzog arrived at Swartkop aerodrome to take the salute at to-day's union day parade, officers discovered that the union jack, instead of the union flag, was flying at the saluting base. Hastily they had the union jack hauled down."

We are asked to copy southern Ireland and South Africa, these other parts of the empire, in the request for a distinctive flag, but is anybody in favour of our following South Africa? They have gone even further than merely hauling down the flag; they have gone as far as southern Ireland has and have complete separatism. They want to be outside the empire and yet appear to be within it. They wish to be a separate country, not belonging to the empire, but they desire to have non-alien status accorded them, in order to keep the protection of the British fleet which is their salvation from dictators. That is all they want to be in the empire for. They want to elect one of their own people as governor general. In addition we have a wave of separatism all along the line. I have been very much alarmed over this state of affairs as to where Canada stands and where she is going. They are asking now for a separate flag to fly over these legations, the cost of which just goes into a sink-hole, and when that cost is paid, before they are through with all these ambassadors on the seven seas, instead of filling the farmers' barns in Canada it is going to empty their pockets. We are a nice dominion, asking to change the flag! Let me say to the mover of this resolution, who talks about the status of Canada and all that kind of thing, that they are about having a separate nationality. As I said in a debate in the house in May, 1928, in reference to the storms on the great lakes in the season of 1927 in which many brave sailors on grain trade ships carrying Canada's flag were drowned in lake Superior, and in connection with this change of flag and change of status which have been mentioned in this debate:

The sense of Canada's nationalism increases and multiplies through our love of British unity. The true Canadian nationalist will not want to see this country a deadbeat on the taxpayers of the British isles for the upkeep of battle cruisers and a navy to maintain the safety of Canadian shores and for the protection of Canada's commerce on the high seas. The true Canadian nationalist will not want to see Canada a nation only in the advertising pages of American journals. As a nation we are a pauper so far as the actual reality goes.

The closing days and nights of navigation on the great lakes in the season of 1927 recorded a great story of unbroken fortitude and of unshaken endurance which proved that our countrymen, the sailors on the decks of those doomed vessels, were blood brothers of the soldiers who brought glory to Canada at St. Julien, the soldiers who could not be blown off the ground they gained at Passchendaele, who climbed the heights of Vimy Ridge, who gained the victory at Amiens and many another field of glory, men whose names will forever thrill every true Canadian. These sailors struggled or waited hour after hour; help came to them, it was help organized by the valiant hearts and strong bodies of their own country, or if help came it was help bought and paid for by the taxes of the people of the United States. That is Canadian nationality for you. The struggle was a story of glory for Canada's sailors. The struggle was a story of shame for Canada's politicians. The tragedies of the great lakes in the closing hours of navigation last season showed in its true colours the stuff that Canadian nationalism is made of. We have those who write and talk and chatter at banquets and refuse to pay under the terms of that nationality.

Canada is a proud and haughty nation. It sends its merchant ships into the winter storms with nothing to do but whistle for a United States service tug when the ship is in danger and to fill the air with the distress signals of a siren with the hope that a United States life saving vessel will put to sea and save the lives of Canadian sailors. Canada, a nation, and in trouble, has a navy maintained at the expense of the old country taxpayer to guard the safety of Canada's shores in war.

That was in a debate back in May, 1928. I do not know what is coming in Canada, with all this Anglophobia which has been going on. We have from the press of the United States and international radio broadcasts attacks on Britain and the Munich pact. We prefer discussing this academic question of the flag to that of needy workers who are to be forgotten. It seems that we are exerting every effort to get out of the empire, by every separatist movement we make. It puzzles me to know what Britain has done to Canada to cause this organized campaign of disparagement. As I have said on other occasions in this house, what does the union jack stand for? I will tell hon. members what it stands for. This is what I said in another debate:

> The Saxon has marked around this earth, as has no other race before him, the scarlet circle of his power.

These are reasons why some people do not want to give up the union jack.

> This thin red Saxon line, so thin with his numbers, so red with his blood, was made possible only by his heroism and radical fealty. Where this line has not gone man has not found. It has crossed every sea, it has traversed every desert, it has sought every solitude; it has passed through swamps where only the sacred ibis fishes, over sands that have never been moistened, over snows that have never melted. There has been no storm it has not encountered, no pain it has not endured, no race it has not fought, and no disease it has not contended with. This Saxon line has been to the earth a girdle tragic and heroic, binding within itself all the old and great places of the world. It has been silent in its duty, ignored in its achievement, and scorned in its devotion; yet it has given down to this now neglectful race a world such as mankind has never known before, an empire over which the sun and stars shine together, where night never falls nor dawn begins. The perpetuation of the British empire depends, first, upon its military duty, and secondly upon its political unification. Sectionalism in time and place must give way to laws so universal in their application that they differentiate in no way between the inhabitants of the overseas dominions and the United Kingdom.

The sentiment exists in almost every province. It was found also at the battle and siege of Londonderry. We look to Macaulay, who described what this flag meant to the people of his time, when he visited Ireland in his lifetime, when Britain was saved. Referring to this flag in the days of those great patriots who suffered and won great battles in the siege of Londonderry, in the history of our empire, he said that " the various tombs of the captains have been sought out and repaired and embellished. It is impossible not to respect the sentiment which manifests itself in these tokens. It is a sentiment which appeals to the higher and purer part of human nature and adds not a little to the strength of states. A people that takes no pride in the noble achievements of remote ancestors will never achieve anything worthy to be remembered." It is such sentiments as that which are wrapped around the union jack and all it stands for. No other is just as good.

[Mr. Church.]

In addition something was said in this debate about our soldiers, and I refer to the glorious land of France where so many of our brave soldiers sleep their last sleep. The endurance of the glorious French nation toward whom the eyes of the whole civilized world were turned during the late war; the awful privations, trials, and tribulations they suffered and endured for humanity; the anxiety, pain and sorrow of that land will live in history as an example, for all time, of the most sublime patriotism. So, if this union jack was good enough for those six hundred thousand men who went over to Flanders and France from Canada, and the sixty thousand who lie buried there, it should be good enough for those who stayed at home.

Reference was made yesterday to our relations with our sister country, the United States. There is a large body of public opinion in this country that supports the very fine relations we enjoy with our kinsmen, and long may those relations continue. But there is something to be said about the flag and democracy. One thing you can admire the people of the United States for is that they have one ruling power, the president and congress and the senate. Nobody can attack them. They have one flag, one school, and they are one nation.

This question of the flag and democracy was, on the anniversary of the birthday of Lincoln, February 12, last Sunday, the topic in many pulpits in Canada. At the dedication of the burial ground at Gettysburg he had this to say on democracy and one flag, and we can well take a lesson from it in regard to one flag for this empire. I think we should take a leaf out of the book of the people of the United States in this connection, and in regard to the way in which they honour their memorials and heroes. On that occasion President Lincoln said:

> Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth upon this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But in a larger sense we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it far above our power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here.

It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us, that from these honoured dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

I think those are reasons why there is a very large body of public opinion opposed to any change in our flag, especially at this time when dictators are leaping out of the trenches and advancing to the Baltic, the Black sea and the Mediterranean. This is no time for us to make a change; rather we should back up one flag for the whole empire. That speech will live for all time. All state governors were present to honour the dedication of Arlington cemetery on the field of Gettysburg. A famous orator of this day, Hon. Mr. Everett, was the chief speaker, and President Lincoln was called in at the end to say a few words. His classic belongs to the ages and should be a guide to Canada and democracy.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to congratulate the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) on his tenacity and perseverance, for it is the fifth or sixth time, I think, that his motion for the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag gives rise to a debate such as the present one.

On the 12th of December last I attended a celebration at Three Rivers, sponsored by a patriotic society, of the anniversary of the Statute of Westminster. On that occasion as on many others it was quite visible that the independence of our young nation is dear to all hearts. Indeed, this independence is for us a cause of legitimate pride.

As citizens of a self-governing nation it is quite natural and consistent that we should wish to enjoy the privileges incidental to that status, such as the abolition of appeals to the Privy Council and the adoption of a distinctively Canadian flag. I wish to have recorded in the proceedings of the house a resolution forwarded to me by this patriotic society:

The Saint-Jean-Baptiste Society of Trois-Rivières would be happy to see this country fly a distinctively Canadian flag during the coming visit of our king, George VI.

We hope that the government will introduce a motion on that subject at the next session of parliament.

(Signed) Maurice Gélinas.

Last year I supported the hon. member for North Battleford's motion for the adoption of a Canadian flag. I support it again this year and with still greater conviction. The mother country having seen fit to grant us our independence, she will naturally expect us to appreciate the privilege and take full advantage of it.

Sooner or later we shall have a Canadian flag, so why not now? I will not repeat the arguments I propounded last year, in order not to take up too much of the time of the house, as our hon. friends opposite have been doing for some weeks. I shall here venture a digression which will serve as a reply to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) who has just been complaining of the uselessness of a discussion of this nature.

In answer to a question the government stated that the Davis inquiry had cost $12,580. The inquiry before the public accounts committee will probably cost as much, and if it is true that each sitting day of the session costs about $12,000 the Conservative party will bear the responsibility of having made the country spend more than $120,000 to discuss a question which had already been definitively settled by the Davis commission. Is it not strange to hear hon. members opposite speak of the great number of unemployed workers and, at the same time, cause the useless expenditure of $120,000?

I would like to add that the arguments used against the adoption of a Canadian flag do not meet with the approval of the majority of our citizens. It is quite the contrary. Such arguments are futile. Many persons have asked me what objections are raised by the opponents of the proposal. Seeing that previous speakers have mentioned all the arguments in favour of a Canadian flag, I took the trouble to read the speech delivered last year by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) who has just resumed his seat. Let me read a few extracts from the forty minute speech which he delivered on that occasion.

I quote:

The union jack was good enough for 600,000 soldiers who fought for you and me in France and Flanders, and it should be good enough for the civilians who stayed at home.

Does that mean, sir, that those 600,000 Canadian soldiers would not have fought for England, had we had a distinctive Canadian flag? I always understood that the last war was fought in order to make the world safe for democracy.

I quote again:

There is no demand for a distinctive Canadian flag.

I wonder if the hon. member took the trouble to ascertain the views of many of his electors, or if he saw only one or two.

I believe in the policy of one king, one flag, one school and one empire. . . .

The hon. member could have completed the list, with a statement frequently heard on July 12, and said that he believes in the policy of one language.

I resume the quotation:

I have consulted with a great many people about this flag issue, and the general feeling is that it would be better for us first to provide a proper fleet on which to hoist a flag, and not boats like the Minnie M, the Ada Alice, the Island Queen, the Luella, and the Shamrock. I do not know where this Canadian fleet is, though I read naval orders.

Further on he says:

So I say, wait until we get an adequate fleet to carry a flag and sufficient men to man the fleet. On land and sea and in the air what are we doing to-day for our own protection? Simply hoisting the pan-American flag in and out of this house.

He went on:

We should do well to go back to the days of Sir John A. Macdonald and remember his declaration, "A British subject I was born; a British subject I will die."

And he said further:

Is it advisable at the present time to raise this question when we are depending upon the motherland for maritime protection?

We are trying to establish an air force in Canada. We know how war has been revolutionized in the air. If the enemy were to sail up the St. Lawrence, what would be our position? We are unprepared; while we are talking about a new flag they could blow up the citadel, proceed to Ottawa and blow up these buildings and the Chateau Laurier.

Mr. Speaker, I have quoted those words from the hon. member for Broadview because he is one of the warmest supporters of the union jack and one of the fiercest opponents of an essentially Canadian flag.

Continuing, he said:

The new flag would no doubt please a good many people in all the provinces; but, as I say, if the enemy sailed up the St. Lawrence, where would we be? Somebody in the committee might say, "We have pan-Americanism to protect us."

His concluding remark was the following:

The people of Canada never voted or consented to that, and they have not voted on this question with regard to a change of flag.

I could find nothing more convincing than that in the speech of the hon. member for Broadview. That is what those who are opposed to a Canadian flag call arguments. It reminds us of the stone age artists who, after having drawn the likeness of a horse or a dog, had to write underneath it: this is a horse, or this is a dog. The opponents of a Canadian flag and their arguments may be compared to the prehistoric artists and their works.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I do say that our loyalty towards the Empire and the Crown have nothing to do with this motion. And I should like to answer what the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) said a few moments ago when he made a special appeal to the French-Canadians. He stated that we should be the first in wanting to retain the union jack, because it is mostly derived from the Fleur-de-lis flag! Let me say to the hon. member that we do love France, her culture, her arts, her literature. We also love England, but our chief concern is for our country, Canada, because we have no other fatherland.

In order to have any significance, a flag must be distinct from those of other nations. Let us hope that the Statute of Westminster will completely eliminate whatever colonialism we may still harbour, so that we may fully enjoy the distinct privilege of having a national flag. The days of a double allegiance are past. After all the question is: are we or are we not Canadians? If we are not, then let us go and live somewhere else, under the flag we prefer. The way has been shown to us recently by some one who is highly-placed. If this were done, there would only remain in this country true Canadians who could sing with sincerity these words from our national anthem:

Le ciel a marqué sa carrière
Dans ce monde nouveau.
Toujours guidé par sa lumière,
Il gardera l'honneur de son drapeau.

There is no room in this country for a divided allegiance, Mr. Speaker. When His Majesty King George VI pays us a visit next spring, we shall be receiving the king of Canada, and I venture to say that the king of Canada will find it quite natural to see flying throughout this dominion, wherever he goes, a distinctively Canadian flag.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, rising to express my convictions with regard to the resolution I should like first of all to refer to the masterly manner in which the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) voiced his oft-repeated arguments in favour of a new and distinctive Canadian flag. Whatever inherent weaknesses there may be in the hon. member's argument—and I contend there are many—one cannot justifiably say that he did not conduct the argument in a most forceful and eloquent manner in his attempt to turn the parliamentary scales in his favour. I am convinced that not only the hon. member but those sections of public opinion in Canada favouring the change are sincere in their endeavours to obtain a distinctive national flag. However, there are many people who, although sincere, may be somewhat misguided. May I say to the hon. member and to those who support him in his sponsoring of the change in our flag at this time that perhaps that word may be suitably used.

I never expected—and I believe my position is in common with that of other new members—that one of the problems we would be asked to debate during our term of service as new members would be the old union jack itself. And so in these days, when there is such a great desire for unity in Canada, it seems exceedingly unfortunate, from the point of view of national solidarity that this highly explosive subject should be debated. I say that because there is such a wide divergence of opinion, and views which are held strongly but honestly on both sides. Under such circumstances the possibilities of consequent bitterness over a change in the flag might well be minimized by leaving matters as they are for the present.

Apart altogether from the possible effect upon national unity there are those in Canada who feel that perhaps to make a change in the design of our flag would constitute, to some at least, an implied notice of a further desire towards insularity as far as the empire is concerned. I have not very much to say in favour of any hon. member who will stand in his place and wrap himself in the union jack, without having some real and honest conviction with regard to the subject in question. But surely, Mr. Speaker, even in these days some of the sentimental ties which bind Canada to the empire should be preserved. In my opinion the least we can do in Canada to-day is to preserve that one sentimental tie of the union jack, particularly at this time when we are soon to welcome with open arms Their Majesties the King and the Queen. Regardless of other arguments it seems to me there are many Canadians who, under ordinary circumstances, might conceivably favour a change to a distinctive national flag, but who in the face of the visit of their majesties would hesitate to sponsor any such idea just now. Our retention of the union jack will serve to show their majesties that Canada is not lacking in affection for the motherland, and that in addition to having a common monarch we fly in common with England the same flag.

I listened with some interest to the strong argument made by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) to the effect that if the matter were really of great national importance to Canada any proposed action in regard thereto would have been initiated by the government and not left to a private member. I have great respect for the Minister of Justice, but I cannot help but think that with his great enthusiasm in support of this change, which was exhibited so well in his speech this afternoon, it is curious that he has not translated that enthusiasm into the introduction of a bill, backed by the government, to change our flag. Had that been done, there would have been some evidence of the courage of the government in that respect.

The hon. member for North Battleford used the words "national defeatism" and "national darkness" as an implication of the ends to which our steps would be directed if we opposed his resolution. It seems to me that we have entirely lost our sense of proportion when it is claimed that one class or section of this country has a monopoly of loyalty or affection to the British empire or to Canada itself as compared with any other particular class or section. Who can say that because of certain honest and sincere policies advanced in the House of Commons we are travelling toward national darkness or national defeatism?

If there is one thing we need in this country it is courage in our national life. I refuse to believe that there are those in Canada who would voluntarily travel along the paths indicated. The hon. member quoted extensively from his scrap-book of editorials, but he did not quote from that great national newspaper, the Evening Telegram of Toronto; had he done so I am sure it would have proved very enlightening.

Once a flag design is altered there is no warranty as to the finality of the change. From the proposed designs I have seen from time to time I am free to say that they would be open to serious and frequent challenge throughout the years that lie ahead. There would be nothing to prevent resolutions of this kind being proposed at every subsequent session, with the obviously resulting confusion. The only guarantee we can have in this regard is to leave the national ensign as it is.

With a depressed agriculture, with low wages and insecurity in industry, with a restless youth and evidence everywhere of criticism of unpopular and unbusinesslike public expenditures and unbalanced budgets, is it any wonder that the people who send us here become impatient when the time of the house is consumed by a discussion prompted by a desire to change the flag? Let us not endanger parliamentary institutions in these days when eager, hopeful eyes are turned to parliament seeking prosperous conditions for the populace. Until some of our most urgent national obstacles are removed, let us not attempt to abolish the flag we have. Let us change the conditions over which the present flag flies before we attempt to alter the flag itself.

Mr. A. B. HYNDMAN (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the proposer of this resolution (Mr. McIntosh) upon the manner in which he has brought it before the house. I was glad to hear him say that he hoped that the debate would be kept on a high plane. A subject of this kind should always be discussed from the national rather than the party point of view.

The hon. member said that the debates on this subject in the past had caused "consternation" in the Conservative party, but I am sure that if he were to consult his Liberal friends privately and quietly he would find that many of them are not in favour of changing the flag at the present time. The hon. member proposes setting up a special committee. I do not like that word "committee," especially after the experience we had with a certain other committee. I feel that we would get nowhere with a committee. I refer to the interdepartmental committee that acted in connection with the Bren gun. That committee was supposed to pass upon certain proposals put before it, but its recommendations were overruled. I feel that if this question is to go before a committee there will be a possibility that the recommendations of that committee will be overruled.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is rather far-fetched, apart from its being out of order.

Mr. HYNDMAN: The hon. member quoted from various newspapers which were favourable to his resolution, but I venture to say that there were many opposed to any change in our flag.

Mr. McINTOSH: I ask the hon. member to quote some that are opposed.

Mr. HYNDMAN: I propose to give the house the statements of a number of outstanding men throughout this dominion. First I mention Mr. N. C. Polson of N. C. Polson and Company, who said:

I think this move is just one step further away from the imperialism that should animate all of us.

Then Mr. A. O. Dawson, president of Canadian Cottons, said:

It doesn't appeal to me. The union jack is a good emblem. Good enough for me. This seems to me to be a dividing, rather than a unifying move.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Clinton Henderson, of Henderson, King and Charland, Limited, exporters, had this to say:

I think the old flag will do for me. It is good enough for me, for as long as I live.

Then we have that outstanding Canadian, Sir Edward Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific railway, who said:

While I do not think anyone will charge me with being anything but Canadian, I am not one of those who have a feeling of restiveness, nor is my inferiority complex heightened by reason of the fact that I live under the union jack. For a long time it has stood for some of the best things the world has witnessed, and it is likely to continue doing so.

The Hon. Gordon Scott, president of the Royal Empire Society, said:

I prefer to stick to the old union jack. It is symbolic of all that is good in the world and that will be good enough for Canadians.

The next is Doctor A. Bercovitch, one of the outstanding medical authorities in the city of Montreal, if not in the Dominion of Canada. He had this to say:

The union jack is good enough for me as long as I live. I don't see any reason for a change. We can be proud of the union jack.

Sir Charles Gordon, president of the Bank of Montreal, said:

The union jack is good enough for me.

Colonel Philip Abbey, former officer commanding, second field brigade, royal Canadian artillery, stated:

The flag we have is O.K. with me.

Mr. C. E. Gravel, a French Canadian business man, said:

At the present time, I am not in favour of a change in Canada's flag as I am of the opinion that public officials should spend more time in the solution of the country's financial problems and difficulties.

Next we have an outstanding minister of the United church of Canada. Doctor F. W. Kerr of St. Andrew's church in Westmount, had this to say:

I am perfectly satisfied with things as they are. Any change at the present moment which would suggest disunity in the empire is to be deplored.

Mr. J. S. Rigby, a flag manufacturer, said:

We should keep the union jack.

F. Winfield Hackett, K.C., said:

We are a part of the British empire and that flag has taken care of all our needs to date. Too many flags may lead to too much confusion, the way we are at present organized.

Then Major W. W. Gear, of William I. Gear and Son, shipping and travel agents, had this to say:

The government has more important things to do than think about flags, and the union jack should be retained.

Colonel Royal Ewing, one of the greatest marksmen in Canada, who has been to Bisley year after year, says:

I think the union jack is still all right.

B. W. P. Coghlin, president of the Montreal board of trade says:

If we try to work out another design it will divide Canada even worse than it is at present.

And finally I quote John A. Charron, president of the building trades council:

The flag we fly has always suited me.

There you have, Mr. Speaker, the opinions of prominent men from all over Canada, and I think their opinions are entitled to respect. The mover of the resolution (Mr. McIntosh) is far astray when he says that Canada is unanimously in favour of changing the flag. I submit that there should be such a unanimous desire throughout the country before the change is made, and I claim that there is no such universal desire. National unity is at stake in Canada at the present time, and surely, Mr. Speaker, this is no time, as I suggested in the debate on the address, to throw another controversial question into the arena. We have enough disunity as it is. So far as I am concerned no representations have been made to me to change the flag—not one. I think our time could be better spent in trying to reduce relief costs and the present high taxation, because these really are burning questions throughout the country to-day.

I listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) last night, and I certainly agreed with him when he said that one month of this session had gone by and absolutely no government business had been done. But I agree also with the leader of my group (Mr. Manion) that we were doing public business when we considered the Bren gun contract. This is what the Prime Minister said last night:

What I wish to make perfectly plain at this moment is that the government have been sent here by the people of Canada to carry on the business of the country, and the first duty of parliament is to get on with that business, no matter what anyone may say or wish. When private members, whether through resolutions or any other circumstances whatever, occupy the entire time of parliament so that it is impossible for the government to get on with a single measure, then I say the time has come for the government to take such action as is necessary and imperative to see that it can get ahead with the public business.

I suggested in the early part of this session that the hon. member for North Battleford withdraw this resolution, because it undoubtedly is contentious, and if he had withdrawn it at that time we should not be having this discussion to-day.

When the house is asked to consider changing the flag, we must remember that in Canada we have not only English, French, Irish and Scotch, but, in addition, quite a mixed population. I looked up the Canada Year Book for 1938, with respect to the origins of our people, and I found that in 1921 our English, Irish and Scottish population numbered 4,868,738, and in 1931, 5,381,071, and our total population in 1931 was roughly ten millions. So half the population of Canada is not made up of English, Irish and Scottish. The French-Canadian population in Canada in 1931 was 2,927,990, and surely they have a right to say: Let us have a flag emblematic of the French-Canadian. Then there are Austrian, Belgian, Bulgarian, Roumanian, Chinese, Czech, Dutch, Finnish, German, Greek, Hebrew, Hungarian, Indian, Eskimo, Italian, Japanese, Polish, Russian, Scandinavian, Ukrainian, Jugoslavic and various other people. We should have a lovely flag if it was going to represent them all!

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that no one in this country is advocating a change in the flag. If it was a burning question, I would say all right, let us consider it. So far as a distinctive Canadian flag is concerned, the idea is perfectly all right, and if the hon. member for North Battleford would bring down a flag to the house and say, "This is the flag that I propose Canada should adopt as its distinctive national flag," I would not oppose it if it met with my approval, but I am certainly opposed to sending this question to a committee of the house.

We must also consider the number of different religions there are in Canada. We have for example, Adventists, Anglicans, Baptists, Buddhists, Christians, Christian Scientists, Church of Christ Disciples, Confucians, Congregationalists, Doukhobours, the Evangelical Association, Friends (Quaker), the Greek Church, the Greek Orthodox Church, the Holiness Movement, International Bible School, Lutherans, Mennonites, Methodists, no religion, pagans, the Pentecostal Church, the Plymouth Brethren, Presbyterians, Protestants, Roman Catholics, the Salvation Army, the Unitarian Church, the United Church, and various other religions. These are the religions of the people of Canada as classified at the decennial census, so I say, Mr. Speaker, that we have in this country so many different races and so many different religions that we had better leave a question of this kind alone at the present time, and not stir up strife when we have so much already in this country.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 16, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. McGeer be substituted for that of Mr. Streight on the standing committee on public accounts.

That the name of Mr. McPhee be substituted for that of Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West) on the standing committee on public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

APPOINTMENT OF SECRETARY TO CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. ARTHUR-J. LAPOINTE (Matapédia-Matane) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 24, to amend the Civil Service Act.

He said: (Translation) The purpose of this bill is to provide for the appointment of the secretary to the Civil Service Commission, in view of the importance of that office, by the governor in council in the same way as the commissioners are appointed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

UNEMPLOYMENT IN RECOGNIZED TRADES

Mr. LENNARD:

Can the government give the number in each of the recognized trades that were out of work in 1938?

Mr. ROGERS: No registration is made of all the unemployed in each of the recognized trades, hence it is not possible to give the exact number in these categories who were unemployed during 1938.

In the federal Department of Labour a register is made of all those unemployed receiving material aid and at present a classification is being made of these by crafts and a return will be made to the house in a fortnight or three weeks showing the result of this classification.

Returns are also received in the department which reveal, as of the last day of each month, the percentage of unemployment among the recognized trades, who are members of trade unions. Approximately two-thirds of the total numbers of trade union members in Canada are covered in these reports and it is assumed that if returns were received from all trade union bodies the percentages of unemployed would not be materially changed. The following table shows the percentages of unemployment among trade union members in Canada by months during 1938 and the yearly average for the same period:

Month 1938	Per cent
January	12·4
February	13·7
March	12·8
April	13·1
May	13·2
June	13·5
July	14·0
August	11·6
September	10·4
October	12·3
November	13·7
December	16·2
Average for the year	13·1

IMMIGRATION SINCE 1930

Mr. LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. How many immigrants entered Canada under the Immigration Act since 1930?

2. (a) How many of such immigrants entered Canada since 1930 through orders in council and special permits, upon recommendation of members of the cabinet or members of the House of Commons; (b) from what country or countries did they emigrate; (c) what was their original nationality?

3. (a) How many immigrants, since the said year, entered Canada after being naturalized British subjects in other countries, viz: the United Kingdom, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Irish Free State, Newfoundland and British colonies; (b) what was their original nationality?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. 1930, 104,806; 1931, 27,530; 1932, 20,591; 1933, 14,382; 1934, 12,476; 1935, 11,277; 1936, 11,643; 1937, 15,101; 1938, 17,244.

2. The departmental records do not enable the preparation of an answer to this question in its present form. Such immigrants are not admitted on the recommendation of members of parliament or members of the cabinet but by the Governor General in Council on the recommendation of the Minister of Mines and Resources. The attached statement shows the numbers of immigrants, by racial origin, admitted by orders in council during the period mentioned.

3. Statistics showing the manner in which immigrants obtained British nationality prior to their coming to Canada are not kept.

Statement showing the number and racial origin of immigrants to Canada, whose admission was authorized by naming them in orders-in-council

Race	1932	1933	1934	1935	1936	1937	1938	Totals
Austrian	7	22	4	2	11	5	34	85
Albanian	1	1	..	..	..	1	2	5
Armenian	..	11	3	10	..	8	2	34
Arabian	..	1	..	..	..	..	3	4
Belgian	18	29	13	30	16	21	27	154
B. W. I.	..	2	..	..	..	..	..	2
Bulgarian	5	2	..	3	5	5	2	22
Czechoslovak	34	27	18	30	39	37	48	233
Cingalese	1	..	..	..	..	..	..	1
Danish	22	18	7	8	5	7	13	80
Dutch	11	23	5	6	13	17	21	96
East Indian	1	..	2	..	1	..	..	4
Esthonian	..	..	2	4	..	..	1	7
English	..	3	2	2	2	2	3	14
French	49	34	35	37	79	81	70	385
Finnish	9	5	7	4	7	14	16	62
Greek	20	38	23	25	16	23	15	160
German	135	128	42	43	41	78	73	540
Hungarian	39	54	24	25	27	27	44	240
Hebrew	166	637	152	525	284	197	608	2,569
Icelandic	1	4	1	1	..	..	1	8
Irish	..	2	1	..	..	..	..	3
Italian	25	67	43	60	43	50	50	338
Jugo-Slav	13	22	29	40	41	26	16	187
Japanese	..	..	1	..	..	..	..	1
Latvian	..	2	..	..	2	1	2	7
Lithuanian	8	14	7	15	12	5	3	64
Maltese	..	..	..	5	..	..	..	5
Mexican	..	..	..	7	..	..	1	8
Norwegian	24	21	5	9	8	8	4	79
Polish	45	71	43	71	81	63	82	456
Portuguese	1	1	..	..	..	..	..	2
Russian	15	33	7	7	13	9	13	97
Roumanian	22	13	10	17	12	6	19	99
Swiss	18	18	13	10	11	17	20	107
Swedish	16	17	7	11	5	12	5	73
Spanish	9	5	5	..	6	3	3	31
Scotch	2	1	..	..	1	1	1	6
Syrian	29	29	8	29	12	14	14	135
Serbian	..	2	1	..	1	..	..	4
Ukrainian	..	..	..	23	25	21	26	95
Totals	746	1,357	520	1,059	819	759	1,242	6,502

ROYAL VISIT TO CANADA—COMMEMORATIVE COINAGE

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. Will the government have silver coins in dollar denominations struck to commemorate their majesty's visit to Canada this year?
2. If so, how many of such coins will be put into circulation?
3. When will the said issue be available?
4. What is the estimated net profit to the government from the said issue?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Yes.
2. It is the intention to issue as many of these coins as the public demand may require, in so far as the facilities of the Royal Canadian Mint will permit.
3. At the time of the visit of Their Majesties' to Canada.
4. The net profit to the government from the said issue cannot be determined, as the number of coins which may be issued is not yet known.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—HOTELS

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury):

1. What are the names and locations of the Canadian National hotels, and what was the cost of each, including furnishings?
2. What were the results of operation of each of the said hotels, giving net profit or loss for the last fiscal year?

Mr. HOWE:

1 and 2.

Name of hotel—Location	Total cost to Dec. 31, 1938 (incl. furnishings)	Net operating income Year 1938
Chateau Laurier—Ottawa, Ont.	$8,673,307 68	Profit $168,293 51
Prince Arthur—Port Arthur, Ont.	1,186,065 52	Profit 19,402 10
Fort Garry—Winnipeg, Man.	2,906,934 58	Loss 18,413 50
Prince Edward—Brandon, Man.	525,623 10	Loss 8,021 21
Macdonald—Edmonton, Alta.	2,271,967 36	Profit 26,338 25
Bessborough—Saskatoon, Sask.	3,567,459 62	Loss 24,456 59
Nova Scotian—Halifax, N.S.	2,448,464 30	Profit 14,549 59
Canadian National—Charlottetown, P.E.I.	857,579 45	Loss 3,367 36
Jasper Park Lodge—Jasper, Alta.	2,660,425 32	Profit 49,467 21
Minaki Lodge—Minaki, Ont.	1,094,079 24	Profit 1,890 73
Pictou Lodge—Pictou, N.S.	199,456 21	Profit 331 02

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—MONTREAL TERMINAL

Mr. STEVENS:

1. Were tenders called for by the Canadian National Railway Company for part of the new scheme for the completion of the project in Montreal?
2. Was the tender of E. G. M. Cape & Company accepted and at what figure?
3. Was the tender of E. G. M. Cape & Company the lowest tender?
4. What other firms tendered?
5. What were the figures of the tenders other than the one accepted?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.
2. The tender of E. G. M. Cape and Company was accepted for a part of the work tendered for. It is not the policy of the management to disclose the amount of bids contained in tenders.
3. Yes, for the part accepted.
4. Jas. Bertrand, Frascarelli Construction Co., A. C. White Landscape Co. Ltd., H. J. O'Connell Limited, Angus Robertson Limited, D. Verochio Limited, Frank Lapan Limited, Duranceau & Duranceau, Chas. V. Billie, Marien-Wilson Limited, Rene Lafleur, A. F. Byers Co. Ltd., G. Archambault Limitee, Kennedy Construction Co. Ltd., Northern Construction Co. Ltd. and J. W. Stewart Ltd., N. Gentile, Atlas Construction Co. Ltd., E. G. M. Cape & Company, Anglin-Norcross Que., Ltd., L. G. Ogilvie & Co. Ltd., The Foundation Co. Que., Ltd., A. Janin & Co. Ltd., Dansereau Limitee, Concrete Construction Co. Ltd.
5. See answer to question No. 2.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER COMPANY

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

Has the government received any requests either directly or through a subsidiary from the Beauharnois Power Company for per second foot water increase or other concessions which would mean a creation of more power?

Mr. HOWE: A request has been received and is being studied, but any action must be taken by introduction of a bill in parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

MILK PRICES IN MONTREAL

Mr. LACOMBE:

What average price was paid for milk: (a) per gallon; (b) per eight-gallon can, in the city of Montreal, to producers in spring, summer, fall and winter respectively, of the years 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938?

Mr. EULER:

	*Milk, fresh, price paid to producers, delivered at railway station at Montreal (mid-month quotations) per 100 lbs.	per gal.	per 8 gals.
1933—	$	$	$
January	1·600	·165	1·320
February	1·350	·139	1·112
September	1·500	·155	1·240
1934—
January	1·500	·155	1·240
July	1·450	·149	1·192
September	1·850	·191	1·528
1935—
January	1·850	·191	1·528
April	1·700	·175	1·400
June	1·445	·149	1·192
September	1·770	·182	1·456
1936—
January	1·770	·182	1·456
June	1·445	·149	1·192
September	1·770	·182	1·456
November	2·095	·216	1·728
1937—
January	2·095	·216	1·728
June	1·750	·180	1·440
September	2·200	·227	1·816
1938—
January	2·200	·227	1·816
June	1·770	·182	1·416
September	2·150	·221	1·768
1939—
January	2·150	·221	1·768

*Montreal firms quote price paid to producers per 100 pounds delivered at railway station at Montreal.

Column 1 shows month of price changes throughout the year.

In column 2 the bureau has calculated the price per gallon at 10·3 pounds.

In column 3 the bureau has calculated the price per 8 gallons.

YOUTH TRAINING IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. PERLEY:

1. How many are employed by the federal government in the training of youth in the province of Saskatchewan?

2. What are their names, home addresses, salaries and expenses?

Mr. ROGERS:

1 and 2. The administration of courses carried out under the Dominion Youth Training Agreement is the responsibility of the provincial authorities.

Mr. H. C. Bingham, of Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, is the representative of the unemployment relief branch of the Department of Labour in that province, his salary being $200 per month and his duties to see that the terms of Dominion-Provincial agreements, including that respecting youth training, are carried out. Mr. Bingham has been paid $357.33 in respect to travelling expenses incurred by him during the fiscal year 1938-39 while engaged in the performance of his duties respecting the Dominion-Saskatchewan Youth Training Agreement.

Mrs. A. J. Currie, of Govan, Saskatchewan, formerly a member of the women's advisory committee of the National Employment Commission, has accepted the honorary post of dominion representative in Saskatchewan, acting in an advisory capacity to the dominion supervisor of youth training, in respect to women's courses. Mrs. Currie receives no remuneration for her services but she has been reimbursed for her out of pocket expenses while travelling in connection with youth training matters to the amount of $306.45 during the current fiscal year.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—MALTON AIRPORT

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. Upon what date will the passenger service at the Malton airport be inaugurated by the Trans-Canada Air Lines?

2. At the date of such inauguration, will passengers be able to travel from coast to coast on the said Trans-Canada Air Lines, and, if not, when will the service be completed from Halifax to Vancouver?

Mr. HOWE:

1. April 1, 1939 has been tentatively set for the commencement of passenger operations, at the Malton airport.

2. Effective on above date, it is anticipated that passengers will be able to travel between Montreal and Vancouver. It is proposed that the service will be extended to Moncton during the summer of 1939, which point will be the eastern terminus of Trans-Canada Air Lines.

*ROYAL VISIT TO CANADA—SPECIAL DECORATION FOR MILITARY FORCES

Mr. LENNARD:

In view of the fact that a British reigning sovereign has never before been in Canada and in view of the approaching visit of their majesties this year, will the government consider the striking of a special decoration to be awarded to all members of the defence forces of Canada and all ex-service men in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This subject, like others relating to the visit of their majesties, is before the interdepartmental committee, and also before the government, for consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

*BROADCASTING OF SUMMARY OF PROCEEDINGS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. CHURCH:

Will the government give consideration to having a summary of the main mere facts of the daily proceedings of parliament given over the public radio station CBO?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government has been giving consideration to the suggestion of the hon. member, and will continue to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

Mr. CHURCH: In view of the fact that the Canadian daily press, since the advent and general use of the radio, do not report the plain facts in regard to what occurs in this house, with very few exceptions, would the Prime Minister consider doing something of this nature?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have answered the question.

RELIEF OF SENIOR UNEMPLOYED

Mr. CHURCH:

Will any steps be taken by the Department of Labour to give some relief or have consultation with the provinces regarding the cases of thousands of senior citizens, industrial workers, and others out of work, who are in destitute circumstances, and who have not asked for relief, and who, because over 40 or of in middle age, are to-day refused work by some industries?

Mr. ROGERS: Agreements with the provinces provide for federal assistance to individuals in necessitous circumstances without restriction as to age or reason for being in need.

[Mr. Howe.]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ROYAL AIR FORCE—RECRUITING IN CANADA

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Was any request received during 1938 by the government of Canada, or any member thereof, from the government of Great Britain, for leave to seek recruits for the Royal Air Force in Canada?
2. If so, on what dates?
3. Will such correspondence or other documents be tabled along with Canada's replies to the same?
4. Was any assistance, in 1938, asked for or given to young Canadians seeking to go to England to enlist in the air force?
5. If so, what was the nature of such assistance, financial or otherwise towards the travelling or other expenses of those seeking to enlist?

PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. How much money was given to each province during each of the past three years?
2. How much was guaranteed to each province during the same years?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled.

OTTAWA PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. BARBER:

1. What public works have been completed in the city of Ottawa since October 23, 1935?
2. What was the cost of completing such public works?
3. What public works are now in the course of construction and erection in the city of Ottawa?
4. What is the estimated cost of completing such public works?

H. P. SUTHERLAND, GASPAR CHARTRAND, HORACE HALCROW, JOHN BACON, A. G. HALSTEAD

Mr. PERLEY:

1. Are the following: H. P. Sutherland, Gaspar Chartrand, Horace Halcrow, John Bacon and A. G. Halstead in the employ of the federal government, temporarily or permanently?
2. If so, what are their home addresses, their respective salaries, the date of their employment, and in what capacity are they severally employed?

TOURIST TRADE

Mr. LENNARD:

What progress has been made in furthering the tourist trade with the object of lessening unemployment?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled.

SILVER PRODUCTION AND SALES TO UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Mr. REID:

1. What was the total production of silver in Canada, by ounces, during the calendar years from 1933 to 1938 inclusive?

2. What was the total value in each of the said years of newly mined silver, and what was the market price per ounce?

3. Of the total production of newly mined silver, what annual amounts were purchased by the government of the United States during the calendar years from 1933 to 1938 inclusive?

4. What were the total amounts paid during each of the said years by the United States for all newly mined silver?

5. Have any representations been made by the government of the United States that all future purchases of newly mined silver will be paid for by goods manufactured or produced in the United States?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—OPERATING STATISTICS

Mr. VIEN:

1. What were the gross earnings, operating expenses and fixed charges of the Canadian National Railways and subsidiaries, including Canadian government railways, for each year from 1920 to 1938, giving surplus or deficit for each year?

2. What was the operating ratio, year by year, during the same period?

3. What were the gross earnings, operating expenses and fixed charges of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for each year from 1920 to 1938, giving surplus or deficit, for each year?

4. What was the operating ratio, year by year, during the same period?

MONTREAL POST OFFICE—TEMPORARY CHRISTMAS EMPLOYEES

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

1. How many temporary employees were engaged by the Post Office Department during the 1938 Christmas season in the district of Montreal?

2. How many of these employees lived: (a) in Montreal city proper; (b) outside the limits of Montreal; (c) in Verdun city?

3. How many of such employees, in each of the above locations, were returned soldiers, and how many were students?

4. What were the minimum days and maximum days paid to these temporary employees?

5. What was the schedule of wages (minimum and maximum) paid to these employees?

ROWELL COMMISSION—REQUIREMENTS AS TO REPORTS OF ROYAL COMMISSIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. On what date was the Rowell commission appointed, and for what purpose?

2. What has been the total cost to January 1, 1939?

3. Have any interim reports been received? If so, will they be tabled?

4. When will the final report be received?

5. Will the government consider amending the Public Enquiries Act to provide that all commissions appointed under it shall report within ten days of the meeting of parliament?

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—POLICY RESPECTING RECIPROCAL AGREEMENTS WITH OTHER COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) went to considerable pains to state that the domestic policies of any country would not preclude trade with Canada. That is reported in this morning's Gazette under this heading:

No Curb on War Exports to Japan is Intimated by King in Commons.

The article goes on say that the statement of the Prime Minister—

—may be regarded as a final answer to those in parliament who are demanding an embargo on the export of essential war materials to Japan.

Does this properly interpret the Prime Minister's statement?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): What I said yesterday appears in Hansard. From what my hon. friend has read I should think the report to which he has just referred conveys an impression diametrically the opposite to what I said. I was speaking, of course, about the negotiation of trade agreements.

FISHING INDUSTRY

LOSS OF LOBSTER TRAPS AT DEVIL'S ISLAND, HALIFAX HARBOUR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): The other day we had a debate in regard to assistance to the lobster fishermen in the maritimes, and I believe the house was unanimous in agreeing that something should be done. I have received the following telegram, having to do with the same general situation, which I have been asked to bring to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud). It is as follows:

Heavy gale swept coast last night. Lobster fishermen at Devil's Island entrance Halifax harbour lost two hundred traps. No report of damage along the coast as most of gear destroyed in previous gales.

Then it continues:

No action taken so far to replace lost gear. Cannot something be done?

Perhaps the minister would give us some statement in regard to what has been done, following the discussion we had the other day.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): Negotiations are still proceeding with the government of Nova Scotia with a view to helping these fishermen.

ROYAL VISIT TO CANADA

REPORTED INVESTIGATIONS BY MOUNTED POLICE RESPECTING PAST CANDIDATES FOR PUBLIC OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The day before yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) read an item which had appeared in the Ottawa Journal to the effect that members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were busy in various parts of the country which are to be visited next spring by the king and queen, checking on the activities of people who have been candidates for public office and who have expressed certain radical views. I do not know where the Journal secured that information, but I must tell my hon. friend that it is absolutely wrong.

REFERENCES TO THE KING IN CERTAIN UNITED STATES PERIODICALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Postmaster General): I should like to answer a question asked by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) on Tuesday last, as reported at page 919 of Hansard, having to do with an article published in the February issue of Scribner's magazine. The hon. member was kind enough to send me a copy of the article. I have read it over and I agree that it is an extremely flippant article, and in bad taste. This magazine is published in New York city. So far as the Post Office Department is concerned, at one time this magazine did have what is known as the mailing in Canada privilege. It does not enjoy that privilege to-day, which would indicate that it would have to come into Canada by either freight or express. In either event it would not be the duty of the Post Office Department but rather the duty of the Department of National Revenue to check up on any impropriety in the article, and I have brought the matter to the attention of my colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley).

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask a further question on this point. What does the Postmaster General propose to do about the Canadian press which have carried the same article in a dispatch from London, England, which circulated through the mails of Canada?

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. McLARTY: While I am taking the matter into consideration, I doubt if under the definition given in the criminal code the article could be deemed to be seditious. If it is not, I think it will be impossible for the Post Office Department to do anything. I should like, however, to give the matter further consideration.

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT

COST OF INQUIRY—ACCOUNT OF L. A. FORSYTH, K.C., ASSISTANT GOVERNMENT COUNSEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) could give an answer to the question I directed to him a couple of days ago in regard to an account for legal fees amounting to $10,000 reported to have been put in by a gentleman connected with the Bren gun inquiry.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The matter has not been disposed of or adjusted; it is engaging the attention of the department at the present time. As soon as information is available it will be given.

Mr. MANION: The question was whether the account had been received, not whether it had been paid. Did this lawyer put in this account?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Even that is entirely departmental business. As a matter of fact an account has been received, but I do not think I am bound to give the information. The matter is before the department and is confidential until it is adjusted, when the information will be given.

Mr. MANION: But parliament has a right to know some of these things, too.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, it is purely a matter of administration. I have to make a decision myself before acquainting parliament with it.

VALIDITY OF ALBERTA STATUTE

INQUIRY AS TO DISALLOWANCE OF PROVINCIAL MEASURE RESPECTING MORTGAGES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. E. LAWSON (York South): In reply to a question asked last session the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) advised the house that the government was taking into consideration the disallowance of an act passed in Alberta under which, unless a creditor and debtor rearranged their mortgage by agreement, the mortgage would be void. I believe the time for disallowance expires in April of this year. Would the minister be good enough to advise the house whether a decision has been arrived at; if not, will the government arrive at a decision and will the minister advise the house before the expiration of the period within which this measure may be disallowed?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I do not know whether a little bird has whispered to my hon. friend, but the matter is engaging my attention at the present time and I think I shall be able to give my hon. friend the information some time this week.

Mr. LAWSON: I can assure the minister that it was just premonition.

SPANISH CIVIL WAR

COST OF RETURN TO CANADA OF CANADIANS WHO SERVED WITH NATIONALIST GOVERNMENT FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. FLEMING (Humboldt): I should like to ask if the government of Canada has paid the transportation or any other expenses of Canadians who fought with the army of the nationalist government of Spain, from the area of war to their homes in Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The answer is no.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MONTREAL TERMINAL—REFERENCE TO ANSWER GIVEN THIS DAY TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): An answer was given to-day to a question placed on the order paper, and according to the rules I think it is pertinent for me to comment on what I might call the incompleteness of the answer. I think I am justified in making a complaint. Let me read the question and answer complained of:

Was the tender of E. G. M. Cape and Company accepted and at what figure?

The answer was:

The tender of E. G. M. Cape and Company was accepted for a part of the work tendered for.

The remainder of the answer is what I complain about:

It is not the policy of the management to disclose the amount of bids contained in tenders.

This was an accepted tender, and it seems to me I am entitled to an answer to the question: At what figure was the tender accepted? In justice to the house as a whole, and the rights of its members, I protest that this answer is incomplete, and that the question is a proper one within the rules of the house.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): I may say that I have followed the practice, which I think has been in vogue for many years, that of referring questions concerning the operation of the Canadian National railways to the railway management and filing in this house such information as is received from the management. I may point out to my hon. friend that the officers of the railway appear before the railway committee each year, and are then prepared to answer questions of this kind.

Mr. STEVENS: Once again, on a question of the privilege of the house, I think it ought to be made perfectly clear to the minister that if reasonable information is not given in the way I have suggested, it forces those of us who are seeking that information, when the committee is appointed or on the estimates, to enter into a more or less controversial discussion or attack in order to extract the information. I do not wish to do that. I am asking for simple plain information that can be easily given. I think it is in the interests not only of the government but also of the railway management itself that proper questions should be answered in a frank and open way. Otherwise it gives rise to the suspicion or the suggestion that there is something they wish to hide. I am not saying that is so in this case, but I do say it tends to create suspicion and to promote a controversial attitude towards the railways which I think is unfortunate, and which I should regret to be forced into taking.

BARTER IN TRADE

EXCHANGE OF GOODS BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND GERMANY—APPLICATION OF PRINCIPLE TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. FRED JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) based on the Associated Press dispatch from Washington under date of February 13, and published in the Ottawa Journal on the evening of February 14. In brief the article states that Germans are offering to exchange farm machinery and certain other commodities for 50,000 tons of wheat and several thousand tons of lard, the value of which would exceed $30,000,000.

It is also indicated in the dispatch that Secretary of State Hull told a press conference last week that he did not object to pure barter, provided it did not interfere with his trade agreements and provided it was not complicated by artificial currency devices. My question is this: Do Canadian regulations permit of such an exchange of commodities?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, it is. There is no prohibition against the importation of farm machinery from Germany to Canada, and there is nothing to prevent, so far as our regulations are concerned, the exportation of similar products to Germany. It is a matter of arrangement between the importing and exporting interests of the respective countries.

GERMAN ALLEGIANCE

DIPLOMATIC ASPECTS OF APPEAL TO CANADIAN CITIZENS FOR RELIEF ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, is the government prepared to make a statement now with regard to the circular issued by the German consulate at Vancouver and with regard to which I directed a question to the ministry a few days ago?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am not in a position to give my hon. friend a reply at the moment. I have made some communications concerning the matter, to which I have not as yet received replies.

TARIFF BOARD

INQUIRY AFFECTING RADIO INDUSTRY—REPORT ON RADIO TUBES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, when may we expect a report on the inquiry into radio tubes?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I presume the hon. member is referring to the inquiry by the tariff board. I am expecting the report some time during the session, but I cannot say exactly when.

Mr. SPENCE: It is coming up in a week or two.

[Mr. Dunning.]

LOAN OF $750,000,000

TO MEET LOANS OR OBLIGATIONS, TO PURCHASE UNMATURED SECURITIES, AND FOR GENERAL PURPOSES

The house resumed from Friday, February 10, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair:

That the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada, and also for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada, and for public works and general purposes.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, I believe the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Landeryou) had the floor.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question. Would the carrying out of the financial operations indicated by this resolution result in a reduction or an increase in Canada's national debt?

Mr. DUNNING: That is a difficult question to answer. It depends on the extent to which this house votes money for expenditures which, during the period covered, cannot be met out of the current revenues of the country. To that extent the debt of the country may be increased. With regard to the refunding operations, with which the bill is mainly designed to deal, no increase in public debt will be involved.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Does the government intend to set aside any reserve to retire this debt within a period of twenty years?

Mr. DUNNING: I believe I have indicated on a number of occasions my own belief that a sinking fund policy is a desirable one for Canada, and that as soon as the finances of the country reach such a condition that an annual provision for sinking fund against the national debt can be instituted, I personally would favour such a course. I do not think it would be a good thing to get into the position in which other countries having definite sinking fund provisions have found themselves during the past few years. For instance, in Great Britain it has been all too common in recent years for the chancellor of the exchequer, on account of prevailing conditions, to be compelled to ask in his budget for the suspension of the sinking fund provisions for the current year. In the present state of dominion government revenues and expenditures in Canada, it is fairly evident that we should be likely to reach that position if we had in effect a definite sinking fund provision with respect to the whole of our debt.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I have raised that question because I understood that in sound financing it was a cardinal principle that money be set aside in a sinking fund to take care of debt.

Mr. DUNNING: In principle I agree.

Mr. LANDERYOU: In one of the resolutions I notice it is the intention of the government to provide a sinking fund to retire in ten years the sums borrowed for capital expenditures in the Department of National Defence. I had hoped the government would possibly set aside a sinking fund to provide for the retirement of this $750,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: We are making a beginning on the principle in the manner the hon. member has indicated.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I am pleased to note that. Section 91 of the British North America Act reads, in part, as follows:

4. The borrowing of money on the public credit.

Would the minister explain just what we mean by "public credit"?

Mr. DUNNING: When the government of Canada borrows money it pledges the word of the people of Canada, as represented by their duly constituted government, to repay the amount borrowed. The public credit of Canada therefore consists of the obligation which I have just stated, authorized by this parliament.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Could the minister tell the committee just what stands behind the bonds and securities issued against the public credit? Is it just the word of the dominion, or what is it?

Mr. DUNNING: In the last analysis, the good faith of the people of Canada, their willingness as a people to honour their given word.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Would it be fair to say that the natural resources of Canada stand behind the bonds and securities issued by this government?

Mr. DUNNING: That is a highly theoretical question. No securities issued by this dominion constitute a mortgage upon any of the business assets of the dominion. What is given is the word of the people to pay. As I understand it, it is the word of the people that stands behind the bonded obligations of this country.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I am glad to know that it is just the word of the people to pay. At the moment would the minister consider amending the act to provide a sinking fund?

Mr. DUNNING: I have already dealt with that.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask a question founded on the last five words in the resolution, "public works and general purposes." Will the financing of the new station at Montreal be charged up to this program, or will it be charged to income?

Mr. DUNNING: In so far as any Canadian National expenditure is an expenditure by the railway, it will of course be chargeable to the railway and not to this legislation. To the extent to which any part of the work may be a relief project, and therefore chargeable against the general revenues of the country, it would be charged here to the extent to which it may be necessary to borrow to meet that or other obligations.

Mr. CHURCH: The latter part of the resolution reads:

—for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada, and also for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada.

Some of these have been sold privately and many investors have suffered losses of from one to three thousand dollars because of bond payments having to be made in Canadian funds. Will any consideration be given in the new financing to regulate or prevent in the future such losses by reason of exchange differences between New York and Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: I think my hon. friend misunderstands the intent of the words in the resolution to which he has referred. They enable the government to take advantage of the call privilege where it exists in bonds now outstanding. We have a number of issues of bonds in connection with which the government has the right to call after a certain date and at a certain price. That is why those words are in the resolution.

With respect to the question as to losses because of exchange movements, let me say to my hon. friend that any person who buys a bond of the Dominion of Canada can depend upon that bond being paid to him in the terms of the currency called for by the bond itself. That is to say, if a person is the owner of a bond of the Dominion of Canada which is payable in lawful money of the United States, it will be paid in that money regardless of what the rate of exchange may be. If he holds a bond payable in sterling in London, England, he will receive payment in the currency called for by the bond. Similarly, if he is entitled to Canadian funds, that is exactly what he will get.

Mr. STEVENS: Sometimes it is optional.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, there are some bonds that are optional. Certain bonds guarantee payment in terms of United States or sterling currency. I am strongly opposed to issuing that kind of bond, and I do not think it is likely that any more will be issued. The volume of these bonds is being reduced gradually by maturities and by call, but in such cases the Canadian government, in accordance with the terms of the bond, must pay the holder thereof in the currency he chooses to receive. He has the option of being paid in either one of two currencies.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This resolution says, "and for public works and general purposes." Can the minister tell us how much of this money is to be used for public works and general purposes?

Mr. DUNNING: I shall try that again. This is not a spending authority, this is a borrowing authority. The extent to which this will be used to cover expenditures will be determined, not by this legislation but by the amounts voted from time to time by this house in relation to the total revenues received by the dominion. If this house votes an aggregate sum of money going beyond the total revenues of the dominion, then the balance must be borrowed. Similarly, certain expenditures are stated in the estimates to be capital expenditures, against which money is borrowed. It is intended to give to the Department of Finance authority to borrow such moneys as this house from time to time determines shall be raised for the purposes indicated.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Should not parliament be told how much money is to be spent on public works and for other purposes before this measure is passed? There does not seem to me to be any great rush about giving the government power to borrow this money before parliament knows for what it is to be borrowed. I am heartily in accord with the principle of borrowing money for refunding and such purposes, but before we give authority for the borrowing we have a right to know for what purpose the money is being borrowed, especially in the light of conditions as we have them to-day, with the terrible taxes and tremendous debt facing this country.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. STEVENS: I indicated some days ago that I would ask the minister to be good enough to break down this resolution and give us certain information, which would include the information asked for by my hon. friend. If the committee will permit I should like to ask the minister to reply to three or four questions I shall ask along that line.

The resolution states that this money is for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada. Will the minister state what loans or obligations are covered by that particular part of the resolution? I have before me the public accounts, which as near as I can judge show that something in the neighbourhood of $425,000,000 will mature in 1939 and 1940. I understand that this resolution is intended to cover 1940. I should like the minister to give us a list of the maturing obligations which it is intended to retire by this resolution. I shall then follow up with one or two other questions.

Mr. DUNNING: I gave the total the other day, but my hon. friend wants the details. If the committee will remember, I made a division between those which are definitely maturing and those which are callable. I want it to be understood distinctly that with respect to those which are callable, it is a question of merely being in a position to call should it be plain that by so doing money can be saved to the treasury of the dominion.

In giving this information, I shall give only round figures. There is an issue of $137,000,000 of 3½ per cent bonds, which are callable in London on six months' notice on June 1, 1939. There is another issue of $20,000,000 of one per cent bonds, payable in Canada, due on June 1, 1939. Then on July 1 we have 4 per cents due in Canada to the extent of $33,000,000. On October 15 we have 4 per cents due in Canada to the extent of $47,000,000. On October 15 we have 2½ per cent bonds due in Canada to an extent of just short of $8,000,000. On November 15 we we have 2 per cents due in Canada to the extent of $20,000,000. On March 1, 1940, we have 3 per cents maturing and payable in Canada to the extent of $115,000,000. On June 1 we have 1½ per cents payable in Canada to the extent of $80,000,000. On September 1 we have 4½ per cents payable in Canada to the extent of $75,000,000. Also, in London our call privilege with respect to $93,000,000, just about $94,000,000, of 4 per cents, becomes exercisable on October 1. The total of all those is $649,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS: And the callable amounts to $230,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. STEVENS: Leaving about $420,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: About that, except that there are $155,000,000 of treasury bills.

Mr. STEVENS: $155,000,000 of treasury bills; and the $420,000,000 must be met.

Mr. DUNNING: Right.

Mr. STEVENS: And the $155,000,000 must be met.

Mr. DUNNING: I should point out, to make sure that my hon. friend has correct information, that under the appropriation acts the treasury bills are renewable, but if they are funded, or any portion of them, it must be done under this authority.

Mr. STEVENS: I was just going to ask the minister to make that perfectly clear. The treasury bills may be renewed?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: And if they are renewed, is the renewal subtracted from the $750,000,000 for which authority is being asked here?

Mr. DUNNING: Only in case they are funded.

Mr. STEVENS: Otherwise not?

Mr. DUNNING: Otherwise not. The appropriation act covers treasury bills—short-term three months bills—which is what we use, but if they are ever funded it must be under this authority.

Mr. STEVENS: But it is not the general practice to fund them at the present time?

Mr. DUNNING: Not at present.

Mr. STEVENS: In the last year there has been a steady increase in the issue of treasury bills, and I personally approve of the use of them.

Mr. DUNNING: I have used them more in the last two years.

Mr. STEVENS: I agree with that method of financing. The point I wish to make, however, is this: If you take all the treasury bills and all the maturing loans, it accounts for $575,000,000, which leaves $175,000,000 of free money; that is $175,000,000 in respect of which authority will be given to the minister. He may use that in part for taking up callable loans.

Mr. DUNNING: I may use it all for that.

Mr. STEVENS: In this resolution we have what the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) referred to a moment ago, namely, authority in respect of "public works and general purposes." What proportion of this $750,000,000 is to be devoted to public works and general purposes?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend has had experience as a minister of the crown, and I am sure he knows well the answer to his own question.

Mr. STEVENS: I do, pretty well.

Mr. DUNNING: He knows that this is not a spending authority but a borrowing authority. He knows, moreover, that every government periodically, as and when its authority already existing expired, had to come back to parliament to get further borrowing authority, which had nothing whatever to do with the government's spending authority, the latter being derived from the appropriation acts based upon what this parliament votes every session for expenditure. My hon. friend knows that I cannot possibly tell him the answer to his question. No one ever could, and in my experience this is the first time that an effort has been made to involve the question of the general borrowing authority with that of the spending authority, which is otherwise provided for by this parliament. I am sure my hon. friend knows that there is no means of answering his question.

Mr. STEVENS: I will tell the minister just why I am exhibiting this high degree of ignorance.

Mr. DUNNING: Which he doubts.

Mr. STEVENS: He is quite correct in saying that I understand it quite fully. Perhaps I understand it a little more clearly than I ought to, for the convenience of the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: That is impossible.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister tell us what proportion of the amounts in previous appropriation acts is still available?

Mr. DUNNING: About $36,000,000 as at February 1.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not very much.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEVENS: It does not materially affect the situation. I appreciate what the minister has said, and he is quite correct in his statement that this is an authorization to borrow. But if this borrowing power is not granted, obviously the government cannot go ahead with appropriations without knowing that the minister has authority to cover any expenditures that are made. That is, I think, correct.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no easier way of tying up the business of the country that I know of.

Mr. STEVENS: I am informed, and I think I am not very far out, that the government has in preparation a large public works program amounting to something in the neighbourhood of $100,000,000. I understand that the amount at present before the government is some $112,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: How does my hon. friend know?

Mr. STEVENS: I have made a shrewd guess at it, and the minister knows I am not very far out.

Mr. DUNNING: It is wholly imaginary.

Mr. STEVENS: We will let that pass. It is true that the minister, as the watch dog of the treasury, will probably sift that down considerably, but what I am concerned about is this: If we give the minister this authority to borrow for public works and general purposes, and he has there a sum amounting to about $175,000,000 which may be used for those purposes, I think we are entitled to know what the special supplementary estimates are going to be before the bill founded on this resolution is passed—either that or the minister should state clearly what proportion of this amount will be used for these purposes. The minister, of course is in an advantageous position. He can laugh at me; he can make light of it, because perhaps a month or two will pass before these very luscious supplementary estimates are brought down. But I have been here long enough to know that in a session preceding an anticipated election, usually a very fine, fat, supplementary public works estimate is brought down. I am not particularly objecting to that provided that the public works estimates this year are directed towards the relief of unemployment. What I do and shall object to is the voting of huge sums of money to be distributed among the constituencies of Canada in a manner best calculated to bring the greatest possible influence to bear upon the electorate in favour of the government. That is what I object to, and that is why I think we are entitled to a clear statement as to what proportion of this authorization will be available for those purposes. The minister is very fair and very courteous, and I compliment him in that regard. But all we know is that the $575,000,000 is clearly provided for, except that of the $155,000,000 of treasury bills, I imagine that at least $100,000,000 will be renewed.

Mr. DUNNING: It depends on the circumstances.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but from my experience I would say that at least $100,000,000 will be renewed, which means that only $475,000,000 out of this $750,000,000 is actually allocated. That is giving a wide authority to the minister, putting him in a pretty secure position to carry out any appropriation which the government may choose to bring down.

Mr. DUNNING: Any appropriation which parliament passes.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, with 175-odd members behind the government—

Mr. EULER: They aren't so "odd."

Mr. STEVENS: —obviously interested in patronage, it is pretty well assured to the government that they will pass anything that is brought down—with the old back-slapping, log-rolling processes which are so well known to this and other parliaments. I do not specify any particular party, but at the moment it happens to be the Liberal party; and I know, and the minister knows, that if they bring down a supplementary estimate it will go through exactly as it comes down. It is a rare thing to have it changed; and with the anxiety of the supporters of the government for a share of this large public works appropriation, there is no question about what is going to be done. Parliament—and I include hon. gentlemen sitting on this side—is merely a cipher as far as the passing of that appropriation is concerned. They will have no more influence on it than the young people down in the Lisgar high school, and the minister knows it.

Mr. DUNNING: No, I cannot confirm that.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, the minister would not confirm it.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish I could.

Mr. STEVENS: He knows it is true.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, I may talk and my hon. friends may talk for a few weeks.

Mr. DUNNING: But my hon. friend said, "members."

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly—members. I say that hon. members on this side of the house will exercise no more influence on the supplementary estimates when they come down than the high school pupils at the Lisgar school.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, I have yet to meet a member of the house on the other side who did not want some money spent. They are all demanding it.

Mr. HEAPS: "All"?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes—the hon. member as well.

Mr. HEAPS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: It happens that I am referring to the 175 supporters of the government in the house. However, that does not alter my opinion that we are entitled this afternoon to a definite statement as to what proportion of this huge sum of $750,000,000 may reasonably be expected to be used for the purposes I have mentioned. Further, I think the minister ought to give the committee the assurance that it will not go beyond a certain figure, because we are asked to vote a very large sum. The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Landeryou), I think it was, a few moments ago asked whether the passing of this motion would increase or decrease the public debt. The minister knows perfectly well that it will substantially increase the public debt.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not prepared to say that.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister may not admit it.

Mr. DUNNING: I gave the answer.

Mr. STEVENS: I know. But I can take these figures again and go over them. If it is agreed that all the $155,000,000 of treasury bills are to be paid—which they are not; if it is agreed that the $230,000,000 of callable loans are to be bought in, then you have the answer. But I say,—and I want it on record, because unquestionably there will be a review of this some other time, whether I am here or not,—that a comparatively small proportion of the $230,000,000 is likely to be called, and a very substantial proportion of the $155,000,000 will be renewed and will not affect this appropriation at all. We know only of about $475,000,000 that is actually needed for this appropriation; the balance of it might all come—taking the extreme view—under the last few words, "public works and general purposes."

Mr. DUNNING: And it would not authorize the spending of a dollar.

Mr. STEVENS: No, no. The minister is always clear and I need not clarify what he says, but let me analyse a bit that repeated excuse. Of course parliament has to make the appropriations.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: I have already pointed out, what every hon. member knows, that the estimates I hold in my hand, covering some hundreds of items, will pass, as to every last one of those items. Why? Because this is a government measure. I will venture to say, from my experience of twenty-eight years in this house, that during that period estimates have not been changed more than half a dozen times. I doubt if it is half a dozen. I remember a few, but very few occasions, and then it was only by way of changing the wording of the estimate. I think I can recall two such cases.

Mr. DUNNING: I have moved more than once to reduce.

Mr. STEVENS: I know, but it did not pass.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, yes—corrections or adjustments, voluntarily made by the government. But very seldom are there changes. And when the government's supplementary estimates come down it will be towards the end of the session, when the heat comes on, when we are all anxious to go, when the ranks are very thin, when the committees are sitting, and there is a bare quorum in this chamber.

Mr. DUNNING: Right now I will give my hon. friend the assurance that the supplementaries will not be delayed that long.

Mr. STEVENS: I am very glad to hear that, but I should like to see them down before this resolution passes, so that we can have a look at them. However, I repeat that when that supplementary comes down it will pass as a matter of course.

The minister talks about appropriations. Of course these appropriations are made by parliament; but, as I said a moment ago, they are made by the government, supported by their followers in the house, and they pass as a matter of course.

Mr. LANDERYOU: May I ask the hon. member for Kootenay East if he is in favour of the method proposed by the resolution of raising this $750,000,000?

Mr. STEVENS: Well, the method is not disclosed, but I will say this—

Mr. LANDERYOU: The resolution reads, "by way of loan"—borrowing.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so. That part of the matter has not been under discussion, but I am quite willing to discuss it. I think that the major portion of it will have to be raised in what is known as the orthodox method, the method which has been followed throughout the years; that is, by the government issuing securities, either short term securities in the way of treasury bills or longer term securities sold on the market in the usual way. Personally I have long held the view that we should make more use of the method of raising money by way of treasury bills.

Mr. DUNNING: We have gone further in that direction than any other government ever went.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. Up to about a year ago there were only about thirty or forty million dollars of treasury bills, and now there are outstanding about $160,000,000 of treasury bills. But ever since the war the British government have had outstanding in treasury bills upwards of £800,000,000, and sometimes it has gone over £900,000,000. That money is raised at from half of one per cent to about one per cent. I doubt whether the British government during that time has paid more than one per cent on treasury bills. The minister is paying now, I think, somewhere around three-quarters of one per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Two-thirds of one per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: If I were in the minister's place I would increase the financing of this country by treasury bills. That is one thing. And I would go further. If the minister accepted my advice he would endeavour in this period of stress, provided he had a policy that would tend to the permanent relief of this unemployment question—which the government now have not—

An hon. MEMBER: They have.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, no; not by a long way. They have no permanent policy; they have a policy of palliatives, that is all.

Mr. GOLDING: Is there such a thing as a permanent policy in any country in the world?

Mr. STEVENS: If the hon. member has in mind a sort of eternal policy I would not say there is; I do not pretend to say that. But coming to something more than mere palliatives, I think measures can be adopted which might be termed permanent. If they had a policy—leaving out the word permanent—to deal with the unemployment question, then I would not hesitate to enlarge the currency in the hands of the public, and that can be done without any inflation. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), a colleague of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), named a figure to which he said he would go, which I would not at the moment name as my figure. He is about four times more generous, more optimistic, more wild than I am. One need only read the pledges of the Minister of National Defence before the last election.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I may tell my hon. friend that my figures were founded on the scientific currency basis adopted at the world conference of 1933.

Mr. STEVENS: Splendid; and my hon. friend was right. But I would not go quite as fast or as far as he, prior to the election, pledged himself to go.

Mr. DUNNING: But my hon. friend would not agree with him at all when he proposed it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, in justice to my hon. friend I think at the conference of 1932 he proposed a resolution on the same basis, subsequently adopted in 1933. Is not that correct?

Mr. STEVENS: No, not quite. The resolution adopted in the conference in 1932 was that there should be an easy money policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I thought the basis was twenty-five per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: No, that was laid down at the international conference in 1933. On that basis we have a wide margin. I am not suggesting that we go that far. I do suggest however that we should go a measurable distance towards it, because as I pointed out the other day we have in the hands of the public in Canada only about half as much circulating media per capita as they have in such countries as Great Britain, the United States and Australia.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my friend permit me to say that his information regarding that is slightly in error. I shall deal with it later.

Mr. STEVENS: All I can say is that four years ago I took a great deal of time and trouble, with the assistance of the bureau of statistics, in working that matter out. Last spring I verified my figures and brought them down to date. If they are brought down to the present day there may be some slight variation—

Mr. DUNNING: Quite a big difference in one case.

Mr. STEVENS: —because in the United States there has been inflation of a kind during the last year. But taking it as about a year ago, my figures are accurate, because they are based upon a very careful computation by experts and authorities. But answering my hon. friend's question, I would use that measure to a certain extent. I would not use it recklessly; I would not suggest that we should go in for inflation at all. But keeping well within the bounds of orthodox financing as laid down by the international conference, as laid down by orthodox financing in London, New York and Australia, using those three countries as a comparison, I would certainly use some of our powers in that regard in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is very cautious.

Mr. STEVENS: I am glad the minister thinks so.

Mr. DUNNING: He is going to try to satisfy everyone with that.

Mr. STEVENS: No, the minister cannot suggest that.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I should like to ask the hon. member a question on this point. Would he be prepared to go so far as to have our financial system accurately reflect our real ability to produce goods and services in this country?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend knows that I should very gladly answer any question that it is within my power to answer, but he knows also that to start on that question would take an hour's explanation and analysis.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I just wanted to determine the bounds the hon. member would lay down.

Mr. STEVENS: I would keep within reasonable bounds.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What does the hon. member mean by reasonable bounds?

Mr. STEVENS: I think I would be somewhere between the wild optimism of the Minister of National Defence and the reactionary position of the Minister of Finance. And I think I would be in a pretty safe position.

Mr. HEAPS: Safe, between the two of them?

Mr. DUNNING: There is room for you here.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You had better come over.

Mr. STEVENS: No, but I have an idea that if the Minister of National Defence were in his right place in keeping with his financial policy he would be along with our friends to the left, the social crediters, and the Minister of Finance would be sitting here.

Mr. DUNNING: No, never.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. For an old country Gladstonian Liberal, of the Walter Scott Liberalism of Saskatchewan—

Mr. DUNNING: First class Liberalism, too.

Mr. STEVENS: —the Minister of Finance could not be recognized to-day for what he was in those grand days.

Mr. DUNNING: I could quote Gladstone by the yard in support of exactly what I am doing in the matter of financial policy. And he was the greatest finance minister the British empire ever had.

Mr. STEVENS: I will agree that Gladstone was one of the greatest finance ministers, and I remember that Gladstone looked with horror at the commencement of income tax. He thought it was a revolutionary thing, a terrible thing, but I believe he did ultimately introduce it.

Mr. DUNNING: Succession duties, too.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister may be referring to the beginning of Gladstone's career or the end, but wherever the minister was, he was a good Gladstonian Liberal—

Mr. DUNNING: He is still.

Mr. STEVENS: —and now in his financial administration he is an ultra reactionary. But I do not want to get away from the purpose of my remarks. I want the minister to tell us what proportion of this $750,000,000 will be allocated to public works and general purposes.

Mr. DUNNING: If I am to answer all these questions I hope the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Landeryou) will give me opportunity to do so by instalments. In the first place let me congratulate the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) upon once more posing very cleverly that question: Have you stopped beating your wife? He knows that is exactly what he is doing. The purpose is to convey to the country the impression that the opposition is vigilant to prevent undue expenditure of public money, as of course an opposition has a perfect right to be.

My hon. friend in his references to supplementary estimates yet to come is either calling upon his own memory of his experience as a member of a Conservative government, or upon his imagination. He knows that I find it very difficult to answer him categorically with respect to supplementary estimates which may be in contemplation, without breaking my oath of office. He knows that I cannot be as frank as a finance minister would always like to be with respect to efforts to control public expenditure. He knows that as well as or better than I know it myself. I said once before in this parliament, and I repeat to-day—nobody will like it but it is the truth—that parliaments came into existence originally having as one of their primary purposes that of preventing the king from spending too much of the people's money. Parliament has changed; it has become a body demanding of the king, as represented by the government of the day, that more and more of the people's money be spent. And that is not confined to any one government or any one party in this house; we all know that it is the public demand upon the membership here. Again I say, however, when my hon. friend indicates some knowledge on his part which I do not at the moment possess, as to what the government contemplates bringing down in the form of supplementary estimates, that it is pure imagination or is based upon his experience of the methods followed by the government of which he was a member.

Mr. STEVENS: Based upon twenty-eight years of experience in this house.

Mr. DUNNING: Now, to come to the point of my hon. friend's impossible demand, I am prepared to take him at his word, if he so desires, if he speaks for all on that side of the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DUNNING: —when he says that before we pass this borrowing authority we must know every dollar that the government proposes to spend by way of main and supplementary estimates during the present year. The opposition have a perfect right to take that stand if they wish to do so, and if they so wish we can avoid wasting a great deal of the money of the people in a long discussion here by my undertaking right now to stop this discussion at this point and proceed no further with the bill until the supplementary estimates are down. I am quite prepared to do that, but only if it will save a great deal of unnecessary talk and expense. My hon. friend well knows that during all the years he was a member of the government of Canada the borrowing authority was never seized upon by the opposition as one of the means of controlling expenditures, but they have a perfect right to do so. My hon. friend may exercise that right now if he wishes, but I do submit to him and to others who hold his views that if that is the desire it is better to attain it by my consenting to hold back the legislation right now, instead of wasting hours of time and then reaching that conclusion anyway. If this house really desires to see all the government estimates before granting this general borrowing and refunding authority I am prepared to hold back this measure until that time, purely in the interests of getting on with the business of the house.

Now I should like to answer the specific questions. A question was asked the other day, and it was referred to again to-day by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), with respect to the amount of currency in circulation in various countries. The hon. gentleman sought to prove by the figures he gave that we could stand a further measure of currency inflation. I draw attention to that because of course there is a distinction between currency inflation and currency and credit inflation.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course I did not use the word "inflation."

Mr. DUNNING: No, but I think my hon. friend indicated a willingness—well, his language was so carefully guarded in his effort to appeal to the extreme left on the one hand and not to offend St. James street on the other that it was rather difficult to know exactly what he did mean.

Mr. STEVENS: It was my hon. friend I did not want to offend.

Mr. DUNNING: As to being reactionary in my own person, I will let the Canadian people judge me and my works, as to whether or not I am reactionary; and they will do that.

Mr. LANDERYOU: They would if they knew the facts.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend might, but thank goodness he is not the people of Canada, and I have plenty of evidence to that effect.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The same applies to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly. Now, with respect to the volume of currency in circulation, the other day the hon. member for Kootenay East said the circulation of currency in the hands of the public in Great Britain was $41 per capita; in the United States, about $42; in Australia about $40 and in Canada, about $22. He is in error with respect to Australia, where the figure is approximately $21 instead of $40. In other words Australia is very similar to Canada in regard to the amount of currency in circulation.

There is one explanation as to why we have less currency in circulation in this country than they have in the United States. There is a different explanation with respect to Great Britain. The explanation with regard to the United States is one with which every hon. member of this house who thinks is familiar. The Canadian public have a great deal more confidence in their banking system than the people of the United States have in the banking system of that country. The hoarding of actual currency in the United States is known and acknowledged by the United States authorities to be very large indeed, whereas the deserved and continued confidence of the Canadian people in the Canadian banking system has involved an ever-increasing growth in the use of checking accounts instead of piling up large volumes of currency.

With respect to Great Britain, for a different set of reasons altogether the British people have not come along in the use of checking accounts to anything like the extent to which that method has been used in this country. Just here I should like to quote from the December bulletin of the United States federal reserve system touching on this exact point in connection with the volume of currency in circulation in that country. This bulletin is authoritative; as hon. members know, the federal reserve system is a governmental institution in that country. The bulletin states:

> The higher level of currency in circulation that has been maintained since 1936 at about $2,000,000,000 above that of 1929 represents increases both in large-denomination currency and in coin and small-denomination bills. The increase in large bills reflects in part the holding of savings in the form of currency rather than in bank deposits, securities, or other property. The banking difficulties in the early thirties may be partly responsible for the increase in the volume of savings held in currency rather than in banks, notwithstanding the safeguarding of bank deposits after 1933 by federal deposit insurance. Another factor is probably the reduction in interest rates paid on savings and other time deposits.

I would direct attention to the fact that the $2,000,000,000 there noted as the increase in United States circulation since 1936 would account for approximately $16 per capita of the difference between that country's per capita circulation of currency and the circulation of currency in Canada.

I do not know that there is anything I can add to what has been said already, except this one point which I overlooked. I was asked the other day as to the proportion of Canada's funded debt which was held in Canada and the proportion payable in other countries. I have the figure here somewhere and will be glad to place it on record. Without waiting to find that figure I would say that as things stand at present, seventy-five per cent of the funded debt of Canada is due and payable to Canadian people in Canada. That, I think, is a record of which we have no reason to be ashamed.

There is just one other point bearing on the same question. The other day the hon. member for Kootenay East asked us to give consideration to whether or not Canadians should increase their indebtedness to the United States. At that time I indicated to him that all the matters to which he referred were of necessity receiving constant study at the hands of the experts of the finance department, the officers of the central bank and, necessarily, myself. I can tell him now that the latest information with respect to the movement in that regard, developed by the bureau of statistics, indicated that there has been a net reduction of Canada's indebtedness abroad—I am speaking now not of the government alone but of all indebtedness abroad by all Canadians—of $524,000,000 during the past five years.

I indicated to my hon. friend, who expressed some doubt the other day, that I was quite sure that there had been during the last few years a continuous reduction in the balance of indebtedness in foreign countries against the Canadian people. This is the figure vouched for by the bureau of statistics in that regard: $524,800,000, in the last five years.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister permit a question?—because we want to keep the record straight. The minister began his answer by referring to the United States. The figures he gave apply to all countries.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, quite.

Mr. STEVENS: It would be a misleading situation.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. If I indicated the United States alone, I was wrong. It is our general international balance.

Mr. STEVENS: No; I do not wish the minister to think I misquoted him. I have said that he commenced his answer to me on the question of the indebtedness of Canada to the United States. And then, without differentiating, he led up to the total reduction. Would he indicate the amount of reduction to the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: One cannot possibly do that. As my hon. friend knows, many of these movements are three-cornered. For instance no one can tell precisely the domicile at this time of any Canadian bond which is payable either in London or in New York. It might be in the hands of a Canadian in Canada, of an American in the United States, or of a Britisher in London; it is impossible to say. We can approach the matter only from the point of view of our net foreign position. As I say, our net foreign position has steadily improved—and I am speaking not governmentally only, but with respect to the indebtedness of all Canadians abroad.

There are other matters which should be taken into consideration, such as payments mentioned the other day by the hon. member, the balance with respect to sales and purchases of securities, and other capital movements such as the international operation of banks, the balance of payments on insurance company accounts, and the Canadian companies for branches or subsidiaries abroad. The bureau's estimate in that regard brings up the total to a reduction of $900,000,000 in our indebtedness abroad during the past five years.

I place that information on Hansard not so much for the purpose of indicating opposition to the views held by my hon. friend—because I cordially welcome study by the Canadian people of the intricate problems connected with the movement of capital, and their relationship to the well-being of the country. Of course the tendency is to pick up an isolated fact, which appears by its nature to support the particular panacea which one may have in mind, and to base an argument upon it. That is a habit which is all too common. I can only assure the hon. member, in spite of his accusations of reaction on my part, that practically my whole time now is spent, and for the last three years has been spent, in a constant study of all of the complex factors which enter into problems of this nature. And I can assure the committee that from day to day they are getting not less complex, but more so. In an attempt to define a policy for this country one has to study at all times not only the immediate effect of that policy upon this country, but its relationship to a welter of other movements and other problems in other countries.

Frankly I confess—and this is not saying too much—that I cannot study any problem of finance at this time, even a problem of internal finance, on any large scale, without making and having my experts make a most careful study of the international exchange situation, not only as it is at the present time but as it may be in any measurable period in the future. Everyone knows how difficult it is in these days even to reach an approximation of what might be involved in a consideration of that kind.

The movement of securities, the decision as to whether or not one should exercise a call privilege—related as it is to the conditions in the place where you are going to attempt to raise money, for the purpose of exercising your call privilege—the bearing of all that upon the international exchange movement, and the question whether you may not lose more on exchange in the long run than you save at the moment on your cash transaction—those things are not simple. They do not fall within the limits of a single panacea or a single formula.

We are in an era of managed currency. What does that mean? It means that every country is managing its currency according to the ideas of those at the moment responsible for its government. But none of us has any assurance that the ideas which are guiding the management of currency, credit and money in any country to-day will be the ideas which will be governing six months or twelve months from to-day.

I know someone will call me reactionary if I point to the fact that when all acknowledged gold as having a certain controlling influence, so long as nations adhered to that principle, the problem was much more simple than it is to-day. Management means the operation by men's minds, as they are at present, with respect to the segment of monetary management which is under their control—the segment which relates to their own country. And it is necessary therefore, in the best interests of all those countries, for each at all times to endeavour to have an understanding of the monetary mentality of all the rest, and how it may be expected to operate within a measurable period in the future.

That is one of the great difficulties which has been created, alongside of some of the advantages which have been secured by the abandonment of gold as the internationally-agreed-upon controller of exchange and of monetary values. I am not now arguing that it is possible to get back to an international gold standard. But I am saying—and I say this particularly to hon. members in the corner, and certainly not in criticism of them—that monetary management in this country alone, along any line very much more radical than that now being pursued, creates a welter of problems, because the monetary management of countries with which Canada must do business is not being carried on along the same lines.

What I mean by that—and I do not want this to be taken as a generalization—is that any person in the position in which I am to-day, in formulating Canada's policy must have regard to what is practicable with relation to those countries with which we have the largest trading and financial relations. A man who ignored that and who proceeded to put into effect in Canada any idealistic monetary theory, which would possibly work if all the world accepted it, would find it impossible effectively to do so in relation to this country alone, without creating untold harm and misery for the Canadian people. I say that in all seriousness with respect to any policy which would differ widely in essence from the policies common in the countries with which we must do business. The world must endeavour to march forward in reasonable co-operation; we may not be able to go back to a gold standard. It is engaged in attempting to manage money by means of the minds of men who are in control for the time being. We may look back with some longing to the comparatively easy days of gold standard currency. I do not say that it is practicable to get back there; I do not even argue that it would be desirable to get back there, but I do point out that the world has started on a great experiment which has revealed already such a degree of diversity of view among those charged with the management of currency and credit in the various countries as to involve grave dangers to the common people of the countries concerned. After all, it is the common people who always pay the piper for monetary mistakes.

Mr. STEVENS: I should not like the minister to close his remarks and leave the committee with the impression that I was, shall I say, seeking to misrepresent him. In the first place, the minister put it almost in the form of a threat—

Mr. DUNNING: No—

Mr. STEVENS: —that he would drop this resolution until such time as the supplementary estimates had come down.

Mr. DUNNING: I offered to do so. I did not threaten.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister added to it the statement that he would like to get along with the business of the house, and the inference was that this would be obstructing the business of the house. My own view is, and I speak for myself only, that it would be better for all concerned, that it would be better for parliament, if we had the supplementary estimates before this was disposed of.

Mr. DUNNING: If that is the general agreement, I am content.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not suggest that that is the view of all hon. members on this side, because I am not speaking for them. The minister made a statement with regard to external loans; he said that there had been a reduction of Canada's obligation abroad by $500,000,000 in the last five years. I have not had an opportunity or the time to check the figures. The minister has not referred at all to the point I raised the other day. I asked whether it was advisable for Canada to continue borrowing in the United States in the light of the heavy indebtedness of Canada to the United States, and the further fact that we were not able by an interchange of goods to meet our obligations in the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: And I agreed with my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: To-day the minister's remarks would seem to indicate that I was wrong in my position. His statement is that there has been a substantial reduction, and therefore we have nothing to worry about. The minister is unable to give the figures. I may say I have studied these figures, perhaps not as closely as the minister, and I question whether our indebtedness to the United States has been diminished at all in the last five or ten years. If it has been, it is because of the shrinkage in the value of securities due to the depression and the failure of a number of institutions which had borrowed in the United States. There may be a shrinkage in that regard, but in so far as repayment or discharge of these obligations is concerned, I question whether there has been any reduction. It must be remembered that we owe Great Britain something in the neighbourhood of $2,500,000,000. The minister knows, and anyone who has studied this matter knows perfectly well, that there are no precise statistics.

Mr. DUNNING: Only the totals for all countries.

Mr. STEVENS: There are no precise statistics upon which those totals can be based. There are estimates and calculations, and so on, which I think are reasonably accurate. However, when anyone by an analysis of these balances says that we have reduced our obligations by $500,000,000 or $100,000,000 or any other figure, that statement is not necessarily an accurate one. No one knows exactly what has happened. The point I was getting at the other day, and which I reiterate now, was this. Our indebtedness to the United States is so heavy that I question the advisability of raising additional loans in that country. The minister agreed with me the other day. The minister may not think it advisable to do so at this time, but I should like to know if he can intimate whether he intends to borrow any substantial portion of this $750,000,000 in the United States, or whether it would be preferable again to open up our borrowing in Great Britain.

At this point I should like to ask the minister if he has considered the brief that I sent to him last year and which I was prevented from presenting in the house because the subject was sub judice. That brief referred to the Grand Trunk shareholders. In my opinion that matter is at the root of the difficulty of Canadian financing in London. I believe that if we were to remove that obstacle we could open up again the British market for borrowing. It would be infinitely better for Canada to secure its financial requirements in London. We sell Great Britain from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000 more goods than we buy, roughly speaking. She is a good customer. In other words, that is a market which is open to us where we are unable to pay back our indebtedness in goods. It is more or less an open market. The reverse is true of the United States. Therefore it is advisable for Canada to borrow its capital requirements in the British financial market if at all possible. If there is anything we can do to reopen that market, it ought to be done. I am not going to discuss the Grand Trunk shareholders' matter to-day—

Mr. DUNNING: That would be going too far.

Mr. STEVENS: Possibly, but I think it might well be brought in under the argument I am now making. I shall probably do that on some other occasion, because it is a matter which I think ought to be discussed in the house. If the minister could indicate whether he will seek this financing in the United States or in Great Britain, it would be desirable.

The minister referred to certain recent increases in the amount of currency in the United States and Canada. The spread between the amount of currency in the hands of the public in Great Britain and the United States and Canada is something that deserves careful study. If within the ambit of the international conference decision as to what is reasonably safe in the way of gold reserve we can expand the currency issue in Canada, I think it ought to be done. Last year when discussing this subject the minister constantly used the word "inflation" and he used it again to-day. I object to that because I am not suggesting inflation in the ordinary interpretation of the word. Inflation is where you get beyond the realm of recognized safety. I say further that you can have inflation of credit just as easily as you can have inflation of currency.

Mr. DUNNING: Easier.

Mr. STEVENS: That is really what happened in 1929. Probably that was the main cause of the collapse of the financial market at that time. I want to make it very clear that I am not talking about inflation.

Mr. DUNNING: Either of credit or of currency?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. DUNNING: We are not so far apart.

Mr. STEVENS: Not very far, but there is a substantial percentage of difference. I think we should go a long way towards improving conditions in Canada if we had a little broader and easier policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A scientific expansion of the currency.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. I am not as much alarmed about managed currency as my hon. friend seems to be. Do not let us forget that we are off the gold standard. Here is a question I should like to put to the minister. Why is it that Canada has tied itself to the American dollar?

Mr. DUNNING: Canada has not.

Mr. STEVENS: I am going to propound a phenomena which exists at the present time. Since the Prime Minister was in New York and Washington, since the signing of the treaty down to the present time, while sterling has fallen as low as $4.50—it is around $4.70 to-day—Canada has not followed sterling down at all. Canada's dollar stayed within a fraction of New York, and no one will persuade me that without some artificial action on the part of the banks of Canada or the Bank of Canada in connection with our relation to United States exchange, Canada's dollar would not have followed sterling down to a certain extent, although perhaps not as rapidly as sterling went.

I say further, because I disagree with the general course followed in 1931, and I disagree with the course to-day, that in the last five months the Canadian exporter, and the Canadian government is an exporter of wheat, has lost a very considerable sum of money. We might just as well have been paid with a dollar that was tied to sterling, which would have greatly benefited the primary producer, as to have been paid with a dollar that was tied to New York.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not tied to New York.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister says it is not tied to New York.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): When the opposition of that day suggested that course, they were condemned by the government.

Mr. STEVENS: And I say very frankly that I disagreed with that attitude.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. STEVENS: We should have followed sterling.

Mr. DUNNING: May I rise to correct an impression given by my hon. friend which would be detrimental to the best interests of Canada. I want to state categorically and positively that the Canadian dollar is not tied at this moment, nor has it been, either to the United States dollar, on the one hand, or to the pound sterling on the other. I state that on my responsibility as minister, with the utmost positiveness.

Mr. STEVENS: All right, I accept the minister's statement that it is not tied.

Mr. DUNNING: Don't do the country harm.

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot allow that to pass.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, my hon. friend stated that he knew that it was tied.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say that. I said that no one could persuade me that it was not tied. The minister says: Don't do the country harm.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not mean that, offensively.

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot see that it is going to do this country any harm to discuss the situation frankly.

Mr. DUNNING: But to state what is not true may do the country harm.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister says it is not true. He says the Canadian dollar is not tied to New York. All right. But the fact is that the Canadian dollar has stayed within half of one per cent of New York. It has been down varying from two to four-sixteenths, and it rarely went above one per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Not often.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not recall its doing so. Most of the time it was five or seven-sixteenths off New York. What I do say is that if the Canadian dollar had been allowed to follow sterling—

Mr. DUNNING: Allowed? It was positively not prevented from doing so.

Mr. STEVENS: I will put it in another way. If the Canadian dollar had been tied to sterling we would have been infinitely better off in this country, to the extent of millions of dollars in the hands of our producers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is definitely true of 1931.

Mr. STEVENS: I will tell my hon. friend that if on September 21, 1931, when Great Britain went off the gold standard, Canada had followed sterling, it would have put millions of dollars into the hands of the people of this country. Exactly the same condition prevails to-day.

Mr. DUNNING: Nonsense.

Mr. STEVENS: In the last few months, exactly the same position. If we were tied to sterling, Canadian producers to-day would be receiving a substantial increase of income.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Did my hon. friend not vote against a resolution moved by the then member for Macleod, and supported by the Liberal opposition of that day, advocating that very policy in 1931?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not recall it. But suppose I did; my hon. friend knows very well that I was a member of the government, and I had to agree with what was done or get out. Ultimately I did get out. But that is not the point. I say that that was my opinion then, and it is my opinion to-day, whether it is done or not. I say that if we were tied to sterling, not merely the pound sterling but to the sterling area, which includes not only Great Britain, but Norway, Sweden, the Scandinavian countries, Holland to a certain extent, Belgium, and all the British colonies, the primary producer in this country would be greatly benefited. Of course there would be some slight handicap on those who have to pay on securities in New York. But I think it would be an advantage to half the population in Canada, our agricultural population, in the prices they would receive for their meat products, their cheese and their butter, their wheat and other primary products, and surely that would more than offset the disadvantage on the financial side.

I am not for one moment, as I said the other day, criticizing the banking institutions, because their business is to look after their own interests. But it is the business of this parliament and of this government to hold things in balance and equity among the various conflicting interests in this country, and for that reason I would welcome some indication from the minister that he intends in this instance to seek to reinstate Canada's place in the London market and that, if it can be brought about, the Canadian dollar will be tied to sterling.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to prolong the out-of-order discussion which is now proceeding, and for which I am perhaps as much responsible as anyone else. But is my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) enunciating the policy of his party when he says that we should tie the Canadian dollar to sterling? I want to know, and the people of Canada want to know.

Mr. STEVENS: I will answer. What difference does it make whether I am speaking for the Conservative party or for myself?

Mr. DUNNING: No difference at all.

Mr. STEVENS: I stated at the outset that I was giving my own opinion. I am not speaking for the Conservative party; I am speaking for myself.

Mr. DUNNING: I thought my hon. friend was speaking as the financial critic of his party—

Mr. STEVENS: No, just as a private member.

Mr. DUNNING: —and therefore with some responsibility as to policy. I will answer him at once and say that this government does not believe, under the conditions now prevailing, or under the conditions which have prevailed since we came into office, in tying the Canadian dollar to any other currency anywhere, whether it be the pound sterling or the American dollar. I would earnestly submit to this committee that the moment we do so we abdicate the function with which the Canadian people have entrusted us, namely that of managing our own currency. We cease to manage it ourselves the moment we tie it up to any other currency. At the present time the Canadian dollar rides on the tide of trade. It is not tied to any other currency, and I think any student of present conditions would question the desirability of tying it either to the United States dollar on the one hand or to the pound sterling on the other.

My hon. friend painted an alluring picture of the benefits to be derived from tying our dollar to a depreciated pound. He spoke, as many do, of the advantages to certain groups of producers, and of the disadvantage to those having securities payable in terms of United States currency. He did not mention at all the effect it would have upon all the people of Canada who are consumers. He did not mention at all the fact that depreciating our currency in relation to the United States dollar at this minute would impose a protective tariff much more effective than anything we have. To the extent of the difference between the depreciated Canadian dollar and the United States dollar it would impose a tariff against all imports entering this country, without, in so doing, bringing in a cent of revenue to the Canadian treasury, but definitely increasing the cost of all domestic commodities which have to be purchased which are governed by the cost of imported commodities. The thing is not so easy as that. If it were, does anybody suppose that any government would not desire to get additional returns for primary producers of exportable products? Would it not be something that we would jump at? My hon. friend well knows that it is much more complicated in its essence than that. In my best judgment, advising the government on these matters, with conditions as they are to-day, it would be definitely bad business for the Canadian people to have their dollar tied to any other country's currency. In the changing circumstances which surround us to-day we must retain control of our own currency, which we have through the legislation enacted by parliament.

My hon. friend refers to the previous occasion. May I point out to him that a $4.70 pound in relation to our producers of exportable products is a very different thing from a $3.25 pound. That is the whole point. These things are all matters of degree. I will admit at once that if the pound sterling declined to anything like the levels which existed in 1931, when, as he said, he was compelled to vote for his government although he disagreed with them, in the process of managing our own currency in the interests of the Canadian people we should have to take cognizance of that position and adjust ourselves accordingly. But I do submit that to claim that there is any parallel between a $4.70 pound, seventeen cents below parity for the pound, and a pound which was $3.25 as against $4.86, is—well, not merely begging the question, but exaggerating for the purpose of making a debating point.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the minister believe that it would be disastrous for Canada to follow sterling down to the $4.70 level, and some sort of glorified blessing to follow it down to the $3.25 level?

Mr. DUNNING: No, I did not say that.

Mr. STEVENS: A moment ago the minister was emphasizing the possible disastrous effect of going on the $4.70 level, and then he says it was a vastly different thing when the Conservative government was in office and the pound went to $3.25.

Mr. DUNNING: I will let my point go. I will let Hansard record it.

Mr. STEVENS: It is difficult, however, to allow the minister to get away with any such argument as that.

Mr. POULIOT: What about the Australian pound, Mr. Chairman? Some friends in the antipodes sent me their speeches in which they contended very strongly that the Australian pound, which is tied to sterling, is much lower than the British pound.

I have listened attentively to the discussion, which was most interesting. A great gentleman in this country has deplored the manner in which experts in economics, sociology and political theory use terms and phrases not understandable by the layman. He mentioned that it was "an abominable jargon." In this connection I should like to quote a few words from "A World in Debt," by Freeman Tilden, which was published in 1936 by Funk & Wagnalls. One fears the entrance of economists in the financial field; they seem to make it more complicated. At one time the statute of 1908 provided that the deputy minister of finance would receive a salary of $4,000 a year, provided that he had been the general manager of a chartered bank for ten years. At that time they were looking for people of common sense and experience in business. Now I am very much concerned about the fact that some of the advisers of the Minister of Finance are experts in economics.

Here is what Mr. Tilden says of economists: it is very short:

> Then I turned to the economists, the political economists. Lord save us, my friend! what shall I say of the economists? What can anyone say of the economists? Nerissa asked of Portia, "How say you by the French lord, Monsieur Le Bon?" Portia replied, "God made him, and therefore let him pass for a man." As to economists, let us not be outdone in benevolence by Portia; they are undoubtedly as they were intended to be; but for any adequate explanation of the difficulties and dangers that beset our industrial economy and the fortunes of those who exist within it, you may as well consult the Great Pyramid.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT:

> Diligently I have perused the modern economists, and I frankly confess that I now know neither what political economy is nor what the economists pretend to teach. If the professors of this alleged science really have any definite notions translatable into practice, it would seem the right time to expose them, for the world stands very much in need of enlightenment. Sir Isaac Newton once refused to publish the results of certain experiments he had made, saying that the publication might serve to widen the circle of his acquaintance, "a thing I chiefly study to decline." Our economists do not seem, so far as mere publicity is concerned, to share Sir Isaac's aloofness; their love of society is so great as sometimes to appear promiscuous; so it must be that a kind of freemasonry among them seals their lips against revealing the prodigious truths of which they are possessed.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, there is always a danger in listening to experts. One very able judge used to say that there were three kinds of liars—liars, d—— liars, and experts. Of course what we need in finance as well as any other business is a clear understanding of what is going on; and very often the accessory currency is considered as the principal when the principal is always trade.

Another point that concerns me very much is the fact that during the last years, and especially from 1930 to 1935, instead of following the practice of Westminster we have been aping it. One thing I cannot understand is the loss of ministerial responsibility and the decrease in parliamentary control. Hon. members have received an extract of the reports of the British parliamentary committee on national economy. May I draw attention to four points which should be placed on Hansard? The document is dated from Treasury Chambers, March 12, 1920, and is the interim report on the position of accounting officers:

> At their first meeting the council proceeded to discuss the general position of accounting officers and the possibility of effective reform in the present financial procedure of departments. On November 10, 1919 the chancellor of the exchequer requested the council to consider, together with other proposals for strengthening the hands of accounting officers, the suggestion contained in paragraph 9 of the first report of the select committee on national expenditure (1919), that the accounting officer of each spending department should be a treasury official appointed by and solely responsible to the treasury.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. POULIOT: I am reading from the official report of the committees of Westminster, an extract from the report of the committee on national economy, which I got here in the library.

The CHAIRMAN: I am of the opinion that the hon. member is out of order in quoting that. I would ask him to confine his remarks to the resolution.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir, and if you permit me I will explain how this is in order. We are now discussing a resolution to authorize the borrowing of $750,000,000. The administration of this will be in the hands of the Department of Finance. We have to see what the present constitution of that department is compared with what it was before 1931. I am just telling the committee what has been decided in England with regard to the appointment of officers of the treasury in various departments.

The CHAIRMAN: I have already made my ruling, and I would ask the hon. member to observe it.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir. Then I will not mention this further at present. But my point is that in regard to all the money spent by the government, each item of expenditure should be authorized by and payment made by the minister concerned. The minister of any department has an allotment of so many hundred thousands, so many millions of dollars for his department. According to my view of ministerial responsibility, responsible government and parliamentary control the minister should have the right not only to authorize an expenditure but also to control the payment of that expenditure, in order to be responsible to parliament for the disbursement made on that account. I hope I make myself clear in that regard. Some years ago under the previous administration the whole financial system of the dominion government was entirely changed; instead of having payments made under the authority of the minister concerned they are now made only by the Department of Finance under the authority of the comptroller of the treasury who is himself under the authority of the Minister of Finance. I submit that we should follow the practice which was in force in this country for a hundred years; from 1834, the time of the ninety-two resolutions—it was put in force six years later in 1840—to 1934 we had responsible government in this country, but since 1934 all payments are made by the Department of Finance and not by the ministers of the departments concerned. There are now no accountants in the departments who are not under the Minister of Finance. The minister concerned has no authority over the accountants in his department. Here in the House of Commons we have an accountant, a very able man; but he is not one of our officers; he is not under the authority of Mr. Speaker; he is under the authority of the comptroller of the treasury who is under the authority of the Minister of Finance. To this I strongly object on constitutional grounds, because each minister should be responsible for his own department, and if he is not responsible for the payment he cannot be held responsible for incurring any expenditure. Further, according to my view, in the present situation all the estimates should be submitted by the Minister of Finance himself, because he is responsible for the payment. I do not see how any other minister can come with them save the Minister of Finance, who through his officials authorizes every payment made. I do not see how any other minister can come and justify the administration of his department, because he administers practically nothing. I do not blame this government for that legislation, far from it; it was imposed on parliament by the previous administration, but it is all wrong. The former Prime Minister used to say that he needed to have it that way in order to get information more quickly. Last year, two months after the expiration of the fiscal year, I telephoned to a high official of the Department of Finance to know the exact amount of the debt of Canada. He told me he had not ascertained it yet. As I say, that was two months after the expiration of the fiscal year. There is no progress in that.

Another point is that with accountants in the various departments to check the expenditures and make the payments under the authority of the minister they become familiar with the work of the department. There is no man in the civil service who can be familiar with the expenditures of all departments. I defy the comptroller of the treasury or anyone in the Department of Finance to be able to justify each expenditure in the various branches of the department; it is beyond the mental ability and the physical capacity of any man. Therefore I hope that some day the Minister of Finance will consider what is being done at Westminster. The proposal was made at Westminster to have officers of the treasury in the departments; this was refused by the mother of parliaments. And I do not see why we do not act here as they do in Westminster. They have behind them the traditions of many hundreds of years, while we are just a relatively new country in parliamentary practice. We have a great deal to learn and nothing to forget of what was done by our forefathers in this dominion to secure ministerial responsibility and gain parliamentary control. If we have no ministerial responsibility, where is the control of parliament? There is none. I consider it a real shame that ministers for whom I have great respect should have to crawl before officers of the treasury in order to have something done in their departments.

[The Chairman.]

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but he is again definitely out of order. I ask him to confine his remarks to the resolution before the committee.

Mr. TUCKER: I do not intend to take up more than a few minutes, but I should like to indicate my view in regard to this resolution. One advantage of the issue of currency, as pointed out especially in the last parliament, is that it is a means whereby the credit of the country can be drawn upon without having to pay interest on the use of that credit. For that reason I understand that the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) at that time urged the issue of $400,000,000 in currency, to be used in part towards the payment of the national debt, having in mind that if that were done it would avoid the payment of interest to the extent it was so used. I am 100 per cent in support of that view. I think the extent to which we can issue currency and pay the national debt and avoid payment of interest on that debt without in any way dislocating the set-up in the country is the extent to which we should go.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), the amount of currency in circulation in Canada is about $22 per capita, compared with $42 per capita in the United States. If we issued the same amount of money per capita in Canada as they have in issue in the United States we could issue another $220,000,000 and use that money to retire interest-bearing debt. By so doing we would save no less a sum than $7,700,000 annually. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) says the reason why we have not as much money in issue in Canada as they have in the United States is that the Canadian people have confidence in our banking system, as a result of which, instead of keeping currency on hand they deposit their money in the bank and use cheques. The result is simply this, that since we have $220,000,000 less currency in issue on account of the people of Canada having confidence in their banking system they are penalized to the extent of $7,700,000 annually. While that may be the actual reason why we have not so much currency in issue in order to do our business, it is no reason in the world why it should be so. Why should we pay interest on that sum of money just because the banks can get by with less or business can get by without that money being in issue. I do not think it can be argued that we could not put that amount of money into circulation in this country without in any way dislocating our banking set-up. As I say, if we did put that amount of money into circulation we would save $7,700,000 every year.

When I suggested last year that we put several hundred million dollars in issue on which we would not have to pay interest it was stated that under our banking system the banks made loans or investments, or tend to do so, at the rate of ten dollars for every dollar of currency put out, and that if you put $600,000,000 of currency in issue, under our present system this would inevitably result in the long run in the banks putting out by way of loans and investments something around $6,000,000,000. At that time I suggested that if the banks showed any such tendency unduly to inflate their loans and investments you could take control and prevent them from doing so. The United States increased the amount of currency in circulation, and in order to prevent the banks from unduly inflating credit they increased their reserve requirement, as I understand it, from ten to twenty cents for every dollar invested or loaned by the bank. In other words the reserve requirement in the United States to-day is twenty cents for every dollar loaned or invested, whereas in Canada the legal requirement is still only five cents per dollar loaned or invested. No one can tell me that we cannot thus control our banks by taking control at any time over the reserve required. We can put twice the amount of money in circulation and double the reserve requirement if necessary in order to prevent the banks from inflating their credits or investments by a single cent. As a matter of fact, we have in the past three years to a very limited extent actually increased our currency in circulation, but the banks claim they cannot, under present conditions, greatly increase loans to commercial institutions. The result is that they have not actually increased their loans or investments in that direction and so the inflation of credit predicted has not yet occurred. So I submit that, under present conditions, without changing our reserve requirement we could increase the amount of currency in circulation without fear of immediate credit inflation. But as we did so, to make entirely certain that the banks would not take advantage of the situation, I say we should take power to increase the reserve requirement in order to prevent that inflation of credit if it threatened.

The situation in regard to this resolution, therefore, is simply this. There is roughly $400,000,000 of this debt Canada owes and which it is proposed to refund by reborrowing at interest which is payable within Canada. I submit that we could require the Bank of Canada to print $400,000,000 of notes and pay that $400,000,000 as it came due with those Bank of Canada notes. As I understand it, the average rate of interest to-day is roughly three and a half per cent, and by adopting that course we could save $14,000,000 of interest every year. I think that is worth considering. If it be said that the moment you put $400,000,000 of new currency into circulation the banks are going to loan or make investments to the extent of $4,000,000,000, I say you can prevent that by increasing your reserve requirement, or by taking power to do so. You would not need to increase it; the very threat would prevent the banks from going to any extreme.

I welcome very much the suggestion of the Minister of Finance that the servants of the people, the officials of the Bank of Canada, should be called before the representatives of the people of Canada to explain what use they are making of the control we have given them over the currency and credit of this country. I welcome that because it seems to me that they should be asked, among other things, if it would not be feasible for us to take the step I have just suggested. I hope the minister will announce at a very early date that this procedure will be followed, because it seems to me high time we put looking after our old and sick people, looking after our unemployment situation and giving opportunity to our young people, above the payment of unnecessary interest on government debt. To me that is the one place where to-day parliament can save money. We hear speeches these days from Toronto, for example, suggesting that if certain business supermen were in control of the dominion government they could save money; but if you asked them where they would save it to any great extent they would not be able to say. Would they eliminate help to the farmers of western Canada? Would they eliminate help to the fishermen of the east? Would they eliminate help to the unemployed or old folks of Ontario or Quebec or elsewhere? Where would they save the money? This is one place, Mr. Chairman, where it would be possible to save money in order to do the things that we as a people want to do. So I welcome the opportunity to have the officials of the Bank of Canada, whom I regard as experts in their particular line, come before the representatives of the people in the banking and commerce committee and explain why it is not possible—if they so think—for us to increase our currency in that way, at the same time preventing undue inflation.

I think the ultimate ideal should be this, that you should gradually increase the amount of currency in circulation and gradually increase your reserve requirement until you have every cent owing by the banks by way of deposit in the banks—amounting, as hon. members know, to almost $3,000,000,000—covered by money issued by the government of this country. Thereby you would save over $100,000,000 in interest and you would prevent the present inflation of credit by the banks. Under our present system the banks are, in effect, little, private mints. On the basis of their reserve requirement they can extend credit at the rate of ten dollars to one dollar to the country, which means purchasing power created as the money loaned is subject to check by the government or other borrower and is received by those to whom the cheques are paid as if they were money. When there is a threat of bad conditions the banks begin to draw in their loans and destroy purchasing power. As a matter of fact, one of the common sayings of the period since 1933-34 has been, "Where has the money gone? There is just as much money in the country as ever." As a matter of fact, there was not as much money in the country, because the banks had drawn in loans represented by deposits in the banks against which cheques could be issued. They had,—as I remember the figures,—contracted those loans to private enterprise to the extent of roughly $900,000,000 between 1929 and 1934. The marvel to me is this, that with that contraction going on in the money to do the business of the country, over the short period of only five years, it did not absolutely wreck our economic structure.

I am glad the Minister of Finance once more is well enough to carry on in the vigorous manner he has demonstrated this afternoon. I have every respect for him. But when he worries about increasing, say, the amount of currency in circulation per capita in Canada to a point at least equal to the amount in circulation in the United States, sufficient to save that interest I have mentioned; when I think about the financial leaders who are advising him to-day being willing, without protest and without seeing to it that the system is changed so that the banking system could not do what it did between 1929 and 1934 again and thereby destroy the purchasing power of the country to the extent of $900,000,000; when those people are content to stand by and let that condition remain, without insisting that the system be changed—well, I cannot understand it.

I submit that the one way of getting away from the banking system engaging in periods of undue inflation and then engaging in periods of undue deflation is gradually to increase the reserve requirements to a point where the banks will be able truly to say that for every dollar they owe depositors they have a dollar on hand. To-day, as I pointed out, by law they can loan out $20 for every dollar they have in legal reserve.

As I pointed out, that leads to a condition where, when the country wants to borrow, it must pay interest. It leads to these inflational booms. It leads to the destruction of purchasing power in deflationary periods. It leads, whether we like it or not, to the very thing that is happening to-day. The people do not know the reason why our system is not functioning, and they are inclined to blame our parliamentary and democratic institutions. We must make that system function, or it will ultimately be destroyed. Those people who seek power by blaming the present government, but without offering any policy of their own and who, if the people believed them, would find themselves in power without any policy, and would carry on for five years without solving the fundamental problems of the country, are playing with the very future of our democratic system. I would say that no man should seek power in Canada if all he has to offer is a palliative, something which would not go to the root of matters in solving the problems of this dominion. If any man does that, he is playing with the confidence of the democracy of Canada.

I submit the one place where the system does not work to-day is right in the realm of currency and credit. That is the one burden—the payment of interest on the use of its own credit—which the government must shed. It is one place where the credit power of Canada can be placed at the service of the people of Canada, to the extent that the Canadian people should be permitted to use their entire man power, and their entire brain power, to develop the resources God put within their control. They should be permitted to work at full capacity to produce wealth. And if the system is not working to put our unemployed to work and to develop what, after all, is theirs—the resources of Canada—then that system is not working properly.

Unemployment is not a scourge. Those who are unemployed to-day should be regarded as an asset, not a liability. They should be regarded as people who could be put to work to produce real wealth. Then, after we have our entire machinery working to produce the maximum amount of wealth, there would be no difficulty in seeing to it that the people of Canada enjoyed or consumed that wealth. The standard of living of all would be immeasurably raised.

As I see it, that is the crux of the whole problem. We must face that problem. No amount of quibbling and fighting as to whether the tariff should be raised from, say an average of twenty per cent to thirty per cent, no amount of condemning the party in office by the very party which held office for five years—but did not do anything to solve the problem—will gain us anything. The point is this: The people of Canada want fundamental remedies applied to the problem. They are patient. They are asking us to solve the difficulties, but I am afraid—

Mr. HARTIGAN: I should like to ask a question.

Mr. TUCKER: I have almost finished; the hon. member can then ask his question. I am afraid history teaches that if a government does not serve its day and age, or if a system does not serve its day and age, it cannot indefinitely endure.

My last word at this time is this: I appeal to every member, if the time does come when we have a chance to go into these problems, with the experts we have at our disposal—and there are no better experts in Canada than are to be found connected with the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance—to give his best attention, so that we may benefit by the advice those officials can give. I would ask hon. members to follow closely the discussions before that committee. I say that because I believe everybody realizes something fundamental must be done to solve the problems facing us to-day.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted a word? The discussion has now got into the realm of monetary theory and principle. The experience last session indicated that on almost any subject before the house it is possible to discuss monetary theory and principle.

I do not wish the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) to think that my failure to speak at length with respect to the matter he raises arises from any disinclination to do so, or from any lack of respect for his aims and the study he has given to the subject. However, based on previous experience, I do suggest that nothing will prevent members from discussing this matter on innumerable occasions in both the near and distant future.

When the other day I volunteered the suggestion that officers of the Bank of Canada might appear before the committee on banking and commerce, I thought I was opening the way for members who have ideas in these matters to examine those ideas critically, by and with the advice of, I think, the best we have in Canada in that line.

I was pleased to note the hon. member for Rosthern welcomed the suggestion, and I can indicate to him now it is my intention—I hope early next week, at the latest —to lay on the table of the house the report to me of the governor and the board of the Bank of Canada, and then as an ordinary formal motion to move that that report be referred to the committee on banking and commerce. Such action would afford the proper means of having the governor of the bank and such other officers as may be required, and indeed any officer of the Department of Finance, before that committee.

I indicated the other day some rather desirable limitations which might be imposed. I stated that we must trust to the discretion of the governor of the bank with respect to the giving out of certain information. I do not want to exaggerate that; I merely want to state it as a necessary condition. I am quite sure, however, that would not affect the possibility of discussing in detail with those experts the ideas which the hon. member for Rosthern seems to think are so simple and easy of achievement. I know he is quite sincere in that, as are other hon. members on all sides of the house. I only want to say that I have not found anything very easy. In my experience with finance I have found that the more I know, the less I am certain of. That may be the experience of others, but I do not know.

I am not pressing this resolution, but I should like to get the bill before the house. There will be an opportunity on the second reading and again in committee to prolong this discussion. To be perfectly frank, I do not want to have to come here to-night because I have had a rather hard afternoon. I should like to get the resolution along, or I am quite willing to do what I suggested in all seriousness to the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens).

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. LANDERYOU: Mr. Chairman, this is a matter about which I stated previously I intended to speak. I believe this resolution affords me a chance of discussing what I consider to be one of Canada's greatest problems at the present time. We have spent some eight or ten days discussing the Bren gun contract, a matter involving $25,000,000 or $30,000,000, at which time we heard political speeches from both sides of the house.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member should proceed to discuss the resolution.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I had hoped that during the discussion of this resolution we would hear the policies advocated by the various parties in connection with monetary reform.

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend permit me just a moment? I hope he realizes that the passing of this resolution does not exhaust the possibilities of discussion thereon. The second reading stage of the bill will afford an appropriate opportunity for discussion. The bill will be identical in its terms with the resolution, and it must again come before the committee of the whole house. I hope he is not under the impression that he is being estopped in any way should he permit the introduction of the bill. I merely want to get the bill before the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LANDERYOU: It is not carried. I appreciate the statement made by the Minister of Finance, but I want to say that I allowed the resolution to go into committee of the whole without speaking, on the understanding that I would have an opportunity of saying a few words at this time. I agree with the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) when he says that democracy is being criticized, and that parliament is being criticized. Rather we should be criticizing the present financial system which is responsible for the poverty and want and misery that is so apparent throughout the dominion. I agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) when he states that the gold standard has been abandoned and that we are now in an era of managed currency. I do not say that the Canadian dollar has been linked or tied up to the United States dollar or the English pound, but it is a significant fact that the Canadian dollar has for some considerable length of time remained on a parity with the United States dollar.

If the monetary policy pursued by this government is working inimically to the interests of the primary producers, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) and as has been declared by the province of Manitoba to be so, then those who are suffering because of the financial policy of this government should be aided by subsidies or by some other measure of restitution of their losses. The minister also pointed to the fact that the Canadian debt is largely internal. In fact, he said that seventy-five per cent of Canada's debt has now become an internal debt. That is all to the good because we realize that it is much easier to handle a debt internally than it is to handle it externally. But other countries are pursuing the same policy. Germany's external debt to-day is only 20 per cent of what it was in 1931. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) declared before the 1935 election that usury once in control would wreck any nation. Yet we find that debt and taxation are on the increase in Canada. When they were in opposition the Liberals railed against the taxation imposed by the Conservative administration, and yet to-day they are collecting more taxes than were ever collected by any former administration or by any government since confederation.

Mr. McNEVIN: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. LANDERYOU: I will permit a question when I have finished. In 1932-33, federal revenues totalled $311,130,000, and we find that in 1937-38 this government collected over $500,000,000. There has been an increase of $200,000,000 in taxation. To-day the government is collecting almost double what was collected by the Conservative administration in 1932-33, and yet the Liberals severely criticized the tax policies of that administration. The Liberals claim that there is less unemployment, that times are more prosperous and that our trade has increased tremendously.

Mr. DUNNING: Are we going to permit a general debate that covers the whole world? I do not want to stop any discussion of the resolution, but—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has a perfect right to speak on the resolution before the house, but I would ask him to confine himself to that.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I had the assurance of the Minister of Finance that when we got into committee of the whole there would be no restriction placed upon the observations I wanted to make.

Mr. DUNNING: Dealing with the subject, of course.

Mr. LANDERYOU: This is dealing with the subject. In spite of the claims of the Liberal party, debt and taxation are still going up.

The CHAIRMAN: I would inform the hon. member that it is the chair that decides who is in order and who is not.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I agree with that. I was simply pointing out the fact that in spite of these promises—this has a direct bearing upon the question—we are borrowing $750,000,000 and increasing the debt and taxation of this country. That is the point I am trying to establish. From time to time they point out the increase in foreign trade, that we are now fourth among the trading nations of the world, but still we have to borrow money, still our taxes go up and still our debt increases. That is the point. Do we have to capture the trade of the world before we can reduce our taxation and borrowings? Do we have to feed the world before we ourselves can eat? That is the question I am asking of this government. The Liberals claim that we have democracy in this country. True, we have certain political rights and certain liberties, yet we are in financial bondage because of the financial policy pursued by the present administration, and it looks as though this is to be perpetual bondage. Last year I asked the government a question which was answered by the Minister of Finance. I asked if the government had in mind any plan which, if pursued, would substantially reduce and eventually pay off Canada's national debt in a period of, first, thirty years; second, fifty years, and, third, one hundred years, and, if so, in what way would this policy differ from the policies pursued during the past thirty years. His answer was: This is a matter of government policy. This year a similar question was placed on the order paper by myself, and it was ruled out of order by the Speaker. This question must be answered. Why all the secrecy about it? Is the idea that the less the people know, the more they can be fooled? That seems to be the whole idea behind this thing—hush up the debate on finance—do not let the people get to understand exactly what Canada's position is in regard to these matters.

A number of people falsely assume that the present financial system is responsible for the tremendous technological development we have witnessed in the world in the last thirty years, but it is not right to say that finance is responsible. Scientists and inventors, with the aid of skilled and unskilled workers, are responsible for the technological development.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member is again out of order, and I would ask him once more to confine himself to the resolution before the committee, which reads:

That the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under The Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada, and also for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada, and for public works and general purposes.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Mr. Chairman, the resolution calls for the raising of $750,000,000 for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of the loans or obligations of Canada. That is a large sum of money. It is just twice the amount of all the cash in the Dominion of Canada; it is greater than the entire debt of Canada in 1914; so it is worth considering.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member that the amount of money involved has no bearing on the question whether the hon. member was out of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I beg pardon, Mr. Chairman. I hold no brief for the social credit party or their ideas, but I would submit that in discussing the amount of money involved he is quite in order.

Mr. DUNNING: I think there was a misunderstanding.

Mr. LANDERYOU: As I was saying, $750,000,000 is a large sum of money. This resolution indicates that the government still believes it can borrow its way out of debt or tax its way to prosperity. I should like the Minister of Finance or any member of the Liberal or Conservative party to inform this section of the house just how we are going to lower taxation and get out of debt under the present debt-creating system.

Mr. DUNNING: You tell us.

Mr. LANDERYOU: In a few moments I am going to move an amendment which will at least indicate in part my answer to the minister's question.

The Minister of Finance has referred on numerous occasions to hoary fallacies. There is no more hoary fallacy than that now being pursued by the Minister of Finance and his government. They still believe they can borrow themselves out of debt or tax themselves into prosperity.

Mr. DUNNING: I never believed it in my life, and on a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman cannot attribute to me statements of that kind. I never made any such statement. I don't believe it, and I don't expect to.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I said, "this resolution indicates—"

Mr. DUNNING: You did not.

Mr. LANDERYOU: My words are in Hansard.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, they are there.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I said that the resolution indicates that the Minister of Finance and those supporting his policy still believe in that hoary fallacy that you can borrow yourself out of debt or tax yourself to prosperity.

Mr. DUNNING: It does not indicate anything of the sort.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Perhaps the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Landeryou) would tell us how the resolution indicates that. It is simply for the purpose of repaying what is already due.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Melfort is out of order unless he is speaking on a point of order.

Mr. LANDERYOU: There is a great deal out of order with this present financial system, Mr. Chairman. I have received a number of inquiries along this very line: When are we ever going to stop borrowing? When are we ever going to be able to reduce taxation? Here is a list of questions sent to me by a man in Nova Scotia, and he says that the people of Canada are demanding that these questions be answered:

1. Who created the money and credit which the nation now owes as a debt?
2. To whom do we owe our financial debt?
3. Is it possible for Canada to pay off this debt?
4. If so, how can it be paid?
5. If it can be paid, why don't we pay it?
6. If it can never be paid, why continue to fool the people by enslaving and starving them to pay interest on a debt that can never be repaid?
7. Is it true that with interest Canadians would have to pay more money to meet their debt than is in existence in Canada? More than was created and loaned in the first place?

Mr. KIRK: What is the name of the writer?

Mr. LANDERYOU: It was written by a friend of mine in Nova Scotia. I have no intention of giving his name in public. The hon. member can see his name if he likes to come to my room.

Mr. GRAY: Did the hon. member answer the question?

Mr. LANDERYOU: I received letters not only from Nova Scotia but from many other sections. More and more the people of Canada are beginning to ask these questions. If hon. gentlemen want names, here is an address by the general manager of the Bank of Montreal.

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemount): The hon. member has not given us the name of the other writer.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): He has spread the letter on Hansard without anyone vouching for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Calgary East a moment ago quoted a document and according to the well-established rule of the house and in committee he must disclose the name of the writer.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Mr. Dixon. I quote now from an address by Mr. Spinney, general manager of the Bank of Montreal, who, in speaking of Canada's debt burden, is reported as follows:

Sherbrooke, Que., Jan. 24.—Canada's debt burden gradually is lowering the general standard of living, G. W. Spinney of Montreal, general manager of the Bank of Montreal, said in an address prepared for delivery to the associated boards of trade of Quebec eastern townships to-night. The indifferent attitude towards mounting government debts threatens the country's welfare, he said.

Mr. Spinney stressed the seriousness of the drain relief expenditures and railway deficits made upon the country's resources without showing tangible returns and he urged that effective action be taken towards practising government economy and solving the unemployment and railway problems. "A great deal is heard nowadays of the effectiveness of the totalitarian states and it does seem to be a fact that unless general government administration is improved, the very foundations of our democratic forms of government may be threatened," he said.

"The primary threat to the welfare of this country lies in our indifferent attitude towards mounting debts. Federal and provincial government indebtedness is ever on the increase and some municipal bodies are shaping their courses in the same direction. Let us consider how our capacity to pay is keeping pace with the growth in our promises to pay.

"Comparing the year 1937 with 1927, we find the annual national income of the country is less by something like $1,230,000,000. On the other hand, the total of dominion, provincial and municipal direct and guaranteed debt had increased in the same period by some $2,620,000,000. In other words, while the wherewithal to enable us to pay our contractual obligations has shrunk in the last decade, we have in the same period substantially increased the total of our borrowings.

"Something seems to be out of kilter here because we are obviously making promises which our present growth in wealth and income does not appear to justify."

Severe criticism has been cast on the province of Alberta for its technical default. Alberta simply said to the bondholders, "we have not the money to pay and so we will give you half the interest." Now, which is the more honest, or dishonest—the policy of a government which says, "we will tell you frankly the position," or the policy of a government which tries to hide the truth from the people when it knows full well that these debts can never be paid? That is the position.

An hon. MEMBER: If they can be paid, tell us how.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Yes; if they can be paid, tell us how. This government claims to have complete control over the issue of money and credit: why doesn't it issue it; why does it continue this policy of borrowing? I remember the statements made by the Liberals before the 1935 election, that the control of money and credit was not of concern to the banks only but of direct concern to every man, woman and child in the country. I remember that they were going to take over the control and issue of money and credit, restore it to parliament, and issue it in terms of pubic need. But they still pursue the same old policy of borrowing themselves out of debt and taxing themselves to prosperity. They argue now that they have complete control of money and credit. But what have they offered to the muncipalities and the provincial governments as a solution of their financial problem? Just in that regard I want to say a few words about the situation in the provinces. I notice that I have only a few minutes, so I may not be able to go into it at this time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Well, then, I will refer to the municipal indebtedness as given here in a supplement to the review of the activities of the Montreal board of trade, volume 5, No. 2, November 1937. In regard to the municipal debt, table No. 14 gives the gross total bonded indebtedness of all classes of municipalities, 1926 to 1934. We find there a continual increase in the bonded indebtedness of municipalities; evidently they still think they can borrow themselves to prosperity or tax themselves out of debt. In 1926 the debt was $1,050,206,121, and by 1934 it had increased to $1,452,850,565. Steadily it has been on the increase. And what does H. Carl Goldenberg say in relation to the fiscal position of these municipalities?

1. The duties and responsibilities of municipalities have increased without a proportionate increase in the power to raise the revenue necessary to meet their new obligations;

2. Having regard to these increasing duties and responsibilities; real property, the principal revenue, is no longer an adequate basis of taxation:

3. Declining revenues accompanying diminished assessments and increased rates have necessitated a greater resort to borrowing, thereby increasing still further the charge against real property and discouraging new construction and home ownership.

4. Debt charges and the increasing cost of social services and particularly of unemployment relief are absorbing a continually increasing proportion of annual revenues and are tending to paralyze normal municipal services;

5. Forced economies in current municipal services are resulting in a huge accumulation of deferred maintenance and expansion.

6. Having regard to the heavy burden of debt charges, further economies in ordinary expenditures can afford no material relief to the taxpayers of the municipalities.

There are the financial problems of municipalities. What has this government offered to them as a solution of those problems?

Then, in respect to the provinces, in the presentation of the case for Alberta, at page 376, under a heading, "Provincial Debt and Finance" as shown in clause 4, I quote:

The urgency of the general debt situation requires that the dominion government should deal immediately with the civic, municipal and private debts of the province, or provide facilities for the provincial government to meet the situation.

Further in part 2, chapter 1, clause 7, under the heading.

Mr. DUNNING: What is my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. LANDERYOU: From the case of Alberta.

Mr. DUNNING: What case?

Mr. LANDERYOU: It is a brief submitted to the sovereign people of Canada by the province of Alberta. It was not submitted to the Rowell commission.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it was not submitted by the Alberta government to the commission.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. LANDERYOU: Under the heading, "Alberta's case in Summary", we find the following:

Coincident with these vast resources which are at the disposal of the province we find—

(a) 52,000 persons on relief, living at a very low standard. Of these, 10,000 represent unemployed persons—or a reserve of labour which could be employed in much wanted production.

(b) Total taxation—dominion, provincial, civic and municipal—representing depletion of already inadequate incomes—is estimated at $48,563,276 or about 30 per cent of the net income of the people available as purchasing power for consumers' needs.

(c) Debt charges and payments would, in existing conditions, represent a further 25 per cent of gross income—the main burden of this falling on producers and traders.

(d) The income of the province is depleted further by the extortionate freight charges which have to be paid by the people for both goods sent out of the province and goods brought into the province—with the disadvantage of selling in an uncontrolled market and buying in controlled markets.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. DUNNING: As I intimated, I cannot go on this evening. My hon. friend, I take it, does not want this to carry.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I do not want it carried at the moment. I want to pass an amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. member cannot do that.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I wanted to move an amendment.

Mr. DUNNING: Then, Mr. Chairman, I will ask you to report progress and ask leave to sit again. If I cannot get the resolution carried now, I cannot. I appreciate the co-operation of my hon. friends immediately opposite.

An hon. MEMBER: The minister will have to answer some of these questions.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT OF $100,000 FOR THE YEAR ENDING JULY 1, 1939

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Public Works on behalf of his majesty to enter into an agreement to pay to the corporation of the city of Ottawa the sum of $100,000 for the year ending July 1, 1939.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish to oppose this vote; I think it is a very good one; but there are one or two points about this agreement which I think should be explained to the committee. It would be a good thing if the federal district commission were to take the members of the house around a bit and show them what work is being done. I do not say there is duplication, but I refer to one or two points of this agreement.

The agreement started in 1920 at $50,000, then went to $75,000 and now it is $100,000. First there is the question of snow cleaning. At the present time the city of Ottawa is doing very good work in that connection. Snow cleaning is done partly by the city, and then there are in the city a number of parks and driveways and federal property on which the roads are cleaned and kept in repair by the federal district commission. The basis of the $100,000 payment is consideration for services rendered by the city of Ottawa to the government: water supply, police, fire protection and other civic services. There is a principle underlying this. The principle follows what was done in the capital cities in New Zealand and Australia; they receive something in exchange for the civic services given. For example, in New South Wales the government maintains the police force; in other places, the fire department. There are other cities in Canada where there are these federal buildings—Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, Winnipeg, Vancouver. They give the federal authority the very same civic services which Ottawa is giving, and good services; yet this principle is not applied to these places. It should apply. The Ontario government are giving to the municipalities part of the liquor licence revenues. The municipalities are now demanding something from the fees collected for motor vehicle licences. Some years ago the dominion government took from the municipalities the income tax. From confederation down to 1918 the income tax was the exclusive field of the municipalities. In 1918 the government no doubt needed the money on account of the war expenditures and they imposed a duplicate tax. In some provinces there is a triplicate tax on incomes. The Ontario government has taken the municipal income tax away altogether and established a flat rate for the province, which, some say, works a hardship to the larger municipalities especially. I am not objecting to this Ottawa vote; I am glad to see Ottawa get it, but the same principle should be applied to other places, when one considers how the municipalities have had their field of taxation invaded by federal and provincial power.

This $100,000 is not all. Parks, playgrounds, squares and driveways within the confines of the municipality of Ottawa are maintained at the expense of the dominion. From the annual report of the federal district commission for the year ending March 31, 1936, it will be seen that there was a contribution of $217,000 from the dominion. Then the report goes on to refer to these public improvements within the city of Ottawa. The city I come from is paying for roads for fifteen miles around the city through the Toronto highways commission, and also for No. 7 highway to Brampton it is paying about $200,000 on capital and maintenance. Then, in the city of Ottawa the federal district commission pays for certain municipal services on these parks, driveways and squares. In Toronto we have a harbour commission, and we might just as well ask the dominion to pay for University avenue, Fleet street, the exhibition park, waterfront and other places in the riding of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence). The report of the federal district commission refers to 137,100 perennials and annual flowering plants sent out from the commission's greenhouse at Rockcliffe to be planted in the commission's parks and government grounds throughout the city, as well as a number of trees and shrubs. Then there is $58,385 for construction and development, including new greenhouses, Elgin street subway improvements, and so on. The total disbursements amounted to $244,389. That also covers the amount spent on Rideau Hall and the grounds, improvements, maintenance and so on.

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask all hon. members to keep order. It is very difficult for the Hansard reporter to hear the remarks of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. CHURCH: Last year we provided another Ottawa district vote of $100,000 for the acquisition of land and for surveys in connection with a national parkway in the Gatineau valley district and the Laurentian hills, and I should like my hon. friends to listen to this. It is said we do no work here, but some of our friends in another place in this building have gone on a sit-down strike, and on three weeks more holidays, expecting us to do all the work. That is not what they do in the senate in Washington, the Ottawa of the south. There they stay on the job, and it is not hard for them in their senate to find work. Speaking of the unemployed, I think the other chamber should take up this problem. Why do they not do something about it as they did in the senate in Washington in 1927?

To return to the question of $100,000 for the new Gatineau and district park, the learned and respected clerk of the house gave an address a few years ago in regard to what could be done to improve this city and district and make it fit to be the capital of this great country. I think from what I saw of that address the clerk would have made a good parks engineer. I do not see the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Leduc) in the chamber, and I hope he will not think I am objecting to this second item. He has a splendid historic county and district, and I do not object to the creation of a national park there; far from it. But I believe that with the present unemployment situation, when we cannot provide the necessities of life for our own people, we should exercise a little care in the expenditure of our money. I believe we are tearing down too many buildings in Ottawa, and ruining the continuity of business on some of the business streets. That is particularly so here in Ottawa. The assessment here has been reduced and the city is losing a large amount of money every year. All this money has to be provided in some way. In the ordinary city expenditures in connection with parks, their expenditures are charged to capital, but I understand that under this government agreement these moneys must come out of income.

It was said by the two Ottawa newspapers that I was unfair to this city. That is not so. I should like to see Ottawa get everything it is entitled to, because I think they have a good city government here. But I do say the government is taking away the revenues of the large municipalities; in addition those municipalities are charged with the cost of relief, and I submit that other places should get equality of treatment. The Minister of Labour brought down a program to provide works for the relief of unemployment in the municipalities, and he also announced that the new division of the cost of direct relief would be forty per cent by the dominion, forty per cent by the province and twenty per cent by the municipality. What does the province of Ontario do? It takes the forty per cent which it is supposed to give the municipalities, chisels it down to about twenty per cent for January, February and March of this year, and does not give them the forty per cent expected for three months.

We should follow the practice that is followed in Australia, where the federal government grants a subsidy, bonus and subvention to the municipalities in compensation for the tax-exempt federal properties and the municipal services rendered, or gives them a share of the income tax collected. In some of the states to the south the state capital is given a subsidy in compensation for certain municipal services, but in Canada this government gives nothing, except to the city of Ottawa. In the city of Hamilton, for example, the municipality has to supply police protection, fire protection, local improvements and so on, and the city gets nothing in return for aid to the federal government. I think the time has come when we should have equality of treatment by the federal power in regard to these municipal services. I do not oppose this vote; I am not opposed to the creation of the Gatineau park, but I do think it is time something was done for the other municipalities. Real estate is being burdened as a result of these federal and provincial taxes so that to-day the holding of real estate is a liability. Mortgages are being foreclosed and industrial workers are being put on the street as a result of the heavy taxes on real estate for relief. As you no doubt are aware, Mr. Chairman, the taxes on an average property constitute a rent in themselves, and the taxes on the homes of workingmen are about twice that. It really amounts, in many instances, to confiscation of property. No wonder the home building program has not been a success, when one considers the way in which these taxes are put on real estate. A man may own a property with a first mortgage, a second mortgage, a chattel mortgage on some of his goods, a bill of sale on the remainder, a lien note, a building lien on the property and every other kind of lien. So he cannot qualify for a loan either from a bank or from a shark loan company.

I hope the minister will take some action in the near future to remedy this situation. In Toronto we have a federal building on Front street covering nearly a block, on which no municipal taxes are paid. The city has to supply that building with fire and police protection; it has to furnish water at cut-rates; it has to construct a road and sidewalk in front of the property, and all that sort of thing. When Sir James Whitney became premier of Ontario, he introduced a policy under which the provincial government paid for local improvements such as sidewalks in front of provincial public buildings, parks and so on. If that is not done, the cost of these works has to come out of the general tax rate, and it becomes a burden on real estate. So I believe we have come to a time when the government must do something in order to help real estate and give other cities something. Otherwise we shall be carrying on a policy of favouritism, robbing collective Paul to pay selective Peter.

What is the principle of this legislation? These are moneys to which other municipalities in Canada are entitled too. What kind of legislation is that? Would the hon. member for Parkdale adopt such a principle in connection with his York highways commission? I hope some hon. members will have the opportunity of travelling on some of his highways, because he has a fine type of highway there.

I say the time has come for a change in principle whereby some of these moneys might go to the other cities and towns in which the other 243 members live, so that they may get the same treatment as the city of Ottawa.

Mr. BARBER: Is the vote of $100,000 supposed to compensate Ottawa for the property which has been removed from the assessment rolls, and therefore no longer revenue producing so far as taxation is concerned? I might point out to the minister that it is the opinion of several people in this city, particularly business men, that the removal of property from the assessment rolls, property which has been taken over by the federal government, has imposed a heavy burden upon the other taxpayers of the city. It is suggested to me that if the federal properties were called upon to pay taxes, instead of the sum of $100,000 the cost would be close to $1,000,000. I should like to have the minister's opinion as to the object of the payment of $100,000?

Mr. CARDIN: May I say to the hon. member who has just taken his seat that the question he raised was discussed in 1920 when this agreement became effective. At that time the city of Ottawa made a heavy claim on the federal government for compensation for the very things the hon. member has just mentioned. They claimed that because the federal government was taking over or expropriating certain properties the city was being deprived of taxes which otherwise it would derive from those properties. Upon that occasion they made a claim, although at this time I do not remember exactly what the amount was. As a result, however, of discussions between representatives of the city and the government an agreement was reached whereby all those claims would be wiped out, and the city of Ottawa would undertake to protect federal buildings from fire and, in addition, supply the water used on the parks for sprinkling purposes.

The sum of $100,000 has been paid to Ottawa since 1925 or 1926. Prior to that time, under the terms of the agreement of 1920, the annual grant was $75,000. Those payments have been made for the services I mentioned, namely fire protection and sprinkling service, and, if not directly, at least indirectly to help to compensate for loss of revenue in taxes. Such a compensation was claimed by the city when discussion of an agreement took place in 1920. The agreement has been renewed every year, and the resolution now before us provides for the introduction of a bill to renew the agreement for another year.

The federal government has been paying the city of Ottawa certain sums of money for a very long time. The first payment was made in 1899 for the reasons pointed out by the hon. member. Since that time the federal government has continued to contribute money to the city. I believe I am free to say that the agreement is not wholly satisfactory to the city. I am informed the city council had in mind asking the federal government for an increase to at least $150,000. The federal authorities, however, thought the present amount was a proper one and could see no reason for increasing it, particularly in view of the fact that we are making other expenditures in Ottawa which in certain ways help to relieve the situation so far as unemployment is concerned. We have thought that for this year at least it would be fair to renew the agreement as it is and pay the same amount as we paid last year.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) mentions the fact that other cities might claim the same privileges. That has been considered. But if we began to apply the same principle and attempted to compensate all cities in Canada where there are public buildings, I am afraid very serious complications and difficulties would arise in adjusting the claims of the different cities.

There is justification for the present vote for the city of Ottawa, because it is the capital of the country. We are supposed to be a little more generous towards the capital city than towards other cities. In addition to that, the federal government has much more property in Ottawa than at any other point in Canada, which may serve as an additional justification for the payment to this city. I know there are public buildings in Montreal and Toronto, but the value of those properties does not compare with the value of federal government properties in Ottawa. Although I should like to see something done in other Canadian cities, I am inclined to be a little more generous towards Ottawa, a capital city of which we are proud, and for which we ought to do the best we can, according to our financial ability to provide developments and betterments.

Mr. HEAPS: I have no objection at all to, in fact I support, the vote for $100,000 which the government intends to pay to Ottawa in lieu of taxes and other revenues of which the city is deprived by reason of the federal buildings. But I think, taking it all in all, our federal government treats Ottawa in a fairly generous way. I have not the slightest objection to the improvements which, as a matter of policy, the government are bringing about in the city. In fact, I approve most of them. But at the same time the people of Ottawa are not appreciative of that very fact. They seem to accept these things as a matter of course. There is really no compulsion upon the government to go to all the expense they have incurred over a period of years to beautify the city and to make it a worthy capital of the Dominion of Canada.

There is no city in the dominion which receives anything like the amount of support from either a provincial or federal government that is received by the city of Ottawa. And, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), the federal government provides parks and driveways in the city which in all other cities of the dominion are entirely a municipal responsibility. Going back over the years I can find nothing worth while calling an improvement that has been initiated and carried out by the people of this city. I have made inquiries on the point and have tried to learn about anything by way of beautification of the city which has been done by the city, but so far I have been unable to find anything whatsoever.

I do not know the exact amount that is being spent by the federal government upon what might be called purely civic enterprises, such as parks, playgrounds and other schemes of beautification, but I believe the amount would run into many millions of dollars. The amounts mentioned a moment ago by the hon. member for Broadview when he was speaking of the money spent by the government in Ottawa did not cover everything. I am wondering whether the Minister of Public Works has in his possession information as to the full amount spent in Ottawa each year by the federal government. I am not asking for the salaries paid to people employed by the government, but I should like to know what it costs the government, so far as Ottawa is concerned, to maintain these parks and driveways, to pay for the removal of snow from the streets and to keep up other improvements which in other cities are looked upon as entirely civic matters. I wonder if the Minister of Public Works has that information with him at the moment.

Mr. CARDIN: I regret I am not in a position to give that information to my hon. friend, for a very good reason. The works which he has just mentioned are carried on by the federal district commission, which is not under the Department of Public Works. That commission speaks in this house through the Minister of Finance. I believe my hon. friend could get the information he is asking for from the report of the federal district commission. If my hon. friend is interested in having that information, I can have the figures prepared for him.

Mr. HANSON: I have pleasure in supporting this resolution. I supported resolutions in former years when the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) was Minister of Public Works. I think all members, no matter from where they come, should support this vote. After all, any impression that a foreigner may gain of our country is helped by the impression he gets of our capital city. I believe this money has been efficiently administered by this and former governments. This is a resolution that should not require much discussion, and I am glad to give it my support.

Mr. HAYHURST: I should like to associate myself with the last speaker, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson). I feel that Ottawa should be a beautiful city. A thing of beauty is a joy forever, its loveliness increases and it will never pass into nothingness. If there is anything that can be done by way of relief for the people, I think it should be something that will add beauty to our cities. We should be willing to do all we can to help to make Ottawa a beautiful city. I believe this $100,000 can be put to doing good work at this time, especially with the great plan they have in mind for the beautification of the city. This is an annual grant. I am certain that Ottawa has become much more beautiful since we came down here. Beauty is truth, and truth is beauty. That is all we know in this world, and all we need to know.

Mr. SPENCE: Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) is willing to support a proposition of this kind. He got a very nice building in his little town. I do not begrudge him it; I only hope that Prince Rupert grows to a size where that building will be in proportion to the size of the town. Everyone seems to be willing to support this vote of $100,000, so I am not going to oppose it. However, as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) said a minute ago, certain other cities in Canada should also receive some consideration. The hon. member referred to the many services rendered by Toronto. There are in that city a great number of public buildings from which the city receives no taxes. I think the Minister of Public Works should include something in the estimates for Toronto to cover the work that city is doing.

I understand the city has been communicating with the Minister of Labour in an effort to obtain a grant to help in the construction of a sewage disposal plant. We have a plant now, but it is inadequate. It is almost dangerous because some of the sewage is running into the lake without being treated properly. A proposition of that kind would employ thousands of people for the next two or three years, and better results would be obtained than if the money was spent in many other ways. It will cost about $15,000,000, and I understand the provincial government has offered to pay twenty-five per cent. The city was hoping that this government would pay twenty-five per cent, which would leave about eight million dollars for the city to spend itself.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does that come under beautification?

Mr. SPENCE: No, it is better than beautification; it has to do with the health of the people. We do not want our lake polluted with sewage from any city. This matter should receive attention. I hope the Minister of Labour, with all the money he has under his control, or the Minister of Public Works, will see that this is done. It would be something of lasting credit to this government and to this country. The taxpayer of Toronto has been literally overwhelmed paying taxes. Relief there is getting worse and worse every year. No matter what anyone may say, relief in Toronto is getting no better.

The hon. member for Broadview referred to the Toronto and York roads commission. At one time I was chairman of this commission, and I have been a member for the last twenty-four years. When my hon. friend was mayor of the city, an arrangement was made between the county of York and the city of Toronto whereby the city paid twenty-five per cent of the cost of maintaining roads extending all over the county. The provincial government was to pay fifty per cent of the cost. This arrangement covers roads extending out as far as fifty and sixty miles to the borders of Ontario, Peel and other counties. No doubt York is a rich county and has done great things in its time. There are over 400 miles of roads in York. The present chairman of the roads commission is my old-time friend, Senator O'Connor. I am sorry to say that he has been ill in Florida, but perhaps hon. members will be glad to know that a letter was received last Monday by the commission stating that he was getting better and expected to be back by the middle of April or the first of May.

I am tired of hearing people call Toronto a hog town. "Hog-town" pays a great deal of money to this government by way of taxation. Just consider the business done in the post office and the money taken in at the customs.

Mr. BAKER: More income tax is paid there than in any other city in Canada.

Mr. SPENCE: We cannot take all the credit for that because Toronto is the centre of the district. But I do get sick and tired of people referring to Toronto as "hog-town." I have lived in Toronto for forty-eight years and I have been behind every big municipal proposition and development carried on in that city. I have supported the program of bridge construction, road building, the improvement of the harbour front and many other useful developments. I am proud of Toronto at all times. Not only has it contributed largely to the building of roads in the county of York, but it contributed $200,000 to Ontario towards expenditures in other counties of the province. So don't talk about Toronto being Hog-town. Toronto is doing more to build up that portion of the country than this government is doing here.

Mr. STEWART: Mr. Chairman, as I recall this agreement and the bill that is proposed to be founded upon it, it is for the purpose of compensating Ottawa for certain specific services which are rendered by the city. We have been discussing beautification, but that is entirely a separate matter and does not come under this resolution at all. There is only one feature of the discussion to which I wish to refer, and that is the suggestion that Ottawa has lost a considerable sum in taxation by the removal of certain buildings, but if a careful check-up were made I think it would be found that other buildings were erected to take the place of those torn down and that the city is getting the benefit of the assessment on these new buildings. I recall in particular one building on the south side of Sparks street which is assessed for a great deal more than the many small buildings that were removed from the area in question.

Mr. BARBER: What about the land though?

Mr. STEWART: The buildings must be erected on other land, and the land is still assessed. There has been also an increase in the assessment of many properties bordering on these improved areas. So, on balance, I think it would be found that Ottawa has lost nothing, or practically nothing, in assessment through the removal of different buildings. The resolution and the bill are based upon an agreement, and until a new agreement is made there is no alternative then to pay the amount stipulated.

Mrs. BLACK: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) and say that I feel we can hardly do too much for Ottawa, for, after all, all trails lead to the capital city of this dominion. The capital city of Canada should be a city of which every member of the house and every person in Canada may be proud, and I am only too glad to support the resolution.

But when Ottawa complains of loss of revenue through the taking over of property by the government, may I point out that if it were not for the government of Canada being located here, Ottawa would be nothing but a little country town. Hundreds of thousands of people are attracted here every year who would under no circumstances come to Ottawa unless it were the seat of the national government. So I think we can take the complaints of Ottawa citizens with just a grain of salt. I am going to support the resolution.

Mr. NEILL: I do not wish to oppose this resolution, but as a matter of curiosity I would ask the minister this question. I understood him to say that the major portion of this amount goes to compensate the city of Ottawa for taxes they have lost through the taking over of property.

Mr. CARDIN: No. It is to compensate the city for providing fire protection for federal buildings and for the supply of water which is used by the federal government in the government parks.

Mr. NEILL: I know the minister said that, but I think Hansard will show that he also said it was to provide compensation in lieu of taxes that had been lost.

Mr. CARDIN: Possibly I did not express myself correctly. Before the first agreement was made between the city of Ottawa and the federal government, the city had built up a big claim against the federal government for compensation for loss of revenue on account of the expropriation of private property. That was all discussed at the time, but the agreement does not take that claim into consideration at all. The agreement is to provide compensation for the two services I mentioned, fire protection and the use of water in the parks.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. HEAPS: What is the actual value of the land and buildings owned by the government in the city of Ottawa and exempt from taxation?

Mr. CARDIN: I could not say offhand, but it would run into millions.

Mr. HEAPS: If we had that information it would give us some idea of what we are getting for the $100,000. I have no objection to this resolution. In fact, I have supported everything the federal government has done in the city of Ottawa, and I would have supported them in going a little further than they have gone in the past. But when we are providing $100,000 for compensation for fire protection and water service, I think we ought to have some idea of the value of the buildings that are being served and the assessed value of the land as well.

Mr. CARDIN: I could not state the value at the moment, but the agreement covers all federal buildings in Ottawa. I do not think any actual figure was arrived at when the agreement was made. The agreement was reached after a discussion of a number of subjects advanced by the city in those days, but the agreement itself states that the $100,000 is paid as compensation for the services I have just mentioned. I can undertake to ascertain the total amount of government property that is protected against fire by the city.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister when he gives us that information give us a detailed statement of the various buildings so that we can form our own conclusions in the matter?

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques Cartier): (Translation) Mr. Chairman, I should like to see this vote carry without any further discussion. But in case the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) should be influenced by the eloquent pleas made by the hon. members for Broadview (Mr. Church) and Parkdale (Mr. Spence) on behalf of the city of Toronto, I wish to remind him of the existence in Quebec province of a large "village" called Montreal where several buildings belonging to the federal government are exempt from municipal taaxtion. I doubt whether the appeal of my two hon. friends will be heard beyond this chamber, but in case it is I wish to make the same request on behalf of the city of Montreal.

(Text) Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, as regards this resolution to provide $100,000 for Ottawa as compensation for fire protection and water services, while I am quite in accord with the expenditure of this money, I do think there are other cities in Canada which should receive their relative proportion of public moneys expended.

Mr. HANSON: There is only one capital of Canada.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I quite understand that, and I am sorry the hon. member for Skeena thought it necessary to interject that remark. There is not a school child who does not know that Ottawa is the capital of Canada. But I rose to suggest to the minister that he grant proportional compensation to other cities which have dominion public buildings that are exempt from municipal taxation, and in that way relieve the overburdened property owners in the various cities. I hope the minister will take that suggestion into consideration.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Cardin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 25, to authorize an agreement between His Majesty the King and the corporation of the city of Ottawa.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISHERIES ACT, 1932

ASSESSMENT UPON OWNERS OF OBSTRUCTIONS TO ASCENT OR DESCENT OF FISH IN STREAMS

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 15, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 1—Repeal.

Mr. NEILL: Before clause 1 is dealt with I should like to introduce an amendment to a section which comes prior to this one, which is section 57. The section I want to amend is No. 32. I therefore move:

That section 32 of the Fisheries Act, 1932, chapter 42, is hereby amended by inserting the following as subsection 2 thereof:

2. No one shall use a salmon trap net in any of the Pacific waters of Canada.

I do that in order to get an opportunity to press the need of this reform in the interests of the fishing industry and of the fishermen of British Columbia, and also to give the minister an opportunity to state his policy on the matter.

It will be recalled that on January 23 of this year I asked him a couple of questions on the orders of the day. I asked him if his attention had been called to a paragraph in the Vancouver Sun to the effect that the senate of the state of Washington was preparing and would shortly introduce two fish trap bills that would enable fish traps to be restored in the state of Washington waters. The second question I asked was: In view of that fact, was he, that is the minister, prepared to take the responsibility of maintaining our traps, only four in number, as against their 219, knowing that the results will be that our catch in those waters will drop from 80 per cent, as it is at present, to 30 per cent, as it used to be when the United States traps were operating? The minister replied that the question of the advisability of reciprocating or of maintaining the policy of issuing fish trap licences was being considered at the present time—that is at that date, January 23, which is three and a half weeks ago. We have heard nothing more yet, and the matter will have to be decided, I should think, within the next few days in any case, because the season is coming on.

The fishermen out there have quite recently organized very strongly in this matter. They are proposing to put on a campaign of a very considerable extent and of their own accord. Last year I presented to the house a petition signed by almost 10,000 people from British Columbia against the fish traps being used any further; and now the unions of fishermen have taken the matter up. One union alone comprising 1,400 practical working fishermen are proposing, as I have said, to get up a campaign. They have support from boards of trade, the trades and labour council, and the city council. They have been stirred up by the notice I have referred to that there was the proposal to re-install traps on the Washington side, and particularly on account of the fact that the argument the trap owners on the United States side were using, are going to use, and do use, is that Canada has not kept faith and has not taken out her traps. I quote a few lines from one of the organizations:

The organized fishermen of British Columbia are at present conducting a vigorous campaign against the continued operation of the fish traps at Sooke, especially on account of the fact that Washington interests are attempting to reintroduce traps in sites over the border.

This is from another union, which says:

Our fight against the issue of fish trap licences is started again. We are holding a series of meetings and starting three petitions, one to be signed by fishermen, one by sports fishermen, and one by business men.

Then I have a record of a conference, as they call it, which was held in Vancouver on January 23, 24 and 25, attended by delegates from the following bodies: Prince Rupert Fishermen's Cooperative Association, North Island Trollers Cooperative Association, Fishermen's Cooperative Association, Inc., Kyuquot Trollers Cooperative Association, representing over 1,400 individual fishing boat owners, and the resolution they passed was as follows, of which a copy was sent to the minister at that time:

Whereas the department of fisheries of the Dominion of Canada has promised the fishermen of British Columbia to eliminate all fish traps this coming year;—

I do not think it was this year; they promised it three years ago.

—And whereas the state of Washington is now considering the reinstatement of such traps in order to obtain its share of the fish now being caught by the traps in the British Columbia coast waters;

And whereas the depletion of the salmon run calls for strong conservation measures in order to preserve these resources;

And whereas the fishing boats engaged in the trolling, purse seining and gill netting industry are in a position to create a livelihood for a greater number of men than are at present employed by the trap owners, and at the same time provide for the better escapement of the salmon to the spawning grounds.

Therefore be it resolved that we, the members of these associations—

And I will not read them again.

—in convention assembled this twenty-third day of January, 1939, do strongly recommend to the fisheries department that all fish traps shall be completely removed from the waters of British Columbia.

I might continue and go thoroughly into the history of the matter to enlighten those hon. members to whom it is not familiar; but it might save time if I stopped here and gave the minister an opportunity to express his policy on the matter, because I am hopeful, from the representations which have been made to him and from his attitude in the house the other day, when he intimated that it was being considered, that he may now be in a position to state that he has decided to stop these traps being issued any further in these waters.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I am very definitely against this amendment—

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment has not been read.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): —not only because I consider the amendment is developed in the cause of class fishing—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The amendment is not yet before the committee. It has not been read by the chair.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Do I understand that my hon. friend is giving notice that he will move such an amendment?

Mr. NEILL: No, I am moving the amendment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Surely we have not reached the point where it could be moved.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, because I am introducing it as an amendment to a section which comes prior to section 57, which is dealt with by clause 1 of this bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But that section is not mentioned in the bill.

Mr. NEILL: But the Fisheries Act is open. This bill is to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In a certain way.

Mr. NEILL: I am amending the Fisheries Act, 1932, not in the same section I admit, but another section. That, however, is commonly done. It is a well known fact that when a bill is open it is open to any hon. member to move an amendment to any other section, provided it is dealing with the subject of the bill. And the bill is to amend the Fisheries Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): To amend the Fisheries Act in a certain way, with regard to certain provisions. I do not object formally to the amendment, because I am not sufficiently acquainted with the bill and the amendment of my hon. friend. But if the amendment proposed is not relevant to the matter of the bill—not the whole Fisheries Act but the matter which is the subject of the amendment proposed in the bill—I do not think the amendment of my hon. friend is in order. I might read May, thirteenth edition, page 404:

Amendments cannot be moved which are based on schedules or other provisions, the terms of which have not been placed before the committee—

This is a different matter altogether. But again I speak with certain reservations because I do not know enough—

Mr. NEILL: Could the minister quote any of our own standing orders in relation to this?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, there is no standing order. I am quoting May.

Mr. NEILL: I submit our standing orders take precedence of May, and our standing orders do permit what I have suggested. Moreover, if we are going to quibble about a technicality, I suggest that it is relevant to the section proposed to be dealt with, which relates to fish ladders or the penalty imposed for non-observance of certain rules; the object, as stated in the explanation, is the conservation of fish, and if there is anything that tends more to the conservation of fish than the abolition of fish traps I should like to know what it is.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If the amendment is relevant I have no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I support the statement of the minister. Last year in this house I lost an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act for the very same reason as that advanced by the minister. If the proposed amendment is to go forward without let or hindrance, then I oppose it definitely. I have a good deal to say on this matter, because the situation has been definitely stirred up—

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order. Is the hon. member discussing the point of order or the ethics of the amendment?

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I am stating a fact.

The CHAIRMAN: In order to keep the record clear, this amendment should be read from the chair, which has not been done. The amendment is moved by Mr. Neill, to insert a new section to be known as subsection 1 of section 32:

That section 32 of the Fisheries Act, 1932, chapter 42, is hereby amended by inserting the following as subsection 2 thereof:

2. No one shall use a salmon trap net in any of the Pacific waters of Canada.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): If I am now in order—

Mr. NEILL: I challenge anyone who objects to this on a point of order to state which of our standing orders this action of mine contravenes.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There would be very few points of order raised if they had to be based on the letter of a standing order. It is rather the appreciation of these standing orders and the decisions which have been rendered based on them.

Mr. NEILL: There are 130 standing orders; surely it is covered somewhere in them. It is for those who object to this amendment to point out a rule forbidding it; it is not for me to prove that no such rule exists.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am going to read something else—

Mr. NEILL: I do not recognize May.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): —which will not have the effect of defeating my hon. friend's purpose, but may delay him a little. May says:

It is irregular to propose an amendment which is irrelevant to the subject matter of a clause but it should be submitted at the end of the bill as a separate clause.

We have not yet started to consider this bill. Before we reach clause 1 my hon. friend substitutes what would be another bill altogether by moving the insertion of that new clause. I suggest that we proceed with the bill as it is; then at the end my hon. friend might move that his clause be inserted, and then we shall see whether it should be accepted or opposed.

Mr. NEILL: That is quite satisfactory, Mr. Chairman. I withdraw my amendment at this stage in deference to the Minister of Justice, who has kindly indicated the proper stage at which he says it should be brought in.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Minister may assess owner of obstruction.

Mr. NEILL: The first part of clause 2 is, as the minister stated when he introduced the bill, for the purpose of making more definite his power to collect certain sums for the maintenance of fish ladders or a substitute for those fish ladders. As far as that part of it goes, I quite agree with it. But I am doubtful about the clause which he did not mention, that is subsection 2 which reads:

Such lump sum or annual sum shall be payable at such time or times as the minister may direct—

That is all right.

—and may be sued for and recovered with full costs of suit in the exchequer court of Canada.

The previous way was that if any man did not fulfil the obligation imposed on him by the minister under section 57, then by the last clause of paragraph (d) of section 57 he was liable to a penalty of not less than $4 and not more than $20 for each day or part thereof during which such notice was not complied with. Now the minister changes that into a provision by which he can sue this man in the exchequer court and recover the amount with full costs of suit. That might result in a condition which would vitiate the very object the minister has in view. An exchequer court proceeding is a long business. If I remember rightly, the exchequer court sits only once a year on the Pacific coast. The section that was in the bill before which provided for a penalty of so much a day was easily enforced by either summary conviction or indictment; the minister could get quick action. Assume this condition: A logger has an area of timber to log; it suits him to put a dam across the mouth of the outlet from a lake, and he stops the passage of the fish. Representations are made to the department here, and they write the logger but he does not pay any attention. Time goes on, and he is cutting his timber. Presently the minister is compelled to tell him that if he does not put in a proper ladder he will be sued in the exchequer court. The man just laughs at the minister and his officials and goes on logging. Finally the case is brought up in the exchequer court, but by the time that court sits out there and judgment is rendered the man has finished logging that area and has moved on, leaving the river ruined with nothing whatever to show for it. While I quite agree with the first part of the provision, which makes it easy and convenient for the minister to collect any sum he thinks proper, I think it would be better to retain the penalty to which this man may be liable if he puts in a dam in defiance of the government order. This penalty of $20 a day could be enforced readily and speedily by a justice of the peace or some similar court. I suggest that to the minister, who is himself a lawyer.

Mr. MICHAUD: I think the hon. member altogether misunderstood what I said when the bill was introduced. The object of this amendment is to enable the government, through the department, to collect the amount which may be assessed against any person or company interfering with the ascent of fish in certain cases; but it does not apply in all cases. If the hon. member will look at section 57 of the act, he will find in paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d) four provisions which enable the department to see that there are proper openings in canals or rivers for the ascent of fish. I think under paragraphs (a), (c) and (d) a case such as that mentioned by the hon. member could be dealt with. An obstruction at the mouth of a river, for example, a dam, by logs or anything else, could be opened up and the person owning the obstruction or placing it there could be fined. But the purpose of the amendment to paragraph (b) of the act is to provide for cases much more important than cases such as my hon. friend mentions. Let me read the first part of this section:

> Every owner or occupier of a slide, dam or other obstruction across or in any stream,—
>
> (a) Where the minister determines it to be necessary in the public interest that a canal around a dam or a fish-pass therein, should exist, who, after three days' notice in writing, neglects or refuses to provide a durable and efficient fishway or canal, or who neglects or refuses to maintain the same in a good and effective condition in such place and of such form and capacity as will admit of the passage of fish;—
>
> shall be liable to a penalty of not less than four dollars and not more than twenty dollars for each day or part of a day during which such notice is not complied with.

This is not affected at all by the amendment, and paragraph (b) now reads:

> (b) Where the minister determines that the provision of an effective fishway or canal around the slide, dam or other obstruction is not feasible, or that the spawning areas above such slide, dam or other obstruction are destroyed, who after thirty days' notice in writing, neglects or refuses to pay the minister such sum or sums of money as he may require to construct, operate and maintain such complete hatchery establishment as will in the opinion of the minister meet the requirements for maintaining the annual return of migratory fish;
>
> shall be liable to a penalty of not less than four dollars and not more than twenty dollars for each day or part of a day during which such notice is not complied with.

My hon. friend will readily see the difficulty of enforcing the provisions of paragraph (b), with the sanction provided at the end of that clause. There is no way of collecting the amount determined by the minister as necessary to provide for the continued propagation of fish in those waters. So, in order that the provisions of this act may be effectively enforced, we are providing for a court in which to sue and collect the amount which has been assessed. It may be said that the exchequer court is a tribunal difficult of access, but it will be seen that the amounts which may be determined under paragraph (b) may be no trifling sum. Where it is not feasible to build a fishway it may be necessary to build a hatchery, and the cost of maintaining a hatchery to replace the natural propagation that would result from the natural ascent of fish over an obstruction might be a large amount. I have in mind one case where it would be not less than $4,000 or $5,000 a year. This is to provide for cases where, for instance, substantial power dams which may be built in some waters would absolutely destroy the possibility of the natural propagation of fish.

So I believe the ordinary cases can still be dealt with, and those violating the act can be penalized, under the remaining paragraphs of this section; but we had to provide an extraordinary remedy in order that we might be enabled to collect the amount of money that might be assessed in other cases, in addition to the fine.

Mr. NEILL: In that case I suggest that the amendment has been badly drawn. In reading the section the minister forgot that it is all one sentence. It states that every owner, occupier and so on, where the minister determines, and so on, shall be liable to a penalty. It is all one sentence, and by striking out paragraph (b) and inserting the amendment the minister proposes to insert a separate section with a beginning and end to it. Apparently now he proposes to maintain the penalty as well. Is that the minister's idea?

Mr. MICHAUD: No. It is under the new section, as provided in the bill now under consideration. We are doing away with the provision whereby we can impose a penalty, but we are providing for the collection of the amount we need to pay costs of maintaining and operating the hatchery.

Mr. NEILL: I am asking for information; I am not trying to obstruct.

Mr. MICHAUD: I understand.

Mr. NEILL: Does the minister not think it would have been better to have left paragraph (b) as it is now, which says that every owner or occupier, where the minister determines that the provision of a dam is not sufficient—and it needs a hatchery, to put it bluntly—who after thirty days' notice in writing neglects or refuses to pay the minister such sum or sums of money as he may require to construct, operate and maintain such complete hatchery as will in the opinion of the minister meet the requirements, shall be liable? The minister takes that away, as he now tells us. He is taking away that penalty and is providing for an action in the exchequer court of Canada. Why not have kept the section as it was and, instead of saying "pay a lump sum," say "pay a lump sum or annual payment." Then if the minister did not order it to be paid—suppose it was $5,000—he would still have his right to recover, and in addition he would have the penalty of $20 per day for non-fulfilment. Would that not be better than the expensive, long drawn out and possibly futile method of going to the exchequer court? Does it not take nearly a year to get an ordinary case into the exchequer court?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes. I think we could not attain the object that we have in view, were we to leave the clause to read as the hon. member suggests. All these points were fully considered and looked into carefully. In order to put some teeth into paragraph (b) we have to provide means to recover the amount assessed against these people. They would gladly pay a penalty of $4 a day or even the maximum of $20 a day. But we could not sue them month after month or week after week and not attain our object of getting from them the $5,000 or $8,000 a year, depending on the amount necessary. It is because we are afraid that our purpose will be defeated if we sue them for penalties rather than for the money which will be required to operate the hatchery.

Mr. NEILL: I will not further dispute the point. The minister ought to know, and his law officers should know, but I would just mention that $20 a day comes to $7,300 a year. He would get his payment in that way.

Mr. MICHAUD: But the hon. member knows it would mean instituting proceedings in order to collect an assessment in a roundabout way by having fines imposed; and then it would not be clear whether the fines which would be remitted to the department could be applied for the purpose for which the assessment is made. This provision would be ineffective, as it had been in the past. It is for the purpose of being able to apply it when necessary that we are seeking the amendment.

Mr. REID: I wonder if the minister, who has the act before him, is aware of what I believe is an anomaly in section 20 of the Fisheries Act. I believe if he will read section 20 he will find a repetition of the new section now before the committee, because they are almost similar. It seems to me that in the present bill we are repeating ourselves. Section 20 of the Fisheries Act is as follows:

> 20. (1) Every slide, dam or other obstruction across or in any stream where the minister determines it to be necessary for the public interest that a fish-pass should exist, shall be provided by the owner or occupier with a durable and efficient fishway, or canal around the slide, dam or other obstruction, which shall be maintained in a good and effective condition by said owner or occupier, in such place and of such form and capacity as will in the opinion of the minister satisfactorily permit the free passage of fish through the same. If it be determined by the minister in any case that the provision of an efficient fishway or canal around the slide, dam or other obstruction is not feasible, or that the spawning areas above such slide, dam or other obstruction are destroyed, the minister may require the owner or occupier of such slide, dam or other obstruction to pay to him from time to time such sum or sums of money as he may require to construct, operate and maintain such complete fish hatchery establishment as will in his opinion meet the requirements for maintaining the annual return of migratory fish.

The minister will notice the similarity.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is there a penalty clause provided at the end of section 20?

Mr. REID: There are ten clauses dealing with fish passes, slides, obstructions and penalties. I wonder if the minister has noticed that these clauses are somewhat similar to the one under discussion, and, if so, whether or not there might be an anomaly?

Mr. MICHAUD: No, there is no anomaly there. I believe the hon. member has an unrevised copy of the Fisheries Act. It has been revised and the sections have been renumbered. That is the reason for the apparent discrepancy.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the provision the minister is making in the amending section, 57A, to take care of dams to be built in the future, or does it apply also to those presently in existence?

Mr. MICHAUD: It will apply to those in existence.

Mr. STIRLING: In connection with an existing fall, dam or runway, where in the past it has not been considered feasible to provide a fish ladder, does the minister now propose to design a hatchery and demand payment?

Mr. MICHAUD: No, not in all cases, or arbitrarily. But when it is represented that through the construction of a fishway, dam or obstruction, the ascent of the fish is prevented and natural propagation stopped, and it is represented to be in the interests of the conservation of the fisheries to ask these people to contribute towards the artificial propagation, it is the intention to apply the act.

Mr. BARBER: Where are these hatchery establishments? I understand all of them have been closed in British Columbia.

Mr. MICHAUD: If it should become necessary to apply the provisions of this act, even to British Columbia, then it would be up to the department either to open one of those hatcheries or to build another one and charge the maintenance to those who have made it necessary. At the present time, however, there is no intention of doing that.

Mr. BARBER: It would not be necessary if there is not a hatchery?

Mr. MICHAUD: No, but it would be necessary to build one.

Section agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: Under standing order No. 76. all the clauses of this bill having now been considered, I beg to move the amendment I moved a few moments ago.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If the amendment has been formally moved I would move that the committee rise and report progress so that the amendment of the hon. member might be considered as to its validity and merit. Then the committee could sit another day to consider it.

Mr. NEILL: Should the amendment be put in order to have it on the record?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The amendment is there. If anyone thinks it is irrelevant or out of order, he can discuss the point again. The amendment is before the chair and it will be up for discussion when the committee sits again.

Mr. MacNEIL: I would ask that the amendment be read in order that the record may be clear.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) to insert a new subsection. The amendment is:

That section 32 of the Fisheries Act, 1932, chapter 42, is hereby amended by inserting the following as subsection 2 thereof:

2. No one shall use a salmon trap net in any of the Pacific waters of Canada.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Marketing service—

24. Marketing service administration, $106,595.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, the last time my estimates were before the committee the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) suggested that it might be advisable under item 1 to give some information as to the possible wheat policy of the government for the coming year. At that time I stated that I did not think it would be in order to discuss a possible marketing policy for wheat under the item then before the committee, but that on some later occasion I would be in a position to do so. So I have asked you to call item 24, marketing service administration, in order that I might be in order when discussing the matter of the marketing of wheat and other farm products.

I do not think I state anything that will be disagreed with by any hon. member when I say that during the last year wheat marketing has been discussed more in Canada than has the marketing of any other farm product.

I probably could go so far as to say that wheat marketing has held the attention of those who are interested in agriculture in every part of the world to a greater extent during the last year than has the marketing of any other farm product. We in Canada have been brought face to face with the difficulties of wheat marketing because of the extent to which the treasury of Canada will probably be drawn upon to pay the cost of our present wheat marketing policy. These costs have not yet been made completely known. We can only estimate what they possibly will be, but we have a fair knowledge of the extent to which our farmers will benefit by the payments which have been made by the government as an addition to the price which was made possible because of world marketing conditions related to wheat. Because these facts are fairly well known the government has considered it wise to give whatever information we have available with regard to the possibilities of a change in policy in relation to the marketing of wheat, and to place before the committee the position which we intend to take in relation to the future marketing of wheat from the Dominion of Canada.

In dealing with this matter I would call the attention of the committee to the fact that we have been working under a policy that provided for bonusing in so far as it became operative at all in connection with the marketing of wheat. A bill was introduced into the house in 1935 providing for the compulsory delivery of wheat to a board at a set price. A compromise bill was finally agreed upon, which became the Wheat Board Act, 1935. The compromise act provides, first, for the setting up of a board to take delivery of wheat, to purchase wheat from the producer and to sell wheat. Second, it provided for the voluntary sale and delivery of wheat to the board by the producer unless otherwise ordered by order in council. Third, the board with the approvel of the government was to set a minimum price which would be paid for wheat delivered to the board. Fourth, the government was to assume any loss resulting from the sale of wheat delivered to it and to distribute any profits to the producers.

The board was set up for the 1935-36 wheat year, which opened on August 1, 1935, and closed on July 31, 1936. The minimum price was set at 87½ cents a bushel for that year. During the year there were two periods when the price was above 87½ cents, one in the fall of 1935 and the other in July of 1936. There was a long period between those two periods when the price was below 87½ cents a bushel. Our experience during that year would indicate that the producer considered the legislation as having as its objective the paying of a bonus to the farmer until the market reached the minimum and allowing him to sell to the trade when he could do so to advantage. The discussions of the time would indicate that the final compromise legislation was intended to deal with an emergent condition resulting from national policies followed in exporting and importing countries. The producers naturally have taken full advantage of the intentions of those who passed the legislation and have delivered in volume only when the market was below the minimum price set. I may say in that regard that as a result of its being below the minimum price all this year the wheat board have got all the wheat that has been delivered during the present year. With this experience, that is the experience which we had in 1935-36, and the probability that the Fort William price would be considerably above any price the board felt inclined to set, the government provided in 1936 that the board would be prepared to take delivery of wheat immediately the price fell to 90 cents a bushel.

Our experience in 1935-36 showed that we would get delivery of so little, if wheat were above that price, as to be very unfair to the few who were so completely sold on the idea of board marketing as to deliver their wheat to the board under any circumstances. We would have had to retain in operation all the machinery necessary to take delivery of all the wheat and use it to take delivery of a small percentage of the wheat. This would have resulted in a loss to those farmers even had we speculated and held their wheat for the higher prices which did come, and no government would have dared to do that in the light of the recent discussions in the country.

The 1936 wheat crop was therefore marketed through the open market at an average price of $1.22 a bushel.

I might call attention to what I consider to be a fact, that with wheat selling at $1.22 a bushel, had the government even set the price at the higher figure that was suggested by anyone during that year, the government would not have had delivery of that wheat made to the wheat board.

The same conditions prevailed to a greater degree in the 1937-38 crop year, and the 1937 crop was again marketed through the open market at an average price of $1.31 cents a bushel, No. 1 Fort William.

It can be argued that we could have advanced the price from time to time and assured delivery of a greater volume of wheat, but I am sure that those who are familiar with the marketing of wheat in western Canada under our different systems will agree that our experience in connection with cooperative marketing in the past indicated that for a government to do that particular thing would have resulted in disaster not only to the wheat producer but to the system itself.

When the 1938 crop was coming on the market, world conditions were different from those of either 1936 or 1937. It became evident that the unsettled situation in Europe, together with the enormous world production, would result in a low world price.

It was also evident that if war resulted in Europe in the fall of 1938, as it threatened to do, wheat would rise rapidly in price. It was therefore considered that an emergency existed which, together with the difficulties experienced by the wheat producers in the years immediately preceding, necessitated the establishment of a minimum price which would in all probability pay a bonus to the wheat producing farmer.

The price was set at 80 cents a bushel, which has resulted to date in paying to the producer what amounts to a bonus of from fifteen to twenty cents a bushel. I think a bonus of even that amount can be justified for this year under all the circumstances. It can be justified as the legislation has been justified from the beginning, namely, that it is dealing with an emergency condition. With the world price below the set price the board naturally gets all the wheat.

I should like to place before the committee information as to who has received the greater part of the bonus which has been paid, in order that we might have information upon which policy might be based for the handling of wheat in the future if we are going to give assistance of any kind to wheat growers.

During the last few months I have had prepared a statement of just what happened in relation to the bonus paid to date in one province, Saskatchewan, which is the largest wheat producing province in the dominion, and of course the figures I have before me are of necessity still based upon estimates, but I think the committee will realize that they are so close to what will actually happen that they can be taken as authentic.

It is estimated that Saskatchewan farmers will receive, at the rate of twenty cents a bushel on the wheat they will market, a minimum of $18,000,000 above the market value of the marketable surplus of wheat in the province in the year 1938-39 through the operation of the minimum price policy of the federal wheat board.

Let me repeat that. An average of twenty cents a bushel paid on all the marketable wheat in Saskatchewan will net to the farmers by way of bonus $18,000,000. But if one were to estimate the net returns to the farmers of the three western provinces on the same basis of twenty cents a bushel, I am given to understand from a discussion which took place in the Alberta legislature the other day that Alberta would collect $22,800,000, although the crop acreage in that province is very much lower than the crop acreage in Saskatchewan.

Taking all three provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the estimated amount would probably reach some $48,000,000, if put on the same basis as I have estimated for Saskatchewan.

What I wish to point out in that connection is this, that all of the area in western Canada which had a complete crop failure during this past year is in Saskatchewan. There are eighty municipalities in Saskatchewan that have an average crop of less than six bushels to the acre; more than half of these have an average crop of less than four bushels to the acre; the greater part of that half have an average crop of less than three bushels to the acre, and a number of them have no bushelage whatsoever. Yet, out of $48,000,000 which will be paid out of the treasury of Canada this year, if this estimate is correct, only $18,000,000 will go to Saskatchewan, the province with the greatest acreage and with the greatest amount of difficulty because of lack of crop.

To illustrate the results from another point of view, five municipalities in Saskatchewan which have no crop at all have 1,700 farm operators, with a total wheat acreage estimated at 153,000 acres; that is, 1,700 farmers with no crop at all will receive under the bonus system nothing at all from the treasury of Canada by way of bonus on wheat, and they become a complete charge upon the treasury, first of the province, and then, because of the difficulties existing in the province in so many municipalities, indirectly a complete charge upon the treasury of the Dominion of Canada in relation to the amounts that have been paid out under the bonus itself.

If we look at the matter in another way, there are 159 municipalities in Saskatchewan, or more than half the municipalities in the province, accounting for approximately half the acreage in the province from which there is a marketable surplus, where the crop ranges from half a bushel to six bushels to the acre, with an average of 3·8 bushels to the acre for the total 159 municipalities. The total amount of price bonus received under the present system in the 159 municipalities having within them half the crop acreage will be $6,000,000, or one-third of the amount paid in to the province. In these municipalities the price bonus will have to be supplemented by relief from the government of Canada; and that assistance, as I stated the other night, for all of those within the 159 municipalities and for those in the other areas I have spoken of, has been estimated at about $9,000,000. Therefore, in addition to paying $18,000,000 by way of bonus to farmers in Saskatchewan, we shall have to pay another $9,000,000 in order to provide relief and assistance so that those who get nothing out of the bonus can live through the winter.

If we look at it in still another way, in eighty-one municipalities with wheat acreage approximating one-fifth of the total in the province and with yields per acre of marketable surplus of wheat in excess of eight bushels and ranging up to twenty-five bushels, it is estimated that the price bonus will amount to $6,000,000.

That is, you have one group of municipalities, numbering 159, with an average marketable crop of 3·8 bushels, and all farmers in that great area obtain under this system only $6,000,000. Then you have another eighty-one municipalities with an average marketable crop in bushels per acre running from nine bushels up to twenty-five, getting $6,000,000. I suggest that in this latter group is a considerable number of farmers who did not require any assistance from the government in order to make their crop a paying one this last year. Then you have another considerable number of farmers in the other vast area, who, no matter what price would have been given to them, would not have had a paying crop because the average per acre of marketable grain was only about 3·8 bushels.

Then, in seven municipalities with an average of half a bushel per acre of marketable surplus, and with 284,000 acres under wheat, the wheat board price bonus under this policy is estimated at $28,000. In seven other municipalities with a marketable surplus of wheat ranging from sixteen to twenty-two bushels to the acre, and with a wheat acreage of 192,000 acres, which is almost 90,000 acres less than were in the other seven municipalities, the wheat board price bonus is estimated at $314,000.

I suggest to the committee that a policy which gets results of that kind is not a sound policy; that a policy which gives, unto those who have, still more and gives nothing at all to those who have nothing, is not a sound policy to follow in connection with the marketing of wheat in this country.

71492—66½

If one wanted further proof of that statement, all one has to do is to review what happened in all the municipalities:

Number of rural municipalities	Amount of wheat board price bonus per acre at 20 cents the bushel of marketable surplus
	$ c.
5	.0
7	.10
18	.30
18	.50
32	.70
37	.90
41	1.10
49	1.30
25	1.50
15	1.70
12	1.90

I think it will be found that all but sixty-seven or sixty-eight of the municipalities in Saskatchewan are in the list down to that point, the committee will note that no one up to that point has received as much as $2 per acre and that it runs down to ten cents an acre. To start from that point:

Number of municipalities	Price bonus
9	$2.10
10	2.30
12	2.50
11	2.70
7	2.90

The last mentioned is the second seven I dealt with in the previous comparison. The first seven got ten cents an acre; these seven got $2.90. To continue:

Number of municipalities	Price bonus
6	$3.10
4	3.30
5	3.50
1	3.70
1	4.30
1	4.70
1	4.90

In other words, the system operating this year in Saskatchewan paid on an acreage basis all the way from nothing to $4.90 an acre, depending on whether the district was one where crop failures took place or one where they had the best crops in the province. Again I say that a system which makes that difference possible in the distribution of funds from the treasury of Canada is not a system that can be advocated or that can be maintained by the federal government.

If I had the time I could give other figures which would further bear out the statement I am now making, but I do not think it necessary to go into all the details; I wish only to give sufficient to justify the government in having come to the conclusion that there should be some change in policy if we are going to establish a permanent policy for the handling of wheat in Canada. I believe, too, that I have given sufficient to indicate that there should be some change in policy even to establish an emergency procedure which we might follow in years when there are crop failures. It is desired that this emergency policy might, at the same time, relieve us from a considerable number of charges which we have been paying in the past, having to do with the giving of relief in areas where there is no crop.

For some time we have been preparing legislation based upon the policies which we hope to place before this house, and eventually that legislation will be introduced, probably without any considerable delay. But before submitting the legislation or even putting the draft in its final form, I thought it advisable that I should announce to the committee the general policy which the government intends to follow, in order to meet, not only the recommendations which were made by the Turgeon commission which reported at the end of last session, but also, because of experiences we have had during the emergencies we have faced in recent years, and particularly this year, to be in a position to discuss more freely with some of those to whom we have not had access because of lack of announcement of policy down to the present time, the effect of the policy we are announcing on the general marketing of farm products in Canada in future years. In order that this statement may be placed before hon. members in a form which cannot be misunderstood I shall read that statement of policy and some of the things which led up to it.

Three years ago when we came into office a wheat board had been set up under the Wheat Board Act of 1935. The government was of the opinion that this legislation only provided a means for dealing with an emergency created through the methods followed during previous years in attempting to market Canadian wheat under existing world conditions. It was therefore decided to appoint a royal commission to hold sittings throughout Canada and elsewhere and to report upon past and present methods of marketing wheat as well as make recommendations of policy for the future. The commission has reported and recommended the continuance of the open market system, regulation of the grain exchange and encouragement of the pool system of marketing as an alternative to the open market which might be utilized by producers.

Between 1935 and now we have had a continuation of crop failures which has necessitated government assistance. It is now evident that marketing legislation alone will not solve the problems of the wheat growing areas. It is evident that an area which produced the wealth of the period from 1922 to 1928 must be utilized to the fullest possible extent in the effort to develop a nation of home builders.

May I say at this point that as far as the government is concerned we do not feel that the most important thing to be done as a government is to try to see how much wheat we can have produced in Canada. Nor do we think it is important in itself that we should try to have all the cattle produced that can possibly be produced in Canada. Nor do we feel that it is important in itself that we should have all of the dairy products or all the fruit produced in Canada that it is possible to produce. What we think is most important is to put the greatest possible number of families in comfortable circumstances upon the farm lands of this dominion. Believing that, we think that any policy for the marketing of farm products should be based upon the idea that sufficient returns should come to the individual families to make it possible for them to maintain themselves with the ordinary comforts and give proper education to their families. The objective of this government has been and will continue to be to set up as many homes as can possibly be maintained on farms in the prairie section of western Canada. We believe that to do so will assist in solving our labour problem, our railway problem and every other national problem.

May I enlarge on that to say that I am not at all interested in encouraging the production of wheat at thirty-five cents a bushel by putting into operation as many tractors as can possibly be operated on the farm lands of western Canada. Even if it costs forty cents a bushel or if it costs forty-five cents a bushel to grow the same amount of wheat, or a lesser amount, while other products are being produced on the same land, with five families upon, say two and a half sections of land instead of having one family and three tractors and two hired men, then I am in favour of the five families. The encouragement of the placing of more and more families upon our land rather than the production of more and more wheat from our land will assist in solving the labour problem of this country. It will assist also in solving our railway problem to have as many families as possible maintained in comfort upon these lands. It will assist in solving every other national problem which is confronting the people of Canada at the present time. For that reason I believe that any policy which we follow should be based upon the idea that we want to put families upon the land.. To that end we have already greatly extended and established on a continuing basis the attempt to reestablish farmers in the area where wheat is grown for export. That is, our whole rehabilitation program, which will again receive consideration when our estimates for that purpose come before the house, is directed to the end that more families may be maintained in the area that has been known as the drought area during recent years.

Three years of experience with the Wheat Board Act of 1935 has shown that it is legislation which can only be helpful to deal with a marketing emergency, and could not form the basis for a permanent system of marketing. The present year has shown that it does not provide an equitable method of dealing with the emergency created through drought and grasshoppers. The minimum price per bushel results in those having most receiving most and those having no crop receiving nothing.

Realizing that the present legislation does not offer a solution for our marketing problems and does not provide a means of dealing equitably with the difficulties which stand in the way of home building on the prairies, we intend to introduce legislation which will carry out as far as possible the recommendations of the Turgeon commission, which were:

First, that the government should remain out of the grain trade and our wheat should be marketed by means of the futures market system.

Second, that the grain exchange should be placed under proper supervision.

Third, that encouragement be given to the creation of cooperative marketing associations or pools.

May I repeat that it is our intention to bring down legislation which we hope will make effective all of those recommedations. In addition, we intend to deal by legislation with another phase of the subject which has not been dealt with particularly by the Turgeon commission. We intend to introduce a bill to deal with emergencies, which legislation we hope will make home building on the prairies more secure. This bill will be drafted on the principle that assistance will be given in proportion to need, calculated on an acreage basis, and so adjusted as to encourage home building and maintenance rather than increased wheat production.

In drafting the legislation having to do with the marketing of wheat and for the promotion of cooperatives in relation to marketing of wheat we shall be mindful of the fact that the same principle might be applied to the marketing of other natural products. In other words, we feel that the principle which has been applied to the marketing of wheat during the last three or four years in Canada is not a principle which could be applied to the marketing of other natural products, including other farm products. Therefore we do not think it is a sound principle upon which to base farm product marketing legislation. We cannot agree that there is likely to be permanency to any system of marketing farm products which is based upon price fixing. We prefer to embark upon a policy which will lead to costs of production and standards of product which will invite a paying market for all our farm products.

As I said at the beginning, I wanted to place before the committee, in these general terms, the policy decided upon by the government in order that we might be free, between now and the introduction of the legislation, to discuss it more intelligently with those who will benefit by it. In due course the legislation referred to will be brought in. As I have already said, I make this statement partly because of the request by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar a few nights ago, when my estimates were under consideration, that at the earliest possible date some statement should be made with regard to the policy of the government in relation to wheat; partly because of our desire to be able to discuss the matter more freely both within and without the house and also particularly in order to make known to producers the policy under which we shall probably be operating during the coming crop year. I repeat that when the legislation is under consideration ample opportunity will be given all hon. members to discuss everything I have mentioned to-night, with all the information that is available and all the necessary details with regard to the policies announced in the statement I just made.

I hope the announcement of this decision on the part of the government may have some effect on the discussion of private members' resolutions now on the order paper. It may be that the legislation will be down in any case before those resolutions come up for discussion, but if that should not be the case the business of the house probably would be expedited if those motions could remain in their present position until the legislation is introduced, when we shall have an opportunity to discuss all matters in regard to our future wheat policy. I wished to place that information on Hansard so that it might be available to all hon. members, and if it meets with the approval of the committee I should like this item to be allowed to stand.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I just say that I think the committee appreciates the statement just made by the minister; I know I do personally. Many points were raised which will be discussed later. I am in disagreement with some of the minister's statements, but I think he is to be congratulated upon having placed before parliament at least some constructive proposals for dealing with a problem that is pressing in the part of the country in which some of us are particularly interested. While we probably will not agree with him as to some of the proposals he is about to lay before us, I think as a basis of discussion both in this house and in the country the statement does the minister a great deal of credit.

Mr. PERLEY: I was very glad to hear the minister make this statement; it shows that after four years of what might be termed comparative inaction the government is going to try to do something worth while. The minister made a comprehensive survey of the results of the present marketing scheme. In common with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I cannot agree with everything the minister said, but certainly I agree with much of what he said in outlining his future policy. I think the matter of placing more families on the land is very important, because if something is not done to reestablish agriculture we shall get into tractor farming with one or two men working large areas of land.

Hon. members will appreciate that it would be impossible this evening to review the minister's comprehensive statement. I should like to suggest, however, that he bring in the legislation as soon as possible, because there is on the order paper a resolution in the name of the hon. member for Bow River, as well as one of my own, which may precipitate a general discussion in connection with the marketing of wheat, and those discussions probably would be more or less repeated if the bill came in later. So I suggest that if possible the minister should introduce his measure before these resolutions are reached. I very much appreciated his statement, and I am sure that anything of a constructive nature will receive my hearty support.

Mr. SENN: I should like to ask the minister just one question; I do not know whether he is prepared to answer it to-night. He made the statement that the farmers of the west would profit by some $48,000,000 as a result of the action of the government in setting the price of wheat this year. Could he give the committee any estimate of what will be the loss to the government?

Mr. GARDINER: It would be exactly the same amount if settlement were made now. That was an estimate at twenty cents a bushel, based on the bushelage which will be marketed. The final result may be a cent or two above or below that figure, and of course there is always the possibility that whatever is carried over may be sold at a higher price, in which case the loss would be reduced. Up to the present time, however, the greater part of the wheat has been delivered by the farmers; the farmer has received whatever he is going to get over and above what he would have received at the world market price.

I should like to make one more observation. I was dealing particularly with wheat and did not emphasize other matters having to do with the cooperative marketing of other products, but we have in mind legislation dealing with that as well.

Item stands.

Administration service—

2. Publicity and extension, $140,730.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister explain the increase in this item?

Mr. GARDINER: The net increase in salaries and wages to provide for statutory increases and authorized reclassifications is $1,470.

Mr. PERLEY: I see on page 51 of the estimates provision for two editors, a grade 1 editor and a seasonal editor. Would the minister explain that?

Mr. GARDINER: There is provision for one new appointment of a publicity editor and a part-time man, making the two.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does this cover publicity both in Canada and abroad, or is there a special estimate for the overseas work?

Mr. GARDINER: The advertising abroad is all done through the Department of Trade and Commerce, but this is not the advertising vote. That comes under marketing.

Mr. COLDWELL: None of the overseas publicity is done by this department?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is all under the Department of Trade and Commerce now?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. The advertising overseas has never been done by our department.

Mr. SENN: A great many publications dealing with agricultural matters are issued by this department. How many are there, and have there been any new ones this year? What method is employed to acquaint the general public, for whom these publications are intended, as to what ones are available and in what way they are distributed?

Mr. GARDINER: I could read the list.

Mr. SENN: It is not necessary.

Mr. GARDINER: I could give some figures to indicate what it amounts to. These are the statistics covering 1937-38, the last year for which I have the figures:

70,166	personal requests received for publications,
630,401	publications mailed on personal requests,
409,199	publications mailed in bulk,
1,727,918	copies of market reports mailed on request,
366,031	copies of press notices,
73,281	clip sheets,
279,620	farm notes,
7,984,764	copies of miscellaneous articles,
10,033	stencils cut for mimeographing,
7,522,131	copies printed from mimeographed stencils
693	jobs on multigraph,
2,320,775	copies printed on multigraph,
2,131,872	envelopes addressed.

Those are the activities in connection with publications in that branch for one year, and they would be approximately the same from year to year.

Mr. SENN: But I am asking the minister in what way the public is made acquainted with these publications. How do they learn that the publications are ready, and what they are. They are not sent around indiscriminately. I understand from what the minister has just read that quite a number of them have been asked for. How are the public made acquainted with those publications?

Mr. GARDINER: They are made acquainted through statements put in the press. Some of these press statements which are issued from time to time are statements indicating to the public that certain publications are available. Then there are certain set lists to which we mail—agricultural colleges, municipal secretaries, county clerks, members of the House of Commons and of the provincial legislatures, and to some others. Then, they are mailed to persons who may write in. Hon. members will note that 630,000 publications are mailed on personal requests, which means that some interest has been stirred up in relation to them.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are not a number of these publications given to the agricultural representatives in the various provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, quite a number of them are given to the agricultural representatives. At exhibitions these publications are in the different stands so that people may carry them away or have them explained by the men in attendance.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does this vote include any amount for radio advertising?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no payment for radio services out of this amount. But officials in this branch do prepare the radio statements announced to the public.

Mr. HAYHURST: We have found some of the pamphlets very useful, and others not so valuable. In connection with pamphlets dealing with dairy and live stock prices, which are sent to farmers throughout Canada, may I say that I have had letters from farmers stating, "We know from the papers what the price of cattle was last week; what we would like to know and what we would be interested in would be the price of cattle next week or six months from now." So that I suggest there is some wastage in some of the pamphlets sent out. There is a duplication of much of the information which appears in the daily press. Probably it would be better if that money were spent on educational pamphlets, such as were suggested some time ago.

Mr. GARDINER: My understanding is that the reports appearing in the press are supplied by us. We put them in from day to day, across Canada. In addition to that, the daily radio reports are prepared by this department. The report to which the hon. member has referred is a general one which goes out from time to time. Speaking as a practical farmer I would say they are more useful to me than any others because, after all, they show a review of marketing conditions not only on one day but over a period. When one is located, as a good many of us are, two or three hundred miles from where our stock is going to be marketed, it takes us some days to get it to the market place. At the time of shipment we really want to know the market trend. We get as much information out of those mimeographed articles which are sent out as we do from the daily press reports.

Mr. MALLETTE: Are all the departmental publications published in French, too?

Mr. GARDINER: Practically all of them. There may be some that are not, but so far as I know they are practically all published in that way.

Mr. MALLETTE: Is there a substantial demand for them?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, there is a substantial demand, one which would compare favourably with the demand for the English edition.

Mr. SENN: I understand publicity is given by means of exhibits at the fairs. I have seen some of those exhibits, and I think they are commendable. I would ask the minister, for my own information—and his reply may be of service to others—how a fair makes application for those exhibits, and if any fair, large or small, is entitled to them?

Mr. GARDINER: The larger fairs are all covered from booths in those fairs where the publications are placed. Individuals in charge of the booths make explanations. As a matter of fact, at the time of the fair in Toronto I had the experience of standing before a booth for fifteen minutes while one of our officials explained to me all about the marketing of hogs. One of the members accompanied me. I must say the official made a very good job of his explanation.

Mr. SENN: I heard all about that.

Mr. GARDINER: He convinced me that the publication was a good one. We send men around to the different fairs. We are not able to cover them all, but men are sent to fairs throughout Canada where we do not have booths, but where information in pamphlet form is distributed.

Mr. SENN: How would a fair undertake to get an exhibit of this kind? There are a great many small fairs at which exhibits would be of great interest to the farmers. I think education might be promoted in that way as well as any other.

Mr. GARDINER: The fair board may make application for this assistance. We are not able to cover them all, so we select certain groups which cover an area. One year we may select one group and another year another group in the same locality. We try to cover the areas each year, but not always at the same places.

Mr. STIRLING: In recent years considerable reorganization has taken place within the department. Frequently, when I am at home, I find the need of something in the nature of a directory to cover at least the province in which I live. I need something from which I could find out the names of the different officials and where they are located. The telephone book that is issued here forms an excellent directory of the officials in Ottawa, but during the recess I am 3,000 miles away from Ottawa and I need some sort of directory when I want to get in touch with an official in the province.

Mr. GARDINER: As I said to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) the other evening, that directory has been prepared and is now in the printer's hands. It was impossible to get it out earlier because of this reorganization. We wanted to have the staffs complete so that the directory would be up to date.

Mr. STIRLING: Will that directory cover all the provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: All the services and all the provinces.

Mr. PERLEY: Who will get copies? Will it be advertised in the press?

Mr. GARDINER: Anyone who desires will be able to get it by writing in. We will probably send it to all hon. members, and in any case it will be mailed out to those on our mailing list.

Mr. PERLEY: No doubt there is a great deal of useful information in these pamphlets, but many people do not know where to get them. I have been asked several times where such and such a pamphlet could be got. A person might see one in an office or in someone else's home and want to know where to get it. The system of distributing seems to be lacking in some way. Possibly this directory will help considerably because it will enable the rural people to know where to get it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Has the minister thought of putting a list of these valuable pamphlets in the post offices? Possibly a card could be prepared with the names of the most important pamphlets.

Mr. GARDINER: I think something along that line might be done and I shall give consideration to it. I may say that different plans have been tried out in the department at different times. We have tried putting the pamphlets into banks, post offices and other places where they would be available, but there has always been a great wastage in that method. We find that it does not pay to make bulk distributions at different points.

We get better results by trying to advertise the fact that pamphlets are available, and then those who really want them can write in. Much of the information gets about, not directly from a pamphlet but from someone who has read a pamphlet and tells others about it.

Mr. COLDWELL: To what extent are these distributed through the schools?

Mr. GARDINER: They are not distributed through the schools except where a teacher writes in for them and asks for copies to be used in connection with teaching agriculture in the school.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not know whether the expense would be prohibitive, but I was thinking of an inexpensive cabinet with a glass front which could be placed in the important post offices. This cabinet would contain a complete set of the most important pamphlets, and would bear a notice to the effect that copies could be obtained by writing to such and such an address. I have thought a number of times that it was really too bad that valuable pamphlets like these are not more widely known. As hon. members said a minute ago, many people do not know that these pamphlets exist or where to get them. The material contained in them is incomparably valuable for men doing practical work.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has the minister any idea of the extent to which teachers apply for these pamphlets?

Mr. GARDINER: There are certain special types of pamphlets for which a considerable number of teachers apply. These are pamphlets that will be helpful in teaching agriculture, but generally speaking there is no application for a great mass of the pamphlets.

Mr. COLDWELL: I know from personal experience that many of these pamphlets have proved most valuable in the schools, and to the communities through the schools. I was wondering if some effort could not be made to have the provincial departments of education or the normal schools direct attention to these pamphlets. This would save the department sending them out. I may say that I knew nothing of these pamphlets when I started to teach, and it was only by accident that I got a list of them. I sent for some of the pamphlets, and I believe I am still on the mailing list of the department.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Speaking as a practical teacher and principal of a good many years experience, I think something could be done along the lines of preparing a circular to send out from time to time to every rural school in the west, either through the provincial departments or direct from Ottawa.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not familiar with what is done in all the schools, but when I was minister of education in Saskatchewan the practice in the normal school was to send for pamphlets to all the dominions. You can go into the normal library in Regina and see copies of pamphlets describing conditions in Australia, New Zealand and so on. I expect that this would be generally the practice in all normal schools across the continent. The teachers who are taking courses in these normal schools have the opportunity of learning about these pamphlets, and I would expect that when most of them go out to teach they would make use of them.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe in recent years certain courses of study have referred to certain of the pamphlets of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Neepawa): The hon. gentlemen to my left who have just spoken come from Saskatchewan and Alberta. I may tell them that for many years in Manitoba these publications have been noted in the departmental journal and in the journal of the teachers' federation. As the minister has said, teachers in training in the normal school have been made aware of these publications. I do not know what happens in Saskatchewan or Alberta, but I know that has been the case in Manitoba for a great number of years.

Mr. POULIOT: There is a practice in China whereby a rich man pays his doctor just as long as he is well. When he is sick he does not pay. There are doctors of every description in the Department of Agriculture. I suggest that they receive salaries only when things are good for the farmers. When the farmers have any reason to complain, all the doctors in the Department of Agriculture should not receive one cent of salary.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about the lawyers?

Mr. POULIOT: There are no lawyers in that department.

Mr. HAYHURST: It has been intimated that the people of Alberta would not know anything about these pamphlets, but I must tell hon. members that the department of education in that province has always kept these pamphlets before the people all the time. The endeavour has been to heal the sick, and, if possible, to have no sick, so far as the knowledge distributed from this department is concerned. I am sure that we in this corner of the house very much appreciate the policy which the Minister of Agriculture has outlined this evening, so that we might have an opportunity of studying it before discussing it at a later stage. We feel that the department has been very efficient in the last few years.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I should like to add my word of congratulations to the department upon issuing these pamphlets. They serve not only the rural sections but the urban sections of our country as well. A great number of people in my riding in the city of Toronto write me from time to time asking me to secure various pamphlets which the department has at the disposal of the public. I have also gone through the department and was favourably impressed with the way in which it is carried on, and through it I have been able to be of service to a great number of my urban constituents.

Mr. SENN: There is a pamphlet known as Economic Annalist. I do not know if it is issued by this department or not, but if so, I would ask the minister if he is responsible for the opinions therein expressed, or if he knows just what those opinions are.

Mr. GARDINER: It is got out by the economic service in the department, under Mr. Booth.

Mr. SENN: Does the minister read those opinions, and, if so, does he agree with them?

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot read the thousands of pamphlets they are putting out, but of course I have to take responsibility for whatever is put out by the department. What is the matter in particular?

Mr. SENN: The pamphlet is called Economic Annalist. I do not agree with all the ideas, economic principles and suggestions set out in that publication.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not read them all.

Item agreed to.

Administration service—
3. Advisory committee on agricultural services, $5,000.

Mr. PERLEY: Who is on this advisory committee?

Mr. GARDINER: Doctor Barton; Doctor Christie of Guelph college; Reverend Father Leopold; Doctor J. W. Black; Mr. Reek, the deputy minister in Ontario; Doctor E. S. Archibald; Mr. Rioux, the deputy minister in Quebec; Doctor Newton, and Mr. Truemann.

Item agreed to.

Administration service—
4. Contributions to empire bureaux, $33,823.34.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister give us a brief explanation of the work that is done in connection with these first four items?

Mr. GARDINER: The imperial agricultural bureaux were set up as a result of the imperial agricultural research conference of 1927, which recommended that eight bureaux be established to collect, collate and disseminate information on research in selected branches of agricultural science, and generally to assist research workers in the empire with information on their subjects and with introductions to other research workers.

These proposals were accepted by empire governments, and in 1928 a number of these bureaux were set up. Since 1929 this service of common empire interest has been maintained from a fund jointly subscribed by the governments of the empire and administered by an executive council, composed of representatives directly appointed by the governments for that purpose. The functions of the bureaux have to do with the distribution of information; they do not themselves undertake research, but they gather and make available to every country that is a member of the bureaux the results of the research work carried on.

Mr. SENN: What is the work undertaken at the Farnham laboratory, and where is it located?

Mr. GARDINER: Parasitology is undertaken at that laboratory. It is at Farnham, in England.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is this a grant, and have we a representative on the bureaux?

Mr. GARDINER: It is a grant made to these bureaux, and from them we get the information.

Mr. MARSHALL: Have we Canadian representatives on the various bureaux?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a representative of every government on the bureaux executive. Our representative at present is a man from the high commissioner's office in London.

Mr. SENN: Is there an interchange of information between these bureaux and any similar bureaux in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, all the information we gather by research is sent to this clearing house to be made available to other parts of the empire.

Mr. COLDWELL: For bureaux which simply collect and distribute information, is this not rather a large sum, if it is simply a statistical collecting and distributing organization?

Mr. GARDINER: They maintain an expert staff to go over all the information gathered and put it into form to be made available to the various countries. The services of these experts are paid for out of these grants, and as it is under the supervision of all parts of the empire it is fairly safe to conclude that we are paying only equally along with other parts of the empire, that we are not overpaying.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has the minister any idea of the total amount expended by the imperial government and charged to the other dominions?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the exact amount, but each part of the empire contributes its just share in proportion to its agricultural activities.

Mr. SENN: Are all parts of the empire connected with these bureaux?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is, the dominions, the crown colonies, and so on?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, all of them.

Item agreed to.

Administration service—

5. International institute of agriculture, $12,000.

Mr. SENN: Is this the one in Rome?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, it is an international organization of the same type as the other.

Item agreed to.

Science service—

6. Science service administration, $28,090.

Mr. MARSHALL: I notice that there is an entomologist in connection with this service. What are his duties, and are they distinct from those of entomologists in other branches of the service?

Mr. GARDINER: He happens to be an entomologist, but it is a transfer from the other branch to the administrative section of the service. The committee will notice that the entomology section is covered in the science service further down. But this official happens to be an entomologist who is in the administrative staff.

Item agreed to.

Science service—

7. Animal and poultry pathology, $158,550.

Mr. SENN: What work is undertaken by this particular branch of the science service?

Mr. GARDINER: The work of the division of animal pathology falls into three main groups or sections; scientific research relating to animal diseases of major economic importance; serums, vaccines, diagnostic reagents and other biological products; analytical and routine diagnostic services.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are all these officers in the department at Ottawa, or are they at various points in the country?

Mr. GARDINER: They are not all in Ottawa; they are at the different laboratories across the country.

Mr. COLDWELL: Where are those laboratories situate?

Mr. GARDINER: One of them is in British Columbia; one is at Lethbridge.

Mr. SENN: Are there only two outside Ottawa?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a third one, at Langley Prairie. There are two in British Columbia, one at Langley Prairie and one at Saanich.

Mr. SENN: I understood the minister to say that one branch of this service had to do with the investigation of diseases. I suppose that would include such diseases as shipping fever and Bang's disease. I do not know whether the minister would prefer to discuss questions of that kind under the health of animals branch, or here, but if it should be discussed here I should certainly like to say something about what is being done and ask some questions about Bang's disease.

Mr. GARDINER: The work having to do with investigation is covered in this branch, and the work having to do with service will be covered in the production branch. It can be discussed at either place. It is late to-night to start this discussion, and if we could carry this item, when we come to the other item we can discuss the whole matter.

Item agreed to.

Science service—
8. Bacteriology and dairy research, $40,450.

Mr. GARDINER: The same remark applies to that. They can be discussed under production service.

Mr. MARSHALL: I was wondering about the note at the bottom of No. 11, "Appropriation not required for 1939-40, $76,700." How much of that would be taken from each of these items under science service? How would that money be distributed?

Mr. GARDINER: The $76,700 is not taken out of this service. It was voted last year for buildings, and is not required this year because the buildings have been erected.

Mr. SENN: Along the same line, was the vote of last year for these items altogether used up?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. It is not all consumed yet, but practically all of it will be by the end of the financial year.

Item agreed to.

Science Service—
9. Botany and plant pathology, $306,665.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are all these officials in Ottawa, or are they distributed across the country at the various farms?

Mr. GARDINER: Some of them are in Ottawa and some of them are distributed across the country.

Mr. COLDWELL: I notice, for example, that there are thirteen assistant agricultural scientists.

Mr. GARDINER: They are at the different stations across the country.

Item agreed to.

Science service—
10. Agricultural chemistry, $101,730.

Mr. SENN: I think we should know what is undertaken under the study of agricultural chemistry. Soil composition?

Mr. GARDINER: As will be understood by the hon. member for Haldimand, many of the agricultural services are based, of course, upon chemistry. Analyses of soil and all that kind of thing are based upon chemistry. I have here quite a statement about it if it is desired to go into it. Probably we had better not start it this evening.

Mr. SENN: I wanted to know whether private individuals could have soils analyzed free of charge, and how they would go about having this done.

Mr. GARDINER: There are local laboratories, some of them provincial and some operating with our assistance, and people can send in soils and have them analyzed. I understand it is quite a general practice in some parts of Ontario to have the soils analyzed, in order to determine the type of fertilizer required.

Mr. SENN: But it is all done, I believe, by the provincial department of agriculture. That is the reason I was asking why it is necessary to have the duplicate branch here.

Mr. GARDINER: In western Ontario it is done largely by the province, but there is an understanding between the federal department and the province as to the division of activities in connection with it, and in some sections it is done by the federal department.

Mr. SENN: Well, does the federal government pay any of the cost of analyzing by the provincial government?

Mr. GARDINER: Not for analyses, except in connection with soil survey work. Where we are making soil surveys of certain areas of the province we make contributions towards the work.

Mr. HAYHURST: Is all the soil testing done in Ottawa?

Mr. GARDINER: No, soil testing is done right across Canada. It is done by the university staffs, I believe, in Alberta and Saskatchewan, and some of it is done at Swift Current in the plant we have there.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the cost of doing university work is not included in this particular estimate?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: I notice there are just four assistants. I suppose all of them are in Ottawa.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. SENN: Does that include analyses of fertilizers as well?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. SENN: And if anyone is buying fertilizer and wants it analysed to make sure it is according to the description which is on the bag, is it possible to have this done here?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; if it is sent in here it will be analysed and a report made on it.

Mr. SENN: Free of charge, I suppose.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 17, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO CANADA'S POSITION WITH RESPECT TO PACIFIC SETTLEMENT OF INTERNATIONAL DISPUTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I notice in this morning's press that Great Britain and France have informed the League of Nations that they will not consider binding their obligations under the general act for pacific settlement of international disputes in the event that either country should be at war. I should like to know whether Canada, as an independent signatory to that agreement, also repudiates the idea of arbitration instead of war.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not know that I would care to answer the question in just the form in which my hon. friend has stated it, but I would say to him that Canada has not altered her position.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR APPROVAL SUBJECT TO REQUIRED LEGISLATION

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King that the house go into committee on the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 17th day of November, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, to-day in a sense I am replying to the speech made by my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) three days ago. I must say that at least half of his speech did not deal with the trade treaty at all but was good political propaganda, from his standpoint. My hon. friend from Mount Royal, whose observations are very wise and very apt, remarked to me that if the text of the trade treaty had smallpox certainly the sermon the right hon. gentleman delivered would escape contagion because it was so far from the text. I thought that was rather well put. I do not intend to follow my right hon. friend into the political realm—I was going to say "quagmire" but will not use that word—except for two or three remarks.

My right hon. friend spoke of the by-elections and boasted a little—perhaps with some justification—in regard to the number of seats his party had won. I happen to have the correct figures, which show that in the fourteen contested by-elections since 1935 the Liberal vote was 111,000, while the anti-Liberal vote was 131,000, so there is not very much to boast about there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But those were not all Conservative votes.

Mr. MANION: That is true, but they were in opposition to the Liberals. In the 1935 general election, only 46 per cent of the votes went Liberal while 54 per cent went anti-Liberal. In spite of that fact, however, my hon. friends obtained 180 seats as against 65 seats won by the 54 per cent voting against the Liberals. Another interesting set of figures —and then I shall have done with the ordinary political discussion—shows that according to the votes cast in the last election it took 12,000 odd votes to elect a Liberal. I do not use the word "odd" in any derogatory sense. It took 33,000 odd votes to elect a Conservative, and it took 389,000 votes to elect the hon. gentleman from Kootenay East. I do not know what any of these figures prove, however; they merely indicate some of the rather strange pictures we get if we begin to describe what we call democracy. The only point I make is that, according to these figures, I do not think my right hon. friend has such a great deal to boast about.

The right hon. gentleman mentioned differences in our party respecting the tariff. Well, perhaps there are such differences, but there are differences in all parties. So far as the tariff is concerned the Liberal party goes from the extreme of free trade, as represented by my hon. friend from Huron North (Mr. Deachman) and many members from the west, to moderately high protection, at least, as represented by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). So not only in regard to the tariff but in regard to almost everything, you can go up and down in the Liberal party from imperialism to Hepburnism, and you will find differences of opinion. But after all, sir, the trade agreement is the subject before the house, and I intend to deal with it as briefly as possible having regard to the fact that a great deal of ground must be covered.

To me. I think to all of us, the subject is a very important one which merits free discussion. I do not think any party or any government can bring into effect a trade treaty of any kind without its deserving in this House of Commons free and wide discussion. For example, the debate on the empire trade agreements of 1932 took twenty-six parliamentary days. In fact, we began the sixth week; there were nineteen days on the resolution, and seven days in committee. At the end my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his party, who were in opposition at the time, voted against the empire trade agreements—with the exception of the present Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) who on the second reading voted for it, but I think abstained from voting at the other stages of the measure. In 1911, when the reciprocity agreement was being discussed, the debate took, I believe, something over four months.

In view of those two points it is clear that this subject is too important to gloss over, and requires a certain amount of elucidation. I have pointed out, and I wish to make it clear, that it is not in any way the intention of this party to hold up the discussion. We have no interest in delaying the business of the house or unnecessarily prolonging the debate. In fact I have no doubt the debate will be a good deal shorter—that is my guess at this time—than was the debate on the empire trade agreements. We realize that after all the government has a huge majority, and can pass the legislation anyway.

But I repeat that a fair discussion is proper, both as we sit at the moment and in committee; for it is only right that the details should be discussed. After all, this is public business of the utmost importance to Canada—just as, to my mind, the Bren gun was public business. And I do not mind saying to-day that I am getting just a little tired of people outside of the house, who know nothing whatever about the affairs of parliament, or how they are carried on, continually lecturing this house and urging it to get on with the business of the people. I do not care who they are; I think they are lecturing without sufficient knowledge. After all, the government of Canada is the executive of parliament, and parliament, therefore—theoretically at least, and indeed in practice—has the last word. That is democracy. Whatever the faults of democracy may be, at any rate it is superior to anything we know of in the way of dictatorship.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: I think I am expressing the point of view of every hon. member in the house when I say that those who criticize members of the House of Commons, as a body, simply because we choose to discuss matters here, merely show that they do not quite understand what the democratic liberty of free speech means.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: As a matter of fact—and I do not say this with the intention of playing politics—my conviction is that the reason we did not go on a few days ago when we could have was that the government was not ready.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, no.

Mr. MANION: And to show I am not trying to play politics, I say that because I well remember that on some occasions hon. gentlemen on this side were in office we were not ready to proceed. For some reason, governments are often not quite ready with the business of the house. I remember occasions when we had to do what my right hon. friend had to do on a few occasions this year—when we had to adjourn the house at six o'clock. Frankly, I do not know why persons who are not members of the house insist that we should work here until eleven o'clock every night. In fact I will admit that one of the very fine things the right hon. gentleman had much to do with, was that of changing the foolish habit we used to have of sitting here late every night—a most barbarous procedure. After all, we have some rights in the way of liberty and freedom, in regard to our hours, as well as in regard to our speech.

My right hon. friend in his political remarks the other day, suggested that this party consists of economic nationalists, that we do not want to trade with other countries. Of course, that, to put it mildly is ridiculous,—only a blind man in a country like Canada would take any such course as that. There are two chief reasons why Canada must trade with other countries. In the first place we have a huge area, a small population and rich resources, out of which we produce large quantities of raw materials which must be exported. We do not consume all of them ourselves. That, in the first place, compels us to trade with other countries. Secondly, we are a debtor nation. The other day I looked up the exact figures and I found that each year we pay out in interest on dominion, provincial, municipal and large corporation loans from other countries, in round figures, $250,000,000 per year. Indeed, we pay out $325,000,000, but we receive in return, in the form of interest and dividends, something like $78,000,000, leaving a balance, in round figures, of about $250,000,000 per year, which we have to pay out to other countries. Most of it goes to the United States—$231,000,000—as against $88,000,000 to the United Kingdom.

So that for that reason again we must export. I must point out however that in our export statistics to-day we include gold, and I believe that does not give quite the proper picture. Gold should be kept separate from ordinary commodities, because gold is not a commodity in the ordinary sense. It is something which is accepted by all countries of the world—they are glad to take it—and for that reason it is something which should not be treated as an ordinary commodity in trade statistics.

In addition to all that, there is a third reason why we must trade. There are certain kinds of products which we cannot produce—tea, coffee, rubber, cotton and even, apparently, wool, though we should, to my mind, be able to produce sufficient wool; I have said that in the house many times. We do not produce oranges and other citrus fruits, and so on. So we are compelled to trade.

Then again, trade figures are mixed up with invisible items such as the tourist trade, shipping, insurance, and the interest which I have just mentioned. So I say that the right hon. gentleman's statement that we do not want to trade, and that we do not want trade treaties, is not correct, and he knows it is not correct. Anyone who knows something about government business or national affairs realizes that we must trade with other countries. But what we do favour is this: We favour trading with other countries on a fair basis. We advocate giving favour for favour. In other words, we do not advocate the making of a trade treaty at any price. I am a pacifist in the best sense of the word; I do not believe in war. But I am not a pacifist at any price; neither am I a trade treaty man, at any price. If we are to take the attitude that we will make a trade treaty at any price—that is, give two favours for one, if necessary, to get a trade treaty—then the logical conclusion for my right hon. friend and his party to come to is to become out and out free traders. Then they would be getting all the imports that our exports could pay for, and there would be no tariff barriers against them.

The only countries of the world to-day in which economic nationalism prevails are a few of the European countries which became economically nationalist because of the great war, and the fear of another one. They would wish if another war came upon them to be self-supporting, self-sufficient and able to take care of themselves. Perhaps of all the countries in the world the United States is the closest to being self-supporting or self-sufficient; yet even the United States requires rubber, tea, coffee, and some other products it cannot produce within its own borders.

Now, in regard to the empire trade agreements, which are mixed up with the one before us, we must not forget that the United Kingdom is the greatest market of the world. That is obvious to anyone who looks at the figures. It is the greatest purchasing market of the world.

I have a quotation in my hand—and I have heard only a part of it cited before—from the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. This is the report of a speech he made in Toronto, in the Toronto Globe of April 2, 1907, at a banquet given to Right Hon. James Bryce, then British ambassador at Washington. This is what Sir Wilfrid said at that time:

> I have seen and you have all seen in an American newspaper published in New York just a few days ago, that we are yearning for reciprocity with the United States. Now I tell you that the editor of that newspaper is about twenty-five years behind the times. At that time, we would have given our right arm for such a thing, but it is now a thing of the past. We are turning our hopes towards the old motherland. We have introduced the doctrine and the policy of a preference to Great Britain and towards all the British empire, and this is the policy by which we stand at the present time. We shall have no more pilgrimages to Washington, and this is simply the message I have to convey to your guest at the present moment. I know he will be a friend of Canada, and if it be a fact that a new leaf be turned in our relations with our neighbours it will be a matter for great congratulation.

The right hon. gentleman who now leads the government of Canada frequently quotes what Sir Wilfrid Laurier had done, and he might give some consideration to the "no more pilgrimages to Washington" idea. I intend to deal with the fact that we also looked for a trade treaty, but we looked for one on a different basis from the one negotiated by the right hon. gentleman. To go back a little further, it was the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier which in 1897 introduced the British preference. I could not find the exact quotation—hon. members opposite will correct me, I am sure, if I am wrong—but I think I am right when I say that for some years Sir Wilfrid took the attitude that we should get something in return, something by way of preference from Great Britain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Sir Wilfrid's position was that if at any time England became a protectionist country, we should then expect to be given a preference in the British market.

Mr. MANION: I attempted to look it up but I could not find it. I accept what the right hon. gentleman has said; and that is exactly what we advocated and what we accomplished in the end. While Great Britain was a free trading country she could hardly give any preference or advantage to the different portions of the empire, but once she became protectionist—I pointed out the other day, Great Britain collects three times as much customs duties per capita as we do—it was then possible for her to return favour for favour, to return something for the favours which she had been receiving since 1897. I submit that the empire trade agreements negotiated in 1932 by the Bennett government were a great triumph.

Great Britain is not only the greatest market in the world, but she is a sheltered market; and that was particularly valuable once we got a preference: the preference gave us shelter. There is another point that should be considered, and that is the fact that Great Britain is a static market; in other words, her population remains practically stationary, and she does not increase her purchases from the world. She goes on buying the same amount of commodities, aside from armaments, year in and year out. It is worth remembering that it is our loss when the United States, competing with us in that market in products such as wheat, fruits and lumber, get some of our export business. If by this treaty we lose in exports to Great Britain, granting world conditions remain the same, ours will not. We would be increasing our unemployment and our distress through allowing the United States to take some of the market which previously we had enjoyed.

As I admitted a moment ago, we also wanted a trade treaty. But in seeking it we asked for it on a fair basis. We did not attempt to get that trade treaty, or trade agreement—I am using the terms interchangeably—except on a basis of favour for favour. After all, there are many reasons why we should get fair treatment from the United States. I have before me the letters exchanged between the Canadian and United States governments in 1934. The right hon. Prime Minister quoted them the other day. I have no intention of reading all the letters, which were issued as a white paper in 1935. I suggest to any hon. members who have not read this white paper that they do so; they will find it very interesting. The letter from which I intend to quote is dated at Washington, November 14, 1934, and is signed by Hon. W. D. Herridge, who was then our representative at Washington. It is addressed to Mr. Cordell Hull, and reads as follows:

> The government of Canada for many months have been giving careful consideration to the means whereby the exchange of commodities between Canada and the United States might be increased, and I have been instructed to present a statement of their views for the information of the government of the United States. The government of Canada believe that the time has come for definite action and that the declared desire of both governments to improve conditions of trade between the two countries should now be carried into effect by the negotiation of a comprehensive trade agreement.
>
> You will recall that when the Prime Minister of Canada visited Washington in April, 1933, at the invitation of the President of the United States, the development of trade between the two countries was sympathetically discussed.

I think the right hon. Prime Minister quoted that the other day. Then lower down in his letter, Mr. Herridge says:

> Since Mr. Bennett's visit, informal discussions have been carried on, and several methods of improving trade relations between the two countries have been suggested and examined.

I should like to quote further from the letter, a part which applies particularly to this discussion. It reads:

> It is hardly necessary to stress the importance to both the United States and Canada of their mutual trade. For many years each country has provided the other with either its largest or its second largest foreign market.

Here is an interesting part a little further down:

> During the decade ending in 1933 Canada provided a market for the products of the United States larger by one-fourth than the whole of Asia, about twice as large as Germany or all South America, nearly three times as large as France or Japan, nearly seven times as large as China, and more than ten times as large as the Soviet Union. In spite of the considerable decline in trade from the high level of 1929, Canada still provided a market in the first nine months of 1934 only slightly smaller than all Asia, nearly twice as large as all South America or Japan, between two and three times as large as Germany or France, four times as large as China, and twenty-two times as large as the Soviet Union.

Then he continues on the next page:

In no year since 1882 have Canadian exports to the United States exceeded in value Canadian imports from the United States.

Since that was written in 1934 there have been a couple of years when Canadian exports to the United States were slightly larger than Canadian imports from the United States, but apparently those are the facts up to that time. The letter continues:

During the thirty years ending in 1933, Canada purchased in the United States almost 70 per cent of all her imports and sold in the United States only 37 per cent of all her exports. In the last decade, Canadians have spent over $1.60 in buying products of the United States for every dollar spent on Canadian products by purchasers in the United States.

That is not a per capita comparison.

Mr. EULER: It is a better comparison.

Mr. MANION: That is a matter of opinion. I am not quite in agreement with the hon. gentleman, but he will have a chance to deal with the matter later on. I am not going to argue about it at the moment. The letter goes on:

Canada has therefore been obliged to meet the debit balance thus arising by other means of payment. In the decade 1921 to 1930, according to the Department of Commerce of the United States, the balance payable by Canada to the United States on exchange of commodities averaged $287 millions a year.

That is a huge balance in favour of the United States. Then on page 8 he said:

Since the beginning of the depression, amongst countries heavily indebted to the United States, Canada stands almost alone in having promptly discharged in full its obligations payable in the United States.

I am pointing this out because I remarked at the beginning of my speech that the United States had every reason to treat us very well in connection with trade agreements. I shall quote briefly from the final part of the letter as follows:

I am authorized to put forward the following outline as a suitable basis for the negotiation of a trade agreement:

(a) A mutual undertaking to maintain during the lifetime of the agreement the unrestricted free entry of commodities now on the free list of either country.

(b) The mutual concession of tariff treatment as favourable as that accorded to any other foreign country;

That is the gist of that paragraph.

(c) The reduction by 50 per cent of the existing United States rates of duty, as authorized by the Tariff Act of 1934, on a specified number of natural products, including inter alia, lumber, fish, potatoes, milk and cream, and live cattle; a number of other agricultural products, and several minerals both metallic and non-metallic.

That, in brief, is the gist of the letter; and if you will note, Mr. Speaker, at no page or paragraph of that letter did we offer to give up our preferences in the United Kingdom. That, to my mind, is one of the chief points of difference between our proposal to the United States government and the attitude taken by the present government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point out to my hon. friend that neither did we, with regard to our first treaty.

Mr. MANION: In 1935?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MANION: I quite agree, but you did with regard to this treaty, and this is the one I am discussing.

To prove again that the Conservative party is favourable to trade I am going to read the plank of the Conservative party adopted at its national convention last July. It has a direct bearing on the present discussion, because, of course, it was known at that time that the trade treaty was being negotiated, and I suppose the negotiations had some bearing on the drafting of this resolution. It is a little lengthy, but I will read the whole of it because I think it should be on record both for us and for our friends opposite. It is the trade and commerce resolution passed in July at the National Liberal—no, not Liberal; I was going to say Liberal-Conservative, but they changed the name of the party to National Conservative, and I have not quite got used to it yet. This is the plank:

This National Conservative convention declares its continued adherence to its traditional policy of fostering and sustaining by fiscal protection Canadian labour and Canadian industries, and especially the primary industries of agriculture, fisheries, forestry and mining, all of which are essential to the maintenance of a well-balanced national economy, while, at the same time, guarding against undue advantage being taken of the protection so afforded.

It also affirms its adherence to the underlying principles of that policy, which have served to stimulate the development of the natural resources of Canada, to preserve and to enlarge the domestic markets for Canadian products, to promote interprovincial trade, and, generally, to provide a diversified economic life which will serve to retain Canada's sons and daughters within our own boundaries.

This convention affirms the policy of having tariff schedules under scientific investigation by a permanent tariff commission and that, in case it is ascertained that unfair advantage is being taken of any customs duties imposed by such schedules, the tariff commission shall make recommendations, to which effect shall be given by the government, for reducing such rates of duty or for removing them from the tariff schedules.

That is very important, and I have so stated on many occasions on public platforms. In other words, it is the plank against exploitation behind tariff walls. We established the tariff board on that very basis, as my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Stewart) reminds me. I continue with the resolution:

This convention affirms its firm adherence to the policy of preferential trade within the British commonwealth of nations, by which Canada obtained the boon of tariff preferences in the markets of the United Kingdom and of other dominions, and which have served to mitigate the severity of the trade depression during recent years, and which were approved by parliament, despite the bitter, determined and prolonged opposition of the Liberal party.

This convention is convinced that the permanent interests of Canada are best conserved by enlarging our markets in the United Kingdom and in other British dominions, whose products are more complementary than competitive with those of this country, and with which our trade agreements are more likely to be durable and beneficial.

Then this last paragraph:

This convention believes that the external trade of Canada may also be increased advantageously by the negotiation, on a fair and equitable basis, of trade agreements with countries which are outside of the British Empire, but that in negotiations with foreign countries, the terms agreed upon should not be such as to impair the benefits derived by Canada under existing agreements between Canada and the United Kingdom and between Canada and other British dominions.

It seems to me, sir, that that resolution is proof sufficient that the Conservative party is not a party of economic nationalism, and that all of us believe in trade.

The Prime Minister claimed, and the Liberal party have been claiming, that this treaty helps to foster world peace and the unity of the democracies of the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: Some of my hon. friends opposite, I think about half a dozen, applaud.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: They did better the second time, stimulated by my comment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was speaking of this treaty in conjunction with the United Kingdom-United States agreement.

Mr. MANION: The right hon. gentleman talked as if this was not a trade treaty but a peace treaty. As I listened to him, I thought he spoke, as if we had just been engaged in a spectacular war with some great nation and had won a glorious victory; and as I waited for his peroration I watched, as an hon. gentleman watched me on another occasion, to see the victims come marching up through the aisles of parliament. He spoke as if we had won some great victory, and yet, as I pointed out the other night, not since 1812, a period of over a hundred years, have we had any differences of a serious nature with the United States, and certainly since the beginning of the century there have been no differences between Great Britain and the United States. It is true, I admit, that prior to the beginning of this century, there were those in the United States who occasionally twisted the lion's tail, as the phrase was at that time, but since the end of the last century so far as I know there has been no attempt, except perhaps by an occasional individual, to do anything of that kind. Yet it looked to me as if the Prime Minister were trying to point out in his address to the house the other day, and indeed he implied this in his interruption a moment ago, that this treaty meant a great advance towards peace throughout the world. On occasion the right hon. gentleman can attain heights of oratory on matters of that sort, even if, as now, he is imagining most of what he says. I well remember, and I thought of it as the right hon. gentleman spoke the other day, an expression used by an old friend of his, and incidentally of mine, the late Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, but not with reference to the Prime Minister. He said that a certain gentleman on the other side of the house could make a hogshead of lather out of an ounce of soap. I could not help but think of the expression when the right hon. gentleman got so much worked up the other day on this question. I envy him at times when he does that sort of thing. I am not able to do it. I am just a plain, blunt man who sticks to the facts. I do not use language—

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend does not need any soap at all to make a lather.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friends opposite are pretty slippery with the soap they do use. I use language to express my thoughts, not to hide them. And so I suggest that all of us, including even the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, should keep our feet on the ground and not get our heads up among the clouds. After all, we are but eleven millions of people and we are not so powerful a factor in the peace of the world as some of us seem to think. Let us be realists, not weavers of words or dreamers of dreams.

I want to emphasize the fact that all of us in this great dominion are friendly to the United States. The majority of the people in our two countries speak the same language, and have the same traditions, the same customs, the same laws. We understand each other. For the people of the United States we entertain most friendly feelings. I admit frankly that in common with other after-dinner speakers I have often boasted of Canada and the United States living peacefully side by side for over a hundred years, without serious quarrels or disputes, as an example to the world of which we may well be proud. In that connection I want to take exception to one thing which the right hon. gentleman said about me in his speech, in the debate on the address. He referred to me as if I had spoken of the president of the United States. But I would point out that I did not mention the president of the United States at all. What I said was that after the Munich agreement all I heard coming from the United States—these were my words, and perhaps they were not quite as definite as they should have been—was criticism of Chamberlain. I was referring to writers, and to such magazines as Time, a very fine magazine which I read regularly and like very much, but which makes me see as red as its cover by its articles against Chamberlain and the settlement which the British and the French made at Munich. Indeed, since I spoke on the address, a professor from one of the United States universities made a speech in Montreal quite critical of Mr. Chamberlain, and along the same lines. The reason I mention it—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think that my hon. friend caught the significance of my remark. I did not think he had reflected on the president; rather I thought he had forgotten altogether the president's contribution.

Mr. MANION: I was not speaking of the president; I was speaking of the populace generally. The right hon. gentleman is more careful to-day than he was the other day. I have the quotation here, and I think I had better read it so that there can be no misinterpretation:

> I was rather surprised this afternoon to hear what my hon. friend had to say about the actions of the President of the United States at the time of the crisis last year.

That is on page 58 of Hansard. On page 59 he said:

> I say to my hon. friend that if he had given that quotation to the house—

He had quoted Mr. Chamberlain.

> —instead of saying what he did, he would have been more patriotic in his attitude. I can conceive of nothing less patriotic in these times than an effort on the part of any Canadian public man or citizen to try to create prejudices between this country and the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that the actions of the president which I there referred to were the all important communications that he sent to Germany and to other countries. My hon. friend's remark was to the effect that nothing had come out of the United States except criticism.

Mr. MANION: I admit that I was a little indefinite and probably did not make my point clear, but the right hon. gentleman had no right to apply to me statements about the president of the United States which I had not made, and he had much less right—I mention this very seriously to-day—to question my patriotism. I do not question the patriotism of anybody in this house: I say this very seriously. I take it for granted that we are all good, loyal, patriotic Canadians. I am not going to question anybody's patriotism, but I object very strongly to anybody questioning mine. Probably that will be sufficient to say regarding that matter. The reason I mention it at all is that it was misinterpreted in England. I had a letter from a friend who said he had read a report of my speech in the London Daily Telegraph, and he added, "Until I read your speech in Hansard—with every word of which I agree—I was under the impression, gained from the report of the Prime Minister's remarks, that you had said things which were not very wise."

In closing the incident I just suggest this, that we should all bear in mind in discussing foreign relations of any kind that these international relations are too important and too delicate to be made a football of politics, and that we should avoid anything in the way of taking, even though we have the opportunity, political advantage from them.

Let me say further about the President of the United States that nobody more than our group welcomed the words of the president at Ivy Lea, when he said in effect that the United States would come to the relief of Canada if Canada were attacked.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was at Queens university, Kingston.

Mr. MANION: I beg pardon: it was the same day the bridge was opened at Ivy Lea. We should remember, however, that the president's statement had no reference to trade. To my mind it was a statement of the position of the United States with regard to its own self-defence. It is to prevent a flank attack upon the United States that the United States so frankly takes this attitude. Ever since the Monroe doctrine was declared, over one hundred years ago, the United States has taken the same attitude The Monroe doctrine forbids any European country which was not then already settled, in a sense, on this continent from becoming settled here; and I have no doubt that if Mr. Roosevelt were asked he would say that he would go just as quickly to the defence of Mexico, were Mexico attacked by some foreign country, as he would to the defence of Canada. As I say, that would be done for the purpose of self-defence, because the Americans do not want Japan, Germany, Italy or any other country to get a foothold in Canada or Mexico and thereby to gain a side-door entrance to the United States. The president's statement had nothing whatever to do with trade. I say also that the friendship of the democracies has nothing to do with trade. Great Britain and France, Canada and the other British dominions, and the United States are and should remain friendly, and I think will remain friendly, because they have the same ideals of individual freedom, much the same parliamentary institutions, and largely the same economic system. These democracies all desire peace. The peoples who are endangering the peace of the world at the present time are not the democracies but the dictatorships. I venture to say that if future wars were dependent upon the actions of the democracies the world would never again be cursed with war.

To support my attitude may I make one or two quotations? I took this out of the Ottawa Journal yesterday afternoon: it is dated February 15, from Washington:

> The House of Representatives heard sales of United States airplanes abroad defended to-day on the ground that "Americans are safe only so long as England and France stand."

That is what one congressman said. A little further down:

> Representative Pace, democrat, Georgia, member of the house military committee, told the house that he thought it was sound to aid Great Britain and France build up their defences because if those democracies fell before the dictatorships a major bulwark of the United States would be removed.
>
> "Is it not better," he said, "to sell England and France planes for their defence than to go to war with a big power to prevent an encroachment on this hemisphere?"
>
> Asserting that the United States "for selfish reasons" would be forced, defensively, to go to the aid of Canada or Great Britain in an emergency, Pace added, "I feel sure that the President did not say 'Our frontier is on the Rhine'. In my judgment he could well have said, 'Our first line defence is England and France'. When we see England and France go down, we are threatened."

That is an American view of the whole situation. I think it is a perfectly proper and correct view. And that is the reason; not trade treaties, not trade, not dollars and cents; but the freedom of democracy, the belief in democracy, is the reason that the United States is ready if necessary to help, in various ways, countries like the United Kingdom, France and Canada, in case of difficulty.

With regard to international appeasement, we all want it. We want it just as much as we want peace. But appeasement, like charity, begins at home. We have not appeasement, at least we have not peace, in our own country to-day because of economic conditions, unemployment, lack of opportunity, insecurity, all of which are so common throughout Canada at the present time. To my mind—and I shall try to prove it before I conclude—this agreement increases those detrimental economic conditions and therefore lessens the possibility of our having peace and appeasement in our own country.

A few moments ago I quoted an American. I am now going to quote a prominent British public man, in regard to this treaty, to show that the British are not putting up any verbal fog to try to confuse the people. They are talking of the two trade agreements, merely as business arrangements. Mr. Oliver Stanley, president of the board of trade, who occupies the same position in Great Britain as the Minister of Trade and Commerce does in Canada, speaking at a luncheon of the Canadian chamber of commerce in London a few days after these agreements were signed, made this statement:

> "You may ask what about the political effects of the agreements," said Mr. Stanley. "The fact is I have never looked upon this as a political treaty. I have looked upon it entirely as an economic bargain."

That is his attitude. It is the attitude I am taking, and it is the attitude I think we should all take. It is not a matter of politics so far as the agreements are concerned; it is a matter of business.

Here is another quotation from the same speech of his, and I think it is worth putting on Hansard although it has not any connection with the immediate statement that I have made:

> It was natural in trade matters, he said, that "we should consider our own interests first and the empire next."

In other words, he was looking at it from the straight point of view of business—the proper attitude. No criticism is implied in my quoting that. A week later, on November 28, he made another speech. Joseph Kennedy, the United States ambassador to the court of St. James, was present. Here are two more quotations from Mr. Stanley's speech in reference to the new Anglo-American trade agreement. True, he was not referring to the Canada-United States treaty, but his conclusion applies.

Mr. Stanley, praising it as "wide and fair," said Great Britain concluded the pact without political aims.

That is clear. I want my right hon. friend particularly, and some of his followers, to mark the next clause:

"It takes in more than 600 items," he said, "but one item we did not include was 'eyewash.' We think it is eminently fair to both sides and to the world."

I suggest that the eyewash might be left out in Canada as well as in England. Let me quote another British opinion. The Right Hon. L. S. Amery, speaking at the annual meeting of the Empire Industries Association on November 29, 1938, ten days after the treaty was signed, made a statement which was quoted in the London Times of November 30, 1938. I quote:

Mr. Amery begged leave to be a little skeptical about the claim that this treaty was a contribution towards international trade and goodwill. He suggested that it would not have the slightest effect on the policy of totalitarianism or on economic nationalism in other countries, and he frankly believed that as a contribution to the opening of the trade doors of the world it was more imaginary than real. The Ottawa agreements—

—that is, the empire trade agreements of 1932—

were intended to be the first steps in a forward policy for the development of interempire trade. It seemed to Mr. Amery that any further steps in that direction were forbidden in almost every direction by the Anglo-American treaty.

That is as far as I shall go in discussing that aspect of the question. I submit that the talk about this treaty as having anything whatever to do with world peace is simply what Mr. Oliver Stanley called it, "eyewash."

There is another point I should like to touch upon at this juncture. In his speech the Prime Minister apparently objected to my describing the Canadian newspaper release as ballyhoo and propaganda. Well, there were forty-three pages in the press release, and if it was not ballyhoo and propaganda, some of it at any rate was deceptive. I find that the people's money is being used for the spreading of political propaganda about this treaty. I have here a page of the Toronto Star of February 7, 1939, ten days ago, over half of which is taken up with a paid advertisement signed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) and by the deputy minister—an advertisement paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. To my mind it is largely Liberal propaganda. For example, in large print there appears this statement:

New trade agreements are further encouragements to Canadian exporters.

That may be correct; I will not argue at the moment about the possible facts. I do not understand, however, why the people of Canada should be asked to pay for such advertisements, and I use the word "advertisements" advisedly, because I do not doubt the hon. gentleman had it printed in other newspapers. I do not suppose he limited it to the Toronto Star. I do not see why the Canadian people should pay for putting out Liberal propaganda.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Any more than they should pay for Tory propaganda published by the former Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman can take that up when he speaks. That should not have been paid for either if it was paid for by the government. I do not know about it. There was some criticism, my colleague the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) says, but I do not remember the incident. I say frankly that it should not have been paid for.

The Prime Minister pointed out that the trade agreements favoured the democracies; but they also favour the autocracies, because through the most favoured nation clauses, countries like Japan, Germany, Italy and even Russia are favoured by the agreement. At any rate they are favoured indirectly, and that without giving any return to Canada. For example, Russia and the Argentine are favoured, because when you take off the six cent preference on wheat which was favourable to Canada you give Russia and the Argentine the same advantages in the British market as you give to the United States. Since the war, in one or two periods at least, Russia has been a large exporter and yet, under the treaty, we give to that country the same advantage without gaining any return.

Trade treaties are not necessarily peace guarantors. Austria had a trade treaty with Germany just before Hitler walked in and took possession. As a matter of fact, there are in all trade treaties the seeds of disharmony. I do not intend to quote many passages from the agreement, but from pages one to ten I find a number of indefinite terms, terms so indefinite indeed that they might well lead to misunderstanding. For example:

In those cases in which the other country is a relatively large supplier of any such article . . .

And again:

. . . the commerce of the other country shall receive fair and equitable treatment.

Whose judgment is to be final in deciding this question? With regard to sawn lumber and timber this phrase is used: "In substantial quantities." But what are substantial quantities? Who is to determine that question? As I say, it might lead to disputes. Again:

If a wide variation should occur in the rate of exchange . . .

What is a wide variation? Does a wide variation exist to-day? To what extent must the rates vary to constitute a wide variation? These are examples of many expressions that are to be found in the treaty, which are open to dispute and which might lead to serious differences of opinion. I admit that it is not a very grave matter, but it might develop into something serious. A trade treaty might well lead to differences instead of bringing about understanding and harmony.

I suggest that the Liberals are trying to float this treaty through on a flood of propaganda. After all, I repeat, the United States is our chief competitor in wheat, fruits, meat and lumber. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, speaking on the address, made the statement that the United States now recognizes British preferences.

Mr. EULER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: The minister says, "Hear, hear." Have we reached the stage where the United States has to recognize British preferences? Is that to be regarded as another step beyond that taken by the Prime Minister in 1929, I believe, when he said that in trade matters we must do nothing to provoke the United States? Is it another manifestation of the same attitude taken by the right hon. gentleman at that time? Certainly it does seem strange to me.

Let me give briefly some of the chief objections to the treaty as I view it, because I cannot help the feeling that we have given up the British substance for the American shadow. Briefly, these are my principal objections to the treaty:

1. It makes for greater competition with our industries which are very much the same as those of the United States.

2. It affords concessions to thirty-one favoured nations which give nothing in return.

3. It brings unfair competition from favoured nations such as Japan, Germany, Italy, as a result of low standards of living and low wages, and the loss of all liberties to labour in those countries, without returning anything to Canada.

4. It is the beginning of the destruction of the whole British preferential system for which we have been struggling since 1897 and which we accomplished in the British trade agreements of 1932.

5. It cuts into the British markets, our best markets in wheat, fruits, lumber, and so on.

6. It injures our Canadian traffic and damages the transportation system, railways, steamships and so forth, sending traffic north and south instead of east and west.

7. It gives too much in return for too little; in other words, it is not an equalization of favours.

8. It will probably lessen revenues through the elimination of the three per cent special excise tax and the lowering of other tariffs.

9. It will probably increase unemployment through greater competition with industries such as coal, mining, manufacturing and so on.

Why is it that we get the worst of it in this agreement? There are a number of reasons. In the first place, the United States tariffs were and are much higher than ours. They have always been; they have been much more highly protected in the United States than we have been, their tariffs starting higher up than ours and not having to come down as low. The United States duty against wheat, for example, was 42 cents a bushel; our duty against their wheat is 12 cents. The Prime Minister himself pointed out that if the wheat duty into the United States were cut in two, from 42 cents to 21 cents, it would not be of very much use to the Canadian wheat grower for the reason that 21 cents would still be too high a tariff over which to ship Canadian wheat. That is all the president of the United States could do—cut the tariff in half. That is the second reason why we got the worst of it; the maximum cut the president could make, according to the act of 1934, was fifty per cent of the tariff, whereas we could and in some cases did take away altogether the tariff against United States products.

Third, they are shrewder traders than we are. I had the word "sharper" in my notes, but I do not like to use it because it might be taken as offensive, and I do not mean it in that way. The down-east Yankee spirit is strong in the United States, and incidentally I like the down-east Yankees, so I am not using that phrase offensively. The hon. gentleman to my right says they out-smart us, and I think they do.

Fourth, the United States has only nineteen favoured nations which automatically get the favours that they give Canada, while we have thirty-one favoured nations.

Fifth, their producers had the opportunity of appearing before the committee for reciprocity information, which is in the nature of a tariff board, to register opposition to the negotiation of a treaty that would affect them. That opportunity was not afforded Canadian producers in this country. I hold in my hand a Department of State press release of January, 28, 1938, a little over a year ago, when this treaty was under negotiation. It is marked, "Confidential release for publication in the morning newspapers of Saturday, January 29," and contains these words:

The Secretary of State issued to-day formal notice of intention to negotiate a new trade agreement with the government of Canada.

Here are the two paragraphs that illustrate the fact that the producers in the United States had an opportunity to appear before some authority, while ours did not:

Pursuant to section 4 of an act of congress approved June 12, 1934, entitled "An act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930," as extended by public resolution No. 10, approved March 1, 1937, and to executive order No. 6750, of June 27, 1934, I hereby give notice of intention to negotiate a trade agreement with the government of Canada.

This is the next paragraph:

All presentations of information and views in writing, and applications for supplemental oral presentation of views with respect to the negotiation of such agreement should be submitted to the committee for reciprocity information in accordance with the announcement of this date issued by that committee concerning the manner and dates for the submission of briefs and applications, and the time set for public hearing.

That is signed by Mr. Cordell Hull. I think this should be on record. What has happened as a result of this opportunity being afforded in the United States, together with the fact that they are shrewder traders than we are? With regard to very many products the duties in the United States are much higher since the negotiation of this treaty than the same duties in the reverse direction, that is, in Canada. It is true that there are a few items where the opposite is true, but there are not very many; I hunted for them. Take the case of bacon, hams, shoulders and other pork products. The duty in Canada is 1¾ cents per pound; the duty in the United States is 2 cents per pound. The duty on potatoes entering Canada is 37½ cents per hundred pounds for six weeks, from June 15 to July 31, and for the remainder of the year they enter free. The duty in the United States is 37½ cents from March to November and 60 cents from December to February. On carrots, radishes and cauliflower there is a ten per cent duty on importations from the United States and a 25 per cent duty on United States importations from Canada. On asparagus and spinach there is a 10 per cent duty this way and a 50 per cent duty the other way. On tomatoes our duty is 1½ cents and the United States duty is 3 cents.

Mr. ILSLEY: That does not take into account our valuations, which form a very important part of our tariff system.

Mr. MANION: I do not suppose that takes into account their valuations either.

Mr. ILSLEY: They do not have them.

Mr. MANION: These are the rates now in force, and I do not suppose there is any reason to suspect that our valuations are higher than theirs, in proportion.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a different system altogether.

Mr. MANION: On mackerel, for example, to take one of the many fish items, the duty is ½ cent per pound into Canada and from 1 to 1½ cents into the United States, depending on whether the fish are fresh or frozen. Wheat, as I have already said, carries a duty of 12 cents entering Canada and 42 cents entering the United States. I have various clothing items here also. On clothing of which silk is the main component the duty is 30 per cent in Canada and 65 per cent in the United States. On clothing of which artificial silk is the main component the duty is 32½ per cent entering Canada and 45 cents per pound and 65 per cent going into the United States. In view of all this boasting with regard to the effects of this treaty I ask why Canada's duties on the vast majority of these items should be lower than the duties on the same commodities entering the United States.

During the debate on the address I presented an argument which I should like to repeat now, that the United States is and always has been an uncertain market for Canada. I think the Prime Minister mentioned the reciprocity treaty of 1854, which was cancelled very abruptly in 1866, and earlier in my speech I quoted Sir Wilfrid Laurier's words about "no more pilgrimages to Washington." I presume he was referring to that very treaty. I have also put on record the fact that in 1922 the United States imposed the Fordney-McCumber tariff and in 1930 the Hawley-Smoot tariff against our products. It may be said that those tariffs applied to all the world, but we were a big exporter to the United States, and this was done at a time when we were importing almost twice as much as they were buying from us. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce said my comparison of $11 per capita as against $1 per capita was not fair. I am not going to argue the point; I do not think it matters very much, because I did not mean to be unfair, but surely it would be reasonable to compare one nation with the other. Surely the United States with 130,000,000 people should buy as much from us as we, with 11,000,000 people, buy from them.

Yet, sir, in the decade from 1921 to 1930 our trade with the United States showed a balance against us of $287,000,000 per year.

It seems to me the United States have always been rather harsh towards us, in view of the fact that we are their best customers. Writing in the Foreign Affairs Journal of October, 1929, Professor Taussig of Harvard used these words:

> For many years we have treated Canada much as a big bully treats the smaller boy.

In my opinion that was demonstrated by the Lumber Marking Act of 1938. At that time we had a trade treaty which had been negotiated by the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues, which included lumber; yet the United States put through this marking act which, our lumbermen complained, prevented by a roundabout method our lumber from entering the United States.

Mr. REID: Has that not been removed?

Mr. MANION: Yes, it has; but for some months it was in force, and all the lumbermen who spoke to me about it at the time, long before this treaty was negotiated, pointed out that the very fact that each piece of lumber had marked on it "Produced in Canada" prevented a great deal of our lumber from entering the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It came into force on September 1 of last year.

Mr. MANION: Yes, and was cancelled some months later.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was cancelled when the new treaty was signed.

Mr. MANION: It was in effect only for two or three months, but in my opinion that was an unfair method of dealing with our lumbermen, and that is all I am pointing out.

Then there is the cattle quota. In the press release of my right hon. friend and his government it was stated that we had a cattle quota of something like 225,000 head —I think that is the correct figure—to be shipped into the United States. And we thought we had. Now, it is discovered that that is what the United States calls a global quota—that is, it refers to the whole world, and does not refer to Canada alone. As a matter of fact, in the first quarter of this year we learned that instead of our having the right to ship into the United States 60,000 head of cattle, Mexico shipped in 45 per cent of that 60,000, and that is cut off from our cattle quota. Why?

My right hon. friend objected to my using the word "propaganda". He objected to my using the word "ballyhoo". I say now that if the fact which was mentioned in the release, namely that we have a quota of 60,000 head, is not ballyhoo or propaganda, then it is deception—and I think it is deception. I should have used the word "deception" to the people of Canada.

Until the other day—I discovered it I believe—we did not know that part of the quota was given to Mexico.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do they know?

Mr. MANION: I had a letter from western Canada, but I shall deal with it later on. There is another point I should like to make about the unfair results of the treaty. It is this rather extraordinary thing which was shown in the press release. Our new reductions to the United States number 283 items, whereas their new reductions to us number 129—considerably less than half.

Mr. EULER: Items do not mean anything; it depends upon the amount involved.

Mr. MANION: Apparently nothing means anything to my hon. friend. I am speaking of the items and, as I say, so far as I can see, the United States is getting two to one, from this government. I am asking myself: Why should they?

The government claims that the six cent preference on wheat we were given in the empire trade agreements was of no use. They have said that this preference was of no particular value to us. Well, perhaps it does not matter to a farmer in the west to-day because he has obtained a guarantee of eighty cent wheat, so he is not worried. But I say that every bushel of United States wheat which goes over there to replace our wheat is just that much more competition against us. And it is a most dangerous type of competition because it replaces our wheat and shows the British consumer that United States wheat is as good as ours—or almost as good. There is not much No. 1 hard; it is mostly No. 1 northern; and the northern United States produce good wheat. In addition to that, as I pointed out, Russia and the Argentine, without giving anything in return, get the same advantage. If Russia achieves an exporting position for wheat, she has the same advantage.

Mr. REID: Is it not a fact that the United States government was subsidizing wheat up to seventeen cents a bushel, and that since this new agreement has passed they have agreed not to subsidize the wheat growers in the United States, on the British market?

Mr. MANION: I do not know whether they have agreed to that. I did see the item in the press to that effect. I shall deal with that in a few moments.

It seems to me that if the United States is subsidizing United States wheat, that is all the more reason why we should retain our preference. If it is not another advantage to the United States to have the preference of six cents a bushel removed, then why is the United States so jubilant over it? In their official publications they have been jubilant. I shall quote two items of their press release regarding wheat. These are their views in regard to the six cent preference.

Mr. DUNNING: And the opposition down there calls that document ballyhoo.

Mr. MANION: I assume there is a certain amount of ballyhoo about it, too. I admit we are not the only people who play politics. But at the same time this is the statement in their press release. It was not distributed by the government of Canada. I happened to get this from the United States office. Here is what they have to say about grain, at page 6:

One of the most important concessions is the removal of the duty on wheat, which has been equivalent to about six cents per bushel. This has tended to divert trade to Canada and Australia. The United States formerly sold great quantities of wheat to the United Kingdom and with normal crops in the future and the restoration of free entry it should again be able to sell large quantities. Also, as a result of the removal of the preference, it should be possible for American port and transportation interests to regain their lost business in the transhipment of Canadian wheat to the United Kingdom.

I agree with that. I used that argument before I saw that statement; I believe I used it in my speech on the address in reply.

Then, at page 19 of the same release they say the following—and this is the proof of the pudding, so to speak:

Grain and grain products.

Wheat: The granting of duty-free treatment for wheat by the United Kingdom should prove of marked value to American wheat growers and the American wheat export trade. The import duty on non-empire wheat has been at the rate of 2 shillings per 480 pounds since November 17, 1932.

That is, the six cents a bushel.

A duty of this size (about six cents per bushel) applicable to wheat from some countries and not others often is sufficient to divert the trade.

Then they go on:

The concession of free entry for American wheat should benefit also the American transportation and port business. In order to obtain the benefits of the United Kingdom preference, Canadian wheat, which formerly moved in large quantities through American ports has under the preference been shipped principally to the United Kingdom direct from Canadian ports. In view of this concession, American port and transportation interests will be in a position to reenter the transshipment business.

The United Kingdom is the leading wheat-import market of the world. Formerly about a fourth of the total American wheat exports were regularly shipped to the United Kingdom. Under the influence of the world economic depression and the establishment of an import duty in 1932—

Get this.

Under the influence of the world economic depression and the establishment of an import duty in 1932—

That is what we got.

—(with empire wheat remaining duty free), imports of American wheat into the United Kingdom dropped from 39,267,000 bushels in 1930 (20·1 per cent of total wheat imports) to only 9,000 bushels in 1933—

Mr. DUNNING: They did not have any wheat to sell.

Mr. MANION: It is strange they did not point that out.

Mr. DUNNING: They were buying wheat from Canada.

Mr. MANION: We did not have much wheat at that time, as a matter of fact; that was a drought year.

—while imports from empire sources for the corresponding years rose from 79,234,000 bushels (40·5 per cent of total wheat imports) to 140,459,000 bushels (67·0 per cent of the total).

That was the difference between 1930 and 1933. Well now, the very figures of the imports given by them as a proof of the injury done to the United States wheat grower by the six cent preference on Canadian wheat shows the correctness of the argument that the United States was injured and that we were benefited by that preference.

Then, I have here an item from Boston, appearing in the Telegraph-Journal of St. John on January 20, 1939:

First Canadian wheat to move through the port of Boston to British markets in more than two years, a shipment of 24,000 bushels will be placed in the steamship Newfoundland on Saturday for delivery at Liverpool.

Earlier this month a shipment of 280,000 bushels of Canadian wheat moved through this port to Rotterdam. Shipment of Canadian grain through Boston follows the removal in the United Kingdom-United States trade treaty of the six cents a bushel preference on grain shipped to Great Britain through Canadian ports.

That is clear. I do not think the matter is debatable. Then there is another item from the Dow Jones agency of New York showing that they expected the same occurence to take place, namely that the ports of Canada would be hurt and the United States ports helped.

I have here another item—from the Christian Science Monitor of November 18—of which I shall read only one paragraph:

"As a result of the removal of the preference," a state department announcement said, "it should be possible for American port and transportation interests to regain their lost business in the transshipment of Canadian wheat to the United Kingdom."

Those facts seem to me unanswerable. It is not a case of an opinion; the facts are there. I have in my hand an article sent to me by a practical grain man of the city of Montreal. This is a statement which appeared on February 3, 1938, a year ago. I take it it was prepared by the shipping interests in Canada. They point out something which is quite true, that while there was nothing in the empire trade agreements that forced Canadian wheat through Canadian ports in order to get the preference, the fact was that the British customs regulations actually forced our wheat to go through our ports. I shall read just a brief summary from this document.

Mr. DUNNING: Who put it out?

Mr. MANION: I imagine it was the transportation interests which were affected.

Mr. DUNNING: Did any one sign it?

Mr. MANION: It is not signed. I shall pass it over to the hon. gentleman when I have finished. It reads:

If the preference is lifted or varied which it can be done by the United Kingdom customs the Canadian interests affected are:

1. Canadian lower lake elevator interests, as storage and transfer will naturally flow again through U.S. lake and Atlantic ports.

2. Canadian lake carriers, as with shipments via Buffalo-Atlantic ports, American ships can carry to Buffalo and will do so, as next season's outlook is for restricted traffic of American products for the American lake carrier.

3. Canadian railroads, as they would lose the bay-Montreal haul during navigation season, and Montreal-Saint John, Halifax during winter seasons.

4. Canadian labour on Canadian ships, railways and in elevators, et cetera.

It may be said that this is exaggerated, but I do not think so. Naturally those who are interested do not want to be injured by this treaty, and they published this pamphlet. As I said, I do not know just who published it, but it was sent to me by a prominent grain man in Montreal as their argument. Here are some interesting figures. In 1931 the empire countries shipped 42·6 of the wheat sent into the United Kingdom. That was before the empire trade agreements. In 1938, empire countries shipped in 63·2 per cent. In 1931 foreign countries shipped in 57·4 per cent, and in 1938, 36·8 per cent. Those figures illustrate what happened as a result of the empire trade agreements.

Mr. MOORE: Those are percentages of what?

Mr. MANION: I am sorry if I did not make myself clear. They are percentages of wheat imports into the British market. I have here a statement published by the economic branch of the Royal Bank of Canada. This has nothing particular to do with the trade treaty, but it sets out a few facts which I take for granted are correct. They point out that world wheat production for the current season is placed at the record total of 4,459 million bushels. They give the supplies available for export as 1,135 million bushels. They point out that importers' requirements are only 550 million bushels and therefore, there will be a carry-over of something like 1,000 million bushels. This illustrates the need for markets for our Canadian wheat, and that is why I mention it. They go on to say:

International demand for wheat declined from a peak of 947 million bushels in 1928-29 to 523 million in 1935-36. Since that time little improvement has been evident, total shipments amounting to 609 million bushels in 1936-37 and 512 million in 1937-38.

Then they go on to point out that the only stable market that remains—"static" is the word I used a while ago—is the British market. They continue:

In Argentina, however, conditions were much more favourable during the latter part of the season and a bumper crop was harvested. The first official estimate places the outturn at 316 million bushels, the largest on record with the exception of that harvested in 1928-29, and compares with 185 million bushels harvested in 1937-38.

They point out that the Argentine harvest is double what it was a year previously. Despite that fact, we are taking this treaty method of losing some of our markets. We are losing our six cent preference, and yet there is more wheat to be shipped by countries like the Argentine, whose crop is double this year what it was last year. All this is going to make matters more difficult for the Canadian producer. I submit that our preferences are being destroyed. I have many quotations here, and I shall read briefly from a few. An apple producer writes to say:

United States requires the export market only for her surplus production; Canada requires it for almost half her production.

I quote from the Seattle Post-Intelligencer of November 18, 1938, as follows:

This is a start in bringing back our export business to the United Kingdom. The previous tax of 45 cents per box for apples was prohibitive. The reduction, approximating 15 cents per box is still inadequate, but it will help.

The Business Week of New York of November 26, 1938, states:

The British pact is more important diplomatically, but the biggest trade concessions are made in the Canadian pact.

The two new pacts, while they do not wipe out the system of empire preferences which was set up at Ottawa in 1932, mark the first important move to break down that system.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) was inquiring about subsidies paid by the United States, and in this connection I quote from the Ottawa Citizen of December 5, 1938:

British millers who bought 20,000,000 bushels of wheat from the United States made this a condition of their purchase of the grain

U. S. to prevent further exports of subsidized flour to Great Britain British millers have purchased approximately 20,000,000 bushels of United States wheat through ordinary commercial channels. The cost was $13,750,000.

Shipments will begin in January when the wheat duty is lifted and continue over six months.

Just because of the destruction of the preference. Then I quote from the New York Times of November 18, 1938, a Washington dispatch dated November 17:

The reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Great Britain, which was signed here to-day, may well have sounded the death knell of the empire preference theory of trade among the members of the British empire. This system, which was advocated by Lord Beaverbrook and others in London, was put into actual effect by the Ottawa agreements, signed late in 1932 and renewed in modified form last year.

And again:

In the agreement signed to-day, several imperial preferences have been extended to include the United States. That is to say, produce of the United States may enter Great Britain at the same rate as competitive produce from some of the dominions, whereas previously the American goods had to pay a higher import duty than similar goods from an empire source.

If the six cents preference on wheat going into the British market was of no use to us, why are all these different sources in the United States so jubilant over its removal? Here is another dispatch from Washington dated November 17, appearing in the same issue of the New York Times:

Now, because both Canadian and American wheat are, by virtue of the British trade agreement, on the same duty-free basis, Canadian wheat may pass through American ports if its shippers desire.

Officials said this would prove a great boon to American railroads, transfer workers and shipping.

I shall quote from one British source. The London Economist of November 26 has this to say:

It is more questionable whether there will be a corresponding increase in British imports. Very few of the concessions made to the United States will result in any category of American goods being placed in a more favourable competitive position vis-à-vis the domestic producer. Most of the agricultural products affected are not grown in this country, or where they are, the domestic producer is already safeguarded.

Listen to these words.

In these cases the effect of the agreement will largely be to divert a certain quantity of trade from dominion (largely Canadian) to American hands, without increasing the total volume of imports.

I ask again what I asked a few moments ago. Where is the advantage if we lose some of our trade and the United States gets it? World trade remains the same, but ours does not. What is the advantage to the world? I cannot see it myself. I simply say, Mr. Speaker, that the United States cares for its own people when it is making a trade treaty of this kind. This government is too anxious for a trade agreement. It wants trade agreements at any price. I say now, from all the mail I am getting from all over this country, that very many of our people, producers of one kind and another—and I have had letters from dozens of different types of producers, agricultural and manufacturing—are very much opposed to this treaty. They protest against it as damaging to them. But they are afraid to protest openly because they know that the budget is going to be brought down in this house probably within a month, and if they protest openly they are just a little afraid of what might happen to them. So the industrialists, the producers, and the workers in the plants or industries affected are afraid to express their viewpoint.

Let me deal briefly with fruits and vegetables, and this will illustrate what has been done to some of our agriculturists. Before 1936 the duty on fruits coming into Canada was 20 per cent, and on vegetables 30 per cent. The duty on both is now down to 10 per cent, as a result of this treaty and the treaty of 1935. Our season for the production of fruit and vegetables is much later than the season in the United States, and so it is difficult for our farmers to produce fruits and vegetables in competition with United States production. I take this attitude, that so far as possible our growers should have the first opportunity in our market.

Then, as I pointed out about apples, the United States sells only its surplus abroad. It has a huge market within its borders, and now it can dump whatever surplus it has much more cheaply into the British market because of the removal of part of the preference, whereas our Canadian producers, with our small population, have to sell about half their apple production in other countries, mostly in Great Britain.

I have also had strong protests from our tomato growers, some of whom say it is going to ruin their industry. They point out that under the treaty there is a duty of 1½ cents a pound on United States tomatoes entering Canada and a duty of 3 cents a pound on Canadian tomatoes entering the United States.

There is another industry, the British Columbia door industry, that is going to be affected adversely by this treaty. There called at my office a few days ago a gentleman who has for many years been associated indirectly with that industry. I do not wish to give his name, but he is an outstanding student as well as a business man. He came into my office and gave me this information. I have confirmed it with British Columbia people.

He says that the door industry in British Columbia began in 1933, after we obtained the preference on doors in the British market. I will read the data he gave me just as I jotted it down. Until 1933 Canada had no wooden door export business at all. In 1933, the year when the British empire trade agreements were negotiated, we exported 50,000 doors, and that number increased to about 1,000,000 doors in 1938. In looking over the figures I found that our exports went to 1,681,000 doors in 1936, when business was a little better, or nearly 2,000,000 doors in that year, and then with the drop in business generally the figure came down to about 1,000,000 doors in 1938. The development of the door industry, particularly in British Columbia, has been almost spectacular since 1933. Many United States firms have been forced to open up factories in Canada, and subsidiary industries such as the plywood industry, have been established. Under the British empire trade agreements we enjoyed a preference of two shillings and sixpence on doors, whereas under this treaty the duty is one shilling and sixpence, and this gentleman told me—and what he said has been confirmed by others—that as a result of the cutting down of our preference of two shillings and sixpence to one shilling and sixpence, the door industry in British Columbia is going to be completely wiped out. They say that this difference is just sufficient to drive the business to the western states; to Tacoma, the hon. member for Kootenay East suggests. This gentleman told me that in two more years there will be no more door industry in British Columbia.

Take coal. The dominion bureau of statistics reports that our Canadian production of coal last year amounted to 14,000,000 tons, and 15,800,000 tons in 1937. Our imports amounted to 13,500,000 tons, or just about the same as our Canadian production. These figures should be read in the light of the declaration that was made in the Nova Scotia brief presented to the dominion government last week, wherein it was asserted that the present Canadian duty on coal is wholly inadequate, and the fact that it has been further reduced by the elimination of the excise tax makes a difference, if I remember the calculation rightly, of seventeen cents a ton in the duty. My hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) shakes his head.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not so with respect to the duty on soft coal.

Mr. MANION: That would be the duty on anthracite coal. Now, whatever increase there may be in importations of coal from the United States in competition with Canadian coal hits the miner, the railways and the shipping interests of this country.

I should like to deal briefly with one or two quotas, and I am very glad to say that I am getting near the end of my remarks. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister said that I used unfairly the words "propaganda or ballyhoo" in a discussion of the quotas under this treaty. I said, Mr. Speaker, that in the press release which was issued respecting the treaty, these quotas were made to appear enormous, whereas many of them are absolutely laughable, and some of the statements are deceitful.

Let me deal briefly with the milk quota. I do not pretend to be an authority on agriculture, but I am giving these facts, and I have no doubt they are absolutely accurate.

Mr. DUNNING: But you do understand milk.

Mr. MANION: Yes, and I like it. By this treaty we are given a milk quota to the United States of 3,000,000 gallons. I am told by authorities on the dairy industry that one-half of the dairy cows in any dairy county in Ontario or western Quebec could supply that complete milk quota.

Mr. PERLEY: One-quarter of the dairy cows in Qu'Appelle.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend says one-quarter of the dairy cows in his constituency.

Mr. DUNNING: He is a little ambitious.

Mr. MANION: While our milk quota by this treaty is 3,000,000 gallons, Canadian production last year amounted to 1,700,000,000 gallons.

Mr. DUNNING We drink a great deal of our production.

Mr. MANION: Of course, but a quota of only 3,000,000 gallons out of a production of 1,700,000,000 gallons shows the picayune size of the quota on milk. It is just a joke. I saw an item in the press the other day—and I have it here—showing that the milk sold in Ottawa last year amounted to over 4,000,000 gallons, and yet our quota, of which this government boasts so loudly, is only 3,000,000 gallons. My secretary, who has a mathematical turn of mind, figured it out this way, that if you take those 3,000,000 gallons and divide them among the people of the United States it means that each citizen of the United States would get one-fifth of a pint once a year. That is the quota of which hon. gentlemen opposite are boasting, and this, with the free market for vegetable oils, is severely injuring the dairy industry.

Mr. DUNNING: The vegetable oils are not touched by the treaty.

Mr. MANION: Quite correct. I just mentioned that it is hurting the dairy industry very much. I was not speaking of vegetable oils as being in the treaty. But milk is in the treaty. The quota on milk is a speck; it is not important, just a microscopic amount.

As regards potatoes, Canada's total production of potatoes in 1938 was 60,000,000 bushels, and that of the United States, 369,000,000 bushels, or a total of 429,000,000 bushels. Our quota into the United States is two and a half million bushels, and I am informed—and my statement has been confirmed by many who come from that section—that one county in New Brunswick could more than supply that quota. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has raised a good deal of wheat, but I did not think that he raised potatoes. He may eat them, like a good Irishman does.

Mr. DUNNING: Just now I represent potato growers, and they are very well pleased with the quota.

Mr. MANION: Well, apparently they are easily pleased, if one county in New Brunswick can satisfy the quota. His statement is not in accordance with letters I have been receiving from potato growers. As I have said, our potatoes go into the United States under much greater restrictions, in addition to the limited quota, than those on United States potatoes coming into Canada. I ask myself, why the difference?

I wish now to deal with the cattle quota. This is a more important matter, because I maintain that the statement about the cattle quota as given to this house and to the people of this country in the press release was a deception—intentionally or accidentally, I am curious to know. I should like to know whether the government knew, when they got the quota of 225,000 cattle and advertised that in their press release, that it included Mexico.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): We in the west knew it.

Mr. MANION: Why did they not mention it in the press release?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): They thought that inside three years the hon. gentleman would know that that provision was in the other treaty.

Mr. MANION: I think that inside three years the hon. gentleman and his party ought to have learned enough to tell the truth when they issue a press release. I am going to quote it. A copy of the press release issued by hon. gentlemen opposite is here, and this is what it says on pages 14 and 15 about the cattle quota:

> For the prairie provinces the most important concession—

They are boasting of what they are doing for the country.

> —in the trade agreement is the maximum reduction in the United States duty on heavy cattle and the enlargement of the tariff quota on this type of cattle considerably beyond that granted in the 1935 trade agreement.

Mr. DUNNING: That is true.

Mr. MANION: I do not know whether it is when you take away the Mexican side of it. On page 15:

> The most important of the agricultural concessions are those relating to live cattle. Western Canada is particularly interested in the United States duty on heavy cattle weighing 700 pounds or more each. On this type of cattle Canada is to receive the maximum reduction in duty or a rate of 1½ cents per pound as compared with 2 cents per pound under the 1935 trade agreement and 3 cents per pound under the Tariff Act of 1930. Whereas the number of cattle to be imported at the reduced rate of duty was limited under the 1935 trade agreement to a total of 155,799 head in any one calendar year, the new trade agreement provides that the maximum reduction in duty shall apply to 225,000 head imported in any one calendar year, of which not more than 60,000 head shall be imported during any one quarter of the calendar year. In other words, provision is made not only for a further reduction in duty by the maximum, but also for an increase in the annual quota to which the reduced duty applies of nearly 70,000 head over the quota provided for in the 1935 trade agreement.

There is no qualification there. There is no reference to Mexico.

Mr. ILSLEY: All that the hon. gentleman has read is true, every word of it.

Mr. MANION: Yes, but it is only half true.

Mr. DUNNING: It is wholly true.

Mr. MANION: It is not the whole truth. My hon. colleague says it is Liberal truth. and I rather think it is. They go to work and give to the people of Canada, and particularly to the western cattle raisers, through the press the impression that there is a Canadian quota of 225,000 cattle into the United States.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No.

Mr. MANION: Well, they do not mention Mexico; I do not find any mention of Mexico.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The western cattle men knew. from the time it was in the other treaty.

Mr. MANION: Who knew?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Western cattle men.

Mr. MANION: Apparently they did not know at the time. The hon. gentleman is familiar with the rather tricky manner in which his party puts out propaganda, so probably he knew; but so far as I am concerned, I may say very frankly that I did not know, and I do not think anybody else knew. In fact, we had to find it out here in the House of Commons, through a question the other day, that it is a global quota and Mexico has sent in forty-five per cent of the first allotment. I will read that. I intend to put it on Hansard.

Mr. DUNNING: The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) spoke of it the other day.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MANION: I know, but only in reply to a question of my hon. friend the member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn).

Mr. DUNNING: I merely indicate that it was spoken of.

Mr. MANION: He spoke of it when it was dragged out of him. Questions were asked on February 10, as shown in Hansard, pages 821 and 822, by the hon. member for Haldimand:

Is the quota of 60,000 head of cattle per quarter allowed to enter the United States under the terms of the new trade agreement exhausted for the first three months of 1939? I should also like to ask if the shipments from Mexico help to make up this quota allowance.

The Minister of Agriculture replied:

The answer to the first question is, yes. The quota ran out towards the end of the month.

That is the first month of the three months. And he goes on:

I believe the statement is somewhat as follows—

Incidentally he had this information at hand, so apparently he expected some mention of it, and knew somebody would be a little curious. This is the statement he puts on the record:

United States cattle imports, 700 pounds and over, for the month of January, 1939:

	Number	Percentage
Canada..	30,246	55 per cent
Mexico..	24,769	45 per cent
Total..	55,015

Then he explains why they shut it off at the 55,000. In other words, of this supposed quota for the Canadian cattle raiser, the Mexican gets 45 per cent. That may please the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross); he seems to be quite tickled to death with it.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No.

Mr. MANION: But I do not think it satisfies the western cattle raiser who was told he could ship in 60,000 cattle in that time.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No, he was not.

Mr. MANION: He was told it in the press release. Why deny it?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No, he was not.

Mr. MANION: There was no word said of Mexico.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It was in the last treaty, and this quota was increased by 70,000.

Mr. MANION: I do not suppose the cattle raiser read the terms of this treaty any more than he read the last one. This, I am told.

is the first time it was ever mentioned in the parliament of Canada. A little further down the Minister of Agriculture said:

> The quota will divide somewhat in the proportions of fifty-five per cent and forty-five per cent.

A little further down the hon. member for Haldimand asked:

> Was it the intention that Canada should enjoy the whole 60,000 per quarter, or otherwise?
>
> Mr. Gardiner: No. Under the old agreement, the one which existed before, provision was made whereby the quota would be for all the cattle imported into the United States. In practice it worked out that the cattle came from Mexico and Canada, and exactly the same terms are in the present agreement.

I ask, why was that not stated in the press release? My hon. friends implied that I was not quite fair in using the word "ballyhoo" or "propaganda". Certainly they might have said that this was a global quota in which Mexico could share. Canada cannot now ship any more into the United States until the end of March; the quota was exhausted in January, with the result pointed out to me in a letter from a cattle raiser from the west, who says:

> Our cattle will rule $1 to $1.50 per hundred lower for the next six weeks than they were selling at one week ago, and I can assure you that the feeders of live stock across this country are really mad.

Mr. DUNNING: That shows the value of the treaty to the cattle raiser, does it not?

Mr. MANION: It shows what he can get as long as he can ship cattle under the quota, but it does not show how long he can get them in.

Mr. DUNNING: As a matter of fact, many cattle were saved up for the coming into operation of the treaty.

Mr. MANION: Where was that?

Mr. DUNNING: In Mexico, and here too, for that matter.

Mr. MANION: That may be; but I find that last year, when Mexico was not saving up, they supplied 31·3 per cent of the cattle shipped into the United States. That was pretty nearly as high as this.

Mr. DUNNING: Not of the class covered by this item.

Mr. MANION: Yes, exactly of the class. I have the figures here in a publication put out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), and I have a page torn from that publication, the Canadian Intelligence Journal.

> Total exports of cattle weighing 700 pounds or more amounted during the calendar year to 124,903 head, or 80·2 per cent of the total quota. Of this total, 48,496 head or 31·3 per cent of the quota were shipped from Mexico.

Again I ask, why, in fairness to our people, was not Mexico mentioned? That is the only attitude I take in this connection, and it is a perfectly fair attitude.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a weak case for deception.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend may think so. His idea of deception and mine may be different. I do not know.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Apparently the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not try to deceive them.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member is implying that the Minister of Finance did, because he denied it until I put up the Minister of Trade and Commerce against him.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): He put it out last year.

Mr. MANION: That is all about that. I do not wish to get into any wrangles; I am simply pointing out the facts. Let me read what they say in the United States press release with regard to cattle. It shows that they were not blind. At page 47 they say:

> In making concessions to Canada on farm products, care has been taken to avoid the possibility of material hardship to any important group of producers in the United States. . . . The most important concessions to Canada in the live stock field are safeguarded by tariff quotas.

They knew what they were doing. This is just another illustration of the way in which they put it over. Now let me read a few more items from this press release, having no particular bearing on cattle but of interest for other reasons. For example, on page 1:

> A major new concession to the United States results from the provision that hereafter the Canadian special import tax of 3 per cent will be removed from all items, dutiable or free, listed specifically in schedule 1 which names concessions by Canada.

Then on the next page:

> On the other hand, the bulk of Canadian imports from the United States consists of dutiable commodities; consequently the commodities on which Canada has reduced its duties, make up a substantially larger value of trade than do the commodities on which the United States lowered its duties.

Then on page 5:

Every section of the United States will benefit from the wide-reaching concessions made by Canada in the new trade agreement.

On page 9:

Under the trade agreements act the United States may not reduce any duty through a trade agreement by more than 50 per cent; but the Canadian government is under no such limitation, and, in some cases, the rates in schedule 1 are more than 50 per cent lower than those in effect in 1935, and some former duties have been removed altogether.

There are a good many more statements to the same effect, all showing clearly that we got the worst of it. They are so bad that I do not like to read them. On page 10 there is this statement:

By far the most important of the "bindings" of the rates of duty already in effect in 1935 relate to coal and coke, the imports of which from the United States to Canada in 1937 were valued at over $30,000,000. . . . The listing of these items in schedule 1 carries with it the removal of the 3 per cent excise tax, which in the case of many of the items on which the duties proper are low, constitutes a material fraction of the charges payable on importation into Canada. In the case of anthracite coal, the duty on which, bound by the agreement against increase, is 50 cents per ton (about 10 per cent in ad valorem equivalent), the tax is equal to about 17 cents per ton.

On the same page:

The new agreement provides that, in the case of all articles, dutiable or free, listed in schedule 1, the Canadian special excise tax of 3 per cent will be removed on imports from the United States as soon as the necessary legislation can be enacted. Since schedule 1 covers 57 per cent of the total of 1937 imports from this country, this provision means a large reduction in the charges heretofore collected.

On page 13:

Of the nine tariff quotas fixed in the new agreement, on dutiable and free items together, six are at figures which represent a very small percentage of our consumption. The limits on filleted fish, shingles, and nepheline syenite are relatively higher but are not high enough to permit serious injury to domestic producers should the tariff quotas be filled.

These quotations show how well they took care of their own people, and I commend them for having done so. They were right in safeguarding the interests of their own people and we should have done likewise. In regard to fruits and vegetables they say, on page 19:

The 1937 imports of United States fresh fruits and vegetables into Canada were valued at nearly $17,000,000. The new agreement provides for reductions in Canadian duties and other import charges on $14,500,000 worth of that trade, or 80 per cent of the total value of all agricultural items on which reduced duties result from the new agreement . . . These concessions represent benefits to fruit and vegetable growers and shippers in all parts of the United States.

[Mr. Manion.]

In regard to apples:

This reduction on apples results from the fact that Canada has agreed to a substantial reduction in the margin of duty preference enjoyed by Canadian apples in the British market, an action of outstanding value to American apple growers and shippers.

Then on page 20:

Duty reductions:—The new agreement establishes a basic duty of 10 per cent for nearly all of the fresh fruits and vegetables now subject to an ad valorem duty. Under the 1936 agreement the same items paid 15 per cent. Prior to 1936, the fruit items now dutiable at 10 per cent paid 20 per cent, while the vegetables were charged 30 per cent.

Here is another, on page 25, with reference to pulp, paper and printed matter:

A major concession of the 1936 agreement, continued in the new agreement, related to magazines and periodical publications. . . . Imports under periodicals of all kinds, including newspapers from the United States increased from $2,600,000 in 1935 to $5,900,000 in 1937, the gain being chiefly in the class from which the duties had been removed. The wider circulation of American magazines in Canada creates and stimulates demand for new and improved products and thereby benefits both Canadian and American manufacturers of such products.

Incidentally, it stimulates in Canada the purchase of many pulp magazines, some of which we would be far better without. On page 43 there is the following:

An important concession is made on boots and shoes. The 40 per cent rate of 1935 became 35 per cent in 1936 through the most-favoured-nation provision. Imports increased from $343,000 in 1935 to $515,000 in 1937. The rate is now made 30 per cent by schedule 1, which is the same rate as applied in 1929 when imports from the United States were valued at over $2,000,000.

On page 47:

The trade agreement with the United Kingdom, made at the same time as that with Canada, contains many concessions of benefit to American agriculture. Several of the concessions thus obtained involve the relinquishment, in whole or in part, of tariff preferences which Canada had previously held in the British market . . .

In making concessions to Canada on farm products, care has been taken to avoid the possibility of material hardship to any important group of producers in the United States.

On page 49:

Canada has now agreed to permit free entry of potatoes except during the 6-week period June 15 to July 31, at which time the duty will be half the former rate.

Mr. EULER: What is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. MANION: From the United States press release.

Mr. EULER: Propaganda like ours?

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman admits that theirs is propaganda. He contradicts his leader. I do not blame his leader for looking crossly at him at the moment.

Mr. EULER: I merely used the hon. gentleman's extravagant language. That is all.

Mr. MANION: The minister need not use any extravagant language of mine; he can be extravagant himself. This release was put out by the Department of State in Washington under the title, "The New Trade Agreement with Canada, signed November 17, 1938." It is an official document.

Mr. CRERAR: Does the hon. member consider that ballyhoo?

Mr. MANION: I do not know whether it is ballyhoo, but I do know that a good deal of what my hon. friends put out was ballyhoo. In regard to the most favoured nation clause, I find that despite the fact that we get no concession from any of the favoured nations including Japan, Italy and Germany, we give them the same concessions as we give the United States. Here is Japan with a lower standard of living, very much lower than ours, with low wages, in some cases one-tenth of ours, in some cases one-fifth, with sweatshop conditions, no liberty to labour—and that applies to Germany and Italy—no labour unions, no right to bargain; and yet they are given the same rights as the United States under the favoured nation clause. How can Canada compete with such conditions? On another occasion I placed on record the wages paid in the textile industry of Japan, which are just one-tenth the wages paid textile employees in Canada. This provision will curtail the work and wages available in Canada, where the wages are equal to any in the world. Our duty on cotton goods, for example, is 16½ per cent, while the British duty on similar goods is 22½ per cent. At the same time our wages are 60 per cent higher than the British wages. I am informed that our cotton industry is about 19 per cent below what it was in 1937.

The right hon. gentleman said what has been stated over and over again, and I suppose will be stated many times in future, that Great Britain asked for special concessions on the part of Canada in regard to the preferences, which would give an advantage to the United States. I asked that those letters be tabled, but the right hon. gentleman said they were too confidential. I want to protest again against this "too confidential" statement that is being made continually by hon. gentlemen opposite. If the right hon. gentleman has a right to quote from that correspondence, this whole house has a right to read it. It is claimed that this agreement brings some advantage to the man on the street. That is questionable; instead of an advantage to the man on the street, what we get is more competition, less production and higher costs. That often happens when you lower tariffs; you have fewer jobs and less money with which to purchase the goods produced.

Then, with regard to the 3 per cent special excise tax, I assume this change will result in a great decrease in revenue. Last year I believe that tax brought in between fifteen and eighteen million dollars. I submit that the removal of the 3 per cent special excise tax on the items specified in the agreement was either bad faith or bad management on the part of the government. No announcement was made in connection with the matter until some days later, after protests began to reach the Minister of Finance because so many inequalities would result. Then the minister said that these would be corrected, but they have not been corrected yet. Here is the situation to-day, on account of the fact that the 3 per cent special excise tax has been removed only from the items mentioned in the schedule. Mushrooms and cut flowers are freed from the 3 per cent tax, but it remains on most of the necessities of life. The tax has been removed from such items as sweet potatoes, artichokes, asparagus, strawberries, quinces and nectarines, perfumery and alligator pears, but it remains on many raw materials and on clothing.

Mr. EULER: The excise tax is not off yet.

Mr. DUNNING: It has not been removed from any item yet.

Mr. MANION: I admit that; but the government agreed to take it off, and I am sure my hon. friend would not contradict the statement that the government does intend to take it off. The situation to-day is that the government has promised to remove the tax from the luxuries I have mentioned, these absolute unnecessaries, if I may coin a word, while they have said nothing about removing it from many raw materials and many kinds of clothing. To show the incongruity of this agreement, the excise tax is to be removed from raw cotton but it is to remain on raw wool and raw silk. It is to be removed from coal but will remain on certain types of coke.

Mr. DUNNING: Who says it will remain?

Mr. MANION: I say, according to the agreement it will remain.

Mr. DUNNING: Nothing of the kind.

Mr. MANION: The agreement distinctly states that the 3 per cent excise tax is to be taken off the items covered by the agreement.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, but it does not say it will remain on anything else.

Mr. MANION: No, and that is exactly what I was going to say. Before the government has finished it will have to remove the tax from all items. The other day when the hon. member for Kootenay East pointed that out, the Minister of Finance shook his head, but I repeat that before we have finished we shall have to remove the special excise tax entirely. It must be done in order to remove the inequalities, absurdities and discriminations in the application of our duties.

Mr. DUNNING: Not because we have to; whatever we do will be in the interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman would not suggest that they would remove that tax from many of these unnecessaries, as I termed them a few moments ago, and leave it on the raw materials and necessities of life.

Mr. DUNNING: I take it that we would have my hon. friend's support in removing it?

Mr. MANION: As long as the agreement is as it is, certainly you would have to have my support, because I would not want the country to get in the muddle it would be in if the situation remained as it would be without further removal of the 3 per cent tax. But the hon. gentleman and his government did not mention that in their press release. They simply stated that these were the reductions. It was only a few days later that this situation was pointed out to the Minister of Finance by many people who were vitally affected by it, people who would suffer from injustice if some remedy were not found. Then, a few days later, the hon. gentleman said:

> The government will make certain when the necessary legislation is introduced that it will be of such a character as to eliminate any unfairness that might otherwise be expected to result from the exemption from the tax of the particular articles enumerated in the agreement.

With that I heartily agree. Otherwise the country would be left in a hopeless muddle. The situation could not possibly remain as it would be left under this agreement. There is no doubt, I further suggest, that this extension of the removal of the excise tax was not contemplated at the time the agreement was negotiated, so these are really new concessions to the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. MANION: Then why was it not mentioned among all the ballyhoo in the press release? Was it again deception?

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, I will tell him.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman can make his own speech when he wishes to do so.

Mr. DUNNING: Very well.

Mr. MANION: However, I do not mind interruptions. Tell me; why was it?

Mr. DUNNING: The answer is this. We were making an agreement with the United States with respect to a specified list of commodities. Anything we do with respect to taxation outside the list of commodities under discussion is purely a matter of domestic policy for this parliament and not a matter for the United States.

Mr. MANION: I quite agree with that.

Mr. DUNNING: That is why it was not mentioned.

Mr. MANION: But since the minister was going to make a statement a few days later, why did not the government, in the press release, say that within a short time there would have to be other modifications in order to put the agreement on a fair basis?

Mr. EULER: They were only announcing accomplished things.

Mr. MANION: No; they were announcing a good many things which were not accomplished at all. To my mind this is simply another case of ministerial blundering.

In conclusion, let me repeat that at present it is impossible to state what will be the result of this treaty. Time alone will tell, but my belief is that the ill effects will be very much greater than the good effects. In 1935 this government made an agreement with the United States. In 1934, the year previous, our trade with the United States showed a balance in our favour of $1,000,000. Last year our trade with the United States showed an unfavourable balance of $82,000,000; in other words, they sold us $82,000,000 worth of goods more than we sold them. Then it is interesting to note the increase of trade under the items covered by the 1935 agreement. Our exports under the items affected by the 1935 treaty increased by only $16,000,000; of that amount newsprint accounted for $15,000,000, and newsprint has been on the free list since 1913. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about their press release being so honest. Let me quote what is said at page 26 of that press release, because this is the sort of half truth with which this release is filled:

> In the 1935 trade agreement provision was made for the binding of the free entry of those kinds of wood pulp of which Canada was the chief supplier of imports into the United States. In the new trade agreement the binding of free entry is broadened to cover all kinds of mechanical and chemical wood pulps shipped from Canada to the United States. The free entry of standard newsprint paper is rebound in the new trade agreement and this covers the largest single item of trade between the two countries.

What is the implication there? It is that they got some great favour for Canada, when as a matter of fact all these things have entered the United States free, at least since 1913. If that is not propaganda; if that is not a half truth, I do not know one when I see it.

This agreement will help here and hurt there. The future will tell the result so far as Canada as a whole is concerned. My belief is, of course, that there is some good in this treaty. It would be a queer treaty if there were not some good items in it, though frankly I have not heard about them, and I am hearing more and more every day about the ill effects on the various industries of Canada. My conviction is also that the balance is largely against us.

After all, we have to aid Canada as a whole. This country is a nation, not nine nations, and we must treat it as a nation. I pointed out that the empire trade agreements bound the empire together economically; this trade agreement pulls the empire apart. When the Republicans again go into office in the United States, the chances are that this agreement will be cancelled. Then we shall have a changing of our trade routes and we shall have lost our preference. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, who follows me in the debate, made the statement in the house the other day that we would get back our preference. The preference will have been wiped out. It will not come back. If the Republicans take office in 1940, then probably this treaty would be wiped out, because they are a high protectionist party. If they do, and if it is wiped out, does anybody suggest that we shall get back our preference?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. MANION: I do not agree with the hon. member. He says we do.

Mr. EULER: It is in the agreement.

Mr. MANION: Yes, but it will be a fait accompli; we shall not get it back. There is certainly room for discussion, and we intend to tell the people what has not been told by the government. We intend to tell the facts and the truth—what we should have in all government business.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I say at the outset that I realize my inability adequately to deal with some of the statements made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion). He has quite properly taken some two hours to deliver his address and to make his criticisms. I appreciate the fact that I am confined to forty minutes, and I believe it is quite impossible for me fully to deal with some of the statements he has made.

Mr. DUNNING: You cannot use a scrapbook in forty minutes.

Mr. MANION: But you put out forty-two pages of propaganda, to begin with. You do not need as much time.

Mr. EULER: But I should like to use as much of my forty minutes as possible.

Mr. MANION: Then, tell the Minister of Finance to keep quiet.

Mr. DUNNING: I was talking to my colleague.

Mr. EULER: Probably my remarks will be rather discursive, in my attempt to some extent to meet some of the criticisms which have been made by my hon friend, some of which have been made a second time and some of which I believe I attempted to answer when I spoke in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

At the outset I had an inclination to compliment my hon. friend upon his speech—as I think I shall still do—and to compliment him upon his evident intention to deal with the trade agreement on its merits. I admit I had a fear that perhaps he would be consistent with what was read out of his book the other day, where I believe he rather advanced the theory that the duty of an opposition was to criticize, regardless of the merits of a case.

Mr. MANION: What I said was not quite as strong as that.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps not quite so strong as that, but I believe that is the implication which was evident from what he had written in his book. He said to-day that he desired to deal with the question on its merits, and I have no particular fault to find with what he has said. I am rather inclined to suspect that he has received a sufficiently convincing number of ballots from the Globe and Mail which call upon all of us to forget party advantage and to cooperate for the common good.

Mr. MANION: Are you going to obey?

Mr. CAHAN: How many have you received?

Mr. EULER: I have received a considerable number. And I will say to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) that on a considerable number of those ballots additions were made which indicated that they had considerable confidence in their member.

Although my hon. friend said in a previous speech, and repeated in his speech to-day, that no one can judge whether or not this is a good or bad agreement until it has had time to operate, yet he spent most of his time this afternoon in a criticism of it. I agree with him that it is not entirely possible for anyone to say whether or not this agreement is going to give us all the advantages for which we may hope, or that it may result in some disadvantages—which we hope will not occur. But while time will tell—and while the hon. member has made the statement that time will tell—I might say to him and to the House of Commons that time has already begun to tell.

Mr. STIRLING: It certainly has.

Mr. EULER: I have just had brought to my attention a statement giving a comparison of figures with respect to exports to the United States. Our exports to that country in the month of January, 1939, were valued at $36,276,766.

Mr. CAHAN: Does that include gold?

Mr. EULER: I expected that question. Yes, some of it includes gold. But even if we subtract gold our January exports to the United States are increased by at least $5,000,000 over those of last year. While I am not an economist, and while I have every respect for the opinion of my hon. friend opposite, I cannot see why, when gold is produced in Canada by the labour of our men, when it adds to the wealth of Canada and when it is exported as a commodity, it cannot fairly be included in the sum of our exports.

Mr. CAHAN: Should we grant trade concessions to induce other people to take our gold bars?

Mr. EULER: If I may proceed, our exports in January, 1939, were the highest for the month of January in any year since 1930, and I suggest a comparison with 1933, when they were valued at $16,000,000. Domestic exports to the United States in January, 1938, were valued at only $20,732,240. I repeat that in January of this year they were valued at $36,276,766.

Imports from the United States in January, 1939, were valued at $28,790,257, compared with $32,329,792 last year. So it appears that imports from the United States, instead of being increased, as my hon. friend seems to fear, for some reason or another have decreased in those respective months of January by something over $3,000,000.

I do not attach too great importance to the month-to-month figures. They vary from time to time, and conceivably it may occur that in other months the balance might be the other way. The favourable balance of trade with the United States in January of this year stands at $8,077,335, compared with an unfavourable balance in January last year of $10,629,000. Exports to the United States in January, 1939, were $15,544,526 greater in value than those in the same month of 1938; but of this increase—and I say this for the information of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George—shipments of gold accounted for $10,258,000. So that the increase in merchandise exports amounted to $5,286,000. I shall now set out figures for the month of January in 1938 and 1939 showing the increase in the value of exports of some commodities. At least some of this increase is attributable to the new trade agreement.

Commodity	January, 1938	January, 1939
Seed potatoes	$ 1,043	$ 141,525
Cattle, all kinds	270,027	1,901,143
Fresh fish	1,081,091	1,118,485
Cheese	22,298	62,265
Leather, unmanufactured	47,454	173,675
Planks and boards	703,599	1,113,557
Red cedar shingles	438,142	774,608
Newsprint	6,124,124	7,055,458
Wood pulp	1,489,875	2,062,071
Aluminum in bars	....	200,354
Nickel	1,004,929	2,092,593
Fertilizers	408,075	566,002
Soda compounds	104,601	147,921

Mr. MANION: There is no change in the rates on many of those commodities.

Mr. EULER: There is in some of them, but there may be an increase on account of the natural development of trade.

Mr. MANION: The pick-up in business generally.

Mr. EULER: I am quite willing to have my hon. friend place any construction he wishes on these figures. I am simply giving some items where an increase in exports occurred in January of this year. In perhaps half of them the increase in exports may be attributed to the new agreement. I give this just as an indication to my learned friends that perhaps they need not fear what was so apparent in my hon. friend's speech, that this country was going to be ruined as a result of this trade agreement.

Mr. MANION: I did not suggest it would be ruined.

Mr. EULER: I am going to be rather discursive in my remarks, in touching upon some of the points mentioned by my hon. friend to-day. He spoke of the fact, and it is a fact, that on some commodities the Canadian duties are much lower than the duties on the same commodities going into the United States. I have not had an opportunity to look into this to any extent, but I might quote a few instances where the shoe is on the other foot.

Mr. MANION: I admit there are some.

Mr. EULER: There are some commodities that go into the United States at lower rates than into Canada. Patent leather goes into the United States in fairly large volume and the duty imposed against it is 7½ per cent. The Canadian duty on patent leather from the United States is 20 per cent. They have a duty against rubber tires of 10 per cent, whereas our duty against them is 25 per cent.

Mr. MANION: As a matter of information, do any Canadian rubber tires go into the United States?

Mr. EULER: I do not think so, but the rate is there. They have a rate of 10 per cent against automobiles from Canada, whereas our rate is 17½ per cent. Agricultural implements are admitted into the United States free, and some do go in, whereas we have a rate of 7½ per cent. The rate on cereal breakfast foods entering the United States is 10 per cent, whereas the Canadian rates are from 15 to 25 per cent. The rate on whisky entering the United States is $2, whereas the Canadian rate is $6.

My hon. friend said something about press releases, indicating that the Canadian press release was pretty much propaganda for the government. Perhaps he made a point in connection with the cattle quota, but I think it might have been as well if it had been stated that, as in the previous agreement of 1934, the cattle quota is a world quota. The hon. member cited some figures to show that this quota was divided pretty well in the present quarter between Canada and Mexico. That is quite true because they are the only countries exporting cattle to the United States. He went on to show that the quota had been exhausted during the first quarter, and that Mexico had received a large proportion of the quota. That is also perfectly true. I believe hon. members across the floor will appreciate my statement when I say that this situation has received the attention of the government. Without disclosing anything that should not be disclosed, I think I can say that the cattle exporters of this country will be well satisfied when they know what action is to be taken with regard to the quota on cattle going into the United States.

In regard to my hon. friend's reference to the Canadian press release as propaganda, I leave it to him to say whether it is not just as reasonable for me to assume that the press release which was sent out by this government was just as fair, just as accurate and just as representative of the real situation as was the press release in the United States, from which he quoted so freely.

Mr. MANION: They certainly could not both be right.

Mr. EULER: They might both be right. My hon. friend has read a good deal from his scrap-book, for which I do not blame him. Before I conclude my remarks, which will be brief, I may be obliged to do the same thing in order to combat some of the statements which he has made. My hon. friend minimizes and deprecates the argument put forth by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that trade agreements between countries like Canada and the United States, and the United States and Great Britain, have an influence on the goodwill that ought to exist between countries. I do not believe my hon. friend is quite serious in what he says. The buying and selling of goods by individuals often result in personal friendships. I remember once being a delegate to the League of Nations, and I thought then, as I do now, that the greatest value of the league was in the delegates from the various countries coming together to sit round a table, getting to know each other and realizing they were all pretty much the same in their outlook. If that is true of individuals, is it not true of nations? We have absolute proof of that right here. In spite of the disapproval of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George—and I shall take back my statement if he objects—never in the history of nations has the feeling between Great Britain and the United States and Canada been as friendly as it is to-day.

I should like to turn, during the time I have at my disposal, to the more material side of the agreement rather than deal with what might be regarded as the sentimental side, of which I spoke just now. I would say that the first principle which we as a government desired to observe in making an agreement with the United States—and I think they were actuated by the same principle—was that we should try to make an agreement which would be mutually advantageous. That is the only basis upon which a permanent agreement can be framed. I was surprised at the statement of my hon. friend that the United States always gets the best of us. I believe he said that he would be afraid to negotiate with them for fear they would always get the best of us.

Mr. MANION: I did not say that.

Mr. EULER: That sort of thing comes strangely from the mouth of that red-blooded Canadian we used to have in this house.

Mr. MANION: I did not say that.

Mr. EULER: If I have misquoted my hon. friend, I shall retract it.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman has.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend certainly made some statement to the effect that if this government negotiated with the government of the United States, he feared we would be taken advantage of.

Mr. MANION: I admit that I said I thought this government had got the worst of it.

Mr. EULER: I think my hon. friend went a little further. I have not the time in which to balance in a debit and credit way all that we received from the United States and all that the United States received from us. I can, however, lay down in a general way the principle that moved this government in making this trade agreement. This agreement was based on something that my hon. friend himself mentioned. It was based on the fact that this country produces a surplus of many commodities which we cannot consume and for which we must find a market in other countries. That must be followed up by the axiomatic statement that if we are going to sell, we must buy. My hon. friend says that he is in favour of trade agreements, but I think in a sense he is inconsistent. He is reported on page 29 of Hansard, as follows:

> —every pair of boots and shoes that is imported from the United States takes work out of the hands of some of our Canadian workmen and food out of the mouths of some of our Canadian people.

That may be true. I yield to no one in this house, either on this side or on the other, in my desire that the Canadian producer and the Canadian manufacturer should have a fair chance for competition in his own market. That, I believe, was the principle laid down by the predecessor of the leader of the opposition, the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett, and I never had any great fault to find with it; I do not think the Liberals have a great deal of fault to find with it. But when my hon. friend says with regard to boots and shoes that the treaty takes the bread out of the mouths of the people of Canada, the only inference we can draw is that he wants such a high tariff placed against boots and shoes that none whatsoever would come into Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: Nonsense.

Mr. EULER: I will give figures to show that it means that and nothing else. In the fiscal year 1938, our imports of shoes from the United States were 307,000 pairs, and the total consumption in Canada was 22,723,000 pairs. If you figure that out, our imports of shoes from the United States, if we disregard those brought over occasionally under the $100 exemption, amounted to less than one and a half per cent of our consumption. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that under those conditions we cannot regard the competition as particularly strong.

Mr. CAHAN: We must have had a fairly good protective tariff.

Mr. EULER: It still is a good protective tariff, and that is one of the points I desire to make. But the argument of my hon. friend would mean that, in spite of the fact that imports of United States boots and shoes amount to only one and a half per cent of our total consumption in Canada, we ought to impose a duty that would shut out those imports altogether, and that he must be in favour of a prohibitive tariff.

Mr. MANION: I am not.

Mr. EULER: It must be true in this particular instance. It would indicate that, at all events, and if you have a prohibitive tariff you might as well say good-bye to your trade agreement.

Mr. MANION: I am absolutely opposed to a prohibitive tariff.

Mr. EULER: Besides, the reduction on boots and shoes is small. The tariff is still 30 per cent, and some reductions have been made in the raw materials for shoe manufacture, on kid leather for instance. The Bennett government imposed a tariff of 27½ per cent to stimulate Canadian industry, but it was not stimulated and it never supplied the Canadian market. We reduced that 27½ per cent to 20 per cent, and that has been of considerable assistance to the Canadian shoe manufacturer.

Reference has been made to the excise tax. It is to be taken off commodities covered by the agreement. It may be true—I am not making any pronouncement, because that is for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning)—that we may take the full excise tax off all commodities, and not merely off commodities entering under this agreement. I am not making that statement. But, after all, it never was an excise tax. It was intended as a revenue tariff, and it acted also, my hon. friends opposite will say, as a protection. But in the first instance it was never intended, as was stated by Mr. Bennett, as anything but a revenue tariff. My hon. friends may say that the removal of the excise tax acts to reduce the protection for Canadian industry, but in addition it has this effect, that many of the constituent materials which enter into Canadian manufacture will also benefit by having the excise tax removed, and the Canadian consumer as well will get considerable benefit from the removal of the excise tax. I may say for the information of my colleague the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) that I have had no complaints from my own constituency with regard to boots and shoes or, for that matter, with regard to any other line of industry. The shoe manufacturers are now asking through their association for a further reduction in the duty on machinery, and it may be—again I am making no commitment for the government—that they can make a fair case because this party has always felt that it ought to make as easily and as cheaply procurable as possible the implements of production.

The leader of the opposition spoke of the most favoured nation clause, and I gathered from what he said, and from what the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has said on different occasions, that he is opposed to the most favoured clause because, particularly with respect to this agreement, he makes the criticism he made before, that through the agreement we have made with the United States other countries will receive the benefits which we are giving to the United States. I have already answered that pretty completely, and I do not know that I should go into it again. He instanced such countries as Japan and Germany. I have already pointed out that Germany benefits practically not at all, and Japan benefits hardly at all. In fact, the whole agreement is made on the principle that the benefits are to go to the United States and will go to her only on those commodities of which she is already the chief supplier. In addition, we have in the agreement a safety clause by which, when it is found that the benefits on any one commodity go more to any other country than to the United States, provision is made for applying a remedy.

Another statement, which has been made repeatedly, and which must be contradicted and contradicted in the strongest possible terms, was that this agreement was the deathknell of the preferences we have in the British market. I made the statement the other day, and was contradicted by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, that this agreement, so far from endangering our preferences, affirms the principle of the preferences that we have in the British market.

Mr. CAHAN: That is the hon. gentleman's deduction, which is different entirely from the deduction made by the United States.

Mr. EULER: I would remind my hon. friend that when I made that statement the other day, I think he said: "Oh, yes, we would get all these back." I made the statement that in case the agreement between Great Britain and the United States was discontinued by, let us say, the coming into power of a new government in the United States, in that event our preferences in the British market are restored, and I repeat that with all possible emphasis—our preferences are restored. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George said that they are only restored—

Mr. CAHAN: I did not discuss that.

Mr. EULER: In the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, speaking in the house on January 31, 1939, as reported on page 479 of Hansard, contended that the exclusion of preferences from the scope of most favoured nation treatment in no sense affirms the right of Canada to grant such preferences and leaves the United States free to condemn such preferences on diplomatic grounds.

Mr. CAHAN: That is true, but that is not what the hon. gentleman was saying.

Mr. EULER: Article 17 of the trade agreement reads:

Nothing in the agreement—

I am saying that this in effect reaffirms that we have preferences in the United Kingdom market which will be restored to us:

Nothing in the agreement shall entitle the United States of America to claim the benefit of any treatment, preference or privilege which may now or hereafter be accorded by Canada exclusively to territories under the sovereignty of His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British dominions beyond the seas, Emperor of India, or under his majesty's protection or suzerainty.

Mr. MANION: As a matter of information, has that not been the rule right along for years? I understand that it has been.

Mr. EULER: It was not included in the agreement.

Mr. CAHAN: It never was necessary because the agreement in other terms made it clear.

Mr. EULER: The statement is made that we give advantages to other countries by reason of the most favoured nation arrangement. My hon. friend lost sight entirely of the fact that the most favoured nation clause is reciprocal and that we have most favoured nation agreements with thirty countries, which means that when those countries give concessions to any other country, automatically they give them to us. Here is a very important point in connection with the United States-Great Britain agreement. Under it the United States gives concessions on some 400 commodities, items in their tariff. These concessions automatically come to Canada.

We did, of course, make some concessions. If we did not make any concessions we could not expect concessions and we would not have any trade agreement at all. We made some concessions in the British preference. We made them for several reasons. One was, for the laudable purpose of assisting Great Britain and the United States to come to an agreement; and we made no very great sacrifices in doing so. Wheat has been spoken of. Well, the same sacrifice, if sacrifice it be, was made by Australia as well. But most of the preferences have been retained. Some have been reduced, as, for example, on apples, which still carry a duty of 90 cents a barrel. The wheat preference was of doubtful value, and in the unbound preferences, only one item of importance, the item of lard, is made free.

I might mention the concession on potatoes. The duty on white potatoes established by the Tariff Act of 1930 was 75 cents per hundred pounds. The duties on potatoes under the 1935 and the new trade agreements may be indicated as follows: On certified seed potatoes, under the old agreement, March 1 to November 30, the duty was 45 cents per hundred pounds; under the new agreement it is reduced to 37½ cents per hundred pounds and the quota is raised from 750,000 bushels to one and a half million bushels. On table potatoes under the 1935 agreement the duty was 75 cents per hundred pounds and we had no quota concession at all. Now, from March 1 to November 30, Canadian table potatoes will carry a duty of only 37½ cents per hundred pounds—that is fifty per cent of the old rate—with a million bushels of a quota, plus—what has not been mentioned before—that when the United States production of potatoes is lower than 350,000,000 bushels a year, Canada receives, as a quota, the whole of the difference between the 350,000,000 bushels and the actual production. In the past ten years Canada would have benefited by that quota in about five years out of the ten.

Mr. STIRLING: Is that arrangement countervailing?

Mr. EULER: I do not think there is any countervailing arrangement.

In conclusion I should like to speak of some concessions which Canada obtained, but I can speak of them only in very general terms. The new agreement renews or betters all the concessions secured for Canadian exports under the 1935 agreement, and contains a large number of entirely new concessions. Whereas the 1935 agreement provided for reductions in United States duties affecting sixty-three items and sub-items of the United States tariff—and now I am using some of the arguments of my hon. friend; I am speaking of "items," although I admit quite freely that the number of items has no real bearing on the matter; it is the amount of money involved; you might have half a dozen small items which would not counterbalance one large item—the new agreement includes 129 reductions in rates of duty covering trade valued in 1937 at $72,981,492. In addition, there are forty-one bindings of existing United States rates of duty, including thirty-two rates reduced in the 1935 agreement. The total trade affected by these bindings was valued in 1937 at $51,843,682. Furthermore, the 1935 agreement contained a number of quotas limiting the imports allowed at reduced rates of duty. In each case in which it was found that these quotas actually restricted Canadian exports, the new agreement provides for a complete removal of, or a substantial increase in, the quota.

Finally, existing free entry was bound on thirty-two items and subitems in the new agreement, compared with twenty in the 1935 agreement.

The following are some of the principal concessions to Canada in the new trade agreement:

Agricultural products: Maximum reduction in duty on an enlarged quota in the case of heavy cattle; enlarged tariff quota for calves; maximum reductions in the duties on cream and milk; further reduction in duty on cheese —this is very important—further reduction in the duty on horses; reductions in the duties on oats, barley, rye, buckwheat and products made therefrom; reductions in the duties on various kinds of feeds, fresh and frozen blueberries, clover and grass seeds, certified seed and table potatoes, hay, maple sugar and maple syrup, and silver or black fox furs or skins.

Fishery products: Reductions in duty covering almost the entire range of production of fish.

Forest products: Removal of the requirement that imported lumber should be marked with country of origin; removal of tariff quota applicable to imports, at reduced rates of duty, of Douglas fir and western hemlock lumber; more favourable arrangement regarding imports of red cedar shingles; reduced duties on a variety of woodenware articles; and on uncoated printing paper, hanging paper, tissue papers and crepe paper.

Minerals and metals: Reduced duties on a large number of them. I will not enumerate them.

Chemicals: The same.

Manufactured goods: Binding of free entry for agricultural implements, and reduced duties on patent leather; horsehide and cowhide gloves; skating boots; pipe organs; yachts; hose; wire cloth; axles; iron castings; moulders' patterns; iron and steel chains; electric stoves and ranges; electric washing machines; and waste.

In addition to the benefits which will be derived by Canadian exporters from the reductions in United States duties provided for in the new Canada-United States trade agreement, there are a great many concessions in the trade agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States which will facilitate Canadian trade. I have already made mention of this. Some of these are: Books; abrasives; sole leather; side upper leather; collar, bag and case leathers; grained leather; boots and shoes; numerous textile items; dressed furs; kippered herring; biscuits; jellies, jams and marmalades; ginger ale, and so on.

I will conclude, since my hon. friend has read from so many authorities, with some of the opinions of the Canadian public, or Canadian journals, as to the probable effect of the trade agreement. These are not in general taken from the columns of papers which are friendly to this government.

I have here a telegram received from the president of the British Columbia Lumber and Shingle Association:

> At a meeting of our directors to-day I was instructed to wire you expressing our appreciation and thanks for the efforts that you and your department put forward in the recent trade negotiations to protect the lumber interests of our country and to advise that we fully appreciate that you had a difficult task to handle, particularly affecting lumber. We fully realized from the start some sacrifice would have to be made in empire markets in the interest of broader trading and sounder national relations but we are hopeful that when the United States removes the present excise tax that we will be able to more than regain our losses. I should also like to express my personal sincere congratulations and thanks.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give the dates of these?

Mr. EULER: This is November 23 of last year.

The Windsor Star of November 19 said that cash will flow, and that the treaty is important to Windsor because of the car industry, which can look foward to better times.

The Ottawa Journal says that praise for the new Canada-United States agreement was general with representatives of the majority of industries.

The Hamilton Spectator says that the spirit behind the agreement stamps it as a healthy symptom in world economy.

The Montreal Gazette states that while there may be some difference of opinion as to the merits of the agreement, it can be said that it is bound to have a stimulating effect on world trade.

The Toronto Star writes that the treaty should commend itself to Canadians of all parties.

The London Free Press remarks that on general principles the people will approve the new treaties on political as well as economic grounds.

The Farmers Advocate believes that wider markets are opened through the trade agreement with the United States.

The Winnipeg Free Press quotes J. A. McLeod, president of the Bank of Nova Scotia, that the new three-cornered agreement is a great achievement in reducing trade barriers.

Saturday Night predicts an increase in trade, which will add to Canadian national wealth, and better times.

The Winnipeg Free Press quotes Hon. Howard Ferguson as strongly approving the agreement.

The Montreal Herald says that the signing of the treaty is one of the most hopeful signs which has appeared on the world horizon for a long time.

The Monetary Times states that the new treaty will affect the volume of international trade.

The Canadian Textile Journal believes that the new trade agreement will lessen restrictions on international trading that should have a far-reaching effect.

The Canada Lumberman, the Montreal Gazette and again La Presse are all favourable. I might say for the benefit of my good friend the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) that far from the textile mills in Hespeler having been injured, they are busy in that town, and in Preston they have gone back from a three-day to a five-day week. In regard to live stock Mr. Wright of Saskatchewan states:

> Lowered tariff of half-cent on live cattle increases the value of all Canadian cattle approximately $5 per head.

Mr. STIRLING: Is that Mr. Wright of the Globe and Mail?

Mr. EULER: No. This is a gentleman from Saskatchewan who, I believe, was a member of the board of the Bank of Canada.

Now let me give a few comments from United States sources.

The Mining Congress Journal of the United States states that the zinc mining industry has been sacrificed in the agreement and complains bitterly.

The Milwaukee Sentinel states that the dairymen attack the treaty, complaining of the reduction in American tariffs on cream, milk, cheese and other dairy products.

The Duluth Herald objects to provisions that lower the duties on dairy products from Canada.

The New York Journal American states that there is severe criticism of the agreement on the part of members of congress who come from industrial states.

Senator H. Shipstead of Minnesota asks, "if this is Yankee trading, or are we trading the Yankee?" He says that the treaty is based more on international politics than on economics.

The New York Times protests against the agreement.

The Boston Post says that the pact hurts New England, and is loud in protest on behalf of the fishing and textile industries of New England which it says are injured.

[Mr. Euler.]

The New York Herald-Tribune regards the new trade pact as a blow to the United States fisheries.

The lumbermen, the sheep and cattle men complain. The cattle men declare that they are sold down the river.

The New York Journal American states that United States farmers are sold out.

I have cited these opinions to show that there are views on both sides, and I say to the leader of the opposition that we shall have to wait and see exactly what the results will be.

This agreement was conceived in the spirit of goodwill and mutual advantage. No one contends that it is perfect, and only time and experience will disclose definitely its advantages and disadvantages. We believe that it is action in the right direction and that its enactment will be to the advantage of both countries.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT

LANGUAGE REQUIREMENT IN QUEBEC PROVINCE RESPECTING EMPLOYEES OF RAILWAY AND TELEGRAPH COMPANIES

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of the bill which I have the honour to introduce is to ensure that employees of certain public services in the province of Quebec have the necessary qualifications for their work. Inasmuch as the chief qualification required in any public service is the ability to speak the language of the people with whom one has to deal, the proposed amendment seeks to authorize the board of railway commissioners to make orders and regulations providing that all new employees of railways, telegraph and telephone companies in the province of Quebec be sufficiently conversant with the French language to be able properly to perform their duties and to be understood by and understand a majority of the people with whom they are called upon to do business.

The situation in that regard in the province of Quebec is deplorable. In spite of all the complaints lodged by the travelling public and others using these services, and their requests for an improvement in the situation, there has been no improvement. Why? Because there has been no change in the custom of appointing to positions in these public utility companies men who are totally ignorant of the French language. Let me take as an example that part of the Canadian National system situated in the province of Quebec and administered from Moncton. Nearly one-third of this division is located within the province of Quebec, and a considerable part of the remainder is in a French-speaking section of New Brunswick. On that division the following new appointments were made during 1937: brakemen, fifteen, of whom only two can speak French; firemen (apprentices), thirty, of whom only three can speak French; shop apprentices, thirty-nine, all but three unable to speak French; headquarters and supervisory staff, six, none of whom can speak French; legal department, seven, all unable to speak French; assistant superintendent of pensions, two, both unable to speak French: staff of the general superintendent of transportation, nine, all unable to speak French; traffic department, twelve, only two of whom can speak French; electric power and signal department, seven, not one of whom can speak French; purchasing department, four, all unable to speak French; engineering department, six, all unable to speak French; auditing department, ten, none of whom can speak French; telephone and telegraph department, three, all unable to speak French; divisional superintendent's office, twelve, not one of whom can speak French; Canadian National express, seven, all unable to speak French; freight claims department, three, only one of whom can speak French; treasurer's department, four, all unable to speak French; local freight agent's office, three, all unable to speak French; general baggage agent's office, three, all unable to speak French; and so on.

In the town of Shediac, New Brunswick, for instance, where the population is ninety per cent French-speaking, there are three officials of the Canadian National Railways: a station agent, his assistant and a porter, not one of whom can speak French. It is high time that we changed this state of affairs; the French-Canadians are sick and tired of it. Even in our good old city of Quebec the express agent bears the name Corrigan MacManus; the telegraph agent is a Mr. McWilliams; the superintendent of the St. Malo shops is a Mr. Boone; the superintendent of the Saguenay division is a Mr. Edgley; the head of the bridge department is a Mr. Riddock; the head of the sleeping car department is a Mr. McDougall; the head of the mechanical department is a Mr. Broadhurst; the superintendent of the transportation department is a Mr. Sunderland; the official in charge of steamships is a Mr. Trueman, and so it goes in a dozen other cases.

In this connection I cannot do better than quote the testimony of a former railway employee who is now a member of this house, the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Lapointe), who on June 22, 1938, said:

It is clear that there exists within the Canadian National Railways an organization which is seeking to eliminate French-Canadians from the posts to which they are entitled. I therefore consider it necessary to investigate this situation, which should not be allowed to continue. Our English speaking friends may be tired of hearing our often repeated complaints, but I wish to tell them that, if we were used a little more fairly, if we were not always kept in the background, we would not so often deem it our painful duty to discuss with such frequency a problem very disagreeable to us.

In order to show them the actual situation, I invite them to visit with me the province of Quebec where we will effect a little investigation. Let us first go to Montreal, and visit the shops or the large offices of the Canadian National Railways on McGill street.

If my hon. friends pay a visit to the different branches—traffic, finance, accounting, purchasing, industry, natural resources, etc.,—they will not find more than two French-Canadians out of every twenty employees. They will also find that French Canadians have been almost ostracized from important positions and that high salaries never go to them. They will look in vain for bilingual signs, either on the walls or on the office doors. If they ask the elevator operator for information in French, they probably will receive the same answer as I got, a few weeks ago: "I do not understand." All that is going on in the greatest French centre of America.

I will then ask my hon. friends to travel to the eastern part of the province of Quebec. But, before we leave Bonaventure station, we will pay a short visit to the offices of the sleeping car department. My hon. friends will no doubt be received as I was a few days ago when I spoke French to one of the employees: "Do you speak English?" said he. "If so, all right, because nobody here understands French."

We will then board the Ocean Limited, the night express, where further surprises await my hon. friends. In the sleeping cars, they will try in vain to make themselves understood in the French language. After a night's rest, we will go to the dining car. In any of the places between Rimouski and Matapedia, the stretch covered from 6 to 9 a.m., when the train passes through one of the most beautiful districts of the province of Quebec, which is also one of the most exclusively French, I defy them to find among the eight members of the staff of that car a single one who can speak French. Our journey will end at Campbellton, New Brunswick. Although more than 50 per cent of the mileage administered from this divisional point is in the province of Quebec, only four officials out of fourteen are French Canadians. The staff of the divisional office numbers twenty-one employees, of which only four are French Canadian. Out of forty-five men employed in the roundhouse only seven are French Canadian.

Mr. Hungerford, to whom I wrote some time ago to complain about there being no French speaking employees on the Gaspé line, answered me in part as follows, in a letter dated December 15, 1938:

> We will take the matter up with the representatives of the brotherhood in accordance with the requirements of a labour agreement existing between the company and its employees. We hope to be able to come to an agreement with the brotherhood that will permit us to appoint a bilingual employee to the post in question.

I do not see why a regulation could not be made that would force the brotherhoods to make their choice among bilingual candidates, without violating their labour agreements. Seniority rules were also put forward as an objection. I think the members of the transport commission are intelligent enough to draw up rules which will safeguard seniority rights; for it must not be forgotten that my bill applies only to new employees.

Should parliament pass this bill, we shall have in a certain number of years, through the normal working of the promotion system, our rightful proportion of French speaking employees on the railways operating in the province of Quebec. This would assuredly be the best way of maintaining the confederation agreement, because it would remove all the causes of injustice of which my compatriots rightly complain.

I rely on the sense of justice of my fellow members in the house to help me in getting this bill through the various stages of procedure.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide that employees of the railways operating in the province of Quebec shall speak the language of the majority of those with whom they come in contact. With the purpose of the bill I think no one can quarrel, and I believe the management of both railways would say that they are making every effort to bring about that very situation.

I understand the hon. member is not complaining about the trains which operate only in Quebec. I think that on those trains there are far more employees who speak French well, than employees who speak English well, and very few employees who are not fairly proficient in both languages. The complaint of the hon. member has reference particularly to those trains which operate not only in the province of Quebec but also in other provinces and in another country.

The question which must be decided in studying this bill is, having in mind the advantages and difficulties, whether or not the advantages outweigh the difficulties. I will recall to hon. members the fact that a bill similar to this was introduced in this house in 1917. At that time it was violently opposed and overwhelmingly defeated. In 1918 a similar bill was introduced in the senate, and there again it met with overwhelming defeat.

This bill is being opposed by the legislative committee of the railway brotherhoods, which I believe represent well over 80 per cent of all railway employees on both railways. Upon a casual reading it might appear, as I said before, that the bill affects only railway employees in the province of Quebec. In effect, however, it affects all employees of the Intercolonial railway, many employees of the New York Central railway operating into Montreal, employees of the Delaware and Hudson railway operating into Montreal, as well as employees of the Canadian National railways trains operating into Vermont and other parts of the United States.

The difficulty, of course, arises in connection with seniority agreements which for over fifty years have been in effect between the railways and their employees. That system of promotion by seniority provides that the men themselves shall recommend to the management the man who is to be promoted to a certain position. And the development of the seniority agreement has been brought to such perfection that to-day the matter of promotion is almost automatic, so far as the management is concerned. The management assure me, however, that in the matter of bilingualism the unions cooperate as far as is possible. Men are urged to stand aside if by lack of bilingualism they are not qualified to fill a certain post, and it is not often that any great difficulty occurs through men, because of seniority, forcing themselves into positions which they are not competent to fill.

To put the purpose of this bill into force on the Intercolonial railway would mean that old employees of the railway in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick would have to lose their rights of seniority, because practically all their runs are interprovincial and pass into the province of Quebec. Both railways have objected to the terms of the bill. Each management has said it is entirely in sympathy with the object of the bill, namely to bring bilingualism into the operation of railways in the province of Quebec, but both have stated they thought the effect of the bill would not be helpful in that regard.

Under the circumstances I have no objection to the bill going to the railway committee, where it can be given careful study by hon. members of the committee, and where the representatives of railway brotherhoods and the managements can appear and point out the objections to the bill in its present form. Possibly some provisions could be incorporated into the bill which would not have the destructive effect on seniority rights that the present measure would undoubtedly have. If so, the bill may deserve further consideration when it is returned to the house.

Having stated my position, namely that I believe the proposed amendment to the Railway Act will not improve the situation the sponsor of the bill is seeking to improve, I may say I have no objection to second reading and reference to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISION AGAINST REFUSAL TO EMPLOY OR DISMISSAL FOR MEMBERSHIP IN TRADE UNIONS

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the criminal code.

He said: A bill similar to this was introduced in 1936 as Bill No. 62. I was not even given a chance to explain the bill; the house had passed a resolution to deal only with unopposed bills, and this bill was promptly opposed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), possibly not because of opposition to the principle of the bill but rather because of the season.

Mr. ROGERS: That was made very clear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. It was reintroduced last year as Bill No. 4. It was again opposed by the government, but entirely on constitutional grounds. The labourers' right to organize was apparently conceded by everyone—at least no one objected. But the British North America Act was invoked once more and we heard a good deal about property and civil rights.

The minister will recognize that I am a mere layman, but in my own way I tried to present certain constitutional arguments. I should like very briefly to run over the ground I took last year. I had been looking over the criminal code, and I brought to the attention of the house certain sections of that code. I found, for example, that breach of trust by a public officer is a crime punishable by five years imprisonment. I found that obstructing an officiating clergyman is a crime for which one is liable to be sentenced to two years in prison. This does not mean that religion comes under federal jurisdiction, but when someone attempts to obstruct an officiating clergyman the act becomes a crime. I found, further, that the head of a family is required to provide the necessities of life for any child under sixteen and for his wife, and if he fails he is guilty of a crime and liable to a penalty of $500 or one year's imprisonment or both. Again I would say that this is not because family matters are matters that come under the jurisdiction of this parliament, but when someone evades certain responsibilities it becomes a crime. I find that the issuing of a false prospectus, statement or account by directors or officers of a company is a crime. Here again is a matter that is concerned with contracts, which come directly under provincial jurisdiction; yet if there is a false prospectus issued or anything of that kind—though, and indeed because—affecting property and civil rights that becomes a crime. I found that ever cheating in playing at any game or in holding the stakes or in betting on any event is a crime rendering one liable to three years' imprisonment. I found that sending a false telegram is a crime, the punishment being two years imprisonment. I should like to read section 501 of the criminal code:

> Everyone is guilty of an offence punishable, at the option of the accused, on indictment or on summary conviction before two justices and liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding $100, or to three months' imprisonment with or without hard labour, who wrongfully and without lawful authority, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing anything which he has a lawful right to do, or to do anything from which he has a lawful right to abstain . . .

I submit that clause is closely in line with the bill which I present to-night.

Let us take another section, section 502:

> Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, in pursuance of any unlawful combination or conspiracy to raise the rate of wages . . . uses any violence or threat of violence to any person, with intent to hinder him from working or being employed at such trade, business or manufacture.

Here is a matter that on the face of it might be considered a purely provincial matter, having to do with contracts, wages, et cetera; but when anyone undertakes to prevent an employee from doing work under these circumstances, his action is a crime and comes under the jurisdiction of this parliament. As I pointed out last year, certain things which employees may do become crimes. And I suggest that if we have a provision against such actions we should also have in the criminal code a provision preventing employers from interfering with employees in their efforts to organize or carry on union activities. It seems to me that is a reasonable provision.

I am not a lawyer. But I remember nearly forty years ago having to coach a few law students in logic. I must say that after the experience of those weeks I have never been overwhelmed by what the lawyers instinctively know about reasoning or accept unreservedly their conclusions.

Mr. MARTIN: They were just young men.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, quite so.

An hon. MEMBER: Like yourself.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But I submit there is no inherent quality in a lawyer as such which makes his deductions necessarily logical.

With regard to the constitutional aspects of the case I should like to quote from the submission made by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations in January of last year. Referring to the jurisdictional question the submission states:

We base this statement on two important principles laid down by the privy council itself in dealing with our constitution. The first of these principles was given in a decision of 1896 (the Distillers' and Brewers' case), when their lordships stated that they did not doubt "that some matters, in their origin local and provincial, might attain such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the dominion and to justify the Canadian parliament in passing laws for their regulation or abolition in the interests of the dominion." Obviously this means that a matter of civil rights or of a local or private nature in its origin should cease to be reserved exclusively to the provinces when it becomes of such prominence as to attain national significance.

The second principle, contained in the decision on the Radio case (1932) may be taken either as an extension of the first, or as parallel to it. Lord Dunedin in giving judgment had established that the point at issue was given by the act neither to the dominion nor to the provinces. As a residual power, and as a matter essentially national, jurisdiction was declared to rest with the federal authority.

One other paragraph of this document.

Thus, it seemed to the trades and labour congress that the intention in the mind of the original promoters of the British North America Act and the needs of to-day in regard to the constitution are in agreement, namely, that the central government should be able to exercise those functions one would expect to find a central government possessing, that is to say, jurisdiction in questions of common import throughout the nation in matters where uniformity is highly desirable, in matters where the size of the problem exceeds provincial competence, as well as in matters more readily recognized as interprovincial in scope.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Later in the debate last year I was very glad to have the hearty support of the then leader of the opposition, Mr. Bennett. As we all recognize him as a lawyer of standing, I take the liberty of quoting a few paragraphs which I think fairly well summarize his argument. This is to be found on pages 3994, 3995 and 3996 of Hansard for 1938:

I think the right hon. Minister of Justice will agree with me that in two paragraphs of this bill we are not dealing with property and civil rights at all, that what we are dealing with is intimidation and conspiracy.

I hope the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will take this point very carefully into consideration, "what we are dealing with is intimidation and conspiracy." The quotation continues:

In the paragraph to which I refer, paragraph (b), we are dealing with the offence against the body politic on the part of those who may be in a position to enforce their views by threats, intimidation or otherwise, preventing that which arises out of property and civil rights, namely a contract being made effective. No one would question the right of the provinces to control matters of property and civil rights. No one has questioned the right of the provinces to deal with matters of contract. But it does not follow that because that is so, this parliament in the exercise of its jurisdiction over criminal law may not express itself in the strongest possible terms as to those who interfere with freedom of contract and the making of it. . . .

Again:

But where a man says, " 'Thou shalt not' use your property or exercise your civil rights," and he uses towards you intimidation or force or threats to see that you do not exercise your rights, that is an offence; that is within the criminal law, and solely within the jurisdiction of this parliament. It is that offence at which this bill strikes.

And again, with respect to penalties:

But it is not a penalty for a breach of contract, because that is covered by a provincial statute; that penalty sounds in damages, as many acts provide. This bill goes further. It does not, as I read it, contemplate the question of contract or property and civil rights in that sense at all. It merely says that if a man refuses to employ another, or dismisses him from his employment because he has exercised his freedom of choice by associating himself with a particular trade union, that is such a deprivation of a civil right, the great right of freedom or association, as to incur the penalties of the criminal law, and not a pecuniary result sounding in damages. That, I think, is the distinction between the provincial statutes and this bill.

The then leader of the opposition offered a practical suggestion:

On the other hand, if we have what I conceive to be the strongest reason in the world for believing a statute to be valid, we should place it on the statute books and ask that it be referred to the court so that its validity may be determined. That is the method prescribed by law for that purpose.

He considered that under these circumstances the bill need not be proclaimed. He closed his presentation with this statement:

I believe the bill to be valid. I believe it to be within the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament. I believe it makes it an adequate and proper offence for a person to interfere with any man exercising his freedom of choice and his right of association, provided always that it is exercised—in the language of the bill itself—"in a lawful manner."

The United States, I might point out, has had somewhat similar constitutional difficulties. The National Labour Relations Act of 1938, though challenged in the courts, was upheld by the supreme court. The core of the National Labour Relations Act lies in sections 7 and 8. Section 7 provides:

Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labour organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

Section 8 supplements and enforces the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively by enumerating and prohibiting certain practices by employers, which are designated as "unfair labour practices." And I would call these particular sections to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers):

1. It is declared to be an unfair labour practice for an employer to "interfere with, restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7."

2. It is an unfair labour practice "to dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of a labour organization or contribute financial or other support to it."

3. It is an unfair labour practice for an employer "by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labour organization."

4. An employer indulges in an unfair labour practice if he discharges or discriminates against an employee because he has filed charges against an employer under the act.

5. An employer indulges in an unfair labour practice when he refuses to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees.

Let me reiterate that this measure, whose constitutionality was challenged, was sustained in the United States by the supreme court.

We are urging this bill at this time because in practice it has been found that the provincial legislation is wholly inadequate. Had I time I might review the provincial acts in the various provinces, but I do not think that is necessary here to-night. I should like to confine myself to the objection raised last year, the constitutional objection.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I should like it very much if my hon. friend would indicate in what way the provincial legislation, where it exists, is wholly inadequate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Essentially because of the very thing that I have included in this bill; that is, intimidation, either overt or in the form of the economic power which an employer possesses and may exercise. This is the situation practically, as I see it. The various measures that we have in the provinces take it for granted that there are two parties equal in bargaining power and that these two parties have perfect freedom in coming to an agreement, but in practice that is not the case. It is true that behind the employee may stand a local union that may have considerable strength. We had an example before us to-night in the very strong railway brotherhoods where, because of certain seniority provisions, there would be difficulty in carrying out the provisions of the bill presented just prior to mine. But very often there are not strong labour organizations.

On the other hand, behind the employer there is a board of directors, a company, possibly a great corporation with millions of dollars. Opposing the corporation is a little man who is threatened with the loss of his job. What chance has he, under these circumstances, to bargain freely? No chance whatever. We can go on and on and on in a theoretical sort of way assuming that everybody has economic freedom and liberty, and we shall get nowhere.

I was very much struck with a paragraph I read the other day in a book by Max Lerner, entitled "It Is Later Than You Think." Although Mr. Lerner was speaking of liberals with a small "l" and was thinking in terms of the United States, I am afraid that what he says applies all too closely to at least some members of the Liberal party in Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): With a small "l" or a big one?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In some instances, I am afraid, with a large "L." It applies to those who have been brought up in the old school, possibly before the problems which have arisen on account of the concentration of capital which exists to-day became acute. In any event I should like to read this paragraph; I think it is worth the attention of every member in the house:

> The result is that the classical liberals play directly into the hands of the reactionaries. They have become the most reliable allies that reaction has. Their doctrine of individualism and laissez-faire leads, in the absence of effective government control, to the further concentration of economic power in the hands of the giant corporations. Their doctrine of the rule of law leads to the oligarchial power of the supreme court. Their doctrine of liberty of contract leads, in the hands of the supreme court, to the defeat of basic humanitarian legislation. Their doctrine of states' rights leads to the creation of a No-Man's land in which the federal government is prevented from acting and the states refuse to act. Their belief in social control through litigation leads to the attempt to regulate a social system through the interminable delays of the courts. Their lip-service to the shibboleths of freedom ties the hands of the government and leaves the field to the tyranny of corporations. It is not that liberals want to stand still but that they fear to go forward.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask my hon. friend, in what country do they have such a strong bench in the supreme court?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was quoting from Mr. Max Lerner, who I think was speaking particularly of conditions that prevail in the United States.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is worse.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think the situation here is any better. There is a reference in my quotation to a No-Man's land. Undoubtedly there are some very real difficulties that any government has to face. It seems to me that this government has sometimes been very generous in its treatment of the claims of the provinces. I am not now going into the question of the padlock law.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is not what I am being told in my own province of Quebec.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Perhaps not.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am a federalist over there.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wish merely to point out that there are undoubted difficulties. I appeal to the common sense of the house and the sense of justice of the Minister of Justice and the Liberal government, in this matter. I ask them not to look at the situation too closely from the purely technical standpoint—although I believe that constitutionally I am on sound ground. But when a grievance exists in this country, and when it has been found in practice impossible to remedy that grievance under provincial jurisdiction, it seems to me that we have a right to come to this house and expect that action will be taken.

On other occasions I have referred to some of the abominable conditions which exist in our so-called company towns. I understand that one of my colleagues will take the opportunity to deal in some detail with that problem. But anyone who has gone into certain industrial communities in northern Ontario, northern Manitoba, northern British Columbia—and I have no doubt that such communities exist in parts of the east, with which I am not so familiar—will recognize that conditions exist there which are incompatible with all ideals of British liberty. Some years ago I was threatened with not being permitted to speak in one of those towns; although I came there at the time of a federal election and I was then supporting a farmer member of this house. It was before we had our own organization as it exists to-day. Before the meeting I was waited upon in the office of the hotel by an American manager of an American company who laid down the law that if I touched on labour matters I would not be permitted to speak. That was in a good sized town in northern Manitoba. Here am I, a Canadian citizen of several generations, who in this country have cherished the ideals of British liberty, and I go to that town to carry on the work of trying to select a federal representative, and an American who has not even taken the trouble to become naturalized in Canada can block me in carrying on that work.

If that can be done to an individual who has some standing in the country, what can not be done to the poor employee who has no one behind him and whose very livelihood is affected by the decision at which the manager may arrive. That is the kind of thing we face all over this country.

Unfortunately in some instances these companies even have certain concessions from the government. It is an outrage, merely because many of these places are isolated and the people concerned are economically unable to assert themselves, that these conditions should continue from year to year. I appeal to the Minister of Justice, who I believe is a fair-minded man, that he should take this matter up. As I said, I am not a constitutional lawyer, and I may not argue this matter as it might be argued in a court.

Mr. MARTIN: You have done very well.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have confined myself almost exclusively to the constitutional aspect, but I believe that if the minister would give a little more careful attention than he has in the past to the actual conditions which have developed here in Canada, he would find a way—if not in the exact wording of my bill, then in some other manner—whereby this need could be met. I urge upon him that course. I do not want to prolong this presentation, although I could go almost indefinitely into cases of hardship. On behalf of the considerable number of people whom I represent—and I know I have behind me the organized labour bodies who have urged this action upon the government—I would urge that the government give this matter careful consideration at this session.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I should like to put myself on record as supporting this bill, because it is real reciprocity and trade treaty, or tradesmen's treaty. The purpose of the bill is to prevent employers from refusing to employ or from dismissing employees, or conspiring with others therefor, for the reason that such employees are members of a trade union. I do not think there is any wrong or any crime in the act of a man who unites himself with other fellow workers for their own good. I know that employers generally give their workmen a square deal. I am speaking now from experience, and I will give the house the most recent example of which I know, of employers of labour who have assisted their men to form a union. I refer to the Canada Car and Foundry Company, of Fort William. The men wished to organize, and they were assisted by the management in their organization. This bill would not do anything but help those men and that management. It may be that there are some employers known to the hon. member who sponsored this bill who are not fair and are not willing to play fair with those whom they employ, but I am convinced that the rank and file of employers of labour want to give their men a square deal, either because they are afraid of public opinion, or because their consciences are properly trained according to the Master Workman.

I have no hesitation in supporting a bill of this kind because it embodies true Liberal policy, and I am glad to see the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth) coming so close to Liberal ideas. I am going to support the bill wholeheartedly.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Since this matter was last discussed in the House of Commons I have had some experience in industrial strife which has led me to the firm conviction that only a measure of this kind will guarantee to the workers of Canada their fundamental rights—freedom of association and equality before the law. I propose to tell a plain, unvarnished tale of events which occurred in British Columbia last summer and which demonstrated how men may be deprived of these fundamental civil rights by powerful, vested interests. In this instance something like thirty-one men were convicted before our courts as a result of their struggle to assert their rights. I refer to the strike that took place at Blubber Bay, Texada island.

Quarrying operations on Texada island are conducted by the Pacific Lime Company. Texada is an isolated spot and the company controls virtually the only payroll on the island. They enjoy practically a monopoly of the source of first-class lime on the Pacific coast, both on the Canadian and on the United States side, and usually they employ about 150 men. I have no hesitation in saying on my responsibility as a member, and after careful investigation of the conditions there, that this particular company has a most unsavoury record at the coast so far as working conditions are concerned. It is a notorious fact that they have failed to enforce the usual safety regulations in the mill, in the quarry and in connection with ventilation in the sacking room. On one occasion, a man, because a shaft was unguarded, was caught, and before the accident was discovered about twenty minutes later, he was mincemeat. Mr. Justice McIntosh, who presided on the arbitration board, found it necessary to recommend that rubble round the lip of the pit should be cleared away. When men are working in a quarry 189 feet deep, from which the only egress is a straight, narrow ladder, it is obvious that a stone, falling from that height, might easily crush a man's skull. Other industrialists on the coast have felt quite uneasy for many years about the conditions that obtained at Blubber Bay. The wage arrangements were also unsatisfactory. The men attempted to organize, and in consequence of that attempt their leaders were definitely blacklisted by the company. During the summer of 1937, and again in the summer of 1938, they insisted on their rights of collective bargaining and of organization. They took all the legal processes available to them under the laws of British Columbia. Conciliators were sent in on three occasions and, conciliation having failed, the men took action under which is known as the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act of British Columbia. Mr. Justice McIntosh presided over the board of arbitration, and the board brought down a unanimous finding on the main points submitted to them. The provincial act provides:

> It shall be lawful for employees to bargain collectively with their employers, and to conduct such bargaining through representatives of employees duly elected by a majority vote of employees affected, and any employer or employees refusing so to bargain shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $500 for each offence.

The board found in favour of the men on all the principal points under dispute, and the award was unanimous. The company accepted the award. True, there were some technical difficulties at the time, but Mr. Justice McIntosh, accompanied by several members of the board, went back to Blubber Bay and ironed out these difficulties. Again, the award was accepted by all parties to the dispute. Mr. Justice McIntosh recommended that the twenty-three men previously blacklisted should be reinstated. His position was made quite clear in that respect. He said that the company should dismiss the men who had been temporarily employed during the course of the dispute and that those who had been dismissed should be reinstated if available. Nevertheless this company, almost wholly owned and controlled entirely by a United States concern, the Niagara Alkali Company, New York, although accepting the award, refused to work out conditions of reinstatement for the men concerned. The men waited between two and three weeks patiently expecting the company to devise a plan of reinstatement, but still the company refused to reemploy them. The men went on strike and from then on we had one of the most tragic series of incidents in British Columbia, constituting a dark blot on the industrial history of that province; for not only was it shown that the provincial legislation was inadequate, that it was impossible for the provincial government to enforce the award, but the company figuratively thumbed its nose at the law; and what made it still worse, the detachment of provincial police sent to Blubber Bay was employed to suppress the strikers.

The company, through the cooperation of the police, enforced their own padlock law on Texada island. Families residing on private property and desiring to cross on the only thoroughfare available in order to get to the only store, the only telephone and telegraph office, the government dock and the public highway, were compelled to secure passes from the company's office, and on one occasion, in order to reach the public highway from private property, I was required, though a member of this house on lawful business, to travel under police escort. It was a terrible situation and one which has led to extreme bitterness in British Columbia. That strike is still pending. The result was to make a travesty of law and justice in that province, and after what has occurred at Blubber Bay, and in view of the circumstances that surrounded that strike, it is no wonder that many people have little confidence in the administration of law and order in our country. It is nine o'clock now and I desire to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR APPROVAL SUBJECT TO REQUIRED LEGISLATION

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for approval of the trade agreement between Canada and the United States, entered into at Washington on November 17, 1938, subject to required legislation.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): In rising to speak on the trade treaty I find myself in a most difficult position. I could praise this treaty with justice perhaps, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) have done, and in so doing unquestionably win the applause and approval of the Liberals in the house and their supporters outside. On the other hand I could disparage the treaty with equal show of reason, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) has abundantly demonstrated, and in so doing I should win the approbation of the Conservatives in the house and their supporters outside.

But I am here to preach a new doctrine, a doctrine of understanding. It is my task to point a new way. If I understand; if I have a new way, I shall stand alone; for it is well known that he who understands, stands alone. I believe there is a way out of the difficulties by which we are beset, and as long as I have that faith I shall endeavour to find that way and to assist my fellow Canadians in finding it, even if in so doing I must, to a great extent, stand alone. Consequently I will not approve this treaty, nor will I condemn it. In my opinion the good points offset the bad ones, and there are in the treaty a sufficiently large number of both.

It would appear as though in the last analysis it might favour the west in considerable measure. It would seem that it might assist my province and my constituency, at least directly; whether or not it will assist indirectly it is too early to say. Consequently I will watch the treaty and the way it works out, with much interest.

Before going further, I am going to lay down this general principle, which I was pleased to hear the leader of the opposition lay down. Before any change is brought about in the tariff structure of Canada, by any administration whatever, all producers whose interests may be affected directly or indirectly by any such change ought to be given full right and opportunity to come before the people concerned in making the change and to present their case, in whatever detail they consider necessary, in order to make everyone fully understand their point of view.

There is a tendency on the part of the leader of the government, the right hon. Prime Minister, to try to misrepresent just a little the stand of the people who oppose him in this country. If one says the least word against trade, or even damns it with faint praise, immediately the leader of the government rises in his place and seeks to take advantage and make political capital of the situation by trying to make it appear that such person opposes trade. That is distinctly unfair, and I trust that as the right hon. gentleman grows older he will outgrow that tendency.

Let me say a word or two regarding the stand I take on trade, in order to make my position clear once and for all. I do not oppose trade; neither do I ardently worship it. As long as the circumstances persist which at present obtain, we Canadians simply must trade; first, to rid ourselves of our surpluses; second, to obtain those commodities which we need and which we cannot produce, such as citrus fruits and the like; third, to enable us to have seasonal exchanges, so that in the winter time, for example, we may enjoy carrots, green vegetables and the like, which can be produced readily in warmer climates. At the same time we have interest to pay on debts. That interest can be paid only in goods and the goods can be exported only by trade. Again, we have life insurance policies in companies located in the United States and elsewhere. Upon those policies we must pay regular premiums which must be paid in goods, and goods can be exported only through trade. Then we have a great deal of raw material to distribute.

At the present time we are endeavouring to distribute the world's raw material by trade, and in so doing we are attempting an utter impossibility. Let no man forget that. We are attempting also to place adequate purchasing power in the hands of our people by means of trade. In so doing we are again attempting an utter impossibility. These last two objects cannot be attained, and until those who are leading this country and the people generally throughout Canada clearly comprehend these latter two facts which I have laid down, we shall go on blundering, trusting to trade to do those things which trade cannot do.

Much has been made by the Prime Minister of the contention that this treaty is tending towards peace. During the time at my disposal I propose to discuss that aspect of the treaty, neither opposing the trade treaty nor defending it as an economic measure, but treating it purely as a political measure in a world where war abounds. Our people in Canada want peace. A democratic government should give them peace. If this government cannot give them peace, at least it ought to follow those policies which are designed to lead to peace. I contend that this government in signing this treaty is taking a step which is not tending towards peace. Can the treaty help to prevent war? Absolutely not. When the Prime Minister maintains that it will do so, he is deceiving himself and all those who trust him.

In a Canadian Press dispatch reporting a speech delivered by Sir Samuel Hoare on February 10, 1939, I find a most interesting statement, in these words:

> How often have I thought . . . when I was foreign secretary, that we tended in the years after the great war to ignore the root of the causes of future wars.

Does Sir Samuel Hoare know? During those years Great Britain was striving for trade treaties. Does he think for one moment that in so doing she was removing the root causes of war? Manifestly he does not. He goes on to say:

> Our first duty is to be ready to remove the causes of war.

To those words I say amen.

What are the causes of war? There are two main causes to-day. The first is the deficiency of purchasing power in the hands of the people within any given country of the world. The more we know about realities, the less we shall treat that statement with disdain. It was that condition which brought into power Hitler and Mussolini, and it is that condition which will bring into being a Hitler or a Mussolini in Canada unless it is changed. The second main cause of war is that in this world there are plenty of resources, but they are in the hands of relatively few nations. The other nations are unable to get those resources, or the products of those resources, by any means known to man, except by fighting. If we are going to remove the causes of war we must remove those two causes. For example, sir, in Alberta we have vast resources of coal. Italy needs coal, which she must import every year in order to keep her people from freezing. Up to the present time and under the present system we know of no way to enable Italy to get enough of the products of Alberta's coal fields except by conquering and possessing Alberta. We want to remove the cause of war; seek it in this inability and remove it. I maintain that this treaty, or a thousand treaties like it, cannot remove that cause.

What is the cause of war? Is it lack of goods in this world? Let us see. I have in my possession a statement by F. E. Lathe of the national research council of Canada. On June 27, 1938, in Ottawa, speaking before the American Association for the Advancement of Science, that authority declared that mankind to-day can produce four times as much food as all the people alive can use. In the same speech he said there is a sufficiency of every other necessity in the world to give everyone an adequate standard of living. There is no lack of plenty in this world. The trouble is that we have not yet learned how to distribute it.

During the same convention another eminent authority spoke; this time Doctor Harold C. Urey, Columbia's Nobelist in chemistry. Before the convention he used these words:

> There is little doubt but that much of the unrest of the civilized world for the past twenty-five years resulting in revolutions, new systems of government and world wide depression are all—

Note these words—

> —rather closely related to this productive capacity, largely brought about by science.

Mr. Speaker, through you may I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that this is a revolutionary statement. It is a statement of what seems palpably impossible —that we are fighting, having depressions, having upheavals, because of our large production. Yet those are the words used. And he goes on to say that profound modifications of our social and economic institutions must result from the clearly increasing productive capacity for material things that chemistry and other sciences make possible. There can be no doubt of the meaning of that man. I maintain that statement bears out my contention. We must learn to distribute. Lack of distribution within the country and among the different nations is the fundamental cause of war and troubles.

What is the cause of war? It is the unequal distribution of resources. I shall have to turn over to Hansard a chart which I wish all hon. members to see. This is a striking chart used by F. E. Lathe in his speech. I shall have to tell—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Lethbridge, but I would ask him to confine his remarks to the trade treaty between Canada and the United States.

Mr. POOLE: That is the trade treaty.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not see how in the world a person can more closely confine his remarks to the treaty than by discussing the question whether or not it will tend to create peace, especially when the Prime Minister made that as one of his greatest arguments in favour of the treaty. The question of peace is the matter I am discussing. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I have laid down the statement that there is an inequality in the distribution of resources throughout the world, and that this is one of the causes of war. This is the chart used by Mr. Lathe in connection with his speech:

> In this table the number "1" is taken to represent substantially complete self-sufficiency, "2" partial or temporary self-sufficiency, and "3" definite lack of self-sufficiency.

Table VI—National Sufficiency in Major Minerals

	Br. Emp.	U.S.A.	U.S. S.R.	France and Dep.	Germany	Italy	Japan
Coal	1*	1	1	1	1	2	2
Iron	1	1	1	1	2	3	3
Copper	1	1	2	3	3	3	2
Lead	1	1	3	3	1	2	3
Zinc	1	1	2	2	2	3	2
Nickel	1	3	3	2	3	3	3
Tin	2	3	3	3	3	3	3
Asbestos	1	3	1	3	3	3	3
Petroleum	3?	1	1	3	3	3	3

*Numerical order represents decreasing abundance in relation to national requirements.

Is it not clear why Germany, Italy and Japan must struggle with the nations which have those commodities in abundance, in order that they may be able to get their share? There is an inequality of distribution of this world's resources. This generation must discover a means whereby we can enable those three nations to get their full share of the production of those resources, without owning them, or they will arise every twenty or twenty-five years, when they are strong enough, and endeavour to seize them by force.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has declared twice in the house that in the present treaty Italy, Germany and Japan hardly profit at all—and we are supposed to be signing this treaty to get peace! Yet those three nations with whom we want to have peace are entirely ignored, so far as the benefits to be derived from the treaty are concerned.

How can this treaty help towards peace? I will grant it helps the United States, Canada and Great Britain. But Great Britain and the United States are not the sources of our potential danger, as the leader of the opposition has so well pointed out on two occasions before the house.

What is the cause of war? What does Herr Hitler say? Perhaps I may be excused for quoting a few salient passages from a recent speech he made. He may not be representing himself truthfully, but this is what he says:

In Germany 135 persons live on one square kilometre—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. Would the hon. member state the newspaper from which he is reading?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is an Associated Press dispatch from Berlin under date of January 30, appearing in the Ottawa Citizen. May I just quote again:

Where lies the cause of all our economic difficulties? (says Hitler). In over-population of our living space.

In Germany 135 persons live on one square kilometre (·358 square mile) without outside assistance and without the resources of former times.

"No people have been born to be "have-nots," and no people to be "haves." The conditions of possession on this earth have resulted from historical development."

And again:

Every people has the right to make its existence secure on this earth.

And again:

It has exactly the same right to participate in the exploitation of this world as any other people.

And again:

As things are, we must replace what we lack in material means by extreme industry and the greatest possible concentration of our labour power.

And again:

He for whom nature lets bananas grow into the mouth—

And, sir, if he was not thinking of the United States, and Canada and other parts of the British empire I ask you what was he thinking about; for if there is any people in the world born with bananas growing into their mouths—

Mr. BOUCHARD: "Yes, we have no bananas."

Mr. BLACKMORE: We are those people.

—by themselves naturally has an easier fight for existence than the German farmer who must work hard all the year to keep his soil in condition.

The whole speech is replete with statements like that, which are pathetic. If we are ever going to get ourselves to the point where there is an understanding between us and the other great races of this world, we must commence now, and not delude ourselves into thinking that the signing of such treaties as this is the beginning of that understanding.

Do such treaties make the "have" nations help the "have-nots"? is the question to ask. This is a treaty among three "have" nations, the three greatest "have" nations in the world. By what conceivable means can it help the "have-nots," when the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon specifically stated that the "have-nots" were not to derive benefit from these treaties, except only incidentally?

May I now read statements of some men whose word ought to bear some weight with hon. members, regarding treaties somewhat similar to this one? I choose first the words of Sir Archibald Sinclair, Liberal leader in England. He is speaking about the Ottawa agreements. But before reading this, may I say that when the Ottawa agreements were signed I hailed them as a great achievement. That was because at that time I did not understand. To-day, without any reflection whatever on the good men who negotiated those agreements, men who in my judgment believed they were doing what was in the best interests of this country, I would certainly not praise those agreements. I agree with this man. Here are his words:

It was not until then—

That is when the Ottawa agreements were signed.

—that the German people abandoned themselves to the frenzy of despair which we call

Hitlerism, and the tariffs and quotas of Ottawa, the economic armaments of the British empire, began to breed in other countries tanks, aeroplanes and warships, the military armaments of nations which were determined not to go on paying tribute to Britain but to acquire territories and raw materials for themselves in Abyssinia, in Spain, in China, in Austria, in Czechoslovakia, and perhaps ultimately in the British empire itself.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the date of that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: According to the record I have, this was delivered on May 11, 1938. At any rate it was near that time.

That is what one great authority says—I assume he is an authority; I hope he is not just talking political ballyhoo. He ought to be an authority. Those words are worthy of our respect. The Ottawa agreements were somewhat similar to the agreement that we are now discussing. They were a set of agreements designed to enable members of the select few who have been blessed by Almighty God with the good things of this world to keep these things unto themselves and away from the others.

I have another quotation of the same tenor. This is from Peaceful Change published by the Foreign Policy Association:

> Through the Ottawa agreements of 1932, the members of the British empire, including India, the dominions and a number of British colonies, established a system of trade preferences, favouring each other, and discriminating against outside countries. Since the trade of the British empire amounted to 29·1 per cent of the world total in 1934, such a policy is of serious concern to the rest of the world. Outside countries like Germany and Japan are thus placed at a disadvantage in all these imperial markets.

The trade treaty under discussion is an expression of a sort of Anglo-Saxon economic imperialism. Canada and the United States could manage to live largely without engaging in hot, successful commercial rivalry. That statement, without amplification, must seem strange, I know, but I could support it at great length. Canada and the United States, being blessed by providence with an abundance of all sorts of resources of every kind, are in a position largely to live without obtruding their goods upon the world markets and competing with the other nations who have to trade their goods on world markets in order to live. We do not need to extrude our goods in order to live; we are doing it merely as a means to distribute purchasing power among our people, simply because we have not yet learned a better way of doing it. Is it not hot, successful commercial rivalry which tends to war? May I read some words of President Wilson, that great ambassador of peace:

> Is there a man or woman, nay, is there a child in this audience, who does not know that the seeds of war are sown in hot, successful, commercial rivalry?

This treaty as far as Germany, Italy and Japan are concerned is tending towards hot, successful, commercial rivalry against them. Thus it does not tend to remove the causes of war; it tends rather to provoke war. I am not condemning the treaty; I am not saying that at the present stage of our progress it is not necessary for us to have such a treaty. But I am saying that any informed person who deludes himself into thinking that a treaty like this tends towards international peace is either culpably ignorant or culpably lacking in understanding. I intend to support the treaty, not because I am deluded into thinking it tends towards peace. It is a bargain economically profitable or unprofitable. But let no man trust to it for peace. If he does, he is leaning upon an aged and very much decayed reed which will break and let him fall.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I always listen with a great deal of interest to the leader of the social credit group in this house (Mr. Blackmore). I also read very attentively the statements he occasionally makes between sessions, and it is hard for me to reconcile the statement he made last fall immediately after the trade agreements had been signed between Canada, the United States and Great Britain, the treaties we are now discussing, with his attitude to-night, because in an interview he then gave to the press he stated that he was highly elated at the signing of the treaties. But this evening, listening to him, the only conclusion I could draw was that he was strenuously opposed to this trade agreement between Canada and the United States.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he not recall that I said in the course of my remarks upon this treaty to-night that as far as I could see it was in the interests of Alberta and in the interests of my constituency directly? I think he will grant that I said that.

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member may have said that, but any one reading his speech in Hansard would be left with the impression that he was absolutely opposed to the treaty.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will he not grant that I stated repeatedly to-night that I favoured the treaty for economic reasons?

Mr. BRADETTE: Anyone who will analyze his speech would say that it was seventy per cent against the treaty, perhaps five per cent for it, and nobody knows what the other twenty-five per cent was about, but I want to believe what he has just said. He mentioned that the people, the consumers, should be considered. But, Mr. Speaker, we are all consumers, and as consumers we have a right to expect that tariff changes will operate to our benefit. There is one thing that the Canadian people have come to realize perfectly during the last four years of the present administration, and that is that tariff changes which have been made have been continually downward, not upward, and that for the consumers of Canada the cost of living has, by such action, been steadily decreasing, and will continue to do so as long as we adhere to that policy.

The hon. member also mentioned the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the House of Commons. I believe, that every member of the house and everyone who has seen how the Prime Minister has, for a great number of years, carried out his functions, realizes how patient he is with every section of the house, and with every member, in all matters pertaining to the parliament of Canada. I say that without fear of contradiction.

The leader of the Social Credit group spoke repeatedly to-night of the unlimited resources we have in this country, but I think we should be very careful about making statements of that kind. He mentioned that Italy, which lacks coal, could easily get coal from Alberta. Would he tell the house how feasible he thinks it would be for Italy to buy Alberta coal? A few years ago there was a bonus paid on coal by the federal government. In our section of the country, in northern Ontario, we have long and severe winters and we use a great deal of coal. We tried as earnestly as we could to use Alberta coal, but we could not use it economically for either domestic or industrial purposes. The distances were too great for economical transportation.

Mr. POOLE: It is the hardest coal in this country.

Mr. BRADETTE: But it is not at all easy of access. The hon. member will not state that it is easy to bring Alberta coal to northern Ontario.

Mr. POOLE: I said that we have the hardest coal in this country in Alberta, forty-two miles south of Calgary.

Mr. BRADETTE: Yes, you have coal, wheat and cattle, et cetera—

Mr. POOLE: The hardest coal in Canada, less than one-half of one per cent moisture.

Mr. BRADETTE: —but you lack many other commodities. It is no use saying that we have unlimited resources. We have limited resources, and they are hard to develop. I have mentioned northern Ontario. At the present time lumbering operations in my section of the country are conducted in a temperature ranging from fifteen to forty below zero for months at a time, and there is now nearly five feet of snow in the bush. Will the hon. member say that our natural resources are easy to develop? They certainly are not. Our mining is all done in hard, solid rock. This is a hard country; we have to fight every inch of the way, and if we have done so well among the trading nations of the world, this has been on account of the fine character of our population, its industry, enterprise and determination, which is the greatest asset any nation can have. Apparently the hon. member believes much more in the utterances of totalitarian leaders in Germany or Italy or some other countries of Europe than he does in his own government.

Mr. POOLE: How does the hon. gentleman arrive at that conclusion?

Mr. BRADETTE: When he spoke of the nations that have not, he apparently did not realize that our markets are opened to Germany and Italy. Personally I have received a number of letters criticizing the action of the government because Germany and Japan receive most favoured nation treatment with respect to the commodities dealt with in this treaty.

Mr. POOLE: He quoted a press dispatch.

Mr. BRADETTE: There is no necessity for Germany to fight for any raw materials she wants. She can get them if she wants them, like all other nations. Will the hon. member maintain that it costs Great Britain less than Germany or Italy to get the raw materials to keep her industries going? Germany and Italy have access to world markets the same as any other nation.

Mr. POOLE: But they have not the credit.

Mr. BRADETTE: It is their intensive nationalism that prevents them from taking advantage of that access. They do not want to trade with other nations of the world, and we have accordingly seen revolutions take place in the last few years. Mr. Cordell Hull, of the United States, only a few years ago, in 1934, stated that while the United States had made big mistakes on the tariff question and they have been changing drastically their policy in that regard in the last few years:

> Extreme nationalism, if persisted in, is destined soon to wreck our entire structure of western civilization. In entering upon the negotiation of trade agreements, we are willing frankly to admit that we have erred in the past, that we have now repented.
>
> Just as we set the vicious example of erecting the trade barriers of high tariffs which induced others to follow us, so now we are asking other nations to join us in an attempt to undo the damage our collective action has worked.

Surely the members of the social credit group realize that situation. It was not for reasons of trade alone that Germany annexed Austria. It was not for trade alone that she annexed the Sudeten from Czechoslovakia. Hon. gentlemen opposite should be fair and not make statements which cannot stand the light of day, and in discussing a matter of this kind they should not attribute to the government motives which the government do not have. We believe trade treaties between the haves and the have-nots, treaties between all the nations of the world, would foster the bringing about of universal peace, and it is the only way in which we can have universal peace.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not include the other nations too?

Mr. BRADETTE: They are included, at the present time, many of them, and all of them that wish to come in. All that a country has to do is to show its willingness to trade with Canada, the United States and Great Britain. Only a few days ago a British statesman, speaking in the House of Commons at Westminster, I believe, said that it would not be necessary for Germany to get back her colonies to get raw materials because the raw materials of the British empire were always easy of access to Germany and Italy at the same prices as to other nations.

I am absolutely in favour of more and more trade agreements of this kind. When one looks at Canadian history over the past seventy-five years, with its succession of reciprocity defeats and revivals, it would almost seem that some force stronger than politics, perhaps some national selfishness, kept alive the idea that Canada and the United States should not engage with each other in profitable trade, but we are gradually coming to a better understanding on that question. The echoes of previous general elections in this country come back to my ears. In 1911, for instance, we had that fine motto from the Conservative party, "No truck or trade with the Yankees," and only last fall they were talking of Canada's annexation to the United States as a result of the present trade agreements. A man who is presently a member of the upper house, and a minister in the previous government, made the statement that the signing of these trade agreements was one of the surest steps towards the annexation of Canada to the United States. He was trying to revive the old cry of annexation to the United States.

I was pleased to hear the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) say this afternoon that we should be ready to trade with other nations on a fair basis. How far away this is from the policy of 1930, when the then leader of the Conservative party was going to blast his way into the world's markets. His powder must have been very wet, because he was not able to do any blasting that I know of. The present leader of the Conservative party mentioned, I think, that the Hon. Oliver Stanley said that some of the features of the present trade agreement were "eyewash." Well, I remember what was said about the Ottawa agreements by one of the ministers of the British government; he said it was humbug, speaking of some of the actions of the then Prime Minister of this country in 1932.

The hon. member also said that the tariff protects labour and industry. I still have to be shown when a tariff has really protected Canadian labour. As to protecting Canadian industry, I am absolutely open-minded on that score. There may have been stages in the life of some of our industries at which they needed some tariff protection, but no one will deny the statement that in very many instances protection has been used to fleece the Canadian people who have been compelled to pay high prices by industries which have hidden behind the tariff wall.

The leader of the opposition appears to have lost some of his red-blooded Canadianism when he says that we cannot do very much, we 11,000,000 people, for the peace of the world. Surely a nation which is fifth in the world as far as trade is concerned should have its voice heard and respected in the concert of nations, where it should be heard on behalf of peace and harmony. This agreement is one great step forward, showing not only that democracies can unite for the good of all, but that commercially speaking it is possible for nations to ally themselves for peaceful purposes. We have done a great deal for peace, and Canada should not take a back seat whether in the League of Nations or in the matter of trade agreements; for we are working nationally and internationally for the peace of the world, and appeasement between nations.

I believe the leader of the opposition was hardly fair to himself when he said this afternoon that we must have peace in our midst before we talk of universal peace. Surely he never meant that statement to be taken literally, because we have peace in this country, although there is some unemployment and some poverty to be dealt with, sometimes acerb discussions; but we are not suffering more than any other nation, and our condition in that respect is not any reason why we should avoid trying to the utmost by trade agreements and all kinds of activities to keep in the forefront ideas of international appeasement and the preservation of peace.

The leader of the opposition also expressed the opinion that Americans are much better traders than we are. Well, I have been quite a student of Great Britain, and I believe it would be difficult to drive a hard bargain against Britain. Old John Bull and Jack Canuck have the reputation of being good traders. We must always visualize this as practically a triangular trade agreement; it was made possible to some extent by the good offices and the willingness exerted not only by Canada but also by the United States and the United Kingdom.

As far as my own section of the country is concerned, we should be free traders in the full sense of the word, for the very good reason that we are primary producers. For every pound of our production we must of necessity find an outside market, and I maintain that the best markets we have are those of the United States and Great Britain. Some hon. members seem to deplore the fact that we are so close to the United States. Cannot they realize what Australia, for instance, would give to be in as close proximity to the United States as we are? After all, in a good many instances we are running on parallel lines in our culture, civilization and way of thinking; our production is almost identical so far as our industries are concerned; our financial and industrial activities operate on much the same footing; and we are in the happy situation not only of having an American outlook but of working within the orbit of Great Britain, within the commonwealth of nations, and acting as a liaison officer between Great Britain and the United States, as well as enjoying those two fine markets which we so greatly need.

I desire to say a few words about the seasonal tariff on fruits and vegetables. I want the Ontario and Quebec producers of these products to have a full measure of protection so long as it does not interfere with the cost of living of the pioneers in districts like northern Ontario and northern Quebec. I know of many instances where the change in the seasonal tariffs has been the cue to certain dealers to over-charge the people in our section of the country. I am not a free trader, and I believe that central Canada should enjoy a reasonable amount of tariff protection. Do hon. members know that in our section at the present time there is what we call a zone system? They may be surprised to know that when I am living in my home town I pay thirty-five cents a gallon for high test gas. In Ottawa you pay nineteen cents a gallon for the same kind of gas. While those who live here are paying on their overdrafts on current accounts six per cent, we in northern Ontario have to pay eight per cent. That sort of thing applies all along the line. A premium has been applied against us as far as our section is concerned. If we criticize high tariffs it is because we believe we are paying exorbitant prices and helping other sections of the country to our detriment. All we want is fair treatment.

I was astonished to hear from the leader of the opposition and from the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), that in dealing with items of trade between Canada and the United States we should not include our exports of gold; that gold is not a commodity. Did the hon. members by that mean that, like King Midas of old, who had the power to turn into gold everything he touched, and who, in spite of all that wealth, starved to death, we must start and accumulate gold? As far as northern Ontario and Canada are concerned, when we have a surplus of that commodity we must dispose of it in outside markets. We have been fortunate in that respect because a few years ago the President of the United States found it possible to increase the price of gold to $35 an ounce. That decision has meant the lengthening of the average life of the old gold mines of northern Ontario and the opening up of new ones, giving useful occupation to tens of thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands, of Canadian workers.

Mr. POOLE: Why does the United States keep its gold instead of exporting it?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRADETTE: I believe the hon. member who just interrupted me expects Canada to keep all that gold. Is that what he suggests?

Mr. POOLE: Well, we have not too much money.

Mr. BRADETTE: On that reasoning, we should keep all our wheat, all our meat, all our timber, all our manufactured production.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member who interrupted is out of order. He can put a question to the hon. member who has the floor, with his permission, but when he does so he should rise in his place.

Mr. BRADETTE: Speaking of this matter the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George answered thus, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) put this question to him, at page 477 of Hansard: "Is gold not a merchantable commodity?"

> Mr. Cahan: No, gold is not a merchantable commodity in the sense that iron or steel or wheat is.

Well, I repeat that this shows how short-sighted some members of the opposition have been in their opposition to and their arguments against this trade agreement. Further, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George said that we have exported to the United States $258,367,247 in gold bullion, and that this should not be included in our export trade. Does he not realize that our producers of gold, and now the government, are always trying to get the best market possible? Do hon. members who speak on this problem realize that in 1933 the Conservative government stopped the selling of gold to anyone but the Canadian government? Do they think for one moment that any Canadian government, whether past or present, has not always done its utmost to find the best markets in the world for Canadian gold? I repeat that with the surplus of production of this commodity we cannot keep it in this country any more than we can keep our excess supply of pulpwood or of sulphite or of grain. Will the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George say that we should send that gold to Germany, for instance? What price would Germany or Russia or the Scandinavian countries give for that gold? These are questions that must be very carefully considered when we are dealing with one of the largest wealth-producing industries in Canada, which has greatly helped the nation during these times of stress. The hon. gentleman said:

> But no trade agreement is necessary to induce foreign countries to accept bar gold. Gold is not an ordinary commercial commodity which is subject to customs duties, and gold has no place in trade statistics which are quoted to show the advantages of a reciprocal trade agreement between this country and the United States or between this country and any other country.

The same applies to all other production. We all know that in the past the United States government have used the tariff as an instrument for the protection of United States industrialists, and it did not always work for the prosperity of that nation. In my section of the country we must of necessity find outside markets; and the best market we have is in the United States. But the United States market is very sensitive. It is easy for that market to lose its equilibrium. I remember vividly two years ago before the increase in the cost of newsprint from $45 to $50 a ton, in my own constituency, in the whole of northern Ontario and northern Quebec, the newsprint and sulphite mills were working over-time shipping in some instances a whole trainload of newsprint in a day. But then the Americans began to buy more freely from the Scandinavian countries, and at the present time we have the sad spectacle of some of these mills running at only fifty per cent capacity, with the result that the prosperity which existed last year in that section is now gone. That makes a big difference to this country. We have no market in Great Britain for that commodity, nor have we in Germany or the other nations. Canada depends upon a freer interchange of commerce between this country and other nations of the world, because it must not be forgotten that we are on an export basis, and that freer interchange will prove beneficial to us in the long run. At the beginning of this session the leader of the opposition, speaking on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, made an allusion to the present trade agreement. He had this to say:

> There have been perhaps more or less sub rosa, many complaints against this treaty, but the industries of the country may have been too frightened to express their opinions about it. Some of them appear to think it would be more or less unpatriotic to express an opinion against the treaty.

I never doubted the patriotism of our industrialists, our manufacturers, but I do know that when their interests are affected they are certainly outspoken and it does not take them very long to express themselves.

If any one will take the trouble to read the various opinions which have been expressed by the industrialists of Canada with respect to the trade agreement, he will realize that that agreement has been wonderfully received by every business organization, by every industrialist in the country. Some of them refer to it as the 1939 model trade agreement, one that will be beneficial to Canada as a whole. Apparently the industrialists of Canada realize, just as those in the United States do, that at times it is necessary for them to make sacrifices. It is not necessary in this instance, and where it may seem that temporarily the trade agreement will not be satisfactory, a little reflection will suggest that in the long run it will prove beneficial to every section of our population. Many opinions have been quoted, from newspapers and various other sources, to show that the agreement should be acceptable to the dominion as a whole.

The opposition that was expressed in this house earlier in the session was more pronounced than it is at the present time. Nearly fourteen months ago, when the announcement was made by the government of a three-way agreement, the Conservative opposition thought they had something to work upon such as they had in 1911, and Mr. Bennett, when speaking in Halifax, tried to stir up the people. He told them that they must fight that agreement from the drop of the hat; that the trade agreements which the government contemplated meant that we were selling Canada's birthright. My hon. friends, however, sensing public opinion, realized that the people were in favour of the agreement; and in his speech this afternoon the leader of the opposition showed that he was fully conversant with the views of industrialists, farmers, primary producers and the Canadian people as a whole. He knows they are practically all in favour of this trade agreement between Canada and the United States, and that to oppose it would not be a popular move on his part.

Some people sometimes seem to believe that the government has no right to appeal to sentiment in support of agreements of this kind. Sometimes they are baffled by the attitude of the government. They always remain in the realm of hard facts, never considering what might be the outcome of any action taken. But I believe that this government should be sincerely commended for the work it has accomplished in the last four years, and particularly in this instance, in bringing together the two great English-speaking democracies. Canada has played a great role in that achievement. The leader of the opposition said this afternoon that in some parts of Great Britain the people were opposed to the trade agreement on the ground that it called for too great a sacrifice. The economists of London and Great Britain, however, had this to say, that even the briefest study of the terms of the agreement is enough to show how little could have been done without the readiness of Canada to offer her generous cooperation, and that Canadian and British business men generally should be gratified at the part the dominion has played in effecting the treaty.

So far as I am concerned, I do not wish to see any harm result from the treaty. I do not want to see any of our minor or major industries adversely affected. But I believe that every Canadian industrialist after making a close scrutiny of the three-way agreement will realize that in the near future, if not immediately, the result will be beneficial to Canada. In our section of the country we are ready and willing to make any sacrifices that are necessary to the well-being of the country, and if in regard to vegetables and fruits we are paying fifty per cent more than the people in the older sections are called upon to pay, we are willing to make that sacrifice, but we do not want that to be used to the detriment of our people and for the purpose of providing profits.

It has been suggested that the textile industry will suffer from the present agreement. I have studied the situation carefully from that angle and have looked into the retail trade in my own locality. I have spoken with some industrialists and they do not believe that particular industry as a whole will suffer.

I do not believe that the present discussion will be as long or as strenuous as we at first expected, for the simple reason that the Canadian people are an infallible political barometer. They have looked into the situation from all angles and have thoroughly analyzed it, and they realize that although the agreement may not be perfect in some respects, although in some instances it may have to be amended from time to time, the government through the agreement has been working for the welfare of the Canadian people.

It has done more, however. It has continued the policy of appeasement in the international situation. We see that it is possible for nations with diversified interests to come together in matters that are so important. Sometimes trade is the cause of war between nations. Trade may cause friction. But, unlike the leader of the opposition, I do not decry the fact that there has been over a century of peace between Canada and the United States. I see no reason why we should not be proud to mention that fact, and to reiterate it, because it is an evidence that the nations have found it to be to their mutual advantage to live peaceably side by side. It is a much happier sight to see the border between Canada and the United States practically unprotected; it is much better than if we had on the one side something like the Maginot line and on the other the Siegfried line. Our two nations live side by side, each benefiting and respecting the other, and I would never fear what one of the senators from the province of Quebec mentioned the other day, for example; that is, our annexation to the United States. It is possible for us to develop more fully within our own borders, and as we achieve a greater understanding of the mentality of the people with whom we are so closely affiliated we shall slowly but surely create a civilization of our own, on which our proximity to the United States will leave its imprint.

In my own name and that of the people whom I represent I want to express appreciation of the fine work that was accomplished by the Prime Minister of this country when, immediately after his return to power in 1935, he announced the negotiation of a trade agreement between Canada and the United States. Again last fall nearly all the citizens in my section were equally happy because of the action taken by the government in again negotiating a trade agreement with that republic. As far as those people in my section are concerned, it will be absolutely impossible for any opposition effectively to criticize those agreements, which in my view represent great amity and understanding between the three nations involved, and present an example to all the world.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, in 1936, during the debate on the 1935 agreement, I expressed the belief that there would be very few people in Canada who, of their own knowledge, could give a comprehensive opinion with regard to that agreement, because its implications were so wide that time alone would tell. If that was the case then, it is more than ever the case now. Not only have we the terms of this agreement, to use the Prime Minister's words of the day before yesterday, added to those of the 1935 agreement, we have also the other agreement, with which we are not primarily connected, between the United Kingdom and the United States. Then we have the further fact that the concessions we give under this agreement automatically go to thirty or forty other nations whose agreements contain the most favoured nation clause, and from whom we receive nothing in return. In addition, there is also the provision for the removal of the 3 per cent excise tax, the implications of which cannot be followed because of the complexity of the matter in its present position. Again time will tell.

This afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) used that exact phrase, that time would tell, and he believes that it is telling. As his reason for so believing he gave the January figures having to do with trade. I do not take that as a proper basis on which to measure the agreement, because last fall we heard from all quarters that various transactions were being held up waiting for January 1, when this agreement would come into force. So it will be interesting to see whether the imports and exports in February, March and subsequent months bear out the contention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In my opinion, however, the trade figures as between Canada and the United States over the last three years have told at least part of the story. A week or two ago the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) directed attention to the export and import figures between Canada and the United States. At that time the hon. member was dealing with what he considered a mistake which is now made, in including the export figures of gold. At the moment I am not interested in that feature, but it is quite evident that if you are going to compare export figures over the years that have passed you must compare comparable things, and if until 1935 the gold export figures were not included, certainly they must be deducted now.

I want to direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that for the calendar year 1935 Canada's exports to the United States amounted to $261,655,372. With the improvement in world trade in 1936 those figures rose to $333,916,949. Again in 1937 those figures showed a slight increase, to $360,012,143. Then, because Canada was feeling the reflection of the set-back in the United States, they fell off so that for the calendar year 1938 our exports amounted to $270,461,189. Now I want to look at the import figures. In the calendar year 1935, before the 1935 agreement had any effect, we bought from the United States $312,416,604 worth of goods. Those figures improved in 1936 to $369,141,513, and again they showed a notable improvement in 1937, to $490,504,978. Then, I assume for the same reason that our export figures fell, in 1938 they dropped to $424,754,993. In other words, in 1938 our export figures dropped back almost to those of 1935, but our imports remained $110,000,000 higher than those of 1935. So to that extent it appears to me that the benefits which were derived from the 1935 agreement were benefits to the United States rather than to Canada; and to the extent that this $110,000,000 represented commodities which Canada could and did produce, to that extent we made employment in Canada so much more difficult.

There is another consideration to which I wish to allude because it is another thing that makes it so difficult to measure the implications of this agreement. I refer to the spirit in which commercial interests in the United States will carry out the terms of this agreement. I do not wish to be misunderstood; I am casting no slur on the commercial integrity of another country, but I am drawing attention to the difficulty that our business men have encountered in the past in carrying out business transactions with that country. We know of so many cases of shipments, covering everything from silk dresses to tank loads of heavy chemicals, which have been sold and moved towards the border with the expectation that they would enter that country under a certain tariff item. They have been held up at the border; and when finally admitted, after incurring demurrage charges, after the business deal had been queered, the question was submitted to the tariff board of the United States and a ruling less favourable to Canada was delivered.

Two or three years ago a shipload of lumber left Vancouver for one of the Pacific coast ports. On arrival at that port the lumber cargo was refused. Eventually it was accepted under protest. Then that matter was carried through the courts in that country for two or three years, before the matter was finally adjusted. We had the famous instance only last fall of the regulation which was imposed, entailing the marking of every piece of lumber. Our lumber had been selling in the markets of the United States. It had come into competition with United States lumber. That competition was, to an extent, resented, and all sorts of methods were resorted to in order to make it more difficult for trade to be carried on in exporting from Canada under the terms of the 1935 agreement—to such an extent that eventually a regulation was passed making it necessary to mark every stick of lumber.

I know that regulation has now been removed under the terms of this agreement, through an arrangement whereby the agreement was arrived at. But the point I am making is, even if that particular method can no longer be adopted, can we really go ahead in the belief that the spirit of this agreement will be carried out in accordance with our understanding of the spirit of commercial dealings? It is these things that make it almost impossible for anyone to give a general opinion as to the effects of this agreement.

On all occasions when trade agreements come up for discussion we are faced with the charge that we do not wish to make trade agreements. On the other hand the view we hold, a view which was corroborated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other day, is that the Liberal likes to make an agreement. And we are of the opinion that he likes making an agreement so much that he is ready to let it go through for a price which in our opinion Canada is not able to pay. We are perfectly ready and anxious to make agreements, but they must be agreements which by their terms commend themselves to us. The Liberal charges us with believing in economic nationalism. Well, if we believe in economic nationalism we have taken the most extraordinary way of showing it. I say that because in the case of the Ottawa agreements we succeeded in extending Canada's commerce, her buying and selling, far beyond the coasts of Canada, and we did increase trade with the countries of the commonwealth. The very making of those agreements resulted in the making of scores of trade agreements between the nations of the commonwealth and foreign countries. And there is no doubt whatsoever that the making of those agreements was a factor in inducing the United States to make trade agreements.

She of course had surrounded herself by a perfectly frightful tariff, a tariff passed by her congress, and one which could be altered only by congress. So long as that tariff stood, the United States could not make trade agreements. She never expected the Ottawa agreements to be the success they were, and she awoke with a shock to the fact that she was no longer able to enter the United Kingdom market and make use of it for the removal of her surplus. She desired to get back into the United Kingdom market. If anyone wishes to talk about economic nationalism, I would ask this question: Is there a country in the world which has been a greater exponent of economic nationalism than the United States, with her successive increases in tariff. Tariffs were raised so high that she had surrounded herself with a barrier over which even she could not trade.

So, after two attempts, the President of the United States received power to make trade agreements with other countries. He was permitted to cut by 50 per cent the items in the Hawley-Smoot tariff. There were certain other restrictions, but that is the main one. He was empowered in 1934 to reduce that tariff. Immediately the statistical officers of Canada and the United States proceeded to delve into the figures and facts of trade, and to lay the foundation for the setting up of an agreement between the two countries. A draft of that agreement was ready in the summer of 1935. But when it became apparent to the late administration that the concessions the United States expected Canada to give were concessions which in our opinion Canada should not give, the late administration declined to make the treaty. Of course, after the victory of the Liberals in the fall of 1935, the agreement was signed, and since then we have been testing the results.

Still the Liberals use the argument against us that we do not wish to make agreements. But, Mr. Speaker, surely the difference between us is just this: The price Canada has to pay. That agreement was for three years. The period of three years has expired, and we now have a revision. It was put over with such paeans of praise that when its terms were announced the public read nothing but columns of eulogies in the press of the country. To such an extent did that obtain that the industries affected began to dig into the matter of the agreement to find out where the snag was that should need such a gas attack to put it over. And gradually industry has learned what this agreement means to them.

Just as it is not easy for me or any other individual member to take a general view of the whole picture and form an opinion, so there is an opportunity in the house for hon. members with particular knowledge of certain industries in certain parts of Canada to take part in the debate and to give us the benefit of their wisdom.

I happen to have a little knowledge with respect to two industries in southern British Columbia with which the people I represent are very closely connected, namely the production of fruit and the production of vegetables. In the treatment of tariff matters in connection with fruit and vegetables the Liberal has ever been unfriendly. For some reason or another, which I have never been able to understand, the Liberal government has it in wrong for fruits and vegetables. I consider that this agreement is the third serious blow the Liberal government has given those two industries in the last ten years, and I am at a loss to understand why they should have done it.

Continually Liberals boast of the fact that a Liberal Minister of Finance created the dumping clause. What good was that, when they never used it? In 1926, when for a short time we held office, we put the dumping clause to work; for the first time the Canadian producer had the benefit of the Canadian domestic market during the period of his production, and I defy any hon. member to point to the harm which resulted to the consumer. The Liberals carried on that method of protecting the industry for two years. Then, in 1928, they wiped out all the values for duty, and the flood started again. The reason they took this action on that occasion was that the free trade section of the Liberal party, this party which the Prime Minister told us the other day was a unit in its actions, became so noisy in the councils of the government that the government removed those values for duty, and the markets of our producers were again wide open to the glut from the United States.

I think it is quite evident that the Liberal government realized that they had gone too far; for when the 1930 budget was prepared, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) introduced into it a new feature, for which some at least of the fruit and vegetable growers' associations had asked for a considerable time. There was the general tariff of 30 per cent on vegetables and 20 per cent on fruit, and, besides that, there was introduced item after item of minimum seasonal specific duties. The reason for that introduction was that towards the end of the production period in one of the states of the union, when it was extremely desirable to them to get rid of the surplus of their crop, looking across to Canada they saw there an excellent place to send it, unprotected as it was, and they were ready to dispose of it at prices which were next to nothing. It is obvious that 30 per cent of next to nothing is still nearer to nothing, and left alone it was no protection whatever. Hence this addition of minimum seasonal specific duties, below which the tariff could not drop. They were helpful as far as they went. But the Liberals would have nothing to do with the dumping clause.

When the Conservatives came into office again for five years, the values for duty were imposed, the seasonal tariff was maintained, and there was far better protection for the fruit and vegetable producers of all Canada than they had had before.

Then this government, that likes making treaties, made the 1935 one. They wiped out the seasonal duties and reduced the tariff to 15 per cent. True, they made use of the values for duty, although to a lesser extent, because they were dropped to 80 per cent of what they had been. I am quite ready to acknowledge the work of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) in carrying out that policy; I have heard him say that he does not approve it in principle but that no better way of accomplishing the desired end had yet been attained. It is not an easy piece of work to decide the dates at which those values for duty should go into operation or be taken off, because the areas in Canada where these commodities are grown are pretty widespread and vary in their seasons. That was blow number two.

Now we have blow number three. In blow number three we have had the values for duty reduced again. They have been removed altogether from certain commodities; the period has been reduced, and the three per cent excise is gone. On top of all that we have had one-third cut off the preferences in the United Kingdom market. How the Minister of National Revenue could go to the Annapolis valley and tell the apple growers there that in his opinion the reduction in the preferences would not hurt them, that in his opinion the revised agreement would help the fruit industry, and that the cut in the preference was arrived at as a reasonable arrangement between the British, the United States, and the Canadian fruit grower, passes my understanding, because Nova Scotia with her export of barrelled apples to the United Kingdom benefited greatly by that preference. Before 1932 she met in those United Kingdom markets very large quantities of United States apples, the surplus of the United States grower, and but a small fraction of it, which the United States producer was ready to dispose of at bargain prices. And after the arrangement was made for the preference, there was a steadying of that United Kingdom market of which we in British Columbia, selling boxed apples, also had the benefit. It was a matter of great surprise to us that in the years following 1932 the United States growers were able to send into the United Kingdom market such very considerable quantities of boxed apples. I am dealing now with the boxed apple trade only. Let me give the figures of those shipments:

Canadian and United States exports of boxed apples to United Kingdom

Year	Canada	United States
	boxes	boxes
1932-33	1,802,464	2,419,100
1933-34	2,007,146	2,183,000
1934-35	1,625,570	2,095,100
1935-36	2,181,395	2,401,600
1936-37	1,719,586	1,521,600

And I was surprised not to be able to get the figures for 1937-38.

But what did that mean? Our apples which are sold by the box are grown under exactly the same conditions as in the states to the south of us. We know their taxes; we know their irrigation rates; we know their orchard costs; and all of these are similar to ours. We know their freight rates and brokerage. Breaking down the four shillings and six pence per hundredweight, which was our benefit in the United Kingdom market, into terms of boxes of apples, it amounted to forty-four cents a box. It was patent to us that without assistance of some sort the United States producer could not possibly be shipping in those quantities to the United Kingdom and taking forty-four cents a box less than we got. It was a great puzzle for some time how this was being done. But gradually it leaked out that the grower of apples in the Pacific states had been receiving federal assistance. It is not in the form of one definite subsidy paid, but apparently it reaches him under two or three different schemes that we know as the alphabetical schemes in the United States. But there it is; he is getting subsidy help. They made no bones about it last fall when these treaties were being discussed. Their growers talked to our growers; their papers referred to the fact that it did not very much matter to them what the two countries did with regard to this preference, they yet had the subsidy. The subsidy is referred to in the trade papers and the ordinary papers in the Pacific coast states, and there is no doubt that they are receiving federal help, whereas of course we do not. The only way, therefore, that the United States producer can benefit from this alteration, this giving up on our part of one-third of the preference, is that he will still further enlarge the quantity of apples sent into that market.

Hon. members who were here in 1932 will remember the care with which it was explained in this house that these preferences had been arrived at after detailed careful discussion between the United Kingdom, Canada and the other dominions. In this particular matter the other dominions, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, do not enter because their shipping season is different from ours. But here we are, three countries, the United Kingdom, Canada and the United States, all harvesting their apples at the same period of the year. Hitherto we have had the shelter of a preference, and by arrangements between Canada and the United Kingdom we have seen to it that various grades and sizes have been such as to conform with similar grades in the United Kingdom, so they have been quite favourably disposed towards the shipment of our apples

But now we are going to find in these auction markets a tendency for the United States grower to return once more to his dumping habits and to be ready to receive pittances for his surplus apples, which will set the price for us and for the United Kingdom.

It was commonly reported last year that the government, in approaching this matter, believed that only two constituencies in this country were affected, and it was stated—I do not know how true the gossip is—that they would be very sorry to lose the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Certainly would.

Mr. STIRLING: And one other riding affected was one in British Columbia that they scarcely expected to win. But I would remind them that it is a much more serious matter than that. There are thirty-five ridings in Canada in which apples are grown commercially, and if we are prevented from making use of the export benefits of the United Kingdom market, those apples which we cannot export will tend to back up on the Canadian domestic market, resulting in smaller prices: Every apple grower who sells commercially in Canada will feel the pinch; and if and when he feels the pinch, this government will also feel it.

I do not understand, as I said just now, why the Liberal government have again and again put this load on fruits and vegetables. There are other hon. members in a position to take up the story with regard to vegetables, and I shall have little to say about it; but it is a most important factor in southern British Columbia.

The Prime Minister tells us that the New Brunswick potato grower is pleased with the result of this agreement. My information is quite contrary to that, and I know that the potato producer and the potato industry in British Columbia are certainly not pleased with it; for whereas we let United States potatoes in free, there is no countervailing nature to that item. We have to pay; if we ever did succeed in shipping into the United States.

I would remind hon. members of this fact, which must always be borne in mind when we are dealing with these perishable products. Canada lies north of the United States. The United States from Texas up to Michigan is producing these successive waves of similar vegetables, and as they draw to the end of their season for whatever vegetable you are considering, they desire to get it off their domestic market so as to free that domestic market for the next vegetable coming along, and Canada is so handy as the dumping ground for these vegetables. It is therefore useless to point out to the fruit grower and the vegetable grower that the United States have made some small concession on certain varieties which we might be able to ship into the United States, because our northern country does not ship vegetables into a southern country.

The Prime Minister in his speech used these words in reference to this matter:

> United States fresh fruits and vegetables are made available on easier terms to Canadian consumers in those seasons when domestic products are not on the market—

I have often stated in this house that I am not interested in what the tariff is outside the period of our production. He goes on:

> —while the Canadian fruit and vegetable grower retains his domestic market in his own producing season.

I maintain that this is a totally inadequate statement after one has studied the terms of this agreement. I also maintain that during the years when tariff protection was given on fruits and vegetables, the consumer has not suffered because there has been ample competition within Canadian production to see to it that these perishable commodities should be sold, and not held for higher prices. But I would also remind the house that if the day comes when the Liberal government, continuing to deliver these blows at the fruit and vegetable industry, succeeds in either destroying this industry in Canada or so reducing it as to make it almost impotent, the consumer will suffer. Once you take away Canadian production and the Canadian domestic market, the result will be that the United States will no longer look upon Canada as a dumping ground but will have arrived at that vision which Mr. Taft saw in 1911 when he so greatly desired the market of the great Canadian northwest.

On motion of Mr. Ilsley the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

Monday, February 20, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—CHANGE OF PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

> That the name of Mr. Dupuis be substituted for that of Mr. Dussault on the standing committee on public accounts.

That the name of Mr. Bertrand (Laurier) be substituted for that of Mr. Blais on the standing committee on public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

BANK OF CANADA

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT AND STATEMENT OF ACCOUNTS TO BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table the annual report to the Minister of Finance and the statements of accounts of the Bank of Canada for the year ended December 31, 1938. In order to give the opportunity, to which I referred previously, of officers of the bank appearing before a committee, I move:

That the annual report of the Bank of Canada be referred to the committee on banking and commerce.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I suppose the reference to the standing committee will not prevent allusions to or discussions of that report when we consider the budget?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not given consideration to the point raised by the hon. member, as to whether or not the reference of the report to a standing committee of the house might preclude a discussion of Bank of Canada affairs in the debate on the budget. I realize the point is an important one, I do not know what the rules are in that regard, but certainly it was not my intention to shut off discussion in the house by referring the report to a committee. The reference is solely for the purpose of enabling the House of Commons, through one of its important committees, to have before it the officers of the bank, so that information may be extracted in reference to all matters of governmental finance and the general economy of the country. I certainly would not like this reference to a committee to be taken as limiting discussion in the house.

Mr. CAHAN: I think all hon. members approve the motives of the Minister of Finance in making the reference, but I suggest there should be a clear understanding that, the reference being made, we shall not be precluded from discussing other financial issues arising to a certain extent out of the report which is being referred.

Mr. DUNNING: Right; that is understood.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

PEACEFUL PICKETING BY MEMBERS OF LABOUR UNIONS NOT TO BE DEEMED UNLAWFUL

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 26, to amend the criminal code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MacNEIL: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend section 87 of the criminal code so as to provide that an assembly of members of labour unions doing peaceful picketing shall not be deemed an unlawful assembly, as defined in the section. It provides also for an amendment to section 501 of the criminal code, to make the subsection dealing with peaceful picketing clearer and more comprehensive.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PENSION AND INSURANCE FUNDS FOR EMPLOYEES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 27, to amend the Loan Companies Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a minor amendment affecting the powers of companies created under the act to institute pension funds for their employees.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PENSION AND INSURANCE FUNDS FOR EMPLOYEES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 28, to amend the Trust Companies Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. DUNNING: The explanation in connection with this bill is identical with that given for the previous one. In order to avoid the confusion which is illustrated by questions which have been directed to me by hon. members, perhaps I should mention that the Loan Companies Act to which amendment is proposed by the previous bill has nothing to do with small loan legislation. That is a different thing entirely.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

RESIGNATION OF JAMES Y. MURDOCH FROM BOARD OF DIRECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). Is it true, as has been reported in a number of newspapers, that James Y. Murdoch has resigned from the directorate of the Canadian National Railways, and, if so, what are the reasons given for his resignation?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Murdoch's resignation was handed in a few days ago. The reason given was his failure to agree with his fellow directors on a matter of internal management. I shall be glad to table at the next sitting the correspondence which was exchanged.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

OPERATIONS AND SELLING POLICY—TABLING OF WEEKLY REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). In view of the very important statement made on Thursday last by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), in which he said that the Canadian wheat board had a loss of $48,000,000, would the minister make a statement to this house in the near future with respect to the board's operations and their selling policy? Will the minister table as early as possible the weekly reports as required by section 8, subsection (e) of the Canadian Wheat Board Act from August 1, 1938, to February 17, 1939, and all subsequent reports as they come forward? Would the minister also table the final report of the Canadian wheat board on the holdings acquired—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Questions such as these should be put on the order paper, and an opportunity given to the government to answer.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. PERLEY: I am just asking the minister if he will table these reports, to which we are entitled.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am afraid I am not equal to the task of remembering all the questions asked, so as to make a categorical reply to my hon. friend. In fact I am under the impression that some of the questions he has asked are contained in his notice of motion, which will come up in a few minutes. However, I shall take note of what appears on Hansard and endeavour to meet his wishes so far as may be possible and advisable.

Mr. PERLEY: If I may just conclude the last part of my question; I was asking the minister to table the final report of the operations of the wheat board and the disposition of the wheat taken over from Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited.

Mr. EULER: That is already in the hon. member's notice of motion, and I shall answer it in a moment.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in order that the record may be correct. The hon. member in his question intimates that I stated that the loss would be $48,000,000. My statement was that if the amount of wheat handled up to date was to be taken into consideration, and an estimate made of the amount of money which will go to the farmers on a basis of 20 cents per bushel, then the total which goes to the farmers will amount to $48,000,000. But as to what the loss will be, that will be impossible to declare until the wheat has all been dealt with.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED ESTABLISHMENT OF ANTI-SABOTAGE ORGANIZATION IN ONTARIO

On the orders of the day.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this morning the Canadian press carried a rather curious news item, about which I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). Apparently this item emanates from the attorney general of Ontario. The article reads in part:

> Establishment in Ontario of a powerful, mobile anti-sabotage organization, to be built from the provincial and municipal police, cooperating with the royal Canadian mounted, and equipped for immediate operation in the event of war or some other dire emergency is now well under way.

The gentleman who is said to be in charge of this organization is "reporting not only to his immediate superior, Attorney General Conant, but indirectly to a secret committee which has been formed at Ottawa under the Department of National Defence." I should like to ask three questions: (a) Is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police under the direction of the Department of National Defence? (b) What is this secret committee which is under the Department of National Defence? (c) Under what authority is this powerful, mobile anti-sabotage organization operating?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Like my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), I am afraid my memory is not good enough to enable me to remember all the points contained in my hon. friend's query. All I can say is that the mounted police are still under the control of the Minister of Justice. As far as the rest of his question is concerned, the only thing I can make public is that there is the fullest cooperation, and I am glad of it, between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the provincial forces in all the provinces of Canada, to maintain order in any case of emergency. All precautions are and will be taken for that purpose. I hope it will never be necessary to use the measures of precaution which have been taken, but I think it is a good thing to take these precautions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the minister what is this secret committee which is said to be operating under the Department of National Defence and to which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police report?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There does not seem to be much secrecy about the committee if my hon friend knows about it. I repeat that there is cooperation between the departments of the government for the maintenance of order.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT—BARTMAN DAM

Mr. QUELCH:

1. What was the total cost of the Bartman dam, built under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act?

2. What was the percentage of local labour used in the construction of this dam in 1937 and 1938 respectively?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. $34,503.58.

2. 1937—Seventy-five per cent; 1938—Seventy-five per cent.

*SASKATCHEWAN OATS DEAL

Mr. PERLEY:

Did the federal government pay all or any portion of the loss sustained in the Saskatchewan oats deal which was investigated by Mr. Justice Turgeon?

Mr. EULER: No.

ONTARIO FARM SETTLEMENT SCHEME

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. Is the government aware that the Minister of Public Welfare and Municipal Affairs of Ontario has announced a new farm settlement scheme to rehabilitate families on relief?

2. If so, what share of the cost of such plan will be borne by: (a) the dominion; (b) the province; (c) the municipalities?

3. What is the nature and extent of the scheme proposed?

Mr. ROGERS: Order in council P.C. 306, dated February 9, 1939, authorizes that the Minister of Labour on behalf of the dominion enter into an agreement with the province of Ontario in respect to the rehabilitation upon farms within the said province of certain unemployed persons for the period of January 1, 1939, to March 31, 1939, inclusive. The order in council referred to and the draft agreement authorized thereby were tabled in the House of Commons on February 15, 1939.

MIGRATION OF CANADIANS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. HYNDMAN:

What was the average number of Canadians who migrated to the United States during the years from 1921 to 1930, and what number so migrated each year during the years 1931 to 1938?

Mr. CRERAR: There are no records kept in the immigration branch that would give the information desired by the hon. member, so that the question cannot be answered.

VEGETABLE OIL IMPORTS

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. How much crude vegetable oil was imported into Canada during the years 1936, 1937, and 1938?

2. How much oil for domestic consumption was imported into Canada during the same years?

Mr. EULER:

1. and 2. Imports for Consumption

		Calendar Years
		1936	1937	1938
Oils, vegetable, for food—
Cocoanut oil, n.o.p., edible	Gal.	43,244	31,578	33,212
Cotton seed oil, refined, edible, for canning fish	Gal.	153,594	154,979	128,500
Cotton seed oil, n.o.p., edible	Gal.	33,563	12,787	10,869
Olive oil, n.o.p., edible	Gal.	238,985	253,549	346,099
Peanut oil, n.o.p., edible	Gal.	46,786	55,591	66,778
Soya bean oil, n.o.p., edible	Gal.	103,075	54,382	96,877
Oils, vegetable, not food—
Castor oil	Gal.	229,169	251,778	213,852
Chinawood oil	Cwt.	54,785	73,888	43,682
Cocoanut oil, not edible, for manufacture of soap	Gal.	2,376,758	3,516,094	2,388,047
Cocoanut oil, not edible, for manufacture of refined cocoanut oil	Gal.	1,292,026	1,499,586	1,438,163
Cotton seed and crude cotton seed oil for the manufacture of refined cotton seed oil and meal	Cwt.	190,702	190,167	140,419
Essential oil, n.o.p., including bay oil and otto of limes	Lb.	647,113	650,985	601,614
Eucalyptus oil	Lb.	25,168	20,190	17,621
Flaxseed or linseed oil, raw or boiled	Cwt.	29,203	42,482	13,753
Foots, being the refuse of the cotton seed or olives after the oil has been pressed out	Cwt.	30,172	45,443	37,745
Olive oil for manufacturing soap or tobacco or for canning fish or for use in the processing of textile fibres, including the finishing of fabrics	Gal.	140,391	60,470	54,764
Oiticica oil	Lb.	....	28,766	....
Palm and palm kernel oil, unbleached or bleached, not edible and shea butter; palm and palm kernel, not edible, for the manufacture of soap	Cwt.	486,456	652,197	703,601
Peanut oil, crude, for refining for edible purposes	Cwt.	600,109	668,739	935,133
Peanut oil for the manufacture of soap or for canning fish	Gal.	478,353	1,170,589	941,278
Peppermint oil	Lb.	39,821	31,075	37,511
Perilla oil, when for use in Canadian manufactures	Lb.	1,578,933	5,208,564	5,685,104
Rape seed oil, crude or refined	Gal.	30,416	89,908	72,735
Rape seed oil, blown, for manufacturing purposes	Gal.	17,895	91	....
Rosin oil	Gal.	84,778	167,222	89,268
Sesame seed oil	Gal.	34,845	938	2,916
Soya bean oil for manufacturing soap	Gal.	107,020	264,169	71,972
Vegetable oil, n.o.p., not edible	Gal.	223,027	233,785	203,290

OTTAWA PUBLIC BUILDINGS—STEEL INSPECTION IN COURSE OF CONSTRUCTION

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. Was any company appointed in connection with steel inspection of fabrication and erection of the new post office building and the new supreme court building?

2. If so, what company or companies were awarded such contract?

3. What are the business addresses of such company or companies?

4. What are the home addresses of the inspectors who performed such inspection work?

Mr. CARDIN: The inspection of fabrication and erection of steel in the construction of the new post office and new supreme court building is under the control of the architects engaged for the preparation of plans and supervision of these works.

[Mr. Hyndman.]

PORT CREDIT, ONT.,—HARBOUR FACILITIES

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. What work, if any, was done by way of improving harbour facilities at Port Credit, Ontario, during the year 1938?

2. What was the total cost of said work?

3. Will the government consider doing further harbour improvement work at Port Credit during the year 1939?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. None.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Matter will have consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. Did the conical buoy situated near the entrance to the harbour at Port Credit, Ontario, suffer any damage during the year 1938?

2. If so, what damage was sustained?

3. Has the said buoy been repaired, and, if so, what has been the cost of such repairs?

4. If the said buoy has not been repaired, when will such repairs be completed?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Broke from its moorings and was washed ashore.

2, 3, and 4: Damage, if any, not yet determined awaiting examination of the buoy on the opening of navigation 1939, when, if warranted, any repairs necessary will be made.

WOMEN IN CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. How many women were employed in industry in Canada during the years 1929, 1935 and 1938?

2. What percentage would this number of women be of the total number of persons employed in industry?

Mr. EULER:

1. Number of women employed in the manufacturing industries of Canada:

	No.
1929	144,032
1935	126,661
1936	132,973

2. Percentage of female employees to total employees in the manufacturing industries of Canada:

	p.c.
1929	21·6
1935	22·8
1936	22·4

Note.—Figures for 1937 will not be available for a few weeks yet.

BREN GUN CONTRACT INQUIRY

Mr. HOMUTH:

1. On what date did the Prime Minister receive the report of Mr. Justice Davis on the Bren gun enquiry?

2. On what date was that report sent to the king's printer for printing?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. December 30, 1938.

2. January 6, 1939.

QUEBEC CITY MAIL COLLECTION

Mr. HEON:

1. What is the name of the person or firm who holds the contract for the collection of mail in Quebec city?

2. What is the amount of the contract?

3. What is the date of such contract?

4. What person or persons held the contract previous to the present contractor?

5. Did the previous contractor fulfill his contract? If not, why?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Alphonse Drolet.

2. $10,213.57 per annum.

3. From September 1, 1937, to August 31, 1941.

4. U. Ste. Marie.

5. No—His contract was cancelled on account of unsatisfactory service.

INSURANCE PREMIUMS

Mr. FLEMING:

Has the government any knowledge, through the Department of Finance, that the insurance companies doing business in Canada have raised, or are contemplating raising, the premiums on new insurance?

Mr. DUNNING: In connection with this question one would require a better definition in regard to the type of insurance dealt with. There are very many types of insurance. Perhaps my hon. friend would allow the question to stand with a view to redrafting it.

Question stands.

TRAVEL BUREAU SERVICE—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. BARBER:

1. What amount of vote to Canadian travel bureau service has been expended in British Columbia during the years 1938 and 1939?

2. Has any contribution been made during the same periods in the nature of grant, or travelling or other expenses, to any tourist organization, hotel or person in British Columbia?

3. If so, to whom, and what amounts?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The appropriation of the Canadian Travel Bureau is not expended in or upon any particular province, but is devoted to an extensive program of newspaper and magazine advertising designed to place the scenic and other tourist attractions of the dominion before the public of other countries, especially the people of the United States and Great Britain, also to make the people of the various Canadian provinces better acquainted with the vacation possibilities of sister provinces. In this advertising and publicity the province of British Columbia receives due prominence and the Canadian Travel Bureau works in close co-operation with provincial and local travel bureaus.

2. No.

3. Answered by No. 2.

DOMINION GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES, PERMANENT AND TEMPORARY

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. What was the total number of persons in the employ of the dominion government as at 31st March, 1938: (a) permanent; (b) temporary?

2. How many of such (1) permanent, and (2) temporary employees are receiving: (a) less than $500 per year; (b) $500 but less than $1,000; (c) $1,000 but less than $1,500; (d) $1,500 but less than $2,000; (e) $2,000 but less than $3,000; (f) $3,000 but less than $4,000; (g) $4,000 but less than $5,000; (h) $5,000 but less than $6,000; (i) $6,000 but less than $7,000; (j) $7,000 but less than $9,000; (k) $9,000 but less than $12,000; (l) $12,000 but less than $15,000; (m) $15,000 and over?

3. How many of these persons are employed for only part of the year?

Mr. MacINNIS: It has been drawn to my attention that to answer the question as it appears on the order paper would involve a great deal of work in compiling information in which I am not particularly interested. I should like the question withdrawn or dropped in order that I may redraft it.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

STATIONARY ENGINEERS AND FIREMEN

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. What are the hours worked by stationary engineers and firemen engaged in connection with the heating of buildings under: (a) Department of Agriculture; (b) fuel research laboratories; (c) Justice department, including penitentiaries, etc.; (d) Mines and Resources department; (e) the royal mint; (f) National Defence department; (g) Pensions and National Health department; (h) Post Office Department, including all buildings under its supervision; (i) Public Printing and Stationery department; (j) Royal Canadian Mounted Police; (k) the Department of Transport; (l) the Bank of Canada; (m) government house; (n) other government buildings where heating is done under the control or supervision of engineers and firemen?

2. What wages are paid such men, and is the scale graded according to horse-power or size of plant or according to the class of certificate of engineers or firemen?

3. Is there a zoning as to hours or rate of pay? If so, in what districts?

4. Is there a fair wage scale set for this class of employee? If so, what are the details?

5. What is the civil service commission rate, grading and hours for such employees?

6. Is order in council P.C. 670 observed in each case with regard to such civil servants?

7. Is order in council P.C. 1537 being observed in regard to Sunday observance or a day off during the week for such employees?

IMPORTS OF COAL

Mr. BROOKS:

1. How many tons of bituminous coal were imported into Canada in each of the following years, 1936, 1937 and 1938?

2. What was the cost of such coal?

3. How many tons of anthracite coal were imported into Canada in the following years, 1936, 1937 and 1938?

4. What was the value of such coal?

[Mr. MacInnis.]

5. How many tons of coal were purchased by the Canadian government for the same years: (a) bituminous; (b) anthracite?

6. How many tons of coal were purchased by the Canadian National Railways during the years 1936, 1937 and 1938?

7. Of the quantity so purchased, how much was imported from the United States or outside the dominion?

FEDERAL GRANTS IN AID

Mr. BROOKS:

1. What was the total amount of money voted as grants in aid by the government in 1936, 1937 and 1938?

2. What was the amount paid to each of the provinces during the same years?

INVESTIGATIONS IN ALBERTA UNDER THE INQUIRIES ACT

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. What inquiries were held under the Inquiries Act (R.S.C. 1927, chap. 99) in the years 1935, 1936, 1937 and 1938, in the province of Alberta?

2. What were the names of the commissioners appointed by the governor in council to hold such inquiries, their places of residence, and occupations?

3. What salaries were paid to each of these commissioners?

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. HEON:

How much money has the dominion government paid to each of the provinces in connection with the Trans-Canada highway project, since 1930?

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE—COST OF GREAT WAR

Mr. HEON:

1. What was the total number of enlistments in the Canadian expeditionary forces during the years 1914 to 1918 inclusively?

2. How many Canadians died on the field of honour?

3. How many died from injuries?

4. How many were wounded?

5. How many veterans of the great war are paid a pension by the government?

6. What is the total amount paid in pensions to veterans from the end of the war to date?

7. What is the total cost to date, capital and interest, of Canada's participation in the great war, including pensions?

PUBLIC AND RAILWAY INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. HEAPS:

1. What was the debt of the Dominion of Canada in 1914?

2. What was the debt of the Dominion of Canada in 1920, and in each year to 1938?

3. What were the annual interest charges in the same years?

4. What percentage of the debt of Canada is held in the dominion and abroad?

5. What was the debt of the Canadian National Railways: (a) in 1923; (b) in 1938?

6. What were the interest charges for these same years?
7. What percentage of this debt is held in Canada and abroad?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—1935-1936 WHEAT CROP

Mr. PERLEY:

For a return showing,—(a) complete details of that portion of the 1935-36 wheat crop disposed of by the Canadian wheat board between July 31, 1936 and July 31, 1938; (b) complete details of the disposal by the Canadian wheat board of wheat acquired from the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers, Limited, from July 31, 1936, to July 31, 1938.

Mr. EULER: There is no disposition on the part of the government to withhold any information with regard to the operations of the wheat board concerning any year in which the transactions are completed. That is the situation in regard to the years mentioned in this motion. I would merely say, however, that when the hon. member asks for complete details this might be construed to involve a tremendous amount of work, which probably my hon. friend does not intend. I think all the information he wants is contained in the annual statements of the board, which will be submitted to him.

Mr. PERLEY: I think the last report we had was on January 6, 1938, and I just wanted a final report similar to that one.

Mr. EULER: I want to assure my hon. friend that any report available now dealing with those years will be gladly supplied.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—1938-39 WHEAT CROP

Mr. PERLEY:

For a return showing,—(a) the amount of wheat acquired by the Canadian Wheat Board during the months of August, September, October, November and December, 1938; (b) the amount of wheat disposed of by the board during the same period; (c) the amount of wheat held by the board in terminal elevators at Fort William, Port Arthur and eastern terminals, as well as in interior terminals, mills, and elevators, private and public; (d) the rate of storage paid on grain held by the board in such storage.

Mr. EULER: As I intimated a moment ago, we are quite ready to give all the information available with regard to completed business in any one year, having to do with purchases and sales of wheat, but this motion deals with the current crop year, in connection with which the sales have not been completed. In the past it has not been the practice of the government to give that information, because the wheat board believes, and the government agrees, that it is not in the public interest to disclose this information during the crop year.

Mr. PERLEY: Then will the minister table the weekly reports that are required under the wheat board act? That has been done in the past; we got them last year.

Mr. EULER: It has not been the practice to make public the weekly reports as submitted by the auditors, and it is not regarded as desirable in the interests of the wheat board and of the country.

FORT OSBORNE BARRACKS—FIREMEN

Mr. MAYBANK:

For a copy of any report made by the deputy minister of Defence to the Minister of Defence on or about the 2nd day of February, 1939, with reference to the employment of civilian firemen and hours of labour of same at Fort Osborne barracks.

VOTES 13 AND 219, 1937-38

Mr. MacNEIL:

For a copy of all orders in council, correspondence, telegrams, reports and other documents relating to the query of the auditor general, respecting votes 13 and 219 for 1937-38, and as referred to on page 307, volume 1, in the report of the auditor general, for the year ending March 31, 1938.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DECLARATION OF NEED FOR INSTITUTION OF A NATIONAL CONTRIBUTORY SYSTEM

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved:

That in the opinion of this house, a national system of contributory unemployment insurance for Canada is a pressing need at the present time and should receive immediate attention.

He said: I have framed this resolution in the words in which it appears on the order paper, for three reasons. First, I wanted to make it in order under the rule which forbids private members committing the government to large expenditures of public money. Second, I wanted to confine it to the general principle of unemployment insurance, with which I think we all agree, and not to have interest diverted from it to the details of any particular scheme which I might advocate and upon which I knew we could not all agree. Third, I wanted to confine the debate strictly to the question of unemployment insurance. I read in the press a statement that it was the intention of an hon. member opposite to bring before the house on this resolution certain data he has collected in connection with the policy of life insurance companies in Canada —which has nothing to do with the subject matter of this resolution. I am advised also by one of my hon. friends of the Social Credit group that he has the idea of expounding the theories of social credit on this resolution, upon the principle that if social credit was in force unemployment would be non-existent and unemployment insurance would therefore be unnecessary. But I submit, sir, and if necessary I will invoke your authority, that the debate should be kept within the limits of what is here stated, and that is unemployment insurance. However desirable and interesting a debate on the other two subjects might be at an appropriate time, this is not the time.

Mr. DUNNING: I hope the hon. gentleman has better luck in that regard than I usually have.

Mr. NEILL: I am trusting to the authority of Mr. Speaker and the good sense of the house. This is the only day that this resolution can be brought up; it is an important matter, and a number of hon. members want to speak on it.

Little time need be spent in demonstrating the need for unemployment insurance. Nearly all the important countries of Europe have such a scheme. Britain has had it since 1911. New Zealand, Australia and South Africa have it; and I shall presently refer to the enormous progress in connection with this matter which has been made of recent months in the United States. In Canada it has a long history. I have not gone back beyond 1919, when a committee sat and recommended it favourably but rather vaguely. A committee sat again in 1928, ten years later, and again in 1929, and again they endorsed it, but they pointed out the fact that it was a matter of provincial jurisdiction. Between 1928 and 1934 I brought the matter up six times in the house. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) has also brought it up from time to time.

In 1935 the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett introduced a dominion-wide scheme, which passed the house but was thrown out, on reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, as being ultra vires, but we know that there was a division of four judges against two, and in the minority was to be found Chief Justice Duff, who is reckoned to be one of the ablest constitutional lawyers in Canada.

This measure was strongly endorsed by the government in the speech from the throne, not this year but last year. They expressed their determination to try to get the provinces to agree upon an amendment of the British North America Act, and they hoped it might be possible to bring down legislation last session. The correspondence between the dominion government and the provinces shows that a very genuine attempt was made to secure that cooperation, but that three provinces refused to extend it; and the government appeared to stop there, apparently hoping that they might induce the provinces to give way.

Since last session a good deal of encouragement has been given to the idea. The Conservative party in their convention endorsed it; I think the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party did the same, and we know that support is not lacking for it in the Social Credit group. The only discordant note that I have heard comes from the Canadian Manufacturers Association, an attitude which is proverbial on their part; they are noted for taking a narrow view of any matter which comes before them and for being unable to see what is really ultimately for the benefit of their members. Associated with them are a few scattered reactionaries throughout Canada who believe that labour is an enemy of capital, and vice versa, and that any improvement obtained by labour comes from the pocket of the employer. This theory was exploded many years ago, but it is still lovingly held by a few people—reactionaries, I call them—who would like to live in the traditions and customs of the early part of the last century.

To these reactionaries I would address myself, and ask them this question: Let them look at the alternative schemes and see how they would like them. Take the Townsend scheme, which proposed a pension to everyone, rich or poor, at the age of sixty, of $200 per month. It has been calculated by experts, taking the United States as a good illustration, that that would involve the payment of half the national income to eight per cent of the population. Just think of that! The prices of ordinary articles of consumption would have to be raised at least seventy-five per cent. The low wage worker would have his income cut from one-third to three-sevenths. Yet that scheme got a large vote in the United States.

Or let them take, if they prefer it, the Lundeen scheme which was put forward in the congress of the United States by people who frankly called themselves communists, although they went further than the scheme put forward in Russia. In these people's plan there would be no contributory payment, no cessation of drawing the allowance. Anyone would be allowed to come under it—farmers, domestic servants, and self-employed people such as lawyers and doctors and others who work for themselves. How they would arrive at a determination of when they were unemployed is not stated. More than that, the compensation to be paid would come to more than the average small earner earns, so that it would form a premium on losing a job and not a premium on getting one. More than that, the funds were to be administered not by the government of the day but by a committee closely resembling the soviet committees of which we used to hear when Russia first started on sovietism and of which we hear very little now. That scheme needs only to be stated as I have done to appreciate the foolishness of it, and yet it got fifty votes in the congress at Washington a year or two ago.

Or they could try the Sheridan Downey plan. I do not know whether he originated it, but certainly he ran on it in California last summer. The proposal was to give $30 every Thursday to everyone after the age of fifty. It was an initiated scheme, propounded by the initiative, but it was defeated, although Downey, who put it forward, was elected by a large majority as senator, and a man named Olson was elected as governor on that ticket.

I mention these schemes for this reason. I ask the house to look at them; I ask people who do not approve of unemployment insurance to consider the vote which these schemes got, and the extent to which, although they were utterly wild and impossible to enforce, they would result in the economic ruin of the people, and be not less injurious to those in whose name and for whose benefit they were put forward, bringing the whole economic structure down about our heads. Do they prefer one of those wild-eyed schemes to a moderate, actuarially sound scheme of unemployment insurance? What if the people, discontented with the feeling that no party is going to do anything for them, should suddenly take it into their heads to vote for one of these inchoate schemes which would get us nowhere?

We have pictured a nation-wide need which requires a nation-wide remedy. In Canada apparently all parties in the house believe in the principle of unemployment insurance. If that is so, why not get together and pass it now and make it unanimous? I know that we shall immediately be confronted with the bugbear of provincial autonomy. Well, in my humble opinion there is a good deal too much attention paid to the claims of the provinces to be self-governing bodies. I think it largely arises from an exaggerated idea of their own importance held by certain local politicians, and was never intended by the British North America Act.

Only two ways appear to present themselves, ordinarily speaking, of meeting the situation. One is to try to persuade the three provinces to join with the rest of us in a petition to the parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act. In view of the Quebec speech from the throne the other day, and other utterances, that way out is apparently beyond hope; at least there is very little to be hoped for. The other way would be to go ahead without the consent of these provinces and pass a resolution in this house by a majority vote asking the British government to change the British North America Act. There is precedent for that, because it has been done before. I know of one occasion on which similar action was taken against the violently expressed objections of one of the provinces. But I submit that there is a third way that might present a reasonable solution of the matter without asking the provinces to do something that we know they will not do, and without trying to force them to do something which we know we cannot make them do.

In the United States the same relation obtains between the federal government and the states as obtains in Canada between the dominion government and the provinces. In both cases the federal authority are unable to pass constitutional unemployment insurance legislation and they are equally unable to force the states or the provinces, as the case may be, to do so either. I suggest that we follow the clever manner in which the Washington government got around the difficulty and, by introducing perfectly legal legislation, brought about, without compulsion, state legislation on unemployment insurance. I referred to this matter in 1934. It was brought up in Washington at that time by a man named Wagner as a private member, but since then the government has taken it up. In January, 1935, the government of the United States introduced what is known as the Social Security Act, a copy of which can be obtained in our library. That act covered many phases of social security such as old age, maternity cases, children, unemployment insurance and so on. Each was dealt with in a separate chapter, but I propose to deal only with the unemployment insurance phase.

There were three objections fatal to the federal legislation, and equally so as regards the dominion. One was that the federal authority could not pass unemployment insurance; the second was that they could not compel the states to do so; and the third, which was the most important one, was that if two or three states did pass such legislation, the cost, which would undoubtedly come out of the payroll in whole or part, would have to be added to the cost of the manufactured article, and those states that followed that course would be handicapped in selling their goods or produce as against other states who had not seen fit to adopt such a policy.

The Social Security Act met all these difficulties. It did not pass unemployment insurance by itself; it did not compel the states to do anything; but it did protect those states that would pass such legislation, and—it produced unemployment insurance. All it did was to produce a desire on the part of the states to pass such legislation, but there was no compulsion, as we shall see. The preamble of the act declared that it was proposed to legislate for the general welfare by doing such and so, and to help the administration—only the administration—of their unemployment compensation laws of the various states. The word "compensation" was used instead of insurance. Nothing is said about unemployment insurance, but merely that they are willing to help to pay the administration costs of unemployment insurance where it exists. Of course, it is obvious that you could not pay the administration costs in those places where they did not have an act of that kind.

Section 303 of the act lays down a few simple conditions that hardly require anything at all except that the state shall have such a scheme, and shall pay money to unemployed people. That is really all. Subsection 4 of section 303 provides that all funds collected by the state under any state scheme shall be paid into a central fund held by the federal authorities, and each state can take out of the fund whenever it likes everything it has put into it, and no more, provided the money is used for the payment of unemployment insurance. But they do not pay for the administration cost because the federal authorities pay that. In other words, the state starts a system of insurance, practically in any form it likes, and collects the cost in the shape of taxes, then pays them into the central fund and draws it all out to pay insurance but not the management, the federal authority paying all costs of administration. The states know, therefore, that if they start such a scheme the federal authorities will pay the costs of administration but there is no compulsion and therefore no interference with jurisdiction.

The matter has been tested and found absolutely legal. It might be held that the cost of administration, although very considerable, did not represent a sufficient inducement to the states to introduce unemployment insurance. Well, there is another section of the act to which I will refer. It is not compulsory. They so arrange it that the legislatures of the states feel impelled, not compelled, to adopt such legislation. Section 901 of the act imposed an excise tax—that is the word used—on all employers of labour throughout the whole of the United States, employing more than eight persons. It began with one per cent, but it is now three per cent of the payroll. That is paid over to the federal authorities. It is not earmarked in any way to be used for any particular purpose but is simply paid into the national revenue just as if we paid similar sums into the consolidated revenue fund. It is an absolutely legal excise tax imposed for a national purpose, but that purpose is nowhere indicated; unemployment insurance is not mentioned from beginning to end.

But—and here is the crux of the whole situation—section 902 provides that anyone paying this sum, which of course he has to pay, can deduct ninety per cent of it if a similar sum has been paid under the terms of a state unemployment insurance scheme. Suppose a company had a payroll of $50,000 a year. That company would have to pay $1,500 to the federal authorities, and they would have to pay that amount in any event, and they would get no obvious return for it. But if there was a local state scheme, any sum which the company paid towards that state scheme could be deducted from the contribution paid to the federal authorities. The situation then is this: Business men, who are the biggest taxpayers as a rule, say to themselves, to their friends, and to the legislators, "We have to pay three per cent on our payroll of $50,000, and we shall never see it again. But if we had a state unemployment insurance scheme the money would be all spent in the state. It would save our relief bills, make labour more satisfied and reduce the labour turnover. The alternatives are to pay it all to Washington or to have it spent within the state." And so they bring pressure to bear on their legislators to get a state law passed. I maintain that the same thing would happen in the provinces of Canada.

The outstanding objection I have mentioned, that two or three states who did adopt the scheme would be handicapped in the sale of their products, inasmuch as they would have to pay this money directly or indirectly, whereas other states would not, has been met and done away with. For the man has to pay three per cent in any case, and if he has a state unemployment insurance scheme to contribute to the money is devoted to that purpose. In any event he is bound to pay $1,500, in the case I have given by way of illustration, and if it does not go to support a state scheme it all goes to Washington. The only choice he has is this: Will he pay it all to Washington and get no immediate, visible benefit from it, or will he pay it into the state scheme and get the benefits I have mentioned—reduced relief bills, greater labour satisfaction and so on? That is the situation in a nutshell, and that is the whole case I advocate to-day.

The federal authorities in Washington give a wide latitude to the states in their acts. They are practically free to draw up any kind of act they like provided it is of that character. They can raise money as they like; it need not be three per cent on their payroll. They can make employees contribute if they think fit, or they can pay part out of general taxation. It is practically left to every state to do exactly as it likes. And it is noteworthy that while this bill was introduced by the Democrats in Washington it was supported by the Republicans and passed unanimously.

We have before us, then, this entirely voluntary system, newly introduced and until then untried. Let us look at the results. That bill was passed finally in August, 1935. By the middle of 1937 every state and territory in the United States of America had passed an unemployment insurance law. They did not have to, there was no compulsion; and it is noteworthy, almost miraculous, that every last one passed such a law within that period. Some 21,000,000 people were covered. That is an achievement to be proud of, bringing the benefits of unemployment insurance to 21,000,000 people. More than that, all but two of those states are now paying the unemployment insurance benefit, although there was generally a two year interval; but now they are all paying except two states, I think, Illinois and Montana, which will be paying by July of this year. While each state had an absolutely free hand it is remarkable to see how comparatively similar was the legislation they passed. The cost has been calculated at an average of about 2·7 per cent of the payroll; in five or six states it runs to a little more, and in six states the employees have to contribute as well. That is entirely optional. None of the states pay anything towards it from general taxation; either the employer pays or the employer and employee jointly. In every case the administration costs are paid by the federal authorities.

This year in the speech from the throne the government were able to say no more than that they hoped to get further co-operation from the provinces in connection with such a scheme, and that they were still of the opinion—and so on. But in view of what took place in Quebec, and in view of utterances from some other provinces, it seems hopeless to look for any action in that regard. And supposing it were possible, we should have to wait for the Rowell commission to report; then we have the visit of their majesties, and there might be an election. Certainly there would have to be a conference between the dominion and the provinces, and then assuming what is very unlikely, that the provinces did agree, we would have to meet again here and pass a petition asking the British government to take action. The British government would then have to pass legislation, which would take another year; then it would come back here and we would have to go through the various stages of the necessary legislation. With the two year waiting period we would be lucky if we got any action in less than six or eight years, with no certainty of anything except a very undesirable scrap with some of the provinces.

The system I have presented is not some ephemeral scheme thought up by myself; it is one which is in actual effect under conditions very much like ours. We have the object lesson of how it was done and the experience of applying it to 21,000,000 people. Surely among that 21,000,000 we can find conditions similar to our own here. If we adopt this scheme we might be paying benefits inside of two years, with no long dispute with two or more provinces and all the bitterness that interprovincial enmity provokes.

I suggest that delay in this matter is unnecessary and might well be dangerous. People are in a sensitive mood, and if they get the idea that nothing is going to be done for them they will get bitter. If a man quarrels and you can reason with him you can abate his anger, but if he gets in a sullen mood you can do nothing with him. There is nothing more hopeless than a body of people who have arrived at the condition of hopelessness and helplessness, and who believe in nothing and nobody; they are ready to bite at any ridiculous promise, and might by pressure pass legislation which would be disastrous to themselves and equally disastrous to other people.

There is no need to make this a political football; let us get together, not on the basis of party but as reasonable men determined to find a fair solution of a difficult problem, and one that gets more difficult the longer action is delayed. Unemployment insurance is not a cure-all; nobody suggests that it is. It will not do away with unemployment, but it will cushion the disaster and injury that unemployment produces to the whole body politic; for it extends beyond the particular working man concerned—it affects us all. I suggest that unemployment insurance is a measure of justice that has been too long delayed. It is a too-long delayed necessity.

What I am asking now is action, demanded not by political considerations, not by the pressure of people, but simply by a cold analysis of what the facts and conditions as we know them require.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): The resolution introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) embraces a problem which I am sure engages the sincere attention and interest of every man and woman in this house; a problem which even the most bitter critics of the government will agree has engaged the government's attention, and particularly that of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). I am particularly interested in this problem, not only as a citizen of this country but because I represent in this house a constituency in which on its urban side thousands of men engaged in an important secondary industry find themselves for a period often as long as five months in the year without work and compelled to resort to the state for relief, with all the demoralising social consequences that result from such an interval of unemployment. Therefore I am convinced that the resolution introduced by the hon. member is one that should receive our immediate attention.

I do not agree with him that every hon. member of this house supports the principle of unemployment insurance. I have talked to a good number and I find that we are not all agreed on the principle of unemployment insurance and the advantages which it offers. For this reason I propose to examine, dispassionately, I hope, some of the economic implications of the resolution. I propose to be as realistic as possible in my treatment of the question. I do not propose to assume, as my hon. friends immediately opposite would assume, that the form of economic society under which we operate is one that should be done away with. I prefer to recognize that in Canada there is not much likelihood that this system of free competition will cease to exist, in our immediate time. We have to approach the problem as legislators with this assumption ever in mind.

Under our competitive and acquisitive system unemployment is inevitable; we might as well recognize this. That is exactly what a great economist, and one of the greatest authorities on this subject, meant when he wrote:

> So long as the industrial world is split up into separate groups of producers, each group with a life of its own and growing or decaying in ceaseless attrition upon its neighbours, there must be insecurity of employment. It is probable that at least one of the most striking specific factors in the problem, namely, cyclical fluctuation of trade, may be traced ultimately to the same source. Unemployment in other words is to some extent at least part of the price of industrial competition, part of the waste without which there could be no competition at all.

[Mr. Neill.]

So that if we are inevitably to have a constant measure of unemployment in this country we have to find some method whereby those who are engaged in our factories, men and women, will be afforded, in so far as the annual income for their work is concerned. This unemployment inevitably is due in Canada, I suggest, to at least five circumstances—seasonal fluctuations, cyclical depressions, technological developments, the decay and merging of industries, and industrial disputes. I have not the time to analyse each of these, except to say that operations in the automobile industry in my own constituency, the city of Windsor, an industry which at the present time means so much to the economy of Canada, but nevertheless an industry based upon the principle of mass production, in the face of technological developments have resulted in the displacement of human effort by the machine. And to suggest that this substitution is wrong or that we must get away from mass production is not facing the facts.

This civilization of ours is a machine civilization. There is no more chance of getting back to the handicrafts or to barter methods than there is of our having utopia to-morrow. We might as well recognize this. One of the machines in the automobile industry, a special machine for the manufacture of pressed steel frames, operated by one man, produces six springs per minute, 3,600 in ten hours—an output which by hand methods would require 175 men. This simple illustration indicates the relation of the technological developments which have taken place in industry in respect of what I call the inevitable circumstance of unemployment, under our system of free competition and production.

Then, another circumstance: Twenty years ago the automobile and truck industry afforded great opportunity for the industrial development of Canada. The moving picture and radio industries a few years ago offered similar opportunities. But I ask hon. members this question: Looking at the character of the world to-day, particularly on the industrial side, is there any likelihood of an emergence of a new industry or a new group of industries which will be able for the time being spontaneously and completely to take care of the working classes of this or any other country? That is another reason why we have to be prepared to do what normally would seem to be economically unsound, in order to cushion, as the hon. member for Comox-

Alberni has said, the great economic as well as the great social waste which attends the unemployment problem.

I believe that a proper way to approach this whole question is to consider some of the methods which have been frequently suggested, not for the removal but for the mitigating of unemployment. An examination of these will show that, with all its limitations, the proposal of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni offers the most advantages and better results in the solution of the problem to which we in Canada must address ourselves.

First of all there is the proposal of industrial stabilization, the proposal advocated by Mr. Owen D. Young and other so-called business statesmen of the world. This industrial stabilization program is one which, by rationalization and coordination of industry, seeks to take care, in industry itself, of the unemployment problem. I think it is too much to expect that any well-directed corporation in Canada or elsewhere is prepared to introduce a stabilization program at a financial sacrifice. Obviously the only form of stabilization program which will operate, within our system, is one which is both practical and economic—one which occasions profit. I am not trying to suggest that our business men are not socially minded. But I do suggest that the profit motive in industry is not going to encourage industries in any part of the world to resort to purely humanitarian practices in the absence of profit. No business can function on pure philanthropy. Consequently I believe that the proposal of industrial stabilization cannot and will not satisfy the test.

Then there is the proposal that, since we are to maintain this system of production within a free and competitive society, we should sit around and develop, sit around and plan our whole economic and social problems. It is suggested that by a system of planning we might avoid the problem of unemployment. I suggest that the very idea of competition itself is opposed to planning, and that consequently one will get oneself into all sorts of difficulties by trying to find a solution through this agency.

Then there is the suggestion that was made by one of the great proponents of a scheme of unemployment insurance in the United States—namely the share-the-work movement. There is the suggestion that by a cutting down of the period of employment—let us say a week, for the individual employee—and giving the remaining portion of the normal period of employment to another workman it would be possible to eliminate unemployment. I have no hesitation in saying that in my judgment the acceptance of that proposal would result in one of the most inequitable and oppressive taxes ever levied upon the working classes of any country, because it seeks to relieve industry of its share in this great burden, and places the entire responsibility upon the working group.

There may be others who say that the proper method of curing the problem is through an expansion of foreign markets. Again realism must compel us to realize that in order to have any strength in its economy a nation must sell as well as buy from other countries. It must constantly increase its markets abroad. This government has proceeded on that assumption. However praiseworthy may be our recent treaty with the United States, or the treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom, I am sure no one in the house will for a moment conclude that under our present form of society the most strengthened trade treaty relations are calculated fully to cope with unemployment. But the proposal that we should eliminate or at least restrain child labour, that we should cut down on the pension period in order to improve the labour market, thereby encouraging a more successful operation of a system of unemployment insurance, is one which deserves much attention and, in my judgment, has great merit.

Therefore complementary to a system of contributory compulsory unemployment insurance I would be in favour—always admitting, in this instance, the constitutional difficulty—of further strengthening child labour restrictions, raising the working age of children, and lowering the age for pension requirements. I believe a comprehensive scheme of unemployment insurance with this supplementary program in mind would have the result of restricting the labour market and, in so far as the possibility of governmental intervention is concerned, making the solution of the problem more successful than it otherwise would be.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Does not the hon. member think it is as much a question of unimpayment as it is of unemployment?

Mr. MARTIN: Of what?

Mr. LANDERYOU: Of unimpayment as much as unemployment.

Mr. MARTIN: I am going to come to that if I am just allowed to proceed. I have tried not to confuse myself with theories about which I know very little, and about which I am sure very few hon. members have any knowledge. I say that not unkindly, but I would prefer to confine myself to something which I believe is reasonably comprehensive.

A system of unemployment insurance such as that suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni would, if put into effect in Canada, necessitate a change in the manner in which our employment exchanges and employment offices are now operated. They are now largely uncoordinated because of divided jurisdiction. If we adopt an unemployment insurance scheme we shall have to do what they have done in the United Kingdom, that is, have a carefully selected and properly organized system of employment exchanges, all operating under the same policy and administered from the centre instead of from the various spokes of the wheel.

The suggestion often made in this house that unemployment insurance will add to the burdens of generations to come is sometimes counter-balanced by the proposal that unemployment could best be taken care of by a public works program. I suggest that the attempt to place men at work by means of public works, a system old as the pyramids themselves, cannot hope to achieve what might be achieved by a system of unemployment insurance. George Bielschowsky, an economist who has devoted most of his attention to the economic aspect of public works programs, has this to say:

> The public works program is not the road to plenty; it is not even a first rate device for reducing business fluctuation; it must rather be conceived of as the last finishing touch which a highly competent government may put upon a smoothly working business economy.

I do not wish to detract from the usefulness of such a program, but I take it that the hon. gentleman who introduced this resolution has in mind some measure which will require assistance from the national exchequer, perhaps to a greater degree in times of prolonged depression. I suggest that a system of public works, palliative as it is in form, will not by itself achieve what I think would be achieved by a system of unemployment insurance. In passing may I say to the Minister of Labour, with whom I have discussed this matter, as I did with the Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty) before he assumed ministerial rank, that I do not want him to understand that Windsor does not still want a new city hall. I do not want him to understand that we are not prepared to accept a new railway station or to have the Blue Water highway extended or to accept further waterfront development in our community. I simply mean that taking the long view we are temporizing with the problem by merely seeking to spend public money in great amounts on public works.

Unemployment insurance is often contrasted with the scheme of unemployment reserves. But before discussing this, I should like to make certain fundamental assumptions, one of which I have made already. I repeat that I recognize that unemployment cannot be abolished without giving up our system of production. I recognize that Canadians are not seriously considering giving up the present social order. Consequently, our responsibility is to discover the best method, within this competitive system of production, of alleviating the social and economic consequences of unemployment.

Having made these assumptions, what then is to be said in favour of unemployment insurance? As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said, it is in effect in thirteen countries of the world and protects approximately 42,000,000 workers at the present time. The English system was inaugurated with the act of 1911 and the legislation has continued in modified form up to the unemployment act of 1934. Allowing for all the abuses that have occurred and the weaknesses that have been found in the English experiment, eminent economists have admitted that if it were not for the system of unemployment insurance the unemployment problem in England, particularly during the past decade, would have been seriously aggravated.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the hon. member be in favour of including all persons in an unemployment insurance scheme, as is done in Great Britain?

Mr. MARTIN: I am coming to that. The hon. member means seasonal groups, and so on?

Mr. HEAPS: I was going beyond that. I did not want to interrupt my hon. friend at this point, but he must know that when the unemployment insurance scheme was introduced in Great Britain it embraced almost every person in industry. If we are to introduce a similar scheme here in Canada, is the hon. member in favour of embracing all persons who could be employed?

Mr. MARTIN: My own view is that that is exactly what would have to be done, and obviously that would defeat the actuarial principle. Because of the emergency that exists, we would have to do what has been done in England. We would have to abandon in part the actuarial principle, having in mind the necessity of providing social security. If I am permitted to continue I think I will cover that point more fully in a moment.

I was discussing the question of unemployment reserves as opposed to an insurance scheme. The Wisconsin plan of unemployment reserves seems to be the most successful, but relatively it has been very unsuccessful. That plan shows the weaknesses of an unemployment reserve system as opposed to an unemployment insurance scheme. There are at least two weaknesses in the Wisconsin plan of unemployment reserves. First, it fails to provide for governmental contributions, and, second, it neglects to take advantage of another basic principle of social insurance, namely, the distribution of the burden on all elements of society. I think it is sheer nonsense to argue whether or not unemployment is an incurable risk. That is a metaphysical question which I do not think lawyers or parliamentarians, let alone philosophers, can possibly answer. The real concern of social insurance is security rather thant the upholding of actuarial principles which must govern in private insurance. I am prepared to admit that on a purely actuarial basis a complete system of unemployment insurance in Canada is not possible. That being so, there must be a constant demand on the national exchequer to bolster up a subsidized fund.

Unemployment insurance was the logical evolution of the experience of the trade unions. Many trade unions inaugurated a voluntary plan of insurance. While not altogether successful, while the objective in mind was not reached completely, these voluntary insurance schemes advanced to a point where there were a number of fairly comprehensive systems. The trade union voluntary insurance schemes were based largely upon the principle employed in certain municipal insurance schemes, such as the famous Ghent system, that put into force by the city of Dijon and other cities in France. The limitations of the trade union unemployment insurance schemes were the same as those of the municipal schemes. They did not reach a substantial portion of the working public. They were confined essentially to the members of the trade unions. Because they were operated on a voluntary basis, they took in only a small number of the trade union members. Nevertheless the trade union experience, particularly after the government provided subsidies, has been of great value, in that—and I think this is important—it demonstrated the feasibility and practicability of mutual insurance against unemployment. It demonstrated also that governmental subsidies stimulate this protection; for all voluntary plans expanded greatly after the government began to subsidize them. In the third place, whatever gain was achieved was due to the factor of compulsion; for it soon became evident that if adequate protection against unemployment was to be extended to the majority of wage earners a national system of compulsory insurance for all workers, with the burden distributed among all groups of society and not on one or two, was the only way out.

This experience of the trade unions, and the experience of other countries where compulsory unemployment insurance is now in vogue, reveal a preference over all other schemes of insurance or unemployment assistance, stabilization fund, or share-the-work movement, in the following particulars.

First, a scheme of contributory unemployment insurance on a nation-wide basis, not for any one province but for the whole nation, would assure the widest possible distribution of the risk. Second, by levying contributions on employers, employees and the state, the burden is equitably distributed. Third, by having such participation in the contributions, as in England, the government can shift a considerable share of the burden to the richer classes through graduated income and inheritance taxes. I suggest that these three principles must ever be at the base of what we adopt in Canada; and while those are the three principles I think the main thing to enunciate in this house is that the scheme must be one not for Ontario, not for Quebec but for every part of the country, for economic reasons which I propose to develop.

Everyone is familiar in a general way with the English experience. Suggestions have been made that great weaknesses have crept in, that great abuse has resulted, and so on. I wish to place on Hansard an important quotation from the final report of the royal commission on unemployment insurance in the United Kingdom, issued in November, 1932:

> In industry as a whole there are general changes from activity to depression, exaggerated since the war, which involve the idleness for months at a time of a considerable proportion of fit and efficient workers. In the interests of more economic efficiency, even if no other values were brought into account, it is important to preserve the economic capacity of these workers during their unemployment. A system of unemployment insurance and relief maintains the efficiency of the working population during unemployment and tends to check the accentuation of unemployment in periods of general trade depression.

And note further:

> Since 1929 unemployment in this country—

That is to say, the United Kingdom.

> —although worse has not increased to the extent and in the degree that it has in the United States and other countries. This difference may in part be due to the maintenance of working class spending by unemployment relief, when spending generally was contracting and investment in new enterprises drying up. . . . One of the advantages of a self-supporting insurance scheme is that if properly controlled—

That was what I meant when I referred to an organized system of employment exchange offices.

—it accumulates reserves when spending is active and employment is good, to disburse them automatically at the time when trade is depressed, and spending needs to be stimulated in order to give employment. . . .

The economic facts of the unemployment situation must be considered in relation to the social benefits of unemployment insurance and its extension which have outweighed any economic objections.

This was the conviction of a group of competent men who, at the instance of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, examined the operation of unemployment insurance in that country. This was the result of their examination. The truth is that English statesmen and leaders of business for the time being having dispensed with many of the social implications of the classical economists, and are prepared to look at the situation not in the light of theory as it was known in the days of Adam Smith but in the light of the system under which we are operating, with all its difficulties. They saw to it that a minimum of mass purchasing power would be available to the working groups of England; and as a result of unemployment insurance Great Britain has been returning annually about one and a third billion dollars to the unemployed, the sick, the injured, the aged, the widows and the orphans. This has enhanced the internal purchasing power, on the basis of population, to nearly four billion dollars, and as a result English wage rates have been kept in hand, thus ensuring purchasing power to those who continued to work. I submit that the same can be done for Canada.

I realize the difficulties facing the Minister of Labour in his attempt to deal with this problem. I would suggest to him that if we resort to a scheme it must be on a nation-wide basis. Otherwise the following burdens and difficulties would result: First, workpeople who move constantly from one province to another would present a difficulty when one worker would move from an uninsured to an insured province, or vice versa. Second, it would be unfair that the taxpayers of an uninsured province should contribute equally with the taxpayers of an insured province. Third, the producers of the insured province would be saddled with a substantial item of cost which would not be borne by their competitors in uninsured provinces.

[Mr. Martin.]

The answer to all these difficulties, we are told, is a constitutional one. We are told that we all want a system of unemployment insurance in Canada, but that because of the judgments of the judicial committee this is not possible. Well, of course, we have to recognize the findings of the judicial committee, and nothing will be gained by disagreeing with those decisions. At this point, however, I believe I should say that this parliament clearly would have the power, without resorting to the provinces, to bring about an amendment to our constitution in order to clearly and unmistakably endow this parliament with the authority now lacking. I realize that to adopt this method of bringing about the desired end might occasion throughout the country a great deal of dissent and possibly further conflict and lack of harmony. I suggest, just as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has suggested, that we might face the emergency; we might realize the difficulty of implementing this legislation and, on the basis of the old age pension scheme, pass a national act making it optional in the case of the provinces. I venture to suggest that public opinion in all these provinces, including my own, would resist any attempt on the part of provincial politicians to interfere with the national interest. Moreover, our financial arrangements with the provinces could be so dealt with as to make it financially worth while in respect of other contractual obligations for any province to accede readily to the opportunities offered by a national scheme.

We are told that the great difficulty lies in the province of Quebec. Seemingly Ontario has signified its willingness to accept a scheme of unemployment insurance, if we can accept the obiter dicta of some of its politicians. But public opinion in the province of Quebec will not support the premier of that province in his opposition to the scheme, even in the form I have now discussed. I quote from a recent statement of Mr. Charpentier, who was and is president of La Confederation des Travailleurs Catholiques dans la province de Quebec:

However, the Canadian Federation of Catholic Workers would not object to the federal government amending the constitution this very winter, in order to establish a tripartite system of unemployment insurance in this country without any further delay.

There is the observation of the leader of one of the most powerful labour groups in the province of Quebec. They are not willing that opposition to an amendment of the constitution shall interfere with what I believe, with all its limitations, represents in the light of past experience the only way within our form of society whereby working people can be given a measure of security during periods of unemployment.

In my own city of Windsor—and I know that the Postmaster General will support my statement—one of the most disheartening things—I say this non-politically and I hope dispassionately—is that healthy men and women, particularly men working in our automobile factories, receive a wage which in the light of its daily amount seems adequate, but in the light of an annual income is insufficient to maintain properly a home in this country on the standards of living we have set up for ourselves. These men are out of work four and five months in the year. I go into their homes, and often am unable to suggest any satisfactory solution. I am convinced that this problem, particularly in respect to secondary industry in our thickly populated industrial centres, would be relieved by the application of a system of unemployment insurance. The Minister of Labour knows as well as I do, if not much better, the economic and social implications of this problem. I am not trying to pit my humble approach against his. He sees it, I am sure, in its national aspects. But I do say to him, speaking for a constituency where the problem is acute, that public opinion will back up this government and this parliament if it assumes in the way indicated the authority which I think it should assume, and that it will condemn politicians in any part of Canada who seem prepared to place the interests of provincial autonomy ahead of what I regard to be the proper treatment of the most disastrous and dangerous problem which confronts Canada and the world at the present time.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I am happy to rise to second the motion introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). It is not the first time such a resolution has been introduced in this house. I believe that during the nine years I have been here it has been proposed several times, and I remember having read before I came here that it was introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps). It has often been debated here; and after many years of debate, in due course an unemployment insurance act was passed. I am not going to speak about it at the moment, but later I shall have something to say with regard to it.

For myself, I have been long associated with many thousands of workmen; I know—I should know—their problems; I have been with them on occasions of joy and at times of sorrow, and I know of no occasion on which I felt more grief for the average worker than I did when he was told that his services were no longer required. From long contact with workmen I am a convinced advocate of contributory unemployment insurance. My conviction arises not only through contact with them but from a very exhaustive inquiry into the subject and from observation of unemployment insurance laws in operation in several Europeon countries, particularly in Great Britain, and a thorough study of the acts which have been referred to as operative in the United States.

In former years, and perhaps at the time the hon. member for Winnipeg North first introduced his unemployment insurance resolution. it was necessary to put up an argument for the principle of the measure. This is no longer necessary. As someone said earlier in the debate, the principle is now recognized everywhere. I believe that all reasonable, thinking men are in favour of unemployment insurance. To read the debates which took place in the British House of Commons in 1911 and immediately prior to the adoption in Great Britain of the first unemployment insurance act in the world, would be an interesting occupation for any hon. member who has not done so. To-day everyone who thinks is in favour of unemployment insurance.

An hon. MEMBER: Contributory.

Mr. MacNICOL: What attracts me most to it is the tragedy of the situation here in Canada. In 1935, after as exhaustive an inquiry into the subject as any government has made, the Bennett government enacted unemployment insurance. I supported it as vigorously as I could. I am sorry that it was not placed in operation. I am convinced that had the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett been returned to power in 1935 it would have been put in operation without any reference to the privy council. It might have been contested later on in the courts, but it would then have been operating for at least some time, during which the people of Canada, and particularly the working man—and it is of his interests I am thinking—would have become interested in and familiar with the operation of unemployment insurance.

Mr. HAYHURST: It was contributory unemployment insurance, was it not?

Mr. MacNICOL: Absolutely. That is what I am in favour of. I have not heard any other form of insurance debated in this chamber. I did not hear the beginning of the speech of the hon. member who introduced the motion, but I am satisfied that any scheme he would advocate would be contributory.

Mr. MANION: It so states in the resolution.

Mr. MacNICOL: In reference to the act passed by the preceding government, and in view of the unemployment which again grew to large proportions in the early months of 1938, I wish to read from an editorial in the Toronto Telegram of January 24, which describes the situation as fittingly and truly as it has ever been depicted:

> It was a grave misfortune for Canada that the unemployment insurance act passed by parliament in 1935 should have fallen a victim, first, to political jealousy, and later to an adverse court decision upon its constitutionality, because it is in times of increasing industrial activity and employment such as occurred in the last two years—

That is in 1936 and 1937.

> —that a strong fund must be collected to meet the calls which arise when depressions strike and workmen lose their jobs.

That editorial tells the true picture. The reason that an unemployment insurance act is not in operation in this country to-day is, I am convinced, political jealousy. The result is that we are back to-day to where we were around 1928 or 1929 when the hon. member for Winnipeg North introduced his first unemployment insurance resolution.

Let me give a brief history of the origin of unemployment insurance. There is nothing new about it, because for decades prior to 1911, in fact in the early part of the nineteenth century, the great labour organizations first began to provide for what was known at that time as unemployment benefits, and from that day they gradually improved upon the principle of providing unemployment benefits. At the same time many great manufacturing concerns began to take up the question, and eventually they themselves adopted a system of out-of-work or unemployment benefits. I have read the story of the great F. I. A. T., works in Italy, the Sandvick steel works in Sweden, the Zeiss works in Germany and the Phillips works in Holland. All these companies had, for years prior to the operation of unemployment insurance proper, their own out-of-work benefit plans that worked satisfactorily. But in 1911 the British government got right down to business and in enacting an unemployment insurance law they had all the experience of the great labour organizations, the large business concerns and the out-of-work benefit societies that had been operating prior to that time. The quantity of data and material that had been accumulated in those previous years was of great assistance to the British government in enacting the first unemployment insurance scheme adopted by any government.

I am going to touch upon the British unemployment insurance act later on, but I might say at this stage that a number of other nations followed in the wake of what the British government had done. The British government are usually first in all these matters, and in 1911 they passed their act. Austria passed theirs in 1920, Queensland, Australia, in 1922, and Russia in 1922, although I do not believe it is operating now. Italy passed an act in 1923, Poland in 1924, seventeen of the twenty-seven or twenty-eight cantons of Switzerland in 1924, Bulgaria in 1925, and Germany in 1927. All these acts were contributory and compulsory. A number of other nations adopted non-compulsory acts, but as that is not in the line of my argument I will not take up time enumerating the nations that passed such acts.

There are two different governmental situations to consider in the adoption of an unemployment insurance act. First of all there is the state like Great Britain in which there is only one government for the entire country. That applies also to France, Belgium and a number of other European states. Then there is the federal state, illustrated by Germany, Switzerland, Canada and the United States. It is quite obvious that states with single governments, such as Great Britain, can approach a subject of this kind more quickly and effectively than a federal government can, and it is very largely for that reason, I suppose, that Switzerland and Germany, that adopted unemployment insurance, though perhaps not to the same extent as Great Britain, were later than Great Britain in passing legislation. The United States, where the situation is pretty much as it is in Canada, the individual states being largely sovereign, as the provinces are in this dominion, was still later in adopting an unemployment insurance act; and Canada has not yet passed a measure other than the one which was thrown out by the privy council.

I have made a thorough investigation into the operations of the unemployment insurance act in the old land. In London there are forty unemployment offices. There are two main unemployment offices, one in what is known as "the city" and the other at Pentonville in the northeast end of the city. It was to the latter, I believe, that I went when I was last in London. I wish to describe what I saw there. In the old land the employment office and the unemployment office are operated from the same centre, and it should be the same in this country. I must first of all remark on the courtesy and sympathy shown by the officials in the various unemployment insurance offices, in which I spent a considerable length of time. I cannot say that I received the same service or was shown the same sympathy in the unemployment offices I visited in Canada. On more than one occasion I telephoned to an unemployment office and the conversation at the other end was more or less discourteous until I told who I was, and then, to my surprise, the voice became more or less courteous. I should like, however, to compliment the officials in the old country on their courtesy and on the manner in which they treated the men. They addressed them as Jack, or Tom, or Fred, and when I asked how they knew these men, the answer was that over the period of years they have been operating since 1911, naturally many men have visited the various unemployment offices a number of times.

When an unemployed worker enters an office in London he first hands in his card on which are a number of stamps. Perhaps the hon. member for Comox-Alberni described it. Every worker has a card with his name on it and a certain number of stamps are necessary for him to obtain unemployment insurance, and are pasted on that card. He hands his card in and then directs his attention to three boards on the office walls, one after the other. To these offices comes information by teletype from every one of the forty offices and the main offices. That report comes in every fifteen minutes and it indicates any positions that are filled or vacancies that occur. Almost as soon as the report is teletyped it is taken off the machine and placed on a board and the workers quickly gather round that board to find out what opportunities are offering. As promptly thereafter as possible the officials list all these positions on a larger board, and finally they have them typewritten and placed where the workers can see them. If a position becomes vacant they write out a card and give it to the worker. If he obtains employment it is reported at once and his record is so noted and the position that had been tabulated as vacant is also erased.

Mr. DUNNING: If my friend will permit, that system recognizes the inseparable nature of the two things, unemployment insurance and the means of finding employment.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, I explained at the beginning that I was strongly in favour of the system that combines the two.

Mr. DUNNING: The same authority must govern both in order that it may work.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, the one office takes care of both, and I found it working very satisfactorily. The fact is that in 1936, the year previous to my last visit to the old country, the officials told me in London they had placed men in one million jobs, odd jobs of one kind and another, but some of them permanent. In fact the day I was in the Pentonville office a teletype came in asking for eight squads of boilermakers. I asked what they meant by eight squads, and was told that four men made a squad. There was the boilermaker himself, the man who held the rivet up, the boy who tossed the rivet, and I suppose tthe riveter made the fourth. So that thirty-two men were called for in that request. I was tremendously thrilled with the way in which the whole unemployment situation is taken care of.

It is interesting also to see the men coming in to obtain their insurance. The waiting period in Great Britain has now been reduced to three days; formerly it was six. The men receive their pay during four hours a day. They are dealt with expeditiously; an effort is made not to keep them waiting but to send them on as happily as they can. They report on three days—Monday, Wednesday and Friday, in order also to look over the boards and try to obtain a position.

I am not saying that it is possible at the moment to adopt an unemployment insurance scheme in Canada. The government would have to look into that very carefully; it may or may not be possible. The conditions of the country are so serious at the moment that at least a considerable waiting period would probably have to intervene in order to accumulate the necessary fund.

Something was said by a previous speaker in reference to the financial position of the unemployment insurance fund in the old country. I studied that very carefully with the labour office—they gave me all the available information—and it appeared to me that it was in a most satisfactory position and most successful. This is largely due to the fact that never before have there been so many mechanics employed as there are at present in the old land. In 1936 in England the employer contributed 20 cents a week for each employee, the employee 20 cents a week and the government 20 cents a week, and the receipts from those contributions in 1936 amounted to $322,860,000. Adding to that an amount of $995,000 in interest on the rest that they have already laid up makes total receipts of $323,855,000. Out of that they paid in unemployment benefits $220,027,000. The cost of administration was $20,250,000, and other expenses—I suppose printing, etc., and perhaps inspectors—$1,467,000; total expenses $266,744,000, including a return of $25,000,000 to the fund which formerly was known as the dole to pay off the debt that accumulated following the war when conditions were unprecedented and when what was known as the dole amounted I believe to $515,000,000. In the last three or four years they have paid off over $100,000,000 and in addition have laid up a rest of $225,000,000 to $250,000,000. The fund is now on a solvent basis.

When I asked the chief of the department at Whitehall what will happen when all these hundreds of thousands of men now engaged in munition work are laid off, perhaps because of sufficiency of munitions, he said: "Oh, we are now in a position to take care of that almost indefinitely." In the old land, therefore, they have fully demonstrated that their system is a sound one, and from my observation it is of tremendous benefit to the worker. To assure myself of its benefit to the worker I visited many plants and many employers and employees, but I shall tell of only three, widely different.

I went to a great steel plant employing 36,000 men. I talked to the foreman in front of the Bessemer furnace, where there was also a squad of four men. I asked him what he thought of unemployment insurance. He was a Scotsman. He replied, "Man, it is marvellous; it is wonderful. I have a wife and six children; I have not been out of work during the last three years and therefore have not required any unemployment benefit, but if I were out of work I would receive for myself $4.14 a week, for my wife $2.19, and for the children 49 cents each, plus 25 per cent." That would make for that man $11.95 a week, and he would receive it almost indefinitely; because for a man who has been on for that length of time the benefits continue for well on to a hundred weeks. In this country when a man is laid off he receives nothing; he either goes on charity or goes to the relief office to get something to exist on. It is a strange travesty that such a situation should exist in a land like ours, flowing as it is with milk and honey.

Then I went to a restaurant. In the British act they have not the restrictions on the number of employees that are imposed in the United States act, to which I shall refer later. The waiter at the restaurant told me he was married and had three children, and that if he were laid off he would receive within three days' time $9.75 a week. In London a man can live on $9.75 a week if he is not too extravagant. Then I went to a corner grocery, operated by a man and his wife and two employees. The man and his wife were working in the store; one employee was drawing a sick benefit of 17 shillings a week, together with medical attention and medicines, and the other young man, who was off because of unemployment, received $5.17 a week. Unemployment insurance in Great Britain is so all-embracing that over 18,000,000 out of the 20,000,000 employed are protected by the benefits of the unemployment insurance law. I often say to myself that when times are good in Canada again and we want more immigration—and we shall, because I am convinced we must have immigration to keep this country on an even keel—we shall have great difficulty in getting Britishers to come out. They will say, "Why should we go out there? At home we have health insurance and unemployment insurance, whereas in Canada you have neither." The result will be that we shall have great difficulty in convincing immigrants qualified to render efficient service in Canada to leave the dear old land and come to this country—despite the fact that we have a land which does flow with milk and honey.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacNICOL: If it does not take too long to answer it.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Did the hon. member visit any farms in Great Britain? Could he tell us about the activities on the farms?

Mr. MacNICOL: I did not visit any farms, but I know that farm employees are now operating under the benefits of the unemployment insurance scheme.

In Great Britain there is the widest possible extension of the benefits of unemployment insurance. As a matter of fact, I intended to refer to the classes receiving it when I discussed the United States system at a later point in my observations.

The German system, while a very good one, is not at all equal to that of Great Britain. But it does include three things, the first of which is accident insurance. If a worker is injured through an accident he will receive accident compensation. Their system includes invalidity insurance and unemployment insurance. The three are grouped together and, to that extent, in my judgment it is beneficial. The rates are however, much higher in Germany than in Great Britain, and the return is much lower. It is a federal-state system, and I assume they have not been able to adjust the operation as accurately and efficiently, on account of its being a federal-state system, as is the situation in the old land. The benefits in Germany do not range nearly as high. A married man with no dependents would receive from $1.80 to $4.92 a week. If he had dependents he would receive from $3.12 to $8.40 a week. The general application of the system in Germany is, in my opinion, not at all comparable with the application of the system in the old land.

Before I proceed to a discussion of unemployment insurance in the United States, it might be well to place before hon. members the scope of the British system. As I said a moment ago, in Great Britain the scope covers approximately 18,000,000 workers out of a possible 20,000,000. Contributions are at the rate of 20 cents a week by the employer, 20 cents by the employee and 20 cents by the state. The conditions stipulate that an employee must have made 30 contributions in a period of two years, and that fact is demonstrated by his presenting at the office an unemployment insurance card bearing 30 stamps. The waiting period is set at three days, and as benefits a man receives 17 shillings a week, a wife 9 shillings, and each child 3 shillings plus 25 per cent. The duration ordinarily runs from 26 to 52 weeks.

In cases where an employee has worked a considerable length of time without drawing anything from the unemployment insurance scheme, that period is considerably extended. In my judgment the system in operation in Great Britain is the best in the world.

Perhaps before proceeding to the situation in the United States, I should refer to the former Canadian legislation, which covered about 1,700,000 workers in Canada. Contributions were as follows: 25 cents from the employer, 25 cents from the employee and 10 cents plus costs from the state. In Great Britain the fund pays all costs. The legislation in Canada provided for 40 contributions in a period of two years. The waiting period was set at six days, and the benefits for a husband $6 a week, for a wife $2.70 and for a child 90 cents. The duration was set at from 78 to 100 days.

I now come to a discussion of what has been done in the United States in connection with unemployment insurance. For a long time an ardent and diligent study of the problem was made in that country. I have visited many of the separate states, and made a particular study in the state of Wisconsin where the scheme was first in operation. The states had some data to work on, compiled by some of their larger companies, which had in operation private unemployment insurance schemes. In this connection I would mention the General Electric Company, the American Radiator Company, Proctor and Gamble, and some others. In addition they had the benefit of the investigations made by many out-of-work benefit societies. Several of the governors in eastern, central and western states, in their desire to bring about an unemployment insurance scheme, made a thorough survey in the respective sections.

The United States chamber of commerce made a most exhaustive survey which covered a period of about two years. All the information gathered was submitted to the government at Washington, at which time governmental officials began to realize what they were up against. They were faced with a problem similar to that in Canada, namely the sovereignty of the states. They realized the difficulty they would have in persuading each state of the union to adopt an unemployment insurance scheme.

The final contribution in each state amounts to three per cent of the wage-roll of companies employing eight or more employees. The amount has not, however, always been that much. It started at a lower figure. In one year it stood at 2·7 per cent. After the two-year intervening waiting period has expired the amount in all of the states will be three per cent. The act in the United States does not cover anything like the percentage covered in Great Britain. In the United States agricultural workers are not covered, whereas in Great Britain they are. Of those gainfully employed only 45·6 per cent would be receiving unemployment insurance in the country to the south of us.

Mr. HEAPS: Percentage of what?

Mr. MacNICOL: The percentage of the number employed. For instance, there are 40,832,000 workers in factories, and in industrial pursuits, and there are 38,000,000 agricultural workers of one kind or another.

Mr. ROGERS: The British act is thirty years old.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, I said it came into force in 1911. I will refer to that in a minute.

Mr. ROGERS: In the beginning a smaller number were included.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under the legislation in the United States about 45·6 per cent of the workers would receive the benefits. I have no doubt, however, that as the United States gains experience in the operation of the legislation, it may reach the high point of operation which has been attained in Great Britain As a rule the people in our neighbouring country like to excel, and I have no doubt, when their act has been in operation as long as the British act, it will be a first-class piece of legislation, too.

As a matter of fact, in 1911, at the time of the commencement of the operation of the act in Great Britain, only 2,500,000 workers were covered. After, however, a series of amendments through the years it has arrived at a stage wherein it covers 18,000,000 workers.

When the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) speaks, I should like him, if he has the information available, to tell the house if it is possible to adopt in Canada a measure anything like that adopted in the United States. Over there they have placed a tax on all companies employing eight or more men, although that regulation does not apply to all the states. I have not time to deal with the practice in all the separate states, but I know that in some there is reference to only four employees and, in others, to only five. Generally, however, I believe over half of the states make the provision for eight or more employees. In some states the employee makes a contribution, I believe of one per cent, but in the great majority of cases the contribution is made by the employer. I understand this contribution is three per cent of the wage-roll.

Mr. HEAPS: It is administered by the state.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. As I understand it, the federal government—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—collect the three percent. They then say to the state, "We have prepared a sample unemployment insurance act; if your state adopts this act, or one similar to it to conform to your own conditions, we will return to you ninety per cent of the contribution." I believe that is the percentage.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: The federal government tell the state that they will pay the cost of administration. If a state does not accept that proposition, the money collected is used for public works or unemployment relief within the state. That might not be possible under our system of government. Every state in the American union has adopted an unemployment insurance act, and I believe they will all be in operation within another one or two years. Within two years at least every one of the forty-eight states and the District of Columbia will have systems of unemployment insurance in operation.

I do hope something can be done in this country. Industry is paying a heavy toll to-day. More factories are closing up than are opening. What can be done, I do not know, but the government should not delay. The need is greater than ever. The savings of the people have been exhausted. I know many of these people intimately, and I have been told their trials and troubles, their sorrows and joys. The stories are heartbreaking. Many of them have lost their little homes, and many others are in no state to combat present day conditions. We must be thankful that the depression has not lowered the moral standards of our people, but their physical standards have been decreased. Many men could not take the positions to-day that they could have taken a few years ago. In my judgment there are several reasons why we should have unemployment insurance.

The first is the fact that many men lose their employment because of age. Two weeks ago last Saturday when I was home a man came to see me who had worked eighteen years for a large company on Dufferin street and had finally been let out. That was a substantial length of time for a man to render service to a company. To have held his job that long he must have been an efficient workman. If he had not been honest and capable he would have been discharged long ago. After eighteen years this company said to him, "your services are no longer required." I saw him last Saturday and he told me that in an effort to save what he could, he had sacrificed his small home at such a reduction that all his life savings, barring a few hundred dollars, had disappeared. This man is about sixty years of age and I ask: What hope is there for him? I contend that there should be some arrangement, either governmental or otherwise, to take care of a man who had rendered eighteen years' efficient service.

We take care of our civic employees who subscribe to a fund. We take care of our civil servants. We have perhaps one of the best civil services in the world and they deserve all credit for their ability, but this government contributes toward their retirement. These people are taken care of, but not the poor chap who has no government or any other person to come to his defence when he loses his job. It does not seem right to me. Much of the unrest in Canada to-day is a result of the fact that no provision is made for these men. It might be said, "Why did not that man save something during his eighteen years of work?" I doubt if that man made more than $15 per week, and I defy anyone to save much on that salary when supporting a wife and family. He did save something, but when a man making $10,000 a year cannot save, we cannot expect the poor fellow getting $15 a week to do very much. I could relate other cases with which I am personally familiar, but I shall not at this time.

The next reason is invalidity. I shall review one or two cases in this connection, as my time will soon be up. I know one man who worked in front of a cupola. I have done it myself and I know something about the work. The other day we heard from a moulder from Vancouver who is also a lawyer. He delivered a fine speech in this house, and perhaps, if I were a lawyer, I could also deliver a good speech. But I come back to this poor fellow. He worked in front of that cupola for fourteen years, putting up with the heat in summer and the cold in winter. His health finally became undermined; he could not carry on with his work, and the company told him his services were no longer required. That is not fair treatment. If this government will introduce some legislation for a contributory scheme of unemployment insurance, one that will take care of the poor fellows who are now employed but who may soon be in the same boat as the chaps I have mentioned, they will be rendering a great service to this country.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to rise and say a few words in support of the motion introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). The subject matter of his resolution is one which the group to which I belong have had at heart for a long time. Before, however, I proceed with what I have to say, I should like to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) who has just taken his seat. The hon. member said that almost everyone in the community is protected except the poor working man, that he did not have anyone to protect him or plead his case. He asked why that was so. He gave the answer himself. The reason he is not protected is that he has had no one to plead his case in the forums where such questions are discussed and decided. When he was speaking on the address the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) made the statement that Canada was far behind all other British dominions in the matter of social legislation. He asked why that should be. The reason for that is equally clear. Canada is behind the other dominions in the matter of labour organization, both industrial and political. It is the pressure by labour organizations on the industrial field and in parliament that gets results for the working classes.

I wish to commend the hon. member for Comox-Alberni for the brevity and conciseness of his motion. I do not think he has put in it a word that was not necessary or left one out that was required. For the purposes of discussion his motion may be divided into four parts. First, he points out the urgent need in this country for unemployment insurance. Second, he contends that this need is so urgent that it should receive the immediate attention of the government. Third, he suggests that the plan of social insurance should be contributory in character and, fourth, that it should be national in scope.

I shall try to discuss these points in the order in which I have stated them. First, as to the pressing need for unemployment insurance; I think we are all agreed, and when I say there is a pressing need for unemployment insurance I have in mind that there is a need for a better method of distributing income to the worker, when, through no fault on his part, he is unemployed, than that which prevails to-day. One of the desirable features of an unemployment insurance plan is that those who come under it, after complying with certain conditions known beforehand, will automatically participate in the benefits without having to go through the degrading process they must go through at present before obtaining unemployment relief. I think I am correct in saying that everyone in Canada who has given thought to this matter or who has given consideration to social conditions is in favour of a better method for the distribution of income. Of course I do not contend that unemployment insurance is a perfect method, but I do think it is a decided improvement over the system we follow at present.

The second point in the resolution is that the need for unemployment insurance is so urgent that it should be put into operation without delay. I believe there is very little difference of opinion on that point. We have had unemployment on a large scale for the past ten years, and there is no indication that we are nearing the end of our difficulties in that regard. Indeed, every indication is to the contrary, and I believe it is generally accepted that unemployment conditions of the past few years will be permanent as long as our present system of production and distribution continues. Such being the case, the government should act in this matter with the least possible delay. There has been, indeed, an insistent and widespread demand in Canada for a very long time for unemployment insurance. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) says for the last thirty years. I am not sure if it is that long, but it is at least twenty years. In looking over the records of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada recently, I found that in 1921 this organization went on record as being in favour of unemployment insurance. Whether or not there was an earlier discussion of the matter I do not know. The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada represents the largest number of organized workers in Canada, and I think every year since 1921, in their submissions to the federal cabinet, unemployment insurance has been advocated. The All-Canadian Congress of Labour, in their interviews with the government during the last few years, have also advocated unemployment insurance. The Federation of Catholic Workers and the Canadian Federation of Labour, for the last two years at least, have stressed the need for this kind of social insurance.

In 1919 a royal commission under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice L. G. Mathers was appointed to investigate industrial relations within the Dominion of Canada. After many hearings, and after visiting every industrial centre from Victoria to Sydney, the commissioners stated that fear of unemployment was the chief cause of industrial unrest, and submitted a definite finding as part of their report. There are three short paragraphs in that report, which, I think, are worth reading to the house. The report can be found as an appendix to the report of the national industrial conference of 1919, and the sections to which I refer are on page 8:

34. But supplying the unemployed man with suitable work for the present will not entirely solve the problem. Before the labourer can be made contented the haunting fear of unemployment must be removed from his mind.

35. This is something which affects all wage-earners, but more especially the casual labourer. He can never be sure just when his employment will terminate and he will be left without the means of subsistence.

36. Unemployment may arise from other causes than the loss of his job. He may be incapacitated by sickness, invalidity or old age. Very few labourers are able, out of their earnings, to make provision for these contingencies. We recommend to your government the question of making some provision by a system of state social insurance for those who through no fault of their own are unable to work, whether the inability arises from lack of opportunity, sickness, invalidity or old age. Such insurance would remove the spectre of fear which now haunts the wage earner, and make him a more contented and better citizen.

I submit that if the worker had been strongly represented in this parliament since 1919, unemployment insurance would have been on the statute books before now.

Mr. NEILL: Might I ask the date of that report?

Mr. MacINNIS: This was the Mathers commission, which sat in 1919.

I really do not think it necessary to elaborate on the need for unemployment insurance. I am convinced that there is so much unanimity on the subject that opposition to the principle is no longer an obstacle to the enactment of legislation. I am therefore in agreement with the mover of this motion, that the need is so urgent that it should receive the immediate attention of the government.

This brings me to the third point in the motion, that the insurance scheme or plan should be contributory in character. By that I understand the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to advocate a system of unemployment insurance under which the insured worker would make weekly or monthly contributions when employed. I am accepting that feature of the motion also. That is as far as I am called upon to go at this time. If we were discussing a bill instead of a resolution I might have something further to say on that point.

As far as I am able to learn, in all countries, with the possible exception of Russia, in which they have unemployment insurance it is on a contributory basis. The representatives of organized labour have gone on record as approving the contributory principle. If, as I said, we were discussing a bill, serious consideration would have to be given to workers in the low wage class, and exemptions might have to be made from the contributory principle. But I need not discuss that, because it is not before us. The fact, however, must be kept in mind that, with the very low wages prevailing in Canada at the present time, we might not be serving any useful purpose in taking money from people, who are not getting sufficient to maintain a decent standard of living or enough to keep them in normal health, in order to provide for a future contingency.

I think we should also try to get it clearly in our minds that insurance is not a solution for the problem of unemployment. It will not meet the needs of all the unemployed and much less will it prevent unemployment. We must face the fact that the kind of unemployment insurance we have in mind when discussing this resolution will not touch thousands of those who are unemployed to-day. There is, however, a turn-over in employment —if that is the correct term to use. That is, many workers are employed part of the time, and part of the time are out of work. Such workers would benefit under a plan such as we have in mind. How many workers would be covered by a scheme I do not know, possibly about a million and three quarters. On the other hand, thousands of those contributing would never draw financial benefits. That, however, is a condition inseparable from almost any kind of insurance.

But as it is conceded that such a scheme would have a stabilizing effect on employment, benefits would accrue to all although it would be difficult to compute them in dollars and cents.

I agree with the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) that unemployment insurance means the sharing of the hazards of industrial employment; it is a realization of the fact that under our present economic arrangement a certain amount of unemployment is inevitable and that financial provision should be made to meet it.

In this connection I should like to give a very few statistics from the British Labour Gazette. This quotation appears in the January issue of the Canadian Congress Journal.

> According to recent statistics published in the Labour Gazette, official organ of the British ministry of labour, 1,679,000 insured persons between the ages of sixteen and sixty-four out of a total number covered by the unemployment insurance plan of 12,250,000 were registered as unemployed at the employment exchanges in Great Britain on November 14, 1938.

The report says:

> It is interesting to note that of this number 1,084,187, had been on the register less than three months, and approximately 825,000 persons, or 49·1 per cent of the total number of applicants, had been on the register for less than six weeks.
>
> There were 165,690 persons, or 9·9 per cent of the total, who had been on the register for more than three months but less than six months; 86,911 persons, or 5·2 per cent of the total, who had been on the register for more than six months but less than nine months; 64,636 persons, or 3·8 per cent of the total, who had been on the register for more than nine months but less than twelve months; leaving only 278,387 persons, or 16·6 per cent of the total who had been registered as unemployed continuously for more than a year.

I believe it is a tendency of our industrial set-up that those who work have more continuity of employment, while those who are out of work are out of work nearly all the time.

I must say again that I am not supporting or proposing unemployment insurance as a cure for unemployment. It has not accomplished that anywhere. But I know of no country that has put unemployment insurance on its statute books which has repealed that law. That is an indication that the law is meeting a social need and that the sooner we get it on the statute books of Canada, the better.

The fourth point in the motion is that unemployment insurance should be national in scope. I am also in full agreement with the mover of the motion in that regard. I believe that any attempt to legislate in this matter on a provincial basis would be fraught with considerable danger. It is not necessary at the moment to go into the many factors which would make it very difficult to administer a provincial scheme. There is also the fact that the majority of the provinces are not in a position financially to carry unemployment insurance; for one or two to embark on the scheme would only increase our difficulties, create more friction between the provinces and the dominion, and add to the factors which make for national disunity. I have the greatest regard for my own province of British Columbia, but I am a Canadian first and a British Columbian second. I am anxious in every way possible to serve my people and add to their security and well-being, and I am satisfied I can do that to the best advantage by giving power to the federal authority to deal for the whole of Canada with those questions which, because of changed economic conditions, have become national in scope. I am thoroughly convinced that much of the talk we hear to-day about the sacredness of provincial rights and the determination in some quarters to maintain those rights at all costs has nothing more substantial behind it than the desire for power on the part of certain individuals whom accident or chance has thrown into positions of authority, and who, having become intoxicated with a little power, seek to hold on to it at no matter what cost to the whole of the country. I will go further and say that those leaders who are opposed to giving the federal authority the power to deal with matters of this kind are not expressing the desires of the people of their provinces. The people are looking for economic security and social well-being, and are not concerned with maintaining constitutional relations which were just and proper in their time but which to-day have become a fetter on social progress. Insistence on the maintenance of provincial rights to the point where that insistence retards national progress becomes, in my opinion, provincial stupidity.

Unemployment insurance is of the utmost importance to Canada to-day. Even though it will not meet the needs of many of the unemployed, it is no small thing to put thousands of workers now employed in a position where when they become unemployed they can maintain themselves and their families without having to submit to the degrading experience of those unfortunates who to-day must apply for unemployment relief. I believe that the federal government should go directly to the people of those provinces whose governments are retarding the enactment of this much-needed legislation and tell the people clearly and in language that cannot be misunderstood what they are anxious to do and what is keeping them from doing it.

The people of Canada are demanding unemployment insurance as they demanded old age pensions a little more than a decade ago. In that regard I should like to quote a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the session of 1926 when the old age pensions legislation was being debated. I am not sure whether this discussion was on the resolution or on the bill, but I rather think it was on the bill. The present leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), then a member of the house, was showing by the reading of letters that had passed between the dominion government and the provinces that the provincial governments were opposed to old age pensions. The Prime Minister said, as reported in Hansard of 1926, volume III, page 2487:

> In reference to the answers from the nine provinces, which the hon. gentleman has just read, I might say that those very replies convinced the government of the futility of ever having an old age pension scheme enacted by correspondence with the provinces. We concluded that the best way would be to enact concrete legislation. We thought that was the only way to get anywhere.

I commend the Prime Minister for his determination on that occasion, and I think that if he were to show the same kind of determination now, ways and means could be found to put unemployment insurance on the statute books in spite of the provinces, and that the people of the provinces would compel their governments to take advantage of it in the same way as they compelled them to take advantage of the benefits of the Old Age Pensions Act. For the past eight years the international labour office at Geneva has issued a year book in which is reviewed, among other things concerning labour, the progress and extension of social insurance all over the world. At the conclusion of the review in the 1938 year book they refer to social insurance. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) mentioned that in the old country unemployment insurance now covers agricultural as well as industrial workers, and in the year book this statement appears with reference to agricultural workers:

> Social insurance has another very important task to perform, namely, the extension of its protection to rural as well as to urban workers. This extension, which necessitates the adaptation of methods to rural conditions, is perfectly feasible, as is proved by the experience of many countries which have developed agricultural insurance schemes resolutely and methodically.
>
> * * *
>
> Agriculture is becoming more and more industrialized, and this process calls for new forms of social protection. A large field of activity is being thrown open to social insurance in the agricultural countries, and the considerable experience already gained in this field should permit them to adapt themselves rapidly to the requirements of their task.
>
> Social insurance of independent workers.—Another important aspect of the recent development of social insurance is its extension to independent workers. In many countries craftsmen, traders, small farmers, professional workers and other independent workers with limited incomes are calling for measures to give them security in their old gae. Though formerly violently opposed to every kind of collective protection, they have come to realize the material and moral value of insurance and desire to benefit from it in their turn.
>
> * * *
>
> Social insurance can neither heal nor prevent all ills. Its resources and practical possibilities, though considerable, are limited, and its action must be kept within measured bounds. Whenever the necessity of such action is recognized, however, it should be effective and adequate. The effort of organization and social solidarity represented by social insurance needs to be continued and, in many cases, intensified. A lasting civilization is unthinkable except on the basis of a new economic and social order in which workers will enjoy, not only a higher standard of living, but also the absolute guarantee of complete economic security.

I do not suggest that unemployment insurance on the scale on which it could be adopted in this country at the moment could give that adequate and complete guarantee, but I do insist that it is a step towards that desirable end. To what I have just read I should like to add this as my own considered opinion. I believe it is now generally admitted that further progress in the material sphere cannot be achieved without a system of social security that makes provision for a more equitable distribution of the national income than now prevails and that will protect workers and their families from many of the vicissitudes of life.

Any program of economic recovery and prosperity runs the risk of failure if it does not include a soundly conceived social plan. The world's productive capacity in labour and material has for the past hundred and fifty years been kept busy building a capital structure, that is, producing equipment for the production of wealth. In the opinion of many that work is now finished. If, then, we are to keep busy the machines which were built with much labour and privation we must find ways of financing consumption. I must have borrowed that phrase unconsciously from the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), but in this case it is a good phrase. Social insurance is one of the ways in which this can be, at least partly, done. I am not arguing that it is the best way, but it is the way most universally accepted.

We cannot move much faster than we have public opinion with us, without some danger to the stability of the social structure. But we cannot stand still. Move we must or perish. The need for social insurance is being universally recognized. The principle of social protection is winning the day against the anarchy of individualism. The work of social organization, however, is only beginning; it must be vigorously pushed forward; for in our changing world that is the price of lasting progress. The premium paid for social insurance is small compared with the risks that confront humanity if it refuses or is unable to master the forces of production at its disposal and distribute the product fairly.

In concluding these few remarks, I think we should take a vote on this question and make it clear beyond the possibility of doubt that this house stands solidly behind the government in support of a plan of unemployment insurance national in scope. The unanimous endorsation by this house of the principle expressed in this resolution would do much to strengthen the hands and, I hope, the determination of the government to press forward with unemployment insurance with all speed. At the very root of the friction and bickerings which menace the unity and progress of our country lies the fear engendered by poverty and insecurity. When the people of this dominion are linked together, not by a legal constitution but by common economic and social ties, when they begin to look to the federal government as the seat of authority and the centre from which they can expect guidance in solving those problems which face all the people, they will quickly begin to acquire that attitude and outlook so essential to national unity and nationhood.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), let me say at the outset that as one who has been long an advocate of unemployment insurance I am pleased indeed to support the motion now before the house. In doing so, however, I am of the opinion that not only is the time opportune for the government to consider contributory unemployment insurance, but in view of the seriousness of conditions prevailing throughout Canada to-day the government should also give some consideration to a policy of contributory social insurance, with the further object of widening our present old age pension scheme. This would take care of the great numbers of our citizens between the ages of sixty and seventy who not only find themselves destitute but will, I fear, never again have an opportunity of maintaining themselves, and so must of necessity depend upon the state, either municipal, provincial or federal, for even the bare necessities of life. These deplorable conditions are largely the result of our economic system, over which they have no direct control.

Time will not permit me to deal as extensively as I should like with every aspect of the serious economic problems confronting us to-day. I intend, however, during the short time at my disposal to deal with one or two of our most important problems, and especially dealing with the lack of social security, and before closing my remarks, to offer certain suggestions.

Briefly speaking, the hazards of modern life to-day are largely these: Unemployment, sickness, death of the bread-winning member of the family, and old age. Regarding unemployment and loss of wages as a result of injury, and so on, it is not my purpose to deal at great length with injuries to workmen which have invariably accompanied industry. For the employed the risks and hazards have been and are taken care of, in most of the provinces of Canada to-day, by way of workmen's compensation. In passing, however, it should be noted that the casualties of modern industry, particularly on the north American continent, exceed the casualties of actual war.

The late Doctor Downey, speaking on this matter, stated in his book on workmen's compensation in 1924, that the total casualties of the American expeditionary force in the world war did not equal the casualties of workmen in peaceful employment between 1917 and the signing of the armistice in 1918. He declared, further, that the toll of life and limb enacted by United States industries during the second decade of the twentieth century exceeded that nation's losses in battle from the declaration of independence to the present date. Those are appalling statements and show to how serious an extent modern machinery has increased the frequency and severity of accidents, beyond all previous experience.

The machine has revolutionized our social as well as our economic system. Let me briefly illustrate this: Fifty or more years ago most Canadians could count on maintaining themselves, either on a farm or in a small business, until they were seventy or seventy-five years of age. A man with the aid of his family could and did carry on his work so long as he had the strength to get around. Artisans in those days were craftsmen, and in many crafts owned and controlled the machinery of production.

Such conditions, however, do not now exist. It is indeed interesting to note that even Canada, in keeping with other countries, is gradually becoming an industrial country. The population of Canada is leaving the farm for a life in industry or in the city. As evidence of this statement I quote the following figures: In 1871, seventy-five per cent of Canada's population was rural, and only twenty-five per cent urban. In 1891 the rural population had dropped to sixty per cent. In 1921 the rural population was only fifty per cent, and for the first time equalled that of the urban population. The latest figures I have, for 1931, show a serious drift from the farms to the cities, the population being forty-six per cent rural and fifty-four per cent urban. To-day Canada's urban population exceeds her farm population by some 700,000, and while the drift has been more or less gradual from 1871 to 1931, it is my belief that the drift from the farms of our country to the urban or city centres from 1931 to the present time has been accentuated not only by the attractions industrial life has for many who live the simple but nevertheless healthy life on the farms, but by the deplorable conditions existing on farms, caused by the extremely low prices prevailing for farm produce, coupled with the high cost of articles the farmer has of necessity to buy.

These unequalled conditions are driving many farmers off the land. As an illustration, in 1926, ten bushels of wheat would purchase one suit of clothes for a farmer; now it requires twenty-five bushels. One barrel or two and a half boxes of apples would buy a pair of ladies' shoes; now it takes two barrels or five boxes. The same will apply in connection with other articles such as milk, eggs, and other types of produce. So long as we raise the cost of living in terms of industrial production and curtail the rewards for farm production, we may expect hard times for everyone.

The labour unions were among the first to attempt to equalize the burden of unemployment, by providing out-of-work benefits and by distributing the costs among the entire membership. Such relief was indispensable to the growth and power of trade unions. In Great Britain the labour unions and friendly societies began to pay allowances as early as the middle of the last century. Between 1897 and 1907 the trade unions of Great Britain distributed nearly $20,000,000, and gave protection to some 1,500,000 trade unionists.

[Mr. Reid.]

Like most forms of social insurance, unemployment insurance went through the stage of voluntary effort, and although some countries still have some system of voluntary unemployment insurance, there are to-day compulsory contributory unemployment insurance schemes in most of the leading countries, including such countries as Great Britain; Germany; New Zealand; Queensland, Australia; Italy; the United States, and many others.

Great Britain, however, as in many other social reforms, was the first country to lead the way. The National Health Act of 1911, the first system of its kind in the world, was one of the finest pieces of legislation passed by any country in this regard. The act has been changed many times since, but generally speaking there has been a broadening rather than a narrowing of the act on behalf of the workers.

In 1935 a total of over 14,500,000 persons between the ages of sixteen and sixty-four, were insured in Great Britain, with an expenditure of over $600,000,000 going to the unemployed alone. It is worth while noting, in passing, that two of the most highly industrialized countries of the world to-day, namely the United States and Canada, have done less by way of insurance for their workers than any other country. This is certainly not to Canada's credit.

There is one form of social insurance prevalent in both the United States and Canada which I think it would be advisable at this point to mention. I refer to the form of private personal insurance against death, a type of insurance described by the high sounding title of life insurance. In a discussion of this kind it is important that life insurance be mentioned, because it has been repeatedly stated—especially by the big interests in this country—that there is little or no need for social or unemployment insurance in Canada because private social insurance of varying kinds is so widely prevalent. Let us examine this phase of social insurance for just a moment or two and see what actual security or protection the people really have in life insurance, so-called.

Life insurance is mainly of two types—ordinary insurance, carried largely by the middle and upper classes, and industrial or burial insurance, mostly carried by the workers and the poorer classes. Studies by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company in the United States indicate that the death rate among industrial workers between the ages of forty-five and fifty-five is about 43 per cent higher than among men in non-industrial occupations. And when one considers that the average industrial policy, the only kind of insurance within their means, is around $200, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what protection is there for those people through that form of insurance?

The primary difficulty with life insurance to-day is its excessive cost. Maxwell Stewart, in his book Social Security states that in the eleven year period, 1922 to 1933, only 18·8 per cent of all ordinary life insurance policies in the United States were closed on account of death or maturity. In other words, four out of every five policies were absolute failures and I venture to say that the percentage of failures of policies during the past eight years has been greater than in the eleven year period mentioned.

Then in connection with industrial insurance policies, since a lapsed policy of this kind provides little or no refund to the policyholder, it is obvious that the poorest sections of our population are thereby deprived of many millions of dollars. It should be noted that only eight out of every hundred industrial insurance policies reached maturity during the same eleven year period. All industrial workers are bitterly aware of their need of social security. Only too well do they realize life's many hazards such as sickness, injury, loss of employment and old age, all entailing much suffering and privation. But the insurance companies deliberately make the contract so unintelligible to the buyer that he knows nothing of what he is getting. Do not forget that industrial policies cost eight times what an ordinary policy costs. In other words, the most extortionist type of protection is reserved for the poorest people.

I think it can be fairly stated that life insurance as we know it to-day, the outgrowth of our industrial age, is not doing the job of providing economic security for the masses of our people. Generally speaking, life insurance as carried on to-day with its high pressure salesmanship, almost compelling policyholders to carry twice as much life insurance as they require or can pay for comfortably, coupled with its excessive cost, is getting to be looked upon in many quarters largely as a racket.

I should like to take up a minute or two at this time to discuss the salaries paid in these companies, which I mentioned a short time ago. The Prime Minister of Canada and the fifteen members of his cabinet receive a total remuneration of approximately $200,000. The President of the United States and ten of his chief executives receive a total of $225,000. The president and ten high officials of the Metropolitan Life receive $684,000. Thirty-nine other officials in the company receive salaries of over $25,000. The New York Life is in a somewhat similar position, the same number of high officials receiving $604,000 as against the $200,000 paid to the Prime Minister and cabinet of this country.

There is another important point to which I should like to direct the attention of the house. I think it is well worth noting that the total number of life insurance policies in force in this country is a little over 6,000,000, representing insurance in force amounting to over $6,000,000,000. There are 988,000 policies in Canadian companies held by persons who live outside of Canada and who are insured for the enormous sum of $3,000,000,000. Last year Canadian insurance companies collected nearly $200,000,000, and in addition $116,000,000 was received from people living outside this country. These people, as I say, have invested in Canadian life insurance to the extent of some $3,000,000,000. These figures are interesting. The fact that these people have invested such large sums of money in this country shows, I believe, their confidence in Canadian affairs.

When we consider that the total amount of money paid to life insurance companies last year was $315,555,682, which companies are carrying insurance to the stupendous total of $9,500,000,000, is it any wonder that questions are being asked in many quarters about the investments, the costs, the mortality rates and the high executive salaries of the life insurance companies? An agitation is going on in the United States to have an inquiry by the securities and exchange commission into life insurance investments. When one considers how the activities of these companies have permeated the life of this country and of the United States; when one considers the great political and financial powers they now exercise, it might be a good idea for the Canadian government also to hold such an inquiry.

I believe that the enormous sums of money now paid by the people to the insurance companies would, if paid into the treasury of Canada, go a long way, if not all the way, toward providing unemployment and health insurance, and in addition, this money would, I believe, provide adequate maintenance pensions for all our aged people, either at sixty or sixty-five years of age. Let me give one illustration, and I speak of my own province. Last year the payrolls of British Columbia amounted to $250,000,000, roughly speaking. If six per cent of that were to be taken by the provincial government, it would amount to $15,000,000. If that practice were followed over a course of years, I believe it would entirely wipe out the debt of the province as well as take care of unemployment insurance requirements.

So far as insurance for the masses is concerned, Canada is one of the most backward nations in the world. At the beginning of the depression in 1931 nearly every country in Europe had some form of social insurance. At the present time forty-three nations provide old age security, thirty-two of them operating under contributory insurance schemes, eleven, including Canada, operating under non-contributory pension schemes, while one country, Japan, still relies on voluntary state insurance. Of the eleven countries operating under non-contributory schemes, five in addition to Canada have set the age limit at seventy years; three have set it at sixty-five years, one at fifty-five years and, strange to say, one other country, Newfoundland, has set it at seventy-five years. It should not be overlooked that some countries provide for a lower age limit for female workers. Of the thirty-two countries which operate contributory schemes, the majority have set the age limit at sixty-five. As I pointed out, some countries provide for women at the age of sixty years. Twenty-five countries now have compulsory health insurance, while fourteen countries pay family allowances. Unemployment insurance schemes now exist in some twenty-two countries, of which schemes fourteen are compulsory.

We sometimes hear hon. members extol Sweden as an outstanding example of what a country can do for her workers. To me it is at least passing strange that we have heard nothing from these members about the country which has given more sane philosophy to the world and has done more for her workers than any other country, namely, Great Britain. In saying that, I am not unmindful of the fact that other countries than Great Britain, for instance, Sweden and New Zealand, have endeavoured to alleviate the lot of their workers. But, Sweden, that country referred to so often by hon. members on the other side, does not surpass, if indeed she equals Great Britain in what she has done on behalf of the masses of her people. For example, the Swedish system of company towns, of which we have heard such a great deal, may be all right for Sweden, but they are still company towns. We must not forget that Sweden of all countries benefited most from and during the great war. Her unemployment figures in 1933-34 amounted to 189,229 out of a population of 6,000,000. Those are unemployment figures only. Again, Sweden certainly has had more labour trouble and strikes than almost any other country in the world. According to Marquis Child's book, This is Democracy, published in 1938, from 1927 to 1936 Sweden lost 1,818 man-days per thousand workers as against 791 in the United States and only 333 in Great Britain. And would anyone say that Sweden's cooperative stores were better than those in existence throughout Great Britain to-day?

I want, however, to deal more particularly with our own conditions and our present system of industrial life with its highly mechanized mode of production. The workers are now finding it increasingly difficult, on account of the comparatively few years during which they are employed, to lay by any reserve for their old age, not to speak of sickness and other drawbacks. What manufacturer or what employer of labour these days cares to hire men fifty-five or sixty years of age?

Let us examine the position of the wage-earner. In 1937, the latest figures I have, the number of wage-earners in Canada totalled 2,706,000. In the manufacturing industries the total number of workers was 594,359. Note here a very interesting comparison. In 1890 there were in Canada 75,961 manufacturing establishments with a capitalization of $353,000,000, giving employment to a total of 369,564 employees. Just see what has taken place in the interval. In 1936 the number of establishments in Canada had dropped from 75,961 to 24,202, while the capitalization had increased from $353,000,000 to $3,271,263,000. Mark now the average wage. In 1890 the average wage for industrial workers was $1,321, as against $896 in 1936, and if one considers how the cost of living has increased one will see now increasingly difficult it has become for the workers, receiving lower wages, to lay aside anything to provide for themselves in old age. According to the Canada Year Book, taking 1913 as 100, in 1914 the cost of all items was 103, while in 1936 the cost of all items had risen to 127.

For a moment I want to mention something about the income structure, because I have heard some manufacturers say, "Why, the workers are getting more per hour to-day than they were getting five or ten years ago." I should like to place on record the results of an analysis made in the United States by the Brookings Institution, as given in a book entitled The Income Structure of the United States. I think these results which are summarized in a table appearing on page 122 apply equally to Canada. I quote:

> Before we examine the structural changes in the earnings of the steel workers, let us note that the average hourly earnings for the group in question were 68·5 cents in 1929 and 72·4 cents in 1935—

The house will note that the hourly rate had gone up; but the average weekly earnings, which in 1929 were between $33 and $34, had fallen to $24 in 1935. The book continues:

This illustrates again the inadequacy of wage increases unless they are accompanied by reasonably full employment. For the workers in the seven departments of the steel industry the rise of more than five per cent in hourly earnings was accompanied by a drop of 28 per cent in weekly earnings.

In a book which I am sure every hon. member has received, called Canada To-day, by Professor F. R. Scott, there is a very interesting fact noted in connection with the income tax paid in Canada. That tax begins at $1,000 for single persons, and a married man with two children pays income tax on earnings of more than $2,800. In 1936 there were 199,102 Canadians who paid income tax. Less than twelve per cent of these were receiving more than $5,000 a year. An estimate made of the distribution of total national income among all wage and salary earners, based on census and income tax returns for 1931, showed some interesting figures. The totals are given in this book, but I have not time to read them all. The table shows, however, that the 11,000 income receivers at the top had as much income as the 400,000 at the bottom of the social scale. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, that at least illustrates the position in which great numbers of industrial workers find themselves to-day.

Speaking about the matter of old age pensions, the wide acceptance of old age pension legislation throughout the entire world is worth noting. Prior to the beginning of this century only five nations, with approximately one hundred million inhabitants, had any form of aid for their aged wage-earners. To-day forty-three countries with a combined population of well over seven hundred million give protection to their aged citizens, and, as has been pointed out already, thirty-one countries are on a contributory basis. The trouble with many people to-day is that they consider this problem only in terms of relief. From the point of view of the aged themselves there is a vast difference between the right to a pension as it applies to a pension scheme, where the applicant has a legal right as a contributor to participate, and a non-contributory old age pension scheme such as we have in Canada, where no assistance is granted unless the applicants acknowledge their poverty and submit to an investigation into their private and personal affairs. The truth of this is so apparent and so well known that it need not be further elaborated. There is a further fact which should not be forgotten. Even though the aged have no means left they may still have some moral and justifiable pride, which splendid virtue I maintain is well worth preserving and retaining.

In view of the antagonistic attitude of certain provinces of Canada against the suggestion or proposal that the federal government should be allowed to proceed with unemployment insurance in those particular provinces, I would suggest to the government that the policy adopted by the United States in 1936 in connection with the Social Security Insurance Act be studied as one which might be put into practice by the federal government of this country. When that legislation was first proposed in the United States the same constitutional question was raised there that we have had raised here. The federal government of the United States got around that objection, however, in much the same manner that we got around objections to the old age pension scheme back in 1928. The United States government set up a fund amounting to over $143,000,000, and told the various states of the union that this money was available for certain security schemes. I have not time to go into them all in detail, but briefly they were these: Old age pensions; unemployment compensation; dependent children's allowances, maternity, child welfare and crippled children; child welfare services; pensions for the blind; vocational rehabilitation and public health. To-day forty-four states have unemployment insurance; forty-six, old age pensions; twenty-five, pensions for the blind; and it is expected that before long all will be participating.

In passing the federal social security act, the federal government of the United States has, I believe, copied the principle put into effect by the Canadian government when in 1928, under Liberal administration, they passed the present Old Age Pensions Act, which act, I maintain needs complete revision. If the people of Canada had waited until the federal government had had the consent of every province before putting into effect old age pensions, it is very doubtful indeed if old age pensions would be in effect throughout Canada to-day. There is no reason why the same course that was followed in 1928 in regard to old age pensions could not be followed now in regard to unemployment insurance, and I am so suggesting.

I should like to have the government go further, however, and consider, when they are at it, the entire question of social security, including not only contributory unemployment insurance but also old age pensions for all eligible Canadian citizens commencing not later than at the age of sixty-five, similar to what has been done in Great Britain and more recently in the United States and New Zealand. I believe, Mr. Speaker, it is high time we took a more realistic view instead of a mere statistical view of our present economic situation. After all, statistics do not always reveal the actual situation.

Great Britain was the first nation to take a long term realistic view of her internal affairs and so saved that country from internal disorders if not from actual revolution itself. Recognizing that insecurity is inherent in the modern industrial business structure, Great Britain provided economic security for her people through an elaborate social system. As a result Great Britain spent for social insurance, including payments to the unemployed, the sick, the injured, the aged and the widows and children, a total of $1,369,000,000 in 1933. By this means Great Britain has preserved and is preserving the British democratic form of government, thereby giving renewed faith and inspiration to the British people in their own system of democratic government, something which I fear we might be in some danger of losing in Canada to-day.

Unfortunately the blind greed and stupidity of our business leaders and some of their political allies fail to recognize the growing storm of discontent gradually creeping over Canada to-day.

Relief, it is true, is being provided on a scale hitherto unknown in this country, but in the giving of relief even under the most favourable conditions and even though essentials of life are provided it should not be forgotten that relief violates man's most valued possession—his self-esteem.

The question of social security to my mind does not and should rest not entirely on economic grounds but on humanitarian grounds as well. What great value should be attached to any economic system if it cannot adequately meet the needs of all her people.

The system adopted by that great and wise nation Great Britain, one of progressive taxation and an adequate system of social security, is one of real merit and one well worth while considering and adopting. Our system, although somewhat progressive, has brought about no re-apportionment of our wealth; in fact, it has put and is to-day putting more wealth in the hands of the wealthy and making the poor even poorer.

The insecurity of our people to-day in the face of the hazards of modern life, with unemployment the chief hazard, menaces more than mere national prosperity. It endangers the very existence of our social order.

In closing, I would express my belief that if a plan such as I have outlined were put into effect, not only would it provide for greater employment of our young people, by removing persons of sixty and sixty-five from the labour market, but it would help to give a greater sense of security to our people and remove from our midst many of the disquieting fears which now confront us.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take very much of the time of the house on this question. I rise merely to put myself in the position of supporting the resolution. The whole matter has been very thoroughly discussed here this afternoon by various speakers. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), who moved the resolution, and the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), who seconded it, dealt with it in detail. Others have also discussed the whole subject very fully. The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Reid) covered a little wider ground, by taking in old age pensions and social security in general; but whatever he does, the hon. gentleman has two qualifications which I rather like; one is industry and the other is the burr in his voice. One does not need to hear the skirl of the bagpipes when the hon. gentleman is speaking, because one knows at once whence he came and the kind of food on which he was brought up—porridge, mostly, I mean.

As the resolution is brief and covers the ground very fully, and since a good many other matters have been touched upon by various speakers in the course of the debate, I will take the liberty of reading it:

> That in the opinion of this house, a national system of contributory unemployment insurance for Canada is a pressing need at the present time and should receive immediate attention.

I think it deserves the support of us all; and to show that our party is in good faith in supporting it I can adduce two very good proofs. One is the act which we put in force when this party was in power, in 1935, although the act was later pronounced ultra vires; the other is the resolution of the National Conservative convention held last July; it is brief, so I will read it:

> To encourage and support throughout Canada a plan of national unemployment and retirement insurance.

That is a plank of our party's platform. The legislation we put into effect, and which was assented to on June 28, 1935, was, to quote the title:

> An act to establish an employment and social insurance commission, to provide for a national employment service, for insurance against unemployment, for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto.

It is chapter 38 of the statutes of Canada, 1935, 25-26 George V. That legislation covered other ground than unemployment insurance.

For example, section 7 points out that the commission which was to be appointed shall, in addition to its powers and duties as otherwise provided by this act—

—as soon as practicable after appointment, undertake investigations for the purpose of making proposals to the governor general in council for——various other matters, such as:

—providing unemployment insurance for the employments excepted from the operation of part III of the act.

And so on. On the next page provision is included for training of the unemployed—something which has been taken up by this government to a certain extent in recent times. In part II an employment service was proposed. I will read section 10:

The commission shall organize an employment service for the Dominion of Canada, in manner hereinafter provided, and shall be responsible for the constitution and management of such employment service and the direction, maintenance and control of all employment offices established as hereinafter provided.

That is very much what was proposed, I believe, by the Purvis commission, although not carried out by the government.

This resolution is in accord with the act as we passed it, because it makes insurance contributory. Section 17 states:

(1) The funds required for providing unemployment benefit and for making any other payments which under this act are to be made out of the unemployment insurance fund, established under this part of this act, shall be derived partly from moneys provided by parliament, partly from contributions by employed persons and partly from contributions by the employers of those persons, which contributions shall be paid by means of revenue stamps as hereinafter provided, or otherwise as may be prescribed by the commission.

That is all I shall quote from the act, which is a very complete one. Quite frankly, at the time of its passing I was not as familiar with it as I might have been. It was handled through the Department of Labour, then under Hon. W. A. Gordon, and at that time I was minister of railways. Nevertheless I well remember long discussions in council, prolonged disputes about certain industries which insisted upon being exempted from the provisions of the act. At the same time the whole act is so complete that when this government finally decides to bring into effect legislation along the lines of the resolution, it might well be based upon the act of 1935, with, possibly, modifications to meet some changed conditions.

I do believe that had the act as passed been put into effect, leaving a private individual to bring it before the courts, it would still be in force. If, instead of being submitted to the courts for decision, that act had been placed in operation, it might still be operating to-day. When something is a fait accompli, it is rare that action is taken against it unless it is distinctly injurious, and this is not an injurious measure. I believe unemployment insurance will have to be brought into operation in the near future, whether this government institutes it or whether the successor to this government takes the initiative. I say that because to my mind legislation such as is in force in so many other countries—England, Australia, New Zealand, and the United States more recently, to mention a few—is recognized everywhere as necessary under modern conditions of employment or unemployment as you will, and it must be so recognized in Canada also.

I believe I have made the criticism in this house, as I have done elsewhere, that the trouble with the Canadian people is that we are less advanced than the people of almost any of the modern countries. The most advanced country, as was said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, is probably Great Britain. I myself have made that statement on many platforms, and I believe that if we were more ready to copy Great Britain in her advanced legislation, as so often we are prepared to copy her in other matters, we should be showing a progressive spirit and putting into effect ideas appropriate to this great country.

We must do whatever we can to bring about security for our people. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) the other day, in offering some criticism of myself, said that I do not propose much that is constructive. On one occasion before the Canadian club in Ottawa—it was a year ago last month—when his leader the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was present, and when the minister himself, I believe, was in attendance, I did suggest unemployment insurance. That was one of the constructive ideas I put forward at that time, and I offered many other suggestions of a progressive sort on that occasion—so many, in fact, that the present leader of the government came up to me and remarked that I had made the best Liberal speech he had heard. Well, theoretically it was a Liberal speech. The trouble is that this Liberal government is progressive only in theory. Unfortunately it does not go ahead in practice and do what it promises in theory.

The point I wish to make now is that in this democratic British country we must cure the conditions from which we are suffering to-day. If what I have described as the great defect of democracy, unemployment, is not remedied, then I am afraid that the system under which we live will not last very long. For saying that on a number of occasions in speeches that were more or less political, though I have said the same thing in other speeches, before Canadian clubs and elsewhere, I have been accused of being too radical. I repeat, however, that if we do not bring into effect measures which will cure unemployment, measures which will take care of those who are out of work through no fault of their own, I sincerely believe that this democratic system will not continue. In a country such as this, rich in resources, with a sparse population and a huge area, people will not continue indefinitely to put up with conditions such as those under which they live in Canada to-day, with 800,000 people on relief and practically half a million unemployed. And, personally I do not think that they should.

If the British democratic system, not only in Canada, but in the United States, in Great Britain and in France cannot solve the problems that face these countries to-day, then I do not think it is worth saving. I do not believe in the socialism suggested by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I believe in the present capitalist system properly improved to meet the difficulties that exist under it. As I say, I do not believe in socialism. Rather, I want to see the present economic system, the present British democratic system with its parliamentary and other liberties maintained. But I do not think that this system can be maintained unless we cure the evils which exist under it. To me that is a particularly strong argument for something being done about the condition which we are now discussing.

I know that the attitude the government takes is that the trouble lies with the British North America Act; the trouble is in getting that act changed. Well, I do not think that is necessary. Action could be taken by cooperation with the provinces. Mr. Duplessis, the Premier of Quebec, is one of those who have been quoted as opposing any change in the British North America Act, as is his right, but even he, in the last paragraph of his letter dated December 30, 1937, makes a suggestion to the Prime Minister. In the earlier paragraphs of the letter he opposes any change in the act, but in the concluding paragraph he states:

> In conclusion, again I state that the province of Quebec is willing to cooperate heartily in the establishment of a sound and fair system of unemployment insurance, which could be established on a national scope, without infringing upon the rights and autonomy of the provinces.

[Mr. Manion.]

I assume the Minister of Labour will deal with that. I admit that it might not be as satisfactory as a national system which could be put into effect if a change were made in the British North America Act; but under the circumstances, with certain provinces refusing to consent to any change in the act, I see no reason why unemployment insurance could not be put into effect along the lines suggested by Mr. Duplessis.

Mr. ROGERS: Is the hon. gentleman aware that in August, 1934, I believe, the government of which he was a member did invite the provinces to attend a conference to consider, among other things, the transfer of jurisdiction over unemployment insurance to the dominion parliament? That conference was never held. The government of which he was a member appropriated in a sense the authority over unemployment insurance. In other words, there was an assertion on the part of the government that the power to enact an unemployment insurance scheme lay with the dominion parliament, and it was against that view that the privy council ultimately gave its decision.

Mr. MANION: I have no quarrel with that. I do not remember the incident, but the hon. gentleman is Minister of Labour and I was minister of railways at the time, so that I am not as familiar with that aspect as he might be. But I do not see that his statement changes the facts. Men like Mr. Bennett, who was a constitutional lawyer, Mr. Guthrie, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), who have all studied the problem in its constitutional aspects, apparently came to the conclusion—a conclusion to which naturally I could take no exception, not being a lawyer—that it was within our jurisdiction; and we thought it was; for we put into effect the legislation from which I have quoted. Incidentally, two judges, Chief Justice Duff and Mr. Justice Davis, both gave judgment in favour of it. They are two of the outstanding judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. Be that as it may, it was declared ultra vires by the supreme court, and that decision was upheld by the privy council. That being so, without quarrelling about the question of jurisdiction, I say, let us in fairness and honesty, instead of merely expressing so many theoretical and pious platitudes, put the legislation into effect as suggested by Mr. Duplessis. Let us put it into effect, leaving the right to the provinces to join and participate in its benefits. I venture to say that if that were done, all the provinces would in the near future join and cooperate, for the reason that otherwise they would be contributing and receiving none of the benefits. That, it seems to me, is the way to cut the Gordian knot. I do not want to be critical of the government; this is a question which has been largely acceptable to the house; a great many hon. members from all parties have accepted it. Yet the rather inane—I say that not offensively—reference in the speech from the throne regarding it is not very encouraging. About unemployment insurance the speech contained one little sentence:

> The government have not altered their view that a national unemployment insurance scheme is essential to a permanent policy of meeting the problem of unemployment.

But that does not help the poor fellow who does not have the insurance. That is merely a pious expression of opinion, with which I do not quarrel, but it does no good to the people who want to see unemployment insurance in force. I think the government might well put it into effect, and wait for the provinces to cooperate with them. That is the way it appeals to me. We tried it the other way and our method was ruled ultra vires. Let us accept that decision for the time being and try the other method. That is the only suggestion I make. To bring into effect such legislation as suggested in this resolution of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, would show a real desire on the part of the government to live up to the protestations it has put forth.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): I should like to begin by congratulating the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) upon his unique success with this resolution. It has produced the most harmonious debate we have had thus far in the present session. So far I believe the resolution has received the support of everyone who has taken part in the discussion. I am pleased indeed to be able to give it my support in equal measure; not only that, but I share the hope expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) that the reception accorded to this resolution from representatives of all groups in this house may have its due effect in those provinces which thus far have not seen fit to consent to the enactment of a national system of unemployment insurance.

The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) referred a moment ago to the events leading up to the present position with respect to unemployment insurance in this country. He alluded particularly, and quite properly from his point of view, to the Employment and Social Insurance Act of 1935. I hope he will acquit me of any desire to recriminate if I refer briefly, as he has done, to the circumstances surrounding the enactment of that act. I interrupted him when I did—he kindly permitted the interruption—simply to make it clear that the administration of which he was a member did not do, when it had the power, what he himself now suggests ought to be done by this administration.

Mr. MANION: We did what we thought we had the power to do.

Mr. ROGERS: It was equally open to his government to enact unemployment insurance in a manner similar to the old age pensions legislation, and in that way avoid any possible question of invalidity of that legislation. It was in August, 1934, that Mr. Bennett, then Prime Minister, sent an invitation to all the provinces asking them to come to Ottawa some time later in the year in order to consider a number of specific questions, including unemployment insurance, minimum wages, hours of labour, and also the employment services to which my hon. friend has referred. The very form of that invitation, the very fact of it, made it clear beyond peradventure that it was the view of the government of that day that the jurisdiction over all these related matters belonged to the provinces. The very purpose of the conference was to induce the provinces to transfer their jurisdiction over these matters to the dominion in order that the dominion might thereafter introduce legislation which would not be declared invalid by the courts.

This matter has come before the house on other occasions. I remember putting the question directly to Mr. Bennett last year as to when and why he changed his mind as to the proper jurisdiction over these questions. Immediately after sending that letter to the provinces Mr. Bennett went to Geneva to attend the assembly of the League of Nations. While he was away, there took place in this country what has become known as the little general election. There were five by-elections, and it happened that they all went against the then government. My hon. friend's colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) was also extremely active at that time and was making a special appeal to the wage-earning population of this country. Whatever the reasons may have been, we all know, and my hon. friend will recall, that shortly after Mr. Bennett's return the country was startled by a series of radio addresses, in which there was a complete volte-face on the part of the government with respect to its previous views as to where jurisdiction over these industrial matters properly lay.

Following those radio addresses we had introduced in the session of 1935 a series of enactments with respect to matters which prior to that time had always been regarded as falling properly under provincial jurisdiction. I have said that I want to deal with this question without recrimination; but I think it is only fair that when we consider the present position with respect to unemployment insurance we should realize that actually in 1935 there was an unwarranted appropriation of provincial authority by this parliament, and that appropriation of authority undoubtedly set up in the provinces repercussions which even until this time have had their effect in producing what, in my opinion, is an over-emphasis upon what is generally termed provincial autonomy. The provinces had some grounds for feeling that the dominion parliament in that 1935 program of legislation had without justification appropriated authority which, by practice, precedent and judicial decision, had always been regarded as belonging to the provincial legislatures. In other words, the Employment and Social Insurance Act of 1935 fell because it was not built upon the rock of constitutional validity. It fell—and I suggest this not unkindly—because it was built upon the sands of political expediency.

When the 1935 legislation came before this house it received in principle, as far as unemployment insurance was concerned, the complete support of every group. The Liberal opposition of that day took the ground that before we entered upon unemployment insurance, and set up an elaborate organization for the administration thereof across the entire country, the validity of the legislation should be determined beyond any question. So, although the legislation, as I say, was accepted in principle, due notice was given on behalf of the Liberal opposition that if there should be a change of government, the question of the validity of the Employment and Social Insurance Act and the other statutes to which I have referred should be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada and subsequently on appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. That course was followed.

I suggest to the house that everything that happened subsequently confirmed the wisdom of that decision. I put this to hon. members, and I do so sharing fully the views which have been expressed here this afternoon in support of unemployment insurance: Would it have been wise; would it have taken us far forward if we had set up an elaborate administrative organization to deal with unemployment insurance throughout this country, requiring industry in every province to gear itself to that new legislation, and then discover a year or two or three later that the entire structure was a house of cards?

Mr. HEAPS: You said that about old age pensions, at first.

Mr. ROGERS: So far as old age pensions are concerned, the hon. member is aware that an entirely different principle is involved.

Mr. HEAPS: But the principle of the provinces coming under the act was also declared at that time by certain lawyers to be entirely wrong and unconstitutional.

Mr. ROGERS: So far as unemployment insurance was concerned, there was a direct assertion of dominion authority. The hon. member surely will not quarrel with my statement when I remind him that what had previously been assumed was later confirmed, not merely by the judicial committee of the privy council at Westminster, but also by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. MANION: With two dissenting votes.

Mr. ROGERS: Very well; the court divided four to two against validity of that legislation. Surely it is clear that upon the facts as we know them to-day, it would have been folly for this country to have proceeded with unemployment insurance, as suggested by the hon. member, without having the question of validity determined beyond any possibility of question or dispute.

To determine first the question of validity was the policy of this government, and I submit that policy has been fully confirmed by subsequent events. Once the supreme court had given its decision, a decision which was confirmed on appeal to the judicial committee of the privy council, we were confronted with a new situation. May I remind the house that the judicial committee of the privy council went very far in its refusal to admit federal authority over unemployment insurance. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) is not in his seat to-night, but hon. members will recall that from that decision he has drawn the conclusion that this parliament cannot lawfully even vote funds to the provinces for their assistance in the distribution of unemployment relief. That is simply an indication of the extent to which the judicial committee of the privy council refused to admit that the dominion parliament had legislative authority to deal with unemployment insurance and related questions.

With that decision before it, as I have said, the government might have followed one of three courses. We might have said, "The highest court of appeal has declared that the jurisdiction over unemployment insurance belongs to the provinces." That being so, we might have said, "Let the provinces exercise their authority." The second course was this: We might have encouraged the provinces to exercise their authority to deal with unemployment insurance by offering to subsidize provincial schemes of unemployment insurance. The third course was this: Of our own motion we could request the co-operation of the provinces in securing a constitutional amendment which would rectify the defect of the previous legislation, and give to this parliament exclusive authority to deal with unemployment insurance.

The course we followed was the last one. I have indicated, and I believe, that in adopting this policy, the policy of seeking the cooperation of the provinces to secure a constitutional amendment which would enable us to bring in a national scheme of unemployment insurance, we had not only the support of all groups in parliament but the support generally of the people of this country.

I am going to indicate first of all the nature of the invitation sent to the provinces in order to secure their cooperation. On November 5, 1937, a letter was sent by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), which at this time I should like to place on record. I do so because I may have occasion to refer to it later. A letter in identical terms was sent to all the provinces at the same time:

Ottawa, November 5, 1937.

My dear Premier:

My colleagues and I are convinced that a national system of unemployment insurance would contribute materially to individual security and industrial stability throughout Canada, and would assist in mitigating the distress incident to any recurrence of widespread unemployment. A strong recommendation with respect to national control of employment offices, based upon a full investigation of the unemployment situation thorughout the dominion, has been submitted to the government by the national employment commission. We share the opinion that a national employment service within federal jurisdiction is a necessary complement of any plan of national unemployment insurance.

We believe it is most desirable that legislation establishing a national system of unemployment insurance and of public employment offices should be enacted. Should it be possible to obtain the cooperation of the governments of the several provinces toward this end we are prepared, at the next session of parliament—

That was the last session.

—to introduce the necessary measures.

You will recall that on January 28, of this year, the judicial committee of the privy council gave a negative opinion upon a reference as to whether the parliament of Canada had jurisdiction to enact the Employment and Social Insurance Act, 1935. Close attention has since been given, by officials of the dominion government, to the resulting situation. We have also had the benefit of the counsel and advice of a member of the staff of the international labour office, who is familiar with existing systems of unemployment insurance, and who has been placed at the disposal of the government for purposes of consultation by the international labour office.

It appears to be the general concensus of view that unemployment insurance, if it is to be effectively carried out, should be national in scope. In view, however, of the limited jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, an amendment to the constitution would seem to be a necessary preliminary to the establishment of a national system.

In these circumstances I am writing to the premiers of the several provinces to inquire whether their governments would be agreeable to an amendment being made to the British North America Act empowering the federal parliament to enact unemployment insurance legislation. I shall be obliged if, at your early convenience, you would kindly advise me of the views of the government of—

And so on.

That letter went out in the late autumn of 1937 in order that with the cooperation of the governments of the provinces the necessary legislation might be introduced at the forthcoming session. I shall not quote in detail the replies received from the several provinces to that request for cooperation, but I believe I might summarize the situation briefly.

Six provinces, namely, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, gave their full consent to a constitutional amendment in the terms indicated in the letter I have just read.

Three provinces, namely, Alberta, New Brunswick and Quebec, declined for various reasons to give that consent. Again, without quoting from the letters received from the provinces, I think I shall not be misinterpreting their position if I say that Alberta took the view that no constitutional amendment was necessary to authorize the dominion parliament to introduce a national scheme of unemployment insurance. Certain extraneous questions were also introduced in the letter from Mr. Aberhart in connection with the financing of the scheme, but I shall not enter upon that subject to-night.

New Brunswick took the view then and later that the transfer of jurisdiction over unemployment insurance from the provinces to the dominion parliament might take place more appropriately in connection with such general readjustments of constitutional relations as might follow the report of the royal commission on dominion provincial relations.

I come now to Quebec. The leader of the opposition has quoted from the letter received from Premier Dulplessis. He is quite right in saying that in his letter of December 30, 1937, Mr. Duplessis expressed in very general terms his willingness to cooperate in what he described as a sound and fair system of unemployment insurance, which could be established on a national scope, without infringing upon the rights and autonomy of the provinces. But that was not the only reference made by Premier Duplessis to the request made by the dominion government for the cooperation of the provinces in this matter. Broadly speaking, Mr. Duplessis took the ground, very soon after that letter was sent, that the request made by the dominion government was an encroachment upon provincial autonomy.

This whole question has been discussed today in a spirit of moderation, and I do not propose to depart from that in what I am now going to say. At the same time, surely it is preposterous to suggest that a courteous request for cooperation for the national good is an encroachment upon provincial autonomy.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister mind telling us where Mr. Duplessis took that attitude?

Mr. ROGERS: If my hon. friend will permit me I shall do so. I have a number of clippings before me, but I shall select only two. I shall quote from a report of a delegation representing large bodies of workers in the province of Quebec which met Premier Duplessis. This was a delegation from the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and the report reads:

Premier Duplessis reiterated his stand against any constitutional amendment to set up the insurance plan.

He declared the Quebec government was "ready to cooperate with Ottawa" to establish insurance but would forsake "none of its rights to do so."

"We are not going to be assimilated by the federal government, and while I am premier that will not be done through any sacrifice of provincial rights," the premier asserted.

Mr. MANION: That is not any contradiction of his letter. I think in justice to Mr. Duplessis, his whole letter should be placed on Hansard. After all, it is the official correspondence.

Mr. ROGERS: With the consent of the house, I am quite ready to have the letter from Mr. Duplessis placed on Hansard. The letter reads:

[Mr. Rogers.]

Quebec, December 30, 1937.

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
P.C., LL.D., K.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

My dear Premier:

Your answer to my letter dated November 22nd was handed to me on the day of your departure for your recent holidays and I preferred to await your return before replying.

In your second letter, you repeat the views you expressed in your first one, adding that you are convinced that enabling or concurring legislation would be uncertain and unstable.

Old age pensions—one of the many similar instances—which you enacted and enforced and which was approved and amended by your successors in office, a few years later, is based on enabling legislation.

Moreover, as stated previously, there are also other ways of realizing unemployment insurance which would safeguard provincial autonomy. If enabling legislation, as you declare, is uncertain and unstable, what do you think of the stability and certainty of a federal legislation on unemployment insurance which could essentially be changed or modified, every year, by the federal parliament?

The government of the province of Quebec considers that the best elements of stability and certainty are within the British North America Act and that it is much safer to preserve the stability of the constitution.

In conclusion, again I state that the province of Quebec is willing to cooperate heartily in the establishment of a sound and fair system of unemployment insurance, which could be established on a national scope, without infringing upon the rights and autonomy of the provinces.

Yours very truly,

M. L. Duplessis.

My point is that this matter was subsequently brought before Mr. Duplessis by a delegation of workers in the province of Quebec. Mr. Duplessis and others have referred to it in the course of political addresses, and I do not think I am misinterpreting the situation when I say that there has been a definite attempt to interpret this request on the part of the dominion government as an encroachment upon provincial autonomy. It has been my point, and I press it again, that there has been no coercion. There has been merely a courteous request which was addressed in identical terms to all the provinces to bring about legislation which we believe would be for the general good and which, after all, was designed not to impose a further burden upon the provinces, but rather to relieve the provinces of burdens which they now have to bear. That was the actual situation.

It is true that Premier Duplessis has taken the ground that the province of Quebec would be willing to cooperate in some scheme in which provincial administration would be retained intact, but there has been no development of that idea to the extent which would permit the dominion government to assume that a nation-wide system of unemployment insurance could be established on the basis proposed by Mr. Duplessis.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the minister assume that the dominion government must be blocked indefinitely because of the attitude of one group in one province?

Mr. ROGERS: I am not sure how my time is passing, but I think I shall have an opportunity to answer that before I have finished. I mention Quebec at this point because it is one of the great industrial provinces of the dominion, and naturally its views are of particular importance at this time. I find it difficult to understand why Premier Duplessis, speaking for his government of course, should take a position of opposition to a national scheme of unemployment insurance. He is not speaking for the workers of the province of Quebec when he takes that position. For three years in succession the confederation of Catholic workers have urged the Quebec government to give their consent to a constitutional amendment which would permit the enactment of a national scheme of unemployment insurance. The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, through its affiliated organizations in the province of Quebec, have made representations along precisely the same lines. Nor has Mr. Duplessis in opposing a national scheme of unemployment insurance been expressing the views of any royal commission set up in his province to consider the interests of the people of Quebec in relation to unemployment insurance. To my knowledge the only commission set up in the province of Quebec to deal with this question was one established in 1933 under the chairmanship of Professor Edouard Montpetit. In addition to this distinguished chairman, there were as members of that commission a number of men outstanding in the industrial and cultural life of the province. I am going to put a list of them on Hansard because I believe the views they expressed are those which lie in the hearts of the majority of the people of the province of Quebec in connection with this question. The members of the commission were:

The Right Reverend Georges Courchesne, D.D. (Rome)—
Bishop of Saint-Germain-de-Rimouski; emeritus professor in the faculty of arts of Laval university.

The Venerable Frederick George Scott, C.M.G., D.S.O., M.A., D.C.L. (Bishop's), D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.C.—
Archdeacon of Quebec; rector of St. Matthew's church, Quebec.

John T. Foster—
President of the trades and labour council of Montreal; member of the trades and labour congress of Canada; managing editor of the Canadian Congress Journal.

Gérard Tremblay—
Deputy Minister of Labour, province of Quebec; late secretary general of the national Catholic labour unions.

Alphonse Lessard, M.D., officier de l'instruction publique—
Provincial director of charities and director of the provincial bureau of health; professor of sanitary legislation in the faculty of medicine of Laval university.

Georges-Arthur Savoy—
President of the Dominion Blank Book Company, Limited, St. Johns, Quebec; president of the Quebec division, Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

That was the commission on social insurance which made its report in 1933. The conclusions of the commission are very brief, and I shall place them on Hansard. They were.

1. The social insurance commission believes that unemployment is a problem above all national and international in character, with respect both to its causes and the remedies which it demands.

2. Unemployment insurance, although, according to the law, it falls under the jurisdiction of the provinces, and although in theory it is applicable within the provincial administration, cannot, for the reasons offered in this report, be efficiently organized except in a nation-wide manner.

That represents the considered views of a royal commission set up in the province of Quebec to consider this question. May I remind the house that so far as I am aware the chairman of that commission which gave that opinion has not in any way given any public expression of alteration of that opinion. Quite recently he was chosen by Premier Duplessis as the chairman of a taxation commission within that province. It is quite evident that that previous commission was not and could not be regarded as being in the nature of a partisan commission.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: What was his name?

Mr. ROGERS: Professor Edouard Montpetit of the university of Montreal.

May I say this further, again because I find it difficult to understand the basic reasons for this alleged opposition of the province of Quebec to a nation-wide scheme of unemployment insurance: There are those who in one breath say, and are saying, that unemployment is a national problem, and who in the next breath are ready to refuse to give the dominion power to deal with unemployment by the method of insurance. It is extremely difficult to understand the consistency of those two points of view expressed, as I have said, in the province of Quebec.

Before I pass on may I make this clear. I have suggested that in this matter surely no real question of provincial autonomy is at stake in Quebec more than in any other province of Canada. I have the greatest respect for the rights which attach to minorities in this country. Those rights had their ancient origin in the capitulations of the treaty of Paris, in the proclamation of 1763 and later in the Quebec Act of 1774. They have been confirmed time and again in this country, and I feel that there has never been any real question as to their being regarded as fundamental guarantees. But this question of the transfer of jurisdiction over unemployment insurance from the province to the dominion surely does not touch even remotely the question of the rights of minorities in the province of Quebec.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The rights of majorities.

Mr. ROGERS: Time alone will tell as to that point. For these reasons I am not persuaded that, in those provinces which thus far have not consented to give their approval to a national scheme of unemployment insurance, that view will continue to prevail. I believe the views expressed from all sides of this house to-day and possibly the unanimous acceptance of this resolution will have their effect in the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Alberta.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister answer the question as to what the government proposes to do under the circumstances?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Let him tell it.

Mr. ROGERS: I am coming to that. In the course of this debate, Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that in the present circumstances it would be sound policy to depart from the position which we believe was soundly taken a year ago and retreat to a position which even my hon. friend would agree is not as good for the defence of the working classes of Canada. I will develop that in a moment. It is suggested that we should give up all efforts to enact a national scheme of unemployment insurance, accept the proposals of the three provinces which thus far have declined to give us their cooperation, and subsidize by federal grants-in-aid separate provincial schemes of unemployment insurance, which every expert to my knowledge who has studied this question has condemned as being so much worse than the other system as to justify us in waiting if necessary, even though we are impatient—and who could be more impatient than a minister of labour in the face of the present situation—in order that public opinion in this country may have its ultimate effect in bringing about that degree of understanding of the real purpose and value of unemployment insurance which will enable us to proceed with a national scheme.

I have not time, I am sorry to say, to indicate all the disadvantages of the separate provincial systems, but I am going to indicate a few, and some were given by the provinces themselves. In the factum of the province of Ontario before the Supreme Court of Canada, for example, a number of cogent reasons were given against the adoption of provincial schemes of unemployment insurance. I am going to take them from the factum of the attorney-general of Ontario in the hearing before the Supreme Court of Canada, at page 5. This is from a provincial standpoint too:

1. The whole scheme of unemployment insurance has a pronounced national aspect.

2. Legislation of this character affects international and interprovincial trade and the maintenance of equitable relations between provinces.

3. If various provincial schemes are adopted instead of a national scheme, it would disturb the equilibrium of industrial relations in the various provinces; labour would naturally be inclined to go to the province where such legislation was on the statute books, and on the other hand, it is possible that employers would prefer provinces where they would not be forced to contribute to such a scheme.

4. It is undesirable that there should be attempts to attract capital to one province rather than another by saying there is unemployment insurance in this province, but in that province there is not.

The scheme is to have one measure in the national interest so that there may be freedom of trade, uncontrolled as far as legislation is concerned. The purpose of the legislation is the necessity of having it extend to every part of the dominion; the necessity of having uniform legislation so that benefits of the same character may be conferred alike upon all the people of the dominion in all the provinces, making for uniformity of law for the common good. The living and working conditions of the people of Canada are of national concern. Those, I submit, are cogent reasons against a retreat to provincial schemes of unemployment insurance while there is yet ground for hope that we may be able to achieve a national scheme; and I have that hope.

I should now like to deal with the United States. Some members of this house will be familiar with the name of Doctor Bryce Stewart, who was at one time a member of the Canadian civil service attached to the Department of Labour. In recent years he has been director of research for the industrial relations counsellors of New York, and has taken an active part in building up the New York administration under the Social Security Act of the United States. In a book published by him a very few weeks ago there is an excellent summary of the advantages and disadvantages of the United States scheme of federal subsidies to state systems of unemployment insurance. I have simply taken from that summary a number of his objections to the United States system, which I believed had special application to our situation in Canada. Those objections are:

The federal-state system—

Mind you, that is what has been impressed upon us as a government to-night by some speakers as an alternative to the method we are seeking to follow:

—offers no solution for the difficult problem of the proper compensation of employees who move from state to state.

The federal-state system will probably preclude the establishment of a satisfactory central system of records; it will not yield uniform national statistics of the insured unemployed and will tend to retard labour mobility between the states.

The Social Security Act does not take into sufficient account the calibre of the personnel in states without civil service. The federal policy no matter how well planned will be difficult of application through the state agencies, since they are only indirectly responsible to federal authority. Many of them operate under the patronage system and pay salaries inadequate to attract and retain a sufficient number of executives and technical assistants of the quality required.

An elaborate, inflexible and costly unemployment compensation organization has been established, consisting of fifty-one separate administrations and overheads in the different states, territories, and the District of Columbia, and superimposed on these systems, a federal organization at Washington and twelve regional offices.

That, I submit, is a most formidable indictment of the present set-up of unemployment insurance in the United States.

Mr. HEAPS: Was it not a case of accepting it in this form or nothing at all?

Mr. ROGERS: I am not so sure as to that. My hon. friend may have greater gifts of clairvoyance than I have.

I should like to come to the final objection written by Doctor Stewart:

The most serious defects of the American plan of unemployment compensation are inherent in the federal-state system and in the tax-offset method, and—

I point this out to my hon. friend.

—until these give way to a national system supported by federal taxes, as they inevitably must, injustices, irregularities and confusion will persist.

I should like to carry the argument a point further. It seems to be assumed that the other provinces of Canada which have consented to the dominion assuming jurisdiction over unemployment insurance would themselves be ready with federal assistance to set up separate provincial schemes of unemployment insurance. There is no warrant whatever for that assumption. The six provinces that gave consent to a national scheme of unemployment insurance did so with the understanding that thereby the dominion was taking over from them a considerable portion of the unemployment burden. But under any scheme of federal subsidies to provincial systems of unemployment insurance I suggest that, at the very least, the costs of administration and of state contribution would have to be divided. Those provinces could not reasonably expect that this dominion would finance entirely the provincial schemes of unemployment insurance. Therefore I think we are justified in saying that there is no warrant whatever for the belief that if we were not able to proceed at this time with a national scheme of unemployment insurance, the alternative suggested by other hon. members, in imitation of the United States Social Security Act, would actually be feasible in this country.

So far as the future is concerned—and I speak now of the immediate future—I have already expressed my hope that a greater understanding of the necessity of unemployment insurance as a part of our equipment to deal with economic insecurity will lead those provinces that until now have declined to give us their cooperation, to alter their view and give us that cooperation which will permit us to go forward as we have been ready to do since more than a year ago.

Premier Duplessis—I regret to say—suggested to a labour delegation a few days ago that the federal government was not sincere in this matter. I should like to say from my place in this house that we have been sincere; that from the moment the decision was taken to seek the cooperation of the provinces the whole record proves our sincerity. We brought from Geneva an expert on unemployment insurance to assist us in drafting a bill, and the bill has now been drafted—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hear, hear.

Mr. ROGERS: —and can be introduced into this house as soon as we have received from Westminster the power to introduce that legislation and have it declared valid in the courts.

Mr. NEILL: Might I ask the nature of that bill? Is it a bill to present to the British parliament, or is it a bill directly—?

Mr. ROGERS: No, it is really a bill providing for a national scheme of unemployment insurance. It was drafted more than a year ago. I should like to say in all kindness, if I may, from this place to the premier of Quebec that if at any time he has doubted our sincerity it has been within his power to test it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hear, hear.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: Might I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. ROGERS: Certainly.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: From the documents, the correspondence which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) may have in his possession, could he tell this house on what grounds the premier of Quebec is objecting to the passing of a law whereby there would be unemployment insurance in Canada?

Mr. MICHAUD: He has already taken thirty minutes to answer that.

Mr. ROGERS: I may have failed partly in what I have tried to do, if my hon. friend is not aware of the reasons given, but I have placed on Hansard the letter sent by Premier Duplessis to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in response to the original invitation.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: The labour union?

Mr. ROGERS: No, the letter sent by Premier Duplessis to the Prime Minister of the dominion government following the original invitation. As for other statements made by Premier Duplessis, my hon. friend will, I am sure, find numerous intimations if he will read carefully the press of his own province during recent months.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: No, but I was referring to the last words of the Minister of Labour, that the objection came mainly from the province of Quebec.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. Well, I have tried to make it clear to the house. I spoke particularly of the objections which have come from the province of Quebec, because unemployment insurance deals with industry, and Quebec and Ontario between them represent roughly about eighty per cent of industrial employment in this country. That is why I have thought it wise to deal particularly with the reasons which it seemed to me supported the view that Quebec should in these critical times march with other provinces in this co-operative method to bring about a national scheme of unemployment insurance.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: I admit that. But if the minister would allow me—

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: If he does not allow me I will sit down.

Mr. ROGERS: Certainly I will permit a question.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: I have been interested in the last few minutes of the minister's speech to learn that it was mainly from the province of Quebec that the objections came to amending the constitution.

Mr. ROGERS: Correct. That is so.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: Then there must be in possession of the Minister of Labour some documents, some writings, some correspondence, to the effect that Quebec as a whole is objecting to unemployment insurance. I ask for the details.

Mr. ROGERS: I am not sure when my hon. friend took his seat this evening. He may not have been here during the earlier part of my speech to-night; but I am placing on Hansard a letter sent from Premier Duplessis to the Prime Minister of Canada in response to the original invitation, and my hon. friend will have an opportunity to read that to-morrow. So far as other statements made by the premier of Quebec are concerned, they have been widely circulated in the public press. I should like to make this point quite clear to the mind of my hon. friend. Three provinces have thus far declined to give their support: Alberta, New Brunswick and Quebec. I spoke particularly of Quebec for the one reason I have indicated, namely that it is one of the great industrial provinces of our country, and also it is the one province which has raised specifically this question of provincial autonomy; and I have found it difficult to understand why, if provincial autonomy were involved, the same objection could not be raised in every province.

Mr. MacNEIL: May I ask if the government has pursued further negotiations with the province of Quebec in order to clarify the situation and remove their objection?

Mr. ROGERS: The situation, I think, has been clarified from time to time since the original letter was sent. As a matter of fact, the whole correspondence has been laid on the table of the house, and I have had myself certain conversations with representatives of some of the provinces with a view to removing any objections which were put forward by them in their original correspondence. But it did seem to me that, after all, this is the proper place in which we might discuss the questions at issue with regard to this great matter of unemployment insurance; and I would thank the hon. member for Comox-

Alberni (Mr. Neill), for the form of his resolution, for the admirable manner in which he has presented it, and for the interesting and profitable debate which has ensued from it.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister a question? Would he explain what differences he considers there are between the difficulties that have been overcome in setting up the present dominion-provincial old age pensions scheme and the difficulties there would be in setting up a model unemployment insurance act under which the dominion would pay those provinces which passed similar acts the whole or, at any rate, a substantial part of the cost? What would be the difference in the difficulties?

Mr. ROGERS: I am not sure whether my hon. friend or the house would desire me to make another speech on the question. Just now there is pressure on all sides for reduction of governmental expense and there are protests against duplication of services. With unemployment insurance on a provincial basis you would have to set up, assuming that all the provinces came in, which is not a necessary conclusion, nine separate commissions dealing with unemployment insurance, nine sets of actuaries, nine complete organizations of inspectors. I suggest that on the question of economy alone, apart from efficiency, the arguments on the side of the national scheme are overwhelming.

Mr. WALSH: May I ask a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The house is not in committee.

Mr. WALSH: Has the minister thoroughly explored the possibility—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WALSH: —of enabling legislation from the provinces?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I suggest that we ought to proceed with the debate.

Mr. O. A. KENNEDY (Edmonton East): It is interesting to note that the minister has been congratulating hon. members on the harmony of the debate, but not one representing the three provinces opposed to unemployment insurance has so far been able to speak. It is now 9.45 p.m., and several members of the Social Credit party who are interested in the debate will find it impossible to speak before the house adjourns.

May I congratulate the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) upon the brevity of his address. I cannot agree, however, with the majority of other speakers in what has been said in regard to the wording of the resolution. There seems to be a difference of opinion with reference to the words "contributory insurance." There is a little inconsistency in the phrase, because I would interpret "contributory insurance" to mean a direct contribution from the insured; and yet every hon. member who has spoken today has touched on all other phases of the subject but not on the question of the direct contribution from the insured. Hon. members have mentioned several other schemes in which contributions are to be raised in other ways. If the words "contributory insurance" are to be used, those who have spoken should have touched upon them and expressed their opinion whether they are in favour of a contributory insurance scheme.

I agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that the government should not wait but should undertake as quickly as possible the introduction of some scheme in an effort to help the unemployed in various parts of Canada.

It is with some hesitancy that we speak on unemployment insurance at this time, because to my knowledge the government has not notified the provinces of its plans. We have heard from the minister to-night that a plan has been drafted, but it has not yet been presented either to the house or to the provinces. I suggest to the minister that he send a copy of the bill to the provinces that are not agreeable to the introduction of unemployment insurance at this time, so that they may see exactly what it provides. The government are asking the provinces for permission to amend the British North America Act, and yet they are not telling the provinces for what reasons that act will be amended or what are the details of the unemployment insurance scheme which they wish to introduce.

I suggest that the problem of unemployment is certainly a responsibility of the federal government, but under this resolution as worded it is being taken off the shoulders of the government and put upon the consumers, the vast majority of whom are men and women of the working class. There is no doubt about it that unemployment results from conditions that are beyond the control of any province or municipality, and until the present economic system is reformed the only solution is for the dominion to assume full responsibility for unemployment relief, making such arrangements with the provinces as may be necessary for the proper carrying out of such a plan. Under a contributory plan this would not be the case. The main burden would rest on the working people.

Let me illustrate—and this is a supposition, because we have no information as to any details of the plan. Usually an unemployment insurance plan falls along this line:

The employee pays one-third; the employer, one-third; and the government, one-third. Let us see what would happen under such a plan. The employee's contribution comes directly out of his wages, thereby reducing his purchasing power and at the same time reducing his standard of living. The employer's contribution must be raised out of his business, and he must add it to the cost of his goods or include it in overhead charges. In other words, he is faced with two alternatives. He must make a profit if he is to remain in business. He must therefore either raise prices, thus reducing the standard of living of the consumers, or reduce his overhead charges, which means a further reduction in the salaries of his employees. The contribution by the government, especially the present one, would in all probability take the form of increased taxation, and this would result in lowering the standard of living generally.

These are some of the results of a contributory insurance scheme which are opposed to the aims and objects of good government. It should be the object of good government to seek to improve conditions in the country. Surely it is evident to all that the average wage-earner cannot stand any further reduction in wages. It has already been pointed out that 98 per cent of the wage-earners receive less than $664 per annum. They cannot afford to have these wages further reduced. They are not receiving enough to-day to enable them to enjoy more than a bare existence.

Let me make myself clear. Neither am I nor are the members of my party opposed to any scheme that will improve conditions for the working people of Canada. We are, however, convinced that a system of contributory unemployment insurance cannot help the working man. Unemployment insurance, introduced by governments who have claimed a cure for unemployment, is merely an admission of defeat. It is merely a shifting of the burden over on to the people and the drawing of a red herring across the trail to divert their attention from the real issue. The people of Canada desire security and freedom; yet under unemployment insurance we are asked to render everyone less secure. Taxpayers and workers are to have their security reduced by a reduction in their income to meet the costs of the insurance. The unemployed are to be regimented, controlled and as a body kept in a condition of permanent indigence, presumably in return for the privilege of being permitted to live in this condition in a country capable of supplying them with all their wants. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the idea is monstrous and is a violation of the democratic right of every citizen of our land to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness in this economic environment of plenty. It is not unemployment insurance that the people of Canada want; it is employment assurance.

[Mr. Kennedy.]

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), in discussing unemployment, suggests that we should encourage industry to take up the lag as far as possible. Others follow the argument that was used by the London Times on October 27, 1936, which said, "He is a public benefactor who can provide employment for two men where only one was employed before." Once again let me point out that the cost of industry goes into the price of the product of industry; therefore, if the cost of industry is to be increased by more salaries having to be paid, then the price of the product of industry must be raised. The result is another increase in the cost of living, which means reduction of purchasing power, which means less goods sold, the stagnation of industry and more unemployment, and again we have completed the vicious circle and are back where we started but in a worse economic condition than when we started. The sole justification of any industrial system can only be personal consumption. The true function of factories or industry is to produce goods, not make work. If it is the policy of the Minister of Labour to encourage private industry, as far as possible to take up the lag in employment, that is not consistent with the introduction of contributory unemployment insurance. I contend that the introduction of contributory unemployment insurance would defeat that aim. Employers who will be forced to pay part of the insurance premium for each and every one of their employees will endeavour to work with as few employees as possible; thus the introduction of contributory unemployment insurance will tend to greater unemployment.

Another point is that the introduction of a contributory system of unemployment insurance will also have the effect to some extent of taking away from workers their privilege of association to safeguard their own rights. For example, let us suppose that a railway company, a factory or some other industry lowers wages or lengthens working hours. The employees, feeling the treatment to be unfair or unjust, protest to the employer. Nothing is done. The men in an effort to obtain better conditions, threaten to strike. Is it not possible for them to be intimidated into accepting these unfair conditions by the threat of losing their contributions to unemployment insurance? Governments have never moved to better the conditions of the people until the people themselves have turned pressure upon them by effective demand.

Let us for a moment examine the effects of unemployment insurance, or the findings of committees on unemployment insurance in other countries. Several speakers to-day have mentioned the plan in Great Britain. Let us look at the other side for a moment. The theory of the British plan is probably familiar to most Canadians, but here are a few figures which prove that it has not worked out just as was planned. It was launched on something less than its present scale in 1911, on the basis of equal contributions by workers, employers and the state. By the end of March of the fiscal year 1931 it was found that of a total of $493,000,000, employers had paid 15·6 per cent, workers 13·6 per cent and the state 70·8 per cent. That is getting down to being almost non-contributory. It is evident to all that conditions in England, because of dense population, would make the administration easier than would be possible in Canada. Yet we find that in England the cost of administration was from 11 per cent to 13 per cent of the net income of the fund. That means that about $13 out of every $100 paid in went in administration cost rather than to the assured. It is estimated that it takes one official administering the scheme to every 100 unemployed who enjoy its advantages. It is safe to predict that in Canada the cost would be much greater.

In the United States, before the Social Security Act was passed in 1936, they had an investigation inaugurated under ex-President Hoover into unemployment and unemployment insurance. I should like to read two or three paragraphs from the report as presented in 1933:

> . . . Whatever its merits for tiding wage earners over slack seasons and moderate cyclical depressions, it cannot provide for those who are out of work for long periods. An extension of old age pensions to care for such victims of progress may bulk large in future discussions.
>
> The committee is aware of the numerous objections urged against these schemes of social insurance and of the heavy costs which they impose upon society; but it also is impressed with the inarticulate misery of hundreds of thousands or millions of bread-winners who are deprived of their livelihood through no fault of their own.
>
> To put the cost of unemployment squarely upon those who remain at work, upon employers, and upon the public purse, makes everyone conscious of the difficulty, and focuses attention upon the need of devising more constructive methods of dealing with it.

Time does not permit me to go any further into that.

Let us now turn to the commonwealth which is the nearest to the Dominion of Canada, namely Australia. We find there that in December last the introduction of national insurance precipitated a national crisis in the government. The government was deluged with letters from all parts of the commonwealth asking that the imposition of national insurance be postponed at least until the electors were first consulted. I have here a sample of the letters which the people sent to their representatives. Apparently the government of that commonwealth were doing exactly what the government of Canada are doing to-day, that is withholding the details of the plan until they are ready to spring it on the people. The first line in the letter following suggests that:

> Dear Sir:
>
> Having at long last learned the details of the National Health and Pension Insurance Act, I have arrived at the definite conclusion that this act will mean a drastic lowering of the already low standard of living of the majority of the people of Australia by the very fact of reducing their weekly income.
>
> I am therefore taking this opportunity of telling you, as my representative in parliament, that I resent having this imposed upon me without the electors first being consulted by referendum; and I am determined that if you, as my representative, fail to do your utmost to have this undemocratic measure repealed, I will do all in my power to cause you to be replaced at the next election by a representative who will truly represent the wishes of his electors.

Over 300,000 of those letters were sent to the representatives of the people of the Commonwealth of Australia, and as I said it precipitated a national crisis in December which almost overthrew the government.

Unemployment is the greatest problem facing us in Canada to-day. All speakers this session have emphasized this fact; yet we find that the government apparently refuse to go to the root cause of this problem, but content themselves with attempting to bring in palliatives or temporary relief measures. Surely it is evident to all that contributory unemployment insurance is not a cure, but simply a shifting of a responsibility of the government over to the working people. Housing schemes on borrowed money are, in relation to unemployment, not a cure, but just a temporary relief. Work and wages programs on borrowed money are not a cure, but temporary relief, which only aggravates the situation and makes for more serious conditions later on. There are only two reasons for unemployment: First, when we have reached the peak of our production, that is when there is no room for further development, and our source of supply is entirely exhausted; and, second, when all the needs of all our people are supplied.

Unemployment insurance will not assist to correct unemployment in Canada. Surely all hon. members will agree that there is much room for great development in this dominion. There are roads to be built, wealthy areas to be developed; housing schemes; rehabilitation; rivers to be dredged; parks to be developed; mining areas to be opened up; reforestation; scientific research; and a thousand and one much needed developments; yet we have unemployment. Have we no materials to do this work? Canada is one of the richest countries in the world. Unemployment insurance, by imposing more taxes, cannot help this. We have not begun to scratch the surface of our wealth.

Again, hon. members will surely agree with me that the Canadian people have not all they need to make them a happy and contented nation. Not one hon. member can say that every one of his constituents has everything needed to make him even comfortable. What is the matter? Are there not enough goods to go around? Surely there are. Then why not distribute them? How can the government correlate the fact that our clothing factories are not producing to full capacity, are not employing all that they could, and that we have all kinds of clothing available, yet the vast majority of people in Canada need clothes? How can the government correlate the fact that Canadians need houses? Many people in Canada live in shacks, yet they live literally in the midst of great forests. How can the government correlate the fact that we are curtailing production of foodstuffs and destroying vast quantities of them in Canada to-day, while thousands of people have insufficient food? I repeat, it is not sufficient to bring in temporary measures of relief, palliatives, unemployment insurance, or any other schemes to relieve the situation for a short time. We must drive right into the root or cause and apply the remedy there. It is indisputable that the reason why so many people are unemployed and poverty stricken to-day is simply that our present inadequate financial system has failed to keep up with the progress of the last two generations. Science has progressed in recent years, and so developed the productive system or machine that it is possible to produce with ease all that is needed to supply the wants of the people of Canada. The system of finance or money, upon which the responsibility of distribution falls, has proven itself old-fashioned, a system adapted to the age of scarcity, utterly incapable of the task, and has miserably failed. It needs modernizing, overhauling and rejuvenating. This is definitely the responsibility of the federal government.

A few days ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested that unemployment was not alone the responsibility of the federal government. I am surprised that he should take this attitude. It is the duty of this government either to remodel the money system so that it will distribute the goods that the people of Canada need, or to take care of the people of this country without imposing any greater penalty by way of more taxes.

I am rather frightened by the implications in the speeches in reply to the speech from the throne, which would indicate that the government is going to force its way through with unemployment insurance. I was worried when the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), when speaking on unemployment insurance, intimated that the government must go ahead or blast its way through. What do these statements mean? Do they mean forcing upon the provinces something they do not want, or do they suggest blasting their way through to the pockets of the working people? I submit that is just what contributory unemployment insurance will do.

Again, I am rather surprised at the argument used by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr Gardiner) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) when they say that we must secure foreign markets in order to cure unemployment in Canada. I wonder just what attitude other countries will take to this. If it is necessary for Canada to export goods in order to cure her unemployment problem, is this not just as necessary for other countries to cure their unemployment problem?

Australia, for instance, has an unemployment problem somewhat similar to that of Canada. Ten per cent of her population are unemployed or on relief. Yet Canada has a favourable balance of trade of almost $24,000,000 with Australia. How can Australia cure her unemployment, if that is the argument? Will she not have to find foreign markets for her goods? What will happen when the saturation point of all countries has been reached? Do our ministers suggest that when that time comes we shall need a war or some other disastrous method of creating markets, or do they think they can discover some new country or civilization to which they can export, so as to cure our unemployment problem?

Another question in the minds of many people when unemployment insurance is being discussed is this: How are the hundreds and thousands of those Canadian people already unemployed to be provided for? Unemployment insurance, and especially contributory unemployment insurance, is for those who are now employed. I might add that it will benefit only those who are permanently employed. It would bring only temporary assistance to those of our people who are only temporarily employed. Approximately ten per cent of our Canadian people are on relief, and many thousands more are on the border line, receiving only temporary or seasonal employment. What steps is the government going to take to guarantee economic security for those people?

We come now to another point. Many classes of our workers are not usually included in unemployment insurance schemes. Agriculturists, fishermen, lumbermen, those employed in domestic service, nurses, teachers and many others are usually excluded from the benefits of unemployment insurance. Those people, because of increased prices, increased taxes and the higher cost of living, will be obliged to pay their share of a contributory unemployment insurance scheme, just the same as the rest.

Agriculturists constitute one glaring example. About fifty per cent of our people are on farms. Those citizens, if they are excluded, will have to pay their share of the cost; yet they will not be able to participate in the benefits.

In conclusion, if a plan is to be introduced which will really assist our Canadian people, it must be one which will assist all classes. It must be a plan which will better the living conditions of the people of Canada, rather than make them poorer. Because the wording of the resolution does not make it quite plain that such a scheme should be available to all classes, and because the word "contributory" will make it ultra vires of the constitution and will give the government an excuse for not going ahead with any scheme. I propose the following amendment to the resolution, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Elliott):

That the resolution be amended as follows: That the words "contributory unemployment insurance for" be struck out and the following be substituted "non-contributory unemployment insurance available to all classes in."

Mr. RODOLPHE LEDUC (Wright) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) on having placed on the order paper the following resolution:

That in the opinion of this house, a national system of contributory unemployment insurance for Canada is a pressing need at the present time and should receive immediate attention.

He has thus provided many hon. members with an opportunity to express their views on a question of such great present-day interest as unemployment insurance.

It is impossible to discuss this question without at the same time discussing the question of amending the British North America Act, for the dominion government cannot establish compulsory unemployment insurance on a national basis in this country without amending the Canadian constitution.

I shall deal first with unemployment insurance itself and then with the necessity of amending the Canadian constitution in order to permit the establishment of unemployment insurance on a national basis.

Unemployment insurance is a form of protection given to the worker who has been employed during a certain number of months of the year and who has contributed to the unemployment insurance fund. It allows him when unemployed to draw benefits from the common fund to which he has contributed.

In other words, unemployment insurance means compulsory saving. It is well known that a large proportion of workers spend their wages from day to day, making no provision for periods of sickness or unemployment.

The proposed system of compulsory and contributory unemployment insurance involves a common fund made up of contributions by the wage-earner, the employer and, in many instances, the State, out of which fund the former draws benefits during periods of forced idleness.

It is recognized by our sociologists and economists that not only is legislation of that kind praiseworthy, but that it is important to put it into force as soon as possible in order partially to solve the problem of unemployment and particularly of direct relief.

Time does not permit me to describe the operation of the various systems of unemployment insurance applied in different countries. I shall simply say that I am convinced of the necessity and urgency of establishing a system of unemployment insurance in Canada, and that I deem it the government's duty to take all means necessary to obtain the consent of the provinces to a constitutional amendment on that point. Indeed, such an amendment is essential if the dominion government is to establish in Canada a nation-wide system of contributory unemployment insurance.

The British North America Act is not a contract, but an Imperial act which can be amended only by the Imperial Parliament.

Our federal system differs from the American one in that the Fathers of the Canadian Confederation insisted on a powerful central authority, while the American federation strengthens the powers of the States. Therefore, in the United States all undistributed powers belong to the parts that make up the whole. In Canada they belong to the federal parliament.

Lord Carnarvon stated in the House of Lords when introducing the British North America Act:

The object in view is to confer on the central government its high functions and almost sovereign powers, enabling it to establish general principles and uniform laws on questions of equal concern to all the provinces, while leaving to each province sufficient municipal liberty and self-government to allow it to exercise certain local powers to the general advantage.

Lord Sankey expresed a similar view when he gave judgment in favour of the Dominion in the aeronautical case:

The main object of the Act, he said, is to establish a system of government on essentially federal principles.

The distribution of legislative powers is given in sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. Consequently, the dominion parliament cannot assume the right to legislate on any subject mentioned in section 92, even on the frequently invoked ground that the matter is an economic one of pressing and national importance, such as unemployment insurance, for in these matters the provinces are sovereign.

We have frequently been told of late that Confederation could survive only on condition that its basic pact remain untouched. To respect provincial rights; to agree with the provinces on a method of amending the constitution, and above all to hold sacred its clauses concerning the right of the minority of their language, their religion and their privileges, that is understood; but to say that the federative agreement, that obsolete instrument, must not be touched at all, is a different matter.

Is it not proper to seek the right to amend the constitution in order to give to the unemployed of the different provinces rights to which they are entitled but which they do not now enjoy? The country is on the brink of ruin while the house discusses the question of the constitutional handicaps which we should nevertheless acknowledge and which it is probably essential to consider and to determine.

Confederation was not made without us. Why are we always endeavouring to isolate ourselves in the province of Quebec as in an Indian reserve? During the economic dislocation to which we must submit, the entire machinery is immobilised in consequence of the ill-will of those who try to establish a state within the state. We know some of the evils affecting the body politic. The healing of a great part of those economic sores depends on the action of the provinces. The federal power will provide some remedies, but, in any case, it is essential to conform our constitution to present conditions and to insure, in the social and economic fields, a greater measure of cooperation between the dominion and the provinces. Our constitution is full of vague statements, difficulties and contradictions, and, for that reason, we move backward instead of forward.

[Mr. Leduc.]

It is time to put a stop to the differences of opinions existing between the dominion and the provinces on the question of jurisdiction. It is time that our governments stop passing the buck.

The minister of justice (Mr. Lapointe), who is considered as the greatest Canadian authority on constitutional law, recently said in a speech that an amendment to our constitution is possible, in order to give the federal government the necessary power to establish unemployment insurance and at the same time to provide better safeguards for the rights of minorities, under a system according to which no change respecting the language, the religion or the political rights of a minority could be made without the unanimous consent of all the provinces,—safeguards that the present constitution does not provide.

I say without hesitation that, to my mind, it is absolutely essential to change our constitution in order to solve social problems and insure suvival of our democratic institutions. I have no hesitation in stating that in those words I am giving expression not only to my personal views, but to those of my constituents and also the great majority of the people of the province of Quebec.

Canadian unity is endangered by the lack of legal cohesion, by our antiquated constitution which does not meet our present needs. Without anticipating a future discussion, I hope the Sirois commission will show us a way of giving life to the federative agreement. The irresistible evolution of men and things, the progress of modern times and of civilization have rendered imperative a remoulding of constitutions. Obsolete monarchies are out of date. Empires shake on their foundations. The abuses of democracy have engendered dictatorships. The entire world craves for innovations, which it sometimes seeks in the unfortunate aberrations of totalitarian systems. But, no matter! The failure of old governmental ideas has created, in certain nations, a taste for adventure. Let us hope, sir, that, in the general panic, our people will keep cool. Changes to be made in our constitution will have to be to the advantage of our people, who want to be freed from that strait-jacket in order that they may fulfil their destiny. It is impossible to place unemployment insurance on our statute books without the consent of the provinces. Let us wish also that a really national spirit will replace that sulkiness which was responsible for a lack of cooperation shown in certain quarters towards the Sirois commission. Let us hope that Canadian ideals will inspire our legislators so that the great wind of progress may fill the sails of our Canadian ship. Such unity of inspiration is the necessary foundation of our prosperity and our economic development.

On behalf of the youth of the country who envisage the future with dismay, on behalf of those who believe that all is not yet lost, and on behalf of those who have kept at the bottom of their soul a glimmer of hope, I ask the legislators of my country to make the final effort which will bring our beloved Canada to the fulfilment of its glorious destinies.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity of saying a few words in support of the motion before this house and at the same time speak to so many empty chairs. The reception accorded to this motion to-day is quite different from the reception given in 1927 to a motion of this kind introduced by myself. When I introduced a motion in 1927 to approve a policy of unemployment insurance, it received a rather hostile reception, and I am glad to note the great change that has come over this house in a period of twelve years. At this late hour it is not my intention to speak at any particular length; I wish to say just a few words in general support of the motion.

I am surprised to find an amendment moved at this late hour by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Kennedy), speaking on behalf of his group. I have a great deal of sympathy with the proposal to introduce a scheme of non-contributory unemployment insurance, but if the government is not prepared to accept such a scheme I am quite prepared to accept a contributory scheme of unemployment insurance. I believe that once we adopt the principle, as years go along we shall add to the measure, in exactly the same way as has been done in Great Britain. I was surprised at the emphatic rejection by my hon. friends to my left of the principles enunciated in the proposal of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill).

I speak with a little knowledge and understanding of the labour movement in Canada. So far as I know, every labour organization in this country, whether represented by the international unions, the national unions, or the Catholic unions in the province of Quebec, has gone on record as being in favour of a contributory system of unemployment insurance. Now, lo and behold, we find a new spokesman for labour rising in his place and telling us that they do not want this system of contributory unemployment insurance.

Mr. MacNICOL: Who was that?

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Kennedy). Why do I say that if I cannot get one form of insurance I am prepared to accept the other? I do so because of my experience with the working people, among whom I have worked and with whom I have lived for so many years, both here, and, as a young man, in Great Britain. If there is one thing I would try to retain in this day it is the manhood and self-respect of the great mass of people now on relief. I know how difficult it is for the average worker who finds himself unemployed to go to a relief office and for the first time become the recipient of public relief. Sometimes it requires nerves of steel for a man to undertake such a task. I have known men to undergo the greatest hardships and to have their families suffer the utmost misery before they could force themselves to become the recipients of public relief. So I say that if we had a system of unemployment insurance under which the state, the employer and the employee would contribute, at least when a man became unemployed he would receive his cheque at the end of the week or the end of the month, and to a certain extent this would help him retain that manhood to which I think every man in Canada has a right.

Some statements were made this evening by the minister with respect to the system in the United States. After all, we must regard what is being done there under the Social Security Act as more or less of an experiment, but if my understanding of the situation in the United States is correct, this was about the only way by which they could circumvent the constitution. There they have a completely different problem from the one we have in Canada; for the simple reason that there they have forty-eight states with which to contend, whereas here we have only nine provinces. Sometimes we think nine are too many; and if some day events should move in such a direction that we could reduce the number of our provinces to five, I think it would be so much the better for this dominion. That experiment in the United States is something worth while, and I think out of their trials and experiences ultimately they will arrive at a much better method of dealing with unemployment insurance than they have at present. But there, in order to overcome the constitution, they took action, and that is the important thing. Whether the action is right or wrong we cannot say. I remember quite well thirteen years ago, when in this chamber we undertook to bring in a scheme of old age pensions, we found the same difficulties that we are experiencing to-day in connection with unemployment insurance.

What have I to complain about now? Well, I do complain when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) rises in his place to-night and practically says we are going to do nothing until such time as all the provinces combine to make a united move in a certain direction. I do not think that is expressing a desire or even an intention that within a reasonable time the people of this country may expect a national system of unemployment insurance. I am anxious that something be done. I am disappointed beyond words at the attitude of some of the provincial premiers. I disapprove the attitude of the premier of Alberta and the attitude of the premier of Quebec on this question; for I believe that by bringing in a scheme of unemployment insurance we really would be doing a good thing for the provinces concerned. Sometimes when I hear these two premiers speak about the unity of Canada, I think they could do nothing better at this time to promote unity than to give their consent to the inauguration of a national system of unemployment insurance.

Let it be stated at once that, as far as I am concerned, I do not believe for one moment that any scheme of unemployment insurance we might introduce here would wholly solve the problem of unemployment. Rather than support unemployment insurance I would far sooner have the government embark upon a scheme which would provide employment assurance, something which has been promised both within and without this chamber so often in the past. But if we cannot have a system which will give our people a certain amount of economic security by providing them with work, then I think it is up to the government to see that we have a comprehensive and all-embracing system of unemployment insurance which at least will give our working people a certain measure of economic security which they do not possess at the present time.

If, as the government say, they have pigeonholed away somewhere a scheme that they hope to introduce into this chamber at some time in the future, I hope that scheme will be as wide and as all-embracing as the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) suggested this afternoon. We have advanced so far since unemployment insurance was first introduced that to-day the problem is entirely different from that which existed in 1911 when this system was first introduced in Great Britain. If my memory serves me correctly, at that time the unemployed in Great Britain, according to trade union statistics, would average somewhere in the neighbourhood of seven per cent. Our unemployed to-day probably would run in the neighbourhood of 25 per cent, or at the very least, 20 per cent. So I think we shall have great difficulty, bearing in mind the vast amount of unemployment with which we have to contend at the present time, in drafting a scheme sufficiently all-embracing to take care of the 400,000 people who are at present unemployed.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that if we are going to give hope to these people who are, let us say, partly unemployed and who expect some day to be in the ranks of the unemployed, we ought to give them some idea of what an unemployment scheme is going to do. When the minister told us the government had a measure ready to deal with this question, I was disappointed in that he did not at least tell us the scope of the measure or what were the immediate plans of the government. That is my main disappointment as far as his speech is concerned, because with the rest of it I entirely agree. I do not complain with regard to what the minister said; my complaint is rather with regard to what he omitted to say.

What is the immediate policy of the government as far as unemployment insurance is concerned? Must we wait now until all the provinces say they are prepared to come under a federal scheme and then have the constitution changed? Is that the present suggestion? If it is, I would far rather have the government come forward with an alternative proposal. I would far rather have the government say, "Well, we will introduce a measure and make it permissive, so that all the provinces wishing to do so may come under the scheme." I am quite sure I suggested proposals along these lines in this chamber in 1929. At that time the excuse of the government was that they could not introduce such a measure because the provinces did not want it. If I had to introduce a measure of this kind into this chamber, I would make it a condition that it should not become operative until at least five or six of the provinces signified their intention of coming under its scope. If that were done, I believe in a very short period all the provinces would come under the scheme, provided the government would make it sufficiently attractive.

I want to resume my seat because there are other hon. members who wish to speak this evening; but before I do so, let me add that, in order to induce the provinces to adopt the scheme, I would have more than one-third of the cost assumed by the federal government. If the federal authority assumed, say fifty per cent of the entire cost, they would not lose anything. We should overcome the constitutional difficulty; in a very short period probably all the nine provinces would adopt the scheme because they would be relieved by the federal government of a greater part of their responsibilities; the federal government would also benefit by a reduction in the amount of unemployment relief which they are paying at the present time. I feel sure that with the incentive of a fairly large contribution from the federal exchequer, even though this government brought in permissive legislation it would not be long before it would be accepted by the nine provinces of the dominion.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): At this stage of the debate I shall be very brief in any remarks that I have to make. The question of unemployment insurance has been on many occasions before this house. If I recall correctly, the platform of the Liberal party in 1919 contained a plank which pledged that party to the introduction and establishment of a scheme of unemployment insurance. That party came into power in 1921, and the question slept from 1921 until 1930, although during that time industry was prosperous and conditions were favourable to the establishment of a contributory scheme of unemployment insurance.

Mr. HEAPS: May I point out to my hon. friend that we had a committee of the house considering this matter in 1928-29.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, but so far as the then government was concerned no action was taken. That is the point I want to make. I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) will admit that from 1930 until the present the conditions of industry have not been favourable for the establishment of a scheme of this kind—not as favourable as they were between 1921 and 1930.

The question has always been beset by difficulties arising from the divided jurisdiction of the provinces and the dominion. As I understand it, the minister would like to introduce a scheme which might be adopted on a firm basis, on a basis that would be free from controversy as to jurisdiction, and he thinks it would be preferable to have it as a national scheme under the control of the dominion parliament. He said that Mr. Bennett on his return from Geneva changed his position. I think he made use of an expression which questioned the motives of that right hon. gentleman. I believe he said he changed his tactics, and that it was a case of the shifting sands of political expediency. I do not think that was quite worthy of the minister. I want to point out to him that if he looks up the record of that government he will find very little in its actions, very little in Mr. Bennett's policy, that was based on what he calls "the shifting, sinking sands of political expediency." No government in the history of Canada had less regard for the political consequences of its acts.

Mr. ROGERS: Will my hon. friend permit a question on that point? He may recall that last year when this matter was discussed, Mr. Bennett stated that the reason he changed his view was the decisions given in the radio case and the aviation case. Now the radio case and the aviation case were both decided, if I remember correctly, some years before; and in the second place they had no application whatever to the Employment Insurance Act; they had to the wages bill and to the hours bill, but they had no relation whatsoever to the Employment Insurance Act.

Mr. STEWART: That may be true in part, but what did the minister say? He said that Mr. Bennett after his return from Geneva changed his position, and that has great significance, because I am going to read for him now the preamble of this statute of 1935.

Mr. ROGERS: I have it here.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, but I am going to read it:

Whereas the Dominion of Canada was a signatory, as part of the British empire, to the treaty of peace made between the allied and associated powers and Germany, signed at Versailles, on the 28th day of June, 1919; and whereas the said treaty of peace was confirmed by The Treaties of Peace Act 1919; and whereas, by article 23 of the said treaty, each of the signatories thereto agreed that they would endeavour to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labour for men, women and children, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and by article 427 of the said treaty declared that the well-being, physical, moral and intellectual, of industrial wage-earners is of supreme international importance; and whereas it is desirable to discharge the obligations to Canadian labour assumed under the provisions of the said treaty; and whereas it is essential for the peace, order and good government of Canada to provide for a national employment service and insurance against unemployment, and for other forms of social insurance and for the purpose of maintaining on equitable terms, interprovincial and international trade, and to authorize the creation of a national fund out of which benefits to unemployed persons throughout Canada will be payable and to provide for levying contributions from employers and workers for the maintaining of the said fund and for contributions thereto by the dominion: Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

Then follows the statute. I want to know if there is any firmer basis upon which the dominion could assume to act than the fulfilment of a treaty obligation. I find in that, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. ROGERS: It was rejected by the court, completely.

Mr. STEWART: —an attempt to put this act upon grounds that, had it been maintained by the privy council, would have placed the jurisdiction of this parliament beyond question. That was the objective.

Mr. ROGERS: It was rejected by the court, completely.

Mr. STEWART: Quite so. Not "completely"; a divided court.

Mr. ROGERS: On that point, rejected by the court.

Mr. STEWART: Oh, yes, it was rejected. But I say there was the attempt not to play politics and to place the jurisdiction of this parliament upon what looked to be a firm, sound basis, beyond question, where there would be no controversy between the provinces and the dominion in this field. The minister says that it was an attempt to play politics with the matter. Let me remind him of the action of the opposition of that day. Why, they criticized the act on the same ground that the minister is taking tonight, the one of jurisdiction, and questioned its validity. The present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) took that position; and although they professed to believe that the act was not sound, that it could not be maintained, each and every one of them voted for that act—for political expediency.

Mr. ROGERS: They supported the principle.

Mr. STEWART: Was that action based on the "shifting, sinking sands of political expediency"? Why did they not take their courage in their hands and oppose that act?

The act went to the courts. It was declared invalid. Nothing has been done since except to communicate with the provinces and to ask for an approval of an amendment to the British North America Act.

Mr. ROGERS: What would my hon. friend have done?

Mr. STEWART: Under the circumstances I think I would have devised some scheme of unemployment insurance along the lines suggested here, giving the provinces the option of taking advantage of it. It would be better than doing nothing, which this government has been guilty of. Nothing has been done. This has been an effective way of getting delay and setting up the opposition or lack of co-operation of the provinces as an excuse for inaction. Let us see the position of Mr. Duplessis. He has been pictured as one opposing the adoption of some scheme of unemployment insurance. I have here a copy of his letter dated December 30, 1937, addressed to the Prime Minister of Canada. It reads:

My dear Premier:

Your answer to my letter dated November 22nd was handed to me on the day of your departure for your recent holidays and I preferred to await your return before replying.

In your second letter, you repeat the views you expressed in your first one, adding that you are convinced that enabling or concurring legislation would be uncertain and unstable.

Old age pensions—one of the many similar instances—which you enacted and enforced and which was approved and amended by your successors in office, a few years later, is based on enabling legislation.

Moreover, as stated previously, there are also other ways of realizing unemployment insurance which would safeguard provincial autonomy. If enabling legislation, as you declare, is uncertain and unstable, what do you think of the stability and certainty of a federal legislation on unemployment insurance which could essentially be changed or modified, every year, by the federal parliament?

The government of the province of Quebec considers that the best elements of stability and certainty are within the British North America Act and that it is much safer to preserve the stability of the constitution.

In conclusion, again I state that the province of Quebec is willing to cooperate heartily in the establishment of a sound and fair system of unemployment insurance, which could be established on a national scope, without infringing upon the rights and autonomy of the provinces.

There, I submit, is an offer for cooperation on a basis that could be worked out just the same as old age pensions. The minister says it would mean additional expense and overlapping if that system were adopted. Perhaps it might, but it seems to me that it is better than doing nothing at all, and that we could work out a scheme if the government really desired it.

The government say they have a draft bill. I think they have a pretty good draft bill in the one that was submitted to the court. That contains the skeleton and it was worked out with great care. A basis for action is found there, and I do urge the government, in view of their pledges and promises, and the fact that it is a plank in their platform, that they take some action to show that they are in earnest, that they really want to do something about unemployment insurance in Canada, and that they are not really just taking advantage of every opportunity to invoke delay as an excuse for failure to take any action at all.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): We all realize that the mover of the resolution (Mr. Neill) desires nothing but the improvement of the employer and employee's condition and that of the working people of Canada, and if we in this group do not agree with his precise plan, I can only hope that he will credit us with a similar desire.

In the few minutes left at my disposal I have not time to go into our case; but, shortly, our objection to unemployment insurance is that it causes, like all other saving of money, a shortage of purchasing power and therefore aggravates the conditions which it is supposed to help. Furthermore, unemployment insurance differs from any other insurance in that it insures acts of men, whereas of course ordinary insurance is an insurance against acts of God. That is a fundamental difference; and as my colleague says, it would leave those who are insured open to tyranny from threats if they were to strike for better conditions.

I represent an agricultural constituency, and so far as my people are concerned, we should get little or no benefit but should have to pay our share of the bill, because the government would have to recoup itself for its share through taxation, and the employer would have to put his share into prices. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) was kind enough to say the other night that we in this group know less about money and economics than any other people on God's green earth. That, of course, may be a matter of opinion, but I do not think anyone can accuse us of any reluctance to learn something about money and to discuss it. We have open minds at any rate; and if I may say so, after three years of fairly attentive listening in this house, I have come to the conclusion, so far as I have been able to hear and understand, that not only is this house ignorant of money but that it has no desire to learn anything about it. It does not even want to discuss money, so far as I have been able to find out while I have been sitting here listening. That being the case, I should like to quote from someone who is an authority not only on money but also on insurance.

I have here a pamphlet called Banking and Industry. It is not a social credit pamphlet, nor is it written by a social crediter, but is by an insurance actuary. It is a paper that was read before the Actuarial Society of Great Britain. I would say that the opinions of an insurance actuary given before the Actuarial Society of Great Britain are certainly worthy of the respect of this house. Dealing with savings he says this:

> In conclusion it might be pointed out how important it is that assurance companies should study the economic effects of saving.
>
> In this connection it will be remembered that in a recent discussion by the society relating to the Cohen report it was pointed out that the officers expected to receive a pat on the back for their services in inculcating thrift; instead of which they were told that it was doubtful whether it was a good thing that money should be dragged out of the pockets of the working man for assurance when it could be better employed in feeding and clothing the man and his family while he was alive. Furthermore if, as has been indicated earlier, every penny saved causes a dislocation of industry, the good rendered to the community by saving is not so apparent. Assurance companies, therefore, if only to safeguard their own position, should look with favour on any plan which will have the effect . . . of counteracting the evil which results at the present time from savings reducing effective demand for the products of industry.

Those are not the words of anybody in this group, or even of social crediters; they are the words of an insurance actuary. It has been pointed out that while this is not, and is not intended to be, a cure for unemployment, it is proposed as a help to the misery caused by unemployment. But before we prescribe anything to alleviate the pain of a disease, we surely should be certain that we are not going to make that disease worse. If, as we believe and as a growing number of people, including some of the ablest economists and financiers in the world believe, the really fundamental cause, or the main cause, of unemployment, is a shortage of purchasing power, surely we should do well to make certain that in prescribing a palliative for it we are not going to make the disease worse. If it is the case, and I believe it is, that we are suffering from a lack of purchasing power, it would be like saying to a man who is suffering from anaemia: You have the beginnings of anaemia, and since you are probably going to be worse in time to come we are going to extract a pint or a quart of your blood and keep it, so that if and when you do get worse you will have some blood to fall back on. But as we see it, by the extraction of that blood you immediately make the man seriously ill. What he wants is not blood taken from him but some blood pumped into him, then he will not have anaemia at all but will be up and doing. We believe that if by any means we could put sufficient blood into the economic body of Canada, it would do away with this anaemia which is the cause of unemployment, and instead of having half a million people on relief, every able-bodied man who wanted work would be able to find it. That seems to me to be a reasonable attitude.

I notice that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) seemed to think that we in Alberta, and of this group, were against any help to the working man, simply because we see that in helping him in this way we would probably make his condition worse than it now is. I think my colleague the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Kennedy) made a good point when he mentioned the power that would be conferred on the state by such a scheme as this, because a man who has paid for unemployment insurance for a number of years would hesitate to do anything which might endanger his benefits. He would think twice before he agitated or struck for better conditions. That would be giving the state a great power over the working man. Already power is much too concentrated. That is a danger not only in Europe where, with the exception of two countries, and they not seeming very anxious to get away from it, dictatorship is a fact; but it is on its way here, and therefore we in this group are against anything that tends to concentrate power either in the dominion government or in this house. We think the power is too much centralized now.

Mr. LAWSON: How would going on strike interfere with a man's benefits under unemployment insurance?

Mr. JAQUES: I am afraid that under the system the insured would give a hostage to those who control the system. They could be told, "All right, strike, but you lose your unemployment benefits."

Mr. LAWSON: How could he be told that? The statute has its provisions. Any unemployment insurance act would contain provisions as to the conditions under which a man drew benefits, and any reasonable act would have in it the provision that there would be a hiatus or something for the period of a strike.

Mr. JAQUES: I am not saying that it would, but I say it could and probably would. For these reasons I cannot subscribe to the resolution.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

END OF VOLUME I