The Debates of the Senate

OFFICIAL REPORT

THE SENATE.

Thursday, Februáry 26, 1920.

The Senate met this day at 2.30 p.m. in the Chamber of the House of Commons in the new Parliament Building; the Speaker in the Chair.

NEW SENATORS INTRODUCED.

The following newly-appointed Senators were severally introduced and took their seats:

Hon. Thomas Chapais, LL.D., of the city of Quebec, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Mr. Blondin.

Hon. Lorne Campbell Webster, of the city of Quebec, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Mr. Blondin.

OPENING OF THE SESSION.

The Hon. the SPEAKER announced that he had received a communication from the Governor General's Secretary informing him that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate Chamber to open the session of the Dominion Parliament on Thursday, the 26th February, at 3 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

At three o'clock His Excellency the Governor General proceeded to the Senate Chamber and took his seat upon the Throne. His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and that House being come, with their Speaker, His Excellency was pleased to open the Fourth Session of the Thirteenth Parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following Speech:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I congratulate you that after an enforced absence of four years, it is possible for you to assemble in your new legislative home, resting in trustful security upon the old foundations and surrounded by the picturesque and historic setting of Parliament Hill. Though not entirely completed, its noble proportions, its wide and convenient spaces, its beauty of design and chasteness of finish and its unique local situation mark it as a most striking and dignified structure, worthy of the people whose national life it will henceforth serve.

Since the last Session of Parliament events of importance have taken place which have brought appreciably nearer the much desired settlements of peace. Following the exchange of the final ratifications, the Treaty of Peace between the Allied Powers and Germany has been brought into full force and effect and has rendered possible the constitution of the League of Nations and the establishment by it of the various Comissions and mandatories authorized by the Treaty to be carried out under its direction. It is satisfactory to note that the status of Canada as a member of the League has thus been definitely fixed.

The Treaty of Peace with Bulgaria has been concluded and will be submitted for your approval. Negotiations for the conclusion of Treaties of Peace with Hungary and Turkey are now well advanced and, if concluded in time, will be laid before you during the present Session of Parliament.

The first meeting of the International Labour Conference, in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty of Peace, was held at Washington in October and November of last year and was attended by representatives of my Government and of the Canadian employers' and employees' organizations. It will be gratifying to learn that Canada was selected as one of the twelve Governments whose countries are entitled to representation on the governing body of the International Labour Office.

When the remaining Treaties shall have been concluded and the functions of the League of Nations and the various tribunals authorized thereby become fully operative, it is confidently hoped that the end will have been reached of the confusion and uncertainty consequent upon the long and regrettable delay in bringing into operation the provisions of the Treaty and an effective beginning made in the improvement of national conditions and the adjustment of international relations which will ensure the continued blessings of peace.

The forces which Canada contributed to the war have now nearly all been returned and mostly demobilized and the great majority have resumed their avocations and again become active and important factors in civil life.

The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and the Soldiers' Land Settlement Board continue to provide vocational training and opportunities for permanent occupation which greatly aid in the solution of the problem of readjustment, whilst the work of the Labour Employment Bureaus and the helpful service of the Canadian Patriotic Association in administering the emergency fund provided by Parliament, have materially assisted in solving the problem of temporary non-employment.

In the European economic field clear vision is still impossible and the unsettled state of Exchange, the lack of International Credits, and the inflation of paper currency, combined with the scarcity of raw materials and the demoralization of labour and transport conditions, combine to retard production and to restrict the exchange of products necessary for the proper sustenance of life and the rebuilding of the waste and destruction caused by the great war. From every quarter of the world is being impressed, often by severe privation and suffering, the one great lesson that increased production through increased work, combined with thrift and economy in individual and state, is the only sure hope of business improvement and future prosperity.

After four years of war and a year and three months of confusion and dislocation which has succeeded thereto, it is satisfactory to know that business in Canada has been well maintained, that production has been large and that general conditions are on the whole satisfactory. It is cause for thankfulness that of all countries affected by the war, Canada has maintained a record of social order and industrial and commerical prosperity second to none.

The ratification of The International Opium Convention renders it necessary to obtain legislation to carry into effect its provisions relating to the sale of opium, cocaine and other deleterious drugs. A Bill will be laid before you for that purpose.

A Bill to provide for a Dominion Franchise will be introduced, dealing with the qualifications of voters and the procedure necessary to enable all persons legally qualified to register their votes.

Other Bills will be presented for your consideration including a Bill respecting Copyrights and Bills providing for the amendment of the Patent Act, of the Loan and Trust Companies Acts, the Indian Act, and the Exchequer Courts Act.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts for the last fiscal year will be laid before you. Estimates for the next fiscal year will be submitted at an early date, making provisions for the various services of the Government of Canada. These have been formed with a view to strict economy having due regard to the requirements of the public service and the obligations of the Country.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In inviting your careful attention to the important subjects which will engage your attention I pray that the blessings of Divine Providence may attend your deliberations.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

CONSIDERATION OF HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, it was ordered that the speech of His Excellency the Governor General be taken into consideration to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

The Hon. the SPEAKER informed the Senate that he had received the following communication from His Majesty King George V:

London, February 23, 1920.

I desire that you will convey to my faithful Senate and House of Commons of Canada my warmest greetings on this the first occasion of their assembly in the new buildings with the erection of which my son is proud to have been associated. It is my firm assurance that the deliberations of the Parliament of Canada will as in the past redound to the happiness and prosperity of the great Dominion whose well-being is so vital to the whole Empire.

George Rex.

BILL PRO FORMA.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED presented a Bill entitled, an Act relating to Railways.

The Bill was read the first time.

COMMITTEE ON ORDERS AND PRIVILEGES.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved.

That all the Senators present during the Session be appointed a committee to consider the Orders and Customs of the Senate and Privileges of Parliament, and that the said Committee have leave to meet in the Senate Chamber when and as often as they please.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON SELECTION.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the following Senators were appointed a Committee on Selection to nominate Senators to serve on the several Standing Committees during the present session: Hon. Messieurs. Béique, Belcourt, Bostock, Daniel, Robertson. Tanner, Watson, Willoughby and the mover.

The Senate adjourned to meet in the Railway Committee Room of the House of Commons to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Friday, February 27, 1920.

The Senate met at 3 p.m. in the temporary Chamber of the Senate, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayer and routine proceedings.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. WILLIAM PROUDFOOT rose to move that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General to offer the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious Speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament. He said:

Honourable gentlemen, in rising to move that a vote of thanks be presented to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I wish first of all to thank the honourable the leader of the Government for the honour he has done me in selecting me to make this motion. As a newcomer to this Chamber I feel it an especial mark of confidence, in that I have not had the pleasure of participating in the many and important measures which have been before the present Government during its term of office, and many of which must be amplified and developed during the present session. It is an especial honour too, in that the present is, I am quite convinced, one of the most crucial times in the history of our country and to a marked degree Canada's future will stand upon what we build now. The way is open for a Canada such as before the war we but dreamed of. Honourable gentlemen may not agree with that statement, yet it is true. When they consider they will find that we take for granted what before the war we aspired to from different points of view, but, I venture to say, with conviction on the part of none that the end would be achieved without years of gradual national and constitutional development.

His Excellency refers to the ratification of the Peace Treaty with Germany and to the treaties with other belligerent nations which are to be brought before the House for approval. The first meeting of the International Labour Conference has been held, and, as His Excellency points out, Canada has been selected as one of the twelve Governments whose countries are entitled to representation in the governing body of the International Labour Office. Look at the Empire how you will; decide for yourselves what should be the constitutional organization for the Empire: there is not the slightest question that Canada will occupy in the Imperial Conference, to meet this year, a position that but for the war she could not have occupied.

We can thank our gallant soldiers for this in a large measure. From the moment that our first contingent set foot in England an indefinite change took place. It was just a matter of getting better acquainted, an opportunity which had been denied to the masses of the people on both sides of the Atlantic. The second battle of Ypres, when the Germans first used gas, when our gallant lads stepped into the breach from Gravenstafle to St. Julien and stopped the savage horde which would have swept through Ypres to the sea, cemented the change. Our battered first division, when it emerged from that conflict, found that in the hearts of the people of Great Britain each and every one of them was a hero. The reception of the wounded in England was touching. These boys' mothers and sisters were too far away to tend to them, but self-constituted foster mothers and sisters were ever ready to do their utmost for their kin by blood and by tradition. And so the mutual knowledge and affection grew as our first thirty thousand was followed by many other tens of thousands. When on leave or in hospital, they came into touch with the people and made friends in, I venture to say, practically every city and town in England, Scotland and Ireland. When they did not themselves become acquainted with the people, some English Tommy, or Scottish kiltie, or Irish fusilier, came home and talked of his Canadian pal. I have been told on good authority that when British Tommy and Canadian or Australian Tommy met, the salutation was, "Well, mate, how goes it?" The term "colonial" was forgotten—and how many of us were unconsciously annoyed by that term in pre-war days. Think of the attitude of even the Prince of Wales on his visit to Canada. To other people he was a guest and a prince, even if no retinue of courtiers stood between. To the veterans he was one of themselves. I am told—and I mention it to show how our army impressed even the enemy—that the Germans in a quiet part of the front, when the lines were close together, have been known to call out: "What are you fellows, British or Canadian?"

And in another way too, thanks to our gallant lads, the way is open. The greater proportion of those who are fit and well are back in their homes, scattered from coast to coast, and either settled or in the way of settling down, but with a different prospect and a wider outlook. It is wonderful to think that 400,000 and more of the best of our young blood have been in the Old Land and had an opportunity of studying its ways and conditions. Nine out of every ten of these men have grown in ambition and in confidence in the possibilities of their country. What a great educational factor this is, and what a spirit it is for us to encourage, to foster and to help!

And again, what a stimulus to immigration! England has in a measure educated our boys, and in return our boys have educated the British. Glowing tales have been told of this Canada of ours. Given the proper opportunities and encouragement, thousands of hearers will be eager to come out to take their part in the development of Canada.

And so I say that in the new knowledge and understanding that has grown up out of the relations of our boys with the people of the Mother Country and have, consciously or unconsciously, changed the relations of Canada to the Old Land, and, in a wider sense, the conception of the Empire by the world at large, a new foundation has been laid for the development of our country. I may safely say that we have a new self-confidence, a new autonomy which but for the war and our part in it, we should have been years in attaining. Friendships and mutual understanding of our needs and our desires have been developed in a way that would otherwise have been impossible.

This, as I have tried to point out, we owe in the largest measure to the boys who have fought for us. Of the debt we owe to them and how we are to pay it I shall speak later. At the moment I wish to emphasize that the greatest opportunity for Canada's future has arrived—is now in our hands—and it is our grave responsibility to see that by wise and provident legislation we take advantage of it to the full not only within Canada but also abroad: within Canada in its development, enrichment and betterment; without Canada in its development in relation to the Empire and to the world at large, commercially and politically. Of the latter phase I shall have but little to say. We have the opportunity. We must develop it and its development depends in a large measure on the success of our internal expansion, which will give weight to our outside influence. Yet I desire to speak briefly of what we must attend to in our external relations. Personally I am as resolute as any Canadian in devotion to the Imperial idea, but I do believe that in the colonial idea there is danger, as well as retrogression, and safety and unity may be found only in the concession of complete national autonomy to the Dominions and in equal and independent co-operation with the United Kingdom for common objects and the common security of the imperial structure. Our status was generously assumed by the Mother Country. Canada was recognized by the other allied powers as one of the nations which should sign the Treaty of Peace. Certain honourable gentlemen could see no particular significance in the Treaty as affecting Canada and some even contended that the Dominion would be committed to grave and dangerous obligations incompatible with national autonomy and involving a costly partnership in the defence of other nations. With all due deference to the opinions of these honourable gentlemen who regarded the Treaty as of little significance to Canada, their viewpoint indicates to me a lack of foresight, of imagination, of conviction in the future of our country. I would ask these gentlemen if they think that Canada would have been asked to affix her signature if she had not participated in the war. I would ask the other honourable gentlemen if there was any compulsion, any force exerted upon Canada to enter the late war, and if not then, how much less for any future wars. I am quite convinced that the power of the Parliament of Canada is in no sense impaired. I am at one with the Hon. Mr. Doherty when he says:

> If unjust aggression occurs, I have no doubt the Parliament of Canada would act on the advice of the Council of Nations, but there is nothing in the Treaty of Peace or the Covenant of the League of Nations that provides machinery for the expenditure of a single dollar or the raising of one soldier if the Parliament of Canada is unwilling.

It is true we have no direct representation on this Council, which consists of representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, Great Britain, France, the United States, Italy and Japan, together with representatives of four other members of the League, selected by the assembly from time to time, at its discretion. It is reasonable to think that Great Britain will continue to have direct representation on the Council and that so long as she does a second British representative will not be chosen. For this reason it is doubtful if any representative of the Dominions will be elected to membership, but our technical right to it is the recognition by the League of the equality of Canada with other nations. This new status which we have, I say we must retain in our relations to the world at large.

As to its effect within the Empire, I can see in our new position only a sign of greater growth—a new cohesion and unity on a basis commensurate with the size and influence of Canada. I repeat that I look for complete national autonomy and independent co-operation with the United Kingdom, but whether we are to achieve that through the theory of equal nations or organic federation, I have confidence that the genius of British statesmanship will develop the machinery necessary to ensure the security and permanence of the Empire, " to guarantee and maintain the essentials of political freedom and to establish equal citizenship for all subjects of the Imperial Crown."

This is a matter for ourselves and the Mother Country to deal with. It is not open to question and interference by other nations. Nor is our place in the League of Nations. That arrangement was not made to give the British Empire any undue representation, but to recognize the position of the Dominions in the Empire and assure to the overseas British countries equal authority with the smaller nations. Of late our position has been challenged. It has been most ably defended by the Hon. N. W. Rowell, the President of the Privy Council. He said:

> Canada, by the free action of her own Government, and the whole-hearted co-operation of her own people, raised 600,000 men to take part in this war. She mortgaged her future to carry the burdens which her participation in the war involved. The flower of her youth lies buried in France and Flanders, and thousands more are maimed for life in order that Canada, as one of the free nations of the Britannic commonwealth, might make her contribution to the cause of liberty and the restoration of the world's peace. In the light of these facts, it is inconceivable that any Government in Canada could be so false to both the living and the dead, and to Canada's future, as to give the assent of Canada to a proposal which would deprive Canada of the position and status won for her by her soldiers on the field of battle, and accorded to her at the Peace Conference by the enlightened judgment of nations; particularly is this the case when full status and voting rights are granted, and we think, properly granted, to several nations on the American continent which either by reason of treaties with the United States or of economic necessity are dependent upon her, nations which took no part in the war and whose combined population probably does not exceed that of Canada.

These words summarized our position.

The rights we secured should at all hazards be retained. For the sacrifices of Canada in the war there never can be any adequate money compensation. There is, however, the consolation that we did something to save freedom, something to strengthen the Empire and something to ensure closer co-operation among all the British countries in the future.

Turning now to domestic affairs in Canada. In its development and reconstruction our first duty is to our soldiers who made its new future possible.

As pointed out in the speech from the Throne, the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and the Soldiers' Land Settlement Board continue to provide vocational training and opportunities for permanent occupation which greatly aid in the solution of the problem of readjustment. It is true much has been done; but there is still much to do. I am strongly of the opinion that no effort should be spared to render as light as possible the burdens of those who were wounded in the war. Encouragement and assistance has been given, but we frequently come across men who feel they have not received the treatment they should have received, and that the right of securing the vocations they desire have been denied them. It is possible that in some instances they have been unreasonable, but their wishes should not be lightly put aside; our efforts should be directed towards making them happy and contented.

Canada has done much to assist her returned men, and will, I am satisfied, continue to do more. Her pension list is the most liberal of any nation engaged in the war; but when we consider the cost of living our supposed generous pensions are wholly inadequate. My own opinion is, and I know that this House and the country will agree with me, that the wounded and the families of those who did not return should be our especial care, and that the treasure of the country should be used to make their lot as pleasant as possible. After we have accomplished this end, all the available resources of the country should be used in assisting those who require assistance, not by way of charity, but as the gift of a thankful nation. These men did not hesitate to place their lives in jeopardy that we might live; why then should we hesitate to spend our money so as to lighten their load. Every man should be placed in a position to secure a living. No man who went to the front, fought for his country, and returned uninjured can rightly claim that the nation owes him a living; but what he can rightly claim is that the nation owes him an opportunity to make a living.

This is one of the problems the Government has had to deal with. Much has been done, but still more is required. Let us have unity of thought and action, for only in that way shall we accomplish what is expected of us and hand down to future generations, and place before the world at large, the fact that the Canadian Government with its able and patriotic leader, Sir Robert Borden, did all that was humanly possible in bringing the country through a crisis of a kind with which no previous parliament of Canada was ever confronted. Mistakes doubtless were made; but a generous and sympathetic nation will not and does not withhold its thanks and gratitude for what has been accomplished.

First and foremost, as I have said, is our duty to our soldiers, not only for what they have done, but, as I have already pointed out to the country at large, because I see in them, through the broader view they have acquired and in the influence for colonization they have left behind in the Old Land, one of the greatest factors in the new development of Canada.

As we are in a sense laying new foundations after the war, another very essential factor is our money. Our sacrifices in the war in relation to our wealth have been so much greater than those of other nations, —particularly as most affecting us, those of the nation to the south of us—that we find ourselves in a very disadvantageous position. If we are to compete on a reasonable basis, that condition must be righted. Various simple and effective proposals involving sacrifice on the part of other nations have been advanced; as for instance a sharing of the total war expenditure by all the belligerent nations in proportion to their wealth. But we can hope for no such solution; we must rely upon ourselves; and if in so doing we create conditions unfavourable to those other nations we must not hesitate to incur their displeasure. Proportionately we have done more for the common good than they. They have profited by our loss. They should not complain.

How is the desired result to be accomplished? Were we in Canada able to produce all that we require and to dispose of all that we produce we need not worry about this subject; but we must import and we must export. As Mr. Macaulay truly stated,

> Every person who buys from the Mother Country instead of from the United States performs a patriotic service, for he helps to improve the value of sterling exchange and avoids increasing the premium on American exchange. The heavy premium on New York funds, and the huge discount on sterling funds, are the natural and inevitable result of our purchasing chiefly from the United States, while selling chiefly to Great Britain.

If the cause of discount on the home funds is the trade balance and not currency depreciation, the disease automatically provides its own remedy. The discount discourages imports and encourages exports. Bankers are familiar with the fact that when we are borrowing largely from Britain our credits come mainly in the form of goods though, as Dr. Bonar pointed out, by one of the peculiarities of international trade we borrow in London and use the funds to buy goods in the United States. The permanent solution of our exchange problem lies in the consolidation of the Empire in such a way that every part shall be developed to its capacity; then, all parts by trading together will make the whole Empire prosperous, populous and commercially independent.

Canadian funds should not be at a discount in New York. Our currency is as sound as that of the United States, and our total exports show a balance of hundreds of millions in excess of our total imports. Until the United States sees fit to accept our money at par and treat us on a basis of equality, our duty is to stop buying luxuries from them, and to purchase nothing from them that is not absolutely necessary. As Canada is one of the largest purchasers from the United States, it will not take them long to reach the conclusion that our trade is worth having, and then the high rate of exchange will disappear.

The Speech from the Throne refers to the business situation and points out that business is on the whole satisfactory. I am pleased to be able to corroborate that statement. The trade returns for January of this year show that our imports from Great Britain totalled $16,414,503, as compared with $9,882,984 in December, and $6,709,200 in January, 1919. They show that the exports to Great Britain were $38,288,049: and our imports from the United States were $74,520,423, as against $71,069,509 in December, and $59,379,127 in January, 1919. They also show our exports to the United States were $43,577,945, as compared with $41,227,589 in January, 1919. For the ten months of the present fiscal year, our trade shows a favourable balance of $357,500,000 with Great Britain, an unfavourable balance of $230,300,000 with the United States, and with all countries a favourable balance amounting to $263,600,000. This is very encouraging. Many people thought that after the war business would for a time be stagnant; instead of that, however, it has kept up, and indications at present point to the continuance of an active market. Almost any manufacturer will tell you that he has orders for months ahead and does not know how to meet the demands of his customers. I am sure you will all agree with me in hoping that the time will not be long before our trade with the United States shows a favourable balance on our side of the ledger. The credit of Canada is proportionately higher than that of any other nation. With our great natural resources we are justified in looking forward to and approaching the future with confidence, and I trust nothing will be done to injure the outstanding position that Canada now occupies.

It is satisfactory to note that a Dominion Franchise Bill will be introduced. I have no idea of what its provisions will be, but doubtless they will be in keeping with public sentiment and modern ideas. In my opinion the franchise should not be granted, for some time at any rate, to aliens, slackers, and men who avoided military service. Canadians have not yet reached the point of forgiving them or placing them on a basis of equality with others.

I have for years felt that the Federal and the Provincial Governments should get together and agree on a franchise covering the whole Dominion. The preparation of the lists could be left in the hands of the municipal authorities, and they could be used for elections to both the Federal and the Provincial Houses. Many millions of expense would be saved in this way, and lists so prepared would, on the whole, be found more satisfactory.

It is satisfactory to note by His Excellency's Address that amendments to the Loan and Trust Companies Acts are contemplated. It is important that these Acts should be amended so as to prevent fraud and speculation with company funds. In the past the moneys of investors have been jeopardized and many people ruined by the improper manipulation of funds by those placed in positions of trust.

I trust that amongst the other Bills foreshadowed but not specially mentioned in His Excellency's Address will be found one dealing with proportional representation, which, to my mind, is the proper and fair mode of electing representatives of elective bodies. Whilst a member of the Legislature of the province of Ontario I gave this matter a great deal of consideration, and I can assure honourable gentlemen that if the Government does not intend to introduce such a Bill, I shall endeavour to bring the matter before the House in some form.

Another Bill which I trust is amongst those foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne is one creating a Divorce Court for the Dominion of Canada. I do not know how far the Federal Government can go in enacting a law of that kind; but when we find at this session of Parliament, as we do, that we have one hundred and twenty divorce petitions to come before us, there is an object lesson we should heed, and by which we should profit. We must remember that in this country divorces are not only granted by this Parliament, but that there are courts in several of the provinces which have similar powers. All divorces are not granted on the same ground; it therefore behooves the Dominion of Canada, if it wants to retain its position in so far as divorce is concerned, to have a common divorce law which will be properly administered by a court created for that purpose; otherwise we shall find ourselves in a position similar to that occupied by the United States, where, in some states, divorce has been made so easy that it has become a public scandal. We do not want anything of that kind to occur in Canada; and the only way that I can see of preventing it is by the Federal Parliament dealing with the question.

Honourable gentlemen will concur with me when I express satisfaction with the progress which has been made in completing this building, which has enabled us to use it this session. We all know that the committee have done everything possible to hasten the completion of the work. While there has been some delay, we know how difficult it is to secure satisfactory results, and if we go into the magnificent Chamber of the House of Commons we can readily understand it. I am sure I voice the opinion of this House when I express the hope that before next session the building and appointments will be complete, and that we shall then meet in a Chamber even better than that now occupied by the Commons.

Before concluding, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact, which is well known to us all, that since we last met, the Prince of Wales concluded his visit to Canada and has returned to the Mother Country. His visit, which was a great success was, to a great extent, brought about, as has been well said, by the fact that from the day he landed at St. John he established a relation with the people as natural and intimate as exists in a happy household. There was no suggestion of official restraint or the compulsion of official machinery. His own bearing, of which he was unconscious, drew all classes to his side, and his own quality was his best passport to the affection of Canadians. Because he has been here the position of the Throne is more clearly understood, and its prestige greatly enhanced. No statesman could have interpreted the Monarchy as it has been interpreted by this modest, smiling, gracious, democratic young Prince, nor could he have done a service of higher or more enduring value to the British Commonwealth.

I desire to express my regret at the continued illness of our Prime Minister. He has had a hard siege of it. All Canadians, no matter what their political creed may be, hope and trust that on his return to Canada he will be fully restored to health and able to resume the duties of his high and important office.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Chapais, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 2, at 3 p.m.

THE DIVORCE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill A, an Act respecting Divorce.—Hon. Mr. Barnard.

BRITISH AMBASSADOR TO WASHINGTON.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired:

1. Has the Government any information as to the appointment of Sir Auckland Geddes, Minister of National Service and Reconstruction in the British Government, to the position of British Ambassador to Washington, as announced in the Canadian papers?
2. Has the Canadian Government been in any way consulted as to the appointment of Sir Auckland Geddes or any one else to this position?
3. Has the Canadian Government made any suggestion to the British Government in the matter of this appointment with which Canadian interests are so closely concerned?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The answer to each question is No. The matter is exclusively within the authority of the Imperial Government, not of this Government.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The Senate resumed from Friday, February 27, consideration of the motion for an Address in reply to His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. THOMAS CHAPAIS (translation): Honourable gentlemen, it is not without feelings of deep emotion that I rise at this time to address this House. Thirty-five years ago another, whose name I bear, was likewise a member of the Senate of Canada. When it pleased His Majesty's Government to call me in my turn to a place among you—which honour I regard as one of the greatest of my entire career—I could not but carry myself back over the long interval of years and conjure up a memory which has naturally always remained dear to me. But, without dwelling longer upon those memories and personal sentiments which are mine at this moment, I wish to add at once that to have been invited by the Government to represent in the Senate the district of Granville was for me a particularly interesting event, and such as to enhance the legitimate satisfaction that I experienced in being made the recipient of such a mark of distinction. It was in the district of Granville that I was born, and in that district I have had occasion to engage in more than one political battle, and I can assure you that I gave a hearty handshake to my excellent friend and old-time opponent, the Hon. Mr. Choquette, who was my predecessor in this House, when he informed me that he had resigned as representative of the district.

As I have mentioned the name of the Hon. Mr. Choquette, I say say that since my arrival here, I have been enabled to understand how my honourable friend figured as one of the most aggressive debaters of the Senate, where generally the atmosphere is so tranquil and undisturbed. I am not, however, surprised that he should have acquired such a reputation, because I have myself frequently had occasion to cross swords in the arena of political debate with Hon. Mr. Choquette. In justice, however, I desire to add that while combating with all the energy I possessed the opinions of the honourable gentleman and the principles of the party he represented I always found him to be intensely loyal to our institutions and embued with a great sincerity of conviction.

It was a task at once honourable and onerous for a new member to rise on such an occasion to address an assembly of men so thoroughly conversant with the politics of the country. Only a sense of the kindly forbearance and traditional courtesy of the Senate could have determined me to accept such an honour and responsibility.

I have no intention of inflicting upon you a long commentary on each of the paragraphs contained in the speech from the Throne. I will therefore, with your permission, confine myself to emphasizing certain passages, and to considering briefly a few of the general ideas suggested by it.

But, first of all, I desire to join in the sentiment of rejoicing with which the speech of His Excellency hailed the return of the Canadian Parliament to the historic hill on which rises, in the purity of its lines and the harmony of its proportions, this magnificent palace of legislation, which has sprung phœnix-like from the ashes of the one destroyed by fire only four years ago. This legislative palace of Canada is "the House" of the Canadian nation; and all the citizens of this great country may well be proud of its majestic beauty so worthy alike of our past and of our future. If I were to permit myself, honourable gentlemen, to indulge in personal reminiscences, I would recall the memories of half a century, and would summon before your vision the huge excavation wrought by the blasting, which, as a mere schoolboy, in 1866, I crossed by unsteady footbridges, that I might traverse the grounds where to-day there lie spread out before us those graceful terraces and that I might reach the splendid parliamentary edifice, where, as to-day, resounded the strokes of the workmen's hammers. Confederation was not yet an accomplished fact; but a year later, with the new régime was inaugurated that glorious parliamentary epoch which has bequathed to us the names of Macdonald and Cartier, of Brown, of Mackenzie, of Dorion, of Tupper, of Langevin, of Campbell, of Tilley, of Blake, of Chapleau, and finally of him who was the last of the band to disappear from among us, one of the most illustrious of that brilliant galaxy of eminent Canadians, Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Passing from these reminiscences, I will direct your attention to that paragraph in the Speech from the Throne, which treats of the League of Nations, its constitution and functions. That institution, the offspring of the overwhelming cataclysm which shook the nations of the world and the fabric of society to their foundations, has provoked since its creation, as it did before, a vast amount of discussion, and excited criticisms of the most divergent kinds. This conception of a body with a moderating and steadying influence, and possessing a general jurisdiction over a federation of powers, this idea of a great international council charged with the reconcilement of difficulties and differences arising between peoples, and the prevention of war among the nations, is not, indeed, the offspring of the genius of a Wilson, as is so commonly believed. It is an old idea in a new setting. The ancient Greek had a similar institution in what they named the Amphictyonic Council. In modern times Henry IV of France, in elaborating his "Grand Dessein," of which the historians have transmitted to us the details, made provision for a tribunal of the same character, by which it was hoped to maintain the peace of Europe. There was thus a sort of League of Nations in anticipation. In these later days writers have published interesting studies upon the possibility, the opportunity, and the probable degree of efficacy of suoh an institution. What is to the credit of Mr. Wilson is that he gave concrete form to this idea in placing before the Council of the Allies a proposition being practically realized, and that he pursued its realization with all the obstinacy which is perhaps the characteristic trait of his personality.

What are we to expect from such a league? Is it to be the arch of an alliance, whose sovereign virtue will henceforth guarantee the world against a recurrence of those terrible experiences through which we have just passed? Or will it end in once more demonstrating the futility of human effort to establish the reign of peace and order on the earth? I will certainly not be so rash as to give a confident answer to such a question. But if asked what we might expect from such a league, I should be inclined to reply, "Neither too much nor too little." In presence of this new institution, I am not disposed to be either excessively optimistic or stubbornly pessimistic, it is too soon, it seems to me, to prognosticate with assurance the outcome of this experiment. The chiefs of the great powers who deliberated at Versailles were willing at least to give it a trial. We cannot do better than follow their example, and, while hoping for the best, avoid illusory expectations on the one hand and equally baseless apprehensions on the other. When we study the constitution of this international political society, we are quite easily convinced that it does not possess any great active or rather, co-active power. But it will possess, perhaps, a real moral power, it is this characteristic which has been recently observed by a distinguished French writer, well known in this country, Mr. Eugène Duthoit, professor of political economy in the university of Lille. Such a moral power, capable of exercising a beneficent and effective influence in the affairs of the world, was seen long ago incarnated in an institution, impersonal and majestic, though without specific form, pact, or constitution. At the period of history to which I am referring there existed in Europe, as there does to-day, a diversity of states, possessing their several ambitions, aspirations, exclusive and sometimes rival interests. But, upon all, and conciliating all, there was a community of doctrine, of ideals, of principles, and of public law, which welded all these various states, with their conflicting ambitions and purposes, into one whole. What common doctrine and conciliating influence was not Christinity? Was not Christianity, as it was known to the world, especially from the tenth to the sixteenth century, an anticipating manifestation of the League of Nations? Unfortunately, that majestic unity of principle and doctrine which formed the basis of the Christianity of that epoch disappeared with the passing of the centuries. Let us, without indulging in any confident expectation of a reunion of Christendom, at least entertain the hope that the present League of Nations will result in the creation of a moral power among the peoples of the world which will be capable of rendering useful service in the maintenance of peace, and the establishment everywhere of the reign of justice and of right.

The Speech from the Throne contains the announcement that Canada has been named as one of the twelve states entitled to representation in the Council charged with the direction of an international bureau of labour. This bureau will have an important role to play, a task difficult of accomplishment. Is it possible to establish throughout the world a uniform system of regulations regarding labour? It may be doubted, because of the differences in environment, in customs, and in climatic, physiological, and economic conditions, which exist among various races and nationalities. But if, in any event, it became possible to establish a code of general principles, the wise application of which would bring about a reign of concord, and assure harmonious co-operation among the classes who should unite their efforts in the all-important task of production and industrial progress, then, it would not have been in vain that the international conference of labour had been brought into being, and had deliberated, devoting weeks and even months to the drafting of a charter of labour in the two worlds.

The labour problem is one of the most formidable which the nations have ever known. Though existing previously for some time in a lesser degree, it became specially acute with the introduction of machinery, which has been the creator of modern industry. This problem set sagainst each other various ruling forces and provides a conflict of divergent schools of thought in the arena of economic facts and theories. There are, for example, the stubborn upholders of the sacred rights of capital; there are the uncompromising champions of radical collectivism; and there are the disciples of the moderate school, who are disposed to recognize the necessity and legitimacy of intelligence-capital and of money-capital, and likewise the necessity and legitimacy of labour's claim to a certain share in the profits of production. In the midst of this strife where is one to find the truth, the equity the just proportion of rights and duties. These are searching questions which cannot be obliterated with a stroke of the pen nor be solved in an hour. Standing as I do within the precincts of this Chamber, I do not hesitate to express the conviction that the recognition and perfect understanding of the principles and doctrines which Christianity has for nineteen centuries caused to triumph in the world can alone lead to a just solution of these questions. It was these principles and doctrines of which we were reminded a third of a century ago, in a luminous thesis, by that illustrious thinker and sociologist who bore the title of Leo XIII, and who was one of the most eminent men of our age. The application of these principles and doctrines would lead the nations with certainty to the establishment of social justice, and social justice would be a sure guarantee of social peace. Such a peace ought to be the object of every legislator having a due sense of his responsibility. We have obtained a peace of nations; and whatever defects there may be in the treaties and pacts which have signalized the return of peace, the frightful war is ended, and the peoples are permitted once more to breathe freely. But a peace of classes, civic and economic peace among the children of the Mother country, is menaced in many lands by the bitter conflict of appetites, cupidities, and interests. Canada itself has already witnessed the manifestation of alarming symptoms. In the face of so formidable a peril it is important that the legislator should be able to foresee, and, foreseeing, to prevent the disastrous consequences of which these symptoms warn us. Heaven grant that the international conference, and the international labour bureau may study these questions in a large spirit of justice, and prepare the remedy and solution which will satisfy all equitable demands and safeguard all legitimate rights.

Another of the paragraphs in the Speech from the Throne I desire to discuss briefly. It is that which is concerned with the question of re-establishment of our returned soldiers, and of their return to or taking up of agricultural life. This latter point has for me a profound interest. I must say that it was with sentiments of patriotic joy that I read that 46,630 disbanded soldiers had made a request to be settled upon the land. The Agricultural Gazette of Canada in its January number informs us that $51,572,332 has already been lent to soldiers who desired to engage in agriculture. The Soldiers' Settlement Board has granted provisional titles to 869,000 acres of land in the Western provinces. Of 42,630 discharged men who have applied for certificates authorizing them to participate in the benefits of the legislation relating to settlement 32,363 have received them. I am aware that from this number there will necessarily be some deduction, because all men are not equally persevering, and there will be discouragements and abandonments. But if even sixty per cent or only fifty per cent of our soldier farmers remain on the land such a result will be highly gratifying. It is, you see, a response to one of the most urgent needs of the hour. All our far-sighted economists would seem to have taken as their watchword, "Produce, and again produce!" And of all our products those of the farm rank among the most necessary. The increase in the cost of living has become almost a public calamity. It has caused anguish to reign in many a household. It haunts like a nightmare an infinite number of firesides. It wrings the heart of many a mother and sears with lines of care the brow of many a father. In the presence of such a state of things a sudden accession to the ranks of the farming community may be hailed as a national benefit. The policy of turning demobilized soldiers into cultivators of the soil is one which merits general approbation. Moreover, it is a policy which may possibly have been inspired by the noble traditions of our early history. Such a policy was put in operation in Canada two and a half centuries ago. In 1667, in the reign of Louis XIV, with Colbert as Chief Minister of the Crown, and with Talon as intendant, the Government demobilized her soldiers to transform them into farmers. Permit me to read to you a few extracts bearing precisely upon this subject from a book entitled: "The Colonization of New France," written by M. Emile Salone, a distinguished Frenchman. We there see how history repeats itself and how true it is that there is nothing new under the sun. Referring to the disbanding and settlement of the soldiers who had taken part in the campaign against the Iroquois, it says:

> With the decisive defeat of the Iroquois there would be no reason for any longer maintaining in Canada a garrison of a thousand men. The army of occupation was consequently reduced to four companies numbering in all three hundred men. The question was what to do with those soldiers who were no longer required for military duty. It was not unnatural that the idea should have occurred of attempting to retain in the colony as many of them as possible. . . . It was in 1665 that Talon met at la Rochelle the companies of the Carignan regiment which were to cross to America with him. He had a plan of his own. He succeeded in increasing their effectives by seventy supernumaries, which would permit him, while still maintaining the companies at their full strength, to distribute among the inhabitants such as might possess some useful trade or public calling. Once in Canada, Talon modified these projects a little. With the assistance of Tracy, he reserved the conquerors of the Agniers and the Onneyouths for the task of colonization properly so called, and for the putting of the soil in cultivation. Both Talon and de Tracy had recourse to history to justify the excellence of their policy, and above all to the case of those two eminent races, the Romans and the Franks.
> Officers and men manifested much enthusiasm in conforming to the plan of the King; (and he testified to his satisfaction on learing that the majority of the soldiers who composed the four companies who at first crossed to America under the command of Tracy, and the regiment of Carignan should exhibit so much disposition to take up their abode in the country.) Immediately this fair country exercised its charm upon them. They already knew also that the Government would recompense them for their zeal by showing them special favour and by aiding them in every way possible; that it would furnish them with large grants of land, with the necessities of life, with ready money for the establishing of homes, and with wives. The military operations were hardly finished when one witnessed the settlement of a great number of these soldiers. In the autumn of 1666, six captains of the Carignan regiment, and ten subalterns, lieutenants or ensigns, took up homes. The following year the intendant writes to the minister: "M. de Tracy told you that there was hope that several officers and soldiers would decide to settle in the country. He will not have told you of what has happened since his departure; that already two captains of the Carignan-Salières regiment have married two young women of the country, and that a lieutenant and four ensigns are conferring with their sweethearts with a view to the same end. . . I regard them as already as good as engaged, and I desire to say that all those of whom I have spoken, whether married or unmarried are labouring at this moment to improve the habitations which I gave them; that the two captains employing on their property the best soldiers of their companies, and the subalterns those whom their superior officers assigned to them. . . . There will be much clearing done during the next winter. The soldiers imitate their chiefs. They are asking for wives and habitations."

They were given both. Honourable gentlemen, have I not reason to say that history repeats itself. More than two centuries afterwards Canadian soldiers are repeating the conduct of their predecessors. After having poured out their blood in the struggle against civilized barbarism, just as those of older time did against that of the savage, they also in the same manner, lay aside the rifle for the plough, and scarcely returned from the desolated fields where the engines of war scattered destruction and death, they apply themselves to those fertile fields from which their fertile labour will bring forth harvests of life. The important task of re-establishing our soldiers in civil occupations could not offer a more consoling aspect.

The economic and financial situation among the nations, torn and impoverished by the war, is less satisfactory. In that regard no one will be tempted to find too sombre the picture drawn for us in the speech from the Throne, when it describes the ruinous conditions of exchange, the lack of international credit, the excessive circulation of paper money, combined with the scarcity of raw materials, the insufficiency of transports and the labour difficulties. To remedy these evils one hears repeated on every side that we must increase labour and production, and that individuals, like states, must practice saving and economy. Also, is it not plain to you that this universal precept is universally violated? Since the termination of the war there seems to reign everywhere a frenzy of pleasure-seeking and a frenzy of idleness. From the highest to the lowest rung of the social ladder one witnesses the same spectacle. Those of the lower classes wish to work less and to have more pay, and more pleasure; while those of the higher classes wish to gain wealth easily and quickly in order that they may plunge headlong into a life of ease and display. And all the while grave voices are repeating and their words everywhere reverberate: "Production and economy! Production and economy!" But so far is this from their thoughts that men are actually wracking brains to invent new means of diminishing production and increasing extravagance. This tidal wave of folly, idleness and ostentatious spending has not altogether spared this Canada of ours; yet one may be permitted to find some satisfaction in the thought that our country is perhaps less submerged by it than others.

Our commercial situation, for instance, is such as to encourage us to hope that Canada will be able to support, without flinching, the terrible burden placed upon us by the war. In a statement made at the beginning of the present year, our Minister of Finance announced that for the eight months ending the 30th of November, 1919, our imports were $636,389,157, while our exports were $838,973,479, which gave us for that period a trade balance in our favour of $202,000,000. I do not wish to be understood as finding in this favourable trade balance sufficient reason for indulging in a song of triumph. But it does seem to me that the figures are encouraging, and constitute a favourable symptom.

There is another matter which I would have discussed at some length if the limits which I have set for my discourse had permitted me to do so. It is that of the electoral franchise, with reference to which the Speech from the Throne has announced proposed legislation. I will confine myself simply to the statement that on that subject I hold views which have little conformity with current political orthodoxy. In my opinion, one of the electoral systems, the most rational and the most equitable, the surest and the most apt to safeguard the stability of political institutions, is that which Belgium enjoyed before the war, and of which the principal traits were proportional representation, age limit, and plurality of voting. I shall possibly have occasion again to address the House on this subject before the end of the present session.

And now it only remains to me to re-echo one of the words of the Speech from the Throne. Yes, Canada has good cause for thankfulness that of all countries affected by the war, she has maintained a record of social order and industrial and commercial prosperity which leaves nothing to excite her envy or any other. The efforts of all the members of this Parliament, without distinction of creed or race or shade of political opinion, the efforts, in short, of all good citizens, should be directed to maintaining this order. And for this work of common patriotism, if I might be permitted to speak in the name of the province to which I belong, I would say to my honourable colleagues from the sister provinces: "Have confidence in the province of Quebec; she is loyal, she is faithful to the traditions of the past. she is conservative—and when I say conservative, it is manifest that I am speaking not of the political complexion of the province, but of her social temperament; she is ardently and profoundly Canadian. She is the more so because she sinks her roots in three centuries of history, and because her annals go back to the first days of civilization and Christianity on this continent. Possessing, as she does, a tradition and aspect more ancient than the others, she is for that reason imbued with energies and doctrines which, you may rest assured, cannot but contribute powerfully to the grandeur, the prosperity, the peace and the glory of the Canadian Confederation.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, after hearing the very eloquent speech of the honourable gentleman who has seconded the Address, we feel that a very strong addition has been made to the debating power of this Chamber. I wish to congratulate both the mover and the seconder of the address on their speeches. They both come to this Chamber with experience in the public life of this country, and I am sure that their knowledge and experience will be of great benefit to us in our work.

Meeting as we do in these new buildings, I think it is perhaps fitting that I should refer first of all to the cable read by His Honour the Speaker at the opening on Thursday last, conveying to this Parliament the greetings of His Majesty and good wishes for our future. It reminds us not only of the sovereignty which we share in common with all parts of the British Empire, but of the constant concern of members of the Royal Family for the well-being and prosperity of this Dominion. We may recall that when it first became necessary to find a home for the representatives of the Dominion the site of our Parliament Buildings was chosen by our late beloved Queen Victoria. The corner stone of the old building was laid by her son the Prince of Wales, afterwards King Edward VII of England. The corner stone of the present building was laid by His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, and that of the Memorial Tower by His Royal Highness, Edward, Prince of Wales. From Confederation down to the present time the foundation and construction of our Parliament Buildings have been intimately associated with the Royal Family, and they have shown a keen interest in the development of our institutions. If anything were lacking to bring home to the minds of the people of Canada a knowledge of this fact, it was adequately supplied by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales when he made his trip through Canada last year. His frank and open-hearted manner of meeting the people aroused a feeling of mutual affection and respect which we hope may ever be maintained.

Meeting as we do to-day in these buildings, which have risen from the ashes of the old building, we recall that the old building was the result of the determination of the Fathers of Confederation to bring about unity and co-operation among the British colonies on the North American continent. May we hope that this imposing edifice, with its dignified and noble proportions, will inspire all those who come within its portals to strive to carry on the great work of bringing more closely together this great Dominion in bonds of unity and fellowship; and, further that this country may, as time goes on, maintain its proper place among the Dominions of the British Empire, and more and more be recognized in the councils of the nations of the world as a power making for peace and the improvement of the human race.

When we contemplate the finished design of these buildings, we realize that the chief architect, Mr. John Pearson, and his associate, Mr. J. O. Marchand, have succeeded in a wonderful way in impressing upon all who enter these portals the greatness of the ideals at which we should be aiming; that it is not only for to-day we are working, but that any action of to-day may have an influence on the future in a way we never contemplate. Mr. Pearson and his associate, the members of the Building Committee of both Houses, the officials of the Public Works Department, and others who have been entrusted with carrying out this work have succeeded in making this building a standing record of some of the resources of this country, working into it materials from several provinces, thus further exemplifying the unity of the whole. It teaches us that we should try more and more to bring about unity and good fellowship throughout this Dominion of Canada.

The Speech from the Throne deals with a number of subjects, principally with those touching our relations with the outside world, only a very small portion of it being devoted to the question of the economic conditions that so seriously affect the country at the present time. We are all pleased to know that peace with Germany has been successfully completed, and that we may now look forward to a settled condition of the world. At the same time, we must realize that conditions of unrest prevail throughout the world, even in this country, and that it will take us a very long time to overcome them so that we may be able to carry on the administration in the best way possible. The people of the country are to-day beginning to realize that the work which has been going on during the war, and the conditions under which they have laboured, have had an effect on the country and on the finances of the country. I think it is fair to say that only lately has the enormous destruction wrought in the world during the years of the war been brought home to the people of the country. What has brought it home to them most clearly is the depreciation of our currency. They find that their money is being taken at a discount in many of the countries of the world, and they realize that in order to overcome that difficulty they will not only have to produce more, but that they will have to spend less; they realize that it must be their aim to deal with countries where their money is accepted at a more favourable rate rather than with those which are nearest to them. This, I think, will have a tendency to bring together the various parts of the Empire. Each will find out more and more about the resources of the other, and all will come into closer relationship in trade. The effect of this will be of very great benefit not only to Canada but to all parts of the Empire.

Conditions brought about by the war have caused people to consider expenditures much more carefully, especially those made by the Government of the day. They realize that expenditures have got to be curtailed. They have learned within the last few months, for the first time, of the large sums of money required to carry on the operations of the Government railways. A short time ago it was said that the Government railways were costing the country $2,000,000 per month over and above what was received in revenue from the roads. That large sum does not take into account the greater expense which we may be under when, in addition to those roads we already have, we take over the operation of the Grand Trunk Railway System. These figures refer only to actual operating expenses; they do not take into account the question of improvement or betterment; they do not take into account any new construction which the Government may have to undertake. At present we have not the figures to show exactly what those items have amounted to for the past year, but we may be satisfied that when they are taken into account the total will be a very considerable sum. Now that we are called upon to provide $115,000,000 to pay the interest on the debt of the country, $35,000,000, for pensions to the men who have returned from the war, and which we are only too willing to pay, and a large sum over and above that for general expenditures, when we think of the large sum of money spent upon our railways, which, if properly managed, should be bringing in a revenue instead of causing an extra expenditure for operating expenses, we will have cause for serious consideration. As time goes on I think that the people of the country will scan closely this large expenditure.

We know from the press that an agreement was submitted to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and that it was accepted by them, but as yet we have not seen it. Last year, in the dying days of the session, we were called upon to put through a Bill for the acquisition of that railway, without having an opportunity of seeing the full details of the agreement that was to be made with the company. We had to act on the faith that the agreement would be a satisfactory one in the interests of Canada. We expect now that the Government will bring that agreement down to the House without further delay, and that we shall have an opportunity of studying it and seeing whether or not our hopes in that regard have been realized.

In years gone by we always expected that the Speech from the Throne would mention the legislation that the Government intended to ask Parliament to deal with during the session, but the information contained in the Speech from the Throne is very meagre in that respect. Last session the Speech from the Throne said nothing at all about the purchase of the Grand Trunk railway, and the legislation was not brought down until the members of both Houses expected that they would very shortly be dismissed and allowed to return to their homes. I hope that the fact that very little legislation is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne on this occasion does not mean that legislation is going to be sprung upon us in the same way; and I trust that we shall not be asked to deal with questions which have not been announced to the country, and which the country has not had an opportunity of thoroughly studying before they are to become law.

In a country as large as the Dominion of Canada it is most important that proposed legislation should be announced in the Speech from the Throne so that the people, as well as the representatives of the people and the members of this Chamber, may have an opportunity of carefully considering and understanding what the policy of the Government is to be. Unfortunately, owing to the war, and owing to the necessities of the conditions in which we have found ourselves during the last few years, this system has not been adhered to as closely as it should have been in the interests of the country. The safeguards that our constitution gives us are such that they should be carefully adhered to. It is to be hoped that, from this time on, now that we are in a period of reconstruction and are, I might almost say, wholly rebuilding the affairs of the country, we will adhere more closely to the safeguards and checks which have been provided in the past to properly protect the interests of the people and to ensure fair play and justice throughout the country.

The Speech from the Throne refers to a Franchise Bill. The Liberal party has always maintained that it is very much more in the interests of the people that the lists should be made up by the local authorities in the various provinces. It is maintained that the men called upon to make up the lists in that way have a very much better knowledge of the people and the country, and are therefore able to compile the lists in very much better shape than men brought in from other parts of the country, and who are asked to deal with a situation of which they have possibly no local knowledge. In 1885, when the franchise was the subject of a great deal of discussion in this country, the Liberals objected to the proposal which was made to adopt a system of revising barristers. The system was adopted, and the Franchise Act which was passed at that time remained, and elections were held under it until 1896. Shortly after the Liberal party came into power in 1896 they reverted to a system of provincial and municipal lists, and elections were held under that system from that time until the War-time Elections Act of 1917 was passed. I do not think that the changes that were made in 1917 would be of advantage to the country at the present time; and I hope, when the Franchise Bill comes before us with all its terms and conditions, we shall find that the Government has gone back to the system which prevailed prior to 1917.

In the country to-day there is a great deal of criticism of the high cost of living. The high cost of living is being brought home to the people more and more as the prices of goods which they require advance from time to time. Towards the end of the session of 1919 the Government brought down to this House a Bill establishing a Board of Commerce. That board has been operating for some time. Honourable gentlemen will remember that when the Bill establishing that board was brought down to the House exception was taken to it on the ground that we had not had time to consider the importance of such a measure at such a late date in the session. We did not have an opportunity of fully considering the details and understanding the powers that were given to the commissioners. I think the criticism we hear of the action of the board, and of the Government in establishing the board, show that the hurried passing of such legislation is not wise. The other day the board acted in a way which, on the face of it, seemed very extraordinary. The announcement was made in the papers that from a certain day the board would cease to control the price of sugar. The statement was made in the press that the board consider that they had saved the country $100,000 a day for the period during which they had been controlling the price of sugar; yet, in spite of that, the Government allowed them to rescind the order. It was made to appear that this action was taken because they had been subjected to criticism which they apparently did not think was fair. If the board was doing its duty to the country and was saving the public the amount of money it has been represented that they were saving, it is most extraordinary that the Government should allow them to act as they did. What they did appeared to be the act of a child who did not appreciate his duties or responsibilities to the country. They did not seem to realize that the members of a board of this nature must expect to be criticised, and that their only defence would be a justification of the action they had taken, and to show the country that what they were doing was in the best interests of the people. To-day they occupy the position of having thrown up their hands and told the country that because they have been criticised, they are not prepared to go on and do their duty towards the people in controlling the price of sugar in the country. I think we should have an explanation from the Government in regard to this matter. Sugar is one of those things that touches very closely the pockets of the people, and enters into their lives almost more than any other article of food that they use. I think the Government should step in and take some very drastic action, and point out to the commissioners their duty to the country.

It was with very great regret that members of this House heard a short time ago of the illness of Sir Robert Borden. We all realize the tremendous amount of work which was cast upon his shoulders during the years of the war and during the period since the Armistice. He has done a great work for this country, and we realize that, if his health is in the condition in which it is reported to be at the present time, complete rest and change are absolutely necessary. We regret that he is not able to be here to attend to his parliamentary duties. At the same time, it is a very serious matter for the country to have the Prime Minister absent from his duties at a time like the present, when the conditions of the country require that a policy should be laid down, a policy which may take several years to work out, and which will necessitate great thought and experience. The Prime Minister is the member of the Government who is responsible for advising His Excellency the Governor General on the general policy of the Administration, and, as far as I know, no other minister is qualified to occupy that position. As the matter stands to-day, Sir Robert Borden is out of the country, and no one has been appointed to take his place. I hope that it will not be long before we get back to the proper constitutional methods of managing the affairs of this country.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I join with my honourable friend in the remarks which he has so fitly made with reference to our re-occupation of the Parliament Buildings. It is a matter of very great satisfaction to meet at this session within these walls. It is of course to be regretted that the building is not yet complete, but when we look back to the four short years that have elapsed since the tragic fire of February, 1916, we are indeed amazed at the rapidity with which the work of construction has proceeded. I doubt if there is in the world a finer legislative structure than that which we occupy to-day. The architect, Mr. John Pearson, informs me that, while there may be parliament buildings more expensive or of more massive proportions, we in Canada to-day possess a pile of buildings which for all the requirements of parliament, for modern equipment and convenience are probably superior to any others. We may congratulate ourselves that the material, the workmanship and the art which have been incorporated into these buildings are almost exclusively Canadian, and I think a tribute is due the architects, the builders and others who have been responsible for bringing this magnificent structure to the stage which it has reached.

It was very gracious of His Majesty the King to cable his felicitations to the assembled Parliament upon our meeting in these buildings on the 26th of last month. As my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock) has pointed out, members of the Royal family of England have been peculiarly associated with these buildings since a time prior to Confederation. The site was selected by Her late Majesty Queen Victoria. The late King Edward VII, when Prince of Wales, laid the corner stone of the former edifice. The corner stone of this building was laid, as we all happily remember, by His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught; and the corner stone of the tower was laid within a very recent period by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. So it was fitting indeed that we should receive at this auspicious time the cablegram which was sent by His Majesty, and our appreciation will, I hope, be expressed by a motion which I purpose introducing on this subject.

May I also join my honourable friend in extending congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address. We may congratulate ourselves, as well as them, upon their accession to the Senate. Both these honourable gentlemen have had considerable experience in deliberative assemblies. My honourable friend who moved the Address (Hon. Mr. Proudfoot) was for a number of years identified with the Ontario Legislature as leader of the Opposition; and my honourable friend, who seconded the Address (Hon. Mr. Chapais) has long been a distinguished member of the Legislative Council of the Province of Quebec, and, I understand, continues to be associated with that Council. Their knowledge and experience in matters of legislation will be of great service in our various deliberations, and will be appreciated by this body. I hope they may long be spared to adorn the Senate by the services they will render to the country in this chamber.

My honourable friend who seconded the Address made some allusion to his predecessor (Hon. Mr. Choquette). We all have a very pleasant memory of that gentleman's presence in this Chamber. I had a letter from him a few days ago expressing regret at his parting company with the members of the Senate, and also recalling to my mind that in September, 1917, we had a very heated debate in which reflections were made upon his loyalty to the policy which Canada had adopted in connection with the war. Naturally he desired, upon retiring from this Chamber, that he and ourselves should continue to have a favourable remembrance of his presence with us, and that I should correct a charge which I made at that time regarding his attitude on the Military Service Act. In his letter he has assured me of his loyalty to Canadian institutions, and particularly to Canada's part in the war, and of my entirely mistaking his sentiments on that question. I am very glad to accept the statements which the honourable gentleman has made with reference to the debate to which he refers, and to express my regret if I wrongly construed the sentiments which he expressed upon that occasion. I should be very sorry indeed to give any pain or distress to the honourable gentleman, for whom I have always entertained the highest respect, and I desire to say that if I construed wrongly the attitude which he took in regard to the very important legislation we were then discussing, he will not think I wilfully did him an injustice, and will accept this explanation of the construction I then placed upon his remarks.

The Address which is before this Chamber for consideration has been dealt with by my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock) in a temperate and reasonable way, to which I can take no exception whatever. This is the third session since the Armistice of November 11, 1918, was entered into. At each of the preceding sessions we indulged the hope that, the war being over, civilization would at once settle down in the normal channels of peace, and that the world, forgetting the terrible holocaust through which it had passed for five years, would not only cultivate the arts of peace, but leave no human means untried to return to the paths from which it was driven in August, 1914. Unfortunately our expectations have not been entirely realized. We are yet facing a disturbed and dislocated world. Central Europe and the whole Russian Empire is yet practically in a state of revolution. The forces that for centuries were repressed by absolutism and tyranny have broken the bounds within which they were restrained, and to-day they are expending themselves in riot, anarchy and revolution. These forces will naturally run their course of human license before they settle down to anything like established government. Even in the countries of the Allies there are to be found conditions of unrest and disturbance that also must necessarily run their course, and cannot by any system of law be suppressed. Until the disturbing forces set in motion by the war more or less exhaust themselves through the various channels in which to-day they are finding expression, we shall have to face these conditions. In Great Britain, in the overseas Dominions, and in the United States the people are suffering to-day from the abnormal conditions that constitute the aftermath of the war. Markets have been destroyed; great systems of production and trade have been wiped out. New channels of trade must be built up; new international relations must be sought, cultivated and established. Labour, owing to many causes, has become restless and uncertain, and so varying in its demands that the unrest and disturbances are seriously reflected in all the areas of production. Production of the world's necessary commodities has been and is seriously handicapped by the many causes that have led to the difficulty, and often the impossibility of securing raw materials, in addition to the untold difficulties of producing the finished product; hence, to-day the great arteries of trade are seriously impeded. Trade, in its widest sense, is seriously battling with almost overwhelming obstacles to release itself from the forces that are yet taking a strangle-hold on its freedom. Canada is not exempt from this world dislocation of trade brought about by five years of war. When we consider the causes that have led to these conditions, it is not difficult to understand why this should be the case. It is easier to pull down than to build up. It took nearly five years to almost destroy a civilization that took centuries to build; and now that for the last fifteen months we have faced a world wrecked by the greatest war that ever cursed a smiling earth, it is needless to say that it is going to take time and unprecedented human enterprise and energy to build up what man has so ruthlessly rent asunder.

Under these circumstances government is being carried on. Under such circumstances it is of vital importance that a government, charged with national responsibilities that transcend in consequence and importance the duties cast upon any former government, should receive a proper recognition of its efforts and achievements. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock) has criticized the Government; and we know it has been freely criticized throughout the country and in the press. I think it was Lloyd George who very tritely said a Union Government has no friends: it lacks the party affiliations which go to create an esprit de corps, and the sympathy and support which party governments invariably receive.

This Government has been a little over two years in office and in that time has been called upon to assume and discharge public duties and obligations beyond all expectation. I do not purpose to attempt to enumerate its many achievements. Suffice it to say, that in no case has the Government failed to rise equal to the unprecedented difficulties and problems it has been called upon to face. The burden of carrying on the war was cast upon its shoulders; which in itself was incomparably beyond the obligation cast upon any former government. This was coupled with even more difficult problems, namely, the demobilization of nearly half a million men, their transportation from the battlefields of Europe across the Atlantic ocean, and then, after reaching the shores of Canada, the transportation of almost half of them across this continent. This in itself is an achievement of which any government might well boast.

Demobilization involved not only the return of our forces and a large proportion of their dependents, but the even more difficult problems of making provision for the hospitalization and the care and treatment of the disabled, the establishment of an adequate pension system, and the devising of schemes for assisting the disabled, as well as other classes, in again becoming self-supporting and able to contribute to the volume of our industrial production. The assimilation of this number of men in a population as small as we have in Canada was a problem that in the press and on the platform was heralded far and wide as almost insoluble; and yet we may felicitate ourselves that in about twelve months we have not only successfully carried out the transportation of our troops from Europe to our own country, but that we have established more successfully than any of our Allies schemes and systems which have to do with re-establishing our troops in civil life and again placing them on the footing of citizenship. Not only in these great problems, namely, the carrying on of Canada's part in the war, the demobilization of our troops and the absorbing of them in civil life, but in the financing of the war to the extent of nearly two billions of dollars has this Government proved equal to the obligation with which it was charged.

The financing of Canada's part in the war within our own boundaries was an undertaking in itself which at one time we thought impossible. The success of the last loan, which we floated in Canada a few months ago, and of which nearly seven hundred million was subscribed, stands to-day as the greatest tribute to Canada's patriotism, prosperity and resourcefulness. Moreover, it bespeaks the confidence of the people of Canada in the Government that placed the loan on the market and is charged with administering its expenditure.

The Government has been equal to the many other problems brought about by the war. It has dealt, probably more successfully than any of our Allies have done, with the many abstruse problems of labour and the dangerous unrest which during the last two years has found expression in our large centres. We can say with confidence that Canada to-day in its freedom from unrest and labour difficulties, is far in advance of either the United States or Great Britain.

The Government has been attacked in the country and in the press for not having done anything. I have read criticism after criticism; I have read denunciation after denunciation by the opponents of the Government; but I have yet to learn of any concrete charge brought against it by reason of its inability to grapple with any problem with which it has been faced; and I challenge any of my hon. friends opposite to point to a concrete instance in which the Government has failed to rise to the occasion. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has referred to the failure of the Board of Commerce to carry out a certain order which it at one time made. The fixing of prices is one of the most difficult problems that the Government has been called upon to face. It practically means the setting at defiance of the economic laws. Not only here, but in the United States and Great Britain, tribunals have been appointed to grapple with this question; and I venture to say that what has been done here will bear investigation, will reflect credit upon the board, and will establish the fact that the Government made no mistake in creating the board.

Canadian trade is improving and growing by leaps and bounds, notwithstanding the almost insurmountable difficulties that we have been called upon to face. The present fiscal year will find our exports and imports increased far beyond those of any period in the past, and likewise beyond our expectation. Our revenues are not only buoyant, but are mounting up to a volume that will dispel all doubt as to our ability to meet our obligations.

This is not the time to enter upon a review of the many domestic or internal questions with which the Government has been charged, and not growing out of the war. Suffice it to say, that in themselves, they formed a sufficiently large volume of responsibility to command the serious attention of a government. When I refer to these matters I have in view problems which this Government inherited from its predecessors, and which for some years to come must necessarily go to make up the serious side of government in Canada. When we think of the public business of Canada ten years ago, in comparison with that of to-day, we are almost overwhelmed at the growth and momentous importance of the questions that to-day demand our attention.

The great questions that face us at the present moment are the questions of trade and revenue. Our public debt, since the beginning of the war, has mounted up from three hundred and fifty millions of dollars to some two billions. The ability of Canada to meet her financial obligations will be the supreme test of our success or failure. This obligation, for years to come, must necessarily be the incentive and the impetus of the Government in Canada.

Growing out of this directly must spring up the development of our national resources, and likewise of our trade; the opening up of new markets and the growth, more particularly in manufacturing than in any other direction, of industrial activities. The very life and being and growth of Canada will be in proportion to the development of our industrial enterprises. If Canada is to carry lightly the burdens placed upon her shoulders, increased production in manufactures must be her aim for years to come. Nature has bountifully furnished us with agricultural possibilities superior to those possessed by almost any other people—soil, climate, products and markets are the heritage of the Canadian people; but in manufactures we face a battle that calls for all the fighting spirit and human energy of the Canadian people, if we are to build up great centres and marts of commerce throughout the Dominion. In this field, we have to compete with the industrial life not only of this continent but with that of the entire world. In failing to carry on this fight successfully we shall fail in our national destiny. Canada's destiny is wrapped up in this problem. It is the "Open Sesame" to success and national importance. Upon the position that Canada's manufactures take in the great manufacturing nations of the world will depend the position accorded us in the galaxy of progressive nations. In my judgment, the great task before this Government or any successor which it may have, is the establishment on a rock foundation, so that it will stand four-square to all opposing elements, of a policy that will wrest from primeval nature those resources with which the Creator has most bountifully enriched us, and convert them into the finished product for the use of man, and increased wealth and revenue to Canada.

It goes without saying that this desideratum can only be brought about by the adoption and continuance of a fiscal policy that will afford opportunity for the growth and expansion of our national industries. This, for the last forty years, has been the policy of the Canadian people. Since its adoption it has withstood the attacks and shocks of all who would pull it down or destroy it. There have been times when those who most viciously attacked this policy were placed in the position of arbiters to decide whether it should be destroyed or continued. When faced with the duty of deciding whether their former professions of antagonism should be acted upon, they realized, notwithstanding their former opposition and professions, that this national policy was something more than a shibboleth, that it was woven into the warp and woof of our national life, and that its continuance was imperative for the good and the growth of the nation.

During the years of war-tragedy through which Canada has passed, this Government has stood firmly by the helm. The ship of State has been piloted through the turbulent waters of stress and storm, until to-day Canada looks forward with hope to the voyage of prosperity upon which she is about to enter. The Government claims credit for the work which has been done, for overcoming the almost insurmountable difficulties that confronted it, and for the confidence which it has displayed in continuing the work on which it has entered.

The times call for stability of national purpose; for a policy and an administration upon which the country can rely; for a resistance to those movements based on the unrest and visionary systems which make for disturbance and upheaval, and for which the war is largely responsible. Human affairs seem to be in the melting pot. Everything suggests a state of flux. All the nations involved in the war are now digging themselves out from the debris of the crash and wreck that prostrated for the time being most of the powers of Europe, and at the same time most violently disturbed national conditions on this continent. The citizen can render no greater service than by loyally supporting the established institutions of government, and relegating to the distant future new political movements, having for their object the pulling down of recognized systems of trade and government. If we are to emerge successfully from this national unrest; if we are to build up a greater Canada on the foundations that we have laid; if we are to emerge at this most critical time into a progressive and prosperous people, we can do so only by giving the utmost stability to our institutions of government and by creating a public confidence that what is done by the Government for the building up of our national interests will have behind it a guarantee of stability and security as against the disturbing movements of political dreamers.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the debate was adjourned.

REVISION OF PUNISHMENTS BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill B, an Act to amend the Criminal Code so as to provide for the revision of excessive or inadequate punishments.—Hon. Mr. McMeans.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 2, consideration of the motion for an Address in reply to His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I desire first to congratulate the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Chapais) who has been called to this Chamber to occupy the seat for the Granville division. It has been my pleasure and advantage to follow the career of the honourable gentleman since he has been in public life, as it is about the same length of time that we have both been interested in public affairs. His selection speaks well for his high standing in our community. I confess that when a vacancy occurred in our province, I feared the present Government, not knowing the province of Quebec, had nine chances out of ten of going astray. Fortunately the present Cabinet had heard, as they could not help hearing, of the honourable gentleman and his splendid record. If I am not mistaken, the honourable member for Granville (Hon. Mr. Chapais) could have come into this Chamber about three years ago. Rumour has it that he was offered a seat, which he respectfully declined because there was coupled with it the offer of a portfolio. If his refusal at the time is a fact which cannot be controverted, I doubly congratulate him for having declined to comply with the condition which was attached to the offer of a seat in this Chamber; for the province of Quebec has spurned representation in this sham Union Government.

Last summer a newspaper stated that Sir Robert Borden, who was navigating the waters of the St. Lawrence, in the province of Quebec, was in search of French-Canadian colleagues. I thought it well to inform Sir Robert Borden why he had failed if he was really on such an errand, and I wrote an article under my own signature, which I intend to put on record, because it represents first my views, and, I believe, the views of the province of Quebec at large on this question of the representation of our province in this so-called Union Government. I published this on the 12th of August in Le Canada. As all the members of this House understand both languages I will read the article in French as it appeared:

[Translation.]

Sir Robert Borden and the province of Quebec.

The Gazette announced recently that Sir Robert Borden desired to give our province its just share of representation in his cabinet, but that he was prevented from doing so because of the fact that the French-Canadians had at the election of 1917 rejected all his candidates. In the same way Senator L'Espérance had during the last session stated in the Upper House that if the French-Canadians were without representation in the ministry the fault lay at the door of their chiefs, who had been invited to join it.

We must not allow such a story to propagate itself, for its sole purpose is to exonerate from all blame in that connection Sir Robert Borden, whom we regard as personally and solely responsible for the isolation of the province of Quebec. It was he who desired to bring about that isolation, and he systematically pursued it.

At the elections of 1911 Sir Robert Borden found himself powerless to obtain a majority, unless he succeeded in dividing the province of Quebec. It was this which he succeeded in doing through his alliance with Mr. Bourassa and the support of the pseudo-nationalists.

In 1917 Sir Robert Borden had no hope of successfully repeating his double game. It was clear that our province was going to drive out the Nationalist Conservatives, who had odiously deceived it.

The chief of the Conservative party could no longer count on the same support in the other provinces, for his ministry had suffered in public opinion through the outbreak of numerous scandals, which had led to the resignation of Sir Sam Hughes and of Robert Rogers. The West also formed a solid block against him, who had sacrificed their interests on the question of reciprocity.

Sir Robert Borden returned from Europe in May, 1917, filled with sombre presentiments. He knew that the Opposition would not agree to a second prolongation of the life of the present Parliament, and he realized that his days were numbered. He had not till then thought of uniting all the forces of the country for the more effective carrying on of the war. He had governed by and for his party which thought first of its own fortune, and after that of the war. That state of mind showed itself clearly when in 1915 a Toronto newspaper suggested the formation of a union government. The idea was received with a burst of derisive laughter by all the Tory press. That was the frame of mind of the party and of its chief up to the moment when power seemed to be slipping from their hands, after three years of war.

What was the military situation at that time? Canada had already equipped and sent to the front 400,000 soldiers. The United States had just entered the lists, and opened to the allies their immense reservoir of men. Their riches were enormous, and had increased by gigantic strides during the war. They had already 100,000 men under arms, and they could call up others more quickly than was possible for us, and as many of them as they wished. To make an effort equal in proportion to ours, the Americans would have to raise an army of 5,000,000. We were to be henceforth allies. There was no longer any frontier line between them and us. Our cause was a common one. It was the same transports—for the most part English—which would carry over the American as well as our own Canadian soldiers.

Canada, which had never up to that time had recourse to compulsory service, had less reason than ever to resort to such a system.

These were the conditions existing at the moment of Sir Robert Borden's return to the country. The election was imminent. What new tactics was he going to employ to maintain himself in power? He told us that he desired to create a union government in the country, that he might assist the allies to win the war; but, before asking Sir Wilfrid Laurier to join him, he entered the House and announced that he was going to lay before it a Bill for conscription, to secure the enrolment of 100,000 new recruits. It was after that that he knocked at the door of the chief of the Opposition, Sir Robert Borden knew perfectly well that the preliminary condition which he had just proposed would inevitably evoke from Sir Wilfrid Laurier a negative answer, for he knew his opinion, which had been expressed publicly in the Commons, and which reflected public sentiment in the province of Quebec, which was unanimous in its opposition to conscription. The manoeuvre was intended to place his adversaries on one of the two horns of a dilemma. Either Sir Wilfrid Laurier would consent to enter the Cabinet, something beyond the range of possibility, and Sir Robert Borden would be assured of an easy return to office. Or Sir Wilfrid would refuse the offer, and Sir Robert would make an appeal to the English provinces against our province, and unchain against her all the passions of race and religion, and, in case of need, there was to be a so-called War-time Elections Act, which would create for him an assured majority.

Such was the programme which Sir Robert Borden brought back from Europe, after having for a long time deliberated upon the chances which this combination offered him. He was aware, as we have said, that Quebec was unanimously hostile to conscription. His alliance with Mr. Bourassa in 1911 was founded on the knowledge that he had acquired in Drummond and Arthabaska that the French-Canadians were radically and unalterably opposed to every form of militarism which would attach them to the imperial war chariot. When he formulated his hope of the sacred union in the country and invited Sir Wilfrid Laurier to take his place by his side, that they might give their united support to the Conscription Bill, his duplicity was clearly revealed. If he had been in good faith, and if he had desired that the minds and energies of the entire country should be devoted to the victorious pursuit of the war, he would not have begun with a declaration of policy which had exactly the contrary effect. In that case his first thought would have been to invite Sir Wilfrid Laurier to study with him the measures to be taken and the programme to be adopted for the creation of that union in the country and in the Government. In first declaring for conscription, Sir Robert said clearly, in so many words, that he did not wish to share power with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose prestige would have too easily eclipsed his own.

To avoid sharing power with another, Sir Robert did not hesitate to place the two races in violent antagonism, to create the false impression that Canada was not unanimously in favour of the Allies, and to have his faithful henchmen cover the province of Quebec with ignominy and insult. He fooled her in 1911, under the guise of nationalism. He openly flouted her in 1917:

The success of the Allies was then far from his thoughts. He paralyzed for more than six months all enrollment for the front and our troops in the field received fewer reinforcements during the twelve months which followed the introduction of conscription than they had under the voluntary system. But he won the election, which was the one object of this bit of political strategy. In the same way, in 1911, in order to gain the election, he paralyzed the construction of a Canadian navy, which would have protected our coasts in the day of peril.

It is untrue, therefore, to say that, if the province of Quebec is isolated, that is not the fault of Sir Robert Borden. There is not a single French Canadian possessing the least regard for his own dignity and for his duty towards his race who would consent to serve under a man who had treated his people so shamefully. Temporary isolation is better than servitude. To enter this cabinet would be not only to commit an act of servility, to play the role of a whipped cur, but it would be also to become an accomplice in the robbery, in broad daylight, of the last elections, which imposed upon us what is nothing but a de facto Government. To this Government, born of force and trickery, the product of an iniquitous election law, the province of Quebec owes nothing but the expression of her contempt.

RAOUL DANDURAND,
Senator.

I have said that we are to-day facing a sham Union Government. When the idea of a Union Government was first mooted by Sir Robert Borden, he went to a number of the leaders of the Liberal party and offered them an opportunity to join in the administration of the affairs of the country and to form a Union Government. What was the answer which he received from these gentlemen? It will be remembered that they came to Ottawa to confer upon the question. The answer was a most humiliating one to Sir Robert Borden. They said unanimously, "We will not serve under you, Sir." Some few days after the Session the Montreal Star published a telegram from Ottawa, stating that the gentlemen who had looked with contempt upon the offer of Sir Robert Borden would yield, and that the reason for their yielding was that the War Time Elections Act would force them to come to their knees, because in it Sir Robert Borden had a strangle-hold upon them. Two gentlemen, Messrs. Carvell and Maclean, had qualified the War-time Elections Act as a most horrible, iniquitous piece of legislation. Those words are to be found as having been uttered by these gentlemen from their seats in the House of Commons in the last days of the session of 1917. There are people who would have struggled, even to suffocation with that strangle-hold, rather than go down on their knees; but some of these gentlemen were not built that way—they swallowed the infamy with the portfolio. I am proud to say that the Liberals of Quebec were not in that class.

The leader of the Government yesterday boasted of the achievements of the Government during the last three years. He laid particular emphasis on their accomplishments in finance. What seemed to loom up largely in his mind was the ability of the Government to borrow money. They had increased the debt from $350,000,000 to $2,000,000,000. They had appealed to the people and had obtained their support in a marvellous way—that was a feat to boast of. The Government borrowed from the people of Canada at 5½ per cent interest, giving them an assurance of exemption from taxation, something which never appeared to me to be worth boasting about. Many were the financiers in Canada who thought it was a most imprudent and most dangerous policy to pursue and that it would create a difficult condition and cause violent recriminations in the collection of the Income Tax. They were answered that that was the only way to ensure the success of the loans. My honourable friend has boasted of the last loan, $700,000,000 which was taken up by the people of Canada. I would ask him to reflect and consider whether that last loan, which was not made free from impost, is not a full condemnation of the previous loans, and of the previous policy followed by the Minister of Finance?

What was that policy based upon? It was a policy which allowed wealthy people to invest their money in loans which would free them from the income tax. What was it based upon, if not a distrust of the people? There was a patriotic duty to perform, and instead of going squarely to the people and telling them that they should take the loans of the Government at 5½ per cent, they lured them to it by the exemption from taxation. The people gave the Government a lesson in patriotism by subscribing $700,000,000 last autumn without that exemption. To my mind the true test of statesmanship is not to be found in the levying of patriotic loans in Canada. To borrow and to spend lavishly is easy. In my opinion the real test is to be found in demobilizing extravagance. The real test of statesmanship at this moment, is in the restoration of pre-war conditions in all the departments, and in finding ways and means for re-establishing the financial equilibrium. The first duty of the Government after the 18th of November was to see that its house was promptly put in order. One needs courage to raise revenue through taxation. How can it be done otherwise? Where is the money to come from if not through appeal to the pockets of the people at large? As I have said, it is easy to borrow money, and while the loan was increasing by hundreds of millions, and while my honourable friend was thinking that things were running merrily along, I could not help thinking of the constantly increasing annual charge for interest that would fall upon the shoulders of the taxpayer. The continuation of the policy of borrowing only aggravates the situation. Why has no policy been expressed to-day which would hold out the hope that conditions are soon to change? My belief is that the Cabinet is too weak and too divided to bring down a policy which would lead us to hope that we might meet our yearly obligations. I am convinced that the present Cabinet will, before September next, announce another loan of $500,000,000.

My honourable friend spoke with glee of the last loan of $700,000,000; I think at the same time of the $38,500,000 interest upon it the country will annually be called upon to pay. As I said last session, I am convinced that the taxpayers of this country will have to be bled to the tune of $200,000,000 in additional taxation in order to meet our yearly expenditure. We have heard no announcement, either in the Speech from the Throne or in the speech of my honourable friend, which would indicate that the Government has any idea of where this supplementary $200,000,000 is to be found. Why have we had no indication of a policy which would tend to re-establish confidence in the country? Why? One of the most influential newspapers in the Conservative party has said that it was because the Cabinet was headless and brainless. Yesterday morning, coming up on the train to Ottawa, I read a curious despatch sent to the Montreal Gazette by one of its correspondents. It said:

> If Hon. J. D. Reid and Hon. James A. Calder, who are in New York to confer with Sir Robert Borden, fail to secure the Prime Minister's consent to remain as nominal leader of the Government, they will ask him to name his successor. These ministers and some of their colleagues are opposed to a parliamentary choice of a leader and would in the event of Sir Robert's retirement prevent this by having Sir Robert hand his crown to his own choice. Any leader chosen will have a difficult task, but it will be doubly difficult if the parliamentary supporters are told why they must follow instead of making the selection. Sir Thomas White has definitely stated that he will not be a candidate for the leadership nor accept it if offered him. Sir Robert will be asked to name first and second choices, and these will be Sir Thomas White and Sir Henry Drayton. Hon. James A. Calder is a favourite of the Prime Minister and would be quite willing to be a compromise selection. The Cabinet ministers, with the exception of two or three, would accept any leader except Hon. Arthur Meighen. The Commoners would accept Mr. Meighen and would be split in several factions were he ignored. It is believed, however, that the ministers in New York will prevail with Sir Robert and return with the glad tidings that the Prime Minister will retain office. This will carry the Government through the session, and with Parliament prorogued the Cabinet with eight months' recess can afford to ignore the Commons.

I have said that this influential and respectable organ of the Conservative party felt that the Government was headless; and it establishes that it is brainless by adding:

> Unionist troubles are due to lack of an accepted policy to an even greater degree than from absentee leadership.
> Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King was justified in his criticism of the Government on this issue. The Unionist Cabinet cannot continue to exist indefinitely on its war record, no matter how clean and effective. Its supporters in the Commons are sick at heart from the Government's indecision and procrastination in formulating a constructive policy. A war administration is of necessity autocratic and secretive.

Then, in order to show the chaotic condition of the Cabinet, the writer goes further and explains that the Government stands nowhere before the people. He says:

> While it is doubtful if there will be Unionist candidates in either St. James, Montreal, or Temiskaming, there will be candidates who support the Government's fiscal policy. In Temiskaming there are two candidates in the field, Liberal and Farmer-Labour. A Conservative convention has been called, but this will probably be cancelled and a well-known business man with large interests in the constituency enter the fight as an independent protectionist. Owing to the lack of Unionist organization and even a platform, it is very difficult to secure an official candidate. There is no one authorized to call such a convention, nor would there be much to gain by being selected as the Government's official candidate, as in the past Cabinet ministers have given no support to such candidates either by endorsation or on the platforms.

This is delightful irony. The Government will have no candidate in those three constituencies, but will try to win on its fiscal policy. It will not show its face; it will rely upon the Opposition carrying its colours to victory.

Now, what is the fiscal policy that is spoken of? Is it the high tariff of the Cockshutt wing of the Conservative party, the low tariff of the Calder group, or the moderate tariff of the Meighen-Winnipeg brand? We do not know. It appears that the Government will have no candidates in those three constituencies; yet, their policy will be there. It is important that the people should be told what the policy is, as there may be so many candidates that the people will be at a loss to know what candidate they should vote against. I may inform my honourable friends on the other side that Quebec is not just now much concerned with the policy of the present Government; it has decided to vote against this sham Union Government. The Tory-Union Government must atone for its sins. The Tory party in 1911, by denying them reciprocity, brought the western farmers into the political field. The Tory party bedevilled the province of Quebec in 1911 by subsidizing the Nationalists and by constantly traducing it thereafter. The Tory-Union Government aroused the farmers of Ontario by violating their pledge not to conscript their sons. Here is a statement by Sir John Willison, a pillar of the Unionist temple, on the situation in Ontario, contained an editorial in the Montreal Star of October 28. After explaining that prohibition had much to do with the defeat of the Hearst Government in the cities and towns, he goes on to say:

> In the country many farmers were sullen over conscription, not because of the fact of conscription but because they had been urged to increase production and assured in the last federal election that their sons would not be taken and the supply of farm labour further depleted. But they held that definite pledges were set lightly aside and they took the first opportunity to punish a government which, although it was not responsible for federal pledges or their fulfillment, was in general sympathy with the Unionists at Ottawa.

To dispel any illusions on the part of honourable gentlemen, I must repeat that those farmers who were sullen because of their sons being conscripted were not from the province of Quebec; the article refers to the Ontario farmers. And kindly note the difference in the treatment bestowed upon the two communities. While Quebec was being abused and vilified by the so-called Unionist party, by the Conservative party from Ontario, that same party and organization were promising immunity to the sons of the Ontario farmers. If you observe the difference in treatment you will understand why there is no French Canadian representative in the Cabinet and why Ontario dominates the Government. Is it any surprise that the Government has no friends? It looks in vain towards the West, the Centre and the East. It is half crumbling. It is time indeed that this rump Government, born in iniquity and maintained by duplicity, should end like a horrible nightmare. It tampered with the franchise to steal power. It may be tempted to repeat the performance. But I dare it to do its worst. It is irremediably doomed.

The honourable gentleman who moved the Address (Hon. Mr. Proudfoot) spoke of the new national status of Canada—of our increased autonomy resulting from our becoming a member of the League of Nations. Last year the Government boasted that by Order in Council they appointed their own representatives to the Peace Conference. They claimed that we had thus made a step forward in the development of our national status. I stated that if the present Government had passed an Order in Council naming representatives to the Peace Conference and had sent that Order in Council direct to the King to be approved by him, and if those representatives had been appointed by him without consulting his Imperial Cabinet, I would recognize in that fact a considerable advance in our national status, but I feared that the Canadian Cabinet had been obliged to act through the British Cabinet, the immediate advisers of the King. When the correspondence was brought down, I found that as a matter of fact the Order in Council had been sent to the Prime Minister, Mr. Lloyd George, and he had been pleased to submit it to His Majesty the King for his signature. To my mind this does not prove that our autonomy has been enlarged. We remain as we were. The British constitution is an unwritten one; ours is a written one and we must act within the four corners of it.

I read last year a statement which had been made in 1908 by the then Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, at an important function held in the city of Quebec, which the then Prince of Wales, now His Majesty King George, attended with the Governor General of Canada, Lord Grey. While Sir Wilfrid Laurier was speaking the words which I shall read, I was very much interested at the impressions that were displayed by one of the testamentary executors of Cecil Rhodes, the late Earl Grey, who felt impelled by his convictions, his enthusiasm and idealism to bring Great Britain and the Dominions closer together, by the creation of an Imperial Parliament. He was dismayed to hear these words, which to his great surprise were applauded by the heir to the throne, the present King George. Here are Sir Wilfrid's words:

> As I advance in years I appreciate more the wisdom of that British constitution under which

I was born and brought up, and under which I have grown old, which has given to the various portions of the Empire their separate free governments. It is our proud boast that Canada is the freest country in the world. It is our boast that in this country liberty of all kinds, civil and religious liberty, flourish to the highest degree. To those who look only on the surface of things, this may not be apparent. The fact that we are a colony does not alter the truth of his statement. The inferiority which may be implied in the word "colony" no longer exists. We acknowledge the authority of the British Crown, but no other authority. We are reaching the day when our Canadian Parliament will claim co-equal rights with the British Parliament, and when the only ties binding us together will be a same flag and a same Crown.

To hear my honourable friends from the other side, and their leaders, it would seem that we had reached the stage at which we could claim that we were no longer a dependency, but a sister nation and that we exercised co-equal rights with the Imperial Parliament. I still believe that we are in the same condition as we were in 1867, for I find in the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons two resolutions moved by the Minister of Justice, addressed "To the King's Most Excellent Majesty" and asking him to consent—

To submit a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, to amend the British North America Act, 1867, in the manner following, or to the following effect:

An Act to amend the British North America Act, 1867.

Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same as follows.

Then comes the amendment itself, which bears on the right of making inquiry as to the age or infirmity of judges sitting in the Superior Court.

The other measure has for its object a declaration that "any enactment of the Parliament of Canada otherwise within the legislative authority of the Parliament shall operate and be deemed to have operated extra-territorially according to its intention in the like manner and to the same effect as if enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom."

Honourable gentlemen, I see nothing altered in our status. We are still dependent upon the Imperial Parliament for the exercise of any power which we do not find in the British North America Act. It seems to me that the Cabinet, flushed with pride at Canada having attained national status by being represented in the League of Nations, might well have passed an Act declaring that the Parliament of Canada, having co-equal rights with the British Parliament, "enacts as follows" and might have sent the Bill for approval to the other side, thus creating a precedent. Now is the time, if ever, for this Canadian Parliament and the Dominions at large to claim co-equal rights with the British Parliament, recognizing a common king, but no subservient or dependent situation. This has not been done, and I regret it, because it seems to me, with the feeling now prevalent in Great Britain that the Dominions must no longer occupy the position of mere colonies, but should be sister nations, we ought to have been able to obtain recognition of our equality and of our full nationhood.

Hon. RUFUS H. POPE: Honourable gentlemen of the Senate, I have listened attentively to the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat. I think it unfortunate, as I have previously stated, that members of this honourable body do not refrain from participating in party caucuses. I observe that the Liberal party held a caucus the other day. Even if I had not read of that political caucus I should have learned of it by listening to the speeches of the Hon. Mackenzie King and others, the day before yesterday, and by listening to the speeches of the Liberal Senators in this House. The speeches were all of the same type. I say it would be much better for this House to stand absolutely, or to a great degree, independent of those party affiliations, especially if, as the honourable member for Delorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) states, the parties in the other House do not represent anything. In that case we do not want to be associated with them. In view of the dignity and independent position of the Senate of Canada, its members should not engage in political or party strife.

The honourable gentleman started off with the complaint that the French Canadians of the province from which we both come have not the representation they ought to have in the Cabinet. Then he read in French a very long statement, which my imperfect education, I am sorry to say, prevented me from closely following. A few moments later he informed us that the present Cabinet and the Union Government, or the so-called Unionist party, were not sufficiently attractive for the province of Quebec to think of associating with them. If the honourable gentleman truly represents his province, as he claims, and if such is still the sentiment of Quebec, I should like to know what practical scheme the honourable gentleman proposes in order that the French Canadians of Quebec may find representation in a Cabinet which he says is not attractive and is unworthy of that great branch of the Canadian family.

If I did not misunderstand the honourable gentleman, he stated that in 1917 the French Canadians were not represented in the Cabinet, but he is aware that we went to the people with two French Canadian members of the Cabinet, Hon. Mr. Sevigny and Hon. Mr. Blondin. Their fate was the fate of political parties in time of great strife or stress. Well do I remember the National party under Mr. Mercier, of whom the honourable gentleman was a follower. He was the father of the National party in the province of Quebec long before R. L. Borden was thought of in the public life of Canada. Well do I remember the keenness of that struggle which resulted in that honourable gentleman having not a single English-speaking representative in the local House at Quebec. The honourable member for DeLorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) will agree that such a situation was not due to ill-will or a desire to deprive any one of his constitutional rights and privileges, but was simply the result of an election. And what happened? A way was made for Col. Rhodes in Megantic county, because we desired to have a representative in the provincial cabinet; not because we believed in that cabinet, not that we were in agreement with Mercier and his National sentiment, but because we thought the English-speaking people of the province of Quebec should have at least one representative in the Government. And Col. Rhodes remained in the Government until defeat.

It was unfortunate that when the Union Government was being formed, the offer of a fifty-fifty arrangement was refused by the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier and those associated with him. It was unfortunate for the province of Quebec, and I shall ever feel that that right honourable gentleman missed a great opportunity to unite the people of Canada when he declined to make whatever personal sacrifice was called for and to enter the Cabinet which was at that time being formed for the prosecution of the war. The attitude which he then took created a certain sentiment in our province, and naturally his advice was followed.

Honourable gentlemen, permit me to say that in this House, as well as outside, I am known as a Liberal Conservative, and the ideals and traditions of the Liberal Conservative party are as sacred to me as the ideals and traditions of any other persons are to them, no matter what language they speak, and while I deemed it my duty to give to the Union party when it was formed, and to this Union Government, in the interest of unity and the prosecution of the war, all the support and influence I possessed, yet I do not feel that I have forsaken a single one of my principles or ideals. And, honourable gentlemen, I will go further and say that if Union Government can make good, if they can do as great things and can go forward as fearlessly, regardless of popularity and party politics, in peace time as they did during the war, they will still have my support, although I am a Liberal Conservative. As president of the Eastern Townships Liberal Conservative Association, which has its ramifications in nine or ten counties, I am calling the members of that association together at a very early date. We did not meet during the war period, because the Prime Minister of Canada said that political matters and political organization should not be taken up during the war. In 1917, when the writs were issued, we met and decided to take no part in the elections. The members of the organization were to have a free hand. I went my way as I saw fit, and others, of a different nationality, went their way as they saw fit, and now that that strife is over, now that that difficulty is passed, I see no reason why we should not bury any hard feelings that may have been engendered.

But my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand)) says we are not fighting the by-elections, but are putting up independent candidates to fight them on principles and ideals, and he does not understand that. I am not surprised that dyed-in-the-wool Liberals like my honourable friend cannot understand. It is because they never had any principles or ideals, never fought for any, and do not know anything about them. Any set of ideals and principles that they ever published at any of their conferences were violated and thrown into the scrap basket when the opportunity arose to put them into force. My honourable friend is astonished and surprised, and I sympathize with him in his miserable condition. But, gentlemen, I am not the keeper of the Government. Whether or not they shall go forth to fight these by-elections, it is not for me to say; but if they do go forth, armed with principles and ideals, I venture to say that they will come back having won some victories.

The honourable gentleman spent some time in dealing with the question of finance. I am not a financier, thank goodness. I am thankful too that I do not possess anything that can be taxed. On questions of finance I am the happiest mortal imaginable.

The honourable gentleman has spoken about the unpopularity of this administration, and, to some extent, I am inclined to agree with him. In Canadian politics, in days gone by, we referred to candidates, parties, and policies as "popular." We spoke of "a popular candidate," "a popular party," "a popular policy"—about the only thing that seemed to be considered was the securing of something "popular." The honourable gentleman knows how many nights and days he spent striving to conceive something "popular" to give to the unfortunate party to which he belongs. He worked diligently, honestly, and well. Having got one of the most charming men in the world, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a man of universal popularity, to lead them, the party started down the track under a full head of steam, and away they went until 1911, when the whole load of popularity was dumped. They should have built upon ideals and principles rather than upon the popularity of any individual. If this Government has lost the confidence of the people of Canada, it is wonderful to think that they can borrow $2,000,000,000 from a free people who have no confidence in them. That in itself seems contradictory.

In the Government to-day we have from the province of Quebec the Honourable Mr. Blondin, who is a member of the Senate. He comes in for much criticism in another place, and I presume there is a certain amount of it here. We have the Honourable Mr. Ballantyne, of the city of Montreal, and the Honourable Mr. Doherty, also of the city of Montreal. The only other Government supporter elected in the province of Quebec was Mr. Ames, and he was sent as the benevolent representative of this Government to Geneva or some other pleasant place, in order that we might be able to say to the province from which he came that we furnished places for all the men they sent us. I say to my honourable friend, although I cannot speak for the Government except as I know it, that if three more bully good fellows are sent here we will find three portfolios for them. There is no animosity on this side of the House. If any province wants representation it must elect some one to support the Government. It would be impossible for the Government to go across the floor of the House and select the gentleman who has just taken his seat. With all the animosity that he seems to harbour and encourage it would be imposible for him to join the administration of Sir Robert Borden, or to accept the broad invitation extended by him, which would include even the honourable gentleman, regardless of the views that he entertains. If our French Canadian friends from the province of Quebec desire representation in this Government, there is no reason why they should not do exactly what was done in the local Government of that province. If they do not desire representation, and some of them say they do not—and an honourable gentleman on the other side of the House shook his head just now when I mentioned it—then, for God's sake, why take up the time of this House talking about it? Do not try to stir up ill feeling between the different elements in Canada; do not try to prejudice the people of Canada against Quebec. It is unfair to Canada, it is unfair to Quebec, it is unfair to the English-speaking people, it is unfair to the French Canadian people.

Hon. WILLIAM ROCHE: Honourable gentlemen, we have had a Speech from the Throne from His Excellency the Duke of Devonshire, representing His Majesty the King, and we have had a response moved by two talented gentlemen thanking His Excellency for the gracious Speech which he has delivered. I join with the gentlemen who have preceded me in expressing my satisfaction and pleasure that gentlemen of such talent should be added to this Chamber. My only regret is that the Government when it has chosen so many able and talented gentlemen as are in this House has not recommended them for and put them into the other House, where they might be able to reinforce and consolidate the Government, which at the present moment, exhibits such marked indications of decrepitude and disintegration.

May I add a few imperfect remarks along the line of those that have been made by the mover and the seconder of the Address. The mover of the Address, almost at the outset, expressed great satisfaction at Canada's advanced status. He intimated that the country was now in a different position to that which it previously occupied, and that a great and advantageous change had taken place in our relation to the Mother Country, so called; and he almost intimated that we were a separate and distinct nation. I do not think that situation exists. I think it is a mirage which honourable gentlemen have entered into, in which they have assumed various positions and contortions of forms which really exist.

The honourable gentleman said that owing to the heroic achievements of our soldiers we were now in such a position that we were no longer responsible to the Mother Country but were an independent nation. He said that that was evidenced by the fact that we signed, as an independent power, the Treaty of Peace and the Covenant of the League of Nations. Does that condition really exist, or does it not? Gentlemen have asked for statements based not upon ideals, but upon facts. Is it a fact that we are separate from the Mother Country at this time? Are we governed by the Parliament and the King of Great Britain, or are we an independent power? As I take it, we sit here as the creatures of the British North America Act, passing out from the Parliament of Great Britain, authorized by the King, the Lords, and the Commons. What change has taken place? By what public act of the Parliament of Great Britain have we assumed this new status? Can any one tell us? When a great power renounces a colony or dependency, it does so by some Act of the legislature or some fiat of the Sovereign. When the thirteen States disassociated themselves from Great Britain, the King and all the heirs of the monarchy came down and signed their names to the renunciation of their power. Has this been done in our case? Are we not exactly where we were?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: No, we are in debt.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: The Governor General came down the other day, and we are answering his Speech. Is it not folly and delusion to talk about an advanced and different status? I am a British subject, and hope always to remain one. I echo the language of Sir John Macdonald when he said, "I was born a British subject and a British subject I hope to die."

The actions of our soldiers were commendable, and received world-wide renown. The fame and reputation of Canada as a fighting country was well maintained.

Was Canada ever a colony? We say we have escaped from the colony state, and have advanced into the monarchical or independent or governing state, whatever it may be. The province of Nova Scotia was a colony, and New Brunswick, that degenerate part that was once attached to Nova Scotia, was part of that colony. I do not think that Canada was ever a colony of Great Britain. The Canadian provinces as a whole were never a colony. They were peopled largely by emigrants from the revolting colonies in America, and were largely settled by the English people, and by the French people who remained in it. A large portion of the territory was taken from the French, and stolen from the Indians. The different provinces that were united by the British North America Act were called the Dominion of Canada. Is Canada at the present time a Dominion of the British Crown, or is it not? Gentlemen who contend that we have achieved an advanced status ought to be able to show us the public Act by which this status has been secured.

Another achievement, upon which the honourable gentleman has vaunted himself, is that we have acquired immense possessions by the acts of our soldiers. Well, what is that? We spent two thousand millions of money; we gave the services of five hundred thousand men, and, what was more precious, sacrificed the lives of sixty thousand men. What have we got in return? Great Britain got ships and colonies, and the other Powers seized upon whatever they could get. What has Canada got as a result of the achievements of these heroes of ours? We have got nothing. We have $2,000,000,000 of debt, and the melancholy spectacle of the graves in France and Belgium.

The honourable gentleman has boasted of the acquisition of peace. That is a great possession. We all freely admit that the cessation of war, with its sacrifices and struggles and tribulations, is a great achievement. I heard the leader of the Government yesterday, in a rather melancholy mood, somewhat different from the optismism that came over him later, asking where peace was to be found, and stating that the nations of the world were convulsed in upheaval and unrest. Where is there peace? Is there peace in China, in Japan, in Siberia? Is there peace in Afghanistan, in Turkestan, in India? Is there peace in the Balkan States, in the Caucasus, in Russia? Is there peace in the Adriatic? Is there peace in Austria or Hungary? Is there peace in Germany? Is there peace in England? Is there peace in Ireland?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Never.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Well, then, I think we can lay aside the great achievement of peace, because all the nations, especially those that are parties to the League of Nations, are secretly arming and getting ready for the conflict— and the conflict is already going on in all these countries.

Mr. Lloyd George yesterday announced that it was a mistake to humiliate Germany. Two or three years ago Russia was our ally; later Russia was our enemy and we fought against her. Some two or three sessions ago I made a remark somewhat along these lines, and was derided for it in this House. But where are we to-day? British statesmen realize that Russia will be rehabilitated, and that she will be our greatest enemy in the future, and they are striving to build up a great barrier in Germany to repel any invasion.

So much for what we have acquired: our political status, and, as a last resort when all other things were illusory and ephemeral, peace. I pass from these topics. When honourable gentlemen reflect upon them they will come to the conclusion that we are suffering from an hallucination, and that what we have acquired is enveloped in clouds, and is very doubtful—that it will require all our energy and economy, all our co-operation and patriotism to re-erect society, to recover what was lost, and to come back to a healthy state.

My honourable friend who moved the Address spoke of the exertions of the soldiers, and said that we were to look to them to re-establish and develop the country. I hope that the soldiers, who have been put upon the land by the Government, will be able to make a living, and to pay back at least some of the advances that have been made to them.

But in the immediate future, to produce the resources which will raise Canada above want and debt, we must look to the re-establishment of industry and trade along normal lines; we must look to the profitable employment of labour and capital of the country, and, above all, we must look for reduction of prices before our foreign trade can be extended. It is useless to talk about the expansion of our trade until we can produce and send to the countries that want our commodities, articles of as good a quality as those produced by any other nation, and at a lower or equal price. Canada at the present moment is, I believe, the dearest country in the world. Our articles have been kept up at tip-top prices by the exertions of the producers and by the arbitrary interference of the Government.

Now take the question of trade returns. The honourable gentleman who moved the Address (Hon. Mr. Proudfoot) felicitated himself and the House on the fact that the imports were less in some respects and in some directions than the exports. What is the secret of that? The Government do not give us the quantities of articles exported or imported. They very carefully abstain from that, although the information has been asked for in Parliament many times. Why is it not given? Prices, both of exports and imports, are four times what they were formerly, and the quantity of trade looks large because it has been multiplied by the very high cost of the articles. Until the articles which we favourably produce in this country are produced at a low rate, our trade can never legitimately expand. The countries that will take our products are those that have become destitute, and have been deprived of their money. They will buy in the cheapest markets, or from any country that will give them credit in the hope of being repaid some day. We have given credit and have established trade by this artificial means, but that will not be permanent. It is by the production of articles of intrinsic value and by the production of articles at a moderately low price, or a competitive price, that we shall expand our trade in the markets of the world. I say that statements of that kind, no matter how elaborately or skilfully prepared, are entirely delusive; that they do not afford a just view of the resources or the operations of the country, and that they must be analyzed, if they can be analyzed, and show what articles are being exported, what articles imported, and how the articles that we produce may be exchanged for those we import. Trade can be established only along those legitimate lines.

The honourable leader of the Government in the House (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) felicitated himself, and urged it as a proof of the popularity of the Government and the confidence of the people in it, that huge loans had been acquired from the people of Canada. I shall not at all speak of the means by which these loans were acquired. The last loan was for $700,000,000. The minister thought it was a subject for jubilation that so much money had been obtained from the people. I think it was a cause of intense regret that in this and previous loans the sum of $2,000,000,000 had been abstracted from the capital of the country—for it was to a large extent taken from the working capital of the country—and spent in the air, spent for the services of war. The capacity of the country has been reduced by $2,000,000,000 which the Government has taken from the people. And what is the situation now? Inquisitors are out all over the land. Every tenth man you meet is a tax collector, and a Doomsday Book is being made up every day. It is not at the end of the year. The emissaries of the Government are everywhere, spying out to see where they can supply more taxation. It will be more and more taxation. I would recommend to the honourable leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed)—I know he will hear me, although he may be absent—that the Government should consider the possibility of beginning in this country a sinking fund, or by and by, with the lavish expenditure which is going on, our country will not be able to pay interest and will be so overwhelmed in debt that our currency will fall far below what it is at present. The financiers of the world know what the resources of a country are; they know what the amount of the debt is; and the currency fails in proportion to the amount of the country's obligations and the inadequacy of its resources to pay the interest and the principal of its debt.

It is within our recollection that after the war in the United States, notwithstanding what we may call the bounteous resources of that country—its huge territory, its material possessions of every kind and its energetic people—the currency of the United States was $150 to $200 of paper money for $100 in gold. They commenced to economize, they established a sinking fund, they liquidated the debt, and in a very short time the currency of the United States was equal to par in gold. That is the only legitimate and proper course for any government; not to go on, in profligate style, lavishing money here and there, but to commence at once to lop off all extraneous expenditure and to come down to the hard and fast rules of supply and demand in production and expenditure, until Canada once more rights itself and is an independent commercial, financial and political power.

I want to speak a word about this building. It has been very highly eulogized, and I do not agree entirely with the eulogy. I remember the old building. I came here in June, 1867, and those Scotch granite columns of the old building were going up in a green field, and down below, where the fence is, was an old rough stone wall. That building was picturesque in its pretty colour and association, and looked like an eastern palace. The variation in the stones and ornament and windows, and all the rest of it, made the building a very beautiful one. This, of course, is a commodious building. There are a great many offices and a great many passages. There is a labyrinth of entrances and exits. I hope none of the senators will be lost in it. The cost of the building, I believe, is as large as that of the public buildings in Albany, New York state. I do not know how much more it is going to cost, but I hope that the amount will be commensurate with the utility of the building, and that the structure will be an ornament and pride to Canada. It was begun at a very bad time, and I hope that every effort will be made to rescue it from being an immense and extraordinary expense out of proportion to its utility for the housing of Parliament.

With regard to the Franchise Bill, I may make this succinct remark, that I believe any Bill will be an improvement on the iniquitous War-time Elections Act—an Act that was odious to a great majority of the people—that was an eyesore and a grievance, and was tolerable only because it was enacted during the stress of the war, when almost anything was justified. I trust that the proposed Franchise Act will be just and equal to all portions of the country; that it will introduce to Parliament men who represent the various classes in the community, and represent, above all, the high ideals of the people in seeking the advancement and the renown and honour of our country; that it will be a measure which reflects the advanced sentiment, the patriotic motives and spirit of co-operation of every province in the Dominion.

I might go on to speak of other topics that were mentioned by the learned mover and seconder of the Address, but I forbear to trespass further on the time of the House. May I add my humble tribute to the acknowledgment that has been made of the immense importance of the visit to Canada by the Prince of Wales. By his genial manner, his bonhomie and his disposition to become acquainted with even the humblest, he endeared himself to every one who came in contact with him. His very high station was represented by his mature dignity, and the goodness of his nature and disposition by his affable manner and his cordial reception of all who came to him. I join in the congratulation, and if Canada should be a separate nationality, according to the dreams of the honourable gentlemen opposite, I hope that the successor of the Duke of Devonshire, who, I hear, is going away, will be His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.

Hon. JAMES DOMVILLE: Honourable gentlemen, I did not intend to say anything, because "speech is silver, but silence is golden;" but when you are urged by being prodded here and there, it very naturally occurs to you to make some remarks which your friends and other persons may read. While there have been good men all about, the lower provinces are not represented in the Cabinet. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are without representation. Where is the security of the Union Government if they cannot take in representatives of some of these provinces? The Government must have considered them of no use, or would not have them, or else the Government was afraid to open up the constituencies. It is of little use for us to speculate as to what the nation is thinking of, but I tell you that if there were an election to-morrow—not that I wish it—the opponents of the Government would sweep this country. I could refer you to men, some of them under this very roof, who would tell you the same thing.

Reference has been made to the debt of Canada. The question is, how are we going to pay it? As the president of a bank once said, unless you have money in the bank, you cannot take money out. I agree with the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Roche) that our currency can be restored to a gold basis only by economy and by progress in development. Look at the middle man to-day. Coal is now being sold at $20 a ton, and if this were the time and the place, I could tell you something of what is going on in this respect. And the price of $20 is for a short ton, 2,000 pounds. Think of the man who has a wife and babies dependent upon him and who is in want. If you talk to him of the beauties of our Parliament Buildings and the greatness of our leaders, his answer is: "Bosh! rubbish!"

I will not discuss the question of our part in the war, although I have my own ideas on the subject. However, our present situation is such that it is the duty of all who desire to serve their country to do what they can to bring it out of this Slough of Despond.

Canada is entering upon a new career. Some honourable gentlemen have spoken about our autonomy. Well, I do not know what it is. We are in an unfortunate position because of the absence of our Prime Minister. If he were here he might enlighten us on the subject—he might tell us something we do not know. But, unfortunately he has been in poor health, like myself. But I am here to do my duty, and I do not care whether my vote is Liberal or Conservative, for my only watchword is "Canada." I will not be led astray by any highfalutin cries in favour of this person or of that. We are entering upon a new era. Ireland has two Parliaments; Scotland is looking for a Parliament now; the Church of England is disestablished in Wales. What is the meaning of this? It means that people want to govern themselves and not be controlled by others. In Canada we have no democracy, but there is a great deal of extravagance. Money is spent freely and easily, for it consists only of pieces of paper. It is said that the wealthy people must be rewarded. Politics is just a game, as it has always been. But there is a higher plane. The world is dissatisfied. The people are becoming educated by means of the press, which is the greatest missionary we have to-day. Through the press the people may obtain a fair education. In the Illustrated London News, for instance, you may learn something of central Africa and the manners and customs of the people there. Twenty or thirty years ago we used to hear of the Mountain of the Moon, with an elevation of, I think, 6,000 feet. There are 28,000,000 people there, and they can grow anything from strawberries to cotton, and now there is a railway running through to Cairo. How can you, with your high prices, compete with wheat that will cost 5 cents a bushel? How can you compete with cotton that costs almost nothing? You must remember that John Bull is pretty clever. For instance, he has turned over to us the Grand Trunk railway.

As my honourable friend has pointed out, our debt is now two billion dollars as a result of the war, and the cost of living is higher than ever. Prices must be brought down in some way or there will be a revolution in this country. If you crush down the poor people and they see John Brown, who is no better than themselves, made Lord Brown, or whatever it may be, and they will say that no consideration has been given to themselves and their families. This is what is going on in all classes of society.

The question might be asked, "Where are we under Confederation?" Our ideal was that under Confederation all would be well. We could not see what was going to happen. Newfoundland was wise enough to keep out. We are hewers of wood and drawers of water. The time has come for the labourers and the farmers to have their turn in office. That is happening all over the world. The salvation of the world lies in the education of the people so that they can decide what is right and what is wrong.

Then there is the Church. I was brought up in the Church of England. I have not much use for it. The Church of England in Wales was disestablished. Do you think the Baptists, the Presbyterians, the Methodists and others will be satisfied to see it represented by twelve or fifteen peers in the House of Lords?

It has been said that the Government of the day is not fit to fill its office. There are many good men in the country, and if a new party is to be formed, it must be done in such a way as to get rid of all the deadwood. Principles which will draw the people together for the redemption of Canada will have to be advanced. I never had anything from any Government. I never asked for anything, and I am not asking for anything to-day. I once brought my little grandson up here—he was killed in the war, poor fellow. I said to him, "What do you think of it all?" Well," he said, "it is a good show, grandpa." Yes, it is a good show, but there must be something substantial behind it. At present we have to keep up the Red Cross, the Red Triangle Clubs, the Women's Union, and the Christian Messengers—and now, in St. John, we have the Millionaires' Club. We hear that Mrs. Tom Bubble entertained a party at the Millionaires' Club.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: You laugh, but is it right that some people should be allowed to arrogate to themselves such a position? The people have to be reckoned with. Any smart man can see the handwriting on the wall, and will trim his sails to the wind. We must go into the temple among the Pharisees and money-lenders and drive them out. I would go one step further. I would say that no man in Canada should own more than one million, actual money. If a man cannot live on $60,000 a year, of what use is he? We must wake up to the future. We must unite together and let bygones be bygones.

Reference has been made to the province of Quebec. The Jesuits came to this continent and settled that country. We can read what they did and what they suffered. Let me tell you, honourable gentlemen, that Quebec, if it stands pat, will hold the balance of power. The people of that province stand together as a united force—and let us hope that they will always exert their influence in the best interests of the country. I remember a time when the late King was going through Kingston. There were Orange arches all round, and he refused to go under them. He would not recognize this hierarchy of Orangery. If we are the descendants of British people; if we have the right idea of what they were in the past, and what their better classes are to-day, we can form a judgment of our duty and can carry it out.

There are enough good men in Canada outside of politics, to carry on the work of the country; but they cannot get into either this or the other Chamber. We must withdraw the umbra that is being thrown over Canada. I do not want to see an election. I do not care a snap for either one side or the other. The Government are not going to give up this session; they are going to stand together in self-defence—and for the indemnity. Of course the members of the Senate do not have to stand for election, as my honourable friend knows; if they did, many of them would never return. The people will elect men in whom the public have confidence regardless of the party to which they belong. We have come to the time when we must realize that the working classes should be allowed to live as cheaply as possible, the middle classes to live in comfort, and those who have the wealth of the country should contribute more to the welfare of the public.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Schaffner, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, March 4, 1920.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE LATE LIEUTENANT-COLONEL BAKER, M.P.

FORM OF MEMORIAL.

Hon. GEORGE G. FOSTER moved:

That a Special Committee composed of the Honourable Messieurs Bradbury, Casgrain, Pope and the mover be appointed to confer and act with a like Committee of the House of Commons in determining the form of the Memorial to be erected in the Parliament Buildings to the late Lieutenant-Colonel Baker, M.P. for Brome, who lost his life on the field of battle.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, in presenting the motion for the appointment of this committee, I may explain to the honourable members of this House that it is really a motion for the re-appointment of the committee which has had this matter in charge during the past two sessions. There have been many sittings of the committee. They have studied the building from point to point to find where this memorial could most advantageously be erected, and have finally decided that it be placed on the right hand side of the entrance to the House of Commons side of the building. We ask for the re-appointment of this committee so that they may confer with a like committee of the House of Commons. We are now in communication with Tait Mackenzie, a Canadian living in the United States, who is going to co-operate with us in the erection of the memorial.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That a message be sent to the House of Commons by one of the clerks at the table to inform that House that His Honour the Speaker and Hon. Messieurs Blain, Thompson and Watson have been appointed a committee to assist his Honour the Speaker in the direction of the restaurant of Parliament so far as the interests of the Senate are concerned, and to act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the said restaurant.

He said: May I say, by way of explanation of that motion, that it was the opinion of the Committee on Selection that this committee should act tentatively, pending the organization of the restaurant when the new quarters are completed. I intend to move, when we have disposed of the Address, that a joint committee of both Houses be appointed to deal with the question of the new restaurant when it is completed. So far as the building and equipment are concerned, the restaurant will probably be equal to any on this continent, and it is therefore very desirable that special attention should be given to see that in its administration, as well as in its equipment, it is placed on a parity with the dining-rooms of the best hotels or clubs on this continent. There is no reason why that should not be done.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: What about a bar-room? Will you have one?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Therefore, when we have disposed of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I shall submit to the House a motion suggesting that, entirely irrespective of the committee which we are to-day appointing to deal with the restaurant in the meantime, a joint committee should be named to take the whole subject into consideration. The members of both Houses, I am certain, will not only desire, but will insist, that this restaurant be administered in such a manner as to make it a credit to Canada and especially a comfort to the members of Parliament.

The motion was agreed to.

ACCOMMODATION OF SENATORS IN HOUSE OF COMMONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RUFUS POPE: Honourable gentlemen, I rise to a question of privilege. I was very much surprised yesterday afternoon, on entering the lobby of the House of Commons, to be told by the doorkeeper that the rule of the Speaker prevented my admittance. I was informed that no senator might enter at that doorway. I refer to the space, in front of the Commons Chamber, leading to the lobby to the left, behind the Government side of the House. I do not know how narrow an interpretation may be placed upon the clearly written article of our Constitution which proclaims that Parliament consists of two Houses, namely, the House of Commons and the Senate. I consider that a broad and reasonable interpretation of that particular article of the British North America Act would include members of the Senate as well as members of the House of Commons as being entitled to free entry into any of the lobbies in and around Parliament. I mention this matter because I think the order of His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons indicates too narrow an interpretation and one that should not be maintained. Personally, as you are aware, Mr. Speaker and honourable gentlemen, my knowledge of the rules and regulations of Parliament is not what it ought to be, considering the number of years I have been loafing about the foot of the Throne. That, of course, is my own fault. But I think it would be desirable for this House to take some action to prevent the recurrence of such an unfortunate and uncomfortable situation as I was placed in yesterday.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I suggest, honourable gentlemen, the desirability of there being a clear understanding between the two Houses as to what the privileges of a member of Parliament should be with regard to the lobbies of either House. I am unaware to what extent the order promulgated by the House of Commons is effective. It may be that the lobby behind the Throne and the lobby in front of the entrance to the House of Commons, because of the open grill-work, are regarded as part of the floor of the House. I do not know whether that is the case or not, but if it is, it seems to me to be a very radical departure from the privilege which was extended particularly to members of this House in the old Parliament Buildings. There is no reason why there should be a stricter rule enforced against the visit of a Senator to the lobbies of the House of Commons than previously. It is very desirable that good relations should exist between the two Houses, because whatever rules may be passed by the House of Commons, if they operate as a restraint upon senators, will probably be duplicated in this House, so that similar rules may operate equally by way of restraint upon the members of the House of Commons. I am not suggesting—

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: Der tag.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am not suggesting reprisals in any sense, but it is desirable that we should have uniformity, to say the least.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Reciprocity.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I therefore suggest that His Honour the Speaker of the Senate take up the matter with His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons, so that there may be a good understanding as between both Houses and a mutuality of privileges.

Hon. FREDERIC NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, while this matter is under discussion I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the seating arrangement of the Senators' gallery in the House of Commons permits of only twenty seats. On ordinary occasions twenty seats may be ample, but when an important debate is in progress, many Senators who take an interest in the legislation which is being discussed and are anxious to learn at first hand the viewpoint of the Commoners, would be quite unable to attend in the gallery reserved for them in order to listen to the debate instead of reading about it next day in Hansard. It seems to me that twenty chairs in the gallery space provided in the new House of Commons are altogether too small a proportion to be allotted to the Senate. I would suggest to the honourable leader of the House that His Honour the Speaker be requested to take that matter also into consideration.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Honourable gentlemen, I am glad to have my attention called to the complaint of the honourable member from Bedford (Hon. Mr. Pope), and also to hear the suggestions made by the honourable leader of the Government in this House. I shall call the attention of the Speaker of the House of Commons to these matters and try to have them arranged. I shall at the same time mention that the number of seats in the gallery allotted to the members of this House is not sufficient.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 3, consideration of the motion for an Address in reply to His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Hon. F. L. SCHAFFNER: Honourable gentlemen, in asking your indulgence for a short time this afternoon, may I say that I have decided to make some remarks because it appears to me that this is about the only opportunity the members of this House have of speaking on certain subjects. In the other Chamber we had at least two opportunities, and sometimes a third.

My first intention was to confine my remarks almost entirely to two questions: one of these is the agrarian movement in this country and the entry of farmers into politics, and I was presumptuous enough to intend to discuss, as the second question, the machinery of this honourable body. But after listening to my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) yesterday, I decided it would be necessary for me to make a few other remarks before entering upon the discussion of the subject on which I had made some preparation.

There seems to have been since the beginning of this session a concerted action to abuse—I do not think that is too strong a word—the present Union Government. Since I entered this House I have learned to respect very highly the ability of the honourable gentleman who spoke yesterday. I have a very high appreciation of his mental qualities. I have also found him a very amiable man. So yesterday I had to conclude that something was wrong—that my honourable friend was not exactly normal. He is in my estimation too big a man to make such a criticism as he made yesterday; and as a physician I have diagnosed his case. I am sorry the honourable gentleman is not here. He was suffering from a sluggish liver and a very disordered spleen. I have made this prognosis, however: he would make a very rapid recovery, and I have no doubt that my honourable friend is to-day back in his normal physical and mental condition.

I said there seemed to be a concerted action to abuse the Union Government and to criticise adversely the work that it did, and especially to criticise Sir Robert Borden. I have no brief for Sir Robert, nor does he need to be defended by me, and I trust that any remarks of mine will be considered as coming from myself only. I have watched Sir Robert Borden pretty carefully and, although I have tried to think back to the very beginning, I do not know of any mistake that he made in the conduct of the war. From the criticism to which I listened in the other House and the criticism made yesterday in this Chamber it does seem to me that the members of the Opposition in the House of Commons and the members of the Opposition—if it may be termed an Opposition—in this House absolutely forget that for four or five years we were carrying on a war. They talk about the immense debt and about our ministers being away from Parliament and off in Europe; but I would remind those honourable members that there has been a war—a very severe war, and if our debt has increased and if there is unrest in this country to-day, these effects may be attributed largely to the events that have been occurring throughout the world, particularly in the belligerent countries in Europe, during the last four or five years. The unrest which undoubtedly does exist is not confined to Canada. I think I am within the bounds of truth in saying that unrest is prevalent all over the world. But let me confine my remarks to this country. There is unrest amongst the soldiers. How could it be otherwise, honourable gentlemen? Five hundred thousand young men went overseas from this country to preserve our liberty—in fact, I may say, to preserve our very selves. There are present in this House to-day men who have experienced the loss of sons. When we consider for a moment the trials to which our men were subjected during the war, not only in the trenches, but elsewhere, is it any wonder that there is unrest among the soldiers at present? To my mind it could not be otherwise, and what surprises me is not that there is unrest, but the fact that there is not a great deal more unrest than at present. And what about the people who stayed at home? It may safely be said that there is scarcely a hamlet in this great country of Canada that has not felt the trying conditions of the war. Those who did not have husbands or sons or brothers over there certainly had friends whose relatives were overseas. In my own little town we have had a number of sad cases. One in particular is that of a woman who sent three sons to the war; they are all buried in Flanders. The point I wish to make is that, as not only the soldiers who have returned, but also many other people, have been affected by the war, we could not expect conditions to be normal.

My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) told us yesterday that Quebec would vote against Union Government. That was brand new information to us, surely; it was something we did not expect.

A great deal has been said about the money which we have expended and the amount we have borrowed. Reference has been made to the fact that the public debt of Canada has increased from $350,000,000 to $2,000,000,000. That is not strange. Does any one think that war can be carried on for any length of time without very greatly increasing the public debt? We have heard complaints, both here and in the other House, because of the large amount of money that has been raised in Canada. Over and over again, it has been stated that the Government had lost the confidence of the people. If that is so, it seems most peculiar that they should have been able to raise the large amount of money they did.

My honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Roche) yesterday asked what we had got in return for the money expended. He said:

> We spent two thousand millions of money; we gave the services of five hundred thousand men, and, what was more precious, sacrificed the lives of sixty thousand men. What have we got in return?

I must say that it never occurred to me that we entered the war expecting to gain anything. I am sure that when Parliament met in the special session of 1914 such a thought never entered the minds of the members of either the House of Commons or of the Senate. What was our object in entering into the war? One of the most autocratic and devilish men in the world had undertaken, after years of preparation, to destroy the peace of the world. This tyrant commenced operations by attacking little Belgium, and later aroused the indignation and anger of nearly all civilized nations by ordering the sinking of ships, thus causing drowning of innocent women and children. In August, 1914, Sir Robert Borden—I do not think he waited for a meeting of Parliament—at once cabled to the Mother Country that, if it was necessary, the people of this country were willing to sacrifice their last man and their last dollar to help preserve the peace of the world and the existence of the British Empire. That is what has been preserved to us. That is what we have got. Our men were sent overseas, not for the purpose of gaining territory, but because the people of Canada believed that it was their duty to assist Great Britain in restoring peace to the world.

A good deal has been said by honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House about the War Time Elections Act, which was passed, I think, in 1917. I have not got a list of the ugly names they called it. I must say that that Act never seemed to me to be very unjust. What were the two principal objects which it effected? First, it took the vote from a certain class of people who were not sympathetic with the aims and ideals of this country and the British Empire. That some injustice may have been done here and there I am not going to deny; it is impossible to bring about any great change without some individual injustice; but surely it was not wrong to take the franchise from people who were not in sympathy with us. The other object of the Act—and I think perhaps more fault has been found with that—was to extend the franchise to the mothers, sisters, and wives of those who were fighting in France. Those are the two points to which the greatest amount of adverse criticism has been directed, and, in my opinion, the Government were justified in doing what they did.

I believe that Sir Robert Borden and his Government made very few mistakes. If ever a man was imbued with the interests of the Empire and of this country, and if ever a man sacrificed himself to his ideals, that man was Sir Robert Borden. I think that some of the criticism which was directed yesterday towards him was too small for the men who made it. I wish to offer my meed of praise to the Union Government, and to the men of the Liberal party, who upon the solicitation of the Premier joined with the Conservatives in forming the Union Government. Some honourable gentlemen in this room were in Parliament in days gone by when, under the old party system, we fought harder and at greater length than we do to-day. They will remember that on many occasions we commenced sitting at 3 o'clock on Monday afternoon, and fought continuously until 12 o'clock on Saturday night, only stopping then because of the Lord's Day Act. Honourable gentlemen opposite were defending their beloved leader, and I do not think any one on either side of the House would say that he was not a most lovable man. When the crisis came, however, some honourable gentlemen, in adhering to their party principles, seemed to forget the importance of the crisis that was facing us. In the early days I was not so enamoured of Union Government as I afterwards was. Now, in the light of what has transpired, I am confident that Sir Robert Borden was right; and I want to give credit to the men from the other side who joined with him.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, a splendid tribute was paid to the Union Government by a gentleman who, judging from his name, never belonged to a Tory family. I refer to Mr. Mowat. The very name smacks of Liberalism. This is what he said:

> I, in common with the Liberals on this side, have had pleasure in supporting this Government, and supporting it enthusiastically, even though it be unpopular. During war I do not want to support a Government merely because it is popular.

Since this session commenced, we have heard a great deal about the unpopularity of this Government and the remarks of Mr. Mowat appeal to me very strongly. He goes on to say:

> I want to support a Government that does the right thing even if it is going to be unpopular. And what a number of unpopular things this Government has had to do!

One of the things the Government has had to do was to enforce Conscription. In my opinion, Conscription was necessary in order to properly carry on the war. I would say that every man should do his part. Mr. Mowat continues:

> One thing after another, which would almost strain to breaking point the ordinary man, these men in the Government benches, heedless of party politics, caring not whether their actions might incur the disapproval of their supporters or constituencies, or what effect those actions might have in the event of an election, have day in and day out framed policies and passed measures—Orders in Council, if you will—that were bound to be unpopular, but which were in their belief for the ultimate good of the country. The only thing that saved Canada during the war was the fact that there was a Government that was not afraid to do things that would be unpopular.

That is very gratifying when one considers the source from which it comes.

I do not want to detain the House too long, but I would like to read a short item from the Toronto Star, which I always understood to be a strong Liberal paper. This is what it says about the Union Government:

"The Union Government is in an extraordinary position," says the Toronto Star in reviewing the session of Parliament just closed. It says: "It has given the country more legislation of first-rate importance than any previous government ever did in the same length of time. It has shown more courage in handling big and difficult questions than any previous government. Yet it is conceded on all sides that the Union Government stands no chance of being upheld by the country, and apparently nobody, even at Ottawa, expects anything else than that the Government will be wiped out when the next elections take place, be it soon or late."

"The work that stands to the credit of the Union Government since the election of 1917 is considerable. but that which has been done in the brief session now closing would in itself be enough ordinarily to make the reputation of an administration. The Grand Trunk has been nationalized in the face of all the influence that the C.P.R. and the big financial and other corporations, mostly with headquarters in Montreal, could exert."

"The Union Government has pushed through legislation enabling Ontario or any other province, to make prohibition bone-dry within its boundaries by taking certain steps which will ensure federal aid in the doing of it."

There may be some difference of opinion on that point.

The work of abolishing patronage and perfecting civil service reform, of having all purchasing done on a sound basis, has been pushed through. This is one of the biggest things in the way of cleaning up graft and waste ever done by any government in any country.

Another great thing has been done. It was during the present session that the Government explained the new status Canada has attained within the Empire—a status which has been accorded international recognition. Canada is now declared to be one of a group of British nations, in full control of her own affairs.

Canada's new status is something which seems to be causing our friends on the other side of the House a great deal of uneasiness. The honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Roche) was at great pains to show that Canada had not attained a new status.

As I have said, during the period of the war the Government has done much; and the same is true of the period of reconstruction. I do not know about military life—there are men here who do—but I believe I am not far wrong when I say that it is extremely difficult to re-establish men in civil life after they have spent some time in the army. I can only refer to what has been done in this respect in Manitoba. The remarks which I am about to read were made by the member for Lakeside in the Manitoba House. The following are statistics on soldier unemployment in Manitoba as of February 7:

Number of soldiers not working, 1,481; number who have not applied for work, who were living without assistance of any kind 600; number to which A class certificates had been issued, or those who had no employment and were seeking work, 165; number to which B class certificates had been issued or those in employment whose wages were not sufficient, 148. Those who had been receiving assistance right along numbered 591. When it was considered that 30,000 soldiers had been demobilized in Manitoba, said he, those figures were very reassuring.

Judging from that statement the Government has been very successful in the re-establishing of the soldiers.

During the last year or two we have heard a great deal about the agrarian movement, the farmers' movement. I do not know of any reason why a farmer should not move if he wants to and has the ability to do so. The sympathy of the House may not be with me in what I am about to say, but I ask honourable members of this Chamber to accept what I say as a sincere expression of my views. I believe that Canada, because of its diversified interests, is one of the most difficult countries in the world to govern. It is easy to govern a municipality because the interests of the people are not so varied; it is comparatively easy to carry on a local government, because the interests of the people are similar; but when it comes to governing Canada, owing to the diversified interests and extent of the country, government is a very difficult problem.

For forty years I have lived in the West, and what I am about to say will apply principally to the three Prairie Provinces. The three Prairie Provinces have not very much on which to depend. It is estimated that the population of those provinces is to-day very nearly 2,000,000 people—1,960,000, I think. Including British Columbia, the population of Western Canada is about two and a half millions of people. The people of the three Prairie Provinces have a great deal with which to contend. Some of you know it and some of you do not. I was astounded to read in the press the other day a statement to the effect that the proprietor of one of the leading papers in Montreal—and that is in Canada—had never until a year ago visited the great West. To me that does not seem right. May I say in passing that I believe it to be the duty of members of the Senate and the House of Commons, the representatives of the people, to became conversant with the requirements of every province in this Dominion, in order that we may legislate intelligently.

The three provinces have, as I have said, a great deal with which to contend—much more than have any of the other provinces of this Dominion. The beautiful province of Nova Scotia, down by the sea, is not entirely dependent upon one thing; it has lumbering and fisheries, and apple-growing. The apples grown there are, in my opinion, the best in the world. And the people of that province have other industries besides. There is certainly a good deal of agriculture. Coming to New Brunswick, you find a similar condition. It has the fisheries; and the lumbering industry is quite extensive though it may not be as great as it formerly was. New Brunswick is a fine province. Quebec is not only a great agricultural country, with a splendid class of farmers, but it has also wonderful industries. I knew very little about Quebec until, through the kindness of one of our most respected members, I had the privilege of visiting some of the industries of that province last year. Any man from the West who has had the opportunity of visiting the great industries of Ontario and Quebec will agree that they are wonderful. They surpass any conception I ever had of them; and if any remarks of mine convey the impression that I am opposed to those industries, then I am not saying what I intend to say. I am in favour of industries. We cannot get along without them. I am not quite so much in favour of industries as the honourable leader of this House (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), if I understood his words. If I asked him what he meant, he would probably answer that he meant what he said. His opinions as to the manufacturing industry in this country were a little too strong to suit my mind.

The great industries of Ontario and Quebec have a foreign market, I admit, but I would ask this House to consider for a few moments what a market of 2,000,000 people may mean to these provinces, whether for agricultural implements, boots or shoes, harness, wagons, buggies, or whatever it may be. I remember on one occasion I visited a carriage factory at Brockville. Without making myself known, I said to the owner: "I suppose you sell your goods in Ontario." He said: "No. If Ontario were our only market we should have to close up in three weeks." "Where do you sell them?" I asked. He told me a large proportion of his output was sold in what he called the Northwest. The Northwest is certainly the source of a great revenue to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

In the three prairie provinces our only industries are grain growing and cattle raising, although there is considerable manufacturing in Winnipeg. It has been said that there is no market like the home market. The home market means much to the farmers of Ontario and Quebec, but I do not think I am far astray in stating that it is of very little service to the people of the Prairie Provinces. The province of British Columbia has the lumber industry, the fisheries, and minerals. We in the Prairie Provinces have minerals to some extent, I suppose. I am glad that British Columbia possesses those resources, for I really do not know what we should do without them.

To give you an idea of the importance of lumbering to the province of British Columbia, I may say that the total value of the forest production in that province for the year 1919 was no less than $62,000,000, as compared with $54,000,000 in 1918, according to a preliminary survey. Water-borne shipments of lumber show an advance over the preceding year of 17,000,000 feet, while the value of pulp and paper sold increased from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000 last year. We in the West have been hearing a great deal recently about the pulp and paper industry and do not feel well disposed towards it, for our newspapers, even in the great city of Winnipeg, had to suspend operation for a week.

I am glad, I say, that British Columbia has lumber resources. In every one of our numerous towns in the three Prairie Provinces is to be found a lumber yard, and I will venture to say that in not one of them will you fail to find a large quantity of British Columbia lumber or timber. It is the same with the fish; you cannot go into the smallest butcher shop in any of those provinces without finding fish from British Columbia, so I claim that if today we are a little restless it is because of the way we believe we have been treated, and I mention these facts so that some honourable members of this House who are not familiar with the conditions may know what they are. Even as to our principal crop, wheat, we have a great deal with which to contend. There are present here some men who are Manitoba wheat farmers, and they will not dispute the statement that had it not been for what were regarded as high prices for wheat, many of the farmers would have had to leave their farms, because for various reasons it would have been absolutely impossible for them to make a living. We in the West have to contend with a great deal of dry weather. We used to suffer to some extent from frost, but that does not affect us so much now. The great difficulty in that country is the lack of rain, and in the last two years we have had to contend with something we never experienced before, namely the wind storms that blew out the crops. I think that the hon. member from Manitou (Hon. Mr. Sharpe) will agree with me that millions of dollars were spent in buying grain not only for re-seeding, but for the third sowing. The tremendous winds we have out there were blowing the grain out of the ground. Therefore, as I have said, it was only the high price of our wheat that enabled the farmers to stand the test.

Of course there are places in the West where money has been made. Some people have been very fortunate. In 1915 the crop was excellent; I think we had about 300,000,000 bushels of wheat. Last year in the three provinces the yield was about 192,000,000 bushels.

There is no need for me to labour this aspect further. The point I desire to make is that those three provinces have been entirely dependent upon wheat growing and cattle raising. To-day it does not pay to raise cattle. That is true not only of the West. I read yesterday a statement made by Mr. Morrison, secretary of the farmer's party, that there is very little export of cattle from Ontario to-day. There was at one time a very large export.

It was, I think, in the three prairie provinces that the farmers' organization originated.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Do I understand the honourable gentleman to say that it does not pay to raise cattle in the West?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: It is said that cattle raising does not pay, because of the price that the farmers can get for their grain and because of the long, cold winters; and I could give the honourable gentleman a wonderful illustration regarding Alberta, if I had time. Without fear of contradiction I say that there is not much money in cattle raising in the Northwest to-day.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is not necessary to house the cattle in the winter.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: In Alberta they must be housed.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Conditions have changed since I have been there.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I may make some mistakes, but I am trying to be fair, as well as careful, in stating what I believe to be the facts.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My hon. friend does not undertake to say that in Alberta range cattle are housed.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I am speaking of the farmers in Alberta. They house their cattle, do they not? I think that statement is correct. I am not referring to the ranges.

Now, what is it that has driven the farmers to form a party? I know that the statement I am about to make will not have the sympathy of this House. My data may not be absolutely correct; hence I may be wrong in my conclusions; but I am of the opinion that this agrarian movement in the West has been caused by what is called "big business"—the big industries of the other provinces. Of that I am firmly convinced. The big interests have not been satisfied with fair profits. As to the question of fiscal policy, the farmers of the West believe that the tariff is too high. Now, I am not a free trader. The leader of the Farmers' party is, I believe, Hon. Mr. Crerar, and he is reported to have said he would sweep away the tariff wall in its entirety. I believe he has not been correctly reported. Of course we must always say we have not been correctly reported when we do not like what we have said. A despatch from Woodstock, N.B., states that Mr. Crerar—> —advocated the entire sweeping away of the protection wall and the production of a revenue from direct taxation as a means of replacing the revenue which would be needed to carry on the business of the country, declaring that protection conferred a special privilege upon industry, and that Canada should only be making the things which she can make cheapest, and then enter into unrestricted world trade.

I do not think Mr. Crerar said that. What Mr. Crerar personally thinks, I am not prepared to say, but I am pretty well prepared to state what his first lieutenant says. Before coming down here I spent several hours with the man whom I consider to be his first lieutenant, and he states that they are not asking for free trade. "But," I told him, "You are talking about class legislation." I have no hesitation in saying that for forty years we in this country have been living under class legislation. That is not Mr. Crerar's statement, but it is what I believe, and there ought not to be class legislation on either side or the other. It is clear to me that the time has come when there should be in Canada a greater unity for national work. It is high time that the class legislation which the big industries are imposing upon this country should cease, and I can assure you that the three western provinces are going to see, in so far as they can, that it does cease and that they receive fair treatment. On the other hand I believe that they are introducing class legislation and I tell them so. I believe in moderate protection. Some of the profits that have been made are amazing, and in this respect, later, I shall offer a little criticism of Union Government, if I do not forget to do so. As I have said a dozen times, I believe in the importance of manufacturing and other industries, but it does seem to me that there has not been the effort made that ought to have been made to bring the industrial and agricultural classes of the people together. The privileged class which has been developed by the large industries has had its way for so long that it has apparently failed to consider the other side of the question. Therefore it will do no harm to have some farmers in Parliament. In my opinion there will be many from the West. And I am glad of another thing, honourable gentlemen. There is to be in Ontario a combination Farmer and Labour government, and the tendency of the old-time Liberals and the old-time Conservatives is to give Mr. Drury a chance to show what his government can do. I believe that there is justification for the farmers' movement, particularly in the three Prairie Provinces, and I lay the blame largely upon the big interests, which do not like this agrarian movement. I do not like to use the word, but it seems to me that there has been a good deal of hoggish work going on among the big interests of Canada. For some reason or other—I do not know why—our Government does not seem to be able to control to any great extent these big interests, such as exist in the United States.

I read last night the remarkable statement—and I give it for what it is worth, without knowing whether it is true or not—that the five great packing institutions of the United States have been found by the courts to have made in the years 1915 to 1917, inclusive, a profit of $192,000,000, whereas during an equal period prior to 1915 they made $59,000,000. The point I desire to make it that this increase was due mainly to the war.

Our Government has been unable, so far as I can see, to get hold of the men who have been making tremendous profits. It makes no difference who they are. I say it is the duty of the Government to do what is being done in England, that is, to get after the individuals or firms who have been making excessive profits at home while our soldiers were fighting to defend our lives and property.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: May I interrupt the honourable gentleman? He says he wants to be fair in his statements. He has compared the profits made during a certain period of the war with those of a pre-war period, but he does not tell us the percentage of profit. For instance, the larger amount of profit might be a lower percentage than that of the pre-war period, there has been so much larger investment. Not only Great Britain, but every European country that was fighting on the side of the Allies, had to draw nearly all their meat supplies from those packing houses in the United States. It is altogether likely that if the figures were inquired into, there would not be shown a very much larger percentage of profit, although the gross profit has been increased because of the enormous increase in the volume of business. I think it is the percentage of profit, not the gross profit, that should be dealt with.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: The honourable gentleman is in exactly the same position that I was in. He says that a larger investment has been made. It has not been made. And he has no authority for saying that it is a matter of percentages. I am simply stating the profits made. I say that they increased their profits to such an extent that they had no right to them. That is the sort of thing that has given rise to a good deal of the unrest in the country to-day.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Can the honourable gentleman tell me whether owing to the increased price of wheat, the grain growers of the West have not made very large profits?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: That may have happened in individual cases.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Why not get after them?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: If the honourable gentleman had been listening to my remarks he would have heard me say that if a man has made these tremendous profits he should be taxed whether he was a farmer or not. But I will tell the honourable gentleman that because of things to which I have already referred the farmers, as a class, have not made large sums of money. Because last year we expected to have a splendid crop. The outlook led us to believe that there would be a yield of 35 bushels to the acre. But what was the average in Canada? According to the statistics of the Dominion Government it was ten bushels to the acre. In some places no doubt the yield was greater; but in many places it was not more than 3 bushels to the acre.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Ten bushels?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Ten bushels, according to the statistics.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That was bad farming.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: It may have been, I am simply giving the facts.

Then there is the labour problem. Because the cities have adopted the eight-hour system, daylight saving, and a few other fads, it is almost impossible for the farmers to get help. The farmer, or his wife, or daughter has to milk the cows. If he does get help, when the afternoon comes along, the hired man, because he knows that men in the cities are working only eight hours a day, wants to stop work, and it is difficult to retain him. I do not know what is going to happen. I believe that the farmers in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec have a better opportunity of making money than the farmers of the Prairie Provinces.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is right.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: But in spite of their opportunities, no one can deny that the rural population in Ontario is decreasing. Even the small town population is decreasing; the people are going to the large centres. Nothing counts like experience. If the farmers of this country are making the amount of money that some people think they are making, then, why do they leave the farms, even in the province of Ontario, and move into the cities?

An Hon. SENATOR: A good many retire.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: And can you blame them after they have spent forty years on the farm? When a man is sixty years old can you blame him for wanting to retire to the beautiful city of Winnipeg from which the honourable gentleman comes?

To a certain extent I agree with the leader of the House when he says that we require manufacturing; but I say that the manufacturers of this country have not treated the three western provinces fairly. I may be wrong, but that is my opinion. If there is a market of 2,000,000 in those provinces, it is worthy of the consideration of the manufacturers. I have said many a time, from my place in the other House, during my political campaigns, and privately, that I was in favour of union. I have stood for the slogan, "Get together." If Canada is to become a great country it will be through union and compromise, and I cannot state that too strongly.

In opening I said that I would have the presumption to say a few words about the machinery of the Senate. Last year the honourable gentleman from Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan) moved for a committee to consider the machinery of Government. I am glad that the honourable gentleman got his committee, because, if for no other reason, it gave this honourable body something to do. Another Committee of the Senate considered the question of the navigability of the Hudson Bay. The committee secured a great deal of very intering and valuable information, and during the recess I had much pleasure in reading and re-reading the evidence. The chairman of the committee was the honourable member for Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler), and although he comes from the East, I must say that his judgment and fairness were all that could be expected, even from a man hailing from the West. I compliment the honourable gentleman upon the way in which the inquiry was conducted. The honourable gentleman from Sydney (Hon Mr. McLennan) talked about the machinery of Government. He might have stopped nearer home, and talked about the machinery of the Senate. He talked about the Cabinet, and the difference in the problems of running a Government and running a private institution. He was well answered by the leader of the Government, and the honourable gentleman from Montreal made a good speech upon the question; but, in my opinion, the honourable gentleman from Antigonish (Hon. Mr. Girroir) did more than any one else to refute the argument advanced by the honourable gentleman from Sydney. They say that he is a poor workman who quarrels with his tools. I do not think that the machinery of Government is too bad if it is properly managed. The honourable gentleman forgot that it was war time and spoke of the large size of the Cabinet. He talked about a Cabinet of twenty members. What occurred in the Mother of Parliaments in England? In 1915 they had a Cabinet numbering twenty-four members, and in 1917 there numbered nearly ninety. These things are peculiar to war times and will right themselves.

In my opinion, we have had too many commissions at work in this country. Parliament is here to represent the people. In that connection, I am going to say something that perhaps you do not know. The Senate is to-day perhaps not the most popular institution in the country. I believe, however, that it can be made popular, and that it can be made exceedingly useful. When I suggest changes in this body, I am reminded of the men who used to come to the House of Commons to attend their first caucus. They stood up and told us what they were going to do. To hear them, one would have thought that we were fools. After they had been here a while they settled down and found that others had been there before them. I remember one particular case. A man, a big man, came to a caucus and told Mr. Borden, "If you do not do things right, I am going to vote against you." This was in the days of party Government. This gentleman sat two or three seats behind me in the House. Towards the end of the Session I went to him one day and said: "This is a fairly good Government, is it not?" He said, "Why?" I said: "At the first caucus you told us that if things were not done right you were going to vote against us, and on every division you have voted with us." Perhaps I am something like that man. I believe, however, that we adjourn too often and for too long periods. There is one subject at least with which I believe a large committee of the Senate could profitably employ itself for a considerable period of time. I am sure that a committee to consider our natural resources could do good work, work that would be in the best interests of the country. One hardly ever hears a public speech which does not contain some reference to the glorious resources of this country. I believe that if more work were done along the line I have suggested, the Senate would be well on the way to becoming more popular in the country.

I have already said that I was very much pleased with what had been done by the Union Government, and, in spite of the criticism of the Opposition, I think that they have conducted the affairs of the country very much to the satisfaction of the people. They were unpopular, it s true; why? One reason, I thnk, was Conscrption. The criticism has been made that the Government went to the country in 1917 and told the farmers that their sons would not be conscripted. Perhaps they did. I rather think that promise was made. Even supposing it was, there is just as much reason why a farmer's son should go to the war as anyone else. What was the condition when that promise was made? At that time production was just as important as sending men to the front, perhaps more so; but in April, May and June, 1918, as my honourable friends well know, the situation at the front was exceedingly serious. We were not at all too sure who was going to win the war. We felt very restless and uneasy. Under those circumstances, men became more important than production. As Sir Robert Borden said, "What is the good of production if we lose the fight?" We had to have men. When matters became so serious, notwithstanding the fact that the promise had been made not to conscript farmers' sons, the Government changed their minds or broke their promise, if you will, and in my judgment they were justified in doing so.

There is one matter in which I think the Government has failed during the last three or four years, namely, in securing money in the form of taxes from the wealthy corporations. I say that they have not sufficiently taxed the big interests and the moneyed men, I care not whether they be farmers or any other class. In this country that work has not been done as well in any sense as in the little colony of New Zealand or in Australia. If it could be successfully done there, I see no reason why it could not be done here, if proper efforts had been made.

A moment ago I spoke of the farmers' platform. They believe in direct taxation, but they do not believe in free trade. Mr. Chipman and his lieutenant told me, "No, we do not believe in free trade." They propose taking the duty off a few articles which they want. That is what I call the height of class legislation. I will just read from their platform:

> And whereas the protective tariff has fostered combines, trusts and "gentlemen's agreements" in almost every line of Canadian industrial enterprise, by means of which the people of Canada—both urban and rural— have been shamefully exploited through the elimination of competition, the ruination of many of our smaller industries and the advancement of prices on practically all manufactured goods to the full extent permitted by the tariff—

And here is where I say they are unfair:

Therefore be it resolved, that the Canadian Council of Agriculture, representing the organized farmers of Canada, urges that, as a means of remedying these evils and bringing about much needed social and economic reforms, our tariff laws should be amended as follows:

That all foodstuffs not included in the Reciprocity Agreement be placed on the free list.

That agricultural implements, farm machinery, vehicles, fertilizers, coal, lumber, cement, illuminating fuel and lubricating oils be placed on the free list, and that all raw materials and machinery used in their manufacture also be placed on the free list.

I asked Mr. Crerar and his lieutenant why the manufacturer who makes these things should be placed in a different position from that of any other manufacturer, and why a labourer should have to pay duty on all that he buys?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am trying to follow the honourable gentleman. Is he in favour of abolishing the duties?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I am not. I am now reading from the platform of the Council of Agriculture of the three western provinces.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman does not advocate what he reads.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I said in the beginning that I was not a free trader, and I say now, just as strongly, that I am not in favour of the privileged class that high protection has given to this country. I say the tariff is too high; it should be reduced. There should be a compromise, as I have stated time and time again, between the interests and agriculture. They should come together. You ask me if I am in favour of these articles being free. I am not. I will go further than that. I had the honour, about 1907, when Mr. Fielding brought down the tariff, to move that the duty on agricultural implements, that is, mowers and binders, be reduced. The items in the tariff are always indicated by numbers, and I think the number of the item is 455. I moved that that clause be amended by reducing the duty to 10 per cent. Well, it is 12½ now; it has been reduced nearly to what I moved for, and I think it is fair. I am not asking for a further reduction. I claim the farmers have no right to ask that these things be made free, for we must have a revenue.

I am wearying you, honourable gentlemen, but I am deeply interested in this question and I would like to point out that there are in my opinion better ways of raising money than by the tariff. There must be a tariff, but my contention is that it should be a tariff for revenue only.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: You are like the Liberals: for revenue only.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Like the devil?

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Like the Liberals.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I say that when we get the duty reduced to 12½ per cent it is low enough, and the farmers should be willing to pay that. Without desiring to boast, I may say that I have farmed extensively in Manitoba and have bought a great many agricultural implements, and I believe it is our duty to pay our part of the taxes and we should be quite willing to do so. I knew that my contentions would not satisfy this honourable House, and I feel perfectly certain that I shall not satisfy the district from which I come, for I strongly maintain that we must to a certain extent protect our industries. I repeat, though, that the industries have taken advantage of us. Sir John Macdonald has been quoted by some honourable gentlemen here. When Sir John Macdonald drew up his National Policy, what did he say? My honourable friends over there will remember that he said it was "to assist struggling industries." Those were his very words. These industries have apparently been "struggling" ever since, to judge by the way they have kept up the tariff. All I ask is that there be a compromise.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman if farm tractors are not free?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Up to $1,400 they are free, and it was a good move to make them so. I do not know when that step was taken. My honourable friend's question reminds me of something I had been forgetting. The Tories, you know, are called the high protectionists, and the Liberals free traders, but what Mr. Drury and the farmers are going to find out is that there is a great difference between standing on the outside looking in, and being on the inside and administering. Our friends over there found that out in 1896. They were about as far advanced in respect to free trade when they held their convention in 1893 as the farmers are at present.

Sir Richard Cartwright, Mr. Fielding, and Mr. Clifford Sifton were free traders then. Mr. Sifton came out to Winnipeg and told us: "We are going to give you free agricultural implements, free coal oil," etc. I believe that Mr. Fielding was sincere. I have always had the highest respect for him. He is a man of wonderful ability, and I have always listened to him with the greatest pleasure. But when Mr. Fielding was entrusted with the responsibility of administering this great country, he burned the midnight oil trying to apply the principle of free trade, but he found it could not be done. And that is what Mr. Drury's government or any other government in Canada will find. There is a vast difference between a platform on which to attain to power and a platform on which the country can be successfully governed.

Before closing I desire to discuss the question of direct taxation. The farmer seems to believe in that. He says he does not believe in having a tariff to raise a revenue when it puts only one dollar into the treasury while putting three dollars into the manufacturer's pocket. That is his argument, and it is the old one. I have frequently asked for an explanation. Not long ago I asked a very prominent protectionist in the House if he would kindly explain that to me, but when you ask men such a question they become peevish. They are either unable or unwilling to explain.

Our Government and the Finance Minister were slow and reluctant in adopting direct taxation, and after five years of war, indirect taxation in the shape of customs and excise continues to provide the greater proportion of the revenue of the Dominion. Not so in the United States; not so in England; not so in Australia or in New Zealand. Practically the total cost of the war has been defrayed from borrowing, and the proceeds of new direct taxes have scarce been sufficient to meet the increase in consolidated account expenditures due to added interest, pension charges, and the increased cost of administration; for the cost of administration did increase very considerably during the war. It was the boast of the former Minister of Finance, Sir Thomas White, that Canada had the highest excess profits tax in the world. I do not know how he made that out. It was his further boast that Canada had received tremendous orders for war materials, and that the greater porportion of her own war expenditure was spent in Canada. That is true; and let me say here, before I forget it, that the position of Canada was very different from that of New Zealand and Australia, which are so far away from Europe. Shipping in Australia and New Zealand was so scarce, and the difficulty of transporting munitions or any other products from those countries to England was so great that Canada was placed in an advantageous position. In spite of those boasts, the surprising fact remains that from the beginning of the war until the end of the fiscal year 1918-19, Canada, in income tax and excess profits taxes, mulcted the war-made wealth of the country to the insignificant total of about eighty million dollars, or an amount scarce sufficient to defray the expenses of the war for three months.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: How much?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Eighty million dollars. Less than $100,000,000 out of the big interests for taxes.

Let us for a moment consider Australia and New Zealand for the purpose of making a little comparison. I have obtained some figures from a reliable source and I think that they are practically correct. Owing to their distance from the theatre of war and the shortage of shipping, Australia and New Zealand were probably worse off, instead of being better off, financially for the war. Yet those two countries took advantage of the war to adopt direct taxation to a far greater extent than did Canada. Now, I am not going to quote all the figures I have. In New Zealand, for 1914, the customs and excise amounted to £3,500,000, and the income tax to £554,000. The total from these and other revenues, such as death duties, amounted to nearly £6,000,000. I have here a table showing the figures for the years 1914 to 1918, but I will not detain the House with them. In 1918 the customs and excise revenue amounted to £3,601,000. There is not much difference. But the income tax, which in 1914 was £554,271, had increased in 1918 to £5,600,000, or $28,000,000. That was a pretty good increase for New Zealand.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is more than in Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Yes, more than in Canada.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And New Zealand has only one-eighth of the population of Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: It will be seen from the figures that during the four years of the war (from 1914 to 1918, inclusive), New Zealand collected in income taxes a total of nearly £12,000,000, or $55,000,000.

Hon Mr. NICHOLLS: Do those figures show what proportion of the income taxes was paid by the farmers of New Zealand?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: No; I cannot state what was the amount of income taxes paid by the farmers. I have only the figures showing the total income taxes paid in New Zealand. There is no distinction between the farmers and other classes of the population.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What income was exempt in New Zealand?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I cannot tell you that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: There couldn't have been any exemption.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I think I understand what my honourable friend is driving at, if I may use that expression. That point has been answered to a certain extent in this way, which does not satisfy me: That New Zealand has only one income tax-whereas in some of the Canadian provinces there are separate income taxes, municipal or provincial. But if you make the calculation you will find that the total revenue derived from income taxes does not come anywhere near the amount that has been collected in New Zealand. Their income tax during the first four years of the war amounted, as I have said, to $55,000,000. New Zealand's population, according to the census of 1916, was 1,099,449, or about one-eighth the population of Canada. On the basis of population, Canada during the four years mentioned should have collected on income, or other taxes on wealth, a total of $472,000,000. As a matter of fact, Canada during these years collected nothing in income taxes, and on war profits only the insignificant sum of $33,777,000, or over $20,000,000 less than New Zealand, with only one-eighth of the population, and with few war orders, collected in income taxes.

Granting that the figures I am giving you are approximately correct, is it not a wonderful showing? That is why I claim that this Government, for some reason which I do not understand, but must leave them to explain, have not dealt as they should with the big interests and the men who have made excessive profits out of the war.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Notwithstanding that, I repeat that, so far as the conduct of the war and the care of the soldiers are concerned, the Government have done splendidly and deserve the greatest meed of praise that this country can give. But in the matter of taxing the big interests, I say the Government have fallen down. I may be wrong, but that is my opinion.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: What would the honourable gentleman suggest?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I would suggest just what is being done in England now. The British Government are getting after such men. They are exempting £25,000, and for the wife £1,000, and for each child £500.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: That would exempt nine out of every ten persons in this country.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I am not saying the exemption should be the same, but I do say that while our men were bleeding in France, the great interests had no right to be free from the obligation to contribute some of their money to reduce the debt of this country. That is exactly my point.

In 1918 alone New Zealand raised from income a total of $28,000,000, as I have said. Canada's revenue from taxation, and the proportion which it bears to the total taxes, are set forth in a table which I have, but I will not give in detail. Customs and excise, which furnished 100 per cent of the revenue from taxes (exclusive of Chinese revenue) during 1914 and 1915, still furnished over 80 per cent of it in 1919. The business profits tax furnished only 14 per cent of it.

In 1914 we raised in customs and excise $126,143,000; from business profits nil; from income nil; from banks, trust companies, etc., nil—a total of $126,143,000.

In 1915 the total raised by taxation was $97,519,000, and there was no revenue from business profits or from income, or banks and trust companies.

In 1916 we raised $121,000,000 by customs and excise; no business tax, and no income tax.

In 1917, when we were getting well on into the war, when we had made large quantities of munitions and believed we were making a very large profit, we took the enormous sum of $12,500,000 in business profits tax, and nothing from income.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No income tax?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: No, not in 1917.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Oh, yes, there was in 1917.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: We paid it in 1918. It was in 1918 that the first income tax was paid in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I beg the honourable gentleman's pardon. I know I paid an income tax in 1917.

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY: Based on 1917.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Based on 1917.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It was paid in 1918, for 1917.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: In 1918 the revenue from customs and excise was $170,568,000; from business profits $21,271,000; and the amount of income taxes is not stated here.

In 1919 we paid $189,000,000 in customs, $33,000,000 in business tax, $9,349,000 in income tax.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Only $9,000,000?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: That would be for 1918, I presume.

There is another argument brought up by the Government. At least I have heard it brought up by Sir Thomas White, a gentleman for whom I have great respect, and whom everybody recognizes as a first-class business man, a man of great ability. As any person who has sat in the House of Commons knows, Sir Thomas White had not much faith in introducing the income tax. It was pretty difficult to get him to introduce it at all, for he always used the argument that the cost of administration would be nearly as much as the revenue received from it. That does not seem to have been the case in the United States, Australia or New Zealand. Australia did not adopt the income tax until 1915 or 1916; so it was nearly as new to them as to us. New Zealand and the United States had an income tax for a long while, and there had been an income tax in Great Britain for a great many years. If you speak to financiers to-day about our revenue from income tax, they say: " Oh, it is a new thing. It will take time to get it established." I recognize that, but I think we have been altogether too slow in getting after those who owe the tax, and in collecting it.

During the first years of the operation of the income tax in Australia, the Commonwealth collected a total of nearly £4,000,000 or $19,000,000. The second year a total of $28,000,000 was collected. In the third year, this tax brought to the treasury a total of nearly $37,000,000. In the three years the total collected by the Commonwealth in income taxes was $84,701,000. The population of Australia according to the census of 1917, was 4,935,311, including aborigines, or about five-eighths that of Canada. In the three years Canada, on the basis of her population and in proportion to Australia's proceeds, should have collected $135,522,000. As a matter of fact she collected nothing at all on incomes during those three years, and only $33,777,000 in business profits taxes, or $50,000,000 less than Australia, with only five-eighths of the population, collected in income taxes. Australia's first war profits tax was collected in 1917, and netted $3,400,000. So much for Australia and New Zealand. Human nature is very much the same the world over. If a certain thing can be done in New Zealand or Australia, while perhaps we cannot do exactly as they have done, there is no reason why we cannot do very nearly the same.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Did they publish the lists in New Zealand?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Does the hon. gentleman mean, did they publish the name of every man who paid the tax? I could not tell him that. That should be done.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Can the honourable gentleman tell us upon what basis the tax was collected?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I cannot. I have simply taken the figures showing what they raised.

A further comparison in the tapping of wealth and the adoption of direct taxation may be gathered from the United States revenue figures. In 1915 corporation and individual incomes contributed only about $80,000,000 to the Treasury. In 1919 they contributed over two and a half billions.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: That is something new that was introduced?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I suppose so.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Income tax?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not believe it.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: I should like to ask the honourable gentleman if the increases of the income tax in Canada has not been upon as great a ratio as the increase in the United States?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: If these figures are correct, I would think not.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Does the honourable gentleman know if money contributed to the Red Cross, and other things of that description, are exempt from taxation in New Zealand, Australia, or the United States?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I do not know.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: That would amount to many millions of dollars.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: No, about $100,000,000. I think the figures I give include patriotic contributions. If any honourable gentleman has better information I should be glad to have it.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: There were contributions to many societies here.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I think the Patriotic and the Red Cross funds were the principal ones.

Canada's population is about one-thirteenth that of the United States, therefore, on the basis of population, we should have collected $200,000,000 in taxes on wealth during the year.

I must apologise, honourable gentlemen, for having taken so long. I had no intention of speaking at such great length. I repeat again that I believe the industries of this country should be protected; at the same time, I believe that they have been protected to too great an extent. Too much money has been raised by custom tax, and too little from the wealth of the country. That is practically the only criticism that I have to make of the Union Government. I believe that no body of men could have worked more earnestly, or with greater success during the war than these men; but now that the war is over there must be a reduction in the customs duties, and more money must be raised from wealth, or in some other way.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: As the honourable gentleman has given us so much food for thought, I would ask that the debate be adjourned until Tuesday next, to-morrow not being a day of labour.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There are several honourable gentlemen who desire to speak on the subject, and who are ready to proceed now.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Very well.

Hon. J. J. DONNELLY: Honourable gentlemen, I do not rise for the purpose of making any remarks that might be dignified by the name of a speech. I had no intention of speaking on the Address; I have no notes, as honourable gentlemen may see, and I have made no preparation. I wish to refer for two or three minutes to some of the remarks made by the honourable gentleman from Manitoba (Hon. Mr. Schaffner); but while on my feet I feel disposed to refer to what was said by the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), yesterday, and to the line of argument advanced by gentlemen of the Opposition, both in this and in the other Chamber.

There has been a good deal of speculation in the House and about its corridors as to why the line of argument has been taken that Quebec does not desire to be consulted by this Government, or, as I might say, by any one. Although I have been somewhat at a loss to know why such a statement should be made, I am going to express what in my opinion is the reason. It is this. It is getting to be pretty well understood that the next general election will be fought out on the tariff issue. Those who have been watching events closely know that industries have been going into the province of Quebec very rapidly during the last few years. Those who advocated protection told us that if we kept at it long enough the Americans would come over with their money and skill and would develop industries. We are learning now that that is what has happened in Quebec, largely owing, I think to the favourable labour conditions there. Some of our friends on the other side, what might be called a solid Quebec, are commencing to think that the new condition may result in a division of the votes polled in that province in the next election; and in order to head that off, and because of a feeling of pride of race, they desire to continue a solid Quebec.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY: The honourable gentleman from Manitoba (Hon. Mr. Schaffner) outlined at great length the many resources and advantages of the Maritime Provinces, the province of Quebec, the province of Ontario, and the province of British Columbia; but I was somewhat surprised to hear a man who has lived so long in the West, and who, I believe, has made a fortune there, give such a dismal report of the three Prairie Provinces. He says that owing to the drouth and the wind blowing down their grain, they make no money in growing grain. How any Government could devise a policy that would overcome the great difficulties under which the West is labouring, according to the honourable gentleman, I am at a loss to know.

The honourable gentleman has told us that the people of Canada make no money raising cattle, and gives us as his authority for that statement a certain Mr. Morrison, Secretary of the U.F.O. I happened to read in a local newspaper that Mr. Morrison was speaking to a number of farmers in Ontario, and he was credited with the statement that there was not a farm in Ontario that was paying the interest on the investment. I am surprised that an intelligent audience should listen to that line of argument. If he were to compare the condition of the farmers of Western Ontario to-day with their condition ten years ago, we would find that they are fairly wealthy.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Does Ontario export any cattle?

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY: I will deal with that question in a moment or two. The honourable gentleman also said that there was no money in raising cattle, because cattle are not exported. Conditions are very different to-day to what they were when cattle were largely exported. I remember that at that time the very finest cattle raised were exported to the old country, and the poorest were eaten in this country. To-day things are different, and that Ontario is the market for the best cattle. A large quantity of meat is being shipped from that province. If you go on the Toronto market to-day you will find that what is being exported is a class of cattle usually called canners. I am well aware that there is no large export trade in live cattle, but there is a large trade in meat, not only from Ontario, but from all parts of Canada.

My honourable friend has said that the rural population in the province of Ontario has been decreasing. That is quite true; but I have never felt like admitting that that was any evidence of a lack of prosperity on the part of the farmers. I am speaking from my knowledge of conditions in Western Ontario. Great advances have been made in farming methods, and many of our people have gone into stock-raising and have made money. With improved machinery and so much land used for grazing purposes, it does not require much more labour now to operate three or four hundred acres than it did to operate a hundred acres a few years ago. The result is that where a family formerly occupied only fifty or a hundred acres, to-day they occupy three or four hundred acres. That largely accounts for the decrease in the rural population.

My honourable friend had something to say about the packers of Ontario. I have no brief to speak for them, and in doing so I realize that I am taking a very unpopular stand. Owing to a certain propaganda, a great many of the people have the idea that the packers are pirates. I do not think that is the case. I do not think you would find anything to justify that view. I have had some experience with a lumbering firm who buy their meat direct from the packers, and I know that they can buy meat from the packers cheaper than they can buy it from the farmers in their immediate vicinity. Why is that? It is owing to the efficiency of the methods of the packers. They are able to remove the hides in a much more economical way, and they use the by-products more advantageously. The packers are not charging excessive prices. The middlemen may be. The packers, owing to the great volume of the business they do, derive great incomes, but their actual percentage of profit is not so enormous as one might think.

The honourable gentleman has referred to the question of taxation. I think there is just a possibility of raising the income tax or the business profits tax to such an extent that it will defeat its own object. I will try to give an illustrartion of what I mean. Honourable gentlemen are all aware of the very high price of lumber in Ontario to-day. Many people wonder why prices have advanced so rapidly. I am going to give one explanation which I think is pretty well founded. We all know that for many years a great deal of southern oak has been brought into this country for use in connection with the furniture trade and for finishing the interiors of houses. The price of the oak has advanced very rapidly, being to-day about three times what it was three years ago. Owing to the advanced price of oak, our manufacturers have had to turn to domestic woods, and this has had the effect of increasing the price of our own hardwoods. You may say that increased taxation has nothing to do with that, but I am going to try to show that it has. The oak in the Southern States is largely held by fairly wealthy companies. They have to pay a very high business profits tax. They bought that timber for perhaps $5 an acre, and they find, when the Government accountants go over their books, that they will allow them credit for only $5 an acre for that timber. To put it briefly, the result is that if these people cut the oak and sell it at the present high prices, they will have to pay out practically all that it is worth, so they prefer to let it stand until conditions change. That, I believe, is responsible in a large measure for the increased price of oak to-day, and is just one evidence that taxation may defeat the object aimed at.

I sympathize with what my honourable friend has said in regard to the farmers' movement. I think that the farmers have just as much right to organize as any other class in this country; but, as a farmer, I do not think it is right or proper for any class to attempt to take to themselves the business of carrying on the affairs of this country. I have never seen a Government which was not prepared at any time to do what it believed was in the best interest of the farmers, if their case was properly presented. I think the farmers would be justified in organizing, and trying to find out what was in their interest, and then presenting their claim in the best possible way; and I am sure that they would receive just as favourable consideration as any other class of the community.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Tanner, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

QUORUM OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

On the motion for concurrence in the first report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce:

Hon. WM. ROCHE: Before that motion is carried I beg leave to record my respectful protest against the proceeding of the honourable gentlemen of the committee in reducing the number constituting the quorum beyond what would be a proper representation of the House. By and by the custom will be for the Chairman to bring in a recommendation that the committee be reduced to one, and that he be that one. The House has confidence in a large representative committee for dealing with such matters as banking and commerce, and railways, telegraphs and harbours. Gentlemen may wish to be present at the deliberations of the committee and to present their views, and I do not think that they should be excluded. Some of those gentlemen have experience in the banking and commerce and the various other Bills that are presented to the committee. I think it is a wrong sort of movement to reduce the number below what would be a proper representation of the various interests. There should be brought to the deliberations of the committee the mature judgment of a number of private members of the House.

CRIMINAL CODE (FRENCH VERSION) AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. BLONDIN presented Bill C, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, French version.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill provides for certain corrections which have been made in the translation from the English into the French version.

The Bill was read the first time.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION BILL.

Bill E, an Act to amend the Technical Education Act.—Hon. Mr. Robertson.

HALIFAX GRAVING DOCK.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS moved:

1. That an Order of the Senate do issue for all correspondence, reports, documents, etc., between any department of the Government and other persons regarding the expropriation of the property at Halifax of the Halifax Graving Dock Company, Limited, and the transfer of same to Halifax Shipyards, Limited.
2. For all correspondence, reports, etc., in connection with Order in Council, P.C. 56, of January 15, 1918.
3. For all correspondence, reports, etc., in connection with Order in Council, P.C. 1291, of May 27, 1918.

The motion was agreed to.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 4, consideration of the motion for an Address in reply to His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Hon. CHARLES E. TANNER: Honourable gentlemen, yesterday afternoon we had the pleasure of listening to a very exhaustive and very interesting address by the honourable member for Boissevain (Hon. Mr. Schaffner). With some parts of his address I should be disposed to agree; with other parts I should not feel like concurring. However, it is not my intention this afternoon to delay the House with any general review of the honourable gentleman's discussion of public affairs, nor, in fact, with any general review of the debate so far as it has proceeded up to this time.

There are one or two observations, however, that I should like to make with reference to the remarks of my honourable friend. If I understood him correctly, he referred to what he called the "privileged class," or the "privileged classes" of this country. Now, I submit, with all deference, that there is no such thing as a privileged class in this country, and that it does not make for the cohesion or the betterment of the country as a whole for any honourable member of this House, or of any House, or, in fact, any person, to endeavour to impress upon the public mind the view that one person is better than another, or that any man has greater rights or more privileges than his neighbour. No person in this country is enjoying privileges over his neighbour. I take it for granted, from the tenor of the honourable gentleman's remarks, that he has in mind the impression that there are people who enjoy privileges under the customs tariff; that is to say that the policy of protection, as we have had it in this country, extends privileges to some people which it does not extend to others. In answer to that, if that was what was in his mind, I want to say that in my judgment his view was entirely erroneous. The National Policy, as we have understood it since 1878, was purely a Canadian policy; designed not merely to assist manufacturing, but to build up the whole country. It applies to every man, whether he be an investor in a manufacturing industry; or whether he be a labourer in a manufacturing industry; whether he be a shopkeeper selling goods to the manufacturer, or a farmer, who finds his ready and profitable market in the manufacturing districts. It does not extend privileges to one more than to another. The National Policy is widespread and benefits every one.

My honourable friend touched upon the question of profiteering. I submit that there is entirely too much general discussion in that regard without any concrete facts being put forward. It may be true, probably it is true, that here and there some men engaged in industry have taken advantage of the situation during the war time, and have gained undue profits. But that cannot be alleged only against the men who are conducting the manufacturing industries of this country. Relatively it can just as truly be alleged against the men employed in those industries. All of us know that during the war, when business was on the upward trend, and when development was going on on a large scale, the workingman was receiving two, or three, or four, or five times the wages he formerly received. I know that in Nova Scotia men were receiving almost fabulous pay. Relatively speaking, they might be called profiteers. The same might be said of the farmers, who were receiving enhanced prices for their products —butter, eggs, hay and grain But I would not call them profiteers, even although in the eastern part of Canada to-day we have to pay $15 a barrel for flour, made, perhaps, from grain raised on the farm of my honourable friend. I would not call my honourable friend a profiteer, nor do I think he should so describe the man who makes steel or any other product because he made increased profits.

The West naturally looks upon the manufacturing industries in this part of the country, and, as my honourable friend did yesterday, calls them the "big interests." We in the East look to the West and see this gigantic organization of the grain growers, which has within its bounds a multitude of men, and which, I am told, has very large sums of money invested. We might be disposed to say they are are the big interests. I know that their representatives came down the other day to organize in Nova Scotia. They brought the cash box with them, and were ready to dump into the establishment of a newspaper the tidy sum of $12,500. In the locality in which I live we would have to search, and search again, to raise that sum of money to put it into a newspaper.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: And then we would fail to find it.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: And they expected the farmers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to dig down in their pockets to find a further sum of $12,500.

The view I take is that, instead of endeavouring to widen any breach that may exist, it should be the duty of every man in public life, particularly in this House, to endeavour to bring the West and the East together. We in the East need the flour and the grain of the West; and the people of the West need the products of the East. Coming up on the train only the other day, a manufacturer from Amherst told me that he was endeavouring to build up the manufacture of a tractor, which he said he was taking out to the western country, where he believed he would be successful in placing it on the market. We want an interchange of products and goodwill between the East and the West. We have statesmen who will be able to deal with any difficulty that might cause division between us, and who will be able to bring us together and make us what we can be—a great country, united from shore to shore.

My honourable friend referred to the question of taxation. I do not want to be understood as speaking of the remarks of the honourable gentleman in a critical sense, because I appreciate very highly the research that he made, and the illuminating address that he delivered. The men who are leading this agrarian movement in the various provinces deal very lightly with the important question of the finances of the country. With a wave of the hand they would sweep away the $160,000,000 of customs duties which come into the treasury of Canada; and, with another wave of the hand, they say, "We can easily raise the money by income tax, or a tax on land," or by some other negligible method. In my judgment, those gentlemen, before expecting their arguments to prevail in this country, should be prepared to come down to concrete facts, and to show the people of this country how, if they were placed in the responsible positions of Government, they would provide the money that now comes from the customs duty. What they have done is all very easy. I could go abroad, any honourable member could go abroad, and stand on platforms, as these gentlemen have done, and make the pronouncement they have made. But I venture to say that if these gentlemen were in responsible positions, facing the problems of government, and had to find revenue, they would not talk so glibly about laying on taxes here and there. I have never observed these gentlemen when talking about direct taxation, taking into account the very important fact that in this Dominion we have nine provinces, and that every one of them, as well as the municipalities, cities, and towns in them, already impose a very heavy direct tax. In the province from which I come, in every town and in every city, there is a pretty high rate of personal taxation. There is taxation upon the real and personal property of the people; taxation upon the household furniture; taxation upon the stocks of goods which the merchants have; and in the municipalities, cities and towns, there is in addition a direct income tax, sometimes running, as it does in my own town, as high as 3 per cent. These gentlemen seem to overlook the fact that these provinces must be maintained and that practically the only source of revenue which many of them have is direct taxation, taxation upon land, personal taxes and income tax—and, in all probability these weighty loads upon the citizens will grow unless the Federal Government dips into the treasury and gives more subsidies, which it is not very likely to do in the near future. So, when any gentleman talks about imposing a heavier federal income tax and a tax upon land, it is his duty to consider the load now laid upon the shoulders of the people by the various Provincial Governments and municipalities. Inasmuch as I did not intend to take part in this debate, I have not had time to look into conditions in the other provinces. But I have in my possession a memorandum of what we pay in Nova Scotia, and as I think the facts contained in it are somewhat illuminating on this side of the subject, I am going to read it to the House. The banks in Nova Scotia are taxed from $250 to $1,000 each, plus $50 to $100 on each branch. Loan and trust companies, telegraph, telephone, gas, electric, and express companies are taxed from $250 to $350. Insurance companies are taxed one per cent of their gross premiums. Theatres are taxed. Insurance agents have to take out licenses and pay a yearly tax. Then, in cities and towns, we have a highway tax of one-tenth of one per cent; and in the municipalities 40 cents on $100. Persons holding land to the extent of 500 acres or over pay one per cent. Probate fees, registry of deeds fees, prothonotaries and other official fees have been increased 50 per cent since the war. Out of the total the Provincial Government takes one-third. The succession duties have been increased. We have upon the statute books of Nova Scotia an Income Tax Act which may be brought into operation at any moment. Under that Act upon incomes of between $1,000 and $3,000 the rate will vary from one-half of one per cent to one per cent. On top of that there will be a supertax on incomes of $6,000 and over of from one-half of one per cent to 12½ per cent. Above that again, on incomes of $6,000 and over, there is a surtax of from 1¼ per cent to 8¾ per cent. It will be seen that with these taxes and the taxes that I have already referred to, the rates will run from two to three, and sometimes up to 4 per cent. I give these facts because I think that my honourable friend from Boissevain (Hon. Mr. Schaffner) and other gentlemen who discuss the question of taxation, should not overlook the important point that, if additional federal taxes are imposed, the people of this country will be loaded down with taxes.

There is just one other point that I was going to refer to. If I understood my honourable friend from Boissevain, he criticised some honourable gentlemen on the other side because they were too impatient with the Government for not having made more progress, and because they seemed to forget that this country has been engaged in war. The question of customs duties and taxation in this country is a very important one, and I think my honourable friend's suggestion to honourable gentlemen opposite applies with great force. We must all remember that this country is only now emerging from the conditions of war, and that we have not really attained a condition of stability. It is too soon to expect this Government to have everything in the house set in order. Although the members of the Government are all able men, as I understand, we must give them reasonable time to deal with these very important questions. I have confidence enough in them to believe that in due course, without any unreasonable delay, the Government of the day will take up the important question of tariff and taxation and will be able to give this country a solution which will be satisfactory to the whole nation from East to West.

There appears to be on the other side of the House a good deal of uncertainty, a good deal of trepidation, if I may use the word, in reference to the constitutional situation of this country. Some honourable gentlemen appear to think that there is danger that the moorings may be cut, and we may leave the Mother Country and cease to be a part of the great British Empire. So far as I understand the situation—and I want to be very brief in this regard—I see no danger ahead whatever. When a young man grows up in his father's house, gains in strength and wisdom, and comes to the age of discretion, the father instead of treating him as a boy who is told to do this and that, defers to him a little; and as years go by he defers to him a little more, and finally takes him into consultation in regard to his business affairs as a full partner. So, as I see it, this Dominion has been growing and developing, not only materially, but mentally as well. As a country we have been expanding until we have arrived at the time when we are no longer told by Downing street what we must do to-day and what we must do to-morrow, but Downing street, on the other hand, sends word over to us and asks us: "What do you people in Canada desire? How would you like to have these matters conducted in regard to the Empire of which we are all proud, and in which we are all full partners?" That is the situation, very briefly, as I understand it, and there is not the slightest menace to the autonomy, the independence, or the rights of the people of Canada in this respect.

I will read to the House just one paragraph from the letter of a very distinguished statesman, whose word, I am sure, will be accepted even by honourable gentlemen opposite. I refer to Lord Grey. In his letter on the subject of the League of Nations, under discussion at Washington he made this statement, which I think covers the ground absolutely and completely:

> There is one particular reservation which must give rise to some difficulty in Great Britain and the self-governing Dominions. It is that which has reference to the six British votes in the Assembly of the League of Nations. The self-governing Dominions are full members of the league. They will admit, and Great Britain can admit, no qualifications whatever of that right. Whatever the self-governing Dominions may be, in the theory and the letter of the constitution, they have in effect ceased to be colonies in the old sense of the word. They are free communities, independent as regards all their own affairs, and partners in those which concern the Empire at large.

I think, honourable gentlemen, that nothing further need be said on that aspect of the matter.

Honourable gentlemen, I do not think I should have intervened in this debate had it not been for the speech, the remarkable speech, delivered the other day by the honourable member from the division of De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand). I must confess that I was surprised. The honourable gentleman adjourned the debate, and he came back on the following day with a very carefully prepared address, which he read to this House. Having some knowledge of his long experience in parliamentary matters and his prominence in the great province from which he comes, I looked for an address which would be helpful to this country, which would be of assistance to us in the great work in which we are now engaged—the reconstruction and the upbuilding of Canada. I confess that I was very greatly disappointed when I discovered in the mentality which was running through that speech from the first word he uttered until the close, nothing but the narrowest and bitterest kind of partisanship I want to join with my honourable friend who spoke yesterday (Hon. Mr. Schaffner) in saying that, although we have all, I suppose, gone through the fires of partisanship, yet when we come to this Chamber, we should at any rate try to forget those old feuds and old fights. We should remember that we are an independent Chamber, that we are here to take under review the whole of this country, and to bend our energies and contribute our mite to the work of making Canada the great country which we all hope and expect it will be. As I have said, there was nothing but partisanship in the honourable gentleman's (Hon. Mr. Dandurand's) speech. He is an able man, an able speaker, has had long experience in public life; is familiar with the conditions of this country, present and past, and should have some vision in regard to the future. I reflected upon his remarks in order to discover if I could, the reason why he delivered so inappropriate an address, and the only conclusion I could come to was that the honourable gentleman was making what we used to call, when I was in the rough-and-tumble of politics, a political campaign speech, for publication in the province from which he comes.

My honourable friend on the front bench (Hon. Mr. Pope), who spoke after him, mentioned the fact that he comes from the same province. I hope I may be regarded as able to look at this turmoil which has been going on for many years between Quebec and Ontario, through glasses which are not discoloured—to take, in fact, an independent view of the situation. In these days we in Nova Scotia take very little stock indeed in these recriminatory remarks which are made by the political leaders, or some of the political leaders, in both Ontario and Quebec. There was a time when the feuds between these provinces on various local questions seemed to be the only issues which should engage the attention of the people of this great country. The gentlemen who are endeavouring to perpetuate that situation, by continuing those unprofitable discussions and unprofitable allegations, one against the other, forget that this country has grown and conditions have changed, and that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, important as they may be, do not constitute the whole of Canada. There is a great and growing West. These gentlemen forget that. The Maritime Provinces are not going behind, nor are they losing interest in public questions. I would have these gentlemen understand that their domestic squabbles, which years ago occupied so big a place in the public eye, are to-day regarded with very little concern by the people of the West and the people of the Maritime Provinces.

The honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) undertook to give us some information in regard to the province of Quebec and the Union Government. He told us that the province of Quebec spurned Union Government and that Sir Robert Borden bedevilled the province of Quebec. I take issue with my honourable friend in respect to these matters. I do not believe that the province of Quebec spurns Union Government. I am sure that Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not wholly and absolutely spurn it. My honourable friend would have us believe that when Sir Robert Borden suggested the organization of a Union Government, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and other Liberals, point blank, without a moment's consideration, waved him back —gave him to understand that they would have nothing to do with it. What are the facts in regard to Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself? On the 24th of May, he tells us, he was invited to a conference with Sir Robert Borden on the question of a Union Government, with conscription as a basis of the union. Did Sir Wilfrid Laurier say at once to Sir Robert Borden, " I will have nothing whatever to do with any such proposition?" My honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) would have us understand that that was practically the situation; and many of his friends, if I read their remarks correctly, would have us believe the same thing. That is not the fact. Sir Wilfrid Laurier received the proposals of Sir Robert Borden on the 24th of May, and he kept them under consideration, and under consultation, by himself and with his friends, until the 6th of June. That was not the action of a man who had already made up his mind that he would not even consider conscription, nor entertain the suggestion to enter into a Union Government. From the fact that he took from the 24th of May until the 6th of June to consider and consult, I infer that if he had received encouragement from men like the inflexible honourable member from De Lorimier, if they had not refused to go with him, Sir Wilfrid Laurier would have accepted the proposal of Sir Robert Borden and there would have come to pass that fact mentioned by my honourable friend from Boissevain (Hon. Mr. Schaffner): Sir Wilfrid Laurier would have made a name for himself greater than the name he possessed. I reason out this situation from the point of view of my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), and I conclude that he and other advisers of Sir Wilfrid Laurier convinced Sir Wilfrid that there could not be in this country Union Government without the province of Quebec; that they convinced themselves, reasoning upon the events of past years since Confederation, that any Government that ever existed must have a representation from the province of Quebec. In that they were mistaken. In that they are mistaken to-day. So far as we in the Maritime Provinces are concerned, we honour and respect the province of Quebec and the people of that province, and we should be proud to see them represented in the Government to-day and in every Government which is formed in Canada.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question? I do not want to interrupt him or be rude, but I would ask him who is representing us in the Maritime Provinces? We have no minister.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: We have a gentleman by the name of Sir Robert Borden, and he is good enough for us. And my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Domville) will find that he will have a good representative from the province of New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: He will, eh?

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I am glad to hear it.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: My honourable friend has lived a long time, and he ought to have a little patience.

While we should be glad to see Quebec representatives of either political party in the Government, they must nevertheless disabuse their minds of the delusion that if they refuse to come in, if they refuse to lend their support to Union Government or any other Government in this country, the people of Ontario, the Maritime Provinces and the great West will not organize governments to carry on the business of this country.

My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) says that Sir Robert Borden bedevilled the province of Quebec. I take issue with that statement. He does not tell us how. I am surprised at his making such a statement; for in another breath he tells us that the province of Quebec is solidly Liberal and therefore has arrived at the stage of perfection. Now, if Sir Robert Borden did anything to bring about that state of perfection, if his bedevilling resulted in the Liberal party becoming a unit and having full control of the province of Quebec, surely my honourable friend should be glad indeed that Sir Robert Borden bedevilled it. I regret that my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) is not here. May I say, with all deference, that the men who have bedevilled the province of Quebec are leaders like the honourable gentleman. The people of Quebec are sound at heart. They are patriotic people, they are industrious, they are energetic, they are progressive; but they have been badly led politically. They have been led by men who did not look to the interest of this country, nor to the development of a sound Canadian patriotism extending from ocean to ocean, but had their hearts set upon the fleshpots of political preferment, and thought more of a political party than they did of their country. Everything that they have been doing has been done for the purpose of solidifying a political party, regardless of what it cost the country. On these grounds, which I think are patent to everybody who investigates public matters in this country, I say that these are the gentlemen who misled the people of Quebec, and if there has been any bedevilling, they are the persons who have done it.

The honourable member (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) also told us that when Sir Robert Borden called in certain leading Liberals they refused to come and serve under him as the leader of a Union Government. That may or may not be true. As to that I have no information. It may be true that men who had long been contending against the political party led by Sir Robert Borden looked with some doubt upon the proposed Union Government, and were not at first willing to accept positions under Sir Robert Borden, as Prime Minister of this country. The complete answer to that is that, no matter what their attitude was at first, some gentlemen from the West, from the province of New Brunswick, the province of Ontario, the province of Nova Scotia—men who are high in the councils of the Liberal party, men who had been honoured, respected, and trusted by the Liberal party—did join hands with Sir Robert Borden and go into the service of the country under him. I do not think, honourable gentlemen, that I need make any further statement in that regard. The fact that these gentlemen served in harmony and with great success under Sir Robert Borden completely demolishes the argument which my honourable friend made in that regard. The Liberal leaders in the province of Nova Scotia met in the city of Halifax. They consulted tomously agreed that Hon. Mr. Maclean should come and join the Union Gov- lean should come and join the Union Government. He came, and he served—and he is still sitting in the ranks of the Union party in the House of Commons.

My honourable friend told us that this Government was a sham Union Government. In what respect is it a sham Union Government? The honourable gentleman did not disclose the grounds upon which he made that statement. If my observation of the Government is correct, I see every evidence of sincerity, every evidence of complete and united action. If we go into the House of Commons we see distinguished Liberals, men whose names have always been known in the Liberal ranks, sitting on the Government benches side by side with Conservatives. Together they form the great Union Government. I was about to say that it was the greatest Government Canada ever had and I do not think I should be exaggerating. I see nothing whatever of sham but much of sincerity.

My honourable friend said that the Government was brainless and headless. I do not think that he stopped to consider before making that statement. I am not going to say one word which would be derogatory to the party of honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House, nor am I going to say anything against my honourable friend himself; I recognize his ability; but while I grant that he has brains and ability, I want to make this reservation: that he does not, nor do his colleagues, possess all the brains or all the ability in this country.

My honourable friend says there has been no leadership. I would ask him if he stands so very much higher than the leader of the Government. He is willing, as some honourable gentlemen are always willing, to make sweeping assertions; but if I put the direct question to him, I am sure he would admit that Sir Robert Borden is a man of outstanding position in this country. If I were to ask my honourable friend if he thinks the Union party in this Chamber is led by a brainless leader, I wonder what he would say. I am sure that he would rise up indignantly to protest, and to tell us that the honourable the leader of this House is, as we all know, one of the ablest men who have ever been in public life in Canada. If I were to pass on the honourable Minister of Labour, I wonder what my honourable friend would say. Would he characterize him as a brainless Minister of Labour? That is what he did in his general assertions. I am sure that again he would rise in his place and tell us that the Minister of Labour is one of the ablest men in the Cabinet to-day; one of the ablest men who has ever occupied the position. I know my honourable friend does not like the Postmaster General. He never did like the Postmaster General. He never had very much respect for him. He knows the Postmaster General is a fighter, and I feel confident that if my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has anything to say about the Postmaster General he generally keeps a good distance off when he says it. Nevertheless, I venture to say that if he were in his seat to-day, and I were to ask him if he would characterize the Postmaster General as a brainless leader, he would not undertake to make good the assertion. There is just one way to examine these general assertions, and that is to get down to details. The details make up the general assertion. If the details are not correct, of course the general assertion is not correct; if the details do not work out, the general assertion falls to the ground. If we go into the other Chamber and look down the ranks of the Government, we will find there Hon. Mr. Doherty and Hon. Mr. Ballantyne, both from the province of Quebec. I wonder if my honourable friend from De Lorimier would also characterize them as brainless leaders? I wonder if he would characterize the other distinguished gentlemen—because there are distinguished gentlemen sitting on the Government benches—as brainless leaders? In conclusion, let me say that my honourable friend in his paroxysm of political partisanship simply made statements of which I believe he would be ashamed if he were to reflect. I believe that he would be, and I believe that he will be ashamed when he reads them; and I do not think he will carry out his intention of having them published in pamphlet form, and scattered broadcast through the province of Quebec, for general consumption by the electors of that province.

There is just one other remark made by my honourable friend from De Lorimier

(Hon. Mr. Dandurand) to which I should like to refer. He said that no French Canadian worthy of the name would serve under Sir Robert Borden. I regard that statement, honourable gentlemen, as almost the climax of political partisanship; I also regard it as very personal and very offensive. I do not know whether my honourable friend would draw a distinction between the mentality, morality or principles of the English-speaking people of this country, and those of the French-speaking people of this country. I think that honourable gentlemen on this side of the House who come from the English-speaking provinces are willing to concede all the respect and honour to which the French Canadian people are entitled. We believe that they are an honourable people, and I think we have the right to expect that they will regard the English-speaking people in the same way. When we find that many men of good character and good standing in the business and social life of the community have been, and are, willing to associate themselves with Sir Robert Borden and serve under him, I want to say that my honourable friend goes a long way when he intimates that no French Canadian worthy of the name would associate himself with Sir Robert or serve under him. The other day my honourable friend paid great respect to our newly-introduced member from Granville (Hon. Mr. Chapais). He spoke of him as a man of very high character and very high standing in the community. The honourable member for Granville is very happy, as I understand it, to come into the House as a supporter of Sir Robert Borden. Would my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) suggest that by so doing the honourable member for Granville is in any way no longer worthy to be regarded as a French Canadian? Would he rule him out of the French Canadian fraternity? The honourable gentleman forgets that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was willing to come into Union Government, and to serve with Sir Robert Borden. I shall prove that by reading a paragraph from a letter which Sir Wilfrid wrote to the Premier on June 6, 1917. This letter, I say, proves conclusively that if the question of conscription had not been involved, Sir Wilfrid Laurier would have been willing to join forces with Sir Robert Borden in forming a Union Government—in other words, in the mind of the honourable gentleman, he would have become unworthy of the name of a French Canadian. This is what Sir Wilfrid Laurier wrote:

> On Wednesday, the 6th of June, the final conference took place, at which I announced that I had not seen my way clear to join the Government on the terms proposed. I asked you at the same time if conscription was the only basis, to which you replied in the affirmative.

That is to be found in the House of Commons Hansard of 1917, at page 2691, and, to my mind, clearly indicates that Sir Wilfrid Laurier would have been willing to demean himself by going in with Sir Robert Borden if conscription had not been the basis of the Union.

Now, I want to read what a very important man in public life to-day says about Sir Robert Borden. The other day Mr. T. A. Crerar, who was once associated with the Government, but who is now the leader of the great agrarian party in this country, made these remarks—

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I do not want to interrupt my honourable friend unnecessarily, but I would call attention to the fact that he is going to read from the Hansard of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Yes, I am. I would not have attempted it if it had not been done by many honourable members on the other side of the House.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The honourable gentleman is an old parliamentarian, and I am sure knows better.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: The honourable gentleman will take notice that I do not read the remarks. I may tell him that I will look to it that no friend of his, on the other side of the House, does so in the future. I have frequently observed that it has been done, and have abstained from taking objection; but now that my honourable friend has so cleverly raised this objection, perhaps I may be allowed to read something that Mr. Crerar said in another place. It is as follows:

> I wish here and now simply to bear testimony to this fact that the Prime Minister of this country carried a burden which very few citizens of Canada appreciated, and discharged the most onerous tasks with a conscientiousness and sense of duty that certainly challenged the respect of those who were intimately associated with him.

That shows the relation that existed between Sir Robert Borden and every Liberal who was associated with him in the Union Government. They may not have trusted him before they joined him; but after they joined him they trusted him implicitly, because they found him to be an honourable man and a great and patriotic Canadian who never let the base concerns of partisanship interfere with his duty to the people of this great country. Therein he differs from the honourable gentleman who spoke the other day; who was brimming over with political partisanship; who could think of nothing but political partisanship; and who could only be happy if he could once more dip his hands into the political flesh pots.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Should not he have a chance with the rest of them?

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Not only in Canada, but the world over, no man stands higher than Sir Robert Borden. He stands high in the councils of the Empire; and no man occupies a higher position in the estimation of the French people at this time; no man is regarded as a greater statesman than he. In the great republic to the south of us I am sure that he stands for uprightness, honour, and greatness in statesmanship. As followers of the Union Government we are proud of him. The honourable gentleman from De Lorimier says that no French Canadian would tarnish himself by following him. We are proud to follow a man who stands head and shoulders, and I think rightly so, over any other political leader in this country. He stands as high as any political leader there ever was in this country, if not higher, and he is the peer of any political leader in the world to-day.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I am about to conclude these remarks which, without much preparation, have of necessity been rambling and longer than I intended to make them. There is just one further remark that I wish to make about the honourable gentleman to whom I have referred. Not only was his speech overflowing with political partisanship, but it was entirely empty of any great suggestion, and absolutely devoid of one substantial idea which would be helpful to the people of this country. Moreover, from beginning to end, there was not one real criticism of the record of the Government of Sir Robert Borden since 1911, or of the Union Government since 1917. The honourable gentleman satisfied himself, as such critics usually do, with general statements. Instead of taking up the Government's record, item by item, and challenging it, he was content with the general statement that the Government had done nothing. It was his duty, if he had any ideas which would tend to the betterment of this country, to make suggestions and recommendations. But he left us without one suggestion, without one idea. Talk about brainless leaders. Talk about headless parties. What kind of head would he make, what kind of leader would he be, when he has nothing to propose, nothing to suggest, but satisfies himself with empty criticisms, and, I may say, violent attack. I want to say in conclusion, honourable gentlemen, that for these reasons I was greatly disappointed indeed with the speech of the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Poirier, the debate was adjourned.

REVISION OF PUNISHMENTS BILL.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS moved the second reading of Bill B, an Act to amend the Criminal Code so as to provide for the revision of excessive or inadequate punishments.

He said: The Bill of which I have the honour to propose the second reading is one which does not require explanation. It passed this honourable body in the year 1918, but unfortunately it passed at a very late hour in the Session and did not reach the House of Commons. Last year the Bill was referred to committee, and after being fully discussed it was again passed by the Senate; but owing to the lateness of the hour it failed to pass the other House. It is unnecessary for me to take up time in discussing this matter again. The Bill is a very simple one. It provides that where a magistrate or a judge has erred in imposing a sentence, application may be made to a Court of Appeal, and if one of the judges of that court considers it is a case for the court to deal with, the court has the right to examine into the facts and decide whether the sentence was a proper one or not. This Bill does not involve the question of appeal in criminal cases; it simply provides for the rectification of any error that may have been made either by a magistrate or by a judge. I am happy to say that in my opinion there will not be many cases in which application will be made, but there is no doubt that grave miscarriages of justice sometimes occur, and according to the methods by which the criminal law is administered in Canada, there is no remedy. Canada is, so far as I know, the only British country in which there is no redress where an error has crept into a criminal trial.

In England there is what is called a Court of Criminal Appeal. It was instituted only a short time ago and it is giving entire satisfaction to the people of England. There the Court of Appeal has very extensive powers. It may not only re-try the case and alter the sentence, but it may also make any order that it thinks justified in the circumstances.

In a great many of the United States—in every state so far as I know—there is a board that revises criminal sentences and has the power to rectify any error that may have occurred.

I believe that this Bill does not go far enough. I think that in Canada we should have a Court of Appeal in criminal matters just as there is in England. Only the day before yesterday I had some business with the Justice Department and was speaking to the gentleman who looks after the system known as the ticket-of-leave, whereby a prisoner may be released from the penitentiary and is required to report to the police. This official told me of a case that had occurred in the adjoining county of Renfrew. A returned soldier stole a case of whiskey. That may be a serious crime. Some honourable members of this House who are prohibitionists might consider it was a good act, removing temptations from the individual. On the other hand, those accustomed to keeping a little in their cellar might look upon that as a very grievous offence. However, in this particular instance, the returned soldier was tried by a magistrate and sentenced to five years in the penitentiary. I need not ask the members of this honourable body whether or not a sentence of five years for a returned soldier who had stolen a case of whiskey was justified. In my opinion it was not. But here is the difficulty: there is no way of correcting that sentence if it is erroneous or too severe. Our code does not permit of the revision of the sentence. It may be said that the Minister of Justice might allow this man to be released on ticket-of-leave; but even so, he would still have that five-year sentence hanging over him.

There are glaring cases of injustice occurring from day to day, and it is largely because of the fact that in the Western Provinces at any rate—I cannot say as to the Eastern—men do not need to be members of the bar, or to have any legal training, in order to be appointed by the Local Government to the office of police magistrate. Very often the magistrates, from lack of experience or some other cause, make very serious mistakes in imposing criminal sentences.

I am asking by this little Bill that with the consent of a judge of the Court of Appeal any erroneous sentences may be revised. I might discuss this matter at much greater length, but as the Bill has already been so thoroughly considered in this House, it is unnecessary for me to do so. I am endeavouring to have the Bill passed at an early date in order that it may reach the House of Commons and be fully discussed there, and that a law may be enacted which will provide some remedy in the cases of injustice that arise so frequently in the administration of criminal law.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The Bill has not yet been printed. Therefore we cannot proceed with the second reading to-day, and it must be deferred until Tuesday next.

The motion for the second reading was postponed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 9, at 3 p.m

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, March 9, 1920.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

MESSAGE OF HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

THE SENATE'S ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

The Hon. the SPEAKER laid before the Senate the following correspondence:

SPEAKER'S CHAMBERS,
OTTAWA, March 4, 1920.

Your Excellency:—

The Senate of Canada has instructed me to submit to His Majesty the King its most grateful acknowledgment of His Majesty's gracious greetings on the occasion of the opening of the new Parliament Buildings.

This Chamber deeply appreciates the interest of His Majesty's family in the Parliament Buildings at Ottawa since a time prior to Confederation, as shown by the selection of the site by Her Majesty Queen Victoria, the laying of the corner stone of the original buildings by King Edward, the corner stone of the present structure by the Duke of Connaught, as well as that of the Main or Peace Tower last year by His Majesty's gallant son, the Prince of Wales.

I have the honour to be, Your Excellency,
Your most obedient humble servant,
JOSEPH BOLDUC,
Speaker of the Senate of Canada.

His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, Ottawa.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, March 5, 1920.

Sir,—I have the honour to thank you for your letter of the 4th instant transmitting the acknowledgment of the Senate of His Majesty's greetings on the occasion of the opening of the new Parliament Buildings. I have cabled this acknowledgment to the Secretary of State for the Colonies in order that it may be humbly laid before His Majesty.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

DEVONSHIRE.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa.

MONETARY EXCHANGE AND OIL PRODUCTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE inquired:

1. Has the Government considered the losses to Canada caused by the present condition of the monetary exchange between Canada and the United States?

2. Does the Government recognize as a fact that were Canada to purchase from the United States fewer goods that this trouble about the monetary exchange would be ameliorated or would perhaps disappear?

3. Are the Government aware that by the development of the oil-yielding shales of Canada the present importation of fuel from the United States may be very largely decreased?

4. If they are aware, what means do the Government intend to take to secure such development?

5. If they are not aware, do they intend to hold any investigations so that this fact may be proven?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: 1 and 2. This is a matter of monetary exchange between the United States and Canada, and is one that cannot be controlled by the action of the Government. 3, 4 and 5. The Government is not charged with the development of these resources.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. RAOUL DANDURAND: I rise to a question of privilege, and I may say that this is the first time in my twenty-two years' experience in this Chamber that I have done so. Last week I delivered a speech on the Address. My honourable friend from Pictou (Hon. Mr. Tanner) replied, unfortunately while I was absent, and my attention has been drawn to a reference which he made to me. He said, speaking of a gentleman who had expressed his high opinion of the Prime Minister:

> Therein he differs from the honourable gentleman who spoke the other day; who was brimming over with political partisanship; who could think of nothing but political partisanship; and who could only be happy if he could once more dip his hands into the political flesh-pots.

I hope that the importance of this expression escaped the attention of the honourable gentleman, because it speaks not only of my desires for the future, but of my past career. I should like to ask him to go thoroughly into that career, and to find, if he can, with the help of his friends, one single instance which would justify such a statement. For his own enlightenment I may say that it has been my privilege to represent the Government abroad more than once in matters appertaining to the public affairs of the country, and that I always refused to submit a statement of my expenses, although I was pressed to do so. If the honourable gentlemen, publicly or privately, should express a desire to see the correspondence establishing that fact I shall be very glad to lay it before him.

I deem it necessary to answer the honourable gentleman, because I believe that his statement imputes unworthy motives to a member of this Chamber. Never in the past have I thought of looking towards the flesh-pots, and I hope it will never enter my mind to do so in the future. My tastes and ambition do not lie in that direction. The honourable gentleman should not have deemed it necessary to impute such motives in order to explain my attitude towards the Government and the party in power. He might have found sufficient enlightenment coming, not from the province of Quebec, but from Ontario, and I would draw his attention to an article which appeared in the Farmer's Sun of the 11th of February last and which explains the attitude of Quebec, and my own attitude. It reads as follows:

> It is funny to hear the big interests making love to Quebec. No Bolshevism there. No demagogues preaching sedition. No labour agitation. A contented, hardworking, thrifty people. A safe and sane province, where you may invest your money at seven per cent in privately owned concerns, unmolested by Government ownership. The finest province of Canada, and a glorious example to the turbulent West, with its organized farmers and labour men.
> It is for the French-Canadian to laugh, perhaps rather bitterly. Only two years ago they were being denounced as slackers and traitors. The whole province was boiling with sedition. The sturdy men of Ontario ought to go down to Quebec and clear the French-Canadians out.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I interrupt the honourable gentleman to raise a point of order? My honourable friend is apparently entering upon another speech, or what would constitute a speech. I fail to understand in what way this is a point of order or why he raises the question of privilege unless it is to renew the declarations which he made the other day in his speech, and which called forth the reply from my honourable friend from Pictou (Hon. Mr. Tanner), who unfortunately is absent today. It would have been in better taste for the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) to have waited until the honourable gentleman from Pictou was present.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I accept the point and do not intend to continue the discussion; but I would draw the attention of my honourable friend to this fact. My intention in rising was not to attack the honourable gentleman from Pictou (Hon. Mr. Tanner), and I am not attacking him: I am simply answering the imputation that is implied in his speech. With that portion of the article which I have read I am content to stop, inasmuch as the point made by my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) may be correctly taken. I desire to add only that the situation which is disclosed by that Ontario paper, with, in addition, the War-time Elections Act, fully explains and justifies the attitude of Quebec and my own attitude towards the present Government.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The Senate resumed from Friday, March 5, consideration of the motion for an Address in reply to His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Hon. P. POIRIER: Honourable gentlemen, it is remarkable what can be found in a Speech from the Throne, even the most non-committal, the most anodyne as that which was delivered to us at the beginning of this Session. We had, first, based upon it two eloquent orations—one from the mover of the Address, remarkable in many ways, but more especially for the broad views he took on public questions; and that of the seconder, one of the most polished orators in this Dominion, who lived up to his reputation. Next, we had the honourable leader of the Opposition in this House, in his usual polished, urbane style, trying hard to find fault with the Government's programme; and, as that programme outlines very little of the Government's policy, contenting itself with pleasant generalities, it was the bounden duty of the honourable leader of the Government to show the bright side of his administration, which he did in his usual good form. He had no trouble in convincing his political friends at least that the Union Government had during the war done all that could be expected from an enlightened and patriotic Government, and that since the war they have been doing all that could be expected of any Government—in fact, a little better.

Then rose my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), who gave some explanations that explain so far as they go. He delivered an address which he might better have left undelivered. This is no time, honourable gentlemen, nor is the Senate the place, to revive or perpetuate racial differences. If personal abuse and the reviling of our public men, even the best, the most patriotic, the cleanest, have become planks of the erstwhile great Liberal party, the handling of that unholy timber had better be left to the National friends of the honourable member. Some parts of his English speech were really vicious, I am sorry to say, and some parts of his French speech were worse.

However, other honourable members have risen in their turn to express their views, and have drawn from the Speech from the Throne what best suited their fancy. I had the misfortune to move the adjournment of the debate in order to prevent the vote being taken on Friday. My purpose in doing so was to enable my honourable friend from Montreal to take part in the debate, as he had signified to me his intention of doing so. But now I am myself participating in it, and I must find something good, bad or indifferent, in the Speech from the Throne.

This is what I should like to inquire: what amount of money is the Administration going to ask from the country this year, and, particularly, what application will it make of this appropriation? As to the amount, we may make up our minds that it will run into the hundreds of millions. Last year the amount was over $300,000,000, and, according to the budget as laid on the table, the amount appropriated for soldiers' land settlement was $25,000,000. There is likely to be as much, if not more, this year. The appropriation for experimental farms was $1,200,000; for the Agricultural Act, $1,100,000; for immigration and colonization, $1,500,000; for pensions, $36,000,000; for subsidies to steamships, $2,500,000; for dairying, a couple of hundred thousand; for the encouragement of the erection of dwelling houses, $25,000,000; for railways and canals, $15,000,000.

All these amounts are no doubt necessary, and I have no doubt they will be well expended. The expenditure is necessary in order to promote the material prosperity of this country. We want Canada to be wealthy. We want its agriculture to flourish, its railways to expand, its soldiers to be well taken care of. We want to make this Dominion a great and wealthy country. But, honourable gentlemen, to my mind that is not sufficient. A country advances not alone by material prosperity. There is the superstructure which must be looked after: the country must be made not only prosperous but also enlightened. On comparing what is being done towards the refinement of the country with what is done for its material prosperity, I am amazed—indeed, a little shocked. For example, the Astronomical Society gets $2,000; that is, outside of what is necessary to conduct the department. The Royal Academy of Arts gets $2,500, the Mining Institute $3,000, and the Royal Society of Canada $4,000. These appropriations do not compare well with the millions and hundreds of millions that are given for the betterment of the material interests of Canada. We are building a great nation, a nation which will probably be, in centuries to come, the greatest that has ever been. Let us not look merely to material prosperity. That alone will not, cannot, build a great nation. A man may be a millionaire, but if he has nothing but his wealth to rely upon, his name will go with his riches, and he will soon be forgotten. Many empires have lived that were no doubt exceedingly prosperous in material achievement, but they have passed away and left nothing of value behind. The countries that live and deserve to live are those that take as much care of the superstructure as of the foundations of the building. Look, for example, at the republic of Greece, a small country, hardly as large as the province of my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Crosby), whom I am glad to see back again in this House. Greece stands foremost among all the nations of the world; why? Not because it had the greatest system of railways; not because it exported hundred of millions of bushels of wheat or barley a year, or had the best fisheries in the world. It had none of these things; but it had a superior culture; it had what remains for ages, for eternity. It cultivated the fine arts. It provided in its budgets for the encouragement of literature, history, poetry, the drama, painting—the fine arts. These things endure. The material prosperity, the substructure, is necessary. Wealth is power; wealth is a good thing; but wealth alone is vanity. If we want to build a great country, honourable gentlemen, let us not confine ourselves wholly to the material part, but let us look to its mental qualities, its soul; for a country, like an individual, has what in French is called "le genie d'un pays." Let us give to the intellectual aspect of the country the same encouragement as we give to the material part. I know that people will say that such encouragement should be left to initial efforts; but I would point out that in many instances personal initiative is not sufficient to overcome the first difficulties. Why is protection in force to-day? To help personal initiative. Why are bonuses granted to the steel industry? To encourage the development of personal enterprise, which otherwise would not prosper, and might not overcome the difficulties surrounding it. The Government is in many ways helping private industry. What I ask of the Government is that it do something towards helping the intelligence of the country.

I have mentioned the Royal Society. There may be some among you, there certainly are many persons in the country, who do not know anything about the Royal Society. It was founded some thirty years ago by Lord Lorne for the very purpose I am advocating. That society is working under great stress and difficulty, as you may well imagine, on an expenditure of $4,000 a year. For a society which has four branches, and whose members come from every part of the Dominion, is that sum adequate to the results we expect from it? I say it is not: we should do more. With the small amount of material help it now receives, the Royal Society can do no more than print its own records. That is not the ultimate object of the society. It is composed of persons who are among the very best from the four quarters of this country. They come from British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario—in fact, from every part of Canada. They have to meet in Ottawa at their own expense. All they can do is to deliberate when they are here, and afterwards print their deliberations. What I would ask is that the Government appropriate an adequate sum of money —say $10,000—to enable the Royal Society to discover and assist Canadian talent and bring it into the limelight. How many young men are there in Canada to-day who will go down to unknown graves, not having had an opportunity to develop the magnificent genius that lies latent within them because they have not had the material means to develop it? If $10,000 were voted for the Royal Society, they could help the poet, the historian, the novelist or the dramatist to come out with his first edition, and among the many who would be helped would be some geniuses who would do honour to Canada. An appropriation of that sort, honourable gentlemen, is what I should like to see in the Estimates this year.

This question has been brought to my mind particularly because I have noticed, as honourable gentlemen also must have noticed, that the staff of our Geological Department has been depleted. Our savants are leaving us, gentlemen, and why? Because they are underpaid.

In this connection there is another matter to which I should like to draw the attention of the Government. We had a commission who, though they did their best, seemed to be unable to appreciate the difference between manual and intellectual work. In the classification they took no account of that difference. I understand that that error or injustice is now being remedied. It is time.

Referring again to the Geological Survey, I find that this year six of their best men have left the service of Canada. I have a list of them; here they are: Reinecke, Burling, O'Neill, Rose, Mackay, Hayes, Cox. Some of the best equipped members of the Geological Survey have left, and why? Because their salaries were too small. They ranged from $2,100 to $2,700. Imagine that, honourable gentlemen. Imagine specialists of great learning, men necessary to the prosperity of Canada, being paid such a trivial sum of money. They have gone, many of them to private practice, in London, New London, New York, and many other places.

I have a list of the men who have left the Service during the last ten years, and more of them have left during the last year than ever before. Among the names are names of men known the world over, who have given their services to foreign countries. That is not right. We should do something, if not exactly to create science, at least to hold what little we have.

But, some people will tell me, it is not important to have geologists in Canada. That is a mistake, honourable gentlemen. The mineral resources of Canada that are known to-day, and those which eventually will come to be known, are of unspeakable value. I have a few figures which will show you what our mines are worth. In 1886—I will not go back to the time of Confederation—our mines produced $10,221,255. Ten years later, in 1896, they produced $22,474,256. Ten years later, in 1906, they produced $79,286,697. In 1916 they produced $177,201,534. This year they produced over $200,000,000. And we are just at the begining.

Here let me relate an incident. I feel somewhat reluctant to do so, because we are sometimes a little severe when Government employees appear in the limelight. In the early days of the war, especially when Russia began to lose ground, the British Government was seeking the world over for petroleum oil which previously it had got from the region of the Black sea. Britain first looked to her dominions. Not finding what she required, the English capitalists, with their millions of pounds sterling, then went to Mesopotamia, South America, Nicaragua, Mexico, and the United States in search of petroleum. Why did they not come to Canada? Because we have no petroleum oil, some will say. True, we have not such fields of oil as may be found in some other countries. But that was not the reason. At the beginning of the war there was a report printed in Canada which almost forbade English capitalists to come and invest their money in this Dominion. A book dealing with our resources in petroleum and gas was published, from which the conclusion could be drawn that it was useless for capitalists to look to Canada for petroleum in paying quantities. I read the book, and I was so struck by the nature of it, and the harm that it could do to Canada, that I went in search of further information. I found out, honourable gentlemen, that the makers of the book were all foreigners—that there was not a Canadian among them. The work was cleverly done, and one of the great results of it was that British capitalists, instead of coming to Canada, went to other countries looking for petroleum. If some of the men to whom I have referred had not been allowed to leave our service, if we had had our own geologists, such a book would not have been written, and to-day millions of money would be coming to Canada instead of going to other parts of the world. It is preposterous to say that petroleum oil cannot be found in Canada. Providence has given us boundless resources of all kinds. We have minerals such as are not found in any other part of the world, and there is no doubt that eventually petroleum will be found in this country in large quantities.

This brings me again to the necessity of establishing a strong and reliable Bureau of Geology. In the very province of my honourable friend the leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), in Alberta, there was a great shortage of water. Through the efforts of some of the officers of the Geological Survey, at no great depth large quantities of the very best quality of water were found. On the eastern slope of the Rockies, in the western part of Alberta, a great deal of haphazard prospecting of coal was going on. The Geological Bureau came forward and outlined certain areas which have since been proved to be exceedingly rich in this mineral. This is what science is called upon to do for the prosperity of the country. Let us not neglect to embellish our country and make it more beautiful; and let us particularly pay attention to encouraging the fine arts, literature, science, and all that goes to make a country really great and prosperous.

Hon. L. O. DAVID: Honourable gentlemen, I think proper to commence by congratulating the Government upon the appointments to this Senate of the honourable the mover and the honourable the seconder of the Address. We on this side of the House do not often have occasion to congratulate the Government, so the Government must be happy on this occasion, and they deserve it. In this instance they deserve to be congratulated upon setting a good precedent, which will be followed by this Government and other Governments.

I think I may say that the Government has generally been happy in their choice of members of this House. I see before me several members whose views and opinions are worthy of consideration; but in the appointment of the honourable gentleman from Granville (Hon. Mr. Chapais) there is something out of the ordinary, something characteristic. I am happy to see that his independence in certain circumstances was not an obstacle to his appointment. As the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) said, it was very well known that the honourable member for Granville could have been appointed a member of this House, and could even have become a member of the Government, if he had been willing to follow the policy of the Government upon the most important question of the time, namely, conscription. I am glad that his independence was not deprive the country of his services. The province of Quebec has been happy to hear of the appointment of the honourable member for Granville, because in that promember for Granville, because in that province he is recognized as one of our most eminent journalists and historians; and those who heard him here the other day had an opportunity to judge whether or not he is a good speaker.

Now, I wish to say a few words upon the remarks of the honourable member for Bedford (Hon. Mr. Pope) and the honourable member for Boissevain (Hon. Mr. Schaffner) in reference to the refusal of Sir Wilfrid Laurier to enter the Borden Government. They spoke of the illustrious deceased statesman with a good deal of respect and sympathy, but they blamed him for having refused at that time to form part of the Government, saying that he was thereby refusing to promote what they called the unity of Canada. Honourable gentlemen, I know the motives and principles which guided Sir Wilfrid Laurier upon that occasion, and I have no hesitation in saying that his motives and principles were good and noble—that owing to the position which he had taken on many occasions, and the declarations which he had made, he was in honour bound to refuse to enter the Borden Government. As a matter of principle he had always been opposed to conscription as being a coercive measure, it was contrary to his character and natural disposition, of which he gave proof when in the settlement of the Manitoba school question he refused to accept a policy which could not be put into execution without coercing the province of Manitoba. At the time when the Nationalists, supported and subsidized, morally and financially, by the Conservative party, were denouncing him as a traitor to Canada, stating that he was preparing the way for conscription, he declared emphatically that he would never be in favour of conscription and would always fight any measure of that kind. So, honourable gentlemen, being the man he was, how could he repudiate his convictions and declarations and join the Borden Government? No, he could not do it. In view of the declarations of certain newspapers, he was under the impression, as was the whole province of Quebec, that conscription was directed particularly against that province. Those declarations aroused a great deal of indignation throughout Quebec, and some Conservatives like Sir Alexander Lacoste and the honourable member from Granville (Hon. Mr. Chapais) were also opposed to conscription. How, then, could Sir Wilfrid Laurier be in favour of such a measure when his own province, including the Conservatives themselves, were opposed to it? Had he favoured conscription, he would have lost his prestige in the province of Quebec and left that province to the mercy of the agitators, all to no purpose. He had always been of the opinion that the voluntary system was adequate to enlist all the soldiers required at the time; and when Canada had furnished 400,000 volunteers, he thought that number was sufficient, or if it was not enough the additional men needed could be obtained by the same system, without recourse to a conscription measure. In that view he was corroborated by the honourable the Postmaster General (Hon. Mr. Blondin), who expressed exactly the same opinion in England or in France, I am not sure which. The Postmaster General had the courage to say at that time that if the voluntary system had been properly carried on, the Government would have found the number of men considered necessary.

Now, honourable gentlemen, were not the views of Sir Wilfrid Laurier justified by what took place? What has been the result of conscription? What was the result of all the trouble, agitation, discontent, which was created by that question throughout the whole of Canada, and especially in the province of Quebec. Out of 80,000 soldiers conscripted, how many went overseas? About 50,000. And how many of those went to the battle front? None or hardly any. So the voluntary system, which would have cost only a fourth or a fifth, would not have been ineffective. No, honourable gentlemen, in this case, as throughout his brilliant career, the illustrious deceased statesman did what he thought was right, according to his judgment and conscience. That will be the verdict of history.

I desire now to say a few words on the question of the tariff. I intended saying more, but have decided for several reasons not to make a long speech. I want to explain why I approve of the remarks made by the honourable leader of the House (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), when in his strong speech he said it was absolutely necessary to the prosperity of the country to maintain industries. I thought that the remarks of the honourable leader of the House applied to what we call manufactured products. I have always been, and am still, of the opinion that all our manufactured products cannot compete with those of the United States without a certain degree of protection. I was of that opinion 50 years ago. In 1870, '71, '72 and '73, in a newspaper called L'Opinion Publique, which I published at that time, I commenced to express those views, declaring that if we would stop the emigration of thousands of our people to the United States every year, we ought to give them what they were seeking there; we ought to establish manufacturing industries. I admit, honourable gentlemen, that since that time our industries have grown, and our manufacturers are better able to compete with the Americans. There are undoubtedly a number of products in which we can compete; but we must determine which products they are. Investigation alone will furnish that information; so I would not like to express a definite opinion on this question before that investigation has been made.

When the tariff of 1878 was adopted I congratulated the Government, although I was an opponent. And, honourable gentlemen, I have no hesitation in saying that we in Canada owe in great part to that tariff the industrial prosperity of our country; that it has enabled our manufacturers to provide millions of shells and munitions for war purposes, and to pay high wages to our workingmen, besides bringing to our Government in the last 40 years many millions of dollars to spend for the progress and prosperity of the northwest provinces.

Now, we must admit that the idea of establishing free trade comes from the Northwest. The fact is that a great many of our troubles come from the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Hear, hear; the Hudson Bay railway.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: There are strong men in the West, with strong wills, and some amongst them want everything for their province—everything and something more. They want cheaper rates from the railways and higher prices for their wheat, and they are in favour of the nationalization of railways and free trade, although it is not certain that such a policy will give them what they expect, and although it may not be in the general interest of Canada. They do not seem to realize that free trade would hamper the industrial interests of the old provinces, which have never hesitated to spend many millions to promote the progress and prosperity of the Northwest. The provinces of the Northwest are the daughters of the old provinces, and they cannot complain that their infancy has been neglected or that the mother provinces have not done all they ought to have done for them. So I think the daughters ought not to do anything that would check the prosperity of the mother provinces.

But, honourable gentlemen, I am sure there are enough reasonable men in this House and throughout the country to realize that Canada cannot prosper and attain its high destiny unless the different provinces of which it is composed consider and do what its general welfare and their mutual interests require. A policy of selfishness would be a policy of destruction. You will find that in this respect the province of Quebec will take a wise and patriotic position. If there are certain industries upon which the customs duties could be reduced—and I think there are—there are others that require more protection in order to enable them to increase their production and to manufacture some of our raw material which is manufactured in the United States to the detriment of our country and in the interest of American manufacturers and workingmen.

What has happened in the United States may perhaps happen in Canada. You know the history of the United States, and you remember that there was a time when the western and southern states were opposed to protection, and did everything they could to defeat the Bills which were brought before Congress for the purpose of establishing a protective tariff. What was the outcome? Manufacturers established themselves in those states, and then they favoured a protective tariff. I think the same thing will happen in this country—that before long manufacturing will become established in the prairie provinces, and the people of those provinces will then be in favour of a certain amount of protection.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: There are a good many of them there now.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I suppose so.

Well, honourable gentlemen, I think that is enough for to-day.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Go on. You are doing well.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Here is an incident that may interest you. I remember that in 1878, when I was living in Ottawa, I had occasion every day to see the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, who was at the time Prime Minister of Canada. It was during his recreation period. He used to send for me to come and play quoits with him on the spot where the Queen Victoria monument is erected. Three or four months before the election of 1878 he asked me what was my opinion as to the result. I said: "Mr. Mackenzie, I will give you my opinion, but as I do not speak English very fluently, perhaps I had better write it out." I wrote out for him what I thought, namely, that if he went to the people, especially at that time, which was a period of financial crisis, he would be defeated, and I gave him my reasons. When I met him I handed him the paper. The following day, when we were playing our game of quoits, he said: "I read your letter, Mr. David. It is not encouraging." "Well," I said, "I told you what I thought." He asked me: "What can I do? All the Liberals of the province of Ontario and those of other provinces as well are saying we must go to the people with the tariff as an issue." "Mr. Mackenzie," I said, "I am not presumptuous enough to tell you what you ought to do." Two or three months after the election I met him. He was very sad, poor man. I said: "I do not presume to think that I was alone in giving you the opinion I did." "But," he said, "you offered yourself as a candidate." "That is quite true, Mr. Mackenzie," I said. "I ran as a Liberal protectionist in a Liberal county, and I would have been elected if on the last Sunday before the election the county had not been invaded by the most eloquent speakers of the Conservative party, who told the people, 'If you want protection, it will not be sufficient to elect Mr. David or two or three Liberals; you must change the Government.' And the electors were convinced that they were right." I had come to the conclusion that my defeat was the result of that. At that time it was said, "Oh, the farmers and the workingmen will vote for a free-trade policy." Do you know what happened? When the elections came, the farmers and the workingmen were easily convinced that a protective tariff would benefit all classes of society; that it would give to the farmers the best markets possible, home and national markets, and to the workingmen work at remunerative wages. What would become of the thousands of workingmen employed in the numerous manufactories which would be unable to bear the competition of the American manufacturers? Especially now, when we know that they are opposed to reciprocity. They would close their doors, and we would leave ours open to their products. What would be the result? If the balance of trade against us it so great now, what would it be if they could dump their products upon our markets? What would become of all those thriving towns and villages in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, which, as I have said, to a great extent owe their prosperity to the tariff, call it what you will, provided it is high enough to protect our manufacturers? If we had absolute free trade, perhaps I would not take exactly the same position. But even if there were reciprocity, I think a good number of our industries would not be able to compete with American industries. But we know very well that we can have no reciprocity now. Look at what took place in 1911, when the Reciprocity Treaty was laid before Parliament. The Laurier Government thought it would be accepted by the manufacturers, because it applied only to natural products. But it was rejected by the manufacturers, and the Government, not being able to have it adopted by Parliament, appealed to the people, and the people voted against the policy of the Government.

Later on, I am sure that we will have an opportunity to express our views, and then I will say what I think of that important question. As I have said, honourable gentlement, I am sure that the province of Quebec will do its duty on that question or on any other question. The province of Quebec is proud of Canada, and is convinced that the progress of Canada depends upon the progress of each of its provinces and the development of its natural resources. The province of Quebec knows that a policy of selfishness will be a policy of destruction.

Hon. ARTHUR BOYER: Honourable gentlemen, I am glad, following the custom, to compliment the honourable members who have proposed and seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I compliment especially the honourable senator for the Granville division (Hon. Mr. Chapais) on the speech which he delivered the other day with so much eloquence. I extend to him the hand of fellowship and gladly welcome him to this Chamber.

Honourable gentlemen, may I be allowed in speaking on the speech from the Throne, to draw your attention to one or two items which have been entirely forgotten in the Speech from the Throne. During the National Loan campaign posters were put up all through the country, one of them representing one of our soldiers at the seat of war asking us in Canada to help with our dollars. A loan was floated last November calling for $300,000,000, and the response to that poster was that over $700,000,000 was subscribed by the people of the Dominion of Canada to help Canada to carry on and pay the vast expenses of the war. What I should have liked would have been a word of acknowledgment in the Speech from the Throne saying that the boys who went and fought not only did their duty, but that those who had to remain behind helped them with every dollar they had. I think it would have been helpful of the Speech from the Throne had contained some things different from the usual cut-and-dried sentence: "The estimates will be submitted to your honourable House; they have been prepared with all due regard to economy." We have been told, in a meeting of gentlemen interested in education that took place in Ottawa, that a civil servant appointed last September to a very high post in the Department of Trade and Commerce, gave voice to the following extraordinary sentiment. He said: said:

That Canada at the present moment was insolvent if based on the same footing as a private corporation, was the statement made by a professor of the Federal Bureau of Statistics. The Dominion debt, he said, was larger than that of the United States after the Civil War, and this in spite of the fact that the United States at that time had three times the present population of Canada. The Dominion Government in 1914 suspended the meeting of Dominion notes in gold, and if asked to-day to meet its obligations it could not do so. If a private corporation was in the same position it would be declared bankrupt, but the Government, being the Government, does not have to do this, he said. Bishop Richardson, New Brunswick, and Professor W. H. Vance, Vancouver, both disagreed entirely with the professor, and pointed out that his views were in no way representative of the feeling of the delegates.

This gentleman makes the remark: "if a private corporation were in the same position." I would ask if this gentleman had been in the service of a private corporation, drawing a salary from that private corporation, and had stood up in any meeting, private or public, and said his employers were bankrupt, how long would he remain in their service?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Not very long.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: This is what was said by a civil servant appointed no later than the 15th of September last. Standing up in a public meeting, he had the cheek to say that this country, from which he draws his salary, which gives his bread and butter, was bankrupt. Why does he not leave the service and go into the service of a firm that is not bankrupt? Is he not ashamed to take the money from a bankrupt concern, when he knows it is deceiving the public? But he takes his salary just the same, and then declares that the country is bankrupt.

I would have liked to have seen a cheerful word in the Speech from the Throne to say that by proper economy the country would pull through—that the country, owing to its resources and owing to the people in it, is able to face any over issue of notes that may have been made. I have asked all my banking friends how we are to overcome the over-issue, to meet the enormous payments that had to be made during the war. I have seen three or four clerks go into the bank of Montreal and present accepted cheques for from $50,000 up to $60,000, and ask for 10,000 ones, 10,000 twos, so many fives, and this, that and the other. We had such enormous wage bills to pay that the only way to pay them was by paper money backed by the people and the enormous resources of Canada. We have an over-issue granted; but even in better times we never had more security for our paper money than 50 cents on the dollar. If the security is somewhat low to-day we have the people behind it, and they would never allow Canadian money to go to protest. We have nerve enough in Canada to defend our own, and since we have done our duty during the war, I think to the last penny we own we will see that our currency goes at par, and that every cent of our liabilities is provided for.

Coming to another point. To meet this obligation we have to save our resources. We are always using the words "unlimited resources." Are our resources so unlimited? I would like to draw attention to the fact that one of the great resources of this country, when first it was conquered, was its fur-bearing animals. What has become of them? At first they were to be found at the very doors of Quebec and Montreal? Gradually expansion took place and they were killed off, and now what do we see? No later than February last, at an auction sale of furs in St. Louis, 1,500,000 skins were sold. How long would the resources of any country stand such a slaughter? How long are we going to allow such a state of things to continue? I am sorry to say that almost one-third, if not one-half, of the furs that were sold in that enormous sale were provided by the Dominion of Canada. How long is the enormous resource of our fur-bearing animals going to last if we do not put a stop to this slaughter? A few years ago we passed a law in this House prohibiting ladies from wearing feathers on their hats; why? Because the birds of every known country were being destroyed. What is the trouble to-day? They are actually destroying every fur-bearing animal, not only in Canada, but in the United States and the rest of the world; and the remark was made, after that enormous sale in St. Louis, that those 1,500,000 skins amounted to half of the skins of the fur-bearing animals throughout the world. Then, what do we see? You remember the humble skunk that was taboo and from which everybody flew. To-day it is popular. And the poor muskrat which was so neglected in bygone days—to-day its fur is one of the most popular you can possibly set your eyes on. As Brother Jonathan said to his daughter going to a ball, "My dear, you must have a dress on; but you have a fox-skin around your neck"—and it was in the middle of the summer.

In this country we have a Conservation Commission for which we pay $42,500 a year. Have they taken a single step towards drawing the attention not only of Canada but of all the civilized world to the enormous destruction of fur-bearing animals? Some fifteen or twenty years ago I used to go to some lumber camps in northern Quebec, where fur-bearing animals were very plentiful. Not later than last year I made the same trip. I went even farther north, and never met even a squirrel. When I asked the shantymen, "Do you ever see any fur-bearing animals?" they said, "No, we don't know what has become of them; we very seldom come across a mink, a martin, or a squirrel; they are all gone."

Another thing that we are wasting, shamefully wasting, is our timber resources. Take the enormous amount of pulpwood that is required to publish all the rubbish that our papers treat us to. And I am not afraid to use the word "rubbish." I may be rapped on the fingers for it, but I am not afraid to speak my mind. Has the Conservation Commission ever raised its voice and said: "We are using our resources too fast? why don't you curtail the production for the papers?" I may say this, honourable gentlemen, and take you as witnesses, that two-thirds of the papers that come into your hands go unread. When you take a paper of 42 pages, you simply turn the pages over and throw it away. The first thing you know you are asked by the servant, "What are we going to do with this pile of newspapers?" There is no way of getting rid of them. Then, they are so highly educational; they are so very wonderful. Take a paper that entertains its readers with such rubbish as "Bringing Up Father." If they had said "Lowering Father" it would have been more accurate. Think of the education our boys are getting from seeing the pictures of this eternal fight between Maggie and the old man, where the old man thinks of nothing but going out by the back door to a bar-room to meet his friend Dinty Moore! What a lesson that is for the growing generation! What must they think of the usual family when they see what is supposed to be a respectable paper publishing such rubbish? Instead of being elevating, it is degrading. Instead of teaching our boys to become men, it simply teaches them that the old man goes about the house in a pair of coloured stockings and is knocked on the head with a rolling pin and called an insect. This is the education that we get from our enormous resources.

A friend of mine lately said to me: "If you will go up to a certain lake in Quebec, you will see it covered over with pulp logs, and more than two-thirds of them are not more than 3 inches thick." Think of the destruction that is going on. How much pulpwood will you get out of a 3-inch log, which has taken, I suppose, close to twenty-five years to grow? Everything is taken to supply the enormous demands of our newspapers. Why does not the Conservation Commission tell us that we must economize? We have great resources, but if we do not husband them we shall some day be bankrupt; some time the resources will fail.

It was no later than 1911, at a great convention of Foresters in the United States, at which President Taft presided, that he drew the attention, not only of the United States, but of the whole of North America, to the enormous waste of our forests; and he predicted that, if the then rate of consumption continued, in less than forty years we should have to apply to God knows where for whatever timber was strictly necessary. And what does the Commission of Conservation tell us about conserving our natural resources in the way of timber? In an article published in its Bulletin in February, 1920, entitled, "Canada's Exports of Pulp and Paper," it says:

During the past year over 1·5 million cords of raw pulpwood was exported to the United States, valued at upwards of $1,500,000. Wood pulp exports for the year are valued at around $35,000,000, of which most went to the United States.

With exhaustion of United States supplies of pulpwood in the eastern states already in sight, and with the industry growing by leaps and bounds in Canada, the question of future supplies becomes of the most pressing urgency, that invested capital may be protected and communities founded upon this business may not, after a time, be compelled to migrate, as has so frequently been the case in the United States.

Hon. Mr. BOYER.

When we have no more pulpwood what shall we do?

The first essential is much more adequate protection of our forests from destruction by fire. The next great requisite is such modification of existing methods of logging as will leave the cut-over lands in better condition to produce a crop of the more valuable species. This involves a careful study, in advance of logging, by practical foresters, in order that the methods best adapted to the particular locality may be adopted.

For the mixed pulpwood forests of hardwoods and conifers, some plan of transporting and utilizing the hardwood species must be devised, otherwise these forests will continue the present process of rapid conversion into hardwood species alone, rendering them less and less valuable for the production of pulpwood. This is one of the greatest problems now before an important portion of the pulpwood industry.

Only the day before yesterday there was held in the city of Toronto a large meeting of a very important body, the Mining Institute of Canada, presided over by Mr. McDougall, who is, I believe, president of the Nova Scotia Iron and Steel Company, and president of the Canadian Mining Institute. Mr. McDougall said:

Canada is not a country where wealth is easily gained, but it is a country not yet fully known, not half prospected, where in the past sincere work has almost always a reaped a satisfying reward. What we, and our children, will get out of Canada will be in exact measure to what we put into Canada in the way of brains and work. We have great national wealth, but none to waste. We have problems and limitations, but, if these are properly tackled, we can lead the world in many things. Only, we must give up talking thoughtlessly of our "boundless" natural resources, and prepare, by fostering science and encouraging scientific workers, to get the best out of our country, which may well prove to be something that will not only pleasantly surprise ourselves, but more favored nations also.

Then he said:

The inroads that are being made upon our forests are a matter of notoriety, nor are these inroads accompanied by anything approaching adequate reforestation. Indeed, it is doubtful whether in some instances reforestation is practical. Enquiry will prove that timber lands are daily increasing in scarcity, and, therefore, in cost, and our limitations in Canada in this regard are not only distinct, but actually alarming.

What I have said regarding these three basic materials is quite probably true of other essential things, but these do not so properly concern us as a Mining Institute.

Here is a note of warning sounded by one of the big men of the country. Let us devise means to protect so far as possible what is left of the fur-bearing animals on this vast continent. In former days countless herds of buffalo roamed the plains. Where are they to-day? If you have not the means to go to the National Park to see live buffalo, you must go to the museum to see the specimens. What has become of the enormous herds of seals that frequented the coasts of Labrador and Newfoundland every spring? Slaughtered to the very last, or to such an extent that sealing has proven unprofitable. Consider also the enormous resources of the salmon fisheries of British Columbia. In 1917 the Government thought it necessary to appoint a commission for the purpose of devising means whereby some of the salmon might be preserved for coming generations. Three gentlemen were appointed, and they made a thorough study of the question. What was the report? There are five different kinds of salmon frequenting the rivers of British Columbia; it is needless to name them. The most numerous at the time was the Sockeye, which takes two years to mature. It takes the young fish from two to five years to come to full size. Sad to relate, the minute the bearing fish spawns it dies. What is becoming of the fisheries of British Columbia? Every year they are going down and down. The best brand of salmon in British Columbia has decreased from the maximum of 78 per cent to below 42 per cent.

Our resources are being exhausted, and God knows we require them for the future if we are to meet our obligations. Let us then be up and doing. Let us try to save whatever is left of our natural resources and see if we cannot meet our obligations.

The speech from the Throne mentioned also that Canada had been invited to join the Labour Congress established by the League of Nations. A big meeting was held at Washington, and two delegates from Canada were appointed and left for Europe. As luck would have it, however, they arrived too late, and missed the meeting in France. We seem to have been unfortunate in recent years. In 1914 there was a big meeting of the International Institute of Agriculture, in Rome, and our delegate arrived there eight days after the meeting had closed. Our Labour delegates arrived a fortnight after the close of the meeting, and they were told to remain in England and study the question and report, so that we might see what could be done in Canada towards easing the situation and whether anything practical would result from the great farmers' movement that is in progress throughout the country. Let me read to you, honourable gentlemen, a word of warning, coming from the farmer:

For sound common sense on this subject, probably the declaration of the Pennsylvania State Grange is the most convincing that has been thus far expressed. This was approved by the farmers present at the Convention in Philadelphia on the 14th inst., and was as follows:

"The farmer is neither an object of pity nor a subject for charity. He is not asking for special favors nor class legislation. He has practiced the eight-hour law ever since Adam was driven out of the Garden of Eden, eight hours in the forenoon and eight in the afternoon and the rest of the time he just works. The Grange seeks the 'greatest good to the greatest number,' and believes that this principle might well be followed by our lawmakers. It is neither right nor just for our national Congress to enact laws for a few at the expense of the many. Arbitration is the only fair and just means of settling disputes when the parties thereto cannot agree. No legislation should be enacted that even tends to create class feeling or widen the breach which now exists between capital and labor.

"Capital should be made to understand that it is helpless without labor, and labor should realize that it could not exist without capital. Each is dependent upon the other. Congress should take such steps and enact such laws as will impress upon both parties, that 'everybody is bigger than anybody.' And that it will not permit the wheels of progress to be blocked, even if it has to take over the railroads and operate them until a peaceful settlement is obtained. It is extremely dangerous for the Government to even attempt to fix a wage scale or establish hours of labor, unless the hours so established, shall apply to all classes of labour.

"Should the law be applied to agriculture or to the labor on the farm it would be a serious blow to the farmer, as he could never get his work done under an eight-hour day, nor could he afford to pay a man for ten hours' work when he worked but eight."

This was said by the Pennsylvania State Grange, and it was repeated in the province of Quebec during the last session of the Legislature when a delegation of workmen headed by a parish priest—what business he had there I have since been trying to find out—sought to impress upon the Quebec Government the necessity of joining in a petition to be sent to the Federal Government asking for the prohibition of the exportation of all agricultural products in order that the working classes might obtain them cheaper. There was a beautiful piece of work!—lovely! And the answer of Mr. Caron, the Minister of Agriculture for Quebec, was this: "You have set us a bad example. By your exorbitant demands for higher wages and shorter hours, you are actually drawing away from the country all the farm hands. If the farmers were to adopt the principle which you preach and work eight hours a day, for goodness sake tell me, when would the cows be milked? If the farmers were, according to your principle, to quit work on Saturday at noon and not resume work until eight o'clock on Monday morning, what would become of the cows?" The delegation came away feeling rather sheepish and saying they had been badly treated—rudely answered. But that was the only answer to the very impudent request that the Government stop the export of all agricultural products so that one class might benefit to the detriment of the other.

Honourable gentlemen, before I sit down I would—I do not like the expression in English—it is rather awkward for us who have to speak English—je désirerais féliciter le gouvernement—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Congratulate.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: No, that is not the word.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: "Felicitate," if you like.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: —on its naval policy, so far as the merchant marine is concerned. There I draw the line. It has been a great surprise throughout the world to see that such a small country as Canada could possess a fleet of 30 or 40 merchant vessels flying the Canadian flag. It has been displayed as far away as Brazil and has attracted the admiration of a Brazilian whom I have seen. He said, "We had no idea that Canada possessed such a fleet." One vessel came back from Brazil with a cargo of sugar on which the freight paid to the Government—well, I do not know who gets the money—amounted to $380,000. Part of that cargo was discharged in the city of New York and the rest in Montreal.

Of course, this fine fleet is well manned. Accidents will happen in the best regulated families, and few industries gain the experience of older established concerns, not only in navigation, but in all branches of trade. A tremendous risk was taken last fall, when two brand new vessels on their maiden trip were sent out from Quebec late in December, one of them as late as the 20th, and the other on the 23rd. What was the consequence? Whereas none of the old shipping companies ever dared to send a vessel out of Quebec later than the 4th or 5th of December, these vessels loaded with their valuable cargoes were despatched from Quebec nearly three weeks later. The consequence was that one of them, with a cargo which, I am told was valued at three-quarters of a million dollars, is now lying high and dry on the rocks at the entrance, or a little east of the entrance, of the Saguenay river. It is completely lost, body and soul. Another vessel, the Canadian Spinner, was caught in the middle of the gulf of St. Lawrence, and drifted for nearly three weeks, the crew as well as the vessel and the cargo in danger of being lost. The ice-breaker Montcalm, by sheer pluck and endurance, managed to break a way through to the vessel and got her safely into Pictou or Sydney, where she could coal, and then into Halifax. The whole cargo had to be unloaded and the vessel put into drydock, and it was only on the last day of February that the cargo was being re-shipped. Two or three months' loss of time, at an enormous cost to the country. Of course, we must learn by experience. The only way to prevent those things is not to take the risk.

There was another marine loss to which I would draw the atention of this House. For the last forty or fifty years the Canadian Government has had a marine agency in the good old city of Quebec. Of course, the good old city of Quebec has one great quality which my friend on the other side would call a great fault: It is a great Liberal city. It had to be punished in some way or other. Almost three-quarters of the business that agency did in supplying lighthouses throughout the gulf of St. Lawrence was taken away from Quebec. We never said a word. You are welcome to it. Let the poorer neighbours have it. It was transferred to Charlottetown in Prince Edward Island. A very fine vessel called the Arranmore, which supplied the lighthouses, was sent from Charlottetown loaded with a most valuable cargo, to replenish the different stores in all the lighthouses in the straits of Belle Isle and east of the gulf of St. Lawrence. Through misfortune—or was it lack of knowledge on the part of the captain?—for some reason or another, the vessel ran aground. A wireless message was sent to the Montcalm, and it came, but the captain declares that it took a fool to get into such a position as the captain of the Arranmore was in. "Let him get out," he said; "I will not risk my vessel." The consequence was that part of the cargo had to be jettisoned. The vessel was pulled out and towed to Harrington, where it was beached. Harrington is a small port in the straits of Belle Isle, I believe. It is not on the chart. That is where the Arranmore is lying to-day. The consequence was that eight of the most valuable lighthouses in the gulf of St. Lawrence had to be closed. In past years the crews were always left in those lighthouses, so as to be ready for the opening of navigation in the spring. Owing to the wreck of the Arranmore and the loss of her cargo, the Government had to send another vessel from St. Johns, Newfoundland, away out east into the Atlantic, to work her way into the straits of Belle Isle and rescue the crews, and, as I say, close up eight of the most valuable lighthouses in the straits of Belle Isle, and at the entrance of the gulf of St. Lawrence.

Honourable gentlemen, if you consult the archives of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, so far as the Quebec agency is concerned, you will find that never in the history of the department has such an accident happened. The Quebec agency always took the bull by the horns. They saw that the provisions were sent out in time so that the crews should be amply provided for for a very long and severe winter, and so that the lighthouses might be kept in the very best state of repair.

Of course, those are accidents. I simply mention them casually. They will happen even in the best-regulated Government. But we should take no risks in the future. Ships should be properly manned and properly commanded. We should see that they get there in time so that the lives of the keepers will not be jeopardized. Those men are isolated for six months in the year. The lives of these men were threatened, and had it not been for a sealer that forced her way through the ice-floes, God only knows what would have happened to those brave men.

Hon. J. P. B. CASGRAIN: It is now five o'clock, and, as I understand that there is nothing on the Order Paper for to-morrow that will occupy more than a few minutes, I would ask the leader if he would agree to the debate being adjourned.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will observe the Order Paper, he will see that there are some very important Bills to be dealt with. We have an hour before us, and I am sure that honourable gentlemen would be only too glad to listen to the remarks of my honourable friend until 6 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Honourable gentlemen, am taken a little by surprise. The leader of the Government is usually very good, and, if I were allowed until to-morrow, I might have some very nice things to say about him in my speech. But he will now have to miss them.

The time-honoured custom is to congratulate at the very outset the proposer and the seconder of the Address. I think that is very fitting and right. But along with the congratulations we must remember that the speeches of the mover and the seconder are a sort of amplification of the Speech from the Throne. That is to say, the gentlemen who move and second the Address are supposed to explain more fully the things said, or left unsaid, in the Speech from the Throne.

The proposer of the Address, the honourable gentleman from Goderich (Hon. Mr. Proudfoot), is an old parliamentarian. Anyone reading his speech would know at once that he had been making speeches for a long time in the halls of Parliament. I for one welcome him most heartily to this Chamber. He was an old Liberal coming in, though here, forsooth, we have no politics. The honourable gentleman has been a Liberal all his life. He was a Liberal when the convention assembled in his county and chose him as the candidate of his party. He defeated the Tory candidate and went to the Ontario legislature, where, during many sessions, he proved himself to be an exceptionally good man. When our esteemed friend, the Hon. Newton Wesley Rowell, left that legislature—where, I must say, he had not achieved so very much—and came here, it became necessary to find a leader for the Liberal party in Ontario, and it was thought that no better man could be found than the honourable gentleman from Goderich. Consequently he took that position. If he had only kept the position of leader of the Liberal party, well and good. But there was a moment when he faltered in his Liberal faith, when he sort of backslided, as it were, and abandoned the policy of his old leader at a moment when that policy was not popular throughout this country—at all events in eight out of the nine provinces in the Dominion.

When the time came for the Liberal party to select a new leader, the honourable gentleman was passed over, and my good old friend, my brilliant friend, Hartley Dewart, was selected as leader of the Liberal party in the grand old province of Ontario, and my honourable friend opposite became a candidate as an independent Liberal in his county, but he was defeated by a farmer. The Liberal party, headed by Mr. Dewart, was almost victorious, and if my honourable friend had remained in the faith there are many who believe, in view of what has taken place, that the honourable gentleman would have been the Prime Minister of the province from which he comes. But he had lost the leadership of that party.

The reward of Mr. Dewart was well deserved, because, during the last campaign, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier left Ottawa to travel across the continent, many of us knew that he was fighting for a lost cause.

The dear old chieftain took us into his confidence, and when we were saying that there was good news here and there, he remarked: "With such a Franchise Act as we have, it would be a miracle if the Government were not sustained by a large majority." But that did not prevent Mr. Dewart from accompanying his chief.

Then there was the Hon. Walter Mitchell, Provincial Treasurer of Quebec, a gentleman who, ever since he has held that office, has shown great surpluses, notwithstanding the many great improvements made in that province, such as good roads, which are the envy of every other province. In Quebec we have to-day over 2,200 miles of macadamized roads, and many other good roads which, if not up to the main standard, are better than those in most of the other provinces. Mr. Mitchell accompanied Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Dewart. When we think of that tour and of the ovations that the old gentleman received in all parts of the country, we do not regret for one moment that we were with him, even though it was a losing fight.

In the great convention that took place in this city last summer, the greatest convention that any political party has ever held in this country, with delegates from the Yukon to Prince Edward Island, right over the stage from which the speakers addressed the meeting was a portrait of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. There was his smiling countenance, and it looked as if he were smiling at every one in the convention. What was the result of the convention? One who had been faithful and true to the old chief, the Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, was unanimously elected leader of the party, and he now sits in the place where the grand old chieftain sat for so many years.

Who is this Mr. King? Honourable gentlemen may remember that Mr. King was for some years in the United States. How did he happen to be there? It may be interesting to them to know that, having been a student at Harvard, where he qualified for the very highest honours, when the great institution headed by John D. Rockefeller applied to President Eliot for the very best economist that could be secured, no matter what the cost might be, President Eliot said: "The greatest economist in America is not in the United States; if you want to find him you will have to go to Canada. The best student that ever went through Harvard, the one who took the highest marks, is in Canada, and his name is Mackenzie King." Mr. King went to the United States and there he made good for those who employed him for so many years. Later on there was a meeting in the city of New York, at which four hundred economists were present, men selected as great captains of industry in the United States. This meeting was presided over by the president of a great industrial corporation, with whom I have the honour of being personally acquainted. The chairman, in presenting Mr. Mackenzie King to the audience, said: "Gentlemen, I will now call upon Mr. Mackenzie King to address you, the man that I consider to be the greatest economist in America."

The Liberal party of this country have been very fortunate indeed in securing the services of a man of the strength and the knowledge of economic questions that Mr. King has; and, although it meant a great personal and financial sacrifice, that did not deter him when the Liberal party selected him to lead them, in the belief that no matter how highly he might have been paid in the United States, no man was too good to fill the place of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I ask this honourable House, and if I were in the other House I should ask the same question: is there in Canada a man better fitted to deal with the burning question of the day, the labour problem? I do not believe there is. Mr. Mackenzie King has devoted much time and study to this problem. I heard him in the city of Montreal address an enormous meeting on the rights and privileges of labour and of capital. He spoke of the four partners to industry—he has written a book on the question—and that audience, which at first would not allow him even to mention the word capital, when he had explained, was convinced that capital had some rights, and that labour could no more do without it than capital could do without labour.

The proposer of the Address made a very good speech. As I have said, he is an old parliamentarian. He spoke of the covenant of the League of Nations. Last year I spoke at length on that subject, and it is not my intention to cover the same ground again. However, I may say that I do not think anything has changed since I made my speech. I think Canada is still a colony, and, as a colony, had no right to be directly represented. We are still a dependent part of the British Empire, thank God, and we have no vote in the council of the League of Nations, so much the worse for us. My opinion on this point is entertained by many people, and, if the time were not so short, I could quote a good many authorities who would support my view. But, though we have not a vote, we have to assume large obligations. We have nothing to say as to what those obligations are to be. We were not consulted, and it might as well be admitted that when the five great Powers—Great Britain, France, Italy, the United States, and Japan—were negotiating, our representatives, who were in Paris for some months, knew what was taking place only from what they read in the newspapers. That being so, they had naturally no voice in deciding anything, and our people, and the people of Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, knew about it as well as anybody else. Anyone could buy Le Petit Parisien and read it. I challenge anyone to say that the contrary is true. Our representatives might have had a little chat in private with Mr. Lloyd George or Mr. A. J. Balfour, but that did not entitle them to know what was going on behind closed doors. They stayed at a very nice hotel, and waited there for news.

The honourable gentleman who moved the Address spoke about Canada's relations with the world, and very properly so, because now that we have signed the covenant of the League of Nations, we think we are, although we are not, a world power, and that we have a right to have relations with other nations. A child qualifying for diplomacy in the very first year would know that that was impossible, because no communication whatever can be had by this Government with any other government, except through the British ambassador. It would be almost a casus belli if anyone were so bold as to attempt it. They say that Sir Auckland Geddes, who was to be the principal of the University of McGill, is to be the British ambassador at Washington, and is to receive a salary of £20,000 a year. If he was to be the principal of McGill, he must know something of Canada, and evidently it is thought that he can represent Great Britain and all her dependencies, including Canada.

The proposer of the Address goes on to say that he feels confident that British statesmen in their wisdom will soon be establishing equal citizenship for all subjects under the Imperial Crown. These are the very words that the honourable gentleman used. What does "equal citizenship" mean, and in what way shall we have equal citizenship? Can you have equal citizenship when you have no vote and the people in the British Isles do all the voting? The only way to have equal citizenship would be to establish an Imperial parliament in which the 13,000,000 white people outside of the British Isles, constituting at least 33 per cent of those coming under the Imperial Parliament, would be represented. Mark you, it would be a parliament for Imperial affairs only, and the people might have as many local governments as they wished. I hear there will be two for the people of Ireland: one for the north, where they may worship King William, and one for the south, where they may worship the Pope. Very well: if there were also a parliament for Wales—where the Anglican church has recently been disestablished—and one for England and one for Scotland, that would make only five, and there are 40,000,000 people in the United Kingdom. It must be remembered that in this country, with a population of less than 8,000,000, we support nine provincial governments besides a Federal Government. If we can support ten, surely the people of the British Empire can have as many as they like. But for Imperial affairs, if we are to give our sons and to contribute our money and to take part in this League of Nations, surely there should be an Imperial parliament in which our delegates, even though they might be voted down, would at least have the right to express our opinion. There are eminent persons in England, such as professors of law, professors in universities, students of political economy, etc., who say that the position of the Dominions to-day is quite unsatisfactory. However, I will not anticipate, for I may come to that question tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Does the honourable gentleman say that we have no representation in the League of Nations? I understood him to refer only to the Council; but that is another matter.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Perhaps I am speaking a little too fast or too loud. What I did say was this: that we have no vote in any Imperial matter——

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I thought you were discussing the League of Nations.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN:—and that, although we belong to the Empire—for my honourable friend would not take Canada out of hte Empire—yet we have no vote: the humblest voter in the British Isles has more power than the Senate and House of Commons of Canada and the Governor General all put together, in deciding the policy. We have absolutely nothing to say, and I claim that we should have a voice. That is what I have been advocating for 30 years, and as long as God gives me breath of life I will continue to advocate that. I want to be a British citizen, not a British subject.

Now let us come back to the League of Nations, since my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Fowler) wants to discuss that. We have no vote in the League of Nations either—in the supreme Council.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The supreme Council.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: In the supreme Council; and so long as the supreme Council can decide anything, it does not go to the Assembly. It is only when the members of the supreme Council cannot agree that the matter is submitted to the Assembly. My honourable friend is a lawyer and is well posted on these matters; he has read the Covenant of the League of Nations; he knows that the supreme Council is supreme in deciding everything, and anything that it decides is concluded; but if there is a disagreement, as there probably will be, then the matter is referred to the Assembly, and in that Assembly Canada has a vote just the same as New Zealand or the Boers of South Africa; we have no more, no less, than the Boers of South Africa, who were not very much thought of about 1900.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: They are now.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, but they were not very much thought of about 20 years ago, and we have no more voice than they have.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: They proved their loyalty.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Perhaps the honourable gentleman is satisfied that we should have the same degree of influence as is possessed by 100,000 or 150,000 Boers. That is all we have, and I defy anybody to say we have more. Our vote in the League of Nations is the same as that of New Zealand, which has one-eighth of our population, the same as that of Australia with one-half of our population.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Just a moment.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We have the same vote in the League of Nations as Great Britain has.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Oh, my honourable friend is not serious. Great Britain has a vote in the supreme Council.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But I am speaking of the League of Nations.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The supreme Council of the League of Nations.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Exactly.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: All right. Perhaps the honourable gentleman would like to make a speech in order to enlighten me. I may have got this wrong.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Not at all, but you are trying to twist it. As the honourable gentleman has said, any controversial matter that cannot be decided in the supreme Council is left to the League of Nations. In that way we have a vote the same as Great Britain has a vote. Is not that right?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is not the supreme Council the first and main thing in the League of Nations?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is the executive of the League of Nations.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: If the executive can agree, then there is no reference to any other body.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Exactly.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: There are only four great powers represented—France, Italy, Japan and England. The United States will be represented if they come in, but they have not done so. If those four great powers agree to anything, we must obey them whether we like it or not, because we have attached our signature to the document. We should never have done it. England had the right to sign, but Canada should not have signed at all. They asked us to sign, just to "kid" us. We had no right to put our name to that document at all, because we have no say.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The honourable gentleman is all wrong.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Of course he is.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Well, everybody is entitled to his own opinion. We signed without reservation and we must make our contribution and furnish men in time of war—whatever quota is allotted to us; for we have given a blank cheque, and we must pay our share. I have read somewhere that our contribution to that League would be greater than that of a certain country; I think it is Spain.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We are richer than Spain.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No, we are not as rich as Spain. Does the honourable gentleman know the population of Spain? It is one of the wealthiest countries; it is very wealthy.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It has not been for a hundred years.

Hon. E. D. SMITH: Spain has no seat in the supreme Council.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No, but there will be four other representatives called in, and Spain will have a nomination, and possibly a Spaniard will be elected as one of the four. Well, since we are going to discuss this League of Nations, and we have plenty of time anyway, let us get right down to the bottom of it. I know something about it; I have been studying it ever since it was first mentioned. There are 50 or, to be exact, 51 of what we may call independent nations; but, as you are aware, there are only eight nations in the world that count for anything: there are the five great powers; then there are Germany and Russia and Austria as it was before it was dismembered. Austria to-day is a very small country.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not agree with that.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Well, that is the fact. There are only eight big nations in the world, and they represent over 90 per cent of the people of the earth. The other nations represent about 10 per cent, or, if you want to be exact, 11 per cent. I have all the figures in this book, right here, but I will not take the time to quote them now. I will perhaps read from it to-morrow if I do not finish to-day. These eight nations rule the world. Of course, there is China, which is a vast country; but China is not active in politics, and the population of China is rather doubtful; and China is left out of the question. But even if you added China to the other nations outside of those eight great powers, they would not constitute 20 per cent. Taking from the total of 51 the eight large countries, there is left a total of 43 small countries. In the League there are to be representatives of the five great nations, and the other countries are entitled to appoint four members, each representing a particular group of small nations. The supreme Council will then have a membership of nine. Of course, there will have to be a change if Germany comes in, or if Russia enters when it becomes sane. The constitution will probably have to be amended so as to make room for them. That is exactly the situation. As I have said, those eight great nations govern the world, and they represent the immense majority. I can give to the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fowler), if he likes, the populations of those countries. The British Empire has over 400,000,000; the United States has over 100,000,000; Russia 175,000,000; France 42,000,000 now; Italy about 30,000,000; Japan about 45,000,000. If you add these figures together, you will find the total population of those great nations who command the world. The population of the whole world is not so great after all; it is only about 1,450,000,000, according to the latest figures. One would have thought it to be much greater. So, after all, there are not so many people in this world and it has not become so thickly populated as we had thought.

But I have strayed, or have been carried away, from the subject I was discussing. Let us return to our muttons. We were talking about our status. Where there is sovereignty there can be no independence. That is an axiom that nobody within these four walls, or anywhere else, will deny. Now, there is a severeignty over this country and the sovereignty is in London, England. It is vested in His Majesty the King and the Imperial Parliament. You cannot pass a law that the Imperial Parliament cannot veto if it likes. So there is no independence in this country, and anyone who talks about our being really a nation is wrong. People talk about a "nation" when they mean a state. May I be allowed to quote this:

> In all regions of the world where settled government exists, every inhabitant, speaking generally, is both a member of a nation and a citizen of a state.

We in Canada are members of a nation, or two nations, if you like to separate the French and the English, but we are not citizens of a state, for the state is across the water, and we are not citizens of that state because we have no vote.

So much has been said in this House on the subject that I have picked out this short definition of about ten lines, and anybody who will do me the honour of listening to me will agree that this is pretty conclusive.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: With pleasure.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: References are given at the foot of the page. This quotation is taken from Holland's "Jurisprudence." Here are the words:

A nation, or people, or race, is a "large number of human beings, united together by a common language, and by similar customs and opinions, resulting usually from common ancestry, religion, and historical circumstances."

That is a nation. Here is the definition of a state:

A state is a community bound together by a common political allegiance.

We are part of a state, but we have no voice in its government. We are bound together by the common political allegiance to King George, but we have no say in the government of the Empire.

A state may be co-extensive with one people, as is now the case in France, or may embrace several, as is the case with Austria. One people may enter into the composition of several states, as do the Poles and the Jews.

The Jews are a nation, but do you know of a Jewish state in this world?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I think they own the whole country.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The Irish people are a nation, but they are not a state; they are trying to be. I think that definition settles the question as to what is a "nation" and what is a "state."

A burning question to-day—the papers are full of it—is the question whether the Sultan will remain in Constantinople or not. Last session, on the 1st of October, I made a prediction in this House. I quote this from Hansard of last session:

Let me make a prediction. The old city of Constantinople has been in the possession of the Turks ever since 1453, under the name of Stamboul, and all that time it has been the seat of "the Father of the Faithful," although it is not a sacred city. I predict that the Moslems will never allow the Turks to be driven from Constantinople, and Covenant or no Covenant, the Sultan will remain in Constantinople, and those who will keep him there are people whom we know very well. I do not blame them for doing so, because after all, the British Empire must look after its own interests just as any other empires must do.

And the Sultan is there yet, and I predict he will not be removed.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: You do not want him removed, do you?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: My honourable friend is not really reading the papers. There is nothing else in the papers. There is in England a very strong party talking about removing the Sultan, driving the Turk from Europe, and so on. As you all know, there is a very large Mussulman and Moslem population inhabiting the British Empire. No longer ago than January 19, 1920, an address was presented to the Viceroy of India by Moslems and Hindus—asking what? The Caliph, as you know, is King of the Hedjaz, and has in his territories the sacred cities of Mecca and Medina, and the whole peninsula of Arabia, bounded on the west by the Red Sea and on the east by the Persian gulf. They say in that petition that the Caliph must be left the sole warden of the holy cities; which means they will not be interfered with. Besides that, they want to have an absolute and full guarantee, consistent with the sovereignty of the state, for the Caliph of the Arabian peninsula. Now, there are 67,000,000 Moslems in India, and anyone who is familiar with India will know that the Moslems are the most advanced people in that country. They are the employers of labour. They inhabit the northern part of India, and they are a much stronger race than those of the southern part. Those 67,000,000 Moslems rule in that country, which contains altogether a population of 313,000,000. The Viceroy of India cannot refuse to hear that petition of the Moslems, and to send it to the home Government, because it would never do to antagonize 67,000,000 of the most powerful people in India; and they have allies outside of Afghanistan, outside of India, in Egypt. As you know, we are having enough trouble in Egypt just now. In that country there are 33,000,000 more. King George is ruler of over 100,000,000 Mussulmans and Moslems, and he is not going to do anything to antagonize those people who serve him faithfully and obey his laws. Consequently the Sultan will be, I think, allowed to remain in Constantinople. To a Catholic you might as well try to drive the Pope from Rome as to a Moslem to drive the Father of the Faithful from Constantinople.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why should you?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is the question to-day.

Now, since we are to have relations with other countries, our vision must not be limited by the boundaries of this Dominion. We must look over the whole world to see what is taking place; and what do we see? Wars, revolutions, and troubles of all kinds. Why, there is to be a military demonstration before Constantinople; what for? Where are the soldiers to come from? Not from France; she has her hands full in Syria and elsewhere—and I saw that her forces were defeated only the other day. Not from Italy; she has all she can do in the Adriatic, settling the question of Fiume and putting down the poet Gabriele D'Annunzio. Great Britain has troubles of her own. Take her position in Egypt. Troops have to be kept there. Lord Milner has been sent out, but he has not accomplished much; and to-day the power and sovereignty of England in Egypt is weaker than it has been for some time. Then, passing from Egypt into India, especially into Afghanistan, what do we find? In that country the natives are just waiting to see whether anything is done to the Father of the Faithful. So England cannot supply all the soldiers necessary to frighten the Turks, who, by the way, are not so easily frightened. Then there is a place not far from England where there is at present plenty of trouble, and where, according to the statement of a minister of the Crown made in the House of Commons within the last 48 hours, there are 200,000 people ready to commit murder night and day. So we, being a partner in the League, may be called upon to send soldiers to Constantinople.

What is this military demonstration for? It is to regulate the internal affairs of Turkey. I am not here to defend the Turks; but I may say there are two sides to the question. Not very many years ago it was my good fortune to meet a naval attaché of one of the big powers, who had spent several years at Constantinople. He had just returned from there, having been made an attaché at Washington as a reward for the services he had rendered. It appears that the Embassy at Washington is the prize or the plum of the service. I could give the name of this gentleman, but perhaps I had better not. As I say, he had been living in Constantinople for several years; he had been in communication with Effendi Pasha; and he explained the cause of the Armenian massacres and how they were provoked. Uusually the first step in these uprisings in Turkey is the outraging or ravishing of a Turkish woman by an Armenian. The Turks believe that the woman is the temple of Allah and the fountain from which springs forth the sons of the prophet, and that anyone outraging a Turkish woman has committed the greatest desecration possible. For that crime they raise the cry of the holy war. It may appear very strange to us that this should start a massacre. But we have not to look very far, only to the Southern States, to see what happens when a white woman or girl is outraged by a negro. The whole community rises, and lynch law is in force for the time being. Very often, if the offenders are not lynched, they are burned at the stake. We do not take up our guns and say to the Yankees, "You must stop this." The Armenians, for some reason or other best known to English politicians, have been held up to us as a much-abused people; but sometimes they get no more than they deserve.

There is another feature to this question. Turkey is not subdivided into farms. If there is a fertile spot in the country the Turks will move there and plant their crops. It appears that when the crops ripen the Armenians sometimes come along, chase away the Turks, cut the crops and sell them, and realize money on them at once. But they do not go very far with the money, because the Greeks come along and take it from them. The Turks, however, wreak their vengeance on the Armenians.

If we are going to police Turkey and the Balkan States it will keep us busy, and with no results, because we cannot change these people. If I had my choice I do not know that I should prefer the Armenians to the Turks. I have just read a book by a professor who conducts a very large university in Turkey. He says that the Turk, provided you do not rouse him, or do anything to cause a religious war, is a very peaceable man. One of my sons, who was on the island of Lemnos in the Gulf of Salonika during nine months of the war, said that the Turks were the fairest and best fighters that could be found. He said that when our troops were leaving the shore of the Gallipoli peninsula the Turks could have slaughtered and killed every one of them. But evidently they said, "If you want to go, you can go;" and 200,000 men left the shores safely. Do you think the Germans would have done anything like that? No, they would have slaughtered every man. I could name men who have been prisoners of the Turks. They were treated well, especially the officers. Why should we be called upon by this League of Nations to send men to regulate the internal affairs of Turkey? That is what we have come to by our meddling with things that do not concern us.

Now, what about Russia? During the war Great Britain had a special department in the War Office to look after Russian affairs. The men in that department knew more about Russian affairs than the British Cabinet did, because it was their particular business. They were men who spoke the language, and who were in constant intercourse with the Russian people. They sent memorandum after memorandum to the British Government strongly advising against interference with the internal affairs of Russia. Honourable gentlemen need not wonder how I got this information. I can assure them that it is correct. But somehow or other the British Government were bound to interfere in Russia; and France, and even the United States, had to take part in it. What happened? We sent an expedition to Russia. It came back. Did it come back covered with glory? How much treasure was spent and how many lives were lost in that foolish expedition? Here were a friendly people; they were our allies. In the early days of the war they manned a front line longer than all of our front lines put together; longer than the front line in France and Italy. Their front was over 900 miles in length, extending from the Baltic sea to the Danube. They stood the brunt of the battle. Still, when there was a revolution in Russia the great powers thought that they must interfere. They acted against the advice of their advisers in the War Office. They simply threw the people of Russia into the arms of the Germans; and then they came back home and left them. Did they come back covered with glory? No. At Murmansk and Archangel many were glad to escape with their lives. Canada was at peace with Russia, and there are a great number of Russian people living in this country; but we fitted out an expedition which went from Vancouver. The members of that expedition never saw the Russians; and we have spent I don't know how much! We have not had any report on that grand expedition, but we will have to pay. We could build many miles of railway with the money expended on that expedition. There was no rhyme or reason for it. We in this House have no politics; but if I were a member of the Opposition in another place, I would protest against the Government spending the money of the people in such a way without any mandate from the people or from the House of Commons. I do not believe it would be possible to show anything worse in the way of administration than the gathering together of a lot of Canadians, commencing at St. John and Halifax, and sending them right across the continent to fight in Russia. What would our handful of men be compared with the 175,000,000 people in Russia? They must have been good people to have let our men get away. They could have taken their food and let them starve. And that is only one of the mistakes that we have made. As I have said, we interefered in Russia without rhyme or reason, and threw the Russian people into the arms of Germany. How long will we continue this kind of thing? How long are we going to remain in our present position in this League of Nations?

Before I go on to that, however, I should like to say a word or two about the seconder of the Address.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Leave the seconder until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: He is lucky.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Give him one more day to live.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Very well. I will move the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Casgrain, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

NATIONAL LABOUR UNIONS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DAVID inquired:

1. Was the Honourable the Minister of Labour a party to the National Industrial Conference held in Ottawa in the month of September, 1919, when a resolution was adopted excluding the National Unions of the Province of Quebec, and if so, was he in accord with the said resolution?

2. Did the Minister of Labour, during the conference, advise the workingmen that they should belong to the International Union rather than to Canadian and National Unions, and if so, why?

3. Is the Honourable the Minister of Labour aware that representatives of the International Union are trying to organize in Montreal a strike in the building trades of that city in order to exclude members of the National Union of Labour, and if so, what does the Honourable Minister intend doing to protect the interests of Canadian workingmen and the city of Montreal against such action?

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON:

1. No such resolution was introduced or adopted at the National Industrial Conference in Ottawa, September, 1919.

2. No.

3. No.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 9, consideration of the motion for an Address in reply to His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Hon. J. P. B. CASGRAIN: Honourable gentlemen, in speaking yesterday without preparation I gave some figures as to the population of the world. I was quoting from memory. If I may be permitted I will read a few lines from a book entitled "The Bulwark of Peace" which is written by Heber Hart, who is a Doctor of Law of the University of London, and the recorder of Ipswich. After reading in the London Times an account of a speech which I made in this Senate, he sent a copy of his book to me, saying that I might find some argument in it. It says:

> There are still, it is true, over fifty separate states with more less free and uncontrolled governments of their own. But of the 1,734 million people, or thereabouts, who constitute the total population of the globe, about 1,450 millions, or five-sixths of the whole, are governed by the sovereign authorities of the eight Powers and China. The smaller states, to the number of about forty-four, between them govern some 284 millions, or one-sixth of the whole. Thus, while the average population of the eight Powers and China is 161 millions, and that of the Powers without China about 131 millions, that of the smaller states is about 6½ millions.
> Accordingly it is quite clear that the existing position of the Dominions in the Constitution of the British Commonwealth is unreasonable and unsatisfactory. Its drawbacks have lately, indeed, been largely mitigated for the time being by voluntary measures wisely taken by the central government. But it is nevertheless absolutely necessary that the legal position should be changed fundamentally and permanently.
> The citizens of the Dominions have marked their arrival at collective political maturity in the noblest way possible. The traditions and the flag of England have always been their birthright. They have now shown that they are in every respect qualified to enter into active participation in the administration of the great Commonwealth which is as truly theirs as ours. Equally manifest is it that, by every title which blood relationship, affection and generosity can create, there is firmly established on the part of Britain an enduring right to their boundless devotion, their constant counsel, and their ever ready aid.
> These decisive facts are now realized on both sides. Only when they are frankly and fully recognized in our political relations—when our Constitutional system corresponds to the needs and aspirations of the aggregate commonwealth—will the British union be properly and adequately assured.
> In order that the inhabitants of the Dominions may enjoy full self-government and the United Kingdom may secure the benefit of their participation in the affairs of common interest to all parts of the British Empire, the federation of the British Commonwealth of Nations is necessary.
> At present only the inhabitants of the United Kingdom enjoy full self-government. The most important branches of administration are those concerned with foreign relations, defence, and other matters of common concern to all the constituent communities of the British Commonwealth. In these functions the inhabitants of the Dominions have no constitutional participation. In the decision of their most important concerns they have no right to any share.

Now we come back to matters absolutely Canadian. I spoke yesterday of the proposer of the Address; now I come to the seconder of the Address (Hon. Mr. Chapais). It has been my privilege and my pleasure to have known him for more than forty years, and, unlike the proposer of the Address, he never was a Liberal—not for one minute. He was always an out-and-out Conservative, and always enjoyed the full and entire confidence of the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic church. He enjoys the confidence of the hierarchy, whilst Mr. Bourassa controls the lower clergy, the ill-informed parochial clergy who read that seditious paper Le Devoir. These are a part of the clergy who will not or cannot learn to speak English, who are anti-British, who gloated over the defeat of the French in 1914, and who, really and sincerely, through misinformation or lack of knowledge, thought it was a visitation of Providence upon France for the treatment of the priests and nuns in that country. These priests in Quebec should remember that nowhere on God's earth does the Roman Catholic church enjoy more freedom than under the British flag.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Are we going into theology or into practical work? I do not care about the priests, or anything else.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not want to answer the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I was calling the attention of the Speaker to this point.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable member for Granville has always been a great student and a brilliant littérateur. The calling of a littérateur is one that is not well known outside of the province of Quebec. As a rule, the littérateur receives very little pecuniary reward for his labours, but he does not seem to care. That calling does not seem to appeal to the practical mind of the Anglo-Saxon. However, just as a sort of pastime, the honourable gentleman from Granville became a lawyer, and next went into journalism, which they say leads to everything provided you leave it. The honourable gentleman as a journalist proved himself a splendid writer and a powerful, polished, accurate, and convincing speaker. Some thirty-three years ago—it was in 1887, if my memory serves me—he was a political candidate in his native county of Kamouraska. He acquired some notoriety at that time in connection with his correspondence with the late Thomas McGreevy. Afterwards he became a very prominent Cabinet Minister in the province of Quebec. For many years, I believe about thirty, he has been a Legislative Councillor in that province, and I understand that he still holds that position. It will be a unique position, if ever there is a change in the province of Quebec, which is most unlikely, because then the honourable gentleman would have to be either President of the Council or a minister of the Crown, because there are only two Conservatives in the Upper Chamber at present—the Honourable Mr. Girouard and the honourable the seconder of the Address. If I had to make a choice for him, I would suggest that he become President of the Council. He would then be luxuriously and beautifully housed. He would receive an emolument as President of the Council, an indemnity as Legislative Councillor, and an indemnity as Senator. All these things, which the honourable gentleman richly deserves, are in the remote future, however, because after twenty-three years the Liberal party is still going stronger than ever.

The honourable gentleman is a great acquisition to this House, so I compliment the Government upon its nomination. It is not often that I have an opportunity of congratulating the Government. In this instance, however, this side of the House has been almost unanimous in congratulating the Government upon calling the honourable gentleman to this House. He belongs to an historical family. For many years his father was one of Sir John Macdonald's Cabinet Ministers; he was a member of the House of Commons and a Senator for seventeen years. The honourable gentleman represents the division of Granville. It is an historical division. It comprises the counties of Temiscouata, Kamouraska and L'Islet. The sitting Legislative Councillor at the time of Confederation was the Honourable Luc Letellier de St. Just. After a memorable fight he had carried the division of Granville; and it required no small fight for a Liberal to carry any constituency in the face of the bitter war that was waged by the priests and the bishops at that time. When the Senate was constituted the Legislative Councillors were appointed Senators, except Luc Letellier de St. Just. Sir John Macdonald procured the passage of an Order in Council in which was submitted to the Governor General of the time a list of those proposed for appointment, but the name of Letellier de St. Just was omitted, and the Governor General very properly refused to sign the Order in Council until his name was added to the list. Letellier sat in this Chamber until December, 1877, when he resigned to become Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec. He was succeeded, as many remember very well, by Sir Alphonse Pelletier, who was Speaker of the Senate from 1896 to 1900, and who also resigned to accept an appointment as judge in place of Senator Choquette, who at that time had resigned his judgeship, and who has since resigned from this body to accept another judgeship.

Granville is probably the only division which, since Confederation, had always been represented in this Chamber by a man of the Liberal persuasion. The electoral battles between the Honourable Mr. Chapais, the father of the present incumbent for Granville, and the Honourable Letellier de St. Just are legendary in the province of Quebec. Many years after these two great men had disappeared from the political arena the electors of the county were still calling each other Letelliers and Chapais's. I remember that in 1872 in Kamouraska—it was open voting then—an old man was brought in to vote and was asked, " Whom have you been brought in to vote for?" He would say, " Chapais." He would be told, " He is not running," and the man would say: " That does not make any difference; if he is not running I am not voting." The elections were so hot that Kamouraska was actually disfranchised upon the pretext of riots in the county, which I suppose is the only example of the kind in the records of Parliament.

In his eloquent address the other day the honourable gentleman spoke at length of the re-establishment of the soldiers on the land, and instanced a case of more than two hundred years ago, in 1667, when Talon, who was then governor of New France, demobilized the regiment of Carignan Salières and established its soldiers on the land. But Talon was much more provident than the present Government; and I think I may justly blame the Government for not doing as well as was done over two hundred years ago. After providing those soldiers with land, Talon actually sent to France for a shipload of women to provide them with wives. I would like to know whether the leader of the Government is going to provide wives for our soldiers. They are being provided with money and many other things; why should they not have wives? This shows that the world is getting no better. Speaking in all seriousness, until these men have someone to look after their households, doing work that they cannot do, they cannot possibly make a success of farming. There is plenty of work around the farm for a housewife, and if the Government were wise it would insist that only married men or men who would agree to marry should go on the farm, because a bachelor will not live on a lonely section or quarter-section if he has no female companion to help him look after the place. The honourable member for Granville might have added that about a hundred years later, when General Murray demobilized the Scotch Highlanders, they settled along the shores of the lower St. Lawrence. That accounts for the fact that many red-headed Scotchmen with names like Blackburn, Warren, McLaren, Fraser, McNicholl, are to-day to be found around Murray Bay, all of whom speak French and nothing else; but from their appearance nobody can deny that they are of good Scottish blood, and they make a hardy population on the banks of the St. Lawrence.

There are many omissions in the Speech from the Throne. It would have been very interesting, for instance, if it had informed us what progress has been made in the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, so dear to the heart of the honourable gentleman from Boissevain (Hon. Mr. Schaffner). Not a word is said about that great project. We are left absolutely in the dark as to whether it is the intention of the Government to sink any more millions in the harbour of Port Nelson. Have the Government discovered, after all these years, that the project was a mistake? I am not blaming the present Union Government, or the Conservative Government that preceded it. It was the Liberal Government that started the project. We were blamed for many things, and if our opponents considered that this undertaking was not a wise one they should not have followed in our footsteps. When the country put them in power, they should not have continued doing the bad things that we were doing. If the people had not thought they would do better, they would never have put them there. But there is not a word in the Speech from the Throne about the Hudson Bay railway. Let us hope, then, that this venturesome scheme is now buried and that we shall not hear much more about it.

It would have been interesting also to be told in the Speech from the Throne about the National railways. The National railways are with us, and, like the poor, I suppose, they will always be with us. Now that we have them, I believe it is the duty of every patriotic Canadian to make the best of a bad bargain and do what he can to help the National railways along. I must commend the Government upon the appointment of Mr. D. B. Hanna to manage the Canadian National railways. There is no one better qualified. I understand that he has been connected with the C. N. R. from its very inception. I understand that he was introduced to Mr. Mackenzie by none other than the member for Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson), who told Mr. Mackenzie that he could get no better man to look after the financing of that enterprise, which needed then, as later on, very careful attention. Mr. Hanna has done the very best he could, and I think the Government should be commended.

Next year, when we shall have the Grand Trunk railway, it will be a good policy for the Government to take also some of the officials who are familiar with the work of that railway, and put them in charge of that part of the National railways. It would be, I think, prudent and wise for the Government to make an arrangement with them as soon as possible, otherwise the ablest of these officials will be picked up by some of the American roads and the country will lose the advantage of their services. I think I am talking good sense when I say that it is the immediate duty of the Government or those in charge of the National railways to secure those officials by saying to them: "Do not leave the employ of the Grand Trunk because your tenure of office is so insecure; stay on the job; you will not be changed; the best of you will remain in charge of the road that you know so well." It must be remembered, honourable gentlemen, that the Grand Trunk, which has been so much decried, gave a better freight service than the Canadian Pacific railway ever had. If you inquire of shippers they will tell you that the Grand Trunk railway's freight service was prompter and more satisfactory—that it had a larger number of cars per mile, etc.

Now, I agree entirely with Mr. Hanna that there should be no politics in the management of those railroads, and I am glad to find him saying that there has been none so far. It is the duty of Mr. Hanna to see that there shall be no political interference. If there is, he cannot put the blame upon the Government. Let him try to make the railways meet expenses and not come to Parliament for more money, and there will certainly be no politics. Both sides in Parliament will say: "Go on with your work; you are doing well and we will not interfere with you." But what do we find? It is rumoured that this year the receipts are behind the cost of operation by $30,000,000; that is, two millions and-a-half a month.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Is the honourable gentleman speaking of the Canadian Northern or of the other Government line?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: My information is that it is on the National railways.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: On the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: On the National railways; so the honourable gentleman is just as wise as I am in this respect.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: He would not be very wise if he were not.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: There is a deficit of $30,000,000, the difference between the receipts from passengers and freight and the cost of operation.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I was suggesting that the honourable gentleman disassociate the Canadian Northern from the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific. If the honourable gentleman could give us those figures separately, it would help us a great deal.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That would be very interesting, and I would suggest to my honourable friend that he should make it the subject of an inquiry in this House. Perhaps the Government will be able to separate the figures. The information would be interesting.

As there are 365 days in a year, the deficit of $30,000,000 means that we are losing every day $82,191.78. In other words, stating it in hours, we are losing because of the pleasure of being railway operators, $3,424.65 an hour, or $57 a minute. That is only on the Canadian National railways as we own them to-day. What will be the loss when we add to those lines the Grand Trunk system? How much will the deficit be next year? I do not know and I should not like to make even an estimate. If you refer to Hansard, you will find that my estimate of the deficit on the Canadian Northern Railway system was $30,000,000. It may have been luck, but my estimate appears to have turned out right. But how much would it be for betterments; for the necessary rolling stock, which is becoming obsolete every day; for repairs; for stations and sidings and workshops; for locomotives; and, last but not least, for the upkeep of the hotels—the Chateau Laurier in Ottawa, the Fort Garry in Winnipeg, the Macdonald in Edmonton? If there is a place where there can be a leakage, it is certainly a hotel. But those hotels are going to be dry, so I suppose there will be no leakage. I have always been told that dry hotels did not pay; that the great bulk of the money made in hotels was made over the bar by the sale of strong stuff. Well, there ought to be a large deficit, then. If private individuals cannot run dry hotels without a loss, what will the Government do?

I heartily approve of Mr. Hanna trying to keep the railways out of politics, but how will he do it when Parliament has to provide the necessary funds to meet the deficit and for additional capital? The other day Mr. Hanna, in the city of Ottawa, made a most interesting speech before the Canadian Club, in which he said that if the rates prevailing in Australia were applied to the National railways of Canada, there would be enough profit to pay the interest on the war debt, and over and above that, there would be a surplus of $100,000,000 annually. Well, honourable gentlemen, that shows us what Government operation means in Australia, if the people are taxed to that extent. However, Mr. Hanna gives the figures and makes comparisons, etc., and I think he arrives at the correct conclusion. If the farmers of the Northwest, with their long haul, wanted Government operation, they now have what they wanted, and they must not whine. If they are going to pay for what they have got, they must pay much higher than at present. That is what the people of Australia have been doing, and you will notice that the population of Australia has not been increasing, but has been almost stagnant, under government ownership, because there has been no incentive in government operation to open new territories. However, now that we have government ownership we must make the best of it. Without going as far as Australia in respect to rates, Mr. Hanna might increase the rates so as to meet at least the cost of operation and the interest on the fixed charges. Then, and only then, will the railway be entirely out of politics.

If the Government would give me one moment's attention, I would make what is, I think, a very valuable suggestion. If the Government are sincere about keeping politics out of the management of the Canadian National railways, they have a simple means of proving their sincerity to the satisfaction of every member on either side of this House and to the satisfaction of members in another place. Let them give the farmers and the Opposition the right to appoint their quota of directors to the Board of Management of the National railways. That would be a very simple matter. The Government would naturally appoint a majority of their own representatives, but there should be a number of others. After all, the National railways belong just as much to the Opposition as to the Government, and they belong just as much to the farmers as to the workingmen. The property of the public, representing the huge sum of two billion dollars, which is about equal to our national debt, should be entrusted not to the care of politicians of either one stripe or the other, but should be administered by joint control. If ever there was need of Union Government, it is in administering our national railways. There is where Union Government might do some good, by allowing the Opposition to nominate some members to that Board of Management, and by allowing the farmers and the labour men to name representatives, so that all classes would be represented on the Board; but let the Government in power keep a majority, as it properly should. Then the control should be left with Parliament, not with the Cabinet, just as in the case of the Auditor General.

There is one little detail that I omitted. I was asked about Roumania. Honourable gentlemen will remember that this country, in a moment of generosity, or folly, actually furnished $25,000,000 to send various articles to Roumania. I am informed that out of the $25,000,000 some $20,000,000 is gone. Where is it gone to? Who got the money? It was supposed to be for Canadian goods. Who got the $20,000,000? It would be interesting to know. Another thing that would be very interesting to know would be, what security has our country got for that $20,000,000 that went all the way across the Atlantic and almost all the way across Europe? What was there to guarantee repayment to Canada of that sum of money? Was it Roumanian bonds? If so, at what discount were those bonds taken? I should like to see anyone go into the market of one of our great cities of Montreal or Toronto, or even into the New York market, and try to sell Roumanian bonds at present. How much would he get? This is a question on which I hope we may get some enlightenment this session. Twenty million dollars is quite a large sum, and why should it be spent without our knowing what was obtained with it and who got the money?

The honourable member for Boissevain (Hon. Mr. Schaffner) the other day made a very able speech, as he generally does. He is very industrious, and if more members of the Senate were as industrious as the honourable gentleman the Senate would prove its usefulness even more than it does. But in his remarks with regard to the Northwest, I think he must have slipped a cog when he stated that the average yield in the province of Manitoba was only 10 bushels per acre. He went further and said that the farmers in Ontario and in Quebec were not nearly as well off, but better off.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Will the honourable gentleman excuse me one moment? He misunderstood me. I stated that the average of wheat in the Dominion of Canada, not in Manitoba, was ten bushels per acre in 1919.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It is the average in Canada? The bulk of the wheat is grown in the Northwest; so I take it that that is about the average in the Northwest. Could the honourable gentleman tell us what was the average in Manitoba in the last two years?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Last year the average in Manitoba was the best average of the three provinces.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: How much was it?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: It was an average of probably 12 bushels.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Other provinces were not so good?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: For Canada, as I said, the average was 10 bushels. I think that is correct.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Anyway, honourable gentlemen, I was correct in saying that the honourable gentleman stated that the farmers of Ontario and the farmers of Quebec were not merely as well off but better off than the farmers in those western provinces. If that is so, why did we spend so much money in opening up that Northwest? Everyone has seen deserted farms in Ontario. If you travelled some years ago from Toronto to Owen Sound, or from Toronto to Collingwood, you would see on both sides of the railway farms that had been abandoned, with boards nailed up in the windows of the houses, padlocks on the doors, etc.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Will the honourable gentleman tell us of any farm in the older parts of Ontario that is not being worked to-day?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I know this much: I have been connected with an estate and we could not get people to go on the farm, or to pay any rent for it. It is in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Where?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Around Morrisburg in the county of Dundas.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Among the rocks.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They would pay no rent at all.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Too near the States.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yesterday the honourable gentleman from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Boyer) made a very interesting speech. He referred to the Commission of Conservation and to the efforts being made for the protection of the forests, etc. He spoke of the quantity of pulpwood being used in America. In order to show the immense quantity of pulpwood used, I took the trouble to look it up, and I find that the quantity of pulpwood used in North America in a year is so enormous that it would make a pile four feet wide by twelve feet high extending 3,000 miles; or, to put it more plainly, a fence four feet thick and six feet high running along both sides of the right of way of the C. P. R. right across the continent from Montreal to Vancouver—even through the Prairie Provinces, where wood is so scarce.

Now, there is a peculiar thing about this pulpwood, and, since we are on the question, I may mention it. Price Brothers in 1911 were very much in favour of our having "no truck or trade with the Yankees." They organized the Nationalists of Quebec. In Quebec district—and the honourable gentleman from the Gulf division (Hon. Mr. L'Espérance) knows very well the details of this—Sir William Price, like Sir Herbert Ames, was one of the chief organizers, and even furnished the means. I do not know whether he, like Sir Herbert Ames, went to Mr. Bourassa's paper, Le Devoir, and actually paid money to have it circulated in order to denounce the navy or any other form of help to the Empire Trading with the Yankees at that time was disloyal; but to-day what do we find? We find the Government actually sending police down to Price Brothers to compel them to keep some of their paper for Canadian journals, and to prevent them selling it all in the United States, where they would like to sell it because they get a better price.

What about the Franchise Bill promised in the Speech from the Throne? I think the last Franchise Bill, that of 1917, can be described in a very few words: multiplication of favourable votes; elimination of adverse votes—and all on the ground of patriotism. I am afraid of the new gift the Government is going to bring to us. Like Virgil, I would say, "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes." I might paraphrase that and say I fear the Government even when they bring gifts. I hope the Bill will be of such a nature that the people of Canada will be able to give free expression to their will.

Now I come to the leader of this House. I have watched him for twenty years. Every year his speeches are better and his eloquence is greater. You must remember that orators can be made, whereas poets must be born. Boileau says: "On nait poète et l'on devient orateur." Or, if you want it translated: "Nascuntur poetæ, fiunt oratores." When the honourable gentlemen soars to the lofty regions of eloquence he becomes a poet and lets his fancy and imagination carry him to the realms of wildest romance. Honourable gentlemen, lend me your ears! Hearken! the leader speaks:

> During the years of war-tragedy through which Canada has passed this Government has stood firmly by the helm. The ship of state has been piloted through the turbulent waters of stress and storm until to-day Canada looks forward with hope to the voyage of prosperity upon which she is about to enter.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: If that is not romance, let the honourable gentleman again remember what Boileau says:

> Rash author, 'tis a presumptuous crime
> To undertake the sacred art of rhyme;
> If at thy birth the stars that ruled thy sense
> Shone not with a poetic influence,
> In thy strait genius their wilt be bound,
> Find Phœbus deaf and Pegasus unsound.

Who stood by the helm of the Ship of State? Your pilot, your captain, has been on shore for three years. The poor derelict has drifted in the dark—not one star to guide her course! With sails in shreds, with rudder lost, she has drifted so close to the rocks of despair that she has cast her last anchor of hope before being dashed on the shoals of the island of oblivion. All her spare anchors will not hold her, because they are dragging in the mud of iniquity. The lights are going out one by one, and the vessel is leaking on all sides. The first brilliant light to go out was the ex-Minister of Public Works, the Honourable Robert Rogers. The next was the organizer of victory—"l'organisateur de la victoire"—the Minister of War par excellence, Sir Sam Hughes. Then that beacon light, Sir Thomas White, disappeared from sight. He was followed by the Minister of Public Works, Hon. Mr. Carvell, who jumped overboard and swam to a safe haven of rest for the next ten years. Another Minister of War, the Honourable Mr. Mewburn, gave up the ship; and the last light on financial matters on board the ship of state went out with the Honourable A. K. Maclean. The Honourable Mr. Roche has floated into the Civil Service Commission, and the Honourable Mr. Crothers is still reaching out for some part of the wreck to support him. And last, Mr. Crerar, whose star did not rise in the Orient, but in the Occident, who was going to lead his people, the man who told them that this Government was all that was good, now finds that he made a mistake, and he also has disappeared. His star rose in the West, and shines not very brightly in the province of Quebec. Did I exaggerate when I said that the remarks of the honourable gentleman were pure romance? No. Unless the people rise in their might and put a new crew in charge, the Ship of State is doomed.

Hon. J. H. LEGRIS (translation): Honourable gentlemen, the debate on the Address which has been proceeding for several days in this House, has been the occasion for a large number of senators to deliver eloquent speeches. May I be permitted to add a few remarks to what has been already said? We have been somewhat surprised to see how much trouble has been taken to persuade the Liberal senators to be moderate, kind, and indulgent, and not to attack the Government. I was amused to hear the honourable senator from Bedford (Hon. Mr. Pope) preach moderation and the forgetfulness of party ties. When one recalls the kind of speeches made by the honourable gentleman during all the years he sat in the House of Commons and even since he became a member of this House, when one remembers the sarcasms and the bitter attacks which he launched against Sir Wilfrid Laurier, there remains only one thing to do, after listening to the counsel he has given, and that is to smile.

As to another of our colleagues, the honourable senator from Acadie (Hon. Mr. Poirier), we all know him. He is always very polished, and even unctuous; but I believe there is not another member of this Chamber more attached to his party, or more ready to serve it in evil as in good fortune.

We have been told that senators should not make use of too strong expressions in discussing political questions. I admit that. I admit it the more readily because of the fact that during the several Sessions I sat in the House of Commons I had occasion more than once to dissent, and to express my dissent, from the opinions of my party and my political chiefs. Consequently I believe I have the right, when I feel that the time has come, to raise my voice, and to say to the Government and to this honourable House that the moment has arrived for doing something. I have no need to cite anything else than the feeling of unrest which reigns from one end of the country to the other; and if my own words are insufficient to prove that, I will make use of the eloquent language addressed to this House by the new member for the Granville division (Hon. Mr. Chapais) in seconding the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. May I be permitted to quote two or three lines from his eloquent speech to prove that the unrest is general and acute in the country? Here are the words of my honourable colleague:

> The increase in the cost of living has become almost a public calamity. It has caused anguish to reign in many a household. It haunts, like a nightmare, an infinite number of firesides. It wrings the heart of many a mother, and furrows with lines of care the brow of many a father.

This is finely expressed, but all the same it is very true. Nobody fails to recognize its truth except the Government; yet they have had proofs in the utterances of numerous friends and several of their party newspapers. I consider that, in the face of all this unrest, the members of the Senate of Canada have a duty to fulfil—to raise their voices and to propose some remedy to relieve the distress and to give new hope to the people.

I have read carefully the speech of the honourable senator from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), and I am not ready to believe that it was too violent. On the contrary, I maintain that he had reason to speak as he did, because what he said was the truth, and the truth it is better to express than to conceal. The causes of unrest are many; but naturally the prime one is the high cost of living due no doubt to the war. But there are two other causes, which are very serious, and which should have been remedied long ago. The tariff we have in Canada is too high. I heard the honourable member from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) yesterday speak approvingly of the policy of protection. He said that it had been his view for fifty years. I am astonished that my honourable friend has learned nothing on this subject in fifty years. It is evident that circumstances have changed. I have believed, and I believe still, that it is proper to accord a certain degree of protection to infant industries, but when I see industries which have been established in the country for many years, which are completely equipped and capable of competing with similar industries in other countries, I ask why the Government should continue to accord them a protection which gives them special advantages over the rest of the population of Canada and which makes of them public beneficiaries and a privileged class.

Will you permit me, honourable gentlemen, to give you some examples in support of my contention. Take, for instance, rice, an article of consumption used in all families. For the year ending the 31st March, we imported 15,373,286 pounds of cleaned rice, and 50,428,411 pounds of uncleaned. The duty on cleaned rice is 75 cents per hundred pounds; uncleaned rice is free of duty. We have three rice factories in the country. The Government collected in duties $111,639. The protected industry had the advantage of a protection of $3 for every dollar collected by the Government.

Let us next take cloths and clothing. There exists a duty of from 30 to 40 per cent on imported goods. The importer adds to the purchase price the duty imposed by the Government, and he puts his percentage both on the duty paid to the Government and on the price of the goods themselves. The wholesaler to whom he sells does the same thing. The retail merchant who buys from the wholesaler has to pay all the accumulated percentages as well as the net cost of the goods themselves, so that the ultimate consumer often finds himself obliged to pay double the original price.

We imported last year 545,000,000 pounds of sugar. Of that amount 2,000,000 pounds was refined. The duty on refined sugar is one cent per pound. The Government, therefore, collected on this article duties to the amount of $20,000; but the refiners, of whom there are nine in Canada, enjoyed a protection which enabled them to realize profits of about $7,000,000 from the consumers. Why maintain a duty on sugar when raw sugar is bought in the countries where it is produced, and the total cost of refining cannot be higher in Canada than it is in the United States? Is it that the workers in the Canadian refiners are not as capable as those in the refineries of the United States and other countries. Why this privileged class? And, remember it is the class of the prosperous, the millionaires, while the people are subjected to duties as unjust as they are useless.

We have in this country other great industries which derive enormous and even scandalous profits at the expense of the people. I may mention the Patton Manufacturing Company, of Sherbrooke, which realized last year a profit of from 72 to 100 per cent upon its invested capital. We have also the Canadian Cottons, Limited, which, after providing for all the expenses of the year, declared a net profit of 32 per cent upon its invested capital. The Dominion Textile Company admitted, under examination, that its profits for the year amounted to 310 per cent on its invested capital. The flour mills also made fabulous profits. It is in such enterprises that we find men who are in favour of protection. My honourable friend from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) has certainly not studied the situation. I believe that he is influenced by his surroundings.

The Government is doing nothing to lighten the burdens which lie upon the shoulders of the people, and which have been placed there for the purpose of filling the pockets of the great capitalists and manufacturers. I do not hesitate to say that the tariff should be modified, as Sir Thomas White promised, in announcing to us last year that a committee of the Government would be appointed to study it, with a view to a revision in the following session. All that has fallen through; it has passed by, like the flight of a bird, and the Government does nothing. Sir Thomas White reappeared in the House of Commons yesterday, and announced a new programme, little different from that which existed already. Here are his words, as reported in the Montreal Gazette, which for some time has not regarded with approval the policy of the present Government. But Sir Thomas White declared that by adding a word to the name of the existing party it could sweep the country at the polls. Instead of being named the Liberal-Conservative party, it should be called National-Liberal-Conservative-Unionist.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS: Here are the words of Sir Thomas White, as reported in this morning's Gazette:

> With these undoubted qualifications, Sir Thomas White urges the Government and Unionist party to carry on as a National Liberal-Conservative party, embracing in its membership those Liberal Unionists who believe in the protective principle which has always been the guiding feature of Conservative policy. "If Sir Robert Borden will form a National Liberal-Conservative party of the old Conservative party and Unionist Liberals who think alike on fiscal and other questions they will sweep the country."

The Government—I might say the present Government, for it has changed only in name—attained power in 1911 by deceiving the electors. The election cry from one end of the country to the other was: "No truck or trade with the Yankees." While loudly extolling the loyalty of the Canadian people to the British Crown, they accused the French Canadians of being disloyal to England. In the election of 1917 the war, with the aid of the press which was at the service of the gentlemen of the Government, served as the pretext or cloak to conceal all that had happened in the intervening period. There was but one cry in the country; it was to win the war. Despite the enormous faults and errors of the Government, they carried the elections with the win-the-war cry. The Government was maintained in power by those elections, and it has continued to sshelter itself under the cloak of the war, and has, with a fiendish disregard of consequences, spent the millions of the country's money without heed or control, and with a boundless prodigality. We had for four years, as Minister of Militia, Sir Sam Hughes, who, as every one knows, is an enthusiast—an enthusiast without measure; and what has astonished me is, that it took four years for Sir Robert Borden really to understand the character of Sir Sam Hughes. We had in England at Argyle House a millionaire and incompetent minister, who gave himself up to a life of ease, and practised favouritism in all things; but the secret reason for all this was the Government's desire to hang on to office and to allow their friends to realize millions; always under the pretext of the war. We shall never know nor be able to render an exact account of all that transpired during the war, and always under the pretext of patriotism, of loyalty, and of zeal for the Empire. I am going to quote here a few lines from an article which appeared in the Farmer's Sun of the 15th October last. They are as follows:

> A great deal has been said about the anxiety of Union Government for the welfare of Canadian soldiers and the safety of the Empire. And yet there seems no possible room for doubt that the Canadian Government and the Ontario Government actually allowed Germany to get her supply of nickel from Ontario mines. We have read evidence on it carefully because it seemed altogether too horrible to be believed. Without nickel Germany would have been powerless. Yet when the war had been in progress for years, in fact, until the United States entered the war, Ontario nickel from the mines at Sudbury was going to Germany. The very last ship that left this side of the Atlantic for Germany had nine car loads or 360 tons of Ontario nickel aboard. One hesitates to mention this crime of the Government of Ontario and the Dominion because it seems too terribly horrible—that the mines of Ontario were turning out hundreds of tons of nickel to enable Germany to make weapons to destroy Canada's sons. At any time the Ontario Government could have stopped the export. But that export went on.
> Fifty thousand Canadian boys lie dead in Europe, slain in part by metal mined in their own country. While women were sending food and clothing to keep their boys well and happy, the country that asked those boys to go to war was allowing Canadian nickel to go to Germany to make bullets to kill Canadians.

It is incredible, yet there is the fact; and at the same time the Government was shouting loyalty and patriotism to the Empire on the one hand, and disloyalty on the other hand, while their friends were making millions by means as criminal as those mentioned in the article I have just read.

Even in this House cruel insinuations were made evidently directed against the French Canadians, but I may say at once that the French Canadians are not at all excited on that score. The French Canadian is a patriot: he loves his country. He is a thoughtful man. He understands that these accusations were made for the purpose of winning the election. But to-day he is amply avenged for all this vituperation. We have had testimony of the highest value, re-establishing the truth and vindicating the name and the reputation of the French Canadians.

The honourable member for Boissevain (Hon. Mr. Schaffner), in his eloquent speech, used these words:

> Quebec is not only a great agricultural country, with a splendid class of farmers, but it has also wonderful industries. I knew very little about Quebec until, through the kindness of one of our most respected members, I had the privilege of visiting some of the industries of that province last year. Any man from the West who has had the opportunity of visiting the great industries of Ontario and Quebec will agree that they are wonderful.

I quote this testimony of a member of this House, and I emphasize it for the purpose of showing that the accusations made against the province of Quebec were not justified, and that their falsity is already recognized.

But here is something rather amusing which I am going to read to the House, taken from an article which appeared in the Farmer's Sun of the 11th of February:

It is funny to hear the big interests making love to Quebec. No Bolshevism there. No demagogues preaching sedition. No labor agitation. A contented, hardworking, thrifty people. A safe and sane province, where you may invest your money at seven per cent, in privately owned concerns, unmolested by Government ownership. The finest province of Canada, and a glorious example to the turbulent West, with its organized farmers and labor men.

It is for the French Canadian to laugh, perhaps rather bitterly. Only two years ago they were being denounced as slackers and traitors. The whole province was boiling with sedition. The sturdy men of Ontario ought to go down to Quebec and clear the French Canadians out. They were priest-ridden. They were anti-British. "Shall Quebec rule?" was the war cry.

And now these fire-eaters are down on their marrow-bones, offering incense to the Quebec. Why? Have the French Canadians changed their character? We have seen no evidence of it. The secret is that their votes are wanted for high protection and the big interests. "Come back" cries the agonized father, "and all will be forgiven." No; even that does not quite describe it. "Come back and we will beg your forgiveness for all the hard things we said in 1917. Instead of abuse we will give you flattery. Instead of charging you with sedition we will give you a certificate of character as bulwarks of defence against Bolshevism. Only stand by the sacred tariff and the big interests and the big profits, and we will exalt Quebec above Ontario as the premier province of Canada."

As we say, it is for Quebec to laugh. But what opinion must French Canadians hold of those who have passed from violent abuse to flattery based upon selfishness?

As I have said, I have never believed that more than a reasonable degree of attention was paid by French Canadians to the unkind things said of the province of Quebec, because they have understood that this was done only with the object of winning the elections. But I have said to myself many times that if there was in the ministry a single statesman who would have desired to act in a manner worthy of himself, he would have put a stop to that flood of insult poured forth from the English press of this country and the aspersions cast by politicians upon the province of Quebec. It was not Sir Wilfrid Laurier who would have permitted such a thing. No; he would have preferred to remain forever in opposition rather than to obtain power by means so unworthy.

As I have said, the expenditures on the war have been both extravagant and foolish. One would have thought that the success of the war depended solely on the efforts of Canada; but the Government was much more interested in winning the elections, and in making money for its friends, the bloated monopolists and the gigantic manufacturing interests, than in winning the war. The war was the pretext by which they served their purpose and by which they still wish to do so. But to-day it would seem that they desire to change their tactics, and to direct public opinion to the illness of Sir Robert Borden. I do not believe that that manoeuvre will succeed, because, if I know anything of public opinion, I understand that the people are beginning to be incredulous regarding that illness and to feel that the comedy has already lasted too long. If, however, Sir Robert Borden is ill, as he announces through his friends, he has only one thing to do, that is, to resign, and yield his place to another, in order that this anomaly without parallel in this country may cease.

For some time we have seen the ministers, one after another, deserting the Government, abandoning the ship in distress, which, without its captain, is drifting hither and thither; and this great Unionist party, knowing all too well the trend of public sentiment, has never once attempted in a single county to secure the election of a new minister to replace any of those who have resigned.

There is much talk of the tariff, and with good reason. But, in spite of the promises made in Parliament by Sir Thomas White, and repeated elsewhere by several of his friends, to name a government committee to inquire into the tariff with the object of modifying it next Session, if one can judge to-day by what has been said by the honourable the leader of the Government in this House (Sir James Lougheed), nothing will be done, because no one dares to interfere with the interests of the manufacturers and the profiteers. To give an idea of the sentiment of the country, it is sufficient to recall that which has just taken place in the provincial elections in the province of Ontario. The result of those elections is undoubtedly due to two causes. The province of Ontario was no more in favour of conscription than was the province of Quebec, and the electors of the province, being fully aware of the sympathy which existed between the Unionist party at Ottawa and the Hearst Government at Toronto, and, being well aware also of the monopoly exercised by the capitalists and the insatiable monopolists, desired to make it clear that they were taking their interests into their own hands. We may expect to witness the same result from one end of the country to the other at the first opportunity. Conscription was certainly a great blunder. This is already recognized, and the future will render the fact still clearer. It was a political question on which people had the right to differ in opinion. Conscription was not necessary, because voluntary enlistment was proceeding successfully, and was securing more soldiers for the army than did conscription. Moreover, the conscripts, after the law had been applied with the slowness inevitable in such circumstances, had not time to reach the front; and, the worst of it was that this conscription measure cost the country $6,000,000 for its enforcement, and perhaps even more to individuals, to say nothing of the trouble, the anxiety, and the confusion which everywhere resulted from it. But the hope of the Government was to arouse the indignation of the English-speaking provinces against the province of Quebec, always for the same end, that of winning the elections. These gentlemen of the Government have returned to kindle the fires of civil discord in the country for the contemptible advantage of their party interest. Sir Wilfrid Laurier would not thus have permitted his friends to raise the cry of race and religion.

After conscription we had the law of national registration. It has never been possible to understand the purpose of such childish legislation, if it was not to give the ministers an opportunity of furnishing their friends with the means of gaining $800,000 at the country's expense. We have also seen these gentlemen establishing a journal known as the Official Bulletin, but which was in reality the organ of Mr. Rowell, established for the purpose of sounding his praises, and in some degree those of the other ministers, at a time when newsprint was becoming scarcer and dearer. That interesting journal cost the country during the few ephemeral months of its existence the pretty sum of $100,000. The expression of Mr. Meighen, "Ruin Canada if necessary to save the Empire," has found its application on many occasions, and it has been put in operation on the most extensive scale possible. After the Official Bulletin of Mr. Rowell we have had the innumerable commissions nominated by the Government, which have cost the country millions of dollars, and have done practically nothing. The most regrettable means have been employed by these gentlemen for the purpose of hanging on to office: disunion, prejudice, race cries, the most cruel accusations against the French Canadians, and particularly against Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

As I said a moment ago, the French Canadians have not been too sensitive because of these attempts to humiliate them, nor too much hurt by the means employed, and to-day they are well avenged and rehabilitated. The French Canadians and the province of Quebec will not vote against the Government for these reasons. They will vote against the Government on its merits. I sincerely believe that they will vote against the Government because the Government has, under the excuse of the war, committed errors which are unpardonable. It has established in the country an autocracy with its Orders in Council frequently unjustifiable, and with its commissions, without number, which have cost the country millions, and which have been without any real value; and during all that time the ministers continued to evade their responsibility. The French Canadians and the province of Quebec will vote against the Government, because it is incompetent to repair its errors, incompetent to diminish the unreasonably high cost of living, incompetent to allay the prevailing unrest, and finally because it is in the hands of great capitalists who are making millions at the expense of the people. The province of Quebec will vote against the Government, because it is without a head and without cohesion, and because, as I have said, while one after another of its members are deserting it, they dare not throw open a single county to elect their successors, because they know well the state of public opinion regarding their administration. The Government and the Unionist party are falling to pieces. They inspire confidence in no one, not even in a great number of their friends. The electors of the province of Quebec will vote against the Government and the Unionist party because of the enormous debt which they have heaped upon the country, because of the disquieting condition of our finances, and because of the incompetence of our finance ministers, Sir Thomas White and Sir Henry Drayton. I have for them personally the greatest respect, but I do not hesitate to say that they are not great financiers, as their party press has declared them to be. They have not proved their competence as ministers of finance, neither the one nor the other. The greatest merit of Sir Thomas White was that he was capable of borrowing instead of finding the means of levying the money necessary for the needs of the country. Instead of taking the means to make those pay who were able to do so, those who had the advantage of realizing millions out of the war, either in the manufacture of munitions or through the sale to the Government of supplies necessary for the army—instead of making those pay, I say, Sir Thomas White preferred to allow his friends to enjoy in peace their enormous profits, and to sleep tranquilly on the laurels tendered them and to the music chanted in their honour by a subservient press. It is exactly similar to the case of a man who, instead of working and producing, would be content to borrow from his neighbours. That may seem fine. He may make people believe that he is a man of great talent because he has always money in his pocket. That will last as long as his credit holds good. But the end is not far distant. The regime of constant borrowing inaugurated by these great financiers of the day is a regime which is utterly ruinous. Why have these gentlemen, instead of conscripting our children, not rather conscripted wealth? It would have been somewhat less painful for those who are possessed of some fortune to give a part of it rather than that fathers and mothers should give up their children to risk their lives in the face of the enemy at the front. The honourable senator from Boissevain (Hon. Mr. Schaffner) mentioned something the other day which I am going to repeat, not to contradict what he said, but for the purpose of drawing from it a conclusion different from his own. I have just said that our great financiers in Canada, instead of levying the money necessary to meet the expenses of the war, resorted to borrowing. The honourable senator from Boissevain mentioned what was done in New Zealand, where the population is about one-eighth of that of Canada. There was practically no munition making in New Zealand. Also the means of transport were paralyzed there, as with us. During the first four years of the war New Zealand collected in income taxes $55,085,620. Canada should have collected during the same period $472,000,000. Instead of that amount Canada collected in taxes on income and taxes on munitions $33,777,554; that is to say, $20,000,000 less than New Zealand, which has only one-eighth of our population. In 1918 New Zealand collected in taxes on income $28,097,805. In the same proportion Canada should have collected $204,743,240. Instead of that, she actually collected $21,271,038.

I will now extend the same principle of comparison to Australia. The population of Australia is about five-eighths of that of Canada. The resources of the two countries are in about the same proportions. Australia was in a better position for making war profits than was New Zealand, because of the possession of certain metals which it was able to furnish the Allies. But it had practically no war contracts. However, Australia levied a tax on profits only in 1917-18, when it realized $3,400,000. It began to levy a tax on income in 1915-16, and in the first year it collected $19,633,875, the second year $28,107,750, the third year $36,927,615. The total for the three years was $84,701,240. In the same proportions Canada should have collected $135,522,144. Instead of that Canada collected $33,777,599 on business profits and nothing on income.

I have seen in the last few days in an English paper that Sir William Henderson, revenue officer of Great Britain, had proposed an income tax from which he estimated a return to the Government of a billion pounds, and the paper comments as follows:

> In Canada one of the most lamentable features of the Government in connection with the war was their refusal to conscript wealth. It was alright to conscript a man's life and send him to the front at $1.10 a day, but the big interests who grew rich out of the war got off almost scot-free. Canada raised a smaller amount of money per capita from her munition makers and others supplying war necessities, than any other country engaged in the struggle. It is just another case of the dominence of the Big Interests in this country. The poor man was sent to the front. His employer who made millions out of the war stayed home and enjoyed the fruits of his war profiteering. Surely a man's life is worth more than money. If it was right and proper, as undoubtedly it was, to conscript men, it was a thousand times more proper that we should conscript wealth.

The electors of the province of Quebec will vote against the Government because of the infamous measure known as the War-time Elections Act, and the criminal use made of it by the friends of the Government for the purpose of stealing the election. The electors of the province of Quebec will vote against the Government because of their inability to devise means for collecting revenues sufficient for the country's needs; because of their extravagant expenditures; because of their unjustifiable borrowing; and because of the scandalous deals which took place in connection with the purchase of railways. These are some of the reasons for which I believe the province of Quebec will vote against the present Government. Notwithstanding all that I do not hesitate to reaffirm the loyalty and the patriotism of the province of Quebec. I believe sincerely that the people of the other provinces will not accuse us as did their press at the time of the last elections. I believe that it is highly desirable that the people of this country should live in sympathy, in a common accord, that harmony should reign in the different counties from one end of the country to the other. I know that the people of the province of Quebec would desire nothing so much as the fulfilment of that wish.

And now I should perhaps ask the forgiveness of the House for having taken up so much of its time. I believed it my duty to speak on these matters, because this is the only opportunity we have of expressing our views upon the conduct of the Government. The time is too serious and our position too precarious for any man who realizes as I do the duty which lies upon us, to remain silent like a dumb animal instead of exposing to the world things as he sees them.

The motion for the Address was agreed to.

REVISION OF PUNISHMENTS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Bill B, An Act to amend the Criminal Code so as to provide for the revision of excessive or inadequate punishments.—Hon. Mr. McMeans.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, March 11, 1920.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

AMALGAMATION OF PARLIAMENTARY SERVICES.

JOINT COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED rose to move:

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to request that House to unite with the Senate in the appointment of a Joint Committee consisting of an equal number of members of both Houses to consider and report upon the desirability of uniting certain branches of the two Houses performing similar duties, and particularly the Law Branch, the Law Translation Branch, and the Debates Translation Branch, and, if in the opinion of the committee, it is desirable to unite any of the branches, to submit a scheme therefor, and that the Honourable Messieurs Belcourt, Fowler, Foster, Sharpe and Thompson be appointed as members of such Committee to act on behalf of this House.

He said: With the permission of the House I should like to amend the motion by adding the name of the Honourable Mr. Dennis, who has interested himself in the subject with which it is proposed that the committee should deal.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: May I suggest that the name of the Honourable Mr. Dandurand also be added?

The proposed amendments were agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I notice that His Honour the Speaker mentioned my name as seconding this motion. I do not want in any way to oppose the motion to the extent of preventing its adoption, but I should like to say that while I appreciate the desire of the Government to examine into this matter, in an effort to bring about a reduction in the expenses of carrying on Parliamentary business, still I think that members of the committee, and members of this House itself, should be exceedingly careful in dealing with any proposal which might tend to eradicate the distinct line of separation between the two Houses. The Senate has a very valuable work to do for the country. It was formed to act as a revising body to revise the legislation of the country, and it is very important for us that the work of the Senate should be kept as distinct and separate as possible from the work of the House of Commons. The position of the Law Clerk is one that I think should be very carefully considered in this connection. Being a revising body we have to look at the legislation which comes before us from the Commons in a somewhat critical manner to see that it is in the best interest of the country. It occurs to me that a number of instances may possibly arise in the future, as they have arisen in the past, in which the point of view adopted by the Senate may not exactly coincide with that of the House of Commons, and where it may be necessary for honourable members of the Senate to take the advice of the Law Clerk of the Senate in regard to the drafting and general form of a measur . Consequently, I think we should be exceedingly careful before we adopt a policy to amalgamate that branch with the similar branch of the House of Commons.

I would like to read to the House a report of a Select Committee which was appointed in 1867, at the time of the first meeting of the Dominion Parliament. On page 90 of the Journals, for the 25th of November, 1867, it is recorded:

> The Select Committee appointed to examine and report upon the Contingent Accounts of the Senate for the existing first session, beg leave to make their First Report:
> 1. That with the exception of the appointment of Clerk of the Senate, Usher of the Black Rod, and Sergeant-at-Arms, which are considered to be Crown offices, all other offices of the Senate, as well as all salaries of officers, are and ought to be in the appointment of the Senate and under the control of the Senate.
> 2. That no officer of the Senate shall be liable to be displaced except by order of the Senate.
> 3. That the duties of Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate, as well as those of Usher of the Black Rod, may, and should be discharged by the same individual.
> 4. Your Committee do not recognize the existence of any officer or servant of the Senate at the opening of the session, with the exception of Crown appointments above referred to, and they propose at an early day to report, for the consideration of the Senate, such a staff of officials, with such salaries as they may think necessary for the efficiency of this branch of the Legislature.
> The whole respectfully submitted,
> B. SEYMOUR,
> Chairman.

That report, honourable gentlemen, was very extensively discussed during that session of Parliament. Various amendments were moved; but, without detaining the House to go into the whole matter, I may say that that report as I have read it was eventually adopted. I desire especially to emphasize paragraph 2 of that report, which says: "That no officer of the Senate shall be liable to be displaced except by order of the Senate." The evident object of the honourable members of this House at that time was to keep the control of their officers entirely in their own hands. Unfortunately, through not apprehending exactly what we were doing when dealing with the Civil Service Act in 1908, we departed from the principle laid down in that report, and I think we have all had cause to regret it ever since. I make these few remarks for the purpose of drawing the attention of the honourable gentlemen who will be serving on this Committee to the need for great care in any action that we take on this question.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: I expected that the honourable leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) would give us the reasons for the motion which he has presented. I fully agree with the remarks of my honourable friend to my left (Hon. Mr. Bostock), and would go one step further. I am not quite satisfied with the reservation which my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) makes as to the view he may ultimately take when a report is presented by that Joint Committee which may have to examine into those various branches with a view to their amalgamation.

Now, I wonder if it is prudent to allow this motion to pass as if it implied the opinion of the Senate. It will go to the House of Commons, and the Senate will appear to have expressed an opinion favourable to the amalgamation of the Law Branch of the Senate with the Law Branch of the Commons. If we pause to reflect upon the importance of retaining our Law Officer for our special advantage, we may, instead of adopting the motion, come to the conclusion that it would be imprudent to deprive ourselves of the advice of our special Law Officer. The public Bills that come from the other Chamber are mostly Government Bills, and I am under the impression that in the majority of cases they have been passed upon, if not framed, by the Law Officer of the Commons. So if we merge our Law Branch with that of the Commons, how shall we be able to appeal to the joint Law Branch for revision? We should be appealing to the Law Officer who had drafted those Bills, and whose opinion regarding his own production would be somewhat biassed. I think we shall be sorry if we adopt a system which would deprive us of the Law Officer whose duty it is specially to advise the committees of the Senate and the senators themselves. If this is the opinion which the majority of the senators hold, then are we not doing an imprudent and unwise thing in allowing to go to the Commons a motion which implies that we are in sympathy with the project therein mentioned? Unless I hear further explanations from my hon. friend on the other side (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), I shall be disposed to move in amendment that the words "Law Branch" be struck out of the motion.

Hon. GEO. W. FOWLER: It does not seem to me that there is anything in this motion which would bear out the contention of my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand). It is merely for the appointment of a committee to make inquiry and consider the question whether it is desirable or not to carry out the proposal. It will then be for the House to accept or reject the findings of the committee. I think it very desirable that inquiries should be made to see if there are certain matters in connection with the Houses of Parliament in which saving can be effected by amalgamation. I am quite of the same opinion as my hon. friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) and the honourable leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) as to the desirability of having our own independent Law Branch. I think that it is very necessary, and I have no hesitation in saying that unless very strong arguments and very strong reasons were brought forward to show me the desirability of uniting the Law Branches of the two Houses, I should be against it. It will take very strong and very cogent reasons to change my opinion on that point. But I do thing that there are services in which a saving can be effected by amalgamation, without interfering with the important privileges of this House. Although a new member of the Senate I should be the last man to consent to the Senate allowing itself to be sheared of any of its privileges or any of the rights which it now enjoys. I am strongly in favour of upholding all the ancient privileges that appertain to this Chamber; but I think this is a step in the right direction. As I say all arguments can be brought before the Committee for consideration, and the Committee can make a digest report to the House, and it will then be for the Chamber to decide which of the different services they desire to have amalgamated. So I do not think there is any necessity for any change whatever in the motion as it now appears.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I ask my honourable friend if a similar resolution is being adopted in the House of Commons?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There will be.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I take it that this motion is brought forward by the honourable leader of the Government in this House after an understanding has been reached with the honourable leader in the other House that a similar resolution will be passed there; so our action would not be interpreted as my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) seems to fear. This is really joint action on the part of the two Houses. It is supposed to be done simultaneously, although we are taking action to-day and the House of Commons may not do so until next week. This is not a question on which we are making a decision. As I understand, it is simply a matter which by arrangement is being taken up by both Houses.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, the time when we are moving into these buildings is opportune to make Parliament as efficient and as economical as possible. My honourable friends apparently have sounded a note of warning that we are about to abdicate certain privileges that we as a Senate enjoyed in times past and hand them over to some foreign body that might disregard them. Nothing of the kind is in view. The Government has already taken steps along the lines that have been discussed. The Law Branch is only one of several subjects to be taken into consideration. In the past the Law Branches of both Houses of Parliament were unsatisfactory, and three or four years ago the Government intervened and appointed a Parliamentary Counsel for the two Houses of Parliament. This House has consulted that counsel just as much as has the House of Commons, and I will venture to say that honourable members of the Senate have consulted him to a very much greater extent than——

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Who is he?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Mr. Gisborne. They have consulted the Parliamentary Counsel on matters of legislation very much more than the Law Clerks of the respective branches of Parliament.

Now, is there any good reason why Parliament should not be placed upon as businesslike a footing as any establishment in the country? Are we not as desirous of having our machinery just as efficient as that of any large commercial enterprise? Would any large business undertaking in Canada have practically three institutions for advising upon legal questions? We have the Law Branch of the Commons, we have the Law Branch of the Senate, and we have the Parliamentary Counsel, common to both Houses, who practically does the work of both Houses; and you and the country are paying the expenses of maintaining three separate establishments for the purpose of advising us in regard to the few Bills that come up to Parliament from time to time. If we are looking for efficiency, if we want to put Parliament upon a modern basis, then let us consider this matter from a business standpoint. The Committee is not charged with altering in the slightest degree—not in the slightest degree—any of the rights or privileges or traditions which we have held in the past. All they are asked to do is to consider and report how Parliament may be made most efficient along the lines indicated in the resolution. It seems to me, honourable gentlemen, that in having a committee of the Senate meet from time to time with a like committee from the Commons to consider the administration of public business with a view to the adoption of the best machinery for the doing of it, we reflect credit upon ourselves and it is of advantage to the country.

Take, for instance, the Translation Branches, as referred to in this motion.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is all right.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We have three or four translation branches in Parliament; we have a translation branch for the Debates; we have a translation branch for the Bills; and it is the same in the other House. Those different divisions are each presided over by a senior member or some official whose standing is superior to that of the others. Would any business institution be organized on a basis of that kind? Not for a moment.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It is the same with the Debates.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is also the subject of the Debates. There is the Post Office. Is there any good reason why the post offices for Parliament should not be under the Post Office Department and administered just the same as the post offices in the city of Toronto, the city of Montreal, or any of the other great centres of Canada? Is there any reason why we should multiply offices and multiply machinery, all of which contribute to inefficiency, when we may overcome difficulties of this kind?

If this should result in the disturbance of any official, his interests will be fully considered. As long as I have been in Parliament I have never yet seen an official whose interests have not been very sympathetically considered and dealt with. So we need have no apprehension on that ground.

We have already established a joint restaurant. I remember the time when we had two restaurants, both very inferior. I do not say the restaurant as it is to-day is a very superior one.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think not

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But we hope that when the Restaurant Committee get to work there will be a very substantial improvement.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: That is a bad illustration.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We had two restaurants; now we have one.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And two bars.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend says we had two bars at one time.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Give us one now.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But the morality of the Senate became shocked on one particular occasion, and they abolished their bar; and a like movement was made in the Commons. The result was that both bars were abolished.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I made the motion.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, this committee is simply a committee to consider and report to this Senate; and when they do report the matter will be absolutely in your hands, and it will then be for you to determine whether the report is good or bad.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: May I ask just one question? This is a matter for lawyers, I understand. I have nothing to say at present with regard to any of the other branches, but may I ask the honourable leader of the Government: If the Senate is to revise legislation, and if the solicitors and attorneys and barristers— all the gentlemen well learned in law—connected with the House of Commons have passed upon and approved of a certain measure, and if we in the Senate have not lawyers quite independent of those people, how are we going to revise? If there is a joint Law Branch, the lawyers would be simply sitting in revision upon themselves, as far as I understand it.

Hon. J. W. DANIEL: If it had not been for what was, I think, the unhappy illustration the honourable leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) brought forward in advising us to unite certain branches, I should not perhaps have said anything. I remember the old restaurant which the Senate had. I used it several times, and I must say that I always came off clear, without any ptomaine poisoning. But the two restaurants have been joined into one parliamentary restaurant, and the last time that I took a meal there I got ptomaine poisoning. I do not intend to take any more meals there until there is very considerable improvement. I understand the same thing happened to another member of this Senate only a few days ago. I feel somewhat diffident in talking about the question of the Law Branch, because I am not a lawyer, but I think there is a very great difference between the Law Branch and the other branches which are mentioned in the motion, such as the Translation and Debates Branches. There can be no two opinions about the translation from French into English and vice versa; and the same is true with regard to the Debates. But there is much room for difference of opinion with regard to points of law, and I think it would be very foolish on the part of the Senate to throw away the privilege which we already have of having our own legal advisers at our disposal.

In regard to the Law Branch, I think it would be better to leave it out of this discussion altogether. I must say that my experience of joint committees of both Houses does not lead me to favour them, and I fear the placing of our rights and privileges in their hands. I think it is safer for us to deal with our own concerns in our own way and keep our independence so long as we are able to maintain it, and not of our own accord and pleasure put them to one side and allow our rights to be gradually taken from us.

These opinions are given with diffidence, because I am not a lawyer, and am not so well posted in legal matters as other gentlemen here; but it strikes me that we would be very foolish to throw away any of our present privileges, and that we ought to be independent of the other Chamber of the legislature.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: All that I would feel ready to concede to the honourable leader of the Government just now would be one restaurant and one bar. I am willing to let the House of Commons have one-half of the control of those departments, and one-half would mean that they would have two-thirds control. But I would advise my colleagues to go slowly in the matter of relinquishing our old-time and honoured privileges. I believe we made a mistake in allowing the Civil Service Commission to step in and take upon themselves the nomination and appointment of our employees. This motion, though only tentative, suggests action that should be adopted only after very mature consideration. The honourable leader of the House likened the two Houses to a commercial concern. While that is the view taken by the experts who presided over the classification of our employees, the Senate is not a commrcial concern. The Senate is a little higher than a commercial enterprise. It enjoys privileges, and in my opinion we should continue to enjoy all the privileges that have been left to us.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: As I understand it, this is only a motion to appoint a committee to look into these matters. We are all the time kicking up a row with the Government because they do not practise economy; but now, when they suggest something in that direction, there is opposition. I cannot really understand it. I was glad to hear my honourable friend talk of the bar in the House of Commons. When I was leading the temperance party in New Brunswick—and I led them well, though they knew I took whatever I wanted, but their own men had left them in an hour of weakness—I pledged myself to close up the bar in the Commons, and I did it absolutely, as you will find on the records of that House. But they got around and made a hole in the wall on the Senate side, which resulted in their getting all they wanted from the Senate.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: What a pity!

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I think it is a pity if we cannot get something here; I think it a mistake to have those sumptuary laws; but you are playing to the public, you are playing to the gallery. I have drink in my house, and temperance people come along, and it is all right; sick people come along, and the parson comes along, and the result is that I am cut down in my supply, which is very hard to get, in order to help them out of their difficulties. Not that I begrudge it, but I do not like the trouble of getting it. I do not know what may result from the proposed motion. I am certainly in sympathy with the leader of the Government in looking into this matter, and finding what the other House will do.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The fact that the honourable leader of the Opposition moved to add one name to the list of members led me to believe that he would have no objection to second the motion. However, as he does not perfectly agree to the proposition, I will ask if I may substitute for him—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable Mr. Robertson.

The motion, as amended, was agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF EXPERTS FROM THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. JULES TESSIER moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for the production of correspondence between the Canadian Mining Institute or others with the Government or any of its Members relating to the resignation of officers of the Department of Geological Survey and the Department of Mines.

He said: In moving this motion I have no intention of criticising the Government or the Civil Service Commission, but I wish to draw the attention of the Government and of this House to a very important matter. Some time ago I received from the Canadian Mining Institute a circular on a subject which to my mind has a great deal of importance. This circular referred to the great number of resignations which have taken place amongst the mining engineers and members of the Geological Survey of Canada. This question is of vast importance, because the future prosperity of Canada will depend upon the development and utilization of its natural resources. We have been accustomed to consider our resources as unlimited, but events of the last decade have taught us our error. There has been a decrease in the average production of our wheat per acre, also in the catch of some of our fisheries, and there will necessarily be a decrease in the output of our lumber industry. In our iron industry, there has been an annual decrease in the amount of native ores used, and a corresponding increase in the consumption of imported ores. Our mineral resources should be utilized to the best advantage of our manufacturing industries, and the preservation of our agricultural industries depends upon adequate supplies of mineral fertilizers. It is, then, obvious that the future prosperity of Canada is in a very large measure dependent upon her reserves of men highly trained in the special sciences that have to do with the study and utilization of our national resources. These men are needed, and their services are a necessity, because we cannot afford to wait until new men are trained to the various kinds of work required. This necessity of keeping good men has been realized in Great Britain and in the United States; and, judging by what has taken place, we in Canada seem to be the last to realize it. Private industry realizes the value of men of scientific training, and, if valuable to private industries, they must be valuable to Canada for its reasonable development. Realizing the important function of these men, we must view with alarm the numerous resignations from their ranks from the Civil Service at Ottawa. These men are trained by a long and difficult course in some university, which is followed by practical experience. In the Geological Survey Branch of the Department of Mines a period of at least twelve years is required to enable men to occupy the higher positions. Within the last few months not less than eight men have resigned from the Geological Survey, representing a loss to the country of more than ninety years intensive training. Five or six other men, students in training for work in this branch of the public service, have left to enter private service. In the Department of Trade and Commerce, eight Government analysts in the Food and Drug Branch, out of a total of thirteen, have resigned to enter private service. There have been other resignations of scientists in other branches of the public service. The Department of Mines is the largest organization in the Government service devoted to investigation of our natural resources and development of our industries. During the last ten years I am told that this department has lost forty-nine men by resignation. The Geological Survey has lost twenty-six men by resignation. During the last two years there have been eleven resignations in the Geological Survey and twelve in the Mines Branch.

The resignation of scientific men from Government service seems to be largely due to very inadequate pay. The numerous chemists who have left the Departments of Trade and Commerce, Interior and Mines, have all secured higher pay than is given in the Government service. Indeed, they have nearly doubled their salaries. The cause of these resignations is not far to seek: we do not pay the men enough to live on and bring up their families.

In conclusion, I may say that I hope that the Government will take some measure to give full justice to that branch of the service, as the importance of these trained men cannot be overestimated. That is why I have chosen to call the attention of the House to this question, and I am not surprised to observe that the Mining Institute has sent us this alarming circular, asking the Government to try to remedy this evil.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Perhaps the honourable gentleman will be good enough to allow the adjournment of the debate, because I have received several documents, I do not know from whom, asking me to look into this matter.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I object, as one. Let the discussion go on: we cannot defer the business of this House for the honourable gentleman's study. This question is one of vital importance to the country. As a scientist, or pretending to be one, I want to retain the very best intellect we have to assist in developing this country. It is very true that men are leaving Canada because they do not get the pay they require, whereas if they had had enough salary to live comfortably and prosecute their inquiries, we might have retained them. The salaries paid here have not been commensurate with what they could get on the other side of the border. This discussion will bring up the question in the departments concerned as to whether some plan cannot be instituted for classifying these technical men and raising their salaries by degrees. We need technical men in Canada, who can show us what to get out of the soil and out of the mines and from the textiles and many new things that are coming up; and we can fairly ask whether something will not be done in these reconstruction days in the matter of employing men and paying them adequately. We have drawn men from the United States; two of our honourable knights came from Hartford, Connecticut, and we were glad to get them for their ability. In the same way the Americans are glad to draw men from this country. This is a very large subject, and I know the honourable leader of this House will look into it. I have no desire to embarass the Government, rather I wish to help them, because I can see how difficult the problem is. I have had experience, and in the line that I have been investigating I have had to bring scientists from England. This cost a great deal of money; but in our case it met the case. We cannot expect capital to come into this country until our resources are explored and reported upon by men who have special knowledge and intelligence, and whose reports inspire confidence. Merely the name of being a geologist is not sufficient; the capitalist wants to see what kind of goods he is dealing with. We need technical men in many departments; now that we are going to have a fleet we shall need a sea-lord. I am very glad to be able to aid one mite of thought to help the departments whose problems have been brought before the House.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: This matter is really one of very much greater importance than appears on the surface; but I am at a loss how to approach the subject, as the proposed motion deals with a matter which it is not within the province of this Chamber to determine. It is a fact, and a most important fact, that the natural resources of our country are very largely dependent on the supervision and technical knowledge and ability of employees of the Government in those departments. It is a fact that those men have been underpaid, and it is also a fact that they have been given very much larger inducements to leave the service of the Government and enter private employment. We had a case at the last session when the question arose as to the value of coal-mining in a section of the Northwest. It was believed that certain parties had acquired a mining lease for the benefit of private parties, for little or no financial consideration, without the Government having had sufficient knowledge of that part of the public domain that was being diverted. Our resources are very often referred to as illimitable—erroneously so; but unless Parliament has a very large number of technical men amongst its members, or some officers on whom they can depend not only because of their technical knowledge but their absolute reliability, I am afraid that the country may in the long run lose a thousandfold more, or ten thousandfold more than the difference between an adequate and an inadequate salary for its technical men. I had no intention of addressing the House on this matter, but it occurred to me while the debate was proceeding that this matter, while apparently simple, is fraught with far graver consequences than perhaps many members of the House may realize. While I have no idea that we are in a position to alter the situation, it is possible that the honourable leader of the House may be able to inform us whether the Government have full knowledge of what is transpiring, and whether, having that knowledge, they are taking any steps to mitigate what may develop into a very serious condition of affairs.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Casgrain, the debate was adjourned until the 6th day of April next.

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED SENATORS.

THE LATE HON. MESSRS. LANDRY AND TALBOT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, owing to the time occupied in the debate on the Address I had not an opportunity of directing the attention of the Senate, as it is my melancholy duty to do, to the deaths of some of our members since last we met. During the recess we have lost two of our members, both of whom were closely identified with the activities of this Chamber. I refer to the late Senators Talbot and Landry.

For two years the late Senator Talbot was a member of the House of Commons, and he became a member of this Chamber in March, 1906. He was one of the pioneer farmers of my own province. I had the pleasure of his friendship for a great number of years, and it was with the deep regret and sorrow of a personal friend that I learned of his death. He possessed peculiarly a friendly and attractive personality, and numbered his friends as numerously among his political opponents as among those with whom he associated in the political party to which he belonged. His temperament was of that peculiar character that made it a pleasure to meet him, and to grasp his hand was to feel that the humanities were strong within him. Although he did not identify himself as actively with the business of this Chamber as some of its members, yet his presence was always welcomed and to-day we deeply regret the loss of Peter Talbot, as he was best known to those who enjoyed his intimate acquaintance.

The late Senator Landry was for over forty years active in the political life of Canada. He entered the House of Commons as one of the representatives of his native province in the year 1878, and was appointed to the Senate under the Conservative Administration of 1892. He was a man of whom it could be said, probably with greater force than of most men, that he had the courage of his convictions. To him it was his meat and drink to be in the front rank of the battle where the fighting was the hardest. He rejoiced in the storm of political life rather than in its calm. Life itself would be monotonous to most of us if it were all sunshine and calm. Nature has ordained that there should be storm and the tumult of the elements. Likewise we find human nature divided between those conditions, although most of us would prefer to pursue the serene and quiet of life rather than to live in the elements of the storm. As he loved controversy and conflict, circumstances furnished him with his desires in this respect; and yet those of us who knew him best knew that, notwithstanding his differences with us on political questions, there was little resentment in his make-up; and, though possibly hard to reconcile, yet he played the game openly, and we had more or less to admire the courage and the fighting power which he displayed in advancing his cause. He was one of the active members of this Senate, and owing to his temperamental qualities we shall miss his militant activities and the interest which he created in the Senate through the assertion of the views which he espoused. Now that he has gone to his long rest, we may all say over his grave: "Requiescat in pace."

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I do not know that I can add much to what has been so ably said by the leader of the Government in reference to the loss which this Chamber has sustained in the death of the late Senators Landry and Talbot. From time to time we are called upon to refer to the losses by death which occur amongst us. It is a matter of great regret that we have to part with those whom we have known so well, and with whom we have associated in this Chamber.

Senator Landry, as my honourable friend has said, was a man who thoroughly enjoyed his parliamentary life. He was a great worker. I understand that as a young man he was in a financially good position, that he did not have to work for his living, and that he entered public life from choice, desiring to do his best for his country and to make himself useful to his fellow men. His activities in various walks of life were considerable. He entered into everything he undertook with great zest, and always acquitted himself with credit. As a member opposing the Government in this Chamber he was always indefatigable in his work, and always a source of information to his friends. He had the great faculty of gathering data and collecting information; so much so, indeed, that amongst his friends the remark became common that if they required any information they had only to refer to Senator Landry. He thoroughly enjoyed his work, and thoroughly enjoyed making trouble for the leader of the Government, if he could do so. The work that he has done will be long remembered. We all very much regret his departure from amongst us, and join in extending sympathy to his relatives in the bereavement which they have suffered.

Senator Talbot, as my honourable friend has said, was a member of this Chamber for some years. He was recognized as a pioneer by all who knew him, particularly in the West. Until he went to the West his whole training had been in the world of teaching. He went to Alberta as principal of a high school. He impressed all those who came in contact with him by his honesty of purpose and his desire to do the best he could in whatever position in life he occupied. From the principalship of the high school he went to farming, and of that he also made a success. I think that all who knew the late Senator Talbot would probably agree with me that he could be best described in the words of Sir Walter Scott as "a man steady of heart and stout of hand." I am sure we all feel the loss that this Chamber has sustained by his death, and desire to offer our most sincere sympathy to his widow and family.

Hon. THOMAS CHAPAIS: Honourable gentlemen, I had not the honour of knowing the Honourable Senator Talbot, but I am sure that he well deserves the eulogies to his memory just now voiced in this House by the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition.

But I feel that it is my duty to share in the tribute paid to the late Senator Landry. I have been most intimately connected with him for over thirty years; I have gone with him through many a political campaign, and I can say with full knowledge that he was a man of sterling qualities, a devoted friend, and a loyal foe. The honourable members of this House know perfectly well that he was a strenuous fighter, always true to his principles and stubborn in the defence of what he deemed right. His death has been a great sorrow for his friends. He was a credit to himself and an ornament to the public life of this country.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 2.30 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Friday, March 12, 1920.

The Senate met at 2.30 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

RESCUE OF LIGHTHOUSE CREWS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOYER inquired of the Government:

What was the cost of sending a sealer from Newfoundland to Labrador to rescue the crews of the different lighthouses in the strait of Belle Isle?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Arrangements were made for this work by the Acting Minister of Shipping, St. John's, Newfoundland, at the request of the Deputy Minister of Marine, Ottawa. Accounts in connection therewith have not yet come to hand. I have no doubt that at a later date we shall have them.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Better allow the question to stand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

THE PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT.

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That a Special Committee composed of the Honourable Messieurs Boyer, Casgrain, Fowler, Thorne and White (Inkerman), be appointed for the purpose of considering and reporting upon a scheme for the placing of the new Parliamentary Restaurant, when completed, both as to equipment and administration, on a parity with a first class club or hotel dining room, and that a Message be sent to the House of Commons inviting that House to appoint a like Special Committee to act jointly with the Special Committee of this House.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Has the honourable gentleman any idea as to when that restaurant will be ready?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It was thought that it would be completed before the end of the present session. Considerable progress is being made in the room at the present time. I was there yesterday, and it seems to me that it should not take more than six weeks or two months to complete it.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: There is very little to be done in the restaurant proper, but in the kitchen and in the anterooms there is work to be done which will require at least six months before anything is installed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think so. I think the equipment is ordered and is ready for installation immediately the room is completed.

Hno. Mr. DANDURAND: Could the honourable gentleman tell us what are the expectations regarding our taking possession of the Senate Chamber for next session, 1921?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I very much regret I cannot say. I should be very doubtful of the Chamber itself being ready for next session.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Oh, yes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will it? My honourable friend from Portage la

Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) is on the Building Committee, but I must say he is more optimistic than I am. I think all the rooms and the corridors will be completed by that time.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: A great deal of the material for the completion of the interior of the Chamber is cut and is ready for the masons to put in place. It was taken out of that part of the building in order to get the building ready for this session, but the stonecutters have been going on with their work and a great deal of the material is ready.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned till Tuesday, 6th April, 1920, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have been asked if this date could not be advanced to the next day, Wednesday, so as to allow of many members enjoying Easter at home and reaching here in time. As the Commons will not likely meet until the same day, we should certainly be able to dispose of the work as quickly as the Commons will.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The only hesitation I would have would be in view of a Supply Bill coming down. As honourable gentlemen know, our fiscal year ends the 31st March, and I have no doubt that were we in session to that date, we should be asked to pass upon a Supply Bill. I am therefore very reluctant to take any chances upon the embarrassment which might result from our not being in session when Supply is needed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Easter Monday is a legal holiday.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We could make it eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I can reach here more easily than many of the members, and I am not speaking for myself, but for members who live at a distance.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If we make it eight o'clock in the evening, that will give an opportunity to those who are travelling on Tuesday, and would not reach here by three o'clock. Make it eight o'clock in the evening.

The motion, so amended, was agreed to.

REVISION OF PUNISHMENTS BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Lendrum McMeans, the Senate went into Committee on Bill B, an Act to amend the Criminal Code so as to provide for the revision of excessive or inadequate Punishments. Hon. Mr. Tanner in the Chair.

On section 1, new section 1055A, subsection 1—revision of sentences for indictable offences:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I ask if this is practically a reprint of the Bill which we passed in a former session?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I may say in reply that when the Bill was first introduced the assent of the Attorney General was required; but as it went through at the last session it was amended to require the assent of a judge of the Court of Appeal.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to ask the honourable gentleman in charge of this Bill if he has considered the question of the costs of these appeals? In the case of an appeal does the person sentenced have to bear all the costs of this further appeal?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I may say that in criminal matters there are generally no costs incurred. The applicant will only have to pay his own counsel when he makes appeal through a lawyer. If, for instance, the Attorney General, who has to be notified, is opposed to the matter, I think it would end there.

Subsection 1 was agreed to.

On subsection 2—powers of Court of Appeal:

Hon. G. W. FOWLER: I have had some experience in criminal law in my own province during the long period that I practised at the Bar there, and I never have observed any crying necessity for this Bill. The judges have been fair; the sentences have certainly not been disproportionate to the crime. They have erred rather on the side of leniency, and this Bill does not provide for increasing sentences.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Yes, it does.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: In my own country the original sentence was more often rather too light than too heavy. I should like to see more uniformity in regard to sentences; yet it is impossible to have real uniformity because the circumstances surrounding each individual case leave the judge to make the sentence long or short, as all crimes in the same category are not of the same magnitude. The circumstances under which a crime is committed, and the causes leading up to it, very often determine whether the crime is heinous or not, apart from what the statute may say about it; so there cannot possibly be uniformity in the sentences. I suppose that is the reason why the law-makers originally gave to the judge trying the case a range from a certain minimum to a maximum punishment. I am very conservative about matters of this kind. I would dislike to see our judicial system operate as it does in the United States, so that when a man is convicted it is often the case that more years elapse between the time of the first conviction for the crime and the time he enters upon his punishment than would be occupied in serving a proper sentence. We do not need that sort of thing in this country, and every appeal afforded lengthens the litigation, and makes it more easy for the guilty person to escape. My experience, after thirty-five years' practice at the Bar—and I had a very large criminal practice in that province, as I specialized along those lines—would be that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred men charged with crimes are guilty; and thus by multiplying appeals you allow a great opportunity for guilty men to escape the just punishment of their acts. I am opposed to the principle of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is one feature of the Bill which displeases me. I am a little afraid of opening the door to the possibility of a higher tribunal increasing the penalty. I recognize the argument of my honourable friend who promotes this measure when he says that we allow a number of appeals in material and monetary affairs, safeguarding the property interests of the individual to that extent, yet make light of the honour and liberty of the subject. There is something that appeals to one when the argument is presented in that way; and I am not much opposed to allowing some kind of recourse to the accused who feels that he has been unjustly condemned and will have that blot on his record and on his reputation for life. I have not yet heard from my honourable friend an argument that satisfies me as to opening the door for an increase of the penalty. Of course, he may have advanced such an argument in my absence. The ideal in the administration of criminal justice under British law is the protecting of the accused from imputation of guilt before conviction; giving him considerable latitude for his evidence; rather allowing a chance for nine-tenths of the accused persons to escape than risking one of them being condemned unjustly. Whatever the sentence may be, even if it be light, the magistrate may have a reason for that; he has had the whole case before him, he has seen the witnesses; he may have inquired as to record of the accused; hence I am somewhat diffident about allowing an appeal to one who has been convicted. I feel this all the more because our statutes at present give to magistrates a chance to temper justice to those who have been convicted. We have now a ticket-of-leave system, by which, if it is felt that a man has been unduly convicted, or sentenced for too long a period, he may ask and obtain relief by securing a ticket-of-leave. In view of that I should like to ask my honourable friend who promotes this legislation what argument he has for allowing to the Crown Prosecutor an appeal with the view of increasing the penalty.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I may say in reply to the honourable gentleman that, while I am not very anxious to retain the clause as to sentences being increased, it was suggested by one particular case which I have no doubt honourable gentlemen know of. It was the case of a school teacher in the province of Manitoba who was accused of a sexual crime against one of his pupils, and the sentence imposed was six months in jail. There was such a furore through that part of the country, and indeed throughout the Dominion, that the women sent in petitions to the Minister of Justice, and even talked about taking proceedings against the judge. The uproar made in regard to that case suggested to my mind that if there had been a clause of that kind it could have been said to those women, "There will be five judges sitting in the court of appeal, and they can look into the matter." That was one of the reasons why this clause was inserted. Another reason was that in the western country we appoint magistrates who are not lawyers and have had no experience in the administration of justice.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Justices of the peace?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS. No, magistrates of cities and towns.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I am happy to say that in Winnipeg the police magistrate is a lawyer; but no special qualification is required for magistrates, although the Criminal Code has greatly increased their jurisdiction. They can give very severe sentences, and in some cases have done so. Perhaps the honourable gentleman who has spoken for New Brunswick is more fortunate there. But I do not want him to have the idea that this is any question of a general criminal appeal; it is simply to correct a great injustice that may be done in some cases. I think I may safely say that in the majority of the cases sentences are imposed fairly, but there are exceptional cases.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You cannot legislate for exceptional cases.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: We are not legislating for them. We are giving a chance to have a sentence reviewed if the Attorney General is of opinion that it ought to be reviewed; that is all. Canada is the only country to-day in the British dominions in which there is no court of criminal appeal; so that when a magistrate or judge pronounces a sentence, he can make it one year or ten years, whatever he thinks best, and whatever he says is final.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The law provides a range of punishments according to the seriousness of the crime.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: The honourable gentleman says he has practised law for thirty-five years. After that long experience he does not know that where the Criminal Code fixes a minimum and a maximum penalty the judge may give any penalty he pleases.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He can fix it between.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: No, whether it is between or not.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is not the practice.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I know it is; I have been in it myself.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: How would the honourable gentleman provide when the evidence is not taken in writing? How can you expect the judge of the higher court to be able to quash a sentence when the evidence is not before him in writing?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: It is not a review of the evidence at all; it is not on the question of the evidence at all. I am afraid honourable gentlemen here have not really grasped the intent of the Bill. A man is sentenced for ten years; representation is made to the Attorney General of a province, who says, "Yes, I think that particular judicial officer erred, and I think his error ought to be rectified." Then the accused makes an application to the court of appeal, where there would be four or five judges, and the Crown counsel would simply say, " In so far as the Crown is concerned, we have no objection to it." I do not think there will be any criminal case reviewed, or any sentence altered, where the Attorney General of the province objects. I want to tell honourable gentlemen that one man got a sentence of 21 years for stealing an overcoat; it was given to him by a magistrate who had a very large experience. Fortunately he had exceeded his jurisdiction by a few years, and the case went up to the court of appeal, and they reduced the sentence to two years.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Was that before the war, or since?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: It did not happen down in New Brunswick; it happened up in the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Was it before the war?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Oh, yes, before the war.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Since the war the stealing of an overcoat is a very serious offence.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Quite true. I think that clause about the sentence being increased should be inserted, because it strikes me in this way. I happen to know of a case that I would not like to mention here; but I will suppose a young man is brought before a magistrate charged with a serious offence, and he happens to be a particular friend of the magistrate; what are you going to do? I could tell you where a bank clerk dined with a magistrate one evening, and the next morning was accused of stealing $35,000, and he was let off on suspended sentence, and nobody knew anything about it. This clause is suggested only to meet those exceptional cases that might occur. In the case of the school teacher I mentioned who made the criminal assault on the girl pupil, he got six months; and inside of two months, owing to the uproar which was caused, a foreigner—in whom the same grade of morality is not expected—received for a similar offence a sentence of seven years in the penitentiary. Now, what are you going to do? The other day I told the House that

I called at the Department of Justice about a ticket-of-leave young man, a returned soldier, and they told me there: "We do not know what to do in these cases; we have before us to-day the case of a returned soldier in the neighbouring county of Renfrew who stole a case of whisky from an officer, and he got a sentence of five years in the penitentiary." That case of whisky was just as valuable as an overcoat, I suppose.

An Hon. SENATOR: Harder to get.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: But five years in the penitentiary is a pretty serious sentence.

The honourable member for De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) spoke about the ticket-of-leave system. I am at present taking up a case with the Minister of Justice. It is that of a returned soldier who in a moment of intoxication forged a cheque for a small amount and was sent to the penitentiary for three years. He had gone to the city of Winnipeg, where he was employed on one of the leading journals of the province, but when his employers found that he was a ticket-of-leave man, and had to report to the police every week, he was immediately discharged, and he was afterwards discharged from three situations one after the other. I asked the gentlemen in the Department of Justice what they would do in a case of that kind. They said, "The only thing we can do is to try to get him another position." This young man had been in jail for six months before he got his ticket-of-leave, and I think his offence would have been wiped out by that term of confinement, and he would not have had the ticket-of-leave, and would not have had the sentence of three years hanging over him. This may have been a case in which the court of appeal would not have diminished the sentence; it would be only in more glaring cases that they would interfere at all.

When I first introduced this Bill I had a conversation with a well-known judge of Ontario, who was a commissioner making an investigation into a penitentiary, and he told me that although it was outside the scope of his authority he had asked any prisoners who had any complaints to make to lay them before him. He said, "I was struck immediately by the fact that the one complaint that seemed to permeat the whole penitentiary was as to the disparity of sentences." One man would say: "I am here for ten years, whereas that man who committed the same offence is in for only two years." That gentleman commended my Bill very strongly. You must recollect that a great change has taken place in the method of dealing with criminals. To-day, instead of a man being locked up in a two-by-four dark cell, he is put on a farm and reclaimed. It is generally admitted that the former method of treating prisoners led to the perpretation of crime. To-day, for a first offence those who know anything about criminal law impose a light sentence.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is an argument against your Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: How is it an argument against the Bill? If a magistrate does not know the criminal law and violates that principle, where is the remedy?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The man goes to this school where he is trained in all the virtues, and he comes out a better man. If you shorten the sentence by half, he has not the same opportunity of learning.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Perhaps the honourable gentleman is not aware that I am speaking of prison farms, which are provincial institutions. When a man goes to Kingston or to Stony Mountain, or to some other penitentiary, he comes under Dominion jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The honourable gentleman says that this Bill is founded on the case of a schoolmaster in his section who received a sentence of only five or six months, and who therefore would not go to the penitentiary but to this beneficent institution where he would be improved.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: There are throughout the length and breath of Canada to-day many magistrates exercising criminal jurisdiction who have not assimilated a proper conception of the way in which the criminal law should be administered. The principle that is followed to-day is to deal lightly with a man unless he has a criminal record. If he has such a record, then he is locked up so that he may not be a menace to society. I do not think that the passing of this Bill would do any harm; in fact, I think it would be of great benefit.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: When this Bill was before the House at a previous session, I stated the reasons why I was in favour of it. I am still in favour of it. I think it is a good Bill. I do not want to repeat the arguments which I advanced at that time.

It is undesirable that the people from amongst whom criminals spring should have any feeling that any injustice is done by the court in inflicting punishment. At the bottom there is a strong demand for justice and fair play. When you find that men in a penitentiary complain because one is serving two years and another is serving six or eight years for the same offence, you cannot expect these people to have undue respect for the law—to have the same respect for the law that they would have if there were something like equality in the penalties imposed. One strong point in favour of the Bill is that it affords an opportunity to rectify that condition.

There is another thing that you ought to guard against. I do not know how many criminal judges there are in Canada, but there must be between 200 and 400 men who have the right to impose a criminal sentences. Nearly every one of those men has a theory of his own as to what in a certain case ought to be the maximum or the minimum penalty. Now, if you create a provincial jurisdiction with the right of review, the judges will get together and lay down rules; and in a short time, I am convinced, there will be a much better administration of justice. Since this Bill has been before the House, having particular regard to it, I have watched weekly in the Law Times the cases that have been taken before the Criminal Appeal Court in England, and I am perfectly satisfied that the law establishing that court—which was a long time under discussion before it became law—is one of the finest pieces of legislation ever passed by the British Parliament.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does it permit of increasing the sentence?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It permits increasing or decreasing or dealing otherwise with the sentence. The court of appeal can put themselves in the place of the trial judge; they can send for the trial judge, or they may ask for a report from him. I think it would be impossible for any one who has followed these cases in the Court of Criminal Appeals not to be satisfied that this Bill, as far as it goes, is a good one. If I had my way, I would have a court of appeal from criminal sentences in every one of the provinces, where the appeal would be instituted at the instance of the Attorney General.

I do not want to prolong the discussion on this Bill; but because I am very strongly in favour of it I feel that I ought not to give a silent vote upon it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Mr. Chairman, the honourable gentleman promoting this Bill says that there will be no review of the evidence.

Hon. Mr. ROSS.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: No, no.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: How can anyone possibly say whether or not an appeal is just unless he reviews the evidence?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I think the honourable gentleman has misunderstood me.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: Sometimes there is no written evidence at all.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: There is no appeal as to whether a man is guilty or not guilty. For instance, if a man is accused of theft, and has been sentenced to five years in the penitentiary, the information would show whether he was charged with the theft of a suit of clothes, or a case of whisky, or the overcoat that alarmed my honourable friend so much.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think the theft of a case of whisky would be even more serious than the theft of an overcoat.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I quite agree with you.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You can always buy an overcoat, but you cannot always buy a case of whisky.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: If five judges, say in the province of Manitoba, were sitting, they would say: "A sentence of five years has been imposed for stealing a certain article, and we are going to allow an application to be made to bring the case before us." The man is guilty. The question is, it being his first or his second offence, is it proper that he should be imprisoned for a long term or a short term?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The honourable gentleman misses my point entirely. I say that the judges impose varying sentences depending upon the circumstances. I can well conceive of a man stealing an overcoat under such circumstances that I, if I were the judge, would not impose a very severe sentence. If he were freezing, and were likely to die as a result of cold, such as they have in Winnipeg, and took a coat that was exposed to his view, without committing burglary, I would give him a very light sentence. But if he broke into a house and stole the only coat of a poor man who was unable to get another, I would think that he ought to get five years in the penitentiary.

I know of a case somewhat the reverse of that mentioned by my honourable friend, and just as serious in its way. It was the result of feminism again. Owing to the feeling that had been worked up in the community by the militant suffragettes, the judge imposed a sentence that was most abominable. It was a sexual offence. A young man picked up a girl on the street, and took her to a room, with the result that an information was laid against him, and he got five years in the penitentiary, and also a very bad case of venereal disease because he had assaulted this virgin. These anomalies will occur. These varying sentences are sometimes just and sometimes unjust. But I hold that unless the evidence is reviewed it is impossible for any court to say whether or not the sentence is just, because the circumstances surrounding the case go to show whether it is just or not. There is nothing here to say that the Attorney General shall look over the evidence and say whether or not an appeal shall be allowed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Paragraph 2 provides for the evidence.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: You first have to apply to a judge of the Court of Appeal.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He reviews the evidence, and says whether the evidence—

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: No, no.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, the evidence goes before him, and he says whether or not there shall be an appeal. That is a long process. It seems to me that we are only providing something which we have gotten along very well without in this country, and without which very little injustice has been done. As my honourable friend from Montreal (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has pointed out, these long sentences may be cut short by the ticket-of-leave. I think that instead of making the punishment of crime less severe, we should make it even more severe.

Hon. W. PROUDFOOT: Honourable gentlemen, I have just a word to say in reference to this Bill. Under this section, as I understand it, the applicant in the first place has to apply to a judge of the Court of Appeal for leave, in effect, to appeal. The case is then argued before the judge, and if he thinks there are reasonable grounds for its going before the Appeal Court, he grants leave and the appeal is then taken up. The Court of Appeal then considers the case upon the evidence, and deals with it, or, if they so desire, they have the right to take further evidence.

What I am afraid of is subsection 6, "Diminution or increase of sentence." I think that it would be very undesirable to allow the judges of the Court of Appeal to increase the punishment. You will find that many appeals will be taken by the Attorney General. Throughout the country, particularly in the province of Ontario, county judges deal with criminal cases, except murder, and pass sentence. Sometimes a sentence is not satisfactory to the Crown Attorney, and you will find that under this section he will ask the Attorney General to consent to his going to the Court of Appeal. That is going to cause a very considerable amount of litigation so far as criminals are concerned. I am satisfied that for one appeal taken by a criminal for the reduction of a sentence, there will be twenty taken by the Crown authorities to have sentences increased. For instance, in the city of Toronto, police magistrates have power in criminal cases. They impose sentences, in many cases running up to seven or fourteen years. Frequently a Crown Attorney says that the judge has not imposed a sufficiently severe sentence, and a great many objections are taken. Now, if that power of sentencing is going to be taken away from the judges and magistrates in the various districts by an appeal such as this, we will find that instead of this Act being a benefit it will be a detriment to the administration of justice. Like my honourable friend to my right (Hon. Mr. Fowler), I have had some little experience in criminal cases during the last forty years, and during that time I do not know of any particular injustice having been done to any one by the imposition of over-severe sentences. I would fell inclined to let the Bill have a trial, if the honourable gentleman would strike out from clause 6 the words, "or increase," so that it would simply deal with diminishing the punishment.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I have always felt that legislation founded on a particular case was dangerous, and, according to the honourable gentleman, this Bill is founded on a particular case. We do not know what the evidence was in that case. If my honourable friend had given us the evidence we might judge of the seriousness of the crime. I think this Bill is dangerous. It leads to litigation, and that is a thing to be avoided. My advice to my clients has always been, "Avoid litigation as much as you can," and my advice to this Chamber is to not pass any legislation which will increase litigation.

Hon. J. W. DANIEL: I do not feel much inclined to intervene in what is really, I suppose, a sort of legal question, but I will say this: that I remember several occasions on which judges in the province of New Brunswick gave verdicts which I, as an ordinary layman, thought should certainly be revised; in some cases not because the punishment imposed was excessive, but because it was so ridiculous that it certainly tended to bring the law into contempt. So personally, as far as my knowledge goes, I am in favour of this Bill, and I should be very much opposed to eliminating the portion to which the honourable gentleman from Huron (Hon. Mr. Proudfoot) refers, and taking away from the Court of Appeal the power to increase the punishment. I think that is one of the important parts of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: In view of the fact that we have a very thin House and that the opposition to this measure has assumed somewhat formidable proportions, I think the matter should be postponed. There should be a fuller House to consider this important question. I move that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: The Bill was passed last year.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: If it passed last year, why is it up this year?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Because it did not reach the Commons in time. It was passed in this House in two consecutive sessions —in 1918 and 1919.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I did not happen to be present when it was passed last year, or I certainly would have opposed it. However, I make my motion.

Hon. E. L. GIRROIR: Before the motion is put, I wish to make a few remarks. I desire very briefly to state the reasons why I supported this Bill last year and intend to support it again. It does not seem to me to be sound argument to contend that the Court of Appeal cannot properly review a judgment by a criminal court because they do not hear the witnesses and are perhaps not possessed of a knowledge of all the circumstances of the case. That does not seem to be sound reasoning. If it were, it would eliminate entirely the right to appeal in civil cases, in which the Court of Appeal, with nothing before them but the evidence, can modify or reverse the finding of the jury who have heard all the evidence and had all the circumstances placed before them. It seems to me that there is just as much reason why the Court of Appeal should have the right to review a criminal case, in which a man's liberty and honour are involved, as that they should have the right to review a civil case, where there is really less at stake. Every day civil cases are brought to the Court of Appeal, and when that court sit they have nothing before them but the written evidence. The court examine the evidence and may grant an appeal. They may change the judgment. They have almost unlimited powers. Why should not the court have the same powers in criminal cases? That is what this Bill provides.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: Does the honourable gentleman understand the word "appeal" to mean an appeal from the decision, or simply an appeal as to the amount of the punishment imposed? That is what I understand the Bill to mean.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Yes. The Bill in my opinion does not go far enough. I think it should go the length which my honourable friend mentions. The English Act goes the full length; that is to say, there is an absolute appeal just as in civil cases. In the United States there are almost unlimited powers of appeal in criminal cases. Surely those two great centres of jurisprudence would not have gone so far astray in a matter of this kind as some honourable gentlemen seem to suggest. This question was widely and fully considered by a committee appointed by the House of Commons in England. They made a thorough study of the matter for several years, and finally recommended the establishment of a Court of Appeal, with powers very much wider than this Bill provides. Surely that must be a very strong argument in favour of this Bill, which does not go as far as the British law, or the American law.

Any person who has watched the sentences that have been imposed from time to time by magistrates and by judges cannot but be struck by the fact that there does not seem to be any uniformity, such as would very likely be attained if we had a Court of Appeal. I cited a case last year—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Does my honourable friend think there should be absolute uniformity in sentences?

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: I think we should endeavour to get as near as we possibly can to uniformity.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is very indefinite.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: And you certainly get nearer to uniformity by having a general Court of Appeal.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What proof has the honourable gentleman that we do not now get as near to uniformity as we possibly can? That is only his idea, his imagination. He has no proof.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: The honourable member from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) spoke a few moments ago of the British Court of Appeal and how they had been endeavouring to lay down general rules and had attained greater uniformity in the imposition of sentences than had obtained in England previously. In Canada not only is there a lack of uniformity in similar cases between judges sitting in different courts, in different parts of the province or different parts of Canada, but you find individual judges varying their sentences to an alarming degree.

I cited a case last year to prove, as I thought, the necessity of this proposed Act. I do not think that the judge to whom I refer—I will not mention his name—was any weaker than the average judge in the country. Two young boys, about eighteen years of age, who had always borne a good reputation, were out one night about the town and imbibed a little too freely. As they went along they saw some overcoats hanging out in front of a store. They picked up an overcoat apiece, put the overcoats on, and walked down street. They made no effort to hide the coats or do anything like that. They walked into other stores and gossiped around. It was only a very small town, and there was really no opportunity for concealment, unless they took the coats off and hid them somewhere. They paraded about with those coats on. It was a foolish thing. The boys, as I said, had been drinking. I was asked to defend them before a judge. I did so. The judge imposed a sentence of three years in the penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Perhaps that was because you defended them.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Possibly.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: A poor defence.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: All the more reason why there should be an appeal.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: What was behind that most extraordinary sentence? It was this. There had been a great deal of petty thieving in the town, and the judge had been letting off the culprits on suspended sentence. Even in aggravated cases, where he ought to have sentenced to the penitentiary, he had been letting off the accused on suspended sentence.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: They wore his patience out.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: The citizens got together and urged upon him that he was going absolutely wrong. Then he went to the other extreme. I took the case before the Department of Justice and had no difficulty at all in having the boys let out on ticket-of-leave. But what had happened? Any reasonable man will admit that the sentence was ridiculous and that a mere reprimand, or at most a suspended sentence, would have been ample in such a case. But these boys were in the penitentiary. One of the boys was a widow's son and practically the sole support of his mother, and that boy, having been in the penitentiary, was stamped with criminality—he was a marked man. He had been in the penitentiary for stealing—for such a trivial offence.

Now, if there had been a Court of Appeal with a proper Act behind it, a motion could have been made for a stay, and the appeal could have been taken. The boy might have stayed in jail for a month or so, but at any rate there can be no question whatever that the sentence would have been reversed, or at least modified to such an extent that the boy's future would not have been affected.

I really think that this Bill does not go far enough—that if there is an appeal in a civil case, where there is less involved, there is no reason in the world why there should not be an appeal in a criminal case. So far as I can learn, the experience of legal minds in England and in the United States has been very highly in favour of the establishment of Courts of Appeal in criminal cases in both those countries. You will find that in certain localities judges, and especially magistrates, are sometimes inclined to go to extremes, either one way or the other, and the farther they go in one direction, the greater is the danger of their going to the opposite extreme. Sometimes a person is let off although he has committed a very serious offence, and at other times for a trivial offence the character of the accused is ruined. I cannot see, for the life of me, who is going to be hurt by the establishment of a Court of Appeal. If the sentence is right, the Court of Appeal will confirm it. If the sentence is wrong, who can urge a single reason why it should not be appealed and should not be reversed or modified? Nobody is infallible.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You would make out the Court of Appeal to be infallible.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Well, you cannot get infallibility even there. I suppose my honourable friend himself will not pretend that he is infallible?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Pretty nearly.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Not seriously, at any rate. But you get nearer to justice and right by having a Court of Appeal, because you have the matter passed upon successively by different judges. I think it is only a measure of justice to pass this Bill. I cannot see any real reason why it should not be passed.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The honourable gentleman certainly proved one thing: that his political effort was much more potent than his legal effort; for he succeeded in getting three years in the penitentiary for his client in the first instance, and he succeeded in getting him scot-free in the second. Now, my honourable friend in his argument puts criminal matters on a parity with civil matters, and therefore he would have an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada and also to the Privy Council in England. Why stop with one court? The higher up he goes in the scale, according to his contention, the nearer he gets to infallibility. The first court of appeal would be, say, 75 per cent infallible, and he would finally get up to the Privy Council, which would have 100 per cent of infallibility, and then absolute justice would be done.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Is my honourable friend speaking ex cathedra now?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Oh, take it any way you like. My contention is this. In these cases generally there is guilt. In the case that my honourable friend cited, that of two boys who had stolen overcoats, they did not give up the coats. He has not shown that they gave up the coats. He said the act was done in a drunken frolic, but they kept the goods until they were arrested—which showed that theft was the object.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: I did not go into all the circumstances. What actually happened was that the proprietor of the store sent one of his clerks down street and he overtook the boys in another store and took the coats from them.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, they still had the coats.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: They retained them until the theft was discovered and they were finally taken with the goods. Very well. Then I say they were impenitent thieves up to the time they were arrested.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: My honourable friend forgets that the impenitent thief was pardoned.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: God pardoned him, and we trust that God pardons all criminals if they repent; but this thief was indifferent—he had not repented. My honourable friend is going into theology. The impenitent thief showed "works meet unto repentance" by what he said—by the chastisement he gave his fellow thief when he was reviling Our Saviour. That is the reason why he was pardoned. So my honourable friend's theology is as defective as his law.

I say that we should let this matter stand until there is a fuller House. It seems to me that if the honourable gentleman and his friends have so much faith in the justice of their case, they will do that. It is not such a serious matter. I press, Mr. Chairman, for my motion.

Hon. W. C. EDWARDS: Honourable gentlemen, I think that a very serious question of this kind ought not to be dealt with by a thin House, especially as it will make no difference whatever if we simply pass the second reading now instead of deferring it until the 6th of April. I think it would be a great mistake to proceed with a measure of such importance to-day. On two former occasions this Bill was brought up just at the end of the session. There is not the slightest danger of the Bill not having full consideration or not being passed if it meets with the full approval of the Senate and the Commons. Therefore nothing would be gained by proceeding with it now, and I think it would be a great mistake to do so. I would therefore argue most strongly that the amendment of my honourable friend be carried, and that this matter be deferred until the 6th of April.

The proposed amendment was negatived.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: The ground I take is that if this Bill is of any value it does not go far enough. I do not think there are many lawyers practising in Canada to-day who do not believe in the principle of having an appeal in criminal cases. There is no reason why a man who is charged with a criminal offence, and whose liberty has been taken from him, should not have a right to appeal in the same way as a man who has been sued for $1,000 can appeal from one court to another in the province. But the man whose liberty is taken away has no appeal, although the judge may be wrong. To my mind this Bill is only a half-way measure, and if we are going to do anything in the direction of amending the Criminal Code, we should suggest an amendment which will cover what is intended by this Bill and also a general appeal. If you have a general appeal, then you have a right to deal with it.

Another objection to this particular Bill is that a man who has been sentenced must first apply to a judge for leave to appeal. What is the reason for that? Why should he not have a right to go direct to the court of appeal at once, instead of doing that which involves two arguments? For any lawyer knows that where you are applying for leave to appeal, the application involves an argument of the whole case before the single judge. Why should there be two arguments? If you are to appeal, go direct to the Court of Appeal. I would suggest that my honourable friend who has charge of this Bill, should let it stand, and in the meantime increase its scope so as to make it cover in a thorough way what has already been spoken of.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: This Bill went into Committee last year, and it was at the request of the honourable member for Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton), who is a lawyer of some eminence in the province, that the clause was inserted in reference to applying to a judge of the court of appeal. In the original draft the application was to have been made to the Attorney General, but this was substituted after a great deal of argument.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Did I understand my honourable friend to say that the evidence would not be before the judge of the court of appeal?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: No, I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I understood you that way. There is nothing in the Bill to say that he shall revise the evidence, or go over the evidence, but simply that he shall revise the sentence.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I do not like to take up the time of the House; but I am astonished that a gentleman who has boasted of his thirty-five years' experience in the great province of New Brunswick does not know that the applicant goes to the attorney general's office and states the evidence. There is no argument. They do not go into the evidence. Surely a statement of that kind is sufficient.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then what is it?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I am afraid I cannot make the honourable gentleman understand anything. Perhaps he does not want to.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Paragraph 2 says—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is not what paragraph 2 says. It is what the honourable gentleman from Winnipeg says now. I do not think I have much more difficulty in understanding plain English than the honourable gentleman has; but it may sometimes be difficult for a man who is accustomed to plain English to understand the language of the honourable gentleman, because the two vary very much, and they are sometimes as wide apart as the poles. Now, I understood the honourable member who is promoting this Bill to state in introducing it that there was no revision of the evidence, and that is what I objected to. If there were no revision of the evidence, how could the court of appeal know whether the sentence was a just one or not, and whether it should or should not be interfered with? But if there is a revision of the evidence, if the evidence is before the judge, then he knows whether that sentence is just or unjust, and he can then recommend or not that the appeal be heard. I agree with what was said by the honourable gentleman from Huron (Hon. Mr. Proudfoot) who has just proposed that this Bill should be made practicable and then be brought before the House, instead of being a cause of increased expense to the country without benefiting any one in the end.

Subsection 2 of new section 1055 A was agreed to.

Subsection 3 of new section 1055 A was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to, and the Bill was reported without amendment.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS moved the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I object to the third reading now. I object to the suspension of rules to allow this Bill to pass now. Let it take its ordinary course.

It was ordered, that the third reading of the Bill be set down for the 6th day of April next.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 6, at 8 o'clock p.m.

THE SENATE.

Tuesday, April 6, 1920.

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

HALIFAX GRAVING DOCK.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS inquired:

1. Has the Government taken possession of the property of the Halifax Graving Dock Company, Limited?

2. If so, on what date, and was it by lease, tender, purchase, expropriation, or by Order in Council under the War Measures Act?

3. Has any sum been paid for or on account of the property, and if so, how much and on what date or dates?

4. Is the Halifax Graving Dock and adjunct ship repairing plant being operated by any department of the Government? If so, for how long has it been so operated?

5. If not now operated as a public work by the Government, has it been rented, sold, loaned, or given to a private company?

6. If so (a) on what date. (b) on what terms and conditions and (c) for what period?

7. The names of the private company to whom the Halifax Graving Dock property has been so transferred, its capitalization, and the names of its directors.

8. How much, if anything, has been paid to March 1, 1920, by said private company on account of the rental, or purchase, or for the use of said Graving Dock property?

9. The amount paid by the Government to the Halifax Graving Dock Company, Limited, for its property at Halifax, taken possession of by the Government, and if nothing, the reason for withholding payment; and has any effort been made, and if so, what, to effect an amicable settlement with the Halifax Graving Dock Company?

10. The number of square feet of land and land covered with water taken by the Government from the Halifax Graving Dock Company on (or in connection with) which the dock and plant was located.

11. Was any land, and land covered with water, additional to that taken from the Halifax Graving Dock Company, sold, leased or given to Halifax Shipyards, Limited? If so (a) how many square feet, (b) was it acquired by purchase or expropriation, (c) what was the cost thereof to the Government, and (d) if sold or leased to Halifax Shipyards, at what price?

12. Has the Government expended any money upon the property taken from the Halifax Graving Dock, Limited, or upon any land or other property acquired in connection therewith, since its acquisition? If so, state the amount so expended and the nature of the work done.

13. Has the Government been asked to make any further expenditures in this connection? If so, how much, and does it propose to do so?

14. Is the Government to be fully reimbursed for all its expenditures for the Halifax Graving Dock property and in connection therewith by Halifax Shipyards, Limited, and if not all, what proportion and upon what conditions; and whether or not any deferred payments carry interest charges?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Yes.

2. Expropriated by Order in Council of May 27, 1918.

3. No.

4. No.

5. Leased to Halifax Shipyards, Limited.

6. (a) Order in Council 10th June, 1918; (b) annual rental of $62,500. The company agree and bind themselves to purchase the dock property and plant outright, by giving notice to that effect at any time during the term of the lease, for the sum of $1,250,000; (c) for one year computed from June 24, 1918, but in case notice is not given within the year then the lease shall continue from year to year upon the same terms and conditions until such notice is given.

7. The Halifax Shipyards, Limited; (b and c) no information in departmental records.

8. $93,750 rental.

9. Nothing paid; an offer of $1,100,000 was made for the property but refused when proceedings to expropriate were instituted.

10. 7.5 acres.

11. Yes: (a) 38,280 feet; (b) by expropriation; (c) $11,484 was offered the Lorne Yacht Club for this property but refused; (d) Halifax Shipyards Company to pay five per cent on award and costs, if any, with right to purchase.

12. The Government has paid out the sum of $53,960; (b) for the erection of buildings, wharves, etc., to replace those destroyed by the explosion. This amount includes $23,485.93 worth of materials handed over to Halifax Shipyards, Ltd., which is to be reimbursed by that company, thereby leaving Government expenditure at the sum of $30,474.07.

13. No.

14. Answered by answers to questions 6 and 11.

PRICES OF COTTON GARMENTS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE inquired:

1. Has the Government received any report from the Board of Commerce of Canada giving the result of their investigations made into the High Cost of Living, so far as such high cost is affected by the prices charged by the manufacturers of garments made from cotton?

2. If they have not, when will such report be made?

3. When made, will the report be, without delay, brought down and laid on the Table of this Chamber?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. No.

2. The Government has no information.

3. Yes, if such report comes before the Government.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY SYSTEM.

INQUIRY AS TO DEFICITS.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS inquired:

1. If there has been a deficit during the past year on that portion of National Railway system known as the Canadian Northern Railway system, and, if so, how much?

2. If there has been a deficit during the past year on that portion of the Canadian National Railways system known as the Grand Trunk Pacific, and, if so, how much?

3. If there has been a deficit during the past year on that portion of the Canadian National Railways system known as the Intercolonial, and, if so, how much?

4. If there has been a deficit during the past year on that portion of the Canadian National Railways system known as the Prince Edward Island railway, and, if so, how much?

5. If there has been a deficit during the past year on that portion of the Canadian National Railway system known as the Canadian Northern Railway system, and, if so, how much?

6. If there has been a deficit during the past year in any hotel of the hotel system of the Canadian National railways, and, if so, which hotel, and how much?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. There was an operating deficit on the Canadian Northern Railway system for the year 1919 of $6,471,846.35.

2. The Grand Trunk Pacific railway is not a part of the Canadian National railways, but is operated under a receivership. The deficit for the year 1919 is $5,555,518.

3. There was an operating deficit on the Intercolonial railway for the year 1919 of $2,286,557.80.

4. There was an operating deficit on the Prince Edward Island railway for the year 1919 of $754,139.35.

5. Answered by No. 1.

6. There was no deficit during the year 1919 on any hotels included in the Canadian National Railways system.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 36, an Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1921.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of the Bill.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill makes provision for voting one-sixth of the estimates for the year. I need scarcely point out to the House that we have been passing similar Bills for some years, particularly when the fiscal year has expired before the Estimates have been brought down. Notwithstanding the vote which is now asked for by the Government, as was pointed out by the Minister of Finance, Parliament will continue to exercise its fullest control over the estimates, and may deal with the various items of which it is proposed under this Bill to vote one-sixth. So Parliament will be in no way handicapped by reason of the vote in question.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: What does one-sixth amount to?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It was said in another place that if the amount had been spent it would be too late to remonstrate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, one-sixth of any particular item would not be of very much service to the Government, if it lacked the right to expend the other five-sixths. The total amount asked for is $62,900,986—in round figures, $63,000,000.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I suppose that, as we have the assurance from the honourable gentleman that we may cut down the remainder of the estimates when the Supply Bill comes before us, we need not move to refer this one-sixth to the Finance Committee for examination; we may do so when the main Supply Bill comes down.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, I had that question in mind myself; but, after the explanation of the honourable leader of the House that the passage of this Bill would not interfere in any way with the consideration of the main estimates, I have no objection to the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Except what has been spent.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING.

On motion of Sir James Lougheed, the Bill was read the third time and passed.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE BILL.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH BULGARIA.

PROPOSED RESOLUTION OF APPROVAL.

A message was received from the House of Commons informing this House that the House of Commons had adopted the following resolution, approving of the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Bulgaria, and requesting that the Senate would unite with the House of Commons in the approval of the said Treaty by filling up the blank in the said resolution with the words "Senate and":

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Resolved by the House of Commons: That it is expedient that Parliament do approve of the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Bulgaria, signed at Neuilly-sur-Seine on the 27th day of November, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, a copy of which has been laid before Parliament, and which was signed on behalf of His Majesty, acting for Canada, by the plenipotentiaries therein named, and that this House do approve of the same.

It was ordered that the said resolution be taken into consideration to-morrow.

REVISION OF PUNISHMENTS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill B, an Act to amend the Criminal Code so as to provide for the revision of excessive or inadequate Punishments.—Hon. Mr. McMeans.

DIVORCE BILL, 1920.

On the Order: "Second reading Bill A, an Act respecting Divorce.—Hon. Mr. Barnard."

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Honourable gentlemen, I promised Mr. Barnard to move the second reading of this Bill in his absence. I wish to move to-night that the order be discharged and placed upon the Order Paper for Thursday next. But I think it is only fair to say to honourable members that I expect on Thursday to ask the honourable leader of the House to have the Bill withdrawn altogether.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: To withdraw the Bill?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Yes, to withdraw the Bill, and probably to introduce two Bills relating to divorce instead of this one Bill. I am saying this now because I know that there are several honourable gentlemen who are interested in this Bill, and I think it will likely be dropped.

The order was discharged, and placed on the Order Paper for Thursday next.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill D, an Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the proposed amendments do not contemplate any change in the principles laid down in the Act, but are submitted for the purpose of ensuring more prompt and efficient and economical administration of the law. I will not go into details unless honourable gentlemen express a desire that that should be done.

There are five amendments of a minor nature suggested. The first refers to boards being established where several employers in the same industry are affected. Perhaps I might indicate the necessity or desirability of the change by citing a specific case. Numerous instances have arisen of workmen in the employ of perhaps half a score or more of employers having disputes with their respective employers, and desiring that the differences be referred to a board of conciliation. It was necesary to obtain the consent of each individual employer to the establishment of the board; otherwise a separate board would have had to be established for each employer. We had an experience of this sort in the coal industry in Nova Scotia within the past two months. Six applications for boards of conciliation were received, and it was necesary to establish four boards, though one board might have done the work of the four just as well, and saved considerable money, and the result would, I think, have been more satisfactory to both the employers and the workmen, because the recommendations would have been uniform and therefore fair to all. I may add that recently a number of employers have expressed a desire that this should be done. Only a few days ago I received from one of the associations of employers, in what is perhaps the largest industry in Canada apart from transportation, a communication that suggests this very thing. I believe, therefore, that it is desirable to amend the Act so that one board may be established to deal with a dispute in which there are several employers, members of an association, so that the employers' association may be called upon to act in the same capacity as would the individual employers.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: How are those boards appointed?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Either an employer or ten or more workmen in the employ of any employer may make an application for a board. If a dispute exists in which they are unable to agree or reach an adjustment, each party selects his own representative upon the board. The two members so selected have the opportunity of agreeing upon a third, who will act as chairman of the investigation committee, or board, as it is usually termed. In the event of the two members of the board appointed by the respective parties being unable to agree upon a third member, it then becomes the duty of the Department of Labour to appoint the third member, who shall act as chairman of the board.

The second suggested amendment to the Act refers to a question that seems to me of some importance, as a result of observation and experience, and particularly in view of the attitude taken by some labour organizations recently. As the Act now stands, it is possible for a relatively small minority of members of a labour organization to make application for and be entitled to a board. The officers of the department feel, and I concur in their view, that a substantial number, probably a majority of the members of the organization, or, if the men are unorganized, a majority of the men affected by the dispute, ought to be obtained before the board is established. Therefore it is suggested that the two clauses of the Act referring to the procedure which workmen must pursue before they are entitled to have a board established should be amended so as to guarantee, more fully at least than is the case at the present time, that the application for the board is concurred in by a substantial number, or a majority, of the men affected. I am sure that employers will agree that that is desirable.

It is proposed to amend section 34 of the Act, because of the inequality and the lack of uniformity that now exist. Every one of the other sixty-three sections applies uniformly throughout the Dominion, but section 34 does not. It refers to the fees of witnesses who may be called by a board to give evidence before it. At present the fees are governed by the fees paid in the province where the inquiry may be held. In some provinces the fees are as low, I think, as 75 cents a day; in others I think they run up to about $3; and the result has been numerous difficulties, much correspondence, and considerable dissatisfaction. It is proposed to make a flat rate of $2 a day, which is about the average fee paid at the present time under the various provincial laws.

It is proposed to amend section 57 of the Act to provide against an interpretation that was placed upon it last year, and which caused a great deal of unnecessary inconvenience and hardship to a large number of people. The Act, which was passed in 1907, provides that after a board has been established there shall be no lock-out upon the part of the employers nor any strike on the part of the employees, pending the rendering of the report by the board. Up to last year nothing but a reasonably broad interpretation was ever placed upon that section of the Act. The board held their inquiry and made their report to the department, and the report was communicated by the Registrar, who is the Deputy Minister, to the parties affected, who had submitted their evidence to the board. After each party had received a copy of the recommendations of the board, they made up their minds, and advised the department whether or not they could accept the recommendations. In one instance last year, however, a body of employees in a large city decided that they had fully complied with the letter of the law when they withheld action until the board had completed its investigation, and made its report; and even before the report had reached the department they were threatening to withdraw their service, which necessarily would cause much public inconvenience. In an effort to avoid that unhappy result the department authorized the board itself to transmit direct to both parties a copy of their award, even before it had been forwarded to the department. However, the gentleman who was managing the property on behalf of the owners could not be found for some three hours, with the result that something like 100,000 people of the city of Toronto, and also those who were attending the exhibition, were inconvenienced. It is proposed to amend the Act so as to make it clear that it will be unlawful for an employer to engage in a lock-out or for an employee to participate in a strike until the board's report has been received by the department and has been communicated to both the parties represented before the board. It is not an important change, but in the event of what I term a narrow interpretation being placed upon that section, as was done in the case I have mentioned, it will prevent a repetition of an inconvenience to many which brought good to none.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: If either of the parties refuse to accept the decision of the board, what happens next?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The Act does not bind the parties to an acceptance of the board's recommendation, but it does bind them to refrain from either a lock-out or a strike until the report of the board has been rendered, and transmitted to both parties.

One other amendment is proposed which I think is only reasonable. Section 63a of the Act at the present time permits the establishment of a board by the department, if a strike has actually occurred, and if, in the opinion of the minister, a good purpose can be served by its establishment, even though there may have been no application received from either the employers or the workmen. The experience of the departmental officials is that some strikes that have occurred might have been avoided had it been within the power of the minister to establish a Board of Conciliation before the strike actually occurred. It is therefore proposed to amend this section by inserting after the word "occurred," in the second line, the words, "or seems to the minister to be imminent," so that an inquiry may be conducted without waiting for an actual strike or a lock-out to occur

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Will the honourable gentleman tell us how the Minto coal mine strike was settled?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The employees made application for a board; the application was granted, and a board was established. It received and considered all the evidence submitted. It rendered a decision which, if my memory is correct, was unanimous. The employees, as was their right under the Act, declined to accept the recommendation, and a strike occurred; but they did comply with the requirements of the Act. That is one of the few cases in which the recommendations of a board were not accepted. In 1919, out of ninety-five cases in which boards were established, about seventy-one strikes were averted.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Has the Government considered the question of whether they could bind the parties to abide by the decisions of the boards, as has been done in certain countries for some time?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Outside of the state of Kansas I do not know of any country where arbitrations and the findings of Boards of Arbitration are compulsory. Some state legislation was recently passed in Kansas, the result of which is yet doubtful. There is much to be said in support of compulsory arbitration, but, on the other hand, there is much to be said against it.

I do not desire to weary the House at this time, but, if I may be permitted to express my personal view, I think—in fact, from observation and experience I am sure—that the system of arbitration and adjustment of disputes that has been adopted by our Canadian railroads and the employees engaged in what we call the transportation branch of these railroads is an ideal one. In 1918, by mutual consent, at a meeting called for the purpose of discussing ways and means to prevent any interruption of transportation, particularly during the war, the railway employees through some seventy-nine representatives, and the railroads through some twenty-four officials, agreed that there should be no strikes or lock-outs during the continuation of the war. They set up a tribunal on which each side had equal representation, and they agreed that any dispute which might arise between any individual organization and a railroad which could not be adjusted by direct negotiation should be referred to this tribunal, consisting of twelve men, and that the decisions of the tribunal should be accepted as final by both parties. Regulations to govern the operations of this adjustment board were drawn, and notwithstanding that the war has been over for about a year and a half the arrangement still continues with marked success. To date sixty-six cases have been dealt with by Adjustment Board No. 1, as it is called, on which each side has six representatives, and in every case a decision has been reached. Sometimes they have been majority decisions, but in each case they have been made unanimous. That happy solution of their difficulties was brought about only because, through years of negotiation and conference together, there has grown up in each a spirit of confidence in the other that unfortunately does not exist in many of our industries. I am delighted to be able to state that a number of the associations of the employers, such as the building trades in our large cities, have discussed similar arrangements among themselves, and even with their employees through their organizations, and in some cases experiments have been carried on with success. I am hopeful that as time goes on that spirit of confidence may be encouraged by all concerned, and that many of the labour difficulties which now exist will be avoided.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Is there not some provincial legislation to that effect?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: This Act, honourable gentlemen, applies to what is described within the Act as "public utilities." The Department of Justice, I think, are inclined to the view that the Act cannot be applied to an individual industrial plant in a given city or province except with the consent of both parties to the dispute; neither can it be forcibly applied to establish a board as between a municipality and its employees. Many representations have been made to the Department of Labour urging that the scope of the Act should be extended. The Trades and Labour Congress at its convention in Hamilton in September of last year, at which 900 members were present, went on record as being in favour of extending the scope of the Act. Some employers or associations of employers in communications to the department have gone on record as being in favour of widening the scope of the Act to cover all industries. I am inclined to the opinion, based upon the views of the Department of Justice, that that is not practicable or perhaps possible, except with the consent of the provinces concerned. It has been proposed that a conference should be held in Ottawa about the end of this month, at which there shall be a representative of such provincial Government, a representative of the employers of each province, chosen by the employers, and a representative of labour from each province, chosen by labour, in accordance with and agreeable to decisions arrived at by the Industrial Conference which met here last September, and that they should deal with the question of the provinces either permitting this Act to be extended in its scope or themselves passing legislation whereby workmen engaged in industrial life or employees of municipalities may have access to machinery somewhat similar to that which I have outlined. The particular purpose of the meeting is to endeavour to co-ordinate and make uniform the labour laws of the various provinces.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Can the honourable gentleman tell us what view labour takes of the Industrial Disputes Act, and the working of the Act? In the past some hostility seems to have been shown to it by some associations. Have those prejudices disappeared?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, which has been the recognized legislative mouthpiece of labour for probably 15 years, did for a number of years, at each of its annual conventions, pass a resolution requesting the repeal of the Act. That attitude was changed last year, and the Trades and Labour Congress is now asking for a general revision and extension of the Act. It has been invited by the Government to submit in concrete forms its views as to what changes should be made; but owing to the president of the Trades and Labour Congress having been in London and not having yet returned, the Congress has not been able to bring down its suggestions; so I anticipate that they may not be brought before us at this session. But the attitude of the congress indicates, I think quite clearly, that the opposition to the Act itself that was apparent for a number of years has to some extent passed away; and, from evidence received, I judge that that is due somewhat to the fact that less delay has occurred during recent years than occurred originally. Some of the red tape, as we might term it, which was required by the Act itself, if minutely followed, and which would cause an unnecessary loss of time, has been eliminated. Communications, instead of being exchanged by mail as between here and British Columbia, are frequently exchanged by telegram. As a result of the prompter administration of the Act, the objections that formerly seemed to be insurmountable have, to some extent, been removed; and to that fact I attribute the change in the attitude of the Congress towards the Act itself. That, I think, answers the honourable gentleman's question.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: Are we to understand that when this Act is passed it cannot be put into operation without an application from the different labour unions where the troubles occur—that they must ask the Federal Government to apply it?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No. The suggestion that it is proposed to submit to the gathering of representatives from the various provinces, to which I alluded, is that one of two things ought to be done: either the province should give consent, if that is possible, to the scope of this Act being extended to cover classes of men in private industry which perhaps may not now properly come within the scope of the Act; or, if the provinces do not feel that can do that, they themselves should pass legislation along lines similar to those of this Act, in order that workmen in private industries, and municipal and provincial employees, might have access to machinery for the impartial investigation of their grievances, just as employees engaged in public utilities now have, under this Act.

Hon. FREDERIC NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, may I ask the honourable minister if he has given consideration to any proposed amendment which would look towards constituting the board of conciliation in a somewhat different way? To-day, when a board of conciliation is agreed upon, the employer appoints one member, the representatives of labour another, and the two of them are supposed to confer and agree upon a third member, who shall act as chairman. In the event of their failure to agree upon the third member, the appointment of the chairman rests absolutely with the Labour Department. I have had considerable knowledge of a number of boards of conciliation that have been appointed, but I have failed to learn of one single case in which the two parties have been able to agree upon a chairman. I may as well state that as a rule the labour representative will not agree to any chairman that may be suggested by the employer, and thus the onus of the appointment of the chairman is thrown upon the Labour Department. The Labour Department usally appoints a county judge. The board of conciliation rarely awards the entire increase demanded. In the great majority of cases it is a question of splitting the difference. That is to say, an excessive amount is asked for by the employees, then a board of conciliation is appointed, and the result generally is the splitting of the difference, which may mean a very heavy burden on the employer.

The suggestion that I should like to make —it may or may not be feasible—is this: that instead of the Department of Labour selecting for appointment one out of a number of county court judges, there should be for one province, say the province of Ontario, a permanent judge, like a judge of the Exchequer Court. That judge would be independent; he would not be looking forward to receiving in addition to his salary a large amount of remuneration according to the number of chairmanships of boards of conciliation that he might be able to secure during a year. An independent judge like a judge of the Exchequer Court would learn in the course of years to weigh evidence pro and con much better than it might be done by a judge appointed only occasionally; and, his appointment being permanent for life, like that of every high court judge, he would not in any sense be playing to the gallery; he would feel that he was immune from criticism and that all he had to do was to decide the case that came before him, as any high court judge would decide a case, according to the evidence and without fear or favour. I do not know whether the suggestion is a practicable one or not, but in practice there are objections to the present method of appointing chairmen of boards of conciliation dealing with employees and employers in individual industries, because the third member, the chairman, always owes his appointment to one source, and that is the Labour Department, and he is not as independent as a permanent chairman would be, appointed in the same manner as a judge of the high court. While this matter is under discussion I would like to ask the honourable the Minister of Labour if any consideration has been given to any such suggestion as I have advanced.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In answer to the inquiry of the honourable member from Toronto, I am happy to inform him that the point that he has raised has from time to time during years past, to my knowledge, received consideration.

I assume that the honourable gentleman, in mentioning that so far as he knew the members of boards selected by employers and workmen respectively had always failed to agree upon a third member, was stating the result of his own experiences, perhaps as an employer; but I beg to assure him and the House that that is not by any means always the case. In years gone by it fell to my lot on several occasions to serve on boards of conciliation, representing workmen, and in no single case did I fail to agree with the employer's representative as to the chairman. The records of the department indicate that in the case of a substantial number of boards the chairman has been selected by the other two members, chosen by the respective parties.

As to the other point raised by the honourable gentleman, may I call attention to this disability that would naturally arise if his suggestion were adopted. Legislation somewhat similar to our Industrial Disputes Investigation Act was in effect in Australia for many years. Australia had not only a permanent chairman, but a permanent board, and the law finally became a dead letter because the board could not keep pace with the work that came to it to be done. It had two years' work ahead of it, and neither employers or workmen cared to wait two years for their turn to have their case heard. We had in Canada during last year, if I remember correctly, 95 boards. There were at one time, I think, 17 boards in session in various parts of the country at the same time. It would, therefore, in my humble opinion, be quite objectionable to have to postpone the hearing of a dispute just because the permanent chairman happened to be busy with other cases. It would create the very discontent that the department has been studiously and persistently endeavouring to overcome, and that caused organized labour to object to the Act itself for years. "If a dispute exists," they said, "we want it inquired into promptly." And I think they are entitled to have it inquired into promptly, if it is to be inquired into at all. Therefore, while there is much merit, from one point of view, in the suggestion made by the honourable member from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls), I respectfully submit that there are also objections to the plan.

Hon. JOHN MILNE: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to ask the honourable the Minister of Labour how the international unions are going to be affected by this. The international unions of America have control in Canada as well as in the United States. In fact, labour has now reached such a stage that there is no stopping it, and you cannot tell anything about what is to be done. In my own business alone, the moulders have been out for four months. The employees of our shop were out three weeks, and they were given what they wanted. Now they come back at us again and they say: "We want our castings shaken out and taken out on the mash, and the sand cut over." We have to comply with their demands, which mean about 75 cents a day added to the wages. They are making $8 a day now, and they are not satisfied. All over this country labour is in a fearful state of upheaval. Every one asks for more money, and you have to give it to him for certain reasons. Take our own case. We have agents in Montreal, in Toronto, and in Vancouver. We must supply them, besides our customers, and if we do not do so our profits will be eaten up by municipal taxes and other expenses. We must keep going, and in order to keep going we must give labour what they want; otherwise we lose our connections and lose business. There is no doubt it is a good thing to have these boards of conciliation, but you must keep in mind that the international unions of America have to do with Canada as well as the United States. As I understand, there are agitators in every trade organizing unions, and those agitators are paid large sums and do not suffer anything. If they can get the men to strike, of course the men suffer, and their wives and children suffer. The moulders went out on strike and stayed out for four months. The agitators who induced them to go out did not suffer at all, because they were paid their salaries by the international unions. I would like to ask the Minister of Labour just how the question of international unions is going to be reconciled with the proposition that he now makes regarding Canada. We can deal with Canada, but we must remember that we have to deal with the United States as well.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In reply to the question of the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Milne), may I point out first that the industry in which he is engaged as a successful business man is not one that comes within the scope of this Act at all. It is one which would come within the scope of a similar Act if the province of Ontario saw fit to set up machinery of this sort, whereby an impartial investigation might be had in the case of a dispute existing in a private industry; but, inasmuch as this Act applies only to workmen engaged in what is known as public utilities, it would not in any way affect the employees in the industry to which my honourable friend refers, and in which he is engaged.

Answering his question as to what bearing this would have upon the activities of the international unions, I would simply point out to him and the House that the workmen in every public utility covered by this Act are members of international unions; that so far as I know—and I am pretty familiar with them—every international union has its separate and distinct Canadian unit, and that the members of international unions in Canada exercise local autonomy and independence in the handling of their own business in this country, to just as great an extent as the Parliament of Canada handles its business without interference by the British Government.

May I briefly point out some of the benefits that have accrued to this country by reason of the fact that the workmen on our railroads, for example, are members of international unions? In 1918 we got within about 48 hours of the tying up of all our Canadian railroads by a strike in what is known as the shop trades. It was set for a certain Tuesday in August of that year, if I remember correctly—or possibly July. It was only through the influence exerted upon the Canadian membership by the executive heads of the international organization, together with the action of the Canadian membership of other international railway organizations, that the strike was averted.

The very fact that the Canadian railways adopted what is known as the McAdoo award, or what is properly called General Order No. 27 in the United States, together with amendments thereto, was the very key which locked the door upon strikes on railroads in Canada during the war—why? Because about nine-tenths of the membership of all international unions of which railroad men are members are in the United States. The Canadian railroads and the Canadian railway organizations said: "We will agree to accept and make effective on the part of the railways general order No. 27 and whatever amendments may be made to it in the United States." The minority in each of the railway organizations could not decline to accept what the majority of the members of that same organization agreed to as applicable to their conditions in the United States. Therefore the very fact of the Canadian railway men being members of international unions was absolutely the cause of preventing the possibility of strikes on our railroads during the war. I think that is an illustration that perhaps ought to indicate clearly that benefits as well as disadvantages are to be derived through men being members of an international union.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to suggest to the honourable minister that, when we reach the committee stage of this Bill, it would be very interesting if he would bring down a statement showing what has been done under the Act. In answer to the honourable gentleman from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. McMeans), the honourable minister said that this Bill applied only to public utilities. I should like to ask whether in his opinion banks are public utilities. I understand that an organization of bank employees is now being formed.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Within the Act as it now stands banks are not termed public utilities. It might be desirable that they should be, but they are not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It may be out of order, but if I may be permitted to extend the discussion to a question that is not exactly germane, I would ask the honourable gentleman about strikes that I understand have been going on in the Crowsnest Pass. Have there been any demands for conciliation boards, or are the parties in a fair way of settlement?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: There has been no application received for a board, because there has been no occasion for it. Briefly, the situation there is this: An agreement existed for some years between the United Mine Workers of America, an international organization and the Coal Operators' Association. That agreement expired on March 31, 1919. By mutual consent, representatives of the workmen and representatives of the employers made a joint request to the department to the effect that the director of coal operations, appointed under Order in Council to regulate matters at least during the period of the war, should issue an order continuing in effect existing rates and conditions until such time as a new agreement was made in the United States, which would not be until the United States Senate had ratified the Peace Treaty, or not later than April 1, 1920. Some of the workmen have attempted to repudiate that arrangement. Some dispute of a minor nature arose which provoked a strike last summer. The United Mine Workers attempted to carry out their obligation under the agreement, and finally succeeded in re-opening or re-operating the mines in August. Subsequently another attempt was made by a considerable number of the men, who had affiliated themselves with what is known as the One Big Union, to repudiate the agreement under which they were working; and at some few mines at present, and since the 15th of last month, part of the men have been on strike. I regret that I was absent from the city today and have not the information up to date. The last information I received was that in some of the mines all the men had gone back to work and that in the rest of them the number was increasing daily. I anticipate that in a short time conditions will be normal.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON moved the second reading of Bill E, an Act to amend the Technical Education Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this, too, is an Act that happens to be administered by the Department of Labour. The proposed amendment is simply to straighten out an inaccuracy in the Act as it was passed a year ago. I have not got my notes here with regard to the details; but briefly the amendment is this. The Act provided that no moneys supplied under it should be used for construction purposes or for paying off obligations incurred by Provincial Governments in any technical educational institution existing prior to the time that the Act came into force. That provision appeared in two different sections. It so happens that subsection 2 of section 5, in its application to a province like Nova Scotia, where there is just one technical education institution, would prevent any portion of the Government grant being used for construction or for the improvement of the property. Another section of the Act provides that not more than 25 per cent of the Government appropriation in each province shall be used for that purpose; but, as the Act now reads, in a province like Nova Scotia, where there has been just one institution in existence for years, even the 25 per cent could not be applied by way of assistance; and the repeal of this section is suggested.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to ask the minister if this Bill does not very considerably change the whole working of the Act? It seems to me that when we put the Bill through it was especially provided that this money should not be used for buildings or for any work done before, but that the money the Government supplied should be used for the purpose of technical education, and, I presume, for buying necessary appliances and that sort of thing, from that time on. As I understand the honourable gentleman, that is going to be entirely changed.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It is not retroactive; but as it stands at present, it would prohibit even future additions or improvements.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY SYSTEM.

THE OPERATING DEFICIT ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. P. McSWEENEY: I would like to direct the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to one part of his answer regarding the Canadian National Railway system, in reply to the honourable gentleman from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. McMeans). In No. 3 he states:

> There was an operating deficit on the Intercolonial railway for the year 1919 of $2,286,557.80.

I think there must be some mistake about that. I think the Intercolonial proper would not have more than half that deficit, because the year previous it had about a million and a quarter. The line from Quebec to Winnipeg is included in this answer, I imagine.

Hon. Sir James LOUGHEED: Probably. I may say to my honourable friend that I have no personal knowledge of the subject. The information was obtained from the Department of Railways. I shall make further inquiries into it and ascertain if the National Transcontinental is included in the Intercolonial system, as I understand it now is.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: It is bad enough to have a deficit of a million and a quarter, without having double that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We do not want to throw any reflection on the Maritime Provinces, of course.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would my honourable friend give that information as an addition to this answer?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend from Northumberland (Hon. Mr. McSweeney) suggests that these figures probably include the deficit on what was formerly known as the National Transcontinental. It may possibly now be included in the Intercolonial system, in the preparation of railway statistics. I shall make inquiries to see if that is the case.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: And give the reply as an addition to this answer?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, I have put in the answer, but I will get further information.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I thought the National Transcontinental was still in the hands of a receiver.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, the Grand Trunk Pacific. The National Transcontinental has always been in the hands of the Government. The Grand Trunk never took it over.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: The Grand Trunk Pacific is in the hands of a receiver, is it not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Not in the hands of the Government at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. The National Transcontinental was never taken over by the Grand Trunk Pacific.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH BULGARIA.

RESOLUTION APPROVING IT AGREED TO.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of a Message from the House of Commons with a Resolution approving of the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Bulgaria, and requesting the Senate to unite with that House in the said Resolution.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, in moving the resolution which stands in my name on the Order Paper, it probably would be correct for me to say that within the four corners of the Treaty before us for consideration, with a view to ratification, namely, the Bulgarian Treaty, there is nothing of material interest to Canada except in the general way in which Canada is a party to that Treaty, and in the recognition which has been given by the Imperial authorities to the advanced status of Canada at the Conference. So far as the Treaty proper is concerned, it partakes largely of the general provisions which enter into the treaties we have already ratified.

Some of the sections and articles in the Treaty deal of course with local subjects peculiar to Bulgaria. I may direct the attention of the House to some of those local considerations. For instance, under Part II of the Treaty, in Article 27, there is a provision dealing exclusively with the frontiers of Bulgaria. Those will be to a very large extent altered upon the ratification of the Treaty. In one of the former wars in which Bulgaria was engaged it secured a very large acquisition of territory belonging to adjoining nations. Provision is made in this Treaty for the renunciation of the territory, or some of the territory, then acquired by Bulgaria, and its boundaries are very much restricted. I would simply invite the attention of honourable gentlemen to Article 27 of Part II of the Treaty dealing with that particular phase of the subject. Honourable gentlemen will observe that special attention is given to the delimitation of the frontiers affecting the new Serb-Croat-Slovene state, Greece and Roumania; also the frontiers on the Black Sea. Provision is made in the Treaty for the appointment of a boundary commission which will hereafter more closely delimit the boundaries referred to in the article of which I have spoken.

There is also, under Part III, Section 1, a subject of some interest to Canadians of a cosmopolitan turn of mind, in regard to the attitude which Bulgaria will hereafter be compelled to take in regard to some of the adjoining states. For instance, Article 37 makes special provision for the renunciation in favour of the Serb-Croat-Slovene state of certain territory over which the Bulgarian monarchy in the past has exercised authority. This likewise would apply to Greece and Roumania. On page 23 of the Treaty, honourable gentlemen will observe that there will be a renunciation of territory in favour of Thrace, Greece and Roumania. The commission to be appointed will protect Bulgaria so far as that country on the Aegean Sea is concerned.

Special provision is made on page 40, under Part VII of the Treaty, for reparation to be made by Bulgaria to the Allied Powers. An indemnity of two and a quarter billions of francs, payable in gold, is being imposed upon Bulgaria, payable to the Allied Powers. That is only a fraction of the penalty which Bulgaria should be called upon to pay, but owing to her financial condition, which is recited in the Treaty, the amount is fixed at that reasonable sum.

There will be found also on pages 42 and 43, further penalties which have been imposed in the way of contributions to Greece, Roumania, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene state, within a fixed period of time, of a very large quantity of live-stock, consisting of bulls, milch cows, horses and mares, mules, draught oxen, and sheep. The coal mines of Bulgaria also have been assessed with a very substantial contribution, which will have to be made on account of the incursions which Bulgaria made into adjoining states. On page 45 will also be found provisions for payment of the army of occupation. That, and some of the other provisions to which I have referred have been embodied in the treaties which we have already ratified. The general provisions of the Treaty are, in fact, a reproduction of the other treaties. For instance, there has been embodied in the Treaty the Covenant of the League of Nations; also the general provisions regarding financial subjects which must necessarily be adjusted between the Allied Powers and Bulgaria. The economic clauses are also found in this; also provision for aerial navigation, for ports, waterways, and railways; also the elaborate provisions contained in the other Treaty dealing with labour, and which, I may say, have already been set in motion by the Allied Powers.

These are the chief features of the Treaty. I need not enter upon the rather interesting features of the Peace Conference, which were discussed at very great length in the House of Commons when this Treaty was before that House, as I think no good purpose is to be served by entering upon an academic discussion of the constitutional status of Canada with reference to these Treaties or the advanced recognition given to Canada by the Imperial authorities. This of course, may be said to be the first occasion on which Canada has entered into anything like an international treaty, such as is embodied within the four corners of the Treaty which we are now considering. Suffice it to say—and I say this with every confidence, touching the relation of Canada to the Empire and the status accorded to this country—that there never has been a time when it did not rest with Canada alone to request from the Imperial authorities, or from the Empire, whatever recognition Canada thought should be accorded to it. I am satisfied that to-day that is the position that Canada occupies in regard to the Empire. We do not look at this for one moment as a concession on the part of the Imperial authorities to the attitude of Canada at the Peace Conference. It has simply resolved itself into a question as to the relation which Canada wished to have established as between this country and the Empire. Upon that being stated to the Imperial authorities, they were at once only too glad to accede to the request; and when honourable gentlemen discuss this subject from time to time I only desire that it should be kept in view that the sentiment of the Imperial authorities towards Canada has always been, and is to-day, that whatever relations Canada wishes to have established between herself and the Empire, that relation will be recognized by the Imperial authorities.

I therefore move, honourable gentlemen, seconded by Honourable Mr. Robertson:

That the Senate unite with the House of Commons in the said resolution by filling the blank therein with the words, "Senate and," and that a message be sent to the House of Commons accordingly.

The full resolution will therefore read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Commons:

That it is expedient that Parliament do approve of the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Bulgaria, signed at Neuilly-sur-Seine on the 27th day of November, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, a copy of which has been laid before Parliament, and which was signed on behalf of His Majesty, acting for Canada, by the plenipotentiaries therein named, and that this House do approve of the same.

I might say that the word "plenipotentiary" appears in the plural in the motion sent from the House of Commons to the Senate, but that should be in the singular.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Who is the plenipotentiary that signed for us?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Hon. Mr. Perley, the High Commissioner.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Was he appointed by Order in Council here, or on the other side?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Here.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I desire to congratulate the Government on having dealt with this matter in what I might term a more reasonable way than that in which this House was asked to deal with the question of the German Treaty. Honourable gentlemen will remember that a special session was called at the end of last year for the purpose of dealing with the German Treaty, and that at that time the Government thought it advisable to proceed by way of a resolution introduced into both Houses at the same time. I think honourable gentlemen will recollect that I took exception to that procedure at the time as not being the proper method of procedure, inasmuch as it did not seem reasonable that either House should commit itself to a resolution without knowing what the other House had done in connection with it. I am glad to see that in this particular case the Government has proceeded in what would seem to me, at any rate, to be a more logical and parliamentary method of procedure, namely, by having the resolution moved in one House, first of all, and sent up to the other House for their concurrence.

Another point occurs to me in regard to this Treaty. In this case we are asked to agree to the Treaty with Bulgaria, but if honourable gentlemen will remember, at the beginning of the Session the leader of the Government laid on the Table of the House the Treaty with Czecho-Slovakia, and that Treaty was assented to by Order in Council. We have had no explanation from the Government as to why that procedure was adopted in that case. It seems to me that if we are to deal with the Treaty with Bulgaria as we are asked to deal with it, we should deal with all these Treaties in the same way. If it is necessary for the Canadian Parliament to show their approval of these Treaties, every Treaty that is brought before us should be submitted to Parliament for approval. I have not been able to understand why the Government pursued the particular course which they did with regard to the Czecho-Slovak Treaty, and, so far as I know, there has been no explanation in regard to that matter.

My honourable friend has dealt with certain terms of the Treaty which is before us, and, of course, has pointed out that the terms of the Treaty are very largely the same as the terms of the Treaty with Germany, which we have already agreed to. The clauses of the League of Nations are identically the same in each case, and by signing this Treaty we have become a party to the League of Nations. We have, as my honourable friend has said, assumed or taken upon ourselves responsibilities with regard to the League of Nations, and I do not think the people of the country quite realize what they may be. Honourable gentlemen who have followed the course of events in the world since the German Treaty was signed will realize, I think, that, since the signing of the Treaty with Germany, conditions in Europe have become worse, if anything, instead of better. The press from day to day gives us information as to insurrection and trouble, and it would look as though the League of Nations, if it is to be of any effect at all, will very soon have to take some very decided stand in regard to what is happening in Europe to-day. To my mind, conditions in Germany are very serious, and I doubt very much whether the people of Canada realize the responsibilities that they have to face and the undertakings they have made in becoming a party to the League of Nations. Honourable gentlemen know that at the present time on the frontier between France and Germany the British Government is maintaining an army of occupation, and that the French Government is also maintaining an army of occupation. They will have seen from the newspapers of the last day or two that in order to preserve the position that the French Government considered necessary they have had to advance their troops to certain points in Germany, and to maintain law and order in that country. There appears to be considerable friction between the German Government and the French Government in regard to the situation existing between the two countries. In one of the morning papers appeared a statement which reads:

> There are grave rumors current in Cairo, says a despatch to the Exchange Telegraph from the Egyptian capital, regarding the situation in Palestine. The despatch asserts that all permits to Palestine have been stopped and that the troops are being recalled to their stations on the western bank of the Suez Canal. No letters are arriving from Palestine.

That, in a very different part of the world, will show to honourable gentlemen that the state of unrest at the present time is a very serious one, and that the condition that we may have to face in the near future may possibly be very onerous. As one of the members of the League of Nations, Canada must assume considerable responsibilities, and I think that in accepting these we have to be prepared to take our stand as part of the British Empire and to do our part in upholding the League of Nations, and trying to make it a force to maintain the peace of the world. The great danger that I see at the present time is that the feeling generally seems to be that the League of Nations has not accomplished anything—that it is more or less of a dead issue. The action of our neighbours to the south has no doubt militated considerably against the work of the League, and consequently we must bear in mind that we may have to assume very serious responsibilities in connection with carrying out the duties of the League of Nations.

My honourable friend has talked about the status of Canada, and the position that she has assumed.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Would my honourable friend allow me to ask him a question before he goes into another matter? Do I understand my honourable friend to be opposed to Canada joining in the League of Nations?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: No. I do not think my honourable friend has understood my remarks, because in what I have been saying I have not in any way indicated that I am opposed to Canada having signed the League of Nations; but I think the people of Canada to-day do not realize what the responsibilities are that they have assumed by the action that they have taken in signing it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then does the honourable gentleman assume that, if they had, they would not have signed it?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Certainly not.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Speak for yourself, John.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am doing that now.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The leader of the Government dealt with the position that Canada had attained—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Do I understand the honourable gentleman to accept the statement of the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain)? He has not answered the question.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I thought that reply was addressed to the honourable gentleman from Kings (Hon. Mr. Fowler).

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It was addressed by the honourable gentleman to your right. But do you accept his answer to me?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: No, I am speaking for myself.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Well, what do you say for yourself?

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: It is very hard to tell whether people accept or not. No one can answer such a question as that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I can quite understand the inability of the honourable gentleman to answer that or any other intelligent question.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The remarks which my honourable friend, the leader of the Government, made with regard to Canada's position in the League of Nations were, as I understood them, to the effect that it is recognized by the British Empire generally that the Dominions shall from this time on be made parties to agreements that are entered into between the British Empire and other nations. I do not myself think that any very great change has been made in this respect from the position that we occupied before. On prevoius occasions, when it was necessary for a treaty to be drawn up between Canada and other nations of the world, representatives of Canada went to those countries and negotiated the treaty with the assistance of the representatives of the British Government. To all intents and purposes they carried on those negotiations themselves and, with the assent of the British Government, drew up with the nation concerned, a treaty which was satisfactory to the people of Canada and to the British Empire. This was simply carrying out the work of co-operation and co-ordination in the Empire, and was a recognition that Canada had arrived at the stage at which she was entitled to be represented directly in the negotiation of such treaties. The action that has been taken by the Government to-day in insisting that the representatives of Canada should be made party to this Treaty has not, so far as I can see, made any particular difference in the status of Canada. What future steps may be taken is of course another question, and we shall have notice of them and be able to deal with them at the proper time.

The clauses of this Treaty to which my honourable friend has referred do not seem to have given quite the satisfaction that one would have expected from a treaty that has been signed so very lately; for I find that even at the present time the Bulgarians are endeavouring to have certain clauses of this Treaty amended. They claim that it is almost impossible for them to carry out the clause dealing with the enlistment of troops; that they find it is a very expensive matter for them to obtain the kind of recruits that they want by voluntary enlistment, and that the clause in the Treaty dealing with conscription which absolutely forbids them from conscripting men for military service, is going to interfere very seriously with their customary method of carrying on. In clause 65, page 27, it is stated:

> Universal compulsory military service shall be abolished in Bulgaria. The Bulgarian Army shall in future only be constituted and recruited by means of voluntary enlistment.

This is apparently the clause which the Bulgarian government now finds it very difficult to carry out, and which they have been endeavouring to have amended. There are other clauses in the Treaty which, I think, may possibly give rise to trouble, on account of the nationalities in the territories contained within the new boundaries. I understand that there are large numbers of Bulgarians in the territory which is now being cut off from Bulgaria and handed over to Greece and other nations, and that it may be very difficult to get those nationalities to coalesce and live peaceably under the new form of government, and it may possibly lead to further trouble. At any rate, it will be a matter which the League of Nations may have to consider very carefully.

These points occur to me as showing the necessity of our studying very carefully what may be the result of the position in which we stand to-day as members of this League of Nations, and of realizing as well as we can what is the meaning of the responsibilities that will be thrown upon the country.

Hon. N. A. BELCOURT: Honourable gentlemen, I desire to take up the time of the House for a few moments for the purpose of drawing the attention of honourable members to certain provisions of the Treaty of Peace with Bulgaria which seem to me to be of special interest to Canada, and, I may say, of chief concern to a large number of Canadians. I want to put on record the following articles which I find in section 4, under the heading, "Protection of Minorities," on page 23:

> Article 49. Bulgaria undertakes that the stipulations contained in this Section shall be recognized as fundamental laws, and that no law, regulation or official action shall conflict or interfere with these stipulations, nor shall any law, regulation or official action prevail over them.

Then I pass on to Article 53:

> All Bulgarian nationals shall be equal before the law and shall enjoy the same civil and political rights without distinction as to race, language or religion.
> Difference of religion, creed or confession shall not prejudice any Bulgarian national in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil or political rights, as for instance admission to public employments, functions and honours, or the exercise of professions and industries.
> No restriction shall be imposed on the free use by any Bulgarian national of any language in private intercourse, in commerce, in religion, in the press or in publications of any kind, or at public meetings.
> Notwithstanding any establishment by the Bulgarian Government of an official language, adequate facilities shall be given to Bulgarian nationals of non-Bulgarian speech for the use of their language, either orally or in writing, before the Courts.
> Article 54. Bulgarian nationals who belong to racial, religious or linguistic minorities shall enjoy the same treatment and security in law and in fact as the other Bulgarian nationals. In particular they shall have an equal right to establish, manage and control at their own expense charitable, religious and social institutions, schools and other educational establishments, with the right to use their own language and to exercise their religion freely therein.
> Article 55. Bulgaria will provide in the public educational system in towns and districts in which a considerable proportion of Bulgarian nationals of other than Bulgarian speech are resident adequate facilities for ensuring that in the primary schools the instruction shall be given to the children of such Bulgarian nationals through the medium of their own language. This provision shall not prevent the Bulgarian Government from making the teaching of the Bulgarian language obligatory in the said schools.
> In towns and districts where there is a considerable proportion of Bulgarian nationals belonging to racial, religious or linguistic minorities, these minorities shall be assured an equitable share in the enjoyment and application of sums which may be provided out of public funds under the State, municipal or other budgets, for educational, religious or charitable purposes.
> Article 57. Bulgaria agrees that the stipulations in the foregoing Articles of this Section, so far as they affect persons belonging to racial, religious or linguistic minorities, constitute obligations of international concern and shall be placed under the guarantee of the League of Nations. They shall not be modified without the assent of a majority of the Council of the League of Nations. The Allied and Associated Powers represented on the Council severally agree not to withhold their assent from any modification in these Articles which is in due form assented to by a majority of the Council of the League of Nations.

Bulgaria agrees that any member of the Council of the League of Nations shall have the right to bring to the attention of the Council any infraction, or any danger of infraction, of any of these obligations, and that the Council may thereupon take such action and give such direction as it may deem proper and effective in the circumstances.

This is the second time that the League of Nations has dealt with the protection of minority rights. In the Treaty with Germany similar provisions were contained. The League of Nations has therefore solemnly on two occasions declared and proclaimed the right of minorities to the free use of their language and their religious beliefs. They have gone further: they have provided the means whereby these rights may be freely and without infringement enjoyed, not only with regard to religion and language, but with regard to education as well. They have gone further; they have decreed in this case, as they have previously done with regard to the countries within the German Empire and the Austro-Hungarian Empire, that the minorities shall have a right to a share of the public money devoted to educational purposes. They have gone further than that again: they have declared that this question of the protection of minorities is a question of international concern. They have provided that if any of the parties to these Treaties—and Canada is one of them—has any complaint to urge of infraction, or danger of infraction, of any law or regulation relating to such rights, the Council will take the matter up and will, to use the words of the section, "take such action and give such direction as it may deem proper and effective in the circumstances."

I wish to ask the question whether we in the British Empire to-day can claim with truth that we have applied throughout the Empire these principles and enforced the rules which are sanctioned by this Treaty, with our approval, as they have already been sanctioned in the case of the German Treaty. I am free to admit that throughout the British Empire the Golden Rule, to which effect has been given in this Treaty and the previous one, has been observed; but it is my duty once more to remind this House that there is a part of the British Empire in which this rule has not held good, but the contrary rule has been applied and is being applied to-day. There are in the Confederation of Canada two provinces which are to-day denying the right which they say must be accorded to the minorities in Bulgaria, Germany, and Austria-Hungary. In the province of Manitoba the French Canadian Catholic minority, in order to be able to teach their children the language of their forefathers, and the religion they have inherited from them, must pay double taxes. In other words, they have to pay the public school taxes, and they have to tax themselves for the maintenance and support of their own schools, in order to have their children taught their language and religion. In the province of Ontario, in regard to language, the same difficulty exists to-day. In the so-called English-French schools—and what a parody it is to call them by that name!—French has been banished altogether in some of the schools, and is gradually but surely being eliminated from the rest.

The British Empire has given the best example of freedom and liberty to the peoples which have come under the British flag, and are we in Canada going to be content to allow this blot to remain on our statutes? Are we going to continue to deprive the minority in Manitoba and the minority in Ontario of rights which we declare must be given to those far-away minorities of whom we know little or nothing? If to-morrow the minority in the Dominion of Canada, which is, as a unit, party to the League of Nations, were to submit to the League this question, would it be or could it be said that the question was a provincial one and must be settled by the province in which the trouble has arisen. No, we could not say that. We have interfered with what might otherwise be called a local question in continental Europe, and we would be bound to deal with the question affecting Manitoba and Ontario in the same way. This question has long passed the provincial boundaries; it has become in Canada a national question of very great importance; and not only that, but by these Treaties it has been given with our participation and full approval the character of an international question.

Now, are we, the French Canadian minority in this country, in view of the conditions which have been created, and the rights which have been secured to those minorities in continental Europe—are we going to be condemned indefinitely to envy them the freedom and the liberty which the League of Nations freely accords to them, and which the League of Nations has taken the means of preserving and maintaining for them? We French Canadians, living under the British flag, supposed to enjoy full British liberty and freedom, are in such a position to-day that with truth, I can say that we are being treated in a way far different from the way in which these European minorities are treated. I want once again to emphasize the importance, the significance, of these provisions in the Treaty. I want once more to ask the majority of this country if they will not take this matter up, if they will not deal out to the minority at least as fair, impartial and just treatment as the majority are to-day dealing out to the continental minorities in Europe. Surely French Canadians have the right to say: "Are we going to be treated with less justice than you are willing to treat these people with? Are we going to be deprived of our money to educate our children as we wish, while you are granting these rights to these people in Europe?" I again solemnly appeal to the majority in this country, and ask them if the time has not arrived when, consistently with the action which we are taking to-day, consistently with the action which we took upon the German Treaty, justice must be rendered to the minority in Manitoba and Ontario.

The resolution was agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF EXPERTS FROM PUBLIC SERVICE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 11, consideration of the motion of Honourable Mr. Tessier:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for the production of correspondence between the Canadian Mining Institute or others with the Government or any of its members relating to the resignation of officers of the Department of Geological Survey and the Department of Mines.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Honourable gentlemen, before the recess I moved the adjournment of this debate, and when I did so it was because I had been told that this matter was about to be settled. Last night, in moving the adjournment of the debate once more, I was again under the impression that the thing would have been adjusted, but this morning I found that absolutely nothing had been done.

Now, it appears that these men, officials of the Geological Department, got special consideration on account of their great knowledge of particular parts of Canada and of particular deposits, such as oil shales, and petroleum, and so on. And, by the way, in parentheses, I regret that the honourable gentleman from Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville) is not here. He has entertained this House in regard to that on several occasions, and I think he is right. It is only within the last few days that the scientific world has decided that, at the rate that we are using petroleum at present, there will soon be no more petroleum, and consequently no more gasoline for industrial purposes or for motors. We have large deposits of oil shale and petroleum in Canada, and these men are able to indicate where it is to be found. And what has happened in the last four weeks? Since we took recess two of these men have been called away by the United States, and they are naturally getting much better treatment and more remuneration than they received from this Government. I do not want to blame anybody, whether it is the Civil Service Commission that is dilatory in this work, or whether the Government is holding it back; but something certainly should be done to take these men out of their present anxious position. They are between heaven and earth. They do not know what the Government or the Civil Service Commission will do with them, and they are constantly getting calls from private companies, and also from the United States. So much so that some of the men have gone, and have been getting from $5,000 to $6,000 per annum, while in our Government service they get $2,000 or $3,000. Of course, I do not think the Government could pay them $5,000 or $6,000; but what they could do would be to give them a fair proportion of what they would get outside, because we must remember that these men are highly qualified men. They are all post graduates of universities, and have specialized in particular branches of geology in order to fill some particular need. They have served a long apprenticeship. Their parents or themselves have devoted large sums of money to their education, and they should be rewarded in proportion to their value. It is against the delay that I am protesting now, because if this thing keeps on much longer there will be none of these officials left; they will all have left the service.

These officials, I understand, are quite willing to stay in the Government employ, because of the permanency of the tenure of office, and would sooner accept from the Government a smaller wage than they would get from an outsider. But they have to know at the same time that they shall get a remunerative wage to keep themselves and their families. You must remember that they cannot live at home, and when they are out on their work, while it is true that the Government pays their travelling expenses, there are a great many incidental expenses going from home, and they have to support their families wherever they may be. They cannot render certain services about the house in the same way as a man who is home every night, when they are away in the northern country for so long that sometimes they almost have to be introduced to their own children. They are valuable men, and deserve special treatment at the hands of the Government, and surely they should be paid at least a good proportion of the salary that they can get outside.

We hear a great deal about production. If there ever was a time when Canada should work her resources, her hidden treasures, it is now. And how can we do that unless we have these men, who prepare maps of the whole country, maps which show to the intelligent prospector the parts of the country that are barren, and where there is no use in prospecting, where, according to the rules of science, there is nothing to be found. These maps also indicate the likely places, and they are used by intelligent prospectors. They can start out with these maps. Canada is really a terra incognita, an unknown land, to the people who live in it. There is a tremendous amount of territory in Canada that is absolutely unknown, and if we can judge of the value of those parts by the value of the unknown parts, it must be tremendous. Take Sudbury and its wonderful nickel mine; Cobalt with its unlimited silver. Every one knows that they were found by chance. Everyone knows how in building the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway silver was found by a Mr. Larose. At this very moment, when Canada needs all her resources, are you going to allow the men who have been trained for years and years to leave your service because you will not pay them enough to keep them here, and let them depart in order to earn a little more elsewhere? I am glad to see the leader of the Government in his place at this moment, and I would ask him if he would be good enough to call the attention of the Cabinet to the fact that these delays are unbearable to these men, and that a decision should be given. If there is no intention of classifying them in a better class, they might as well be told at once, and their services would be retained by people who were willing to give them a better salary. Or, if there is going to be action, it should be now. These men are in a position of great uncertainty.

I do not want to detain the House on this question. I thought, before we took recess, the question would have been decided one way or the other. We come back after four weeks and nothing is done. I do not know whether the Civil Service Commission is to blame, or whether there is some one who is saying that there is no hurry about this thing—that it can wait until the session is over. But I think it is an injustice to these officials, who know so much of this country. It would take years and years for a new staff to find out all that these men know. Are we going to let those who have the knowledge go? I hope the leader of the Government will see that something is done in the near future to relieve the doubts of these gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I want to add a few words to what the honourable gentleman has said, because the position with regard to the Geological Survey affects very considerably the province of British Columbia from which I come. The number of resignations within the last year or eighteen months in the Geological Survey has been causing a great deal of agitation amongst the people interested in mining in that province. To show honourable gentlemen the feeling with regard to it, I might possibly be permitted to read a resolution which was introduced into the British Columbia House by the Honourable William Sloan, Minister of Mines for British Columbia. It is as follows:

Whereas, under the terms of union of this province with the Dominion of Canada, it is incumbent on the Dominion Government to maintain in British Columbia the geological survey;

And whereas from the pioneer work of Dawson to the present day the services of the geological survey have been of intestimable value to the mineral industry of this province;

And whereas recent advices show that, out of a total number of twenty-one geologists available for field work throughout the Dominion, eight already have tendered their resignations, and others are likely to do so, thus leaving very few fieldmen for the whole Dominion;

And whereas the six years prior to 1914 the geological survey maintained an average of nearly twelve geological and topological field parties in British Columbia alone, it becomes evident that it will be impossible for the survey to provide for work in British Columbia trained geologists from the remaining staff to continue the geological work so necessary to the mineral development of this province.

Be it resolved, that this Legislative Assembly of the province of British Columbia expresses its appreciation of the great value of the work of the geological survey of Canada as assisting the mineral development of this province, and views with apprehension the depletion of the survey staff, especially at this time, when, with the world entering upon a period of reconstruction, it is most important to our mining industry that all possible knowledge of British Columbia geology shall be available.

And be it further resolved, that this Legislative Assembly of the province of British Columbia does strongly urge the Dominion Government;

(1) To take some immediate action to prevent further depletion of this most valuable branch of the Civil Service.

(2) To offer adequate inducements to engineering and scientific students of Canadian universities to undertake training with a view to employment on the geological survey of Canada, in order to provide trained men for the future.

(3) To complete and publish the results of the geology of such districts as have been topographically mapped.

(4) To adopt a policy assuring the maintenance on an adequate basis of work of the geological survey of Canada in British Columbia, to the end that the letter and spirit of the terms of the British North America Act may be implemented and the development of British Columbia expedited.

And be it further resolved, than an humble address be presented to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, praying that a copy of the preambles and resolutions hereinbefore set out be transmitted to the honourable Secretary of State.

I have not been able to get information as to whether the resolution was passed or not, but I think honourable gentlemen will see from it that the Minister of Mines of British Columbia, at any rate, considers that the condition of things is serious.

As honourable gentlemen may know, there is a considerable mining development going on in British Columbia to-day, and a great deal of prospecting is being done, especially in the northern part of the province. I regret to say that, in confirmation of the resolution which I have just read, a gentleman from British Columbia the other day told me that an officer of the Geological Department, a Mr. McKay, who had proven himself to be an exceedingly valuable officer along certain lines of work, with regard to placer mining in the northern part of the country, particularly around Barkerville, a man who had worked out an original system of his own, of the possible geological formation of that country, which apparently had never occurred to any one before, had left the service. He had put his ideas to practical test, to the great benefit of the people who were mining in the Barkerville district, who had been enabled, by following up his theories, to carry on their work to the best advantage. As I say, this gentleman has unfortunately left the service, and, as I understand, is going into the service of some company operating in India. It will be impossible to replace this man, because, so far as I am informed, there is no other man in the service, or, as far as I know outside of the service, who has followed up this particular line of work and is capable of taking on the kind of work that he has been doing. His work would be valuable in the Omenica, Tulameen, and other placer mining districts in British Columbia, and it is most unfortunate that the services of this gentleman should be lost to the country.

I make these few remarks to bring this matter to the attention of the Government, because I think at the present time, when we desire to do all we can to increase the production of the country, it is a very serious matter indeed that this condition of things should have arisen.

Hon. J. G. TURRIFF: The question under discussion is no doubt a most important one; at the same time I consider it absolutely impossible for this or any other government to retain all the civil servants in their positions irrespective of what outside parties may do. We know that occasionally we get in the Civil Service men of extra ability, and those men receive very good salaries. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), who spoke just before the honourable leader of the Opposition, seemed to think those men should be retained at any cost; but if my honourable friend was out with a party of surveyors, and a chainman said he was offered twice as much as the ordinary pay given to chainmen, I am sure my honourable friend would reply: "Well, I am very sorry, but I am paying you the highest price that chainmen are getting, and therefore I cannot pay you any more, so you will have to go and get double salary with somebody else," and my honourable friend would get another chainman. In regard to the case cited by the honourable leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock), I have never in my lifetime known a man to drop out from any position, even the highest position in the land, who could not be replaced right there and then; somebody else can always be secured. If the man referred to by the leader of the Opposition has developed some new system in connection with placer mining there will be a lot of men who will know something about it, and who could take his place. The trouble is that if we attempted to keep in the service all who are in it, irrespective of what they are offered from the outside, by giving such men an extra thousand or two thousand a year, there would be five hundred or a thousand men who are getting the same salary who would complain that they should get similar increases. When a man can do better outside of the Civil Service than in it, I think he ought to get out as soon as possible, for I do not believe the Civil Service is a good place for such a man. The Government cannot begin to give that man such a salary as would keep him in the service, simply because they would have to apply the same rule to hundreds of others, and the cost of maintaining the Civil Service has gone up to such an extent that any Government will have to think seriously before undertaking a policy that might lead in some cases to the payment of double the present salaries. I know of men in the service who got offers of twice as much as they were receiving in the service, and they went out and took positions; but I have known of those same men wanting to come back, and willing to return at their old salaries; for it must be remembered that they do not all get the big salaries for a long time, and even though they may get a larger salary for a time, it is not in Government service, which some of them would prefer. During the boom in the West many bank clerks left the banks and were making big money outside; but within three or four years hundreds of them were applying to get back to their old positions at their old salaries. The question of payment to the civil servants is a large one, but I think we may as well make up our minds that it is impossible for any Government to keep every man in the service, because in that case offers would be made to scores of men in the service for the purpose of increasing their salaries. It cannot be done successfully unless we simply cut loose and pay no attention at all to the fact that the Civil Service is costing quite enough now.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I suppose that does not apply to senators?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: You can apply it to yourselves if you wish. It is a vexed question, no doubt, but I do not see how it is possible to deal with it along the lines suggested—giving large increases to a certain number of men—because that would cause dissatisfaction from one end of the service to the other, and would accomplish no good. I think we can rest assured that when a man goes out there is somebody in his department who can take his place. No doubt, as the leader of the Opposition has stated, at a time like this, when we need a great development in the natural resources of the country, we should have good geologists and able men who know the country well, who know about the deposits that may be found, and how they could be developed; but to my mind these can be developed just as well under the present system as by a method of increasing salaries of individuals in order that they should always remain in the departments. Good men can get good salaries, and if they cannot get them in the departments they are quite justified in going out; but I do not think they are justified in complaining to the Government that they are not getting enough salary where they are. If they are not content, let them go where they can do best, because if they go to private companies their services are not lost to the country. I remember cases where men went from the Northwest to private companies—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: But they are going to the United States.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, but we get any number of men from the United States to come here. You cannot stop the Anglo-Saxon from travelling all over the world; that is what has made the Empire; the men of the British Isles were not content to stay at home, but went all over the earth and took the best of it, and they are still doing that, and will always do it. Hence our men will go to the United States under any and all circumstances, and many people will come into Canada from the United States. It is a fair exchange, and we are not losing anything on that account. I think the Government should move cautiously in this matter, because it is a subject that would easily lead them into a great deal of difficulty and involve very large expenditure, and in my opinion they are doing enough in the line of expenditure.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is no objection to the order going; but I might say that very happily the responsibility at the present time does not rest on the shoulders of the Government, as this is a matter that comes within the authority of the Civil Service Commission. Notwithstanding the dissatisfaction expressed by my honourable friends opposite, I would say, in a very friendly way, that they are themselves very largely responsible, having withdrawn from the Government the exercise of any discretion in fixing salaries of professional men. I recall that last session, when the Civil Service Bill was before a committee of the Senate, with the classification of salaries attached thereto, my honourable friends were very strongly opposed to any discretion being vested in the Government, particularly in adjusting the salaries of those who occupied professional positions in the employ of the Government. I must say that I was favourable to vesting in the minister or the Government a fair amount of discretion in fixing that particular class of salaries, and I think it should be so.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am not at all in favour of an arbitrary commission, such as the Civil Service Commission, mechanically fixing compensation for the class of services involved in the subject now before us; but the Senate in its wisdom considered that it was inadvisable to permit the Government to be charged with exercising any such discretion as that which I have indicated.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But was not that the honourable gentleman's Bill?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It was; but I may say in answer to what my honourable friend had said, that an amendment was moved, which was very strongly opposed by gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think my honourable friend and I voted on the same side.

Hon. JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say, in reference to these threatened resignations, or those which have already taken place, that since Confederation there has never been a vacancy without an applicant to fill it, and I have no doubt that if there should be a general exodus of the gentlemen referred to in the motion before us, there will be a genesis of those who are quite prepared to fill the vacancies that would thus be created.

The motion was agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Gideon Robertson, the Senate went into Committee on Bill D, an Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907. Hon. Mr. Daniel in the Chair.

On section 1—interpretation:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think my honourable friend was going to give us some further particulars about the workings of this Act when we got into Committee.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I shall be glad to answer any enquiries my honourable friends may advance.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2, new section 16—signatures requisite for applications to refer disputes to a board and for statutory declarations accompanying them.

Paragraphs a, b and c were agreed to.

On paragraph d:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will the honourable gentleman tell us if this applies to the employees of a single corporation or employer, or does it apply to a union that embraces working men working for more than one employer?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The amendment to paragraph c of section 2, which the Committee have already adopted, refers to the point that my honourable friend raises, namely, that it is permissable to establish boards where there may be several employers involved instead of an individual employer, as the Act now provides. The proposed change in paragraph d is suggested because it is desired that applications for a board shall express the will of the majority of the men affected. Instances have come to the notice of the department where, under the Act as it now reads, a meeting is called and the purpose of the meeting announced at least three days in advance; but a handful of men may come to the meeting, reach a decision, and make application for a board, perhaps entirely without the knowledge, let alone the consent, of the majority of the men affected. The purpose of this proposed change is that the minister may require what will satisfy him that the application does express the voice of the majority of the men affected, and prevents minority rule among workmen themselves, and the exercise of the will of the minority upon the majority. The amendment does not in any way adversely affect the employer.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is paragraph d intended to take effect in the case of a firm or corporation or business where all the men are not members of the trade union?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Paragraph e specifically provides that applications for boards may be made " by employees some or all of whom are not members of a trade union."

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That is the case you are dealing with?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I would like to ask the honourable Minister of Labour if the Government, having taken into account the advisability of action being taken by the majority of the employees, have had their attention called to the like necessity of having a similar arrangement in connection with employers? The point I wish to make particularly is this. Suppose that throughout any province there are twenty, thirty, or forty manufacturing firms engaged in one particular industry, and one of those firms is singled out by a trade union for attack; the others are not notified; and therefore the burden is thrown upon one industry either to concede or to combat the demands made upon them, and which may be very onerous. I have had occasion to communicate with the honourable minister in my private capacity, suggesting that some steps should be taken to bring about uniformity in the rates of wages in particular zones throughout Canada. I think it would make for industrial peace and greater satisfaction, and lessen unrest, if there were a general conference of the majority of employers engaged in an industry with representatives of a majority of the unions that might be identified with that industry. As the honourable minister has said, of course it is unfair that the minority of a union should foment trouble and create unrest to the disadvantage of a majority of the same union that may not be in sympathy or accord with their action. It is equally important that, when they are dealing with a particular industry, the majority of employers should also be taken into consideration, and any decision that is arrived at should be uniform. Otherwise one particular locality is prejudiced to the great disadvantage of another. It has been stated, in the past, with or without reason, that international unions have fomented strife in Canada, to the disadvantage of Canadian industries and for the great advantage of United States industries. Whether that is true or not I am not prepared to say, but I do say there is a possibility in the Canadian branch of an international or any other union of some official being reached by the executive of a large manufacturing corporation and being induced to foment trouble in the industry of a competitor. We know that it has been done, and it has been proven by the records of the courts to have been done, in the United States; and if it has been done across the line there is no reason to suppose that it may not be done in Canada. I do not say it has been done, but there is the opportunity of doing it in Canada, and it is quite possible, by the method that at present is followed, of a union concentrating on one particular industry or one particular locality, to cause loss or destruction in a particular industry and great loss and deprivation to a particular locality for the benefit of some other industry or some other locality, which may or may not be cognizant of the fact. I simply want to bring this point forward and ask the honourable the Minister of Labour if he has given any consideration to that phase of the question.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The point that the honourable member from Toronto has raised would indeed be very important if it came within the scope of the Act. The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act applies only to public utilities, such as mines and transportation companies, as described in the opening sections, and employees engaged in private industries such as my honourable friend has referred to do not at the present time come within the scope of the Act.

I heartily agree with much that my honourable friend has said with respect to the desirability of closer co-operation by means of association between employers and workmen themselves, with a view to standardizing and making uniform the rates of wages and conditions of employment in a given industry in a given locality. Efforts in that direction were made by the officials of the Department of Labour a year ago, with some success, in certain industries, and I can assure my honourable friend that so far as it lies within the jurisdiction of the Federal Department of Labour we should be delighted to assist in promoting the very purpose that he has so effectively stated to the House to-day.

But, as the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act now stands, it is not within the jurisdiction of the Federal Department of Labour to interfere in private industry. That point was touched upon during our discussion last night. I stated that in my humble opinion the scope of the Act ought to be extended to private industries, or that similar machinery ought to be set up by provincial enactment, so that those employees and employers to whom my honourable friend alludes might have means to adjust their disputes, as employers and workmen engaged in public utilities now have under this Act.

Paragraph d was agreed to.

On paragraph e—application by employees not members of a trade union:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Paragraph e, which, I understand, is an addition to the present statute, permits of exactly the danger to which the honourable member from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) has called attention. Heretofore the section was limited, I understand, to members of trades unions, but under this new paragraph the Act may be taken advantage of by employees of a particular firm, whether they are members of a trade union or not. If a majority is obtained, they may invoke the benefit of the Act and force the Government to put it into operation, although employees occupying similar positions with another firm are taking no part in the dispute at all. I think this is exactly the danger which has been mentioned by the honourable member from Toronto.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: My honourable friend is in error in thinking that this is a new section. Subsection 4 of section 16 of the present Act reads exactly the same as paragraph e of this amendment, except that this provides that the authorization must be obtained in whole or in part at a meeting. If only a portion of the men are present at a meeting, the will of a small minority of the total membership or the total number of men affected shall not govern without the consent or authority of the majority of the men affected having been obtained.

I may perhaps clearly demonstrate just what this means by a concrete illustration. During the time that there were some difficulties existing in Western Canada last year, the postal employees in the city of Vancouver, for example, were called together to decide whether or not they should participate in a sympathetic strike movement. The majority of the men affected were present and they voted the proposition down—voted against going on strike. At eleven o'clock that night a portion of the men, known to be sympathetic to the proposal to go on strike, attended a special meeting which had been called, and to which only some of the men had been invited. It was proposed by that back-alley method to get the necessary authority whereby all the postal employees in Vancouver would be called out. Fortunately the men were alive to the situation. They spread the news, attended the meeting at 11 o'clock at night, and again defeated the attempt to have them go out on strike when they had no grievance of their own.

This proposal would enable the registrar to decide whether or not an application for a board should be granted. He could satisfy himself and satisfy the other officials of the department that the application was in order and did express the will of a substantial majority or substantial number of the employees who were affected. It is not an entirely new clause, as my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Béique) supposed. Its purpose is simply to prevent a small minority from imposing their will upon the majority of the employees concerned.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, the honourable the minister stated that the Act applies only to those engaged in the operation of public utilities. I was quite aware of that fact. But it is within my knowledge that a very large number of boards of conciliation have been appointed to deal with trade troubles that do not come within the purview of public utilities. Probably the honourable minister can tell us how large a proportion of boards of conciliation, or how many, have been called together to consider trade disputes that did not come within the Act. He mentioned yesterday, as an evidence that it would not be feasible to appoint a permanent chairman, that some seventy-nine cases, I think, had been considered during the year, and I believe that a very large proportion of those cases were of trade disputes that did not come under the Act. Therefore, the point that I made yesterday is all the more significant, that, in order to prevent unrest, in order to concede every possible opportunity for the employees to be favourably and properly heard by the proper tribunal, a great many employers and others have consented voluntarily, although their industry did not come within the Act, to the establishment of boards of conciliation. These boards of conciliation have met, but in my judgment their findings have been almost altogether in favour of the employees and not in favour of the employers. As I pointed out yesterday, there is a demand made for a certain percentage of increase, and if any one will take the trouble to investigate the number of awards that have been made and the terms of those awards, he will find that in the great majority of cases there might as well have been no chairman at all; it was just a question of splitting the difference. Each side put forward its own case, but the employer—and I am perfectly frank about it—is under this disadvantage. He nominates one board member and the workmen nominate another. They fail to agree upon a chairman, and therefore the chairman is mandatorily appointed—by whom? By the Minister of Labour, or the Labour Department. The Labour Department have a certain number of judges who might almost be called professional chairmen of boards of conciliation, and I assume—I think it is natural to assume, honourable gentlemen—that as these chairmen may have a number of cases during the year, for all of which they receive a remuneration in addition to their salaries as county judges, they are naturally anxious to keep in good odour with the powers that be. Now, in spite of themselves, with all their desire to act impartially and fairly, what they consider to be the wishes of the powers that be must have, intuitively perhaps, some effect upon their mental attitude towards the case over which they are presiding. My idea in proposing a permanent chairman was that he would be immune from criticism; he would gradually, from year and from case to case, become better able to sift the evidence: he would naturally, from his constant practice, become acquainted with all the varied technical conditions that surround the different industries of the country.

The honourable minister pointed out, quite frankly and fairly, that it would be beyond the power of one permanent chairman to handle as many cases as he would be called upon to do, and, as despatch or time was of the essence of the settlement of these disputes, they had adopted the plan of appointing a chairman in each case, who might be selected at random. But I am not aware that there is only one judge to handle all the law cases in Ontario. As the cases coming before the courts multiply, more judges are appointed. The matters dealt with by Boards of Conciliation involve enormous sums of money. The outcome may mean tremendous losses, not only to the individual employer or to the employees, but also to the country at large, because the action may result in destroying the Canadian trade and sending the business to a foreign country. Therefore I claim that it would not be unreasonable to have a sufficient number of permanent chairmen appointed to deal with industrial disputes.

Let me take a case in point. I know of several concerns that pay upwards of $5,000,000 a year in wages. Nobody will object to a fair increase, but an unfair increase, that has been given because the chairman was not conversant with the technicalities of the particular case, might mean $750,000 a year. Now, what industry can stand up against an increase of $750,000 a year to its workmen, when the workmen engaged in like industries in different localities have not been subjected to that tremendous loss? The business is destroyed. The owner loses his orders. Either they go abroad or they go to some other locality in this country which has not been subjected to this industrial unrest. I consider that in the aggregate this question involves annually hundreds of millions of dollars, and very often it is dealt with in such a way that much of that money may be diverted from the trade of the country and the consequent employment of Canadian workmen. If the amount involved were only a few thousand dollars a year, one chairman might be sufficient, but if the amount involved is tens of millions of dollars a year, I submit, honourable gentlemen, that it is not too much to expect that the Department of Labour would appoint a sufficient number of permanent chairmen to handle the cases. In my business, in your business, in anybody's business, if it grows to such an extent that a department has to be subdivided into two departments, you have to appoint a new departmental head. Those two departments may have to be subdivided again, as is the case in some of those great departmental stores that have done so much for the credit and prosperity of Canada. They may have to be subdivided into fifty departments, and do you think that the head of the concern will say, "Oh well, we cannot afford to increase our business, because we have only one head of a department?" He will appoint new heads of departments, and he will appoint a sufficient number—whatever number is essential for the prosperity of the concern. I claim that there is no question before this House that deals with vaster sums than the question of labour and capital, the question of the amount paid by the employer to the employee. I think the honourable the Minister of Labour will give me credit for having done everything possible in my own business, since he has been appointed, to maintain peace and satisfaction as between the employer and the employed, but my experience of Boards of Conciliation is that unless there is a judicial mind that is free from bias, that has only the one purpose in view, that of holding the scales of justice in balance, we shall never have that degree of peace and satisfaction between the two classes which we should have.

Paragraph e was agreed to.

On subsection 2 of new section 16—requirements when there is more than one party to application:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is that new?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes, this clause is new, and it is essential because of the amendment to subsection 2 which makes it possible for several employers to make application for a board jointly or through an association of employers, which exists in many instances. This simply provides the manner in which a joint application may be made by the employers.

Subsection 2 of new section 16 was agreed to.

Section 3 was agreed to.

On section 4—allowances to witnesses:

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: By whom are these fees paid?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: They are paid by the department to the witnesses who are summoned by the board.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Do the Labour party or the employers pay the fees? Are they assessed for them?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: They are paid by the Government out of Government funds.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Is a professional witness restricted to $2 a day? An engineer might be called.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: All that he would be entitled to under the clause would be $2 a day.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Has that been the case in the past?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes. Section 34 of the present Act says:

> Every person who is summoned and duly attends as a witness shall be entitled to an allowance for expenses according to the scale for the time being in force with respect to witnesses in civil suits in the superior courts in the province where the inquiry is being conducted.

As I attempted to explain yesterday, the rates vary in the different provinces. For the information of the House I might point out that witnesses in the province of Ontario, residing within three miles of the court, receive a fee of one dollar.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is that the fee for every kind of witness?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No; if a witness happens to be an engineer, he gets $5.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Under this he would get only $2.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: But in this instance it is not probable that any engineers would be present, unless they were employees of a railway or transportation company, and they would be paid their salary in any case. But, if either party to the dispute requests the board to summon witnesses, this rate would prevail. From the experience of the department, it seems advisable that the rate should be uniform throughout the country. It has happened that a witness has been summoned by a board in one province, and then later on has been summoned by a board in another province, and has received a different fee in each instance.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: If I understand the honourable gentleman correctly, previous to this amendment the witnesses received pay in accordance with what was paid in the province where the inquiry was held. In our province an expert witness gets more per day than a man who is not an expert witness. This amendment would do away with that. That does not seem to me to be right.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Let us suppose that by reason of the work in which certain men are employed the question of health is involved; they might wish to call a physician as a witness. It seems rather hard that if a practising physician is called he should be paid only $2 a day. Or take a case in which there is great danger by reason of the machinery that is in use—and that is quite common in these days of electrical devices—you call a skilled man, and you pay him only $2 a day.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I should have no objection to accepting an amendment to the effect that the existing rates in the different provinces should apply with a minimum of $2 a day. But at the present time the rates run as low as 27 cents a day, and you cannot blame a man for not wanting to attend.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: The point that I see that has not been made clear in the clause is the fact that there is absolutely no limitation to the number of witnesses that may be called. The honourable minister has stated that the board will call all the witnesses asked for both by the employer and the employee. It is conceivable that in a very trivial case a large number of witnesses might be called from a very considerable distance. If the witnesses are to get $2 a day as a minimum, and living and travelling expenses—and, under this clause, one hundred, or two hundred or every member of the union, may be called, it will be a very expensive proceeding. I think there should be some interpretation or some limitation.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I would think my honourable friend was quite right if any abuse of the nature he has suggested had ever arisen; but, the Act has been in force for some twelve years, and, so far as I am aware, no abuse of the sort has ever occurred. The chairman of each board decides upon the applications for the summoning of witnesses, and I do not think the number of witnesses summoned by the ninety-five or ninety-seven boards that sat last year exceeded an average of three. Witnesses are usually in the immediate locality in which the dispute occurred. They do not often come great distances. There is a clause in the Act that requires the railways to supply witnesses in railway cases with transportation. This clause is only to prevent what was evidently unfair. In one province, at least, the witness' fees were 27 cents a day. If my honourable friend thinks it is desirable to make a minimum of $2, or some other amount, leaving the expert fees as they exist in the various provinces, I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: So far as experts are concerned, under that schedule they would be getting more than they get at the present time.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In the province from which my honourable friend comes the barrister's fee is $6 a day, and, in addition, travelling expenses are paid, not to exceed 5 cents a mile.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: He does not get his living expenses.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps this will do: "But in the event of a witness giving evidence of an expert nature, such witness shall be paid five dollars a day." I think the minister will agree that it is pretty hard on an expert or a professional man to call him and pay him only $2 a day.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I think probably an amendment of that sort could be worked out; but I do not know that I like the wording proposed by my honourable friend, because it would leave open the question of what was or what was not an expert witness. If my honourable friend desires to introduce an amendment, we might permit this clause to stand for a moment, and take it up again.

Section 4 stands.

On section 5—relation of parties to remain unaltered, etc.:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This clause is not as clear as the marginal note. Perhaps it is because it is not read in conjunction with the preceding clauses. Does section 57 apply solely to the relations of the parties while the dispute is pending before the board? If you read the text alone, it does not seem to apply to a condition existing while a dispute is being arbitrated.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The purpose of this section, which I think is the same as the present section, with a little addition, is to avoid a repetition of an experience that occurred in 1919. A board dealt with a dispute and heard the evidence. The employees interpreted the Act to mean that as soon as the board had completed taking evidence there was no longer any restriction upon either them or the employers to prevent them from indulging in a lock-out or a strike, and a strike was declared, which caused considerable public inconvenience. Subsequently the department employed a commissioner to inquire into the matter, and the recommendation of the commissioner was that there should be an amendment to the law so that it could not be interpreted in such a way as to permit that kind of thing. The intention of this section is to prevent a lock-out or a strike, not only during the time the investigation is being held, but during the time necessary for the transmission of the board's report to the department, and from the department to the two parties to the dispute. The board's report is not officially known to either the employers or the workmen until it is received by the department and sent forward. Sometimes, if the scene of the dispute is a considerable distance from Ottawa, this is done by telegraph, or the board asks permission to make their decision known to both parties. But it is not desired that a strike or lock-out should be indulged in until the nature of the contents of the report has been made known to the parties to the dispute.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What I refer to is the first clause: "Employers and employees shall give at least thirty days notice of an intended change affecting conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours." I take it for granted that that has nothing to do with any impending disputes.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The words my honourable friend has just read are those which appear in the existing Act, and which have appeared for the last twelve years.

Section 5 was agreed to.

On section 6—minister may order a board or recommend inquiry:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This gives the minister a right to take the initiative, and to proceed to appoint a board if it seems to him that danger is imminent

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Under the existing section the minister may do that after a strike, in the event of neither the employers nor the employees making application. Provision is also made by which a municipality may do so in the interests of the general public. Experience has demonstrated the desirability of the minister having the privilege of appointing a board, if he thinks that by holding of an investigation a strike can be prevented.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman stated a moment ago that there had been some ninety-five or ninety-seven arbitrations last year. Could he tell us how many of those arbitrations were in cases which do not fall under this Act? As I understand, there were such cases.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I have not that information at hand, but it can be found, I think, in the last issue of the Labour Gazette. The Act does provide that, in any industry which does not come within its scope in a compulsory way, boards may be established upon the joint application, or with the joint consent of the parties, and the statement made by my hon. friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) was perfectly correct, that during the past year many employers engaged in industries that were not public utilities agreed with their employees to refer their disputes to arbitration, or investigation by a board of conciliation. A very substantial number of the boards established last year were constituted by the parties affected agreeing jointly to adjust their differences by this method, which was not compulsory. All this indicates, in my humble opinion, the desirability of extending the scope of the Act, because experience generally has proven that it has been useful in bringing about closer and better relations between employers and workmen.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Could the honourable gentleman tell us how many countries, since this Act was placed on our statute book, have followed the example of Canada by enacting similar legislation? I was in Europe a year or two after this Act was passed, and already legislators in other countries were taking notice of it and considered it a great advance towards the solution of the difficulties in the industrial world.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I have not recently looked up the information for which my honourable friend asks, but a number of countries have passed, not exactly the same legislation, but Acts based on the same principle. As to just how many, I cannot say. I do know that the United States within the last few weeks have passed an Act respecting the adjustment of disputes in connection with railroads that quite closely follows the principles of this Act, and that this Act was very closely studied and formed the basis of their deliberation in arriving at their conclusions concerning the measure that they have adopted. I do know also that during the first five or six years after this Act became law, many countries throughout the world inquired by correspondence, and a number sent representatives here, to obtain first-hand knowledge of the success or failure of its operation, and it did attract world-wide attention.

Section 6 was agreed to.

On section 4—allowances to witnesses:

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If the House has no objection and the honourable gentleman from Simcoe (Hon. Mr. Bennett) concurs, I would suggest that clause 4 be approved at present, and passed, with the understanding that we shall amend it along the lines discussed, on the third reading.

Section 4 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Robertson, the Senate went into Committee on Bill E, an Act to amend the Technical Education Act. Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—provincial expenditure for land, buildings, and equipment may be taken into account in determining Dominion grant:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: We are repealing this clause subsection 2 of section 5 of chapter 73 of the Statutes of 1919, which reads:

In determining the grant payable to any province annually, no account shall be taken of any liability or expenditure incurred by the province for the acquiring of land, the erection or improvement of any buildings, or the supplying or furnishings or equipment for any technical education institution established in the province prior to the first day of April, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen.

Paragraph b of section 6 provides:

No portion of any grant shall be used in whole or in part in meeting any liability or expenditure of any kind whatsoever incurred in any province prior to the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, for lands, buildings, furnishings or equipment secured, or provided for technical education purposes.

Therefore, as I understand it, by the amendment we are making we are simply tied down to paragraph b of section 6. I thought from what the honourable member of the Government (Hon. Mr. Robertson) said last night that he wanted to deal with some cases that occurred before the first of July, 1919.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Subsection 2 of section 5, which it is proposed to repeal, is almost a duplicate of paragraph b of section 6. Paragraph b of section 6 covers everything that is necessary to be covered. It prevents the using of the Federal grant for any of the purposes named, in connection with any liability or expenditure incurred prior to July 1, 1919. Therefore everything that is covered in subsection 2 of section 5 is covered by paragraph b of section 6, except, I desire to point out, that in the last part of subsection 2 of section 5, which it is now proposed to repeal, the following words occur "or the supplying of furnishings or equipment for any technical education institution established in the province prior to the first day of April, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen." That means, in practice, that in the province of Nova Scotia, for example, which I cited last night, there is an institution which was the only institution of the kind that existed in the province prior to July, 1919. It was established long before that time. Under subsection 2 of section 5 it is impossible at any time in the future to use any Federal Government grant for the purchase of equipment, materials, etc., for that institution, because of the fact that it existed prior to July, 1919. That is obviously not the intention of the Act. Therefore paragraph b of clause 6 meets every requirement, and it places no disability upon any institution because of the fact that it happened to be in existence prior to July, 1919.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Has any money been spent so far?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The Director of Technical Education, Professor Gill, late of Queen's University, has just completed a visit to all the provinces. In fact, he has not arrived here yet, but he will arrive in a few days. He has been delayed by illness in the East. He has drawn up the agreements with the various provinces in accordance with the terms of the Act itself, but disbursements have not yet commenced. There will be some for last year, but they will be much less than the amount provided for by the statutes.

Section 2 was agreed to.

The preamble and title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 2, an Act to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and to transfer to the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police the powers heretofore vested in the Commissioner of Dominion Police.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, it will doubtless be remembered that at last Session legislation was passed merging the Northwest Mounted Police and the Dominion Police. It is proposed now to vest in the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police the powers that were formerly vested in the Commissioner of Dominion Police. That is to meet the requirements of the various statutes which have been passed touching the powers vested in the Commissioner of Dominion Police.

There are also some proposed amendments permitting a constable, after having served ten years, to avail himself of the pension provisions of the Act, if he is incapacitated from the performance of duty by infirmity of mind or body. The ordinary term that can be invoked by a constable for pension is twenty years.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I do not intend to oppose this Bill in any way, but I would like to ask my honourable friend a question in regard to it. What is proposed is practically an amalgamation of two offices. Is there any intention of increasing the present salary of the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or of paying him two salaries on account of his holding two offices?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would not think so. The legislation of last session abolished the office of Commisioner of Dominion Police and vested in the Commissioner of the Mounted Police the administration of the entire body. My recollection is that the salary fixed by that legislation would probably not represent what he was drawing as Commissioner of the Northwest Mounted Police, because he had certain advantages, such as residence, rations, and that kind of thing, for which provision was not made in the legislation which we passed. My impression is that the salary fixed would not represent more than the equivalent of what he had been receiving previously.

Hon. J. W. DANIEL: Honourable gentlemen, I noticed to-day, for the first time this Session, a Dominion policeman on duty near the entrance to this building. Not having noticed any before, I thought the policemen had probably been withdrawn altogether; but evidently, if they had been withdrawn, it is the intention to have them on duty again. What I would like to know is under whose command the policemen in this Parliament building are acting. What instruction do they receive as to their duties, from whom do they receive instructions and to whom do they report? Formerly, as I understand, the Dominion Police were under the control of Col. Sherwood, who was the chief commanding officer of that body; but now I presume they will be connected with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I think it is perhaps right that the Senate should know what duties they have to perform, what orders they receive, and under whose direction they are acting. I presume they are, in a sense, for the purpose of keeping order in the building. They must be under somebody's control; they must receive orders and directions from somebody and report to somebody; and I would like the minister to give us a little information on that head, if he has it.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: Before the honourable gentleman answers the question, I would draw his attention to a fact, which has not escaped him, because he has such an acute mind that he can see the general scope of an Act, and besides I pointed out last year, when the Act was before this Chamber, that the administration of justice and the maintenance of peace and order in the various provinces are delegated to the provinces and are essentially under provincial jurisdiction. My honourable friend having that in mind, while answering the question of the honourable gentleman from St. John (Hon. Mr. Daniel), could perhaps tell us whether the Government intends to limit the activities of the force to those fields which have heretofore been covered by the Northwest Mounted Police.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend is familiar with the constitution and knows that the Northwest Mounted Police could not interfere with provincial authority. There is certain Federal authority to be enforced and maintained in the different provinces of Canada, irrespective of provincial considerations, and the jurisdiction of this body of police can be exercised only within that particular sphere of duty. The intention is not in any sense to interfere with provincial authority unless by mutual arrangement between the provincial and Federal Governments such as formerly existed in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, whereby the police acted for both governments. But the organization of provincial police renders that arrangement unnecessary, and it is no longer effective.

The Northwest Mounted Police, being the larger body of the two, and having been administered for many years by the President of the Privy Council, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are naturally attached to his department. Whereas the Dominion Police were formerly under the administration of the Department of Justice, the amalgamated body is now administered by the President of the Privy Council. The instructions referred to by my honourable friend from St. John (Hon. Mr. Daniel) would naturally come and do come from the Commissioner of Police. He is responsible for the placing of the men on duty and for whatever distribution of the force may be made, and the police naturally report to him just as any military or police body would report to their commanding officer.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: That does not make the matter quite as clear as I would like to have it. How many men does the commissioner put on duty here? Is it left to his own discretion?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: He gives what orders he wishes in that respect? In other words, he has no directions from the President of the Privy Council?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am not aware of that.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Suppose a disorder occurred in the corridor, is the Speaker authorized to call upon the police to keep order?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: He has no control over them?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: That is what I wanted to find out—whether this House or the other House has any control over the actions of the police who are on duty here?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. N. A. BELCOURT: May I ask my honourable friend whether it is the intention of the Government to have those services which were previously performed by the Dominion Police outside the capital in the provinces, performed in future by the Dominion Police or by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is no distinction between the two bodies; they have been merged in one body, and the one body will perform all the duties that were formerly performed by the Dominion Police, and will likewise perform all the duties that were performed by the Northwest Mounted Police.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is there to be but one uniform?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There may be some distinction between the mounted and the unmounted bodies. My recollection is that the Act makes provision for a distinction between the two branches of the police. The mounted body will be practically the same as the old Northwest Mounted Police; there will be one force, administered by one head, and it will perform all the duties which were formerly performed by both.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend might perhaps tell us what were the services performed in the past by the Dominion police outside of the Capital—with regard, of course, always to Dominion matters.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They were employed chiefly on public works and public buildings; and if any police services had to be rendered in connection with the enforcement of any Federal laws, they were entrusted with that particular duty.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Do they have anything to do with public harbours?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes; they could be detailed for duty on any public harbour, or upon any public works.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They were under the direction of the Department of Justice?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And they were utilized for the enforcement of the excise and customs laws?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. Where there was any threatened violation of any of those laws, they were entrusted with the duty of enforcing them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Now that they will no longer be under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice, will they still be to a certain extent amenable to the orders of that department for the enforcement of those laws?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The orders would come through the department to which they are attached, namely, that of the President of the Privy Council. They are entirely removed from the Department of Justice, but the Department of Justice could readily set them in motion through the department to which they belong.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Are they liable to be called on in case of public disturbance —riot, or anything of that kind?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The liability would be no greater than obtained heretofore. Their duties in that connection would be precisely the same as before.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is it the intention to change the style of uniform of the mounted branch of the service?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The uniform of the mounted men will remain practically the same as before; that of those who are attached to what I might term the civilian branch will probably remain very much as it is.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think it is very important that that uniform, which is more characteristic of certain authority than the ordinary policeman's uniform, should be continued.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will be continued. That is historic and traditional.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not undertake to criticize in any way what has been said by the honourable leader of the House. The thing that puzzles me is this. Suppose something goes wrong in this Chamber or in any of the adjoining rooms of this building, who is the officer in charge? A Senator or an officer of the House cannot very well call on the President of the Privy Council to give orders, and there should be some one in direct charge of the men who are looking after the building. There is no difficulty, of course, in finding out who that is, and I think it would be desirable for the members and officers of the House to know to whom they should go.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say to my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) that the Serjeant at Arms could invoke the aid of the police for the maintenance of order.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But if the Serjeant at Arms should find fault with the manner in which the Dominion Police, or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, are performing their duties, there might be a serious conflict of authority. Who would solve that? Who would settle the point?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If any conflict arose between an officer of this House and the Mounted Police, he would, I suppose, have to state his grievance to the minister responsible for the administration of the police.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I would like to ask the honourable leader if there has been any protest, particularly from the West, with regard to the change of the name Royal Northwest Mounted Police. It seems to me that the Government made a mistake in changing that name, because the Royal Northwest Mounted Police is a body of men that is known practically throughout the world. There has been probably no better police force ever in existence than the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. In the amalgamation which has taken place the name Royal Northwest Mounted Police has been dropped.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; it is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The Royal Northwest Mounted Police was known as a body throughout the British Empire, and one of the best police bodies in the world, and I think it is a great mistake to change the name. I know a number of the Northwest Mounted Police in the West have regretted the change. Changing its name is like taking away a sort of copyright that the force had.

As to the suggestion made by the honourable member from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) regarding the jurisdiction of the Mounted Police, I am satisfied that under Commissioner Perry, who was the head of the Northwest Mounted Police, if there is any violation of the law in any part of this building, the police will be found right on duty. Perry has a splendid reputation in the West, and I have no doubt he will bring it down here. However, I know that there have been serious complaints made by individuals—I do not know whether to the Government or not; and I would like to ask the minister if he has any ideas about the old name being restored to that body?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am unaware of any complaint having been made, and I think there is no probability of the old name being restored. Furthermore, my honourable friend from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) is a little late with his objections. This House deliberately concurred in the legislation of the House of Commons last session.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I know.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Furthermore, it would be practically a misnomer to call the organization the Northwest Mounted Police, in view of the fact that their authority has been extended throughout the whole of Canada. Under the legislation establishing the Northwest Mounted Police their duties were confined to what was then known as the Northwest. Hence it is desirable that their name should signify the scope of the territory within which they act.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT moved the second reading of Bill 7, an Act to incorporate The T. Eaton General Insurance Company. He said: The Bill, as stated on its face, is to incorporate The T. Eaton General Insurance Company, with a capital of $500,000, with the right to increase it to $1,000,000. It might not be out of place to mention some reasons why the T. Eaton Company desire to have an Act of this kind passed. A number of years ago the Company formed what was called a welfare department, for the purpose of assisting their employees, when necessary, on account of illness or any other cause. In connection with that department certain activities were formed, among them a girls' club, a boys' club, a choir, a summer camp for boys, a dental clinic, X-rays, nurses, and services in other lines. Then, in order to complete these various works, it becomes necessary to adopt what is called sickness and accident insurance, thus supplementing the work done by the welfare department. The Company has at present about 20,000 employees, one of its largest establishments being in Toronto, and another very large one in Winnipeg. They also desire to provide old age pensions and life insurance to assist those who may be left behind by the death of the wage-earner. They now provide retiring allowances for men and women; but no definite plan has yet been decided on, and it is for the purpose of placing these on a definite basis that the company now desires to secure this insurance. Under the arrangements a man will be entitled to retire and receive a pension when he reaches an age anywhere between 60 and 65 years, though it may not be compulsory on him to retire. Female workers will also be able to retire, at a somewhat earlier age than the males.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why?

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: It is thought that probably they may not be quite as strong, and for that reason may desire to retire at an earlier age than the men. The retiring allowances and pensions will be arranged at no cost to the employees. Then there is the life insurance branch. We are all aware that people as a rule do not carry sufficient life insurance, and hence when the bread-winner is taken away some families are left without the income they should have, particularly in the case of young men with growing families. For some considerable time past the T. Eaton Company have had a mode of insurance for their employees, known as group insurance, which was put on by the company at no expense to employees. It has been found, however, that that insurance is not sufficient; hence they desire to be enabled to form a regular insurance company in which employees may be insured. The insurance that employees take in the company would be supplementary to what they already receive under the group system. In coming under the proposed Act it will be necessary for employees to pass a medical examination, just as they would for insurance in what we call an old-line company. They would also be able to take out endowment policies, straight life policies, and all other classes of insurance that the regular old-line companies give at present. The proposed company would be under the Insurance Act, and would be obliged to make returns to the Government just as all other companies do. The scheme should be a success, starting out as the company does with 20,000 employees, and we all know that many companies which have been carrying on business for years have not 20,000 members. Another feature of the new plan is that while under the general insurance as it exists to-day, policyholders are obliged to pay the first and the yearly premiums in advance, the proposed company, desiring to benefit the employees, would not require the whole year's premium to be paid at once, but could so arrange matters that premiums might be paid in monthly instalments. The scope of the Bill is therefore wide in that respect, and it is desirable that the company should have all the rights and privileges of the ordinary insurance company, particularly as it would be brought under the ordinary insurance law of the country. I cannot say to what amount the company will issue policies, but they say the insurance will be for a reasonable sum. The head office of the company is to be in the city of Toronto. Under section 6 of the Bill it is provided that the company may make contracts covering sickness insurance, accident, guarantee, burglary, inland transportation, plate glass, automobile, sprinkler leakage, fire, and steam boiler insurance. Section 7 provides that the company shall not commence the business of sickness and accident insurance until at least $200,000 of its capital stock has been subscribed, and at least $75,000 paid thereon. These two classes of insurance the company intend at once to take up, with the desire to carry out the work that has been going on under their welfare department and their other branches. Under subsection 2 of section 7 the other classes of insurance authorized are safeguarded by provisions for the capital necessary for each, so that there will be no risk for any one insuring in the company. Under subsections 3 and 4 the amount of the capital stock may be increased, and the last section provides that the General Insurance Act shall apply to the company. The scheme is a large one, intended for the benefit of 20,000 employees; and, while one is not desirous of seeing corporations secure too great powers, yet this scheme is one which can be worked out within the company itself, and being for the benefit of the employees I do not see any good reason for this House declining to give its assent to the passing of this Bill. If the object were other than it is there might be some question or objections; but it is a purely beneficial Act for the employees of this particular concern. We all know that large corporations are desirous of assisting their employees in various ways. Railway companies have their pension funds; the Dominion Government provides pensions for its civil servants; and that class of benefit seems to be attracting attention everywhere particularly with large corporations. I therefore take pleasure in moving the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: The honourable gentleman talks about welfare work, but there is not a single word about that or about group insurance in this Bill; all that is mentioned in that respect is sickness and accident insurance. That is all right so far as it goes, but what do the employees of the T. Eaton Company want with guarantee insurance, burglary insurance, inland transportation insurance, automobile insurance, sprinkler leakage insurance, fire insurance, steam boiler insurance? There is another Bill, I see, by which the T. Eaton Company want to establish a company for life insurance. Well, this is to go before the Committee; we will discuss the whole matter there.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: When I referred to welfare work I was pointing out what has been done for years past under a department in connection with their business, called the welfare department; and this Bill is for the purpose of enabling them still further to carry on that work.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: They could do that without coming to this Parliament and asking for burglary insurance.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman says the Act shall be for the benefit of the employees mainly, but he does not claim that the Act will be limited to the employees of the T. Eaton Company. It is a general insurance Act which will allow the company to do business with the public at large.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Decidedly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is a general insurance Act that will allow this new insurance company to do business with the outside world and I suppose that the Eaton Company will take very good care, while selling its goods, to sell insurance as well.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I fail to see any difference between this Bill and any other ordinary private Bill. I read that a certain number of directors or incorporators are applying for an Act, and I understand they have complied with all the provisions of the Insurance Act. The mere fact that the T. Eaton Company are connected with it is neither here nor there. They are organizing a separate insurance company.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: That is all.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: They have certain incorporators, they subscribe a certain amount of capital as required by the law, and they have to comply with the terms of the Insurance Act; therefore why bring in the T. Eaton Company at all? Without mentioning the T. Eaton Company they might have called it the Royal Insurance Company or the Ontario Insurance Company, or an insurance company by any other name, and the matter would not have been questioned. We would have asked the Insurance Department if all the requirements of the Act had been complied with, and the Insurance Department would have said yes, and the Bill would have gone through without question, because there are no special privileges asked for; therefore I think it is a mistake to bring in the question of the T. Eaton Company or any one else. We should consider this as an insurnace Bill pure and simple, and deal with it on that basis.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT moved the second reading of Bill 8, an Act to incorporate the T. Eaton Life Assurance Company. He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill, as it states on its face, is simply to incorporate the T. Eaton Life Assurance Company, with a capital of $500,000, which may be increased to $1,000,000. It provides for certain directors, and also that the company is to come under the purview of the Insurance Act of 1917. Under section 7 of the Bill the company may make contracts of life insurance, and may grant, sell, or purchase life annuities, endowments, and so on.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT moved the second reading of Bill 9, an Act to incorporate the Scottish Canadian Assurance Corporation. He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill, as appears on its face, is one to incorporate the Scottish Canadian Assurance Company with a capital stock of $1,000,000. The amount to be subscribed before the general meeting of the directors is called is $200,000. The head office will be at the city of Toronto; and the company may make contracts of fire, accident, sickness, automobile, burglary, and hail insurance. Provision is made under clause 7 of the Bill as to what the company shall do before it starts to carry on business. The Insurance Act of 1917 and amending Acts shall apply to the company.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Bill 10, an Act respecting the Trust and Loan Company of Canada—Hon. Mr. Turriff—was read the second time.

CURRENCY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 15, an Act to amend the Currency Act, 1910.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the Bill before us proposes to amend the Currency Act in order to reduce the proportion of silver that enters into our currency to 800 parts. The present proportion is 925. England is about to adopt a standard for silver of 500, and the United States of 800 parts. It is of course manifest to honourable gentlemen that this change is necessary. There is no good reason why Canada should adopt a higher standard than other nations, and we have to take into consideration the value of silver at the present time. Silver has advanced, since the present legislation was passed, by over 100 per cent. There was one period when silver was $1.41 an ounce. I cannot say with authority what it is to-day, but it approximates that amount. This reduction in standard will place our coinage, so far as gold and silver are concerned, upon a satisfactory basis. With the standard which we have been using, particularly in coining silver, the Government has been losing a substantial amount. It is therefore felt that this legislation is absolutely necessary under present conditions.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the alloy? It will be ten per cent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Presumably it will be the same as before, but it will be increased in amount. I cannot tell what the alloy is composed of.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: My honourable friend has not said anything with regard to the copper coinage. I understood that there had been a change made in the copper coinage of the country. So far, I understand, it has not been put upon the market at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That does not come within this Bill. We passed that legislation last session. Whether any coinage has been turned out in pursuance of that legislation I cannot say.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I should like to ask the minister if he would announce an expert opinion as to what effect that change would have upon the currency itself. Would it further depreciate the currency? When it is known that it has a decreased amount of valuable metal in it, I should like to know whether or not the loss would be greater than the gain by the alteration of the respective amounts of gold and silver and the baser metals. I do not know whether any effect has been announced beforehand; but it might be that it would put our currency down very much lower than the present rate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say to my honourable friend that such would not be the case. So far as the silver coinage is concerned, the position taken, and maintained, that it is simply accepted as a token of money, and not for its intrinsic value.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: We are turning out gold and silver coins in the mint all the time, are we not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 16, an Act to amend the Government Annuities Act, 1908.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, in the existing legislation as to Government annuities there are several limitations which have very considerably handicapped or restricted the sale of annuities. One of these limitations, which has to do with the domicile of the applicants for annuities, has proved rather embarrassing. Under the present Act, the domicile has to be established as being in Canada, thus necessitating rather extended inquiries on behalf of the Government officials. It is now proposed that a person who is resident in Canada, entirely apart from having his domicile in Canada, should be qualified as an applicant.

At present the annuities are limited to $1,000. The Government up to the present time has not gone beyond that amount in the issuing of annuities. It is now proposed that this should be extended to $5,000. There is no reason why, if it is good policy to issue an annuity for $1,000, it likewise should not be good policy to issue annuities for $5,000. The fact is that the department administering this branch of the public service has been handicapped to a very large extent by the limited sum which it has been authorized to issue, and it is known that very much larger annuities than $1,000 can be negotiated and sold.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: What will the limit be?

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: $5,000 will be the maximum. There is a further provision being made as to age. The present age is 55. It is proposed to strike out all limitation as to age. Other financial organizations are issuing annuities entirely irrespective of age. Of course, the rates are based on age. It is therefore proposed that the Government should be authorized to issue annuities to persons of ages lower than 55. The tables on which they are issued are well recognized in actuarial circles; consequently it is just as easy to determine what should be the price of an annuity to one of 30 years of age as to one of 55.

We further propose amending the Bill as to the rate of interest. The rate of interest up to the present time has been calculated on the basis of 3 per cent. Owing to the advance in the rates of interest it is proposed to increase the interest rate to 4 per cent. This will add to the attractiveness of the purchase of annuities.

Hon. Mr POWER: There are two questions suggested by the observations of the honourable leader of the House. One is whether a person who has already effected an insurance will have the benefit of the reduction in age of which the honourable gentleman has spoken. The age limit at the present time is 55. Suppose a person took out an annuity say ten years ago; would that person be entitled to receive the annuity of, we will say 50, if 50 should be the new age?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not see how my hon. friend views the subject. It would not affect existing annuities, or annuities heretofore issued, because the cost of the annuities is based upon the present age.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I understand that a person who purchased an annuity some years ago would not get the benefit of the change in the age.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is no benefit. The cost of the annuity is based on the age at which it is purchased, so there would be no particular change in that class of annuity. That is to say, an annuity at 55, after this legislation comes into effect, would cost practically what it cost at the time it was purchased. Like a premium of insurance, it is governed entirely by actuarial tables based on the age of the applicant or the holder.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: It is just the reverse of insurance. In insurance you have to pay higher as you are aged; in the annuities you pay higher as you are younger.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What I have in view is the fact that the premium of insurance is based upon age; so will the annuity be based on age.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: No, upon youth.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The other question is whether the person who has already acquired an annuity will get the benefit of the increase from 3 to 4 per cent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is a certain class of annuity that is deferred. Certain payments are made and the Government credits those annuities with a certain percentage, and some of them come into play and some do not. The payments are repaid where the annuity does not issue, and it is in that case that the increased interest will apply. It will provide for the return of contributions to the estate of an annuitant dying before the annuity is entered upon, at a rate of interest of 4 per cent instead of at 3 per cent, as at present. I think there is also a class in which, although the annuitant may be living, the annuity has not been issued, though the payments have been made previously.

Hon Mr. THOMPSON: Any one having an annuity taken ten years ago and who was proscribed from taking more than $1,000 could not enlarge the amount.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He will come in—

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: At the age he is at now?

Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Could he not pay the back premiums?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He could take a larger sum now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is an element of risk that no longer exists. The risk is past; that is why he is no longer in a position to purchase greater insurance at the rate at which he bought it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He would have to come in in the same way as a policy-holder who wants to increase the amount of his insurance.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I should like to ask the minister, in connection with clause 4, increasing the rate of interest from 3 to 4 per cent, and referring to Bill 17 in which there is a provision increasing the rate of interest from 4 to 5 per cent, whether the Government have in contemplation the raising of the rate on savings bank deposits to 4 per cent? No doubt sooner or later we will have to raise another Victory loan for a large amount. If between now and the time when it is necessary to issue another loan, on which the rate of interest will be 5 or 5½ per cent, depositors could be encouraged to deposit large sums of money for the use of the Government at the rate of 4 per cent, instead of 3½ per cent or 3 per cent, as at present, there would be very many millions of dollars available for the Government at a much lower rate of interest than they will be called upon to pay when the next Government loan is issued.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot answer my honourable friend. I do not know what the intentions of the Finance Department are. There is a distinction between this legislation and the other legislation to which my honourable friend has referred. The other has to do with Civil Service superannuation. This is largely maintained by grants from the Government, and the Government can therefore exercise their generosity, or assume a risk more readily than it could in reference to a matter of what you might term insurance, because annuities are on practically the same basis as insurance. I cannot tell the honourable gentleman what the policy of the Government will be.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: The fact remains, honourable gentlemen, that we are paying, and will have to continue to pay, a great deal more than 4 per cent on any Government loan that may be issued for some time to come; and in my judgment a great deal of interest could be saved if the Government encouraged the small depositors to deposit in the Post Office savings banks by paying interest at the rate of 4 per cent instead of at the rate now paid. There would be saved to the Government the difference between 4 per cent and the rate they would be obliged to pay on the next loan.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: That would compel the ordinary banks to pay 4 per cent also, would it not?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I am not holding a brief for the banks. I am here discussing something that I think is of interest to the country at large, and that would tend towards economy in the very serious matter of the interest which we have to pay from year to year.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION AND RETIREMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 17, an Act to amend the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the object of this Bill is to increase the interest allowed on sums in the retirement fund from four per cent to five per cent from the 1st of January, 1920. The provision as to the retirement fund for civil servants applies to two classes: (1) civil servants appointed on and after July 1, 1898, and (2) civil servants in the service on July 1, 1898, who elected before January 1, 1899, to come under the retirement fund in lieu of superannuation. The amount of the retirement fund as at January 31,, 1920, was $6,254,000; and it may be of interest to the House to know that the number of civil servants contributing to the retirement fund on April 1, 1919, was 13,659, which has been increased since that date to about 16,500.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Has my honourable friend the figures of the number of civil servants under the superannuation fund?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The number of civil servants contributing to the retirement fund at the present time is 16,500.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: What percentage do they contribute—2½ per cent?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think it is five per cent.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Suppose the rate of interest should fall?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Government would have to come down with further legislation to reduce it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Could there not be a sliding scale, so as to provide for a possible decrease in the rate of interest?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not know that it makes very much difference. The Government has to augment the fund by making substantial contributions to it for its maintenance.

In answer to what has been asked me, I may say that the deductions for the superannuation fund from the officials' salaries are as follows: Deductions are applied at the rate of three and a half per cent on salaries of $600 and upwards, and three per cent on salaries of less than $600. These deductions are to be refunded, and the Government adds to the fund a sum sufficient to make the amount of the fund equal to the value of prospective annuities.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What class of officials are getting less than $600?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Under the new classification that class will have disappeared.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Six hundred dollars is the minimum now, anyway, is it not?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Eight hundred dollars.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My impression is that under the Civil Service classification $50 a month is the minimum that any one can receive, no matter how youthful he may be.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Sixty dollars, I think it is.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

HONEY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 29, an Act respecting Honey.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, in conformity with the legislation which was passed some time ago dealing with the organization of a Department of Health, certain provisions have been taken out of the Adulteration Act, and it is proposed to include them in an Act which will be administered by the Department of Health. The language of this Bill is simply a reenactment of what is already on the statute book. The only difference is that the law is placed under a different administration.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

OTTAWA MINT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 30, an Act to amend the Ottawa Mint Act.

He said: As honourable gentlemen know, the Mint is a branch of the Royal Mint. When it was established in 1906, it was understood that a yearly payment of $75,000 would be provided for the expenses of that institution, and it was provided. As the business of making our coinage increased, the expense of course increased proportionately, and in 1913 they had risen to $110,000 per annum. There has been a notable increase in the business of late years, and consequently, at the instance of the Colonial Office—for it is really under the Colonial Office—it is now proposed to increase the allowance to $200,000 per annum. I may say that if that amount exceeds the actual expenses, the excess is repayable to the Government of Canada. The management of the Mint will account to the Canadian Government annually for whatever amount may be involved. The Mint has been of very substantial value to the Government of Canada. The net profits since it was started exceed $6,500,000. So it is readily observable that the investment is an excellent one.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I am sure the House will be very gratified to know that the Mint has been such a valuable asset to Canada and we have received so much income from it. I would like to ask my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) whether it would not be well to give out a statement of the actual work done by the Mint during the war. I think it might show that the Ottawa Mint was of considerable value, not only to Canada but to the British Empire generally. Now that the war is over, I think that information would be of great interest to the country. Possibly my honourable friend could give us the information when we go into committee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend would ask that a return be brought down giving the particular information desired, I should be very glad to have the information placed upon the Table of the House. Would my honourable friend indicate what is the information that he would desire when we went into committee? Is it the volume of coinage?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: A report is issued by the Mint, and I think it goes to the Department of Finance.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: In that report there is, I think, a statement of the amount of gold that was handled by the Mint during the war, a great deal of which came from South Africa. I think the work that was done by the Mint is of considerable interest to the country.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I shall be very glad to get the information if it is obtainable. I have not the information before me.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Do we get the profit from the Mint?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We get the profits.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why is it not absolutely controlled by Canada? What is the reason for having it controlled by the Imperial Government?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The branch was established at the instance of the Government of Canada when the Hon. Mr. Fielding was Minister of Finance.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes. I remember. I was in the House.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And the Imperial authorities consented to the request which Canada made that a Mint should be established in Canada, we agreeing at the time to pay whatever expenditure would be necessary for its operation. As I have pointed out, that expenditure has risen from $75,000 at that time to $110,000 in 1913, and at the present time it is approximately $200,000.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But there is a very great profit, is there not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Sometimes as high as $800,000.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, a very great profit. The total profits, since its establishment exceed $6,500,000.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Is that over and above the expenditure?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It would seem to be very profitable investment, and it would strike me that we should have it separate, entirely our own—a Canadian Mint. We are a nation now, everybody tells us so; and that would put the stamp upon our nationhood so that even my honourable friend from Montreal (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) —he is not here—could not question it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It might be killing the goose that lays the golden eggs, to attempt to do it ourselves.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not see that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Perhaps the honourable gentleman (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) gave the explanation, but I did not catch the exact meaning of his statement. Why is this proposal made in the form of a lump sum for the expenses of the administration of the Mint? Are we not paying those salaries ourselves?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. As I understand, they are paid by the Imperial authorities, and heretofore the Government has had to ask for Supplementary Estimates from time to time, which has been extremely inconvenient. But in fixing an amount, as we have done now, and as we have done in the past, provision is made for an accounting to the Government of Canada, or to the Finance Department, for whatever the expenditures may be, and the difference is returned to the Government.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Does the Imperial Government pay the expenses and do we keep the profit?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We do not repay those salaries to the Imperial Government?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, we pay them and we take the profits of the institution.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is the Imperial Government out anything on the transaction?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Well, then, I do not see how we would be killing our goose, or disturbing our prospects.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Fowler) suggested, as I understood, was that we should wipe out the Mint——

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, no.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Or rather that we should have our own Mint.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I might point out that we do certain Imperial minting here. We have the advantage of the Imperial Government being interested in the Mint and of making coinage for the Imperial authorities, as well as for ourselves, and we get a profit out of that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But the Imperial Government pay for whatever they get done. They have it done here only because their own Mint is not capable of doing all the work that is required. We would get just the same work.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would not be prepared to say that on account of this being a branch of the Royal Mint the Imperial authorities draw no distinction between this Mint and their own in Great Britain. I do not know, but it may work out somewhat in that way. But if honourable gentlemen desire it, I will read a copy of a letter I have in my hand, from Lord Milner to His Excellency the Governor General touching this particular subject. He says:

Downing Street,
November 18, 1919.

My Lord Duke—

I have the honour to request Your Excellency to inform your Ministers that the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury state that it appears to them to be desirable, and it is understood that the Canadian Government share their view, that a fresh Act should be passed by the Canadian Parliament to increase the annuity at present sanctioned for the maintenance of the Ottawa Branch of the Royal Mint to a figure commensurate with present and prospective expenditure.

2. Their Lordships state that some of the temporary excess expenditure which during the war, and more recently in connection with certain staff proposals, has been sanctioned with the approval of the Canadian Government in excess of the present Mint Annuity, may not continue. On the other hand, it is certain that the normal expenditure at the Mint will considerably exceed the grant at present sanctioned of $110,000 per annum.

3. With regard to the amount of the revised annuity Their Lordships state that it is difficult at present to forecast with any certainty the exact amount of the future expenditure, which will depend partly on staff proposals at present under discussion, and still more on future coinage requirements. The staff proposals at present before them, to the majority of which they have already assented, are estimated to raise the charge for salaries to $145,000 per annum at the maximum, in addition to which provision must be made for pensions. On the provision for incidental expenses, which were $82,327 in 1918, and $27,860 in 1919, a margin must be allowed for extensive coinage demands. Their Lordships are, however, of opinion that it would be preferable to fix the annuity at a figure sufficient to obviate the need of a further revision in the near future; and they suggest that in all the circumstances $200,000 would perhaps be the appropriate sum. The Annuity Act, of course, merely fixes a maximum which cannot be exceeded without parliamentary authority; and if the amount suggested were decided on the balance not spent in any year would as at present be returned to the Canadian Government.

4. Their Lordships would be glad to be furnished with the views of the Canadian Government on this proposal.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord Duke,

Your Grace's most obedient, humble servant,

(Signed) MILNER.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Who built the Mint here? Was it built with Canadian money?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That I cannot say.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Yes, sir.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Canada built it.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: It might be of interest to know out of whom the $6,500,000 was made. Was it a transfer of money from one pocket to another? The Government of Canada made $6,500,000, but the people of Canada pay the piper.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This situation reminds me of that which used to prevail with regard to Canada, London, and Washington. A few years ago, when we wanted to have something done in Washington, we wrote to London, and our correspondence finally succeeded in reaching the Washington authorities through the British Ambassador. We have at our very door a Mint which we could administer directly, and apparently we are sending our money to London to pay employees who are within a stone's throw of us. Why could not the Canadian Government arrange to handle its own business and show that we have grown to a higher status than that of minors, instead of having our affairs, right under our eyes, administered from London? It seems to me a most extraordinary situation that this Mint is not administered by the Minister of Finance. It is the Department of Finance that planned it all, and yet we find, after 14 years, that it is still being administered by persons who come here from London. If it were a new venture I could quite understand that we needed men of experience; but has not the experimental stage been passed, and should we not now be able to handle this matter ourselves?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I may say we have the advantage of having a very distinguished and capable man as deputy master of the Mint at present. I know this gentleman very well, and he is certainly versed in all the business of minting; I do not suppose there is a better man along that line. He was appointed from England. But it does seem to me that there is a great deal in the contention of the honourable gentleman from DeLorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand). We built the Mint, and I remember that we paid $50,000 for the fence around it, and there was a great deal of talk at the time about its exceedingly high cost. Therefore why should we not control it?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As I have said, the Mint depends largely upon the minting which it is doing for Great Britain itself. For instance, in 1919 the Mint milled for the Royal Mint alone 1,563,340 blanks, and produced in 1918 for the Royal Mint not less than 4,435,000 shilling blanks; so that the minting we are doing for the Royal Mint amounts to almost overwhelming figures. If the Government of Canada established its own Mint it is doubtful if it would do this business which is being done by the Imperial authorities.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But most of that minting which is credited to the Royal Mint was done for New Zealand, Newfoundland, Jamaica, and other parts of the Empire, and we would get that just the same.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I presume those orders would come in through the Royal Mint in London. I am unaware how it would work out any other way. But it seems to me we are getting very satisfactory results, notwithstanding the fact that the Mint may be dominated from Downing street.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: We are getting the cash, anyway.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

DIVORCE BILL, 1920.

WITHDRAWN.

On the order: "Second reading Bill A, an Act respecting Divorce—Hon. Mr. Barnard."

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: In the absence of the honourable member who had charge of this Bill, and on his behalf, I beg leave to withdraw the Bill, as he announced some few days ago that it was his intention to introduce other Bills which would take the place of this.

The order was discharged, and the Bill withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 2.30 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Friday, April 9, 1920.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

WRECK OF ARENMORE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOYER inquired of the Government:

What was the value of the cargo of the lighthouse ship Arenmore, wrecked in the Gulf of St. Lawrence?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: So far as the Department of Marine is aware, $15,076.25.

MANDATES OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:

If the Government has received a copy of the mandate issued to the Australian Commonwealth as to New Guinea, as provided for under the Treaty of the League of Nations?

If the Government has received a copy of the mandate issued to New Zealand as to Samoa, as provided for under the Treaty of the League of Nations?

If the Government has received a copy of the mandate issued to the Union of South Africa with regard to South West Africa, as provided for under the Treaty of the League of Nations?

If the Government has received a copy of the mandate issued to Belgium with regard to South East Africa, as provided for under the Treaty of the League of Nations?

And what is the particular form of mandate in each case?

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Copies of the proposed mandates have been received, but they are confidential and have not been finally settled by the Council of the League of Nations. As they have come as confidential papers, it is not possible at present to disclose them.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: They will probably be made public later on?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should judge that immediately they are settled by the Council of the League that will be done.

PROTECTION OF SOCKEYE SALMON.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:

If the Treaty made between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of sockeye salmon of the Fraser River System has been accepted by the Senate of the United States?

If so, when does the Treaty come into force?

If not so accepted, what is the position at the present time as between Canada and the United States with regard to the regulations governing the protection of sockeye salmon of the Fraser River System?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1 and 2. Not yet.

3. Each country is attending to the regulation of the fisheries in its territorial waters as heretofore.

OIL SHALES OF CANADA.

COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY APPOINTED.

Hon. G. W. FOWLER moved:

That a Select Committee of the Senate be appointed to inquire into and to report from time to time on the desirability of the development of the oil shales of Canada, and that the committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records and to employ a stenographer and such clerical aid as may be necessary. The committee to be composed of Senators Girroir, Farrell, Domville, Donnelly, Thibaudeau, McMeans, Turriff, Schaffner, Willoughby, Ratz, and the mover.

This House is, or is supposed to be, composed of intelligent gentlemen, well versed in the affairs of Canada, and I need not enlarge upon the importance of this motion, particularly in view of the greatly increased use of oil for motive power, by ships and by motor cars, which have greatly multiplied throughout the world, and as a fuel because of the increased price of coal. It is essential, I think, that we should develop the natural resources of our country, in order that industrial production may be increased. We are at the present time purchasing almost our entire supply of oil from the neighbouring republic. The supplies there are becoming exhausted. This statement may seem strange when new oil wells are being opened in different parts of the United States. But no new reservoirs are being discovered; it is simply that old reservoirs that were already tapped are being re-tapped, the number of holes, or the number of wells, is being increased, while the oil supply is diminished.

I have a clipping from a New York paper which I will take the liberty of reading to the House, and which, I think, shows very well the condition of things in this respect. It is as follows:

The Oil Situation.

Washington is beginning to worry a little harder about the oil situation. The Shipping Board has asked bids for future deliveries of fuel oil, but there has been no response. The Administration is reported to have decided to take over the entire petroleum production of the Osage Indian Nation for the use of the Shipping Board and the navy. This is 15,000,000 barrels a year, but the years are numbered. Meanwhile there is concern over the belief that Great Britain is getting hold of the best oil fields of the world.

Great Britain is doing just what any competent government ought to do. There is no oil in the British Isles, so England gets it where she can, whether in her own India, Persia and Egypt, or in somebody else's Mexico, Russia or South America. She does just what the United States will be obliged to do when the oil fields of North America are exhausted. Our own oil wells are going dry comparatively fast. Some experts say that five years will see the bottom of them; the most optimistic guess is thirty years. The wells of the United States produced 356,000,000 barrels in 1918, but that was not enough to supply the demand, 24,000,000 barrels being drawn from storage. Until now the prospector has been finding new American fields, but the geologists say the end of discovery has been reached in this country.

America had a great oil supply, but she has used it prodigally and sold some abroad. Ships, motor vehicles, gas plants and a dozen other things have burned it up. It may be that within the few years which will elapse before the wells go dry some way will be found to take petroleum economically from the oil shales of the West.

I may say in passing that the United States have large reserves of oil shales, but, owing to the cheapness with which the oil can be produced in the well, they have not been heretofore utilized.

If this does not happen the United States must look elsewhere for oil. Mexico is the nearest place, but nobody can be assured that the oil deposits of that country will last longer than our own. The United States bought two billion gallons from Mexico last year. Mexico may decide to conserve.

South America may be the most promising field of oil operation in the next half century. Undoubtedly England and other European countries are busy there. The United States has done nothing officially toward an investigation of the oil possibilities of the southern hemisphere. Most of our oil men hesitate about investing huge amounts of money in foreign fields. Englishmen do not hesitate, but they never have a government with a foreign policy as wabbly as that which the United States is now enduring.

Quite a compliment to the British Government—

The Briton buys an oil concession in a foreign land secure in the belief that nobody will rob him of his rights so long as there is a British navy.

The extract which I have read shows honourable gentlemen the importance of making some investigation into the oil shales of our country, because, hitherto we have not discovered oil in the natural condition in any large amount. We have hope that in the northern country, in the district around Slave lake, very considerable deposits will be found. To-day the Imperial Oil Company of Canada, which is an offshoot of the Standard Oil Company of the United States, and the Shell Oil Company of England, which, next to the Standard Oil, is probably the largest in the world, are investigating the district around Slave lake, and it may be that they will find very considerable deposits there. Let us hope that for the benefit of the country and its future they will be successful in their quest. But it seems to me that in the meantime we should look into this matter of oil shales and see what can be done.

The oil shales of Albert county, New Brunswick, have perhaps been more thoroughly investigated than those of any other part of Canada, although there are deposits, I believe, in almost all the provinces except Ontario. These shales have been tested, and have been found to produce a very superior quality of oil, running all the way from 40 to 50 gallons to the ton, being much superior to the Scotch oil shales which for many years have been successfully handled, and have produced considerable quantities of oil. We have been very neglectful in the past, it seems to me, of our natural resources along various lines. We have very large deposits of coal and iron in this country, and yet we are dependent upon the United States for those two substances which form the base of most of our industries. If the industrial life of this country is to be on a scale commensurate with the size of the country, our people must develop our coal and our oil and our iron. Therefore, I beg leave to move, seconded by Mr. White, this motion.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would my honourable friend have any objection to adding the following amendment to the motion:

But, before incurring any expenditure herein, to report to the Senate and have its consent to the proposed expenditure.

It has been usual for the House to maintain its control of expenditures.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I have no objection to that at all.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Honourable gentlemen, I desire to compliment the honourable member from New Brunswick (Hon. Mr. Fowler) who has just brought up this subject. It is of the very highest importance that we should try to find a substitute for petroleum. In conversation with members of the Mines and Geological Departments the other day, I was informed that there are, not only in New Brunswick, but throughout the country, very large deposits of oil shales—in fact, hundreds of square miles of them. There are also a great many of them in the United States; and I may say that only a few days ago I read in a scientific paper that, notwithstanding the very great find of oil that has been made in Texas, where, judging from the reading and the pictures in the prospectuses of those selling oil, as they are in Montreal, the oil wells seem to be so close together that you would think there was nothing but oil rushing out of the ground—notwithstanding that and the great oil discoveries that have been made since before the war in Persia—and that is one of the reasons why England was anxious to get in there—in Baku, on the Caspian sea, and in Roumania, all of which are very far away from us, we are at present getting it from the United States. Not only that, but we are dependent upon the United States for anthracite coal and for a great part of our soft coal. If we can develop this industry at once, it will be a great thing.

Oil is not extracted from the oil shales as easily as one might think. As I understand it, it is only when the shale is submitted to a very high temperature that the oil oozes out. I do not know what is done with the residue, which must be considerable, because I understood that the figures of 40 or 50 gallons to the ton, which were given by my honourable friend, are correct, and the oil would not weigh more than water, since it would not float on top of water, and would therefore be only about eight pounds to the gallon. So the residue must be used.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: It will make coke.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable the middle member for Halifax informs me that it will make coke. That will be a very good thing.

The other day we were talking about the engineers of the Mines Department and the Geological Department. Even if they are to go, now would be the time to find out what they know about these oil shales and their development. In the United States they are starting this work, because they say that in 1930, only ten years from now all the known areas of oil in that country will be exhausted. I commend the honourable gentleman from New Brunswick for bringing up this question.

The motion, amended as proposed, was agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 2, an Act to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, and to transfer to the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police powers heretofore vested in the Commissioner of Dominion Police. Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 1—powers of Commissioner of Dominion Police transferred, etc.:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to ask the leader of the Government if he has the figures giving the number of mounted men and the number of unmounted men in the force at the present time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot state that with exactitude, but I believe it is the intention to bring the force up to the strength sanctioned by the legislation of last session. Whether we have yet reached that strength or not I cannot say, but the proportions would remain very much the same. I am under the impression that that branch of the work which heretofore was performed by the Dominion Police will be performed by the same number of men; but the mounted branch would of course be increased very substantially.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: How are the squads located in the different provinces?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My recollection is that that has been fixed by Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The reason for my question is that I see by section 4 of chapter 69 of the Statutes of 1919, which amended section 8 of the Northwest Mounted Police Act, it is provided:

> The Governor in Council may, from time to time, authorize the Commissioner of Police to appoint, by warrant under his hand, such number of constables as the Governor in Council thinks proper.

The number is not fixed by this Act, as I understand it. The Government can appoint as many as they like.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, I think the strength of the police is fixed by the Act. The section my honourable friend has read I think deals only with special constables. I am satisfied that the strength of the police is defined by statute. I cannot put my hand upon the statute just at the moment. I shall get that information for my honourable friend before we reach the third reading.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—contable after ten years may be pensioned if infirm; after twenty years entitled to pension:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Heretofore it was fifteen years.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does my reading of this clause justify me in taking it for granted that a constable shall be entitled to his retirement after ten years, provided he is incapacitated from the performance of his duty by infirmity of mind or body? He may, as I read it, if incapacitated; but he shall, after twenty years, if capacitated.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My reading of it would be that he would be entitled to his pension at the end of twenty years' service.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Would it be right that he should have the right of retirement after twenty years if he entered the force at twenty years of age?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The law at the present time is that he shall be entitled upon retirement to a pension for life, as follows:

> If he has completed ten but less than twenty-one years' service, one-fiftieth of his annual pay and allowances for every year of service;
> If he has completed twenty-one but less than twenty-five years' service, an annual sum equal to twenty-fiftieths of his annual pay and allowances, with an addition of two-fiftieths of such pay and allowances for every completed year of service above twenty years.

If he has completed twenty-five years' service he shall be entitled to a larger sum, but the element of physical incapacity is now being introduced for the first time, so as to provide that, if a man has served ten years and disability has arisen, he may invoke his right to a pension on the scale provided. To make that apply to the men who had served twenty years or a longer period than ten years would of necessity interfere very seriously with the rights of those who are approaching their twenty years of service.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I am surprised that Parliament should decide that one who has served twenty years shall have the right to exact a pension. If he engaged at twenty, why should we say that at forty he will have acquired a right to a pension if he is in good health? That is what I cannot understand. I thought, in order to reconcile it with my sense of right, that he would be entitled to a penson after twenty years by right, while after fifteen years he would have to petition for it. We have a similar enactment allowing the judges to retire after fifteen years of service; but in allowing them to retire upon their request, but not as an absolute right, there is a presumption that the judge who does ask to be allowed to retire after 15 years feels that his health has weakened to such a degree that he cannot render the services that the country is entitled to expect from him, and that the country should give him his pension. But as I read the Act it rests with the Cabinet to decide whether he is entitled to his pension after 15 years or not. Of course, I know that it has been the practice since Confederation, perhaps before, to acquiesce in such an application from a judge who has served 15 years. But, according to my interpretation of the law, that is not a right, but a matter of tradition. If there was an impression that a judge would retire after fifteen years, it was easy to find somebody to take his place; perhaps somebody was waiting to take his place; but I cannot accept my honourable friend's explanation as to how it is that a young man who entered the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at twenty is entitled to a pension when he reaches 40, although still in perfect health.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The same principle, as I understand it, applies to the judiciary as applies to the police under this section. For instance, a member of the judiciary who has not served 15 years, but who through physical or mental incapacity desires to apply for retirement—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is all right.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: —is entitled to consideration along that line. There are many cases in which judges who have not served 15 years have received their pension, notwithstanding the non-expiration of the period.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is a correct principle.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As to the 15 years, I would say to my honourable friend that the interpretation of the Judges Act, as to a judge being entitled to his retirement allowance after 15 years, is beyond all question.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I think the Act says " may ".

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The word " may " is perhaps used in the statute, but it is interpreted not in a permissive sense, but as mandatory. I know the opinion has been given by the Department of Justice that the judge is entitled ipso facto—by the fact of his having served 15 years—to his retiring allowance; and that is the case here.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But if my honourable friend will permit me, I would draw his attention to this difference: that a judge may serve 15 years and may be entitled to retire, if that is the interpretation of the Department of Justice, but he is generally appointed when he is 45 or 50 years of age, and after 15 years' service has been completed he is past 60. That is the general rule. But I am speaking now of the case where a young man enters the Mounted Police at the age of 20. There is a difference between granting him the right to a pension if he becomes incapacitated and granting him the absolute right to a pension when he has passed 40.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This obtains in many classes of employment in this country. A policeman, after he reaches 40 years of age, is very largely unfitted for the duties of a mounted organization such as the Northwest Mounted Police. In the Canadian Militia we have a pension system which is based on somewhat the same principle. A similar system obtains in other police forces and among our railway employees. The pension is a comparatively small one, and a man who has reached that age is unfitted for the ordinary industrial activities. He has to exercise his resourcefulness to find employment along other lines, which will be very much less remunerative than those which he might have entered upon at an earlier period. Experience has pretty well determined that this is a very fair and judicious way of handling the question.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think these clauses refer only to pensions in the event of the constable becoming incapacitated.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Oh, no.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The ten-year period does.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The ten-year period does, but not the twenty-year.

Hon. Mr. POWER: As I understand, the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) finds two difficulties in this clause. One is that he has apparently laboured under the impression that the man must be incapacitated before he can be pensioned, even after twenty years' service. That is not what the clause says. The clause says if he has completed not less than ten years' service and is incapacitated from the performance of his duty, by infirmity of mind or body, he may be granted a pension for life. Well, I do not suppose any one would quarrel with that. If a man is physically or mentally disqualified, he can be pensioned after ten years' service. Then the honourable gentleman thinks that twenty years' service should not entitle a member of the mounted police to a pension for life.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If he is not incapacitated.

Hon. Mr. POWER: If he is not incapacitated, certainly. As to that, I do not undertake to express any decided opinion; only I think there is a great deal of force in what the honourable leader of the Government has said, that whatever may be the case of a judge, in the case of a policeman whose duties are of an active character, calling for energy and spryness, so to say, perhaps the 20 years' service is long enough; and I think that is the period mentioned in the existing law and in the Militia Pensions Act. I do not feel that I am in a position to vote against the adoption of the clause.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Supposing a constable, having joined the force at say from 19 to 21 years of age, is only 38 or 39 or 40 and is physically fit—and one would think that in a force like that the necessary physical exercise would keep him fit—according to that clause he shall retire.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, he need not retire; it is not obligatory.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: He may.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He has a right to retire.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then, he could simply retire at a time when his physical faculties, and his mental faculties as well, were at their highest, and could go into some other business having a pension for life.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is not 40 years the prime of life?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, it is the early prime of life, and, judging by the honourable gentleman and the vigour he shows here, I might say that 60 was still the prime of life. But at 40 years of age, as I say, a member of the police could go into some other business and would have this pension all the time to supplement his earnings in another line. I think you should insert an age limit. It should be provided, for instance, that he shall have reached the age of 50, and have served twenty years in the force before being entitled to retire.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would my honourable friend suggest what openings in life there would be for a man who had served, say, 20 years in the police and had given all his time and attention to the duties of a policeman? Say that at the end of twenty years he looks about at the different activities of life and determines upon doing for himself. He is very seriously handicapped.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: During his service in the police he has been drawing practically not much more than will keep him. He enters upon life handicapped, without having any capital, and it is but reasonable he should have a small allowance. The fact of the matter is, this has been the law ever since the organization of the police. As honourable gentlemen know, the police were organized shortly after we took over the Northwest Territories. This is the old law that we are now amending. For instance, honourable gentlemen will find in the Revised Statutes this same provision. The only change that we are making in the law as it has stood for years is that we are wiping out the 15-year period mentioned in the existing law. Under the existing law, the policemen had a right at the expiration of 15 years to ask for a limited pension, to which he was entitled. We have now stricken out the 15-year period and we have inserted in lieu thereof a ten-year period, but that ten-year period can be invoked only in case of physical infirmity.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is all right: I agree with that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As to the other period, we are simply allowing the law to stand as it was.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The antiquity of the law, I may say to the honourable leader, does not give it any virtue in my sight; because, if that antiquity gave it any virtue, we would never make any change. My honourable friend cites the fact that the law has been unchanged for twenty or thirty years. It would almost look as though, according to the modern trend of thought, it was about time for a change. But my contention is that the man could enter some other occupation. There are a hundred other things he could engage in if he were clever enough, and his earnings in the new occupation would be enhanced by the pension which he gets. Besides that, you are losing a servant who is much more valuable that he was when he enlisted.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not at forty.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You have spent money to train him and get him perfected in his work, and if he is a good man at 40 and is still in the full possession of all his physical faculties, with the benefit of twenty years' training in the police he is an invaluable servant. You ought to put restrictions upon his giving up his job, instead of facilitating his giving it up, as you do by this. There would be no objection to a provision declaring that he might be pensioned after twenty years' service, if he has reached the age of fifty, or fifty-five, when he is not as spry as he might be; for it is necessary for a man to be physically fit in order to hold that position.

So far as I am concerned, I believe in paying the police more. Their duties for a long time may be very slight, and then may suddenly, owing to an outbreak of some sort, become very arduous and very dangerous. They should be paid well, but I think that in the interest of the service this limitation should not be as it is.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Honourable gentlemen, I think any one who has had at all to do with the Mounted Police in the past will realize that the longer a man is in the service, if he retains his bodily vigour, the better policeman he is. I am inclined to think it is a good idea to give a pension when a man has been twenty years in the service, because you retain the man for that length of time, and in most cases where he has been twenty years in the Mounted Police service, if he has retained his bodily strength, the fact that he has the prospect of increasing his pension by remaining five or ten years more before dropping out will keep him in the force. I agree with the honourable leader of the Government that when a man has been twenty years soldiering he is handicapped in undertaking any other occupation in life; and, as I said a moment ago, very few who have spent twenty years in the police, if they are physically fit, will want to go out. I have known a great many mounted policemen during my residence in the West, and I have observed that a man who has been ten years in the service generally makes it a life job. Under this Bill the police are well recompensed by staying in the service 25 or 30 years, because then they get a fairly good pension.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is the pension increased after twenty years?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Yes; after twenty-five years they can get up to two-thirds of what they are receiving.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The next clause of the Act, subsection 2, makes provision for that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I had not read that.

Hon. Mr TURRIFF: I think, hon. gentlemen, that this is a very fair proposition.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: What is the pay?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: About $1.70 a day.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: After ten years' service their pension is only one-fiftieth of their annual payment.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: For each year's service.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: The whole system appears to me as being reasonable, and the pensions in any case are not so very large that we should spend much time in trying to have them reduced. The principle, I believe, is a good one, and I believe it will tend to bring in the best men who are available.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: There is one point that does not appear clear to me, although other parts of the Act may refer to it. This provision gives a pension to an incapacitated man only after ten years. A constable, in the carrying out of his duties, may be absolutely incapacitated in the very first year of his service. Why should not that man be entitled to a pension? Perhaps he is; but if this is the only clause in the Act that refers to the matter, the department would have to keep him in hospital or under care for ten years before they could pension him. Perhaps there is something else in the Act which refers to this point, but if there is not I think the Act is incomplete. A man who is incapacitated in the discharge of his duties in such an employment as that of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should be entitled to a pension within the first year or at any other time of his service.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER: Honourable gentlemen, the Bill is very good as far as it goes, but I do not think it goes far enough. In the first place, my honourable friend from St. John (Hon. Mr. Daniel), takes exception to the ten-year limit regarding a man who is incapacitated. If a man joins the Northwest Mounted Police and he is invalided—which means incapacitated—he can be turned out without anything to support him, if he has been in for only six months. I do not think that the allowance for a man after ten years, or even after twenty years, is sufficient. If you want to have a first-class force, as we had in the early days—not particularly because I happened to be a member of it at that time—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER: I know it was a pretty good force at that time. My hon. friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) who lived in Calgary at the time I was there, will acknowledge that it was a pretty good force. If you want to keep the force up to its standard in those days you must pay it as well as any other class of persons in the community.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It has done very well up to the present time.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I suppose the honourable leader of the Government has no reply to the question I asked him?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If it is a case of hardship, it will have to be left to the discretion of the Government as to what should be done for the man. The police has existed for over a generation, and our attention has not been directed to any case of hardship along that line, and I fancy the same treatment will continue.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER: May I ask the honourable leader whether a man who is injured after he has been in a year would get any pension or not? Could he apply for compensation under the Act?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. He would not get a pension under the Act, but it would be discretionary with the Government to deal with the case on its merits.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER: I can see why the word "may" is the proper word there, because I know we had many men in the police force who wanted to get out and became malingerers. If the word "shall" had been in there, they might have got their money and got out; but with the word "may" a man would have to be examined and passed upon before he could retire.

CURRENCY BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 15, an Act to amend the Currency Act, 1910. Hon. Mr. Murphy in the Chair.

On section 1—standard for gold and silver coins:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What is the present standard for gold coins?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The standard for gold is the same as it was before. We are simply changing the standard as to silver. England is adopting for silver a standard of 500, and the United States is adopting a standard of 800, so that our silver would be the same as that of the United States. At the present time the standard is 925, and we reduce it to 800.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not think there is any objection to that, but we should not interfere with the gold.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are not interfering with gold.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Has any consideration been given to the advisability of using nickel?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot say as to that. Last session we legislated as to copper coins, but we made no provision as to nickel. Canada has no nickel coins at present, but I see no reason why we should not have them. They have them in the United States.

Section 1 was agreed to.

Section 2 was agreed to.

On section 3—silver coins heretofore struck to continue current:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Can my honourable friend give us any information about those Orders in Council? This arrangement has been made before under Order in Council.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My recollection is that when the rapid rise in silver took place, Parliament was not sitting, and silver coinage was being minted at a loss; but an Order in Council was passed to cover the interim between that time and the adoption of this legislation.

Section 3 was agreed to.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

THE NEW PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS.

CHIME OF BELLS FOR THE TOWER SUGGESTED.

Hon. GEO. H. BRADBURY moved:

Resolved, that in the opinion of this House there ought to be installed in the tower of the Parliament Buildings a first class set of chimes or carillon in connection with a clock that will be heard all over Greater Ottawa.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the resolution which stands in my name on the Order Paper is to my mind one that ought to commend itself to this honourable body. We have been told by different architects and other gentlemen who have travelled much that this is the finest parliament building in the world, and I have no reason to doubt the correctness of that statement. The proposed tower to this building ought to be, and I have no doubt will be, in keeping with this magnificent structure, and will be one of the grandest towers in the world, a fitting finish to the splendid outward appearance of this great building.

As my resolution has to do with the proposed tower, this seemed to me an opportune time to bring the matter referred to before the House so that, in the event of the Government accepting the suggestion, the architects would have ample notice to make provision for the carillon.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: May I ask the honourable gentleman, is it the carillon or the clock that is to be heard all over Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: It might well be both. I trust that the clock may be of such a nature that when it strikes it will be heard all over Ottawa, and I trust that. when the carillon is put in, as I hope it will be, it also will be heard all over the city. As we have the finest parliament building in the world, and I trust will have at least one of the grandest towers in the world, I think it would be fitting that the Government should cause to be installed in the tower one of the finest carillons in the world that would be heard all over Greatern Ottawa emphasizing hourly, in mellifluous tones, the fact that time is fleeting and waits for no man.

I do not intend to weary or delay the House, but I feel that this is a subject which ought to receive the consideration of the House. Any one who has had an opportunity of visiting Belgium or the northern part of France must have been struck with the magnificent music produced by these carillons. Nothing in the world can take its place; such a carillon, I believe, would be a great addition to this magnificent building.

Great Britain adopted the carillon some years ago. A few of the places where it has been installed are Worcester, Monaghan, Londonderry, Dublin and Sligo cathedrals, Bradford, Rochdale, Reading and Manchester townhalls, and the Royal Exchange, London. All these have carillons installed by the firm of Gillet and Johnson, of Croydon, England. It is said that this firm has made many improvements on the machinery employed in playing these carillons. The old system in vogue in Belgium and in the Netherlands was such that it required a good deal of physical strength to strike the keyboard to produce the proper sounds on the bells. The firm of Gillet and Johnson has overcome all these difficulties and claims that now a carillon is no more difficult to play than is an ordinary pipe organ.

Now, for the purpose of giving to the House more authentic information than I could possibly give, I shall read one or two passages from a work I hold in my hand, on "Carillons of Belgium and Holland," by William Gorham Rice. In chapter 1 he says:

> My story is one of discovery and exploration; exploration leading often into fascinating aerial fields, and discovery, for many Americans, at least, of a new kind of music. Yet the land of which I write is not far off and the music has long been heard. Ver Meer and Rembrandt, Van Dyck and Rubens, listened to it as they painted the life of their time. and still in our day the benediction of this music continues for travellers and for all people in the Low Countries.
> It is heard from St. Catherine's tower at Briel, on the island of Voorne, where first "The Beggars of the Sea" rose against the power of Spain, and it sounds from that fifteenth century New Church at Delft where William of Orange, victorious but assassinated. forever rests. From St. Stephen's tower at Nimeguen, rising above wide river waters, it marks the hours for the passing boatmen, and from St. Lawrence's tower at Rotterdam it gives a welcome to sailors coming home from distant seas.

Hundreds of students hear its call at the University of Louvain, and it unites with the worship of thousands in the Cathedral at Antwerp. At Ypres it sounds over the magnificent Cloth Hall of the merchants; at Amsterdam it floats over the great palace of the Queen. The watchmen high up in Groningen's tower in the north and those in Mechlin's tower in the south, follow with their faint-sounding trumpet-strains the notes of the bells at each half hour of the night; and the market-men at the weigh-house of Alkmaar, and the market-women in their Zealand costumes at Middleburg wait for the signal of this music to begin their selling at mid-day. From the belfry at Ghent to-day sounds the concord of bells as it did when the Treaty of 1814 first was proclaimed, and from the belfry of Bruges ring the chimes, "low at times and loud at times," which were the inspiration of Longfellow when he first journeyed through Flanders.

So tower after tower might be named, each carrying a part in this chain of melody. Assuredly no music joins more perfectly in the celebration of days of national rejoicing; but, better still, it sends down from airy heights an influence which lightens routine and to happy occupation adds an accompaniment of surpassing charm.

Many travellers have sought to comprehend the secret of the attractiveness of the Low Countries. Complex and elusive that secret doubtless is, yet I believe we shall find a clue for our search in a knowledge of this distinctive music....

It was at Antwerp on the Scheldt that Arethusa and Cigarette began their voyage. and in that delightful chapter, "The Oise in Flood," Stevenson thus tells how a new sensation of sound revealed itself:

"On the other side of the valley a group of red roofs and a belfry showed among the foliage; thence some inspired bell ringer made the afternoon musical on a chime of bells. There was something very sweet and taking in the air he played and we thought we had never heard bells speak so intelligently or sing so melodiously as these. It must have been after some such measure that the spinners and the young maids sang 'Come away, Death,' in the Shakesperean Illyria.

"There is so often a threatening note, something blatant and metallic in the voice of bells that I believe we have fully more pain than pleasure in hearing them; these as they sounded abroad, now high, now low, now with a plaintive cadence, . . were always moderate and tunable and seemed to fall into the spirit of the still rustic places like noise of a waterfall. . . . I could have blessed the priest or the heritors, or whosoever may be concerned with such affairs in France who had left these sweet old bells to gladden the afternoon. At last the bells ceased and with their note the sun withdrew. The piece was at an end; shadow and silence possessed the valley of the Oise."

In another place the author, giving some idea of the number of these carillons that have been established throughout the Netherlands, says:

There are to-day in Belgium about 30 carillons of importance and in Holland about 20. If those of lesser consequence are included the total for both countries will be well over 100. Many authorities give higher figures, Brockhaus' German Encyclopedia saying there are 115 in the Netherlands and 97 in Belgium.

I have already given a list of some of the carillons in Ireland. I have here a list of some that have been installed in England and in Scotland. In Aberdeenshire, Scotland, St. Nicholas has 36 bells, installed in 1890. The heaviest weighs 6,578 pounds. At Boston, Lincolnshire, England, the 36 bells of the carillon were sold to increase the ring. Bournville, Worcestershire, England, has a carillon of 22 bells, recently erected under the supervision of Mr. W. W. Starmer. Cattistock, Dorsetshire, England, at St. Peter and St. Paul there are carillons of 35 bells respectively.

This gives you some idea of the number of these bells that have been installed. Another reference I desire to make from this author is a description given by a traveller of such a scene as I have been speaking of. He says:

From the top of the tower (St. Lawrence's) the whole of Rotterdam can be seen at a glance, with all its little sharp red roofs, its broad canals, its ships scattered among houses, and all about the city a vast green plain, intersected by canals bordered by trees, sprinkled with windmills and villages hidden in masses of verdure, showing only the tops of their steeples. When I was there, the sky was clear, and I could see the waters of the Meuse shining from the neighbourhood of Bois-le-Duc, nearly to its mouth; the steeples of Dordrecht, Leiden, Delft, the Hague and Gouda were visible, but neither far nor near was there a hill, a rising ground, a swell to interrupt the straight and rigid line of the horizon. It was like a green and motionless sea, where the steeples represented masts of ships at anchor. The eye roamed over that immense space with a sense of repose, and I felt, for the first time, that indefinable sentiment inspired by the Dutch landscape, which is neither pleasure, nor sadness, nor ennui, but a mixture of all three, and which holds one for a long time silent and motionless.

Suddenly I was startled by the sound of strange music coming from I knew not where. It was a chime of bells ringing a lively air, the silvery notes now falling slowly one by one, and now coming in groups, in strange flourishes, in trills. in sonorous chords, a quaint dancing strain, somewhat primitive, like the many-coloured city, on which its notes hovered like a flock of wild birds, or like the city's natural voice. an echo of the antique life of her people, recalling the sea, the solitudes, the huts, and making one smile and sigh at the same moment. This aerial concert is repeated every hour of the day and night, in all the steeples of Holland, the tunes being national airs, or from German or Italian operas. Thus in Holland the passing hour sings, as if to distract the mind from sad thoughts of flying time, and its song is of country, faith and love, floating in harmony above the sordid noises of the earth.

I have read these quotations from this author, honourable gentlemen, for the purpose of conveying to the House some idea of what wonderful results can be obtained from a carillon of the proper kind and properly constructed, and I have no hesitation in saying that I believe it would be in the interest of all concerned to have a carillon of this nature installed on the magnificent tower which it is proposed to erect.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: How many bells are there in the carillon?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: There are a great many different kinds and sizes of carillons. A first-class carillon contains as many as 52 bells. The carillon installed in the tower at Bruges has, I think, 46. In the town hall of Ypres, which was destroyed by the Germans, there was a carillon, I think, of 48 bells. At Louvain there was a magnificent carillon containing over 40 bells.

The cost of a carillon is not perhaps as great as one might think. I am told by this authority that an ordinary carillon of 48 bells could be installed for about £4,000, or about $20,000. I think it would be a good investment for Canada to make, to put a first-class carillon on top of the great tower which we hope is going to be erected here. I am satisfied it would attract hundreds and thousands of tourists, who would come to hear these bells. Moreover, it would be a magnificent thing for this great city of Ottawa to have such beautiful music sounding over the whole district. I am offering this suggestion in the hope that the House will see the advisability of asking the Government, through this resolution, to take some action in the matter.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Honourable gentlemen, I was very much pleased to hear the academic address of my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bradbury). It has been prepared with a great deal of pains and trouble. Whoever supplied that information has certainly been doing good work; whether he had any ulterior motive or not, I cannot tell. My honourable friend has spoken of the chimes of Normandy, and the chimes in the Royal Exchange in England; but, like Gog and Magog, they are all things of the past—medieval history. The bells in the tower of this building would proclaim what? There is enough shouting going on anyway, and Ottawa gets all the shouting. Why does the honourable gentleman want a bell to ring up the people of Ottawa? I do not know of what church my honourable friend belongs, but I believe that in the Catholic Church—a first-class church—the bell is rung to tell the people of their duties. But does that bell tell us our duties? I see my honourable friend the leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) smiling at me. I know he will agree that these are not days for experimenting and exploiting. I know I am stating the views of the Government. Their wish would be for us to show the country that we are not going to spend money upon all sorts of frills. We may not agree as to the manner in which the country's money has been spent, or the policy which has been followed, but we are not going to invest to-day in the chimes of Normandy or a bell to be rung for the people of Ottawa. The tower of the Parliament buildings is not yet built. Why not leave this matter until the tower is completed? Then the Government will be able to decide. Personally I do not care which Government is in power; I have got past that. Let us give the Government time to consider the question. Why should it be brought up by an honourable member of this House? Is it not for the Government to say what they will do? Where are the architects? Where is the Department of Public Works? Where are all the ministers who believe in the beauties of Ottawa? Do you want to throw them overboard now? Do you mean to say they do not know what they are doing? Would you suggest to them that they do not understand? I have more confidence in the Government than that. There is no need for me to take up the time of the House, and, if I may be permitted, I would move the adjournment of this debate until we have more particulars regarding the tower.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: Six months.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: What is the reason for adjourning the debate? We may as well get it through.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: What do you want to get through?

Hon. Mr. BOYER: We may as well settle the question one way or the other.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I cannot see how you are going settle the matter at all. Would you put an extra tax on the people of Canada? I press my motion.

The motion for the adjournment of the debate was negatived.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Of course, every bell has its sound. We heard first the merry bells of England and the chimes of old France. Then came the pall which my honourable friend from New Brunswick (Hon. Mr. Domville) cast over all by his motion. "Is there anything sweeter than the sound of bells?" said Edgar Allen Poe. And in the old world the prettiest girl in the village could be christened only by the name of Belle. What my honourable friend from Selkirk (Hon. Mr. Bradbury) proposes would really be an ornament. I cannot concur, however, in the exaggerated idea that everything Canadian is the mightiest in the world. We may have the biggest building in the world, and we have one of the biggest debts in the world. But why should should not we, as a Senate, do something for our country and furnish that carillon? There are 80 of us. Suppose the cost is $30,000; spread the expenditure over 3 or 4 years; say that each year we chip in $100 apiece; and the Senate will live forever in the memory of Canada as being a useful body. If we do not make a noise in politics, we shall at least with our bells, which will draw public attention to this House. Why should we not do that? A few years ago the members of the House of Lords noticed that the walls of the House and those of the corridors leading to it were bare of attraction; and everybody chipped in, and they had magnificent mural paintings put in at the cost of their Lordships. The expense of the proposed bells would be small compared with their usefulness. The matter has to be decided now on account of the solidity of the tower—what size of bells we may require, how big the tuning bell will be, and all such questions which the architect must decide; but let us as a Senate undertake to do this much for our country, and for the ornamentation of these parliament buildings, by subscribing whatever the cost of this carillon may be.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I think it would be very necessary to have a good clock in the tower; but a chime of bells would be rather in the nature of frills. It may be very fine and may be advisable, but I do not think we should be called upon to recommend to the Government a large expenditure without having more information than my honourable friend is able to give as to the cost of these bells.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Hear, hear: you are right.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: It is all very well to say that a chime of bells cost $20,000 in the old country before the war, but I venture to say that a chime of bells on the tower of this building would cost between $100,000 and $200,000. Before recommending the Government to undertake such an expenditure I think we ought to have an estimate from the chief architect of the building.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would suggest to my honourable friend from Selkirk (Hon. Mr. Bradbury) that he do not press his motion to a vote. It is not desirable that the Senate should commit itself to a recommendation of this nature until we have information before us as to the cost which may be involved, as to the constructive features of the tower, and other considerations. If my honourable friend wishes to pursue the subject, I would suggest that a more practical way would be to have a committee to take it up either with the architects or the building committee. The Senate has a reputation, which it desires to maintain, of not committing itself to any important subject of this kind without having all the information which would warrant an intelligent mind in coming to a satisfactory conclusion.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Does not that cover the ground of my motion asking that the matter be put aside for the moment?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I am quite satisfied to have a committee. I may say that I would be willing to accept the suggestion made by my honourable friend on the other side of the House (Hon. Mr. Boyer). I do not agree with my honourable friend from Saskatchewan (Hon. Mr. Turriff) that the bells would cost anything like $200,000. The cost of 32 bells installed in England only three years ago, the largest of them weighing 6,400 pounds, was £4,400. The cost of the proposed bells could not much exceed that, though it would no doubt be somewhat larger. I am satisfied that the suggestion of my honourable friend opposite would be very acceptable to the people of Canada. It would be a splendid thing for this Senate to contribute this set of bells, and I would be quite satisfied to accept that proposition; but, as the leader of the House has suggested, I would be prepared to have a small committee appointed to investigate.

The motion was withdrawn.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. GIDEON ROBERTSON (Minister of Labour) moved the third reading of Bill

D, an Act to Amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT moved:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that section 4, new section 34 be amended by adding thereto the words, "the minimum allowance to be $4 per day."

He said: I think this amendment will be acceptable to the minister. All it asks is that a professional witness giving evidence may be allowed $4 a day.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I do not exactly understand how that amendment is going to read. Do we leave in the words of new section 34? And is this amendment an addition to that new section?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The amendment as proposed by the honourable member for Simcoe is simply an addition to the existing Act, section 34 of which provides that the witness fees as provided for by provincial statutes shall apply in each province where an inquiry may be held. The amendment proposed provides that there shall be a minimum fee of $4 per day, and where the fee provided by the provincial law is less than that this minimum would apply. Wherever the provincial law would entitle witnesses to more—as in the case of professional men whose case we discussed the other day—this amendment would not prevent them from receiving the additional compensation.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Then are we taking out section 4 altogether?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes, and adding those words to the present section 34?

The amendment was agreed to, and the Bill, as amended, was read the third time and passed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada having come, and being seated on the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, His Excellency was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following Bill:

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1921.

His Excellency the Administrator was pleased to retire.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 16, an Act to amend the Government Annuities Act, 1908. Hon. Mr. Bradbury in the Chair.

Sections 1 and 2 were agreed to.

On section 3—age when annuity payable:

Hon. Mr. POWER: What is the exact change in that section?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We have done away with the age limit. The age under the present Act is 55. There is no reason why we should not sell an annuity to a person younger than 55. The object is to enable the Government to compete with financial companies dealing with annuities.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Would an annuitant who has been paying for a number of years be affected?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Section 3 was agreed to.

Section 4, the preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION AND RETIREMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 17, an Act to amend the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act. Hon. Mr. Beaubien in the Chair.

Subsections 1 and 2 of section 1 were agreed to.

On subsection 3 of section 1—rate of interest may be reduced:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What is the object of this subsection? If it is necessary to reduce the rate of interest, would it not be better to do so by amending the Act? Everybody would then have notice of what was being done. Apparently it will be done by Order in Council.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It simply gives discretion to the Government to reduce the rate of interest if money should become of less value. There is no reason why that should not be done. It seems, in fact, unnecessary to come before Parliament in a case of this kind, because it is manifestly in the interests of both the Government and the civil servants. It is not a case in which the Government can take any advantage of the situation.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is it not rather in the interest of the civil servants that the rate of interest should be five per cent instead of four per cent?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but at the same time the civil servants would not know whether the account, according to actuarial tables, should be based on a four per cent or a five per cent basis. That must necessarily be determined by the Government, and the Government should be clothed with authority to determine that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Are there any members of the Civil Service on the committee administering this money?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am unaware of that.

Section 1 was agreed to.

Section 2 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

OTTAWA MINT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 30, an Act to amend the Ottawa Mint Act. Hon. Mr. Casgrain in the Chair.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—yearly payment increased:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, when this Bill was before the House the other day, I suggested to the leader of the Government that it would be interesting to know what had been done by the Mint during the period of the war. I think there was a great deal of work done by the staff of the Mint which would, if known, be of great interest to the public generally and to the country. I find on looking into the matter that no report has been made since 1916. The report that would give this information has not yet gone to England, and when I inquired, the Minister of Finance seemed to think it better that that kind of information should not be given out in Canada until it had been made known in England; so apparently this information cannot be given to the country at the present time. I hope, however, that at some future time it may be possible to let the people of this country know something of the valuable work done by the Mint during the war.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have no doubt that when the report is brought down and laid upon the table of the House, as it doubtless will be, an opportunity will be given to discuss the subject or to direct the attention of the House to the very valuable work accomplished during the war.

Section 2 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

ESQUIMALT NAVAL YARD.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:

Is the following statement:—

"The Esquimalt naval yard will be closed down by April 1 and a watchman placed in charge. The officers will be demobilized and may join the fisheries service if they so wish. The Stadacona will be transferred to the Fisheries Department. H.M.C.S. Rainbow will be sold":

which appeared in the Daily Province on the 22nd March, 1920, a newspaper published in Vancouver, British Columbia, a correct statement of the policy being pursued by the Government?

If not, what action is being taken by the Government in regard to Esquimalt naval yard, the Stadacona and H.M.C.S. Rainbow?

What action is being taken in regard to Halifax naval yard and the vessels belonging to the navy at Halifax and the staff?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1, 2 and 3. The Government has had under consideration for some time the question of the naval defence of Canada and the suggestion of Admiral Viscount Jellicoe in reference thereto.

In view of Canada's heavy financial commitments and of the fact that Great Britain has not as yet decided on her permanent naval policy, and of the approaching Imperial Conference at which the question of naval defence of the Empire will come up for discussion between the Home Government and the Overseas Dominions, it has been decided to defer in the meantime action in regard to the adoption of a permanent naval policy for Canada.

The Government has decided to carry on the Canadian Naval Service along pre-war lines and has accepted the offer of Great Britain of one light cruiser and two torpedo boat destroyers to take the place of the present obsolete and useless training ships, the Niobe and Rainbow.

The Minister of Naval Service, in order to be free to thoroughly reorganize and place the present service on an economical and efficient basis, has issued orders for the demobilization of all officers and naval ratings and for the discontinuance of civilian help at headquarters and at the naval dockyards in Esquimalt and Halifax. The Canadian officers who are in the Imperial fleet and who are now being paid by the Canadian Government will be recalled and placed on duty with the Canadian Naval Service. The Naval College will also be continued. After reorganization has been completed, only those officers and other ratings and civilians will be taken on who are absolutely necessary and possess the qualifications desired.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill 2, an Act to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and to transfer to the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police the powers heretofore vested in the Commissioner of Dominion Police.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I promised my honourable friend the leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) to obtain certain information respecting the Police before the third reading of the Bill. I find that previous to August 8, 1914, the statutory strength of the police was 1,000, but the actual strength had become reduced by several hundred. An Order in Council was passed, under the War Measures Act, increasing the strength to 1,200. It then became desirable, in 1919, to amalgamate the Dominion Police and the Mounted Police, and the strength was accordingly increased by Order in Council to 2,500. There are now on the strength 1,864. Under the amalgamation 173 Dominion Police were taken over. The Dominion Police form a division known as the Ottawa division. Their uniforms will not be changed, but will continue as it has been under the old Act. Whether it will become necessary to increase the force immediately up to its legal strength I cannot at the moment say; but 1,864 is the present strength.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understand that the number of 2,500 was arranged by Order in Council under the War Measures Act?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, apparently. I was under the impression that it was by statute; but apparently, so far as the Police themselves understand, it was by Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: In that case will it not have to be done by statute? Will not the Order in Council drop as soon as the War Measures Act goes out of existence?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But what was done under it will continue.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION AND RETIREMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill 17, an Act to amend the Civil Superannuation and Retirement Act.

Hon. WILLIAM ROCHE: Honourable gentlemen, I wish to make a remark on a subject along the line of the present Bill. I understand that the employees of the Geological Survey have superannuated themselves by resigning in a body. I think it is a pity that so valuable a body of public servants should be allowed to disperse and that their services should be lost to the country at the present time. It would be difficult to reassemble so large a number of experienced servants, well acquainted with the business. I do not know whether the difference between their demands for increased pay and the present salary is very great. I understood that the increase demanded was not very large, and I only reiterate what I have already said that I think it would be a great loss to the country at the present time, when so much is required for its development along the line of geology, to be deprived of the services of men so experienced and to so great an extent acquainted with the mineral deposits of Canada. I only make the remark that perhaps attention may be given to it, and that the Government may be able to meet the demands of this large and influential and most valuable body of men.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

OTTAWA MINT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill 30, an Act to amend the Ottawa Mint Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

DIVORCE (ONTARIO AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. W. B. ROSS moved the second reading of Bill I, an Act to provide in Ontario and Prince Edward Island for the Dissolution and the Annulment of Marriage.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, in moving the second reading of this Bill, I do not think that I shall have to inflict any very extended remarks upon this House. There was a Bill dealing with divorce introduced in the Commons last year with a very long dissertation upon the law of divorce. In fact, it was the reading of a text-book which practically any member of this House who is interested in the substantive law of divorce can get by asking for it in the library. But, inasmuch as the Bill of which I am now moving the second reading does not interfere with the substantive law of divorce, I do not think it at all necessary to enter into the question of what divorce is or what it ought to be.

Substantially, the Bill is one for creating in Ontario a divorce court, giving that court jurisdiction in divorce and in the annulment of marriage that is now possessed by the courts of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and pretty nearly what is possessed by the court of British Columbia. The British Columbia law is, I think, the English Act of 1858. This will give Ontario and the Western provinces the English law on the subject as of the 15th day of July, 1870. Of course, in Ontario there is no divorce law, people wishing divorces always coming to Parliament to get them. In Prince Edward Island they have a divorce court, but it is a very archaic court, consisting of the Lieutenant-Governor and five members of the Council. It is styled a Court of Judicature for Granting Divorce, and I thought when dealing with this matter that it would be better to transfer the jurisdiction from the Governor in Council to the Supreme Court in that province. You will see that, by adopting the law of England as on the 15th of July, 1870, you will not alter the substantive law with regard to divorce as it has been administered in this Parliament for a very long time—practically ever since Confederation. The English law allows a divorce for adultery or for bigamy, and also allows the annulment of marriage for fraud, for impotence, or for imbecility. But I need not go into these details, for they are to be found in all the text books. From that point of view this Bill is very conservative. It leaves the substantive law exactly as we have it to-day. That is to say, the court in Ontario and the court in Prince Edward Island will not be able to give relief in regard to divorce or the annulment of marriage where this Parliament has not been able to do so.

In dealing with the province of Quebec, I wish it to be clearly understood that I am not desirous of saying one word about the sentiment or the opinion of the people of that province or of any institution there, ecclesiastical, political or social. The only reference I find it necessary to make to the law of Quebec is to explain why it is that Quebec is not included in this Bill, as it was included in the Bill introduced in the lower House. Honourable gentlemen will find, in volume III of the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1886, at page 5, with regard to the Civil Code of the province of Quebec, that that province has a pretty complete code with regard to the annulment of marriage. There is one clause, section 185, which says that marriage is indissoluble—that there is no divorce in the Quebec law. But there is provision for the annulment of marriages, that is to say, for setting aside what on their face seem to be marriages, but which in reality are not marriages at all. That law antedates Confederation, and any one who would interfere with that law would require to give a great deal of study to the subject and to know a great deal more about it than I pretend to know.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: So does ours.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I am perfectly aware of that. Your law is archaic. It gives the Governor in Council judicial powers which I think would be better vested in the court.

So far as I see, there are few divorce applications to Parliament from the province of Quebec. I do not think that in the last ten years there have been more than four cases a year on the average. In one year particularly there was not one.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What about Prince Edward Island?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There was one, I think. What I was going to say is that it would be a very serious thing to impose upon a province like the province of Quebec, where the great majority of the people are Roman Catholics, and, as I understand, conscientiously opposed to divorce, and where, I am also informed, a great many of the Protestant population are imbued with the same opinion—it would be a very serious matter to pass a law which would impose upon the province of Quebec the English law of 1870, which would be practically wiping out a large section of their Code. There are 36 sections of the Code that deal with the subject. So far as I am concerned, I would regard it as a very serious thing to interfere with the law of the province of Quebec, and unless some reasons are advanced for interfering with that law, I would be not only unwilling to be a party to repealing it and enforcing another law upon the people of that province, but, further than that, I would oppose any attempt to do so.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Does the honourable gentleman say that we can pass Bills here for one province which will not affect the other provinces?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What is the honourable gentleman's authority for that?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It is the sovereign power of Parliament.

Those are the reasons why I have left out the province of Quebec. The law under which the province of Manitoba has jurisdiction in divorce is chapter 33 of the Statutes of 1888, and the particular section reads this way:

Subject to the provisions of the next following section, the laws of England relating to matters within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, as the same existed on the fifteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and seventy, were from the said day and are in force in the province of Manitoba, in so far as the same are applicable to the said province and in so far as the same have not been or are not hereafter repealed, altered varied, modified or affected by any Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom applicable to the said province, or of the Parliament of Canada.

That made the laws of England applicable to the province of Manitoba. The Privy Council has held that under that section the province of Manitoba has jurisdiction in divorce. Now, when we were dealing with the criminal law there was a great deal of consideration given to that section of the Manitoba Act, and an improved way of expressing the same idea was adopted. Section 12 of Part I of chapter 146, the Criminal Code, reads in this way:

The criminal law of England, as it existed on the fifteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and seventy, in so far as it is applicable to the province of Manitoba, and in so far as it has not been repealed, as to the province, by any Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, or by this Act or any other Act of the Parliament of Canada, and, as altered, varied, modified or affected, as to the province, by any such Act, shall be the criminal law of the province of Manitoba.

By section 1, of this Bill, the law of England as of the 15th day of July, 1870, as to the dissolution of marriage and as to the annulment of marriage, is made applicable to the provinces of Ontario and Prince Edward Island. So for those two respective provinces you will have a court that will have power to grant divorce for adultery and power to annul marriage where the marriage is contracted by fraud or on the ground of bigamy.

The rest of the Bill is, of course, mere detail. Section 2 provides:

The Superior Court of the province shall have jurisdiction for all purposes of this Act.

Section 3 says:

This Act may be cited as "The Divorce Act (Ontario and Prince Edward Island), 1920."

Section 4 repeals certain laws of the province of Prince Edward Island.

The question then arises, why I propose this Bill at all. I am not egotistical enough to put myself forward and claim that this is my Bill or that it originated with me. It is a notorious fact that there has been a great deal of agitation in the country for the creation of a divorce court, particularly for the province of Ontario. Now, I can see some advantage in having a court instead of having so many divorce cases from Ontario tried before this House. Of course, there is one section—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Before my honourable friend passes on to speak of the objections, I should like to hear from him what would be the advantages. He seems to slip away from that. I think my honourable friend has turned the corner very sharply. What advantage would there be in the law which my honourable friend proposes?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: One of the advantages of transferring the jurisdiction to a court would be to remove this impression that is abroad. How far it is abroad I do not know; but I have read in the newspapers and have heard it stated on the public platform that every now and again, when a divorce is pending before Parliament, Parliament departs from the evidence and from the report of the committee, and that there is more or less of political or social pull with regard to the granting of divorce.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Will my honourable friend allow me a question?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Could you have any better judge than the chairman of the present Divorce Committee?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That question answers itself. I may say that I have been on the Divorce Committee for about eight years, and as far as I know there were only two cases in which it was suspected that there was something wrong about the grant ing of the divorce. Just how far that extended I never knew, and I do not know now.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is my honourable friend not prepared to say definitely that the committee was not affected in either of those cases?—or was it the other way?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There was no effect on the committee, but I am not able to say whether or not there was any effect on others. It is just possible that there was. At all events, that is always possible. Of course, it is always possible to corrupt a court, or to corrupt a judge. However, if a judge is guilty of yielding to improper influence and is found out, of course he can be impeached; but you cannot impeach Parliament. So far as I have been concerned as chairman of the Divorce Committee, the House could turn down my report or accept it, or do anything else it desired with it. I have always taken the position that whatever the House did with the report would be perfectly satisfactory to me. I do not regard the action of the House in a personal sense if they decline to accept my report. I have done the best I could. However, I think it would be well to remove all possibility of political or social influence.

There is another point which I think would be gained by having a court. Honourable gentlemen will see by the Divorce Bills that are going through now that some of them were tried perhaps less than two weeks ago. They are now being given the third reading, and after they pass they become law, and are practically irrevocable. I do not believe in that myself. I believe in the decree nisi. In England, in the first instance, there is a decree nisi. It is not a final decree, but it is for six months, and during those six months the King's proctor can interfere. I was reading in the London Times only last week of a very interesting, a rather extraordinary, case—a case of interference by the proctor. I believe that there has been granted by the Canadian Parliament at least one divorce in which, if there had been a decree nisi, effective for even three months, and if there had been a King's proctor, there would have been an interference and the divorce would not have been granted. Not in this Bill, but in the second Bill which I have before the House, there is a provision which would be applicable to all the divorce courts of Canada, that the divorce must in the first instance be a decree nisi, and the Attorney General would be entitled during a certain period to intervene. Moreover, that would be a protection, because very often people will talk after the trial, when it is too late, and we have given an absolute decree in the first instance.

I think there is a notion abroad that divorce will be cheaper if the court is established to replace the system we now have. I know something about divorce courts in Nova Scotia, and I know something about divorce courts in England, and I am perfectly satisfied that divorce will not be one cent cheaper than it is now. Moreover, I doubt very much whether the cases will be any more carefully tried by a court than they have been by the Divorce Committee of this House. There has been considerable criticism, I see, in the Lower House about the way in which we have tried the cases, but I may say for myself that there has never been a report from the Divorce Committee in favour of granting a divorce regarding which I was not thoroughly satisfied that the case had been clearly proven. Such criticisms, of course, come from people who are not used to examining evidence. The fact of the matter is, the opinion of the man on the street with regard to the trial of a case before the Divorce Committee is not worth anything at all; it is not worth anything more than my opinion would be on a case of typhoid fever. The only person whose opinion is worth having, to my mind, is the opinion of those who have taken part in the trial of the case. There have been many very good lawyers, both from the Quebec bar and the Ontario bar; and if these leading counsel say that they are satisfied with the way in which the Divorce Committee has taken the evidence and disposed of the cases, I would attach very little value to what other persons may say. I have reason to know that the leading lawyers who have been before the Divorce Committee are satisfied that the cause has been as well tried as if tried before almost any of the regular courts of Canada.

There is this much gained by this proposed legislation, that there will be in the first instance a decree nisi and there could be interference by the Attorney General of the province. I think the public would recognize the advantage of that, and on the whole this would be in the public interest. There prevails a feeling that a divorce court would be much better than the present system, and so far as I can see there is no objection to the province of Ontario having a divorce court in answer to what I believe is the prevailing sentiment in that province.

You observe, honourable gentlemen, that the Bill is a very conservative one. In dealing with the question of divorce, you are dealing with a subject that is of very first importance—a subject in which every one in the country whose opinion is worth considering would be deeply interested. I would of course regard it as a very serious state of things in this country if a Bill of this kind were to be treated as an insignificant matter. Divorce touches not only religious convictions but also the persons and the properties of the inhabitants of the country. From any point of view it is a serious thing. I would therefore inveterately oppose enacting anything like what might be called a divorce code, that is, a large body of legislation in regard to divorce. It is better to start at the point at which we are starting in this Bill. The law of England has been tried out for a great many years, and if any change is to be made in it, the change should deal with one thing at a time, and due notice should be given to every person concerned. Furthermore, every person dealing with the subject should endeavour to be absolutely candid. Any legislation you have ought to be as definite and clear-cut as it is possible to make it in the English language.

I have done my best with regard to this Bill, and I examined the Bill that was before the lower House, which was really in a way, almost a code with regard to divorce, and it of course raised a great many questions on which you could not expect anything like unanimity either in this House or in the lower House. It must be remembered that the divorce law is exceedingly technical. I do not know any branch of law in which there are more pitfalls than in the law of divorce. I need not enter into an exposition of what these things are; but I can say that after a good many years' experience, I found that to be true. Divorce affects not only religious convictions, it affects children; it not only affects the status of the parties in their own country, but it has an international aspect. It is a very serious thing for a woman to get a divorce in one country, then go to another country and get married, and afterwards have the question raised whether her divorce was valid or not. The subject is a big one, and for this reason I think that any changes that are to be made in the divorce law of Canada should be made one at a time, or as nearly in that way as possible, so that every question might be thoroughly threshed out and the whole subject dealt with in a conservative spirit. I for one am not at all in favour of any great extension.

I do not know that there is anything else that I want to say on this matter at the present time. There is another Bill that I will of course speak to when I come to it. It will of course have some relation to this Bill. I have interfered as little as possible with existing institutions. All the provinces have been left exactly as they were, except Ontario, which has no divorce law.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Honourable gentlemen, I have listened very carefully to what the honourable gentleman (Hon. W. B. Ross) has had to say, and, so far as I have heard, he has not advanced any good reason why this law, which he evidently thinks is a good one, should not also be made use of by those in the province of Quebec who believe in divorce. If it is a good law, why should the people of Quebec who believe in divorce be deprived of it? The honourable gentleman has said that he does not want applicants for divorce coming to Ottawa any more,—that it is better that the cases should be heard before a court. I suppose that is the purpose of the law. I thought he would advance some good arguments why he would not allow the people of Quebec who believe in divorce and want divorce to have that law apply to them. Why make bone of one and flesh of another? I thought all the provinces had equal rights. I am speaking for the Protestants of the province of Quebec, and I think they are entitled to equal justice with the Protestants of the other provinces. God knows they get it.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Order.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Who says order?

Hon. Mr. POPE: I do.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the honourable gentleman any complaint of the treatment of Protestants in the province of Quebec? This might be a good law, and I might vote for it, but I should not like to see my neighbours who are Protestants treated differently from Protestants elsewhere.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I will say to the honourable gentleman that, if he will introduce a Bill to give the Protestants of Quebec the rights he speaks of, he will find where his difficulties begin.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: Honourable gentlemen, I see that this Bill deals with the largest province and the smallest province in the Dominion of Canada. The smallest province does not need this legislation; the largest may. In the province of Quebec they do not believe in divorce. I have not had a chance to read the Bill, and therefore I would move that this order be discharged and placed on the Order Paper a little later, so that we may have an opportunity to look it over.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Would the honourable gentleman say when he wants it discussed, or how long he wants to think it over?

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman has had several years to think over this question.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The honourable gentleman had better move the adjournment of the debate; his motion will then be in order.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: Then I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, before this motion carries, I desire to say but one word, as I may not be here when the debate is resumed.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Speaker, can the honourable gentleman speak to a motion for the adjournment of the debate?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I have a right to speak on the motion. The reason I am rising to say a word or two is because of a remark made by the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain). Those of the faith to which I belong adopt the practice of not voting on a divorce Bill because they are opposed to divorce on principle. I have no intention of voting on the Bill which has been presented by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross); but I desire to compliment the honourable gentleman on having left the province of Quebec out of his Bill. The divorce law is one which is repugnant to the customs and ideas of a large proportion of the people of that province, and I think it is very proper on the part of the honourable gentleman to respect the opinions of that large proportion of the people in leaving out that province as he has done. There was an excellent reason for doing so because of the fact that those in the province of Quebec who have no objection to divorce or who believe in the law of divorce can have their remedy before this Parliament.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: I rise to a point of order.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: In the province of Quebec we have a law which provides—

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: I rise to a point of order. I moved the adjournment of the debate. I may be wrong, but I do not understand why the debate is still going on. If I am wrong, I want to be corrected.

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY: If I understand the honourable gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Hon. Mr. Prowse), I think his object in moving the adjournment of the debate was that he might have an opportunity of discussing this question before voting upon it. I do not think he has any objection to letting others discuss it so long as the question is not decided at this sitting of the House. Perhaps I am not right, but that is what I understand. If that is the case, I think he might withdraw his motion at this stage, and move it later.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I rose to a point of order, and I insist upon the point of order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I am of opinion that on a motion for the adjournment of a debate every honourable member is at liberty to discuss the question. The point is not well taken.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I was saying—

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do adjourn.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: In the province of Quebec we have a law which was referred to by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) which provides for the annulment of marriage; but of course it is limited to cases in which the essential formalities for the marriage have not been complied with. In addition, we have what is called the separation from bed and board, which, however, does not entail the dissolution of the marriage, but merely the separation of the consorts. It is a law which is resorted to in a great number of instances. As far as divorce cases are concerned. I think that up to this Session there has been only one from the province of Quebec at the instance of a Catholic; and, as was truly stated, from the time of Confederation to the present day there have been only a very few cases from that province.

An additional reason why this law should not be extended to the province of Quebec is that it would be repugnant to a large majority of the members of the Bench. If the law were extended to Quebec, they would be called upon to administer a law which would be repugnant to their opinion and their conscience; so I think the honourable gentleman is well advised in leaving the province of Quebec out of his Bill.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I do not question the intention of my good friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross). I believe that he thinks what he is doing is for the betterment of our divorce laws. I do not think very much of our divorce laws, and I do not believe in divorce, I have sat in the divorce chamber, and have listened to the evidence, and I believe the committee have been doing everything they could to deal with this matter properly. If my good friend had not introduced Prince Edward Island into the matter, I would have allowed the Bill to pass without any objection. But Prince Edward Island has a divorce court under a statute of William IV, and therefore is perfectly capable of doing the work that the honourable gentleman wants to give us the authority to do by a statute of the Federal Parliament. Under this Bill Quebec is placed in a different position to the other provinces. I feel that it is a slight on the province of Quebec that it should be signalized by being left out. There is no special reason why my good friend should not have made the people of that province amenable to the ordinary laws. I think the members from the province of Quebec will not feel flattered that a law should be passed especially exempting their province. It would seem that its people are somewhat different from the people of the other provinces. But that is only the first objection that I take to the Bill of my honourable friend, although, of course, I do not want to speak for the province of Quebec, because there are men here from that province who are capable of speaking for themselves.

In Prince Edward Island we have a divorce court, as I said, established under a statute passed in the days of William IV, prior to the time when we entered Confederation. The fact that we have had only one divorce case in the history of that province shows how moral we are. That case came up in Prince Edward Island, and the Government, of which my, honourable friend from Souris (Hon. Mr. McLean) was a member refused to constitute the divorce court, and the case had to come to Ottawa. If I could be induced to believe in divorce at all, I believe that that was a case in which a divorce was allowable. A man—and he had eight children—was left by his wife—and I am sorry to put this on the records—and in a way it was to legitimize the children that I agreed not to fight the divorce, which I would have done under other circumstances.

An Hon. SENATOR: Eight children by another wife?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No, by the one wife. If honourable gentlemen subscribe to the principle that there is reason for divorce, they should make the law reasonable. I want to circumscribe divorce. I do not know what the feeling of my honourable friend from Souris (Hon. Mr. McLean) is in regard to this Bill, but I say as we have a court in Prince Edward Island, leave the question to us. We do not want the Federal Government to override our authority.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: If I may interrupt: The honourable gentleman will remember that we had a big struggle here on the temperance question, and gave prohibition to Prince Edward Island, and what became of it?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: We were the first prohibition province. That may have been awkward for my honourable friend and myself, but we had prohibition, and I want to tell my honourable friend that it was better enforced in Prince Edward Island than it has been in any other province.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: They had more liquor.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: There was some if you had a doctor's prescription. However, we want to be serious now. To my mind, divorce is always a serious question; it is not something to be laughed and jeered at. There should be one law for all; I think we all admit that. We do not want to segregate the province of Quebec. I am surprised at my good friend from Middleton saying that the province of Quebec should be left out, as if it were not good enough to be put under the general law. The province of Quebec has been a thorn in the side of a great many people; at the same time it is the best province in our Confederation. We want to talk as man to man. In my opinion we shall need the province of Quebec in the next five years to save us. That is the most conservative part of our Confederation, and we do not want to put it in an anomalous position by any law that is passed; and knowing the breadth of view of my good friend from Middleton, I am surprised that he should ask any special favour for that province. They do not need it. As for Prince Edward Island, we do not want a special Act for ourselves. I am sorry to disagree with the honourable gentleman from Middleton, because we usually see eye to eye on most things; but I think his Bill is ill-timed, and that it would be unfortunate if we were to enact such legislation, and I would suggest to him that he withdraw the Bill.

Hon. L. G. POWER: I have always been very strongly opposed to divorce, and have been consistent, I think, in my action with respect to the cases that have come before this House. But it strikes me that we have really got to a stage when the matter has to be considered. When, eight or nine years ago, we had four or five divorce cases, the Divorce Committee was quite competent to deal with that number. I will say of that committee that it has always dealt with the cases that came before it in a most satisfactory manner. I do not think there is any court in the Dominion which could have discharged the functions assigned to that committee better than they have been discharged. But, honourable gentlemen, look at the position to-day. As I understand, there are over one hundred applications for divorce. That just means that if the committee are to try all those cases and give proper attention to them, the committee and the House practically will have almost nothing to do except to deal with divorce cases. I think we ought to consider the position. I do not mean to say that I am in favour of the Bill, but I think there is that point to be considered.

The honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) spoke of the disapproval by the House of Commons of the action of the committee in the past. Now, every honourable gentleman here knows that, although we are supposed to be a criticizing and examining body, the House of Commons do criticize—I do not say in an unfriendly, but at any rate in a not very friendly spirit—all the actions of the Senate which are susceptible of criticism. Consequently I do not myself pay much heed to what the Commons and their friends say about the Senate's actions in connection with divorce. I have already said that the Senate court was a very good one.

With respect to the province of Prince Edward Island, I felt disposed, when I read the Bill first, to suggest to the honourable gentleman from Middleton that he should not make the Bill apply to the province of Prince Edward Island. The honourable gentleman from Tignish (Hon. Mr. Murphy) has expressed his feelings in the matter. Inasmuch as there has been, as I understand, only one divorce in the province of Prince Edward Island for over forty years—

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: There never was more than one.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I would suggest to the honourable gentleman from Middleton that it is hardly worth while including the province of Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: It would put a stigma on us.

Hon. Mr. POWER: As to the province of Quebec, the honourable gentleman from Tignish (Hon. Mr. Murphy) seemed to think that we should not deal differently with the various provinces, but the honourable gentleman apparently forgets that on a great many very important matters—

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Yes, provincial matters.

Hon. Mr. POWER: —there are special laws applied to separate provinces. With respect to Dominion lands, for instance, the new provinces in the West have not the same right to deal with their lands as the old provinces of the East have.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Will the honourable gentleman let me ask him a question? On a question of morality should the province of Quebec be dealt with differently from the other provinces? This is a question of morality.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I was not talking about morality.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: You were talking of lands, but this is a question of morality.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I was speaking of the objections which the honourable gentleman took to treating Quebec differently to the other provinces. What I understand from the honourable gentleman from Middleton, and what I think we all understand from what we read and hear and see, is that the people of the province of Quebec, as a body—not as Catholics or Protestants, but as a body—are opposed to divorce—to the creation of a divorce court which will apply to that province.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: They are well trained.

Hon. Mr. POWER: As has been pointed out already, if a married man or woman in the province of Quebec thinks that he or she is called upon to apply for a divorce, why, Ottawa is very convenient to Montreal, and not very far from Quebec, and the cost of getting a Bill through the committee is really not any greater than the cost of getting a judgment through a court.

I feel that, at any rate, we should not be unfair to the honourable gentleman from Middleton. Looking at the views that he entertains, I think that the Bill which he has presented is exceedingly fair and reasonable. But, if the honourable gentleman will allow me to make one other suggestion before I sit down, it is this. In the second clause of the Bill it is stated that the Superior Court of the province shall have jurisdiction for all purposes of this Act. In the provice of Ontario there is a special court known as the Superior Court. It is the same in the province of Quebec, as I understand. In the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island, and in the Western Provinces, there is no court known as the Superior Court. I think that instead of "the Superior Court," this should read, "a Superior Court."

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: With the consent of the House, I would like to say that we have in our province a special court which can be constituted at any time and which is similar to the committee that tries the cases here. Now, why should my good friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) want to foist on us another court of his own? We do not require that court. As the honourable gentleman from Souris (Hon. Mr. McLean) will tell you, we have full authority, and have had that authority since the days of William IV, to try these divorce cases in our province. I protest against this Bill on these grounds.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, this question is one to which the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) has given a great deal of attention and consideration, and I want to congratulate him on the work he has done on this Bill and the following one. Owing to the way our Minutes were printed this morning, I did not think these Bills had been printed, for there were no letters, "E, F," after them. Therefore, I did not realize that the honourable gentleman was going on with these Bills to-day, and I have not had time to give as much consideration to them as I otherwise should have done.

This question is a very important one, and one that I think we in this Chamber should thoroughly discuss. From the remarks of my honourable friend from Middleton I judge it is his desire that there be a full discussion. Although at the time of Confederation it was considered that divorce ought to be left in the hands of the Parliament of Canada, conditions throughout the whole Dominion have considerably changed, and it is only right that the present situation should be considered. As honourable gentlemen are aware, the only provinces in which divorces are not granted to-day are Ontario and Quebec. In all the other provinces there is some form of court for the purpose of dealing with divorce. The trouble is, I understand, that provinces like British Columbia and Alberta are under an old law of England which is out of date and not altogether suitable for the conditions under which they are working. Therefore I think it is very much better in the interests of the Dominion that some legislation of the kind now proposed should be passed by this Parliament for the purpose of bringing the divorce law of the Dominion up to date, and for the benefit of the litigants. Every one in Canada who considers the question of divorce must regret that such a thing is necessary at all in this country, or in any part of the world. The marriage tie is a very solemn tie, and we are all taught that the contract should be binding for life; but unfortunately human nature is so constituted that it is sometimes considered advisable, in the interests of the country and the people generally, that some dissolution of that contract should be made possible. Consequently throughout the whole of the British Empire to-day there are laws permitting of divorce.

If this measure is passed, the situation, I understand, will be that the various provinces will have courts for the dissolution of marriage, and the people of those provinces may go to those courts for the purpose of obtaining divorce; but at the same time no one will be prevented from coming to this Parliament for a divorce if he so desires. A very similar situation exists in England at the present time. There have been divorce courts in England for a number of years, but in the case of a divorce application from Ireland the parties have to go before the House of Lords. The same procedure applies in the case of a divorce between British subjects in India; it is dealt with by the House of Lords.

My honourable friend (Hon. W. B. Ross) has dealt with the objections that may arise in regard to cases coming before the committee. Every honourable member of this House must realize that the large number of cases coming before Parliament entail a great deal of work and considerable expense in the printing of Bills and in having them put through both Houses; and the time has arrived when we ought to consider this question and see if something cannot be done to relieve the present situation. I therefore congratulate the honourable gentleman upon having brought these Bills before this House.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT. Honourable gentlemen, I am not going to vote one way or the other on the second reading of this Bill; but, for the edification and possibly the enlightenment of honourable gentlemen, I would like to translate a description of a divorce court which appeared some years ago in that great French paper, Le Figaro, of Paris:

> The Fourth Chamber of the Tribunal of the Seine held a hearing which lasted four hours, during which time it granted a little over one divorce a minute. All this was done with the utmost decorum by means of three gentlemen, all well robed, who mumbled the proceedings, one cranky gentleman supposed to do the petitioning, and a fifth gentleman who took notes. This social ante-room of hell, occupied by grave men who are breaking up society by means of the law and under the image of Christ—

Honourable gentlemen will remember that in all the French courts there was a crucifix over the tribunal—

> —seems quite respectable. However, all this will have to be paid for, you may be sure. Every thing has to be paid for. By the fault of the legislator, with complicity and almost temptation on the part of the courts, free love is gradually replacing marriage. It is destroying the family. It delivers the husband to alcoholism, the woman to prostitution, and the children to precocious vice. Facts like these throw a very disquieting light upon the whole social state.

I am not going to make any comment of my own, but I would ask honourable gentlemen who are going to facilitate or permit in Canada what is described here—I would ask them to consider seriously before passing legislation of this kind.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Honourable gentlemen, I am going to vote against this Bill. I am not going to vote against it simply because, being a Christian, I believe it is flying absolutely in the face of what our Lord and Saviour laid down as a law binding upon all Christians; for I know that the world, nearly every country in the world, have seen fit to amend His law. But I am going to vote against it because I believe it is not right for any Christian people to facilitate divorce in any possible way. I quite recognize that it is not logical to sit in this House and allow Bills to pass, as they have been passing year after year, without entering a protest against them, and afterwards to set out to oppose the mere transference of the jurisdiction from one tribunal to another. I do not purpose justifying my conduct on logical reasoning. I have listened attentively to the presentation made by the author of the Bill (Hon. W. B. Ross). He pointed out that the reason why he excepted the province of Quebec was that the people of that province have imbedded in their statutes a law which allows only the declaration of nullity of a marriage ceremony, and does not allow the dissolution of marriage. The honourable gentleman of course really means to say that he knows that the overwhelming opinion of the people of Quebec is against divorce. He believes that the opinion of the province of Ontario is for it. That is no reason why any man should cast his vote in favour of the measure. The question to be determined by any man in deciding whether to cast his vote for or against a measure is whether it ought or ought not to be the law. If the great mass of the people wish for something which in my conscience I believe is wrong and against public policy, the desire of the people is no argument that appeals to me.

Now, what are the reasons given for the establishment of this court? The reason given first, by the man on the street, is that this committee is a rich man's court. I quite agree with the author of this Bill that that is an unsound reason, because divorce will cost quite as much in a provincial court as before the Senate. If that is not so, you can reduce the cost of a divorce before the Senate by not charging anything for introducing the Bill, and so forth.

Another reason why I shall vote against this Bill is just this: the nearer you bring the mill to the grist the more grist there will be. In England, lately, divorce was made easier, and last year there were 10,000 cases on the list waiting to be tried. Such legislation is encouraging the people to apply for divorce, and no man, no matter what his beliefs may be, if he has any right notions of morality at all, will dispute the statement that we should so far as we can discourage the dissolution of the marriage tie. I was told the other day that in the United States there are a million cases of divorce a year. It is simply dreadful. Whereas people used to shun divorcees, to-day they think no more of welcoming them into society than if they were legitimately, virtuously married people. Apparently we have lost all idea of adultery being not only a crime but a disgrace. We have lost all idea that we should protect the children of the country against illegitimacy, and that we should not encourage their parents absolutely to scoff at that which is the foundation of society. So long as I am a member of this House I shall never do anything to facilitate divorce.

The honourable the Chairman of the Divorce Committee says that there are more divorces than ever before. Well, I think there are for the time being, while the morality of the world is upside down, as it is at present. But I do not think this will continue. I do not think that in years to come we shall have any more divorces in proportion to the population than we have had in years gone by. If you establish courts, and cases are tried in Hamilton, London, Toronto, and so on, what are you doing? You are advertising the fact to the people that all they have to do is to go to a lawyer and apply for a divorce. The Senate Committee, to the great mass of people, is a mysterious body. The people think it is hard to get at. What is the result? They reconcile their differences. I consider that this country is the most virtuous country on the face of the earth. I consider that the people of this country are better morally and have less scandal in their lives than the people of any other country in the world. In any State in the Union, where five or six are gathered together, you cannot speak to anyone in disparagement of divorce because one of them is almost sure to be a divorcee.

Why establish a court? It is admitted that it is not more expensive to come here for a divorce than it would be to go to a court. It is admitted that the people who come here get a fair trial. The only reason the honourable gentleman has advanced—and he has had years of training and of experience—is that under the new practice we shall have a decree nisi which may be reversed in six months. Under existing conditions why could not cases be heard in one Session and the passing of the divorce Bill be allowed to stand over until the next Session? The honourable gentleman will not deny, I think, that the facility of the process will increase the number of applications which will be made. This is interfering with the most sacred relations between man and woman. It is interfering with the rights of children. It is dissolving marriage, and not only those who are leading improper lives, but those who will be brought into this world, will be affected by it. We should not deal with this question until we find that there are stronger and more important reasons for doing so.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY :I would remind the honourable gentleman that, in one case in which a divorce was refused last year, the parties went back and lived together.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I have known of many such cases. Many people have come to me concerning their family troubles, about the infidelity of the husband or the infidelity of the wife. Any lawyer, in any kind of practice, knows that there are many such cases. But I have seen case after case reconciled. I have had the pleasure of reconciling such people, and telling them that for the sake of their families they should overlook that which in this country is considered the only ground for divorce. If they go to a lawyer, and he is keen to issue a writ, the case gets into the papers, and under this Bill away it goes. I say, in all confidence, that if we allow the provincial courts in Ontario to deal with this matter, we shall break up many families which, if they had to come to Ottawa, would not be broken up. I dare say that in twenty cases it will be far better to save one family than to pass a law facilitating divorce for those whom we cannot save.

The honourable leader of the Opposition has said that if we pass this Bill we shall bring our law up to date. I cannot see any reason on earth for doing that. In the United States persons can get a divorce if they have cold feet: all they have to do is to possess fifty dollars. If that sentiment grows in this country we shall have the public saying that we should give a divorce for something less, and something less, and something less, and there will be honourable gentlemen in this House who will stand up and justify it, absolutely ignoring the question of morality, to bring our law up to date. As Carlyle says, it is a mess of wrong and sentimentality to argue that it is wrong to prevent divorce between people who disagree. People have told me that when they were married they agreed that if they did not get on together they would consent to a divorce. That is a common thing in the United States and it will be a common thing here. I have no doubt that in many cases brought here there is collusion, and I have no doubt that if such cases were tried in the assizes there would be double the number of divorces that there are at present.. I cannot see any evil that has resulted from allowing people to come to the Senate that is going to be remedied by passing this Bill; but I do think that by facilitating divorce we shall increase the number of cases, and therefore I am going to vote against the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Honourable gentlemen, it strikes me that this matter of divorce might be very much simplified and the number of cases diminished considerably if the committee made a point of decreeing that the person found guilty of causing the divorce should not be allowed to marry again.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: You cannot do that.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Yes, you can.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Why should the committee thrust into a new family a man or a woman guilty of the only act for which a divorce can be granted? If what I suggest were made part and parcel of the decision of the committee, people would think twice before they would come here asking for a divorce. There could not possibly be any collusion. Why does not the committee give it a trial? After all, if a man or a woman is found guilty of an offence which justifies them in not living together, why should he or she be allowed to marry another and bring into existence a new family, and perhaps make it as bad as the first one? It was only the other day, I think in a New York divorce court, that one of the judges threw up his appointment in disgust. The cases brought before him were so trivial, and the reasons given for asking for a divorce so infamous, that he would preside no longer. One case cited was this: Mrs. Brown came before the court and complained about Mr. Brown's conduct. Mr. Brown was summoned before Judge So-and-So, and the wife was there. Each of the parties had a lawyer. When the wife was questioned about what grievance she had against her husband, she did not answer. So the judge pressed the question, and what followed was something like this: "Are you not treated properly?" "Yes." "Don't you get all the care and food and dresses you require?" "Yes." "Does not your husband allow you so much money every month?" "Yes." "For God's sake, what do you require a divorce for?" And do you know what the answer was? "Kind of lost my taste for him."

Such are the reasons given in the divorce courts of the neighbouring country. Are we going to catch the contagion? Make it a rule that a person found guilty before the Divorce Committee shall not be allowed to marry again, and try that for a few years, and see the effect.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Can the honourable gentleman tell us if the lady he referred to got the divorce?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: Honourable gentlemen, the reason that I asked for the adjournment of this debate was because I saw in the Bill these words:

> The law of England as to the dissolution of marriage and as to the annulment of marriage.

I do not know what that law is, and I do not suppose that there are ten honourable gentlemen in this House who do know. This Bill refers to Prince Edward Island and to Ontario. My honourable friend from Hamilton says that he does not believe in divorce, and I am glad of it: he is a happy man. I can tell you of a case in Prince Edward Island, where the people have not got too much money, of a returned soldier who came to me and wanted to know how he could get a divorce. He returned from the front after spending three years there, and fighting hard and well. He was married to a good woman. He wired from Halifax that he was coming home. He arrived home that night, and she took the train the next morning and went away. That poor chap has not got a chance in the world of getting a divorce. He has to bring a lawyer at twenty-five dollars a day and witnesses to Ottawa, whereas, if there were a divorce court near, all that he would have to do would be to apply for a divorce and prove his case. It is an utter impossibility for a man who has not got the dollars to come up here and prove his case. There are arguments that might be used both ways, and that is the reason I moved the adjournment of the debate until we might look into this question and see what the result ofthis Bill would be.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Honourable gentlemen, I think we might all very fairly congratulate the honourable gentleman (Hon. W. B. Ross) who moved the second reading of this Bill on the clear exposition which he gave of the whole matter, and his reasons for bringing in the Bill. I take it that there is no other member of this body who is so well acquainted with the subject matter of divorce in this country, in its various provinces, as the honourable gentleman from Middleton.

I should not care to enter into a discussion as to the merits of divorce as a proceeding moral or immoral, because I take it that for all purposes a large majority of the people of this country, outside of the province of Quebec, have decided that they desire to have divorce under certain circumstances.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: When did they say so?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I do not believe it.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Of course, I am not responsible for the amount of evidence that is necessary to make any honourable gentleman believe a thing: that is a matter for himself entirely. I think we can take it for granted, by reason of the number of applications for divorce, not only here, but in the various provinces that have courts for that purpose, that that is so. Every province of this Dominion, with the exception of Ontario and Quebec, has now a divorce court of its own. As a matter of fact this Parliament is busy now with divorce cases from practically one province alone, and the number of applications from the province of Ontario has so increased that it becames a question as to the ability—

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I second the motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The honourable gentleman has no right to interrupt the speaker.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I seconded the motion for adjournment. It was not seconded before.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I have no doubt that the honourable gentleman, if he wants to speak on this matter again, will have an opportunity of doing so; but I might remind him that he has spoken a good many times already this afternoon, and he might allow other gentlemen to have their turn.

The number of cases that are coming in at this session is such as to tax the time at the disposal of any committee to attend to them, and I think every one must have noticed often in the press of Ontario, and particularly the Ottawa press, an expression of the desire to have this matter taken out of the hands of Parliament and placed, like all other civil and criminal cases, in the hands of properly constituted courts of justice. There is a great deal to be said for that. Courts are established and judges are paid for the purpose of administering justice, and they have all the necessary appurtenances to carry on such business as that.

There is another thing which to my mind is a serious objection to divorce being granted by Parliament, and that is that every now and then cases occur in which an unusual degree of interest is taken by different members of this or the other House, and there is much canvassing going on, with the result that occasionally justice is not carried out in the way which the merits of the case would lead one to expect. In cases of that kind it is, I think, a serious objection that these matters are left to a body composed, as Parliament is, of so many different members who are susceptible to influence. So I think it would be better to have this Bill become law, and to establish in Ontario a court which could deal with nearly all the cases which are coming before Parliament now. Let them dispose of their divorce cases without troubling Parliament. With regard to the province of Quebec and whatever cases may arise there, application may still be made to Parliament to deal with them. For these reasons I intend to vote in favour of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I do not know that I can add anything to what has already been said; but I desire to point out to this honourable House just one fact. The right of the province of Manitoba to grant divorces was not known in that province until quite recently. From the time that Manitoba entered into Confederation up to six months or a year ago it was generally assumed that Manitoba had no right to grant a divorce. Some enterprising lawyer looked into the question and came to the conclusion that the province had that right. A test case was sent to the Privy Council and it was decided that Manitoba always had the right to grant divorce. So far so good. But I want to point out this: that if that lawyer had been wrong, and if Manitoba and Saskatchewan had no divorce courts today, the Senate, instead of struggling with 100 divorce cases, would be more likely to have 500. We know that these numerous applications for divorce are a direct result of the war. The vast majority of cases that have been brought before the Manitoba court and before the Committee of the Senate have been directly traceable to the war. Would my honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) want all the divorce cases brought from Manitoba and tried here in the Senate?

Prior to last year innumerable cases in which people were anxious to obtain divorce were tried on the other side of the line. Men or women went to Dakota or Montana or Nevada, stayed there three or four months, obtained a divorce, remarried there, and then came back to Canada to live. In that way there was raised the question whether any issue of the second marriage would be legitimate or not.

Speaking of divorce generally, we must all acknowledge that no matter how deplorable it may be, it has existed from time immemorial. I have never known of a time in the history of the world when the question of divorce was not before the people. Even in the faith to which the honourable gentleman from Hamilton belongs, we know that persons professing that faith, when they were not allowed a divorce, made appeals to the Pontiff himself and divorces were given.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Never.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Never in the history of the world.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I do not know if my recollection is right. We will go back to the time of the early church. Were there not reasons why the Pontiff himself cancelled marriages?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No, no.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I may be wrong, and if I am I am glad to be corrected. It does not make a bit of difference as to the general result. It is of course an unfortunate thing that these things happen, but we must deal with them as existing facts. I must take exception to one statement made by the honourable gentleman from Middleton. I think he was wrong. I believe it costs a great deal more for a person to come to the Senate from Manitoba or Saskatchewan in order to obtain a divorce.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Oh, yes. I was not referring to the Western Provinces.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I know that in Manitoba the average cost of a divorce in an undefended case would not exceed $200, and I am sure that no man could employ counsel and bring witnesses here for any such sum as that. I have listened to the hearing of one or two cases and I know that the fees run pretty high. I think the man is fortunate who escapes without having to pay $2,000.

Some Hon. SENATORS: No, no.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Or $1,000 at the least; and if it is a contested case the cost might go as high as $10,000. But I am sure $1,000 will not pay the cost of a Manitoba divorce which has to be tried in the Senate.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: When I made that statement I was referring to the existing laws, having in mind that the Western Provinces have their courts.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Honourable gentlemen, I sympathize with the honourable members of this House who represent communities that are so exceedingly immoral that they feel the absolute necessity of bringing closer to their domiciles courts for the purpose of severing matrimonial alliances. Those honourable gentlemen have my deep sympathy. Fortunately, I come from the province of Quebec; I represent the minority of that province; and if you look over the records of the divorces granted by the Senate, you will readily understand why I am not in favour of divorce, for that community has made fewer applications for divorce, in proportion to its population, than has any other community in the Dominion of Canada. The minority in Quebec is a Protestant community. The Eastern Townships, which I have the honour of representing, are situated close to the international boundary line. They, as you know, border upon Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, etc., and the light and immoral manner in which the matrimonial bond is viewed on the American side of the line has certainly made a very profound impression on our people of the Eastern Townships. We regard the matrimonial alliance as a very solemn and complete contract. I will admit that some of us are asked now and again to offer advice to a neighbour or to help compose little differences of opinion between husband and wife. In most cases we have found that the trouble is not of a very aggravated character. Quebec is being excepted in this Bill, and I do not want it to go out that the reason for excepting it is entirely because of the views of the French Canadian, Roman Catholic community of that province. As a representative of the Protestant community of Quebec, I wish to join my voice with that of the representatives of the majority in Quebec, and I for one am ready to vote for the exemption of Quebec. Impressed and influenced by the people amongst whom I live, and being of this opinion, I cannot vote for this measure. Adjournment has been proposed by my honourable friend from Charlottetown (Hon. Mr. Prowse). I sympathize with that, because I could not understand any of the arguments presented by my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross). My view is, as I have stated, controlled entirely by the people amongst whom I live and for whom I believe I speak. We are opposed as a whole to divorce, and to the facilitating of divorce, and we are in favour of allowing the cost of obtaining a divorce to be $1,000 or $2,000. In fact, honourable gentlemen, I would not care if the cost were $5,000, for I believe that the less we dissolve the solemn matrimonial alliance the better for the future of Canada and for the citizenship of this country.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, it might possibly be more discreet for me not to project my views into this discussion, but, having pronounced views on the question, I feel that, entirely irrespective of the element of discretion, I should not hesitate to express myself upon a matter which appeals so strongly to my common sense, however it may appeal to others. This is peculiarly a question as to which tribunal is the better able to try divorce cases—the high court in the province of Ontario or the tribunal of Parliament. It resolves itself into that simple question. We have always been accustomed without any hesitation to pronounce the highest eulogies that we could express upon the courts of the realm. We have been accustomed, and very properly so, to place the greatest confidence, not only in the honesty and the honour of the courts, but also in their ability to deal with complex questions of civil and criminal law. Reasoning along this line, would any honourable member of this Senate for one moment advocate that Parliament, in preference to the courts of the Dominion, should be the tribunal for the trial of cases of contract? Could any honourable gentleman be found who would urge that a parliamentary committee, made up of representatives of both Houses of Parliament and afterwards sanctioned by both Houses, should be the tribunal to decide questions of criminal law? Why, it is unthinkable that any one would advocate any such proposal.

That being the case, and our minds being absolutely clear as to which is the more competent authority to determine questions of that kind, let us for a moment consider what is the question to be tried. Not only in every province of Canada, but throughout the Anglo-Saxon world—the British Empire and the United States of America—wherever there is a system of jurisprudence in any way analogous to that under which we are living, marriage is regarded as a civil contract and not as a sacrament. Of course, honourable gentlemen are at liberty to regard it as a sacrament, but we are legislators and as members of this Parliament are entrusted with administering practically the civil law, and the criminal law so far as Parliament has authority to deal with either. Marriage in England, marriage in the United States, and marriage in Canada except in so far as it is associated in the province of Quebec with the idea of its being a sacrament, is regarded as a civil contract.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman is losing sight of the Church of England.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, that may be; but the views which may be held by the Church of England, or the views which may be held by the Roman Catholic Church, or the Presbyterian or the Methodist Church, do not necessarily constitute the views held by the State on this question and which from time to time are crystallized in our laws. We are here, not at all for the purpose of considering what may be the traditions, or the prejudices, or the sympathies of any particular church or religious body; we are here in the capacity of civil legislators; we are here to divest ourselves of our theological views and to do our duty as legislators.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Do we exclude morality as well as religion?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will deal with that in a moment. We are here to administer the laws of Canada as we find them, and we must not be prejudiced, or limited in our action by any political or religious prejudice or sympathy. Honourable gentlemen can well appreciate the position in which Parliament would be placed if we adhered to any other doctrine. If we adopted the attitude taken by honourable gentlemen who have an antipathy, or religious antagonism, or prejudice, against divorce, and if we adopted a similar attitude with regard to the other duties which fall upon the shoulders of members of Parliament, what would be the outcome? Why, Parliament would be such a medley of confusion as would result in the State being futile to legislate on any subject.

My honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) asked me a question as to morality. I must say—and I say it with an earnest desire to avoid giving offence to any of my honourable friends—that in this discussion it did seem grotesque that some honourable members, while taking the position that divorce is unchristian, should at the same time advocate that we make use of the machinery which we have in the Senate for the granting of divorce, and thus preclude the courts from dealing with it.

If my honourable friend believes that divorce is so unholy, so unchristian, that he cannot for a moment give recognition to the principle which is recognized by all states in regard to divorce, why should he say for the moment that we should preserve the machinery that we have in Senate for granting divorce? It is so inconsistent, so illogical, that I am surprised that my honourable friend, who occupies so high a position at the Bar, should take such a stand.

Furthermore, while I entertain the very highest regard for my honourable friends, I am surprised at the calm and superior assumption they take that they are the only Christians in this Senate. My honourable friends would almost lead us to believe that we are outside the pale of all Christian and moral principles because we are in sympathy with this Bill.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Pardon me. I said nothing to put you in a position to make that statement.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am simply stating the inference that may be drawn. I think honourable gentlemen of this House should give every recognition to the fact that they are here to administer the law of the State as they find it, entirely irrespective of any church or religious creed to which they belong. That is the position which I take, and I say it feeling fully assured that my honourable friends will not take offence at the position which I take.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I believe in administering the law; but it is creating the law that I objeet to.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The law has been created. Every state in the Empire recognizes divorce, and we are here to administer the law as we find it; and consequently this question must reduce itself to the narrow question of what is a proper tribunal to administer this law. If honourable gentlemen deny that such a law exists, they are on logical grounds.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Is it not a fact that there is no law of divorce in this country? When divorces are granted it is an exercise of the authority of Parliament itself. A law is passed, but there is no law of divorce.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Under the British North America Act authority is given to the Parliament of Canada to grant divorces, and since Confederation we have been exercising that authority, and consequently have been granting divorces. If that were not the fact, I could understand the consistency of my honourable friend in saying that divorce is unchristian, that it is immoral; but, being the law of the land, it resolves itself into a question of how we may best administer the law.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Will the honourable gentleman say that there is authority for the statement that there is any law of the land regarding divorce?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Certainly there is.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I should like to know it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All I can say in that regard is that the British North America Act clearly gives the Parliament of Canada the right to legislate in divorce, and that the Parliament of Canada has been legislating from Confederation down to the present time, and will continue to do it, either by giving jurisdiction to the courts or by exercising that jurisdiction in Parliament.

Now, honourable gentlemen, permit me to direct your attention to another consideration. I fancy every honourable gentleman here is an adherent of one of the great religious bodies of this Dominion. I fancy that no honourable gentleman here has a right to say that he is more religious than his neighbour. I believe that we are all equally interested in maintaining the great principles of Christianity and the great principles of morality; and we are here for the purpose of crystallizing those great principles in the legislation for which we are responsible. But let me say this, that we have long passed the stage in our civilization when religious prejudice will triumph over civil rights and civil law. In the interest of the great religious bodies to which we belong, in the interest of the great edifice of Christianity which we have been engaged in building up to the magnificent proportions which it has attained, we must realize that at its base lies the principle of liberty of thought and action. It is of no use to project religious prejudice into these great questions which have been threshed out long ago, which have been established as belonging to civil freedom, and which must necessarily advance as time progresses.

There is another consideration, and it is more immediate, probably, than any other to which I have directed attention: is this Senate, which is a co-ordinate branch of Parliament, to occupy the greater part of its time in dealing with questions which in other countries are dealt with by the courts? During the present session, applications for divorce closely approximate 200 in number. Members of this Chamber have been sitting from morning till night dealing with the question of divorce, and they are overwhelmed with the work which is involved. It was never contemplated for a moment, when the British North America Act was drafted, and this authority was given to Parliament, that the time of Parliament should be occupied in dealing with cases which, to any ordinary mind, must present themselves as being capable of being dealt with more advantageously by the courts.

We all pride ourselves on the dignity of the Senate. It is entitled to this position in the parliamentary life of the Dominion, and it should not be charged with dealing with this class of civil business. By reason of the Senate being charged with the administration of divorce it has to meet a measure of ridicule in the public press, and otherwise, which is not in harmony with the dignity which we desire to maintain. Honourable gentlemen can scarcely take up a newspaper without finding remarks, made by those in high authority, in reference to the Senate which are inconsistent with the position which we should insist upon maintaining.

Furthermore, instead of the best minds in the Senate sitting day after day, week after week, dealing with this class of business, which should be disposed of by the courts, the members of the Senate should be engaged in larger and more important questions of public duty. If honourable gentlemen of this Senate have a conception that this class of business should be disposed of by the Senate, and not by the courts, then they hold an entirely different conception of the duties of the Senate to that which I entertain.

Honourable gentlemen, may I further direct your attention to the fact that in Great Britain, which is the fountain of our jurisprudence, and I might say of most of our legislative ideas and principles, we find a broader outlook obtaining upon this question than has ever been entertained at any previous time. We in Canada must keep pace with progressive thought in regard to the best way of dealing with this subject.

Since rising I have not said a word in advocacy of divorce. I am not discussing that question at all. It is a condition, not a theory, that is facing us. We are not here for the purpose of dealing in theological refinements and discussing the question as to whether in the public interest divorce should be granted. We have arrived at a point in our civilization when this question is regarded as one of the great problems of the age, and it must be dealt with. You cannot block the wheels of progressive thought in regard to this subject. You must deal with it. Let us cast to the winds any religious prejudice or any theological refinements which we may entertain upon this subject, and deal with it purely as a question that is facing us every hour of the day while we are meeting in Parliament. Let us discuss, as men possessed of common sense, the best way of dealing with the question, whether by Parliament or by the courts.

As to the anticipated abuse which may arise from this question being delegated to the courts, let me point out that honourable gentlemen who have intimated that it would result in a greater number of divorces being granted cast a reflection upon the courts. In the first place, the cause of divorce is limited to that of adultery. Will not the higher courts safeguard the morality, and, if you like, the Christian principles which may be jeopardized in the exercise of this authority or duty which we seek to place upon them? They are in a very much better postion to hear the evidence, to weigh the evidence, and to come to a proper conclusion than a committee of Parliament. It is unnecessary for me to labour that question, because I feel satisfied that there is not an honourable gentleman sitting within reach of my voice who will not at once concede that the most satisfactory machinery that can be applied to the solution of this problem is to be found in the courts of Canada.

I have to apologize for thrusting these views upon you, honourable gentlemen, in the way in which I have. But I have a very strong feeling on the subject, that this is a commonsense matter and should be dealt with in a commonsense way, and that the only way to do it is to relegate it to the courts.

Hon. JAMES J. DONNELLY: Honourable gentlemen, after the remarks of the leader of the Government, I feel it my duty to say a word or two on this question. I wish to say first that I feel it my duty in the public interest as a representative of Ontario to oppose this Bill. The honourable gentleman referred to such matters as religious prejudice. I do not know that he meant it in that way. The result of this Bill will be to establish a divorce court in the province of Ontario. We have heard a number of speeches in support of the Bill, but so far we have not heard a gentleman from Ontario supporting the Bill. It is surprising that other gentlemen should be so over anxious about the welfare of the people of Ontario. My view is that as soon as you have a divorce court in Ontario you add a certain amount of respectability to a divorce, and thereby strike at the family, which is the foundation of all society.

For many years, I have understood that we had no divorce law in Quebec or Ontario. True, people have made a practice of coming to Parliament, and have had special Acts of Parliament passed whereby marriages were dissolved. Parliament has practically supreme power, if it is so disposed, to pass an Act in regard to any contract. Although the practice has grown up of the Senate doing this work, it is under no obligation to do so. A divorce Bill might as well be introduced in the Commons as in the Senate.

I oppose this Bill on the ground that we are not administering the law, but enacting the law. You may say that if we do not pass this Bill we will impose great hardship upon some people. But I do not think you can follow that line of argument We have the prohibition measure, which certainly limits what many people think is a personal right. There has got to be some suffering, some hardship, perhaps, but it is for the public good.

I do not wish it to be understood that the opposition to divorce law comes entirely from one religious denomination. I have a very clear recollection of reading about twelve months ago, an article written by the Rev. Byron Stauffer, who was for many years a prominent Protestant minister in Toronto. After leaving Toronto he went to the United States and lived there for two years. Many honourable gentlemen will remember, no doubt, reading the same article which strongly advised the people of Canada against any action simplifying the means of gaining a divorce, and pointed out the evils that would accrue therefrom. That gentleman, I think, is now stationed in Winnipeg.

I intend to oppose the Bill because I think it is not in the public interest.

Before the question was put:

Hon. THOMAS CHAPAIS: I would like to know on what motion we are going to vote. Is it on the adjournment of the debate?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The question is on the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY.

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: I am very sorry. With the permission of the House I was going to speak on that motion. I would have liked very much to speak on the second reading of the Bill. Being a new member of the House, I did not understand the situation and did not know that we were going to vote on the second reading.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Too late now.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Chapais) understood that the discussion was still on the motion to adjourn the debate. If the honourable member desires to speak, he should be allowed to do so. He may speak with the consent of the House, which I think the House should give.

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: I know that I am not in order. As I understand, the moment the question is put I have no right to speak, and I bow to the ruling of the Chair; but I shall have to speak on the third ruling of the Bill.

The motion for the second reading of the Bill was agreed to on the following division:

5. 21—In six cases board procedure was rendered unnecessary, direct negotiations between the disputants having resulted in a settlement.

6. None.

7. None.

8. None. This question is interpreted to mean strikes occurring after the award of the board.

THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

THE SELECTION OF LIBRARIANS.

Hon. PASCAL POIRIER inquired:

If it is true that both the general and the parliamentary librarians are about to be retired on their superannuation. And, if such be the case, that he will call the attention of the Senate and of the Government to the necessity of having well trained and competent librarians appointed in their place.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say to my honourable friend that in his absence a few days ago I brought down an answer to that question. I cannot put my hand on it at the moment, but my recollection is that the answer was that the librarians would be entitled to retire on superannuation, but had not yet done so. That is to say, they are still in office, but they would be entitled to some superannuation upon their making application. I may say further to my honourable friend that I think it is their intention to do so.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: In that case, honourable gentlemen, I should like to be allowed to say just a few words. There is nothing personal in the question put. It is entirely an objective one. I understand that the two parliamentary librarians have completed long years of service, and that, whether they have asked to be retired or not, they are to be retired.

This question concerns the qualifications of the future librarians. We are about to move into our new library. I will not say that the arrangement, as least to my fancy, is an ideal one, but I suppose it is the best to be had under the existing condition of affairs. The removing of the library means a new classification. The books will have to be classified as they are classified in European libraries, or in the libraries of the United States. That work of classification is in itself a science. It is most important that the classification should be well made at the start. That carries with it the necessity of appointing librarians who are acquainted with that sort of work, and who will do it properly. The public librarian who is up to his business should also know how to handle his staff; that is to say, he should have certain men appointed for certain work. For example, this being a parliamentary library, it is often resorted to by us for information. There should be some specialization; there should be employees whose duty would be more particularly, for example, to attend to law questions, others to history, and so on. That again is a performance that requires a previous training at the hands of the librarian.

Now, have we such a man in the Dominion? I believe we have not. Therefore the Government will be called upon to appoint gentlemen without adequate previous training. What is the Government to do? I have no candidate of my own for the position, and care very little who is appointed, provided he is competent. Very likely the Government will put in some old faithful servant who will get his reward in that way. I am not concerned with that, but I am concerned with his competency. As we have no competent man in that line. I would suggest to the Government that the two librarians who are going to be appointed should be given at least six months' travelling expenses. Let them be sent to the United States, where the system of running a library has reached a fair degree of perfection. Let them go to Washington, to Boston, to New York, to Chicago, and get from the librarians in those cities all available information. Then let them cross over to the old country. Let them go to England, to France, and to Italy, to pursue for six or nine months the study of what is required in a library. Then they will come home, I will not say fully equipped, but as well equipped as this or any Government could equip them under the circumstances. The position of librarian has became so important in the United States that no person can be appointed as librarian to a public institution unless he has served two years of apprenticeship or has been at least two years in a library learning his trade. In Belgium they have, I think, a school for that purpose, and in Germany I know they have. In England and France competence is required in public librarians. What I ask, and earnestly ask, of the Government is that they do not appoint a green man, no matter how intelligent or how well informed he may otherwise be, for the removal of our library to its new quarters, possibly its eternal quarters. We hope this building will be like the poet's metal—that it will be eternal—"aere perennius." We want the foundation work to be done in such a way that it will not have to be done again. That is true economy. There is no economy in having a library in which there are no employees who have specialized for such work. I hope and pray earnestly that some preparation will given to the librarians who are to be appointed in the place of Mr. DeCelles and Mr. Griffin.

Let me add just one word. I heard a rumour, in which I place no credence, and I hope there is nothing in it. It is necessary, in my view, that there should be an English and a French librarian, for the sake of economy. The library is granted, I believe, $10,000 a year for the purchase of books, and if we enlarge our library we may have to grant more money. It is essential that the purchasers of books, either English or French, or both, should know what books to select. If they do not, there is a squandering of public money. Now, I submit that a Frenchman cannot do justice to English literature, history, and science, nor can an Englishman do justice to French literature, history, and science. An English librarian will have plenty to do in keeping in touch with literature published in all countries of the world —not only in English and French, but in all other languages; if not in the original text, at least in a translation. There is much work for an English librarian in connection with English literature, and he cannot adequately attend also to French literature. Therefore I earnestly hope not only for the competence of the librarians to be appointed, but also for the continuance of the custom which was instituted by Sir John A. Macdonald. I hope there will be an English librarian and a French librarian. The two librarians have worked in perfect harmony. There is no reason for us to suppose that two intellectual men, dealing with books, should not agree; and, agreeing, they should help one another. Therefore I confidently hope that the two librarians that are to be appointed will be given at least six months' leave of absence in order to study their art as much as possible in that time, and that there will be an English and a French librarian appointed.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, it is for the authorities and the present librarians to decide when the latter shall withdraw; but when that time comes I feel that the Government cannot be too particular in the selection of the two librarians to replace the present officials, who have been eminently qualified for their work. I have followed the writing of Mr. Griffin and Mr. DeCelles for a number of years. I have enjoyed the weekly comments of Mr. Griffin in the Gazette on literature, contemporary and past, and I know how highly qualified he has been as an English litterateur. I can say as much for Mr. DeCelles. My honourable friend from Acadie (Hon. Mr. Poirier) states that we shall not be able to find in Canada men who are fully qualified for the position; that, inasmuch as we shall have to select gentlemen who have no special qualifications as librarians, they should be given a few months to enable them to travel in the United States and in Europe to prepare themselves for the position. I doubt very much that the suggestion of my honourable friend would be satisfactory and effective. I do not know whether these appointments are supervised by the Civil Service Commission or not. I believe they are not, and that the librarians are appointed directly by Order in Council. Now, if there is any appointment that should stand the test of an examination, it is that of librarian of the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: Who will examine them?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would suggest to the Government to leave to the Civil Service Commission the appointment of a committee of the best men who can be found in Canada to examine into the qualifications of applicants for the position of librarian. The Civil Service Commission can surely find men who, while not themselves perhaps fully qualified to fill the positions, could yet examine the applications and decide upon what matters, and they are numerous, the candidates should be tested. I am convinced that unless that is done we shall have librarians appointed who possess no previous knowledge of what is required of a librarian. When one recognizes all the different branches that are comprised in a library one realizes at once how necessary it is that the librarian should be proficient in many subjects and should be possessed of general information on the subjects on which it will be his duty to gather literature in the development of the library. I cannot too strongly impress upon the Government the importance of having the Civil Service Commission appoint a proper committee to examine into the qualifications of the aspirants to this position.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Do I understand the honourable member to say that the candidates should be obliged to pass an examination, or that they will be examined? I think that the examiners would be less qualified than themselves.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My answer to the honourable gentleman from Mille Iles is that men can be chosen from outside Canada to act as members of the committee. Such a committee should be able to select persons possessing the requisite knowledge for the position.

Hon. L. G. POWER: I think it is very appropriate that the honourable gentleman from Acadie (Hon. Mr. Poirier) should have brought up this question. The honourable gentleman, as we all know, is himself a distinguished literary man, and he is naturally interested in what we may call the only literary branch of the Government. I regret to say, however, that I cannot see eye to eye with the honourable gentleman, for two or three reasons. In the first place, I would call attention to the fact that there are at present two deputy heads in the library. Their names have been mentioned by the honourable gentlemen who spoke before me. These two gentlemen at the time of their appointment were men who had special claims on the Government of the day. One of them had been acting as the editor of a very prominent and influential paper for several years, and his health had failed. He had really either to give up the editing or drop out, and the leaders of the Government of that day—I assume Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper—decided that Mr. Griffin should be a librarian. This was when the position became vacant by the death of the late Dr. Todd. We know, honourable gentlemen, some of the things that politics bring about; and it happened about the time when this appointment was to be made that there was what is nowadays called a strike amongst the members from the province of Quebec, and that the gentleman who was then Secretary of State insisted on the appointment of a person who was to represent the province of Quebec, and Mr. De Celles was appointed. I think it would be very difficult to find two gentlemen who had stronger claims, both on account of their ability and their literary achievements, than Mr. Griffin and Mr. DeCelles.

But how is it now? So far as I am aware, there are no gentlemen occupying anything like the relative positions that Mr. Griffin and Mr. DeCelles occupied, and the question is, what action are we to take when these two gentlemen retire? Honourable gentlemen, my humble opinion is that there is not the slightest occasion for appointing a deputy head in the library at all, certainly not two deputy heads. The whole staff of the library, including the two deputy heads, numbers only 18, and the salaries amount to something over $37,000 a year. The two deputy heads draw $12,000 a year. If you strike off the salaries of the two deputy heads, you find that a saving will be effected much larger and in a much more satisfactory way than the saving which it is supposed would be effected by the consolidation of our law department with that of the House of Commons. My contention is this, that if we are to look for efficiency, the gentlemen who are in the library at present, in a subordinate capacity, are quite suitable. There is one English gentleman who has spent a lifetime there. There is a French gentleman who has been there nearly as long. Any outsiders that you can get will not even after six months' travelling, be as well suited for the position as the two chief clerks. I myself do not see any reason why the country should not save this $12,000 a year and appoint no successors to the present librarians as deputy heads.

The honourable gentleman from Acadie (Hon. Mr. Poirier) spoke of the classification as being important. Well, classification is important; but surely the men who have spent their lives among the books in the library and have naturally considered possible improvements would be better qualified than any gentleman who could be picked up outside. I have heard the names of two gentlemen mentioned as probable appointees, and I am safe in saying that neither of them has any special qualification for the position of librarian, and we would simply be spending $12,000 a year unnecessarily if we appointed outsiders as librarians.

The library is an important branch of our staff, but it is not as important as some honourable gentlemen seem to think. I find that in England the librarian of the House of Lords is paid £1,000 a year, and he really counts as only one of the clerks on the staff of the House of Lords. The clerk of the House of Lords receives a salary of £2,500. The clerk assistant receives a salary of £1,500. Some of the inferior officers receive salaries of £1,000. In the House of Commons the librarian's salary is from £1,000 to £1,200; the clerk's salary is £2,000; the salary of the assistant clerk is £1,800; and the librarian comes in at from £1,000 to £1,200. So, in the country whose example we are supposed to be glad to follow, the librarians are treated not as under-secretaries or deputy heads, but as important clerks; and I am satisfied that the gentlemen who are now in the library, if continued as chief clerks, will do everything that can be done by an outsider, and will do it in a more effective and economical way than it can be done under the scheme indicated by the honourable gentleman from Acadie.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I appreciate the action of the honourable gentleman from Acadie (Hon. Mr. Poirier) in bringing this question forward, because I think the administration of the library is a very important matter in the interests of Parliament. As has already been stated, we have been very fortunate in having had competent librarians. I will not take up time in expatiating further on the work of these gentlemen. And, previous to their appointment, we had in the library a very capable librarian: I refer to the late Mr. Todd, who established a reputation for Canada in the work that he wrote on Constitutional Government. It is recognized as a standard work throughout the whole British Commonwealth. Only the other day I received a letter from a gentleman who pointed out that on several occasions representatives of other parts of the British Dominions, on their visits to this country, had made a special point of bearing testimony to the valuable work that Mr. Todd had done, not only for Canada but for the whole British Empire, in the book that he wrote some years ago, and which has been ever since, as I have said, the standard work in regard to constitutional government.

To draw the attention of the House to the necessity at the present time of having really competent men appointed to these positions, I shall read an extract from the report of the librarians which was laid before Parliament at the beginning of this session, and which will be found at page 11 of the Minutes of this House. It says:

"The librarians understand that some space for the use of the library will be spared in the new building.

"As the crowded state of the library has long been known, and has been reported on yearly for many years, it is hoped that the space to be supplied will be, at least temporarily, sufficient."

In 1919 they again referred to the subject as follows:—

"The librarians understand that some space for the use of the library will be spared in the new building. As the crowded state of the library has long been known, and has been reported on yearly for many years, it is hoped that the space to be supplied will be, at least temporarily, sufficient.

"No information has been received during the year, from any source, regarding any proposed plans for increase of space. But the librarians still entertain the hope that the plans for the new building will include more room for the convenience of members and for the storage and consultation of books."

Another paragraph says:

We desire to point out that any scheme which would dislocate the books from the indexes, catalogues and cards, would involve trouble and expense which the librarians do not care to contemplate, and which would, for some years, perhaps, prove a great annoyance to members.

I think that report will prove to honourable members that it is most necessary that the gentlemen appointed to these positions should be men who have had a considerable number of years training in the work of properly conducting a library, especially a parliamentary library, such as ours. For that reason I cannot altogether agree with the proposition of my honourable friend from Acadie (Hon. Mr. Poirier) that whoever is to be appointed be given six months in which to make himself acquainted with other libraries, because I think the work of the parliamentary librarian is of such a character that it requires a number of years of training before a man is competent to fill the position.

In regard to the remarks of my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), I think it would be more satisfactory if the Government took upon themselves the responsibility of appointing a small committee to select men for this purpose rather than delegating the selection to the Civil Service Commission. Personally I am not enamoured of the work done by the Civil Service Commission. I think the Government would be much more capable of selecting the best men for these positions, and we should have more chance of getting competent men to fill the positions if the Government proceeded in that manner.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I wish to voice my regret that advanced years have rendered necessary the early retirement of the two librarians of Parliament. They have certainly filled their positions with great satisfaction to those using the library.

I listened with attention to the speakers who have already spoken, and I was somewhat surprised, in view of the changed condition of affairs in this country, that they took it for granted that two men would be appointed to these positions. We have in this country many literary ladies, of very great ability, and it seems to me it was very ungallant on the part of the senators who have spoken to have entirely neglected the idea that ladies should be appointed to the positions, or at least to one of them. The women of the country now have the vote, and are on a basis of equality with the men along every line. I am surprised that the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), who comes of a chivalrous stock, omitted to recommend the appointment of some woman to this position. It would be invidious if I were to recommend any lady litterateur for the position, but the Government, if it seeks women for it, will have no difficulty in getting thoroughly equipped and well qualified women, who will not have to take six-months' trips, but who are now fitted, both by nature and education, to discharge the duties of this high office. I trust that when the time comes for making these appointments the Government will not forget the better part of creation, but will appoint at least one woman. How much more pleasant it would be for the aged senators, when they went to consult the authorities, to be waited upon and instructed by a beautiful woman, highly cultured and highly trained. I know the honourable gentleman from Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville) would be particularly attracted if such an appointment were made.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I am very much pleased to see this question of the Parliamentary Library in the past and in the present taken up and dealt with. But in the future we want more scientific books, and less of the lending library system. Only to-day I had to send for something that should be in every library. As to the indexing, one does not know how to turn up anything that one wants to get out of the library.

I think my honourable friend is right about the ladies. You know, he once referred to "wine, women, and graft," and he was not far wrong. He is far-seeing. His perspicacity is great. He sees to-day the ideal that the ladies of this country should have an opportunity of filling one of these positions. The ladies are coming to the front, in England and in other countries; and should not we in this country give the ladies a chance? We all agree on that. I remember, when I was in the House of Commons, when the sugar question came up, and certain statements were made. I asked where a certain gentleman got his authority. He said his authority was first-class. I insisted upon an answer to my question, and he finally said, "I got it from the cook." We are very much in that position now.

I think there should be a different system in the library. I hate to have to go in and see whether I can get a book or whether I cannot. Things seem to be out of joint a bit, and this matter should receive some consideration.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: Honourable gentlemen, I do not see the need at the present moment of appointing new librarians. We have two librarians, Mr. Griffin and Mr. DeCelles, both very able men. We cannot find men good enough to replace them. Later on, when they are not able to do their work, the Government may replace them. They have given satisfaction to everybody in this country—senators, members of the House of Commons, men from the universities—

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: Ladies.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: Ladies, too; and I hope the Government will let them keep their positions as long as they are able to do the work properly, as they have done for the last twenty-five or thirty years. These gentlemen were appointed by Sir John A. Macdonald's Government, I think, and have been able to give full particulars to all desiring information, and I trust the Government will allow them to remain a while longer.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Honourable gentlemen, in addition to the qualifications which the several members have represented should be possessed by the librarians, there is one which I am going to mention which they have not possessed in the past, or which they have not been allowed to exercise, and that is the qualification of being able to get back the books which are loaned from the library. I remember not very long ago attending a meeting of the Library Committee, at which it was said that thousands of volumes that had gone out of the library had never been returned. Information was given which went to show that in many places throughout Canada volumes belonging to the Government were to be found in second-hand shops. If I remember correctly, that statement was made by the librarian. I took occasion after that to visit the library at Washington, and also the library at Boston, where I found a system in force whereby a receipt was given by the members of the respective Houses for every volume which they had obtained in the library, and for which they had to pay if the volume was not returned within a certain time. Additional space within this building is being asked for for the books. If the information to which I have referred is correct, the space which is to be used for keeping books would not be large enough to hold the books taken out in the past and not returned. If I am not much mistaken, the value of such books ran into thousands of dollars. This is the time to make a change in this respect. Some system should be adopted to enforce the return of books, or to collect for them if they are not returned. I am sorry to say that at the particular meeting to which I refer there appeared to be only two or three gentlemen who were willing to follow the matter up in the way which I suggested, and the matter was dropped. To my mind the loss of books is a serious matter. For all I know the same thing may be going on yet. I hope that in connection with the change that is to be made in the staff a real system will be adopted by which the country will not suffer any further loss in this respect.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I trust the House will pardon me for a moment. I wish to make a point which I forgot to make when speaking a moment ago. The expenditure for the staff in the library is about $37,000 a year. The cost of the books purchased does not exceed $30,000 a year. It seems to me, honourable gentlemen, that to have a staff costing $37,000 a year, including two deputy heads, at $6,000 each, to look after the disbursement of $30,000 is altogether unreasonable.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Honourable gentlemen, it is a matter of regret to a great many people who use the library that the gentlemen now in charge are to go. For a librarian it is not everything to be well enough educated to choose books. Those who have researches to make know how absolutely necessary it is to have a librarian who can guide them promptly to the information they want. I feel extremely grateful to the two gentlemen in the library for the assistance which they have given to me time and again, which has enabled me in a very short time to get information which it would have taken me days and days to find if I had been unassisted. $37,000 a year may seem a large amount to pay for men who are going to collect $30,000 worth of books a year; but, gentlemen, if we have not at the head of the library men whose brains and education and talent are such as to make those books of real value to those who require to use them, this country will suffer a very much greater loss in a year than the $37,000, or the extra amount of money which may be required to keep as good a staff as we have to-day, or to make it even better than it is. I am sorry if a change has been decided on. I hope it will not be made immediately. I do not think there is any necessity for making it now, but if it is made, whatever may be the amount which is necessary to to obtain two librarians, one English and one French, qualified not only to select books, but to guide those who want to use them, I think that the money spent will not really be lost.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I am sure the House has listened with interest to the observations which have been made upon this subject. It is of interest to the Government, but probably of greater interest to the present librarians, to know that their services have been so extremely satisfactory, and that their names have been mentioned with commendation. The discussion this afternoon, however, illustrates the difficulty facing the Government in dealing with questions of this kind. I do not think that any two honourable gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject have agreed. The honourable gentleman from Acadie (Hon. Mr. Poirier) suggests that the new appointee should be put through a preliminary course of training—a course to which nobody can take serious exception. The honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), recognizing that two appointments will be made, would not, I am surprised to say, have sufficient confidence in the Government to make the appointments, but would suggest that they be made by some independent commission. Then, my honourable friend from Kamloops (Hon. Mr. Bostock) has no confidence at all in the Civil Service Commission, provided they are competent to make these appointments, but would employ, I fancy, a parliamentary committee. Then, the honourable and gallant gentleman from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler) would disappoint those who are looking forward with considerable expectation to the appointments being made, and would make his selection from some of the ladies of the Dominion. Some of the most competent librarians that we have in the Dominion belong to the gentler sex, and I have no doubt that the Government might make two very acceptable appointments from that section of the community. However, honourable gentlemen, this illustrates the difficulty that we have in dealing with a subject of this kind. In as much as the vacancies up to the present time have not been created, I may say with all assurance to honourable gentlemen, and particularly to those who have spoken, that every consideration will be given to the views expressed.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: There is one very simple way of getting out of the trouble: let well enough alone.

The discussion concluded.

ELECTRIFICATION OF GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

MOTION.

Hon. E. D. SMITH moved:

That, in the opinion of the Senate, it is expedient and in the interest of Canada for the Government to proceed to substitute electricity for steam as a motive power upon the lines of railway owned by the Government as soon as and wherever economically practicable.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, you will observe that this motion does not commit the Government to any immediate action, nor to any definite expenditure. The proposal is simply that when it is economically feasible the Government shall change some portions of the roads owned by them into electric roads. I will now proceed to give my reasons.

I enter upon the discussion of this subject, however, not as an expert in any way qualified to determine which is the more economical method of locomotion, electricity or steam, under given circumstances, but rather as a layman looking around and seeing things as they exist and drawing conclusions from them. I see, for instance, that for many years past our imports from the United States have been much larger than our exports. Until lately that did not matter so much; but now the financial conditions in the various countries of the world have put us in such a position that the Canadian dollar will buy only 90 cents worth of goods in the United States. This is attributed by financiers to the adverse balance of trade. It is therefore desirable, it seems to me, for us to study in order to change this situation wherever we can. We must buy less from the United States and sell more to them.

Upon our steam railways in Canada we use 10,000,000 tons of coal in a year, and that coal cost us last year about $3 a ton at the mines, or $2.37 a ton counting slack and all, or about $4 a ton at the border; and, as we have about 40,000 miles of railway, that means that we use 250 tons of coal upon an average mile of railway. The railways that I would suggest might possibly be electrified are those that have the heaviest traffic, and they would probably use much more coal than 250 tons a mile; but at 250 tons a mile, and $4 a ton at the border, $1,000 a mile is expended for coal in the United States by Ontario lines. We would save that, and the saving of it would help us to some extent, though perhaps not a very large extent, in our exchange situation, as I only suggest electrification of a small part of the whole. That is one argument in favour of the change.

There are many other good reasons. A good many economies could be brought about. For instance, an electric road does not require any firemen, any stokers. There is a big saving. There are no coal tenders. Over every mile of railway operated by steam the engine pulls around one car loaded with coal all the time. On electric cars that is saved. Then, a very large part of the service in the operation of railways is taken up in hauling coal from the United States to dumps where it is unloaded and at which it has to be lifted again into tenders. All of that expense is saved, and it is a huge amount. Then, the discomfort of coal is a great objection. Coal is a fuel that is dirty and that causes discomfort to passengers. In the summer time no one would travel upon a steam train if he could take an electric train at the same rate and going at the same speed, because on an electric train he can have the windows open and will have to suffer none of the discomfort that arises from the use of coal. Sa that there are many arguments in favour of electrification if it is economical. These are summarized perhaps better in an article dealing with the results acquired by the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul railway, 440 miles of which running across the Rocky Mountains are electrified. The beneficial results are stated as follows:

Marked reduction in cost of electricity as compared with cost of coal.

Reduction in maintenance cost of locomotives.

Elimination of delays due to coaling, taking water, oil, etc.

Elimination of delays due to natural causes, such as freezing of locomotives, loss of steam in cold weather, bucking snow drifts.

Elimination of non-revenue trains hauling coal and water for steam locomotives.

Increased tonnage per train.

Increased train speed on grades.

Greater reliability asd certainty of maintaining schedules.

Reduction in train crew hours per ton mile.

Reduction in damage to rolling stock due to rough handling by steam engines.

Greatly increased safety of operation on grades due to regenerative braking.

Saving in power and reduction in wheel and track wear by use of regenerative braking.

Improvement of tunnel conditions due to smoke and gas, absence of smoke and cinders which obscure scenic attractions, uniform speed and absence of grinding brake shoes on grades, all of which accrue to the benefit of the traveller on the transcontinental passenger trains.

Here is what is said in regard to operation:

Electrification promises a material reduction in running time. It has been found, for example—

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: What does that refer to? To freight trains or passenger trains, or both?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: To both.

It has been found, for example, that on the 21-mile two per cent grade from Piedmont to Donald the electric locomotive can reduce the running time of passenger trains from an hour and five minutes to approximately 40 minutes On the run from Deer Lodge to Butte which, under the steam locomotive schedule, required an hour and 20 minutes, a saving of approximately 30 minutes can be made.

In the freight service it has been found that on the first division, where the steam locomotives have required 10 to 12 hours to make 115 miles, electric locomotives can meet a schedule of from seven to eight hours for the same distance. The heavy grades and frequent curves at certain points offer serious obstacles to steam locomotive operation even in the summer time, but with winter temperatures as low as 40 deg. F. and heavy snowfalls in the Bitter Root Mountains, serious delays have occurred, owing to engine failures or to inability to make steam.

The capabilities of the electric locomotives are in no way impaired by cold weather or by inability to obtain fuel or water in case of snow blockades. During a series of record-breaking temperatures in December, 1915, Mallet engines were frozen up at different points on the system, and the new electric equipment was rapidly pressed into service to replace them. On several occasions electric locomotives hauled in disabled steam engines and trains which would otherwise have tied up the line.

These are some reasons. As to the economical aspect I cannot say, but I observe that during the past 20 years electricity has replaced steam as a power to a very great extent. People do not change from one system to another unless the change is profitable. In the provinces of Ontario and Quebec there have been developed in the last 20 years 1,475,000 horse-power of electric energy, which is used by our factories and in our cities in various ways. That development would not have taken place unless it was profitable. It seems to me that is a strong argument that, so far as stationary work is concerned, electricity is more profitable than steam.

It is worth while considering how much that has benefited our exchange. The production of that much electric power would have taken about $24,000,000 worth of coal from the United States, besides a very large quantity from Nova Scotia, at prices which prevailed last year. Twenty-four million dollars worth of coal from the United States would have increased the adverse balance of trade to that extent, and would have placed our exchange in a worse situation than it is. So we have accomplished a great deal through the energy and enterprise of Canadians in changing from steam to electricity, and I think there is great room for still further change.

So far as the electrification of railways is concerned, we have not very much to guide us, but I notice that in the last few years, wherever a new railway has been built, unless there has been some special reason to the contrary, it has been an electric railway. In Ontario we have a railway running from Port Dover to Galt, built within the last few years. It is an electric line, operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is not a suburban line. Then there is the London-Port Stanley road. It was a steam road, but has been converted into an electric line. Whereas the steam road was an absolute failure, involving a tremendous loss, the electric road is being operated at a profit, because in that case the capital cost has not been great. The road was bought for a very small sum. It seems to me it is worth while having a thorough investigation, at any rate, to see whether electrification is not more profitable.

But there is another reason which seems to me of far more importance: there is a reason why, in some portions of Ontario, at any rate, we should make the change, and I do not think there is any argument against it. As honourable gentlemen are aware, many municipalities in Ontario—57, I think—have voted in favour of the construction of the hydro-radial system of roads. The whole system so far contemplated is to cover 1,600 miles. These roads are to run parallel with, or to duplicate, existing railroads in almost every instance. There is no city or town or large village in Ontario that is not connected with the next city or town or village by a steam road, and it is impossible to build any railway system in Ontario without duplicating or paralleling existing steam roads. It seems likely that the 1,600 miles of road will be constructed, as the people who have voted for it are determined and are inquiring of the Government of Ontario, or of the Hydro-radial Commission, nearly every day, when the road will be commenced. The answer always is: "Just as soon as the Chippewa development scheme, which is to produce 400,000 horse-power, is completed, the hydro-radial road will be started." It seems to me it is worth while considering very seriously what effect this is going to have upon our government roads. We have taken over the Grand Trunk railway and the Canadian Northern railway—

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Unfortunately.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: Well, my honourable friend and I differ on that. I think it is fortunate that in Ontario we have such a system of roads as the Grand Trunk, supplemented to some extent by the Canadian Northern. If the lines are well managed, and if rates are provided that are equitable and adequate, corresponding to those which prevailed before the war, and to the cost of the service, this system of roads in Ontario together with the Canadian Northern system in the Prairie Provinces, will ultimately become profitable, or will at least reduce to a minimum the losses resulting from our unfortunate speculations in railway building. It ought to be our special aim, therefore, it seems to me, to make the lines in Ontario and the western part of Quebec as remunerative as possible, and to do all we can to prevent traffic being taken away from them.

We can readily see what will be the result if the proposed system of 1,600 miles of hydro-radial roads is built. It is said by the promoters that these hydro-radial roads will pay, and they adduce arguments to that effect; but I must say that those arguments are not very convincing to me. Looking over the situation in other countries, I cannot find anywhere in America any hydro-electric roads, capitalized as these will be, that are paying, and I do not believe that these roads will ever pay. I believe they will be an enormous loss which will be a frightful load for the municipalities to carry. However, they have voted in favour of them. They want to have roads of their own, regardless of the cost or of the loss, and they are going to have these roads and operate them by electric service, for they know how superior it is to steam. Now, it seems to me that if those roads are built, they cannot but cause an extremely heavy loss to the government-owned roads. If the hydro-radial roads are to pay, they must earn from $15,000 to $25,000 a mile, at the costs which prevailed before the war. What they would have to earn at present costs I do not know. Some of these roads are estimated by the engineers to cost $200,000 a mile. The one from Mimico to St. Catharines, running through the city of Hamilton, which is 60 miles in length and was voted upon a couple of years ago, was to cost $11,000,000.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Does that include the cost of the right of way?

An Hon. SENATOR: And equipment?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: Yes. One hundred and ninety thousand dollars a mile—that is an enormous cost. The Toronto-Bowmanville line, 40 miles, was lately voted upon. The engineers say that will cost $8,000,000, or $200,000 a mile.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not wish to interrupt the honourable gentleman, but would he kindly state what is the proportion between the cost of the right of way and the cost of construction?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: I do not know. The cost of the right of way would be heavy in these two cases.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes, it would probably be 50 per cent, would it not?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: It would be heavy, because one of the lines runs through the city of Hamilton, and the other runs into the city of Toronto. I do not suppose that the entire system of 1,600 miles would cost $200,000 a mile. Certain parts of the roads would cost at that rate, and we may assume that the remainder would cost perhaps $100,000 a mile.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But the roads will cost $200,000 a mile throughout.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: I have not seen that statement. Perhaps so. At any rate—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In both cases those roads would duplicate existing lines.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: Yes, they would absolutely duplicate and run alongside existing roads.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Triplicate.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: Take the 40 miles of line from Toronto to Bowmanville. There are already three steam roads running within pistol shot of where this road is to run. From Mimico to St. Catharines, a distance of 60 miles, there is an electric road, and the Grand Trunk runs within half a mile of it. All over the province of Ontario a similar condition exists. It is proposed to continue the line from Bowmanville down to Kingston and perhaps on down to Montreal, running right alongside the Grand Trunk and the C.P.R. in some cases and the Canadian National in others. From Toronto westward to Guelph there is an electric road owned by the Government, and the Grand Trunk runs from Toronto to Guelph; it is proposed to run a hydro-radial also from Toronto to Guelph. It is proposed to continue the electric line from there, parallel with the Grand Trunk, to Stratford and London. So it is all over the country. As I stated at the beginning, you cannot build an electric line in Ontario without paralleling at close quarters an existing steam road. Therefore I can come to no other conclusion than that if these roads are built they will suck the existing steam roads dry of all profit from local traffic. The local passenger traffic will nearly all go by electric road, if there is good service. No one would travel on a steam road in the summer time if he could travel on an electric road in the same comfort, at the same rate of speed, and at the same cost. These roads propose to carry passengers at about half the rates of the steam roads. Whether or not they can do it I do not say, but that is their proposal. If they have to have traffic of $25,000 a mile, that amount has to be extracted from the traffic of the existing roads. Put it at a less sum if you like. It will cost only about $2,000 a mile per year interest to electrify our steam roads, while, if these roads are built alongside the Grand Trunk railway, we would lose our proportion of $20,000 or $25,000 a mile.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would cost $30,000 or $40,000 a mile to electrify the roads.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: The cost of electrification of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul roads, including substations and everything, was $18,500 per track mile, or $27,250 per route mile. That was in 1916. The cost would of course be greater now.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Are these hydro-electric railways under the control of the Dominion Railway Board or under provincial jurisdiction?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: Provincial jurisdiction.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: So they can make passenger and freight rates independently of the Railway Commission.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: How would it be if they ran from one province to another?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: They do not. If they reached the outskirts of the province, they would have to come under the Dominion Railway Board, but at the present time they do not contemplate going that far. Let me repeat; to electrify these roads would cost about $2,000 per mile per annum in interest.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: You say the cost is $2,000 per mile. That is interest charges. What is the cost per mile?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: I just gave the capital cost of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul as $18,000 a mile in 1916. Suppose we double that figure and say $40,000 a mile; at 5 per cent that would amount to $2,000 a mile per annum. But the cost to us, if these hydro-radial roads are built alongside the steam roads, will be our proportion of the $25,000 of traffic which the electric roads expect to get, provided they get it. At any rate, whatever traffic they would get would be taken from our roads and that would amount to a great deal more than $2,000 a year per mile.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: If these roads were electrified, would that change the position?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: That is another point. My contention is that if the Government propose to electrify some section of the roads where electrification is most required, surely the Ontario Government, surely the Hydro-Radial Commission, surely the voters, would not be so foolish as to duplicate them. I do not think anybody would think of such a thing. What the people want is an electric service, and an electric service they are going to have. If they cannot have it one way they are going to have it another. We have to face a fact, not a theory, and the cheapest and best way to do so is to propose to electrify such portions of the Government roads as can be economically electrified. We do not have to electrify the whole system; maybe only 1,000 or 500 miles to start with. We cannot electrify the whole system now; we have not got the power. The earliest time that we could get the power would be when the Chippewa scheme is finished, which it is said will be in the fall of 1921, but which will more likely be in 1922. That is the earliest date at which the hydro-radials can get power.

I know it is almost out of the question for any one to suggest spending large sums on capital account at the present time. No one in this Chamber dreads more than I do a proposal for large expenditure at this time; but there are times in the affairs of business when, even though a man or a company may be in difficult circumstances, it is absolutely necessary to spend some more money to save the business. I consider that that is the position the Government is in with regard to railways. We must defend ourselves. I do not think the Government would dare to veto a Bill passed by the legislature of Ontario for the building of these roads. We cannot stop them in that way. We have to stop them by giving the people something that they want, and making them see that it is more economical to have one road which is paying than to have two which are not. The financial strain on the Dominion Government would not be severe. The 47 or 57 municipalities have pledged themselves to an expenditure of at least $200,000,000. If they can venture on an expenditure of that kind, this great Dominion can surely venture on an expenditure of $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 a year for a few years in order to save its property. I do not think that this is a question that we need run away from because of the expenditure. The expenditure is not immediate, and it does not necessarily mean a huge sum, and it seems to me that it is the only way in which we can prevent this duplication.

Hon. JAMES DOMVILLE: Honourable gentlemen, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks of my honourable friend from Winona (Hon. Mr. Smith), and I agree with him in what he has said as to progression and advancement. There can be no question that these railways should be run by electricity if we can get it; but what are you going to do a hundred or a thousand miles away on the Intercolonial? They will have to haul coal there, which the honourable gentleman objects to; if they do not, where are they going to get their electricity? They cannot carry water-power around in their pockets. The question arises, where are you going to get the electrical energy, and how far is it going to compete with coal, or take the place of coal?

In Germany they use oil on the locomotive. Energy cannot be used twice over. If you are going to use oil-generated electricity you do not want it. There are to-day interior combustion engines which burn fuel oil, and the power is produced directly from that. That course will have to be followed in some places, because, while in principle I agree with my honourable friend, I must ask where are you going to get the energy in localities where there is no water-power? We cannot afford to use electricity unless we can use it to advantage. You talk about the railways going behind now; if they were electrified in some parts they would go still further behind. Perhaps my honourable friend would supply us with a little more detail, say a comparative statement showing the cost of electricity, coal, and also the cost of the generation of electricity by the use of hydro-carbon oils. It is difficult to convince a hard-headed man by argument; you must give him a practical demonstration. Down in New Brunswick there is no more power in some of the streams than a woman could carry around, if you understand me; and we know, from scientific study and knowledge, that it will not pay to generate electricity in small bulk in the winter time. The upkeep of the water storage and watersheds makes the use of electricity impracticable unless you have great power such as they have in Ontario. My hon. friend's argument is thoroughly correct as regards the province of Ontario, in the vicinity of Niagara, and probably some of Quebec, down near Shawinigan Falls. But when you use electricity on one part of the government roads and not on another, then the argument of my honourable friend is somewhat destroyed. Coal is still coming in to run the railways, and there is still the same dirt and the same handling of coal to be considered.

I only raise this question, because, perhaps unfortunately, I am a practical man in some respects. I admire the desire of the honourable gentleman. I think his wish may be gratified in the great future, but we should see where we are going to get our energy before committing ourselves. I think if my honourable friend would ask for a small committee composed of, say, half a dozen men to talk over this question they could bring in a report which would show where we stand in regard to generating a supply of electrical energy.

Hon. JOHN MILNE: Honourable gentlemen, I should like to say a few words on this question. When the Hydro-Electric Commission was first formed, I happened to be one of the commissioners. The honourable gentleman from Winona (Hon. Mr. Smith) is perfectly right in what he has said about electrification being profitable. I can give a practical illustration. In our factory in Hamilton we were using soft coal for which we paid $7 a ton laid down in the city. It required three tons a day to run our big engine. After talking the matter over with my son we came to the conclusion that we must put in dynamos, and we rigged up our whole plant with electrical equipment, and, taking power from the Hydro, we made a saving of $1,000 a month. The only difficulty was that we could not always get the power when we wanted it; but now we can get it pretty regularly, because we are running only five hours a day. The trouble with the Hydro-Electric Power Commission was that they sold more power than they could produce. That is why they undertook the Chippewa scheme. We are using electricity for light, heat, and power to-day, and some day the railroads will be electrified in Ontario and Quebec, because there is plenty of water-power. I am interested in the Southern Canada Power Company, which is doing a good business down below Montreal. We can get coal from Nova Scotia, but the cost of bringing it to above Montreal is too great, and therefore we must take advantage of the energy we have in our great water-powers. In Ontario we have the greatest water-powers in America. When the Chippewa canal is completed we shall be able to get plenty of power because in Hamilton there are two electric lines, the Hydro and the Cataract Power Companies. At present the services of the Cataract Power Company is better than that of the Hydro, but when the Chippewa scheme is carried out it will not be. I apologize for taking so much of the time of the House. I agree with what the honourable gentleman from Winona has said, that sooner or later we musts top using coal from the United States. The coal that is down in the Maritime Provinces we cannot get, and the coal out in the West is not available, because the freight charges are too high.

Hon. GIDEON ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, just a word with reference to this important matter. The honourable gentleman from Wentworth (Hon. Mr. Smith) has mentioned the electrifying of the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul railway, running through the states of Montana, Idaho and parts of Washington, a distance of about 440 miles—an experiment which was carried out in the years 1915 and 1916 and has operated successfully, but not altogether economically. I had the opportunity of travelling over that road in 1917 on one of the electric engines for the whole distance of 440 miles, and got a good deal of first-hand information from the employees operating the trains. The saving in cost of operation was very substantial. The roundhouse, the terminal facilities, sidings, shops, staff connected therewith, etc., were all or practically all eliminated, having been rendered unnecessary, because the electric engines hauled trains over the whole distance of 440 miles and it was not necessary to change engines. But the initial cost of construction and the cost of maintenance of wires and power houses and staffs connected with the plant where the electricity was developed were very heavy indeed.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: May I ask my honourable friend where they get the energy from to develop that electricity?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It was all carried by wires from a main station—I forget the name of the point, which was, I think, 110 miles from the railway, and was redistributed through 24 sub-stations scattered along the 440 miles of line. The Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul railway were at that time contemplating the extension of the electric line right through to Seattle, a distance of 560 miles more. They, however, I am informed, abandoned the idea because of the greatly increased cost of material, particularly copper, which figures largely in the construction.

I think there is no doubt that on a mountain section of railway, such as that is, such as we have in British Columbia, where water-power is available within a reasonable distance, it probably is an economical arrangement to operate a railway by electric energy. But the time has not yet arrived, in my humble opinion at least, when our railways in the province of Ontario, for example, could be economically operated by electric power.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Has the honourable gentleman considered the eastern provinces and how it would apply there?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The point made by my honourable friend who introduced this question was that he believed it desirable, in the interest of the public as a whole, and of both Federal and provincial governments, that there should not be an unnecessary duplication of lines, splitting up traffic in such a way as to make it unprofitable; and in that contention he is perfectly right. But the reason I say that in my opinion the time has not arrived when our lines in Ontario can be economically operated by electric power is that there is up to the present time a greater demand for electric energy for industrial purposes than can possibly be supplied. If you divert electric energy for the purpose of running railways for which there is no traffic, you are curtailing and retarding industry, without doing any good to the railroads. When the Chippewa power development scheme is completed and the 400,000 odd horse power that is in contemplation is actually developed, so that our industries that are now crying for power and cannot get it will have all the power they need, and there will be power to spare, then will be the time to commence to electrify our railroads.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: That is exactly what my proposition was.

Hon. Mr. ROBERSTON: I have no faith in the expectation of the development of a system of electrical lines competing with our present railway lines, and for this reason: that before the time arrives when those electrical lines can be built, the highways will have been so improved that the railroads will have been replaced by the motor truck for the carriage of freight, and by the automobile for the transportation of passengers. You will have a jitney service all through southern Ontario, on the main highways, and there will not be need for more railroads than we have at present. Therefore I think it is not advisable at the moment for us to attempt to make any capital expenditure in changing over from steam to electric operation of our railways, even in the territory where energy is available, for all the available energy is at present needed for industrial purposes, and will be for some time to come.

So far as the honourable member (Hon. Mr. Smith) desires to avoid the duplication of railway lines, which makes operation unprofitable, I am entirely in accord with his views, and heartily commend his suggestion to your consideration; but I wanted to point out particularly that, with the improvement of highways, the motor truck will, I think, revolutionize transportation for local purposes.

Hon. W. H. BENNETT: The point which, as I understand, the honourable gentleman from Wentworth (Hon. Mr. Smith) was emphasizing was this: that, in view of the engagements which are about to be entered into by certain municipalities in the province of Ontario, it is desirable that, in any cases where such undertakings would involve the duplicating or triplicating of existing roads, the Government of Canada manifest its intention to substitute electricity for steam. For the benefit of honourable gentlemen who do not come from the province of Ontario and may not be conversant with the conditions existing in this province in respect to the so-called hydro-electric roads, I would like to make a few remarks.

In the first place, these undertakings are not initiated by the province at all; they are initiated by municipalities, which issue debentures or bonds upon which the roads may be built, and which in turn ask the province to guarantee the bonds. Without the provincial guarantee the bonds could not be profitably sold. Fortunately for the province of Ontario, the present provincial government has taken a determined stand with regard to the manner of dealing with these hydro-electric railways—a more determined stand than was taken by the political parties in the last House. Let honourable gentlemen look at the map or consider the province of Ontario. Let us take the case referred to by the honourable member from Wentworth (Hon. Mr. Smith)—that of the railroads running along the north shore of Lake Ontario. There are places where the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk run parallel within a stone's throw of each other. Yet, voluntarily, the municipalities have pledged their credit to establish, in opposition to those three existing systems, a line of electric railway. On the face of it, it is madness. Nevertheless it is being done.

I am not positive, but I have always understood that under certain Acts of the Legislature it is guaranteed that in the event of losses on the hydro-electric railways the province will pay a portion of the losses. I have not read the Acts and will not state that for a fact. I have asked members of the legislature about it, and have had answers both pro and con. It is rather alluring to the municipalities to be assured that in the event of loss they will not have to bear it all. Then, another inducement is held up, particularly in the case of the line which runs from Hamilton to Toronto, and that is that the assessment would be on the large property owners in Hamilton and the municipalities through which the line passed, and there would be an enormous capital expenditure of millions of dollars. The proposition was defeated in the city of Hamilton on the first vote, but on the second occasion it was carried, although not by a very great majority.

The London and Port Stanley road was originally a steam railway. It did not succeed in making money as it has been operated. Consequently it passed into the hands of the city of London, I understand, and is now owned by that city.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: That is right.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There had been a big development in the traffic of that railway owing to a large quantity of coal being imported from the United States to Port Stanley. That importation created an abnormal increase of traffic over what had obtained when the road was being operated by steam. Moreover, owing to the favourable price at which it was purchased, the line was able to make a very creditable showing. Another factor that entered into the increased profit of the road was the development of Port Stanley as a summer resort, which greatly increased the traffic. These and other factors, together with the general development of the country and particularly the city of London, increased the revenue.

There is the Metropolitan railway running out of Toronto northward to Newmarket and diverging to Lake Simcoe. Any honourable gentleman who is conversant with the conditions knows that were it not for the enormous summer traffic that is carried to the shores of Lake Simcoe, which has become a great watering place, so to speak, for the city of Toronto, that road would never have had the prosperity it now enjoys. I doubt very much whether in the winter months it pays at all, but in the summer time it certainly must make a great deal of money.

Now we come to the other road referred to, the one running parallel with the Grand Trunk from Guelph to the city of Toronto. Wonderful to relate, the Hydro people contemplate building another line alongside of it. I have passed up and down on that line of railway. I have seen an occasional car on it. It was formerly owned by the Canadian Northern, and has now been acquired by the Government. From all I have ever been able to learn, the operation of that road seems to have been regarded as more or less of a joke, and it was maintained by Mackenzie and Mann only for the purpose of enabling them to retain their rights to certain bonuses or some arrangement they had made with the municipalities.

Now the people of those municipalities in the province of Ontario to which I have referred—and there are others—purpose placing themselves voluntarily under certain obligations by building lines which will not only duplicate but actually triplicate other roads. What is going to become of the roads? Every person who has read articles on the use of motor trucks and vehicles of that sort, referred to by the honourable Minister of Labour, knows very well that in the province of Ontario a large trade has already been developed in this respect. The province is now spending, or contemplates spending, millions of dollars in the betterment of roads, and it is to be expected that a great deal of traffic will thus be diverted.

What has been the history of the so-called radial roads in the United States? I have no reference by me, but I have read from time to time of the enormous number of such roads that have been scrapped. Any honourable gentleman who goes to the State of California may see magnificent systems of electric railways, running hither and thither all over that state, more particularly in the district of Los Angeles and other centres where there is a large tourist as well as local traffic; and he will be surprised to find that the cars on those lines are practicaly empty, while automobiles and trucks are passing on every side. I remember, while out there two or three years ago, reading in one of the newspapers of the abnormal decreases in the receipts of those roads throughout the state of California.

The time has now arrived, I believe, when the Government should take up this matter with the province of Ontario, and if certain municipalities in the province propose to involve themselves in huge expenditures, there is always one course left, and it is this. If the province does not endorse the bonds, that will be the end of the matter. But if the province is induced to guarantee the bonds, they will be sold, because, so endorsed, they naturally go on the market as a good security. What will be the next thing? I have often heard men talk of the huge municipal indebtedness of Canada of years ago. And what was the result? The provincial legislatures and the Dominion Parliament had to come to their rescue. If the province of Ontario guarantees the bonds of those municipalities, in ten years the municipalities will come to the Provincial Government and say: "By your endorsation you asked us to go into this." Then the province will be in honour bound to recoup them, because the Provincial Legislature is the power which can now stop them, and if it does not do so it should bear the consequences.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Have any of those bonds been endorsed by the province so far?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: None have been issued yet.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps not. At the present moment I cannot recall any one of those roads that has been built under those assurances, but they are contemplated all over the province. Some of them are the most idiotic propositions conceivable. Let me cite a case. Between the town of Midland, in which I live, and Orillia, there is one line of railway with three or four villages along the road, and a survey has actually been made to establish right alongside of that one of those hydro lines. Why, it would not pay. You could not derive enough money from it in the winter to pay for shovelling the snow off it. It would have to be closed up; that would be the result. Yet the people are keen to have this line built; first, because of the expenditure of money, and in the next place because they believe that the province will ultimately have to pay for it.

I have read some of the articles on those electric roads as maintained by the railways, and there seems to be a great diversity of opinion. It is all very well to say that the steam engine was frozen up and utterly powerless; that it could not be moved and had to be rescued by the electric engine. That is very plain; a steam engine may get frozen up, and then an electric engine may come and take it along; but had the electric engine been out in the same storm that the steam engine had been in, or had it been hindered by storms and snow as the steam engine has been it would never move the length of itself. I understand that in recent years great improvements have been made in the maintaining of steam by locomotives, so that they are much less liable to be frozen up than they were formerly.

I believe that the time of this Senate can be well occupied on this question, and the Government would be well advised to listen to all representations that may be made. Moreover, I believe that the Dominion Government at the very earliest day should have a commission appointed to inquire into this whole question, so that its findings might be placed before the people of the Dominion generally, and might have the effect of stopping the people of the province of Ontario in their wild career with respect to electric railways. Consider the position of the province of Ontario to-day. Honourable gentlemen have read the Budget which was presented the other day in the Ontario House: a deficit in round figures of $1,500,000. How can the people of Ontario expect to continue such abnormal expenditure? One of the greatest assets of the province has been its receipts from Crown timber lands, but they cannot last forever. Any gentleman who is conversant with the lumber business knows the shortage that is imminent in this end of the province, and that around Georgian bay and lake Huron the lumber question is a very vexed one. It follows that the income derived by the province of Ontario from that source must fail, and fail abnormally, in the next few years. But the province has many engagements which it cannot forego, such as the maintenance of public institutions and grants to schools. What is the position to-day? The province is actually deriving about $3,000,000 of income from taxes on places of amusement, automobiles, and so on. In the face of the condition which I have described, this highly virtuous province of Ontario, better and holier than the others, is encouraging horse-racing, so that it may get from it three-quarters of a million dollars of income this year. I suppose there will come a time when the horse-racing people will have to forego their diversions.

I think this honourable body is under obligation to the honourable gentleman who introduced this motion. I hope that the Government will at an early date issue a commission to take this whole matter into consideration—to consult experts, and to get all the information that is to be had on the subject; and I trust that the result will be that the people of Ontario will be brought to their senses in the matter of these huge expenditures on hydro-radials, which expenditures would not be undertaken if it were not for the fact that the province by guaranteeing the bonds practically gives its consent, and a moral undertaking that if a loss follows the province will assume the liability

Hon. W. C. EDWARDS: Honourable gentlemen, being engaged in the hydro-electric power business, I am somewhat familiar with the subject now before the Senate; but I will not detain the House longer than is necessary to make a very short statement.

The honourable Minister of Labour made just such a speech as I would have made on this subject, and which it is not necessary for me to repeat. I want, however, to make a statement in regard to California which may be interesting to members of this Chamber. In that state there are 11,113 miles of cement roads, and more are being rapidly built. The internal traffic of the state, both passenger and freight, is carried on almost entirely by means of motor trucks. The railroads have very little to do in the way of local operations in the state.

One great misconception seems to exist as to electricity and its development for the use of the Canadian people. It will be very many years before it can be used efficiently and economically for transportation purposes. Electrical energy can be successfully applied to cooking, and any person who has electricity available can effect great saving in that respect. So far as heating is concerned, although there is a general idea that electricity can be used economically for that purpose, and that Canada will have nothing to fear, even if the coal supply becomes exhausted; that is not the case. Electrical energy can never be made available economically in the heating of our houses.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Why cannot electricity be used for heating our houses?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: It can be made available at an enormous cost.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: What is the cost?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Three times the cost of coal.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: In the city of Winnipeg electrical heating is being made available. In my own house I am using electricity for heating purposes to a considerable extent. The energy costs us one cent per kilowatt. Electrical energy for heating and for a cooking range costs us $1.48 a month. I am very much interested in what the honourable gentleman says, because this question is being discussed in the West.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: May I say a word? I know a little about electricity. One cent a kilowatt is a very cheap rate in any event. In New Brunswick we pay 15 cents a kilowatt, right adjacent to coal and water power.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: All I can say is that I think I shall move to Winnipeg. I am afraid we do not all know what electricity is costing us. The electrical business is very intricate and highly specialized, and I want to tell honourable gentlemen that there are few men buying power who know what they are paying for it. I will give you the testimony of the head of the electrical system in the city of Ottawa, one of the greatest experts in the Dominion of Canada on the subject. He has made tests in his house for three or four years, and he assures me that the cost of electricity for heating is exactly three times that of coal; and electrical energy in this city is perhaps cheaper than in any other part of Canada with the possible exception of some portions of the Niagara district. The average price of electrical energy in the city of Ottawa in wholesale lots does not exceed $15 per horse-power. The cost of the production of a horse-power by the use of coal to-day would be $60 or $70.

Hon. ARTHUR BOYER: What the honourable gentleman from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Schaffner) has said has made my mouth water. I tried in the country a system of heating water by electricity. The apparatus was installed, and I was told that the cost of power for it would be a trifle over the normal cost of power for lighting purposes. We used that heating apparatus just one month. In the month of June, before it was installed, our bill was about $15. In the month of July, after we had used that heating apparatus, I received a bill, and much to my surprise —I took my glasses, but would not believe it, and got a magnifying glass to be sure— the charge was $109.90.

Hon. GEORGE LYNCH-STAUNTON: Honourable gentlemen, I do not intend to speak on this subject at any great length, because I agree entirely with everything that has been said. The honourable gentleman from Winona (Hon. Mr. Smith) has brought this motion forward for one purpose, and one purpose only, namely, to try to obtain a commitment from this Government to the electrification of railroads as soon as it may be practicable to adopt such a system. He wants the Government so to declare themselves so that we may prevent the execution of this piece of folly that has been so graphically described in this House. The Minister of Labour says that the only reason he knows against the electrification of railroads is that we have not the necessary power. We all know that we are going to have that power when the Chippewa development is completed; so the Government might well now declare that when that completion is in sight it will begin the electrification of such portions of the Government railroads as it may think proper. I know that one of the reasons animating the Hydro-Electric Power Commission in undertaking the Chippewa development was the fact that they would be able to use the surplus power for railways. Sir Adam Beck is now endeavoring to obtain the consent of the Dominion Government to allow him to build an electric railroad on the right of way of the Grand Trunk between Toronto and the Niagara frontier. If he does not get that consent, he proposes to buy a right of way alongside of it.

If this Government will only commit itself to the electrification of its railway system when the power is available, that is all the honourable gentleman from Winona wants. The Minister of Labour has seen and knows that in the western states they have 500 miles of electrically-operated railway in a climate similar to ours. Therefore I think he should try to impress upon the Government the necessity of declaring a policy now. I am told by a very competent and efficient engineer that the efficiency of electrical energy increases with the cold, while the efficiency of steam-generated power decreases with the cold. Therefore, with our climatic conditions there is certainly every reason for adopting electricity in the operation of our railways. We ought to consider the high rate of taxation in the province of Ontario—Hamilton has a 35-mill tax rate— and this Government ought to do everything it can to discourage the people entering upon reckless expenditures at this time.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Can the honourable gentleman tell us whether the Hydro-Electric Commission have fixed the rates at which they would be prepared to supply electric power from Chippewa?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: They have not done so yet, because I do not suppose any one has approached them. I have no doubt whatever that the Hydro-Electric Power Commission would give the Government a contract for any amount of power they might require at a price that would be satisfactory to them. They have declared that the only reason for the expenditure of this enormous amount of money, some $40,000,000 to $60,000,000, in developing that power, is because they are satisfied that it will be cheaper than the power derived from any other system in the province of Ontario, and we know that they develop power as cheaply at DeCew Falls as anywhere else.

Hon. GEO. W. FOWLER: I was greatly interested in the remarks of the honourable gentleman from Winona (Hon. Mr. Smith), and also in the remarks of the honourable gentleman from Simcoe (Hon. Mr. Bennett), because they confirmed the course which I, in common with a number of other members, pursued when the question of the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway was before this House. We are now face to face with a difficulty. The people of Ontario are determined to rush on to destruction, unless the Government intervenes and does something involving the expenditure of a large sum of money to supplement an expenditure already necessary on account of the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway. We pointed out that these things would occur, and they have occurred. I do not wish to be like the person who says afterwards, "I told you so," but by force of circumstances I am compelled to remind the House, "We told you so."

Hon. GEO. GORDON: Honourable gentlemen, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate, and perhaps I should say a word in doing so. I regret exceedingly that we did not have this able address from the honourable gentleman from Winona (Hon. Mr. Smith) prior to the time when we voted upon the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway, because, after listening to his address, I have come to the conclusion that possibly the Grand Trunk Railway Company knew at that time of the obligations with which we are now threatened, and sought to get away from the expenditures which now look as though they would have to be shouldered by the country. I should like to consider further the address of the honourable gentleman, and for that purpose I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Gordon, the debate was adjourned.

DIVORCE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Bill Q, an Act for the relief of Herbert Walter Eccleston.—Hon. Mr. Bennett.

DIVORCE (ONTARIO AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND) BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. W. B. ROSS, the Senate went into Committee on Bill I, an Act to provide in Ontario and Prince Edward Island for the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriage. Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Sections 1 and 2 were agreed to.

On section 3—short title:

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: Honourable gentlemen, I would not have spoken on this Bill but that reference has been made to the one divorce granted on an application from Prince Edward Island. I would like to explain the circumstances. There was in that province a man who married when he was in poor circumstances and was living on an ordinary farm. Later he took another woman to live with him, and sent his wife away. By this other woman he had seven or eight children. He went into business and made a great deal of money, probably half a million dollars. He built a splendid place for himself and continued to live openly in adultery with this woman, to the knowledge of every one in the province. When he made application to the Government, it was felt that this man was not entitled to a divorce from his wife. She was not asking for it, but he was, and the Government refused to entertain the matter or to open the court at all. Under those circumstances he applied to the Senate, and I am told that he paid his wife $1,000 not to oppose his petition for a Bill of Divorce. If that man had applied to the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island he would certainly not have obtained a divorce; but the Senate here was not supposed to know the circumstances, and a divorce was granted him. I am quite in sympathy with the Bill as introduced by the honourable gentleman from Middleton. I think that the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island is the proper place for matters of this kind.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I would like to correct just one statement. The honourable gentleman is mistaken in saying that the man petitioned for a divorce. It was the woman who applied.

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: It may have been.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Yes. I remember very well that at the time I was suspicious of the case on account of the woman's age and the long time that had elapsed before the application was made. It was one of those doubtful cases.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: With which section are you dealing?

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: With section 3.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: May I refer for a moment to section 1? I have been attending a hearing by the Divorce Committee and we have just finished. I do not know what reference has been made to section 1, which reads:

> The law of England as to the dissolution of marriage and as to the annulment of marriage, as that law existed on the fifteenth day of July, 1870. . .

Was there any change made in that? I have always objected to that form of expression in legislation. I prefer always to see the particular statute with which we are dealing. The enactment should be set forth so that any one picking up the Act of Parliament may be able to see what is the law which we have passed. Now, taking up this proposal statute, I find that it refers to the law that existed in England in 1870, and before I am able to learn what that statute is, I must of necessity look up the English Act and ascertain what was the English law at that time. It is very much better to set forth in our statute book the exact law which we intend to place before the people of this country, instead of merely referring to the law of England as it existed in 1870. We all know that quite recently many changes have been made in the English law. Why should we not deal with the law as it exists in England at the present time? If we can set forth in this Bill the law which we intend to place on the statute book, I would like to see it set forth. If we cannot, then I would like to suggest as an amendment, "as that law existed on the fifteenth day of July, 1870, and as it exists at the time this Act shall come into force. Various changes have been made in the English statute, and it is advisable, I think, if we are going to have the English law, that we should have it up to date.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I agree with the honourable getleman that it is desirable to have everything put down in black and white, so far as possible, and it might be desirable to have a complete divorce code for all the provinces; but I can assure the honourable gentleman that if anybody introduced a divorce code it would be so intricate that it would be hopeless to get it through either this House or the Lower House. The law of divorce is an intricate law, and the more you study it the more you realize that fact. Rather than attempt what is impracticable, in bringing in too many things at once, I prefer to take up one thing at a time. Let it be as clear-cut as possible, and let it be thoroughly examined and discussed. It is only in that way that something can be accomplished.

Of course, as the honourable gentleman is aware, I pointed out the other day that we are following the course which was adopted in the case of the province of Manitoba and also with regard to the criminal law. We are keeping the provinces of Ontario and Prince Edward Island pretty close to the lines laid down for the three western provinces. I would advise the honourable gentleman not to ask now for more than he is likely to get, however desirable it may be. I agree with him that in many ways it would be better to have one code.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: I quite appreciate the difficulty of enacting a divorce law. What I would prefer, of course, would be a code for the whole Dominion. I accept the statement of the honourable gentleman that it would be probably impracticable to bring forward a Bill of that kind and have it passed at the present time. At the same time, I desire to place on record the view that I hold, not only in reference to this Bill but any Bill which states that we are going to adopt the law that existed somewhere else at some time. I think that is bad legislation, and that the practice should not be continued. In the Ontario legislature I always objected to that practice, and will continue to do so here. I would much prefer that the honourable gentleman, if he can see his way clear to doing so, would set forth the law as it existed at that time.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: You would never get it done.

Section 3 was agreed to.

Section 4, the preamble, and the title were agreed to.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There is a typographical error in the schedule on the last page of the Bill. In the margin the year 1886 appears. It should be 1866.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

CUSTOMS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 31, an Act to amend the Customs Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill has to do with the importation into Canada of firearms and munitions. It seems that in the law as it stands at the present time this prohibition does not extend to the importation of firearms from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Inasmuch as it is very desirable to place the control of importations absolutely in the hands of the Government, it is proposed to strike out the exception.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

BULGARIAN TREATY OF PEACE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 46, an Act for carrying into effect the Treaty of Peace between His Majesty and Bulgaria.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, in dealing with the resolution which came up from the House of Commons a few days ago, I made such explanations as I considered necessary and was able to make as to the contents of this Treaty. This Bill is simply to give effect to the Treaty which was then laid upon the Table, and which I explained at some length. It is unnecessary for me to repeat what was then said. I therefore move the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, in connection with this Bill I would ask the leader of the Government if, when we go into committee, he would be in a position to tell us how much money we have already expended in connection with the Treaty with Germany, the Treaty with the Czecho-Slovak minority, the Serb-Croat-Slovakian Treaty, and this Bulgarian Treaty, as well as our representation on the League of Nations. I should also like to know how the money has been provided.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The price of peace is very often as great as that of war. It seems to me that if my honourable friend would ask for a return, he could better arrive at the detailed information upon this subject, because it includes a considerable range of expenditures. I doubt if I could get the information he desires before we go into committee on this Bill; but if my honourable friend will move, either by way of an address or an inquiry, I shall see that his request is forwarded to the proper quarters, and that he gets the information asked for.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That will be quite satisfactory.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 2.30 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Friday, April 16, 1920.

The Senate met at 2.30 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

CHIME OF BELLS FOR PARLIAMENT TOWER.

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY moved :

That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the cost of the installation in the Tower of the Parliament Buildings a first class carillon in connection with a clock, the said committee to be composed of the Honourable Messrs. Boyer, Belcourt, Girroir, Michener, Foster and the mover.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Explain.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Honourable gentlemen, I do not intend to take up the time of the House. I spoke on a similar motion a few days ago. I felt it was in the interest of Ottawa, and in the interest of Canada as a whole, to place on the tower of the new Parliament Building a carillon. I may say that since addressing this House on the question I have learned that in Washington there is a similar movement to-day. The musical interests of Washington are taking the matter up. Not only are they urging that a carillon should be placed on the buildings in Washington, but they are suggesting that the musical men of the district should themselves supply it as a memorial. I am asking for this committee for the purpose of having an investigation made so that the committee may be able to satisfy this House as to the wisdom of proceeding as suggested. A carillon would certainly be a delightful thing to have on these buildings. There is no music ever invented that is equal to a carillon if properly played. Honourable gentlemen who have heard the carillons in the Low Countries will agree with that statement. There are over 100 carillons scattered over Belgium and the Netherlands. Any one who has ever listened to the bells of Bruges, Brussels, or other places would say that it is the sweetest music that was ever heard. There is no reason why we should not have a first-class carillon on top of this great tower we are building. I know there are certain criticisms as to the cost. I am not prepared to state, honourable gentlemen, what the cost will be. I know that previous to the war first-class carillons had been installed in different parts of Europe for about $22,000, or £4,400. The cost would doubtless be a good deal more at the present time. But let us say it would cost $50,000. That expenditure in connection with a building that is costing $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 is a mere bagatelle, if it is what we want, and I believe it is. The consensus of opinion in this great city and throughout the country, wherever this matter has been given proper consideration, is that the placing of a carillon in the tower would be a fitting finish to the building. However, I am asking for a committee for the purpose of investigating the question, and I hope that the committee will be appointed so that it may be able to present an intelligent report to the House when it has secured the necessary information.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Is it the intention to have chimes that will strike every hour?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: There will be, in addition to the carillon, a clock that will strike every hour, or every quarter of an hour, or every half-hour if desired.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I am not inclined to think that the Parliament tower would be a suitable place for such chimes as my hon. friend suggests, which could be heard all over the city of Ottawa. They would be striking when Parliament is in session.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: The striking of the hour need not be anything more than the striking of the clock. A carillon is played in two different ways. It is adjusted mechanically like a large music box, and it can be made to strike every hour or every half-hour, or every quarter of an hour, and to give a chime, if desired. In addition, it is fitted up so as to be played as an ordinary pipe-organ. If we had a man trained and able to play the chimes the music produced by a properly attuned carillon would be superior to anything that we have in Canada to-day.

My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Webster) suggests that the musicians might go on strike. There is danger of anybody going on strike. Even the Senate may go on strike some day.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Are these bells to ring after Parliament has prorogued? What is to be done with the bells? Will they be taken away?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I would not like to suggest that we take them away.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Are you going to annoy the people of the whole city of Ottawa? Why, they are trying to stop the bells in the churches.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I am very sorry that the honourable gentleman has not a little more music in his soul.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Oh, I hear plenty of music all the time. In the olden days the bell was rung in the tower in order to give warning of the approach of the enemy, or to rouse the people in case of fire—to communicate intelligence of some kind; not for the sake of harmony.

The motion was agreed to.

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 21, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act (Certificates of Service).

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill is to modernize, so to speak, the Canada Shipping Act, in respect to the issuance of certificates to masters and mates. As I understand, under the Shipping Act of today, a man cannot secure a certificate as a master unless he was sailing previous to 1870, or as a mate unless he was sailing previous to 1883. This Bill provides that he shall have been qualified during the ten years previous to the present year. It furthermore makes provision for increasing the tonnage as at present provided under the Act, so as to extend the certificates of masters and mates to sailing vessels of 750 tons. Since the law was passed of course the size of ships has been very much increased. This Bill applies only to sailing vessels.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Does it cover coasters?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand so.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I think from what my honourable friend has said about this Bill that it is in the interest of the country. There is one point, however, to which he did not refer. I understand that previous to the war it was possible to register ships in other parts of the British Empire and to sail them out of Canadian ports, and that immediately after the war started it was decided that ships must be registered in the country to which they belonged, and for a time the difficulty was overcome by Order in Council. I think I am right in saying that that privilege has now relapsed, and therefore, as the law stands at the present time, ships of over 150 tons register have to come under the law as it stood, which is working a hardship on the sailors. The navigation laws of the United States provide that a master or mate without a certificate can sail a ship of 700 tons register; and I presume that this Bill is making the conditions under which such ships have to be sailed here very similar to those which exist in the United States. I think it is a good provision, which will assist navigation on both the Pacific and Atlantic coasts.

Section 1 of the Bill reads as though it were only necessary for a man to have served twelve months at any period during the ten years preceding 1920. I suppose twelve months is a sufficient length of time to enable a man to acquire a sufficient knowledge of the sea to become a master; but if he were to serve twelve months, and then not sail again for nine years, he might forget a great deal that he had learned. That is a question that might well be discussed when we get to the committee stage of the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would refer my honourable friend to paragraph b, which says that every British subject who produces satisfactory evidence of his sobriety, experience, ability, and general good conduct on board ship, shall be entitled to a certificate.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: He produces that evidence to the board?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, before he gets his certificate. He does not get it automatically.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think we may find that it would be better that some legislation of this kind should be applied to vessels propelled otherwise than by the wind, and I would ask my honourable friend if the Government would consider applying it to vessels of that character.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: In the Maritime Provinces we have a different condition of affairs to that which exists elsewhere. Small coasters of 130 or 140 tons go down to the West Indies. We are trying to improve trade relations with the West Indies. Under this Act would those small vessels be able to ply?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would direct my honourable friend's attention to the last paragraph of the first section of the Bill, which provides that the certificate is for sea-going or coasting sailing vessels, whether square-rigged or fore-and-aft rigged, not exceeding 750 tons.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: What is the idea of confining it to sailing ships?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I fancy provision is already made in the Shipping Act for other classes of vessels. Apparently for this class of vessel adequate provision had not been made to meet the requirements.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I should like a little information on this subject. The minister has made it clear that for vessels of under 750 tons, certificates would not be required. That is very well for the masters, but the examination of the mates is another matter. Frequently the crews and under-officers of sailing vessels are better seamen than the examiners, because nowadays the examiners are largely concerned with steamers and have not the same experience in the use of sailing vessels. In Nova Scotia, and I presume the same is the case in New Brunswick, the mate of a coasting or fishing vessel frequently has a share in the vessel, is part owner, and I fancy that this provision might sometimes impose a hardship on them. But I fancy the Bill allows for a reasonable examination.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CUSTOMS BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 31, an Act to amend the Customs Act. Hon. Mr. Thompson in the Chair.

On section 1—firearms and munitions of war not to be imported without permission, etc.:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What is the object of this Bill?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As I explained yesterday, the Government has authority to regulate the importation of firearms coming from all countries except Great Britain and Ireland. There is no reason why there should be such an exception. The Bill simply increases the authority of the Government so that it may exercise control over firearms and munitions of war coming from all quarters outside of Canada.

Section 1 was agreed to.

Section 2, the preambule, and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

BULGARIAN TREATY OF PEACE BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 46, an Act for carrying into effect the Treaty of Peace between His Majesty and Bulgaria. Hon. Mr. Daniel in the Chair.

On subsection 1 of section 1—Governor in Council to carry out provisions of Treaty:

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Mr. Chairman, I understand that the King has already signed a Treaty with Bulgaria binding the Dominions. In what position would we be if we refused to pass this Bill? Would we go on fighting with Bulgaria under our previous arrangement, or would we suspend hostilities? The question is whether we add anything to the agreement which the King has made by passing this Bill through the House. We have either peace now or we have war. Have we war, if the King has made peace?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The King has deferred his signature to the Treaty until it is signed by the overseas Dominions who are parties to it.

Subsection 1 of section 1 was agreed to.

Subsection 2 of section 1 was agreed to.

On subsection 3 of section 1—expense, how to be paid:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is that a direct expenditure by the Government of Canada, or is it simply the contribution of our share?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. Each of the countries party to the Treaty is assessed with a certain proportion.

Subsection 3 of section 1 was agreed to.

Section 2, the preamble, and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

CRIMINAL CODE (FRENCH VERSION) AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. P. E. BLONDIN moved the second reading of Bill C, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (French Version).

He said: Honourable gentlemen, notwithstanding its title, this Bill does not make any amendment to the Criminal Code. Its object is to correct certain errors, and in some instances very important errors, which have been made in the translation from the English version of the code to the French version. The Parliamentary Counsel has prepared a new edition of the volume containing the Criminal Code and other selected statutes, putting in the amendments in their proper places. In preparing the French edition of this, it became necessary to compare the English with the French, and it was discovered that there were a large number of mistakes in the translation of the Revised Statutes.

Some of them are of quite a serious character. For instance, the punishment would be different in the English version from what it would be in the first French version. In some places whole sentences were left out. The Revised Statutes were first of all prepared in English and were afterwards translated into French by the late Mr. St. Louis. It was a task which was really too great for one man to undertake. Moreover, there is no doubt that the French translation should have been prepared by the law translators of the House, who have a sufficient staff and are specially skilled in this work. The present Bill is to correct those errors. By looking at the Bill honourable gentlemen will see that there are a considerable number of amendments. They all relate only to the French version. If this Bill is given the second reading, my intention is to propose that a special committee of members from both sides of the House be formed to examine each proposed amendment.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would like to ask the minister if it would not be advisable for him to amend the title of this. It is not proposed to amend the Criminal Code; we intend only to correct certain errors in translation. The Criminal Code itself is not amended, it is the same.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The title says, "French version."

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The title is misleading.

Hon. Mr. BLONDIN: Section 1 reads:

This Act may be cited as the Criminal Code (French version) Amendment Act, 1920.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: But you are not amending the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: You are correcting errors.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: In the French version.

Hon. Mr. BLONDIN: It would seem to me that the present wording covers the case.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There are material amendments.

Hon. Mr. BLONDIN: Yes, there are material amendments. At the same time, I think it is immaterial if the title says more than is contained in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I would like to ask by whom this translation was made.

Hon. Mr. BLONDIN: This translation was made by the French Assistant Parliamentary Counsel, and was no doubt submitted to the translators. But I may say this, that although you have very able translators on the bluebook staff, the translation of law requires a man who not only thoroughly understands both languages, but is a practised lawyer; because very often it is necessary to deal with law that has never existed in France but comes from England, and there are expressions for which you cannot find the equivalent in the French dictionary.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Have you been working under this law for 14 years in Quebec—under the French version?

Hon. Mr. BLONDIN: No. I do not pretend to be a criminal lawyer, but I would suppose that the courts in Quebec have been using the English version. Whenever they saw that there was an error in the French version, they would use the English.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That has been done ever since 1906?

Hon. Mr. BLONDIN: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, the Postmaster General (Hon. Mr. Blondin) has stated that this translation was made by Mr. St. Louis. I suppose he refers to the late Horace St. Louis. If the information furnished the minister is correct, then I would absolve the authorities for the selection of the translator, because no better translator could be found than Mr. St. Louis, who had long been practising as a lawyer; but in the latter years of his life he was very much incapacitated. If he did that work in his last years, when he was still apparently active, the disease which gradually incapacitated him would explain the sorry mess which is exhibited in this Act.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Does the honourable gentleman attempt to absolve the authorities for engaging an imbecile to do this work?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, I do not know at what stage of his illness he was asked to do the work.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Apparently at a very advanced stage, if that is a correct statement.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, the minister (Hon. Mr. Blondin) intends to move for a committee, and that committee will report upon the present Bill. There is no principle before the House, although we are to vote upon the second reading. It is declared that there are about a hundred amendments or corrections to be made. The committee will examine into them and will report to the Senate whether or not they are desirable amendments.

Hon. Mr. BLONDIN: I would like to say on behalf of Mr. St. Louis that, immediately upon mentioning his name, I added that it was too much for one man alone to undertake the translation of the Criminal Code. And I would go further: if you asked the ten best translators in the Dominion of Canada to translate a certain section, there would be long discussions regarding it after they had done so, and perhaps after some years of practice it would be necessary to apply to the Senate to have some amendments made in order to improve the translation.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: With due deference to the honourable minister, I think that is an absurd statement—that you cannot find anybody who can translate an English statute into French so as to cover exactly the same ground and provide the same penalties in the one language as in the other.

Hon. Mr. BLONDIN: If my honourable friend understands French—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, I do not.

Hon. Mr. BLONDIN: Well, if he would undertake to learn French, I would certainly accept him as an authority. I would refer one clause of any statute to him, and I am sure he would be fair enough to admit that there are difficulties that you cannot understand unless you have to deal with them yourself.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think that the drafting of the Bill is hardly open to the criticism made by the honourable gentleman from St. John (Hon. Mr. Daniel). His criticism was a perfectly natural one, and one that would occur at first sight:

This Act may be cited as the Criminal Code (French version) Amendment Act, 1920.

The honourable gentleman takes the ground that it is a Bill not to amend the Criminal Code, but to amend the French translation. But the honourable gentleman left out of sight the fact that in both Houses of Parliament one language stands on the same footing as the other. It is not the French version we are amending: we are amending the Act as it appears in the French version. I think there is no error at all in the drafting of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Blondin, the said Bill was referred to a special committee composed of Messieurs Beaubien, Belcourt, Casgrain, Chapais, Dandurand, David, Girroir, Poirier, and the mover.

FIRST READING.

Bill 67, an Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending 31st March, 1921.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of the Bill.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I am quite aware that it is necessary to obtain the leave of the House for this motion. This Bill has to do with a bonus payable to the Civil Service. In anticipation of there being substantial changes to be made, the Bill has apparently been held over; but it is quite apparent that the payments have to be made at once pending further consideration which the Government is to give to the recommendations made by the Civil Service Commission respecting an increase of bonus. Honourable gentlemen will observe that the pay of the civil servants depends on the passage of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would my honourable friend state what is the amount?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This simply makes provision for one-sixth.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: How much?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The same bonus as was paid last year, which I think, amounted to a little over $12,000,000. It is proposed that Parliament should vote one-sixth of this so as to permit the cheques which have been issued to be cashed. I would therefore move by leave of the House that the Bill be read the second time.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I would like to ask the minister what position this places us in, to pass one-sixth of the allowance for the bonus.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will permit of the bonus which we voted last year being paid to its full extent for two months

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Are you considering the increase or the diminution of the bonus?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Both. Proposals have been made along both lines, and each proposal finds a certain amount of advocacy.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Honourable gentlemen, do I understand the honourable leader of the Government to say that there is a demand from the civil servants for an increase of the bonus over and above what was paid last year in addition to their salaries?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. There is some expectation on the part of civil servants that the bonus of last year will be increased in proportion to the alleged increase in the cost of living, but that question has not yet been decided upon.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: The Government is considering it?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, as my honourable friend very well knows, the Government has become so accustomed to giving consideration to every proposal that comes before it that we can scarcely refuse to consider it, to say the least.

Certain rules having been suspended, the motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 20, at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Tuesday, April 20, 1920.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

DIVORCE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill Z, an Act for the relief of Alexander Scougall.—Hon. Mr. Mulholland.

Bill A-2, an Act for the relief of Edith Gertrude Willis.—Hon. Mr. Proudfoot.

Bill B-2, an Act for the relief of Ada Mabel Sanderson.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

Bill C-2, an Act for the relief of John Albert Green.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

Bill D-2, an Act for the relief of Emily Cruickshank.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

Bill E-2, an Act for the relief of Cyril Graham Sinclair.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

THE DOMINION COAT OF ARMS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:

1. What are the names of the officials appointed to consider the question of the Coat of Arms for the Dominion?
2. When were they appointed?
3. How far have they progressed with their work?
4. When will their report be laid before Parliament?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. The Under Secretary of State, the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Dominion Archivist, and Major-General Sir Willoughby Gwatkin, C.B., K.C.M.G.
2. 26th March, 1919.
3. Work is almost concluded. A report thereon is now in course of preparation.
4. The report of the committee will be made to the Governor General in Council.

OIL FUEL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE inquired of the Government:

1. When will the Government bring down the reports that have been made by Admiral Viscount Jellicoe of Scapa, and which have reference to the establishment of a Canadian navy?
2. Has the Government considered the question of using oil fuel in the steamers that have been constructed and are to be constructed to their order?
3. Did the Government take the opportunity of the presence in Canada of an Admiral of the Imperial fleet to discuss the question of oil fuel?
4. In view of the fact that the large transatlantic steamers are being converted into oil fuel burners, what steps are the Government proposing to take to assure for such steamers an assured supply of Canadian oil fuel?
5. In the years 1918 and 1919, this Chamber unanimously passed resolutions asking the Government to take means to assure the quick and early utilization of the oil shale exports of the Maritime Provinces; what steps have the Government taken to meet the recommendation of this Chamber in this matter? If no steps have been taken, what steps do the Government propose to take?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Admiral Jellicoe's report has already been placed on the Table of the Senate.
2. Yes.
3. Some of the ships recommended by Lord Jellicoe, for the Canadian navy, are oil burning vessels.
4. No information.
5. No information.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill 31, an Act to amend the Customs Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

BULGARIAN TREATY OF PEACE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill 46, an Act for carrying into effect the Treaty of Peace between His Majesty and Bulgaria.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

ELECTRIFICATION OF GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

DISCUSSION CONTINUED.

The Senate resumed from April 15 consideration of the motion of Hon. E. D. Smith:

That in the opinion of the Senate it is expedient and in the interest of Canada for the Government to proceed to substitute electricity for steam as a motive power upon the lines of railway owned by the Government as soon as and wherever economically practicable.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Honourable gentlemen, having read over the address of my honourable friend from Winona (Hon. Mr. Smith) in Hansard of last Thursday, I find that, owing a very short absence from my seat that day, I misconstrued some of the remarks which he had made; and, as what I had to say is not really relevant to the subject, I have nothing to add except to compliment the honourable gentleman on the able manner in which he presented the subject.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Blain, the debate was adjourned.

DIVORCE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill T, an Act for the relief of Ignace Perugini.—Hon. Mr. Gordon.

Bill U, an Act for the relief of William Murray Gray.—Hon. Mr. Bradbury.

Bill V, an Act for the relief of Albert Harvey McBride.—Hon. Mr. Proudfoot.

GERMAN TRADE IDENTIFICATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. GEO. LYNCH-STAUNTON moved the second reading of Bill W, an Act for the Identification of Traders in German goods.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill provides:

1. The Criminal Code is hereby amended by inserting therein, immediately after section 508d as inserted by section one of chapter twenty-six of the statutes of nineteen hundred and seventeen, the following as section 508e:

508e. (1) Every person who knowingly deals in goods, wares or merchandise which are, in whole or in part, the growth, product or manufacture of Germany or Austria-Hungary, shall keep posted in letters easily legible over every outside entrance to his premises the words "Dealer in German goods," and shall print the said words prominently in all his advertisements and stationery.

(3) The provisions of this section shall not apply to dealings in any such goods, wares or merchandise as are in Canada at the time of the passing of this Act.

Honourable gentlemen, this Bill was introduced at the Session before last, and was passed unanimously by this House. It failed to be taken up in the House of Commons—I imagine, because there was too much business and it was so near the close of the Session. I am reintroducing it, therefore, in the hope that it may become law before the close of the present Session. The reason for which I introduced this Bill I stated in part before. My first reason is that there are thousands and thousands of persons in this country who, like myself, have objections to purchasing German-made goods, and who think that they are entitled to know when they enter a shop whether or not they may find German goods there, in order that they may be on their guard and examine carefully such goods as are presented to them for purchase and may not be deceived in having German goods passed off on them. These are perhaps personal and sentimental reasons, but they are the reasons which, in part, animate me in advocating this Bill.

There are other reasons which I consider of the utmost importance. We know that those who were induced to go voluntarily into this great war were told that it was a war to end war. They were told by the now Prime Minister of England and by, I believe, his Foreign Secretary, Mr. Balfour, and by Mr. Bonar Law, officially, that those who brought this terrible catastrophe upon the world would suffer condign punishment if we succeeded. After the war was over a Treaty of Peace, combined with what was called the League of Nations, was negotiated with the Blonde Beast. The British Empire and all her dependencies, with the other Allied and Associated Powers, entered into that Treaty, and Germany promised the performance of her Treaty obligations. It was provided in the Treaty that those felons who had brought on this war, the Emperor of Germany and his advisers, who had been guilty of crimes against civilization were to be brought to trial and, if found guilty, were to be punished. The ink was hardly dry on the Treaty before the request was made to that secret ally of Germany, Holland, to deliver up that fugitive, that half maniac, William, former Emperor of Germany, who, at the first appearance of personal danger, had fled from his own land and sought an asylum among the Dutch; and in very graceful and very hypocritical language that Government refused to give him up. The Allied Powers bowed down at once and said: "We are sorry we cannot punish him." Thus was kept the pledged word to the people of the world, given by the Prime Minister of England. The whole proceding was a pretense. In the time of Charles II the regicides sought asylum in Holland. They were political fugitives if ever there were political fugitives. The Dutch Government gave them up. In ancient times, when the man who shook the foundations of the Roman Republic, Hannibal, sought asylum in an independent kingdom, the Roman Empire, which was no more powerful to enforce its will than are the modern Allies, had Hannibal surrendered to it; and I have no doubt that if one were to look into history one would find many precedents for the demand made by the Allies. Now the German Government has refused to hand over the other, smaller fry, and it is common belief that no effort is to be made to compel it to do so. So one of the great principles laid down, for which the people of the world fought, that those who were guilty of crime should be punished, and thereby all seekers after war in the future should be taught that if they brought on an unjust war and failed they would pay for it with their heads, like any other felon, has been abandoned, and this war to end war has ended just as preceding war, those who caused it going unwhipt of justice; and every nation and every ruler who in time to come may be threatened with punishment if they bring on a desolating war to destroy or to make miserable their generation, will feel that the punishment will never be inflicted, because the greatest powers the world has ever seen have abandoned that principle.

Hon. Mr. POWER: If the honourable gentleman will permit me to interrupt him for a moment—perhaps he would be good enough to say whether legislation of this particular character has been adopted in England?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I do not know. I do not know what they have done in England. I was one of those who had a high opinion of the sincerity of the Right Hon Mr. Lloyd George. I am one of those whose opinion has had a terrible fall. I think now that, as Canada is recognized as having an individuality, recognized as one of the parties to the Treaty, recognized as more than a mere dependency, we should assert ourselves and do something—that we should let even the small voice of Canada go across the world announcing that we at least believe that felon nations should be punished. For that reason I bring forward this Bill, so that other nations may learn that if they cause an unjust war it will not be forgotten by those against whom they warred—that they will not enter into friendly commercial relations with them immediately after they have, perhaps, stabbed their brother to death.

Some of the Allies have gone further and given up one of the greatest and most important and valuable rights of the people. The Republic of France saw the Germans flagrantly and publicly breaking one of the provisions of the Treaty concerning the occupation by their troops of a certain territory. France protested, and as was her right, sent troops into that territory to make Germany keep her word. The moment that France acted in the way that I have mentioned without consultation with the others, so far as we know, the Government of England reprobated France for trying to carry out and enforce the Treaty, abandoning the right of each signatory of the Treaty to alone insist on the performance of the Treaty. It seems to me that was the most colossal blunder that any nation could possibly make, because, if one nation protested that none of the other nations should act unless they were all agreed, the British Empire would have no right to enforce any provisions of that treaty unless she got the consent of France, Italy, and all the other powers engaged in it. To my mind that was a most extraordinary attitude on the part of the Government of England, an attitude which I think the British people would not endorse—publicly to reprobate that great and magnificent ally, France, for her conduct. These actions convince me that there will be no effort made to compel Germany to carry out the Treaty; they convince me that Germany's push or pull is as mighty as it ever was.

During the debate on this question last session some one said that if we did not give Germany an opportunity to trade she could not pay the indemnities. I do not care one snap of my fingers whether Germany ever pays a dollar of indemnity. So far as we are concerned it will never do any good, and Germany will never pay it anyway, and will never be compelled to pay. But if I thought that the passing of this legislation would in any way discourage trade with Germany in this country I would be more insistent than ever. We must regard this question as a very serious one; we must stand out to reprobate in every way we can the conduct of the German people.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: How long will this Bill be in force?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It will remain in force if it passes, as I heartily hope it will, until this Parliament repeals it.

There are nine million men in their graves to-day because Germany sought world power or destruction. Like Lucifer, when he went in the face of the Almighty—to rule heaven or to go into the lowest depths, to find still lower depths still opening to receive him—the German people declared that they would have world power or destruction. It was their election; and it is not for us to lead them out of destruction. They strove after the object which has been present in the Teutonic mind from the beginning of recorded time. Century after century the Teutons thundered at the gates of the Roman Empire until they brought it down in ruin; until Charlemagne was crowned in Rome; until his empire extended from the North sea to the Adriatic. Their pinchbeck emperor dreamed that he might transcend the greatness of Charlemagne, and he set his hand and the mind of his people to the conquest of the world to bring down the civilization of our time. And we say: "Oh, well, the war is over; we will let bygones be bygones. The millions of maimed and halt and blind and broken-hearted that go up and down this world may look out for themselves; we are only thinking of the dollars that are in it for us." If the people of the world allow this war to pass and fade into history after having taken the position that a new attitude towards unjust wars should be adopted by mankind, then for all time men will know that there is no sanction for punishing those who bring them on. We cannot do it. We are but a small people; we have not much voice in the government of the world; but we have some, and when we set an example we should set a right example and tell the world that we have not given sixty thousand lives and nearly ruined our country in a war to end war, and are now willing to abandon all our high pretensions and take a few miserable marks as compensation for the wrong that has been done to us.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I purpose pressing this Bill and asking that it be passed, and that the Government of this country give to those who have suffered at least the satisfaction of knowing that when they go into the shops of this country they will not have these accursed German wares put upon them.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: If this Bill is passed, I would like to ask the honourable gentleman how it will be enforced. It will be impossible to enforce it, because England before the war sent goods to Germany to be dyed, and they were dyed and returned to Bradford or London or Huddersfield, where they were sold and sent out here. Within the last few months England has sold millions of pounds' worth of raw materials to Germany; the United States is doing the same; and even France is selling goods to Germany. Look at things practically and forget all this highfalutin stuff about Charlemagne and Hannibal.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Who are they?

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: We have to get down to brass tacks, and if we have any goods to sell, and the Germans can pay for them, it is our business to sell to them. It would be impossible to enforce legislation of this kind. I have goods on my shelves, and I do not know whether or not they came from Germany originally. Part of them are English, part French, and part German. How are we going to distinguish between them? You could not get one man in Canada to put up in his store a placard of the kind suggested. Give us something practical.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I will give you something practical. The honourable gentleman takes the position that we have nothing to do after the war except make money—"Put money in my purse; all this sentimentality about the war is trash; all we have to think about is putting money in our purses." I do not propose to stop any man from making a profit by selling German goods; but when I go into a shop I do not want anybody to deceive me by passing off German wares as honest goods.

That is the point. Put up a sign and the law will not have to be enforced. I presume that any merchant who has such a love for Germany as to deal in German wares will not object to put up a sign stating that he deals with the Kaiser's subjects.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I do not know how any country could strictly apply such legislation as this. We have been informed that a number of European countries are already dealing with the Germans and exchanging wares with them. A considerable quantity of goods come to this country from the British Isles, and I have no doubt that through that channel will come German wares that will not bear the words, "Made in Germany." We know that only lately Great Britain has sent ships across the channel for the purpose of carrying 250,000 lbs. of German dye-stuffs, with the understanding that they will be apportioned among different countries; and I know that some American and some Canadian manufacturers are very anxious to get their share. If those dyes are used in Canadian-made goods, will the goods have to bear some indication that they are coloured with German dyes? Any inspector of the Federal Government would meet with some difficulty in supervising the application of this law.

I sympathize with my honourable friend when he says that it will be a bitter pill for the Allies to swallow to shake hands with the Germans and deal with them as if nothing had happened. Every one knows that the German soul has not changed since the 11th of November, 1918; that every German feels remorse, not because of the declaration of war, but because of the humiliation of defeat; that a large committee has been sitting in the Reichstag inquiring, not into the cause of the war, but into the cause of the defeat. They have examined generals and statesmen to find out why the opportunity had not been taken in 1916 to accept the offer of the United States to arbitrate the differences and settle the war. We know also that Germany has hardly begun to execute faithfully or honestly any part of the Treaty. We know that she has bound herself to demobilization, and that on the 31st of March last, when she should not have had more than 100,000 men under arms, she had hundreds of thousands. She has organized a territorial army which, in connection with her police organization, would enable her to put over a million men in the field. We know that Germany pledged herself to hand over great quantities of war material, and that not one-twentieth of that quantity has been delivered up. We know that she promised to deliver a certain number of millions of tons of coal to France, and that not one-twentieth of it has been delivered. We know that Germany was to deliver up cattle and many other things which were taken from France and Belgium, and as yet she has hardly begun to carry out her obligations. She is keeping her army in preparation for a day of revenge. The militarists are still watching for a chance to seize power and organize for the day when they may go back to the Rhine. I sympathize deeply with France in her present predicament. We know that Great Britain, when the Armistice was to be signed, required that the German navy, which was a menace to Great Britain, should be brought to a British port. We know also that another danger to Great Britain was the air craft, consisting of aeroplanes by the thousands, and they were to be delivered up. But, to the surprise of the world, although Bulgaria had been required to disarm on the day of the Armistice, no such condition was found in the Armistice of the 11th day of November, 1918, and the German troops returned triumphantly to Berlin with their arms and their guns, and to-day they are there in thousands.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Whose fault is that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is the fault of the Allied Council of War, who did not impose that condition.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Who had the task of imposing the conditions of the Armistice?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It was the Supreme War Council, presided over by Marshal Foch. I understand that Marshal Foch did not have his way entirely, because the political authorities had something to say in the fixing of the terms. But I am not recriminating; I am stating facts. Germany is on the Rhine, and there is a possibility of its having considerable strength at its back. We find that it is the same Germany as of old, eager to redeem itself in a military sense, and looking forward to have its revenge some day and to re-establish its military domination and to call back the Kaiser if possible. We are confronted with the same spirit that brought about the war of 1914, and I do not feel any sympathy towards the vanquished, because they have not the chastened spirit of the vanquished. They have not a feeling of guilt; their only state of mind is one of humiliation, not because they stand before the bar of public opinion as culprits, but simply because they stand there as vanquished. I am not at all certain that my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) can effect anything in particular by this Bill; but, knowing the sentiments which exist in Germany, and feeling that the situation has not been improved one whit, I will not lift a finger to impede the passage of his Bill.

Hon. C. P. BEAUBIEN: Honourable gentlemen, the sentiments expressed by my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) have found a deep echo in my heart. It seems strange indeed that the most horrible crime of humanity should be in danger of receiving no adequate punishment. If one looks over the ruin caused by the late war and considers who are responsible, one cannot but be in entire accord with the sentiments expressed by my honourable friend. But may I say this, that when I heard his speech I thought it must lead somewhere else than to this Bill—why? It is true that the terms of the Treaty have not been observed. No punishment has been visited upon those who were primarily responsible for the war. Nothing has been done as yet to protect poor, brave little France against a repetition of this calamity. Nothing has yet been done to force Germany even to begin the delivery of those things which are necessary to France, that she may re-establish her industries, reclaim her fields, rebuild her homes, and resume her moral life. It seems to me, honourable gentlemen, that the noble sentiments expressed by my honourable friend should have soared above trade, and might very well have concluded with a recommendation from a proud little sister nation in the British Empire to the Imperial Government to have perhaps a little more sympathy for what France has suffered in the past, and a little more eagerness to back her against a possible repetition of that calamity in the future.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Do I understand my honourable friend to charge Great Britain with any lack of sympathy with France in this war? Do I understand him to make that charge on the floor of this House?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I will be quite frank with my honourable friend, and I will state to him that I was indeed very much disappointed that when France asked to send troops to the Ruhr district after the Treaty had been violated and after an official lie by Germany—I was very much disappointed not to see Lloyd George come across at once and say to France: "Here we are, by your side." And may I say to my honourable friend that I am not the only one to feel this. I would invite him to open what I consider to be the best English paper in the country. In the Montreal Gazette of a few days ago he will see expressed, in a much better and more vigorous language the same sentiments that I have just expressed.

Now, honourable gentlemen, permit me to say this. Sentiment is veering in England now—why? Because, I believe, England is better informed. What was stated on the floor of the House of Commons lately by Mr. Winston Churchill? That England was astounded to find that, whereas Germany was allowed by the Treaty to keep only 288 guns, she had no less than 18,000—after stating that she had destroyed them.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: They say she has 70,000 now.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: What I read in the papers was 18,000 guns and 15,000 aeroplanes. Now, it is quite evident that, after the strong position taken by France, some measure of protection to her will be given. But, honourable gentlemen, if ever effect is to be given to sentiments such as those my honourable friend has expressed—that justice should prevail, that those who are guilty should be brought to sentence and to punishment—we ought also to see that those who have permitted the wrong should repent to the full measure of their capacity. Poor France has borne practically half the cost of the war on the side of the Allies—no less than $71,000,000,000 out of $149,000,000,000, or practically half of the total cost to the Allies. That $71,000,000,000 stands to the credit of the little French nation. And whereas, honourable gentlemen, we have lost one man in 142, France has lost one man in 27. England's loss was, I believe, about one man in 52. The next nation which suffered the most severely, after France, was Serbia, which everybody thought had been wiped out. She has lost one man in 32. Now, honourable gentlemen, after being afflicted in that way, it is not surprising that France should require the execution of the Treaty. I must say to my honourable friend that when he reproaches the Allies with not having insisted sufficiently on the execution of the Treaty he must make an exception of France. What has Mr. Poincaré said lately? "We have asked that the criminals be brought to justice. Nothing has been done. We have asked that coal be delivered to us. Germany was obliged to deliver to us 800,000 tons per month. At first she delivered 300,000, then 150,000. Nothing has been done. We have been patient. When the Ruhr district was menaced with invasion and we asked whether or not German troops would be sent, the German government said no troops would be sent; and when the German troops did enter the Ruhr district, it was time for us to say that Germany had gone far enough, and for our own protection we were obliged to enter the district ourselves." No, I do not think France can be held to account for any negligence. She has been bled white by this war. She has lost one-fifth of her whole wealth, and she knows where the danger lies, and what precaution must be taken to protect what is left of life and of property within her boundaries.

As I said at the beginning, the sentiments expressed by my honourable friend are lofty, but it seems to me that they find little application in the Bill. I regret that I differ from him as to the result which may be obtained by this Bill. If instead of being a blow at Germany it strikes at our trade and commerce, where shall we be? It is now desirable for us to break all the fetters that bound us during the war. Our trade must be free, because our debt is very heavy; and, notwithstanding the admirable sentiments expressed by my honourable friend, when we act as legislators we cannot get away from monetary or financial considerations, which are essential to the nation. I say that our trade must be free. When all the other nations in the world are free to deal with one another, with enemy as well as with ally, should we be the only nation to be fettered? I do not think we should. That is my first point.

My second point is this. Is every merchant in the land to be exposed to the accusation that he is dealing knowingly in German goods? How can a man know? Goods that originate in Germany may travel by very many routes before they reach our shores. How can a man know that they originated in Germany? If he is brought before a tribunal, he will have to plead that he did not know.

It seems to me that not only is the proposed measure very difficult of application, but it might be administered in a way which would cause irritation. I do not think it is wise. If I could interpret it as being a blow against the country from which all our trouble has come, in which all the misery of the war originated, I would vote for it without any hesitation; but I am sorry that I cannot see it in that light.

Hon. GEO. W. FOWLER: Honourable gentlemen, it is a sad and unfortunate fact, but a fact nevertheless, that a certain type of man, a certain type of member of this House, cannot rise upon his feet and speak of the British Empire except in the most slurring terms, in terms of disrespect, and without making statements that are not supported by fact. My honourable friend—my histrionic friend, my actor friend from the district of Montreal (Hon. Mr. Beaubien)—is full of that sort of thing. I have never heard him make a speech in this House, in which the British Empire has been mentioned, but that it has been mentioned in terms of disrespect and dislike. The honourable gentleman may say that that is not so, but that is my experience of the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will my honourable friend allow me? Will he cite one occasion—one occasion?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Sit down, then.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: What I have said has been stated by your own papers in my province. But let the honourable gentleman, instead of making a general remark, cite just one occasion.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The occasions are so numerous I could scarcely pick out one. Every member of this House knows it to be true. The same remark applies to the honourable member from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), but not quite to such a degree as it does to my honourable friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien). It is strange that the honourable gentleman, a member of the legislature of a sister nation in the British Empire, cannot speak in this Chamber without slurring Great Britain. I have not the slightest objection to his eulogizing what France has done in this war. I say, all honour to France for what she has done in this war. But when the honourable gentleman intimates that France bore the heaviest burden in the war I throw that falsehood back in his teeth, and say that the heaviest burden of all in the war was borne by the glorious British Empire. It provided the money. The honourable gentleman talks about what France has done, in comparison with what has been done by England. The very money that was used by France in this war, or a very large proportion of it, was provided by England, and France is to-day debtor to England for that money. The conditions under which the Entente was formed called upon England to perform a certain task if France were attacked. Did England resist? Did she say that she would only live up to the terms of that agreement? No. But every man, and every gun, and every dollar in Britain was at the service of the Allies in this war. Talk about any country being bled white! England surely has been bled white in that regard. Not only has she spent her own money, but she has borrowed billions of pounds from the United States, in order to finance the war, whereas if she had collected the amounts that she has advanced to her debtor nations, she would not have had to borrow one dollar from the United States, and the rate of exchange to-day would have been different: the pound sterling would have been worth its face value in the United States instead of being at a considerable discount, by reason of the fact that she advanced very large amounts of money to her sister nations in Europe, engaged in the same struggle as herself—to Italy, to France, and to Belgium. These are the facts. My honourable friend forgets that these are the facts, when he jumps at the opportunity to get a stab at the country, the great country, that bore the brunt of this war. If it had not been for the British navy the war would not have lasted three weeks, and everybody knows it. To say that England has done nothing, when she maintained that navy, which kept secure the trade routes of the world in order that this war might be fought out and that the people of Europe might be supplied with food! And the honourable gentleman cannot speak unless he sneers at that great country!

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I rise to a point of order. I have said nothing in my speech, not one word, that could be interpreted as being a sneer at the British Empire—not one word. I did criticise, and it was my right to criticise, the conduct of Lloyd George at that time. I think my honourable friend should bear that in mind.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But the honourable mover said absolutely the same thing.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Oh, yes, but there are reasons why.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is the honourable gentleman going to make a speech or is he rising to a point of order?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am rising to a point of order. If ten Englishmen and one Frenchman were to rise in this House and were to use the same language as to the conduct of Lloyd George, the one man would get all the reproach; and, Sir, that is what you are doing: you are selecting that man. Let me tell you one thing, though, that it will produce no result at all. So far as I am concerned, I have nothing to reproach myself for, and I will not change my conduct, but will speak my mind whenever I think I should do so.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You were speaking your mind, but I do not think the workings of your mind are of such importance as to make any difference to anybody, no matter how you speak it.

My honourable friend referred to the conduct of Lloyd George only since the war. Let me say to him, and I have pleasure in saying it, that if there is any one man to whom the winning of the war is due, it is that great man Lloyd George—the greatest man in the world to-day, the man who took hold of matters when the situation on the continent was nearly desperate. I was over there at the time, and know something whereof I speak. He is a man of dynamic energy, of wonderful power, The moment he assumed the helm of state one could see the difference in the feeling of the people, the difference in the response of the people, the difference in the army, the difference in every way—Lloyd George, the man whom this puny statesman would attempt to traduce on the floor of this House; Lloyd George, the wonder-worker. Born in a remote village in Wales, the son of a poor preacher, the adopted son of a cobbler, a shoemaker. He has fought his way up, single-handed. He became a country attorney, and to-day stands pre-eminent among the statesmen of the world. And we hear would-be sarcastic remarks made by little two-by-four statesmen regarding this wonderful man, the man in whose hands the Tiger of France, Clemenceau, and the statesmen from the country to the South of us were but as clay in the hands of the potter. And he, forsooth, does not meet the expectations of the honourable member from Montreal (Hon. Mr. Beaubien). Lloyd George when he learns of this, will no doubt be deeply repentant, and I would not be surprised if he were to instruct his secretary to send a letter of apology and explanation to the honourable member. Now, I have paid more attention to the gentlemen who have traduced the British Empire than they deserve, because that Empire will stand triumphant and glorious when all the yelping curs at her heels are gone and forgotten.

I am in the deepest sympathy with the honourable gentleman who is promoting this Bill, and my sympathy goes further than that of honourable gentlemen who merely sympathize with him. They sympathize tremendously; but, for fear that their sympathy might mean dollars and cents, they will not support his Bill. I will not only sympathize with the honourable gentleman, but I will support the Bill. I took a vow myself—a vow that I would not ask any one else to take—realizing as I did the wretched nature of the German nation, that I would never again so long as I live buy any article knowing it to be of German manufacture, nor would I deal in the store of a man who sold German goods. That is the way I feel about this matter, and I intend to support the Bill.

Hon. WM. ROCHE: Honourable gentlemen, when my honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) introduced this Bill, I ventured to make a few remarks along the line that it would be extremely difficult to detect German goods, and also because of their mixture with other goods, and the necessity of their use in the arts, that we might be injuring ourselves more than we would the Germans. I think that indirectly I was the subject of the collateral censure of my honourable friend from Hamilton on that score; but I would ask him if he would penalize the whole German nation—the manufacturers of Germany, the hard working artisans of Germany, and the labouring men of Germany, for the injuries which the Kaiser and his military entourage inflicted upon the other nations? Would we make our enmity and animosity perpetual? Would we carry it on forever? And would we injure these people when the effect of our actions might be injurious to ourselves? That is a very plain and simple inquiry which I would present to the honourable gentleman.

But I would make a further inquiry into his historical recitations. He raised the parallel of Hannibal Barca and the Roman Republic of that time. We know that Hannibal had made a rather treacherous assault on Saguntum, and had been victorious at Cannae and Lake Thrasymene; that the soil of Italy was covered with the bones of those who had fallen in defence of the republic; and that the tremendous Numidian cavalry had defiled within sight of the walls of Rome. But was Hannibal a relative of any of the ruling families of Rome at that time? His father had caused him to swear eternal enmity. But I woul' like to know by what law my honourable friend would try the Kaiser. Would he try him by the law of England? would he try him by ex post facto law? would he try him by international law? We know that the Kaiser is the heir, by the second branch, to the throne of England. If he were tried by the law of England, he would say, "I am entitled to trial by my peers". And when has it been provided that the head of a warring government shall be tried by his enemies? These are the questions that were before the British people, and I do not know that Holland was unwise to shelter the Kaiser and not to give him up. We know that England has all along sheltered political prisoners; we know that it has been her boast that she has been the asylum of political refugees from all parts of the world.

Now, let us go a little further. How can we deliberately charge upon Germany acts of belligerence? How can we ascribe all the evils of war to Germany. Does not my honourable friend remember the 4th of August, 1914, when Germany had not declared war against England, but England declared war against Germany? Has he forgotten that fact? Was the German Emperor then justified in defending his dominions or not? Was the Emperor of Germany and were the people of Germany not justified in using all the military means in their power to prevent invaders coming into their country?—because it was the intention of the others to invade. Has the German mind forgotten the French occupation of 1808, after Jena and Auerstadt when Napoleon overran Germany? They have not forgotten the occupation of their cities, and the exactions made and the suppressions imposed upon them. When Napoleon was in Berlin in 1806-7, what did he do? He did exactly what my honourable friend proposes now; he issued an embargo against trade with the British Isles. That failed utterly because English trade penetrated into every seaport on the continent. The other nations sympathized with England, and she was able to maintain her commerce and continue the war for twenty-one years until Napoleon was taken to St. Helena.

There are other historical points that might be brought forward. Why continue this petty enmity, this penalizing of our own people for having German goods or goods partially German when the British Empire is receiving German goods, restoring German trade, and trying to secure German trade?

But, further, what is the policy of the British Government in Europe? They do not wish any other power to be dominant, and when they have supported powers until they were able to balance or overcome other powers, they have taken the other side, because they must preserve that balancing of forces in Europe which enures to the peace of Europe and the peace of the world. What was the conduct of England in the war with Austria after the days of the elder Pitt? She supported Maria Theresa against the Prussians. When Frederick the Great took command of the German armies and seized Silesia the English went over to the other side.

Other people can read history as well as my honourable friend, and can recite as pregnant instances as the honourable gentleman has. It is the policy that Britain has pursued. They have awakened to the fact that there is a war of aggression on the part of France. Germany knows very well that France was only waiting. It is a subterfuge to say otherwise. If Germany had not invaded Belgium France would have invaded Germany. She had her plans fully prepared.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: What authority has the honourable gentleman for making that statement?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I have the very best authority, and I may tell my honourable friend that the plan of every ship that was built was known to Germany. Does my honourable friend think that these diplomatists that meet in Paris are blind and deaf and dumb to what is going on around them?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Are you referring to our Canadian representatives?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I do not know anything about them; I have never seen them; they never come to me for authority or anything of the kind.

The tendency is now for peace. For Heaven's sake let us have peace. Have we not had enough of war? Have we not sacrificed men and money and the amity of the people? Have we not violated the laws of God and man? Will we carry it on forever with enmity against any? Let us have peace, by Lloyd George or by France or Italy or Germany or any other power; let us have peace, and let God's will be done on the earth.

Hon. JAMES DOMVILLE: Honourable gentlemen, I do not want to say very much. But while these historians are at work where is poor Ireland? Did not the Germans send over brigades to kill the Irish in 1700? That is a matter of history. I am strongly in favour of the Bill, but, as my honourable friend has pointed out, there are difficulties. The fact is we are all full of imperialism I thought my honourable friend over there (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) wanted to commit us all to jail. We did not look to history, my honourable friend here (Hon. Mr. Roche) says. But what are we going to do? We had before our eyes imperial honors; and those who did the fighting, what did they get? They were humbugged. We were led to believe that it was a war of necessity. If they had all these troubles to work out, I do not know why they did not let the Serbians and Bulgarians kill one another instead of us. It is true that England had to step in and hold the sea, which the navy did so well that it saved the nation. I do not agree with all the statesmen; I do not agree with a good many in this chamber, because their views of governing the world are not sound and will not be carried out. Lloyd George has done remarkably well—no one better; still he was forced into it. The people of the country went to war to get their wealth dissipated and their children killed; but in Canada the blandishment was put over us, and without reckoning where we were we stood to defend anything. Where I come from the women and the churches were all talking of "your duty to God and man." But I say there is a greater duty than that. A man's intelligence should be used for the country he lives in, to make happy homes. That is what these embryo statesmen should consider. But unfortunately we are fighting—

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Shadows.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Shadows, as my honourable friend says. There are generals by the score going around. Some of them did very good work. I speak now with knowledge, knowing something about military matters. But this is not a time to cavil. We have to do something. We cannot hang the Kaiser because he has lots of relations in England.

It is very difficult to have the Kaiser hanged up on Tower Hill, because his relatives everywhere would be humiliated. Now, we must face this thought. My honourable friend says we cannot help it, we cannot send over an army, except an army of politicians and statesmen, to bring about peace. But we can do the next best thing: we can point out to the world that Canada is brave enough to say: "We will hold aloof, and will have no truck with you in the shape of trading in goods, and we will punish Germany by having nothing to do with her; she must take her medicine, and must be punished indirectly, if not directly, for fighting our countrymen, hanging them, shooting them, ravishing them, and she should be brought to book." I congratulate my honourable friend because of his statement.

Hon. W. H. THORNE: I want to state briefly why I am not in favour of this Bill. I have been in trade and merchandise all my life. The object of the promoter of this Bill is no doubt to prevent the consumption of German goods in Canada. Will it have that effect? Sentiment will not prevent the consumption of German goods. In a few years the sentiment created by the war, the feelings opposed to the use and importation of German goods, will die out.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: All the worse.

Hon. Mr. THORNE: It is proposed to penalize any one who may buy these German goods; but I noticed that immediately after the armistice was signed the British merchants were reaching out to trade with Germany, and were re-creating the business they had lost during the war, although the sentiment is probably as strong in England as it is in this country. My feelings in regard to the war and its results are very strong against the Germans, but as a merchant I realize that that sentiment will soon die out, and that if people can buy a jack-knife made in Germany that suits them better and is cheaper, they will buy it. If the object is to prevent the consumption of German goods, I would suggest raising our tariff barriers or prohibiting the importation of German goods. If this Bill is passed the result will simply be that many Canadians, backed by Germans who are strong commercial men with strong commercial sense will find that there will be sale throughout this country for their goods if they can be placed here cheaper than the American or British. They will open up houses of their own, will put advertisements in the papers offering German goods for sale, and will put signs over their business places announcing "German goods dealt in here." I know enough about trade in this country to know that in nine cases out of ten people throughout the country districts will not hesitate, as soon as stable government is established on the other side of the water, to buy German goods if they are a little cheaper and as good as they can buy from the Mother Country or the United States.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

DIVORCE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill X, an Act for the Relief of Gladys Stewart Addison.—Hon. Mr. Barnard.

Bill Y, an Act for the Relief of Fedorin Cope.—Hon. Mr. Schaffner.

DIVORCE BILL (GENERAL).

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED.

Hon. W. B. ROSS moved the second reading of Bill J, an Act respecting the Dissolution and the Annulment of Marriage.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, in moving the second reading of this Bill, I do not propose to make any extended remarks. The Bill is unlike the Bill that was before the House the other day, which was entirely concerned with giving jurisdiction to the Superior Court of Ontario and the Superior Court of Prince Edward Island in the matter of divorce, and giving those two provinces the English law as it existed on the 15th July, 1870—merely a transfer of jurisdiction from this House to those courts. The present Bill is a different thing, and will apply to all the Divorce Courts in Canada, and it contains a number of provisions which will make the law a little more uniform than it would be without this Bill.

In the first section, for greater security, I intend to insert in the third line, with the consent of the committee, the words, "The province of Quebec alone excepted" after the word, "province." That leaves the Bill to apply to all courts in Canada having jurisdiction as to divorce.

The second section deals with a matter of this kind. A wife may be petitioned against by her husband for a divorce on ground of adultery, and on the trial of the cause it may transpire that she was innocent and that he was guilty. In England there is a statutory provision that in such case the husband's petition would be dismissed, but the wife would be entitled to a divorce against her husband. That is a good law, because it makes men careful, and tends to prevent men from bringing actions for divorce unless they are prepared to stand examination and cross-examination as to their own conduct.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I understand the law of England requires that, but I do not quite see the necessity for this section.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: There is no necessity for it as far as Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan are concerned, but there is in regard to British Columbia, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, because they have not such a provision, while the other provinces, which have the British law as of the 15th July, 1870, have that provision. The honourable gentleman is quite right in stating that there is no statute in the case of those provinces, but I want all the provinces put on the same footing.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: How is it that the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have not the English law as well as other provinces?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Because they have special laws of their own. Prior to Confederation they passed a divorce law which is still on their books.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: They adopted the English law with modifications.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: No. The legislature of Nova Scotia adopted the Scotch law, a very wide divorce law, and later on, a few years before Confederation, they narrowed it down. For instance, the Scotch law grants divorce for desertion for five years; but that was cut out, and it is limited now to one charge, that of adultery.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is similar to the others, then, because the sole ground is adultery?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Adultery; but they have not this particular provision of the British law.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: So this Bill is not necessary to Bill I?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: No, Bill I stands by itself. This present Bill will produce uniformity in all the courts, to a certain extent.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: You are providing here for the uniform application of Bill I?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I have provided for a new form of practice which refers to a certain state of facts, which may exist in any one of the courts.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: This is merely to establish a uniform practice in those courts?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Yes, that is it. The principle of section 3 is the same as that of section 2. In British Columbia, and all those other provinces that adopted the English law, a husband is entitled to a divorce on the ground of adultery alone, but the wife has to prove adultery plus desertion or cruelty, etc. There is a good deal of complaint on the part of women of the country, and I sympathise with them in their view, that the law should be made the same for both.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is that the law in England?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Yes, but this will put the wife and the husband on the same footing. Under section 3 the wife can get a divorce on the ground of adultery alone.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Bill I says that the English law will apply; then the two Bills are distinct?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I know, but this follows the other Bill. It would repeal the law of England that far, as applied to us.

Section 4 contains what I regard as an important and very just provision regarding domicile. Every one knows that it is a rule of English common law that the wife's domicile is the domicile of the husband, and the jurisdiction of the court granting the divorce is settled by the question of domicile. If a wife is deserted by her husband in one of the provinces, and he moves elsewhere, it is a great hardship to the wife to be compelled to find out where he has moved to, and chase him and file her petition in that province, or in a foreign country, as the case may be. Hence section 4 provides that a wife who is entitled to divorce on the ground of adultery may have a domicile of her own. For instance, I saw a case of this kind in Nova Scotia. A woman applied for a divorce, her husband having left her and gone to Western Ontario and settled there. The judge in the divorce court in Nova Scotia dismissed the petition on the ground that her domicile was the domicile of her husband, and therefore she would have to come up to Western Ontario. Of course, it is an implication of the common law that when a woman marries a man she intends to live with him; but there is also this pretty strong implication, that when a man marries he undertakes to take care of her and make her his helpmate and companion. For that reason I think it is very fair that where a wife has been deserted by the husband and is applying for divorce she should have a domicile as if she were a femme sole, and not be subject to this common law rule that the domicile of the husband should govern. I may say that this is the law in New South Wales, and although there was some objection to it at first by the Imperial Parliament, the contention about it was abandoned after some few years, and the married woman there has the relief as given under this section 4. I attach more value to this than to almost any other section in the Bill, and I may say it was put in as result of questions I was asked in reference to another Bill that was withdrawn. But I refused to have anything to do with it unless this clause went into it, because I have seen a great deal of hardship of that kind. I saw here one case in particular, one of the hardest cases that I have ever seen before the divorce courts. A very fine young English woman who was married in England was brought out here by her husband, and two weeks after her arrival he deserted her. It turned out that he had been in this country for about a year. He was engaged to this girl before he left England. He got entangled with another woman here, and, instead of breaking off his engagement in England and marrying her, the dirty coward went back to England and married that beautiful woman, and he brought her out to this country. He ran away two weeks after bringing her to the city of Toronto, and left her stranded here. She would not go home—she said she could not and would not; she wanted to stay here; she wanted to get a divorce and get into some position in this country and earn a living. The Parliament of Canada has not been tramelled with regard to this question of domicile as a court would be, and it is, in my opinion, absolutely necessary and highly meritorious to give a wife who has been deserted, as that one was, a separate domicile, so that she may not have to go chasing after her husband, without knowing exactly where he is. In the case I have mentioned, after the husband left the city of Toronto, there was hardly any trace of him.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Does my honourable friend think that it would be well to add to section 3 the words, "or in the law of England," so that the section would read: "Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the law of any province, or in the law of England. . . ." Does not the honourable gentleman think it would be better to make that reference to the English law?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I am trying now only to explain the principle of the Bill, which will be taken up in committee section by section. I hope honourable gentlemen understand that the fullest criticism of every section is invited, for I would be sorry if the Bill were to pass in any other way, without being carefully examined, clause by clause, line by line and word by word That is what I think ought to be done with any divorce legislation brought here.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will the honourable gentleman allow me a question, which arises out of the subject he is now discussing. My honourable friend has no doubt looked up the laws of the various provinces in regard to domicile. Let us suppose the case of a woman in Nova Scotia who has obtained a divorce from some court in one of the other provinces or in a foreign country. This question of domicile has a very wide application, and the question arises in my mind, just what recognition would be given by the court of Nova Scotia to the divorce obtained in a court of one of the other Canadian provinces, or in one of the states of the American Union, for instance. How would that work out?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If the divorce was not granted by the court in the place where the woman was domiciled, the court of Nova Scotia would not recognize it at all. The test of whether a former divorce is of any value or not rests on this question of domicile.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Take the case cited by the honourable gentleman, that of a woman in the country for three months. Would that be a sufficient period to give her a domicile in the province of Ontario?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It is all a question of fact that comes before the judge. If she can show the judge that she has made her home in Ontario, that is sufficient. It is not a question of whether she has been here three months or six months. As the English courts say, a person may not be domiciled even after twenty years' residence. It is necessary to convince the court that you have abandoned your old home and acquired a new home. It is in every case a question of fact.

Clause 5 is a clause that makes the husband or the wife a competent and compell-able witness. The purpose of this provision is to bring about uniformity. The wife or the husband can give evidence in Nova Scotia. I do not know what the law is in New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: That is a clause which requires a great deal of consideration. While the husband and the wife might be asked to give evidence, and be competent witnesses, it would strike me as being inadvisable to compel them to testify.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That point can be taken up when the Bill is discussed in detail in committee.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Very well, I would like to discuss it.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Then under section 6, the co-respondent is not a party to a divorce suit.

Section 7 provides for a decree nisi. We had some discussion on that the other day. I regard that as an important section. It is a mistake to grant an absolute divorce in the first instance; the divorce should be revokable for a least three months. I am not sure that six months might not be better. Experience in England shows that there are a great many cases reopened during the six months in which the decree is a nisi decree.

As to section 8, restricting the publication of the reports of divorce suits, I do not think there will be any difference of opinion.

Section 9 relates to alimony. I have my doubts about that section, as to whether the jurisdiction belongs to this Parliament or to the provincial legislature; but I thought it better to put it in here, and if the provinces have any doubt about the matter they can act under their own alimony laws. Some of the provinces have local statutes now. But this is one of the questions on which I have never been able to make up my mind, and I have not been able to find anybody who can tell me who has the right to deal with the question of alimony, which is closely related with the question of divorce.

Section 10 deals with appeals; and I intend to move in committee another clause at the end, giving courts power to make rules of practice. I forgot about that, but it can be done in committee.

This, honourable gentlemen, is just a short statement with regard to the Bill. You will see that there is in it nothing radical, and I think it would produce considerable uniformity in the divorce courts without making any substantial change in the law of divorce. In fact, it would not at all enlarge the jurisdiction of the courts in granting divorces, or the grounds on which the divorces would be granted. At all events, I think that all divorce legislation is of great importance and I invite the attention and the fullest criticism of this honourable House on every section of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It seems to me, from a reading of section 3, that it applies to all the provinces:

> Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the law of any province, adultery by the husband shall in itself be sufficient cause for the dissolution of a marriage.

My honourable friend, I know, has in mind the establishment of uniform legislation and procedure in those provinces in which divorce can be granted, but it looks from the reading of that clause as if it applied to the one province which he left out of Bill I.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The honourable gentleman will find that section 1 will read in this way:

> In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, "court" means the superior court having jurisdiction within a province, the province of Quebec excepted.

I proposed to insert those words. But if there is any doubt on this point—there should not be the slightest—I can deal with the question in another way. Instead of those words, "the province of Quebec excepted," being inserted in section 1, there could be inserted at the end a clause to this effect: "This Act shall not apply to the province of Quebec."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That will be satisfactory.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That would perhaps be a neater way of putting it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why do you give the wife a separate domicile? Is it so that she may bring an action in any province where she happens to be?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Certainly; instead of her having to chase the husband. The husband has his domicile, and if he wishes to institute divorce proceedings he may do so where he is. This gives the wife her domicile and she brings her action where she is domiciled, instead of chasing her husband all over the earth.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: There is one question on which I am not clear, and it is this. It is proposed by this Bill to provide that all the superior courts in the various provinces shall have authority to grant divorces. What I would like to know is what are the causes for which those courts may grant divorce? I do not see any of those causes stated in this Bill. In what Act, or under what legislation or jurisdiction, can the courts grant divorce, and for what reasons? The only reason that is mentioned at all here is adultery, and that is mentioned only by the way. There are no causes put down here as statutory causes for which divorce can be granted, and I would like to learn from the honourable gentleman (Hon. W. B. Ross) where those causes are to be found, if they are not in this Bill?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I may say, honourable gentlemen, with regard to those causes that they are contained in the statute, which will be found in volume 3 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. For the province of New Brunswick, they are found in the statutes of that province—the volume of 1886. With regard to all the other provinces, they are to be found in the English law. In connection with divorce, the grounds are stated seriatim.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Then there will be different grounds in different provinces.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The grounds in British Columbia and all the Western Provinces, and in Ontario and Prince Edward Island, will be a little wider than those in Nova Scotia, and a little different from those in New Brunswick. It is not desired to interfere with Quebec at all, or with the other provinces any more than we can help. If Nova Scotia desired to have a change made regarding the grounds for divorce, I have no doubt this Parliament would put Nova Scotia on the same footing in that respect as the other provinces; and the same applies to New Brunswick. There is no difficulty at all, however, in ascertaining what are the grounds of divorce, for they are statutory.

Hon. THOMAS CHAPAIS: Honourable gentlemen, in opening my few remarks on this Bill, I must state that they shall be somewhat different from those I would have felt bound to make on the Bill formerly introduced by the honourable member from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Barnard). That other Bill had a wider scope. One of its obvious consequences would have been to break into the civil law of a great Canadian province, to defy one of her main religious and legal principles, to upset a very important part of her civil code, to put her judiciary in the most painful and dangerous position, in a word to create a situation pregnant with trouble, ill-feeling, friction and endless dissension. Clauses 2 and 3 of that Bill aimed at making divorce lawful within the province of Quebec, at introducing the principle of divorce in the common law of that province, contrary to this fundamental enactment of her Civil Code:

185. Marriage can be dissolved only by the natural death of one of the parties. During their lifetime it is indissoluble.

That clause is the embodiment of a doctrine held as unassailable by our forefathers, and juridically asserted by our old French laws, which are a most important part of these "civil rights" guaranteed by the Quebec Act of 1774.

It was never intended to invest the Federal Parliament with the power of subverting that doctrine, and of giving an adverse meaning to the words "Marriage and divorce," introduced in clause "91" of the British North America Act. To support that contention, allow me to make a brief quotation from the "Debates on Confederation." The Solicitor General of Canada made the following declaration in the name of the Government, on the 21st February, 1865:

Let us now examine the question of divorce. We do not intend either to establish or to recognize a new right, we do not mean to admit a thing to which we have constantly refused to assent. But at the conference the question arose which legislature should exercise the different powers which already exist in the constitutions of the different provinces. Now, among those powers which have been already and frequently exercised de facto is this of divorce. As a member of the conference, without admitting or creating any new right in this behalf, and while declaring, as I now do, that as Catholics we acknowledge no power of divorce, I found that we were to decide in what legislative body the authority should be lodged which we found in our constitutions. After mature consideration, we resolved to leave it to the central legislature, thinking thereby to increase the difficulties of a procedure which is at present so easy. . . . . We found this power existing in the constitutions of the different provinces, and not being able to get rid of it, we wished to banish it as far from us as possible. (Debates on Confederation, 1865, p. 389.)

This important and authorized declaration gave the true meaning of clause 91 of our federal constitution. Taking all that into consideration; I am sure the honourable members of this House, coming from our sister provinces, would have expected to see their colleagues of the province of Quebec join issue on that point, and make a strenuous effort to resist the intended invasion. Fortunately, we have been spared that unwelcome necessity. And I must pay my most sincere tribute to the noble and wise inspiration which has led to the withdrawal of the Bill previously introduced.

But we have got now to deal with a new Bill. And though it does in no way challenge our convictions and feelings, as far as we represent specially the province of Quebec, it involves a general principle that for my part, as a Canadian legislator, I cannot see submitted to Parliament without raising my humble voice against it.

What is the object of this Bill? Undoubtedly it is to facilitate divorce. Last year, when a Bill of the same nature was introduced into this Parliament it was stated very frankly and very plainly that "in the interests of this country something should be done to facilitate divorce." This quotation is taken from the Debates of last Session, page 3772. To facilitate divorce is then the avowed and admitted object of the present Bill. And, should it become law, we all know that its aim would be attained. If, departing from the present regime of restriction and of special and exceptional jurisdiction, you should enact that, in eight of the nine Canadian provinces, there shall be courts vested with the power of granting divorce, you would surely take the best means of disseminating divorce, of encouraging it, of laying the temptation at the door of every citizen of this country. That cannot be denied. Should reasoning fail to prove that proposition, experience would come to the rescue.

The honourable members of this House know what took place in England. Until 1857 immemorially there was no such thing as legal divorce in the United Kingdom. No better proof can be given in support of that assertion than the following statement of Blackstone, the great English jurist. He writes in his celebrated "Commentaries":

> The canon law, which the common law follows in the case, deems so highly, with such mysterious reverence, of the nuptial tie, that it will not allow it to be unloosed for any cause whatsoever that ariseth after the union is made. And this is built expressly upon the revealed law. With us, in England, adultery is a cause only for separation from bed and board; for which the best reason that can be given is, that if divorce were allowed to depend upon a matter within the power of either of the parties, they would probably be extremely frequent.

That quotation is surely decisive; it cannot be controverted that, before the legislation adopted in 1857, legally the marriage tie was indissoluble in England. But from the middle of the seventeenth century the practice was introduced in Parliament to grant divorces—to pass Bills of relief, as they were styled. This regime of privileged divorce, by way of special legislation, lasted for about two centuries. Then towards 1850 a campaign was launched to abolish parliamentary and organize judiciary divorce. A commission was appointed to study the question, and, after two or three vain attempts, a law was passed in 1857 to give divorce a legal status in England and to create a Court of Divorce and matrimonial causes. With that piece of legislation, divorce became part of the common law. What was the result? A renowned historian, Mr. Justin McCarthy, will give us the answer. We read in his "History of Our Own Times":

> The Divorce Act, judging by the public use made of it, certainly must be held to have justified itself in a merely practical sense. It seems to have been thoroughly appreciated by a grateful public. It was not easy after a while to get judicial power enough to keep the supply of divorces up to the ever increasing demand. (A History of Our Own Times, vol. III, p. 27).

The following figures fully support that statement. During the first thirty years after the passage of the Divorce Act of 1857, 6,381 decrees absolute for dissolution of the marriage tie were granted in the English Court, while during the preceding two hundred years 317 only had been granted by Acts of Parliament. (Gemmill, "Parliamentary Divorce," 1889, p. 258).

A few more figures will not be here out of place. In the United States divorce is granted by the States Courts. In Canada until lately, for five provinces out of nine, it was granted only by Act of Parliament. Statistics compiled for a period of twenty years show that during that time, from 1867 to 1886 the American courts had granted 328,716 divorces (The Encyclopædia of Social Reform, Bliss and Binder, New York and London, 1908, p. 397), while in Canada the total number of divorces granted had been only 116. "The ratio of divorce to population in Canada, on the basis of the census of 1881, for the above period, was 1 to 37,983 persons, while in the United States, on the basis of the census of 1880, for the same period, the ratio was 1 to 150 persons." (Gemmill, p. xxii.)

Let us now make a comparison between the regime of divorce granted by courts in our own country and the regime of divorce enacted by way of special legislation. Statistics compiled for the first twenty years of Confederation show that the number of divorces granted by Parliament during that period, for the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, where there were no divorce courts, was only 26, while in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and British Columbia, where such courts were in existence, the number of judiciary divorces was 109. The ratio to population on the basis of the census taken in 1881 was for Quebec 1 to 194,146, for Ontario 1 to 101,222, for Nova Scotia 1 to 8,472, for New Brunswick 1 to 7,648, for British Columbia 1 to 3,297. The disproportion can be seen at a glance. A similar result is obtained if you compare figures for a later period. During the last session of this Parliament the following statistics were put before the House of Commons. From 1906 to 1918—thirteen years—the number of divorces granted by way of legislation for the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba was 244. For the same period the number of divorces granted by the courts in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and British Columbia was 380. The population of the former was 5,849,215 and the population of the latter was 1,236,707. Therefore the ratio to population for the first five provinces was 1 to 23,992 while it was for the three last 1 to 3,254.

I need not further insist on that demonstration. I think it is an admitted fact that the unavoidable and natural result of the creation of divorce courts has been and must be a tremendous increase in the number of divorces. And, moreover, we have the candid admission of the promoter of a Bill similar to this one that its aim is "to facilitate divorce." It is to make it more easy, less remote, less costly, more accessible to all classes and to all individuals—in a word, to make it more democratic, to use the favorite expression of the day.

Now, is that object a desirable one? Is it desirable that the number of divorces should increase. Is it desirable that the number of marriage ties dissolved should be growing? Is it desirable that the number of families disorganized should follow a steady progression? Is it desirable that the number of unfortunate children, guiltless victims of the family wreck, should multiply? I say, decidedly no. Divorce is a social evil, a social danger, and instead of being disseminated it should be restrained. Decentralization of justice was once an undoubted national boon in our Canadian history; but decentralization of divorce would be an unqualified curse. The family is the corner stone of society. In the words of Goldwin Smith "it is of more importance than the state; the family may regenerate the state, but the state cannot regenerate the family." And another writer of a very different school of thought, the celebrated Ingersoll, has none the less sounded the same note, in the following lines:

> Civilization rests upon the family. The good family is the unit of good government. The virtues grow where one man loves one woman. Lover, husband, wife, mother, father, child, home, without those sacred words the world is but a lair, and men and women merely beasts.

Now, divorce is the most deadly menace to that great social institution. It strikes at its very foundation. It threatens its stability. It opens the door to unholy feuds and to shameful schemes devised to nullify the most sacred of human contracts. And in the countries where it has become part of the civil laws it has grown to be a source of patriotic dread and despondency. Some years ago an American writer made the following declaration:

> Among the social problems which are forced upon us for solution none are more radical in their relation to society at large than the matter of divorce, none are charged with greater danger for the future of the United States. If the foundations be destroyed what can the righteous do?

And another writer stated in an American review:

> The country begins to be pretty thoroughly aroused to the evil of frequent divorce and the necessity of wise and efficient measures to ward off the imminent danger to the family and to the state and church as well. The evil has put on such fearful proportions during the last few years and chimes in so readily with the present demoralized condition of society, that only combined special and persistent measures will have the least chance of success..

Only a few weeks ago, a well-known American divine, Rev. Dr. William T. Manning, rector of Trinity Church of New York, was raising his voice against what he called "the modern assault on morals." He said:

> We have now to face the question whether the institution of marriage in any real sense is to continue among us or whether America is to be a land in which marriage is regarded as a permanent relations only in the private view of certain individuals or of certain religious groups of people.
> On Manhattan Island alone 1,335 divorces were granted in 1919, as against 889 in 1918, an increase of about 50 per cent, over the year previous. In the States of Oregon and Washington a recent investigation is said to show that during a six months' period the ratio was one divorce to every two marriages.
> Statistics published some time ago by Mr. Carroll D. Wright, of the Department of Labour, in Washington, showed that in twenty years nearly 1,000,000 persons in the United States had applied to the courts for divorce, and that more than 650,000 had been granted. Think of the number of children, relatives and friends affected by these broken homes and of their influence among our population as a whole. There are comparatively few families which are not in some way touched by this influence.

Our present system of easy divorce is in some respects less moral than the system of polygamy. Under the system of polygamy a man remains in responsible relation with the wives whom he marries. Easy divorce allows any number of successive wives or husbands to cast loose upon society, with cessation of all mutual responsibility as soon as the divorce is secured.

From my own ministerial and pastoral experience, I am convinced that if the divorce courts were abolished, the overwhelming majority of those who now seek divorces would find it possible to live together with reasonable contentment, and that many of them would find the full happiness and reward of faithful married life.

The present destructive movement in regard to marriage is not going to stop and cure itself. Unless it is opposed by some strong counter force its progress will continue of its own momentum.—The Montreal Gazette, 26th March, 1920.

It was from such cogent motives than one of the greatest public men of England in the last century, Mr. Gladstone, made a desperate fight against the ill-advised Divorce Act of 1857. His biographer, the Rt. Hon. John Morley, tells us that he took the floor twenty-two times during that memorable debate which, through the different phases of the measure, lasted eighteen days. Let me quote a few passages of the powerful speech delivered by him on the 13th of July, 1857. I may be mistaken, but it seems to me that they admirably fit the present debate. Mr. Gladstone said:

What is my honourable friend going to do? He is going to give you a law under which divorce is to be made accessible to all classes of the community. Is not that a new law?... The fact of the occurrence every year of one or two of those divorce Bills limited to particular classes of society has had no more effect upon the mass of the British people than if no divorce Bill had ever passed. I am most anxious, Sir, to make this assertion broadly, because it is vital to the whole case. The honourable and learned gentleman says he is bringing forward no new law. Well, I won't argue with him whether it is a new law as regard the infinitesimal part of England to which it applies, but I say the present Bill pledges him to carry divorce to the door of all men of all classes, and his law therefore, is as completely novel to all interests and purposes as if the first Bill of divorce passed in the case of Lord Roos in the reign of Charles II, had never been introduced in Parliament and never been followed up by others to pander to the passions of society." Having thus stated what was the purpose of the Bill and what would be its natural outcome. Mr. Gladstone went on to point out its logical and fatal consequences. He said: "All Englishmen and all Englishwomen—all Irishmen and all Irishwomen—and in Ireland the observance of the marriage now is still more exemplary than in this country—know that on entering into the marriage state they contract an indissoluble tie. And then you have the authority of philosophers—most impartial philosophers—of Gibbon who condemns the license of divorce, and of Hume, who speculating with his unequalled acuteness on this subject, says there is nothing so dangerous as to bring a man and woman into union, unless you bring them into absolute and total union. The union has been absolute and total. The whole course of desire, thought, purpose, will and habit has adopted itself to the entireness of that union. The marriage state is a total and absolute change. You pass over a gulf which you know you cannot repass; you enter upon a new state and you adopt all its obligations,. But you are now going to make that gulf which has hitherto been impassable, passable; you are going to say to the woman who has sinned, although she may have sinned under the strongest temptation, "Your sin shall be unpardoned, you shall be divorced, and nothing shall reconcile you to the man from whom you have been divorced; your sin shall be impardonable by the person you have offended though with his whole heart and soul he may be desirous to forgive you. That to me is a most doubtful state of things as regards the shutting the door to the penitent; but still more doubtful is the shaking the great idea of the marriage contract in the minds of the English people. Do not let us deal with humankind as if they were creatures of pure intellect, as if life was governed by conviction. The traditions of past time and the rules and customs of society which a man inherits as it were from those who have gone before him, have more perhaps to do with the government of life than any other consideration. The indissolubility of English marriage is an idea which has never been shaken in the mind of England. At no time have the middle and lower classes of the English people known what it was to have marriage dissoluble. Take care, then, how you damage the character of your countrymen. You know how apt the English nature is to escape from restraint and control; you know what passion dwells in the Englishman. But here is a great feeling of restraint observed among your population, and which has prevailed ever since England was England, that the marriage tie is indissoluble. And is there any adequate reason for giving a shape to this notion? Are you quite sure, when you have shaken the feelings of the people on this vital point that they will settle down again upon a basis defined for them by my honourable and learned friend the Attorney General or by Act of Parliament? As I have said, you are bringing in a system entirely novel, not novel. perhaps, as regards that small class of persons who have from time to time been divorced through the intervention of private Acts of Parliament, but perfectly novel as regards the great bulk of the community and the great precedents of human history. No single age. or country, or period has ever known a law of divorce like this. None have ever gone so far, without going further.... I cannot regard this plan in any other light except one namely, as the first instalment of change, the first stage on a road of which we know nothing. except that it is different from that of our fore fathers, and that is a road which leads from the point to which Christianity found the heathenism of man. (Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, 3rd Series, vol. 147, pp. 835, 853-856).

In taking that stand, Mr. Gladstone was following the steps of another great leader, Sir Robert Peel, who, on a similar attempt, had firmly and successfully opposed the creation of a divorce court. "With reference to public morality, it appeared to him (I am quoting his own words) that it would be much better to retain all existing inconveniences than to make divorce so easily obtained. To do that would be to hold out a temptation to adultery." (Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, 2nd series, vol. 24, p. 1287.)

In 1857 Mr. Gladstone had not yet attained that immense prestige which crowned his older years. He was defeated in that great parliamentary battle. But eighteen years later, Sir John Macdonald, Prime Minister of Canada, declared in the Canadian House of Commons that in his mind, "amongst the moral triumphs which Mr. Gladstone had achieved, there was none so great as his defeat when he protested against the establishment of a divorce court in England." (Debates of the House of Commons, 1875, p. 859.)

Sir John Macdonald made that declaration in 1875. Later on, in 1888, when a prominent member of our House of Commons was urging that steps should be taken to remove from Parliament the duty of granting divorce, Sir John made another statement on the same subject. He said he was opposed to a divorce court, because if one were established the number of applications would greatly increase. That had been the experience of England, and of those who once strongly opposed the establishment of the divorce court and the transfer of the trial of divorces from the legislature to the court, very many had seriously repented their advocacy of the measure, because the number of divorces, the corruption of society . . were increasing to the annually increasing degradation of the public mind. He preferred our system which offers very considerable impediments to the granting of divorces, to the systems which prevail elsewhere. (Debates of the House of Commons, 1888, vol. 2, p. 1414.)

This was a settled opinion in the mind of Sir John Macdonald. We find the following lines in the interesting "Memoirs" of Mr. Pope on the departed leader:

> Speaking one day on this subject (the Senate's jurisdiction in the matter of divorce), Sir John observed that the late Lord Westbury had told him that, when he sat in the House of Commons, he had rather a stiff encounter with Mr. Gladstone on the establishment of a divorce court in England, against which Mr. Gladstone took strong grounds. "And Gladstone was right, too," observed Sir John, "for of this I am convinced, that the establishment of the divorce court in England has been productive of much mischief. In former times, the procedure with respect to divorce was the same as in force in Canada to-day—that is, it could only be obtained from the Upper House of Parliament. In those days divorces were rare, expensive, and hard to get, and the morals of the community were spared the columns of scandal with which the English papers are occasionally filled. The only objection was on the ground of expense. It was urged that divorce was a luxury, accessible only to the rich. The establishment of the divorce court in Canada would mean cheap and easy divorces, which would lead to great laxity in the marriage relations. . . . They are beginning to see that in the old country. I hope it may be long before we have anything of the kind in Canada." (Memoirs of the Rt. Honourable Sir John Alexander Macdonald, by Joseph Pope, Vol. II, page 235.)

Nobody would deny the weight of that expression of opinion from the great Canadian statesman who took such a prominent and decisive part in the framing of our constitution, and in the moulding of our political institutions. Allow me to quote also the opinion of another eminent Canadian political man and jurist. Speaking in the same strain as Sir John Macdonald, the Honourable Mr. Mulock, later on Minister of the Crown and now Sir William Mulock, Chief Justice of the Exchequer division of the Supreme Court of Ontario, made this declaration:

> I think the facility with which divorces are granted in England and in other countries does go a long way to interfere with the sacredness of the marriage tie. . . There is no reason that justifies, in my opinion, the establishment of a divorce court for the province of Ontario. Divorce courts do exist in certain other of the provinces. If it is sought to harmonize legislation, that may be a reason for all these cases being brought before Parliament, but it does not supply a reason for adopting the suggestion made by my honourable friend for Queen's. (Debates of the House of Commons, 1888, vol. II, page 1416.)

In face of all these authorities, of all these powerful arguments against the dissemination of divorce, which would be so detrimental to the morals of our people, to the stability of the family, to the sound education of children, to the welfare of the state, what indeed can the supporters of that measure have to say? They say, first, that they do not ask for the introduction of the principle of divorce in our laws: it is there. The only thing they aim at is a change of jurisdiction, a betterment of the procedure followed heretofore. I would beg to reply that the proposition now before us goes further than that. They want to introduce legal divorce where it does not exist. They want to lower the fence, to open the gate, and give freer passage to the unloosened passion of men. Among our Christian community divorce is a disease; they strive to make it an epidemic. And I submit that a moral epidemic eats more deeply into the vitals of the nation than a mere physical one.

The advocates of this measure also say that it is out of sympathy for the poor, for the lower classes, deprived of that great blessing of divorce that they propose this benevolent reform. Is it necessary to answer such sophistry? Divorce has been deemed at all times by the most eminent expounders of human wisdom to be a religious and social evil. Because that evil, with the complicity of passion, interest, and laxity of doctrine, has become accessible to the rich—has become a luxury of the rich, as you say—is it a reason why it should be made cheap enough to invade and poison the poor? Supposing that some fashionable and costly vice had fought its way through the higher ranks of society, do you mean to tell me that it is uncharitable, that it is contrary to the great and sacred principle of democratic equality to prevent the adoption of a scheme introducing the high-bred vice in the lower and swarming ranks of the nation? Daniel O'Connell, in face of a similar argument, made this typical answer:

> I wish, as the honourable mover, that the poor shall be placed on the same footing with the rich, but I would accomplish that not by giving it to the poor, but by refusing it to the rich. . . . If we regard the subject merely as statesmen, I would ask: are the upper classes who can obtain divorce more virtuous than the lower, who cannot? No man will say that they are, and is not divorce a temptation to adultery? Does it not give another argument to the seducer, when it enables him to say that he will restore the object of his passion to her rank again, or perhaps raise her to a higher rank than before? . . . . The Christian law, the canon law, the common law, and the law of both the Catholic and Protestant churches, are all on my side. (Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, 2nd Series, Vol. 24, p. 1,024.)

Then the promoters of that so-called reform use a circumstantial argument. They say, and it is true, that we have to face a frightful flood of divorce cases. They add, and it is false, that we should therefore divert that flood towards the ordinary civil courts. But they forget, or rather they try to make us forget, that this is only a passing and exceptional surge, due to special, extraordinary and well-known circumstances. Let us do our best to meet the crisis. I will not attempt to find out what would be the best emergency prescription. But I most energetically object to the enactment of a standing treatment for an occasional illness. Are we going to accept the notion that to face a transient evil we should enact a lasting harm? The muddy flood will recede, but the impairment of our social system would stay. I trust that the good sense of this Parliament will not be deceived by such faulty reasoning.

In concluding these too long remarks, I would like to sum up in a few words the whole trend of my feelings in regard to this Bill. Its aim is to facilitate divorce; its consequence would be to spread divorce. Now, divorce is a religious and social evil, which should not be disseminated, but should rather be restrained, if not suppressed. Therefore such a measure can not be acceptable to those who firmly believe that the theory and practice of divorce is condemned by the doctrine of Christ and by the most sound principles of social philosophy.

If the present Bill should be adopted, for the first time legal divorce would be introduced in the statutes of Canada. Let us pause before we take that momentous decision. Let us ask ourselves if it is wise, if it is sound policy to court family decay and social demoralization. Our country, like many others, is living through troublous times. We have to face disturbing problems and to prepare for coming trials. Let us do nothing which could weaken our fundamental institution and poison the wells of our national life.

Hon. G. W. FOWLER: Honourable gentlemen, just a word or two with regard to this Bill. I must congratulate the honourable member from Granville (Hon. Mr. Chapais) upon the very eloquent speech which he has made. I might say, paraphrasing what was said of old, it almost persuades me against this Bill. It certainly gave us a very interesting historical account of divorce as it was attempted to be enforced in England, and has also pointed out to us the horrors that might ensue if we persisted with this Bill. I sympathize with the point of view of those persons who are opposed to divorce. I think that divorce should not be granted except upon the highest grounds, and only in cases of utmost necessity. There are, however, cases in which it would seem to be a very great unkindness to keep two persons united in the bonds of marriage when all the obligations implied in that bond have been broken. It is contended that we should not have divorce, because, it is said, marriage is a sacrament. Those who are opposed to divorce use the quotation: "Whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder." There are other quotations from the Bible that might be used on the other side

"Be ye not unequally yoked together," is one that I would suggest as containing some argument in favour of divorce.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Does not that refer to oxen?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That shows the absolute lack of knowledge of the Holy Scriptures on the part of my learned and honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton). I regret that my honourable friend should make such an exhibition of his absolute ignorance of what is common knowledge to those who have, as some of us have, studied the Scriptures from our youth. If it were true that all marriages were God-directed, then I would agree that divorce should not be permitted; but, judging by some of the marriages that we have seen, they exhibit evidences of the handiwork of another power, which occupies the nether regions, rather than the Power which controls the heavens and the earth and all things that are therein. I would have little faith in the all-wisdom, in the omniscience and enveloping kindness of Divine Providence if I believed that it had art or part in the bringing together of some persons whom I have seen joined in the so-called holy bonds of matrimony. I think that the sooner we get away from that idea the better.

Now, I want to congratulate the honourable gentleman, the projector of this measure (Hon. W. B. Ross), upon the attempt on his part to take away from this Chamber the reproach which it has had with it for a long time, of being merely a place where persons who have a quarrel in the married state may come and air their grievances and be separated. There are services which this branch of the legislature can perform of much more importance to the state than even the dissolution of marriage, and I am glad that this will be relegated by these Bills to the courts. I have great faith in the courts of this country. I have a very high respect and esteem for the judges of this country. The proper qualification of a judge is that he shall be an honourable man and shall have a general working knowledge of the law of the country. It is not necessary that he should be a brilliant advocate; for my observation has taught me that usually the most brilliant advocates have made some of the very poorest judges. I am not geting personal with my honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton). There is no reason why he should not be a judge, because we all recognize the fact that he is qualified. But the fact that a judge should be of upright character; he should have a fair and open mind; he should be a man who entertains a respect for all the institutions of the country. He should have a respect for the very position which he holds. In the great majority of cases our judges fulfil the conditions and qualifications that I have laid down. I have had an experience of thirty odd years in the courts of one of the provinces of this country, and, speaking of that province, I may say that almost every man whom I have known on the bench has had the qualifications which I have laid down as being necessary for a good judge; and I believe the same is true of the rest of Canada. But there are men who, by some stupid blunder on the part of an unwise executive, have been elevated to the bench of this country and who are unfit to wear the judge's robes; who, forgetful of their own dignity and the dignity of the bench to which they belong, have laid aside the robe of the king's judge and have assumed instead the cap and bells of the king's fool; as Shakespeare says, in order to tickle the ears of the groundlings, in order to win the cheap applause of the hangers-on of the courts, that guttersnipe type whom puerile curiosity brings to the courts to listen to the cases being tried; I say judges have been known who, for the sake of winning the applause of that type of men, have indulged in ribald criticism regarding this institution and regarding individual members of this institution. Such men are elevated to the bench, not by reason of the possession of brains or by reason of having an intimate knowledge of the law, but sometimes for racial or religious reasons. I am glad to know that the members of the courts of this country are in the main such men as litigants in divorce cases may safely trust their future to; and I may say, while I am not in favour of indiscriminate divorce, I am in favour of striking the shackles from the slave, and of giving persons who have been led into an unfortunate marriage an opportunity to achieve in a second marriage the happiness which they may have missed in the first.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Crosby, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS moved the second reading of Bill 33, an Act to incorporate the International Loan Company.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I would ask in this particular case for a suspension of the rule so that the Bill may be sent to the Committee on Banking by Friday. The Bill has passed the Insurance Department and has been passed by the House of Commons. It is just an ordinary Bill for the incorporation of a loan company, and the gentlemen obtaining the charter have been here for about ten days. By having it go to the committee for Friday a week's delay will be saved. Under the circumstances, I would ask that the Bill be read the second time now.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would the honourable gentleman explain what this Bill refers to?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: The International Loan Company, which was incorporated in the province of Manitoba, is making application for a Dominion charter.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

DIVORCE BILL (GENERAL).

SECOND READING.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of the motion of Hon. W. B. Ross for the second reading of Bill J, an Act respecting the Dissolution and the Annulment of Marriage.

Hon. A. B. CROSBY: Honourable gentlemen, when I moved the adjournment of this debate last evening I did not do so with the intention of making any extended remarks, or with the hope that anything that I might say on this Bill would amount to very much. This question has been fairly well threshed out. I happened to be in the House when the second reading of Bill I came up. On that occasion the honourable gentleman from Granville (Hon. Mr. Chapais), who yesterday gave us a very eloquent address on this Bill, asked that Bill I be not read the second time then, stating that he desired to speak on the principle of the Bill. The honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) told my honourable friend that he need not worry, that Bill J that was coming up was the same kind of Bill, that the principle was the same, and that he could make his speech upon the second reading of that Bill. But when I got up last evening to move the adjournment of the debate, the honourable gentleman from Middleton said that there was no principle to Bill J. He said, "Why move the adjournment? It has no principle." I was very much struck by such a remark coming from a gentleman of the make-up of my honourable friend from Middleton, because if there is one man to whom I would look for information, and whom I would expect to carry on any matter with decorum, particularly a legal matter, it is the honourable gentleman from Middleton.

I was here when Bill I was read the second time, and my honourable friend from Granville (Hon. Mr. Chapais) put exactly the same question that I would have put. He said that he did not intend to give a silent vote on such an important Bill. I had intended to vote conscientiously on Bill I; but when the honourable gentleman from Middleton said that Bill J would be the same as Bill I and that we could discuss the whole matter when it came up, I was satisfied I could vote as my conscience dictated. My honourable friend from Granville made a very eloquent address yesterday and I was interested in listening to him. What he said was particularly well directed. If I understand Bill I, it is for the purpose of giving the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec the right to establish divorce courts.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: No, not Quebec.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I should have said Prince Edward Island. I know that Quebec is always able to take care of itself in such matters, and I hope that honourable gentlemen from that province will excuse me for coupling that province with what I said, without any such intention. All the other provinces now have divorce courts of their own, and Ontario and Prince Edward Island, I understand, are the two provinces which will get divorce courts under Bill I, and I understand that Bill J provides regulations for their conduct. My difficulty is this: I have the good fortune to be one of those who are frequently accused of being opposed to divorce. There is no doubt about my position on that question. But we have divorce to deal with and so far as I am able conscientiously to deal with it, I am prepared to do so on its merits. At the same time, I am anxious that we should have as little divorce as possible. We should be careful not to do anything that would encourage divorce in this country. If I came to the conclusion that my honourable friend's Bill would curtail divorce, and give us a guarantee that there would be fewer divorce cases than we have under the present system, I would be very much inclined to vote for it. On the other hand, if I came to the conclusion that the putting of those Bills upon the statute book was going to multiply the divorce cases, I would vote against the Bill and that the law should remain as it is, bad though it may be. As you can see, honourable gentlemen, I am in quite a dilemma. Would some honourable gentleman tell me what is the truth of the matter? I might even refer to the lawyers, whom I am not very anxious to speak of, but whom we sometimes have to do with and take a great deal from, and who sometimes charge very high. I am told by some honourable gentlemen in this House that if divorce courts were established in Ontario the province would be flooded with divorce applications as soon as the law went into effect. I do not know whether that is true or not. I do not know very much about Ontario; but, judging from the people who come from that province, I consider it a very fair and very important province. But I am told there are hundreds of persons who are just waiting for that opportunity. If that be so, I shall be very much inclined to vote against Bill I and Bill J and let the situation remain as it is bad as it may be.

The same is true of the province of Prince Edward Island. I heard one honourable member representing that fair little island state that its people did not want this divorce law; they preferred to be without divorce courts of their own. If he speaks for that province—and I am confident that he is capable of speaking for it—then you are forcing upon that province a court which it feels able to do without, and which may possibly provide a speedier way of obtaining divorces than coming to Ottawa.

People talk about the expense. They say that the Divorce Court in Ottawa is a rich man's court. I have taken a great deal of interest in divorce cases, because I have been desirous of seeing that no divorces were granted by this Chamber that should not be granted; and I must say that the committee inquiring into those divorce cases are entitled to a great deal of thanks from this House and from the country for the very able manner in which they have dealt with them. I know of only two cases coming before this Chamber, or before Parliament, on which a division was taken. In both cases I voted against the divorce. One was afterwards thrown out in the Commons. The other, I am sorry to say, was not thrown out; that was the Eastcott case. You will remember we divided on that case. That was one of the occasions on which I felt that the granting of the divorce was not as fair as it should have been; for, in my judgment, the evidence was not sufficient, and without any doubt there was a very strong canvass made on that occasion. Moreover, I saw a number of honourable gentlemen leave the Chamber when the vote was about to be taken. I was disappointed at that divorce being granted.

However, it is said that this is a rich man's court. Now, my experience in watching and examining the different cases has not been that many rich men have been divorced. Most of the applications have been from persons belonging more or less to the working classes. There has not been a great proportion of business men. That shows that the Senate Committee is not wholly and solely a rich man's court, but that those who feel obliged to take advantage of the opportunity of obtaining a divorce may come here and obtain it, if they are entitled to it.

One reason why I feel opposed to this measure is that if the province of Ontario or the province of Prince Edward Island is to have a court of its own, a man who did not have strong reasons for a divorce might be able more easily to obtain the services of a lawyer for perhaps $5, $10, $15, $20 or $25—just according to the scale; whereas, I notice, very few of the lawyers who come here to plead cases get less than $250. That is a substantial fee. I know there are cases in which the petitioner makes application for a return of the deposit money, and if the petitioner is a person who has not plenty of funds, the committee sometimes refunds a portion of the $200; but I notice the lawyer always gets his $250, or $300, or more, for his share. That is one thing that may perhaps have a tendency to deter persons from seeking divorce. I have reason to believe that, because most of the cases that come before the Senate Committee are cases of persons who are already practically divorced, by virtue of the fact that they are living apart. Either the wife has left the husband and gone to live with somebody else, or the husband has left the wife and gone to live with another, and usually months have elapsed before the divorce application is made. That indicates to me, honourable gentlemen, that there are many persons who are living together, although they are not getting along well, and who might perhaps try to obtain a divorce if the method were easier—if they could go to a court in the vicinity in which they live, and if the lawyer's fee were smaller. The result might be a greater number of divorces in the different provinces.

One thing I would point out, honourable gentlemen. Marriage is too easily effected in this country. We ought to begin by putting more restrictions on marriage. Any man can go from the municipality in which he lives over to another municipality, buy a license, and go with some lady and get married straightway, without asking anybody's leave or license, or without any other restriction. I think, as I have said, that marriage is too easily effected. The provinces should get rid of the idea that all they need be concerned with is to obtain the few dollars charged for the license, or that the more persons who get married the better, so long as they add a few more dollars to the coffers of the provincial treasury. That seems to be the whole principle of the license bureau—to grant a license without ascertaining whether the man has been married or not, whether he is a widower or not, or whether he has already a wife or half-a-dozen wives. Licenses are granted without any hesitation.

A few days ago, when I was in New York, one of the leading papers there gave an account of 264 marriage licenses that had been granted on Easter Saturday morning before 12 o'clock. The newspaper stated also that the deputy clerk had married 84 persons that morning. If that is so, assuming that the deputy clerk of licenses arrived at his office at 9 o'clock and stayed there until 12, a period of 3 hours, or 120 minutes—as nobody goes to work now much before 9 o'clock, although a few, but very few, may start at 8—

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: Are you sure that three hours are equal to 120 minutes?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: One hundred and eighty minutes. If I had any doubt I would apply to my honourable friend, but he did not give me time. Well, if you take 180 and divide it by 84, you will see that the marriages were disposed of very quickly and without much ceremony; that there was not the sacredness that there should be in the surroundings. I think it would be a good thing for the clergymen at the head of the Christian bodies in this country to form a union and insist that they should perform all the marriage ceremonies in this country, instead of having them performed by magistrates and every Tom, Dick and Harry. They should insist on that safeguard, because it is needed. I am told that some of the Christian bodies are not paying as much attention to the clergy as they should pay. Why do not the clergy combine in a union, as every other class is doing. The workingmen have their unions; the lawyers have their union—and it is one of the biggest and strongest in the country; the engineers have a union; so have the doctors and other professional men—all but the clergymen. It would be wise for the clergymen to get together and see if they could not bring about such a situation as would compel persons desirous of marrying in this country to be married before some Christian minister. And let the clergymen protect each other, so that an Ottawa man wanting to get married could not run down to Montreal and obtain a license without difficulty and get some one there to marry him. If the person belongs to Ottawa he should be married in Ottawa, or should have a certificate from some one in this city, which he could present in the other municipality for the purpose of obtaining the license there. That would be a very necessary safeguard. I say that if we started better, we might have better results.

Now, I trust I have made my position as clear to the honourable gentlemen present as it is in my own mind. We are dealing with an evil, and I have decided that it is perhaps better for me to vote for our retaining control of that evil here rather than for handing it over to some other court or courts, thus perhaps affording a greater opportunity or greater inducement for married persons to go into the divorce court. I cannot vote against Bill I at the moment, as it has already been read; but I claim the right to vote against it when it comes up for the third reading. Now, I do not want to be misunderstood. I do not want honourable gentlemen to feel that I am going against this Bill because I think divorces should not be granted at all; I am voting against it because I want to vote for what I believe will offer the least inducement to applicants for divorce, and will prevent as much as possible the increase of divorce in our country.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: The honourable gentleman was talking about a union of clergymen. Would that include the clergymen of the church to which he belongs?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I think they are all pretty well united. They take good care that they marry all their people.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Then why preach to others? Can they not take care of themselves?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Well, I always like to help the weak.

Hon. B. C. PROWSE: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to say just a word or two on this question of divorce. My honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Crosby) could have made his whole speech in one sentence, and we would have understood it thoroughly: "I am against divorce."

Now, we have no lawyer from Prince Edward Island, and the reason I asked the other day to have the debate adjourned was that I had not seen the Bill. But I wish to compliment the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) for simplifying the situation so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned. We do not often have a divorce case in Prince Edward Island. So far as I can remember, we have had only one. But I do not see any reason why we should not have a divorce court on the Island, in case we should need it, so that a poor man as well as a rich man might take advantage of it.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, the honourable senator from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton), when discussing Bill I, referred to some remarks that I have made and rather took exception to my saying that I was in favour of bringing the divorce law up to date. I infer from the honourable gentleman's remarks that he may have thought that I was in favour of largely extending the causes for which divorce should be granted in this country. I desire for a few moments to explain to the House the present position of the divorce law in British Columbia, for it was with reference to the law in that province that I spoke of the divorce law being brought up to date. We in British Columbia have been working under the law of England of 1858, and divorces have been granted in that province both before it entered Confederation and since. For some considerable time divorces were granted without any question, but a few years ago Mr. Justice Clement took exception to the manner in which they had been granted and raised the point that British Columbia was not justified in granting divorce at all. I should like to refer for a few moments to the remarks which he made on this question. Dealing with the case of Sharpe v. Sharpe, brought before the Supreme Court of British Columbia, Mr. Justice Clement used these words:

> If I do not discuss at length the views expressed by the learned judges in Sharpe v. Sharpe (1877), B.C.R. 25, it is not because I have not carefully considered them. When first called upon to exercise jurisdiction in divorce, I was at once struck by the fact that the jurisdiction, if it exists, is unhappily in one way so fettered and in another so unfettered as to place a judge in a very unenviable position. Tied down to the law of 1858, he has none of the safeguards which now obtain in England against collusive actions—I mean the granting in the first instance of a decree nisi and the reference of the case to the King's Proctor for investigation and, if necessary, intervention; while on the other hand, as the full court has held in Scott v. Scott (1891), 4 B.C.R., 316, there is no appeal from his decision to any tribunal in this province.

I think the two reasons stated by the judge in that particular case are very good reasons why we should support this Bill that my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) has brought before the House. That judgment states the position of the law in British Columbia to-day, and it shows that at the present moment we have not the power to investigate cases to the extent we should do. The Bill that my honourable friend has introduced should have the effect of preventing some divorces rather than increasing the number which several honourable gentlemen in this Chamber seem to think would be the result of passing this measure. I think it is in the interest of British Columbia at any rate, and probably of the other provinces, that this Bill, which has been so ably defended by my honourable friend from Middleton, should become law, and that it will not tend to facilitate divorce, but will, on the contrary, have the effect of deterring applicants from coming to the court as much as has been done in the past.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: I have no objection to the Bill as presented by my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross), provided it is made clear that it will affect only those provinces which will have divorce courts, and I understand from him that he intends to make it clear that this does not apply to Quebec. If I had been present when the Bill was explained, I would have challenged the affirmation that no principle was involved in it, and that it was but a transference of jurisdiction, inasmuch as Ontario and Quebec have not hitherto had an absolute right to divorce. The people of Ontario and Quebec had no settled or clear right to divorce. Any one from either province could come here and petition Parliament for legislation, which could, however, be refused. Even if a case was made out, a majority might be found in this Chamber, or in the other, to reject the Bill. So the people had no absolute right to divorce. Now, by virtue of Bill I, if it passes and is sanctioned, any citizen of Ontario will be entitled to apply to the court for a divorce, and, if he establishes his case, the judge is bound to grant his application.

I was in complete accord with my honourable friend from Granville (Hon. Mr. Chapais) yesterday regarding the danger of extending divorce legislation to such a large province as Ontario; but I feel that if Ontario desires this legislation it is not for those from another province, which is not affected, to refuse by their vote to grant what Ontario asks for. We are a Confederation, and it is understood that each province may enjoy whatever advantages it can claim under the constitution. We must recognize that principle, and at the same time see to it that no legislation that may be desired by one province and granted to it shall be extended to a neighbouring province if it is contrary to its customs and religious tenets. We applied that principle quite clearly in 1906, when a Bill called the Lord's Day Act was introduced by the Government of the day. That Bill purported to cover the whole of Canada, but I know that certain of the provinces, particularly Quebec, objected to certain of the restrictions contained in it, and fought strenuously to have the autonomy of each province respected, and we succeeded in having inserted in the Bill a clause which reads as follows:

> No action or prosecution for a violation of this Act shall be commenced without the leave of the Attorney General for the province in which the offence is alleged to have been committed, nor after the expiration of sixty days from the time of the commission of the alleged offence.

Under this clause we felt that each province would be able to administer that Act according to its own habits and ideas. That law has worked, I think, satisfactorily. Those provinces which have felt that their own laws in that respect were not sufficient have been able to take advantage of the Federal Act; but those provinces to which the provincial legislation has been satisfactory have not invoked this Act, and for them it remains inoperative. I think we should be guided by the same principle in the matter now before us, and I thank the honourable gentleman from Middleton for having recognized that principle and for having excepted the province of Quebec from the operation of this Bill. If the Confederation pact is to endure, and if harmony and peace are to prevail in this country, we should not do violence to the habits and customs of the people, especially to their religious convictions.

Hon. WM. ROCHE: Honourable gentlemen, I listened yesterday with a great deal of pleasure to the essay of my honourable friend from Quebec (Hon. Mr. Chapais.) A great deal of it I agree with; but with some of the points in it I am at variance. I will state these as briefly as I can. In the first place, my honourable friend drew a rather unfavourable contrast between the province of Quebec and the province of Nova Scotia and some other provinces which he named, on the ground that there were a much greater number of divorces in the province of Nova Scotia and these other provinces than there were in the province of Quebec. In the province of Nova Scotia there is a great influx of strangers. Many of them contracted hasty marriages, perhaps on the other side of the water, and perhaps on this side, and some of them have obtained divorce in the courts. That is not chargeable upon the native inhabitants. On the other hand, it does not follow because offences are not brought to judgment that a great number of them have not been committed. Perhaps, if the same facility had existed in the province of Quebec as exists in Nova Scotia, the number of divorce cases in that province would be very much multiplied. The number of criminals who appear in the police court in one place or another may indicate that crime is not more prevalent in that place than in another, but simply that the detection of it is more vigilant in the one place than in the other.

But I would rather dwell upon the sanctity of the home, of which the honourable gentleman spoke, and of the efforts that ought to be made by every influential body to preserve the amenity and the kindness and the binding force of home and domestic life in this and every other country. I will go a little further and say this: that when the affection of the man for the wife has vanished, from any cause whatever, if that affinity which the Creator made and blessed has departed from home life, home has become a hell, and the sooner a divorce is granted the better. I am not in favour of divorce. I would like to preserve all those alliances which have been made with sacred sanction, legal sanction, or whatever it may be. I think that with a little patience and forbearance a good many cases of divorce might be avoided. But I have known instances of married people dragging along a miserable existence when, for the benefit of their families and the benefit of society, they ought to be apart.

There is another feature of the case which I think has not been mentioned by anybody, and I would like to allude to it. At the present time I believe that cases from Ontario are heard by the Committee of the Senate. I saw by the telephone book that the areopagus where the trials are held is room 651. If that is not a difficulty in the way of securing divorce, I do not know what difficulty may exist; and the proceedings are heard comparatively in private. I think the committee sit around and listen carefully and judicially to the evidence, without any outside interference. Most of the cases that come before this court are from the city of Toronto. Most of the divorce cases that I have listened to in the Senate have been either from Toronto or from Hamilton.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: But what would be the case in a city like Toronto if the hearings were held in open court, and women crowded in frantically to hear the proceedings, and kept out some of the venerable gentlemen who wanted to hear just how depraved the community was? And it would be in the newspapers. What would be the effect if the women took it up, and, as a matter of gossip, retailed all the disgusting features of the trials held in such a way? What effect would it have upon the young people? What effect would it have upon society in general to have the courts open, with people dropping in to hear what evil there is in the community? And if it were made the topic of moving pictures or some of the other means adopted nowadays to spread information amongst the people, what a diabolical effect it would have upon society by bringing these disgusting and horrible cases before the public mind and contaminating it! It is a great evil.

I do not perhaps lay so much stress upon the binding force of a religious ceremony. I think that any ceremony that would add importance and deliberation to the act of marriage would be desirable. Marriage is an old institution, because we have it upon the best authority that there was a marriage ceremony performed on the very day that Noah entered the Ark. It was not even the Jewish ceremony; it was the original ceremony, performed long before Christianity, long before the establishment of churches, long before the organization of civilization upon modern lines. Everything that would make the home life more amenable, more joyous, more satisfactory, I am for. How, then, shall we amend society? How shall we take away conditions that lead to divorce? How shall we alter conditions which make divorce the resort, and the only way of escaping an odious situation? Look at the great cities. Where do the men spend their evenings in the great cities? They spend them at the clubs and the theatres; and they spend their days in business;—business by day and amusement by night. Where do the women spend their time? At meetings of societies, social functions, and other entertainments;—domestic and home life neglected. The women of the present generation do not know how to keep house. They are not taught, and there is nobody to teach them. How shall we return to the good old days when the home was a pleasure, a delight, and an honour to look after? How shall we go back to those conditions? How shall we expend those safeguards of home and family life, and make them what they ought to be? That is the point. We should direct our efforts to reforming society if we can, not to running after and punishing the culprit after the offence has been committed, and making public and disseminating the details of bad lives everywhere. To do that will reform society and place it upon a better basis; it will elevate the home to its true condition in relationship to the population. That will be doing a good act, an act better than any divorce court that may be established, or any divorce court of the Senate, no matter how reputable, exacting, or well conducted, can do. We shall be doing a benefit if we try to restore the good old life that our fathers and our mothers and those before us lived.

Hon. GEORGE McHUGH: Honourable gentlemen, I did not intend saying anything on this subject. I am fully satisfied that you cannot establish a court that will deal better with divorce than the committees of the Senate have done since I came to this House. They have performed their work well. If anything were required to induce me to vote against establishing a divorce court in the province of Ontario, it would be the remark of my honourable friend who has just sat down (Hon. Mr. Roche) in reference to a remark of the honourable gentleman from Granville (Hon. Mr. Chapais) comparing Quebec and Nova Scotia to the detriment of Nova Scotia. The honourable gentleman from Halifax said that if Quebec had the facilities that Nova Scotia had, divorce might be more prevalent in that province. If the establishment of courts for the purpose of hearing divorce cases is going to increase the number of divorces in Ontario, I shall certainly oppose any such legislation.

THE STAFF OF THE SENATE.

PLAN OF ORGANIZATION ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL moved the adoption of the Second Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would draw attention to the second paragraph of this Report, which reads:

2. That the word "and" be inserted immediately before the words "Clerk of Stationery" in the title of the Deputy Clerk.

This refers to the item in the Minutes of March 11th, page 47, which read:

J. Chas. Young, Deputy Clerk and First Clerk Assistant, Master in Chancery, Clerk of Routine and Proceedings, Clerk of Stationery.

I understood that in the committee the word "and" between "Routine" and "Proceedings" was struck out, in order to make the Clerks designation agree with the heading used in our Minutes, "Routine Proceedings;" but this report does not cover that point.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think it is a mere matter of taste to use the title "Clerk of Routine Proceedings" instead of "Routine and Proceedings."

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It is a matter of keeping things in proper shape and order, and in accordance with the heading used in our Minutes.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The Assistant Clerk has always been designated as "Clerk of Routine and Proceedings;" but if there is any reason for striking out the word "and," th re would be no objection to the honourable gentleman so moving.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: In that case I would move that the word "and" be struck out, so that the title of the Assistant Clerk would be "Clerk of Routine Proceedings."

The amendment was agreed to, and the report, as so amended, was adopted.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL moved the adoption of the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think that this report, recommending that the number of pages employed by the Senate be increased to eight, changes the decision of the committee. It seems to me that four pages are quite sufficient for this Chamber. I understand that the ground taken is that the pages have to run errands in various parts of the building; but it seems to me the right thing to do would be to appoint two or three additional messengers if they are deemed to be necessary. I gather from conversation, however, that the proposed plan is to appoint only one additional page, and that he is to have specified duties. If that is the case the better way would be to increase the number of pages to five.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I may say that the application came to the committee from the Clerk of the Senate. We have now four pages, and one is wanted immediately for the Debates staff. The honourable gentleman from Halifax thinks it would be better to employ a messenger; but a page can do all the work, and he is only paid as a page and not as a messenger; so I think the members of this Chamber will be quite willing to pass a recommendation so far as that one page is concerned. The other three are not required this session, but they will be needed next session, and this recommendation, if passed, will give authority to the clerk to engage those additional pages and have them ready for work next session. This is an immense building, with large distances and great floor space, and more assistance in the way of messengers and pages is required than were found necessary in the building we have left. These additional employees are not necessary now, while workmen are in this building, and we have to put up with a good deal of inconvenience, dust, and unpleasantness, which will be absent next session; but the idea is to have at least one page for each of the three or four floors available for the members as messengers, and service of that kind. So far there have been requests for additional messengers, but it is more than likely that before the end of this session such a request will be made with a view to next session's needs. This recommendation was carried without a single opponent or dissenting voice in the committee, which had as full an attendance as I have ever known since I have been connected with it.

The report was adopted.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL moved the adoption of the Sixth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: I notice in this report a recommendation or resolution that the employees of the Senate, in addition to their actual duties, are charged with the execution of any orders that are given them by the Clerk of the Senate. I would like to know just what that means.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: That clause was inserted for a specific purpose. In carrying on the work of the Senate there are occasions when some particular employee is overworked, while others are doing nothing at all. The idea is not to give authority to the Clerk to change the regular duties of the employees in any way; but when occasion arises, if one is not doing anything, and there is work for him to do which cannot be accomplished by those whose duty it is, the Clerk may have discretion to put him on duty. For example, at present the Divorce Committee meets every day in the week, and our Clerk of Committees, Mr. Hinds, must be present every day, which makes it absolutely impossible for him to attend any other committee. Hence it is necessary to have somebody else to do his work while two or three committees may be on duty at the same time. At the present time the Clerk has no authority for that purpose, and honourable members of the Internal Economy Committee will remember that at our meeting the Clerk of the Senate had to act as clerk of the committee because there was nobody whom he could order to do the work. This clause is intended to give the Clerk authority to place on duty some one who is competent and is not otherwise engaged. To give an instance, our Law Clerk has a great deal of leisure, and I understand that formerly he did some work as a clerk of the committees.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: He was younger then.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Under this clause, if adopted, the Law Clerk might be called on occasionally to do some work in committees when Mr. Hinds was absolutely unable to be present, on account of being engaged elsewhere. That is really the reason this clause is put in, and I hope honourable members will see the force and necessity of it, and will, by passing it, give the Clerk the authority that we ask for.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: What I was particularly anxious to know was whether this would interfere in any way with the classification of the service?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: No; not with the regular duties.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It refers to other duties.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Whose jurisdiction would the Law Clerk come under? Which is the Tycoon and which is the Mikado? That is what I want to know? Is he to be bossed by the Clerk of the House, or his deputy, or is he to boss them?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: All these matters, I think, come under the jurisdiction of the Clerk of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Then the Law Clerk is not superior to the Clerk of the Senate?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The Clerk of the Senate is over all the clerks.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He is the deputy minister under the Civil Service Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not suppose there is any disposition to oppose the adoption of this paragraph of the report—that is, in substance; but I think the wording of the paragraph is susceptible of improvement:

> Your committee further recommends that, in addition to the present duties of the officials of the Senate, they shall undertake and carry out such other duties from time to time as may be assigned by the Clerk of the Senate.

Honourable gentlemen will see that that language, taken in its widest scope, would mean that the Clerk of the Senate could instruct the Law Clerk to act as a messenger, or could direct his own Clerk Assistant to do a messenger's duty. I know that that is not the intention.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I only say that I do not think the wording of the paragraph is very happy. I think, further, that if a little more inquiry had been made, it would have been found that the Senate on more than one occasion adopted reports of the Committee on Internal Economy which directed that the Clerk of the Senate should have authority over all subordinates. There must be some head, and the Clerk of the Senate has charge of the executive work of the Senate. Of course, I quite understand that there would be no disposition to make the Law Clerk a messenger; but, as I say, I think that the wording is a little wider than it should be. I have no objection to the substance of the recommendation.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: If the Law Clerk bucks up—and from my long acquaintance with him, I think he is very likely to do so—who is going to control? Has he not his appointment and position? You have certainly to take away his prerogatives first. If I were Law Clerk—

Hon. Mr. POWER: He is an officer appointed by the Senate, who can be removed by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Who is?

Hon. Mr. POWER: The Law Clerk.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: He is an appointee of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Yes, he is an appointee of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: For how long? And what are his duties under the appointment? This is a serious matter. I am not kicking in any way, but I want to see that there shall be no conflict, that is all. If he has to do what he is told, it is all right.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think no honourable member need be afraid that either the Law Clerk or anybody else would be put on duty that is uncongenial.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Excuse me. Do not say uncongenial.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: It is intended that the other duties should be performed only in emergency cases.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think the honourable chairman is unfortunate in using the word "uncongenial," because I can hardly think of any kind of work that would not be uncongenial to some gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think that the senior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) is right: that, if we turn up the reports of the Internal Economy Committee, we shall find one, and perhaps more than one, recommendation on similar lines, affirming the right of the Clerk of the Senate, as head of the service, to see to the proper administration of the affairs of the Senate. My honourable friend the chairman of this committee (Hon. Mr. Daniel) has cited instances of members of the staff being overworked and of clerks of committees being needed. It seems to me that up to last year the Law Clerk attended all meetings of the Railway Committee and meetings of the Committee on Banking and Commerce; so I believe that we are simply reaffirming the general principle which has already been adopted by the Senate.

There is a query I would like to make concerning part of this report:

> Your Committee beg to recommend that Mr. Joseph Bouchard, Translator on the Debates staff, be retired on 1st July next, and that he be granted an annual allowance of $1,500.
> Your Committee further recommend that the Clerk of the Senate be authorized to make the necessary arrangements for the translation of the Senate Debates for this Session.

I would like to know who is attending to the translation of our Debates at the present time, and whether we can be given any information as to the mode in which the work will be carried on until the end of the session.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I am very glad that the honourable gentleman has brought up that question, because, as a matter of fact, the work is not being attended to There is a great accumulation of this work. As the honourable gentleman may know, Mr. Bouchard has not been doing any work. He has not been able to do any work for some time, and the Clerk of the Senate applied to the Civil Service Commission for help. They sent one gentleman, but it was found that he could not do the work. We have a temporary appointee, a gentleman by the name of Potvin, who does the work very well indeed, as far as he is able to do it; but he is only a temporary appointee. Now, the Clerk is asking for power—the granting of which is recommended in the second clause referred to by the honourable member from DeLorimier—to make the necessary arrangements for the translation of the Senate Debates for this Session. It is the intention, as I understand, to get that work done by contract for this Session until other arrangements are made; that is the only thing that can be done under the circumstances. We have no authority under the Civil Service Act to appoint a translator; we must get one from the Civil Service Commission. We got one: he was inefficient; and we are now being held up by being unable to get the translation made. That is a very necessary part of the report.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am reminded by the statement of the honourable gentleman that I was informed some weeks ago that the Civil Service Commission, after taking all the trouble it could possibly take to find a translator, and after holding an examination, actually sent to the Senate a man who was totally incapable of doing the work. I want to emphasize that statement. It has been corroborated by the chairman of the Internal Economy Committee, and I make that statement in order that the Civil Service Commission may take notice. Here was an official, simply a translator, to be appointed. There were, I am informed, quite a number of applicants. Surely there was among them some man who could do the work properly; and yet, after examinations, they apparently picked out the worst in the list. Of course, I am aware that the Civil Service Commission has an immense amount of work to perform, and that it cannot itself proceed to examine the applicants, but must appoint boards. The members of a board may be drawn from Ottawa or from outside. It is a specially qualified jury to conduct the examination. Now, the Civil Service Commission should take care that those boards are properly constituted, in view of the utter failure which has paralysed the whole work of translating our Debates for the past month.

The report was adopted.

ELECTRIFICATION OF GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

DISCUSSION CONCLUDED—THE MOTION WITHDRAWN.

The Senate resumed from April 20 consideration of the motion of Hon. E. D. Smith:

That in the opinion of the Senate it is expedient and in the interest of Canada for the Government to proceed to substitute electricity for steam as a motive power upon the lines of railway owned by the Government as soon as and wherever economically practicable.

Hon. JOHN WEBSTER: Honourable gentlemen, before the debate on this resolution introduced by the honourable member for Wentworth (Hon. Mr. Smith) is closed, I feel it my duty to make a few remarks in the hope that I may be able to convince the Government of the necessity of doing something at the present time in the way of developing a further supply of electrical energy in the eastern part of the province of Ontario.

I think that we are all under an obligation to the honourable member for Wentworth for the very able and logical address he made in this House on Thursday last on this subject of electrifying where possible some of the Government railways, which in my humble opinion is a most necessary and proper course to pursue.

Now, we are all prepared to talk about Canada's natural resources, and I am free to admit that they compare most favourably with those of any other nation in the world; and one of the greatest of those resources is Canada's great water powers.

Let me say, honourable gentlemen, that I believe that Canada's success for the future now lies in the development of her natural resources; and, now that public ownership has been adopted by the Government of this country as one of their policies, I say to them to go on and still pursue their course along these lines, and wherever possible develop the necessary water-powers of this country and then electrify the Government railways with the energy thus produced and they will then have done something worth while towards rectifying the unfavourable situation in the exchange market of to-day.

Let me say further, honourable gentlemen, that the western part of this great province of Ontario has occupied a most enviable position owing to the hydro-electric development at Niagara Falls; and the cities of Toronto, Hamilton, London and St. Catharines have become beehives of industry through this great scheme whereby these cities were able to offer as an inducement to the proprietors of industries cheap power at a very nominal cost, say of from $10 to $15 per horse-power for a 24-hour service; while we who dwell in the eastern part of the province, where power is not available, have no such advantages, and for those industries that have to purchase coal in the United States at the present rate of discount you will find that it costs $75 per horse-power per annum for a 12-hour service. Honourable gentlemen, let me remind you that the people who dwell in the eastern part of the province have paid their full share of the cost of this hydro development at Niagara Falls without a murmur, although their towns and cities were starving for cheap power. Now, if public ownership is to receive our best and most careful consideration, I think it is up to the Government of the day at the earliest possible moment to see what can be done along the lines of harnessing up the Long Sault rapids, thereby improving navigation, and utilizing the energy developed on the mighty St. Lawrence to furnish power at first cost to supply the Government railways in the western part of the province of Quebec and in the eastern part of the province of Ontario.

It may possibly prove to be of interest to some of the honourable members of this House when I tell them that within 50 miles of this city there is one of the greatest water powers to be found on the continent of America—a power sufficiently large, if developed, to supply all the energy that will be required in both the state of New York and in this section of Canada for the next century. Now, why not develop it? There is simply no limit to the head of water there, and so far I have been unable to find a practical engineer who cares to even give an estimate of the quantity of power that can be secured by proper development at this point.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will the honourable gentleman state at what point? Where is that fall?

Hon. Mr. WEBSTER: The Long Sault rapids on the river St. Lawrence. This power has been permitted to go to waste since the creation of the world. Let me say, honourable gentlemen, that there is sufficient power there to furnish that section of Canada not only for domestic purposes but also for manufacturing and commercial purposes, and the electrifying of all the Government-owned railways between Montreal and Toronto.

Now, I fancy I hear some honourable gentleman say that this is an international stream of water and that complications between Canada and the United States are bound to arise. Let me say to that honourable gentleman that the people who reside in that district over in New York state who will be benefited by this great power development are just as anxious to see it go through as our own Canadian people are.

I am free to admit that the people who are financially interested in the port of New York are opposed to the scheme owing to an impression that they have that, if ocean-going vessels were to go up to the head of the Great Lakes to discharge their cargoes and there take on their overseas cargo and go out to sea by this St. Lawrence route, their own Erie canal and port of New York would lose some of their regular business. I am free to admit that navigation and transportation on the St. Lawrence must be paramount; but we are told by the most eminent engineers of to-day that, by this development, and the construction of the necessary lift locks, and proper dams, transportation would be improved, and that a sufficient revenue would be obtained from the sale of the power thus developed to pay more than 10 per cent per annum on the cost of the work.

The honourable member from Wentworth (Hon. Mr. Smith) told us the other day that it takes about 250 tons of coal per mile per annum for a steam railway, which at present prices, including the discount on Canadian funds, would mean $4 per ton or $1,000 per mile. As the Government now owns about 600 miles of railway within transmission distance of the base of this great power, see what a saving would be effected. In a year it would amount to no less than $600,000 for coal for railway purposes alone, all of which at present goes into the pockets of the mine owners of the United States. This one item alone would be equal to an annual revenue of 5 per cent on an investment of $12,000,000, to say nothing about the other revenues to be derived from the sale of power. With this development there would be no further necessity of radial railways paralleling the lines of steam railways in Ontario.

I do not wish to take up the time of the House further just now; but, when it is so difficult, not only in Canada but also in the United States, to obtain coal, it seemed to me opportune to bring to the attention of the people of this country the great waste of power that is going on from day to day and from year to year that should be conserved for the benefit of our people.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I would ask the honourable gentleman, for the information of some like myself who know very little about the subject, if he has any estimate of the expenditure that would be incurred in carrying out the project he has outlined?

Hon. Mr. WEBSTER: I have never heard the figures given. I know that both the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States have engineers making a study of plans and estimating the cost of this work now.

Hon. E. D. SMITH: Honourable gentlemen, I do not intend to take up the time of the House at any great length. There has not been any objection raised in this House to my motion, except those of the honourable Minister of Labour, which he did not press very strongly. His objections were: First, that we could not do this now because we have not the power; and second, that, in his opinion, we could not economically electrify the railways of Ontario at the present time.

In regard to the first objection, I stated clearly, in my remarks on Thursday last, that we had not the power now, and therefore could not undertake the electrification of the government railways or any portion of them until the Chippewa development scheme was completed, which I stated likely would not be until the end of 1921, or possibly 1922. I understand that when these works are completed there will be sold, or as good as sold, about 250,000 horse-power. If that is the case—and it is not likely that the remainder of the development will be finished until 1922 or possibly 1923—I quite agree with the Minister of Labour when he says that industries should be taken care of first. It is not likely that the Government of Canada or the Hydro-Radial Association, or any one else other than the manufacturers, will get any of this power until the manufacturers are satisfied, which is not likely to be until about 1923. So, we are not required to make an immediate expenditure of large amounts of money in this enterprise.

Then, in regard to the belief of the honourable minister that the electrification of steam railways is not economical at the present time. When I introduced this matter I stated that I was not an expert; but I have since had placed in my hands the report of a very important meeting of eminent engineers which took place in this city on the 19th of February last year. This report may be found in the Journal of the Engineering Institute of Canada of May, 1919. That meeting was held for the purpose of discussing railway electrification. There were many eminent engineers present, and I think it might be worth while to read their opinion. I shall take only a few extracts here and there, as the report of the meeting is somewhat lengthy.

The first paper read at the meeting was one by John Murphy, M.E.I.C., head of the electrical section of the Railway Department of the Dominion Government. He said:

It is many years since the N.Y., N.H. & H.R.R. cut its coal consumption in two by electrification.

Canada's coal shortage and its transportation difficulties, coupled with Ontario's power shortage during the war, have forced forward the question of railway electrification. It demands attention. Canada's steam locomotives use 30 per cent of all the coal consumed in Canada. But what is obtained at the wheels of the steam locomotives as the result of the mining, the hauling, the handling and consuming of some 9,000,000 tons of coal on locomotives each year in Canada? That is surely a pertinent question. The answer is as follows:—Only 3 (or 4) per cent of the mechanical energy which is in the coal itself, in the form of heat, becomes available in the form of power at the wheels of the steam locomotive! The 97 per cent (or 96 per cent) of the energy in those 9,000,000 tons of coal, which is lost every year in the transformation of the heat energy of the coal into the mechanical energy of the steam locomotive, cries out against a continuance of such wasteful procedure, and as engineers who are expected to guide the non-technical public, it is our duty, in my opinion, to industriously advocate the electrification of railways at every advisable opportunity.

The steam locomotive needs on an average 6 pounds of coal per h.p. hour because it burns coal while in the round house getting ready for its run, while standing on sidings and at stations, as well as while hauling its loads. The stationary steam plant, with its condensers and other fuel-saving apparatus—to say nothing of its better load factor—can produce power at the switchboard, which can be transmitted electrically to the wheels of the locomotive in such an efficient manner that from one-half to two-thirds of the railways' present coal needs can be saved by electrification.

That, you will observe, is with a steam plant producing electricity.

No argument is required, I think you will agree, to support the contention that eliminating the need for coal at a considerable distance from the mine is a greater measure of relief, and of true conservation, than increasing mine production and thereby adding more load to the already overburdened railways. Reducing coal consumption automatically relieves or releases men and apparatus all along the route from the mine to the consumer; it also relieves the route itself from some of its congestion.

So eminent an authority as Mr. E. W. Rice, the president of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, addressing that body in New York in February, 1918, made the following statement:

"It is really terrifying to realize that 25 per cent of the total amount of coal which we are digging from the earth is burned to operate our steam railroads—and burned under such inefficient conditions that an average of at least 6 pounds of coal is required per horsepower-hour of work performed. The same amount of coal burned in a modern central power station would produce an equivalent of three times that amount of power in the motors of an electric locomotive, even including all the losses of generation and transmission from the power station to the locomotive."

Railroading in the mountains is the most strenuous kind of railway work, and I have chosen some mountain sections as examples of what can be done to them. The Butte, Anaconda and Pacific railroad, by electrification, is said to have increased its ton-mileage 35 per cent and at the same time decreased the number of trains, and their incidental expenses, 25 per cent. The time per trip was decreased 27 per cent. It is said their savings in the first year's operation, after electrification, amounted to 20 per cent of the total cost of electrification. That railway buys electrical energy from water power plants.

On the Norfolk and Western railway electrical energy is obtained from their own steam station. Twelve electric locomotives have replaced 33 Mallets of the most modern and powerful type. The tonnage has been increased 50 per cent, and the electrification obviated the necessity for double tracking. The salvage value of the released steam engines was 45 per cent of the cost of electrification Electric locomotives make 8 times as many miles per train-minute-delay as the steam engines. Their terminal lay-overs average only 45 minutes and they are double-crewed every 24 hours. Pusher engine crews have been reduced from 8 steam to 4 electric. Steam pusher locomotives have been reduced from 7 steam to 2 electric. Steam locomotives used to "fall down" in cold weather—the electrics always "stand up," they are really more efficient, in cold weather. As you all know, during our severe winter weather, trains are delayed by the extreme cold as well as by storms. In conversation with a superintendent of a northern division not long ago, I was told that when the temperature fell to zero he at once reduced his train-loads ten per cent; that if the temperature went to twenty below zero, he reduced his train-loads twenty-five per cent; and from that on he was in mortal terror of his trains being tied up entirely. With extremely low temperatures and heavy snow storms tie-ups are inevitable on steam railways.

Speaking at the New York Railway Club in March, 1917, the electrical engineers of the Norfolk and Western railway stated that: "coal wharves, spark pits, water tanks and pumps as well as roundhouses and turntables have disappeared from the electric zone. Our track capacity has been doubled. Our operating costs have been reduced. From an engineering, an operating and a financial viewpoint our electrification has been a success." Speaking of the value of regenerative electric braking they went on to say:—'The use of the air brake is practically eliminated, it is only used to stop trains; it is regrettable we are unable to put a dollars and cents value on this great asset; to appreciate it properly one must have had experience with the difficulties of handling 90 car trains with air. Trains of 103 cars are now taken over the summit, 12 to 20 times every day, down the 2.4 per cent grade without even touching the air. We never broke a train in two or slid a wheel. It is done so nicely we wouldn't spill a drop of water out of a glass in the caboose."

Then, in reference to the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul railway, Mr. Murphy says:

Among the advantages secured by this railway on its electric sections are the following:—The "cruising radius" of each electric locomotive is twice that of the steam engine. Sub-divisional points, where freight crews and steam locomotives were formerly housed and changed, have been abolished; the passenger crews' runs are now 220 miles instead of 110. For railway purposes these stations do not now exist; 7 or 8 miles of track at each old station have been taken up. In many months the electrics were not delayed a minute; the latter can do more work in cold weather. Many of the delayed steam trains were double-headers, but never more than one electric is hitched to a passenger train. An entire suspension of freight service, due to steam engines losing their steaming capacity and freezing up, was not an uncommon experience. Electrical energy for the operation of these trains cost considerably less than coal. This latter statement is one of the most interesting in connection with the operation of the C.M. & St. P. Ry., and it is especially interesting because it was made before they had improved their load factor.

The foregoing actual operating experiences on large railway electrification projects show what the electric locomotive is doing every day. As the vice-president of the last mentioned railway said: "electrification has made us forget that there is a continental divide."

The limitations of the steam locomotive are due to the fact that it is a mobile steam power plant of limited capacity; it is compelled to carry its own supply of coal and water; and, it is unable to take advantage of many of the economical refinements of the large modern stationary steam plant. On the other hand, the electric locomotive has no such limitations; it merely acts as a connecting link between efficient stationary steam or water power plants of unlimited capacity—because their number may be extended indefinitely—and the train to which it is connected. The Electrical World summed up the situation a short time ago when it said:—"Why continue to haul millions of tons of coal, for and by uneconomical steam locomotives, all over the country, and thus add more loads to the already overburdened railways, when the power which they need so badly can be much more economically and efficiently transmitted to electric locomotives over a wire the size of one's little finger?"

The next speaker was Mr. W. G. Gordon, transportation engineer of the Canadian General Electric Company of Canada, who, you may say, was an interested party, but whose argument, nevertheless, is worth listening to. In the course of his argument he says:

Mr. E. W. Rice stated at the June convention of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers last year:—"Electric locomotives have been so improved and simplified that they are competent to haul the heaviest train that can be held together with the present train construction; to operate at the highest speed permissible by the alignment of the road and independent of its grades; and that the electric locomotive can meet in the most efficient and adequate manner the transportation problems confronting the country, and offer better results than are now obtained or seem possible with steam locomotives. It should not be forgotten that steam locomotives burn about 25 per cent of the entire coal mined in the United States, and that 12 per cent of the entire ton mileage movement of freight and passengers carried is represented in cars and tenders required to haul coal to supply steam for the locomotives."

Where a trunk line is electrically operated from water power stations, it means that the total movement of railway coal and locomotive tenders is eliminated, and even if partially or wholly operated from steam power stations, the movement of locomotive tenders is eliminated and the movement of railway coal greatly decreased.

The benefit is self evident of being able to apply this ton mileage, at present absorbed by steam operation, in the movement of revenue tonnage.

The cost of maintenance of the electric locomotive is very much less than that of the steam locomotive. The following table gives the cost of maintenance in cents per locomotive mile for a number of railroads, these costs being for the years they have been operating electrically to 1917, inclusive.

The costs are given for an average of 5 years for three railroads, an average of 4 years for two railroads and an average of 2 years for the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul R.R.

He gives the cost of maintenance of electric locomotives as follows:

Average maintenance on basis of locomotive weighing 100 tons.

Baltimare & Ohio R.R.	5.24
Butte, Anaconda & Pacific R.R.	7.08
Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul R.R.	3.09
Michigan Central R.R.	4.06
N.Y.C. & H.R.R.R.	3.50
Pennsylvania R.R.	3.40
General Average	4.39

The cost of maintenance per locomotive mile for steam locomotives compared with the above will be from 10cts. to 20cts or higher, depending on the capacity and service of the locomotive.

A very interesting comparison is given in the following table giving comparative results between steam and electric operation on the Butte. Anaconda and Pacific R.R. In 1913 the operation was entirely steam, since then it has been gradually superseded by electric operation. The figures for electric operation are averaged for 3 years, and, as there was still a considerable amount of steam operation during these 3 years, the figures do not show full credit to the benefit of electric operation.

Comparative Result—Steam and Electric Operation. B.A. & P.R.R.

—	Steam, 1913.	Electric average for 3 yrs.	Savings in amount.	Electric operation. Per cent
Fuel and power	$294,830	$175,165	$119,665	40·59
Locomotive repairs	97,45	57,881	39,611	40·61
Engineer's wages	99,611	74,036	25,575	25·67
Engine house expenses	28,34	16,703	11,639	41·06
Lubricants	9,345	5,444	3,901	41·76
Water	4,491	2,084	2,407	53.59
Other supplies	5,435	4,308	1·127	20·774
Total	$539,54[illegible]	$335,621	$'03,925	37.80
Revenue ton miles hauled	$153,168,648	169,553,405	16,384,757	10.70

The above table shows a saving in electric operation of 37.8 per cent, and at the same time an increase in the revenue ton miles hauled of 10.7 per cent.

Had these increased ton miles been hauled in 1913, the total cost would have been $597,277, so that the actual saving in electric operation is 44 per cent.

On this railroad 17 electric locomotives were in operation in 1914, 24 in 1916 and at present there are 28.

Where mountain divisions are electrically operated, a further marked economy is effected by regenerative breaking. This is obtained by exciting the fields of the motors on the locomotive on down grades so that the counter electro-motive force builds up higher than the line voltage and returns power to the line; this action retarding the train to whatever extent desired without the use of the air brakes. as well as supplying power to other trains running on the level or up grades. This action, of course, reduces the total demand on the substations with consequent reduction in the power demand on the primary source of supply.

I presume that is the reason why the honourable minister on Thursday said it was more economical on mountain sections than on the level. There is a great deal of evidence which this engineer adduced to prove the economy of electrification. I shall just read one more short extract.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does this gentleman give the primary cost of electrification?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: No, I do not think that was taken into account. But, as regards that, I am referring only to roads that were already built. My motion is for the electrification of the steam roads.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What about the cost per mile for operation?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: Well, I have just stated that and the total cost of the road as compared with steam.

After giving a number of proofs, Mr. Gordon says:

This means that, over any line, trains of heavier tonnage can be hauled at a much better schedule speed than with steam locomotives. In the case where a single track steam line has reached its capacity and would have to be double tracked to handle increased ton mileage, electric operation will obviate the necessity of double tracking and permit of a large expanse in ton mileage handled.

I will not weary the House much more. The next speaker was Mr. F. H. Shepard, Director of Heavy Traction for the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company. Another interested party, it may be said; but his evidence is worthy of our attention. He says:

The growth of traffic on the Norfolk & Western caused so great a congestion on the Elkhorn Grade as to limit the output of the celebrated Pocahontas coal field, from which a great part of the revenue of the whole railroad is derived. The topography of this section is such that either additional tracks or revision of line was practically impossible. Electrification has doubled the capacity of this division and, during the past severe winter, the freedom of movement of traffic over this section was markedly the easiest of the whole railroad. A noteworthy feature of this operation is the large size of trains and the expeditious manner in which they are handled. On the lesser grades, trains of 5,000 tons are operated, and on the 2% grades, trains of 3,250 tons, at twice the speed of former steam operation, with three large Mallet engines per train. Trains are accelerated to a speed of 14 m.p.h. on the 2% grade in a little over a minute—in fact to quote a brakeman on one of his first trips: "these trains start like a trolley car."

The next speaker was Mr. H. H. Vaughan, M.E.I.C. Mr. Vaughan was in the employ of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for a number of years, but at the time this meeting occurred he had not been in their employ for three years. He gives a great deal of evidence in regard to the efforts which were made by engineers to induce the C.P.R. during the time he was with them to change some sections of their line to electricity. One was the Connaught tunnel; another was the line from Smith's Falls to Montreal; and another was a portion of their line in the province of Quebec. But on each occasion the directors of the C.P.R., after careful investigation, decided that at that time electrification was not economical and abandoned it. Mr. Vaughan, however, sums up his remarks in this way:

> I do think, however, that our railway men and financial men do not look at this electrification problem in the right light. They look at it altogether from the dollars and cents point of view now. That is the natural way, and in a sense, is the proper business way to look at any proposition. I would firmly agree with that proposition when it comes to a question of substituting, for the steam locomotive, a steam power plant, and using coal for generating electricity, but in this country, where we have such a magnificent supply of water power, I believe it would be wise foresight for our railway people to invest money in electrification and to utilize that water power, instead of burning up the supply of coal which, in the days to come, will be needed by our descendants and who, if we consume it now, will bitterly regret the wastefulness of which we have been guilty.
> We can justify electrification if we take into account its contingent advantages and give it credit for all the saving that it can make. I believe, if that was done, the railways and railway engineers would find that it would pay to go ahead with the work of electrification.
> Electrification is, of course, a major change, and involves a large investment not unlike that involved in construction of terminals, second track, and new lines. The justification of these latter is almost never determined by the prospect of immediatae return, but rather by that determination which governs the expansion of, and provision for, facilities for a first-class railroad.

It seems to me Mr. Vaughan has there struck the right idea, that we must take into consideration the contingent advantage, and in the cases which I have drawn to the attention of this House that contingent advantage is of enormous proportions. It means the difference between profit and loss on the railways owned by the Government. I am satisfied that if the hydro-radial enterprise that has been started in the province of Ontario is carried out—and it will be carried out if the wishes of those who voted for the by-laws prevail—it will mean the taking away from our steam railways of enough of their traffic to make it unprofitable.

I do not intend to take up the time of the House any further on this question, though it is a very interesting subject and very much more might be said upon it. But I trust the Government will take it into very serious consideration, and as I said before, if that is done, I shall feel that I have accomplished something in bringing the matter to the attention of the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Did the honourable gentleman, in his first remarks, state the cost per mile for the electrification of steam railways?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: Yes; I gave the cost of the electrification of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul railway, 440 miles. It was $18,000 per mile of track, or $27,000 per route mile, at that time; that is, in 1916. Of course, costs have increased very greatly since then. At the present time it would cost perhaps $40,000 a mile. I give that just as an estimate; that is about double what it cost in 1916. But these costs may increase in the future, or they may decrease. But as these costs increase or decrease, everything else does the same, apparently.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I have no intention to speak at length on this proposition. I rise simply to say a word, which the honourable gentleman may answer. If I construe the proposition aright, I have no objection to adding my vote to that of the honourable gentleman. The motion reads:

> That in the opinion of the Senate it is expedient and in the interest of Canada for the Government to proceed to substitute electricity for steam as a motive power upon the lines of railway owned by the Government as soon as and wherever economically practicable.

This is so modest a proposition that I suppose anyone would agree with it—

Hon. Mr. SMITH: I should think so.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: — if it implies that the Government will choose its own time for the financing of the enterprise. Considering the proposition by itself, it might be decided to-day that it is economically practicable; but with the formidable obligations which the Government of Canada has assumed and is facing, it may not be able to finance the proposition for a number of years, although economically the proposition would be practicable.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, it might be inexpedient for the Senate to pass a general resolution of this kind without having more definite information before them, touching the cost of the undertaking, and the financial position of Canada to enter upon so great a responsibility. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Smith) introduced the discussion in order to direct attention to this important subject; and, as he has already fulfilled his intention, I would suggest that no great purpose is served by absolutely committing the Senate in this very general way to so important a proposition. I am sure, not only that every honourable member of the House has listened with much pleasure to what my honourable friend has said upon the question, but also that the attention of the Government will be directed to it, and in that way as much will be accomplished as if we absolutely committed ourselves to the proposition.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I was going to suggest, honourable gentlemen, that it might be well to refer this motion to the Finance Committee of the Senate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not object to that.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: I am quite satisfied with the suggestion of the honourable leader that the question will be drawn to the attention of the Government. That is my object: to draw it to the attention of the Government.

The motion was withdrawn.

OTTAWA AGREEMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 28, an Act to confirm an Agreement between His Majesty the King and the Corporation of the city of Ottawa.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the object of this Bill is to make provision for increased payments to the city of Ottawa on account of the services rendered by the city to the public buildings of the capital. My recollection is that formerly we were paying about $15,000 a year in consideration of those services. That was afterwards, some years ago, increased by an additional contribution of $100,000 a year to the Ottawa Improvement Commission. Lately the subject has been reopened, and the Government has arranged to increase the $100,000 to $150,000 and to make the payment $75,000 in lieu of $15,000, thus making a total contribution of $225,000 annually.

This city will to some extent profit by the new arrangement, inasmuch as there has been eliminated from the contract which had previously been entered into the exemption of civil servants from payment to the city of certain taxes on income. The city, very naturally, has made even larger demands than the Government has conceded, but the arrangement is regarded as an equitable one. It has been sanctioned by the House of Commons, and I have no doubt this Chamber will approve of what the Government, and likewise the House of Commons, have done as to the agreement between the parties.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: What does the Government get from the city?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I suppose the city would say the Government gets exemption from taxation, for one thing. The city has claimed that Government property should be subject to taxation, the same as privately-owned properties. The Government is supplied directly by the city with water for all its public buildings, with the exception, I think, of the water furnished to the different departments for consumption. The payment agreed upon includes, for instance, the supply of water for sewerage purposes, for parks, and, I think, for fire protection. The Government will pay water rates for the other purposes to which I have referred, on the basis of 13 cents per thousand gallons "for such quantity of water as it may use in any year up to 200,000,000 gallons, and for water used in excess of 200,000,000 gallons in any year at the price or rate of 10 cents per thousand gallons."

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Is all government-owned property in the city of Ottawa exempt under this arrangement? Is all the property between the river and the north side of Wellington street now exempt from municipal taxation?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes; I understand that would become exempt. The contract would not permit of property rented by the Government being exempt. Property would be exempt if it were in the control or the possession of the Crown; but it is conceded that property rented from other parties and occupied by the Government would not be exempt from taxation.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: But all this newly-acquired property is exempt?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All property the title of which is absolutely vested in the Crown is exempt.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I think the time has come when the city of Halifax should be considered in connection with a vote such as the one that is now before us. In the city of Halifax there is about $20,000,000 worth of property on which not one cent of taxes is paid. The greater portion of that property has been handed over to the Dominion Government by the Imperial Government. The Government have the streets kept clean for them, and they get police service and fire protection. They get everything free. The time has certainly come when some consideration should be given to the city of Halifax.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: What about Winnipeg?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Winnipeg is out of sight. Nobody knows anything about Winnipeg, and nobody cares. The Government have no public buildings there.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Oh, yes, they have.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: My honourable friend may have to be looked after. I suppose the police have to take care of him. That does not cost anything. What I want to point out is that the greater portion of the water front in Halifax is owned by the Government, and the city provides sidewalks and streets and fire protection. Then, again, we have in Halifax the Wellington Barracks, covering a very large area all along up Gottigen street. The assessment of real estate values in Halifax would probably be somewhere between $45,000,000 and $50,000,000. Twenty years ago, when I was more familiar with it than I am now, it amounted to about $25,000,000. It is only fair and reasonable that Halifax should be given some consideration for all that property owned by the Government in the very heart of the city. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. McMeans) speaks about Winnipeg. I do not know very much about Winnipeg, but if he has any claims to present here on behalf of Winnipeg, I have no objection to his presenting them. But I do know that in Halifax the Government occupies the greater portion of our waterfront. I understand that some change is about to take place; that the Government will sell some of the property there. I think they should do so, for they do not need all the property they have there now. In the meantime I think the Government should give Halifax at least $25,000 or $40,000 a year for the services they get from that good old city. In Halifax they are given good protection; it is not like the city of Winnipeg, from which my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. McMeans) comes, where there is trouble all the time and no man's life is safe. In Halifax everything is conducted in splendid fashion and the Government never suffers anything there from lack of fire protection or lack of protection of any other kind. The property is well taken care of. I would urge upon the honourable leader of the Government that the claims of the city of Halifax be considered in connection with this vote.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, the leader of the Government has said that under this Bill the Government undertakes to pay a sum of $225,000 a year as against $115,000, I think it was, that we were paying formerly. But, upon examining the Bill, I find that there is a good deal more than that in it, because the Government also undertakes to keep up certain bridges, and "to maintain and repair good and sufficient sidewalks on the northern side of that portion of Wellington street between Connaught Place and the western boundary of the Perley Home property." I think that is new. I do not think the Government undertook that before in the arrangement with the city of Ottawa. Then, on page 5 of the Bill, the Government makes itself subject to "local improvement rates imposed by the corporation under the provisions of the Local Improvement Act." I do not know whether that is a new arrangement; but it seems to me that it might necessitate considerable expense in addition to the $225,000 to which my honourable friend has referred.

Further than that, I presume the city will get a considerable advantage from the privilege they now have of taxing civil servants on their incomes and on their property. I do not know whether my honourable friend has figures to show what the benefit of that arrangement will be to the city. If he could give us that information when we go into committee it would be very interesting. I think it is somewhat of a hardship upon the civil servants who were appointed to the service at a time when it was understood that they would not be subject to taxation by the city in the way that other people are. This change has been made, however, and I presume that question was considered.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That arrangement, it seems to me, was not based upon common sense or reason. There was no reason why civil servants in the city of Ottawa should have been exempted from taxation while those in other parts of t...

Dominion were not. Furthermore, the case of the civil servants is not such a hard one as my honourable friend would lead us to believe. As he knows very well, civil servants have received great consideration, particularly since the war, in the matter of salaries and in the bonus which has been given them to set off to some extent the increased cost of living. However, if the city, when the first contract was entered into, was deprived of its right to impose taxation upon the civil servants, there is no reason why that condition of affairs should continue for all time.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

SHIPPING BILL (CERTIFICATES OF SERVICE).

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 21, an Act to amend The Canada Shipping Act (Certificates of Service). Hon. Mr. Willoughby in the Chair.

On section 1—requirements for certificates, etc.:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Who appoints the board before which these men have to appear to get their certificates?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is done under the Marine Department.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: They have examinations. I may say that this Bill is about 25 years behind the times. If it had been brought in 25 or 30 years ago it would have have been of some advantage to the Dominion of Canada, and we would be in a different position to that which we occupy to-day. However, the bringing in of this Bill now cannot do any harm.

In 1911 and 1912 schools were established in the Maritime Provinces where any one who cared to attend could get an education in navigation. I think the first school was started in Halifax; and there is now one in Sydney and one in St. John. It used to be that examiners went down there only once a year or once in six months; but now we have an examiner in Halifax who is there all the time. Sailors are now offered an opportunity of getting an education free, and of passing their examinations. I think there are very few ships in the employ of the Government on which the men have not got master's and officers' certificates. Some 20 years ago we used to grant tickets for service; but they were done away with. That system was not of much use because the ships would cross to Britain, and the Board of Trade there would not allow them to be brought back under those certificates. Many of the ships had to be sold to the Norwegians, the Swedes, the Danes, and others, and that is why Canada was in such bad shape with regard to shipping when the war broke out. We had gone back in our shipping. We built the finest ships in the world and manned them with the very best men in the world; but the practice of the British Board of Trade practically put Canada out of the shipping business.

As I say, this Bill will not do any harm. But why should the certificates be limited to ships of 750 tons, or to sailing vessels? I think it should include freight carriers propelled by steam if it is going to be of much advantage, because there are now more steam-propelled vessels than sailing ships.

Section 1 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

JOINT DISTRIBUTION OFFICE.

ORGANIZATION APPROVED.

The Senate proceeded to consider a message from the House of Commons approving and confirming the organization of the officers and clerks of the Joint Distribution Office of the Senate and the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, this is simply a formal matter. In the Joint Distribution Office there are three clerks, and to comply with the requirements of the Civil Service Classification this organization has been made. I understand that it is practically as it was before.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: We are apparently authorizing a Superintendent of Distribution of the printed documents of Parliament and three officials. I thought they were classed as clerks.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I was going to move:

Resolved that the Senate doth concur with the House of Commons by approving and confirming the organization of the officers and clerks of the Joint Distribution Office of the Senate and House of Commons, as submitted to that House on the 31st day of March last, and that a message be sent to the House of Commons accordingly.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Can my honourable friend explain why they are referred to as three officials?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is simply an organization. My honourable friend will see, according to the resolution, that it only deals with the organization of the officers and clerks; then they have to be classified.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: All we decide is that there will be officials in the department?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: How many have there been up to date?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Three. I understand that no change has been made.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

Hon. W. B. ROSS moved the second reading of Bill R, an Act to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Western Assurance Company. He said: Honourable gentlemen, this is simply a consolidating Bill, which can be dealt with in committee.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does it mean that there is to be a consolidation of the many amendments to the Act made from year to year, or that it is to be printed with the amendments proposed?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It collects together a number of Acts and amendments. The Bill will go before the Banking and Commerce Committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. W. B. ROSS moved the second reading of Bill S, an Act to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting the British America Insurance Company.

He said: This is exactly the same kind of Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

INCOME AND BUSINESS PROFITS TAXES.

INQUIRY AND DISCUSSION.

Hon. W. H. BENNETT rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate and inquire:—The number of persons or corporations paying and the aggregate amount paid by each group by way of Dominion Income Tax or the Business Profits War Tax in the town of Midland during the years 1917 and 1918 whose assessed income was $1,500 and over, showing each group, and also by advances of $1,000; also specifying as between males and females.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, last year I either asked a question or moved for a return to the effect that there should be published by the Department of Finance, or that particular branch which deals with income and war taxes, a statement showing the number of persons who had paid their taxes; not giving their names at all, but classifying them according to municipalities. On that occasion the honourable leader of the House (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) suggested that the motion should be withdrawn, intimating that the Government, or the Finance Department, proposed to bring down a return, not by individual municipalities from one end of the Dominion to the other, but by larger districts. That return, I may say, was never brought down; at least, I am not aware that it was. So I have placed this motion on the order paper. I have done so, not with any particular desire to know what has gone on in the town in which I happen to reside, with respect to these so-called war taxes; but rather because the Government intimated in another place a disposition to give all publicity as to the number of persons who have made returns on income subject to war taxes.

I may instance the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. In answer to a question asked in the House of Commons on April 20, it was stated that that company had paid for the year 1918 $1,463,097, and that, up to last year, inclusive, they had paid $3,817,172. It may fairly be asked, if the business of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is to be made public, if it is to be shown what war taxes they have paid, is it not equally fair that in every locality there should be published the name of every person who has paid war taxes. I will deal later on with the desirability of the publication of such lists.

But the Government, or the Finance Department, have gone further in this respect. In response to a motion made in the House of Commons for a return showing the number of persons in the city of Toronto who had paid income taxes or taxes on business profits, the following statement was made public. As this was not in answer to an inquiry, but was in response to a motion for a return it has not appeared in Hansard. Therefore, I will give the figures as stated in the return of which I have obtained a copy, showing the number of persons in the city of Toronto who paid income tax for the year 1918:

Amount of Income.	Persons.	Taxes paid.
$ 1,500 to $ 6,000	4,274	$ 170,214.96
6,000 to 10,000	1,215	222,604.83
10,000 to 20,000	688	397,216.88
20,000 to 30,000	165	251,037.00
30,000 to 50,000	91	272,438.87
50,000 to 100,000	55	378,680.88
100,000 or over	13	506,066.93
	6,501	$2,198,260.35

I will comment only on perhaps two of these groups. Take the case of persons paying on incomes from $50,000 to $100,000 or over. In the whole city of Toronto only 68 persons made returns on incomes of $50,000 or over.

I may say that when the first return was brought down in the House of Commons the other day the newspapers by error stated that it was indicative of the whole Dominion. That statement was subsequently corrected, and it was shown that the return applied only to the city of Toronto. The first statement published, that there were only 13 men in the whole Dominion who had an income of $100,000 or more was productive of a great deal of comment. In the reading room, where several of us were, the question was discussed, and within a few minutes there was made up a list of 13 men in the city of Ottawa alone, each of whom, it was agreed by those present, had an income far beyond $100,000. To say that in Toronto there were only 13 who had incomes of $100,000 is nothing more than a farce in my opinion. Take one gentleman—and I am not going to mention any names. The municipal taxes on his residence are $50,000 a year. The total number of persons in the city of Toronto who made returns and whose income was over $1,500 or under $6,000 was only 4,274. The whole income-tax law is based on the principle of honour; it is purely and simply a question of honour whether people do or do not make returns. The result is that a large number of persons in this country are very much prejudiced because, while their income may be small, may be under $2,000, it is rated in the most open way, while a man who may have a large income and is not an employee can abstain from making a return and thereby escape paying the tax. I believe that Mr. Breadner has done excellent work in the compilation of these lists. I believe he has done a great deal more than half-a-dozen ordinary men would have done. He has established a wonderful system for collecting this information. I am told that he has secured from one end of the country to the other all possible information, so that it will be possible to see whether men have or have not escaped paying the war taxes. Let me give an instance: this is a case that I know of. I refer to the Canada Steamship Company, a number of whose engineers and captains live in my town. Every one of those men who has $2,000, if he is single, is taxed on the extra $500, and why? Because the Government has gone to the company, and has asked it to give them a return showing what those men are earning. Then, in turn, I assume that the company has intimated to the men that they must pay their money; and that is the rule that I presume prevails with that and every other company.

I believe the time has arrived when the Government should not only intimate, by bringing down returns, as they have done in the case of the city of Toronto, how many people are paying their taxes, but that they should go further, and publish a list of the names of all in the country who have paid. Some honourable gentlemen will doubtless ask what is to be gained by that? I will give you an instance. Let us assume the case of the average small town. A man is well known to have an income of $20,000 or $30,000. When the names are printed that man's name is absent. If the department does not receive anonymous letters intimating that there is a man of the name of John Smith, or whatever his name may be, who has escaped paying the tax, I would be very much surprised. It may be urged that that is giving too much publicity to a man's private business but I do not think so. What does the Government do with regard to a man's private business? You can go to the Distribution Office and ask for the bluebook relating to chartered banks, and what will you find? You will find the name of every man, woman, and child who owns a share of stock in any chartered bank in any part of the country. That is publicity. What is done in the municipalities? You can go to the proper municipal officer in your town and ask him to show you the assessment roll, and from it you can find out who in that town has been assessed and who has not. There is more publicity. Let us go a little further. I am in favour of the principle of taxing men when they are alive rather than after they are dead. Take the case of succession duties. Under the probate a list of all the assets of the deceased is made public. Why not make it public in his lifetime? Any man conversant with municipal taxation knows that men endeavour to escape it. In my own town I have known persons to be assessed for $1,500 of income, and they have carried it along for years; but when there was a hue and cry the assessment went up to $15,000. The person taxed knew that the assessment list was under the eye of every person in the town. When you have all that publicity for the assessment roll and know that people will not make a proper return under that system, what are you to expect under the system of the Finance Department which puts people on their honour, so that no one knows whether or not they are paying one cent of what they properly should pay?

To-day there is great need of money in this country. The Government tells the returned soldiers, whose claims are great, that it has not the money to meet their demands, which it is estimated would require from $500,000,000 to $800,000,000. Personally I am not in favour of that payment, and I am willing to state my reasons; but I say that it is a crying shame that the men who have returned to this country badly wounded, and who are unable to help themselves, the widows of men who have been killed, and the mothers who have lost their sons, are not receiving larger pensions than they are receiving to-day. I will mention a case that came to my notice only this morning. I received a letter from a widow, whose only support, her boy, went to the war. He was killed. She had been paid $40 a month, and had received in addition a bonus of $8—$48 per month in all. She is getting on in years, and, by reason of the fact that she owns her house and lot, she has been informed that $10 is going to be deducted from her allowance. Is it any wonder that there is a feeling, which I say is a proper feeling, in favour of these wounded men and the dependents of those who have been killed? This morning I went up, as I have frequently done, to the meeting of the committee dealing with these claims. I heard the evidence of a medical man who attends tubercular patients. He told the story of a man in an advanced stage of consumption. His pay for this total disability is $720 a year. There is a man, who is not able to work, trying to support a family on $720 a year, a man who has done what? True, he has not sacrificed his life, but he has sacrificed his future, and he is paid a paltry sum like that. If that man intimates that he is bettering his condition, or that his health is improving, a deduction is made. Perhaps a tubercular patient should receive more sympathy than patients of other kinds. He is practically taboo. I have known a young man whose services in a bank were dispensed with, and why? Because he had tuberculosis.

I do not know whether the Government will adopt the practice of publishing the names of the people who have paid their income tax, but in my opinion it is the only way in which they can increase, and I believe greatly increase, the income from war taxes. I know of a man who, I believe, has an income of $25,000 a year, and I do not believe he has ever paid a single cent.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Why do you not report the case to the Government?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: In the first place, I am not a common informer for the Government, and, in the second place, if I made a complaint, I might perhaps find that I had stultified myself, because he had made a return. I know of another man who during the war made huge profits, over $50,000 a year, on his own telling, and it was evident that he had been making a great deal of money. I have been told that he does not pay the war tax, and does not intend to do so until he is compelled. There is something in this grievance of returned soldiers and their dependents, and the general public are not turning a deaf ear to fair and honest claims when they see men going around showing cheques for a return of 100 per cent on some of their investments. I have seen the cheque of a company which paid a 100 per cent dividend, while, under the law, it was supposed to pay 60 per cent of that to the Government; but no 60 per cent has been paid. I saw a man with a cheque for $5,000 who had made an investment of $5,000 in a certain company. How is it that these things are happening? Either the companies are not making the return, or they are not being treated as they should be by the Department; and I do not believe the latter is the case. On the contrary, I have heard many complaints that people have been harshly treated by Mr. Breadner, and I do not believe he is letting any one that he knows of escape.

In the province of Ontario, if a man holds stock in a joint stock company, if I want to see how much stock he has, all I have to do is to go to the proper office in the city of Toronto, and ask for the return of the company. Then I see in the public press that that company paid a certain dividend. But when it comes down to the question of who is paying the war tax and who is not, it seems to be like the sacred ark of the covenant, we must not lay hands upon it. Has not the time arrived when there should be publicity in these things?

I hope that if any discussion ensues on this question it may result in the Government taking the matter in hand and dealing with it—first, by bringing down a general return, by municipalities, and then giving the names of the persons who have paid the tax. Talk about publicity! My just happening to glance at a gentleman recalls something that happened in the town in which he lives. A woman in Ontario died leaving $75,000 or $80,000 to a man who was not a relative of hers. She had relatives in the States, and they were showered with letters telling them what had happened, and an action in the courts has been started. The people are alive, and are keen to expose any person who has not paid his war tax. A man employed by a company is exposed by it making the return of his income to the Department. He pays up to the last dollar. But the man with a large income may not be paying at all. Just remember the figures that I quoted as to Toronto. Sixty-eight men in the city of Toronto have made returns stating that their incomes range from $50,000 to $100,000. That reminds me of a discussion which I had with an honourable gentleman in this House the other evening. He said that my notice of motion should be extended to cover some other town in the county of Simcoe, and he asked what I estimated was the income of a certain man there. I have no doubt that he is a well-to-do man; he is a personal friend of mine; but I never knew that he had an income of $18,000 from a certain business. I had never heard of it before, but my honourable friend had. There is only one way to collect this tax, and that is to publish the names. Any man in receipt of a large income will be ashamed to see his name paraded through the country on the list, if his return has not been made, and truly made. Not only that, but the publicity which he will get will, as he must know, probably result in a prosecution.

A short time ago I saw a list of men in the city of Toronto who had not made their returns. I knew who two or three of them were, although I did not know them personally. They were men of intelligence and standing, and it was absurd to think that they should not have made their returns long before. There is unrest in the country. Some people may think it is slumbering. It does no good to talk about peace, peace, because there is no peace in this country to-day; and the first step that should be taken to allay the unrest that exists—I refer now particularly to the soldier movement, as it is termed—should be a substantial increase of the pensions for maimed soldiers and for dependents of deceased soldiers, and the money should be obtained by an endeavour to increase the income of the country by the payment of war taxes, particularly by those who have been shirking the payment in the past. The Government should address itself to that question with all possible heartiness.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I regret that I am not in a position to furnish my honourable friend from Simcoe (Hon. Mr. Bennett) with the information for which he asks. The Department of Finance has been charged with the duty of adopting whatever system seems to be best for the collection of the income tax. If the system which it has adopted has not met with the approval of my honourable friend, or the approval of the public, I presume the Government will have to assume the responsibility. This is a very large question. It is a question that may well be considered, whether or not it is desirable to publish the names of those chargeable with income tax. Speaking for myself, I see no good reason why some system such as those which obtain in municipalities should not be applied to the collection of the federal income tax; but the subject is not so easy to work out as it would appear on its face. The difficulty which has always been met in imposing an income tax has been in the collection of it. That has invariably been the case, not only in this country, but in every country where such tax has been imposed.

I shall be very glad to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to the remarks made by my honourable friend from Simcoe. As to whether or not he will agree with the views the honourable gentleman has expressed I am not in a position to say. I feel fully assured, however, that every attention will be given to the statements of my honourable friend.

In reference to the return which my honourable friend intimated was asked for last session, I am not prepared to say whether it was placed upon the Table of the House or not; but I would point out to my honourable friend that the inquiry was made last session, and that there is a good deal of human infirmity on the part of some of the departments in not charging themselves with very much responsibility once the session is over. I would suggest to my honourable friend the desirability of asking for a return during the present session, and I shall expedite it in every way possible.

My honourable friend spoke of the inadequacy of the pensions paid by the Dominion Government. I need not remind him that there is a committee of Parliament considering this subject at the present time. But it is to be pointed out—and I would ask my honourable friend not to overlook this—that the pension scale as we have it to-day has been fixed by Parliament. The representatives of the people themselves have had the matter within their exclusive responsibility. This scale of pensions has been fixed, not by the Government, but by Parliament, and if my honourable friend disagrees with the action of Parliament as to the size of the pensions payable to our returned soldiers who unhappily are suffering disability, he must blame Parliament itself. But it would not be out of place for me to say in this connection that the scale of pensions paid by Canada, I understand, exceeds very substantially that paid by any of our Allies or any of the Associated Powers in the war; and it seems to me that this fact should relieve Canada to some extent, if not altogether, from any criticism of ingratiutde to the returned men. The solicitude of Parliament, every Session since the war, has been exercised along the line of giving most mature consideration to the question of pensions, and I think I am correct in saying that every Session since the payment of pensions has been assumed by the Government of Canada, Parliament has made a very close investigation and scrutiny regarding not only what pensions Canada should pay, but also what pensions are paid by other countries. Therefore, while my honourable friend's criticism as to the collection of the income tax may have some ground, it seems to me that the Government as well as Parliament has discharged its full duty in investigating and in showing proper sympathy on the question of pensions.

However, as I have said, I shall be only too glad to direct the attention of the Government to the observations made by my honourable friend.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to say a few words on the question raised by the honourable gentleman from Simcoe (Hon. Mr. Bennett).

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Before my honourable friend proceeds—I do not take any exception to my honourable friend making any observations he may desire, but it is a very bad practice to renew the debate after a motion of this kind has been discussed, and the inquiry has been made, and the answer has been given by the Government. I should be very glad to hear what my honourable friend has to say, but it is very desirable that the practice of discussing the question before the Government answers should be followed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I should have risen before my honourable friend; but it has occurred to me that there is perhaps one point which, with the permission of the House, I might emphasize. My honourable friend from Simcoe (Hon. Mr. Bennett) claims that there is considerable uneasiness in the country owing to the fact that the income tax may not have been paid by all who should make returns and send in their cheques. He suggests as a remedy that a statement showing those who have made returns and have paid the amounts they are called upon to pay should be published. I have not given any time or study to the question, but it seems to me that the practice throughout the world has been contrary to that suggested by my honourable friend. I know of no country in which income tax is imposed that has as yet decided to publish the names of those who do make returns and do pay. There is one objection which occurs to me, and there may be many others. There would undoubtedly be an injurious effect upon the business community if there were published throughout the land the amounts which various firms pay. The information would indicate their commercial strength. In days of prosperity business men would not object to the publication of the amount of their turn-over and their profit; but there are also lean years, in which profits are not in evidence, and the statement would show that the firm's business was not a prosperous one in the previous year. Business men live on credit. It seems to me that the publication of the profits or lack of profits of various corporations and business throughout the country would shake considerably the foundations of our whole commercial edifice. As I have stated, I have given no time or special study to the matter; but as it has never occurred to other countries, so far as I know, to publish lists of the amounts paid in income tax, I would hesitate to approve of the suggestion at this moment.

Last year I made a suggestion which would, I think, help to clear the atmosphere. It was that the law be changed, and that, as in many other countries, every person be required to make a return to the Department of Finance. At present the law requires only those persons coming under the Act to make a return; so any one can excuse himself from making a return by deciding that he does not come under the Act. What objection can there be to requiring the whole community to make returns? Then you would have annually a complete census of the wealth of the people. I see no reason why every one in the community should not be called upon to send in a return, in order that the Department of Finance might see at a glance, when all the returns were tabulated, what was the exact situation in the country. Until that is done, I am convinced there will be suspicion and uneasiness throughout the country, because those who do make their returns will feel that there are many others who should pay the tax but are not doing so.

The discussion concluded.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

HUDSON BAY AND STRAIT.

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER moved:

That a committee of twelve of this House be appointed to take evidence and report at this session upon the navigability and fishery resources of Hudson Bay and Strait, and of the character of the ports of said Hudson Bay with regard to their fitness as railway terminals, and that such committee shall have power to call for persons and papers, and that the said committee do consist of the Honourable Messieurs Bostock, Casgrain, Dandurand, P.C., Daniel, DeVeber, Fowler, Lougheed (Sir James), K.C.M.G., P.C., Michener, Schaffner, Sharpe, Watson and Willoughby.

He said: We are ready with our report, but it is necessary to re-appoint the committee in order to bring it in. The report is the result of the inquiry made by the committee during the last two sessions of Parliament.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Will the honourable gentleman speak a little louder? I could not hear what he said.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: In making the motion, I was just explaining to the House that this was simply a formal matter; that the motion was made in order that the committee might bring in the report, the result of our labours during the last two sessions of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would ask the honourable gentleman what difference there is between this reference and the reference to the former committee, which, so far as I am aware, has not yet reported. Is this exactly the same reference?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler) did not speak very distinctly, but I understand that the object of the appointment of this committee now is simply to edit, in a way, the report made by the committee during the past two sessions. I should like to know whether that is correct or not, or whether the intention is that this committee shall be a sort of perpetual committee, to go on, session after session, taking evidence which is largely a repetition of evidence taken years ago?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: It is only to report.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, it is not intended to be a perpetual committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER: A ltle louder.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is not intended to be a perpetual committee, but simply a committee to make a report of what has been done in the past two sessions.

Hon. Mr. POWER: In that case, I have no further observation to make.

The motion was agreed to.

CANADA SHIPPING BILL (CERTIFICATES OF SERVICE).

THIRD READING.

Bill 21, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act (Certificates of Service).—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

DIVORCE BILL (GENERAL).

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. W. B. Ross, the Senate went into committee on Bill J, an Act respecting the Dissolution and the Annulment of Marriage. Hon. Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 1—definition "court":

Hon. W. B. ROSS: On account of a suggestion that came from the honourable gentleman on the other side of the House, I have reconstructed section 1. I move that this section be struck out, and that the following be substituted:

> In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, "court" means the court which in any province has jurisdiction to dissolve or annul marriage.
> (a) This Act shall not apply to the province of Quebec.

That will be clause 1.

The reason for that change is that in the clause as it stood the words "Superior Court" are used. That is suitable except with regard to two provinces, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia has a divorce and matrimonial court, or, as it is called, a court for divorce and matrimonial causes; and New Brunswick has a court.

Hon. Mr. POWER: There is just one question which occurs to me, honourable gentlemen, with respect to this clause: that I do not find anywhere in this Bill any statement to indicate what court in each province is to have charge of divorce cases.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Bill I provides for that. If the honourable gentleman will read Bill I plus the clause in the chapter of the statutes relating to interpretation, which defines the words "Superior Court," he will see that it is the "Superior Court" which has jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. POWER: That removes my doubt.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Ross was agreed to.

On section 2—relief to respondent on counter-charge of adultery:

Hon. W. B. ROSS: In moving this section, honourable gentlemen, I do not know that it is necessary to repeat what I said the other day, namely, that it is made to deal with a set of facts of this kind. A man petitions for a divorce from his wife, and she simply appears, but files no counter petition against him. At the trial it turns out that the wife is innocent, but the husband is shown to be an adulterer himself. This section will give the court power to grant a divorce to the wife, notwithstanding that there was no counter petition made. I think that is provided for in the English Act, and I am desirous that it should apply to all divorce cases, because I think from my experience here that it is a good thing to make a man a little careful about going into a court of justice. In other words, he must see that he has a pretty clean record himself before he seeks a divorce.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: When such a situation was disclosed in any case before the Divorce Committee, you did not act upon the evidence; you simply rejected the petition?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It happened, so far as I know, in two cases. It happened once before a committee of which I was a member, and in that case I would have liked very much to grant the respondent a divorce, but we did not do so. But I am told there was a case, away back a good many years ago—

Hon. Mr. POWER: Yes; the Campbell divorce case.

Hon. W. B. ROSS:—that there was a case in which that was done.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman if the language employed in this clause is sufficient to make plain exactly what he has just explained to the committee. It may be quite simple language to the lawyer, but it looks a little involved to the ordinary layman.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I may say to my honourable friend that it is verbatim with the English Act.

Section 2 was agreed to.

On section 3—relief to respondent on counter-charge of adultery:

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Clause 3 is designed to put the wife on an equal footing with her husband. The husband gets a divorce on the grounds of adultery only under the English Act, but the wife has to prove not only adultery, but cruelty, or something else.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Is not the law of England the law of 1870? I understand the honourable gentleman to say that under the law of England a woman applying for divorce can only secure that divorce when she proves cruelty or something else in addition to adultery.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It appears to me that the proper place for this section would have been in Bill I. By this Bill we are passing a law declaring that the law of Canada is similar to the law of England of the 15th day of July, 1870, and by a concurrent Bill we say that the law of Canada shall be different from the law of England as of that date. I would like to know why this Bill, which is intended to deal only with procedure, should contain clause amending Bill I which passed here this Session.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Does not the honourable gentleman think it would be proper to say that "notwithstanding anything to the contrary, the law of any province or the law of England"?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I see no objection to inserting the words suggested by my honourable friend. In reply to my honourable friend from Hamilton, I would say that Bill I deals only with Prince Edward Island and Ontario. Bill J deals with all the divorce courts of all the provinces that have them.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Would it not have been better to have put Bill I into Bill J?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The statement of the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) is on the whole satisfactory; but, after all, they have had the present divorce system in England since 1857, and the adultery of the husband is not in itself a sufficient ground for the wife to obtain a divorce. I suppose there must have been some good reason, or some apparently good reason, why that line was taken by the legislators of England, and why they have continued the Act upon that line for sixty years. It does seem to me that honourable gentlemen might have pointed out why the motives which influenced the British Parliament should not weigh with us. I have known that the reason for that distinction was because the misconduct of the wife affected the offspring, whereas the misconduct of the husband did not necessarily do so. I am not undertaking to say that this is a mistake, but I think that we should have some further explanation as to why the change is made.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I accept the suggestion of the honourable gentleman from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David). I would say to the honourable the senior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) that if we compare the social and political position of the women of the British Empire in 1857 with that of the women of the present day, we shall find that it was very much inferior.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman whether it would not be better to use the same language that was used in Bill I, which says:

The law of England as to the dissolution of marriage and as to the annulment of marriage, as that law existed on the 15th day of July, 1870.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That would not be necessary. This is wider.

Section 3, as amended, was agreed to.

On section 4—wife to have separate domicile for divorce:

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Perhaps I need not repeat what I said yesterday in moving the second reading of this Bill. I think this is a good section. Once you can see that divorce is permissable at all, it is an act of justice to women, and I would like this section to become law.

Section 4 was agreed to.

On section 5—evidence by husband and wife:

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Before this clause is passed I would like to point out that it makes a very radical departure from all rules of evidence existing at the present time. I understand that the law of some provinces to-day is that while the husband and the wife are competent witnesses they are not compellable witnesses. Suppose a charge of adultery is made against either a man or a woman, but is not proceeded wit... further than to have the defendant examined and asked whether the charge is a true one. It is generally accepted that a man in such circumstances, even if he is guilty, will not acknowledge it. I think that this provision opens the door to a great deal of perjury and many family troubles. The man or the wife is suspicious and files an application, relying on the fact that the other can be called to give evidence. I do not know why the honourable gentleman has put this in. While I have a great deal of regard for his legal knowledge, I would move to strike out the word "and" in the third line and to insert the words "but not a."

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Under the practice of the province of Ontario one litigant may cite the opposing litigant for examination for discovery before proceeding to trial. I think this provision would lead to a great deal of abuse and might be used for very improper purposes, and might involve people who were innocent. If a deadly enmity exist between the husband and the wife, either of them could be called by the other and put into the witness-box and asked whether they had committed adultery with so-and-so, without there being a shred of right. I would support the motion to make it clear that the husband or the wife should not be a compellable witness. There is no class of litigation in our province in which a party is not a compellable witness; but I think that in cases of divorce the husband or the wife should not be a compellable witness. I should be surprised to know that they are compellable witnesses before the Divorce Committee.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I also take exception to this clause. I think we should either adopt the motion to amend it or we might even go back to the English Act. An English Act of 1869 to amend the Evidence Act contains the following section:

> The parties to any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery, and the husbands and wives of such parties, shall be competent to give evidence in such proceeding; provided that no witness in any proceeding, whether a party to the suit or not, shall be liable to be asked, or bound to answer any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery, unless such witness shall have already given evidence in the same proceeding in disproof of his or her alleged adultery.

I think it would be a very vicious practice. Every lawyer knows that a suit may be discontinued after discovery.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: I would like to have the clause remain as it is, with the provision that neither the husband nor the wife shall be obliged to give evidence for discovery.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: That is just as bad.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: No, it is not as bad, because you can secure the evidence of either the one or the other on the trial The whole object of the Common Law and of the Statute Law is to prevent people from compelling the husband and the wife to give evidence against one another. This is on account of the sanctity of the marriage pact. Now, we are dealing with parties who are at arm's length. The same thing no longer applies; so why should they not be placed in exactly the same position as other witnesses who may be called for the purpose of giving evidence? If you are going to carry this matter to a logical conclusion, and if people who are guilty of adultery are not going to be obliged to give evidence, then you should protect any one who is called as a witness. If a witness is asked, "Did you commit adultery with so-and-so?" that witness should be protected. I do not know whether my honourable friend would go that far.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: I understand that that was what was read a moment ago. This law would be of very great assistance in closing up cases in our courts. I do not think it would be advisable to permit the parties to be examined for discovery before the trial, for the reason that the case might not go any further, and there would be on record the statement as to what the party had sworn to. I see no objection whatever to the clause being amended in that way; but I think it should provide that the husband and the wife shall be not only competent but compellable witnesses. It is not going to work any hardship, and it will assist very greatly in the administration of the law.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But I would suggest to my honourable friend—perhaps he has not thought of it—that if a man is made by this Parliament a competent or compellable witness, then we have no control over the practice in the courts. That is reserved for the province, and if a man is a competent or compellable witness the province can pass an Act making him compellable to give evidence for discovery. I do not think there is any authority to pass a statute here regarding practice.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: I do not quite agree with my honourable friend in that respect, because the court, in dealing with the question, would be bound to recognize the section of the statute under which it had jurisdiction to deal with it.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Not if it has absolute control.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: Well, if it controls the practice, in so far as the legislation permits it to deal with that particular subject.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: The Privy Council held that the province of Saskatchewan had power to grant divorce, and the judges in Saskatchewan passed a set of rules, in which provision was made for discovery.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Honourable gentlemen, the amendment to section 5 is:

In any proceeding to dissolve a marriage or to annul a marriage, the husband and wife shall each be a competent but not a compellable witness.

I accept that amendment, because I want to get on. We can perhaps have the original section approved another year.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: We have already given way sufficiently, so far as this Bill is concerned. There is no use in destroying a section of the Act which may be of practical value, simply because you want to pursue the line of least resistance.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. McMeans was agreed to, and section 5 as amended was agreed to.

On section 6—co-respondent not party to divorce suit:

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman from Middleton might explain.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I move the adoption of this clause 6, which abolishes the co-respondent. I inserted this clause for two reasons. In the first place, I think that the trial of what is really a civil case along with a case of adultery is a joinder of two causes of action, and I think, from what I have seen of it, that it is not a good law, and does not work well. In addition to that, I do not know that this Parliament has jurisdiction to deal with the co-respondent at all. The husband or the wife may bring action against the co-respondent in the Superior Court, or in the court having jurisdiction to deal with the matter; so you are not taking away any of the rights of the husband or the wife. We have no joinder in Nova Scotia at all and the Act of that province has worked very well without it. It only raises the question of jurisdiction as between the Federal and the provincial authority. I steer away from the question of jurisdiction as much as possible.

Section 6 was agreed to.

On section 7—decree nisi in first instance which may be made absolute:

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: In lines 27 to 29 you will see the words: "and if, from any such information or otherwise, the said Attorney General suspects that any party to the suit is or has been colluding or conniving for the purpose of obtaining a divorce contrary to the justice of the case." I find it pretty hard to understand exactly what is the meaning or what is the application of the words, "contrary to the justice of the case."

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Would it not be clear without the words "of the case?" It means, contrary to justice. It is quite intelligible to me.

Section 7 was agreed to.

On section 8—publication of report of divorce suits:

Hon. Mr. POWER: I wish to express my great pleasure at finding this provision in this Bill. Every honourable gentleman who reads the English newspapers must have noticed the disgusting details of divorce cases which are found in some of the best of them. This clause provides that there shall be no report of the proceedings until the suit has been determined, "unless the judge or court before whom the suit is heard or proceeding is had orders such publication." And here is a most important thing: "and after such final determination no such report shall be published without the approval of the said judge or court." I think that is a most admirable clause, and I assume that there will be no hesitation about passing it. We are doing all we can to prevent the distribution of indecent literature, and this will be a great step in that direction.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Might it not be well to insert in this section a clause to the effect that the judge may give an order that the case be tried in camera?

Hon. Mr. FOSTER: I am moving an amendment to that effect.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Go on with that.

Hon. Mr. FOSTER: It would come in as subsection 3. Before I submit to the committee an amendment which I propose to this clause, I would ask the indulgence of the committee for a moment while I say one word of personal explanation. I was not present in the Senate owing to sickness in my family when this Bill came before the House. If I had been present, I should have considered it my duty, in the interest of the people whom I represent, and in accordance with their opinions, as well as representing my own views on legislation of this kind, to oppose the Bill. I do not want to have it said, because I move this amendment at the present stage, that I concur in the principle of the Bill for I do not. With that explanation I would move that section 8 be amended by adding the following subsection:

3. Any judge or court hearing any case or proceeding under this Act shall have the power to order, if in his discretion it seems in the public interest, that such case or proceeding may be heard in camera.

This amendment means that the court or judge, so far as the whole case or any part of it is concerned, may order that the evidence be taken in private, in order that it may not be heralded throughout the community or used to gratify morbid curiosity, if the character of the evidence is such as to make it, in his opinion, in the public interest that the evidence should not be heard in public.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: That is good.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I may say to the honourable gentleman that I am a little at fault in this respect. I had in my hand, when I was discussing the matter with him, a clause which I intend to move as subsection A of section 10, which would give to the different courts powers to make orders and rules. I will read the proposed subsection, because when we come to section 10 I mean to move that it be added. You will see that section 10 provides for appeal. Then 10A will read in this way:

The court, the appellate courts, and the Supreme Court of Canada, respectively, shall make such general orders, rules and regulations concerning the practice and procedure in such courts, respectively, and for proceedings in forma pauperis, as such courts may respectively consider expedient, and shall make tariffs of the costs and fees to be paid for or in connection with any proceedings had in such respective courts under the provisions of this Act, and may by such orders, rules and regulations provide for the trial or hearing, or any part of the trial or hearing, of any suit being held in camera; provided, however, that no order, rule, or regulation, shall be made to permit the introduction of co-respondents in any suit or to try any issue by a jury.

(2) In all matters not provided for by this Act or by any general order, rule or regulation, the practice and procedure shall conform to and be regulated, as nearly as may be, by the practice and procedure at the time in force in civil suits in the courts dealing with such matters, and if there is no such practice or procedure which can be conveniently and effectively adopted then, as nearly as may be, by the practice and procedure at the time in force in the Probate Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice in England, or in appeals therein or therefrom as the case may be.

(3) All general orders, rules and regulations made under this section shall be published in the Canada Gazette.

I would ask the honourable gentleman if this answers the purpose he has in mind.

Hon. Mr. FOSTER: I did not hear my honourable friend quite distinctly. I did not hear him read the words that would be necessary to cover that clause which I proposed. Perhaps they may be there.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: "And may by such orders, rules and regulations provide for the trial or hearing, or any part of the trial or hearing of any suits, being held in camera."

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: We are unable to hear.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I am sorry. Nobody seems to be able to hear.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I think that under the English Act there are rules and regulations.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I want it understood, honourable gentlemen, that I do not approve of the principle of the Bill at all. So far I have taken no part in the discussion, but I think, with regard to section 8, that we ought to provide for something which is not provided for there. Because I am opposed to the Bill, I want to see that the restrictions and conditions imposed are as severe as possible. In reading section 8, I find there is no provision by which the judgment or the decree of divorce shall be published, and I suggest to my honourable friend (Hon. W. B. Ross) that that is a thing which ought to be provided for. If a decree of divorce is made, the status of the wife and the husband is changed. That is a change of status which ought to be made public, and of which the whole community ought to know. For instance, in the province of Quebec, when a decree of separation from bed and board is granted, the order granting the separation is posted up on a board placed in the court house for that purpose, and also, I believe, in a newspaper. That is done because the public is interested in knowing the changed relations between husband and wife. There are civil consequences arising from the separation or the divorce of which the public should be informed. I would suggest that section 8 should provide for the publication of the divorce decree, at all events when it becomes final.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think you can trust to the newspapers to publish the fact that there was a divorce. The Attorney General of the province has power to deal with these divorce cases, and I think that affords pretty good protection. I do not see that it would be of any value to say that the decree must be published.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not propose publishing the evidence or any of the proceedings, but I propose that the decree of divorce should be published so that the general public may know that so-and-so have been divorced. There are some people in the community, at all events, who do not look upon a decree of divorce as conferring any very special distinction upon anybody; and I do not think anybody wants the number of divorces increased. We should take such steps as will tend to prevent divorces multiplying. As I say, the public is interested in knowing that the parties who have been divorced have changed their civil status, and that the obligations which result from the marriage relation have disappeared. To take a very homely illustration: the corner grocer, who has looked upon Mr. and Mrs. John Smith as married people, is interested; he has given groceries to the wife on credit because he knows that she is married to Mr. Smith. If he does not know that they have divorced, and continues to supply goods to Mrs. Smith, what will happen?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: She would be guilty of fraud.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But in the meantime he would have lost the groceries.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I fancy the corner grocer would be the first to know of their new status.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I think the honourable gentleman from Ottawa is quite right. The expense of having the notice published would be trifling. Men are willing to pay to advertise the fact that their wives have left their bed and board.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I would propose striking out the words "and after such final determination no report shall be published without the approval of the said judge or court," and inserting, "such final determination shall be published in at least one newspaper within the jurisdiction of the court."

Hon. Mr. POWER: I hope the honourable gentleman from Ottawa will not persist in moving his amendment. The first subclause of clause 8, I think, is admirable. I understand that the honourable gentleman proposes that the evidence should be published.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, not the evidence. I stated that distinctly.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The report embodies the evidence. My idea is that when the case is closed the judge who tries the case files a judgment in the court; and then the question arises whether there should be some special means taken to make this filing known to the public. I contend that the change proposed by the honourable gentleman, as far as it goes, will simply render useless the first subclause.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No. My honourable friend does not understand me.

Hon. Mr. POWER: My understanding may not be as acute as that of the honourable gentleman, but I think I understand the meaning of the English language fairly well.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am afraid my honourable friend misunderstood me, if he wants it that way. I said that I did not wish to change the section in so far as it prohibits the publication of the evidence. I thought I had made that as clear as possible. If not, I repeat that I do not want the evidence published; but I want the fact published that a decree of divorce has been granted.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Would not the honourable gentleman have to state by whom it was to be published?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I would substitute the following words at the end of subsection 1:

And after such final determination, notice thereof shall be inserted in at least one newspaper published in the locality where such final determination has been so made.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: Would it not be better to say that the "decree" or "judgment" of the court should be published? Otherwise what kind of notice is to be published?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: What would be the effect of that notice? If the case is dismissed is the final determination to be published?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Would the honourable gentleman publish the fact that a man or a woman has sued for a divorce and has failed?

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: Here is the difficulty with regard to the amendment of my honourable friend from Ottawa. In the first instance, after the trial, would he publish the order nisi? The final judgment of the court is not published until at least three months afterwards. What are you going to publish?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The final determination.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: Would it not be better to publish the final order of the court?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is what I am proposing.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: You are referring to the notice.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Perhaps the language is inapt, but it is the final determination that would be published.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What do you want to publish it for?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: So that everybody will know.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Why is it anybody else's business?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend unfortunately has just come in and has not heard my remarks. First of all, I want the general public to know that the divorce has been granted. I think the public at large is interested in knowing that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Because of the legal effect.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am surprised that that should not have struck my hon. friend at once. I want these people to carry the badge of divorce. I want to try to limit divorce. So far in this country the badge of divorce has not been one of which people are proud. Then, from the legal point of view, these people have changed their relationship. The civil responsibility which attaches to the man and the wife ceases the moment they are divorced. I gave a homely, and perhaps not very dignified instance of what I had in mind. I want the corner grocer to know that the lady who has been the wife of John Smith is no langer his wife, so that he will not advance her any more groceries under a misapprehension. I thought, in the light of the speech he made the other day, that my honourable friend would probably have been the first to appreciate a reason of that kind.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not believe in divorce; but I feel that I cannot vote for the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa, because I think it conflicts with the earlier part of subclause 1 of clause 8, which is intended to prevent the proceedings becoming public. If the proposed amendment is carried there is nothing to prohibit any one publishing a full report. The report includes the evidence of the proceeding as well as the judgment. The honourable gentleman from Ottawa should let subclause 1 remain, and add such words as these: "When the final judgment of the court or judge has been filed, public notice of such judgment shall be given in such manner as may be provided by regulation." After the final judgment is recorded in the court, notice is given to the public. The court would fix the regulations.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I take it that the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) leaves it in the hands of the judge to make regulations. Surely that is sufficient.

Hon. Mr. FOSTER: The objection that I see to the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) is that it does not say the judge must do it, but that he may do it.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: It is left to the court to make these regulations. If the amendment of the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) goes through it will mean that if the case is one that should never have been taken into court, that fact will have to be advertised. Furthermore, the amendment makes no provision as to who shall do the advertising. I think that matter should be regulated by the judges.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Belcourt was negatived.

Section 8 was agreed to.

Sections 9 and 10 were agreed to.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Honourable gentlemen, I wish to propose now the addition of clause 10A. I read that clause to the House before, but I will read it again, if any one wishes:

The court, the appellate courts, and the Supreme Court of Canada, respectively, shall make such general orders, rules and regulations concerning the practice and procedure in such courts respectively, and for proceedings in forma pauperis, as such courts may respectively consider expedient, and shall make tariffs of the costs and fees to be paid for or in connection with any proceedings had in such respective courts under the provisions of this Act, and shall by such orders, rules and regulations provide for the trial or hearing, or any part of the trial or hearing, of any suit being held in camera; provided, however, that no order, rule, or regulation shall be made—

I have dropped out a line there.

—to try any issue by a jury.

(2) In all matters not provided for by this Act or by any general order, rule or regulation, the practice and procedure shall conform to and be regulated, as nearly as may be, by the practice and procedure at the time in force in civil suits in the courts dealing with such matters, and if there is no such practice or procedure which can be conveniently and effectively adopted then as nearly as may be, by the practice and procedure at the time in force in the Probate Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice in England, or in appeals therein or therefrom as the case may be.

(3) All general orders, rules and regulations made under this section shall be published in the Canada Gazette.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Regarding this amendment, it seems to me that we are making this a Federal court. The British North America Act provides that the practice of all courts which try matters between subject and subject shall be regulated by the province. There is nothing that entitles the Dominion Parliament to confer power on any court authority to make practice or regulations. That power is conferred on the court by the provincial legislature. If this business were confined to the Exchequer Court, then in my opinion this clause would be proper; but when this jurisdiction is given to a provincial court, it appears to me that such a section as this should be passed by the provincial legislature. I cannot see under what law this section is suggested. So far as trying the case in camera is concerned, I can understand that we may perhaps provide for that; but if it is correct for us to make rules and regulations, then we deprive the provincial courts of their control over the costs of litigation. The question has often been discussed whether or not the costs payable by one party to another should be abolished. The proposal to abolish costs altogether has been up in the legislature more than once. Now, supposing that this clause is passed and is legal, and then the provincial court declares that there shall be no costs or that the costs shall be limited to $100 on each side, will the judges have the power to override the provincial legislature and to make a tariff of costs? This will raise a very serious question, the question of provincial jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. FOSTER: Does my honourable friend contend that the Parliament which makes possible the tribunal cannot provide that the judge or the court hearing the case shall have power to hear the case in camera? That is as far as my amendment goes.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I am devoting my remarks to the question of the control of costs and the control of the practice in the court. I am not at all sure whether there is not already a general power conferred by the Dominion Parliament to have cases heard in camera; but as to the other powers, it seems to me it is a grave question.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman from Hamilton appears to overlook the fact that by the British North America Act divorce is handed over to this Parliament, and all the necessary machinery would naturally go with it.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I may state to my honourable friend from Halifax that I quite appreciate that. But so is shipping, so is banking, so are bills of exchange; yet nobody has ever dreamed with reference to legislation regarding shipping, or bills of exchange, or banking, that the courts in trying cases should be circumscribed by Dominion statute.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think my honourable friend has forgotten for the moment that the Privy Council has settled that point—that where the Parliament of Canada legislates on any subject which appertains properly to it under the British North America Act, that which Parliament does incidentally, as a necessary incident to that legislative power, is quite within its competence, though it may be in contravention of provincial jurisdiction. That point is not open to discussion now at all, because the Privy Council is clearly on record as declaring that this Parliament may legislate on any matter affecting a civil right arising out of provincial jurisdiction, if it is a necessary incident of any subject upon which this Parliament can legislate.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But the point that the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), if I may be pardoned for saying so, seems to miss is that this practice is not a necessary incident of the legislation of the Dominion Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Well, I think it is.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: I do not quite appreciate the difficulty that the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) has in reference to dealing with practice and procedure. This particular clause simply gives the court that is to deal with the question authority to make general rules and to provide for costs, etc. If we did not confer that jurisdiction, I do not see how the court would have any authority to do so. We assume that we have the right to deal with legislation of this kind. Then, having the right to enact legislation of this nature, does it not follow that we also have the right to say to the courts: "You may have jurisdiction to deal with the question of procedure; that is, we give you authority. We do not say what your procedure shall be, or what course you are to adopt, but we give you authority to enact general rules for the purpose of carrying on your proceedings."

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: We have done so, for instance, in the matter of bankruptcy, in the matter of winding-up, etc.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: My contention is that we have the right to do it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes.

Hon Mr PROUDFOOT: And the doubt that my honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon Mr. Lynch-Staunton) has in reference to this is that we have not the jurisdiction. It seems to me that we have, and that this clause is therefore in that respect not objectionable.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to call the attention of the honourable gentleman from Hamilton to subsection 14 of section 92 of the British North America Act, which states one of the powers given to the provincial legislature. It says:

> The administration of justice in the Province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of Provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: That is the point.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: My learned friend raises the point—and I have heard it raised before—that divorce is a civil matter, and therefore when you give the provincial court jurisdiction in regard to divorce the provincial legislature would have to provide the procedure, under that section.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: That is the point.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: That is what I understand is the objection of the honourable gentleman. As against that there is another point: that the words "civil matters" refer to civil matters as they were assigned to the provinces. Divorce, although a civil matter, was not assigned to the provinces, but was assigned to the Parliament of Canada, and when we send that back to the provinces we may at the same time fix the procedure, in the same way as may be done, as is pointed out by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), in regard to bankruptcy and other matters. I know there is a dispute on this question, and I do not pretend to be allwise in the matter or to decide who is right; but, as I understand the matter now, the decision of the Privy Council, as stated by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa, points to the fact that this legislation that we now propose is all right. But we will assume that it is wrong—that we have not jurisdiction. I think that even in that case we ought to pass it and that, so far as this House is concerned, the Bill should be as nearly perfect as we can make it; and if the High Court of Ontario says that this provision that we are making for rules of procedure is ultra vires, then that court will not act upon it, but will proceed to make its own rules, under the powers conferred by the legislature of Ontario. It was for a similar reason that I inserted the clause with regard to alimony. I do not know who is right or who is wrong on that question; it is one that has yet to be determined; but if we have the power, then, having legislated, we have done with the matter. Now it is for the High Court of Ontario to deal with it. I do not mean to say that the contention of the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) is not perfectly correct.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: You are going on the principle of "safety first."

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Well, I want to get things done and get them out of the way.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Ross was agreed to.

Section 11 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported as amended.

GERMAN TRADE IDENTIFICATION BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton, the Senate went into committee on Bill W, an Act for the Identification of Traders in German Goods. Hon. Mr. Daniel in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: There is a printer's error in the second line. The word "inserted" should be "amended."

On subsection 1 of the proposed section 508 E—words "dealer in German goods" to be on dealer's premises, advertisements and stationery:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman in charge of this Bill how this law is to be enforced. From the remarks made the other day when the Bill was up for second reading, it seems that gentlemen interested in business practically all admit that it will be very difficult to say whether the goods they sell were or were not manufactured in Germany. We know that many different things sometimes enter into the manufacture of a certain article, and some of these things may be manufactured in Germany. It may be very difficult to tell whether that is the case or not. Any person dealing in any of these articles may have to go to considerable trouble to find what has been done in manufacturing the goods.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The principle of this Bill was carried in this House. It did not go down very well with me, but I let it pass. I want to point out that this section is too wide. It says:

> Every person who knowingly deals in goods, wares or merchandise which are, in whole or in part, the growth, product or manufacture of Germany or Austria-Hungary, shall keep posted, etc.

The point that troubles me is the same one that troubles my honourable friend the leader of the Opposition. For instance, iron ore may be got out of a mine in Germany, and transported to Belgium, or Sweden, to be refined; the pig iron may be sent to England, turned into steel, and finally made into knives which will be sent out here. The language of the Bill is too far-reaching. If the words "growth" and "product" were cut out, and if the Bill were confined to something manufactured as a complete article, it might be feasible to enforce it; but I really do not feel like voting for this section as it stands. Perhaps my honourable friend can give us some further light on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: When this section passed the Senate in 1918, this question was very thoroughly gone into. The honourable member for Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) pointed out the difficulties which have just now been mentioned, and the word "knowingly" was inserted to make it clear that if a man imported goods—for instance, knives made in England—and did not know that part of the product came from Germany, he would not be held responsible in any way at all. The word "knowingly" would cover such cases as have been conjured up. In making a charge against a person it must be charged that he sold goods, knowing them to be of German growth or production. If that is not proved, he is not liable and he is not bound to find that out. If the section is limited in the way proposed the act will become a nullity. There is no use in introducing legislation on any subject which is so unreasonable that it will be non-enforcible. No possible case of hardship can arise with the word "knowingly" in the section. The principle of the legislation is admitted, and the Act is of no use if it is made purely illusory.

Hon. M. SCHAFFNER: Will there be any difficulty in determining whether a man "knowingly" has the goods?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It must be proved. If I charge you with a breach of the Act, I must prove that you knew the goods were of German origin.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: It seems to me that there will be considerable difficulty there.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It will be quite difficult to prove. In the case just mentioned it could not be proved; but there would be no difficulty in proving the charge in the case of something that came direct from Germany. What I had in mind when I put the words "growth, product, or manufacture," in the Bill was this. It is quite well known that goods manufactured in Germany—for instance, electrical machinery—having the manufacturer's name on them, will be moved over into Switzerland, or some other country, and assembled. Without this general clause those goods, while they are manufactured in Germany, will not be considered German, goods. In such a case one could not say he did not know the article was German, because there would be printing all over it indicating that it was. But in the case of a dye that is used in the manufacture of something else, or something of that kind, a man would not know anything about it. Of course, the House can emasculate the Bill to such an extent as to defeat its object; but as it passed the second reading I suggest that it should not be reduced to a mere shadow in committee.

Hon. Mr. RATZ: If a merchant now has goods, knowing them to be German goods, what will happen to them?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The last subsection of the Bill covers that.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Does not the honourable member think that the effect of the Bill will be to penalize English and American traders as much as German traders? Inasmuch as there is no law prohibiting trade between England and Germany or between the United States and Germany, English and American traders may send German goods here. Does the honourable gentleman think that a merchant in Montreal or Toronto would like to put up over his shop such a sign as has been suggested? What will become of German goods sold by English or American merchants?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: They will not be sent here. I do not see that we are greatly interested in them. My sympathies are entirely against people who deal in German goods. I know that there are people who deal in German goods, and that you can buy German goods at the present time for about one cent on the dollar.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Where?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: In Germany. Every one knows that at the present rate of exchange you can buy German goods very cheaply.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: Do you not want to bring down the high cost of living?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I am speaking only of German goods. We can buy other people's goods. This is not going to affect the high cost of living. We can buy Italian goods nearly as cheaply as German goods. The Italian rate of exchange is very low now.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Russian goods?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: You can buy Russian goods. The Russian rate of exchange is just as low as that of Germany.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I want to enlighten my honourable friend. While in Geneva I met a member of the English House of Commons who had a grievance against the Germans. He had been delegated by his colleagues of the House of Commons to buy some German wine. The German people instead of selling the wine at the rate at which he expected to buy it—that is, at the rate of a mark for a cent and a half—immediately jumped up the price, and he had to pay a great deal more. You cannot buy German goods as cheaply as you think you can, if you take the mark as your basis of calculation. Another reason why you cannot buy German goods as cheaply as you think you can is because in many cases they have put on an export tax which goes up to two or three hundred per cent.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Where have they done that?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: For instance, you cannot buy a motor car. When I was in Brussels a member of the ministry told me that his son in Germany had been offered a Mercedes at a price which would have been positively ridiculous. I think it was $1,200 for a 48 horse-power Mercedes, which was as good as a Rolls-Royce or a Pierce-Arrow. But upon investigating the matter he found that there was a very high price put on those goods for export. I am not saying this to my honourable friend for the purpose of defeating his Bill. The principle has been accepted. But may I call his attention to this point? Section 3 is, I believe, intended to protect persons who in good faith have bought German goods which are now in this country. They might not have bought the goods had they known that they would be forced to advertise the source from which the goods came. Now, I would point out that there may be persons who have ordered goods which have not yet entered Canada, and may not arrive for two or three months to come. I would suggest to my honourable friend that he extend the clause so as to cover those persons, because they have not been notified of the passage of this legislation and they will surely be taken by surprise, for they are bound by the contracts which they have entered into and which they cannot cancel.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Does not my honourable friend think that their reason would be that they are ashamed to acknowledge having bought German goods?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am referring to the purpose of sub-clause 3—

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: May I remind the honourable gentleman that he is discussing subsection 3 and we are now on subsection 1.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I must admit that. It is simply because this point has just been discussed.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I sympathize considerably with the learned introducer and mover of this Bill. I think we should have some regard to permanency in Bills of this kind, and I think the Bill of the honourable gentleman will have to be repealed at next session of the legislature. For that reason, because it is only a temporary Bill, I think I am going to vote for it. Now, I would point out to him a very valuable article, of extensive consumption—the article of sugar. We know that a syndicate in London has put up the price of sugar in the British Isles and wherever they can get three or four times its former price. Our Government is putting an embargo on the shipment of sugar to the United States. The United States in reprisal will very probably prevent Canada from obtaining any sugar from any of the possessions over which they have control. Now, where are we going to get sugar? The Germans will produce any quantity of beet sugar and that will be brought into Canada. There is no prohibition against its importation. The refineries will put upon it their processes; they will refine the sugar and mix it with other sugar and put it on the market. Sugar will be in demand as an article of prime necessity. Under this Bill persons who sell sugar of that kind, which is a mixture and part of which is the production of Germany, shall be liable to a penalty. In the process by which the sugar is treated in Canada it can be mixed up so that no dealer can tell how much is German beet and how much is other mixture. What will those who like sugar do? The general public will demand something at a reasonable price. Here is a prohibition in my honourable friend's Bill. I appeal to him to have some regard for the public. Legal precision is one subject, but the wants of a great community are a very different subject, and a Bill that is absurd upon its face ought not to pass the legislature.

Hon. Mr. THORNE: Honourable gentlemen, I expressed my opinion yesterday in reference to this Bill. I have the utmost respect for the opinions of members of the legal fraternity with regard to the technicalities of the law, but I must say I have not the same confidence in their opinions with regard to commercial matters. I think this Bill will defeat the object in view. As I sad before, the only way to regulate trade in German goods is through the customs or by tariff regulation. I believe that is the only practical way of settling this matter. My sentiments are just as strong as those of any man in this House with regard to German trade and the attitude which Germany took in the late horrible war, and I would like to see some step taken to prevent German goods from being imported into Canada; but the result of this Bill would be to advertise German goods and to create in Canada a market for them. The Bill would not be effective for the purpose intended. On the contrary, it would promote the sale and consumption of German goods in Canada. One or two years hence, in this country and in the United States and England, there will have passed away all sentiment against doing business with Germany, and if you desire to carry out the policy of preventing trade with Germany the only way to do so is by regulating the tariff. If under the tariff regulations German firms were prevented from selling to the ordinary merchant, they would start a house of their own in each city of the Dominion of Canada, and I will guarantee that sentiment would not prevent the ladies from buying such things as would appeal to them as being superior to, or cheaper than, goods made in the United States or in Great Britain. I know from experience that in lines of industry in which German goods can be sold most cheaply, sentiment will not control the purchase and use of such goods. Holding these views, and feeling that this Bill should not become law, I move that the committee now rise.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I would like to point out that one honourable gentleman contends that this Bill will embarrass the retailers and embarrass the people, and another gentleman says it will promote the sale of German goods and will not do any harm at all. Which is right? If the honourable gentleman who has just spoken is right, the passing of the Bill cannot cause the slightest injury to anybody. His objection to the Bill is that it will promote the sale of German goods. That was the burden of his speech.

Hon. Mr. THORNE: It will defeat the object in view.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: And therefore I do not see how any person who wants to sell German goods can object to the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: We know—

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: I would remind the honourable gentleman that there is a motion before the committee—a motion which is not debatable. We shall have to take a vote on the motion of the honourable senator from St. John (Hon. Mr. Thorne). The motion is that the committee do now rise; and if that is carried it will of course defeat the Bill entirely.

The motion of Hon. Mr. Thorne was negatived.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Mr. Chairman, I was about to remark when you called the vote, that when for a number of years, there was in force a surtax against German goods it was well known to the trade generally that a great proportion of German goods did come into this country without the payment of the surtax. It was known that English manufacturers imported materials from Germany, finished them in England, and shipped the goods to Canada as English-made goods. I am rather in sympathy with the views of the honourable gentleman from St. John (Hon. Mr. Thorne). I would be in favour of this Bill if it would prevent the advertising of German goods in Canada, or if it made it a criminal offence to advertise German goods in this country; but, as pointed out by the honourable member from St. John, the Bill would have the opposite effect. When goods are placed on the retailer's shelf, it does not matter where they come from, it is the quality and the price of the goods, and not sentiment, that will appeal to the customer. If you want to keep German goods out of this country, put up the tariff, or prohibit their importation altogether; then you will effect your purpose. But it seems to me that in this Bill and the objects in view there is a great deal of camouflage.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: That is the latest argument about it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: That may be the latest, but that is the way it strikes me. I may be a little dense, but it seems to me that you are legalizing and encouraging the advertising of German goods in Canada by declaring that any person is guilty of a criminal offence and liable to a penalty if he does not advertise them.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: I am surprised to hear any honourable gentleman say that sentiment will be gone; that is, as I understand the statement, that the people will forget the facts that have been driven home to them during the four years of the war.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: Will the honourable gentleman excuse me. The debate, as it has been carried on by the last two or three speakers, is a discussion on the principle of the Bill. What we are discussing is the first subclause. The principle of the Bill has already been adopted by this Chamber, and we can now discuss only the clauses as they come up. We cannot discuss the principle of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: All right, Mr. Chairman. I was only following along the lines of the honourable gentlemen who had just preceded me.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: I know.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: And I thought it was advisable to answer some of the statements. If we have adopted the principle of the Bill, in which I heartily concur, then there is really nothing more for me to say on the subject except that I fancy that if this clause is passed it will prevent something that is going on at the present time. We have in Canada merchants who, I think, are a disgrace to this country, because they are sending men over to Germany for the purpose of purchasing German goods and bringing them into Canada. Men who are supplied with goods purchased in that way and delivered in Canada will not be able to sell them as they have been able to do in the past. For that reason I think that if this clause is changed at all, it should be extended so as to make it a criminal offence for merchants to send their travellers to Germany for the purpose of making purchases there.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Honourable gentlemen, the arguments that have been advanced against this Bill, or this clause, might have come with good grace before the war, but for the life of me I cannot understand how any person can conclude that the passage of this measure would advertise German goods. How many men in Canada to-day who had any blood relation or any friend engaged in this war could put up a sign like this: "Dealer in German goods?" Why, it is preposterous to think that a sign like that would advertise German goods. How many men in Ottawa—how many members of the Senate—would like to have a sign up over their door: "Dealer in German goods"?

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: What is the use of putting it up at all? The Bill is of no use whatever.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I say that the man who to-day would put up a sign of that kind is not worthy to be called a Canadian citizen.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Or the man who would buy German goods.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: He is not worthy to live in America or in any of the countries of the Allies. This Bill has my wholehearted approval. I hope it will be a long time before any person in Canada will knowingly deal in German goods or in anything from Germany.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: I did not speak on the second reading of this Bill the other day, for the simple reason that I thought the Bill was only a joke. I did not think it was possible for any man to stand up here and flaunt his loyalty—

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I rise to a point of order. Are we going to go on with these clauses or are we going to talk about the principle of this Bill all night.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: What is your point of order?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: My point of order is that we are not discussing the clause.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: I decide that the point of order is well taken. Shall this sub-clause be adopted?

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT.

Subsection 1 of new section 508E was agreed to.

Subsection 2 was agreed to.

On subsection 3—exception:

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I would suggest to the mover of this Bill that there be added in the second line of this subsection, after the word "are," the following words: "bona fide purchased or," so that the subsection would read as follows:

The provisions of this section shall not apply to dealings in any such goods, wares or merchandise as are bona fide purchased or in Canada at the date of the passing of this Act.

Persons who have already made bona fide purchases are in a position similar to that of persons who, in good faith, have such goods in the country at the present time, and they should be protected. I would suggest to my honourable friend that as this legislation was not advertised in advance, this amendment ought to be made.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, I feel compelled to oppose that suggestion, because of the fact that it would only be legislating to assist the agents of retraders and merchants who have sent their representatives to Germany for the specific purpose of buying German goods and bringing them here to be sold to the people of Canada. I agree with the honourable gentleman from North Bay (Hon. Mr. Gordon) that it is an offence against the intelligence and the loyalty of our people for merchants to have done this thing, and those who have done it should suffer the consequences of their own act.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the honourable minister a question?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: What difference does the honourable minister find between persons who have done that and have the goods in the country, and persons who have done that but have not yet received the goods? What is the difference in the degree of the offence?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The difference would be this: that since the war Germany has not been exporting to any great extent, and there has not been any large quantity of German goods brought to Canada. German goods in Canada were probably here before the war, or during the early part of the war, and they have remained unsold because of the antagonism of the people against Germany—because of the anti-German sentiment in Canada. It is quite proper to provide that merchants holding those goods, who have perhaps already suffered loss by reason of the fact that they have been on their hands, shall not be further penalized. But the merchant who has deliberately sent his agent to Germany since the close of the war and who purposes to bring into Canada German-made goods to compete with the goods manufactured in our own country, or in the countries of the Allies, ought to suffer the consequences of his own act.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: May I ask the honourable gentleman who has just sat down; were not the United States one of our Allies in the late war, and are they not buying German goods? I was reading in a newspaper the other day that hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of German dyes are being shipped to the United States now, and people think it a great privilege to be able to get them.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: While we are on this point I should like to read a letter in my possession which was passed to me yesterday. Before proceeding with this, I wish to state that I consider myself as loyal a subject as there is in Canada, and I would not like to take back water. You may blend sentiment with law, and some other things, but I do not believe in mixing sentiment with business. I have here a letter from a member of Parliament who happens to be a farmer. He wanted some fertilizer and wrote to a firm in Summerside. The answer he received is dated March 30. I will not mention any names. The letter reads:

> Your letter of the 15th to hand. Have no ready-mixed fertilizer—

But they quote prices for chemicals which are mixed for fertilizers.

> Acid of phosphate, 16 per cent available.
> Nitrate of soda, $5.75 per cwt.
> Muriate of potash, from Germany—

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: I think the honourable gentleman is quite out of order.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: This is information which I think honourable members should have.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: This clause simply refers to the date at which this Act shall come into force.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: You are going to pass this Bill, and you do not want the information Does not the country want it? I do not often take the floor of this House, and I ask the permission of the House to speak for a few minutes. I have been here for about ten years and have not occupied more than about twenty minutes, I suppose, and I do ask the privilege of this House—

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I object, Mr. Chairman, I think your ruling should be maintained. We must deal with this Bill in the usual way. The honourable gentleman had every opportunity to discuss the principle of this Bill on the second reading, and this is no time to do it.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: I did not take the Bill seriously. I thought it was only a joke. I think so yet.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Then what is the use of discussing it?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: If this Bill is carried, I wish to tell my honourable friend, you will advertise German goods from Vancouver to Prince Edward Island, with that sign over the door.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: I must call the honourable gentleman to order. I will put the amendment of my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Beaubien). Do you insist on your amendment?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: No. I just want to put another question to the Minister of Labour on this point. Great quantities of these goods are being sold here by travellers who have come from Switzerland or the United States or somewhere else. Say a traveller goes to A and sells him goods. He sells some goods to B. Very good. The goods of A come in the day before this Bill is sanctioned. The goods of B come in the day after. Would my honourable friend tell me what is the difference in the degree of responsibility of A and B—why he should strike at B, and not at A?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: My answer to the honourable gentleman would be that the same objection might be raised to every Act of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I beg my honourable friend's pardon. No Act of Parliament is retroactive unless it so specifies.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Question, question. We have heard this before.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I beg pardon. In this case you punish a man for something done prior to the passage of the Bill, when the man does not know anything about the law.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: If a man imports German goods into this country for the purpose of sale, is he ashamed to put over the door his sign to the effect that he is dealing in them.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: No.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: Does he want to see his name over the door?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: You are advertising Germany. That is what I object to.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: Order.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: This discussion is out of order. The honourable gentleman says that he did not propose to move an amendment; therefore there is nothing to discuss.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I beg pardon. We are on clause 3, and until it is adopted, I suppose we can discuss it. I shall bow to the ruling of the Chairman.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: You may continue so long as you deal with the clause.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I say, why make a distinction between A and B? In one case you impose a responsibility which is followed by fine and imprisonment.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: No.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Yes. In the other case you refuse to impose it. The man in the second case is not more guilty than the man in the first; still, you punish him,—why? It is because you give this law a retroactive effect. You punish a man for completing a deal that was made prior to the coming into effect of this law. I submit that what is fair in the case of A should be fair in the case of B. But what are you going to do? What does it mean? It means that you do not do justice. You do something that you have no right to do—something that is not done in the case of any other offence. You have no right to penalize a man for a deed unless he is placed on exactly the same level as everybody else in the land. In this case there may be delay in delivery, something over which he has no control, and on that account he is not put on a level with everybody else.

Subsection 3 of section 1 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 2.30 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Friday, April 23, 1920.

The Senate met at 2.30 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

DIVORCE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill N 2, an Act for the relief of Charles Elias Vardon.—Hon. Mr. McMeans.

Bill O 2, an Act for the relief of John Hamilton Harvey.—Hon. Mr. Bradbury.

Bill P 2, an Act for the relief of James Goddard.—Hon. Mr. McMeans.

Bill Q 2, an Act for the relief of Frederick Stephen Hartman.—Hon. Mr. Bradbury.

Bill R 2, an Act for the relief of William George McBride.—Hon. Mr. Bennett.

Bill S 2, an Act for the relief of George Stinson.—Hon. Mr. Bennett.

Bill T 2, an Act for the relief of John James Davis.—Hon. Mr. Bennett.

PRIVATE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN presented Bill U 2, an Act respecting the Army and Navy Veterans in Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Will the honourable gentleman explain the Bill?

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: I may say that it was just placed in my hands at the door. I am introducing it in the absence of the honourable gentleman from Manitou (Hon. Mr. Sharpe). The object of the Bill seems to be to incorporate the Dominion Association of the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Army and Navy Veterans of Canada, and to give the Army and Navy Veterans the right to add the ladies to their association under a different name.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: They are associating with them now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is there an age limit?

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: I rather think not. The Bill will be open for amendment.

The Bill was read the first time.

CAMP BORDEN.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL inquired of the Government:

1. How many acres are comprised in the area on which Borden Camp is placed?
2. From whom was this land purchased?
3. What was the total cost of the land?
4. What has been the total cost of equipping Borden Camp in its present condition?
5. What has it cost each year to maintain Borden Camp?
6. What has been the total cost of everything to date in connection with the purchase, equipment and maintenance of Borden Camp?
7. How many miles of roads and sidewalks have been built in connection with Borden Camp?
8. What has been the total cost of these roads and sidewalks?
9. How many soldiers have been trained each year at the Borden Camp?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. 14,596.6 acres (includes road allowances).

RESCUE OF LIGHTHOUSE CREWS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOYER inquired:

What was the cost of sending a sealer from Newfoundland to Labrador to rescue the crews of the different lighthouses in the Strait of Belle Isle?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The amount paid for the service of the Seal to bring the different lighthouse crews from Belle Isle to St. Johns, Newfoundland, was $20,000.

CANADA'S PEACE TREATY EXPENDITURE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a return of all moneys expended by the Government up to the present time in connection with the Treaty with Germany, Austria, Czecho-Slavia, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State and Bulgaria, stating the vote from which any moneys so far expended have been supplied; stating the amount assessed against Canada under Article 6 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, as the share of the Dominion of Canada for the purpose of carrying out the terms of the Covenant.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MANDATE FOR ARMENIA.

RUMOURED OFFER TO CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to bring up a matter of urgency, and I think it should receive the immediate attention of the Government and a reply should be made forthwith. I see in the Montreal Gazette of today the following words in large type: "Canada may be given Mandate for Armenia."

Hon Mr. DOMVILLE: My God!

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: "Curzon"—that is Lord Curzon, the British Foreign Minister—"Curzon tells Premier's Council Dominion is willing." Now, we ought to know who told him that Canada is willing. "Norway will refuse—Britain would bear part of burden—Is important matter for U.S." This is a cable from San Remo, where the Council of the League of Nations is at present meeting, and here are the words:

San Remo, April 22.—Canada may receive the mandate for Armenia. America having failed to ratify the Treaty and accept the mandate burden and the League of Nations having refused on the ground of inadequate resources, the decision was that it should be offered to a neutral nation, and that the members of the League should guarantee the cost.

In accord with that plan the Council of Premiers yesterday decided to offer the mandate to Norway. The general opinion, however, is that Norway will not accept, as it would be called on to provide a police force of 40,000 as well as to make a financial sacrifice.

When that possibility—

And this is the particular place that I lay stress on, and I hope the Government will be able to reassure this House and this country with regard to it—

When that possibility was laid before the council Lord Curzon—

"The Right Honourable George Curzon Thinks himself an important person."

—Lord Curzon, the British Foreign Minister, rose and stated that he was in a position to state that Canada would accept the mandate if Norway refused.

Now, I would like to know from the Government—and I may tell the Government that this country is in no mood to police Armenia. I know it is out of order to make a speech at this time; but I think the country should be reassured at once that no one ever authorized Lord Curzon, British Foreign Minister, to speak in the name of Canada. In any case, the days of Orders in Council are past, and the Parliament of Canada would be the only authority that could authorize anybody to speak for Canada.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend from De Lanaudière should not take so seriously his perusal of newspaper reports. It is marvellous what feeling my honourable friend can throw into an unauthorized report which may appear in the public press. I regret very much that I cannot give him any information upon this subject. It seems to me that this is a flattering tribute to Canada, that Canada should be mentioned as assuming a responsibility so grave, so important, and of such magnitude as that referred to in the report. This report apparently has been received in the native city of my honourable friend, and I would suggest that, instead of inquiring from the Government as to the truth of it, he should inquire at the Gazette office.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I think the honourable member is asked a very serious question. Is the Government aware of it, or is Lord Curzon talking for himself? That is the question I put.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I said the Government is not aware of it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is what I want to know.

DIVORCE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill Z, an Act for the relief of Alexander Scougall.—Hon. Mr. Mulholland.

Bill A2, an Act for the relief of Edith Gertrude Willis.—Hon. Mr. Proudfoot.

Bill B2, an Act for the relief of Ada Mabel Sanderson.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

Bill C2, an Act for the relief of John Albert Green.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

Bill D2, an Act for the relief of Emily Cruickshank.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

Bill E2, an Act for the relief of Cyril Graham Sinclair.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

GERMAN TRADE IDENTIFICATION BILL.

MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED.

Hon. GEORGE LYNCH-STAUNTON moved the third reading of Bill W, an Act for the Identification of Traders in German Goods.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I have been requested by a member of the Senate who is unavoidably absent to ask that, with the consent of the mover of the Bill, this order be discharged and placed on the Order Paper for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I do not see why that should be done.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would not the honourable gentleman allow the Bill to stand? It is not unusual for an honourable member to make that request.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: On the third reading I think a discussion usually takes place.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Honourable gentlemen will allow me to speak on this question. This is the first time in four years that I have opened my mouth. I rise today on behalf of certain persons, probably the majority of people throughout the United Kingdom, and in Italy, and in part of Canada anyhow, to protest against the passage of this Bill for the identification of German traders. Why this question is brought up is more than I can understand. It is a proposal which ought not to receive the support of members of this House. I do not intend to speak at length, I cannot speak as I should. I wish to point out how this Bill has attracted attention—attention which is to the detriment of Canada itself, and of Great Britain and the Allied Powers, who are absolutely opposed to the principle enunciated by the honourable member from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton). I will read part of an editorial which appeared in the Montreal Gazette under the heading, "Trade with the Germans":

A Bill designed to discourage trade with Germany precipitated a debate of some warmth in the Senate on Tuesday. The discussion developed a wide range, covering the alleged shortcomings of the British Prime Minister, the untrustworthy character of the German people, and the consistency of certain individuals in this country now championing the cause of France.

The Gazette, it must be understood, is not an ordinary paper. It is really the mouthpiece of the Conservative party throughout the Dominion of Canada. I have good reason to know that, for I have been contesting its strength for the past 40 years. It has a great hold upon the people of Canada, and in all this time it has been the mouthpiece of the Conservative party throughout the length and breadth of Canada. It is the organ of the manufacturers. Now, in order not to delay the House, I will quote only one or two instances which the editor cites. I will read it. Unfortunately I cannot speak—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You are doing all right.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It says:

Yet the world's memory is short, the memory to business still shorter, and all the countries which lately were at war with Germany are now seeking to establish, or have already renewed, commercial relations with her.

All the other nations are establishing business relations with Germany; Canada is alone now.

Nor is this to be ascribed wholly to forgetfulness. The world's trade and the world's finances have been seriously disorganized, and it is of the highest importance that both be restored to normality as rapidly as possible.

Then, let the honourable gentleman from Hamilton listen to this:

That end can not be served by boycotting the products of a great producing country such as Germany was before the war and will be again. The resumption of trade relations with Germany does not necessarily imply the wiping of the slate. On the contrary, it may be argued that the products of German industry are a necessity as a means of repairing the economic and commercial damage for which the German people are responsible.

This is a very serious statement and one which it would be foolish for men of your capability to cast aside because of a little sentiment. The article goes on:

Assuming that the policy of Canada is to exclude the products of Germany, will the measure proposed by Senator Lynch-Staunton be effective?

This is a question put by a Conservative paper, one of the backers of the honourable gentleman's party. Will it be effective, and the question is answered, no.

Difficulties of enforcement will suggest themselves at once, and no explanation has been given as to how these difficulties are to be overcome.

Such is the language of the editor of this paepr. All I can say, gentlemen, is to look at the matter as coolly and calmly as possible, and not to allow ourselves to be carried away. I cannot say what I wish, but what I have just read is a statement of the principles held by a paper of universal responsibility for all that it says in regard to political matters.

This morning's Ottawa Citizen contains an article headed "France and the Treaty," and which says:

Premier Nitti—

That is, the Prime Minister of Italy—

—makes it clear that Italy recognizes that only by a stable Germany and an independent Russia can Europe return to a sound and progressive basis.

This, honourable gentlemen, is only the beginning of the argument. The views of Premier Nitti are given fairly and without any bias.

The Montreal Gazette of April 22nd, under the heading "Purest Democracy," publishes the following statement of the Prime Minister of Italy:

Italy's foreign policy is inspired by the purest democratic principles. We waged war, not against the German and Austrian peoples, but against Imperial Germany and Austria. We must allow Germany to resume her place in the world. Europe will never recover stability until Germany—that great storehouse of productive energy—and Russia—that immense warehouse of raw materials—are once more placed in a position to progress and prosper once more. The whole effort of Italy's policy is directed to this end now.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I cannot read or speak exactly; but I have said enough to make you understand that Italy and Great Britain are against the principle contained in the Bill introduced by my honourable friend from Hamilton. Therefore I ask that the House do not proceed with the consideration of the matter now, but that it be allowed to stand until Tuesday or Wednesday so that honourable gentlemen may have time to think it over, and decide whether it is right or wrong.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Honourable gentlemen, I see no good reason why the request to discharge this motion until Tuesday should not be accepted. There is no great rush to crystallize this legislation into a statute. I regard it as legislation of a most mischievous character. There is unrest enough now in this country, without exploding such a bombshell as this, which will cause a great deal of difficulty, trouble, and dissatisfaction. I am going to move that this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be read a third time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I will second the motion.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: I can see that the motion of my honourable friend may be the means of killing this Bill altogether. While I am not at all favourable to the Bill, yet I would rather see it come up and be discussed on Tuesday or Wednesday. I think the honourable gentleman who introduced the Bill (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) will probably accede to the very reasonable request that was made to have the Order for the third reading of this Bill discharged, and placed on the Order Paper next week. If the House then feels like giving the Bill the six months' hoist I shall acquiesce; but I think an opportunity should be given of further discussing the Bill next Tuesday.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Honourable gentlemen, I intend to support the motion for the six months' hoist, and for two reasons.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Louder.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The first reason is, as I stated yesterday, that even if you accept the principle of the Bill the application of it is too wide. It would be an improvement if the Bill were narrowed down to goods manufactured in Germany. As I pointed out yesterday, it covers a great deal more ground than that. Any raw material produced in Germany, and sold to any other nation on earth, and there used in the manufacture of an article sent to this country, would bring that article within the provisions of the Bill. I think the promoter of the Bill would have been wise to accept the suggestion to let the third reading of the Bill stand over until next Tuesday, to give an opportunity of considering whether or not it should be narrowed in its scope.

But there is a further question. The relations between Great Britain and her Allies and Germany and her Allies were settled by the Treaty of Versailles, which contained very elaborate provisions to guard against Germany passing any snide legislation with regard to foreign goods. The Americans complained of such treatment under the favoured nations clause with regard to oil. They claimed that the Germans had resorted to underhand practices, and had passed regulations in regard to the railways, which were Government-owned, which operated in favour of the home article and against the foreign article, and took away the whole benefit of the favoured nations clause. I examined the Treaty of Versailles somewhat carefully, and there are in it elaborate regulations guarding against that very thing. I think my honourable friend should study the Treaty and see whether he is not now proposing legislation which is contrary to the spirit, if not the letter of the Treaty. If this Parliament passed this Bill it is not certain that the British Government might not have to disallow it. If my honourable friend will not agree to let the Bill stand until next Tuesday, I shall support a motion for the six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The honourable gentleman from Middleton, in order to injure the Bill, has advanced a number of arguments founded on nothing. Where is there a word in the Treaty which is infringed upon in any way by this Bill? We have all seen the Treaty. If there were anything in the Treaty in jeopardy by reason of the Bill, I would agree to withdraw it. But there is nothing whatever in that contention. Neither the honourable gentleman from Middleton nor any one else has advanced a single argument showing that the Bill controverts the Treaty. Two years ago this Bill was passed unanimously by this House; not a vote was taken. This session it has passed the second reading and the committee stage, and has been discussed again and again, and, until now, not one word has been said about the Treaty.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I regret very much that my honourable friend did not accede to the request of an honourable member of this House to allow this matter to stand until next Tuesday. This Bill was discussed when it came up for second reading on Tuesday last; it was considered in committee on Thursday—only yesterday—and was put down for its third reading to-day. My honourable friend cannot say that there has been any delay in forwarding the Bill. The criticism that has been made of the Bill has, I think, been fair and just criticism; and I think the honourable gentleman, if anything, showed rather too much of a disposition, when we were in committee, to push the Bill through.

I did not make any remarks on the Bill on the second reading. I thought that probably the sentiment that the Germans should realize the enormity of their crime in forcing war upon the world should be brought home to them as strongly as possible, and, if it was possible to emphasize that in any way, I thought it was the right thing to do. I did not see, however, how this Bill was going to operate. I hoped that during the discussion in committee we would have got the information necessary to show us how the Bill was going to work.

My honourable friend has referred to the fact that the Bill went through the House two years ago. At that time we were at war with Germany, and, as I understand, there was no possibility of German goods being brought into Canada. As the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) has said, we are to-day in a different position: we have entered into the Treaty of Versailles, the terms of which we are bound to carry out, and we want to see everything done to bring about peace and harmony in the world. My honourable friend controverts the statement that this would in any way interfere with trade, or with the principle of the Treaty dealing with the question of trade; but I think he has not studied the clauses of the Treaty closely enough to see that, as the honourable gentleman from Middleton stated, it is specially provided in the Treaty that the German nation shall not do anything to hamper trade between their own country and any of the Allied nations. They have to receive the same treatment as Germany would give to any of the nations that were allied with her during the war. I think we are interfering with that principle.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Will the honourable gentleman allow me to ask him a question? It has been the law in England that goods brought in from Germany should be marked, "Made in Germany." Where is there in principle any distinction to be drawn between that legislation and this?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That refers to the goods.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Yes. Foreign goods were marked in order that people might buy home-made goods. Where, in principle, is there any difference between that legislation and this?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: By this legislation you propose to make people throughout the whole country advertise that they are importing German goods.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: And what is the difference?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think there is considerable difference.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Not the slightest difference.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Anybody who has suffered in the war, as the people in England and the people in this country have, will not be disposed to buy German goods unless they cannot possibly help it. If I may speak for myself, I should certainly not desire to buy them unless I were absolutely forced to do so. But to make it a crime for people to buy German goods is an unjustifiable interference with the trade of this country.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The honourable gentleman will pardon me. The Bill does not provide that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The Bill provides that any man who deals in German goods has to state that on his stationery, and advertise it to the world, and it puts him under the obligation of finding out where the goods came from.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Well, he would have to trace them up.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: "Knowingly," it says.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I certainly consider that this legislation is not based on British principles of justice and fair play, and that it is a great mistake for the Senate of Canada to pass such legislation at this time.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Honourable gentlemen, I do not intend to vote on a matter so important as this without explaining why I vote as I do. But I must first congratulate my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran)—and I am sure that in doing so I voice the sentiments of every honourable member in this Chamber —on his first speech since his illness.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: And I am sure we all join in hoping and trusting that from day to day and from week to week he will recuperate in such fashion that we shall hear him as we did in the past—but with a changed view, of course.

This Bill, I believe, would not have gone as far as it has gone had it not been for the popularity of the honourable gentleman who introduced it and the fact that we look upon him as a man of ability devoting a great deal of care and consideration to any matter which he brings before this House. Personally I did not at all expect that this Bill would pass the second reading. I thought that, after the honourable gentleman had given expression to his views, the Bill would have been withdrawn.

We would all have liked to see something done with the Kaiser and others who were responsible for the war. In that we agree with the honourable gentleman. But, on the other hand, we know that there are men who are closer to this question than we are, and who understand it better. Lloyd George, the Premier of the British Empire —we might almost say, of the world—seems to be satisfied. I cannot state the case much more strongly than has been done by my honourable friend (Hon. W. B. Ross), whom I always like to follow in matters of this kind. Great Britain and France and the other Allies—what are they doing? My honourable friend Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) says this Bill passed two years ago, and the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat answers: "Yes, but we were at war at that time; we have since adopted a Peace Treaty." We have unanimously decided to accept that Peace Treaty. Are we going to have the peace which we have been looking for? Are we going to cry "Peace, peace!" and then to declare a commercial war? Shall we say that we have declared peace, but we do not mean peace and are not looking for peace? I think, honourable gentlemen, that we in this House should be very guarded and very careful. As I said before, I find it difficult to oppose a Bill which has been introduced by my learned and honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton), and I feel very strongly against the Germans, particularly against the Kaiser and others who were responsible for bringing about a war in which so many lives were sacrificed for the re-establishment of freedom and of peace. But now that peace has been restored we trust it will continue for many, many years to come; and surely we are not going to give expression to a view differing so greatly from the views of the leaders whom we have followed. We followed Britain in this war; we followed France in this war. Can we not still follow the example of Great Britain and of France?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Italy also.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: While some German goods may be brought by merchants into this country, we must remember that, on the other hand, we have a great many goods that Germany wants to buy. I might mention some of them. I think one of the best customers we have in Europe for the lobster trade of this country is Germany. The Germans are also customers for our lumber and many other products. If we do not buy German goods, they are not going to buy our goods. While we may not be particularly anxious for Germany to put herself again in the position which she occupied just before the war—while we may, in fact, take great care to keep her from occupying any position in which she can ever give us more trouble, yet I think we ought to be willing and ready to maintain the peace of the world as it should be maintained. Therefore I intend to vote against the Bill. I would have preferred to see it held over, as requested by the honourable member for St. John, until Tuesday. Nobody could have been harmed. With regard to any important Bill that comes before this House, when any honourable gentleman asks to have its consideration deferred in order that he may examine into it further, the Bill should always be held over, unless there is some very serious reason for proceeding with it immediately. I have come to the conclusion to vote for the motion made by the honourable gentleman from St. John, and to vote against the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: As there has been so much commotion aroused about this, I would like to state that I am willing that the third reading should stand until Wednesday.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: That cannot be done, however, if the honourable member for Fredericton does not agree to withdraw his amendment.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I meant to move the adjournment of this debate until Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: But the honourable gentleman has already spoken.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman can get some member who has not spoken.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Smith, the debate was adjourned.

Bill 4, an Act to incorporate Armour Life Assurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Schaffner.

Bill 25, an Act respecting the Pacific Coast Fire Insurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Shatford.

Bill 26, an Act respecting the Pacific Marine Insurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Barnard.

Bill 34, an Act respecting the Montreal and Southern Counties Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Bill 41, an Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Webster (Stadacona).

Bill 42, an Act respecting the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Barnard.

Bill 43, an Act respecting the Kettle Valley Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Barnard.

Bill 44, an Act respecting Montreal, Joliette and Transcontinental Junction Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Pope.

Hon. Mr. PLANTA (for Hon. Mr. Taylor) moved the second reading of Bill 5, an Act respecting The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.

Hon. Mr. POWER: This seems to be a very serious undertaking, the tunnelling of Burrard Inlet, and I think that the House is entitled to a little information on the subject before we send the Bill to committee.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: As the honourable member for New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor) is not in his place, perhaps I might be allowed to give my honourable friend a little information about this Bill. It is a Bill which has been before this House on several occasions. It provides for an extension of time. The Bill is promoted by the municipalities of the cities of Vancouver and North Vancouver and, I think, the municipality of Richmond. They hope at some time to put a tunnel under Burrard Inlet to connect the north side and the south side of the harbour. I do not think there is any particular harm in the Bill. They have so far been unable to float the necessary bonds for the purpose of carrying on the work, but they hope to be able to do so, and I think it is in the interest of Vancouver that the Bill should be kept alive.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

DOMINION LANDS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 55, an Act to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this is a short Bill containing miscellaneous amendments to the Dominion Lands Act. Section 1 deals with the definition of "Allies," which is enlarged to include the Associated Powers. Sections 2 and 3 deal with letters patent. Section 4 deals with the sale of fractions of school lands which remain unsold, permitting them to be sold by the Department of the Interior.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What is the occasion of section 1?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not know just at the moment what the application of it would be. When we go into committee on the Bill we shall be able to consider that further. I suppose it is to include the United States, which was not an allied, but an associated power. That is the designation they gave themselves.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

MAGDALEN ISLANDS SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. JOHN McLEAN: I would like to bring to the attention of the Government a matter of great importance to a certain section of the Dominion. As honourable gentlemen may know, at the close of the season of navigation last fall, the Lady Evelyn was unable to perform service, and the car ferry was sent down to Pictou to release the Canadian Sealer, which was then lying there. It took the freight and passengers from Pictou to Souris, and then made an attempt to reach the Magdalen islands, but failed. The Government then sent the steamer Montcalm down to Souris to take part of the freight and passengers on board. It took her six weeks to get to the Magdalen islands. I may say that all the fishing supplies for the Magdalen islands, or nearly all that would be required for the spring, were on board the Canadian Sealer. On the 29th of March I received a telegram from the Magdalen islands asking about the ice conditions. I called the attention of the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the matter, and he said that the steamer would be attended to at once.

On the 19th of April I received the following telegram:

> Frank Leslie arrived Sunday in small schooner from Magdalenes and reports no ice between Magdalenes and Souris. Understand likely Evelyn under repairs until June, and steamer Guide replacing her is now at Pictou, but waiting slip repairs, which will delay her some time. The crew for Sealer is not yet here, and some delay will be necessary after they arrive. Would urge that Sealer complete her trip to Magdalenes and avoid further expenses and delay of cargo. Will you kindly see Mr. Johnston and advise us by wire.

I called up Mr. Johnston, Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and he told me he had nothing to do with the matter; that the steamer belonged to the Railway Department. I then called up the Railway Department and was told they had nothing to do with it; the steamer had not been handed over to them up to that time; and I had better apply to the Department of Trade and Commerce. I applied to the Department of Trade and Commerce, and they said they had nothing to do with her: it was a matter for the Department of Marine and Fisheries. In this way I had to go all the rounds, and those people were without their fishing supplies. As every honourable gentleman knows the lobster season opened yesterday. The steamer is at Souris with no captain and no crew, with the exception of the engineers who were left on board of her last fall. Among other things, there were on board 120 casks of gasoline. There is no gasoline on the Magdalen islands and not a boat in that place could go out. There are on the Magdalen islands about 6,500 people, most of whom are employed in the fisheries, and without gasoline they would be unable even to get their nets. I think that whoever is responsible for this delay and carelessness regarding a steamer worth $300,000 or $400,000, lying there without a captain, should be taken to task. As I understand, she is to ply between Charlottetown and Newfoundland during the summer and should have been at Magdalen islands ten days ago. It is a very great hardship on those people, and one that should not be overlooked. Whoever is responsible for it should be severely taken to task by the Government.

OTTAWA AGREEMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 22, an Act to confirm an agreement between His Majesty the King and the Corporation of the City of Ottawa. Hon. Mr. Crosby in the Chair.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On the schedule:

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Honourable gentlemen, I should like to ask the leader of the Government, now that some changes are being made in respect to the city of Ottawa, if it is the intention of the Government to make the owners of buildings rented by the Government pay their taxes to the city. It seems to me that all the property rented by the Government should be left in exactly the same position that it would be in if it were rented to private individuals at about half the rental paid by the Government and that the owners should pay the taxes. If I own a building and rent it to an individual and pay the taxes and water rates, why, when I rent it to the Government for more than I could get from any one else, should it become exempt from all taxation in the same way that this building, for instance, is exempt? I do not think it is a fair proposition, and I do not think the Government should exempt from taxation buildings that they rent from private individuals. You must remember, honourable gentlemen, that there are very many buildings rented by the Government from private individuals. When the Government puts up a new building the overflow goes into it, and very little of the space previously occupied by the overflow is released. This has not been the case under only one government; it has always been the case. I think the time has come when the owners of buildings rented to the Government should be left in exactly the same position as they would occupy if their buildings were rented to private individuals.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand that the Government is not claiming exemption from taxation on properties not owned by the Crown. Buildings which are rented by the Government are subject to taxation, the same as if they were occupied or rented by an individual. The only exemption from taxation is in the case of lands vested in the Crown. Before we reach the third reading of this Bill I shall make inquiries, and shall be able to advise my honourable friend further when the Bill comes up again for consideration.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: If the owners of such buildings are now paying taxes, they must have commenced very recently, because I know that a very few years ago all such buildings were exempt.

The schedule was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

DEVELOPMENT OF OIL SHALES IN CANADA.

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE (for Hon. Mr. Fowler) moved the adoption of the second report of the special committee appointed to inquire into the subject of the development of oil shales in Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Honourable gentlemen, I have not had the pleasure of reading this report, and perhaps other members of the House are in the same position as myself. Before committing itself to the report, the House should know, at any rate substantially, what it contains.

I have just had a copy of the report handed to me. I find that the report which we are asked to adopt contains this statement:

> Your committee have examined a number of witnesses and in consequence would recommend that the scope of their inquiry be enlarged by including therein iron ore and coal deposits; also whether further and better means might not be placed at the disposal of the Department of Mines for the attainment of the above ends.

If we deal with iron ore and coal deposits it seems to me that we shall be trespassing upon the sphere of the Geological Survey people; and it may mean quite a long inquiry and the examination of a great many witnesses without producing any substantial result.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Oil and fuel and iron are very closely allied. I fancy the honourable gentlemen making this suggestion have thought it advisable to cover more ground and bring out more information. They are good enough to give their time. There is no money asked for.

The report was adopted.

DOMINION LANDS BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 55, an Act to amend The Dominion Lands Act. Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 1—additional definition:

Hon. Mr. POWER: This is a somewhat important measure, and I think, with the leave of the House, we would not object to the leader of the Government explaining each clause of the Bill as we go along.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As I said the other day, the amendments are of a miscellaneous character, and do not embody any particular principle or policy; they have relation more to the procedure of the Act than to anything else. We are placing an interpretation on the word "Allies" so as to include the Allied and Associated Powers. As honourable gentlemen know, the United States was not an Ally with ourselves in the great war, but was an Associated Power, and the object is simply to include the United States in the word "Allies."

Hon. Mr. POWER: Suppose the United States put an embargo on Canada's white paper business, as they are talking of doing?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would not make any difference to the provisions of the Act. or would not stand in the way of our receiving American settlers upon our lands. We are very glad to have them, for they are amongst the very best settlers we have on Dominion lands, and I think it is very desirable that encouragement should be given to them.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—letters patent may issue where settler has no adequate knowledge of English or French language, but has complied with other conditions:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen will remember that at the last session it was pointed out that under the Naturalization Act provision should be made for that class of settler who could not speak French or English, but who spoke another language, and that discretion should be vested in the Secretary of State to issue to him a certificate of naturalization.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That would be after three years' residence?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. We restricted letters of naturalization to certain classes of aliens; but it was pointed out that that class of aliens had already entered for homestead duties and had performed their duties upon the land, and not being able to get letters of naturalization they were prevented from obtaining their patents. This discretion was therefore given to the Secretary of State, to make inquiry into such cases and issue letters of naturalization, so that if they do not come within the Naturalization Act because of the lack of adequate knowledge of English or French the Secretary of State may relieve them of their disability in that regard.

Section 2 was agreed to.

Section 3 was agreed to.

On section 4—disposal of unsold portion of school lands to be after valuation by official of department:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Under this section the minister has power to sell as well as to lease a fraction of a school section. The present Act provides that only a certain area of the land shall be sold; but there are cases where there may be a fraction outside of that area, and this section gives authority to sell that fraction. The school lands are held in trust, and are subject to certain regulations, and a certain routine has to be complied with before sale. The fact is that if there is a restriction no harm is done.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I assume that the Provincial Governments will be consulted with regard to this particular section, because the school lands belong to them, and the Dominion Government is only holding them as trustee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but provision is made in the Dominion Land Act whereby the funds are placed in a trust fund, and of course an accounting is made to the Provincial Governments or cestui qui trusts from time to time.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: This is excluded from the section enabling the Dominion Government to sell lands?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Section 4 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

IMPERIAL OIL COMPANY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a return showing all correspondence that may have taken place with the British Admiralty, and with the Naval Mission to India and the Dominion, 1919-20.

From the Sessional Return No. 254 brought down last session and laid before this House the Imperial Oil, Limited, in a letter addressed to the Honourable Minister of the Interior and signed by D. B. Hanna, president of the said company, under date March 1, 1919, protested against the Government granting the Shell Transport and Trading Company certain privileges claimed to be necessary for the economic exploration for oil in Northwestern Canada.

In the same letter the Imperial Oil, Limited, showed that they possessed or aimed at possessing a monopoly for supplying Canadian consumers of gasolene (motor fuel) and kerosene oil (lighting oil). In the said letter the Imperial Oil, Limited, claims, amongst other things, to be "the second largest amongst Canadian concerns, admitting first place only to the greatest of Canadian railways."

The motion was agreed to.

CANADA'S WAR EXPENDITURE AND CLAIM FOR INDEMNITY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS inquired:

(a) Has the Government computed the total of expenses incurred by the war which started in August, 1914; and, if so, what is the total of the expenses for Canada in the war?

(b) Has the Canadian Government claimed a war indemnity from Germany, or has the Imperial Government claimed an indemnity from Germany in favour of Canada; and, if so, what is the amount of the indemnity which Germany will pay to Canada?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

(a) Total payments out of War and Demobilization Votes as shown by the books of the Finance Department:—1914-15, $60,750,476.01; 1915-16, $166,197,755.47; 1916-17, $306,488,814.63; 1917-18, $343,836,801.98; 1918-19, 446,519,439.48; 1919-1920, to March 31, $343,544,081.26; Total $1,667,337,368.83.

Note—In addition payments have been made out of Consolidated Revenue Fund for expenditure due to the war, as follows: European War Pensions to March 31, 1920, $47,535,886.30; Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment to March 31, 1920, $44,128,661.49; Soldiers' Land Settlement, to March 31, 1920, $38,652,692.98; Interest on Public Debt, to March 31, 1920, $203,517,241.02; such interest being on borrowings in connection with War debt.

(b) The claim of Canada is determined by Articles 232, 233, 235, and annex 1, of section 1, Part 8, of the Treaty of Peace with Germany, and is strictly limited to the classes of expenditures covered by these Articles. Canada will present a claim in accordance with the terms of the Treaty; this claim is in course of preparation, but the exact amount has not yet been ascertained.

RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES.

MAIL ORDER BUSINESS AND COUNTRY MERCHANTS—MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. W. PROUDFOOT moved:

1. That an order of the Senate do issue for a return of the evidence and other proceedings submitted before the Dominion Railway Commission at the sessions at Ottawa on October 3, 1911, November 7, 1911, and March 18, 1919, relating to freight rates and all matters before said Board on said dates.

2. A copy of the report made by said Board to the Government as the result of said investigations.

3. A copy of the postal rate agreement or agreements existing between the Government and the railway companies for parcel post service, including a statement or copy of the rates charged by the Government railways.

4. A copy of the report made by the Dominion Railway Board to the Government on the contracts between the Government and the railway companies as to the rates charged for the postal services.

5. Does the said report show (or is the Government aware) that the rates fixed and paid are less than it cost the railway companies to perform the services?

6. What quantity of mail is carried annually by parcel post?

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the object of the investigations above referred to is for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not certain commodities were being carried at certain rates. I understand that a report was made by the Railway Board to the Government, but the report has not yet been made public, and it is for the purpose of having it brought down to the House that I make this motion.

Another object of the motion is to enable me to deal with the question of postal rates, in so far as they affect mail-order houses. The mail-order business is one of great importance to the people of the Dominion of Canada. When in the Ontario legislature, I advocated the imposition of a tax on mail order houses in each municipality; that is to say, if they sold by mail order in certain townships, or in certain towns or villages, they should pay a tax based on the business they did in each municipality. It is not fair that they should do business in a municipality and pay nothing in the way of taxes to the municipality, while the merchants there are obliged to pay taxes and other rates toward the up-keep of the municipality. The mail order business is carried on very extensively throughout the Dominion, and, according to my information, the mail order houses have been securing a great advantage over the merchants in the country districts. The question then arises, how far is the Government responsible for enabling the mail-order houses to carry on business? We find that on the 15th of March, 1918, freight rates were advanced 15 per cent, and that on the 12th of August, 1918, they were again increased 25 per cent. There was also an increase in the rates on various commodities.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: On what railways?

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: On all the railways: there was a general increase. The salaries of those engaged in the mail service were also increased, and in that way the cost of transportation was increased. My information is to the effect that, although those increases were made, nevertheless the postal rates were not increased, and that therefore the mail-order houses were able to carry on business at practically what it cost them to do so prior to the increase in freight rates. If that is so, it is unfair discrimination in favour of the mail-order house, and it is a kind of discrimination which should be put an end to. We must consider the effect it has on business in the rural municipalities and in the towns and villages. We find throughout the length and breadth of the land that the country stores are gradually being driven out of business by unjust competition. I say it is unjust competition when mail-order houses are enabled to ship goods into these municipalities at less than it costs the country to provide the carrying of these goods. They are discriminated against, first, in so far as the railways are concerned, and, secondly, in so far as the Government is concerned. The railways are carrying the mail-order business at less than cost, and the Government is providing the means for carrying it at less than cost. The result is, as an examination will show, the Government of this country is handing over every year millions of dollars to the mail-order houses. It would not be so bad if the general public were getting the benefit, but the public as a whole are not getting the benefit of the millions that are handed out in this way.

The Minister of Labour, at a meeting in, I think, Ottawa last year, made the statement that the Government of this country was bonusing the newspapers of the Dominion of Canada to the extent of about $6,000,000 a year by carrying them at less than the cost of transportation. Now, I am not making any complaint in that respect. There may be some justification for newspapers being carried in that way. Newspapers are supposed to be a means of educating the people and of disseminating the news from one end of the country to the other. That being so, there is an excuse for the Government spending money in that way. But there is no excuse in permitting one section of the people to secure an advantage over others. If the country stores had been allowed to go on as they did in years past, many of the young people in the country would have found it to their advantage to remain at home. The money would be kept in circulation in their immediate neighbourhood. Besides, those localities would not be entirely rural districts, as they are being made by the change which has been gradually brought about in the mode of business by the mail-order houses. No one objects to fair competition, but what people do object to—and I think they have a right to object to it—is unfair competition; and the competition is unfair when one class secures an advantage over another, at the expense of the whole public.

The object in desiring to distinguish between the provinces is to ascertain what amount of mail-order business is being done by the various houses, say in the province of Ontario. We can in that way ascertain whether the mail-order business is being carried on more extensively in Ontario than in any of the other provinces; and if that is the case, and I am correct in my surmise that this service is being carried on at a loss to the country, then Ontario is securing an advantage over the rest of the Dominion. If the service is being performed at a loss, the sooner the Government makes a change in that respect the better. Otherwise the same unfair conditions will continue in the future as in the past.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, my honourable friend from Huron (Hon. Mr. Proudfoot) has apparently anticipated the information with which the return would furnish us when brought down. Therefore it would probably be difficult, with the mass of material asked for, to gainsay what has already been stated. I have no disposition to criticise the course which honourable gentlemen may take in asking for the return of papers, information, etc.; but it seems to me that honourable gentlemen might greatly profit by attending at the departments and securing the information, which they would secure upon application to the minister. In that way we would have the advantage of any remarks made upon the motion being based upon the actual information in the possession of the Government; whereas, if information is sought by way of motions, particularly when the papers are very voluminous and it necessarily takes perhaps a couple of months to prepare them, the effect is lost, not only on the Senate, but also on the country, because the return is so long delayed that little or no attention is paid to it when it is placed upon the Table. I might direct the attention of honourable gentlemen to the fact that on many occasions I have placed upon the Table of the House most voluminous papers, which related to questions that really did not elicit very much interest in the country, and which, I venture to say, have been pigeonholed without being used for the purposes originally intended. I simply suggest to honourable gentlemen who wish to bring up subjects of this kind, covering a great deal of matter, that I should be only too glad to assist them in securing the information at first hand from the departments, so that when the motion is made the information will be in their possession, and their address to the House may be based upon the very best authority obtainable. I should be very sorry to disappoint my honourable friend from Huron as to furnishing this information; but the probabilities are that it will take until the end of the session to obtain it, and in the meantime the object which my honourable friend has in view will be lost. I hope honourable gentlemen will pardon me for making this suggestion. I do so simply for the purpose of making the deliberations of the Senate in matters of this kind more effective.

Hon. JAMES DOMVILLE: Honourable gentlemen, I am very glad this question has come up. I intended putting a notice of motion on the Order Paper, but I am trying to spare everybody—the Government and everybody else. They have their hands full. The first paragraph is: "That an order of the Senate do issue for a return of the evidence and other proceedings submitted before the Dominion Railway Commission . . . relating to freight rates." As the honourable leader of this House has said, it is impossible to tell what information is available, or how long it may take to supply it. But I think I am strictly within the rules of the House in calling attention to a matter regarding which, as I have said, I intended giving notice of a motion. In the hard times when everybody was suffering from the cold and had to burn up any wood there was in the house, the Intercolonial Railway put up the rate to $3 a ton on coal shipped from St. John for a distance of nine miles. Was that helping out the poor people? Was that reducing the cost of living? It was a terrible thing to contemplate. Now, this is not the time to attack anybody, but I am very glad my honourable friend from Huron (Hon. Mr. Proudfoot) has brought up this matter, because it gives us an opportunity to discuss the question. I think that the Government should make inquiry and let us know something about this. I do not want to condemn the Government; all I want is to know why the freight rate on coal was put up to $3 a ton for nine miles, and why it was put up at a time when we had very bad storms and the most severe winter that was ever known. Surely that is not statesmanship. It is not the Government's fault. I am not blaming them; I am blaming those who were administering the affairs of the railway, and I do not think the increase should be allowed to pass without a protest and without our being given the reason.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: Honourable gentlemen, in view of what the honourable leader of the Government has stated, I have no desire to encumber the records or to cause unnecessary trouble in securing the return; but I think there would be very little difficulty in giving me the return asked for in the first two items.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There will be no difficulty about motion No. 2.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: I am speaking of the first motion. I am referring to the question raised by the honourable leader as to the possibility of this being a voluminous return which it might take so long to prepare that it would not be worth while having it for this Session. If I can secure a return within a short time to paragraphs 1 and 2, particularly No. 2, the information will cover practically all that is required. I think that the report which the Government has in its possession will cover nearly all the information that is asked for.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but the probabilities are that the Railway Commission will not permit the original documents to go out of its possession and be laid upon the table of the House. It will prepare a copy. The evidence submitted to the commission upon this subject must be very voluminous indeed. My honourable friend can very well appreciate the unwisdom, so to speak, of placing original documents on the table of Parliament. We have to rely upon copies being made. But if my honourable friend would attend at the Railway Commission and look over the material, he would obtain the desired information more readily than by moving for a return, particularly one which it would take so long to prepare.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: All I am asking in paragraph 2 is a copy of the report, not the evidence. I do not expect to get anything but a copy.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but the honourable gentleman asks for the evidence.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT: That is, a copy of the evidence. But I am not particular about the evidence if I am given the report asked for under paragraph 2.

The motion was agreed to.

DEPORTATION OF LEE QUONG KIP.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT moved:

1. That an order of the Senate do issue for a return of the minutes of the Board of Inquiry, No. 158, taken under The Immigration Act, at Vancouver, B.C., on July 3, 1919, dealing with the case of Lee Quong Kip, a Chinese student, who sought admission into Canada.

2. The finding of the said board.

3. All correspondence which passed between W. D. Scott, of the Department of Immigration and Colonization at Ottawa, and Ping Lee or any other person or official in relation to the said matter, including correspondence with the minister and his finding.

4. The order of deportation of the said Lee Quong Kip.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I desire to point out some of the circumstances of this particular case, which has already received a good deal of consideration. I wish to place before the House some of the difficulties that Chinese have to contend with in securing admission to this country. On May 27, 1918, a letter was written by Mr. Scott, of the Department of Immigration, acknowledging receipt of $500 from Ping Lee, a brother of this young man. According to the contents of the letter, although the young man was to be brought in at Vancouver, the case was dealt with as an Ottawa registration, the Controller of Chinese Immigration at the port of arrival sending here the photograph, etc., of this young man. The $500 having been paid by the brother, this young man arrived in Canada on the 14th April, 1919. On his arrival an objection was taken to his entry into this country on the ground that he was within the restricted class, and had therefore no right to be allowed in. An inquiry was held on the 3rd of July, 1919, before some officer out there. I cannot quite make out his name, although it is signed to this document; but I believe his name is A. L. Jolliffe. The evidence taken on that inquiry was disposed of in a most summary way by this official. He says: "I hereby reject Lee Quong Kip and order that he be deported, he being a prohibited immigrant uner P. C. 1202." The peculiarity about P. C. 1202 is that that order was passed on the 9th June, 1919, and was not in effect at the time when the young man landed in Canada, nor at the time when his money was received, and when, in view of the information which had been given by his brother, he was said to be a proper subject to come to this country. This young man was about seventeen years of age, and the intention of his brother and his friends in bringing him into Canada was to complete his education. Up to the time that he left China he had always been going to school. His brother, who lives in Toronto and is in good circumstances, desired to have him out here for the purpose of giving him an education, so that he might subsequently, on returning to China, be of some use in disseminating the English language in China. The official at Vancouver, for some reason, took very strong grounds, and, as I read the summary of his remarks, he declined to allow Lee Quong Kip to come into this country.

I have examined with a great deal of care the evidence given before that Board of Inquiry, and I venture to say that honourable gentlemen reading that evidence without bias—and I believe none of you have any bias in this particular case—will come to the very opposite conclusion from that of the official in Vancouver. The question was not allowed to rest there, because the young man had friends in Canada who were interested in having the regulation, as they understood it, carried out; and, as I have pointed out, this was not a Vancouver registration, but an Ottawa one. Why the official at Vancouver saw fit to take the course he did, and direct that he should be deported, I fail to comprehend. That action was prevented for some time by a habeus corpus having been secured from the courts, and security given, and the young man was kept in Vancouver on bail for a considerable time. The case went to the Court of Appeal, but that did not help the young man, for that court said they had no jurisdiction to deal with the question, because section 23 of the Immigration Act prohibited them from doing so, and, as Mr. Justice Martin expressed it, "The section says, 'Hands off.'"

We have heard so much here within the last few days, in discussing another matter, about British fair play, and how Great Britain desired to deal fairly and squarely with other people, that I should like to say that Great Britain has a special reason for being on friendly terms with China and Japan, and the people in the East; yet we find that the official at Vancouver has seen fit to reject this young man. I would not care so much about the matter if it remained with the official alone; but it was taken up in another way. I am counsel for the Chinese National League for the province of Ontario, which has branches all over the Dominion of Canada, its object being to assist the Chinese—they object to our calling them Chinamen. It is said by some people that they are not desirable immigrants, and that may be so in some respects; but people from one end of this Dominion to the other are anxious to secure the services of good Chinamen to look after their cooking and other household arrangements. They are required to pay a head tax of $500 apiece. Many of the Chinamen are gamblers, but that class does not belong to this league, which was established for the purpose of preventing the Chinese from being led away into gambling habits. The secretary of the league for the province of Ontario is a brother of this young man who was refused admission into this province under what is said to be an Order in Council, No. 1202. The matter was brought before the department, but the department desiring no doubt to stand by what the official at Vancouver had done, refused to interfere.

I have brought this matter up, not because it is going to do any good to this particular young man, but for the purpose of placing before this House and the country the manner in which officials of the Government have seen fit to deal with people who, as I contend, are desirable immigrants to this country. I tried to secure a stay of proceedings from the minister by writing to the department, but the last letter, which I received on the 16th of February, was to the effect that the minister had given the matter consideration, but did not see fit to stay the proceedings so far as Lee Quong Kip was concerned. If matters are to be disposed of in this summary way I think a change should be made in the law, and I desire to have this information brought down by return for the purpose, among other things, of ascertaining exactly what actuated the minister in reaching his conclusion. I think it is only fair that we should have this information, and that such a proceeding as happened in this case should not occur again. The Government got this young man into the country. They received his $500, and so far as I know they did not even return the money, although I do not know how they sent the young many back. Probably they used some of the $500 for that purpose; but the balance of that $500 should still be in the hands of the department, and has not been returned. I therefore move for the return.

The motion was agreed to.

ESTABLISHMENT OF DIVORCE COURT.

REPORT OF OPPOSITION IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I beg to draw the attention of the House to a despatch which appears in this morning's Ottawa Journal:

Prince Edward Island is against Divorce Measure.

CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I., April 27.—By unanimous resolution to-day the Legislature declared that the establishment of a divorce court in this province, as proposed by the Dominion Senate, is against the best interests of the island, where there is no demand.

DIVORCE BILLS.

FIRST READING.

Bill A3, an Act for the relief of Marion Olive Booth.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

THIRD READING.

Bill M2, and Act for the relief of William George Mackness.—Hon. Mr. Turriff.

OTTAWA AGREEMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill 22, an Act to confirm an agreement between His Majesty the King and the Corporation of the City of Ottawa.

He said: I informed my honourable friend from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turriff) yesterday that I would make inquiry as to the payment of taxes on property leased by the Government in the city of Ottawa. I am informed by the officer in charge of this business that for the last eight or nine years taxes have been imposed on all properties leased by the Government, and that the only properties exempt from taxation under the arrangement which has been entered into between the city of Ottawa and the Government are properties vested in the Crown.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does my honourable friend mean that the lease contains a covenant on the part of the Government to pay the taxes?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It may be by the lessor or the lessee, according to the provisions of the lease, but in no case does the Government claim exemption from taxation respecting property leased from private individuals.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: That does not exactly answer my question. What I complained of was that the Government, in paying rent for those outside buildings, exempted the owners of the buildings from taxation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: My honourable friend just now said that the Government does not claim any exemption from taxation. That is, that the Government may be paying the taxes on the building, in accordance with the agreement, as the honourable leader has said; but what I wanted to find out was if the owner of the building, who gets the rent for it, and in all cases a good rent, has to pay out of that rent the taxes of the city.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As I have said to my honourable friend, the city collects taxes upon all property leased to the Government. It will collect that tax either from the owner or from the Government, in accordance with the provision made in the lease.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: That is just exactly what I am complaining of.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend answer this question: does it make any difference whether the Government or the owner pays the taxes, so long as the city gets the money?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: It makes the difference of the amount of taxes that are paid if the Government pays them. When the Government pays the taxes, it pays them over and above the rental that the owner could get for the property from any other organization. When we are making this new arrangement with the city of Ottawa, by which the Government is paying an additional amount of taxation—which I am not complaining of at all—I would like to have it understood that in the future the Government will not pay taxes as well as rent on any property they lease, and will not exempt that property from paying taxes. The owner of property rented to the Government should be in exactly the same position as he would be if he were renting to one of us or any one else.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the case.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: No, it is not. When the Government undertakes to pay the taxes, it pays the full rent and the taxes in addtition.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No, no.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Well, I happen to know.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I might put the case to my honourable friend in this way, that no distinction is drawn between the Government and a private individual with reference to those leases, and it is simply a matter of arrangement in the lease as to which party pays the taxes. The city gets the taxes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

GERMAN TRADE IDENTIFICATION BILL.

REJECTED.

The Senate resumed the adjourned debate on the motion for the third reading of Bill W, an Act for the identification of Traders in German Goods, and the motion in amendment thereto, that the said Bill be not now read a third time but that it be read this day six months.

Hon. E. D. SMITH: I do not intend to make a speech on this Bill, but as I intend to vote for it, I want to give my reasons. Like thousands of other people, when I go into a store or when I order goods by mail I do not want to be put to the bother of stating that I do not want German goods. I would be satisfied if we had the goods marked "Made in Germany," but that is not always done, and a far more convenient and surer way is the one proposed in this Bill. When I cannot get German goods except in a store over which there is a sign stating "German goods sold here," I will not be put to any bother, and that is the reason why I will vote for this Bill.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What will you do when you write to a German house for goods?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: I will not write to a German house. I do not know whether it is going to reduce or increase the quantity of German goods sold in this country. We have heard two sets of arguments—one claiming that the putting of this sign upon premises where German goods are sold will increase the sale of those goods. If that is so, then there is nothing to the other argument, that we must trade with Germany in order that Germany may make money to pay the indemnities to the Allies. I am inclined to the French view: I do not care a hoot whether Germany is ever able to build up or not. Germany deserves to remain just where she is to-day, and if there were never any German goods sold in Canada, or in any other part of the British Empire, I would not be at all concerned. Therefore I intend to vote for the Bill.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: I should like to ask the honourable gentleman whether he has not sold some of his goods to Germany?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: Yes, a long time ago, and I would sell them again if I could get the money.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Honourable gentlemen, on a previous occasion I voted for my honourable friend's Bill, and, as I intend to vote against it this time, I think perhaps I should give my reasons. When the Bill was up some sessions ago, we were at war with Germany, and there were reasons in favour of the Bill which appealed strongly to Canadians generally. I must say, however, that the Bill did not appeal very strongly to me. The situation to-day is entirely different to what it was then. A state of peace has been substituted for the state of war which prevailed on the previous occasion. We have entered into an agreement, being one of the parties to the Treaty of Peace, and we are in an entirely different position. I need not elaborate that argument. I just want to say, however, that to me the Bill, both in letter and in spirit, is in absolute conflict with the covenants and undertakings which we, as one of the parties to the League of Nations, have made.

Hon. B. C. PROWSE: Honourable gentlemen, I listened with a good deal of attention to my honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton), and I must say that every tissue in this body vibrated, every drop of blood in these veins moved, just a little faster when I heard him, and I was perfectly satisfied that the honourable gentleman had made his point. But the second reading of the Bill was rushed through, and at the third reading, when I was shut off, and not allowed to speak, I began to think there was something more at the back of it. Sentiment is one of the finest things in the world; but you cannot blend sentiment with business; they are two absolutely separate things. Another thing is loyalty—and there is dishonest loyalty and honest loyalty. You may get sentiment, and honest sentiment, from the pulpit; sometimes you get it in politics; but we have not always got it. I will give you an instance. In the last election sentiment was expressed on every platform from one end of the Dominion to the other, and rightly so; but when some one attempts to mix sentiment with business and manipulation, I for one cannot sit in my chair.

To-day the whole world is calling for greater production. How are you going to get greater production unless you encourage it? The high cost of living has to be reduced in some way. If the honourable gentleman promoting this Bill would propose some means of reducing the high cost of living, I am sure that the Government and the people would be delighted. If he can go further than that and suggest a means by which the returned soldiers can be remunerated in some shape or form, without hurting the finances of the country, he will go down to posterity and will live in history as one who introduced something of some use to his country. But, in proposing a Bill of this kind, he has put a white elephant on the country. But that is not all. He has proposed an absolutely unworkable machine, a machine which would require a force of men larger than that of the Post Office or the Customs Department to keep it working. There is in Great Britain to-day a law which says that every article that goes into Britain must be labelled, no matter whether it comes from Austria, Italy, Japan, or anywhere else. Every buyer from the Dominion of Canada who goes there knows what he is buying, because the articles are marked plainly, "Made in Germany," "Made in France," and so on.

I would not buy an article of German manufacture; I would not put it in my store if I could help it; but if a man has to buy German goods—because there are German goods which we cannot go without —I would not force him to put up a sign. Take, for instance, German fertilizer. Would you force a man selling that fertilizer to put a sign over his door saying, "We sell German goods"? Would you force him to put on his stationery the words, "German goods for sale." I say it would not be fair. Would you ask the farmer who buys that fertilizer and uses it, when he brings his load of potatoes to market, to put up a sign, saying, "Potatoes grown by German fertilizer." Would you force every second store from Vancouver to Prince Edward Island to put a sign over the door, "German goods for sale here?" I say no. I say that this Bill, instead of being a loyal Bill, is the most disloyal Bill that ever came before this House. Here is Great Britain with her arms open to German trade, and here we are, one of Britain's biggest customers, saying, "No, we won't trade with you." We do not go to Germany to buy the goods, but to Great Britain. If a man's loyalty amounts to anything, he must be loyal to himself. If we are not loyal to ourselves, we cannot be loyal to our families and to our country. I say that the first essential of loyalty, if I understand it aright, is that we should be loyal to the Mother Country and should trade with her. But what will England think if we pass this Bill and say to her, "We won't buy any German goods from you," and cut them out? I say, gentlemen, it is not fair. I might here quote Macaulay, who in 1845 said: "There is a mutual dependency between nations that we cannot get away from." That sentiment has never been controverted by any of the great statesmen in the British Empire, or in any other country. It has never been disputed until now, when our honourable friend from Hamilton comes here and says that it is all wrong. I say, gentlemen, that it is all right. If we want to be loyal, for Heaven's sake, let us be loyal to ourselves and let us be loyal to the British Empire, and not pass this Bill, because, by passing it, we would be loyal to no one.

Hon. G. G. FOSTER: Honourable gentlemen, before I express to the House my reasons for the vote which I am about to give on this Bill, I wish to say to the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) that I did not, and I do not now, agree with what he said when he introduced this Bill concerning the First Minister of England, Right Hon. David Lloyd George. On the contrary, I disagree with every word he said with regard to that distinguished statesman, to whom I, and every man in this House and in this country, owe a debt of gratitude that I do not know how we shall ever be able to repay. I do not agree with my honourable friend in his severe condemnation of the fact that those of the enemy who should have been punished have not been punished. I am not in a position, nor is my honourable friend, to know all the particulars which guided the League of Nations and the British Government in arriving at the conclusion they have with regard to the German Emperor, the German royal family, the German soldiers, every one of whom I should like to have seen shot if I could have found legal machinery to carry out the sentence. I do not know how it could have been done, and therefore I am not going to sit in judgment and say that I condemn others who failed to punish them.

Having disagreed with my honourable friend on these points, I find myself just where I was two years ago. What we said at that time was that at the end of the war we would force our merchants to put up a sign on every store where they handled German goods in this country, which sign would tell the people going in there to trade that they were dealing with a firm buying and selling German goods, and thereby put them on their guard.

My honourable friend from Prince Edward Island (Hon. Mr. Prowse) talks about curtailing and preventing trade. There is nothing in this Bill about preventing trade with Germany. There is not one word that says that we cannot buy German goods if we want to. But I know that the majority of Canadians do not want to. Some of us never want to see a German face again, and we realize that we owe a debt to the boys who are dead, and to the boys who fought, and when any members of my family go into a store I want them to have a chance to know whether the goods they are buying are German goods or goods made by some nation who will not use the profits of Canadian trade to start another war with us at the first opportunity.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: I should like to ask my honourable friend how much Germany would pay for the "ad": "German goods for sale."

Hon. Mr. FOSTER: I am not going to say that there are not German merchants who will be glad to know that we advertised their goods or that there are men in Canada—if there are any such—who are so far forgetful of their duty to Canada and to the Canadian soldiers that they would deal in German goods. But, as against that, I do not want people to go unwittingly into a store in Canada and think they are buying Canadian, American, or English goods, and have palmed off on them goods from a country that I detest and shall continue to hate so long as I have a drop of blood in my veins. They say we propose to curtail trade by insisting on this sign. We force a man who sells whisky to put up a sign saying that he is licensed to sell whisky; we compel a man who sells gunpowder and dynamite, to put up a sign stating the fact; and a man who is selling a damned sight worse when he sells German goods should not be ashamed but should be compelled to put up a sign stating the fact.

Honourable gentlemen, I am going to vote for this Bill as it has been brought down. I do not know whether it can be worked out in the way my honourable friend intends or thinks. I have doubts whether it can be. There will be vast difficulties in the way; I am free to admit that. But two years ago I voted in favour of the principle of a man who sold German goods putting up a sign stating that he was doing so, and I am going to stick to that principle to-day. I am not going to say that I have gone back on it because there is less danger of the German flag flying over this building to-day than there was at that time. I am going to stick to the guns that I fired then, and I ask every man who supported it before to do the same thing.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, I generally see eye to eye with the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton), but I regret to say that on this occasion I am unable to support the Bill which he has presented to this House. In dealing with this measure we must not lose sight of the fact that the British Government has adopted a policy to encourage trade with Germany. One of the reasons of that, I think, is to enable Germany to pay the indemnity which she will be called upon to pay to the Allies. We must not lose sight of the fact that the moment that England deals extensively with Germany, the great majority if not all of the firms dealing with merchandise of different kinds will of necessity, if this Bill passes, be obliged to advertise that they are dealing in German goods. What effect will that have? The masses of the people, seeing that nearly all the merchants are dealing in German goods, and are advertising the fact, will come to buy German goods, and I am afraid that, instead of this legislation curtailing the sale of such goods it will have the opposite effect, popularizing the goods, and extinguishing the sentiment now prevailing, and which I hope will endure, against the purchase or sale of German goods. For the reasons I have stated, I cannot see my way to vote in favour of the Bill.

Hon. W. H. BENNETT: Honourable gentlemen, during the course of the discussion last week, some gentlemen advanced the argument that, as a matter of fairness to the German manufacturers, we should deal with them, and for that reason should not allow this Bill to pass. I have heard a great deal said about the Kaiser and his part in bringing about the war; but I want to say that his part was infinitesimal when compared with the part played by the German manufacturers, who, ever since the war of 1870 with France, have worked up the war feeling in Germany. Who worked up the war feeling? Was it not the manufacturers? Was not the aim of Germany to acquire colonies all over the world? For what? To foster German trade. Let any man read the story of the building up of the city of Essen, where the Krupp works are, and he will learn of the extraordinary evolution of that city. After the Franco-Prussian war it was a small place, but then started the era in Germany that produced this war, an era of filthy greed for money that started among the manufacturers. Any man who has ever read the political history of Germany knows that for years past in the elections there have been but two parties, the war party and the anti-war party. The Socialists were the anti-war party; why? Because they did not want to see a huge debt incurred, and for what purpose? For the benefit of the Krupps, dealing in guns, or others dealing in clothing or boots and shoes. The war spirit was fostered by the manufacturers of Germany, because they were amassing fortunes at the expense of the down-trodden taxpayers. Any man who has ever read of the movements of the Socialist party in Germany will be conversant with that, and will know that antagonism was developed among the masses of the people, by reason of the fact that the so-called war party were corrupting constituencies, buying up members of the Reichstag, and doing everything possible to keep up the feeling that millions upon millions must be spent for the purpose of war. The appeal was made in the constituencies: "If you want millions expended, vote for the war party. If you want to see your towns closed against the manufacture of war goods, vote against them, and vote for the Socialist or Peace party." And yet to-day we hear in Canada the cry raised—on whose behalf? On behalf of the manufacturers of Germany. Well, I am sick and tired of doing something for those manufacturers of Germany after what they have done to the world as a whole, and to Canada in particular, in the late war. It is all very well to say that sentiment is dead. I can go to houses not far from my own home and see three vacant seats, where before the war three young men used to sit who now are buried in Flanders. I know of homes where there are two vacant seats, and it is quite common throughout the country to find one vacant chair. And yet we are asked to take those German manufacturers to our breast.

We can learn a great deal from the war, and I hope we shall learn. What did we ever buy from Germany in large quantities? We bought toys to the tune of thousands of dollars. Go down Wellington street and you will find in one of the Government buildings an exhibition of German toys, many of them made from raw materials sent from Canada. Go to Beaverton and you will see a very large toy factory which has been established there and is increasing its business all the time. Toys such as we have been importing from Germany had better be made in Canada, because a great deal of the hardwood that went into their composition was imported from this or some other country. Let us teach the German manufacturers that they must be treated according to their deserts.

I supposed that some honourable member in the course of this debate would have said: "Look at what we ship to Germany." What do we ship to Germany? Not lumber. We cannot compete with the people of Norway and Sweden and other neighbouring countries that have lumber to ship. We cannot ship sawn boards, as they are called, because they cannot with advantage be sent that long distance. In the heavier sorts of timber the proximity of those countries to Germany gives them a more favourable chance than Canada.

"But," some honourable gentleman will say, "look at the figures of our exports of grain to Germany." But if you look at those figures you will find that in the years 1912 and 1913, when Germany was contemplating this war, we exported larger quantities of wheat than ever before. Our exports had never been up to such abnormal figures, and they have never been since, and never will be again; why? Because the Germans were making preparations for war in those years. I am sorry I have not the figures by me, but any honourable gentleman who will compare them will find that in the years prior to those immediately preceding the war, our exports of wheat to Germany would not at all compare with what they were in those one or two years before. I know that particularly, because the fact was commented upon in my part of the country, where large quantities of grain for export went through the elevators—the abnormal quantity of grain then going to the continent of Europe and particularly to Germany. I think the time has arrived in this country when a little more regard should be had for the feelings of the people.

I have heard gentlemen say, "This Bill will not pass the House of Commons." Well, all I can say is that the gentlemen who vote against it in the House of Commons had better look out for public feeling in the province of Ontario. It may be popular in one or two German ridings to oppose such a Bill, but I do not think it is throughout the province. The House of Commons is the pulse of the people, and for no other reason than that I would vote as I am going to vote with all the greater pleasure in favour of this Bill, in order that it might pass the Senate and be sent to the Commons, which represents public opinion perhaps more than we do. If the Bill fails to pass there let it fail. But I have heard a great deal of favourable comment upon it by members of that House, and I say again, the time has arrived for us to stop this maudlin sympathy for Germany, and especially for the German manufacturer, who was the head and front of all the offending in the late war.

Hon. FREDERIC NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, I do not intend to discuss the principle of this Bill, because when it was before this House in 1918 I gave on the floor of the House full expression to my sentiments in regard to it. I think, however, that the phraseology might be altered so as to make the Bill more workable. Clause 1 says: "Every person who knowingly deals in goods." In my judgment the words "offers for sale" would be preferable to the words "deals in goods," and I would suggest to the mover of the Bill that he agree to the change. The Bill further states: "Every person who knowingly deals in goods, wares or merchandise which are, in whole or in part, the growth, product or manufacture of Germany." In my judgment the words "or in part" should be eliminated, and the Bill should refer only to goods that have been manufactured wholly in Germany and are offered for sale in this country. My reason for making that suggestion is this. In my judgment it would be patriotic for any Canadian to utilize in manufacture raw materials which could be bought in Germany to better advantage than in any other country, and to use those raw materials in the manufacture of the finished product, thereby giving employment to Canadian artisans and affording facility for the purchase of other raw materials which are the product of this country, and to sell the product in competition with the finished product which might be brought in from Germany and sold as a complete product of that country. I would therefore suggest to the mover of the Bill—which Bill I intend to support, as I supported the similar Bill in 1918—that he eliminate the words, "or in part," from clause 1.

Hon. GEORGE McHUGH: Honourable gentlemen, I am in full sympathy with the sentiment that the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) had in bringing in this Bill. He felt that it was going to punish the Germans. But I do not think the method that he has taken is the right one. The trade between Canada and Germany is, I think, a matter for the Government to deal with by putting a tariff on goods coming from Germany. England is at the present time fitting up her ships, and ever since the close of the war has had agents in Germany, to cultivate trade with that country again. Are we going to stand out and refuse to trade with Germany? The honourable gentleman from Wentworth (Hon. Mr. Smith) said that he would sell to the Germans but he would not buy from them. I say that trade must be reciprocal. If you want to sell to people you must be prepared to buy from them. The honourable member from Midland (Hon. Mr. Bennett) says that we have no opportunity to send goods to Germany; that Norway and Sweden are going to outdo us in lumber, and as for grain the Germans took it only at the time when they were preparing for war. I can tell the honourable gentleman that the most profitable crop raised on the farms of Ontario to-day finds its greatest market in Germany; that is, alsike clover seed, which produces from $150 to over $200 to the acre in many parts of Ontario. The greatest customer we have for that seed is Germany. Now, if Germany refuses to take that seed from us because we refuse to take goods from her, will not that interfere materially with one great agricultural product of the province of Ontario? I do not know to what extent that seed is grown in other provinces of the Dominion of Canada; but I know that it is by far the most profitable crop in the part of Ontario where I live. We are out to trade with the world, and I want our trade relations to be such as to be profitable to the people of Canada. Let other countries trade as they will. If the Government of Canada thinks that there is to large a quantity of toys or of poisons coming from Germany to this country, let them put on a tariff that will keep out such goods. I think that is the way to settle the trade question between Canada and Germany rather than to require people who import goods to earmark them as German goods or Austrian goods. I am going to vote against the Bill.

Hon. P. POIRIER: Honourable gentlemen, I am very much perplexed with regard to this Bill and the way I am about to vote. My sentiment is totally in favour of the motion of my honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton); so much so that if this Bill is carried and if I should see advertised by a merchant the fact that he is dealing in some particular German goods, I would certainly not buy those goods from him even if I had to pay a higher price for similar goods at some other store. On the other hand, we have concluded peace with Germany. I voted in favour of peace. I was sincere in my vote. When I voted peace I meant peace, not only on the battlefield, but also commercially and in every other respect. Peace embraces all that pertains to peace. The passage of this Bill would mean that for all time to come or until it was repealed it would be necessary to advertise any dealing in German goods. Is there to be no end to our enmity or to our warlike attitude towards Germany, however guilty, or however undeserving of any sympathy it may be, as it actually is? Are we forever to perpetuate a hatred between this country and a country with which the Empire and we ourselves have made peace? I voted for peace, and I am going to stand, although very reluctantly, by that vote. Therefore my reason, in this case dominating my sentiments, urges me to vote against the Bill of my honourable friend.

Hon. JAMES DOMVILLE: Honourable gentlemen, I will vote with the honourable member who has introduced this Bill (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton), although I do not quite concur in it. I am sorry to say that the impression that will be received throughout the counrty from the debate in this House will be that the war has been nothing but a trade war, and that, now that we have made some bargain, we want to do business with the Germans. I think that is not the right way to look at the matter. I think that the Germans should be made to suffer for what they have done. I would not allow one dollar's worth of German goods to come into this country. As my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. McHugh) has said, this is a matter that comes within the purview of the Government. Are we going to say, because we can make a dollar here or a dollar there, that we will forgive the past. It will not be wiped out in Canada for centuries. Whoever else may be willing to forgive, there will be no forgiveness by the relatives of those who have suffered. Are they going to subscribe to the doctrine that everything is to be sacrificed for the good of trade? Better let the trade go. We have not accomplished much by this war. As I attempted to point out here last year—and I got into a good deal of trouble over it—this was a wicked war, and I do not know yet why it was planned. However, having carried on the war at enormous cost and sacrifice of life and treasure, how do we come out? Forgive? Shall we say: "Let us enter into trade relations; never mind the past; we want business." There is a story I used to tell when I was running an election. I do not know that it would be out of place to apply it now. In church—I will not say what church—there was a poor girl on the penitent stool, and they said: "Well, it is all over; kiss and forgive." An old woman got up, and she said: "That is all very well, but I have been going to this here tabernacle for over sixty years; I never did anything like that, and I am not going to forgive her now." I really think there is no justification for our letting the Germans off. As to requiring a dealer in German goods to put up a placard, perhaps that is the best means that occurs to my honourable friend; but I do not think it is going to work or answer the purpose intended. But no more of this forgiveness! Why do we not shoot or hang the Germans? Why should we allow them into this country? We are not in favour of allowing the Hindus, or the Chinese, or other yellow races in. Canada should look to her own children—to those who will come after us. However, I think that my honourable friend has gone as far as he can go with the Bill. He has brought the matter before the country. I think the honourable gentleman should now withdraw the Bill. I do not want to vote against it, and I certainly will not vote to help the Germans in my respect. I am between the devil and the deep sea. Now that the honourable gentleman has expressed his views, I think he should withdraw the Bill.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON: In order to come to the rescue of the honourable gentleman from St. John (Hon. Mr. Domville), if possible, I would point out that in my humble opinion there is nothing so serious in this Bill as some honourable gentlemen seem to feel. Let us remember that prior to the war practically every store a person entered dealt in German goods, and the goods were so marked and labelled. That custom became so common that even the vendors frequently alluded in their advertisements to the fact that those goods were of German make. Now, if it was right and proper in pre-war days for merchants in Canada to advertise the fact that they were dealing in German goods, what is the objection to their doing so now?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The law compelled them to do that then.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: But times have changed since then. It is not probable that a German will desire to advertise his goods in Canada now. Is it not proper, therefore, that precautions should be taken to acquaint the purchaser in Canada as to the origin of the goods that he is purchasing, if they come from Germany? I do not think the majority of Canadian people desire knowingly to purchase German goods; therefore, I think it would be rendering a service to the people of this country to require dealers in German goods to acquaint the public of that fact; otherwise they would probably not be reminded of it. I propose to support the Bill for that reason, if no other.

Hon. ARTHUR BOYER: In answer to my honourable friend's statement that all German goods were marked before the war, I would say that a law was passed in England compelling the placing of the words "Made in Germany" on all kinds of goods that were made in Germany and sent abroad to be sold.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: How could Great Britain require Germany to stamp her goods if they were for sale in Turkey?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: And in England?

Hon. Mr. BOYER: And in England.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The honourable gentleman used the word "abroad."

Hon. Mr. BOYER: In some of the best shops in Paris I bought balbriggan hose that were not French or English make. During the war I applied to the same house for the same kind of goods, and the reply was that they were made in Austria, and could not be procured. On another occasion I applied to an English house for a pocket-book such as I had bought perviously in England, and the answer was that that pocket-book was made in Austria, and could not be had until after the war. So much for the labelling of German goods. My honourable friend from Simcoe (Hon. Mr. Bennett) has touched the right point: it is a question of feeling as well as of trade. Before the war the German propaganda throughout the world was the biggest thing known to humanity. They advertised all over the world what they were going to do, and in a remarkable book published anonymously in Berlin, one German had the courage to tell the Emperor what he thought of him and of the policy of his Government. In that book he said: "You are asking for a place in the sun. Why, you have got it all. See what a merchant fleet you have developed the world over; you have practically driven some of the old-established lines from the trade of the world by putting on bigger boats and giving cheaper rates because they are subsidized by the German Government." I was in Yokahama when one of the P. and O. steamers was ready to sail for England. She was a ship of 6,000 tons. The German Government, or the Hamburg-American line, had a steamer there of 15,000 tons, and the rate they advertised was exactly one-third less than the P. and O. people had advertised, and the ticket took the passenger from Hong Kong to either Southampton or London. So much for advertising their trade. In that same book we were told of all the remarkable qualities the Germans possessed. Honourable gentlemen, you have all heard of the mighty collections of art treasures throughout the world. A great many of us have had the advantage of visiting the National Gallery in London. But did you ever hear who founded that gallery and made it one of the first in the world? The names of the different men who presided at the establishment of that great institution are unknown. If you go to Paris and visit the picture galleries of the Louvre you will never find out the name of the great man who originated that gallery and brought it to its present perfection. But if you go to Germany they will tell you that Mr. Bode was the great man who organized the National Gallery in Berlin; that he was the only art connoisseur in the world; that he had such a record amongst all the new millionaires of later years that whenever a picture of any consequence was for sale nobody would buy it unless it had the official stamp of Mr. Bode. Another great authority was Professor Max Mueller, of Coblenz. When you found the names of those two men on a picture it was all right: it went. But you never heard of the great men of Great Britain who have worked, unknown to secure to the world the finest art collection there; and the same remark applies to Paris. But those two Germans were known the world over, through advertising. Germany was supréme in the way of propaganda by advertising. Once when I was in Rome I was offered a picture and I was shown the authenticity of it. They said: "We got it authenticated by Mr. Mueller, of Coblenz; here are all the papers signed and sealed; the man that sold me the picture paid so much for the official stamp of this gentleman." That gentleman died two years afterwards, and on his deathbed he made a public confession that for the paltry sum of five marks he had authenticated any picture merely for the sake of the money that was in it, though the pictures never were genuine. That was German propaganda for you.

Now, if it pleases England to trade with Germany, why should not Canada, a small British colony that has done its utmost in this war, simply say, "We won't." Let us say that this war has cost us enough in blood and money to do without German goods. Let us wear our own goods, and if we cannot get them to fit as they did before, let us be satisfied to wear overalls, if we must, instead of wearing German goods. When the war broke out Germany told us, "We are going to conquer the world." Ireland was to rise, to a man, but it didn't. India was to rise against British rule, but it didn't. The Cape of Good Hope was going to rise, but it didn't. Canada was going to lie back and lag, but Canada did the very opposite. The author of the book I have mentioned said to the German Emperor: "Your diplomats have systematically deceived you; your diplomats lied, or did not know what they were about when they told you that if you went to war you would conquer. You did not." So far as trade was concerned, what was the policy of Germany during the war? Take the northern district of France, containing the great manufacturing centres of that country. They systematically destroyed every factory in the north of France so that they would not in the future interfere with German trade. They destroyed every orchard in the richest part of France; why? Because some of them were interfering with the sale of German wines. Why should we not have some feeling left, and say: "No trade with Germany; let us do without the goods of Germany." We have done so; we have not missed German goods for the last five years, not having bought a pennyworth of them during that time. Then let us desist, and teach the world, if they are willing to sacrifice sentiment for money, that Canada for one will not do it.

Hon. P. McSWEENEY: I should like to read something from the Montreal Gazette of Tuesday, following my honourable friend from Montreal (Hon. Mr. Boyer):

Commercial Treaties—Germany and France may Co-operate in Three Branches.

PARIS, April 26.—Trade agreements or commercial treaties by which France and Germany may stabilize markets and co-operate in some branches of commerce are forecast in a report of the foreign trade bureau of the Department of Commerce. Three industries, potash, iron and coke, and textiles, are taken up by the report, which shows the economic dependence of the two countries upon each other.

Germany's former monopoly in potash is now jointly held by her and France. Iron and coke are closely related, and Germany is the logical source of the latter product, which France cannot produce in sufficient quantities. Alsace has many important cotton mills, but the product has in the past been sent to Germany for dyeing or printing. German plants are still better equipped to do this work than any in France, and, in addition, affords a good market for the manufactured goods.

Honourable gentlemen will see from this clipping that France has no objection to trading with Germany, although no country in the world suffered as France did: 1,750,000 of her men were killed, while England lost only 750,000, the United States lost only a very few, and Canada lost some 50,000 or 55,000 killed. This despatch shows that all over France they say: "We want peace; we want to sell goods to those people and buy goods from them; we have to do it; so we might as well come down first as last."

Hon. E. L. GIRROIR: With others, I have had great difficulty in arriving at a conclusion as to how I should vote on this Bill. People, countries, and empires are very often swayed and actuated by sentiment. Sentiment is a grand thing; countries have been saved by sentiment. In the last war many of our young men enlisted and went to the front and gave up their lives for sentiment for the country and the flag. That is one thing that appeals to a person when he is endeavouring to make up his mind on any question. Another thing that actuates him in his conclusions is reason, and I think that in a question of this kind appeals can be made to reason as well as to sentiment.

The promoters of this Bill claim and argue that it is a Bill to punish Germany. The arguments advanced by practically all those who have spoken in favour of the Bill are arguments showing that we have suffered great injustice from Germany, and that now is our opportunity for getting square and punishing her for the great injustice she has done. Our men were killed; the bodies of our best sons lie in France and in Flanders, as a result of the war brought on by Germany. That is one of the arguments. Another is that the German manufacturer will be punished through this Bill, and that as he was behind the war we should have this Bill in order to punish him. What strikes me in considering that view of the question is that in endeavouring to punish Germany through this Bill, we may in the end punish ourselves.

The promoters of the Bill cannot say in one breath that it is designed to punish Germany, and in the next breath that it is going to help Germany by promoting the sale of German goods in this country. They must take either horn of the dilemma; and, as their arguments have all been calculated to show that Germans should be punished, we must take it that the object of the Bill is to punish the German people and German manufacturers. But what is the situation in Canada to-day from the commercial and business standpoint? We have been sweating and struggling for the last few years to try to live in this country. The Board of Commerce has been created by this Parliament in order to endeavour to keep down the high cost of living. The argument used was that during the war millions of people throughout the world were fighting each other, were destroying instead of producing, and that when the war was over and people settled down to produce there would be some hope of reducing the high cost of living. That was the argument; but the proposition contained in this Bill is to shut out 65,000,000 people from producing goods which might be brought into this country and might help to bring down the high cost of living. There is no way in which we can ever bring down that cost to a reasonable basis except by interchange of trade.

As has been pointed out with great force by the honourable member for Moncton (Hon. Mr. McSweeney), France and Belgium have been devastated and injured to a very much greater extent both in lives and in property than we have, and they are trading with Germany. Britain, who lost in the war twenty or thirty men to our one, is trading with Germany.

If the Canadian manufacturers and producers of goods wish to combat Germany, the proper way for them to do it is by producing goods at a reasonable price. Let them wake up, and do as Germany has done, and invent new methods of production. Let the labouring people of this country do as the labouring people of Germany have done. Let the manufacturers and the labourers and every one in his country stand together and endeavour to increase production and put on the market goods that are as good and as cheap as those of Germany. To pass a Bill which has for its object the tying up of 65,000,000 producers is to my mind to hang another millstone around the necks of the consumers of this country.

I do not think the manufacturers of this country have much cause to complain. They have made their millions during the war, and I do not complain of that: I am glad they have. If the country is to be prosperous, industry and manufacturing must flourish; but I do not think we are justified in passing a measure which, in my opinion, will do more harm than good, in that it will increase the cost of living. No one will deny that it is very difficult now for the consumers of this country to make both ends meet.

If I were actuated by sentiment, I would vote for this Bill. But I am not actuated by sentiment. I think the only way to discuss this question is by foregoing sentiment, and by appealing to reason and getting down to facts. The German people have injured us, no doubt; they have killed our sons; they have forced us to spend large sums of money for the defence of our country. They have done all that; but if we impose a greater burden on the consumers of this country in order to get square with Germany, I think we will do Canada a greater injury than we would do if we allowed German goods to come in under certain reasonable restrictions. I therefore feel it incumbent upon me to oppose the Bill.

Hon. J. J. DONNELLY: Honourable gentlemen, with all the suffering, and all the loss of life and treasure that has been brought to this country by the action of Germany in plunging the world into the great war, I think it is only natural that there should be a strong desire to enact some legislation to prevent German-made goods finding a ready market in this country. With that sentiment I am fully in accord; but I do not think that the Bill which we are now considering is the best means of bringing about that result. If it is the wish of this country that we should not purchase German goods, why not place an embargo upon them? If the promoter of this Bill will amend it so as to compel all German goods coming to this country to bear the words, "Made in Germany," then the people will know what they are getting.

But that is not the course taken by the honourable gentleman. One part of the Bill says:

> Every person who knowingly deals in goods, wares or merchandise which are, in whole or in part, the growth, product or manufacture of Germany or Austria-Hungary, shall keep posted in letters easily legible over every outside entrance to his premises the words "Dealer in German Goods."

The sign that is posted over the door of a merchant is usually meant to signify his principal occupation. It might come to pass that a country storekeeper, carrying perhaps $15,000 or $20,000 worth of stock, would have $100 worth of German toys or dyes in his stock, and he would be obliged to place that sign over his store and, to a certain extent, brand himself pro-German. That would be the effect of it in most communities. I think that is an unfair position to put him in. You may say that he should not buy the goods. He may get the goods not knowing that they are German and may afterwards learn that they are; and he would then come under the Act. Unless the mover changes his Bill, I cannot see my way to support it.

Hon. GEORGE LYNCH-STAUNTON: Honourable gentlemen, I have listened to the debate—

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I do not like to interrupt my honourable friend, but I think he has spoken to this motion before.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I have not spoken. I have the right to close the debate. I do not see why any honourable gentleman should desire to cut me off.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: We heard all about it before.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I have listened with feelings of utter surprise to some of the gentlemen who have spoken on this question. I introduced this Bill in the session of 1918, and at that time stated in the presence of honourable gentlemen that the Bill would not be effective until after the war, and that the reason for its introduction was so that when the war was over people could not oppose it on the ground that merchants had loaded themselves up with goods and that the legislation would be unfair. This Bill passed the Senate at that time with the support of all but perhaps one of the gentlemen now opposing it. The scales appear to have fallen from their eyes. Every gentleman who has stood up has said: "I have the greatest sympathy, my heart is breaking with sympathy for the dead Canadians and for the suffering families; I voted for the Bill before, but now I must vote against it." They remind me of the story, "Through the Looking Glass," and of the walrus and the carpenter who coaxed the oysters out onto the shore, telling them that they would have a friendly walk together:

> "I weep for you," the walrus said;
> "I deeply sympathize."
> With sighs and tears he sorted out
> Those of the largest size,
> And with his pocket handkerchief
> He wiped his streaming eyes.

These gentlemen who are so sorry voted for the Bill before. One of them at that time actually amended the Bill and said that it met with his approval; he actually helped the passage of the Bill; and now he gets up and says, "Oh, I cannot vote for it." Another gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, says, "True, I voted for the Bill, but we were at war then." True, the war was on; and he had been in the great theatre, where the greatest tragedy man has ever beheld was being enacted. He saw the abomination and the desolation in the holy places; he heard the cries of outraged France and the wail from Canada; and he then believed the Bill was just. But now the curtain has gone down; the poor exhausted German comes and appeals for his help, and his heart goes out to him.

Were these gentlemen, who one by one stood up in this House and said that they had voted for the Bill, dissimulating before the people of the country? Were they pretending that the war was a sufficient reason for their action? To me it is absolutely astounding that men having the responsibility of legislators, after reading and examining the Bill, and approving of it, should excuse themselves on the ground that they wanted to fool the people into thinking they were in sympathy with them. There can be no other excuse, because at that time it was stated, and was known by every man who voted for this Bill, that it would not be effective until after the war. It was a simulated sentiment to show sympathy with the people who were sacrificing themselves in the war. I can understand a man who can skim fatness from the German broth not desiring the Bill to pass; but I cannot understand a man who supported the Bill after deliberate judgment—and he cannot say he did not give his deliberate judgment —now saying, "It is all sentiment," and kicking it out. One gentleman said, "It is all rubbish." Another spoke of it as a white elephant. Kipling will have to write another poem, "Lest We Forget," and will have again and again to remind the people of the world what Germany has done, so that it will not be forgotten entirely.

Passing from that view—and it appeals to me very strongly—I want to protest against this Bill being misrepresented in this House. I protest against arguments being advanced which a man must know, if he has the power of reasoning, are unsound. The contradictory arguments of honourable gentlemen remind me of the argument of the lawyer who was sitting beside an old counsel in the Supreme Court of the United States. He said: "I propose to address that argument to the court; what do you think about it?" "Well," said the counsel, "it is absolutely unsound; it is absolute rubbish; but you never know what those fellows in the togas up there will be moved by; try it on them." I suppose the gentlemen who put forward these arguments say: "We don't know what the Senate may swallow; we will try it on them." To begin with, they tell us that England has made a Treaty with Germany, and that this Bill would be in violation of that Treaty. I said that I thought no man should put up an insincere argument against this Bill. I asked the gentleman who made that argument to show me anything in the Treaty with which it was in conflict, and he said not a word. That was seeing what would go.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The whole Treaty is predicated on trade with Germany.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The whole Treaty? Show me the clause. Where is it mentioned in the Treaty? No one that I know of has been able to find anything in the Treaty which is in conflict with this Bill. Honourable gentlemen pretend that the Bill means one thing, while they know it means another. That is my protest. It is misrepresenting the meaning of this Bill. This Bill does not prevent a man importing and using all the German goods he chooses. There is not a word in the Bill which imposes any pain or penalty on any one who imports anything of that kind. You can fill every factory in Canada with German-made machinery, and this Bill does not affect you. You can use millions and millions worth of German clothes, food, anything you like, and this Bill does not affect you.

One honourable gentleman, for whom I have great respect, said that the Bill would promote the use of German goods. Another honourable gentleman, after listening to him, said that if we passed the Bill it would increase the cost of living, and that he was going to vote against the Bill because he believed that—and a half a dozen others believed him. Now, if it will increase the cost of German goods—

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: What does the honourable gentleman say about it himself?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I say it will not increase the cost of living, and I will prove it.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I rise to a point of order. I ask what motion is before the House. The popularity of the honourable gentleman promoting the Bill is so great that he got the Bill further than he otherwise would; but his popularity is not so great that he can stand here all day speaking.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The question is on the motion of the honourable gentleman from New Brunswick (Hon. Mr. Thompson) for the six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: And how is my honourable friend closing the debate? I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker. He has already spoken.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I thought the honourable gentleman was going to say just a few words. I did not understand that he was going to make a speech. If the honourable gentleman limits his remarks, he may continue.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Mr. Speaker and honourable gentlemen, I rise again to explain my point of order as taken on the ground—

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I submit that my honourable friend is out of order. I understand that His Honour the Speaker has ruled.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I ruled that the honourable gentleman had the right to speak.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I ask that I be heard on the point of order.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: You cannot. The point of order has been ruled on. The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Girroir) asks me whether or not it would increase the cost of living.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: I did not ask the honourable gentleman that. My honourable friend, in answer to my argument, I presume, stated that one member said that this Bill would help the sale of German goods and another said it would not. I would like to know what he thinks about that. Which will it be?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I think it will not help the sale of German goods.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Do you think it will hurt it?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I am not quite an idiot. I would not have brought in the Bill if I thought it would help the sale of German goods. What I am telling the honourable gentleman is this. We do not import food from Germany, and we have had an opportunity ever since the Treaty was signed, and the cost of living has been going up and up all the time. I do not think the honourable gentleman has any more confidence in that argument than I have. One honourable member says it will increase the sale of German goods and he will vote against it. Why should an honourable gentleman go against those people who want this only from sentiment, when he does not think it would injure anybody? That is what passes my understanding?

Then there is another argument to which I would draw attention; and I have more respect for this argument than I have for any other which I have heard against the Bill. Some honourable gentlemen have said that it will decrease trade with Germany and lessen Germany's opportunity to earn money to pay off her indebtedness to the world. That is an argument that is entitled to respect. If it is reasonable, it ought to be weighed, and if it is not sound it ought to be ignored. Now, let us see. The business which we did with Germany at the high tide of our trade with her did not amount to more than $4,000,000 in a year. Here are the returns. The honourable gentleman from Simcoe (Hon. Mr. Bennett) has given them to me. The trade is a bagatelle. We did more business with Belgium than we did with that great empire.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Then what is the use of bothering with the Bill? What is the good of moving Parliament if that is all the trade amounts to—if it is a mere bagatelle?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The honourable gentleman should have asked that question when he encouraged me to bring in the Bill, and when he moved to amend it, and approved of its being passed.

Does Germany require all this solicitude? I think I may safely say that Germany has come out of this war better off than any other people in the world; that all the lying camouflage that she has put up is in keeping with her whole history of unreliability. The whole debt of Germany before this war began was not more than $1,200,000,000, according to Whitaker, who is an authority on that question. That great empire of between sixty and seventy millions of people is, as I said the other day, a standing menace to the life of the world. During the war Germany did not spend any money outside her own country. All that she got from other countries she stole from them. She robbed Roumania; she wrecked Russia; she paid nothing to anybody. And she has all the wealth now that she had before the war. We did not set foot on German soil to destroy any property that she had. She was looked upon as one of the richest nations in the world; and can any person say that her treasure has been depleted? She has everything that she had before; whereas we, from this war, have gone empty away. Look at the rate of exchange. The devil has given her that blessing even. The greatest blessing that came to Germany was the fall of the mark on the market. A great English authority said the other day that the greatest blessing to England has been the fall of the pound sterling. It has absolutely cut off the importation of goods from the United States.

I can cite a case in point, and I can give you the name of the gentleman who actually bought the goods in question. Before the war began, a member of the House of Commons, engaged in the manufacture of knitted goods, purchased a machine for knitting, to be brought into Canada from Germany, for $1,800. The price was 9,000 marks, or $2,200, laid down in Buffalo, or $1,800 in Canada. The same kind of goods are for sale in Germany to-day at the same price, and that gentleman has bought six of those machines. What do you suppose they cost him, in Canadian money? Four hundred dollars apiece. He bould six of those machines for $2,400, laid down in Buffalo—$400 apiece.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: That is trading with Germany, is it not?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: That is trading with Germany. That gentleman could not be prevented under this Bill from doing that. But what I want to say is this. Any man that says Germany will not get an enormous trade, so long as the mark is worth only two cents, is talking nonsense. She will have an enormous trade and will build herself up as well as ever. I am sure we cannot keep German goods out of this country. I am sure that as long as they can be bought at low prices they will enter in large quantities.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Why not make the surtax higher?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But I think that those who have suffered in this war are entitled to ask that German goods shall not be palmed off on them as English goods, or French goods, or Belgian goods, as an honourable gentleman showed a few minutes ago. We are entitled to some protection in this respect and not to have our request cast aside with the remark: "Oh, that is balderdash."

Then, to say that this legislation is unexampled is another insincere argument. We know that Canada placed upon German goods a supertax.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: In retaliation.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: We know that the British Government required German goods to be marked, "Made in Germany." We know that these things have been done in retaliation, when there was no question of sentiment at all. We know that the United States put an embargo on pulp. We know that we put on an export duty to prevent the export of lumber to the United States. The history of legislation in the British Empire and in all other countries is full of that kind of legislation. And honourable gentlemen stand up here and say that this Bill is unexampled in this history of the Empire. As I asked one honourable gentleman the other day, what in principle is the difference between this measure and a law requiring German goods to be marked, "Made in Germany?". If you prohibit persons from selling goods made in Germany unless they are marked "Made in Germany," why are you doing that? You are doing it to discourage the purchase of German goods. The British Parliament, which is constantly cited, has done that. I tell you anything can be passed easily when it is not going to cost anything, or when it will make money for somebody; but when one appeals to men's better feelings, when one asks that sentiment be respected, then they say: "Let us look over the ledger first and see whether or not it will cost anybody anything."

We have lived for five years without dealing with Germany, and nobody has complained. But now gentlemen say the war is over and they are willing to take German goods made with the bloody hand —the blood perhaps of their own children on that hand; they are willing to do that rather than violate some economic principle.

After this Bill has received the stamp of unanimous approval in this House, after it has passed the second reading without a vote and has been allowed to pass through the committee, it is in my opinion most unfair, most improper, to treat it with the contempt with which it has been treated here. Let the Bill go to the House of Commons, the popular assembly, and let them say whether or not this is proper and right legislation.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I understand that Mr. Speaker has not ruled that the honourable gentleman who has just spoken was closing the debate.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The honourable gentleman from Hamilton has closed the debate.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: He has no right to close the debate.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I asked the honourable the Speaker to allow me to speak. I did not want to speak until everybody else was through, and Mr. Speaker had risen to his feet when I rose.

The Hon. the Speaker: We have to dispose first of the motion of the honourable member from Fredericton (Hon. Mr. Thompson), and then anybody can oppose the third reading, or make a motion in amendment, if he so desires.

The motion of Hon. Mr. Thompson, that the Bill be not now read the third time, but be read the third time this day six months, was agreed to on the following division:

EMPLOYMENT OFFICES CO-ORDINATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON moved the second reading of Bill Y2, an Act to amend the Employment Offices Co-ordination Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the purpose of this Bill is to amend the Employment Offices Co-ordination Act of 1919 in such a way as to enable municipalities, in provinces where the Provincial Governments have not taken advantage of the opportunities offered under the Act, to exercise that privilege and to do as the provinces elsewhere have done. Briefly to demonstrate the necessity for this amendment, I would point out that in 1919, when the Employment Offices Co-ordination Act went into force, Quebec and all the provinces west took advantage of the Act, and employment offices were established in those provinces under the terms of the Act. In the three Maritime Provinces, however, the Provincial Governments felt that from their standpoint it was not desirable to take advantage of the provisions of the Act; and therefore, during the reconstruction period immediately following the war, for the purpose of helping to place returned soldiers and civilians in employment, the Federal Government operated nine employment offices under an arrangement which ceases to exist at the end of April, 1920. Therefore we find ourselves in the position that in the largest cities, such as Halifax, St. John, and Moncton, which have signified a desire that this work should be continued, it cannot be carried on. There is provision that it may be done through co-operation between the Provincial Governments and the Federal Government. The municipalities, however, desiring that they should have an opportunity to carry on the work in co-operation with the Federal Government on the same basis, it is proposed to extend the Act so that in such cases that may be done. It will mean no added expense, no appropriation of money outside of that already provided for by statute.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, in looking at this Bill and the report laid on the table of the House by the honourable gentleman at the beginning of this session, it seems to me that he has rather exceeded his authority under the original Act. As I read the original Act, and as I think the minister stated a minute or two ago, he was empowered to do this work in co-operation with the provinces. He apparently found that he could not get the desired co-operation in the three eastern provinces, but he went ahead and did the work and incurred expense. I cannot see that he had any authority under the original Act to proceed in that way. Of course, I understand that this Bill will give him power in future to deal not only with the Provincial Governments, but with municipalities or other organizations.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The observation of my honourable friend is quite correct so far as the existing Act is concerned. The work carried on by the Federal Department of Labour in the Maritime Provinces during the period of necessity was authorized, although not by statute, because it was necessary work. It was carried on to meet the emergency existing, but it cannot be carried on any further because the authority expires at the end of this month. Therefore it is proposed to amend the Act so that in the municipalities desiring that employment offices should continue to exist the work can be carried on along the same lines as it would be carried on had the Provincial Government adopted the privileges extended to it under the Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There is nothing compulsory in any of these provisions?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is left entirely at the discretion of the municipalities?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I might say to my honourable friend that a number of municipalities have urged that the service should not be discontinued, and that when it was explained to them that we could not continue because our authority had expired, they urged that some arrangement should be made whereby they could bear the share of the expense that would otherwise fall on the province. It is by reason of these requests that the amendment is proposed to the Act.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

FOOD AND DRUGS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 27, an Act respecting Food and Drugs.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill proposes to repeal what is known as the Adulteration Act, and makes provision for the inspection of foods, so far as they relate to human beings, and drugs, so far as they relate to both man and beast. It likewise deals with the question of standardization so far as the subject has not come under the control of some of the other departments in the administration of other Acts. It is not intended to deal, for instance, with the Acts administered by the Agricultural Department as to the canning of foods, except to take for the department that will administer this Act power to examine into the purity of foods in the hands of the retailer. The same would apply to fish. For instance, fish is packed under the supervision, as I understand, of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. This would permit of examination for the purpose of discovering if the fish is fit for food when in the hands of the retailer. It is intended to apply to food that may be in transit, in the matter of interprovincial trade, or in the matter of export. The Bill covers so many subjects and is invested with so many details that until we go into committee it is difficult to discuss it intelligently enough to give honourable gentlemen an idea as to the full scope of its application. When we go into committee I shall be very glad to have here the experts of the department, who will furnish us with information as to every particular of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I would like to ask the honourable leader of the House if the retailer who has the goods on his shelves will be penalized under this Bill, or will it be the manufacturer who puts up the goods?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will be the retailer.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That would be a manifest injustice to the retailer. How is the retailer going to analyse the goods or drugs on his shelves, in order to tell whether they are pure or impure? It is impossible for him to do so. These goods come from the manufacturers. They pass through the hands of the jobber and the wholesale grocer before reaching the retailer. It would be an injustice to take those goods off the shelves of the retail grocer, for instance, and if they were found impure in any respect under the provisions of this Bill, to penalize him when the manufacturer, who was the real culprit, would get off scot-free.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There are many considerations entering into the subject, and if my honourable friend will wait until we get into committee, we shall be able to advance reasons why this should be done. There are other Acts affecting the very question which my honourable friend raises. There is another Bill, which will reach the Senate in the course of a few days, dealing with drugs and opium.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I ask the honourable leader of the House if this is a consolidation of previous Acts?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes; it is a repeal of the Adulteration Act and a revision and consolidation of all the Acts relating to those particular subjects.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I want to congratulate the Government and my honourable friend on bringing down a measure of this sort. It is a very necessary one. It was necessary many years ago, and should have been enacted then. I am afraid that in the past we have paid far more attention to protecting the horse, the cow, and the hog than we have to protecting man, in the matter of food. We have been very remiss in that respect. I am impelled to rise and say the few words I am going to say, because of a statement that was made to me only last evening by a gentleman from Montreal, whose father, an engineer in that city, is an old personal friend of mine. This gentleman told me that his father was very ill with eczema, and he said: "You would be astounded to know the number of cases of eczema that exist today in the city of Montreal." The doctors have attributed it entirely to the use of bad meat, which is taken out of warehouses and is being sold in the city of Montreal. When a statement of that kind is made by thoroughly responsible members of the community, men of high repute, one is doubly impressed with the necessity of legislation of this sort, and again I congratulate the Government on having brought down this measure. I am sure the Bill will receive all the attention which it deserves.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) has suggested that we can deal with this Bill very much better in committee than on the second reading. It is not at all against the principle of the Bill that I wish to make a few remarks, but I think that we must look into the Bill very carefully when we go into committee in order to see if some of its clauses have not a wider scope than we think. It seems to me that some of this legislation is rather on the drastic side, and the terms of the Bill may be much more far-reaching than on the surface would appear to be the case. I find in one clause that the informant is to receive half of the penalty. I think that policy is not a good one; it is very liable to lead to abuses.

The question raised by the honourable gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Hon. Mr. Murphy) as to making the retail merchant liable for the goods on his shelves, is also one that I think we ought to consider very carefully, because, although the Bill provides that if the retailer brings in the wholesaler or the man from whom he obtains the goods, he himself is to a certain extent exonerated, still the penalty placed on the retailer is heavier than he ought to be asked to assume. However, as I have already said, these questions can be discussed much better in committee, and I will not detain the House any longer.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

BRITISH COLUMBIA INDIAN LAND SETTLEMENT BILL.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING POSTPONED.

On the Order:

Second reading Bill 13, an Act to provide for the Settlement of Differences between the Governments of the Dominion of Canada and the province of British Columbia respecting Indian Lands and certain other Indian Affairs in the said province.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I desire to couple this Bill with another which will shortly reach the Senate from the Commons—Bill 14. They have been largely discussed together in the House of Commons, and it will probably save time and enable us to have a more intelligent view of the subject to place them on the Order Paper together. I would therefore move the discharge of this Order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Until when?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Say, until Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Has my honourable friend any idea as to when Bill 14 is likely to reach the Senate?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I thought it would have been down to-day.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understand it has not yet been reported out of committee of the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Has it not? My idea is that this Bill should stand until the other reaches us. So we will put it on the Order Paper for Tuesday next.

The Order was discharged, and placed on the Order Paper for Tuesday next.

GRAND TRUNK AGREEMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 54, an Act to confirm the agreement dated the eighth day of March, 1920, between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the said Grand Trunk Railway Company, except the four per cent guaranteed stock.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, it will be recalled that at last session of Parliament we passed the Grand Trunk Railway Acquisition Act, 1919. It was said by some of our critics that sufficient time had not been given for a proper consideration of that Bill. Whether that statement be true or not, it has been found that there were two small omissions in the agreement, which was to be ratified by the shareholders, and which has been ratified. It seems that a short line known as the Vermont and Province Line railroad, owned by the Grand Trunk, was omitted from the agreement. It is necessary, therefore, to amend the agreement by including this road with the others with which the agreement deals. There was also an error in regard to the Pembroke Southern railway which in the agreement appears as a railway under lease, whereas it is controlled by a majority stock in the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Hence it is necessary to amend the agreement so that the Pembroke Southern railway, instead of being described as under lease, shall appear as being controlled by the majority stock of the company.

There was another omission—I might call it an omission—it is not of a serious character—in regard to the notices which were sent out regarding the confirmation of the agreement. The shareholders naturally had to be notified. It seems that there was a small group of shareholders in Canada, numbering, I think, ten or twelve. There was an irregularity in the notice in regard to two of those shareholders. While the others in Canada may not have received notices, yet on their own authority the notice was properly served upon those who were authorized to appear for them at the head office of the company in England. The two shareholders in Canada not regularly notified represent only about $1,500 worth of stock, or thereabouts. So honourable gentlemen will appreciate the fact that the matter is not a very material one. Yet it is very desirable that regularity should be observed in regard to the notices sent to the various shareholders, and that, in order to cover any omissions of the kind which I have mentioned, Parliament should confirm the agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company regarding which the notices were sent out. This is the purpose of the Bill.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, my honourable friend has not laid before us the correspondence which was brought down in the other House in regard to this matter. I do not say that I complain about that. I understand that it took three hours for the minister in the other House to read all that correspondence, and I think the honourable leader of the Government in this House has probably given us the pith of the correspondence in the few remarks he has made in moving the second reading of this Bill.

This measure, as my honourable friend has presented it to the House, appears innocent and simple. Its purpose, according to what he tells us, is simply to correct errors or omissions that have occurred in the drawing up of the agreement, one railway having been wrongly described, and another having been omitted, in the original agreement. These are small matters, regarding which we would make no objection. But this Bill, as I see it, brings before us the whole agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company respecting the purchase of the railway. We asked last year that this agreement be submitted to Parliament; but the Government at that time did not feel disposed to allow Parliament to examine the agreement before they passed upon it. The agreement now placed before us has already been sanctioned, although not altogether in due form, by the shareholders of the company, and we are practically committed to it by the legislation of last session. Therefore, I do not know that there is much to be gained by discussing its terms again.

We had a fairly full discussion of the whole matter at last session. But I would point out to the Government that the action taken by honourable gentlemen in this House last session in moving "that Bill 33 be not now read a second time, but that further consideration thereof be deferred until the next session of Parliament." was a wise one, and one to which the Government ought to have given their consent. Then we should not have been placed in the position in which we find ourselves today, of having to deal with this matter a second time in order to correct errors which would then not have been made or would probably have been discovered. This is, I think, a strong argument against legislation being brought down in a hurry, as was the Bill of last session. Honourable gentlemen will remember that it was introduced in the House in the very last days of the session, when we thought prorogation was about to take place. We were kept here for a considerable time longer, in order to put through this particular piece of legislation. Had the Government taken the necessary time to deal with it in the way in which honourable members of this House asked that it be dealt with, we should not now be called upon to deal with the question again.

Another point. We might also have taken a different view of the legislation had we had before us the information that has now been given to the country by the Minister of Railways, as to the country's position with regard to the roads now being operated by the Government. The other day the Minister of Railways told the country that it would be necessary to provide the sum of $47,000,000 for the purpose of making good the deficit on operations and to pay the fixed charges on the roads for the operation of which the country is now responsible. In giving those figures the Minister of Railways mentioned that the loss on the Grand Trunk Pacific would amount to $5,000,000 and the amount to be paid out on fixed charges would be $8,800,000. Those figures, as I understand, referred to the railway year ending the 31st of December, 1919. Let us consider the amount of money that has been put into these railways, and the amount of money that has been spent by the country on them. We find, on page 2 of the Public Accounts report, the following items put down as investments and assets of the country:

G.T.P. railway, prairie section loan account, chapter 19 of the Act of 1909	$10,000,000
G.T.P. railway, loan account, 1913	15,000,000
G.T.P. railway, loan account, 1914	6,000,000
G.T.P. railway, loan account of 1917	5,038,053
G.T.P. railway, Appropriation Act of 1918	7,471,399

These items make a total of $43,509,453 that we have advanced at various times in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific, and that are now entered as investments of Canada in that railway. But in the Appropriation Act of 1918, and in the Appropriation Act of 1917, both these amounts were put down as loans to the railway company; but, as far as I can understand, the Minister of Railways the other day, when mentioning these amounts of fixed charges that the railways had to pay, was not taking into consideration any interest payment that the railway company would make on those loans which, according to the Public Accounts, have been advanced to the company by way of loan and not as out-and-out payments. I think we ought to have further information about such a matter in order to realize what amount of money we are paying out in connection with these railways; because, if we are advancing this money by way of loan, the amounts ought not to be put in the Estimates every year but provided for by a separate Act; and surely the railway company, if they receive these moneys in the way of loans, ought to pay interest on them. If it is necessary for the Government to borrow money from other sources, it must pay interest on what it borrows, and if those sums are entered in the Public Accounts as investments, the country is certainly entitled to get interest from the railway for the amounts so advanced. I bring up this matter in order that honourable gentlemen may realize what the position is with regard to this particular railway question. If we were going into the general railway policy of the country many other questions would be raised which would add very greatly to the figures given by the Minister of Railways as to the actual cost of these railways to the country; and I think we should carefully consider the position into which we are driven and the enormous sums we are paying for the luxury of operating these railways.

Hon. G. G. FOSTER: I understand that the Bill before us has been fairly explained to the House by the honourable leader of the Government, and there is nothing in it which in any way adds to the financial obligations of Canada other than what was incurred by what is known as the Grand Trunk legislation of last session. When I saw in the press the announcement that the Government proposed to legislate with regard to the rights of minority shareholders in England or Canada, I confess that at first I thought that any such legislation must be improper and unfair to those stockholders; but, as I have read this Bill and heard the explanations given here and elsewhere, I have come to the conclusion that no wrong is done to any one, and that I have no legitimate cause of complaint against this Bill. I was opposed to the purchase by the Government of the Grand Trunk system, because I did not then and I do not now believe in government ownership or government management of railways; but I do not see that it is my duty to oppose a Bill which does not in any way commit me to a principle in which I do not believe, but which is necessary to complete legislation heretofore passed by a large majority of the members of the Lower House and a majority of this House. I understand that this Bill deals only with the Vermont and Province Line railroad, all of the stock of which is owned by the Grand Trunk railway, and the Pembroke Southern railway, the majority of the stock of which is owned by the Grand Trunk railway, and that they are the only two corporations in which any question arises under this legislation. Supposing for a moment that we were to throw out this Bill, or to delay the carrying out of this transaction by sending it back, it would mean that the Grand Trunk railway would issue new notices to all the shareholders of those two corporations that a meeting of the shareholders would be held, the Grand Trunk would control every share of one company and a majority of the stock of the other one, and we would have to ratify, after two or three months' delay, the Bill which we are given the opportunity of ratifying today. I cannot see that any one suffers, or that any wrong is done to any one by this Bill, and therefore I cannot see it to be my duty to vote against it. At the same time, in justice to myself and those of my friends who did not vote for the legislation before, I want to say that I do not recede one inch from the position I took at the last session. I did not believe in the purchase then; I do not believe in the purchase now. I did not believe then in government ownership; I do not believe in it now. But because of that opinion, which is a minority opinion, and not that of the majority of the members of the House of Commons and of this House, I do not see that it is my duty to offer useless opposition to this legislation, and therefore I shall not vote against it.

Hon. N. A. BELCOURT: This is the third act in the financial tragedy which, in the opinion of not a few Canadians, is bound to terminate in the financial ruin of this country. For my part, I am not prepared at this stage or at any stage to give any sort of acquiescence, by my silence, in the legislation which was passed by this House when we acquired the Canadian Northern, and later on when we acquired the Grand Trunk railroad. The original drama was schemed with only two acts: the acquisition of the Canadian Northern and the acquisition of the Grand Trunk. This third performance was wholly unexpected and wholly unprovided for. When we did acquire the Canadian Northern it was contemplated and intended by the Government that the Grand Trunk would also be acquired later on; but it was deemed not easy to have the Canadian people swallow both pills at the one time. It seemed better to go ahead with the Canadian Northern, which was perhaps the worse of the two pills, and have that one well down before any attempt was made with the other.

The time for the play was well chosen. The excitement caused by the war, the fact that everybody's mind was centred on the one object, the one purpose, of bringing the war to a satisfactory conclusion, was chosen as the best time possible to pass this legislation, which would not have been passed, in my opinion, had it not been for the circumstances which I have indicated. It was thought—and I have no doubt the argument had a very strong influence in determining those who are responsible for the legislation—that when once the Canadian Northern had been acquired it would be an easy matter to convince the Canadian people of the absolute necessity of acquiring also the Grand Trunk in order to carry out the scheme of public operation of railways. Therefore, when the Canadian Northern deal was passed, the Grand Trunk deal was trotted out. All of us know how well the scheme was managed. It was only through the desperate appeal of the Prime Minister of the day to gentlemen of this House who owed their seats to his benevolence that the legislation was passed in the Senate. There were gentlemen in this House who were going through the lobbies decrying the deal in lurid language, and expressing their determination to vote against it, and yet who came to the House and voted for it. I am not going to inquire into their motives; I only state the fact. If the matter remained with me I would not do what my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Foster) just now stated he would not do. I would kick the Bill out. I would try to save the country from the enormous financial burden which has been imposed on it by the taking over of those two railways and endeavouring to operate them as government properties.

We have been told that the obligations of those two systems would be six or seven hundred millions in one case, and I am not sure that we have been told what the obligations of the Grand Trunk are or might be. From all the information I have been able to gather I take it that the debts and obligations of those two systems are not very far from a billion and a half. When we are told that the debt of Canada to-day is two billions, I say we are misleading ourselves and the public; for the debt of Canada to-day, by reason of these obligations, is far nearer four billions than two billions of dollars. How are we going to pay this billion and a half in addition to the two billion of debt that we admit we have to pay? Is it by the operation of the railways? Those who took the trouble to go into this matter and think it out realized from the very first that there would annually and every year be a huge deficit in the operation of the railways. It was estimated as sixty millions in the first year, but it will be found that it is between sixty and seventy-five millions from the first year's operation. What are we going to do? How are we going to pay this billion and a half? We are told that this huge sum is represented by assets; that we own the property of these two systems. Well, I ask any business man, what is the good of an asset—the operation of which results in an annual deficit? Is that not the kind of asset that you would want to get rid of? Is that not the kind of an asset that is absolutely worthless? But that is our position to-day, and I am very much afraid that the people of Canada have a very poor conception of what is meant by the bargain which we have made with those two companies, and have not the faintest idea as to where they are being led by the Parliament of Canada in this legislation. The only reason worth mentioning why these railways should be taken over was that if we allowed them to go into the hands of a receiver Canada's credit would be very seriously affected.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Even had the railways gone into liquidation, how would the Dominion have escaped payment of the guarantees given on the bonds?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Assuming that the Government would ultimately have had to pay these guarantees, I do not think those obligations were nearly half what the debts of the companies were; and if we were going to choose between escaping one debt and the other, we would be choosing the smaller debt and escaping the larger one; for if those companies had been disposed of they would have realized probably enough to indemnify the Dominion and Provincial Governments which have given the guarantees, and whatever was realized would have gone to help to pay the obligation for which Canada was guarantor. I do not think it would have cost Canada very much if those railways had been allowed to be dealt with in the same way as any other bankrupt concern in Canada or any other country. The people of this Parliament had no right to saddle the country with the huge debt and the huge obligations of those two railway systems, especially when it must have been clear to anyone that we could not possibly operate them with success.

Now, what does Government operation mean in this country? Let us look for a moment at what it has done for other countries. There is no country on the face of the earth where government operation of railways has been successful.

An Hon. SENATOR: Germany?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Not Germany. Prussia was the only part of the world in which it was reasonably successful; but the surplus declared there on two or three occasions was made, as it is generally made in cases of that sort, by cooking the acounts. I assert that there is not one country in the world where the government operation of railways has been successful, or rather, where it has not turned into a huge deficit. If you cannot make the operation of railways successful in countries such as France, Great Britain, Belgium, and Germany, how can you hope ever to make it a success in Canada? Belgium, for instance, has over 500 people to the square mile, whereas in Canada we have less than 2. The proportion is perhaps a little less in England, and a little less in France, but there you have a density of population at least two or three hundred times greater than it is in Canada. But that is not the whole story. In Great Britain, France, Belgium, and Germany the railways are principally occupied in carrying manufactured articles, and they have very short distances to go, whereas in Canada our railways are engaged mostly in carrying raw materials—ore, grain, iron, and so on. And look at the tremendous distances we have to carry goods across this country. I say it was utter madness for Canada to go into the undertaking of attempting to operate those railways; but the dictionary affords me no adequate words to describe our conduct in taking over those bankrupt systems.

I said this is the third act of the tragedy. I do not know how many more there will be, and I cannot see just what the fourth act will be; nobody can. I can only hope that the fourth act will come when the people realize the full significance of this matter, the extent of the enormous obligations that we have assumed, the greatness of the danger which Canada financially is going to run because of these undertakings. The people will then realize that the time will have come when they must hand the system over to somebody who will be able to make something out of it. So far as Canada is concerned, I have no hesitation in prophesying that at no time will Canada ever be able to operate those railways with anything but a deficit; hence the sooner we get rid of the system the better. I have no doubt that the gentlemen who have handed over this white elephant to Canada will be only too glad, when the time comes, to get together and buy it at auction or in some other way, and get it at auction price. Perhaps the very gentlemen who sold it will be the ones who will come along and succeed in buying back their own property for a mere bagatelle.

I quite realize that I am wasting my breath and my time, and that what I am doing now is absolutely useless; but I want to put myself on record once more, not because I hope to convert anybody or bring light to the mind of any, but only because I want to square myself with my own conscience. I cannot and I will not sit in this House, so long as I have a seat here, and by my silence acquiesce in this frightfully calamitous undertaking which Canada has gone into. My only purpose in rising and saying what I have said is that of acquitting my conscience. My voice is a very feeble one; my protest must be a very humble one, and can have no effect whatever; but I think I owe it to myself to utter it on this occasion, and on every other occasion when this matter is put before the House. I do not care how many acts there may be in the tragedy; I do not care if this is going to be a sort of continuous performance; for my part, I am going to protest on every occasion that offers. I would not wish any one to misinterpret my remarks; I would not wish any one to think that I have no confidence in the gentlemen who are administering the system. On the contrary, I have every confidence in Mr. Hanna, and I have great confidence in the men surrounding him. I think that if Mr. Hanna is given a free hand he will do far better than any one else could hope to do with this tremendous undertaking. But no process of alchemy has yet been discovered by which iron, for instance, can be turned into gold; and in my opinion there is no way of administering this railway to the profit of Canada. But that will not be Mr. Hanna's fault. I am sure that the deficit that we are going to have every year will not be due to any delinquency or want of ability on his part, but simply because of the utter impossibility of bleeding stone.

Again, honourable gentlemen, I beg to be excused for indulging in a speech which I know will have no effect, and which might just as well never have been made. I am conscious that my only justification for making these observations, wholly unprepared and which on the spur of the moment I am impelled to make, is because of my deep and unalterable conviction that peril to Canada because of this nefarious bargain is much graver thant most people have realized. I want to get rid of something that troubles my conscience: that troubles it so much that I could not sit here and allow the principle of this Bill to be again sanctioned without voicing my protest.

Hon. W. C. EDWARDS: Honourable gentlemen, I must not attempt to make a speech. But, like my honourable friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), I want to take this occasion again to repeat what I have more than once said in this House, and what I have said many times in various parts of Canada, perhaps not publicly, but privately. My honourable friend does not go back to the origin of the terrible disease from which Canada is suffering, and from which I am afraid she will continue to suffer so long as Canada is Canada—that is, the inordinate unnecessary building of railways in this country. This building of railways is the outgrowth of a lack of knowledge on the part of public men and Canadians generally of their country. Unfortunately for Canada, few men have studied conditions and have come to understand fully the geographical construction and the physical disadvantages under which Canada necessarily labours.

A most inordinate overestimate of Canada's possibilities and resources is the cause of the whole tragedy. I say again, as I have said many times, that is a condition which has not been studied by the public men of Canada or by Canadians generally. When Canada rouses herself to the real truth, as I am sure she will within two or three years, there is going to be a tremendous awakening.

The public men of Canada are continually talking of our numerous resources and their inexhaustibility. There is no resource that is not exhaustible; and I regret to say it, as a Canadian, that this is a country limited in variety of natural resources. I swallowed the talk of our public men for many years, and was under the impression that this counry was going to be a second United States. Some years ago, however, I began to study conditions very carefully, and I arrived at an entirely different conclusion. It may seem egotistical for me to say this, but I say that there is no Canadian who has spent as much as I have done to study Canada east of the Rocky mountains to the Atlantic. We have explored more of Canada east of the Great Lakes than perhaps all of the rest of the lumber trade. That may seem an extravagant statement to make, but it is true. If the knowledge that I have of the eastern portion of Canada had been possessed by the people generally, certain conditions which now prevail, never would have prevailed.

I do not want to belittle the country. Canada has certain possibilities, but it is not the wonderful country, rich in resources, that the Canadian people believe it to be. I invite Canadians to make a study of their country and its conditions, and to make a comparison with the other countries of the world. Canada is necessarily a dear country to live in. It is a dear country in which to produce. We can produce very few articles here in competition with other countries. We can perhaps produce pulp and cement more nearly on an equality with other countries than anything else. But, generally speaking, Canada never has been, is not to-day, and never will be, a cheap country in which to produce. The great vigour of the people, because of the northern climate in which we live, contributes to our activities and enables use to withstand disadvantageous conditions. But I say that if Canada had been understood, the mad follies that exist in the country to-day, in the shape of railway construction, never would have been undertaken. I make the statement now, as I have made it before, that the wisest thing the Canadian people can do is to make a study of their country and determine how many thousands of miles of the railroads that have been built should be scrapped and abandoned entirely. Perhaps it is a courageous statement to make, but I believe before three years pass many Canadians will believe as I do.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Might I ask the honourable gentleman if he supported the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill, and if he supported the building of the Transcontinental railway.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: My honourable friend, I am afraid, is a politician; I am not. I am the only Canadian who honestly opposed the building of the Transcontinental railway. There was no vote on that question in the House, both sides of the House, in their folly, supporting the undertaking.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Do I understand my honourable friend to say that he is the only one who opposed it?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: I sat in this House at the time. If I had sat in the Commons, I would have openly opposed it. It is true that I did not draw the attention of the House to the fact, but I took the strongest means in my power—by means of writing letters and by conversation—to hinder that project.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THE HALIFAX GARRISON.

INQUIRY AND DISCUSSION.

Hon. A. B. CROSBY rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to matters pertaining to the garrison at Halifax, and the agreement with the Imperial authorities, and also regarding the defence, both military and naval, and the dockyard and all agreements and understandings in that connection; and inquire whether it is the intention of the Government to restore the regiment to Halifax.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, yesterday I was going to say a word or two with regard to the garrison of the city of Halifax, but the honourable leader of the Government asked me if I would wait until to-day, when he might be able to give me the information that I desired. I understand now that he agrees with everything that I am going to say, although he does not yet know what it is; so I feel perfectly free to discuss this matter as best I can.

Years ago we had in Canada an Imperial garrison. That garrison was from time to time removed from one place to another, and finally it came to the city of Halifax. The Imperial authorities decided that there must be a garrison at Halifax, and for the last 25 or 30 years that garrison, consisting of from two to four regiments, has been stationed at Halifax. For the last five or six years, until the Dominion Government undertook to take over the garrison, we have had in the city of Halifax in the neighbourhood of two or three thousand men. In 1905 an agreement was entered into between the Government of Canada, represented by the Militia Council, and the Imperial Government, represented by the Secretary of State for Canada, by which the Government of the day undertook the work of looking after the garrison at Halifax and carrying on that work. The Imperial Government loaned us officers, and handed over all the properties they had in connection with the garrison. They handed over the Wellington barracks, which I think—I do not want to exaggerate—cover about half a square mile of territory. They are situated on elevated ground in an ideal position fronting on Gottingen street, where there is a very high stone wall of from two to two and a half feet thick. They also handed over the Artillery Park, and a splendid reservation for a military cemetery, where soldiers can be buried. Then there are the fortifications, situated on both sides of the harbour. As everybody knows, without Halifax, it would have been very difficult for Canada to carry on her part in the war. In fact, it would have been almost impossible for us to have won the war.

We all have a high regard and great respect for the soldiers, and we all want to do what we can for them, particularly for the returned wounded soldiers, who require care and hospital treatment. I need not refer to the dependents of those who have not come back. Certainly we are all interested in the men who require our assistance, and I think we all agree that nothing is too good for them. In the city of Halifax, a very large hospital was being built, which according to the terms of the contract was to have been completed on the last day of November last. That hostpital is just now nearing completion. Consequently sick soldiers and men convalescing could not be put into that building and had to be put into what were known as emergency hospitals on the Common, which were constructed to accommodate returned men, but which were being used for the troops then stationed in the garrison. Somebody started an agitation, and said that the place where the garrison were living was not good enough for the soldiers, and that they should be put into the Camp Hill hospital, so called, forgetting that the new hospital had not been completed and that the Camp Hill hospital was being used. Such an agitation was raised that it became evident that unless the men could get into the hospital on Camp Hill they would have to go somewhere else. Somebody was sent down from Ottawa to inspect the place, and as a result the garrison was removed to Montreal.

I am informed on creditable authority that the quarters in Halifax are just as good as those in Montreal. I am not saying that the quarters in Montreal are not good enough; but simply that they are no better than those in Halifax.

It is not my desire to interfere in any way with Montreal. Under the legislation which we passed two years ago we established an army of 10,000 men. Consequently Montreal can have a garrison of one regiment, or two or three regiments, if they so desire. But what I desire to impress upon the House is this. While garrisons were being taken away from other cities in Canada, it was considered expedient and necessary to have the garrison at Halifax, and the Government of the day entered into an agreement with the Imperial authorities undertaking to continue that garrison. It has been maintained there since, and I do not believe the Imperial Government would agree to its being removed from Halifax and placed anywhere else.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: It ought to be put in St. John, N.B.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I do not know whether there should be a garrison there or not, but if it were decided to put one at St. John, N.B., I am quite sure the Imperial authorities would feel there should be another garrison established. We want the garrison at Halifax. My honourable friend, who is a military man, knows very well that if there is to be only one garrison in all the Dominion of Canada, that garrison should be at Halifax.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: They spend money to keep Halifax up.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Well, that would be no disadvantage at St. John. Still, I am pleading that the garrison be left at Halifax, not at all because they would spend money in that city, but because I believe, as I said before, that the Imperial authorities would want the garrison continued there.

The Dominion Government came to the conclusion that it was not fair to expect the people of the United Kingdom to pay taxes for the maintenance of a regiment in the city of Halifax, or for a dock-yard in that city, and that the time had arrived when the Imperial authorities should be relieved of that expense. They were, accordingly, relieved of it. Now, I contend that we are not fulfilling our part of the contract. I have in my hand the agreement which was entered into, but I do not wish to take up the time of the House in reading it. Under the agreement, I believe, we had no right to withdraw the garrison from Halifax without the consent of the Imperial authorities, but the excuse was made that the garrison was being withdrawn for only a few months and would be returned. The article appearing in the newspaper indicates, however, that the garrison will not be sent back, and that is the reason why I bring this matter to the attention of the Government and ask that we perform our part, as we agreed to do.

The article to which I referred was published in the Morning Chronicle of Saturday last. It says:

It is believed in local military circles that the removal of the Royal Canadian Regiment, from Halifax to Montreal, will be permanent. This is based on a despatch from Montreal to the effect that three million dollars will be expended for the erection of barracks to house 1,200 men. General Armstrong, officer commanding the Montreal district, has asked that city to give a 40-year lease on a piece of property in the East End, and it is believed that the barracks will be erected there.

On the arrival of the Royal Canadians at Montreal, from Halifax, many prominent business men of the Quebec city became interested in the idea of having them permanently located there. This has resulted in the proposal that barracks be erected for their accommodation. They are at present quartered in the Peel street barracks.

As I said before, there can be no objection to the establishment of a garrison of two or three regiments at Montreal, but what I desire to impress upon the House is the fact that there are in Halifax all the property and facilities necessary. There is no need to spend a dollar to obtain a lease of any property there. We have in Halifax sufficient property to accommodate 5,000 or 6,000 men, if necessary. The Wellington barracks were somewhat damaged in the explosion that occurred in December, 1917, as they had not been thoroughly repaired or reconstructed, they were not proper quarters for the men to enter last year; but the Wellington barracks are now, I understand, in good condition.

With regard to the navy, the most advantageous location for a dockyard is Halifax, and a dockyard was established there by the Imperial authorities. In fact, the gentleman who transferred the property to the Imperial authorities, did so without charging a single dollar, but on the condition that it must never be used for any other purposes than those of a dockyard. This Government has taken over the property on the same condition. There has been some talk of the navy going out of existence, or reverting to the pre-war status; but the agr ement between the Government of Canada and the Imperial authorities regarding the dockyard was similar to that with the military authorities with respect to the garrison. If we make up our minds that we can no longer continue the dockyard at Halifax and carry on the navy, as we undertook to do when we took over the property from the Imperial authorities, then it is our duty so to inform the Imperial authorities and let them decide whether to continue it or not. We must hand back to the Imperial Government all the property and material and tools that were turned over to us amounting in value to millions of dollars. There is in the War Department a schedule of all those goods and their values and the goods should be returned to the Imperial Government the very moment we decide not to carry on. I claim that this Government cannot properly break the agreement with the Imperial authorities without giving them proper notice and affording them an opportunity to re-establish in Halifax what they had there before. The naval base of what was called the North Atlantic squadron used to be Halifax harbour during the summer months and they went to Barbadoes in the winter. After the Canadian Government took over the garrison it was decided that the North Atlantic squadron should go to Bermuda, in place of Halifax. Are we going to say now that we do not want the Halifax dockyard any longer—that we are giving up our interest in the navy and naval matters, and our interest in the defence of Halifax, and the defence of Canada through Halifax? If we do that, we must give the Imperial authorities proper notice, so that they may decide whether they themselves shall carry on or not?

The Royal Canadian Regiment is looked upon as being practically a Halifax regiment, because a great many of the men enlisted there, although there are also, I understand, quite a number of men from the province of Quebec. I claim that the Royal Canadian Regiment, which held the garrison at Halifax and was transferred temporarily to Montreal, should be returned to Halifax, if we do not wish to break faith with the Imperial authorities.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Before the honourable gentleman ceases, I should be thankful to him if he would communicate to the House this agreement which he said was made at the time that the Imperial garrison was withdrawn. We do not know just where we are at without that.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I shall be very glad to read it. I never like reading documents, because, to tell the truth, I never like to listen to documents being read, and so many honourable gentlemen read so much of this kind of thing.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Without knowing what is in them.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman is a good reader.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I assure my honourable friend that I accept that as a great compliment, coming from him, because I always thought he did not consider I was much good for anything. However, I am very thankful and I appreciate the compliment very highly. No honourable gentleman in this House could pay me a compliment that I would appreciate more. This is the agreement:

Memorandum of Agreement between the General Officer Commanding, Canada, representing His Majesty's Secretary of State for War, and the Militia Council representing the Dominion Government of Canada.

It is agreed as follows:

1. The Militia Council take over the control of the garrison of Halifax, and assume the financial responsibility for maintaining the defences as from 1st July, 1905.

2. The War Department transfers to the Militia, free of charge, and with fixtures, all their lands, buildings, and fortifications in Nova Scotia as coloured pink on the plan and enumerated in the inventory accompanying this agreement; the boundaries of which properties are more particularly indicated in the War Department property book dated 13th April, 1895, now in charge of the Militia Council (copy at the War Office).

The transfer of the War Department properties are made on the following conditions, viz:—

(a) That they are held by the Dominion Government for so long as they are required for colonial military purposes, and that when they cease to be used for such purposes they shall revert to the War Department to be disposed of for the entire benefit of the Imperial Government.

(b) The Dominion Government are free to remove or alter buildings now existing on War Department land, on the understanding that in the event of the ground ever being handed back, the colony will either replace the buildings, or return to the War Department the value placed upon them in the accompanying inventory.

(c) Should, however, it be considered necessary for the colony to remove War Department buildings to suit colonial military requirements and not to replace them, and at the same time not to incur the possible future liability, the sanction of the Army Council must first be obtained.

(d) The Militia Council are empowered to authorize and determine lettings and encroachments. The agreements connected therewith have been handed over accordingly.

(e) The Dominion Government further agrees to take over the plot at Fort Massey coloured blue on plan, and to look after it and maintain the ground as a military cemetery.

(f) In the event of all, or any, of the property reverting to the Imperial Government the Militia Council will—at the request of the Army Council—arrange for its disposal free of all agency or other charge, and will look after and maintain the property at the expense of the Dominion Government pending its disposal.

(g) The whole of the property was formally transferred on 16th January, 1906.

E. FISET, Col., D.M.M. & D.
For Minister Militia and Defence.

I neglected to say that, while the garrison has been in Halifax, there are many fortifications and other structures and much land all over Nova Scotia that belong to the Imperial authorities; for instance, at Camperdown and in that direction; but I did not wish to take up too much of the time of the House. My honourable friend who has asked me to read the agreement (Hon. Mr. Power) is familiar with those properties.

Accompanying the agreement is a plan of the city of Halifax and the province of Nova Scotia, and the pink colour designates the different places which are held for fortifications. I have not that plan. The War Department property book, dated April 13, 1895, which is held by the Militia Council, contains a more elaborate description of the properties. The "Army Council" referred to in paragraph b is the Imperial Council.

You will see by the agreement that the Militia Council is given the right to remove the buildings, or to alter them in any way considered necessary for the accommodation of the garrison, but it has no power or authority or right to remove the garrison.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Has it the right to sell any part of the land?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: It has no right to sell any part of the land. When the Dominion Government decide that they cannot carry on any longer, they must hand back the property to the Imperial Government in the same way and in the same form as it was turned over to them, including all the material, or value therefor.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Honourable gentlemen, this is really a very important matter, and, as there is a thin House and I think there should be some further discussion, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Power, the debate was adjourned.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS OF THE WORLD.

DECLARATION BY THE SUPREME COUNCIL OF THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I desire to place upon the table of the House a Declaration by the Supreme Council of the Peace Conference on the Economic Conditions of the World. The document is a comparatively short one, and it contains so much interesting information as to present conditions that I am about to ask the House to consider it as read, so that it may appear in Hansard. It deals with the present high cost of living; it gives a general statement of the position of the world to-day in this respect, and comparative statements as to the rise and decline of prices in the Napoleonic Wars and in the American Civil War. Likewise it deals with the increase of production, the collapse of exchanges, and other subjects which are not only of interest but of vital importance, and I am sure that every honourable gentleman, when it appears in Hansard, will read it with great interest.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend bring down any information he has with regard to the condition of the people in the European countries, particularly Germany and France? The Government must have information of that sort, and I believe it would be of very great importance to the people of Canada to know just what are the conditions with regard, for instance, to the supply of food in the various countries of Europe, and what are the commercial and financial conditions as well.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am unaware of our having any information of an official character on that subject. The attention of the Government has been directed to the unfortunate condition of the people of Austria with reference to the scarcity of food supplies in that country, by philanthropic organizations which are endeavouring to meet that situation. As to whether we have any official review of the food situation in the countries of Central Europe I cannot at the moment say, but I shall be very glad to make inquiry.

Declaration on the Economic Conditions of the World.—(As approved by the Supreme Council on March 8, 1920.)

The Supreme Council of the Peace Conference has taken into consideration the causes which combine to produce the present high cost of living, and now thinks it desirable to publish the following declaration:

1. General Statement of the Position.—The war which the democracies of Western Europe were forced to undertake in defence of their liberties, and which they have carried to a triumphant conclusion, has necessarily entailed the disorganization of the whole economic position of Europe.

This disorganization is reflected in the rise of prices which is at present the source of universal discontent among the peoples, belligerent and neutral alike. History shows that high prices are the invariable result of war, and in comparison with most wars the present situation is far from abnormal. In the Napoleonic wars, prices in England rose 75 per cent, and took eight years to become normal again. In the American Civil War American prices rose 100 per cent and took 12 years or more to become normal. As a result of this war, the most gigantic of all in the history of the world, general wholesale prices (as distinct from the cost of living) have advanced since 1913 approximately as follows:

	Per cent.
The United States	120
Great Britain	170
France	300
Italy	300
Belgium	300

Many causes contribute to this rise in prices, but they may all be regarded as directly or indirectly the consequences of war. For nearly five years the energies of the people have been diverted from the work of production to the work of destruction; for nearly five years the creation of new resources has been stopped and the resources of past generations consumed or destroyed. To feed and equip the nations engaged in this struggle, their Governments had to mortgage the prospective wealth of their countries in the form of credits or paper money. The excessive creation of these tokens of prospective wealth, as compared with the volume of real wealth, is indicated by the rise in prices.

Nothing but the hard necessities of war could have justified or excused this procedure. Its dangers are obvious. Public appreciation of the necessity of maintaining a strict balance between normal revenue and expenditure is weakened, and the ordinary individual is misled by the illusion of prosperity to believe that there is an increase in real wealth and an abundance of available supplies, and is encouraged in habits of extravagance.

Government action may mitigate or disguise some of the effects of the rise in prices, but it cannot remove the root cause, which is the destruction of wealth. This loss of wealth is, after all but a small matter compared with the sacrifice of life which was freely given during the war to overthrow militarism and re-establish national liberty in Europe. But its effects can only be healed by the passage of time, and the people of Europe, if they wish to expedite the process, must contribute to the works of peace the same ardour and devotion as they gave to the prosecution of the war. In the sub-joined review of the position the Conference indicates the lines on which it considers that a solution of the problem can best be found; but it is vain to expect that the result of the war can be eliminated by a stroke of the pen.

2. Peace not yet Re-established.—At present Europe is far from having returned to the conditions of complete peace. Russia is stated to have in the field armies of 1,500,000 men or more, and the disbandment of these armies is of course a primary condition of European peace. But many also of the countries which have been created or enlarged as the outcome of the war have still the appearance of armed camps; and not less than 1,000,000 men are still under arms in Poland, Roumania and the new States created out of Austria-Hungary. Moreover, although armed conflict has ceased, the mutual rivalries and antipathies which are the natural legacy of war still dominate many of the nations of Europe, and are leading to the erection of artificial economic barriers which must seriously hamper, if they do not entirely prevent, the restoration of the common prosperity.

The first step to the reconstruction of Europe is to complete the process of demobilization in all countries, to resume the full employment in peaceful pursuits of the whole of the able-bodied population and to encourage by every means the normal interchange of their products. Until peaceful conditions have thus been resumed in every branch of life, Europe, which has suffered so terribly during the past years of strife, will continue to suffer from the restlessness and lack of confidence which is the natural consequence of the upheaval through which she has passed.

3. Increase of Production.—Liberty has, indeed, been preserved to Europe, and the threat of military domination is gone. This great achievement has, however, left victors and vanquished alike impoverished and enfeebled. Death or disablement has removed from the work of production millions of men in the prime of life; and millions more have had their efficiency impaired by sufferings on the field of battle or through pestilence or privations at home. Instead of having the assistance of these sons, each country has to provide, in the most generous measure possible, for the maintenance of the maimed and for the familes of the fallen, and this must for many years to come be the first charge on the national income. Meanwhile those who remain have not yet recovered the former habit of industry, and have not yet readjusted their standard of output to compensate for the reduction of hours which public opinion in all ocuntries has demanded and is securing. At the same time, of the machinery which might have made good these deficiencies much has been destroyed, and more has been worn out, no adequate renewals being possible during the war. In particular, all means of transport have been disorganized, and the efficiency of the railway systems has been universally impaired.

To these general losses must be added the special disturbances of production in each country. For example, a large portion of the most fertile territory, more especially in France and in the north of Italy, has been devastated; while in France also industrial centres and mining areas, of vital importance to her industries, have been completely destroyed and will not be able to resume production for years to come. In Belgium, similarly, the national industries suffered greatly during the period of occupation. Germany, on the other hand, has its industrial establishments intact, but is paralysed by lack of capital and credit, and by the disorganization bred of defeat; while in the case of Austria these conditions have led to the complete breakdown of her economic life. Russia has passed through all the throes of civil strife and is still the victim of confusion and anarchy. Each country suffers from a different difficulty, but each contributes its share to the common deficit.

In agriculture, Russia, which before the war was the most important granary of Europe, and of whose products Europe is in such need, either has not been producing at all or has not been able to exchange with her neighbours such products as she has.

Roumania, which before the war exported annually over six million quarters of wheat, has altered her system of land tenure, and is now ceasing to produce more than suffices for the immediate needs of her own population; indeed, on the 1st December last, it was stated that only 530,000 hectares had been sown as compared with an annual average before the war of 1,000,000 hectares, though some improvement has since taken place. Other countries again such as France and Germany which were largely self-supporting are unable at the present moment, owing to the devastation of the land, the destruction of buildings and machinery, or the lack of capital and fertilisers, to produce more than a fraction of what is required for their own needs, and have been increasingly driven to compete in the world market for the limited supplies now available.

Again, in regard to coal, production in every country has been decreased, the approximate figures of output in metric tons for 1913 and 1919 respectively being as follows:

	1913.	1919.
United Kingdom.. ..	292,000,000	234,000,000
France (including Lorraine)..	44,000,000	22,000,000
Germany* (excluding Saar and Lorraine).	173,000,000	109,000,000
United States of America..	517,000,000	495,000,000

Although detailed statistics are not available, such information as we have goes to show that the output of factories and manufacturing industries throughout the world is below the standard which prevailed before the war, and far below the demands now made upon them. The net result of under-ropduction arising from these various causes is an acute shortage of the essential supplies on which the economic life of Europe depends.

This situation requires to be met with the same courage as was displayed on both sides during the war. The energy which was then thrown into the production of foodstuffs must be revived and reodubled in order to restore the situation. It must be made a point of honour with the tillers of the soil in every country to show that peace can extract from nature more than war. Europe must take measures to provide herself more largely with the food she requires in order that she may resume her full activities, and much can be effected if the necessary preparations are made without delay.

In regard to industry generally, each Government must take steps to impress on its people that the limitation of production directly assists the upward movement of prices, and that it is by increasing production that they can best help to solve the problem. Every proposal which may assist in this direction deserves the closest attention.

Governments must co-operate in the reconstruction of the common economic life of Europe, which is vitally interrelated, by facilitating the regular interchange of their products and by avoiding arbitrary obstruction of the natural flow of European trade.

The Powers represented at the Conference re-affirm their determination to collaborate with a view to the execution of these aims.

4. Increase of Consumption.—Meanwhile, instead of restricting the standard of consumption in view of this shortage of supplies, there is a general tendency to make heavier and heavier demands for the limited quantities of goods that are available. The increase of consumption takes the form of an intensified demand for commodities of every description. The demand not only for foodstuffs, but for clothing, boots and other manufactured articles, is in most countries far in excess of the supply, while luxuries of every kind command a readier sale than at almost any previous period.

The general extravagance now observable throughout the world is a phenomenon which as almost invariably followed in the footsteps of every great human catastrophe. It is well known to those who have lived in a district which has suffered from earthquake, and the history of the great plagues of Europe amply illustrates it; and the results have always been economically disastrous for the populations affected. It must be one of the first aims of each Government to take such measures as appear appropriate to the circumstances of its own people to bring home to every citizen the fact that for the time being, until supplies are increased, it is by diminished consumption and unselfish denial that they are best able to help themselves and the world and that extravagance increases the national difficulties and perils.

5. Credit and Currency Inflation.—The immense increase in the spending power of Europe which is reflected in this extravagance has been brought about by credit and currency inflation during the war. Broadly speaking, the general level of prices may be said to be the expression of the ratio between spending power on the one hand and the volume of purchaseable goods and services on the other. In order to prosecute the war, particularly in European countries, every Government found it necessary to increase the amount of currency in circulation. Unable to raise sufficient funds by taxation and by loans from real savings, they were compelled to resort to borrowing from the banks and the use of the printing press. Additional spending power was thus placed in the hands of the public at a time when the volume of purchasable goods was being reduced. For example, the note circulation has grown approximately as follows:

In the United Kingdom from 30,000,000*l.* in 1913 to nearly 450,000,000*l.* at the end of

*Exclusive of lignite.

1919. (About 120,000,000*l.* of the latter figure takes the place of gold coins in circulation in 1913);

In France* from 230,000,000*l.* in 1913 to 1,500.000,000*l.* in 1919;

In Italy* from 110,000,00*l.* in 1913 to 700,-000,000*l.* in 1919;

In Belgium* from 40,000,000*l.* in 1913 to 200,000,000*l.* in 1920;

While the war debts (which are closely connected with inflation) amount, in the case of the United Kingdom, to over 7,000,-000,000.l;

In France* to 6,750,000,000*l.*;

In Italy* to 2,750,000,000*l.*;

In Germany* (apart from liabilities for reparation) to 9.500,000,000*l.*;

In United States* to 5,000,000,000*l.*;

The total war debt of the world is approximately 40,000,000,000*l.*

Throughout Europe prices at present are with few exceptions paper prices. But gold prices have also risen, that is to say, gold has a lower purchasing power than it had before the war. This is the inevitable result of the many economies which have been effected in the use of gold for monetary purposes and, on the other hand, of the dispersal of stocks of gold previously held in Europe and their excessive accumulation in other countries. Thus, in the United States, although the gold standard remains effective, prices have advanced 120 per cent over the pre-war level. As the purchasing power of gold is ultimately the measure of price, it must be obvious that this change is itself responsible for much of the increase in the price of commodities, when expressed in terms of the currencies of all countries.

A considerable part of the rise in prices in Europe is due to this depreciation of gold, but there is an additional depreciation due to excessive issues of paper currency. The continual expansion of paper issues with its necessary consequence of continuously depreciating exchange prevents the grant of the commercial credits required by the situation, and thus fatally hampers the resumption of international commerce.

It is essential to the recovery of Europe that the manufacture of additional paper money and Government credits should be brought to an end, and this must be effected as soon as the war expenditure has been terminated.

Note.*—The national currencies have in each case been converted into sterling at approximately par of exchange.

6. Profiteering.—Excessive profit making, commonly known as profiteering, has resulted from the scarcity of goods. Deflation and a check upon the continuous rise of prices will do much in itself to end the conditions that make profiteering possible. But it is essential, in order to obtain the co-operation of all classes in the increase of production, that each government should take such steps as are appropriate to the circumstances of its own people to assure and guarantee to the workers that the burdens that they are called upon by their efforts to remedy are not aggravated by those who would exploit the economic difficulties of Europe for their own personal ends.

7. Restriction of Government Expenditure.—Demobilization has been effected by the Powers represented at the Conference at a far speedier rate than could have been anticipated, but heavy abnormal expenditure resulting from the war still requires to be met (particularly in connection with the restoration of the devastated areas). Such charges must be regarded as part of the war burden, but in order to stop the process of inflation and to start the process of deflation, the necessary measures must be initiated by every country to balance recurrent government expenditure with national income and to begin at the earliest possible moment the reduction of the floating debts. The best remedy of all is that debts should be reduced out of revenue, but in so far as this is not possible, floating debts should be consolidated by means of long-term loans raised out of the savings of the people, and it is out of the savings of the people that any fresh capital expenditure must be provided. The Governments here represented have undertaken the consideration of the measures required for this purpose.

8. Restriction of Private Expenditure. — But private economy is not less urgent than economy in Government expenditure. It is only by means of frugal living on the part of all classes of the nation that the capital can be saved which is urgently required for the repair of war damage, and for restoring efficiently to the equipment of industry, upon which future production depends. It is of the utmost importance that it should be brought home to every citizen in each country that just as in the war their private savings made available for the Government goods and services urgently needed for the prosecution of hostilities, so in the period of reconstruction, economy by individuals will reduce the cost of essential articles both for themselves and for their fellows, and will set free capital for the reconstruction of their country and the restoration of the machinery of industry throughout the world.

9. Collapse of Exchanges.—Commercial intercourse, on the resumption of which the recovery of the world depends, is governed by the foreign exchanges, and most of the foreign exchanges have been to a greater or less extent disorganized during the past year. The discount of European currencies on New York approximately stands as follows:—

	Per cent.
Pound sterling	30
Franc (Paris)	64
Franc (Brussels)	62
Lire	72
Mark	96

The state of the exchange does not reflect the true financial situation of the countries concerned, provided their industrial life can be resumed. It is in part the result of depreciation in the purchasing power of the several currencies, but in part it results from the failure of exports. Many countries are temporarily dependent on the importation of food, raw material, and other necessaries, and are not in a position to export nearly sufficient to furnish the requisite means of payment. The result has been severe competition for the very limited supply of Bills of Exchange which has forced down the rate of exchange beyond the point which properly represents the purchasing power of currencies in the buying and selling countries. In the degree in which rates of exchange are so forced down, the prices of imports are forced up and the prices of food and raw material increased. The ultimate cure is to raise exports to the requisite amount, and this should be impressed on the trading communities affected, but it is not immediately possible to increase exports sufficiently, and unless steps are taken to furnish a substitute the situation will rapidly become worse. It is therefore urgent to obtain a temporary balance of trade by means of commercial credits accompanied by the reduction of all non-essential imports to an absolute minimum.

10. Difficulties of Credit.—Attempts to manipulate the exchanges by Government action will only retard ultimate recovery. Meanwhile means must be found to prevent the breakdown of trading operations. At the present moment, the Governments of Europe are not in a position to furnish more Government loans except to a very limited extent for the purpose of relieving extreme distress, and State aid in this matter would be at the best entirely inadequate. It is from the resumption of commercial credits that the necessary means must be found for securing the interchange of the resources of the world, and the Conference is assured that such credits will be forthcoming as soon as governments have taken steps to strengthen confidence in their commercial and financial policy.

The Powers represented at the Conference recognize, however, the necessity of continued collaboration in this matter, and they will continue to consult together regarding the provision and distribution of the necessary raw materials and foodstuffs with a view to the early resumption of normal conditions.

They recognize, further, the special position of the devastated countries, and particularly of France, having regard to the widespread devastation which her territory has suffered, the consequent diminution of her immediate resources, and the heavy capital expenditure which she must incur in restoring the damaged areas. The restoration of the devastated areas is of primary importance to the reconstruction of Europe.

They have also had under consideration the special position of Germany, where enterprise is at present paralysed and the possibility of obtaining commercial credit closed, by reason of the fact that her obligations for reparation are still totally unknown. It is most desirable, therefore, in the interests of the Allied Countries, no less than in that of Germany, that at the earliest possible moment the total of the reparation payments to be made by Germany under the Treaty of Versailles should be fixed, and that, in accordance with the terms of the Treaty and the reply of the Allied and Associated Powers to the German delegates dated the 16th June, 1919, she should be enabled to obtain essential foodstuffs and raw materials, and, if necessary in the opinion of the Reparation Commission should be allowed to raise abroad a loan to meet her immediate needs, of such amount and with such priority as the Reparation Commission may deem essential. In the case of Austria, the powers here represented recognize that even more active assistance may require to be given.

11. Need for Co-operation of all Classes.—The review which the Conference has made of the situation indicates that the process of recovery of Europe must necessarily be a slow one, which cannot be expedited by short-cuts of any description. It can, however, be most seriously hampered by the dislocation of production by strikes, lock-outs and interruptions of work of all kinds. The civilization of Europe has indeed been shaken and set back, but it is far from being irretrievably ruined by the tremendous struggle through which she has passed. The restoration of her vitality now depends on the whole-hearted co-operation of all her children, who have it in their own power to delay or to accelerate the process of reconstruction. It is the hope of every Government that improved conditions of livelihood and of employment may be assured to the workers. To secure this result, each individual must contribute his best efforts to the restoration of his country. Taking the Allied countries as a whole, the recovery of industry has been remarkable. Nearly 18 months have passed since hostilities terminated; and the reaction which necessarily followed the tense strain of the war is gradually passing. The citizens of every country are once again resuming the normal occupations of home life, and in their renewed labours the Conference sees a clear sign of renewed prosperity.

12. Summary of Conclusions.—In view of the above considerations, the Supreme Council, after a careful survey of this vitally urgent problem in all its aspects, agree upon the following recommendations with a view to the amelioration of the present economic difficulties of Europe:—

(1) It is of paramount importance that peace conditions should be fully and completely restored at the earliest possible moment throughout the world. In order to achieve this object it is desirable—

(a) That peace and normal economic relations should be re-established as soon as possible throughout Eastern Europe;

(b) That armies should everywhere be reduced to a peace footing, that armaments should be limited to the lowest possible figure compatible with national security, and that the League of Nations should be invited to consider, as soon as possible, proposals to this end;

(c) That the States which have been created or enlarged as the result of the war should at once re-establish full and friendly co-operation, and arrange for the unrestricted interchange of commodities in order that the essential unity of European economic life may not be impaired by the erection of artificial economic barriers.

(2) Not only the Government of each country, but all those engaged in the task of production in every land, should give immediate attention to the execution of all measures which will contribute to the full resumption of peaceful industry, to the encouragement of better output on the part of the workers in every country, to the improvement of machinery and means of transportation, and the removal of such disturbing factors as profiteering.

(3) Each Government should at once consider means for urging upon its nationals in every rank of life the vital necessity of suppressing extravagance and reducing expenditure, so as to bridge the gap which must for some years exist between the demand for and the supply of essential commodities.

(4) It is essential that early steps be taken to secure the deflation of credit and currency (a) by the reduction of recurrent Government expenditure within the limits of revenue, (b) by the imposition of such additional taxation as is necessary to secure this result, (c) by the funding of short-term obligations by means of loans subscribed out of the savings of the people, and (d) by the immediate limitation and gradual curtailment of the note circulation.

(5) The provision of raw materials being essential to the restoration of industry, means should be found by which the countries which are in present conditions of international exchange unable to purchase in the world markets, and so are unable to re-start their economic life, can obtain commercial credits. It will be possible to achieve this when the countries have made the reforms indicated in the foregoing paragraphs.

(6) The Powers represented at the Conference recognize the necessity for continued co-operation between the Allies and for removing obstacles to the easy interchange of essential commodities. They will continue to consult together regarding the provision and distribution of necessary raw materials and foodstuffs with a view to the early restoration of normal conditions.

(7) The Powers represented at the Conference have given careful attention to the special case of the devastated regions, and more particularly of Northern France. The restoration of these areas is of primary importance for the re-establishment of the economic equilibrium of Europe and the resumption of normal trade conditions. It is evident that the large sums required for this purpose cannot be provided out of current revenue, nor can the work of restoration be postponed until the reparation due from Germany under the Treaty of Peace has been received. Under these circumstances the Powers represented at the Conference recognize that the capital sums required for this restoration may properly be raised by market loans in anticipation of the reparation payments provided by the Treaty, and that the restrictions which they desire to see placed on new borrowing do not apply to loans and credits raised for the purpose of meeting this abnormal capital expenditure.

(8) The Powers represented at the Conference have taken under consideration Article 235 and cognate articles of the Treaty of Versailles, and the passages in the letter addressed on the 16th June, 1919, by the Supreme Council to the German Peace Delegates which contemplate that Germany shall make proposals for fixing the total of the payments to be made by her by way of reparation, and that facilities may be given her to obtain necessary foodstuffs and raw materials in advance of payments being made by way of reparation. The Powers are agreed that it is desirable in the interest alike of Germany and of her creditors that the total to be paid by her for reparation should be fixed at an early date. They observe that under the Protocol to the Treaty a period of four months from the signature of the Treaty was provided during which Germany should have the right to make proposals of the kind referred to, and they are agreed that in the circumstances as they exist to-day such period should be extended.

MAGDALEN ISLANDS SERVICE.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

Hon. JOHN McLEAN moved:

That a Select Committee of the Senate be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the management of the steamer Canadian Sealer, now lying at Souris, P.E.I., laden with fishing and other supplies for the Magdalen Islands, and the reason why such steamer was not despatched at the opening of navigation to the Magdalen Islands, and that the committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records and employ a stenographer and such clerical aid as may be necessary. The committee to be composed of Senators Crosby, Murphy, Tanner, Thompson and the mover.

He said: In asking for this committee I may say that the people of the Magdalen islands have been very badly used. The steamer they have needed so sorely all winter was not despatched this spring as early as navigation would allow her to go. It seems ridiculous that one of the Government steamers should leave England and get up to Montreal a week or so before this steamer was fitted out for that place, while the people were waiting ever since last fall for goods that they should have had before the season opened. I had a telegram from my son on the 28th stating that the steamer was expected the next day, but I learned that the captain of the steamer had arrived in Charlottetown looking for a crew, and up to the present time I have had no report that the crew has arrived or that the steamer has gone forward. I notified the Marine and Fisheries Department on the 29th of March that the Gulf was then clear as far as the Magdalen islands, and they said the steamer would be fitted out at once. When I got the telegram on the 21st asking that she be dispatched through to the Magdalen islands I called up the Department of Marine, and they referred me to the Railway Department, who in turn sent me to the Trade and Commerce Department, and they said they had no information, and referred me back to the Marine Department. Now, I understand the trouble to be that the steamer they had on hand, the Lady Evelyn, was not able to make the two trips a week. On this matter we will have more information when my honourable friend from Pictou (Hon. Mr. Tanner) gets his information on Wednesday next as to the nature of the contract. For the last thirty or forty years the Government has been paying a large subsidy for carrying mails and passengers and freight from Pictou and Souris to the Magdalen islands, and the only service that was satisfactory was that given by the Lady Sibyl, which was built by the Magdalen Islands Steamship Company, especially for that route. She is capable of making twelve or thirteen knots, and can make two round trips a week; but the Lady Evelyn, a smaller steamer, could not make a trip twice a week except in June and July, when there was not a large amount of freight offering; in the spring and fall, when there was a large amount of freight, she was not able to keep the freight clear.

My object in having this committee appointed is to find who are responsible for the neglect, delay, and hardship imposed upon the people of the Magdalen islands, and put it before the proper department. As the Government are building steamers now, I believe the time has arrived when they should build one of the capacity of the Lady Sibyl, which would take the round trip twice a week and clean up the freight, because it must have been a great expense either to the contractor or to the Government last fall to send the car-ferry down to Pictou and take out this new steamer of 2,500 tons that was lying there, send her over to Souris, have her unsuccessfully attempt to do down; then replace her with the Montcalm; take part of the goods out of the Canadian Sealer; and then spend six weeks getting down to the Magdalen islands; whereas if her contractor had a steamer suitable for the purpose there would have been no trouble whatever; the freight would have all been cleaned up, and those people would have had their freight last fall. I believe if the Government built a steamer a little larger than the Lady Sibyl, with proper speed, and put her on that route, it would save the ship subsidies that are now being paid to the contractors, and take the mails and passengers and freight down there. There would be a further saving to the Government if that steamer were put in connection with the railway that carries the goods that are taken down to the Magdalen Islands. Those people do not raise any goods for export, and all the freight that goes down there in the shape of supplies—flour and goods of that kind—would come over the Canadian railways. If the steamer were taken over, the railways would have control of that, which I think would be of great service.

For these reasons I ask that this committee be appointed, with power to investigate matters.

IMPERIAL OIL COMPANY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE inquired of the Government:

1. What knowledge they have of the said Imperial Oil Company, Limited, a company incorporated in Canada?

2. Whether or not this company, incorporated in Canada, are or are not a branch or a subsidiary company of the Standard Oil Company of the United States?

3. Has the said Imperial Oil Company, as stated in the press, a capitalization of $100,000,000? If it has not such capitalization, then what is the present capitalization of the company?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. (a) Imperial Oil Company, Limited, incorporated under The Canada Joint Stock Companies Act 1877, by letters patent dated 8th September, 1880, with capital stock of $500,000.

(b) Capital stock increased by supplementary letters patent dated 13th December, 1898, to $1,000,000; further increased by supplementary letters patent dated 4th July, 1907, to $6,000,000; 11th February, 1913, to $15,000,000; 15th November, 1915, to $50,000,000.

(c) Name changed to Imperial Oil, Limited, by supplementary letters patent, dated 15th September, 1919; latter name changed to Imperial Petroleum Company, Limited, by supplementary letters patent, dated 12th December, 1919.

2. No information.

3. Present capital stock, $50,000,000.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH BRITISH ADMIRALTY AND NAVAL MISSION —IMPERIAL OIL COMPANY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a return showing all correspondence that may have taken place with the British Admiralty, and with the Naval Mission to India and the Dominion, 1919-20, and also a list of shareholders, officers and directors of the Imperial Oil Company.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS moved:

That the public accounts which were laid on the Table of the Senate on the 13th April last be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would ask the honourable member if he would agree to amend the motion by adding the Auditor General's Report for the year ending 31st March, 1919.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: With the permission of this honourable House, I have no objection to amending the motion by that addition.

The motion as amended was agreed to.

THE LATE HON. R. H. C. PRINGLE.

TRIBUTES TO HIS MEMORY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, at this hour of to-day, in the town of Cobourg, sorrowing and mourning friends are laying in their last resting place the remains of our late colleague Senator Pringle. He was one of the younger members of this House, both in appointment and in years. Few men in Canada had more friends. He had the faculty of being friendly with all whom he met. In becoming a member of this body, while he attended fairly regularly, his professional duties largely prevented him from taking that active part in the proceedings of the Senate for which he was so well qualified. It is said that death loves a shining mark. I do not know of any man in this Chamber who in physical appearance gave more promise of long life, or who apparently possessed in greater degree the physical endowments for its enjoyment than our late colleague. Since he became a member of this House he suffered more or less from the disease which finally laid him low. Death found the weak spot in that powerful frame which seemed almost proof against attack.

Although the late senator was born in the province of Ontario, he left his native province some years ago and took up his residence on the Pacific coast, where for some years he was actively engaged in assisting in the development of the various resources of the province of British Columbia. There, as elsewhere, he made for himself a host of friends who to-day mourn his loss. Some few years ago he returned to his native province where he actively pursued his profession, and which province he so popularly represented in this Chamber. If any man were to be selected from the Senate of Canada for his gifts of friendship, of popularity, and of apparent physical endowments, it would have been our late colleague. But the messenger of death, regardless of appearance and of promise, lays his hand upon the strong as well as upon the weak; upon the youthful as well as upon the aged; upon those who have abundant promise of life as well as upon those who stand upon the precipice of death. Regardless of their faculties of body or of mind, death summons all to that bourne from which the weary traveller never returns.

A host of personal friends mourn the loss of Senator Pringle, and we join with them in our sympathies and condolences. Particularly, honourable gentlemen, do we extend our deepest sympathy to the sorrowing family who have suffered this unspeakable bereavement.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I desire to join with my honourable friend in expressing the sorrow that this side of the House feel at the loss of Senator Pringle. As has already been said, he was closely associated with both the West and the East in this Dominion. Brought up in the province of Ontario, educated at Trinity College school, Port Hope, and then Trinity University, where he took his degree, he afterwards was called to the bar of Ontario.

In the year 1898 he came out to British Columbia, at a time when that province was starting a very large mineral development. A great activity was going on in what was known as the Boundary creek country. Senator Pringle made his abode in the town of Greenwood, where he was in partnership with a Mr. Whiteside, under the name of Pringle & Whiteside. His kindliness of feeling and his general friendliness naturally endeared him to an active population such as the mining population of British Columbia, and he was prominent and active in the work of that province during all the time he was there. His many friends there will sincerely regret his sudden decease, because they looked upon him as a man of great promise, a man who, with his knowledge of the whole Dominion, was a very valuable representative in this Chamber.

Senator Pringle's friends were numerous throughout the country. Wherever he went he had the happy faculty of making friends. We on this side of the House join most sincerely in expressing our deep sympathy with his family in the loss they have sustained.

BOARDS OF CONCILIATION.

ALLEGED INCORRECT RETURN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to draw the attention of the House to a return made in response to my inquiry in regard to Boards of Conciliation. It happens that the return is incorrect with respect to some of the information contained therein. I bring this matter to the notice of the House because, if the information contained in a return is incorrect it is very apt to be misleading, and does not answer the purpose of the member making the inquiry.

I am sorry that the Minister of Labour is not in his seat this afternoon. I am sure that any incorrectness in the return is not attributable to him personally. I intend to bring the matter to his attention in a more private manner. Last session I had to complain that a return which I asked for was incomplete and incorrect. This is the second time in two years that I have had to make the same complaint.

THE BUSINESS OF PARLIAMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would ask the leader of the Government if he can give us any information, first of all, as to the health of the Premier, and as to whether he is likely to return to Parliament. The statement was made some time ago that it was the intention of the Premier to return to Parliament two weeks before the end of the session, but no date was given as to when the end of the session was likely to be.

I think my honourable friend might also give us some information as to the course of public business. The announcement was made some time ago by the leader of the Government in another place that the Budget would come down I think to-day; but so far as I can learn that is not the present intention. I think it would be of interest to the House to know what the course of business will be within the near future.

Hin. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I very much regret that I cannot speak with exactitude as to the legislation which is yet to come down, except to assure the House that I am not aware of any legislation which is so voluminous that it will necessarily occupy the time of Parliament to any very great extent. We have a fairly large Order Paper before us now, and upon the completion of that work the Senate, I am sure, will be prepared to assume all the responsibility that may be involved in taking care of any further business which may be presented.

As to the Prime Minister, if my honourable friend will permit me. I should like to postpone answering that question pending his return. He has always been very well qualified to answer for himself. I am looking forward to his early appearance in the House, and to his assurance that he will be able to look after the duties of the high position which he occupies.

DAYLIGHT SAVING.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Honourable gentlemen, on Friday this House adjourned under standard time, and to-day, as I understand, we have met under daylight saving time. As far as I am aware, there has been no action taken by the House to provide for the change, and I do not think any announcement has been made by the leader of the House. I understand that in another place the acting leader of the Government announced that thereafter the business of that House was to be conducted under what is known as the daylight saving plan. Perhaps the leader of the Government in this House will enlighten us on the subject as to this House.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend has already made so clear a pronouncement upon it that it is unnecessary, I think, for me to say anything. I am indebted to my honourable friend for informing the House. We shall act upon that during the balance of the Session.

EMPLOYMENT OFFICES CO-ORDINATION BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Robertson, the Senate went into committee on Bill Y2, an Act to amend the Employment Offices Co-ordination Act. Hon. Mr. Thompson in the Chair.

On section 1—definitions:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The minister the other day, when this Bill was before the House for second reading, told us that he had authority to do what he had done in the Maritime Provinces, but he did not give us any statement as to whence he had derived that authority. I see in the report which the minister brought down at the beginning of the session that an Order in Council was passed on the 24th of December, 1918, and I presume this was the authority for the minister to spend the money in the Maritime Provinces, contrary to the Act of 1918. I would ask the minister if he would bring a copy of that Order in Council before the House, so that we may have an opportunity of looking at it and understanding the situation exactly.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I shall be glad to bring before the House, for the information of my honourable friend, the Order in Council to which he refers; but I desire to correct his impression that the authority by which the department acted was contrary to the provisions of the statute. The three Maritime Provinces did not see their way clear to avail themselves of the opportunities under the statute to establish employment offices in a co-operative way. Therefore, for the purpose of providing the necessary service during the demobilization and re-establishment period, this authority was given and acted upon under the War Measures Act, and the offices, nine in number, were maintained in the three Maritime Provinces up to May 1, 1920. They have now been discontinued, and at the request of two of the government of the Maritime Provinces a conference is to be held in the near future for the purpose of discussing what we shall do with regard to the carrying on of these offices under the statute.

Section 1 was agreed to.

Section 2 was agreed to.

On section 3—allotment of moneys appropriated:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would like to ask the minister a question with regard to that new subsection. I understood him to say that the idea was to establish these offices in connection with municipalities in cases where the provincial governments would not undertake the work. Is it the intention under this clause that the municipalities shall provide half of the cost of the office, in the same way as the Provincial Government?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That is the intention. The purpose of the amendment is to give the municipalities the same opportunity to take advantage of the provisions of the Act itself, on a fifty-fifty basis, as the province would have if it saw fit to come into the arrangement.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am afraid my honourable friend is going beyond the jurisdiction of this Parliament. It may be argued that paragraphs a, b, and c, of section 3 of the Act of 1918 are quite permissible, because the powers conferred upon the minister may be exercised without at all infringing the rights of the provinces; but I do not think that this would apply to the amendment now proposed in new paragraph b:

> To require any person or firm to make a written return of such information as may be deemed necessary for the purposes of this Act, or of any regulation made by authority of this Act, under penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars and not less than ten dollars, for each refusal or neglect to answer or wilfully false answer.

That would be a power which the minister might exercise in regard to any person in any province, and notwithstanding any provincial legislation. So my honourable friend, I am afraid, did not quite state the case the other day when he said that the provisions of the amendment were provisions which would be enforced only with the consent and participation of the provinces. That would not apply to the amendment which is now proposed, because, whether the provinces wish it or do not wish it, my honourable friend can require any person or firm to make a written return. I do not think that is within the constitution. I am afraid that provision would be ultra vires.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If my honourable friend fully understands the proposed amendment and the reasons for it being inserted here, he will quite appreciate the necessity of it. The Department of Labour maintain what is known as a clearing house in the city of Winnipeg for Western Canada, and one in Ottawa for Eastern Canada, and the employees of labour, particularly the manufacturing concerns, numbering between 8,000 and 9,000 throughout the country, make a weekly return on a form of postal card size, showing the number of persons they have had in their employ during the week, and the number they anticipate they will require during the next week, and some other information, so that we may know at all times just what the prospective requirements are. Up to the time when the War Measures Act was discontinued, there was authority—I do not recall, but I presume it was by Order in Council—whereby any information desired had to be supplied. Under that arrangement we were able to get, in connection with this service, the information necessary to carry on our work intelligently. It has happened that a few, a very few—perhaps less than a score out of 8,000 or 9,000 employers throughout Canada—have objected to going to the trouble of sending in this necessary information. This clause is inserted simply for the purpose of enabling the department to obtain the necessary information and to administer the Act properly. I think you will find that under the Board of Commerce Act the powers of that board are still wider than those which are suggested here, and if the Federal Parliament had jurisdiction to enact a clause of this sort in the Board of Commerce Act, it seems to me there is no question as to its jurisdiction in this connection.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am afraid that that is not a very convincing sort of argument: it is simply begging the question: because if the provisions of the Board of Commerce Act are ultra vires, they would not make this any better. Because an ultra vires Act has already been passed, is no reason why another Act would be intra vires. If my honourable friend will look at section 6 of the present Act, he will see that it provides:

> The payments hereinbefore authorized shall, as to each province, be conditional upon agreement between the minister and the Government of the province as to the terms, conditions and purposes within the meaning of this Act upon and for which the payments are to be made and applied, and upon such agreement being approved by the Governor in Council.

Clearly my honourable friend's jurisdiction with regard to payments would be limited by the Act; that is, it would require the concurrence of the Provincial Government. But that applies only to payments; and here my honourable friend is taking a power which is not dependent upon the agreement or concurrence of the province: he will have the right to require any person or firm to make a written return of information. This clause can be intra vires only if, like the question of payments, it is made subject to the acquiescence or concurrence of the Provincial Government. I am afraid that if it is not so conditioned, or so limited, it will be ultra vires.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I can only say, in reply to my honourable friend's observation, that I am not a lawyer, but that the Parliamentary Counsel has passed upon the clause, and I think the Justice Department has also reviewed it, and I can only feel that their opinions and decisions ought to be sufficient justification for my respectfully suggesting that the clause be adopted.

Section 3 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I see that there are two other Orders in Council in connection with this matter. May I ask the minister if, when he is bringing down the one to which I have already referred, he will at the same time bring down the other two?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Would my honourable friend quote the numbers of them?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: They are quoted in the report I have here. Order in Council No. 3111. December 17, 1918; No. 3171, December 24, 1918; and the other one is put down as March 12, 1919—no number is given in the report.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I will have them looked up.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Did I understand from the honourable Minister of Labour that the opinion of the Justice Department had been asked upon the validity of that clause; and that the Department of Justice had declared it to be intra vires of this Parliament?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No. The honourable gentleman did not understand me to say that. I said that the Bill had been referred to the Parliamentary Counsel before it was introduced, and, I understand, to the Department of Justice for their opinion upon it. I cannot say definitely that the Department of Justice did review it, but I believe they did.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does not the honourable gentleman think, since the question has been raised, that it would be in the interest of this Parliament and of the public at large that such opinion should be sought before the third reading is given to the Bill?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I have no objection to that being done if the honourable gentleman so desires. When the Bill goes over to the House of Commons, the Minister of Justice will be sitting in the House, and if there is any doubt about the question it will be dealt with there.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not propose to say anything against this Bill; but I do respectfully protest against the line taken by the honourable the Minister of Labour. He undertook apparently to silence criticism of the wording of this Bill by saying that it had been drafted by the Parliamentary Counsel. Well, the Parliamentary Counsel is not an officer of this House, and each member of this House is entitled to his own independent opinion, and I do not think that it is a seemly thing to bring in the opinion of an outside officer of Parliament to prevent the members of this House from expressing their opinion or from allowing their opinions to have the weight to which they are entitled.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I must respectfully call the honourable gentleman's attention to the fact that I did not make the statement with which he credits me namely, that the Parliamentary Counsel drafted the Bill; because that is not the case. It was referred to him and was reviewed by him. Neither have I raised any objection to any honourable gentleman in this House expressing his opinion upon the subject as fully as he desired.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I should have pointed out to my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Robertson) that the penalty provision in this Bill is a very drastic one. It is a penalty "not exceeding one hundred dollars and not less than ten dollars, for each refusal or neglect to answer or wilfully false answer." I do not think my honourable friend ought to press this Bill, at all events to the third reading, without having the question which has been raised submitted pointedly to the Minister of Justice. If the point is well taken, it may be brought up again in another place, but I do not think the Senate ought to pass legislation which is open to objection when it reaches another place. I think it is eminently the duty of the Senate to raise and decide questions of this sort, and I for one, object to the Bill being sent from this House with a sort of label attached to it containing an invitation to the other House to correct our mistakes or to overlook our failure to do that which we should have done.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I have no objection whatever to my honourable friend's suggestion, and will let the Bill stand until to-morrow. Meanwhile I can obtain some further views from the Department of Justice concerning it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The third reading would not be to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We could perhaps leave the Bill in committee and report progress.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That would be better; because we may amend it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That is quite satisfactory if it is the honourable gentleman's desire.

Progress was reported.

FOOD AND DRUGS BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved that the Senate go into committee on Bill 27, an Act respecting Food and Drugs.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is proposed to deal with Bills 27, 28, and 29 together?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, just with Bill 27.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Would it not be advisable to deal with all three at the same time? You have a general Act respecting food and drugs. Why not make the other Bills part of that, and have only one?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Bills as to honey and maple products?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes. Why not put them all into one Act?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Bill 27 simply deals with general principles and does not deal with individual subjects. All through the statutes runs legislation dealing with particular subjects such as honey, maple products, butter, oleomargarine, etc. It would therefore be very undesirable for us to encumber this Bill or to import into it any specific subject, because it is a Bill dealing simply with general principles. As we proceed my honourable friend will probably observe what is the policy of the Bill.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 27. Hon. Mr. Crosby in the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would ask leave of the committee to bring within the bar, Dr. Amyot, who is the Deputy Minister of the Department.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—definitions:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say that paragraphs a, b, and c are from the old Act; that is, the Adulteration Act. Paragraph d is new.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Paragraph d confines the interpretation of the word "food" to food for man only?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: And does not refer at all to animals?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Section 2 was agreed to.

On section 3—food, when deemed to be adulterated:

Hon. Mr. POWER: Is not the language a little too sweeping? "Food includes every article used for food or drink by man, and every ingredient intended for mixing with the food or drink of man for any purpose whatever." Section 3 says that food shall be deemed to be adulterated within the meaning of this Act—

—if any substance has been mixed with it so as to reduce or lower or injuriously affect its quality or strength.

Now, suppose that the food in question is Scotch whisky; if you put a little water into the Scotch whisky you are guilty of adulterating the food.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think any Scotchman would stand for that.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Where are they going to get the Scotch?

Hon. Mr. POWER: It is not a joke; it is a serious matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend will observe the words: "or lower or injuriously affect its quality or strength." I think that is sufficient protection.

Hon. Mr. POWER: If you say, "and lower," it might do. As I say, water is a substance, and it certainly does reduce the strength of whisky.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Language cannot be so scientifically exact that we can qualify it in such a way and make the Act praticable. We have to import some common sense into the administration of the Act. I am sure that no inspector of the department, nor yet any court, would for a moment place upon the Act a strained construction of that kind. I suppose almost every page of our statutes affords such instances. We have to legislate with common sense.

Hon. Mr. POWER: And leave something for the courts to do.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. Otherwise they would not have anything to do.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understood my honourable friend to say that the first four paragraphs are old. I would like to know what the policy of the department has been under paragraph b. My honourable friend probably knows that what they call a base, such as apples, is very often used in the manufacture of strawberry and raspberry and other kinds of jam. I should think that would be an adulteration under the Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The policy of the Act is to prevent food becoming deteriorated by adulteration. In the case my honourable friend speaks of a foreign substance might be introduced into the article in question, but it would not deteriorate it so as to bring it within the Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would like to ask the leader of the Government how paragraph e will affect the question of milk. In dairy herds very often there is a good deal of disease, and I presume in that case milk would be considered adulterated under this Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would come under the Act.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No allowance should be made for any one to sell milk from a diseased animal. As honourable gentlemen know, that is the most potent way of communicating disease to man. The diseased animal should be slaughtered and not kept in the herd at all.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: How are you going to decide whether or not a cow is diseased?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: By testing it.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: My honourable friend knows that what is revealed by the test is probably never correct. A whole herd might be condemned because of the way in which it was handled. They test an animal by taking the heat of the blood, or whatever it is, and if a certain condition shows so and so, the animal is described as being diseased or as having tuberculosis. Everything depends on the care and the knowledge of the man conducting the test. I know of a herd in New Brunswick which was said to be diseased. A friend of mine who owned the herd said, "If you are going to destroy these animals, you may as well destroy all the animals in Canada." Although it cannot be demonstrated, there is a certain amount of tuberculosis in all cattle.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: How is the standard under paragraph g to be fixed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: By Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Under paragraph g, and also, I think, under sub-clause 2, the question arises as to skim milk. If both parties understand that the cream has been taken off, you can hardly call it adulteration.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: So long as it is sold as skim milk it is all right if it is up to the standard for skim milk.

Section 3 was agreed to.

Section 4 was agreed to.

On section 5—misbranding:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is there any change in this clause?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There are some changes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Last session my honourable friend told us that he would use his influence, and we know it is very great, towards having what is new and what is old in these Bills printed in parallel columns, so that we might know what improvement was being suggested. I know my honourable friend was quite sincere and earnest at the time. I would like to know what his sincerity and earnestness has resulted in. So far I have not seen any evidence of a change.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That question was up in the other House the other day, and they are going to try the experiment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I quite admit that my promise of last year has risen up in judgment against me and has disturbed my rest on one or two occasions; but it occurred to me that the joint committee of both Houses, of which my honourable friend is a member, might take up the question and absolve those of us who were going to exercise special efforts in that direction.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Passing the buck.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If the joint committee were to take up this subject it seems to me that they could easily work out a satisfactory scheme. I quite appreciate the difficulty confronting the honourable gentleman, but do what you can the law officers apparently keep to the old form and give us as little information as possible.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: In the other House the new clauses were so marked.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: We are very remiss. I had a Bill this morning from the Ontario Legislature, and every new section is indicated by a hand at each end.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me that question would have to be dealt with by the joint committee, so that reports could be made simultaneously to both Houses, and a uniform plan adopted. I hope my honourable friend will take it up with the committee.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If we do not succeed, we may have to do as they have done in Ontario—call in the farmers.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What parts of this clause are new?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The greater part is new. Misbranding was not recognized in the old Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER: When does this Act go into operation?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: By order in council.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Men who have laid in stocks would be liable if it went into operation at once.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will not become operative with regard to existing stocks until July, 1921. Clause 5 is practically new, and might be discussed from that standpoint.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Would the honourable gentleman explain the reason for the suspension of this enactment by Order in Council?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is on account of the various bottles that have been made for this purpose, and the difficulty of replacing them. It is proposed to extend the time to the first of July, 1923.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Will the manufacturers of carbonated beverages be compelled to put a statement of the contents of the bottles on the labels?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I purpose moving an amendment to line 33.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Has the department considered the advisability or the means of preventing the adulteration of food, not merely in the way stated here, but by its own process, as it were—deterioration, either by reason of the bottling, the can used, or something else? We have all read recently of the very serious trouble caused by the eating of ripe olives. Many deaths have taken place, both here and in the United States. Only a few days ago I read in one of the newspapers that the trouble was largely caused by the rubber rings, which are used to hermetically seal the bottles, poisoning the contents. The same article pointed out that contrary to the general opinion, it was not the tin can that caused the trouble, but ripe olives contained in bottles. I do not know whether the department has considered that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Section 3, paragraph d, does this, and in fact was provided for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am afraid that would not meet the case I am putting.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would refer to the chemical process of becoming putrid.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Very serious danger is encountered by the community in the way I have indicated, and if there is any preventive against that the department should consider the advisability of making it a part of this legislation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is one of the objects, and it is proposed, under the powers granted in the Bill, to make inspection so as to determine fully whether the food is fit for human consumption.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Should there not be some provision in the Bill to cover that?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend thinks that paragraph d is not sufficient I will accept a suggestion and before we come to the third reading we can follow it up. We desire to make the Bill effective along these lines.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I received a letter drawing my attention to section 5, and to amendments made in the House of Commons in the Bill as recently drafted, referring to the limitation of the last part of section 5, paragraph f, by which the Governor in Council may defer the operation of that subsection for such period as he may prescribe "with regard to bottles containing mineral waters, ginger ale, ginger beer, or other common beverages, ordinarily known as soft drinks." It was suggested that the words "ordinarily known as soft drinks" should be deleted in order to allow the Governor in Council, on representations made, to go beyond that expression, "soft drinks," because those beer bottles are not easily obtained just now, and some delay may be necessary in that case, as in others, for the importation of the standard bottles. I give the argument for what it is worth; but, as the matter is to be reviewed by the Governor in Council, I am disposed to move to strike out the words "ordinarily known as soft drinks" so as to give power to the Governor General, if fair representation is made, to allow a bottle which does not fall under the words "soft drinks."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I propose amending that by adding after the word "prescribe" in the thirty-third line. "up to the first day of July, 1923."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: So that the right of the Governor General to suspend this clause would be limited, to that date.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will not the honourable gentleman agree to the striking out of the words, "ordinarily known as soft drinks?"

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would not that amendment be sufficiently broad to cover beer bottles?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There may be a question in view of the legislation of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. POWER: If the suggestion to strike out those words, "ordinarily known as soft drinks," is adopted, other soft drinks would be shut out.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No; "or other common beverages."

Hon. Mr. POWER: Hop beer is no stronger than ginger beer, and root beer is also a soft drink.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The phrase "soft drinks" is a common slang term which has no real meaning outside of slang.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: You have the words, "or other common beverages."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Strike out the words "ordinarily known as soft drinks."

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It occurs to me that the words used in the section are not comprehensive enough with regard to bottles containing mineral waters, ginger ale, etc. There are other beverages, such as distilled water and spring water sold, but they are not mineral waters.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Ginger ale or ginger beer is not a mineral water.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, but I think the words ought to be extended so as to include distilled water, and probably others.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Originally the language was intended to cover that class of bottle in which a cheap drink is sold. The more expensive class of bottle can easily be supplied by the bottler, but this is intended to cover alone that class which with their contents cost five or ten cents each.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Bottles for mineral waters like Radnor, which are "charged," cannot be had on this side of the Atlantic.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But I am dealing with water alone. In Ottawa there are from fifteen to thirty people peddling water from door to door, and it is not mineral water at all. It was shown a few years ago that some of those waters were absolutely bad, and conveyed typhoid fever, or were in close contact with water which at that time was polluted with typhoid germs. For this reason the Act should be made more comprehensive.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We should insert "water," whether we call it distilled or any other kind.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What is intended would be secured by striking out the words "or other common beverage," and inserting "or other non-alcoholic beverage." I happen to know that this amendment was made to cover a man conducting a pop factory and making five cent drinks, and it certainly does not cover all those wishy-washy beverages.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I would suggest that the honourable leader of the House leave that section over for consideration.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All right.

Section 5 was allowed to stand.

Section 6 was agreed to.

On section 7—samples may be obtained; seizure of suspected articles; examination at customs:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is this section new?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; the only new feature is that it gives the department authority to hold samples until analysis is made.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Is it new so far as it gives power to the department to seize and confiscate the goods without any trial or any conviction?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The spirit is the same as in the old Act, except that now the inspector may temporarily seize a suspected article until an analysis is made, and if the goods are not found contrary to the Act they may be immediately released. It was found that when seizures were not made the vendors took precautions to dispose of the suspected goods as rapidly as possible, so that when the inspector returned they were gone. Under the old Act it was not possible to hold the goods imported into Canada for sufficient time to determine what should be done with them.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Subsection 2, at line 22, says:

If the Dominion Analyst reports that the said article is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this Act the article so seized and held shall ipso facto be forfeited to His Majesty. Otherwise it shall be released forthwith.

The article seized might be very valuable; yet in making this new law we are giving an official power to forfeit it without granting the holder of the article any trial at all. He should not be fined or imprisoned without a trial. That is a very drastic Act.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: And the accused is without any remedy.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand the Act provides that the goods seized are held and go as an exhibit to the court.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But the subsection says the article shall be "forfeited to His Majesty."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If it is adulterated there is no reason why it should not be.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But the official has the power of trial.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And the accused has no recourse whatever.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: He has no trial, no hearing, no chance to combat the finding.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand there is a clause.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I find no provision here that the Dominion Analyst shall be on the spot and make his report forthwith. In the summer time a dealer in soft drinks might suffer serious pecuniary loss by being compelled to hold a large stock over until the Dominion Analyst, perhaps coming from some distant city, had an opportunity to examine and report. In large cities there are Dominion Analysts, but they are not distributed over the country, and provision should be made for prompt reports.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Section 13 deals with reports.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The honourable member for Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) has just pointed out that section 12 absolutely contradicts section 7, with which we are now dealing, because it says:

If the Dominion Analyst reports to the department that the whole or any part of such articles of food or drugs as have been submitted for analysis by the aforesaid inspector is adulterated or misbranded, the minister may declare such articles, or so much thereof as the Dominion Analyst reports to be adulterated or misbranded, to be forfeited to the Crown.

This leaves it in the discretion of the minister, while section 7 gives the minister no discretion whatever; he is as helpless as anybody else; the article is ipso facto forfeited to the Crown.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Instead of saying "shall ipso facto be forfeited," we might use the words "may ipso facto," etc.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No, it must be read "shall."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Could not the owner be notified, and a certain time allowed to him?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is taken out of his possession.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It seems to me that subsection 2 is superseded by section 12, and should be struck out altogether. Certainly they are contradictory. This subsection 2 of 7 is not required if section 12 stands.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think my honourable friend is quite right; the subsection is either mandatory or contradictory, and I agree with him that that part should be struck out.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I move that subsection 2 of section 7 be struck out.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let it stand meantime.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I did not understand my honourable friend to suggest the striking out of the whole of subsection 2, but only the words relating to seizure and forfeiture.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That provision is not only desirable but necessary.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I would move to strike out all the words from line 22 to the end of the subsection, as follows:

If the Dominion Analyst reports that the said article is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this Act the article so seized and held shall ipso facto be forfeited to His Majesty Otherwise it shall be released forthwith.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I would like some explanation about that. I do not quite agree with the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) when he says there is a contradiction between section 2 and section 12. As I read it, subsection 2 refers to one article which the inspector, when he comes into a store, may pick up, while section 12 refers to all articles of the same class.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton was agreed to, and section 7 as amended was agreed to.

Subsections 1 and 2 of section 8, were agreed to.

On subsection 3—analysis and certificate thereof:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In subsection 3 of section 8 there is full protection of the party, because on the report of the Dominion Analyst the owner may be sued and the report of the Dominion Analyst may be offered as evidence. I see in that provision protection for the owner, but I do not know whether in any case he has the right to a trial.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Under subsection 4 it is provided that the Department may keep a man waiting for six months before giving him a certificate as to the condition in which his goods were found. Is that right? Section 9 gives a person the right to appeal to the Minister from the decision of the analyst. Is he going to be obliged to wait six months for an opportunity to appeal?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: He ought to get a certificate forthwith.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Why should not the inspector be required, at the time he sends the certificate to the department, to send a copy to the person from whom the sample was procured?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The certificate is that of the Dominion analyst, apparently.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes. Why should not the person from whom the sample was procured be advised at once?

Hon. Mr. POWER: Six months seems a long time. In the next clause we find that if the party wishes to appeal he has to move within ten days of the receipt of the copy of the certificate. Why should you give the department six months to move, and compel the party accused to move within ten days?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Deputy Minister of the Department informs me that there are really cases in which it will take six months to determine.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: They should make the analysis with all despatch and furnish a copy of the certificate promptly to the man concerned.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It has to be done within six months of the time of procuring the sample.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But, as I understand this clause, the analysis might be made to-day and a copy of the report not be furnished for six months to the man whose goods were seized.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Because the sample might take that lenght of time to analyse.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The analysis might be made in two days, and under that section the report might be held for six months.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Would the Deputy Minister please give us an example of any article that takes six months to analyse? I would like to know of any such article. I do not know at present.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Why mention any particular time? Why not say: "A copy of such certificate shall be furnished by the department to the person from whom the sample was procured?"

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Forthwith after the analysis is made?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, we will take that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The section reads: "If it appears to the Dominion analyst that the sample is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this Act, the Dominion analyst shall so certify." Why not at that time send a copy of the certificate to the owner?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will put it that way.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: "If it appears to the Dominion analyst." Does that mean, if it appears to him without analyzing it at all? Surely he should analyze it or do something to determine whether it is adulterated or misbranded or not.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: "Appears" is a very unfortunate word there. The clause should read: "If on analysis it appears misbranded." Surely the general appearance of the article should not be sufficient.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, if the facts warrant that conclusion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I suppose "if it appears" are synonymous with "if he finds."

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: "Appears" is an unfortunate word.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not know of any word more used in judicial proceedings than the word "appears." It is a word which is invariably used in all orders of the court.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved that subsection 4 be amended to read as follows:

A copy of such certificate shall be furnished forthwith by the department to the person from whom the sample was procured.

The amendment of Hon. Sir James Lougheed was agreed to, and the section as amended was agreed to.

On section 9—appeal; further investigation and analysis:

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not think the words "in full" should be included. The person supplying the article has only ten days in which to controvert the certificate of the Dominion analyst. He gets notice to-day, and ten days hence he must put before the minister a complete case.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Thirty days would be better.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think a period of ten days is altogether too short, because by the words "in full" he would be obliged to submit at once to the minister the complete evidence.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It does not say that at all; it says that he shall notify the minister that he intends to submit the evidence.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: "Stating in full the nature of such evidence."

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The nature will be that the article is pure food and that the label is all right.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, no. My honourable friend is too much of a lawyer to think it means that.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It says, "stating in full the nature of such evidence."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My recollection is that you have to take such a step as that under the summary proceedings in appeal from a justice of the peace under the Criminal Code. That is to say, you have to serve your notice of appeal within, I think, ten days. That is all that is required. The appeal is not lodged. The person concerned simply gives notice of appeal. He simply has to state that he intends to present evidence in his own behalf to controvert the certificate. He does not submit evidence; he simply states the character of the evidence to be submitted.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not think so. I think the words "stating in full the nature of such evidence," mean that he would have to submit a complete statement.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If they had to state the evidence in full, that would be a different thing.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is open to that construction.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: If a man living in Victoria receives a copy of the certificate, he is required to notify the minister within ten days. It will take six days for his notice to reach here. You might as well shut him out altogether.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: To whom is this appeal? It says the Dominion analyst in one place, and in another place it says the chief Dominion analyst. Are you going to appeal to the man who condemns your goods?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No. He notifies the minister.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: The minister may not get that notice.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: In one place it says Dominion analyst; in another place, chief Dominion analyst.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think that instead of striking out the words "in full," as suggested by the honourable member from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), it would be better to lengthen the time given to the accused to make his appeal; because we should see that the department gets fair play; and if the party appealing is not bound to state in full the grounds of his appeal, the department is liable to be taken by surprise when the inquiry comes up. I think the better way would be to give the accused a little longer time to make his appeal.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: There is no objection to that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What does the honourable gentleman from Ottawa suggest?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Of course, it depends altogether on whether the words "in full" are left in or not.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Thirty days.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If the words "in full" are stricken out, I am quite satisfied with the time given.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Leave "in full" and make the time thirty days.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will extend the time and leave in the words "in full." That permits of a better presentation of the case.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Give thirty days

Hon. Mr. POWER: Give twenty days.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Say we split the difference and make it twenty days.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I move that the word "twenty" be substituted for "ten" in the fourth line of the paragraph.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Power was agreed to, and section 9 as amended was agreed to.

Section 10 was agreed to.

On section 11—inspectors appointed by councils; analysis; prosecutions; special application of penalties:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is this a new clause, or is it the same as the old clause?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand it is the same principle as in the old Act. Section 13 of the old Act makes provision for this.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Did it not provide that the penalty should be divided between the informer and the department?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is further on. But section 11 seems to be precisely the same as section 13 in the old Act.

Section 11 was agreed to.

Sections 12 and 13 were agreed to.

On section 14—regulations by Governor in Council:

Hon. Mr. POWER: Should not these things be done by Parliament rather than by the Governor in Council?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would be very cumbersome.

Section 14 was agreed to.

On section 15—regulations by minister:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think that paragraph c of this section contains an objectionable provision. I do not see why the informant should receive half the fine.

Hon. Mr. CURRY: I have had, I think, a dozen or more very strong telegrams from both grocers and druggists, protesting against the division of the penalty with outside persons.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: There will be no prosecutions unless that is done. There are very few prosecutions even now, and there are a great many adulterated foods. This is a very salutary provision, and I think it should be there to protect the public.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Will not the public protect themselves under this Act?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. This principle is to be found in many Acts.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think it is very objectionable.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, those who are poisoned cannot prosecute; but those who are only half-poisoned, I should think, would be actuated by a spirit of revenge.

Hon. Mr. CURRY: Is that in the old Act?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Section 15 was agreed to.

On section 16—penalties:

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I submit that this section should be amended to read in this way: "Every person who knowingly, or under such circumstances that a magistrate finds that he should have known, sells, offers for sale, or exposes for sale," etc. A man should not be held criminally liable if he did not know, or if it can be said that he ought not to have known.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Section 17 covers that.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No, it does not. I have read section 17, and I think it is the most extraordinary clause I ever saw. I think that a man should not be held criminally liable unless he knows or ought to have known. A man may buy sealed packages, in which case he has not the slightest opportunity of knowing; and I submit that he should not be held liable. The language I have suggested leaves the matter entirely in the discretion of the magistrate. If he finds that a man ought to have known, he would be liable. I think the magistrate should have the responsibility of saying that a man could not know or ought not to have known.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Why does not section 17 cover that case?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I will explain if a man buys a large quantity of canned goods from a reputable dealer, does any one contend that he is bound to open those cans and have the contents analysed? Section 17 says that if the person accused proves "that he could not with reasonable diligence have obtained knowledge of its adulteration or misbranding he shall be discharged." With reasonable diligence he could have opened the cans.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then they would not be saleable.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No. He could punch a hole in every can.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This provision would not go that far.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No man is held liable in a criminal prosecution unless the court is satisfied that he has knowledge or ought to have known.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If we amended the provision is accordance with the views expressed by my honourable friend, it would be futile to attempt to enforce the Act because it would not be possible to prove knowledge in regard to deteriorated or adulterated foods on the shelves of a retailer. Surely section 17 is sufficient. The last subsection of section 16 doubles the penalty if the offence is an aggravated one. The policy of this Act is to protect the public from being poisoned. Is it not infinitely more important that the public should be protected than that some one who is selling adulterated food should possibly escape? It seems to me that you have to choose between the two, and we have imported into section 17 all the protection required by any man dealing in these goods. All he would have to do would be to make the necessary inquiry.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would it not result in this: A man buying a case of canned salmon would have to take one tin and have it analysed before he could sell the case?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. All he has to do is to exercise ordinary discretion.

Section 16 was agreed to.

Sections 17 and 18 were agreed to.

On section 19—voluntary payments:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What is the object of clause 19? Does that mean that when the man is brought up he may voluntarily pay so much to the minister and the prosecution will stop? It is a rather curious provision.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I think the word "voluntary" should be struck out.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It simply permits the accused to acknowledge his guilt.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: He does not pay voluntarily, but because he has committed an offience.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That can only be done after a suit has been instituted.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, after adulteration has been established.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Can the minister say how many payments have been made under this section of the old Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My deputy tells me that even within the last three weeks there have been some.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Perhaps my honourable friend could let us have that information later.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Section 19 was agreed to.

On section 20—refusal of access:

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think the language of this clause is rather too sweeping. If a person omits to show the inspector—it is not merely if he refuses, but if he "omits to show the inspector all or any of such articles in his possession"—he shall be liable. I think that is going rather too far.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the law which has been on the statute book for many years, and I do not think it has been productive of any great hardship. The department is acting under that now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There need be no prosecution. If the analysis establishes that a person is guilty he can pay in.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Suppose there is a certificate establishing adulteration or misbranding. A man so charged may not desire to go to court and he may say, "I admit the offence," and he can pay the fine.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Do you think that is sufficient punishment? I do not think it is.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He may not knowingly have been a party to the offence. This provision relates only to the first offence.

Section 20 was agreed to.

Section 21 was agreed to.

On section 22—false label or neglect to label:

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I move to strike out the word "knowingly."

Section 22, amended as suggested, was agreed to.

On section 23—expenses:

Hon. Mr. POWER: This clause is a little hard on a man who establishes his innocence. Of course, you cannot get costs against the Crown.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is one of the misfortunes of litigation.

Section 23 was agreed to.

Sections 24 and 25 were agreed to.

On sections 26—1907, c. 27; 1914, c. 45; not affected:

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What is this clause for?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is to prevent any conflict with the departments administering those Acts.

Section 26 was agreed to.

Section 27 was agreed to.

The schedule was agreed to.

On section 5—misbranding (reconsidered):

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As this is a very mixed question, covering a whole range of bottles, I would suggest that it be left to the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I am in receipt of a telegram in regard to this Bill, and I presume that many other honourable gentlemen have received similar telegrams. It reads as follows:

Understand Food and Drug Bill, No. 27, provides for every bottle of aerated water, temperance and other beer being marked with label giving capacity and contents. If Bill passed in present form it will be impossible for the brewers and bottlers of this country to continue in business. The glass manufacturers cannot supply sufficient new bottles of uniform size, and trade forced to purchase second-hand ones, which vary in size slightly. The expense of labelling each bottle with labels giving capacity would also add considerably to cost to the consumer. Bill should be amended so as not to apply to any beverage. Hope you will help us.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Strike out all the words after the word "prescribe."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The regulations of the Governor in Council will then defer the operation of the whole subsection, whereas, as the Bill came from the House of Commons, the suspension referred only to the bottles. I would suggest that it be made to read in this way:

And provided further that the Governor in Council may make regulations deferring the operation of this subsection, in whole or in part.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, that will be all right.

Section 5, amended as suggested, was agreed to.

The Bill was reported, as amended.

The amendments were concurred in.

HONEY BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 29, an Act respecting Honey. Hon. Mr. Nicholls in the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I ask the permission of the committee to bring in Dr. McGill.

Sections 1, 2 and 3 were agreed to.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I move to add the following section:

4. Everyone who violates any provision of section 2 or section 3 of this Act is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to the penalties provided by section 16 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1920.

The amendment was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to, and the Bill was reported as amended.

MAPLE PRODUCTS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Bill 28, an Act respecting Maple Products.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

TRUST COMPANIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 38, an Act to amend the Trusts Companies Act, 1914.

He said: The object of this Bill is to place trust companies under the Insurance Branch so far as inspection is concerned. It places them in practically the same position as insurance companies with relation to inspection. There are about 30 trust companies operating under federal legislation, and there is no provision at present for an annual inspection; but the department or the Minister of Finance is placed in motion, perhaps by some untoward circumstance, and an inspection is made. Companies of this character are becoming so important in the transaction of business that it is very necessary for the public to be protected by the most rigid inspection.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understand that this Bill and the next Bill on the Order Paper, No. 39, are very much on the same lines.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, necessarily so.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understand that the power to inspect these companies is going to be placed in the hands of the Superintendent of Insurance. Possibly when we go into committee the minister will be able to tell us how much extra work this will entail on the Insurance Department; I suppose it will mean quite a large amount of extra work, and probably more officials appointed under the superintendent, in order to carry out this work.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There are only 30 companies, and it may require an extra official.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The same superintendent who looks after the insurance business is going to do this work also?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

LOAN COMPANIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 39, an Act to amend the Loan Companies Act, 1914.

He said: What I have said in regard to trust companies applies with equal force to loan companies.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think the Government is to be commended for presenting this legislation, more especially in deciding to put the inspection in the hands of the Insurance Department. I have followed the work of that department for a number of years, and, while there may be in the Government other departments that are managed as effectively as the Insurance Department, there is none better.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 49, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act (Steamboat Inspection).

He said: The object of this Bill is to give authority to the Government of Canada to make rules and regulations respecting the testing of boilers and all manner of machinery within steamboats. That of course would cover the inspection of hulls and the equipment of steamboats. The Bill also permits of inspection during the construction of a ship, and the imposition of such fees as will be necessary to maintain the expenditure which the department is making. I understand that up to the present time the fees for inspection and this kind of work have very largely applied to ships not registered in Canada, ships registered here being permitted to escape with a very inadequate fee in fact, not sufficient to maintain the public service. The schedule of fees is based entirely on the actual cost to the Government.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Would this Bill apply to vessels owned abroad which temporarily put into Canadian ports, or would such ships be exempt? And would the Bill apply only to vessels built in the Dominion of Canada?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand that it will apply to all steamships coming into Canadian ports.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Can my honourable friend tell me if the department accepts certificates from England or other countries?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Under this Bill such certificates would be good for one year, after which time such ships must have Dominion inspection.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Do I understand that this Bill will apply to every steamship coming from abroad?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, to every steamship that has not been examined within a year. If such a ship presents Lloyd's certificate showing that it has been examined within a year, it would be exempt from Canadian inspection, but if that certificate is more than a year old the ship would be subject to inspection here.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I do not find any mention in the Act to the effect that ships will be exempt if they have certificates from Lloyd's.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This will be governed by regulation, and I understand the regulation will be of that character.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: They do not accept Lloyd's.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: They are not empowered under the Act to accept anything; I think that should be considered. Take the case of the Cunard and White Star lines, which have the best steamers that sail the Atlantic; under this Bill those ships cannot leave port until they are inspected and the fees paid, although they may have the very highest certificates from the port of London or the port of Liverpool.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I know there was a very great difference of opinion about this when the Bill was in the House of Commons. When we go into committee I will have full information on the subject.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CIVIL SERVICE INSURANCE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 58, an Act to amend the Civil Service Insurance Act.

He said: As honourable gentlemen are aware, the Government maintains an insurance service for members of the Civil Service. This insurance service has been self-supporting. The amount of the policy has been increased from time to time. At the beginning it was, I think, $2,000 or $2,500. Then it was increased to $5,000. It is now proposed to increase the maximum amount of insurance to $10,000, so as to permit of a more adequate allowance for the family of the deceased, or the beneficiaries, as the case may be. As I have already stated, the insurance is self-supporting, and the Government therefore feel every confidence in acceding to the representations which have been made by the members of the Civil Service, that the amount should be increased from $5,000 to $10,000. Owing to the very great rise in prices and the increased cost of living, it is very desirable that additional provision should be made along these lines.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I notice that this Bill empowers the Government to extend the insurance to the Navy as well.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. Under the old Act it was extended to the civil and military employees of the Government. Why the Navy was left out I do not know, unless it was that when the Act was passed, shortly after Confederation, we were not so impressed with that branch of the service as we are now.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Wednesday, May 5, 1920.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY.

BRANCH LINE TO OKA—INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOYER inquired:

Did any officials of the Department of Railways and Canals or of the Canadian National Railways attend during the year 1919 a banquet at the Trappist monastery at Oka and there and then promise that a branch line of the National Railway would be built from the station Frenière to the monastery?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The answer to the entire question is: No.

APPOINTMENT OF FRENCH TRANSLATOR.

INQUIRY AND DISCUSSION.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER inquired:

1. Whether Major E. J. Stehelin, who was employed for a few months in the Senate, and who has just been dismissed for alleged incompetence, had passed the examination required by law.

2. The list of candidates who competed at the same time as he did, and of those who qualified.

3. Their rank by order of points obtained.

4. Had Mr. Stehelin obtained the number of points necessary to qualify him as French translator?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Yes.

2. The candidates who competed were as follows:

Audette, Geo. A., Ottawa, Ont.; Baril, J. E. W., Ottawa, Ont.; Bélanger, Jos. E., Hull, Que.; Chassé, Henri, Quebec, Que.; Cruchon, Chas. T., Montreal, Que.; de la Durantaye, L. J., Ottawa, Ont.; Drouin, Adolphe, Ottawa, Ont.; Ghysens, E. A., Ottawa, Ont.; Giguère, Jas. A., Montreal, Que.; Godin, J. R., Montreal, Que.; McRae, D. M., Peterborough, Ont.; Montgomery, M. I., Peterborough, Ont.; O'Farrell, Wm., Quebec, Que.; Potvin, A., Ottawa, Ont.; Sauvé, Jos. H., Montreal, Que.; Solomon, S. G., Montreal, Que.; Stehelin, E. J., Yarmouth, N.S.; Vallières, Henry, Ottawa, Ont.; Warren, Jas. M., Ottawa, Ont.

Those who qualified were:

(a) Returned soldiers—Marks obtained (maximum 200): Stehelin, E. J., 177.8; Baril, J. E. W., 172.7; Drouin, Adolphe, 167; Chassé, Henri, 165.

(b) Civilians—Marks obtained (maximum 200): Ghysens, E. A., 182.8; Audette, Geo. A., 181.2; de la Durantaye, L. J., 173; Potvin, A., 171.8; O'Farrell, Wm., 170.

3. Rank by order of points obtained: Ghysens, E. A.; Audette, Geo. A.; Stehelin, E. J.; de la Durantaye, L. J.; Baril, J. E. W.; Potvin, A.; O'Farrell, Wm.; Drouin, Adophe; Chasse, Henri.

4. Yes.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: Honourable gentlemen, I may not be quite in order, but I crave the indulgence of the House while I say a few words in regard to the answer which has been given by the leader of the Government to the question put. It will be seen from the answer that of the returned soldiers who qualified Major Stehelin got 177.8 out of a possible 200 points. Next to him came Mr. Baril, a professional translator, who got 172.7 points, or 5 points less than Major Stehelin; then followed Adolphe Drouin, with 167 points, or 10 points below Major Stehelin. Therefore, honourable gentlemen, if the examiners know anything about their business, and I can assure you that they are eminently capable, this gentleman qualified. To prove this more clearly I will refer to the list of civilian candidates who also passed the examination. One of them, Mr. Potvin, who is employed here as professional translator, and, I understand, is well qualified, took the examination at the same time, and he got 171.8 points, being 6 points below Major Stehelin.

Major Stehelin, when he passed his examination, was just back from the war. He had not shaken the dust of the trenches off his feet. He saw an advertisement in the paper, tried the examinations, and on his own merits, without any influence, he was appointed and sent here by the Civil Service Commission. That same gentleman was later dismissed on the ground of alleged incompetency. The allegation of incompetency falls, prima facie. The proof that he is competent is the answer to this inquiry. I do not know what power there is in this House—I do not refer at all to the committee, nor to the Clerk, nor to the Speaker, because they cannot go into the details of every case; but who is the power in this House that thwarts the nomination, the proper nomination, of competent men made by this commission? Who is it in this House who renders null and void the will of the country, as enacted in the 39th section of the Civil Service Act, which says:

In all examianations persons who have been on active service overseas on the military or naval forces of His Majesty during the present war; who have left such service with an honourable discharge; and who obtain sufficient marks to pass such examinations, shall, irrespective of the marks they have obtained, be placed in the order of merit on the list of successful candidates above all other candidates.

This gentleman had qualified in every way. I desire this House to know that when the war broke out he with all his brothers, four or more of them, volunteered at the very first call, and went over and served their country. This gentleman was promoted on the battlefield, and the old father of these boys died during the war, possibly not of regret to see his sons fighting for England, Canada, and France, but more likely because he himself was too old to cross over. Major Stehelin has been properly sent to this House. He was dismissed because of alleged incompetency, and, what is worse, one of my honourable colleagues said—what he will permit me to qualify as regrettable—that the selection of this very man was the worst that could have been made. I say that, according to the answer which is before us, according to my own knowledge, not only was it not the worst, but it was the best that could have been made from among the military candidates. I knew of this gentleman, and he came to me and told me that life was made impossible for him in the Senate. I asked what was the matter, and asked him to show me his translations. He brought me the last translation he had made. I looked over it, and, gentlemen, if I can judge of the French language, that translation was 25 per cent better than some of the translations of our Debates which have been made of late years. No doubt the language was not as eloquent as that of Bassuet or of Mirabeau; but, honourable gentlemen, you cannot make an eloquent French translation of an English speech that lacks eloquence.

I shall not add anything further except to say that I believe a wrong has unwittingly been done, and I would like the members of the Committee on Internal Economy to see why they are made responsible for a wrong towards a very deserving man.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: If I am in order, I would like to say a few words. I do not think that remarks such as have been made by the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Poirier) should be allowed to go without some words of rebuttal. I am amazed at the attitude the honourable gentleman has taken on this question. I happen to know a little about what has taken place in regard to the appointment of this translator. The gentleman, according to the return which has been made, secured a sufficient number of marks to put him at the head of the list, and one would naturally have thought he would be competent to fill the position. The man has my heartfelt sympathy, and, as a returned soldier myself, I would have been glad to see him not only obtain the position but prove himself qualified to hold it. I am informed by those who know that he was absolutely incompetent; that his translation was so bad that it could not be used. It was sent to experts to be examined, and these experts pronounced it absolutely unfit to be placed in Hansard. I was led to believe that the honourable gentleman who has appealed on behalf of this man knew these facts. Still he pleads that a man who is inefficient should be placed in such an important position as translator of the Senate.

I am sorry, honourable gentlemen, to realize that the tendency in our Civil Service to-day does not seem to be towards securing efficiency. Efficiency ought to be the aim of the Senate and of every honourable gentleman in it. Instead of that, if I can read between the lines, the honourable gentleman would be quite satisfied to retain in the Senate, at a high salary—I think $2,400 or $2,500—a man who was absolutely incapable of doing the work. How this man secured the marks which qualified him for the appointment is another question. It proves to me that the examination which take place in connection with appointments to positions of this kind are little short of a farce. Honourable gentlemen may remember that at last session, when the question of the method of making appointments to the staff of the Senate was debated in this House, I contended that the Chief of the Department requiring assistance ought to be consulted in the preparation of the examination papers, so that the man appointed would be qualified to fulfil the duties he would be called upon to perform; but the House did not see eye to eye with me. Consequently that provision was omitted. The fact that this gentleman apparently succeeded in passing an examination and satisfying the Civil Service Commission demonstrates clearly that the examination was anything but sufficient. The man himself had absolutely no experience. In the first place, the position calls for a man with certain qualifications, including university graduation. This man is not a graduate of any university. He was, I understand, a book-keeper in a lumber camp, perhaps a very competent man in his line, but absolutely unqualified for the very important position to which he was appointed.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not want to interrupt the honourable gentleman, but how does he account for the fact that this gentleman got so many points?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I say that the examination was apparently a farce; that is what I say, when this man could secure those marks with his limited knowledge of the work. The honourable gentleman from Granville (Hon. Mr. Chapais), who is not here at the moment, is more competent to speak on this question than I am. He is an educated Frenchman. I am told that when a page of the translation was submitted to the honourable Senator, he declared that it demonstrated the absolute incompetence of the man who made that translation; it was not a good translation and was unfit to be inserted in Hansard.

I do not know the object of raising this question. I presume that every honourable gentleman in this House is anxious to secure efficiency in its officials. That should be the first aim. Now, if this gentleman was inefficient or incompetent, why should any honourable member rise in his place and protest against his being removed from the position? I could understand the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Poirier) having a grievance against the Civil Service Commission for sending to this House a man who was evidently incompetent and inefficient. If the appointee was not qualified, as I think has been demonstrated, beyond any question by men who know, then why should the honourable gentleman feel that the man has been harshly treated? I am told on every good authority that this man, when he was occupying the position, admitted frankly that he was not competent to discharge the duties appertaining to the office. In view of these facts I do not think that anybody responsible for changing the situation is deserving of censure or blame. I think that if the authorities of this House had not taken the action necessary to insure our having a correct translation, then they would have been derelict in their duty to the House, and would have been deserving of censure. I think that the officials of the House deserve to be highly commended for the action they have taken.

I hold in my hand the classification volume in which are stated the qualifications required for this position as follows:

> Education equivalent to university graduation; at least two years of experience as translator or experience of similar character and standard; in some cases sufficient specialized training or previous experience to insure thorough familiarity with legal and scientific terminology; considerable demonstrated aptitude for translation and the faculty of expressing ideas clearly in each of the languages used; ability to read, write and speak two or more languages fluently.

Unfortunately, honourable gentlemen, this man had none of these qualifications; and how under heaven he secured the highest marks in that examination is a mystery to everybody. That is a question that might bear investigation.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: Is that an insinuation against the honesty of the Civil Service Commission or the examiners?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Honourable gentlemen, I am making no insinuation: I am making a plain statement of facts, and the honourable gentleman can take out of that whatever he likes.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Is he a university graduate?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: According to my information, he is not a university graduate, and has none of the qualifications that would have entitled him to the position which has been awarded him by the Civil Service Commission. This is only another argument, and a very strong argument in my mind, for taking this House from underneath the operation of the Civil Service Commission. Every official of this House, to my mind, ought to be appointed to the House on the recommendation of some responsible officer of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: Hear, hear; I am in favour of that too.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: If that were the case, we would have no such trouble as we are having to-day. I purpose giving you some day an opportunity of voting on this question, as I intend to move an amendment to the Civil Service Act when it comes before us, with that purpose in view.

Now, I am not going to detain the House. I would not have risen to say a word only that I thought my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Poirier) was perhaps misinformed. The gentleman who now occupies the position of translator, Mr. Potvin, whom I have known for years, is a graduate of two universities. He is a thoroughly qualified French scholar. He had been performing the duties of the position to the satisfaction of his chief and of everybody who came in contact with the translation, for, I think, eight or nine months previous to the examination. In my opinion, according to law Mr. Potvin should have been appointed without that examination.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is Potvin a returned soldier?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: No, he is not a returned soldier, but I would like to say this on his behalf: he did a great deal more than a good many returned soldiers in connection with the war.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is what they all say.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: This man devoted two years of his time to assisting in recruiting in his own province. He tendered his services for overseas, but was rejected twice by the doctors on account of his heart. It is not his fault if he is not a returned soldier. He has rendered good service. He has done more than a great many honourable gentlemen in this House have done to help win the war. However, I am not going to discuss that question. He was highly qualified to fill the position, whereas the man who was appointed and afterwards relieved by the authorities of the House was absolutely unqualified. I think the officers of the House deserve credit for what they have done.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question before he sits down. According to this return, Mr. Potvin received 171.8 marks; he did not get as many points as the returned soldier. But they passed over a man named Ghysens and another named Audette, and another named de la Durantaye. Those men got more points than Potvin. How does the honourable gentleman explain that?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I have really no explanation to make. I am not conversant with that phase of the situation. But in reply to the honourable gentleman I would say this, that in an important appointment of this kind something more is needed than a technical examination. Consideration must be given to the man himself—his personality and his fitness for the position. These factors ought to receive far more consideration than even the examination. I am told on the very best authority that there is no better translator in the employ of either of the Houses to-day than the man who now fills the position, Mr. Potvin.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: Honourable gentlemen, may I be allowed to conclude the debate?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Being responsible for the dismissal of Major Stehelin as French translator, I may be permitted to give some explanation. When Mr. Stehelin was appointed by the Civil Service Commission he was sent here. We tried him several times, and he made several translations in the course of about two months. I received many complaints that he was not at all qualified as a translator. I read his translations myself, but did not consider myself sufficiently qualified to render judgment; so I consulted many experts in French translation. All agreed that it was of no use to employ a man who would make such translations as Mr. Stehelin did. A second time I asked these experts if Mr. Stehelin, after having worked five or six months, might not possibly become qualified, and they all answered it was of no use to try. I was very sorry to be obliged to replace him, because, as the honourable member from Shediac (Hon. Mr. Poirier) stated, he was employed overseas during the course of the war—not in the trenches as the honourable gentleman from Shediac stated. If I am correctly informed, Mr. Stehelin is well qualified in the lumber trade. If he suffered, it was not in the trenches, but in the lumber camps. He may be perfectly well qualified to fell trees, but I consider that he is absolutely incompetent for translation. As I have stated, I consulted several experts and not one of them told me that it was possible to retain him in the position. Even one member of the Civil Service Commission, to whom the translation made by Mr. Stehelin was submitted, said that he had no qualifications at all. That is why I dismissed him. I was very sorry to be obliged to do so, but the French translation must be first-class or we must have none at all.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: May I be allowed a word? There is certainly some misunderstanding of a serious character about this. The man, according to the Montreal examiners who looked at the papers—

The Hon. the SPEAKER: May I draw the attention of the honourable gentleman to the fact that he is out of order.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know whether I am in order or not, but I would like to ask the honourable the Speaker whether or not another examination has taken place since, and, if so, who has been selected?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: There is no selection yet.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The present appointment is but a temporary one?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Until an examination is held?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may say, honourable gentlemen, that I am the person referred to by my honourable friend from Shediac (Hon. Mr. Poirier) as having expressed in rather harsh terms my opinion as to the incompetence of Mr. Stehelin. I did not even know the name of the party. I drew my conclusions, first, from a statement that had come to me, and from the dismissal, which was apparently a corroboration of that statement. These are the only facts I had. A report came to me a month before, and then we had the report from the Internal Economy Committee. Reading my remarks again, I observe that I stated that the commission had unfortunately selected the most incompetent man. While that may be true, I hope that it is not. The gentleman may not have been the most incompetent, but in this respect I am no better informed than the Senate is at the present time.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: I have been out of order, but would the honourable the Speaker permit me to put to him a question?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: I have been told directly that the gentleman was given at the start something like five pages a day to translate. That was before he had been coached and before he had time or opportunity to see how the Senate was constituted. If that is so—I do not say it is—but if he was examined on translations which he did at the rate of five pages a day, I say there is no man who could translate five pages a day and could safely submit his translation to a critical examination.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: This thing is entirely out of order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I am informed by the Clerk of the House that he had two months and a half in which to do the work, and the Chief Translator advised Stehelin to take all the necessary time to make the translation correctly.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: The Clerk knows. I simply put the question.

The discussion concluded.

SERVICE TO THE MAGDALEN ISLANDS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. TANNER moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a return of copies of contracts between any department or departments of the Government and the owners of the steamship Lady Evelyn in respect to the carriage of mails, passengers and freight between Pictou, Souris and the Magdalen Islands, and copies of schedules of rates for such service, if such schedules are in the possession of the Government.

The motion was agreed to.

DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill H3, an Act for the relief of Edith Sarah Bell.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE STEEL CORPORATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FREDERIC NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to ask the indulgence of this House to refer to a matter that is occupying public attention to a considerable extent at this time. Yesterday, the honourable the leader of the Opposition placed on the Order Paper an inquiry for certain particulars in connection with the British Empire Steel Corporation. I am told that if I were to remain here until tomorrow I would have an opportunity of speaking to the question. But, unfortunately, I am informed that a great many of the mechanics in our Peterborough works have threatened to go out on strike tomorrow morning. Therefore, by leave of the House, I would like to refer to this matter at the present time.

I am interested in this merger from the standpoint that I am one of the vice-presidents of one of the constituent companies, the Dominion Iron and Steel Corporation; and, while I shall not attempt at this time and in this place to defend the British Empire Steel Corporation, because I do not see that any information is yet before the public that warrants any attack, and therefore no defence is necessary, I do think it would be interesting to this House to have certain information from one who is qualified to give it first hand.

It was some months ago when the question of the merging of certain Canadian steel corporations and other corporations came before the company of which I am an executive officer, and at that time I was personally very much opposed to the idea. I assumed—it has since turned out erroneously assumed—that the proposition was simply for the purpose of stock manipulation, and I believed then that any merger having that as the main object in view was detrimental to the interests of the country. Since that time I have been present at a great many conferences, and I have to say now that, with a more intelligent understanding of the situation and of the proposals set forth, I am only too glad to say that I believe that the merger of the Canadian companies as proposed by the British Empire Steel Corporation will be one of great advantage to Canada. There are good mergers and there are bad mergers, but from a patriotic standpoint I believe this merger will bring prosperity in certain lines of industry, will increase the development of our resources, and will be to the advantage of Canada and beneficial in every way.

At the present moment any manufacturer who uses iron or steel as the base of his industry knows that we are entirely dependent on the United States in that respect, and that at times like the present, when it is almost impossible for the United States to secure a sufficient amount of raw material to enable the American manufacturers to keep their factories employed, honourable gentlemen may imagine that it is far more difficult for Canadian industries that have to depend on the United States for their supply to receive equally favourable treatment.

The Dominion Iron and Steel Corporation, wnich is the principal constituent of the new merger, because in the new issue of securities I believe it is allotted 38 per cent of the whole, occupies a very peculiar strategic position in regard to world trade; but in regard to domestic trade it occupies a somewhat disadvantageous position. It has the great advantages for export of coal, of iron, and of seaboard. The port of Sydney is nearer to South Africa, Southern Europe, and South America than is the port of Liverpool. But, unfortunately, Sydney is about the most easterly port in Canada, and, as you know, honourable gentlemen, iron and steel and coal are very weighty products, and the freight rates have made it impossible for the Sydney corporations, the Dominion Iron and Steel Company and the Nova Scotia Steel Company, to market their products to advantage in the western section of this country. Freight rates by rail are prohibitive. They have been able to ship coal by vessel during certain months of the year to the port of Montreal. The balance of the Canadian requirements of coal are imported from the United States. In order that we may develop our natural resources we must look for an export market, and that was the one reason, my whole reason, for being favourable to the coming alliance with the British Empire Steel Corporation, when I found that it was to be promoted and placed before the public on a basis such as that upon which every Canadian industry should be established.

First of all, I would like to refer to a most misleading statement which was made in another place yesterday. Taking the Hansard of the House of Commons, I notice that Mr. J. E. Armstrong made the following remarks:

> I rose particularly to call the attention of the Government to the fact that the time has come when we should investigate these mergers instead of permitting them to say that they have a capital of $207,000,000, and that they are going to put in enough watered stock or common stock to make up $500,000,000.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: We cannot discuss what is going on in the other House.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Well, honourable gentlemen, I will not quote from Hansard; but I think my memory is sufficiently clear to enable me to mention that I read in the newspaper this morning that a certain member in another place had made the statement that, because the British Empire Steel Corporation was applying for a charter of $500,000,000 capital, and only $207,000,000 of that was to be issued for the purpose of taking over the constituent companies that were entering into the merger, the balance was all to be issued as watered stock. That is a most unfair statement. A little knowledge is a dangerous thing. If we are to assume—no business man would—and if others who are not interested in business to the same extent are allowed to form the impression that all the balance of the capital that is not invested on the immediate inception of the corporation is going to be distributed as watered stock, I do not know what stage we would arrive at.

The facts are these. Of $500,000,000, $207,000,000 is to be issued to take care of the securities of the different enterprises entering into the new merger. The balance will remain in the treasury, and will be issued from time to time, if called upon, for the sake of strengthening the organization by the addition of new interests.

It is a very ambitious scheme. As I have pointed out, heretofore we have been entirely dependent on the United States. To-day there are associated with this new enterprise a number of leading manufacturers and financiers of Great Britain. They are going into this, not simply because they expect to make money out of it, or because they expect to make any great amount of money—because they have deliberately shut the door against making money; and that has led me to the belief, honourable gentlemen, that, after all, the guiding spirit is the fact that they want to act in accordance with the lessons they have learned from the war, when the trade of Great Britain and the trade of the Empire was so dependent upon German activities, and that they must have for their shipbuilding, for their machine building, and for every other class of industry, iron and steel to make the Empire independent.

My proof that they are actuated by a self-sacrificing spirit is this. The industries at Sydney cannot be developed without the expenditure of a very large amount of capital. The Dominion Iron and Steel Company cannot, if it remains as it is, satisfactorily proceed without many millions of new capital. These British capitalists have undertaken to take $25,000,000 of 8 per cent cumulative preference stock at par, and to put that $25,000,000 at par into the treasury, and they do not get one share of common stock or any other kind of security. It is cash, and clean cash. They get no bonus of common stock; there is no water in it; and therefore I think that honourable members of this House should be informed of the fact when they come to the discussion of this matter, at which discussion I regret to say I shall not be present.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Does not the honourable gentleman think that 8 per cent is a pretty stiff rate?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I do not believe that anybody could go into any financial market in the world at this very moment and get $25,000,000 on an 8 per cent basis, when the Governments are paying 6 per cent.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: As I understand my honourable friend, these companies on this capital are going to issue stock at 8 per cent.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I think that every financier will admit that in these days, considering the risk, unless the men who are supplying that money are actuated by patriotic motives and by a desire to bind the different parts of the Empire closer together, both for patriotic and selfish reasons, it would be quite impossible at this time to get $25,000,000 for any Canadian industry at such a rate.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Are we to understand that there is some legislation coming down in regard to this question later on?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I mentioned on rising that the leader of the Opposition had placed an inquiry on the Order Paper for certain information regarding the merger, and by leave of the House, knowing some of the facts which could not be procured elsewhere, I desired to give the House any information which was at my disposal. If the House desires to hear it, I shall be pleased to continue; if not, I shall be equally pleased to take my seat.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Go on.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I asked a question which was not answered. Is this to be followed by any legislation?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I am quite unaware that any legislation is to follow.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: From the form of the inquiry of the leader of the Opposition, I take it that he does not intend to speak upon it.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The information is important anyway.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Go on.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: As it is the expressed desire that I continue, I will give you another fact, and that is that the directors of the new merger will be entirely Canadian, or so I am informed, and that the British people who are advancing the initial $25,000,000 are satisfied to remain as an advisory board in London, and to leave the entire operation and management of this great Canadian enterprise to Canadians to develop for the benefit of Canada. I think it is rather unusual for people who are putting up a large amount of money when money is required, and when they are in a position to dictate terms, not to dictate terms, but to say: "We have decided not to go into this at all; we believe in Canadian management of Canadian institutions, and we look to you to work with us for the good of Canada and for the good of the Empire."

Before I was converted I had to be convinced by facts. The facts were placed before us by probably one of the leading firms of auditors in the world—Warwick, Mitchell, Peat and Company. They investigated most thoroughly our books, the books of the Nova Scotia Steel Company, and those of the steamship company. Warwick, Mitchell, Peat and Company and Price, Waterhouse and Company are, I think, the two concerns of actuaries that stand higher than any other when an organization is going to be put together and the shareholders or others desire to know the true conditions of affairs. We had a full and most voluminous report, made after a most thorough investigation of the books and accounts. We had the best minerological experts that Great Britain could produce spend months investigating the physical assets of the company, the stocks of coal, ore, machinery, etc.; so the directors only voted in favour of bringing about this merger after the fullest investigation. But, after having been approved by the directors, all this has still to be submitted to the shareholders, who will be called in a special general meeting to consider it. So that every shareholder, from the largest to the smallest, will before it is consummated have an opportunity of expressing his opinion and criticising, or recommending or making any other suggestion that the circumstances of the case may seem to him to warrant.

Although this matter concerns our Canadian resources, I doubt if there are many honourable gentlemen in this Chamber who are aware of the fact that within the bounds of the province of Nova Scotia and on Belle Isle, which is part of Newfoundland, there is fifteen per cent of all the coal and iron ore of the world. Of what advantage has that been to this country in the past? We have played with it, but it should make us potentially rich. We have played with it largely because of the adverse geographical situation. If these wonderful natural resources had been situated say in the vicinity of Montreal, or in the province of Ontario, which are the manufacturing centres, radiating both east and west, Canada would to-day occupy a different position industrially and financially. But those resources have been lying dormant, honourable gentlemen, and this is the first opportunity we have to make a proper development and use of them. Canada during the war gained the admiration of the world not only by the gallantry of the soldiers that it sent to the front, but also on account of the financial strength of the country, which enabled it to meet the enormous expenditures connected with the conduct of the war. Canada has won the admiration of the world for having shown to the returned soldiers greater consideration than has been shown in any other part of the world; and we have not done with that yet. I believe that if we are able to link up with the Empire and march in synchronism with her, each constituent part of the Empire aiding in purely British development, it will be a great thing for this country financially, commercially, and patriotically.

The reason five hundred millions of capital is asked for is that it will leave an ample amount of treasury stock which can be issued only in the event of other enterprises—British, Indian, Australian, etc.—coming in to cement still further this world-wide British Empire consolidation. And I would draw the attention of honourable gentlemen to the fact that when any such question arises it must come before a Canadian board of directors, who will have to consider it from the standpoint not only of the Empire interest, but also of the interest it will be to Canadians and to Canada.

As I am speaking by leave of the House, I do not wish to take up too much time. I have felt that there were certain things that would interest the members—

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Would my honourable friend permit me to ask him a simple question? I appreciate his ability, and I appreciate his desire in this matter; but I would like to put a question to him regarding a point which I could not understand, as to the Dominion Steel Company. What has that to do with the Davie Shipbuilding and Repairing Company, Limited? And what has it to do with the Maritime Nail Company?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I am very glad the honourable gentleman has asked that question. This is so large a subject that it is quite impossible for me to give to the House all the information I would like to give in a few remarks made by leave of the House; but I may state that in my judgment it would be quite impossible for us to carry out the full purpose of the combination unless there were adequate shipping at the command of the Empire Steel Corporation.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: My honourable friend has not told us about the Maritime Nail Company.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: As to the Maritime Nail Company, I may tell the honourable gentleman that the Dominion Iron and Steel Company during the war developed a very large export trade in nails with France and Great Britain. Their total nail-producing capacity was more than taken up by their export trade, which also took the output of the nail manufacturing company in St. John. I am glad to say that the Canadian corporation, which never had had any of the export trade and had never been able to engage in the world-wide competition in the manufacture of nails, showed itself during the war to such advantage that it has been able to retain its trade after the war, and the manufacture and export of nails will become a very important part of the future production of the corporation. That is where quantity production lowers prices. If the Canadian corporation can manufacture only, we will say, one-tenth of what a similar corporation is manufacturing in the United States, they cannot manufacture to the same advantage; therefore they cannot manufacture and sell as cheaply. But if by means of this Empire trade they can manufacture in gross as much as the competing company in the United States, they will be able to reduce very largely, their cost of production, so that they can compete successfully.

There has been a great deal of criticism because the figures seem large, but I have not heard any criticism of the United States Steel Corporation, which is investing almost as much at Ojibway, on the Detroit river. That is an American corporation. They have been welcomed with open arms and have been given a great many advantages and concessions, and every dollar that they may make in the employment of a capital of from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000 will go across in dividends to the United States. It can at least be said that the money earned by the British Empire Corporation will remain within the Empire.

I feel that I am trespassing too much on the indulgence of the House, honourable gentlemen, and occupying too much of your time; but I consider that this is one of the most important questions that has ever been brought to the attention of this country. I honestly believe—otherwise I would not have become connected with it—that it is going to do more for the development of our natural resources of that class, and our raw materials, than has ever been dreamed of before. I believe it is going to give us connection with the great iron and steel mills of Great Britain, of Australia, and of India. I think it is most unwise for gentlemen whose names I have read in the newspaper this morning to attempt to frighten away or discourage capital when it is willing to come here without bonus. I think it is a most regrettable thing, and I hope that the same class of destructive criticism will not occur in this honourable House. Of course, constructive criticism is helpful to any enterprise or any industry.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understood the honourable gentleman to say that the amount of stock that was to be issued was $207,000,000; but the statement that appeared in the Ottawa Journal yesterday morning gave it as $250,000,000. Can he explain the difference between his statement, and the statement which was attributed to Col. Morden?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: The balance sheet as submitted to me called for $207,000,000. Whether there has been any new enterprise which has been given consideration since then, or whether the $250,000,000 is an error in the report in the press, I am unable to tell the honourable member at this time.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I might point out to the honourable gentleman that the statement as it appears in the paper refers to the assumption of a nominal funded debt of $43,000,000. That added to the $207,000,000 which the honourable gentleman mentions would make the total $250,000,000. Can the honourable gentleman give us any information about that $43,000,000?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I am sorry I cannot at this time; but if it is a funded debt it will of course be taken care of by the issue of new securities. What I do know is this, that the valuation by the experts is $403,000,000 as against $207,000,000 of contemplated capital. I know also that when the corporation starts there will be over $77,000,000 of liquid assets, cash and goods.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Honourable gentlemen, I am sorry I cannot congratulate my honourable friend on bringing this subject before the House at this time, nor can I congratulate him upon the remarks which he has made. I am very sorry to have to rise and say this, for my honourable friend and I are very good friends, and I dislike saying anything which may at all appear ungracious. But I am impelled to do so as a member of the Senate of Canada, which unfortunately has thrown at it daily many bricks that it does not deserve. I do not know the first thing about the subject which the honourable gentleman has discussed, and I will not attempt to follow him in any of the details as given to this House. But I rise for the purpose of placing on record my view that it is utterly unseemly for the Senate of Canada to be made the channel by which—

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: You should have objected before the honourable gentleman made his statement. I rise to a point of order.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am objecting now. I say it is unseemly that the Senate should be made the means—

The Hon. the SPEAKER: An objection having been raised, the honourable gentleman can speak only by leave of the House.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Go on.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not know anything about this merger; I do not know anything about the details of it.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What is the use of the honourable gentleman addressing us on it if he does not know anything about it?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: If the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Crosby) insists on his point of order, the honourable member from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) cannot speak without the consent of the majority of this House.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Perhaps I may be given an opportunity of explaining my point of order and the reason why I object. The honourable member from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) asked the permission of this House to place this information before us. Permission was granted him unanimously; there was not a dissenting voice. At that time my honourable friend from Ottawa had the right to dissent if he so desired. Now, having listened—and in my judgment with a great deal of profit—to the remarks made by the honourable gentleman from Toronto, are we going to precipitate a discussion that is altogether out of order? My honourable friend from Ottawa will understand that I feel some diffidence in raising the point of order when an honourable member like himself has the floor. I would look to the honourable gentleman for the observance of perfect order, and he must know that when, after hearing the explanation of my honourable friend from Toronto, who cannot be here to-morrow, we unanimously granted consent to him to speak, we cannot go any further with the discussion unless we are going to open the question and give everybody an opportunity to discuss it.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Is not my honourable friend looking for information? Surely we desire to hear what any honourable gentleman has to say?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Now, will the honourable gentleman just remain quiet a moment—un moment? Does my honourable friend think it advisable, or does he wish us to move the adjournment of the House?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT.

That could be done. But surely the honourable gentleman does not want that. I think there might be a discussion on the subject prior to what may come later in the shape of a report.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Honourable gentlemen, I was going to suggest that if we are to have a field day on this question, the honourable leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) might change his motion so as to permit of the question being discussed when it comes up at the regular time to-morrow. Then my honourable friend from Ottawa will have a chance to say all he desires to say, and the rest of us will likewise have a chance to talk. The thing is developing now into a debate, and I am very glad of it, for I want to have my part in it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: With the leave of the House, in order to meet the wishes of honourable gentlemen, I would change my inquiry—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will the honourable gentleman wait until I finish with the point of order? I do not propose to prolong the discussion. I thought that, when my honourable friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) had been permitted to discuss the matter at all, it was allowable for other members of this House to do likewise. If it was permissible for him to discuss the matter, I do not see how it would not be permissible for me to do the same thing. But I am not going to precipitate a discussion, nor am I asking, as my honourable friend from Nova Scotia (Hon. W. B. Ross) fears, that we have a field-day. I do not propose that at all; I rise simply to put before the Senate a consideration which is, it seems to me, of paramount importance to this House, apart altogether from the subject which has been brought up by my honourable friend from Toronto. The point I want to make is this—that it is unseemly, that it is improper, for this House to be made the channel by which a merger of this kind may be discussed and may be boomed; because, after all, the remarks of my honourable friend were made for the purpose of helping on this combination, which will soon ask the people of Canada to subscribe to the stock.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I would ask the honourable gentleman to withdraw that remark.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Will the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) tell us how, when, as stated by the honourable member from Toronto, it is not going to be offered to the public, any evil will come of it?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is going to be offered to the public. If it is not going to be offered to the public, then, it seems to me, we are wasting the time of the House in discussing the matter. If the public is not interested, why should we discuss it?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There has not been anything so interesting before the House this session.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, I am very sorry indeed if I have transgressed the rules or if I have done anything that led to the remark made by my honourable friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt). I felt that the members of this House would be interested in knowing something of this matter; and if the remarks which I made were out of order, or if there was in them anything reprehensible, I am very sorry indeed. I ask the leave of the House to give the information which I presented.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to ask a question, as my honourable friend from Toronto will not be here to-morrow when the matter comes up. I understood my honourable friend to say that at the present time industries requiring iron and steel and coal were absolutely dependent on the United States. I did not gather from what he said what was the cause of their being dependent—whether it was the freight rates from Sydney up to Quebec and Ontario, or whether there were other reasons. I remember very well that, when the Dominion Iron and Steel Company was formed, the reason given was that it was so well situated it could supply the whole Dominion and could export better than any other steel company on earth.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether it has been decided that this matter shall be open for debate to-morrow or not. I think this question is of national importance and should be thrown open to debate, so that any misunderstandings, or any remarks made that are apt to create misunderstanding, may be cleared up. It is in the interest of the whole country, and I would like to know whether the question will be open for discussion to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: It cannot be opened to-morrow. There is no notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Was not the notice going to be changed?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I understood the honourable leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) to say he was going to amend his inquiry.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I rose for the purpose of saying that, if the House so desired, my motion might be changed to read: "That he will call the attention of the Government and inquire."

The notice, as amended, stands.

OAKLEY DIVORCE CASE.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE REFERRED BACK.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY moved the adoption of the 56th report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Oakley, together with the evidence taken before the said committee.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Honourable gentlemen, before this report is adopted, I would like to call attention to the fact that the recommendation of the committee is a departure from what has been the usual practice in this committee. The committee have recommended that the mother, Mary Oakley, be given the custody of the children. I believe some recommendations of that kind have been made and passed by this House; but I do not think that has been the case since some time in the eighties. I was not in this House at that time; but I am told that the committee, and presumably the House, abandoned the practice of dealing with the custody of the children, and simply granted the divorce or refused it. For some reason or other it was thought unwise that this House should deal with the question of the custody of the children, inasmuch as all the provinces have machinery of their own for dealing with that question.

I was not present when the committee adopted this report, and there may be some special reason for it. No doubt the Chairman will explain to the House why the committee departed from the usual practice. I am not complaining; I only want to put the House au fait.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I had the honour of presiding at the meeting of the Divorce Committee when this report was recommended. This phase of the question was deferred at that time at my request, and I consulted the authorities as to whether or not we should make the recommendation. I may say frankly that I was not strongly in favour of making this recommendation; but rightly or wrongly, I think the committee have the authority to exercise this power. Apparently the last case in which the custody of the children was granted was in 1905, that of Isaac Pitblado, the well-known lawyer of Winnipeg.

In the case that is now before the House, independent evidence was submitted to the committee as to the financial standing of the petitioner. Evidence was given not only by the mother, but by the family solicitor, which satisfied the committee that she was abundantly able to look after and properly maintain the children. I may say that to the committee she seemed to be a person eminently fitted to have the custody of the children. I cannot give any reason for the recommendation other than that the husband had abandoned the children. They were left in the custody of the mother, and it was evident to the committee that she was the proper person to have the charge of them, and beyond any shadow of doubt had the means to maintain them. These are the main reasons for making the recommendation.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman if there was any suspicion that any move would be made to take the children out of the custody of the mother.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I understand that the mother, speaking through her attorney, was afraid that such an effort might be made, although the father, the respondent was in New York.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: For certain reasons some of us do not interfere in divorce petitions; but is it not very unusual for the committee to say who shall have the custody of the children? It is bad enough to have divorce; but you are adjudging civil rights.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have been a member of the Divorce Committee for probably a longer period than any of the present members of the committee, and I might say that since becoming a member of that committee this subject has frequently been brought to our attention, numerous applications having been made by petitioners to be given the custody of the children. We have persistently refused such applications, within my own knowledge, since 1890, with the exception of the Pitblado case in 1905. My recollection of the circumstances of that case is that there was a possibility of the children being suddenly removed to the United States, where the father would not be in a position to assert his authority over them or to demand their custody. However, that was a very exceptional case, and there was a grave doubt in the minds of the committee as to whether they should exercise such authority.

Furthermore, it has been urged, and I think with very considerable weight, that the committee would be exceeding its authority, and would be usurping what in my judgment is clearly the right of the provinces under property and civil rights. I think the courts are in a very much better position to determine this question than a committee of Parliament. If we start dealing with the question of the custody of the children, we will next have to deal with the question of alimony; and in that way we shall be, according to my judgment, going entirely outside of the authority by which we act. I think it would be much better to confine the exercise of our authority to the single question of divorce, leaving the question of the custody of the children and the question of alimony to the courts of the respeotive provinces in which the parties may live. I am unaware who is the promoter of this Bill, but I think there is every probability of it being jeopardized in its passage through Parliament during the present session if this clause is left in the Bill. I think it would be in the interest of the petitioner that the words should be stricken out:

—and granting her the custody of the children, the issue of said marriage, and for such further and other relief as to the Senate may seem meet.

I submit this with all due deference, and more particularly as an attempt is being made—which I hope will succeed—to hand this entire subject over to the jurisdiction of the courts, it would be unwise for us to depart from the very well established practice which has prevailed in the Senate for practically a generation.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I have no objection to the clause being stricken out of the Bill, as suggested by the honourable leader of the House, if the other members of the committee are agreeable to that.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: You might postpone the consideration of the Bill until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I would move to strike out these words.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will move that the report be referred back to the committee for further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

THE HALIFAX GARRISON.

INQUIRY AND DISCUSSION.

The Senate resumed from April 30 the discussion of the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Crosby:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to matters pertaining to the garrison at Halifax, and the agreement with the Imperial authorities, and also regarding the defence, both military and naval, and the dockyard and all agreements and understandings in that connection; and inquire whether it is the intention of the Government to restore the regiment to Halifax.

Hon. L. G. POWER: The honourable gentleman who made this inquiry (Hon. Mr. Crosby) divided it into two sections, one dealing with the military aspect of the matter, and the other with the naval aspect. These two aspects of the question are really distinct and independent.

With respect to the garrison, which is perhaps the more urgent just now, honourable gentlemen must bear in mind that Halifax is a strategic point, and not simply a point on the map. It is a port where coal and food and ships and military stores and dockyards are all available; it is not like an ordinary town. Halifax has been the headquarters in America of the British Navy ever since about 1750, and it has been a garrison town for over 160 years. The expedition which finally captured Louisburg—and since which Louisburg has been a British possession—was fitted out and sailed from Halifax in the year 1758; and from that time forward Halifax has been both a naval and a military station. That is a circumstance which I think should count for a little. Shortly after that, the expedition to Quebec, during which General Wolfe lost his life, was started from Halifax. Then during the Revolutionary War, beginning in 1776, Halifax was again the principal military and naval station of the British arms. During the French war which took place in the period between the close of that Revolutionary war and the war of 1812, Halifax continued to be a garrison town, and the military and naval headquarters of Britain in North America. Then of course in the war with the United States in 1812, Halifax was again the headquarters of the British military as well as naval forces. In the same way, during the Crimean war, although England was rather short of troops, the garrison was not withdrawn from Halifax. Instead of two battalions there was only one, which was a strong battalion stationed in Halifax.

In the recent war, which is now definitely over, Halifax occupied a very important position as a military and naval station, as every one knows. There was a time when it was thought that Halifax was liable to be attacked by German submarines and it was efficiently garrisoned.

It is now proposed to withdraw the infantry from Halifax altogether, and apparently to leave the military defence of that city in the hands of a few artillery men. I think some very substantial reason should be shown for such a change as that, such a departure from the policy of England toward Canada which has continued down to the present time; but so far as I am aware no substantial reason has been given. Of course, honourable gentlemen have learned that nowadays countries going to war do not begin and move forward gently, as they did a hundred years ago or more; perhaps before war is declared the attacking forces are on foot. If Halifax, which is so important as a station for military and naval purposes, were left defenceless, and a war should break out unexpectedly, the place might be carried by a coup de main, and it would be impossible for Canada to recover it. I think that is a matter which deserves a good deal of consideration.

While Montreal has the largest population of any city in Canada, it is not in any sense a strategic point for a military or naval station, and is not calculated to be that. Quebec is such, to a certain extent, but Montreal is not. We should examine the record and should see what England did. I remember when there were British garrisons in Toronto, Montreal, and Quebec as well as in St. John and Halifax; but as the field for imperial action grew larger the troops were gradually withdrawn, first from Toronto and then from Montreal, Quebec and St. John; but England never withdrew her troops from Halifax. Two regiments were retained there up to 1905, when Canada took over the military defence of the place.

Bearing in mind this little history, let us look at the agreement to which my colleague (Hon. Mr. Crosby) has called attention. The transfer of the War Department properties was made in 1906 on the following among other conditions, namely:

(a) That they are held by the Dominion Government for so long as they are required for colonial military purposes, and that when they cease to be used for such purposes they shall revert to the War Department to be disposed of for the entire benefit of the Imperial Government.

That shows that it was not the intention of the Imperial negotiators to transfer the military property in Halifax absolutely to the Dominion, because if it were they could not talk about reverting and about their being seriously altered. Then paragraph f says:

(f) In the event of all, or any, of the property reverting to the Imperial Government the Militia Council will—at the request of the Army Council— arrange for its disposal free of all agency or other charge, and will look after and maintain the property at the expense of the Dominion Government pending its disposal.

The Militia Council here mentioned is the Canadian Council, and the Army Council is the Imperial authority.

So, honourable gentlemen, looking at the history of the case, and at the language used in this transfer, I think it is perfectly clear that it was not the intention of the parties to that negotiation that the garrison should be withdrawn from Halifax, an important strategic point which should not be neglected. As the honourable gentleman who spoke before me (Hon. Mr. Crosby) very properly said, the Dominion Parliament has now provided for a considerable increase in the regular force, sometimes called the permanent force; and when that force is increased there will be no difficulty whatever in assigning a regiment to Montreal, if that is thought desirable, leaving in Halifax the regiment which has been stationed there until now. With respect to this military matter, I feel that what is now proposed—to abandon the garrisoning of Halifax except as regards a few artillerymen, and to transfer the garrison to Montreal—is really, substantially, a breach of faith with the Imperial Government.

Another point made by the honourable gentleman who brought this matter before the House deserves to be made again: That in Halifax we have always accommodated two regiments. All the buildings are there. Although the Wellington barracks suffered somewhat through the explosion, I understand that the necessary repairs have been or are being made, and there would be no difficulty in accommodating two regiments in Halifax again. That is an important point, because building costs very much now, and if the garrison is transferred to Montreal, the newspapers say it is proposed to spend some millions of dollars in providing a barracks in that city—an expenditure which, I think, is entirely unnecessary, as Halifax now has the required accommodation.

I wish to say a few words, on a somewhat broader platform, with respect to the naval question, which has been brought up by the fact that steps have been taken from headquarters in Ottawa to withdraw a very considerable portion of the staffs from Esquimault and Halifax, and the impression appears to be that Canada is going out of the naval business. I hope it is so. What should be the policy of Canada with respect to the navy? Looking at the financial condition of this country, at the tremendous burdens we have to bear, and at the fact that our capacity to bear that burden is almost questionable, we should not go in for spending money on a navy unless it is shown to be absolutely necessary. Honourable gentlemen know that a very small navy will cost a very large sum of money, and, unless it can be shown that a navy is an absolute necessity, I think we should not spend money upon it. I fail to see any necessity for a Canadian navy at the present time. It is easy to understand that before the outbreak of war in 1914 there was something to be said in favour of it. At that time, and for some time previously, Germany had been threatening the maritime supremacy of Great Britain, and the Motherland had to pull herself together, to call in her ships from the various outlying stations, and bring them to the North Sea, and Canada was, in a way, only doing her duty in contributing some other ships to replace those that had been withdrawn. But what is the situation to-day? The German navy which had threatened Britain's supremacy is gone, and the bulk of it is at the bottom of the water at Scapa Flow, while the chief part of the remainder is in the hands of the Allied Powers. I cannot see, therefore, what we need a navy for.

With respect to this question, and also others, I trust I am a loyal subject. I hope I am as loyal as the average Englishman, but I look at this question from the point of view of Canada in the first place. While I am loyal to the Crown, I am loyal to Canada also; and just as an Englishman thinks of the interests of England first, and those of the colonies afterwards, so I think of the interests of Canada first, and of those of Great Britain afterwards. I am afraid there is a tendency amongst a certain class of our population in Canada to think first of England's wishes or fancies, and secondly of the interests of Canada. No one accuses Australia or New Zealand of any lack of proper loyal sentiment, and Lord Jellicoe went to Australia and to New Zealand and laid his proposals before them, and the governments of both countries rejected his proposals. Then he comes and lays proposals, as I understand, before the Government of Canada. I think that we are in a much better position to reject them than either Australia or New Zealand.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Australia and New Zealand have something in the nature of a navy, have they not?

Hon. Mr. POWER: Australia has had a navy for several years. Australia needs a navy. Australia is an island and the people are exposed, or think they are exposed, to attacks from Japan. The position is different from that of Canada.

Then there is this to be borne in mind, that, no matter whether we try to set up a navy or not, as long as England owns so many West India islands and Guiana, and as long as the Panama canal is a waterway, England must and will keep ships in North American waters, and there is no necessity that I can see for Canada keeping ships here too. England will continue to have a very large navy, and that navy will naturally be spread over the face of the waters in all directions. So any naval business that may be necessary can be transacted by the British ships.

The honourable gentleman who brought this matter before the House spoke of Bermuda as being now the summer station of the British West Indian-North American squadron. I think the honourable gentleman was a little in error. No doubt Bermuda is not as warm as Jamaica or any of the other West India islands, but the climate of Bermuda is a very enervating one and it would not serve, as Canada in the past served, as a summer station for the bulk of the British ships. They came to Halifax. Then they came up from Halifax to Quebec, and some of the smaller ships to Montreal. The navy will continue to need a summer station, and Halifax has always been the summer headquarters in North America.

I do not think, honourable gentlemen, that I have anything further to say on this subject except that we should be loyal to Canada first and foremost, then loyal to Great Britain, and that with respect to this naval proposal we should not go into it until a Canadian navy is shown to be absolutely necessary; and up to the present time it does not appear to be necessary and no one has undertaken to show that it is.

Hon. J. G. TURRIFF: Honourable gentlemen, I think it is quite natural for the honourable member from Halifax or any one from the lower provinces to make objection if the garrison is to be removed from Halifax to Montreal. However, there are many of us who are not so much interested in that aspect of the question. Speaking for myself, I am more interested in the extra expenditure that will be required if it is true that the transfer is to be made. I understand from the discussion that has taken place so far that Halifax has all the accommodation necessary for a garrison of one or two battalions. It seems to me—although, I must confess, I am not well posted in the matter—that Halifax is a very good place for the garrison to be located at. If, as I infer from the newspapers, the removal of the garrison to Montreal would necessitate the erection of barracks costing as much as $3,000,000, that would be a move in the wrong direction in the present condition of Canada's finances, and I hope to hear from the honourable leader of the Government a denial of the report that that move is considered necessary or is contemplated. If the garrison is not necessary in Halifax, then, to my mind, it is not necessary at all in Canada. If the garrison is to be removed from Halifax, why not disband it and save so much money? However, I should judge from the agreement between the Government of Canada and the British authorities, which has been read, that, as stated by my honourable friend from Halifax, the removal of the garrison would be rather in the nature of a breach of faith; and it seems to me that if we are going to carry out our agreement the forts and other properties should be handed back to Great Britain, so that the British authorities might maintain the garrison in Halifax if they thought it necessary to do so.

I do not see why it should be necessary to have a large body of soldiers in Montreal. In the last few months it has been decided to increase the strength of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police from 1,000 to 2,500. Their headquarters are at Ottawa. Barracks are to be built at Rockcliffe, and we shall have here a fine large body of men who can be sent out quickly to any part of Canada where there is trouble.

The main consideration that appeals to me in this matter is this. Our expenditure in Canada is tremendously high. We do not know exactly how we are going to meet it. We are the only country in the world that has been deficient in looking after its expenditures. I see that in the month of March alone the United States reduced their debt by $750,000,000, and that Great Britain proposes to reduce her debt this year by £255,000,000 sterling and next year by £300,000,000 sterling. We in Canada, who are always talking about being so rich, are not going to meet our charges this year; We are going to add, I am informed, at least another hundred million dollars to our debt, by borrowings of one sort or another. You may not float a loan, but if you issue treasury bills they have to be paid in just the same way. In view of all these facts it seems to me that it would be good policy for the Government not to go in for the expense of building huge new barracks if they already have accommodation in Halifax, even if Halifax is not as good a location for the garrison as Montreal would be. That is the only consideration that appeals to me. I do not care two straws whether the garrison is at Halifax or at Montreal. Let it be at which ever is the better place, if one does not require a higher cost than the other. But it seems to me that in view of the fact that Halifax has been the home of the garrison for all these years, there should be some very strong reasons for removing it from there, especially if the removal is going to cost money, at a time when we can ill afford to spend it.

Hon. WM. ROCHE: Honourable gentlemen, I do not wish to go further into the details of this subject and the inquiry which has been made; but, before the minister answers the question which my honourable friend has addressed to him, I would like to make a remark or two upon the concrete subject of removal of the Royal Canadian Regiment from Halifax. The wider question of the navy and the army might be reserved for some future occasion on which we could take up the whole subject and discuss it. I will say simply this. The Royal Canadian Regiment in question has been accommodated at one barrack in Halifax. That barrack, I believe, requires, or has had, repairs, and will be fitted for the accommodation of the regiment again. In addition to the barrack for the soldiers, there is a large building, almost equal in size, for the accomodation of the officers. In front, between the two barracks, is a large esplanade which can be used as a reviewing ground and for the exercising of the soldiers. If those facilities had to be provided in another city, like Montreal, a very large amount of money would have to be spent in acquiring a site and in erecting the buildings. Besides, the British Government—or, I suppose, the Canadian Government, under lease from them—have a large number of buildings for the accommodation of the married men; there are fifty or more buildings. To provide similar accommodation in any other city would require a very large amount of money. In addition to that, there is on the Common an exercising ground for the troops, and there is the Citadel Hill, with a large fort on the top of it, and there are outlying batteries outside of Halifax—all of which could be utilized in giving training and exercise to the regiment. Moreover, there is a close connection between the army and the navy, and the army people can understand what naval evolutions are taking place and know something of the routine of the navy. Halifax has also several outlying islands. One that I have particularly in mind is McNab's Island, a large island out near the sea. Upon that there are tents for the soldiers and they can go there in the summer time. It is a very healthful resort and provides ample space for all their military evolutions. Without any exception Halifax is the ideal place for a regiment. There is hospital accommodation and there is ample provision for sanitary arrangements being made if the town should become unhealthy or if an epidemic should break out in the barracks.

With regard to the expense, I do not think that suitable accommodation, or accommodation equal to that already available in Halifax, could be procured in Montreal for an expenditure of less than $10,000,000; and as the Halifax site, with all these advantages and facilities that I have endeavoured brieby to describe, with all its historical elements and its connection with the naval efforts, is far superior to any other site that I know of in Canada, it would be folly for the Government—I do not know that the Government would be singular in this act of folly, but I should say it would be a crowning act of folly for the Government at a great expense to take away the regiment from the place to which it has been accustomed, which is adequately fitted for it, and which can be improved to an infinite extent.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Has it not been the universal custom not to leave a regiment more than a certain number of years in any one town?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: It was the custom of the British Government to inure the soldiers to different climates. The soldiers were sent from one place to another. The British Government sent them out to the West Indies, and when they were diseased in the West Indies they were brought to Halifax to recover. It would be the same with Montreal; after the soldiers went there and became diseased, they would be brought back to Halifax.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I have seen no statement from the Government explaining its action in regard to moving the garrison from Halifax to Montreal. I am not even sure that the Government intends to remove to Montreal the regiment now stationed in Halifax. But I know this much, that it has apparently been decided that a regiment shall be stationed in Montreal. I know that, because the General Officer Commanding the division has applied to the city council of Montreal for a certain number of acres in a park in the east or northeast end of Montreal, stating that accommodation would be needed for 1,000 men, and at the same time asking for the use of a building which is now on the grounds and which would house a certain number of soldiers. It was explained that a number of houses would have to be built for married soldiers. The figure of $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 was mentioned as the capital expenditure. That is an official statement which I think we shall find will not be controverted. As I have stated, I do not know what actuated the Government to make this change. I surmise that up to 1914-18, the danger be a foreign one, it was considered desirable to have a regiment stationed in Halifax, but that since 1918, the dangers being possibly internal or domestic, owing to the changed conditions and the unrest which prevails in large centres of population, the Government has felt the need of maintaining soldiers in places like Montreal rather than in a quiet, sedate place like Halifax. If these are the reasons which have actuated the Government, there may be good ground for their action.

But should not the Government apply its policy in such a way as to save every dollar it can? If the Government decides that it is better and safer policy to have a garrison of 1,000 men near a large centre which in the near future may have a population of 1,000,000 with a foreign element of 15 or 20 per cent, rather than to have the garrison located a thousand miles away, I have nothing to say against that decision; but I would point out to the Government that in the carrying out of such a policy it could save millions of dollars by using the barracks at St. Johns, on the Richelieu river, which were built in 1844, I think, by the Royal Engineers, and have since been enlarged. During the war more than a thousand men were housed and received their training there before being moved eastward. There are splendid grounds around those barracks, and it seems to me that if the Government wants to have a thousand men within striking distance of Montreal, the purpose in view could be served by having them at a distance of 45 minutes by rail, just as well as by having them at the extreme east end of Montreal. In fact, it would take 40 or 45 minutes for the troops to march to the centre of the city from the place they would be located in Maisonneuve Park.

I have risen simply for the purpose of emphasizing what has been pointed out by some of my colleagues who have just preceded me, namely, the importance of the Government economizing as much as possible. It is all very well to say that we have immense undeveloped resources, but we all know that those immense undeveloped resources are not taxable to-day, nor will they be taxable to-morrow. We are facing an immense deficit. Why should we go into an expenditure of millions, when we have within a half-an-hour of the city splendid barracks which are capable of quartering the men that are now to be housed in the city of Montreal?

I say likewise that it is no time for Canada to spend millions with a light heart to create and develop a navy. We should have a chance to breathe a little. Canada has increased her debt by two billions, and we do not yet know where the money will come from to meet the annual interest on that charge. Should we not wait until we have adjusted our finances before discussing the question of a navy? Why should we launch into this venture and increase our expenditure by $10,000,000 a year? To me it is an inexplicable folly.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I do not profess to be able to discuss this subject in any sense as a military strategist, or even from the standpoint of military science. We have to rely on the Department of Militia to advise us under such conditions as have been pointed out by the honourable gentlemen who have referred to the defences of Halifax, and especially to the agreement entered into between the Imperial authorities and our own Government.

I submitted the question which was placed upon the Order Paper by my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Crosby) to the militia authorities, and they informed me as follows:

> Since the withdrawal of the Imperial troops there has never been at Halifax a complete battalion of the Permanent Force; and since Germany collapsed, the strategical importance of the fortress has declined; the centre of interest has shifted from the North Atlantic to the North Pacific. It is therefore considered safe to reduce to one company the strength of the Royal Canadian regiment at Halifax; and there is no agreement which that reduction would violate. When the fortress was taken over from the Imperial Government no stipulation was made as to the standard of defence to be maintained.

It will be observed from the agreement itself, which the honourable gentleman from Halifax was good enough to place on Hansard, that the defence of Halifax is a subject to be determined not by the Imperial authorities but by this Government, and that the condition upon which the Halifax property is held is based entirely on maintaining such a defence as may in the judgment of the Canadian government be considered wise. This property was never handed over to the Canadian authorities in fee simple, or with the view of the Imperial authorities divesting themselves of ownership. We are simply holding it for the purposes of such defence as the Government of Canada may think fit. It is of the essence of this agreement, as will be found in paragraph A of the agreement, that these properties will be held by the Dominion Government so long as they are required for colonial military purposes, and that when they cease to be used for such purposes they shall revert to the War Department, to be disposed of for the entire benefit of the Imperial Government. The subsequent paragraphs, B, C, D, E, F, and G, are all practically of this essence.

I do not know whether my honourable friend from Halifax contends that the Royal Canadian Regiment is a Halifax regiment. I understand that is not the case. Before the Imperial authorities handed over this particular property, the Royal Canadian Regiment had been organized and was distributed throughout the different parts of Canada. But, since the transfer to the Canadian Government that regiment was mobilized in Halifax, and has been subject to the disposition of the militia authorities of Canada. I quite agree with what my honourable friend from DeLorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has so forcibly pointed out, that it may be more necessary to keep in one of our large centres a large number of troops than to maintain, as was formerly done, the defences of Halifax. At the present time we have more to fear from internal disturbances than from attacks which may be made from outside. Conditions brought about by the late great war have caused unrest in almost every country; and almost every country that was in any way affected by the war has to work out to-day the very serious problem of how to maintain internal conditions. That, I venture to say, is the most important problem that we in Canada shall have to face in the next five or six years. I do not apprehend, and I fancy that no honourable gentleman here would apprehend, any difficulty from outside. But it is very essential that in large centres of population throughout the country we should have a sufficient number of troops to maintain that authority which is consistent with law and order.

I do not know that I can say anything further on this subject. I accept the statement furnished me by the Department of Militia and Defence as a complete answer to the inquiry placed on the Order Paper by my honourable friend from Halifax.

Hon. A. B. CROSBY: I desire to say a word or two in reply to the statement of the minister. I ask the leave of the House, because I do not want to do anything that would not be in accord with the views of the House. The reply read by the minister states that a company of the regiment will remain in Halifax. A company numbers about 200 men, I think.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: One hundred.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Say 125, and compromise.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I think it is 200. The companies are bigger in Halifax than anywhere else. Let me say that at least 1,000 men are required there to take care of the property that is now vested in the Imperial Government through the Dominion Government. There are the fortifications, there is McNab's island, which was referred to by the honourable member from Halifax (Hon. (Mr. Roche), and there are I suppose half-a-dozen military boats, two of which run regularly from the King's wharf in Halifax down to the forts. In one of these forts, called the Spion Kop, it is claimed they have guns that have a range of 16 miles. When my honourable friend from Halifax said that the enemy expected to take Halifax on several occasions, he might have said that it was not done because they were afraid to come near it. It was so fortified that there was no possibility of getting near it. Before the United States came into the war,we had at times from 80 to 150 ships in Bedford basin being examined. Those ships and their cargoes were examined by experts from the United Kingdom and from Canada. Everything was searched and looked into. Even Trotzky came there, and if the British authorities had done what they should have done Tratzky would not be living to-day, and there would be no trouble with him. He did enough in Halifax to warrant his execution. He complained very much of the way his baggage was examined, and because he was put to the trouble of going through an examination.

In addition to the properties I have already mentioned, there is the Wellington barracks and Citadel Hill. Any one spending any time in Halifax would not fail to see those places. Then there is Artillery Park, and the Cemetery. All those properties require men to look after them, apart from the necessity of having a garrison to repel any foreign attack..

My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has referred to the necessity of having a regiment at Montreal. I do not object to a regiment being stationed at Montreal. The Minister of Militia and Defence has the right to establish an army of 10,000 men, and there will be plenty of soldiers for Montreal. Conditions must be very bad in Montreal. If they need a regiment in Montreal when we are going to have 2,000 mounted police in Ottawa, something very dastardly must be expected.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: There is a big population.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Yes, there will be a big population if you have 2,000 soldiers here and another 1,000 or 2,000 in Montreal. However, I am not complaining of that. What I say is, that under the agreement we are bound to notify the Imperial authorities before withdrawing that regiment from Halifax. When the Dominion Government took over the troops at Halifax there was not only the Royal Canadian regiment, which numbered between 1,000 and 1,200 men, but we had one or two companies of Royal Engineers. I am informed that at Point Pleasant you can go underground, out of sight of everybody, and by means of some sort of contrivance you can tell the exact location of a ship coming towards the harbour, and that by the operation of some device with which I am not familiar, by merely touching a button, you can blow her to pieces. If that is the case, is it not wise to keep the defences that did not cost us a cent, in proper condition? Is it not right to keep a regiment there? If we decide that it is not, I say that at all events we should inform the Imperial authorities that we have abandoned Halifax as a garrison city of the Dominion of Canada and of the Empire, and should hand the property back and let them say whether or not they will put a regiment there. The answer which we have heard is no answer to the agreement which I cited.

The discussion concluded.

TRUST COMPANIES BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 38, an Act to amend the Trust Companies Act, 1914. Hon. Mr. McMeans in the chair.

Subject 1—definition:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As I explained yesterday, this Bill merely makes provision for an annual inspection of all trust companies somewhat similar to the inspection of insurance companies by the Superintendent of Insurance.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—examination and report on condition of companies:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would like to ask the leader of the Government whether under the proposed arrangement the superintendent will have authority to say when a company may commence business. I understand that in the past certain irregularities have occurred in regard to trust companies —that some of them proceeded to do business when they had not complied with the Act, and that afterwards it was found that all the transactions of the company were illegal. I think that is a very serious matter. If there is no provision in the Act, I think some arrangement should be made whereby the superintendent would have the right to refuse to allow a company to proceed to do business until it was shown that the conditions under which the charter was granted had been complied with.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think there can be the slightest doubt that a trust company cannot proceed to do business, any more than could an insurance company, without securing the authority of the Finance Department. The powers of the company are defined either by the letters patent which it may receive, or by the special Act which it may obtain from Parliament. All those companies are under the control of the Insurance Branch of the Finance Department.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The other day I received a letter pointing out that in the winding up of a trust company in British Columbia it was discovered that the company had proceeded to do business before properly complying with the Act, in the matter of putting up the necessary cash. In the interests of the public it is very important that such a serious breach of the law should be prevented in future.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, a company may do business surreptitiously, but in the Trust Companies Act as it is today no trust company can obtain letters patent; they must come under the provisions of that Act, which is the authority.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: What would be the scope of an inquiry by the Finance Department into a trust company? Could the inspector, or an official designated for that purpose, inquire into the value of mortgages or other securities? Of course, the usual examination is by document—there are so many thousands of dollars here and so many there; but now that there may be a transition in the values, would the investigation by the Finance Department go further in the case of trust companies?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, precisely as they would examine into the securities of an insurance company. In further answer to my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock), who asked as to the authority under which a trust company must act, I would refer him to section 13 of the Trust Companies Act, which makes provision that a company shall not commence business or exercise any of the powers conferred under section 62 of that Act until it has obtained from the Minister of Finance a certificate permitting it to do so, and no application for such a certificate can be made, and no certificate issued, until satisfactory evidence has been submitted to the minister on affidavit of the company's officers. The particulars of the evidence that must be submitted are given in the Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The necessity for such inspection is so apparent that I would suggest to the honourable leader of the Government that in the annual conferences between the Federal Government and the provinces this matter should be taken up, in order to incite the provinces to establish uniform modes of inspection of their own provincial trust companies, and thus afford complete security to the public. Although the provinces believe that they have the exclusive right of legislating in this matter, they would surely be agreeable to such uniformity as to give such protection as this inspection woud ensure to those who deal with federal companies.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I quite agree with what my honourable friend has said; but the provinces seem to be reluctant in regard to all companies of this kind, to enter into any uniform arrangement between themselves and the Federal Government. If I had my way I should have some uniform system by which all companies would be incorporated in Canada, in the different provinces, under one General Act. To-day we have the anomaly of each province legislating for itself, and incorporating companies which do business all through Canada, so that the public have to familiarize themselves with all the company law of the different provinces. That remark applies to loan companies and trust companies. It is only by a process of evolution that we can bring about even the advanced legislation contained in this Bill, because up to the present time it has been most difficult to get public opinion to consent to a proper inspection of loan and trust companies.

Section 2 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to, and the Bill was reported without amendment.

LOAN COMPANIES BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 3, an Act to amend the Loan Companies Act, 1914. Hon. Mr. McSweeney in the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This Bill is substantially the same as the preceding. It deals with the inspection of loan companies, such inspection to be of the same character as in relation to trust companies.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Can my honourable friend tell us whether these loan companies are allowed to take money on deposit, in the same way as banks?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: They do, anyway.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot tell my honourable friend, but I will find out to-morrow. Of course, it is a well-known fact that all the loan companies have been doing that kind of thing in the different provinces, but whether we prohibit them from taking money on deposit I cannot say at the moment.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I think it is generally regulated by the charter they get on a joint-stock basis; but some of them get special powers, through different legislatures, to take money on deposit. I do not think there is any Dominion legislation. They might possibly get a special Act from the Dominion Parliament giving that power, or they might become incorporated provincially under the Joint Stock Companies Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: A Dominion company cannot now be incorporated without coming under this Act. As to whether this Act expressly prohibits them from accepting money on deposit I cannot say; if it does, I do not know but that the company, by way of borrowing, could take a deposit, agreeing to pay a certain percentage on it. However, I will make enquiry to-morrow and find out what the provision is.

Sections 1, 2, and new section 70A were agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to, and the Bill was reported without amendment.

CIVIL SERVICE INSURANCE BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 58, an Act to amend the Civil Service Insurance Act. Hon. Mr. McMeans in the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The object of this Bill is to increase the maximum policy issued by the Government to $10,000. At the present time it is $5,000. The fund is self-supporting.

On section 1—authority to insure extended to persons in navy:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The first section is for the purpose of extending the insurance?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, to persons in the navy.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Did I not understand that all our naval forces had been disbanded or abolished lately?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, simply superfluous members of the force, I think. We have a sufficient number to maintain the defence of the country at the present time, and it can be extended to them. Originally, however, this should have been extended to the naval as well as the military service.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend assures us that all the superfluous naval men have been dispersed, then we need not concern ourselves very much about the balance, because it will be nil.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The naval men have not been insured at all up to this time?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, it only extended to the civil and military employees of the Government.

Section 1 was agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 were agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to, and the Bill was reported without amendment.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 6, 1920.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

Bill M3, an Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.—Hon. Mr. Beaubien.

BOARDS OF CONCILIATION.

ALLEGED INCORRECT RETURN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, I would crave the indulgence of the House for a moment to make an observation concerning a statement made by the honourable member for Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) the day before yesterday. I had intended doing this yesterday, but was called out to the telephone while the honourable member from Toronto was speaking and I missed the opportunity. I had hoped to do it while he was present in the House. He is not present to-day. The honourable member stated that he had asked for a return of certain information to be supplied by the Department of Labour; that the report was brought down, and he questioned the coreotness of it. I think it is but fair that I should have the opportunity of stating to the House that the report as brought down was absolutely correct. The honourable member from Toronto overlooked one important matter, else he would not have raised the question. He noted in the return what he thought was an omission, namely, the Board of Conciliation that was appointed in the year 1918 to deal with a dispute between the Canadian General Electric Company and its employees. That was not mentioned in the report brought down, for the reason that during the war period industries engaged in the manufacture of war materials were, by Order in Council under the War Measures Act, brought within the scope of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and for the purposes of this Act during the period of the war they were regarded as public utilities. Therefore, inasmuch as the honourable gentleman's question referred only to boards that had been established in industries other than public utilities, the board to which he specifically refers was not included in the report, the industry being a public utility within the meaning of the Act at that time. I desire to correct the impression which the honourable member's remarks doubtless left on the minds of honourable members, namely, that the report brought down was not wholly correct. I desire to assure the House that it was.

TRUST COMPANIES BILL.

Bill 38, an Act to amend the Trust Companies Act, 1914.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

CIVIL SERVICE INSURANCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

(Bill 58, an Act to amend the Civil Service Insurance Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

GRAND TRUNK AGREEMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 54, an Act to confirm the agreement dated the 8th day of March, 1920, between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the said Grand Trunk Railway Company, except the four per cent guaranteed stock. Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 1—alterations in schedule to agreement:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I understand that this clause is for the purpose of correcting an error in the agreement. I would like to ask the leader of the Government, in regard to the Vermont and Province Line Railroad Company, whether when the Grand Trunk Bill was before this House last session there was a considerable liability against the road which was likely to fall upon the Grand Trunk Railway Company or upon the Government in connection with some lawsuit by reason of that company not having carried out the provisions of the charter that it holds in the United States. This is a matter of importance to the people of Canada. We do not know very much about this question; we are falling heir to it through assuming to run roads in another country. That raises the important question of the liabilities and difficulties that we are taking upon ourselves by the action of the Government with regard to this agreement.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot tell my honourable friend whether there is any litigation pending. It is sufficient, it seems to me, that we are this much ahead, that we are getting a railway that we did not expect to get. While it is of standard gauge, the same gauge as the Grand Trunk railway system, it is not quite so long. It is about three miles in length.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Does it run?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As the Grand Trunk controls 100 per cent of the stock, it seems to me that we might as well take it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: With all its liabilities?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Will the honourable gentleman tell us what the liabilities are?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: On a road only three miles in length they would not be very great.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: On a road with a terminal they might. Three miles of the Grand Trunk going into the city of Montreal is valued at $10,000,000.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, we are getting a very valuable property there.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the value of it?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I take my honourable friend's statement as to that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What is the change from the position of last year?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Vermont and Province Line Railroad Company was omitted from the agreement of last year, and we are now including it in the agreement. It is a property that is transferred by the Grand Trunk to the Government.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why was it omitted before?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It was done by mistake. The Grand Trunk holds 100 per cent of the stock. Then there is the Pembroke Southern Railway Company which appeared as a leased road. That is a mistake. The road is controlled by the Grand Trunk holding a majority of the stock, and it is to correct that mistake that that road is being included in this Bill. As I pointed out, there was also a slight omission which could scarcely be said to be material, in regard to some of the notices served upon the stockholders. There were some stockholders in Canada, eight of whom had authorized notice to be served on their agents in London. Two had not, and they did not receive the regular notice.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: How long is this road?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Vermont and Province Line railroad is about 3 miles long. It is on the other side of the line. I cannot tell the honourable gentleman exactly where it is, but it is in the state of Vermont, I understand.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Does the Government not assume certain responsibilities in taking over this Vermont line? I was under the impression last year, when we were told that the annual sum for which Canada would be liable under this agreement would not exceed $5,000,000—that that included everything. Now it appears that that did not include the liabilities arising in a case like this. I think the House is entitled to full information on a question of that sort.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This will not exceed the maximum liability of the Government. The finding of the arbitrators cannot exceed the maximum amount fixed by statute.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Notwithstanding the addition of these things that were forgotten?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It strikes me as being a little careless, to say the least, to leave out a whole railroad, even though it were only 3 miles long, and to not know whether it is owned or leased. How long is the Pembroke Southern Railway?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: About 25 miles.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It looks, because they were so anxious to get rid of it and to unload it on the Government, as if it did not amount to much.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I would like to ask the leader of the Government if these two roads are mortgaged; that is if there are outstanding bonds on these roads?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Even though there were bonds on these roads, that would not necessarily make the Government liable for payment on the bonds. If the roads were encumbered for more than their value, the Government would readily let them go; but if they are not encumbered for their full value, or not at all, it is manifestly to the advantage of the Government to have them. Had the facts as they appear before us to-day appeared on the face of the agreement last session, I am sure that it would not have altered the decision of Parliament in any way.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not know where the agreement says that the Government can let go of anything that it is not suited with. Why do they not let go of the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I understand that the Government assumes all the liabilities of the Grand Trunk.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am in absolute agreement with my honourable friend. Any of these subsidiary companies that have maintained their entity may be allowed to go into the hands of a liquidator. The Government may take no responsibility; but I ask my honourable friend if the same thing could not have been done with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and liquidation allowed to take place? If that had been done we would not now have been facing the tremendous responsibility that we are assuming in these times of stress.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think I said last year that you might abandon a road like that. But there is almost a multitude of these small roads lying in the United States, and if you undertake to throw out what does not pay and to hold what does pay, you may find that that will affect the treatment you will receive all along the line of the Grand Trunk in the United States. While it is legally possible to take that position, I do not know that it is a practical policy. You may have to make good these bonds.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I would like to direct attention to paragraph 10 of the agreement, regarding undisclosed liabilities. I assume that the result of this is that the Government is bound to pay these liabilities when disclosed, and that the only remedy provided is that in paragraph 10. Construing that, it seems to put upon the Government the obligation of paying all the now undisclosed liabilities, whatever the amount, over and above the limit of $5,000,000 interest per annum. They are bound to pay all the liabilities of these companies whatever they amount to, and the only remedy is to ask the arbitrators to take that into account, and to reduce the award if they feel so disposed. But there is primarily a liability on the part of the Government to pay all the liabilities, now disclosed or still undisclosed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am afraid my honourable friend misapprehends clause 10 of the agreement. That clause has a precedent in the agreement between the Government and the Canadian Northern. I may say that clause originated in the Senate, and was inserted in the Canadian Northern agreement for the protection of the Government. It fixed a maximum of liability under the award, the intention being that the arbitrators should not have the right to fix an award greater than a maximum sum which we determined, and which was accordingly expressed in that agreement. In this agrement we have inserted practically the same provision.

Last session a disclosure of the liabilities of the Grand Trunk was made, so far as they could be determined. We provided that if a full disclosure of those liabilities had not been made, or were not made at the time of the award, such liabilities as were disclosed thereafter should be practically deducted from the award, and the award reduced by that amount.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If the arbitrators say so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If the liabilities are undisclosed, and within the period mentioned in clause 10 they become disclosed, they must be deducted from the award.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If the arbitrators say so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is an instruction to the arbitrators to amend the award accordingly. It is manifestly for the protection of the Government, and would work out in the way that I have indicated. Let me further say, in regard to any liabilities which may exist in connection with those two roads, that those liabilities would come in under the same clause. Consequently the Government cannot be damnified in any way by reason of those liabilities. It might become a question whether the roads had any margin of valuation in them. That of course is to be determined hereafter. We could not determine it here to-day, even if we knew the extent of the liabilities. But these cannot be added to the liability of the Government.

The Deputy Minister of Railways is here, and, with the consent of the Senate, I would ask him to come within the bar.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend said a moment ago that last year the amount of the liabilities was disclosed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will not say with exactitude, but an idea was given as to the amount of the debenture indebtedness, etc., against each road embraced in the agreement.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Has my honourable friend those figures at hand?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have not. The Deputy Minister informs me that there is nothing against those roads more than the ordinary liabilities as to the actual cost of construction. The Vermont and Province line railroad is really a siding about three miles in length.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: How much is there of that?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have not that information.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does my honourable friend maintain that primarily the Government is not bound to pay the obligations of these different railways, whatever they amount to, whether disclosed or to be undisclosed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The Government is liable to pay?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. My contention is that it is voluntary on the part of the Government to pay off those liabilities. If the Government should choose to let any particular road go into the hands of the creditors and be wound up in the usual way, the Government can exercise its right so to do just the same as the Grand Trunk.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: But the Government cannot be insolvent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If a road is insolvent, if it does not possess a value beyond the liabilities, then there is no reason why the Government should keep it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Those are all separate corporations?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. But the Government does not enter into any specific obligation for the payment of any of the liabilities.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It might be inexpedient to do that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, it might.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It might be bad politics.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, if it were necessary, the Government would pay off the liabilities.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I want to place on record my advice, or my suggestion, to the Government. I do not know whether it will be considered or not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will receive every consideration, I assure you.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I desire to make the suggestion anyway, on behalf of the public. I would very strongly urge the Government not to pay liabilities not yet disclosed, whatever they may amount to.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—agreement as corrected ratified:

Hon. J. P. B. CASGRAIN: I do not know whether this agreement would have been carried by the shareholders if there had been added to the Bill a certain provision which gave rise to considerable debate in another place. We all remember that in 1910 there was a strike on the Grand Trunk which tied up the system from Chicago to Portland. The Minister of Labour at that time, the present leader of the Opposition, and the late Sir Frederick Borden acted as mediators between the men and the Grand Trunk Company, and they succeeded in having the men taken back. No mention at all was made at that time of pensions. The men were reinstated, with their seniority rights. I am informed that some of those men had been in the employ of the company and participating in the pension fund for over thirty years, and they fully understood that in being reinstated they were not losing any of the advantages they had enjoyed; that they were being put back as they were before, as old employees, not as new men, and without losing their seniority rights. Now, I have asked the Minister of Labour to be present, because I would like to know his opinion about this. There are three alternatives, honourable gentlemen: first, that the pensions shall be forfeited; secondly, that we shall insert in this Bill—and this is the very last chance we have for doing it—a clause whereby the company shall be called upon to carry out the understanding then reached and to pay those pensions; thirdly, that the Government, that is, the taxpayers, will pay those pensions. These are the three alternatives regarding which I would ask the Minister of Labour to give us his opinion in a little while.

The Minister of Justice in another place declared, as we read in all the newspapers, that the men may not have a legal right to those pensions. But there is a moral right, and it would be infinitely better for the country to pay those pensions than for this Parliament to usurp the functions of the courts of justice of the land and declare, without hearing the parties, that the Grand Trunk shareholders should be mulcted for the amount of the pensions. The amount is not disclosed. No one has been able to tell what it is, although there has been in another place a debate which lasted nearly two days. However, we are face to face with this situation, that a grave injustice has been done. The late C. M. Hays—de mortuis nil nisi bonum—came across to Canada from the adjoining Republic, and sometimes pretty sharp things are done to the south of the 45th parallel. He never mentioned this pension business, but afterwards, a long time afterwards, he declared that he could not reinstate those men in their pension rights because the Provident Fund of the Grand Trunk Railway Company did not allow for the paying of those pensions, as there was not continuity of service. Now, if the Grand Trunk had been willing to do justice to those men—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Which men?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The employees, the strikers. If the Grand Trunk had been willing to do justice to them, it could easily have been arranged and the necessary power could have been obtained from Parliament. So that contention does not hold good at all. However, I may say that the then Government refused to have anything further to do with the Grand Trunk Company until they gave justice by implementing their word and carrying out the understanding. These are the facts that are before us.

It was most clearly demonstrated, and it has not been denied in any of the discussion that has taken place, that there had been no talk of these pensions at all. The men were put back in their places with all their rights, whatever they might be. However, the Minister of Justice, as you can see by the papers, did a great deal of special pleading; but he would not take one side or the other, and he said it would be injudicious for Parliament to saddle the shareholders with this; and, I may say, the Minister of the Interior said about the same thing. Now, we know that we in this country are in a terrible mess with this railway business; the blame belongs where it belongs. Twenty years ago we had some 16,000 miles of railway—

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Who was in power 20 years ago?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Wait a minute. Twenty years ago we had some 16,000 miles of railway. That meant one mile for every 300 inhabitants. That was already quite a large mileage. But the country evidently could stand it, and the railways were able to pay dividends. Ten years later the mileage had increased to about 25,000 miles. Then we had one mile of railway for every 284 persons in the country. That was a difference of only 16 persons per mile, because during those ten years the population had increased from something over 5,000,000 to more than 7,000,000. You will see that under the former administration there were just as many persons per mile of railway owing to the natural increase of population and to the immigration coming into Canada we had not overbuilt. But ten years ago or thereabouts there was a change. What happened? The immigration stopped. Do you think that railway building stopped? We went on building railroads even more than before, and, according to the Drayton-Acworth report, we were loaded down with 40,000 miles of road, enough to go around the earth at the equator one and a half times. Therefore that was the time when we should have stopped railroad building. But that was the very time we went on building more than ever before, and at the time the Drayton-Acworth report was submitted, about five years ago, there were only 187 persons in the country for every mile of railway.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Would the honourable gentleman tell us the exact mileage that was built after 1911?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: After 1911? I have just said about 15,000 miles.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Where was it?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Will the honourable gentleman give me time to explain where it was? I shall be very glad to do so. I think the honourable gentleman should not ask this question when, as we know, he was himself the very person who with Mr. Gutelius investigated this matter. The honourable gentleman is very facetious in asking me that question. He is supposed to know and he got well paid to know.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think the honourable member for Hamilton should have put the question in a different way. He should have asked: who made the contracts for the building of the roads that were built after 1911?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am very glad to answer that too. The Canadian Northern went at that time as far as Edmonton. Now, what broke the back of the Canadian Northern was to build from Edmonton to Vancouver across the Rocky mountains. I will ask, who subsidized that road? Who contributed anything to it, and what did this administration do? Did they give one subsidy to that road? Did they give two subsidies or three subsidies? They gave four subsidies to that road—a thing unheard of. And where was it built? Within a stone's throw of the road that was already there, the Grand Trunk Pacific. For 360 miles, from Edmonton to Lucerne, at the top of the Rocky mountain, the two roads, two beautiful roads, ran just parallel—and nobody in the country! And I may just tell you this, honourable gentlemen, it does not matter if we take a little time on this thing. Remember that every day we postpone taking over that Grand Trunk railway we are saving the country at least $80,000; that is $3,000 an hour. So there is no hurry in taking it over. We have plenty of time to discuss it.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I would ask the hon. gentleman to tell us how we are saving $80,000 a day by delaying the taking over of the Grand Trunk.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am very glad that question has been put, because that gives me a chance to explain that also, and this is the very simple explanation. The Grand Trunk railway, administered like a comic opera, as government railways have been administered, will have a big deficit. I predicted the other deficits, and I have been on the conservative side every time. The Grand Trunk railway, under Government control, will have a deficit of $30,000,000 a year, with present rates.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: The Grand Trunk proper?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The Grand Trunk proper will have a deficit. I stake my reputation on this: I thoroughly believe the Grand Trunk in twelve months of Government ownership will have a deficit of at least $30,000,000; and, honourable gentlemen, if we are here next session, twelve months hence, we shall see whether I am right or not.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Mr. Speaker, and honourable gentlemen,—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Will the honourable gentleman sit down?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Here is an honourable gentleman making predictions and telling us what is going to happen to the Grand Trunk, and everybody knows he does not know very much about the Grand Trunk and does not know what he is talking about. We want to learn something; we do not want to sit here all day listening to a man jabbering—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Chairman, he has no right to interrupt.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I will have an opportunity of getting after him later.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Thirty million dollars a year makes over $2,000,000 a month; it makes over $80,000 a day. So that is what will be the loss.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Do you distinguish between the Grand Trunk and the rest of the system, or does that mean the whole system?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am talking about the total mileage of the old Grand Trunk Company in Canada and in the United States.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Just that?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Just that, and we shall see who is right.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not wish to interrupt my honourable friend, particularly as he is saving the country $3,000 an hour, I understand, and therefore he might go on for some time and we should be that much money ahead. But I think that we committed ourselves to the policy of this Bill when it passed its second reading, and my honourable friend is clearly out of order in discussing the policy of the whole question. Under section 1 we are simply discussing the question whether or not we shall amend this schedule by adding the two roads in question.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: We are on section 2.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The question of ratifying the agreement.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, simply the question of ratification.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I said that if the Senate, in ratifying the agreement, had in its wisdom added a provision respecting pensions, it would affect the rights of the shareholders. Naturally, if those pensions were to be paid, the shareholders would get that much less.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You were talking of the general railway situation.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I was drawn into that: I was not going into that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would like to know the honourable gentleman on this side of the House who handed those notes to my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It was my own brief.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: When the branch roads were taken over by the Canadian National Railway, were the employees taken care of in regard to pensions?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No. The Grand Trunk came before Parliament in 1907 and asked permission to take out of their earnings a certain amount to create a pension fund—they called it a provident fund—for their employees. The Grand Trunk railway is the only railway, so far as I know, that has such a fund. That fund has been in existence since the eighties, and in 1907 they were allowed to add to it out of the earnings of the road.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The Government railway has a fund exactly the same, and the case of the men on the branch lines would be even stronger, because they were never strikers, but always loyal servants.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Are they losing their pensions also?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I understand they are losing their pensions.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Clause 17 of the agreement states:

> In no case shall any acquired rights or vested interests in either the pension system or the Insurance and Provident Society be affected.

So they get their pension; it is only those unfortunate strikers of 1910 who lose their pension.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But that does not apply to those men on branch roads which were taken over by the National system?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am only speak- about July, 1910, when the agreement was entered into, which was witnessed by two ministers of the Crown, by which the men were to be reinstated with their seniority rights; and after they were reinstated they were denied their right to the pensions, and to this day they have not got them. The Government of that day refused to have anything further to do with the Grand Trunk Railway Company until they gave satisfaction or justice to those people in accordance with the agreement entered into. That is all I am saying.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: How many were there?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I cannot tell you. We have the Minister of Labour present, and I would like to ask him which of these three alternatives is to be followed —whether the pensions are to be forfeited, whether he is going to amend this Bill in such a way that those men will get their pensions, or whether the country is going to be taxed for them? The honourable gentleman is a prominent member of the Labour party, and that party is becoming very powerful in the country at present—and I will add that if there were no strikes for five years a great many of the leaders of the Labour party and walking delegates would be out of employment, and they would have to go and work like everybody else. One of the arguments made in another place against paying these pensions was that the labour leaders had said: "Oh, the men don't care for the pension." Of course, labour agitators do not like a system of pensions, because the hope of receiving a pension for continuous employment has prevented many men from going on strike, and they are all the happier for it. The labour agitators do not like anything that prevents a strike. I do not say this because I am against labour, for I am just as good a friend of labour as any one here; I was the first one in this House to propose the eight-hour day, and I made a long speech on it, but got very little sympathy. I was the first one in this House to say that men should be paid semi-monthly. But the Labour party is travelling altogether too fast for me: I must confess that I cannot keep up with it. There are too many labour leaders and they are too ambitious, and I will welcome the day when a man will arise in this country and free labour from the tyranny of unionism.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON: Inasmuch as my honourable friend has indicated so directly that he desired some remarks from the Minister of Labour upon this question, I feel like gratifying his desire if the House will spend a little time—not for the purpose of using the question as a political football, as has unfortunately been done in times past, but in order calmly and impartially to state the truth, if I can.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: You will have many honourable gentlemen listening to you.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The honourable gentleman who has just spoken referred to the fact that in 1910 a strike occurred on the Grand Trunk railway, and that the then Minister of Labour and the then Minister of Militia succeeded in having the men who were out on strike reinstated. He points out that the question of the payment of pensions did not come prominently to the front when those men retired from the service, nor did that question arise for some time. I want to show that the honourable gentleman's information is quite erroneous. That strike occurred in July or August, 1910, and, notwithstanding the fact that the Government of that day continued for nearly a year and a half afterwards, 200 Grand Trunk conductors and trainmen were out of service until about January, 1912. I took occasion only to-day to look into the files and get an idea of what did actually take place, because my honourable friend spoke to me yesterday, as he told the House, and I found that voluminous correspondence had passed between officers representing those employees and the Department of Labour. Evidence was submitted clearly indicating that the promises and pledges made by the then management of the Grand Trunk had not been fulfilled; but, notwithstanding that great pressure had been brought to bear on the Labour Department of that day, it was only in 1912 that the question was taken up. It was then found that of the 200 men whom Judge Barron, the commissioner appointed to investigate their complaints after the strike, had found should be reinstated, 138 had not been reinstated. Pressure was brought to bear, which I need not go into in detail, and it proved sufficient to cause the reinstatement of those 138 men forthwith—an action which I submit might have been taken a year and a half before. It was somewhat of a surprise to me that the honourable gentleman should attempt to bring up this matter on the floor of the House for the purpose of throwing mud at the Government because of lack of interest in or sympathy for those railway men.

That, however, has nothing whatever to do with the question of pensions. It was not until February, 1914, that the subject of pensions arose, when a conductor in the province of Ontario, whose name I think I could find, was disqualified from further service in the Grand Trunk employ because of failing eyesight, and he made an application to the company to be retired upon his pension. He was one of the employees who had participated in the strike trouble of 1910, and he was informed that because his service had not been continuous, but had been broken by that short interval when he was on strike, he was not entitled to the pension consideration. Subsequently cases of a similar nature arose. Men being retired because of having reached the age limit, or for physical infirmities such as occurred in the case cited, found themselves exactly in the same position. The railroad organizations representing those classes of men—conductors and trainmen—took this question up with the management, and endeavoured to obtain fair and equitable adjustment of the difficulty. The record indicates that a good deal of sympathy existed in the minds of the subordinate officers of the Grand Trunk railway, but that the manager of that day did not see the question in the same light, and adhered to the original stand that had been taken. It was pointed out to the management that there was no precedent for their action, and that they had specifically agreed to reinstate those men in the service and restore to them all their promotion and seniority rights, which undoubtedly carried also the right to their pension payments, the same as in the case of any other employee, had they not been removed from service.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Pension was not mentioned in this agreement, was it?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Was there a clause in the provision saying that service must be continuous in order to secure a pension?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I will read the pension regulations, if I may:

> Absence on leave, suspension or discharge followed by reinstatement within a year, or the temporary left-off on account of reduction of force, need not be considered as a break of continuity of service.

Mark, it is absence on leave, suspension, or discharge, which may subsequently be followed by reinstatement within a year.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Were the strikers reinstated within a year?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The agreement was that they were to reinstate them within ninety days.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Was it within the year that they were reinstated?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No, because the pressure that ought to have been brought on the company between July, 1910, and January, 1912, was not brought, and it was not until January, 1912, that the Minister of Labour of that day took the matter up and brought it to a head, and those men were not only reinstated but in many cases were paid for time lost.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The men went out on strike, as I understand?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Then some conciliation proceedings took place and an agreement was made with the Grand Trunk; was that agreement made within a year?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes. Let me make it clear. The strike occurred in July, 1910. In August of that same year, I think, an agreement was made as between the Minister of Labour of that day and the Minister of Militia of that day and Charles M. Hays, president of the company, to the effect that all those men would be reinstated who had not been guilty of any criminal act, and that it would be done within a period of ninety days.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: So they became entitled to go back within a year?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes; but the fact is that 200 of those men, notwithstanding the agreement that they were to go back within ninety days, were not brought back until 1912, when pressure was brought to bear on the Government.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That would not make any difference.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That does not disqualify them at all.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Was the matter submitted to the courts? Was there any legal proceeding taken at any time?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No, none; but I desire to point out that, notwithstanding all those facts, the railway company took the position that those men had not been continuously in service within the meaning of the Provident Fund Act, and therefore were not entitled to the pension. Appeal was taken by the organizations named to the vice president, subsequently to the president; but meanwhile a new president had come into office, Mr. Chamberlin, and subsequently an appeal was made through him to the board of directors of the Grand Trunk railway in London. Those negotiations continued over a period from 1915 to about September 11, 1917, and during all this time efforts were being made by negotiations with the company to get this matter straightened out fairly.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend might tell us if during that interval of time the fees were deducted for the Provident Fund?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I cannot give information on that point.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Do I understand that the pension fund was kept up by specific contributions made by those men, or through deductions from their monthly salaries?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If my recollection is correct, it is an amount set aside by the company itself, a fund established for the purpose, and out of that fund the pension allowances are paid.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No contributions from the employees?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: So far as I know, there is no contribution to that particular fund. There is still another fund, the insurance fund, to which I used to contribute 87 cents a month years ago, but I think this is altogether a different matter from the pension scheme.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Usually there is so much deducted from each man's monthly pay for these pension schemes.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That is the custom in the Intercolonial railway, with which my honourable friend is familiar, but the Canadian Pacific scheme is on the other plan: the employees do not contribute anything to it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They get that much less salary.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Oh, no. Up to September, 1917, the gentleman who had been conducting the negotiations on behalf of the employees found that they were unable to reach any satisfactory settlement with the company's officials, or even any reply giving satisfaction from the board of directors itself. Naturally, as is the custom in these democratic organizations, they laid the facts before the members over the whole system in an open circular letter. They did not use other means to bring pressure to bear to obtain a square deal, and the matter dragged on until the first part of 1919. After every possible effort had been made, the employees said to the Government: "If the Grand Trunk is taken over by the Government"—as was then foreseen might occur—"we desire the Government to see that these men are protected and fairly treated;" and I think it has been made clear already in another place that this is likely to be done, and that the intention of the Government is that it shall be done. Up to the present time there are some 18 men, perhaps more, who were entitled to the benefits of this pension fund who have not received them.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Have all the others been arranged for?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: So far as I know, 18 is the number that have reached the pension age.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Have all who have reached that age been refused so far?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: How many are there altogether who stand in that position?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I should think a very considerable number; it would run into the hundreds. There were at that time probably 2,000 men on strike. Of course, a large number of them have probably left the company's service since, for various reasons. The number who are being deprived of their pensions when they reach the pension age runs into several hundreds.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It is not only the 138 men that the honourable gentleman mentioned.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No. Those 138 men were men whom the company did not restore to service in accordance with their agreement. Nevertheless, all the rest who were restored would likewise be debarred from receiving their pension.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: How would that be?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: They were not out a year.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The company's contention was that they were not suspended, not off on leave of absence, not dismissed, and that therefore they were not covered. Frankly, the position, as I understand it, is this. It is the intention of the Government to see that the interests of these men are properly and fairly protected before these negotiations with the Grand Trunk Railway Company are closed, and I think it is a fact, and can be properly contended, that the amount due these men is a liability of the Grand Trunk Railway Company towards these men. There is going to be a Board of Arbitration, on which the Government will be represented, and I think that is the place to determine whether this charge should be made against the Grand Trunk Company in making an adjustment with them. I am not speaking for the whole Cabinet on this subject; I speak only for myself; but I know that that is the view entertained by some of my colleagues, although the question has never been officially discussed or determined by the Cabinet as a whole.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is this a large amount of money?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No. I do not know what the pensions would amount to. The minimum Canadian Pacific Railway pension was $22 a month; that has now been increased to I think $25. It would mean at the present time that the liability, as a maximum, would average probably $25 or $30 a month for these men, running back to 1914. But it is important that the principle should be decided because of a number of other men who have been in the employ of the company for 30 or 40 years —I know of one man who was in their employ 47 years—and who have become blind or incapacitated in the service.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: When the Government takes over this road, what provision will be made for the men of the future? What about the hundreds of men who would be entitled to this pension if sufficient time had elapsed, and it was due to them? Is the Government making some provision for them?

Then, I would ask the honourable minister to direct his attention to the case, the pitiable case in some instances, of the officials along the branch lines which have been taken over by the National railway. Many of these men have been railroading all their lives, and have always had before them the prospect, which for a long time was a will-o-the-wisp but which may now become a true light, that if the road were taken over by the Government they would come under the pension system. Unfortunately these men find now that they are too old, and that the labour associations refuse to take them in. There will have to be some special arrangement made for them, and I would earnestly ask the Minister of Labour, who is, as he should be, the friend of such people, to look into the question and see what measure of justice he can devise for them.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It might clear up the point to state that a careful and exhaustive inquiry has been proceeding and is still proceeding in regard to pensions. Conditions regarding pensions are very different on different parts of the line now controlled or likely to be controlled and operated under government ownership, and when the general organization is completed a new and probably entirely distinct plan of pensions and retiring allowances for the older employees will be created which will apply uniformly and equitably to all. It is something like the effort that is being made to bring into uniformity the different branches of the Civil Service. Small branch lines of minor importance, on which employees were receiving small wages and perhaps had very limited responsibilities, have been absorbed by the large system. That has occurred not only in my honourable friend's part of the country, but in other parts as well. The absorption of the small lines has made necessary a pension scheme that will be fair and equitable, and that will cover all employees of railways owned by the Government.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would like to ask the minister if he is aware of the cause of the strike, and whether it was supported by public opinion. If it was a justifiable strike the men are entitled to the sympathy of the public. If it was not, then I do not think they are.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I do not know that that question is quite in keeping with the question before the House, but in answer to my honourable friend, I can say from recollection and from personal knowledge that public sympathy was entirely with the employees at the time of the strike. The Grand Trunk employees for many years had been receiving very small wages, much smaller than had been paid on the competing road, the Canadian Pacific, and it was the general impression at the time, whether it was correct or not, that the management of the railroad of that day was very antagonistic to the employees, and that their position was becoming absolutely intolerable. I say this, not only from personal observation and recollection, but from records that are available, and from which it can be clearly demonstrated that the sympathy of Parliament itself was at that time with the employees.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Honourable gentlemen, as I understand this matter, it seems to me that there was a certain amount of money devoted by the Grand Trunk to a particular purpose, namely, the paying of these pensions. That fund would surely belong to the Government.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is taken over by the Government subject to all its obligations.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then, I do not see why all this discussion is necessary, because the matter is entirely out of the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. My honourable friend from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) shakes his head, but I persist that the matter is entirely out of the hands of the Grand Trunk, and that it has become a matter for the Government to deal with to see that these men receive fair play. For my part, I am satisfied to rest there, and feel assured that they will receive justice.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am afraid the case is not quite as my honourable friend puts it. If it were I would be satisfied. The Minister of Labour has answered the question put by the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) quite satisfactorily so far as he as a member of the Government is concerned, but he only speaks for himself. I have no doubt that he will do everything to implement the promise he has made, but unfortunately he is only one among many. Paragraph 17 of the Bill says:

> In no case shall any acquired rights or vested interests in either the pension system or the Insurance and Provident Society be affected.

It clearly includes these members.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is not the contrary the proper interpretation to place upon that? Whatever rights they have acquired are still intact, and to be determined hereafter.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, their vested rights are gone. They were deprived of those rights in 1910, and have been deprived of them ever since.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The most that can be said is that they have been postponed.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: They are not in the enjoyment of their rights to-day.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If they had a right in 1910 or 1912, is there anything which up to the present time has affected the continuance of that right? If they had a legal right in this fund, can it not be asserted to-day as well as in 1912?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am afraid that if the agreement is left as it is these men will have no rights whatever. The Grand Trunk have in this agreement a provision which will prevent them being compelled to pay.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I take it that it does not make any difference at all. Here is a sum of money that was once the Grand Trunk Railway Company's. It is now the Government's money, and the Government can do with it as it likes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It is going to be distributed among the shareholders.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: If the road were not taken over by the Government, what would be the men's chances of getting the pensions?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We cannot say. But might I ask my honourable friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), if there is anything in this agreement to prevent the Government, as an act of grace, reconsidering or adjusting this claim?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would my honourable friend as a lawyer be prepared to fasten upon this agreement a liability concerning which we have no evidence to-day?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am not doing that. I do not want to cut the men out. If you leave things alone I am satisfied; but here you are cutting them out of their legal right.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Of course, it all turns on the interpretation placed upon the words I have read. I may be all wrong and my honourable friend may be right, or I may be right and my honourable friend may be all wrong. I cannot construe these words as having any other effect than to deprive these men of their legal rights.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It seems to me that there is a great misapprehension. These pensions are not a liability of the Grand Trunk Company at all, nor are they made a liability of the Government. The pensions are a liability of the pension fund. If a man obtains a pension it is not taken out of the funds of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but out of the pension fund which has already been set aside by the Grand Trunk railway for the purpose of paying pensions. The Grand Trunk Railway, like a bank or any other institution, sets aside each year so much money for a pension fund. If the Government takes over the road, it will continue to set aside so much each year for that fund, and will have no proprietary interest in it. The question is whether or not the men shall rank on the pension fund. If the men do not rank on the pension fund, that will not benefit the Government at all, because the Government cannot appropriate and use the money. They are only trustees for the men, and the whole question is whether or not this pension fund shall be saddled with this liability. If the Government intends to increase the pensions, that is quite another question; but, so far as the Grand Trunk Railway is concerned, their assets would not be increased one dollar if they paid all these pensions, because they are only liable for the amount they agreed to contribute. It passes my understanding, and for the life of me I cannot see, how this agreement, which deals with the liabilities of the Grand Trunk Railway Company which may be assumed by the Government, or which the Government may ask to have charged against the value of the Grand Trunk railway, can in any way be involved.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is the subject-matter of the agreement:

> In no case shall any acquired rights or vested interests in either the pension system or the Insurance and Provident Society be affected

I cannot see how it passes my honourable friend's understanding. It is part of the agreement we are discussing, part of the agreement we are making. If the Government should decide to-morrow to pay these men, that is so much money that the taxpayer would have to pay. It is a sum that the Grand Trunk would be relieved of.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The fund would not in any case go back to the Grand Trunk Company. They have divested themselves of it and set it apart. It would no more go back to them than rails or rolling stock. It belongs to the people who have bought the Grand Trunk railway; therefore it belongs to the Government of Canada; therefore the Government of Canada will have the administration of it; therefore I think it is perfectly safe to leave the whole matter as it stands, no matter what the section says. We are satisfied to have the fund in the hands of the Government, knowing that they will treat the men not only fairly but generously.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The second clause calls upon us to ratify an agreement. I have not yet heard any really good explanation from the leader of the Government as to why we should be called upon to ratify this agreement at the present time. Last session we dealt with the question of this agreement in a Bill which was put through Parliament. That agreement, I understand, went before the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in London and was approved of by them, and was afterwards signed by the representatives of the company on behalf of the shareholders. That being so, I cannot see why we should now be called upon to ratify the agreement. We can ratify something that the Government of Canada has done, but it does not seem to me to be quite the proper thing to ask the Parliament of Canada to ratify an agreement in order to put into shape something that has been done by the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. This brings me to another point. Last session, when this question was under discussion, we on this side of the House suggested to the Government that possibly it would have been better if they had given the matter further consideration and had come to an arrangement with the Grand Trunk Company on lines very different from the lines of this agreement; that would have been very much better for the Dominion Government to make an arrangement with the Grand Trunk Company along the lines that were suggested in the correspondence brought down, lines which would have kept the Grand Trunk Company and the shareholders interested in the operation of the road. Canada would have had the advantage of a large body of shareholders in England and possibly in other parts of the world being interested in seeing that the Grand Trunk railway was successfully operated and that the business was properly carried on; and they would have been interested not only in the development of the railway, but also in the upbuilding of the Dominion of Canada itself. That policy would have been a very much better one for the country and would have saved the Dominion of Canada from being placed in the position it occupies to-day, of having under the agreement to arrange to pay a fixed sum of money as interest to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk railway every year. They obtained money on the credit of the Dominion of Canada, and the Dominion is responsible for paying the interest on the company's shares and bonds, without any reference to the operation of the road or the amount of profit that may be derived from it. This agreement imposes upon the country very great liabilities and responsibilities, and I do not think the country realizes the extent of the difficulties with which we may have to contend in carrying out the terms of the agreement. As was pointed out last session by the hon. gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross), the operating of these roads in the United States will give rise to all sorts of difficulties. The Dominion of Canada may find itself in the position of being subject to the laws of another country. I think we ought to protest once more against being asked to ratify an agreement of this kind and against the country being saddled with an enormous liability in addition to that which we have already assumed on account of the war and on account of the railway policy which has been pursued. I think this is a very serious question, and one on which we should make our position very plain.

As to the operation of these roads, the announcement we have had from the Minister of Railways this year regarding the roads the Government is already operating, is not very encouraging or likely to lead us to believe that the operation of this Grand Trunk system, when it comes into our possession, will be any more successful than that of the other roads which the Government has been operating now for two or three years. The Government has contended that by taking over this Grand Trunk system we shall be able to effect a considerable saving through the amalgamation of offices, the doing away with certain buildings, and the elimination of certain expenses of management; but I fear that in the present railway situation the money that may be saved in that way will not by any means make up for the tremendous cost of operating these roads and the deficit that the country will probably have to face.

I do not know that it is worth while to take up the time of the House in making a further protest; but, in the first place, I do not think we should be called upon to ratify this agreement for the purpose of making it valid because of something that has been done or omitted by the Grand Trunk Company or its shareholders. I understand that a meeting has been held in London within the last few days by the Grand Trunk Company; and if there was anything not properly done at the first meeting, which was held in February of this year, they had time to call a second meeting and correct the errors or omissions. I cannot myself see why we should be asked to ratify the agreement in this way, for the benefit, practically of the Grand Trunk Company.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I asked my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) a little while ago, when the discussion was going on, if he could give us the figures of the liabilities of the Grand Trunk system, and I understood that my honourable friend was getting those figures for us. If he has them I should be very glad to hear what they are.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My recollection is that last session, when the question was under discussion, an approximate statement was submitted. It did not enter into the statute, but it was submitted for the consideration of the House. I should be glad if my honourable friend would peruse that, if he feels inclined to take sufficient time to do so.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think the public is as much interested as I am. It is on behalf of the public that I am asking for this information.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think my honourable friend will find the statement on file. It was laid on the table of the House last session and was printed. We have no intention of repeating that, because there is no necessity for so doing, during the present session.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It does not make very interesting reading.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It may not be the most interesting class of literature, particularly for the coming warm season.

Section 2 was agreed to.

Section 3 was agreed to.

On the schedule (agreement):

Hon. Mr. POWER: I would like to make two or three observations on that schedule. We find in this agreement a statement of control, as follows:

1. Statement of Control.—The Grand Trunk represents that the companies, properties and interests comprised in the Grand Trunk Railway system are correctly and fully set forth in the First Schedule to this Agreement, and that it has in such Schedule correctly and fully shown how the various companies and their undertakings are controlled by the Grand-Trunk, whether by stock ownership and to what extent, and whether by leases, agreements or otherwise, distinguishing in these respects the direct ownership and control by the Grand Trunk from the indirect ownership and control through companies included in the system.

When we passed the Bill last year we had the solemn declaration of the Grand Trunk Company that we had been furnished with full and complete and accurate statements of all the liabilities of the company and of the particulars necessary to enable Parliament and the public to understand just what was being done. Now the Government come down and say, notwithstanding this solemn declaration, that there are certain interests of the Grand Trunk which do not appear. These interests, as I understand, involve liabilities as well as assets. That does not seem to me like a very business-like transaction.

Then, clause 10 of this agreement says, with respect to undisclosed liabilities:

10. Undisclosed liabilities.—Should the Government, within three months after making of the award, claim that there existed any liabilities of the Grand Trunk, or of any company comprised in the Grand Trunk System, which were not disclosed to the Board of Arbitrators prior to the making of their award, the Government may, within such period of three months, apply to the Board of Arbitrators to amend their award, and the Board may thereupon decide whether such liabilities existed and were disclosed to them, whether the amount of their award would or would not have been affected thereby, and the amount of the deduction, if any, to be made in respect thereof; and may amend their award accordingly.

That provision that after the arbitrators have met and made their award they may amend it, goes to show that it is not a complete, final thing.

I think the attention of the committee ought to be directed particularly to clause 11 of the agreement:

11. Limit to the Amount of the Award.—The value, if any, so determined shall not be greater than an amount on which the annual dividend at four per cent per annum on the aggregate face value of the present guaranteed stock and the new guaranteed stock taken together would be $5,000,000—

This is a thing which has taken me rather by surprise——that is, the value, if any, so determined shall not exceed sixty-four million one hundred and sixty-six thousand six hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six cents ($64,166,666.66).

Note the 66 cents.

The fixing of this limit shall not be taken by the arbitrators as any admission or indication that the value to be determined is the amount so fixed, or any other amount.

Unfortunately, honourable gentlemen, I am not in any respect a financial man, and I have to confess that when we were passing the Bill last year I was under the impression that our greatest liability was the $5,000,000; but, instead of that, I think it is $64,166,000. I do not know whether or not other members of the House were under the same impression as I, but this is a very serious disappointment to me. I thought we were getting off comparatively cheaply, but it does not so appear. I think, honourable gentlemen, that this case illustrates the unwisdom of not retaining parliamentary control. If this agreement had gone over to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Company and had been accepted by them and then come back to us to be approved of, we should not be obliged to deal with it again in the way in which we are now doing.

The schedule was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

PRIVATE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Bill 40, an Act respecting The Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. De Veber.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 68, an Act to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the object of this Bill is manifold. Each section has an object in itself. The main purpose is to provide somewhat greater elasticity for the purposes of administration. The first clause is to make clearer the interpretation of the word "settler." The second clause deals with the question of transportation for the chairman of the board. It is largely a matter of routine. The other sections also deal with matters of routine or administration. When we go into committee I shall be very glad to have the officers of the department here to explain the different sections of the Bill. There is no general policy involved in it.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES BILL

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 78, an Act to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

He said: The object of this Bill is to remedy what has been an abuse in cases where animals are destroyed. Under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act the Government is liable for the payment of two-thirds of the value of the animal. The owner then takes the animal and in many cases realizes a substantial amount upon it by selling it for beef to the butcher or to some other person. So very frequently it has paid the owner of the animal to have it destroyed under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. This Bill may not appeal to thrifty individuals who have realized upon their herds in that way.

Hon. Mr. POWER: No member of this House has realized.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is proposed that hereafter the Government shall pay two-thirds of the value and the owner shall not be permitted to realize on the remains.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Then does the Government become possessed of the carcass?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will see to the destruction of the animal, if necessary.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

PETROLEUM AND NAPTHA INSPECTION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 92, an Act to amend the Petroleum and Naptha Inspection Act.

He said: The object of this Bill is to increase the weight of naptha from eight pounds to five one-hundredths of a pound per gallon to eight pounds and seventeen-hundredths per gallon. It has been discovered that in the refining of certain oils which are obtainable, a greater amount can be produced, which would be equally advantageous for domestic and other purposes if the specific gravity were increased. So the Bill makes provision for increasing the specific gravity by a fraction of a pound, as I have stated.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

EMPLOYMENT OFFICES CO-ORDINATION BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Robertson, the Senate went into committee on Bill Y2, an Act to amend the Employment Offices Co-ordination Act. Hon. Mr. Thompson in the Chair.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: Everything but the title in this Bill has been agreed to. Perhaps the minister has some explanation.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I think it was the wish of the committee the other day that certain Orders in Council asked for by the leader of the Opposition should be laid upon the Table. I have pleasure in complying with his request, and file the information. The only other point on which the committee were not in accord was as to section 2, relating to the Federal authority. In that connection I would point out that there are a considerable number of Acts now upon our statute book in which provisions exactly similar to those contained in this section already exist. For example, in our Dominion Statistics Act, chapter 43, in the statutes of 1898, an almost identical provision is to be found. In the Act of 1906 respecting infectious and contagious diseases in animals, a similar provision is found. In the Act of 1906 respecting shipping in Canada a similar provision is found. The Act of 1917 respecting insurance contains a similar provision; and, in the statutes of 1917, the Act authorizing the levying of a war tax upon certain incomes has a similar stipulation, requiring certain returns to be made under penalty. I might quote others, such as the Department of Commerce Act, which I named the other day, and to which the honourable member from Ottawa took exception. I think therefore there is no impropriety in including this clause, and I move its adoption.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman has cited a number of precedents and he draws the inference that those precedents create a right. This is an implication that would not stand as an argument before the courts. I think he should give the opinion of the Department of Justice on that point, as to legislating in that sense. Of course, Parliament has passed similar legislation, and up to this date it has not been questioned by any test case in the courts; but the affirmation of the honourable member from Ottawa was that, in the sense that it has not had a definite decision, the question still remains a doubtful one, no judge of one of our High Courts of Justice having been called upon to pass upon it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I might clear up the point my honourable friend has in mind by acquainting him with the fact that the question was referred to the Department of Justice this morning, and I have before me a memorandum which says that they have assured us that in their opinion there is no doubt that Parliament would be within its legislative rights in passing this section of the Bill.

The preamble and the title were agreed to, and the Bill was reported without amendment.

MAPLE PRODUCTS BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 28, an Act respecting Maple Products. Hon. Mr. Crosby in the Chair.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Friday, May 7, 1920.

The Senate met at 3 p.m. the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

DIVORCE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill M3, an Act for the relief of James Lyon Lincoln Bobbin.—Hon. Mr. McCall.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES—INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY inquired of the Government:

1. What were the receipts of the Intercolonial railway for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1920?
2. What was the expenditure for the same period?
3. Also, what were the receipts of the Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg for the year ending March 31, 1920?
4. Also, what was the expenditure for the same period?
5. What were the receipts and what was the expenditure on the Canadian Northern system for the year ending March 31, 1920?
6. What were the receipts and what was the expenditure on the Grand Trunk Pacific, now in the hands of a receiver, for the year ending March 31, 1920?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. The gross revenue was $28,104,733.66.
2. The operating expenses were $30,908,505.18.
3. The gross revenue was $11,592,718.72
4. The operating expenses were $14,584,250.06.
5. The gross revenue for year 1919, was $53,562,177.57. The operating expenses for the same period were $60,034,023.92.
6. The revenue for calendar year 1919, was $12,251,462.13. The operating expenses for the same period were $17,587,567.37. Figures from January, 1920, to March, 1920, are not yet ascertained.

THE MANITOBA MENNONITES.

INQUIRY.

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: I would like to direct the attention of the leader of the Government to a despatch in this morning's Ottawa Journal headed: "Manitoba Mennonites Finally Decide to Move Settlement to Mississippi—After All-Day Conference Members decide to Leave Canada and Locate with Uncle Sam." The despatch comes from Plum Coulee, Manitoba, and is as follows:

By Canadian Associated Press.

Plum Coulee, Man., May 6.—The Mennonites of Manitoba, after an all-day conference held on Tuesday by the members of the Mennonite Church at the village of Rhineland, decided to leave Canada and seek new homes in the state of Mississippi, where they have secured options along with the Mennonites of Saskatchewan on large tracts of unoccupied lands.

They hope to be permitted to have their own schools conducted under the direction of their own church, in which German is the only language and the Bible the lesson book. Preparations are being made by them to move after this year's crop has been harvested, and delegates have left for the Mennonite settlements near Swift Current and north of Saskatoon to advise them of the difficulty of their compatriots in Manitoba.

Probably the leader of the Government can give us some information on this subject.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It would be interesting to know from the representatives of the province of Manitoba if these people have been good citizens and an asset to the Dominion. If we were thus informed, perhaps we could press the Government to retain them in Canada; but I think we should have the opinion of the members from Manitoba as to the fitness of such a request.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Ask the honourable gentleman behind you (Hon. Mr. Watson).

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am sorry I cannot give any specific information to my honourable friend. Suffice it to say that if these people are seeking the liberty indicated by the article which my honourable friend from Moncton (Hon. Mr.

McSweeney) has read, I fancy the people of Canada will be able to reconcile themselves to their departure.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

LOAN COMPANIES BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill 39, an Act to amend the Loan Companies Act, 1914.

He said: I informed my honourable friend opposite (Hon. Mr. Bostock) that I would make inquiry as to the right of loan companies to receive deposits. I find that under section 65 of the Loan Companies Act authority is given to them to do so.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

GRAND TRUNK AGREEMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill 54, an Act to confirm the Agreement dated the 8th day of March, 1920, between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the said Grand Trunk Railway Company, except the four per cent guaranteed stock.

Hon. J. P. B. CASGRAIN: Honourable gentlemen, this is probably the last time that we will have an opportunity of discussing this question; so perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words. I wish to draw the attention of the House to the report, the day before yesterday, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, from which it can easily be seen that, although it has been said that a ten per cent dividend was paid by that company, such is not the case, but that they paid 7 per cent from the profits on earnings and 3 per cent out of some special fund, and that, when they had paid the usual dividend, there remained the small surplus of one-half of one per cent, which is very close indeed to the margin of safety. The president Mr. E. W. Beattie, declares that for the last two years the returns have not been adequate to meet the real necessities of the road, let alone to make betterments and improvements. He showed that, although freight rates have been increased thirty per cent, and passenger rates ten per cent, the expenses are so great that the margin of profit shown is only four per cent on the amount of money invested in the railway. He says that a readjustment of rates is absolutely necessary if the Canadian Pacific railway is to continue to develop this country, as it has done in the past, and to keep abreast of the progress of the day. He draws attention to the argument against increasing the rates of the Government railways. They need an increase in rates, and a very large increase; but some people say that if you increase them, you will cause the coffers of the Canadian Pacific Railway to overflow. The coffers of that company have overflowed before now, and it has been to the advantage of this country; nobody will deny that. On the other hand, as he points out, it is not sound policy to penalize a company that is acting wisely and running its affairs economically. If you do not raise the rates, and if those who ship goods pay rates which are not sufficient to pay for the service they are getting from the transportation company, then the other people of the country who are not shippers will pay the difference. Again, he says it is not sound to take from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company any excess that they make over a certain amount. Naturally one would expect him to say that. We must not forget that the Canadian Pacific railway was to a great extent built with money furnished by this country. The Drayton-Acworth report shows that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company got $358,000,000, including their land at $119,000,000; therefore they might reasonably be expected to contribute something to the country. We all remember what the Canadian Pacific Railway Company received in the beginning. They were given about 600 miles of completed railway, and surveys extending almost from ocean to ocean—at all events from the Great Lakes to the Pacific ocean; 25,000,000 acres of land in fee simple; $25,000,000 in cash; and also —and this is the most serious matter, and the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) was one who fought it—they were given the right for 20 years to charge what they liked for service rendered in the Prairie Provinces.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: That right was taken away from them.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: At the instance of the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie and the Laurier Government.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Is that all contained in the article which my honourable friend has?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: My honourable friend is absolutely in error when he speaks about the right being taken away. I understand that, it was the Norquay Government of Manitoba who made the protest, and the Dominion Government, in order to do away with that agreement, loaned the company $15,000,000.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I have discussed that question with my honourable friend before. We did not agree at that time, so I do not hope to convince him this afternoon. But, after all, the Canadian Pacific railway is a public utility, and the tendency of the age is that public utilities should pay only a reasonable rate of interest to their shareholders. I can give an instance of a contract that was made for the tramways of Montreal. A valuation of the property was made by the commission, and all that the shareholders could possibly receive on their investment was 6½ per cent. The company had to accept that, and the fares have to be so fixed that the return shall be no more and no less; and no expenditure may be proceeded with by this company without the sanction of the Commission. It is not public ownership, because the company operates the road; but the rates are fixed independently of the company, and if any extension is to be made this independent commission decides whether the line shall be built or not; and when the line is built it is obliged to charge certain fixed fares. So, after the C.P.R. shareholders have been fairly treated, and well treated, I would not be averse to having anything over and above a reasonable dividend fall into the public coffers. The C.P.R. would only be returning to this country what they have been getting from it.

Now, as to government railroads, where are we going if we do not increase rates? According to the admission made by the Minister of Railways, we have had a deficit of no less than $47,000,000. And that is the deficit which they own up to. What must be the real deficit! It reminds me of the play in which the lady says, "Oh, you don't know the half of it, dearie." Well, perhaps we don't know the half of it: it may be much more than that. Then the minister adds that for every dollar collected by the railways, 78 cents went to the workmen. Considering also the enhanced price of coal, which is 200 or 300 per cent more than it used to be, you can see how much was left. I do not think the farmers of this country should complain so very much about increased rates. They used to sell potatoes for $1 a bag and now they are selling them at $6 a bag; and they are selling wheat at two or three times as much as they used to get. They should be willing to help this country along. Yesterday the price of corn was $1.82 a bushel. Fifty cents used to be the ruling price. The increase is considerably more than 300 per cent. It is discrimination to tax the people who are not shipping, and who must pay the increased price for the article. The people who are not shipping and who are getting no benefit are actually taxed more than the others.

There is another point. In the discussion yesterday I was interrupted by the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton). He doubted that there could be 40,000 miles of railway a few years after of the accession to power of the present Administration. Well, I took those figures from the Drayton-Acworth report. I see that, according to the correct figures the Government now controls 22,000 miles, including the Grand Trunk, and the C.P.R. controls 14,000 miles. That makes a total of 36,000 miles. There is a difference of 4,000 miles—

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The honourable gentleman has quite convinced me. He need not labour it any further.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That leaves only 4,000 miles for the independent roads. In any case I thought that the Drayton-Acworth report would be correct. It cost this country a lot of money. They had an endless number of experts going all over the railway systems, and then they devised the scheme—to which we are coming, by the way—that of having a so-called company manage the government railroads. I thought surely that report would be correct as to mileage, and I did not verify the figures myself, but took 40,000 miles as being correct. However, that is only one factor.

At the time we took over the Canadian Northern, this House was fairly evenly divided. Now, I do not think I am divulging any secrets or saying anything I should not say. I went to Lord Shaughnessy and said to him: "You see, they are going to buy the Canadian Northern. It is a matter of over $500,000,000, nearly $600,000,000, and when it is operated it will be like the I.C.R.—it will not pay operating expenses." Nor has it. We have that huge debt saddled on the country. "Now, the C.P.R. is interested more than any other corporation in having this country run properly. Why should not the C.P.R. use some of its influence? Surely the Canadian Pacific railway must have some friends left on the Government side of the Canadian Senate, and it requires only four or five Senators on the other side to prevent this Canadian Northern deal, which I think is a bad one"—and I still think it is a bad deal—"from going through." Well, the C.P.R. were absolutely indifferent. I was in Lord Shaughnessy's office for nearly an hour. I said: "Lord Shaughnessy, this is what is going to happen to you. The first thing you know they will take over the Grand Trunk after taking the Canadian Northern, and then the C.P.R. will be all alone fighting the Government roads." What is the position of the C.P.R. to-day? They have 14,000 miles: the Government have 22,000 miles.

In my position as vice-president of the Empire Parliamentary Association I have had to entertain men from Australia, where there is government ownership. These gentlemen, discussing the railway question, told me that it was impossible to operate satisfactorily the two systems in the one country, that it must be either one system or the other; you cannot have both. If you have government operation here and private operation there, and people have the choice of working for a private concern or loafing for the Government, which side are they going to take? I said to Lord Shaughnessy: "They are going to disorganize all your system, and next the C.P.R. will have to be gobbled up too." I should not be surprised if the C.P.R. came to that.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Do I understand my honourable friend to state that the employees on the Government-owned railways are loafing?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: My experience has been this. I happen to have had to operate a railway—not a very long one, only 100 miles in length, but just as wide as the C.P.R., a line from Metapedia to New Carlisle. I ran that railway for ten years, and I saw what was going on. I saw our road opened up, the snow all shovelled away, when the Government road was tied up and the workmen were smoking their pipes. That is a thing I can speak of. The Minister of Labour has had experience on railroads, but I have had a little experience too. He is not the only pebble on the beach. What is more, I was the whole thing on the road. I had no board of directors. I was president and manager and everything.

An Hon. SENATOR: And chief engineer.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And chief engineer. And here is another point. During the ten years I never even received a lawyer's letter.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: You were not shovelling snow.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And we never paid a dividend; not even a coupon on a bond.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is the road still in existence?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: You cannot have two systems in the country. Before the Laurier Government came into power, in 1896, we had in this country for a long time a Conservative Government and there was an exodus from Canada to the United States. People were leaving this country just as the Mennonites are now treking south. C.P.R. stock was selling at 33 cents on the dollar, and the credit of the company was not much. But a change came over the country. Another Government came in, and with it prosperity. We had Laurier and prosperity.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And what did you see the Canadian Pacific railway stock do? You saw it climbing and climbing and getting to par and increasing to 150 and 175. I think it went to 280. Now we have had a Conservative Government for some time, and it is commencing to slide down and down, and in the last paper I saw it was at 116. It may get down to 30 cents yet. But I see a ray of hope. I think there will be a change in this country. I do not care whether it is the Farmers or the Liberals or the Labour or any other party, because no party can do worse than the present Government have done, and when the change takes place prosperity will come back to this country.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

EMPLOYMENT OFFICES CO-ORDINATION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill Y2, an Act to amend the Employment Offices Co-ordination Act.—Hon. Mr. Robertson.

MAPLE PRODUCTS BILL.

MOTION FOR THIRD READING POSTPONED.

On the Order: Third reading of Bill 28, an Act respecting Maple Products.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

Hon. P. C. MURPHY: Honourable gentlemen, with the concurrence of the honourable leader of the House, I would ask that this Bill stand. Clause 2 of the Bill makes it impossible for a retailer to sell maple syrup or maple products, because he has no means of telling whether they are adulterated or not. I think also that the provisions contained in this Bill are amply covered in the Act we passed the other day, known as the Pure Food and Drugs Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Does the honourable gentleman want to amend the Bill or to have it thrown out?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I want to have the Bill amended if it is to be passed. I want to have the word "knowingly" inserted so that it will read: "No person shall knowingly expose for sale." As you will readily understand, it is absolutely impossible for the end man, who is the retail dealer, say, in a general store in the country, and who buys his goods from the manufacturer or the jobber, to tell whether the maple syrup or maple sugar is adulterated or not. I have personal knowledge of a case occurring under the old Act, and this Bill is not very different—a case in which Inland Revenue officers on their rounds entered a store and took a sample of maple syrup that had been put up in Quebec and was labelled "Guaranteed pure maple syrup." A sample of this syrup contained in a 24-ounce bottle, was bought for analysis, and as a result the merchant was brought before a magistrate and fined $20 and costs. That was a manifest injustice, for nobody could tell under the circumstances whether that maple syrup was adulterated or not. I tasted some of the syrup, and I assure you I could not tell. There is no justice in making the retail grocer subject to a fine of $200, as he would be under the provisions of this Bill.

The Order was discharged, and placed on the Order Paper for Monday next.

PRIVATE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill L2, an Act respecting the Hamilton Provident and Loan Society, and to change its name to "The Hamilton Provident and Loan Corporation."—Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

On the motion for concurrence in the First Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament:

Hon. L. G. POWER: Honourable gentlemen, I think it would be regrettable if this report were allowed to pass without some observation. The change made two or three years ago in the method of distributing parliamentary documents—a change which originated in this House and was reported on by the Joint Committee on Printing—has had the effect of saving, not a few dollars, but some hundreds of thousands of dollars to the country, and I think that the Committee of the Senate might very well have indulged in a little self-praise in connection with the matter. Now the committee have met and they have decided to carry a little further the reform which has already progressed so well. The committee, I think, deserve commendation for the line they have taken, and I assume that this report will be adopted without any question.

The report was concurred in.

DIVORCE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill H3, an Act for the relief of Edith Sara Bell.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

Bill I3, an Act for the relief of Albert Graham Elson.—Hon Mr. Ratz.

PILOTAGE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 94, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act (Pilotage).

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the object of this Bill is to remove the restriction which is now part and parcel of the Act, under which the pilots' tariff cannot be increased until the minimum salary of the Quebec pilots' for three successive years falls below $600 a year. That is considered entirely inadequate, and the object of the Bill is to give authority to the minister of the department under which the pilots come, to increase that tariff from time to time as may be consistent with the requirements of the situation.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Will the leader of the Government be in a position when we go into committee to tell us the rates of pilotage that are being paid now? I take it from reading the Bill that a change has been made by Order in Council, because the Bill is retroactive from June, 1914.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will find that out for my honourable friend when we go into committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

OLEOMARGARINE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 103, an Act to amend the Oleomargarine Act of 1914.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this is to extend the time for the manufacture, importation and sale of oleomargarine for one year. It also gives further authority to deal with the subject of regulations. It makes provision for prescribing penalties for violation of the regulations. There has been more or less controversy between the dairy interests of Canada and the consuming public as to this particular question. But the Government is prepared to assume the responsibility for extending the time for another year for the importation, sale, and manufacture of oleomargarine.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 20, an Act to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill is introduced in pursuance of the provision which appears in the Peace Treaty between the Allied and Associated Powers and Germany and other enemy countries. Previous to the war, in 1911, a convention was entered into at the Hague in pursuance of which the different nations agreed to legislate in regard to the regulation and suppression of narcotic drugs. The Bill is largely administrative. It embraces the principle to which I have referred, and amends chapter 17 of 1911, the Act under which we have proceeded in the past, so as to permit of its more effective enforcement. There is no necessity of my dwelling upon the desirability of legislation looking to the regulation and suppression, so far as it can be brought about, of so deleterious a drug as opium.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The Bill, as first introduced in another place, was a most crude and inoperable Bill in every respect, and it has undergone a great number of amendments before coming to us in its present condition. In my opinion the amendments have had the effect of improving the Bill. The intention of the Bill, as has been said by the leader of the Government, is to make it more difficult for those who are inclined to become addicted to the use of opium, morphine, and drugs of that kind to obtain them. There is no doubt that in order to attain that end certain disabilities will be imposed upon those people. For instance, they will be prevented from getting paregoric and such remedies without a prescription. As the Bill was first introduced, it prevented the ordinary grocery store in the country from selling domestic remedies which they have been accustomed to sell and deprived people in rural districts of the opportunity of obtaining them, which would have entailed a hardship indeed. But the Bill, as amended, has remedied that situation to a great extent, and, as it appears before us, I think it as good and proper a Bill as can be framed for the purpose which it has in view. No Bill which absolutely prohibits can be enforced without inflicting some hardship on some people. We all realize that in connection with the prohibition laws which have been in force for the last few years. This is another prohibitory measure with which I presume we will have to comply. The Bill in its present form is one that I think we may very readily adopt, if we think it is necessary, as I think we all do, under the arrangements which this country has entered into regarding opium and other drugs. There are some very good points in the Bill, and some which are not so good, but which I think cannot be avoided.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think the Government is to be congratulated upon doing everything possible to stop the sale and the use of drugs in this country. The opinion in the province from which I come is that the traffic in drugs has increased enormously. Only the other day I read in one of our papers here that within the last three or four weeks two very large seizures of drugs, valued at something like $50,000, have been made in the city of Vancouver. That shows that somebody is importing these drugs into this country, and I presume they are being imported for the purpose of sale to individuals who, unfortunately, are addicted to the drug habit. All prohibitory laws should be very carefully considered, and adopted with very great caution. At the same time, I think there is no case in which the Government is more justified in passing prohibitory legislation. I notice that the last clause of the Bill provides that it is not to come into force until a date to be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council. The Act is such a good one that I do not see why its operation should be suspended. Why should it not go into effect immediately? Perhaps my honourable friend will be able to tell us that when we go into committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 68, an Act to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919. Hon. Mr. Thompson in the Chair.

On section 1—settler to mean male member only, etc.:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This applies only to male members?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is to remove any doubt as to the Act including female members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—Chairman of Board to have free or reduced transportation:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is to place him in the same position as a Deputy Minister in regard to transportation.

Section 2 was agreed to.

On section 3—calculation of cost of land and improvements:

Hon. Mr. POWER: What is the effect of this clause?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This amendment, if adopted, will authorize the board to make larger advances for the improvement of land than the amount authorized by the Act, keeping, however, the total advances for all purposes to the settler within the maximum prescribed by the Act. It simply permits of a new distribution up to the amount of the maximum. It is felt that settlers purchasing unimproved farms should be placed on the same footing as those purchasing improved farms. Under the amendment any amount expended on the land by the board for permanent improvements may be classed as part of the cost of the land to the board. It does not include the loan.

on. Mr. BOSTOCK.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Does that mean that part of the loan is to be for the purchase of stock, cattle, horses, and that kind of thing? Could a part of that money that is to be used for horses and cattle be applied to improving the land?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. It draws a distinction between improved and unimproved land. I understand that at present a certain amount may be advanced on improved land, which would be in excess of what could be advanced on unimproved lands. This is to permit of a larger expenditure being made in improving the land.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That would be counted part of the purchase price?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Section 3 was agreed to.

On section 4—additional security for advances as may be required.

Section 4 was agreed to.

On section 5—powers of board:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: These are new clauses, are they not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is proposed to give advantageous terms to settlers purchasing unimproved lands or securing advances for the operation of unimproved lands howsoever acquired. In the case of land purchase interest will begin to accrue one year from the date of the sale, and the first annual instalment, which shall be paid not later than two years from the date of the sale, will consist of accrued interest only. Repayment of advances for stock and equipment will be made in six annual instalments instead of four, as at the present time. In the case of sales of stock and equipment to settlers for the operation of improved farms, a larger cash payment may be required. The loan may be made repayable in six or less annual instalments, and the first payment must be made not later than the first day of October or November, as the case may be, next following the date of the sale. It simply permits of a variation in the time payment.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Paragraph d is to permit of that?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is what I take it to be, so as to permit of that principle being carried out.

Section 5 was agreed to.

On section 6—no officer, agent, or employee to purchase, acquire, or sell land which Board is authorized to deal with, or act as agent or take commissions:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What is the effect of that clause?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is to prevent the members of the Board, particularly of local Boards, from trafficking in any way in the lands which they are administering on behalf of the Government in the carrying out of the Act. I think there have been cases in which there has been a suspicion that members of the Board have been largely responsible for selling their own lands or lands in which they are interested.

Section 6 was agreed to.

On section 8, new section 65, subsection 1—marks or brands to denote the Board's ownership of property:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What is the effect of that clause?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That provision is made to overcome difficulties which have arisen under the Chattel Mortgage Act, that is to say, in cases where the settler may have property of his own, it is desirable to be able to distinguish the property of the Board, on which they hold the security, from other property which may be brought upon the land. It is therefore proposed to mark it or brand it so that its identity may be distinguished from other property.

Subsection 1 of new section 65 was agreed to.

Subsection 2 was agreed to.

On subsection 3 of new section 65—unauthorized applying or destroying of marks or brands:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would these marks be registered with the Provincial Government?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not necessarily so. On cattle, I presume, it would be necessary, but in regard to other personal property, I think it would not. The matter would be largely, if not entirely, regulated by the law of the province; but difficulty has always been experienced under the Chattel Mortgage Act in distinguishing what property is really covered by the chattel mortgage, because there may be similar property upon the land in question; and when the mortgagee seizes the property it may be claimed by some person that it is not the property mortgaged. This is simply to protect the interest of the Government to a greater extent than the Act now permits.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: In the case of cattle in the western provinces, there are arrangements for the recording of brands of cattle?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I presume that the Government branding would be recorded in the same way.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should think the provincial legislation would have to be complied with; otherwise it would be ineffective as evidence.

Subsection 3 was agreed to.

Subsections 4 and 5 were agreed to.

On new section 66, subsection 1—insurance of property in favour of Board by settler when indebted to Board:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is to protect the interests of the Government.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would the Government have any power to object to the company in which that insurance was made, or would they have to take the insurance in any company?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should say they should have the right to pronounce upon the company. The mortgagee, under a mortgage, invariably passes upon the goodness of the policy, or upon the company in which it is taken out.

Subsection 1 was agreed to.

Subsection 2 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 78, an Act to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. Hon. Mr. Murphy in the Chair.

On section 1—provision re sale by Crown of carcass of condemned animal:

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: What is the section that is repealed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The section that is repealed is that which permits the owner to sell the carcass and apply the proceeds to his own account. That is now reversed. Hereafter the Government will pay two-thirds, as before, and will itself sell the carcass.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Section 46 of the Act reads:

> Every person who violates any provision of this Act, or of any regulation made by the Governor in Council or by the minister under the authority of this Act, in respect to which no penalty is hereinbefore provided, shall for every offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars.

That is what we are repealing now?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, that is repealed. Under clause 1 we are repealing section 46 and paragraph b of section 7, which deals with the sale of the carcass.

Section 1 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

PETROLEUM AND NAPHTHA INSPECTION BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 92, an Act to amend the Petroleum and Naphtha Inspection Act. Hon. Mr. Bennett in the Chair.

On section 1—test increased from 8.05 pounds:

Hon. Mr. WATSON: What is the occasion for this amendment?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is now ascertained that oil can be refined which will be equally useful for domestic and other purposes if the specific gravity is increased. Thus a greater volume of oil can be manufactured for uses of that kind. The specific gravity is increased from 8.05 pounds per gallon to 8.17 pounds per gallon.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That is illuminating oil, is it? Or does it refer to all kinds of oil?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is chiefly illuminating oil. I will read to my honourable friend what was said regarding the present Act:

> That Act was passed in 1906 when the oil came from the Canadian and Pennsylvanian fields. Oil ranged from 8 and 8.05 to 8.13 pounds per gallon. Since that time there has been production from other sources and latterly we have been getting oil from midcontinent points in Wyoming and elsewhere, which is of very much higher specific gravity, running to as much as 8.15 pounds per gallon. If we do not increase the allowance as to specific gravity in the testing of the oil, we lose seven-tenths of one per cent in the process from the crude to the refined and by bringing the requirement up to 8.17 pounds per gallon we allow for the full extraction of refined oil from the crude. This refers to illuminating oil.

So the Bill simply makes provision for a larger volume from the crude oil.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It is very much to be regretted that this measure should be discussed in committee in the absence of the honourable gentleman from Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville), who has a technical knowledge and is very keenly interested in the oil business in various forms. However, he may have a chance to say something at the third reading.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We shall doubtless have his views on this Bill during the Session.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Will this affect the specific gravity of gasoline?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think so. This refers simply to increasing the refined products from crude oil. I do not think it would have anything to do with gasoline.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Gasoline is a refined product of crude oil, is it not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but its specific gravity is entirely different from this.

Section 1 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

IMMIGRATION (DEPORTATION) BILL.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON moved the second reading of Bill X2, an Act to amend the Immigration Act (Deportation of Undesirable Persons).

He said: Honourable gentlemen, if the proposed amendment to section 41 of the Immigration Act is adopted, the section will apply merely to British subjects born outside of Canada and who have not acquired Canadian domicile, and will not apply to any others. All the other provisions of the Act so apply, and this amendment will bring section 41 into line with all the other clauses of the Act so far as it relates to British subjects.

The proposed elimination of subsection 2 of section 41 is regarded as desirable. That subsection was passed at a time when it was necessary, under war conditions, to place safeguards or restrictions which would enable the immigration authorities to cope with any situation that might arise.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Will the honourable gentleman read that portion of the section which is being repealed?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Subsection 2 of section 41, which it is proposed to repeal, reads as follows:

> Proof that any person belonged to or was within the description of any of the prohibited or undesirable classes within the meaning of this section at any time since the fourth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and ten, shall, for all the purposes of this Act, be deemed to establish prima facie that he still belongs to such prohibited or undesirable class or classes.

It does not seem necessary any longer to keep what may be termed a rather radical restriction in the Act, and, as honourable gentlemen know, it has been very widely objected to by the press and by labour people particularly. Inasmuch as it was enacted for a specific purpose in time of war, and the emergency has now passed, it is not considered important by the Department of Immigration that it should be continued.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill seems to be one of those which are very difficult to understand owing to the way they are printed. When I first read this Bill the term "Canadian citizen" seemed to me to be very broad, and it was difficult to understand the meaning or effect of the Bill. In the Act of 1910 I found a definition of "Canadian citizen." But I did not understand very clearly from the explanation given by the minister what was the change that was being made. I understood the honourable gentleman to say that the present Act did not affect a British subject domiciled in Canada. It seemed to me that the proviso in the present Act was that the section should not apply to any person who is a British subject either by birth in Canada or by naturalization; but the explanation that the minister has just given seems to be contrary to that.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: There is a distinction, though perhaps not a very wide one, between Canadian naturalization and Canadian domicile. The term "Canadian citizen" is defined in section 2 of the Act, paragraph f, I think.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That is the Act of 1910?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: 1910 or 1918. At any rate, "Canadian citizen" is interpreted to mean "a person born in Canada who has not become an alien; a British subject who has Canadian domicile; or, a person naturalized under the laws of Canada who has not subsequently become an alien or lost Canadian domicile." The Act as it would apply if amended as proposed would mean that a British subject, after he had been resident in Canada for, I think, a period of five years, would be regarded as having obtained Canadian domicile and would then be on the same ground as a Canadian-born citizen; but a British subject who had been here less than five years would still come under the provisions of section 41 of the Immigration Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Does not that question of domicile relate closely to the question of intent? Would not a man who came over here with the intention of living in Canada be immediately considered to be domiciled in Canada? It seems to me it is a very wide question, and one which it is rather difficult to discuss.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I think that the term "domicile" is quite clearly defined in the interpretation clause of the Act. It reads:

> (d) 'domicile' means the place in which a person has his home, or in which he resides....
> (i) Canadian domicile can only be acquired, for the purposes of this Act, by a person having his domicile for at least five years in Canada.

That is the interpretation of the word "domicile" in the interpretation clause. Whatever it may mean elsewhere, that is what it means for the purposes of this Act.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I would like to ask the minister if this repeals the drastic authority which we gave the Government last year?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Only in part.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What part?

Hon. GEORGE LYNCH-STAUNTON: Honourable gentlemen, I am very much surprised that the honourable minister should bring in at this time a Bill which practically repeals the Act which was passed last session. Chapter 26 of the Statutes of 1919 says:

> Every person who by word or act in Canada seeks to overthrow by force or violence the Government or constituted law of Great Britain and Ireland, or Canada, or of any of the provinces of Canada, or the Government of any other of His Majesty's dominions, colonies, possessions or dependencies, or advocates the assassination of any official of any of the said governments or of any foreign government, or who in Canada defends or suggests the unlawful destruction of property, or by word or act creates or attempts to create any riot or public disorder in Canada, or who without lawful authority assumes any powers of government in Canada or in any part thereof, or who by common repute belongs to or is suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from or in any way attempts to control any resident of Canada by force or by threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining or teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to belong to the prohibited or undesirable classes, and shall be liable to deportation.

I think everybody will agree that at all times, even the most peaceful times, when society is best ordered, such a person is an undesirable citizen, no matter whether he comes from Australia, South Africa, or Great Britain. It seems to me wise that we should have such a salutary provision in our law. It will only be invoked and has only been invoked on proper occasions. I for one am very much opposed to allowing such to come into this country, even though they are British subjects and the descendants of British subjects from generation to generation for all time. I therefore beg to move, seconded by my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) that this Bill be not now read, but that it be read this day six months hence.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Honourable gentlemen, I have only a few remarks to make in regard to this Bill and the amendment moved by my honourable friend. The easiest way to understand this section is to bear in mind, first, that there is a general law authorizing the deportation of certain classes of people. At the end of the Act there is a clause which exempts from the provisions of the Act British subjects born or naturalized in Canada. If you change the Act, persons who have become British subjects by virtue of the British Naturalization Act can come here and claim to be Canadian citizens. This Bill enlarges the exemption. The present exemption is confined to Canadian-born or naturalized Canadian citizens. If this Bill were to be passed, not only would Canadian-born and naturalized citizens be exempted, but British subjects who came here could claim the benefit of the exemption. As a matter of fact, I am a Scotchman—and I am not ashamed of my race. I have heard it said, and I agree with it, that while a Scotchman as a rule is a very good man, a bad one is about the worst you can get hold of; and close behind him comes the Englishman, who as a rule is a very good man, but who, if he is bad, is a pretty bad character. Among the class of people described in the Act with which we took such great pains last year, there are a number of Scotch and English who come to this country. They are trained agitators. They are brought up in an atmosphere that is rather hostile to law and order. They are unscrupulous and very clever, and are about the worst class of people that the Government of this country has to deal with. I think that the Act passed last year worked well, and is a useful Act; and while I would not say that it is absolutely necessary to continue it for all time. I do not think we should wipe it out at present. Anyone who is acquainted with what is going on in this country knows that conditions are not yet normal. Look at the conditions in the United States: they are far from normal; they are far from settled; and there is a great deal of trouble there. We know how drastically that country deals with such people as have been described.

I am in favour of leaving the Act alone. When conditions become normal and it is found that there is no necessity for such a statute as this, it can be repealed; but I think it would be a great mistake to alter the law which was passed last year, and which is working so well. I am not afraid of high-handed action. We have seen enough of what is going on to know that the Government, or anyone acting for the Government, or the police, will not undertake to do anything except for good and sound reasons.

Hon. GEO. H. BRADBURY: Honourable gentlemen, a year ago, when the Government took power to deport aliens or undesirables, I took the ground very strongly, as honourable gentlemen will remember, that the Government would have been derelict in its duty if it had not done so. I am amazed to find to-day that the Government has apparently backed down on the legislation which was passed a year ago. It is simply another evidence of the weakness of the Government in dealing with questions that affect labour interests. To my mind, if we pass this Bill that has been sent over to us by the House of Commons, we will be doing something—

An Hon. SENATOR: It has not been sent over from the Commons.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Well, I am amazed to know that it originated in this House. I did not believe that anyone in this House would bring such a Bill before it under present conditions, in view of our experience during the last year in the city of Winnipeg, when men who under this Act would be free to carry on a nefarious campaign, did carry on such a campaign which very nearly caused a revolution, tied up the city, and caused bloodshed and loss of life. If we are foolish enough to endorse this Bill, we are simply saying to those men and others like them: "You can come to this country; agitate if you like; preach sedition if you like; we will not deport you."

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Will my honourable friend pardon me? That is not the effect of the adoption of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I still maintain, with all due deference to the Minister of Labour, that I am right in my interpretation of the Bill, and I maintain that if it is passed the very men who were put in jail for committing those acts cannot be deported. Is not that right?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No; it is absolutely wrong.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I don't agree. Why was the Act of last Session passed? I maintain that it will be a great mistake if the Government does not keep on the statutes legislation that will give it absolute control of the people who come here, even after they become Canadian citizens. I cannot conceive of anything more dangerous than the passing of this Bill. It would appear to me as if it had been introduced at the request—not at the request, but at the demand—of the labour organizations of Canada.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That is quite incorrect.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: The question is whether we in this Parliament are going to be dictated to by labour or any other organizations, and induced to pass legislation that would endanger not only the property of this country, but the lives of the people as well, and make it impossible to maintain law and order in Canada.

In view of the fact that a year ago we did take power to deport not only alien enemies but Canadian citizens who preached sedition or committed acts that brought them under the law, and in view of this Bill coming before the Senate endorsed by the Government, not much encouragement is held out to the people who are trying to maintain order in Canada. The experience that we had in the city of Winnipeg ought to be a warning to every man that such legislation as we placed on the statute book a year ago is absolutely necessary. It does not necessarily follow that it should be enforced harshly; but I maintain that, when there is occasion to enforce it, it should be on the statute book so that it could be invoked, and should be strictly enforced when necessary. I do not believe that men who commit acts which bring them within the provisions of such a law should be dealt with as some men in Canada have been dealt with. As my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) has said, agitators who have come from the Clyde, or from England, have caused a great deal of our trouble. If I understand this Bill, such characters could not be deported if once they became Canadian citizens if we adopt this Bill. They would be protected by their citizenship, and could do almost anything they liked. They could be put in penitentiary, of course; but I do not believe it is in the interests of good government that such men should be put in the penitentiary and kept at the expense of the country. They should be deported, and the deportation of half-a-dozen such men would be the very best thing that could happen to-day as a warning to others. When they are sent to the penitentiary they become martyrs: the Government is pestered by petitions to release them.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Where would you deport British citizens to?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: To the country from which they come—or we might send them to Halifax.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: They are all good citizens there.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I saw this Bill to-day for the first time, and I was amazed when I looked at it. So far as I am concerned, I shall vote against it and shall do everything I can to make such legislation impossible. To my mind it is legislation that is well calculated to encourage agitators all over Canada. It is a confession of weakness on the part of the Government, and I think would do a very great deal of harm. I think at the present moment it should not have been brought before the House.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman some questions. Are any of the men who were convicted in Winnipeg Canadian citizens?

Some Hon. SENATORS: All of them.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I would like to ask the Minister of Labour a question. I understand that the passage of this Bill would repeal the Act that we passed last Session?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In part.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No, the whole thing.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: That should be made clear.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The wave of enthusiasm against this bit of legislation reminds me of what you might witness, and do sometimes witness, at a labour meeting when a fellow with a glib tongue gets on the platform and carries away his audience until they are prepared to vote to assassinate the King.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I did not think they ever did that in labour meetings.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: There seems to be a feeling, without any one stopping to reason about it, that when the legislation of last Session was passed it was necessary; that the necessity has not passed by; and that in case it should be needed in the future it should be kept on the statute books. Let me assure honourable gentlemen of what I know to be true in connection with this matter. While it may be that the legislation which we passed last year served a good purpose at the time, there was nothing done during the war period that caused so much discontent or made it so hard to control labour in this country as that very thing.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Because it was regarded as un-British and unfair.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Un-British?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Un-British, absolutely.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Well, let us be un-British, then. Let us be Canadians.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Un-British to say that a British subject should be deported without a trial.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Oh!

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That is absolutely what this means.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Why not repeal the whole law?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I say that under that legislation it was possible to deport without a trial a British subject who had been in this country for, if you like, 50 years, if he had not taken out Canadian naturalization papers. That, I submit, honourable gentlemen, is something to which the press and the public of this country did take serious exception. That provision was enacted only because the Government of the day and Parliament realized the necessity, under war conditions, of doing drastic things; but now that the necessity has passed, there is surely no objection to giving a British subject who has been resident in this country for at least five years a trial before a jury of his peers before he is deported.

The first clause of the Bill is simply an amendment to section 41. In the second clause of the Bill it is proposed to repeal a provision which permitted the deportation of anyone, whether a British subject or the subject of any other country, who at any time since May, 1910, had been guilty of any of the acts or utterances described in section 41 as being seditious. That legislation was passed a year or more ago, and there has been an opportunity for dealing with any persons in this country who came within that class; and I can assure this House that a substantial number of men in different parts of Canada were deported. It is not generally known at the present time; but I know of one locality from which a large number of men of that class were deported. I think the number was 22. Those whom it was desired to remove having been deported, the legislation has served its purpose; so that to-day there is in this country nobody of the class referred to who has been here five years since the legislation was passed; that is, only a year ago.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: The minister says this has served its purpose. That is, in the honourable gentleman's opinion.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Obviously it has served its purpose, because it gave the authorities more than one year to remove from the confines of this country any persons coming within that class who had prior to the date the legislation was passed committed any of those acts.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Suppose a man comes in to-morrow and does that sort of thing?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Then he can be deported to-morrow or at any time within five years without a trial.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Not if you pass this Bill.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I beg the honourable gentleman's pardon. To acquire Canadian domicile one must be a Canadian citizen or a British subject having acquired Canadian domicile, which means five years' residence in Canada.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Does the minister say that we have deported all who came within the undesirable class except Canadian citizens?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: All whom it seemed necessary to deport.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What about Ivens and some more of those preachers?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I think honourable members will agree that the Government and the authorities of the province of Manitoba and the courts of that province acted wisely when they gave to Mr. Ivens and every one of his colleagues in that movement a fair trial. Mr. Ivens came to this country a young man, in fact a boy. He received his education in the Wesleyan College in Winnipeg. He grew up in this country. He had been here for more than thirty years. I submit to you that public opinion, and you honourable gentlemen yourselves, would agree that it would not have been fair to railroad that man out of this country without a fair trial.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: How about the others?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Citizens of foreign countries who came to Canada and were guilty of seditious acts and utterances merited deportation, even though those utterances or acts were committed prior to the time this legislation was passed. We dealt with a substantial number. Now, that having been done, and more than a year having gone by during which that work has been carried out and concluded, there is no necessity for continuing upon our statute books a law that will permit an officer of the Immigration Department to cause to be deported a British subject who has been in this country more than five years.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: And has been guilty of all those acts?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Can any officer do that?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The immigration officers can do that without a trial. Now, honourable gentlemen, I urgently suggest that this matter be given careful and serious consideration before you finally decide. I am not asking you to make a snap judgment upon it, but am simply requesting you to give earnest consideration to this question: is the Parliament of Canada going to refuse to pass legislation which will entitle a British subject of more than five years' residence in this country to a fair trial before a jury of his peers before he is deported?

I would suggest that, inasmuch as we have a very small attendance in the House at the present moment, and as this is a very important subject, we should adjourn the debate until some future day—say until Tuesday of next week if you desire, to give you time to inquire and consider just what the effect of this measure would be.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The honourable gentleman stated two or three times, in discussing this question of domicile, that a man has to be in the country five years before he acquires Canadian domicile. I cannot see that in the Act of 1910, which I have before me. It says only three years. Has the Act been changed since then?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I think it was changed in 1918.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What is the section?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I think I can give the honourable gentleman the information. "The Immigration Act and Regulations," as issued by the Immigration Department in the year 1919, quotes section 2, paragraph d, as follows:

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Of what Act?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The Immigration Act?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What year?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: 1919.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What chapter?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The new section 41 of the Immigration Act was enacted by Chapter 26 of the Statutes of 1919.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I do not think you will find it there.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Where is the section that defines "domicile"?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Chapter 25.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It is section 2, subsection 1, paragraph d of the Immigration Act of 1919. It reads as follows:

Canadian domicile can only be acquired, for the purposes of this Act, by a person having his domicile for at least five years in Canada after having been landed therein within the meaning of this Act.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: That does not affect the other Acts. It says, "for the purposes of this Act."

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But it does not say for other purposes?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Well, that is quite a different thing.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Well, section 41, which we are proposing to amend, is a part of this Act; therefore the five years' clause necessarily applies.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: It is moved by Hon. Mr. Robertson that this debate be now adjourned until Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No. I object to it standing until Tuesday. I think it ought to stand until after the adjournment if it stands at all.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: After the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: There may not be many here on Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I was not aware that there was to be an adjournment.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: We might say Friday of next week, and if the House did not sit on that day it would not come up until after the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I think, honourable gentlemen, that that is hardly fair. This Bill has been on the Order Paper for several days. It is a simple matter. Surely honourable gentlemen can give it the necessary attention.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: It is the honourable gentleman's own motion to adjourn until next Friday.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No, Tuesday.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I mentioned Friday myself.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I moved the adjournment till Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Honourable gentlemen, I do not think this question ought to be postponed until Tuesday. Every member of this House knows that we are not likely to have a large attendance of the House then. We have a fair attendance at the present moment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: And there is a very strong opinion in the House at the present moment. I think that instead of adjourning the debate until next week, we ought to take a vote now.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If it is the will of the majority, honourable gentlemen, that it should be adjourned until Friday, I will not raise strenuous objection, but I think it is not unreasonable to say we should be in a position to proceed with it earlier.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Friday is substituted for Tuesday of next week.

The debate was adjourned.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved that the Senate go into Committee on Bill 49, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act (Steamboat Inspection).

Hon. WM. ROCHE: Honourable gentlemen, at the second reading I asked the Minister whether this Bill was to apply to shipping generally, and I think he replied in the affirmative. I would like to point out at the present moment, if the honourable gentleman says that, what would be involved in it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We can discuss the question fully when we go into Committee, as we intend to do.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: This affects the principle of the Bill; that is the point.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The principle of the Bill has been assented to by the House, because the Bill has received its second reading. It is now at the Committee stage.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I am speaking against the motion to go into Committee on the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes; my honourable friend can do that.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I want to point out briefly what effect the Bill will have. I say that this infringes international law. In the first place, foreign ships are deemed part of the territory and under the control of foreign states, and these resent any interference with the management or construction of their ships.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend will observe that it is proposed to give authority to the Governor in Council to make rules and regulations along the lines mentioned in the Bill, and we would have to wait until those rules and regulations are made.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Yes, but this proposes rules and regulations regarding ships over which we have no control.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. Manifestly—

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I do not want to argue with the honourable gentleman; I only want to say just what effect it would have and also to urge that we consider carefully its effect on Canadian shipping. If this Bill is passed, foreign ships putting into ports like Sydney for coal would have to be stopped and their fires would have to be put out and their boilers examined. Halifax also is a port of call. Vessels come in merely to get orders, and then they proceed. If they can be stopped and their boilers inspected, it will have a bad effect.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Government will not go beyond its authority in the matter.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate went into Committee on the Bill. Hon. Mr. Daniel in the Chair.

On section 1, new section 578—rules and regulations:

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to make this observation, that in the cases I have cited of foreign ships, the regulations could not apply to them, because they are precluded by their nationality from control by the Governor in Council or anybody else in this country.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Impliedly, without any argument, this must necessarily be within the authority of the Government of Canada. We cannot for a moment presume to assert authority which we do not possess. Until the rules and regulations are passed, of course, it cannot be determined what the authority is. But I think my honourable friend may rest assured that the Government of Canada is not going to assert an authority which it clearly does not possess.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: If you buy a foreign ship, until that ship is registered in Canada it is not subject to inspection.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: There are conditions under which we can have a foreign ship examined. Canadian vessels have to pass a test at least once a year. Their boilers must be tested every year, and under certain conditions the vessels may have to be tested more than once. For instance, a ship may meet with an accident. Then, there are classes of ships that come into Canadian waters, and, I am sorry to say, are able to trade between one Canadian port and another. Any such ship that remains here for a certain length of time is subject to inspection, whether she is British or Norwegian or Swedish, or whatever register she may be. If the vessel is trading from port to port in the Dominion of Canada she is subject to our boiler regulations. We have passed legislation by which we restrict the size of ships, in order to give the Dominion Coal Company, the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, and the Nova Scotia Steel Company the privilege of chartering these ships, because we did not have ships on our own register up to 1,500 tons. These ships have been coming into Canada and trading in Canada year in and year out, and they come under our boiler regulations. We exercise control over them. Under the Shipping Act their boilers must be tested at least once a year. In my judgment no foreign ship should be trading between port and port in Canada. We have ships of our own, and we want to preserve our own coastwise trade. However, we are not discussing that point. The point I am making is that any ship that comes into Canadian waters and trades from port to port in Canada is properly subject, regardless of nationality, to the same examination as a Canadian ship.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Paragraphs a, b, c, d, e, f, and g of this new section 578 are the same as in the present law.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: With regard to the observation of my esteemed colleague from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Crosby), I want to say that vessels loading cargo in Canada would be on a different basis from those about which I have spoken. Provision could be made that vessels should not load in Canada unless they were subject to inspection. We might have control over that. But my good friend from Halifax knows very well that the portwarden or anybody else cannot make a survey upon a foreign ship except on application to the consul of the nation by which the vessel is owned.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Certainly not, if she is one of those ships that have a right, under the old British Treaty, to trade in ports in the Dominion of Canada. We cannot interfere with a ship that comes into any port of Canada to load for any part of the world, and the Act does not propose anything like that. We could not interfere if we desired to do so. The ships I was referring to are those which come into Canadian waters and go from port to port in Canada; and, as I said before, I trust that practice may not prevail very long. But any ship of that kind comes under the regulations if she remains in Canadian waters for a year.

Paragraphs a to g inclusive were agreed to.

On paragraph h—fees:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The object of this is simply to make the system of inspection self-supporting, as I explained the other day on the second reading.

Paragraph h was agreed to.

On section 2—duty on steamboats registered in Canada:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I see that in the old Act the amount was fixed, but now it is left to the Government.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It was based on a charge of ten cents per ton, which in the case of small boats was entirely inadequate to cover the expenses of the inspector sent to make the inspection, and in the case of the larger class of ships was out of proportion. A classification based upon tonnage will hereafter be adopted so that the incidence of the charge will fall equitably.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Should not the word "fees" be used instead of "duty"?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: "Duty" is the word that has been used in the past.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: It is not the proper word.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In the old Act, under the head of "Inspection fees," section 643 says: "The Governor in Council may fix a duty."

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: It is the wrong word.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is understood.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: It does no harm.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Perhaps the leader of the Government can tell us the distinction between the word "duty" and the word "fees" in new section 644. I have been assuming that there was none; but apparently there is a distinction.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are meant to be the same. They are synonymous terms.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: No doubt it is just an error.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: A distinction seems to be drawn between the two.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: I beg pardon, Mr. Chairman: they are "fees." I have been paying them for years. However, I do not think any harm will accrue from the use of the word "duty."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As it has been on the statute books for a great number of years, it is probably well to adhere to it.

Section 2 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

RETURNED SOLDIERS' EMERGENCY FUND.

INQUIRY.

Hon Mr. TANNER inquired of the Government:

1. What is the total amount of Federal Emergency Fund paid in each province to returned soldiers?
2. What is the number of men in each province who received payment out of such fund?
3. What is the total amount of such fund paid in each county of Nova Scotia to returned soldiers?
4. What is the number of men in each county of Nova Scotia who received payment out of such fund?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: 1, 2, 3 and 4. The necessary information to answer this question will not be available until some time after May 15th, as the branches of the Federal Emergency Appropriation Department in the Western Provinces have until May 15th to pay soldiers' settlement cases, claims for which originated prior to april 24th. Official returns from such branches will therefore not be received in full until some time after that date.

Advances to branches in the respective provinces to 24th April, 1920, less refunds to date:

Province.	Advance.
Alberta	$1,065,000 00
British Columbia	970,000 00

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

The Hon. the SPEAKER informed the Senate that he had received a communication informing him that the Deputy Governor General would attend in the Senate Chamber at 4.30 p.m. on Tuesday, May 11, for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to certain Bills.

RUMOURED FRENCH EMBARGO ON LOBSTERS.

INQUIRY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I would like to bring to the attention of the House a seemingly well-founded report that the Government of France is about to put an embargo upon the importation of lobsters into that country. Inquiries have been made at the Department of Trade and Commerce, but they seem to be in a quandary to answer them. I would ask the leader of the Government if he has any information on the subject, and, if not, whether he will endeavour to get the information for us. The question was asked in the other House this day week, but there has been no reply which would in any way clear up the matter. I need hardly say that such an embargo would be a serious blow to the lobster industry of the Maritime Provinces, which amounts to about $3,000,000 a year.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have no information upon the subject, and have had no intimation that such a thing was to be done. If I can get any information on the subject I shall be glad to communicate it to my honourable friend.

MAPLE PRODUCTS BILL.

REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE OF WHOLE.

On the order for the third reading of Bill 28, an Act respecting Maple Products:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I wish to make a slight amendment to this Bill before it is read the third time. I therefore move that it be not now read a third time, but that it be re-committed to the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate went into committee on the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I propose striking out clause 3 of the Bill which makes provision for the imposition of a fine in the event of maple sugar being seized on the shelves say of a retail merchant or otherwise, if it should be found to be adulterated in any way. The Food and Drugs Act which was passed a few days ago makes, I think, all the necessary provision for the imposition of penalties and for the enforcement of an Act of this kind. I therefore move that clause 3 be stricken out.

The amendment of Hon. Sir James Lougheed was agreed to.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then, I propose that clause 4 be amended so that it will read as follows:

Every person who violates any of the provisions of this Act shall be guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to the penalties prescribed by section sixteen of the Food and Drugs Act, 1920.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: By that alteration the honourable gentleman is moving to strike out the words—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The words "of subsections two and three of said section two."

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Does this alteration meet the point that was raised the other day by the honourable gentleman from Tignish (Hon. Mr. Murphy)?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. The Food and Drugs Act makes the most ample provision for the enforcement of penalties.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: May not the penalties prescribed by the Food and Drugs Act be too severe for those who may sell adulterated maple sugar? With what substance is maple sugar adulterated? Some of those penalties may be very severe indeed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is a minimum penalty, which is very small, and the Food and Drugs Act makes the most ample provision, so that any one violating it may take advantage of a want of knowledge or anything of that kind. Last week before we passed the Food and Drugs Act we discussed that phase of the question. I am sure this is a very reasonable and moderate Bill.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: As the one who raised that point, I may say that I took exception to that section of the Food and Drugs Act on account of its stringency. You will notice by the section that when a man is supposed to be liable under this Act, if he notifies the magistrate that he bought the article in good faith and used all necessary precautions to get a pure article, he would not be subject to the fine.

The amendment of Hon. Sir James Lougheed was agreed to.

The Bill was reported as amended.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill 49, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act (Steamboat Inspection).

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Before the third reading is carried, may I call the attention of my honourable friend the leader of the House to paragraph d:

(d) respecting boats and life-preservers, fire buckets, axes and lanterns and other life-saving appliances to be carried by steamboats or by other vessels mentioned in this part.

And then paragraph f:

(f) requiring steamboats to carry chemical or other fire-extinguishers, and prescribing the number of such fire-extinguishers.

Why make a difference by not specifying that the Governor in Council shall have power to prescribe the number of life-boats, life preservers and fire-buckets? Only the number of fire-extinguishers is to be prescribed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does not my honourable friend consider that the authority would be sufficient to prescribe the number of boats, life-preservers, fire-buckets, axes, etc.? My honourable friend might as well ask that the number of axes, the number of fire-buckets, and the number of lanterns, be prescribed:

Hon. Mr. BOYER: That is precisely what I say.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But we do not do that?

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Why should you ask power to prescribe the number of fire-extinguishers and not to specify the number of boats that should be carried?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It might be difficult to determine the number of life-boats that should be carried. I do not think that you could adopt any uniform standard by which that could be done.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Yes, according to the number of persons the boat is licensed to carry.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Not the number of boats—the size of the boats.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That authority should be sufficiently wide to permit of the number being prescribed.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: According to class of boat.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would have relation chiefly to the number. As I understand, my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Boyer) asks if in paragraph f the number of fire-extinguishers to be carried is to be specifically mentioned, why should not the same provision apply in paragraph d?

Hon. Mr. BOYER: That is my objection.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Paragraph f simply states what shall be done as to fire-extinguishers, but paragraph d leaves it entirely with the Government to regulate the whole subject.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Through the inspector.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Paragraph f throws upon the Government the responsibility of specifying the number of fire-extinguishers, that is all.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: I have no objection; only I thought I would draw attention to it. I do not see why, if the number is specified in one clause, it should not be specified in the other.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Perhaps I could explain.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Now the authority is going to speak.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Well, perhaps I could. You must know that at present there are various kinds of life-boats. There are the collapsible life-boats, there are boats of different sizes, and so on. The regulation under the Shipping Act on the other side states exactly the provision that must be made for every one. There is no analogy between the number of boats and the provision of live-saving. For instance, there is a new launching apparatus by means of which it is possible to handle about four times as many boats as formerly. That makes quite a difference. It is not the number of boats that is important; it is the number of places in the boats. Everyone must be provided for. There are boat drills at certain hours, and every one must go and stand by the boat. Every passenger on board ship has a particular place assigned to him.

Then, as to the number of fire-extinguishers, that is an altogether different thing. For instance, all the fire insurance companies say that there must be a certain number of fire extinguishers. That is why the number is specified here, I take it. It is the same with regard to a store or other building. If you want to get the benefit of some insurance clause or to pay less for your insurance, you must have a certain number of fixed fire-extinguishers.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think it is all right as it is.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

PILOTAGE BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 94, an Act to Amend the Canada Shipping Act (Pilotage). Hon. Mr. Daniel in the Chair.

On section 1—section 434 repealed, etc.:

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend opposite (Hon. Mr. Bostock) asked me for a statement of the fees of pilots. I lay the statement upon the Table. As I explained in introducing this Bill, it is proposed to repeal the section of the Act referred to because it provided that the pilotage charges cannot be increased until the minimum fees of a pilot for three consecutive years fall below $600. Of course, that is a very low rate of payment for pilots. It is proposed to leave the matter entirely to the discretion of the Minister. There is no intention at the present time of increasing the fees, but this removes the restriction, which is very embarrassing.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Does not the passing of this Bill rather hold out an invitation to the pilots to ask for an increase?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The desirability of increasing them has been represented, but the Minister has no intention of doing so at the present time. But when the restriction is removed, if it should be desirable to do so, owing to the increased cost of living, and so on, he can exercise his discretion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Do I understand that the Minister does not intend to avail himself of the legislation?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Minister states that, notwithstanding the repeal of the section, it is not his intention at the present time to increase the pilots' charges. But should the matter become acute, or should a case be so clearly made out as to require the intervention of the Minister in the matter, he will be at liberty to exercise his discretion.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I undestand that the average income of the pilots is now $2,400 a year, so it will be some considerable time before they get down to $500. What is intended, I understand, is to make the law with reference to Quebec uniform with that respecting St. John, Halifax, and Sydney.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, the restriction applies only to Quebec.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It is an invidious distinction.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I suppose there are complaints from those pilots who are asking for an increase.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not think so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is an invidious distinction which applies only to the pilots below Quebec.

Section 1 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

OLEOMARGARINE BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 103, an Act to amend the Oleomargarine Act, 1919. Hon. Mr. McSweeney in the Chair.

Sections 1 and 2 were agreed to.

On section 3—power to prescribe penalty, etc.:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Does this increase the penalty over that of last year?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is entirely new.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Honourable gentlemen, I do not rise to oppose this or any other clause in the Bill; on the contrary, as a physician, I commend it very highly. I know that oleomargarine, if properly put up, is under ordinary conditions a very nutritive substance, and is very much better than a good deal of the butter produced in ordinary dairies.

I wish to draw attention to an article that appeared in the Toronto Globe in November last. The remarks are those of Mr. E. S. Archibald, the present superintendent of the dairy at the Experimental Farm, which, by the way, is an ideal breeding place for germs to contaminate the products of the institution. Evidently some other gentlemen as well as myself must have objected to the moss growing on the roof and the cracks in the floor as having a deleterious effect upon the butter manufactured there. In the course of an address this gentleman goes out of his way to say:

Milk is now costing $3.14 per 100 lbs. to produce on the Experimental Farm, and last year averaged $2.96 per cwt. These figures, Mr. Archibald said, lined up fairly closely to those secured by Prof. Archie Leitch. An additional item of cost, not usually encountered, was the cost of several extra men to weigh the feeds and milk and keep the stables clean for visitors and the super-critical visitors from the Senate.

If we are to infer from that, and the inference is plain, that the only time efforts are made along that line is when some of the super-critical gentlemen around me go out there, what is the usual condition of the place? It is a demonstration station to which people look to learn something, and it should be clean at all times, and there should be no necessity of hiring men to have it ready in case of visits from super-critical gentlemen from the Senate. This gentleman, I submit, should not have gone so far out of his way to be facetious before a public meeting, and I think he deserves to be censured.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I would like to ask the leader of the Government what is the object of limiting the time during which oleomargarine can be manufactured in or imported into Canada? Surely the time has arrived when we might follow in the wake of most other countries where butter is manufactured and where there is a large consuming public, and allow the people of this country to choose whether they will use oleomargarine or butter. When butter was twenty-five to thirty cents a pound could understand the argument against the use of oleomargarine, because then people who were not very well off could afford to buy butter. But now that butter is from sixty cents to a dollar pound, it is a very serious thing for the people of limited incomes to be restricted. I have heard it argued in the other House that oleomargarine is not a good article of food. I have eaten a good deal of it; I have it in my house; and I have eaten butter that was a great ideal worse than the oleomargarine that is on the market to-day. I do not think that any one is likely to mistake oleomargarine for butter. I heard one man argue that the merchants sell oleomargarine as butter, and the next moment he was contending that it was no good for food and was not fit to eat. If merchants can sell it to the people as butter, and if the people cannot tell the difference, it must be a pretty fair article of food. Any of the Government analysts will tell you that it is fully up to butter in food properties. It seems to me that, instead of extending the time for its importation and manufacture for one year, when we will have to go all over this again, it would be good poilcy to say that oleomargarine may be manufactured or imported until legislation is passed to the contrary. If the manufacturer of oleomargarine is not certain of the time in which he can engage in that business, or if he thinks that his factory is going to be closed up in a year, what inducement is there for him to go into the business? What is the result? All this has a tendency to keep up the price of oleomargarine. I would have no objection to the passage of strict regulations providing for the punishment of persons who attempted to deceive the public. Oleomargarine should not be sold as butter, and if any one attempts to sell it as butter the punishment should be sufficiently severe to prevent him attempting to do so again. But to say that oleomargarine should not be manufactured or imported is surely not in accordance with the ideas of the people of Canada to-day. If I thought that this legislation would inflict a hardship upon the farmers I might hesitate to speak as I am doing; but it can be no hardship upon them. They have been and are now getting high prices for butter, and I am sure they will continue to do so for years to come, and I do not think oleomargarine can enter very largely into competition with good butter. No doubt the Government has given this question careful consideration. If they put this Bill through, as I presume they will, I hope that a year from now they will come to the conclusion that the time has arrived for free trade in oleomargarine, as being a very important article of food of the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman seems to know all about oleomargarine. Can he tell us how they give it the taste of butter?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: There is butter in it.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I am informed by a man who is thoroughly posted, having to do with its manufacture, that in the manufacture of oleomargarine a certain amount of whole milk is mixed with it.

Hon. JOHN WEBSTER: And buttermilk.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I am informed that whole milk is used, and also a certain percentage of butter. The balance of the material, or 75 per cent of it, is produced on our Canadian farms. It contains animal fats cotton-seed oil, cocoanut oil, and other vegetable oils, every one of which is a first-class, wholesome food. The butter and the milk, I understand, are put into it to give it as nearly as possible the taste of butter, to which people are accustomed. That is a perfectly legitimate practice. If you can make oleomargarine taste as well as butter, it is worth as much as butter, because its food value is as great as that of butter.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I have been told that, in order to give it the taste of butter, a few drops of bad melted butter are put into it.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Oh, no.

Hon. JOHN WEBSTER: In reply to the honourable member from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turriff) I may say that I think it is wisdom on the part of the Government that they have extended this time for one year. At the close of the great war no person in Canada knew what the effect on the dairy industry would be. The dairy industry of Canada is one of the greatest industries we have, but I must say that with the prices the farmer or producer is receiving for his milk, I do not think he is suffering by the manufacture of oleomargarine. Butter in this country to-day has become almost a luxury for the poor man. But, regarding the quality of oleomargarine as compared with fine butter, I cannot agree with the honourable member for Assiniboia.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Well, give us our choice.

Hon. Mr. WEBSTER: I have tried several times to eat it in New York, but I prefer my bread without any oleomargarine on it. Any person who has been accustomed to good creamery butter, or first-class dairy butter made by a Canadian woman, will not take kindly to oleomargarine. I think the Government is very wise in limiting the time from year to year. Had a depression occurred in the cheese trade or the creamery butter trade, it would have been an easy matter to let the time for the manufacture of oleomargarine expire and let the people of Canada have creamery butter at a lower price. But there is a foreign demand for all the fine butter we can make in Canada, and so long as the prices remain high I think the Government of Canada is displaying a great deal of wisdom in giving the workingmen who cannot buy butter at fancy prices an opportunity of obtaining fats of this kind.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would ask the honourable leader of the Government whether it would not be well to strike out clause 3 of this Bill, as he did a similar provision in Bill 28, the Maple Products Bill, leaving the penalty to come under the operation of Bill 27, an Act respecting Food and Drugs, which, as he said a moment ago, makes all the necessary provision for the enforcement of a penalty.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would not like to consent to striking out clause 3. I am not prepared to say without looking into the question further, that oleomargarine would necessarily come under the Food and Drugs Act of 1890. As this is simply a tentative piece of legislation, expiring at the date mentioned, I think it had better go as it is.

Hon. JOHN WEBSTER: If I might be permitted to make a suggestion, I would urge that instead of striking out clause 3, the penalty should be made $100. That is the way to deal with that clause. I know of a storekeeper who during this past winter has sold, on an average, according to an admission which he made the other day, 150 lbs of oleomargarine a week, as butter. He was fined the other day $50, the full penalty of the law. That man should have been fined $150 or $200. He was importing oleomargarine, and clearing 25 cents a pound on it by selling it to the poor people of Kingston as butter. I would make the penalty more than $50, and protect the dairy trade.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That would not quite meet the case. A man might sell 5,000 lb. and $100 would not be a sufficient penalty. The penalty should be as it is $50, but the offender should be made to return to the purchaser twice the value of all the oleomargarine that he sold as butter.

Hon. JOHN WEBSTER: That is all right.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There was a similar difficulty in England. The fine was made as high as £5,000, but the man who sold the oleomargarine as butter profited to the extent of £30,000, and, after paying his fine of £5,000, was £25,000 ahead. These penalties are not of much value. The offenders should be dealt with in the other way—that of allowing the persons who got the oleomargarine for butter to recover twice the value.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I wish to inform my honourable friend from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), who seems to have very little regard for oleomargarine, that I was lately told by a grocer selling that article that during the winter he sold it to persons of limited means for cooking purposes, and even for the making of fine pastry, and they all claimed that it served the purpose as well as the butter generally used in cooking. I have heard that more than once; so I wanted to give the information to my honourable friend, who seems to be prejudiced against oleomargarine.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 20, an Act to amend The Opium and Narcotic Drug Act.—Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 1, subsection 1—title changed:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Why is this restricted to narcotic drugs? Are there no other drugs to which this law is to be applied?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This Bill is confined entirely to habit-forming drugs.

Subsection 1 was agreed to.

Subsection 2 was agreed to.

On subsection 3—amendment in consequence of section 5A:

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: What is the effect of this clause?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It makes it obligatory to have a license to sell.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: As I understand, every wholesale or retail druggist and every physician will have to be licensed under this Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What will be the position of country stores under this Act? They sell certain patent medicines which, I suppose, contain some of those drugs. Will they be liable, unless they get a license from the minister, to be fined for having those medicines in their possession?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is a provision whereby any person can sell a preparation with a limited quantity.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Such as most patent medicines would have?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is provided in paragraph a of subsection 4, new section 5A.

Subsection 3 was agreed to.

Subsection 4 was agreed to.

On subsection 5, new section 5, subsection 1—penalty for giving, selling, or furnishing drugs to any but authorized persons:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: This seems to be a pretty drastic section. It does not specify the drug. It would cover everything in the nature of medicine or drugs. I do not think that should pass in so broad a form. What is meant by "drugs"?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I would like to ask the honourable leader if the Bill has not been very much amended. Have we before us the amendments made to it?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is the difficulty.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is the Bill as it has come from the Commons.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: After it was amended?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, it was amended radically.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: We have not those amendments made to the Bill.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Without a definition of the word "drugs," what would it cover?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Paragraph a of subsection 2 gives the meaning of "drugs":

> "drug" means and includes any substance (whether, alone or in conjunction with any other substance) mentioned in the Schedule to this Act or which may be added to such Schedule under the authority of this Act.

And if my honourable friend will refer to the schedule he will find that it means: cocaine or any of the salts or compounds thereof; morphine or any of the salts or compounds thereof; opium; eucaine or any of the salts and compounds thereof.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Would that cover liniments? There are drugs in those.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then you could not sell Friar's Balsam without the authority of a doctor. It seems to me you are tying up the druggist in a very tight corner.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In new section 5, subsection 4, the exceptions are to be found.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think this is one of the most important sections in the whole Bill. If the Bill contained this section alone it would be worth passing, for the simple reason that it prohibits the refilling by druggists of a physician's prescriptions without orders from the physician to refill them. Every one knows that doctors have been blamed to some extent for creating the habit of narcotic drug-taking, by prescriptions which they have given at various times. As a matter of fact, if such habits have been formed, through doctors' prescriptions, which are given only for emergencies, for certain purposes, and for a certain length of time, it is because of the irregular action of druggists in continuing indefinitely to fill such prescriptions time after time. That is very often how the habit of taking narcotic drugs is acquired. It is not by the original prescription of the physician, which is given for a certain purpose, usually in an emergency, and only for a certain length of time. This section prohibits the druggist from refilling any prescription of that kind without a special and specific order from the doctor to do so, and I think that if it is carried out it will be one of the most useful means of preventing the drug-taking habit, or at all events of decreasing it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Can the honourable gentleman, with his experience, say whether it is likely to be carried out or not, and whether it should not be subject to some other regulation?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: That I was going to ask afterwards.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: It is like every other statute in that respect.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It seems to be a section in the interest of the doctor. If the doctor's prescription can be used only once—if you must go to the doctor every time—I can quite understand why the honourable gentleman from St. John (Hon. Mr. Daniel) would be very strongly in favour of this.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: That is a lawyer's view of it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I suppose honourable gentlemen do not remember the time when they were purchasing paregoric. But paregoric would be excluded by this, would it not?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: So it should be.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: It is used for children more than anything else.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: There have been some pretty good men raised on paregoric, and they have lived a long time. I must say it strikes me that this is very drastic legislation, and I think we are having too much of that kind of legislation. There is too much of "thou shalt not" in our enactments, and it is really against the public interest, I think, to pass laws of that sort. I for one protest against this section. I do not think that subsection 4 (a) of section 5A gives sufficient relief.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I might tell my honourable friend that under subsection 4 (a) paregoric would not be shut out, because there is not a sufficient strength of opium in it. Opium is the chief ingredient in paregoric. At the same time, I might tell my honourable friend it is and always has been a very dangerous thing in the household, and has on more than one occasion, to my own knowledge, been productive of serious harm.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know much about this question except that I have heard doctors and others say, ever since I have been able to understand, that half the children who die before attaining their second or third year do so as a result of having been drugged with all kinds of patent medicines. Knowing hardly anything of hygiene, and very little of the way in which children should be fed, the parents, when a child cried, even though it had been fed only half an hour before, fed it again; and if the child cried again, they gave it a bottle. Thus, often, owing to the parents' lack of knowledge of the effects of these drugs, children have been sent to the grave.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is true as far as ordinary food is concerned. But if a child, after being given the bottle, continues to cry, recourse is had to the paregoric bottle, and he is chloroformed into quietude. When he awakens he cries again because of the disturbance created in his stomach by the food, and he is given paregoric again and is once more chloroformed into a state of insensibility, and in that state he dies.

Subsection 5 of section 1 was agreed to.

On subsection 6 of section 1—Minister may issue licenses, etc.:

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Under this clause, is a druggist who is not in the habit of making large importations obliged to pay $5 every time he wants to import a few grains of morphine, or tincture of opium, or opium itself?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: A man with a small drug store could not do that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am informed that there are only about thirty or forty in the whole Dominion who will take out these licenses. I may say that the further provisions of the Bill are entirely new, and are drafted in prusuance of the Convention of 1911, which I understand was entered into at The Hague. This legislation is practically in conformity with legislation introduced by the other nations who adhere to that Conventon.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: But that Convention does not specify the fee that is to be paid for a license?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Perhaps the explanation is that this is only for import from foreign countries. It may be that there are only forty or fifty who will be under the necessity of taking out licenses. If it applied to every retail druggist who bought morphine or opium, t would be out of place.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Do we understand that—wholesale importers?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Should not that be made clear?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They will discover that.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I am not sure that the leader of the Government is absolutely corredt about that. If you look at this section you will find that there are two charges mentioned—one of $5, and another of $25. The section says:

> For a license for a year for a manufacturer or a dealer other than a retail druggist, the sum of $25.

So the retail druggist pays $5 for every importation he makes, while the other man pays $25 a year.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: As a rule, does the retail druggist import?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No. That is the point I want made clear. If he buys from a wholesaler. will he have to pay $5?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Will this have the effect of shutting out Tanlac? That is a very important medicine.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: According to the newspapers.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I understand it has saved the lives of hundreds of thousands of people. I would be a great mistake. A doctor's prescription would be required, and a doctor would not give a prescription for it; he would lose his job.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS: It is not often that I rise to address the House, but I do not think we have considered the question we are now discussing. We know what opium has done in China and in other eastern countries, and we know something of the growth and development of the opium traffic in the British possessions. I had the privilege of living for some years in the East, and know something of its development, and the vast importance of this question. This has not yet been realized by the Canadian people, and I would like to throw out a little hint in this regard. I know of the practice of some of the foreigners in our Northwest. I have seen fine and beautiful specimens of the poppy in large quantities. It is put to uses of which we at present do not take any cognizance. It is a very common thing for foreigners in our West to put it into cakes for festive occasions—marriage feasts and all sorts of entertainments. They like the flavour of the poppy seed, and in that way it is introduced into their sweetmeats. This practice is becoming quite common. We are guarding our own people and our own families, but I have never yet heard a word as to what Canada can do and is doing, and as to what our foreign population has done and is doing, in the cultivation of the opium plant.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Have the poppies grown in the West anything like the strength of the opium of the East?

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS: I am speaking of what my own eyes have seen. The poppies of the West are a rather stronger and better plant than you find in India, for example, where I spent some twelve years.

Another thing. We are adepts in growing tobacco. Our Lower Canadians can tell us all about that. We think tobacco is not so very dangerous, but there is great danger in its habitual use. A field of poppies is a beautiful sight; it is like a sea of roses; but you can scarcely realize the influence that it exercises upon those engaged in its cultivation. A man, for example, cannot cultivate the opium plant and make it fit for market as we know it, because he becomes drunk, and that in a few hours.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What damaging effect has it had upon the foreign communities where it is used?

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS: They look upon it as a great advantage. They make the same use of it in their feasts and gatherings as do the people of India and Japan and other countries where it is used. Of course, the growth and use of opium has been checked in Japan and China. I would like our Canadians to be a little more alive to the situation, and to endeavour to curtail some of these things. We must not only consider what the doctor or the druggist may do. I never come across the poppy in this country without a shiver passing through my frame. I know something about medicine, and I know the mischief that has been done in the East through opium. To me it would be a very sad reflection if our legislation were lacking in any way to effectually prevent the culture of these plants in our own beloved Canada.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In line 23, strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or."

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: What constitutes an importation?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Bringing such a product in from a foreign country.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Can purchases be made by five different stores and imported together?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would be one importation. They would have to be licensed to import.

Then, in line 26, after the word "druggist," add the following words: "who manufactures any drug."

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You give a man an annual license, and yet you charge on each importation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is a manufacturing license. There shall be a license for each exportation and importation, and there shall be a license for the man who manufactures.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And there is a license for the retailer, although you make him pay on each individual importation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, they are two entirely different things.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Suppose he does not manufacture?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He is not bound to take out that license.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He has to pay $5 for an annual license and $5 for each importation. That is not regulated. If a man were rich, he could import $20,000 worth of drugs, but the man who had to import in small quantities would have to pay $5 every time. I should think it would be according to the size of the importation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He will not import unless it pays him to do so, because he can get it from the wholesaler.

Hon. JOHN WEBSTER: But suppose a Toronto or a Montreal wholesaler is short of a certain drug, as happened on many occasions during the "flu" epidemic. Suppose a man living near the international boundary line keeps a drug store, and he orders from New York a small shipment of one of these drugs and gets it next morning by mail. He would have to pay $5 every time he made an importation, although the drug itself did not cost $5 in New York. There are many cases of that kind right near the international boundary line.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is only the maximum. It does not follow that the Order in Council will fix the fee for exportation and importation at $5. This simply provides that the fee shall not exceed that amount. The intention of the department is to advise the Government to permit an importation of $25 without that charge being made. But this is regulative, and its object is to fix the maximum amount.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Why should the importer be required to pay even 50 cents under the conditions which the honourable gentleman from Brockville (Hon. Mr. Webster) mentions?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: There must be a fee. The honourable leader says the importer may be allowed to import up to $25 worth, but the Act would require the payment of a fee.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: For instance, a man might run short of heroin and send across the international boundary line for some, which might be worth only $5, and if he had to pay only a dollar it would not be reasonable or equitable at all.

Hon. JOHN WEBSTER: I fully realize the importance of these cases, because during the "flu" epidemic of last year there were druggists who could not obtain articles in Montreal or Toronto, and who wired to

New York and got them next day by mail. Under this provision each importation would cost the importer $5.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Were they narcotic drugs?

Hon. Mr. WEBSTER: I do not know. I am not a physician.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I might say to my honourable friend from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler) that it is really not obligatory to issue the license. My honourable friend will see that this simply gives power to the Department of Health to issue licenses. It is simply an enabling power and it is proposed that it shall be exercised reasonably. There may be circumstances in which the importation or the exportation may be permitted without license.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why not say: "No fees shall be exacted for any importation under $25"? That would make it clear.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You mean, the value of the drug?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Yes; an emergency importation, for instance.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, in the value of the drug.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me that, while it is not obligatory to issue the license, but only an enabling power given to the department, that is not going to be exercised arbitrarily. I understand that a regulation will be passed, by which a person, without being obliged to take out a license, may bring in $25 worth. If the value is more than $25, then the license would be required.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why not provide that in this clause?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: If a small importation came through the custom house, how would the authorities be aware of it? How would they know whether I or anybody else was importing something in the mail?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: You cannot watch that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The customs authorities are aware of it.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No, they are not If the stuff is put into an envelope in the ordinary way, how will they know?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The postal authorities will become aware of it.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: There is nothing in the Bill about that.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: Honourable Sir James Lougheed moves that in line 25, after "druggist" there be added, "who manufactures any drug."

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Why does the honourable gentleman propose that amendment? Do retail druggists as a rule manufacture the particular drugs that are mentioned in the schedule of the Act?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think the retail druggists would simply be importing. I understand that, according to the amendment proposed, it would be necessary for the retail druggist to take out a license for a year, which will cost him not more than $5 if he manufactures any drugs.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But I do not think drugs are ever manufactured by retail druggists, are they?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes, they are.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The drugs we are referring to are opium and the others specifically mentioned in the schedule to the Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes, any number of them are manufactured.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think there is some little doubt about that. In the schedule, as I read it, only four are mentioned: cocaine or any salt or compound thereof; morphine or any salt or compound thereof; opium; eucaine or any salt or compound thereof. These are the only drugs we are dealing with. Retail druggists manufacture laudanum and paregoric

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: But they have to get the opium first.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: And laudanum and paregoric are not mentioned in the schedule at all. Opium is mentioned, but they do not manufacture opium; they import opium. But they manufacture out of opium laudanum and paregoric.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would the honourable gentleman look at page 4 of the Bill? He will see that by subsection 5 of new section 5A the schedule is amended so as to provide a further definition of "opium." I do not know whether those drugs to which the honourable gentleman refers would be covered by that definition.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Cocaine and eucaine are altogether different substances.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Would that amendment apply to a druggist who compounds?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. It applies simply in case he manufactures the particular product.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No; anything containing opium.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Could he not compound, and use opium in any mixture that he puts up?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Up to a certain extent.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That might affect anything he makes.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Read subsection 4 (a) of new section 5A.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The preparations of opium are added, at the end of the Bill.

The amendment of Hon. Sir James Lougheed was agreed to, and subsection 1 of new section 5A, as amended, was agreed to.

On subsection 2 of new section 5A—penalties for importing or exporting drugs without license:

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I would like to draw the attention of the representative of the Department of Health to the remarks just made by my honourable friend from Saskatchewan (Hon. Mr. Douglas). Has the fact been taken into consideration that whole fields of poppies are grown in the West and that the product is used in bread and all kinds of concoctions for festive occasions? There should be severe restrictions to prevent that. It nullifies the effect of the whole Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is there any provision for controlling the growing of the poppy plant?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: They never took it into consideration. They did not know.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think that if the honourable member sends a note to the President of the Privy Council, informing him of these facts, he will put in an amendment to the Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We may have to legislate hereafter.

Hon. Mr. MURRAY: But it has been formally drawn to our attention by the honourable member from Tantallon (Hon. Mr. Douglas). He asseverated on his own knowledge that there are whole fields of poppies grown by the foreign population. That statement is worth investigating.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes; anything that adds to the beauty or the gaiety of the nation, shut it out.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is certainly gaiety.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Do you not think that the penalty provided in this subsection is pretty heavy?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Not for bootlegging.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The maximum is $1,000 and the minimum is $200. That is pretty severe.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend would not claim it was too severe for those bootleggers who are peddling opium in almost every city of the Dominion and creating havoc amongst the population.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Not for that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is intended to meet that class.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But would not the druggist come under it?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Yes, if he was persisting.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why not say "any person not a registered druggist"?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The druggists possibly traffic in the same trade.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: If you are going to take that line, doctors also do some things they should not do, the same as members of other professions.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But this refers to men who seek to make a living by it.

Subsection 2 of new section 5A was agreed to.

On subsection 3 of new section 5A—physicians, veterinary surgeons, dentists and druggists excepted, but must make prescribed declaration and furnish information as requested:

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: This subsection says:

> The provisions of paragraph f of this section shall not apply to a duly authorized and practising physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist, but every such physician, veterinary surgeon, or dentist, shall on request furnish the minister with any information which he may require under any regulation made under this Act with respect to the drugs received, dispensed, prescribed, given away or distributed by such physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist.

What does that mean? Does it mean that a practising physician can be called upon to state exactly how much he prescribed for any individual patient, and when, and the doses, and everything of that kind? To my mind the wording of the clause is too diffuse. It gives the minister power to call upon the physician for all kinds of information, which the physician cannot possibly furnish him.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If he cannot give the information he cannot comply, that is all.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Yes, but if he does not give the information he is liable to a penalty.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Quite right.

Mon. Mr. DANIEL: That is the point. I think that clause should be modified to some extent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If it is ascertained that a surgeon or a dentist or a veterinary surgeon has been using an unusual quantity of opium, why should he not be required to furnish that information? It seems but reasonable. Furthermore, the physician will hereafter be relieved of the obligation of keeping a record.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The remarks of the honourable the leader of the Government are all very well as far as they go, but this clause does not say that the information shall be required only of any physician who in the opinion of the Minister, is using or dispensing more opium or morphine than the Minister thinks he ought to. The Minister can call upon any physician at any time for any information that he may want. There is nothing in this to indicate that that information will be required only from those physicians who in the opinion of the Minister are using more of these drugs than he thinks they ought to use. I think the clause ought to be modified in such a way that the Minister would understand that he is only authorized to call upon a physician for information in any case where he appears to be prescribing too much.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Many physicians in the country and in small towns keep a drug store or keep supplies in their office.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: They dispense their medicine.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, they dispense their medicine. Such a person is acting in the dual capacity of druggist and physician, and he ought to be subject to the same restrictions as are imposed upon the druggist. If you make the druggist furnish the information, why should you not make the medical man do so? It is not to be supposed that the Minister will ask every medical man for the information. It is to be inferred from the very tenor of the section itself that such information will be required only where the Minister has suspicions that the man is overdoing the thing.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: It does not say so.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Otherwise you would infer that the Minister would be trying to poke his nose into everybody's business. It is only in cases where suspicion has been aroused and information is laid, or something of that sort.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Where there has been abuse.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think the section is all right.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I quite agree with the honourable gentleman from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler) that there should be some limitation. We know that unfortunately there are doctors who are not too scrupulous.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They are not all angels.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: They are not all angels. They are human after all.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Some of them are inhuman.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: The Minister will not require the informaaion unless his attention is directed to abuses, or unless a case is made out against a man; and if such a thing should occur it is the Minister's duty and responsibility to inquire, and he should have the power to demand information as to how much of the drug is being used.

Subsection 3 of new section 5A was agreed to.

On subsection 4 of new section 5A—liniments, etc:

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I take it that any ordinary proprietary medicine containing opium or morphine as derivatives is allowed to be sold in an ordinary retail store. Is that the fact? Might not an opium habitué get a dose if he got a vial containing two grains of opium? He could buy up the whole stock of a retail store and have a glorious drunk on it.

Subsection 4 of new section 5A was agreed to.

Subsection 5 of new section 5A was agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 were agreed to.

On section 4—commencement of Act:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: When is it intented to put the Act into force?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Just as soon as the Department gets the forms prepared and everything necessary to put it into motion.

Section 4 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported as amended.

MONTREAL CENTRAL TERMINAL COMPANY BILL.

INQUIRY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: I would draw the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to a Bill which was read the second time yesterday and sent to the Railway Committee—an Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company. A Session or two ago this Bill failed to pass in the Railway Committee, because the Minister of Railways declared his opposition to it. The Bill has for its object the organizing of terminals and the exchange of freight between the Grand Trunk, the Government railways, and the Canadian Pacific. I have been lately informed that the Government was changing its attitude on this Bill and would not oppose it. I draw the attention of my honourable friend to this information in order that when the Bill comes before committee he may be in a position to say what is the attitude of the Government or the Minister of Railways regarding it. It was my honourable friend himself who, when the Bill came up, declared the absolute opposition of the Government to its passage.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will be good enough to remind me of the Bill being before committee, when we come back, I shall be very glad to ascertain what is the attitude of the Government respecting it. I have no personal knowledge of it at the present time. I do not know that the Government has in any way changed its attitude upon the Bill since we dealt with it before.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I put the question only in order that at the next meeting of the Railway Committee my honourable friend might give me the information.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, that would in no way restrict the liberty of the Railway Committee in dealing with the Bill as freely as they dealt with it on a previous occasion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I understand.

CRIMINAL CODE (FRENCH VERSION) BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. BLONDIN moved the third reading of Bill C, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (French Version).

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, the special committee which was appointed to examine into the many amendments to the French section of the Criminal Code, contained in this Bill, do not pretend to have gone beyond the duty entrusted to them. Considerable work could have been done on the whole Act itself. There were many reasons why the committee should not undertake that stupendous task; but we all agreed that at the next revision of the Criminal Code we would ask the Government to see that a proper committee was appointed for the purpose of making the French text such that we need not blush to have it seen by governments of other countries knowing the French language. If the Government does not appoint such a committee the French members of the Senate will be very glad to see to the appointment of a committee that, with the help of the staff, may do what we regard as a meritorious work.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

DIRECTOR OF COAL OPERATIONS BILL.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON moved the second reading of Bill O 3, an Act respecting the Director of Coal Operations.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: I would point out to my honourable friend that this Bill has not yet been distributed. I have asked for a copy of it and have not been able to obtain one.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I can state to the House briefly the purpose of the Bill, and if honourable gentlemen desire that it should stand over, I have no objection. In 1917 in April, I think—there was appointed by Order in Council a Director of Coal Operations, with jurisdiction over the coal mines in what is known as district 18, in Alberta and southern British Columbia. The duties of the director were to regulate the production of coal, the selling price of coal, and the wages of the miners. Any disputes that arose between the miners and the employers which they could not themselves adjust were to be referred to the Director of Coal Operations, and his decision was to be final. That arrangement was carried on most successfully. No interruption whatever occurred in the production of coal in that area up to the sympathetic strike of 1919, when the miners went out for some little time in sympathy with the Winnipeg difficulty. That control will cease automatically at the end of this session of Parliament unless it is continued by legislation. Representatives of the workmen, of the employers and of the Government of the province of Alberta declare —and it is the opinion of the officials of the Department of Labour—that it is in the public interest that this control or direction of coal operation should be continued until the next session of Parliament, or probably for the period of one year. If prior to the expiration of that time the Governor in Council should deem it unnecessary to continue the measure, he may annul it. It is simply a temporary expedient for the purpose of continuing the present stable situation in that district. There is yet some danger of interruption through what is commonly known as the O.B.U. element agitating for the overthrow of the International Union and their purpose, which they publicly announced a year ago, to take control of the mines and have them operated by the workmen. Honourable gentlemen are familiar with their policy of confiscating the property from the employers, etc. It is therefore deemed desirable, in the public interest and to insure the continued and uninterrupted production of coal, especially during the winter months, that the authority under which the Director of Coal Operation works, and the orders which he has issued up to date, should be validated and continued for a period of approximately one year. That is the purpose of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: To what area is the jurisdiction extended?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The province of Alberta and the Crowsnest district of southern British Columbia—the area that is known as district 18.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does that comprise merely the coal lands which are still under the jurisdiction of this Dominion? Is it confined to those lands?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No. The director has jurisdiction over all the mines that are in operation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What jurisdiction has this Parliament in the matter? As I understand my honourable friend, the Orders in Council dealt with the price of coal, with wages, and with disputes between the workingmen and the operators. On what ground does the honourable member base our jurisdiction for the purpose of this legislation?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It is upon the same ground as that on which the Federal Parliament claimed jurisdiction in passing the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, which governs this matter in so far as public utilities are concerned. Coal mining comes under the head of public utilities. Instead of relying upon the establishment of boards from time to time as disputes arose, it was in 1917 considered desirable to establish a tribunal that would be available at all times to adjust disputes promptly. This experiment has been tried out and has proved successful for three years. It will be abandoned when conditions in that territory seem to be wholly normal. It is not considered that normal conditions yet exist, although the abnormal conditions that prevailed a year ago have very much improved. It is therefore desirable that the control should be continued for a limited period.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I have not the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act before me. My honourable friend is much more familiar with that than I am. My recollection is that coal mines are not included.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: As public utilities under the Act?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Could the honourable gentleman tell us where are the headquarters of the One Big Union? Where does it originate and from where is it directed? Has it started in Canada or on the other side of the line? Do those who belong to the One Big Union on the Canadian side receive their orders from headquarters in the United States?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: My honourable friend has asked a rather wide question and one which it is perhaps difficult to answer. The One Big Union is an organization that supposedly sprang into existence in Canada about a year ago last February.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Was it born in Canada?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No; it was conceived in Chicago and born in Calgary. The Industrial Workers of the World, an organization with which this House is of course familiar, have printed and distributed a great deal of literature, advertising themselves as being the original and central publishing house for O.B.U. literature. The I.W.W. is a term and the Industrial Workers of the World are an organization not held in high repute by the public of this country; and it is my personal opinion, although I have perhaps no proof for saying this, that the name, One Big Union, was adopted for the purpose of making the people believe that it was something new, and was not the I.W.W. being transported to Canada. It is simply a camouflage for the introduction of the I.W.W. into this country. As to the origin of the organization, I fancy that the honourable gentleman who asked the question is probably as well informed as I am.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Referring back to this Bill, I would ask my honourable friend if he has submitted it to the Department of Justice with regard to the question of constitutionality?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: There can be no doubt as to the constitutionality of the Bill, because its purpose is simply to do in another way what the Industrial Disputes Act already provides for—to continue to do the work in a way that has proven acceptable to all parties concerned and has brought prompt and satisfactory results during the last three years.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I have great respect for my honourable friend's opinion, even his legal opinion; but I am sure he will not be shocked if I say that I have greater respect for that of the Department of Justice, and I cannot say that I share his view that there is no doubt about the constitutionality of this Bill. Personally I believe it is not constitutional, and for that reason I think we would be in a better position to deal with it if the question of constitutionality were pointedly submitted to the Department of Justice, so that we might know what they think on the question.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: My honourable friend raised exactly the same point a few days ago in connection with another matter, and the Department of Justice without any hesitation ruled absolutely that the Bill was in order; and I quoted in the House probably a dozen or more Bills in which a similar clause was included. If there is any doubt in the mind of the honourable member from Ottawa as to the constitutionality of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act itself, or as to the right of the Federal Parliament to pass legislation governing public utilities such as coal mines, I would point out to him that mining is specifically named in section 1 of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act as being a public utility and coming within the scope of that Act. I do not presume to set up my opinion against that of my honourable friend, he being a lawyer, but I think it is obvious that there is no doubt as to jurisdiction. However, if my honourable friend desires to raise the point when the Bill goes into committee, I shall endeavour to ascertain for him the opinion of the Justice Department regarding it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am only suggesting that this be done now in order to expedite matters.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman has spoken of the abnormal conditions that still prevail in British Columbia. Could he give us up-to-date information as to the conditions? I asked him the question two or three weeks ago. I should be interested to know what have been the recent developments.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: As honourable gentlemen are perhaps aware, I have not made it a practice to say much publicly about what has been going on in the way of the adjustment of disputes throughout the country. I do not know that it is in the public interest to enter into those matters too deeply; but, in reply to the honourable gentleman's question, I would point out that for several months last year, following the difficulty at Winnipeg, the coal miners in district 18 were on strike. Some benefits perhaps came from that, inasmuch as, after being on strike about four months and when the fall was coming on, they were anxious to get back to work and coal production was necessary, and we got along through the winter very nicely. But in the month of December and this will perhaps explain, as well as anything else, the necessity for the introduction of this Bill—the organization known as the One Big Union served notice upon the Coal Director and upon the Coal Operators' Association that unless an agreement were made with the One Big Union and they were officially recognized as a labour organization before the first of January, they would proceed to enforce their demands by any means that seemed necessary. In the month of December steps were taken to meet the situation and prevent what would have been a disaster to the people of the Prairie Provinces—the cessation of coal production in very severe weather when there was no surplus of coal on hand. By perhaps unusual action, but action necessary to meet the emergency, the Director of Coal Operations and the Coal Operators' Association and the United Mine Workers' organization, who were seeking to fulfil and maintain the contract that had been made, each doing their part, we succeeded in maintaining the production and supply of coal, so that there was no suffering from coal shortage. Subsequently, in the enforcement of the agreement that had been made in December, some objection was taken by the One Big Union organization and its followers, and local strikes were precipitated her and there. Those, however, have happily passed away; the men have gone back to work; and conditions at the present time throughout the entire district are normal.

As a result of the recent revision of the agreement between the United Mine Workers' and the coal operators in the United States, it becomes necessary during the next few weeks or months to negotiate a new agreement in district 18, and it seems most important that affairs should not be left to hazard or luck until matters are adjusted and a definite, permanent agreement is made between the employers and their workmen. Until that agreement is concluded it is the desire of both the United Mine Workers' organization, who have endeavoured to stabilize the situation there, and the Coal Operators' Association, composed of the employers, that the Government should continue to act in the capacity of buffer as between them, and help to stabilize the industrial situation in that coal area.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I agree with the honourable member from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) that there is a good deal of doubt about the jurisdiction or the power of Parliament to pass this Bill. I have not the Bill before me; I have only heard the statement of the Minister of Labour. I think it is highly desirable that this question of constitutionality should be threshed out before the Bill is given its second reading. The question of constitutionality is one that ought to be discussed before the Bill goes into Committee. What the Government did by Order in Council a few years ago, of course, does not throw any light at all upon the position of things to-day. In England the war is still on, because an Act was passed providing that the war should not be over until there was a proclamation saying that it was over; but here the war is certainly over, because the Peace Treaty has been ratified and there has been an exchange of ratifications. So far as we are concerned, there is no war. If there is jurisdiction to legislate on this subject it is not by virtue of the War Measures Act; it would have to be under the British North America Act. It seems to me that this Bill would come into conflict with section 92 of the British North America Act. Coal companies are in practically the same position as electric railway companies and as factories for that matter. Just where the jurisdiction lies I do not know, and at the moment I am not offering any opinion. I think the question must be threshed out, and I would suggest to the honourable the Minister of Labour that, having explained the Bill and enabled the House to see what his point is, he should let its stand until after the adjournment. There will be no time lost. The right stage at which to raise this question of constitutionality is at the second reading. If the Bill passed the second reading and the question of constitutionality had to come up in Committee, that would not hely matters at all.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I have great respect for the opinion of the honourable member for Middleton in legal matters; but with all due regard to his remarks, may I ask why it is necessary for this House even to stop to question our jurisdiction at this time? There is a public service to be performed. This measure has been in effect. If this Bill is not constitutional, then the Industrial Disputes Act itself is not, and that Act has not been questioned by the provinces in the thirteen years that it has been in force. The province of Alberta in this case, through one of its government officials who was here within the last two weeks, has urged that we pass legislation to continue this control. I think it would be most unwise at this time and under these circumstances to raise the question of jurisdiction, because it is not important and nobody is objecting on that ground. If on some other occasion honourable gentlemen deem it desirable that the question should be carefully sifted I have no objection; but I hope that this House will not hold up a necessary measure—for it is necessary, even though it is only temporary—designed for the purpose of maintaining stable conditions in a very important industry upon the output of which hundreds of thousands of our people are dependent for their coal from day to day during the severe winter season. We ought not to let a question of that sort interfere with our doing what is necessary under the circumstances to meet the situation.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I would like to ask the Minister a material question. There is a struggle between the operators and the miners. I imagine that if the Controller fixed a price at which the article would be sold, that embraced the elements of labour, operating charges, and all that. I would ask the minister if he remembers what the Controller allowed as the ground price of the coal? What would there be for the owner of the mine after the charges were paid, and what would be allowed to him as profit on his commodity? Was there any allotment of that kind?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I have not at hand the information for which my honourable friend asks; but in 1917, when the control began, the existing price of coal and the existing wages were taken as a basis, and as the controller from time to time authorized an increase in wages by reason of the increased cost of living—which by the way was the basis upon which the increased wages were calculated—he granted an increase in the selling price of coal, sufficient to meet the increased cost of labour. That was for the purpose of preventing the operators of the mines, if they had been so inclined, from unduly enhancing the price of coal, as we know was done in some other coal fields. If miners' wages went up 25 cents a day, coal went up 25 cents a ton; and in order to prevent anything that would have the semblance of profiteering on the part of the coal operators, this control was maintained. I think there is no doubt that it has stabilized the situation. It has prevented unjust criticism from being levelled at or directed against the employers, the coal operators, because the public have had confidence in the Director and felt that he did not grant or permit an increase in the price of coal that was not warranted by reason of the increase in the cost of production. I think the arrangement has been generally satisfactory to all parties interested.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: How much was left for the owner of the coal in the ground, after it was all settled? Was that ever determined?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I do not know that that was determined. I think that they worked from the basis of prices existing at the time the directorship or control commenced.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I do not share my honourable friends view with regard to the attitude we should take towards this Bill. No harm could result from holding over the matter until we have had time to make a real study of the Bill. I quite agree with the honourable Senator from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) that the question of our right to pass this legislation should be considered on the second reading. I do not wish in any way to obstruct the honourable gentleman's Bill; but, in order that the House should clearly understand the position, the question of constitutionality should be thoroughly threshed out and not glossed over. I therefore ask my honourable friend to let the Bill stand for the time being.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I think I stated at the outset that, in view of the fact that the Bill was not printed or had not been distributed, I had no objection if honourable gentlemen desired that it should stand over.

The order was discharged.

EXCHEQUER COURT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill 108, an Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That when the Senate adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 25th May next, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In placing this motion on the Order Paper I had regard to the fact that practically all public Bills that have been before the Senate have been disposed of. We have not upon the Order Paper any public business with which we can proceed. Although there are a number of Bills on the Order Paper for to-morrow, yet it remains to be said that dealing with them even to-morrow would not hasten their passage, with the exception of the second readings.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: They are all divorce Bills, are they not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, and reports from the Standing Committee on Divorce. These can be disposed of as advantageously when we meet again as they would be to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I would ask the honourable leader to consider in a charitable way the position of his brethren from the outlying provinces, and make that motion read "Wednesday at 8 o'clock" instead of Tuesday. We are church-going people, and we would have to leave home on Saturday in order to reach here in time to sit with our brethren on Tuesday. If the honourable leader could postpone the sitting for one day and make his motion for Wednesday evening at 8 o'clock, we could come and join you. We on our part, by remaining here in Ottawa all the time, as we are bound to do, have deferred to our friends from Quebec and our friends from Ontario, and this is the first time we have asked any consideration for ourselves, and I submit to the honourable leader and the members of the House that in justice they should now give us an opportunity to arrive back here at the appointetd time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may say, in the name of my colleagues from Montreal, that we have no objection.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I hesitate to do it, but I think that the House will bear with me under the circumstances. I would move that instead of Tuesday it may be made Wednesday evening at 8 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Three o'clock.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Eight. We cannot get here at 3 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. POWER: There is nothing to prevent the honourable gentleman from Prince Edward Island from being here at 3 o'clock on Wednesday afternoon.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I might point out to the honourable gentleman that we come up on the Ocean Limited, and very often that train is late. As the honourable gentleman knows, the last time we came up it was three hours late and he had to remain over in Montreal with me for the 3 o'clock train in the afternoon, and did not reach here until 7 or half-past 7. The same thing is liable to occur on our way up. We cannot be sure of getting here at 3 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The better way is to see that the National Railway service is improved.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: I would point out to the honourable leader of the Senate that if we come here on the 26th we shall have no work to do that week. I would move as a sub-amendment that we adjourn until the 31st day of May. Then we would be sure to have some work to do.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Murphy was agreed to, and the motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, as amended, was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

The Right Honourable Sir Louis Henry Davies, K.C.M.G., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy Governor General, having come, and being seated on the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned. the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following Bills:

An Act to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

An Act to amend the Petroleum and Naphtha Inspection Act.

An Act for granting to His Majesty a certain sum of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1921.

The sitting having been resumed:

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: Honourable gentlemen, I asked that the motion which I made be put to a vote, and that has not been done. I moved that the House adjourn until the 31st of May, instant, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The motion for the 26th has been carried.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: I made another motion. We shall have nothing to do on the 26th.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The adjournment to the 26th has been carried. There is no other motion to be made now.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: I would ask the honourable leader of the House to say something about it. I know I am in order.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would suggest to my honourable friend that he bring that up on the 26th.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: That will not do at all.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, May 26, at 8 o'clock p.m.

THE SENATE.

Wednesday, May 26, 1920.

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

GRAIN AND FLAX ELEVATORS IN ONTARIO.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PROUDFOOT inquired:

1. How many elevators were there, in the year 1919, in province of Ontario, handling grain and flax?
2. Where are they situated?
3. What is their capacity?
4. What quantity of grain and flax was received by each elevator during the said year? Distinguish between the different kinds of grain and where grown.
5. How much of this grain was exported?
6. Where was it exported to?
7. Did the Government, through the Grain Board or otherwise, fix the various charges to be taken by the elevators?
8. If so, a schedule of such charges?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Forty-one. See statement attached marked "A".

2, 3, 4. Ditto.

5. No record.

6. Answered by No. 5.

7. Yes. The charges were made in accordance with the provisions of the Canada Grain Act.

8. See schedule attached marked "B."

BRITISH EMPIRE STEEL CORPORATION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate and will inquire:—1. Has a company been incorporated by Letters Patent under the name of British Empire Steel Corporation?
2. When was it incorporated?
3. What are the names of the incorporators?
4. What is the amount of the capital stock?
5. Into what denominations is this stock divided?
6. How much has been issued?
7. To whom has it been issued, and for what consideration?
8. Has a prospectus been issued?
9. If so, what are the chief points brought out in the prospectus?
10. What powers has this company of issuing bonds or debentures?

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the inquiry that stands in my name mentions that I shall call the attention of the Senate to the matter and inquire. As honourable gentlemen remember, the inquiry was worded in that way at the instigation of some honourable members of the Senate who seemed to desire to discuss this question. Personally I have no desire to discuss it, and, as I have noticed that since this question was put on the Order Paper an application has apparently been made to the province of Nova Scotia for an Act of incorporation, I do not see that this House has anything further to do with the matter. But I would ask the Government if they can reply to my question.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Yes.

2. 15th March, 1920.

3. Frederick Henry Markey, Waldo Whittier Skinner and George Gordon Hyde, all of His Majesty's Counsel learned in the law; Ronald Cameron Grant, accountant, and Robert John Forster, secretary, all of Montreal, Quebec.

4. $100,000.

5. $100 shares.

6. No information.

7. No information.

8. No information.

9. Answered by No. 8.

10. Their powers do not appear in the charter, but are governed by the provisions of section 69 of the Companies Act.

STEEL AND SHIPBUILDING COMPANIES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired:

1. Have the following companies been incorporated either by Letters Patent or by Act of the Dominion Parliament: The Dominion Steel Corporation and subsidiary companies, Nova Scotia Steel and Coal, Limited, and subsidiary companies, Canada Steamship Lines, Limited, Canada Foundry and Forgings, Limited, and its subsidiary companies, Maritime Nail Company and its subsidiaries, Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, Limited, Port Arthur Shipbuilding Company, Limited, Halifax Shipyards, Limited, Davie Shipbuilding and Repairing Company, Limited?

2. If not, have they been incorporated under the laws of any province? If so, which province in each case?

3. What is the authorized capital of each company?

4. What is the debenture or bonded indebtedness of each company?

5. What is the amount of capital issued and at present outstanding of each company? How is it divided up?

6. How long has each company been in existence?

7. Has a balance sheet been issued by any of these companies? If so, how often?

8. Is the value of the properties owned by each of these companies known to the Government?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

IMMIGRATION (DEPORTATION) BILL.

ORDER FOR SECOND READING POSTPONED.

On the Order:

Resuming the adjourned Debate on the motion for the Second Reading Bill (X2), An Act to amend the Immigration Act (Deportation of Undesirable Persons), and the motion in amendment thereto, by the Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton, that the said Bill be not now read the second time but that it be read this day six months.—Hon. Mr. Robertson.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved that the order be discharged and placed on the order paper for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: The honourable member for Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton), who took such an active part in this matter and moved the amendment, is not here and may not be here to-morrow. I think it is only fair to give him a chance to be present when the question is taken up.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would suggest to my honourable friend that when the question comes up to-morrow he speak to it if the honourable member from Hamilton is not present. The honourable the Minister of Labour asked me to have this order stand until to-morrow, but he did intimate that he was very desirous of proceeding with it then, even though the honourable gentleman from Hamilton should be absent.

The order was discharged and placed on the Order Paper for to-morrow.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE LATE LT.-COL. G. H. BAKER, M.P.

PROPOSED MEMORIAL.

Hon. GEO. G. FOSTER presented the First Report of the Baker Memorial Committee.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, on behalf of the Baker Memorial Committee I present their Second Report, which deals fully with the work of the committee. It is necessary only to remind the members of this Chamber that at last session the committee recommended that there should be a panel on the right hand side of the stairway leading up to the House of Commons. The committee this year have concurred in that proposal. Our committee would have made a final report to-day but for the fact that we were not able to agree on the exact wording of the two inscriptions, on the right and the left of the memorial. This is the only point that is not settled and covered by the present report.

IMMIGRATION (DEPORTATION) BILL.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED.

The Senate resumed from May 7 the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Robertson for the second reading of Bill X2, an Act to amend the Immigration Act (Deportation of Undesirable Persons), and the motion in amendment thereto by the Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton, that the said Bill be not now read the second time but that it be read this day six months.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, two or three weeks ago a Bill to amend the Immigration Act was brought up in this House for its second reading. The honourable member from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) moved in amendment that the Bill be not read a second time, but that it be postponed for six months. Some discussion took place, and, the day being a Friday, there was not a very large attendance in the House; consequently I moved the adjournment of the debate in order that the matter might have the consideration that it undoubtedly deserves, and that it might not be dealt with too hastily. I think it but fair to say that I believe the honourable gentleman from Hamilton was not fully aware of all the facts bearing upon the question, else he might not have submitted his amendment. Briefly, the facts are these. In June, 1919, some serious industrial disturbance occurred in the city of Winnipeg, and it was apparent that certain men were conducting themselves in a way that was probably not lawful, and were guilty of seditious acts and utterances. But there was at that time no provision in the Criminal Code of Canada to enable the courts or the Government to adequately cope with crimes of that sort. Therefore Parliament in its wisdom passed certain amendments to the Immigration Act. Honourable gentlemen may recall that that measure was not discussed at any great length; in fact, I think it passed through both Houses in one day. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe that at that time that particular piece of legislation was necessary and desirable in order that steps might be taken, should occasion arise, to protect the interests of our people, and to guard against and adequately deal with residents of Canada who might be guilty of seditious acts which could not be tolerated. Had the amendments which were made to the Criminal Code at the subsequent Session, and which are in effect to-day, been in force, it would not have been necessary to pass such special legislation. The war has now passed away, and the necessity for the continuation of what I regard as very drastic legislation no longer exists. The provisions of the Criminal Code are ample to meet the requirements, and the Government and the Parliament of Canada are being severely criticised by the public at large, and, as honourable gentlemen know, by a large and influential press, claiming that the legislation which I have referred to, and which it is now proposed to amend or repeal, ought not to have been passed because it was contrary to British customs and British institutions, and what we ordinarily term British liberty.

May I point out that the amendments to the Immigration Act, as they now stand, make it possible to deport from Canada a British subject who may have been resident in Canada nearly all his life without giving him a trial by a jury of his peers. Such procedure, honourable gentlemen, is absolutely contrary to the spirit of the British constitution, and to that great bill of rights, the Magna Charta, upon which it is founded, and I am sure that there is no desire on the part of honourable gentlemen to put the Parliament of Canada in the position of resorting to or returning to a high-handed method of dealing out justice such as existed prior to 1215.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Might I ask the honourable gentleman a question? Under the law as it stands at present, would it be possible to deport the men who are now in jail in Manitoba for the disturbances they caused a year ago?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I feel quite incompetent to give a legal opinion on the question; but my own view is that, by reason of the fact that those men were taken into custody and were given a fair trial before a jury of their peers, and were found guilty and convicted and sentenced and are now serving their terms of punishment, when they shall have paid the penalty imposed upon them by the court they will not be liable to any further punishment. I do not think that a man can be tried twice for the same offence, or can be tried a second time after he has been convicted and has paid the penalty imposed on him. That may be only a layman's view, and it is not my intention to express an opinion from the legal standpoint.

There are two clauses of the amendment proposed to the Immigration Act. One proposes that a British subject, after he has resided in Canada for five years, cannot be deported without being given a trial for the offence with which he is charged. The second amendment proposes that the clause which was added to the Act last year, whereby it was possible to accuse a man of the crime of sedition, although it might have been committed prior to the time the Act was passed, is now obsolete, and need no longer appear. That is retroactive legislation, to which I think honourable gentlemen have gone on record as being opposed.

As the Immigration Act now stands, because of the necessity which arose a year ago, it is possible to take a British subject or any alien and deport him for an alleged seditious utterance or an Act that may have been committed prior to the passage of the Act. That was obviously necessary and desirable when the legislation was passed, because of the fact that, perhaps within a few weeks prior to that time, certain men had been guilty of such things, and if we were to cope with the situation it would be necessary to have legislation which would enable the authorities to act legally in relieving the country of the menace with which it was felt we were then confronted. It is now a year since that legislation was passed, and any man resident in Canada then who was guilty of a seditious act committed prior to June, 1919, who has not been dealt with and deported before now, ought not, I think, to be held responsible or liable for something that has passed and gone years ago. I do not think it was ever contemplated that any amendment to the Criminal Code should be retroactive. This legislation was made retroactive because of the emergency that existed, and because the Criminal Code did not meet the situation. It has since been remedied; war conditions have passed away; the emergency no longer exists, and the Criminal Code is sufficient to meet conditions in peace time, and, I think, in war time; and this measure would undoubtedly remove what I think, and what in the opinion of the Government itself, is a cause of unrest and disquietude at the present time. We ought not to have upon our statutes any law that can be regarded as contrary to or in violation of the principles laid down in the British constitution.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Who is finding fault with the law as it stands? Who is asking for the repeal of this legislation?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I do not think it is improper for me to say that this Bill was introduced in this House because of the fact that we had but little work to do at the time, while in another place there was much legislation under consideration, and the Minister of Immigration and Colonization requested me to introduce the Bill here. If any honourable gentleman has the thought in mind that it was because of any idea of my own, I wish him to disabuse his mind of that thought.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Is there not usually some agitation for legislation of this kind? I do not think that the men who are Canadians and who are going to remain Canadians would be asking for it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If my honourable friend would refer to the utterances of the press throughout the country for weeks, and indeed months, after the legislation which it is sought to repeal was passed, and would come to my office and to the office of the Minister of Immigration, I am sure that the evidence would satisfy him that there is ample justification for this Bill. Opinions have been expressed and resolutions passed, not by radical labour bodies, but by what we term sane labour elements in Canada, pointing out that this legislation has been adding oil to the flame of discontent, and has made it much more difficult than it would otherwise have been to control the labour situation. The legislation does not serve any good purpose, but is simply an aggravation; and I assure honourable gentlemen that it is not the desire of this House, or any other constituted authority in Canada, courts or otherwise, to impose a system of this sort, whereby a British subject, resident in this country for five years or more, would be summoned and deported without being given a trial.

If I may be pardoned for again referring to the provisions of the Magna Charta, on which the rights which we enjoy, of which we are so proud, are based, namely, that no free man shall be outlawed or imprisoned, or have his property taken from him, except by the judgment of a lawful court composed of a jury of his own rank, I think that every sane man in this country deprecates any thought of the confiscation of property without compensation, which, as we know at the present time, is being advocated by certain elements in this country and throughout the world. That is a principle that is forbidden under the Bill of Rights. On the other hand, that same doctrine upon which British greatness has grown up, provides that a man shall not be deprived of his liberty without a trial by a jury of his peers. That is all that this amendment to the Immigration Act contemplates, and I respectfully submit, honourable gentlemen, that the Criminal Code as it now stands is ample to meet all the requirements, and that the passing of this Bill would promote peace, order, and good government, and that failure to pass it would have the contrary effect. I therefore hope that this House may see fit not to support the amendment presented by the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton).

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Before the honourable gentleman sits down, will he permit me a question? The honourable gentleman has at different times to-day and when he was speaking previously stated that the legislation was not British. Does not the honourable gentleman know that during the war there were dozens of Canadian citizens who had gone over to London and were deported from London without any trial?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I am very well aware that that is the fact. The Immigration Act as it is proposed to amend it would give Canada a similar right to deport any British subject who comes to Canada and does not behave himself, if he has not been here for more than five years; and I do not know that any Canadian citizen who had been residing in England for more than five years was deported without a trial.

Hon. Mr DANIEL: I would like to ask the minister to make clear a point that puzzles me a little. There are two provisos. One, which it is proposed to repeal by this Bill, reads in this way:

> Provided that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject, either by reason of birth in Canada or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

It appears to me that that provision exempts Canadian citizens, while the proviso we are now asked to approve simply says:

> Provided that this section shall not apply to any person who is a Canadian citizen.

What is the difference? A man is a Canadian citizen either by birth or by naturalization, and it appears to me that the old Act was just about the same in this respect as the Bill.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Without going carefully into that, my opinion is that the Act as it now stands permits the deportation of a British subject who is not a Canadian citizen, no matter how long he may have been resident in this country. The proposed amendment would make it possible to deport a British subject who has not been in Canada long enough to obtain domicile, which under the Naturalization and Immigration Acts, is a period of five years.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: It will not affect Canadian citizens?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No, it will not affect Canadian citizens.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Would the honourable gentleman permit me a question? Was the Immigration Act which we passed last Session necessary? If it was necessary, why change it? Are the same conditions not liable to arise again?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: They are not? Well, I mistake the signs of the times. I wish to differ with the minister. I believe that those conditions are possible at any time, and if the Act was necessary last year it is still necessary to have it maintained.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: My reason, honourable gentlemen, for expressing the view that the same conditions could not arise again is that the Criminal Code itself has been so amended since this legislation was passed as to meet all necessary requirements and all emergencies.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Would the minister state in what manner the Criminal Code was amended so as to meet such conditions? I am not aware of any legislation having been passed that would meet conditions such as occurred in the Winnipeg strike, when we had to pass special legislation to enable us to cope with it; and the minister was on the ground at that time, and was one of the strongest supporters of that legislation.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Could the minister tell us how many men were deported under the Act as it stands at present, since it was passed?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I am not in possession of that information, but I do know that a substantial number were deported, most of whom were not British subjects, however. Therefore, so far as that class of men is concerned, the law is not changed, except that it is not retroactive. But, honourable gentlemen, if I may be pardoned for making a further observation after I had closed my remarks, I would suggest that it is fair and right that we should view the situation from the standpoint of the Golden Rule. If any one of us had been a resident of England for a period of more than five years, and had been a loyal citizen and had committed no act that could be criticised, and if then for some reason somebody took a dislike to us and under an Act such as the Immigration Act caused us to be deported from England without being given a trial to determine whether we were guilty or not, we would regard it as most unjust. I submit, honourable gentlemen, that that is the proper viewpoint to take on this question—that we should respect the rights of other people if we hope to have our own respected.

Hon. J. G. TURRIFF: I intend to vote for the amendment to give this Bill the six months' hoist, and I want to state in a few minutes my reason for doing so. I believe that the Minister of Immigration should be vested with authority to deport a man who acts in the manner in which some men have acted within the last year or two, in bringing about trouble and trying to set aside proper government throughout the Dominion of Canada. I do not think there is much in the argument that was advanced just before my honourable friend the Minister of Labour sat down, that a person would be deported without a thorough inquiry on the part of the Minister of Immigration. If a man comes to this country and succeeds in obtaining Canadian citizenship, and then misbehaves by trying to set aside proper government and by putting the country to enormous expense, he should be deported. I have seen it stated that the Winnipeg trial would cost far more than $1,000,000. There are men who would behave in that way if the country had to provide a million dollars to prosecute them; and, on the other hand, if they knew that they were liable to be deported for conducting themselves in that manner, they would hesitate very much. The present legislation, if it is allowed to remain as it now stands, would be in my judgment the best possible deterrent for such men, because if there is anything they object to it is to be sent back to their own country, where they would be cast into jail at once if they started one half the trouble they have caused in this country. I am not as a rule in favour of high-handed measures; but I have not the slightest fear that any man in Canada who would attain to the position of Minister of Immigration would be likely to deport a person without very fully inquiring into the case to determine whether he deserved deportation or not. We shall have enough to do to deal with our own Canadian citizens, whom we cannot deport; but in respect to the desire to override law and order, there are worse men coming from various foreign countries, and I claim that they should be deported if necessary. I am absolutely in favour of leaving the authority to be exercised by the Government, as it is at present, because that will do more to deter that class of men from acting improperly than anything else would. So I trust that the amendment will carry.

Hon. GEO. H. BRADBURY: Honourable gentlemen, I regret very much that the member for Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) is not here. I do not agree with the honourable gentleman who introduced this Bill (Hon. Mr. Robertson) that if the honourable gentleman from Hamilton had known all the facts he would not have taken the action he did. I discussed this matter pretty fully with the honourable member from Hamilton, and he was thoroughly aware of what would be the effect of his amendment when he moved the six months' hoist. I believe that this is a very important piece of legislation. It looks to be quite an innocent little Bill, but it will have a very far-reaching effect if this honourable body is led to endorse it.

In the first place, what is the clause of the Immigration Act that is being amended? I will read to you a part of clause 41 of chapter 26 of the Immigration Act, which, I may say, was rushed through this House very hurriedly:

41. (1) Every person who by word or act in Canada seeks to overthrow by force or violence the Government of or constituted law and authority in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or Canada, or any of the provinces of Canada, or the Government of any other of His Majesty's dominions, colonies, possessions or dependencies, or advocates the assassination of any official of any of the said Governments or of any foreign Government, or who in Canada defends or suggests the unlawful destruction of property or by word or act creates or attempts to create any riot or public disorder in Canada, or who without lawful authority assumes any powers of government in Canada, or in any part thereof, or who by common repute belongs to or is suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from or in any way attempts to control any resident of Canada by force or by threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining or teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to belong to the prohibited or undesirable classes, and shall be liable to deportation in the manner provided by this Act, and it shall be the duty of any officer becoming cognizant thereof and of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein any such person may be, forthwith to send a written complaint to the minister, giving full particulars: Provided, that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject, either by reason of birth in Canada, or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

Honourable gentlemen, what does that mean? Under section 41, the Minister of Immigration can deport any resident of Canada who is not a Canadian citizen by birth or by naturalization and who is proven guilty of any of the acts mentioned in the section just quoted. This is the present law. If we adopt the amending Bill proposed by the Minister of Labour, we cannot deport a man, no matter how great a menace he may be to law and order in Canada, unless he is an alien. In other words—

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If my honourable friend will permit me, I desire to point out to him that that is not quite correct; that it is possible to deport any British subject who has not been a resident here for a period of five years, being the time required to obtain domicile.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I understand that; I understand that persons who have been in the country for less than five years may be deported. A Red agitator who is British and has residence in Canada for five years may carry on a campaign among our citizens calculated to overthrow the Government of this country; or he may be the cause of riots and bloodshed and the destruction of property; he may be guilty of all the acts set out in section 41 of the Immigration Act; still, if we pass the proposed amendment, we cannot deport that man.

It will be remembered that last session, after an attempt had been made in this House to pass legislation that would have given the Government power to deport persons who were a menace to the State, and after this House had refused to endorse such legislation, the Government itself put through a Bill to amend the Immigration Act, and then realized, at the eleventh hour, that they did not have power to control the Red element in Canada, and that in order to obtain that power it was necessary to bring down another Bill, which my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Robertson) is now desirous of amending. The Bill was passed by the House of Commons after an explanation by the Minister of Immigration. It was given the first, second and third readings in just ten minutes. This shows, honourable gentlemen, how important the Government at that time considered this legislation to be, and how well it succeeded in impressing upon the House of Commons the importance of it. The Bill was rushed over to this Chamber and passed in like manner, in just seven and a half minutes, even in face of the fact that the House just the day before had refused to endorse similar legislation which I had the honour to move. My honourable friend says the Bill was an emergency measure. Perhaps it was, but it was legislation that was then deemed necessary in the best interests of the country, and I am one of those who contend that the conditions in Canada have not changed sufficiently to warrant the Government in destroying the power which they now hold.

As I said a moment ago, this House endorsed that legislation. It was late; it ought to have endorsed such legislation before, when it had an opportunity of endorsing a measure which had been brought in by one of its members. However, it was better late than never, and the Senate justified itself in approving of the legislation that was sent over from the Commons.

What I have said refers to clause one of the Bill. Now let us consider clause 2. We may find, honourable gentlemen, that this apparently innocent Bill, like some dangerous reptile, has its sting in the tail. I think you will find that one of the greatest objections to the Bill is to be found in this very innocent-looking line comprising clause 2:

Subsection 2 of the said section forty-one is hereby repealed.

Let me read the subsection which it is proposed by the Bill to repeal:

41. (2) Proof that any person belonging to or was within the description of any of the prohibited or undesirable classes within the meaning of this section at any time since the fourth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and ten, shall, for all the purposes of this Act, be deemed to establish prima facie that he still belongs to such prohibited or undesirable class or classes.

If we repeal this subsection as suggested, we practically say to the red element of Canada: "Agitate; create all the trouble you like; destroy property, cause loss of life; the Government will not deport you." That is practically what we say if we accept the suggestion made by the honourable the Minister of Labour. I ask, honourable gentlemen, would that be a wise thing for this House to do?

Every honourable gentleman will, I am sure, recognize that this subsection entails absolutely no hardship on any reputable citizen of Canada. On the other hand, it is a protection to all good citizens, and it enables the Government to enforce law and order throughout the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Would the honourable gentleman allow me a question? Suppose that a year elapsed after a man had been deported, and that the minister found that the information upon which he had deported the man was absolutely false—that the deportation had been brought about by ill-will, or something of that kind. Who would make amends to the man for having been deported without a trial?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Of course, that is straining the point a great deal; that is a case that is not likely to occur, for the reason that the Minister of Immigration, who is responsible for the deportation, will not deport anybody without being absolutely sure that he deserves to be deported.

Does the present law in any way have an injurious effect upon reputable citizens? I think not. But it does affect and ho'd back and check the dangerous Red element, which has been very aggressive, and which has already caused serious loss of life and property in this country. I think every honourable gentleman will admit that. This clause simply says to the agitator who is in the country to-day, and who has already committed those acts, and has made himself liable to deportation, that the Government has not taken any action, but that it is possible that, if he continues to commit acts of this kind, the Government will use this club that is hanging over his head if necessary. I believe it is salutary legislation. Why should this House be so much concerned over such characters as are affected by the present law? It does not affect any reputable labour man in Canada. No respectable labour man in Canada has any reason to be afraid of the legislation that is on our statute books. It is to protect the labour man and the lives and the property of himself and his children against agitators who have come into the country, and who may do harm, and who have done harm, as was the case in the city of Winnipeg. This is a big stick, if you like, that the Government of Canada places in the hands of the Minister of Immigration to hold over the heads of undesirable characters, which enables him to say to these men: "Behave yourselves, or this stick will fall, and we will get rid of you and send you out of the country." It is not punishment enough to try these men, as was done in the city of Winnipeg, at a cost of nearly a quarter of a million dollars, and to send them to the penitentiary. These men are in the penitentiary at the expense of the people of Canada. If they are undesirable citizens, I contend that the wisest and easiest course would have been to deport them in the first place, and I believe that if the Government invoked the Act that is on the statute book in a few cases and deported these dangerous men who get in among the reputable labouring element and cause this unrest, it would be a good thing for the country. Any man who employs large numbers of labouring men too often finds that he has one or two agitators among his gang, and he knows that the quicker he gets rid of them the better for himself and his men.

I submit, honourable gentlemen, in view of the situation in Canada to-day, that this legislation brought into this House by the minister, endorsed no doubt by the Government, as he says, ought not to receive the support of this body. If the Government is really in earnest in this matter, why did it not submit the Bill to the popular body to pass and then send it on to the Senate? That has not been done. The Bill has been sent to us to pass, and then to send it to the House of Commons, which, I am satisfied, from what I have heard, would put their veto on it. I submit that any backing up on the part of the Government at the present moment—because that is what this legislation means—is an invitation to the disorderly and dangerous element to commence to agitate and cause perhaps serious trouble in the country. Why, honourable gentlemen, it was just a year ago that the legislation which we are now asked to repeal was rushed through both Houses as necessary legislation.

My honourable friend the Minister of Labour says that since that time the Criminal Code has been amended in such a way that this legislation is not necessary. Every honourable gentleman knows that while the Criminal Code has been amended, a man cannot be deported under the Criminal Code. He can be proceeded against for sedition, and sent to the penitentiary. But we do not want to fill our penitentiaries with this class of men. We should send them out of the country. I contend that the deportation of one or two or half-a-dozen of them would have a better effect than putting twenty of them in the penitentiary. When you put them there you make martyrs of them, and forthwith the labour organizations of the country proceed to petition the Government to release them. You place the labour organizations in an awkward position. We should go slowly in amending important legislation like this. I submit that if the Bill was a necessity a year ago, when it was put through in a very few moments, it is just as necessary to-day. We have the same element still in Canada. It may be sleeping but it is here, and the Government has evidence against dozens of men who would come within the meaning of clause 2 of this Bill. That is a fact that is known to everybody who knows anything about what the Government has been doing. I say that this is salutary legislation. It is a splendid thing for the law to have a club which it can hold over the head of evil-doers, and I trust that this body will not endorse the Bill before the House, but will rather vote for the six months' hoist moved by the honourable gentleman from Hamilton.

Hon. E. L. GIRROIR: Honourable gentlemen, we who are democrats to the hilt, sprung from the toilers and workers and farmers of the land, are very apt, perhaps, to be carried away by our sympathy for the labouring man, and, if we allow that to take too great a hold upon us, we may support a measure that will not be to the best advantage of the people of Canada. To my mind there is one thing that is higher and more sacred than anything else, and that is the safety of the State. If the safety of the state is imperilled, then it is the duty of all persons to stand by the State. To my mind there are elements in Canada who are endangering the safety of the State, and it might be our bounden duty to support legislation that would allow those who have the administration of affairs for the time being to take summary action.

The Minister of Labour, in the very able address which he delivered in support of his Bill, stated that the rights which he was seeking to accord to these men were like the rights that were sought for the people under the Magna Charta. Now, let us think for a moment why Magna Charta was obtained, and the circumstances surrounding the agitation which brought about the granting of the Magna Charta by King John. The Magna Charta was granted because the barons were being oppressed by the King. King John was making exactions upon the barons and the people that were so obnoxious, so unfair, that the people rose up and demanded from the King that they be granted the right of trial by their peers. They had been thrown into prison, they had been taxed and penalized, and had no recourse. They were not given an opportunity of stating their side of the case; but the King, who is all-powerful, took the matter into his own hands, and was exacting tribute or punishing or penalizing them to such an extent that they could stand these wrongs no longer, and rose up demanding certain privileges, which were granted at the point of the bayonet, so to speak, and which have ever since been the right of British subjects.

What is the situation to-day compared with the situation then? The situation to-day, as I understand it, is that certain elements in this country, as well as in other countries, are in exactly the same position that King John was in at the time the Magna Charta was demanded and obtained. That is to say, there are certain agitators in Canada and in other countries who are using the most powerful weapons that can be used to exact from the people at large concessions to which they are not justly entitled. I do not say for a moment that the labour people are not entitled to use the strike weapon within reasonable bounds; but when they go to the extent of plotting and agitating for the overthrow of established authority, when they go to the extent of adopting a programme to put aside all lawful government in this country, then they are using that weapon in a way calculated to do injustice to the bulk of the people, and to exact from them a tribute to which they have no right, not even to as great an extent as had King John to the tribute which he was exacting. Take the situation as it existed in Winnipeg. Men plotted there for the overthrow of constitutional authority. There is no question about that: that cannot be denied. So bad was the situation in that respect that perhaps for the first time in this country citizens of all classes banded themselves together to oppose to the very limit the onslaught of the extremists who were not only threatening the lives and the property of the people, but were threatening to overthrow lawful constituted authority.

Now, does it not seem right that some power should be placed in the hands of the governing authorities whereby they may take speedy action in case of an emergency —in case men appear in any community in Canada and begin an agitation which might cause grievous injury to the whole country, which might bring death and destruction in its wake? Is it not fair that some person in authority should have in their hands the power of taking action which would relieve the country speedily of this menace? You talk of trying these men. What happened at the trials which took place in Winnipeg? These men who were tried, able men, eloquent men, men who knew how to appeal to a jury, who knew how to appeal to a mob—or to the multitude, if you like—in many cases defended themselves, and they were given the very best opportunity that could be accorded to any one to disseminate throughout this country from one end to the other, by means of their addresses to the jury and their questions to witnesses, ideas and doctrines of the most revolutionary kind. If you are going to try these men, you are simply going to aid them in the dissemination and distribution of the doctrines which they advocate, and which everybody must acknowledge are not such as any of us here, or any citizen of Canada worthy of the name, could subscribe to. I for my part will always stand up to the very utmost for the rights of the labouring man, for the rights of the worker who is one of the producers of wealth in this country; but I think it is not in the interest of the honest labouring man of Canada, the labouring man who has the welfare of the country at heart, to allow the seeds of revolution and anarchy to be sown among his class. The best interests of the labour men of this country will be served by sustaining in Canada the established form of Government in such a way that when rights are taken away from any one they can be given back by the proper authorities. The labour man and the agitator have no more rights in this country than the ordinary citizen, and if they are going to use the strike weapon to such an extent as was threatened in the city of Winnipeg, in order to remove lawful authority and to obtain concessions to which they are not entitled, then I think it is time for us to stand by the law on our statute books, which will aid in their speedy removal from our midst. The fact that people make claims and strike does not for one moment mean that the claims are just. When labour men hold up the community and deprive them of food and fuel and other necessaries of life, they are the judges. The people generally do not previously pass judgment upon their claims. The men try their own case; they decide in their own favour; and they strike to obtain concessions and privileges which the bulk of the community may believe they are not entitled to obtain. Thus it is that the strike weapon is a more powerful weapon than has ever been used before in this country. It is so powerful that, if it were used to the extent that has been threatened on more than one occasion, the whole commerce of the country could be destroyed, public utilities could be destroyed, and people could be deprived of the absolute necessities of life; death and destruction could be caused upon every hand. I have no fear that the honest labouring man of Canada who seeks to better his position is going to bring about any such condition in the country. I have absolute faith in him.

He has been tried, and tried hard, on many an occasion in the past, and he has always shown himself a true Britisher and a true Canadian. But I have fear that agitators who come amongst us from abroad may sow the seeds of rebellion and anarchy in our midst and may do irretrievable injury, not only to the country at large, but to the labour people of Canada in particular. Therefore when I say that I am going to support this amendment I do so only in the interest of the people of Canada, not only in the interest of stability of government in this country, but, as I honestly believe, in the interest of the loyal, honest labouring men of Canada as well.

Hon. N. A. BELCOURT: Honourable gentlemen, I propose in a very few words to state why I am not going to vote for the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman from Hamilton. I must say that it is after considerable hesitation that I have come to that conclusion. My hesitation has been due to two or three considerations. First of all, my dislike, my fear, of the foreign agitator, especially the international agitator—the man who carries on the nefarious business of labour agitating, sometimes in Canada, sometimes in the United States, and sometimes in Europe. I hesitate also because of the tendency which it seems to me is too much in evidence nowadays in Canada, that of pandering to, and endeavouring to meet all the wishes of, the labour men in this country. Some of them are very unreasonable and impracticable. Another reason which causes me to hesitate is my profound dislike of most of the war legislation, especially the war Orders in Council, such as are by this Act continued indefinitely.

Notwithstanding these considerations, I feel that it would be unwise and illogical for us to deport without trial men who have been given citizenship in Canada. I think it is dangerous to confer upon one man, even a Minister of the Crown, the power to deport, without trial, without any investigation except such as he may carry on by and through his subordinate officers, a man to whom Canada has given the right of Canadian citizenship. I think it is improper to empower a minister of the Crown to undo that which the Government of the country has done. When we grant a certificate of naturalization, giving to a man who has lived here the requisite length of time and has complied with the law, the right to call himself and to be treated by others as a Canadian citizen, I do not think it is something which we can revoke. It is something which is given, not for a year or two, but permanently. Deportation would be, to all intents and purposes, a complete cancellation of the certificate of naturalization by which one who, having complied with the law, becomes a Canadian citizen.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: You cannot deport a Canadian citizen, if I understand the Act aright.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No; I do not say that. I say that for that very reason we should not deport one who has become a Canadian citizen. Not only should a Canadian citizen by birth not be deported, but you should not deport the man whom you have made a Canadian citizen by naturalization.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Under the Act you cannot deport him either.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: You can do it under the Act.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: No, you cannot.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: You cannot deport a Canadian citizen either by naturalization or by birth.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But does not the British subject acquire Canadian citizenship by five years' domicile or residence in Canada? If he does, is this not equivalent to giving the alien his naturalization papers?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is the position I take. My position is that by residing in this country for five years a Britisher becomes a Canadian citizen entitled to the rights and privileges enjoyed by all other Canadians, whether born or naturalized.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: He would under the amendment, not under the present Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is the amendment we are discussing—the Bill introduced by the honourable the Minister of Labour. I say that under the law the Britisher who comes over here and remains five years and complies with the law, conducting himself properly and decently, will be entitled to be considered to all intents and purposes a Canadian citizen; and if he becomes a Canadian citizen, it is not for a year, but permanently.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Not under the present Act. A British subject coming over here and remaining five years does not become a Canadian citizen. There is in clause 41 of the Act a proviso which says:

> Provided that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject, either by reason of birth in Canada or by reason of naturalization.

Under the Act a British subject does not become naturalized. He would become a Canadian citizen and could not be deported under this amendment.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No. Under the Naturalization Act, by five years' residence he becomes a Canadian citizen, without having to go through any formality at all.

I do not want to make a speech. I desire only to state as briefly as I can the reasons why I think we should support this Bill. I contend that, having conferred Canadian citizenship upon a person born in the British Isles who has resided in this country for five years, we should not transfer to any one man, even a Minister of the Crown, the right to take away that which the law has granted. It is not in the interest of the future of this country, not in the interest of the colonization and development of Canada. It might deter a great many persons from coming here. We should not put any obstacles in the way of proper immigration to this country.

Some honourable gentlemen have waxed eloquent over the great dangers with which the Canadian labourer has to contend because of agitators coming here and trying to inculcate the doctrines of Bolshevism, etc. Honourable gentlemen, it is not by references in this House or the other that we are going to clear the country of those ideas. They are in the country, and they have to be met, and the sooner they are met the better. It is not by burying our heads in the sand, like the ostrich, that we are going to overcome the difficulty. Whether those men come from England or elsewhere, the ideas are in the country today, and I for one am not prepared to admit that our labour people are so weak and so unintelligent that they cannot themselves see the weakness and falsehood of those doctrines and ideas. If they are, then it is only by educating them, only by showing them the fallacies of such doctrines, that we shall succeed in avoiding the dangers which threaten us. To my mind, there are two things which we should do. We should be very careful when we allow any foreigner or any Britisher to come and establish himself in this country. There should be a strict examination. We should not admit any one who is not capable of becoming a good citizen—a good loyal British subject.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: But we have them here.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes; largely because we have been too careless in letting them in; largely because we have not properly investigated the standing of those people, where they came from, the theories they held, etc. We let everybody in without discrimination, without investigation. Before admitting immigrants, there should be a strict inquiry made as to their antecedents—who they are, where they come from, etc.; and before they are granted certificates of naturalization or recognized in any way as Canadian citizens, there should again be a proper investigation. Canadian citizenship should not be conferred upon them unless and until we are perfectly sure that they will make good citizens. It seems to me that it is illogical for us, in granting naturalization, to say that if it pleases say the Minister of Immigration at any time without trial to order deportation, he may do so. I do not think that is in the interest of Canada. For that reason, notwithstanding my dislike of those agitators, I feel that, in order to be logical and consistent, and in order to do that which is in the best interest of Canada, we ought not to continue legislation which would throw discredit on our own act of citizenship granted by naturalization.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: My honourable friend is a very clever lawyer. Would he be kind enough to tell us under what arrangement the Americans deport all their Reds? They have deported a large number, I understand—shipload after shipload. Under what law or what arrangement? Is it something along this line?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not know, and I may tell my honourable friend that I am not very much concerned. I am not one of those who generally look to the United States for advice or guidance in matters of this sort. So far as Canada is concerned, I think we have done pretty well in the past, and our own traditions and our own legislation ought to be sufficient guidance for us in determining questions of this sort.

Hon. J. J. DONNELLY: Honourable gentlemen, I did not have the privilege of hearing the discussion when this Bill was before the Chamber on a previous occasion; but, after listening to the explanation which has been given to-day by the Minister of Labour, I am disposed to be in sympathy with the principle of the Bill. I cannot agree with the argument put forward by the honourable member for Selkirk (Hon. Mr. Bradbury), that, because the Bill that was passed a year ago received only about ten minutes consideration in the House of Commons and seven minutes consideration in the Senate, it should not be amended or altered at present. I am rather disposed to think that that is a good argument why some consideration should be given to it at the present time, and why there might be strong reasons for amending it. Nor can I agree with the honourable member from Selkirk in his argument that if we pass this Bill we strengthen the position of the Red agitator. My belief is that you strengthen the Red agitator if you give him a grievance, and the Bill passed in 1919 did give him a grievance and placed him in a position to stir up trouble; made him much stronger over the people whom he was endeavoring to control. I think that to remove that grievance will be a step in the right direction, and that, I believe, is the object of the Bill.

My main reason, though, for desiring to support the Bill, is that I understand from the minister that under it no British subject will be deported without being given a fair trial. I believe that is a principle which should be supported by this House.

The honourable member from Selkirk mentioned the cost of the trial in Winnipeg. If we were guided entirely by the question of cost in giving a fair trial to all those who come before the courts—if we carried that argument to its logical conclusion, we would adopt lynch law in this country, because it would be a great saving of expense to the country if we lynched those who were guilty of murder, instead of giving them a fair trial. I believe in the principle of a fair trial, and I think that is the main principle involved in the measure. For that reason I propose to support the Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I am not very clear with regard to the Bill introduced by the honourable the Minister of Labour. I understand it to be an amendment to the Immigration Act, providing that if a British subject stays in this country for five years the Act shall not apply to him. I would like to ask the honourable the Minister of Labour if he is in favour of the Act with that amendment?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In answer to the honourable gentleman's question, I shall have to make an observation. I do not think he has quite stated the case. There is nothing to prevent the British subject, after being given a trial, from being deported, if it is decided that he should be; but after he has resided here five years and under the Naturalization Act has gained Canadian citizenship, he cannot and ought not to be deported without a trial.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: But are you in favour of leaving the Act on the statute book with the amendment that you now propose?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Then I think the remarks of the honourable minister, from a logical point of view, entirely failed. If it is proper to expedite the deportation of a man from Canada because he is dangerous, it is just as important to do so after five years as it is after four.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: But he should be proven guilty.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I understand the Minister of Labour to say further that there is no necessity at all for the Act, because the amendments to the Criminal Code cover all the features that are necessary. If the Minister of Labour would bring in a Bill repealing that Act entirely, so that we could discuss this matter on some question of principle, I would be prepared to meet him half-way. But here is an Act that he placed upon the statute book last year, and he comes this year and says, "I want it changed so that if a man has been in the country for five years the Act shall not apply to him." Honourable gentlemen, there is something wrong about that principle. If the Act is a proper one for Canada, it ought to be applied to an immigrant whether he has been in this country for four, or five, or six years. Either the principle of the Act is correct, or it is wrong. I can speak about this matter from a disinterested point of view, because, I am proud to say, I am Canadian-born and am quite free from the effects of that Act. But suppose the Reds should get into power and that Act were on the statute book. There are many on this side of the House and some honourable gentlemen on the other side who might be railroaded out of the country. There is that danger about it.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Better fix it.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: But I would like to get at the principle of this thing. If the Act is proper in principle, this proposed amendment is not, and if the Act is not proper in principle any amendment will not cure the defect.

Hon. P. POIRIER: Honourable gentlemen, I did not come prepared to make a speech nor do I intend to make one, but I crave permission to be allowed to summarize this Bill as I understand it There was, as everybody knows, a world war. During the war we had recourse to emergency legislation, as did other countries. In some countries it was even necessary to adopt martial laws. Now that the war is over, why should we continue to live under what I might call an autocratic regime, such as we willingly accepted during the war? A great principle is involved in the question before the Senate to-day: shall the Canadian citizen be a free man or not? If the Bill does not carry, we go back to the time of Magna Charta, and to King John Lackland, to whom reference was made by my honourable friend from Antigonish (Hon. Mr. Girroir). At that time the authorities could take it upon themselves to cast a man into jail, or into the Tower of London, to rob him and to deprive him of his life, without a trial by his peers. We have come through revolutions and bloodshed to the state of freedom which prevails in the British Empire. Are we going to go back to King John?

Some Hon. SENATORS: No. no.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: We are, if we do not wipe this legislation off our statute book. Remember, honourable gentlemen, that a Canadian citizen holds a sacred right that no man may take from him against his will. A Canadian citizen is equal to what formerly was a civis Romanus. What made the grandeur of Rome? The fact that the State upheld the rights of all its citizens. If this Bill does not pass, honourable gentlemen, there is a man in this Dominion who may act as the kings or the ministers of France acted before the Bastile was razed: there is a man who may deport a Canadian citizen without trial. To me the enormity of that situation is appalling, and I am surprised at any honourable gentleman standing for the continuation of a state of things which was unfortunately made necessary by the war. Let us return to normal conditions: let us refer differences to our courts. I believe in our courts: they represent a high state of civilization. But if you give power to a minister, or to the Government, or to the Governor, or to the King, to deport a Canadian citizen without trial, I say, honourable gentlemen, you are going back to the days of King John Lackland, and we may have to fight again for the recovery of our liberties.

Hon Mr. SHARPE: You voted for the Bill last year.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: Last year the war was hardly over, and peace had not been concluded.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: We may have another war next year.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: But when we can let us have peace. I am strongly opposed to the continuation of autocratic and tyrannical legislation in this country. I say that this legislation smacks of Bolshevism, and that it might better be enacted by a Soviet than by a Canadian Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I should like to ask the minister a question. In the case of deportations last year, were the proceedings ex parte, or how were they conducted?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In answer to my honourable friend's inquiry, if I remember correctly, the provisions of the Immigration Act touching that point provided that officials of the Immigration Department—I think either two or three officials—had jurisdiction to make an inquiry and advise the minister as to whether or not deportation should take place. The minister acted upon their recommendation, unless he had doubts as to the correctness of the recommendation. The men accused did not have the opportunity of a trial by jury before being deported. The suggestion is, as the honourable gentleman from Acadie (Hon. Mr. Poirier) has just pointed out, that notwithstanding the fact that after five years' residence in this country, under the Naturalization Act, a British-born subject becomes a Canadian citizen, he is, by the Immigration Act as it now stands, deprived of the right of a trial.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Then the man complained against was not even present.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: That is barbarous.

Hon. GEO. McHUGH: Honourable gentlemen, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the discussion of this question and I must say, from the statements of the honourable Minister of Labour, that I am fully in sympathy with the proposed Bill. I listened to the address of the honourable gentleman from Selkirk (Hon. Mr. Bradbury), who wants the law to remain as it stands, so that it may be held as a big stick over the heads of the people. The honourable gentleman from Antigonish (Hon. Mr. Girroir), followed somewhat along the same line, and said that in case any one was accused of sedition or anything of that kind, it should be left with the Minister of Immigration to say whether or not he should be deported.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: I do not think my honourable friend is quite stating the case.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: When there is cause for suspicion.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: My idea is that in exceptional cases, when the safety of the state is threatened, some one should have authority to deport.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: The state is better able to take care of itself than the individual. The men in Winnipeg who were accused were brought to trial, as I think every person accused of a crime should be, but they were not all convicted. It would have been an injustice to the innocent if they had all been deported without a trial. I think the sooner legislation is passed under which a man may retain his freedom until he is fairly convicted of some crime the better. I shall support the Bill.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, from the arguments used by the Minister of Labour in his speech this afternoon it did not seem to me that the honourable gentleman was going the right way about attaining the desired object. If it is his intention that these men should have a trial before any action is taken, I do not think this legislation is going to accomplish that intention. My chief objection to the legislation put through last year was that it failed to provide that a man should be given a hearing before action was taken. As the minister explained a few minutes ago, everything was left in the hands of the officials, who reported to the Minister, and then it was left to the Minister to decide what should be done. The man charged had no opportunity of being tried before his peers. The Minister now comes down and proposes this amendment, but only in one certain direction. As I view it, the amendment simply makes provision that a British subject, like myself, who comes to Canada and lives here for five years, cannot be deported; but the British subject who has not been here for five years can be deported without any trial. It seems to me that if it is good legislation to provide that a man who has been in this country for five years should be given a trial before he is deported, it would also be good legislation to give the same right to a British subject who has been here for only four years. I think it is the intention of the Minister to amend the Act in a very different way from that which is provided for in the Bill.

As was said by the honourable gentleman from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. McMeans), if the Act is to be amended now I think we ought to discuss the whole principle and policy of the Act. In the first session of 1919 the Government considered that this legislation was necessary, and I for one do not think that conditions in the country have altered very much since that time. I do not altogether like this kind of legislation; but if the Government, which is responsible for the administration of the affairs of the country, thought that it was necessary in the first Session of last year, I for one do not feel inclined to vote for the Bill, and shall vote for the amendment, because I do not think the Bill goes far enough in one respect, and I think it would be better that we should discuss the whole question as a matter of policy on another occasion.

Hon. J. W. DANIEL: Honourable gentlemen, I coincide in a great many of the sentiments expressed by the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat. It is barely twelve months since the legislation which we are now asked to amend was enacted. As has already been said, it was put through Parliament hurriedly as an emergency measure; and I cannot see that the circumstances which produced the urgency at that time have changed to such an extent that we might now safely repeal that legislation.

I must say, honourable gentlemen, that I was astonished this afternoon at the great amount of sympathy extended by some honourable gentlemen who have spoken—sympathy to whom? To the worst malefactors this country has ever seen; the very worst class of people that have ever received the hospitality of this country. What worse character could we receive into our midst than a man who comes here for the express purpose of agitating and creating trouble and trying to overthrow the Government of the country. The people for whom sympathy has been expressed this afternoon are described in the Act: how are they described? They are described as "advocates of assassination." Are they people to whom our sympathy should go out this afternoon? Should we extend our sympathy to any one "who advocates the assassination of any official of any of the said Governments, or of any foreign Governments, or who in Canada defends or suggests the unlawful destruction of property?" Are these the kind of people to whom we should extend our sympathy? People who come here to burn down and to destroy what our citizens have for many years been trying to build up? Such a thing does not appeal to me, honourable gentlemen. Should we extend the right hand of sympathy to any man "who, without lawful authority assumes any powers of government in Canada or in part thereof, or who by common repute belongs to or is suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from or in any way attempts to control any resident of Canada by force or by threat of bodily harm or by blackmail?" or things of that kind to obtain action and a position in this country that he is unable to obtain by legitimate means? One honourable gentleman has said: "Why, if you do not pass this legislation, you will give these people, these agitators, these men who are attempting and advocating the destruction of property and the assassination of officials, a grievance." Just think of it: you will give them a grievance. A murderer might just as well say that you give him a grievance by putting a section in the Criminal Code providing that if he commits murder he must be hanged. Such arguments do not appeal to me in the slightest degree. The legislation of last year was passed in good faith as a matter of urgency and emergency, and to my mind there is no reason in the world why it should be suddenly repealed and cut off at the present time. Personally I am opposed to both sections of the Bill which is now before us, and under the circumstances I feel obliged to vote for the amendment of the honourable gentleman from Hamilton.

Hon. L. G. POWER: Honourable gentlemen, I had not proposed to say anything in connection with this measure, and I do not know that I should now, only that the leader of the Opposition has expressed a view on the subject in which I do not feel able to concur. I agree with the leader of the Opposition in feeling that perhaps this legislation might have come to us in a better form; but, after all, honourable gentlemen, the House is not altogether responsible for the form. The Government and their officers and the Parliamentary Counsel are responsible for the form; and even though the form does not quite suit us I do not think the fact that we do not fully approve of the form is sufficient reason for voting against the measure.

The honourable gentleman from Selkirk (Hon. Mr. Bradbury) spoke of the haste with which the measure was put through the two Houses in the first session of last year. When the honourable gentleman gave us that piece of information, I thought that he was really putting into the hands of the minister about the strongest argument that he could. It is a well known maxim in law that hasty legislation is as a rule bad legislation; and no legislation could have been much more hasty than that of which the honourable gentleman from Selkirk spoke. This is supposed to be peculiarly a deliberative body —supposed to be, on the whole, the coolest, and I think I might almost add, the most level-headed legislative body in the country; and to say that they would pass a measure of this sort in seven minutes goes to show that the Senate were just a little bit rattled, to use a slang expression. The Government may have been suffering last year from a condition like that of Philip who had been a little bit drunk and who now feels sober and appeals to Parliament to help him out of his trouble.

Hon Mr. BRADBURY: If I remember rightly, the honourable gentleman was in his place last year when that legislation was passed.

Hon Mr. POWER: I do not remember whether I was or not; but it does not follow, if I overlooked my duty on that occasion, that I should do the same thing now.

What is the proposal, honourable gentlemen? I mean what does the law as it stands to-day--and as the honourable gentleman from Selkirk wishes it to stand—what does that do? It practically places the liberties of a very large proportion of our people in the hands of any government understrapper who may be actuated by vindictiveness or some other unworthy motive. That is not a satisfactory condition of things. The references that have been made to cases of murder, etc., are to my mind quite beside the question. As some honourable gentleman said, one would not advocate lynch law in the case of murder, and I do not think that these subordinate officers, who are not always the most high-toned people in the world, should be allowed a chance to interfere so seriously with the welfare of men who perhaps may be infinitely better than themselves. We should, I think, bear this in mind: I do not remember now who expressed the maxim, but it was substantially that it is better that ten guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should be found guilty. And I do not think that there is much danger of many guilty men escaping.

Then, some honourable gentleman spoke of men coming from abroad. But this measure does not apply to men coming from abroad; it applies to citizens of Canada. If the honourable gentleman from Selkirk, or any other honourable gentleman, can devise some legislation which will shut out the objectionable people from abroad, I shall be glad to support it. But unfortunately, as far as my limited judgment goes, I feel bound now to vote against the amendment and in favour of the Bill.
