ONLY AN IRISH BOY.

THE FORTUNES OF ANDY BURKE.

CHAPTER XXIV.—(CONTINUED)

'Are you going to Boston?' asked Godfrey.

'Yes, said Andy.

'What are you going for?'

'Important business.'

'Has Miss Grant turned you off?'

'She didn't say anything about it this morning, do you want to take my place?'

'Do you think I'd stoop to be a hired boy?' said Godfrey, laughing.

'You wouldn't need to stoop,' said Andy; 'you ain't any too tall.'

Godfrey winced at this. He was not tall of his age, and he wanted to be. Andy had been growing faster than he, and was now, though scarcely an old, two inches taller.

'It makes no difference about being tall. I'm a gentleman, and don't have to work for a living like you do.'

'What are you going to be when you grow up?'

'A lawyer.'

'Then, won't you work for money?'

'Of course.'

'Then you'll be a hired man and work for a living.'

'That's very different. When are you coming back?'

'When I've finished my business.'

'How soon will that be?'

'I can't tell yet.'

'Humph! I shouldn't wonder if you were running away.'

'Don't you tell anybody,' said Andy, in a bantering tone.

'Where did you get the money to pay for your ticket?'

'What would you give to know?'

'You are impudent,' said Godfrey, his cheek flushing.

'So are your questions,' said Andy.

'I dare say you stole it.'

'Look here, Godfrey Preston,' said Andy, roused to indignation by this insinuation; 'you'd better not say that again if you know what's best for yourself.'

He advanced a step with a threatening look, and Godfrey instinctively recoiled.

'That comes of my speaking to my inferior,' he said.

'You can't do that.'

'What do you mean?'

'I don't know anybody that's inferior to you.'

Godfrey turned on his heel wrathfully, muttering something about a 'low beggar'; which Andy, not hearing, did not resent.

The whistle of the locomotive was heard and the cars came along.

With high anticipation of pleasure, Andy got aboard. He had before him a journey of close upon a hundred miles, and he wished it had been longer. He had never been much of a traveller, and the scenes which were to greet his eyes were all novel. He had heard a good deal of Boston also, and he wanted to see it. It was a bright, sunny morning, and that made his journey the pleasanter, though if it had rained pouring it would have dampened his spirits.

Besides the money which Miss Grant had given him to defray his expenses, he had with him ten dollars of his own. Since his mother had delivered the two donations from Colonel Preston she made Andy keep half his wages for his own use. These were now seven dollars a week, so he kept three and a half, and of this sum was able to lay up about ten. So he had a supply of money in his trunk, of which he had taken with him ten dollars.

'Maybe I'll see something I want to buy in the city,' he said to himself.

I don't mean to dwell upon the journey. There is nothing very exciting in a railway trip, even of a hundred miles now-a-days, unless indeed, the cars run off the track, or over the embankment, and then it is altogether too exciting to be agreeable. For the sake of my young hero, whom I really begin to like, though he was 'only an Irish boy,' I am glad to say that nothing of that sort took place; but in good time—about the time when the clock on the old South station indicated noon—Andy's train dove into the Boston and Maine railway depot, fronting on Northmarket Square.

'Inquire your way to Washington Street.' This was the first direction that Andy had received from Miss Priscilla, and that was what our hero did first.

The question was addressed to a very droll young man, who politely gave Andy the necessary directions. So in a short time he reached Washington Street by way of Court Street.

The next thing was to inquire the way to the Merchants Bank; this being the one in which the ladies owned the largest amount of stock.

'Where is the Merchants Bank?' asked Andy of a boy, whose blacking-box denoted his occupation.

'I'll show you, mister,' said the boy. 'Come along.'

His young guide, instead of taking him to the bank, took him to the side door of the corner house, and said:

'Go in there.'

Against a massive stone building, and Andy, not suspecting that he was being fooled, went in. Wandering at random, he found his way into a room where a trial was going on. This opened his eyes.

'He cheated me,' thought Andy. 'Maybe I'll get even with him.'

He retraced his steps, and again found himself in the street. His fraudulent young guide, with a grin on a face not over clean, was awaiting his reappearance.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE MERCHANT FROM PORTLAND.

'Look here, young chap,' said Andy; 'what made you tell me that was the Merchants Bank?'

'Isn't it?' asked the bootblack, with a grin.

'It's the bank where you'll be wanted some time. Shouldn't wonder if they made a mistake and took you up instead of your money.'

'Have you got any money in the Merchants Bank?' asked the other.

'I'm going to see if they won't give me some. If you hadn't cheated me, maybe I'd have invited you to dine with me at my hotel.'

'Where are you stopping?' asked the street-boy, not quite knowing how much of Andy's story to believe.

'At the most fashionable hotel.'

'Parker's?'

'You're good at guessing. Perhaps you'd like to dine there?'

'I don't know as they'd let me in,' said the boy, doubtfully; 'but I'll show you where there's a nice eatin' house, where they don't charge half so much.'

'Wouldn't be fashionable enough for me. I shall have to dine alone. See what comes of tryin' to fool your grandfater.'

Andy went on, leaving the boy in doubt whether his jest had really lost him a dinner.

Andy didn't go to the Parker House, however. His expenses were to be paid by the Misses Grant, and he felt that it wouldn't be right to be extravagant at their expense.

'I shall come across an eatin' house presently,' he said to himself.

Not far off he found one with the bill of fare exposed outside, with the prices. Andy examined it, and found that was not an expensive place. He really felt hungry after his morning's ride, and determined, before he attended to his business to get dinner. He accordingly entered, and seated himself at one of the tables. A waiter came up and awaited his commands.

'What'll you have?' he asked.

'Bring me a plate of roast beef, and a cup of coffee,' said Andy, 'and be quick about it, for I haven't eaten anything for three weeks.'

'Then I don't think one plate will be enough for you,' said the waiter, laughing.

'I'll do to begin on,' said Andy.

The order was quickly filled, and Andy set to work energetically.

It is strange how we run across acquaintances when we least expect it. Andy had no idea that he knew anybody in the eating house, and therefore didn't look round, feeling no special interest in the company.

Yet there was one person who recognized him as soon as he entered, and watched him with strong interest. The interest was not friendly, however, as might be inferred from the scowl with which he surveyed him. This will not be a matter of surprise to the reader when I say that the observer was no other than Fairfax, whose attempt to rob Colonel Preston had been defeated by Andy.

He recognized the boy at once, both from his appearance and his voice, and the old feeling of resentment ran in his breast. To be foiled was disagreeable enough, but to be foiled by a boy was almost unendurable, and he had vowed revenge, if ever an opportunity occurred. For this reason he felt exultant when he saw his enemy walking into the eating house.

'I'll follow him,' he said to himself, 'and I'll go hard if I don't get even with him for that trick he played on me.'

But how did it happen that Andy did not recognize Fairfax?

For two reasons; first, because the adventurer was sitting behind him, and out here faced the front of the room. Next, had he seen him it was doubtful if he would have recognized a man whom he was far from expecting to see. For Fairfax was skilled in disguises, and no longer was the black whiskered individual that we formerly knew him. From motives of prudence he had shaved off his black hair and whiskers, and now appeared in a red wig, and whiskers of the same hue. If any of my readers would like to know how effective this disguise is, let them try it, and I will guarantee that they won't know themselves when they come to look in the mirror.

After disposing of what he had ordered, Andy also ordered a plate of apple dumplings, which he ate with great satisfaction.

'I wouldn't mind eatin' here every day,' he thought. 'Maybe I'll be business here some day myself, and then I'll come here and dine.'

Fairfax was through with his dinner, but waited till Andy rose. He then rose and followed him to the desk, where both paid at the same time. He was careless of recognition, for he felt confident in his disguise.

'Now,' thought Andy, 'I must go to the bank.'

'But he didn't know where the bank was. So when he got into the street, he asked a gentleman whom he met: 'Sir, can you direct me to the Merchants Bank?'

'It is in State street,' said the gentleman. 'I am going past it, so if you will come along with me, I will show you.'

'Thank you, sir,' said our hero, politely. 'Merchants Bank?' said Fairfax to himself, beginning to feel interested. 'I wonder what he's going there for? Perhaps I can raise a little money, besides having my revenge.'

'He had an added inducement now in following our hero.

'When Andy went into the bank, Fairfax followed him. He was in the room when Andy received the dividends, and with roll of bills, representing, no doubt, a considerable sum of money.

'That money must be mine,' he said to himself. 'It can't be the boy's. He must have been sent by some other person. The less will get him into trouble. Very likely he will be considered a thief. That would just suit me.'

Andy was careful, however. He put the money into a pocket-book, or rather wallet, with which he had been supplied by the Misses Grant, put it in his inside pocket, and then buttoned his coat up tight. He didn't mind his money being stolen.

But this was not his last business visit. There was another bank in the same street where it was necessary for him to call and receive dividends. Again Fairfax followed him, and again he saw Andy receive a considerable sum of money.

'There's fat pickin' here,' thought Fairfax. 'Now I must manage in some way to relieve him of that money. There's altogether too much for a youngster like him. Shouldn't wonder if the money belonged to that man I tried to rob. If so, all the better.'

In this conjecture, as we know, Fairfax was mistaken. However, it made comparatively little difference to him whose money it was, as long as there was a chance of his getting it into his possession. The fact was, that his finances were not in a very flourishing condition just at present. He could have done better to follow some honest and respectable business, and avoided all the dishonest shifts and intricate laws to which he was compelled to resort, but he had started wrong and it was difficult to persuade him that even now it would have been much better for him to amend his life and his ways. In this state of affairs he thought it a great piece of good luck that he should have fallen in with a boy in charge of a large sum of money, whom, from his youth and inexperience, he would have less trouble in robbing than an older person.

Andy had already decided how he would spend the afternoon. He had heard a good deal about the Boston Museum, its large collection of curiosities, and the plays that were performed there. One of the pleasantest anticipations he had was of a visit to this place, the Paradise of country people. Now that his business was concluded, he determined to go there at once. But first he must inquire the way.

Turning round, he saw Fairfax without recognizing him.

'Can you direct me to the Boston Museum?'

'Certainly, with pleasure,' said Fairfax, with alacrity.

'In fact, I am going there myself. I suppose you are going to the afternoon performance?'

'Yes, sir.'

'Have you ever been there?'

'No, but I have heard a good deal about it. I don't live in the city.'

'Nor do I,' said Fairfax. 'I am a merchant of Portland, Maine. I have come to the city to buy my winter stock of goods. As I only come twice a year I generally try to enjoy myself a little while I am here. Do you stay in the city over night?'

'Yes, said Andy.

'So did I. Here is the museum.'

They had reached the museum, which, as some of my readers are aware, is situated in Tremont Street.

'We go up these stairs,' said Fairfax. 'If you don't object we will take seats together.'

'I shall be glad to have company,' said Andy, politely.

Reserved seats adjoining were furnished, and the adventurer and his intended victim entered the museum.

CHAPTER XXVI.

SPINNING THE WEB.

There was a short interval before the play commenced. This Andy improved by examining the large stock of curiosities which had been gathered from all parts of the world for the gratification of visitors. Fairfax kept at his side, and spoke freely of all they saw. There was something about him which seemed to Andy strangely familiar. Was it in his features, or in his voice? He could not tell. The red wig and whiskers misled him. Andy finally set it down as a mere chance resemblance to some one whom he had not formerly, and dismissed it from his mind.

At length the increasing crowds pouring into the lecture-room reminded them that the play was about to begin.

'Shall we go in and take our seats?' said Fairfax.

Andy assented, and they were speedily in their seats.

I do not propose to speak of the play. It was a novelty to Andy to see a dramatic representation, and he thoroughly enjoyed it. Fairfax was more accustomed to such things, but pretended to be equally interested, feeling that in this way he could ingratiate himself better into Andy's confidence.

'How did you like it?' asked Fairfax.

'Tip-top,' said Andy, promptly. 'Don't you think so?'

'Capital,' answered Fairfax, with simulated delight. 'I am glad I had company. I don't enjoy anything half as well alone. By the way, where do you pass the night?'

'At some hotel—I don't know which?'

'Suppose you go to the Adams House. I've got to stop over night somewhere, and it might be pleasant to go in company.'

'Where is the Adams House?'

'On Washington street, not very far off—ten or fifteen minutes' walk.'

'It's a good place I'm willing.'

'It is an excellent hotel, and moderate in price. We might go up there now, and engage a room, and then spend the evening where we like.'

'Very well,' said Andy.

'They soon reached the Adams House—a neat, unpretending hotel—and entered. They walked up to the desk, and Fairfax spoke to the clerk.

'Can you give us a room?'

'Certainly, Rate as you please.'

'Shall we room together?' asked Fairfax, calmly.

Now Andy, though he had no objection to going to the theatre with his present companion, did not care to take a room with a stranger, of whom he knew nothing. He might be a very respectable man, but somehow, Andy did not know why there was something in his manner which inspired a little repulsion. Besides he remembered that he had considerable money with him, and that consideration alone rendered it imprudent for him to put him-
