PREFACE

Each year the Institute commissions, funds and publishes a survey of Canadian public opinion in the area of international peace and security. This series began with a poll conducted in 1987. The questions that make up these surveys are designed by Don Munton, of the University of British Columbia, and Institute staff. The polling is carried out by Longwoods Research Group in Toronto.

In contrast to the previous working papers reporting on earlier polls in this annual series, the text of this paper does not describe the results for every question included in the 1990 survey. Instead, it focuses on selected questions and themes which, for various reasons, are of particular interest. The appendices and tables accompanying this working paper, however, provide statistical results for individual questions. The appendices include breakdowns of the results by demographic factors, including gender, region, language and income.

The analysis of results presented in the text is that of the authors and does not necessarily represent the views of the Institute and its Board of Directors. Don Munton is an associate professor of political science at UBC.

Introduction

While Canadians are significantly less worried now about the danger of a nuclear war than in recent years, concerns about the danger of a major conventional conflict somewhere in the world are almost as high as three decades ago, at the peak of the Cold War.

Related to this view is an increasingly positive assessment of both the United States and the Soviet Union, of the trend of East-West and superpower relations, and of the recent unification of the two Germanies. At the same time, there are continuing concerns about regional powder kegs, especially the Middle East, concerns that pre-date the current crisis in the Persian Gulf.

Canadians are changing their conceptions of security threats. As first demonstrated in last year's Institute for Peace and Security poll, these threats now feature economic and environmental problems as well as more traditional military threats. The present survey suggests an awareness of and, perhaps, a new concern about the emergence of Japan as an economic power. It also suggest a declining concern with the Canada-US issue of acid rain along with a striking awareness of such global ecological problems as depletion of the ozone layer. Problems such as Third World hunger and poverty, on the other hand, are not perceived as important or growing threats by many Canadians.

The Survey -- Purpose and Format

The 1990 national public opinion survey, like those conducted in 1987 through 1989, was commissioned and funded by the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security and designed by Don Munton and members of the Institute staff. Comprising some 80 questions in all, the survey was carried out in September and October, 1990 by the Longwoods Research Group with a national sample selected randomly to be representative of Canadian households and chosen from a panel of 30,000 households maintained by Market Facts Ltd. A total of 1,275 people responded to the questionnaire which was conducted by mail in both English and French. Of these, a total of 688 were also respondents to the 1989 survey. The overall response rate was 62%. (By comparison, the 1989 survey had a response rate of 50%) The margin of error with samples of this size is approximately +/- 3%, 95 times out of 100.

Hot Wars and the Cold War

Asked about the possibility of a nuclear war, only one in three Canadians (33%) said there was much danger. Two-thirds (66%) believe there is not much danger. These levels represent a rather dramatic shift from 1987 when the same question was last asked. At that time, prior to the signing of the Intermediate-range Nuclear Force (INF) treaty and the definite warming in US-USSR relations, a majority of Canadians, fully 55%, perceived much danger of nuclear war.

On the other hand, perceptions of the danger of "world war" are relatively high; indeed, they are as high as those of the early 1960s. Four in ten respondents (41%) to the present survey believed, in the month following the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, that there was much danger of a world war. (This level of concern almost certainly increased in subsequent months as the media carried increased speculation about a direct military conflict with Iraq.) A 1961 survey by the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion (CIPO -- the Gallup Poll), using the same question wording, showed 49% of Canadians at that time perceived much danger of such a war. In that poll, 51% saw not much danger, compared with 57% in 1990.

While the possibility of a world war remains real for many, the anticipated cause of such a war has shifted radically in this thirty-year period. Today, the vast majority of Canadians (69%) think a world war would be caused by countries other than the USSR or US; less than one in four (23%) thought so in 1961. Only two in every hundred (2%) now believe a war would come about as a result of Soviet action. Thirty years ago, the figure was forty in one hundred (41%). By contrast, more, although only about one in seven (13%), currently expect the US to be the cause, while about half as many (6%) did in 1961. Finally, 15% place now their bets on war occurring as a result of both American and Soviet action; in the CIPO poll thirty years ago, fully 31% did so.

The sort of development most Canadians regard as the greatest military threat to world peace, as shown in earlier CIIPS polls, is either the spread of nuclear weapons to smaller countries or a regional conflict, most likely in the Middle East. In this sense, many Canadians would not have been surprised by the outbreak of war in the Persian Gulf.

When asked last year, the month before the Berlin Wall was opened, whether the Cold War was over, few Canadians were (6%) were so optimistic. After a dramatic year of events in Eastern Europe, significantly more are optimistic (21%) but most remain cautious. Fully two-thirds (66%) say that the Cold War is lessening but not over. Canadians also still largely refuse to gloat about its demise. Only a small minority (14%) believe that the western or capitalist countries "won" the Cold War. (The 1989 figure was 5%.) Most (47%) continue to judge that both sides won to some extent.

Consistent with these views, the proportion of Canadians who now expect that there will be increased co-operation among major countries in the future has grown slightly since 1989, from 66% to 72%. The number who anticipate no change has dropped, from 23% to 13%. About the same proportion as last year expect less co-operation (14% versus 12%).

What to Do About NATO?

Domestic preoccupations in recent months -- the Meech Lake accord, the future of Quebec, native land claims and blockades, the Goods and Services Tax -- have left little time for Canadians to debate international affairs, and, in particular, have meant that Canadians have yet to debate the implications that the revolution in Eastern Europe and demise of the Warsaw Pact have for the future of the NATO alliance and Canada's membership therein. The role the Canadian armed forces have been assigned in the Persian Gulf crisis, moreover, has obscured the questions which might naturally arise about the maintenance of Canadian forces in a post-Cold War Europe.

Despite the lack of an unofficial debate, or of an official government decision in this regard, the Canadian public has clearly begun to think about their country's NATO commitment. For the first time in recent decades, support for NATO has dropped dramatically. The extent of the drop is all the more striking in that it precedes any notable public discussion of this issue.

A slim majority of Canadians (50%) still supports keeping Canadian forces in Europe at their present levels. But most of the rest support either a reduction or complete withdrawal. The number who would reduce the size of those forces has roughly doubled since last year. In the 1989 CIIPS poll only 10% favoured a reduction (of unspecified size). The proportion is now 21%. In 1989, 14% favoured outright withdrawal of Canadian forces from Europe. Now 20% favour it. And whereas in 1989 one in six Canadians (17%) wanted to see these forces increased in size, only one in sixteen (6%) now do so.

Changing attitudes about NATO force commitments appear to be part of a general decline in the importance afforded the alliance. Only one in every three (32%) rank Canada's continued membership in NATO as very important. As recently as October 1989, more than one in two (52%) gave it a very important rating. Moreover, in the CIIPS poll last year, one-third of Canadians thought involvement in these defence arrangements was somewhat important, while one in two think that now. In short, there has been a 20 point drop in the perceived salience of the alliance, presumably as a result of the decline of the old threat through the collapse of the communist regimes of Eastern Europe, the effort to reform the Soviet along liberal democratic and free market lines, and the expectation of the demise of the Warsaw Pact. Once the delayed public debate in Canada begins on what these changes mean for the Canadian role in Europe it seems reasonable that these shifts will become even more pronounced.

Warming Feelings for the Superpowers

The CIIPS surveys have since 1987 tracked changing perceptions of the United States and the Soviet Union. The trend has been a very consistent improvement in both cases. Those with considerable or great confidence in the ability of the US to deal wisely with world problems increased from 37% in 1987 to 47% in 1988 to 67% in 1989, and now amount to fully 75% of Canadians. Correspondingly, the proportion with little or no confidence has shrunk steadily from 63% to 52% to 33%, and now rests at 24%. When the current results are compared to those from a survey conducted in Canada in 1972 by the US Information Agency (USIA), it appears that Canadians' confidence in their southern neighbour now exceeds that of the early 1970s, probably for the first time in two decades.

In the Soviet case, the proportion of those with considerable or great confidence rose steadily from only 28% in 1987, to 42% in 1988 and to 52% in 1989, and currently sits at 62%. The proportion of those with little or no confidence dropped over the same years from 73% to 59% to 48%, and is now at 35%. This is almost certainly a record high level of confidence in Soviet policies internationally. What might be more surprising is that, when comparison is made to the equivalent question on the 1972 USIA poll, it appears that the USSR image among Canadians has in the past eighteen months surpassed that held in the early 1970s, around the time of the first US-USSR Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty. While Mikhail Gorbachev and his policies have undoubtedly done much to improve western publics' perceptions of the Soviet Union in recent years, the present degree of confidence is not unprecedented.

In keeping with these perceptions, Canadians are now much more positive about both superpowers' leaders, their policies, and their basic global strategies. Over half (53%) think George Bush is very interested in working towards world peace and about as many (48%) similarly regard Gorbachev. When an identical question was asked on a CBC survey in 1985, fewer (38%) thought then President Reagan was very interested in working towards world peace. On the Soviet side, less than half as many (22%) as at present then thought that then new leader in Moscow, Mr. Gorbachev, was interested.

Greater shifts have taken place in the judgements about whether each superpower's recent policies have done more to promote peace or more to increase the risk of war. Positive evaluations of American US policies have risen to 68% on the 1990 CIIPS poll from 42% in 1984 on another USIA poll conducted in Canada. Positive evaluations of Soviet actions have risen even more dramatically from only 17% who thought these policies promoted peace in 1984, to 87% who currently think so.

When asked whether each superpower was seeking world domination or was more interested in protecting its own national security, most respondents said that both were more concerned with national security. But a larger share of respondents think this about the USSR (84%) than about the US (71%). Interestingly, while this assessment of the United States has not changed much since the 1988 CIIPS poll (when it was 67%), that for the Soviets has significantly improved. Only 60% in 1988 saw the USSR as mainly interested in its own security (compared to today's 84%).

Implications of German Unification

While a debate continues, especially in Europe, about the implications of the unification of the two Germanies for the security of that continent and of the world, the vast majority of Canadians seem to have decided it is for the better.

Asked in the weeks preceding unification what they thought about it, over eight in every ten (82%) offered the opinion that the two Germanies should be united. Only one in six (16%) expressed a contrary view. Asked if a united Germany would try to dominate the world, they said no by a similar ratio (79% to 18%). And asked whether or not they agreed with the statement that unification of the two Germanies "into one large state" would make Europe more stable and peaceful, seven in ten (70%) again agreed or strongly agreed.

Economic and Environmental Threats

While direct military threats to Canada seem to have declined over recent years, and perhaps decades, there is a new level of awareness about economic and environmental threats. Such was clear in the 1989 CIIPS survey. The present survey was designed to locate the origin of these new, non-traditional, threats.

No major country is seen generally to threaten Canada militarily. None, including the USSR, is regarded by more than one in four Canadians as a military threat. (Significantly fewer respondents than five years ago agree that the USSR is "an expansionist power that threatens western security"; while in a 1985 CBC poll 40% agreed with this view. Only 5% do so now.)

On the other hand, two countries stand out in Canadians minds as serious economic threats. One is the United States, named by no less than two out of three (68%). The other is Japan, named by almost as many (65%). A unified Germany was named as an economic threat by fewer than the other two, but more than any other source (43%).

The concerns about these perceived threats are particularly striking when the results of another question are taken into account. Less than one-third of Canadians choose the US as the strongest country in economic terms today. The largest single number, indeed a majority (50%), point to Japan. The European Community comes in a distant third at 11%.

These perceptions can also be put in a more historical context. In the early 1970s (on the USIA survey noted above) a solid majority of Canadians (60%) regarded the US as the strongest country economically. Only one in six (15%) pointed then to Japan. (Most then, and now, think the US is the strongest militarily.)

That environmental issues have recently come to prominence as perceived threats to security is beyond doubt. (Fully 89% said pollution in general was a serious problem for Canada that is getting worse.) Given the fact that scientists working on these problems have not yet reached any sort of consensus about their relative seriousness, it would be surprising if the Canadian public had done so. Nevertheless, such a consensus may be forming.

When asked to rank five major environmental issues (global warming, toxic waste, acid rain, ozone depletion, and water pollution) in terms of seriousness as international problems, the CIIPS respondents did not come up with a clear top priority. Two issues, however, did stand out. Almost one in three (30%) nominated the relatively recently discussed problem of the depletion of the ozone layer as the most serious. In second spot was the pollution of lakes and oceans (24%). Further back were toxic waste (16%), global warming (15%), and acid rain (12%).

The perceived importance of acid rain in particular appears to have dropped somewhat in recent years. In 1984, before the current heightened interest in environmental issues, three in four Canadians (74%) rated it as a very important problem to overcome. Today, 64% give it this rating.

The sources of perceived environmental threats seem especially clear. Europe, China and Japan and USSR are each mentioned by a minority; 16% in the case of Europe, 17% for China, 24% for Japan, and 34% for the Soviet Union. The preoccupation of Canadians in this regard, however, is the United States. No fewer than 85% regard the US as a serious environmental threat to this country.

As might be expected, almost seven out of ten (69%) believe the US is not yet doing its fair share to solve the acid rain problem. In contrast, six in ten (59%) think Canada is doing just its fair share, but few give Ottawa and the provinces credit for doing any more.

Other International Problems

In contrast to the evident concerns of Canadians for their economic and environmental security, there is less compelling evidence that they see poverty and hunger elsewhere in the world either as potential threats to security or as top priorities. North-South issues have not risen notably on the global agenda as the East-West dimension has faded. Indeed, there is some evidence that the priority afforded these issues has declined.

The CIIPS survey respondents were asked to rate the importance for Canada of a number of different activities. One of these was providing aid to developing countries.

Two in ten (22%) ranked it as very important, six in ten as somewhat important, and one in ten as not important at all. These evaluations represent a significant drop in perceived salience since the mid-1980s. In a 1984 survey carried out for the Department of External Affairs by the Goldfarb organization, almost twice as many people rated providing aid as very important (39%). In contrast to the declining importance of this activity, Canadians continue today to afford roughly the same priority as in 1984 to such commitments as participating in the United Nations and in UN peacekeeping efforts. Also, in contrast, almost nine in ten (87%) rate protecting Canada's own oceans and offshore resources as very important.

A similar picture is provided by the responses to a question on the priority to be given to "helping reduce hunger and poverty around the world." About four in every ten Canadians give this pursuit a high ranking (ie, 8, 9 or 10 on a 10-point scale). More rate it as a medium priority (45%) and a few as a low priority (12%). This overall ranking is also significantly lower overall than found for the same question on a survey done in Canada in 1985 by Decima. There more than six in ten (62%) rated reducing hunger and poverty as a high priority.

Conclusions

The incredible international events of the late 1980s have clearly had a significant impact on the perceptions and attitudes of the Canadian public. Much of the old post war order is crumbling and in the process of being re-built, and as a result, public as well as elite views are undergoing many shifts. But public opinion is not merely a product, an effect, of those changes. It is also one of the causes or determinants, of these changes. Changes in public attitudes about the Soviet Union and the nature of security discussed here, for example, to a considerable extent preceded the policy changes that are now occurring. Indeed, the foreign policy challenge for much of the 1990s seems destined to be that of bringing long established and much defended, but now out-dated, policies back into line with both the changing international environment and shifting domestic attitudes.

2. Impossible	7
3. Don't know / no answer	1
	100%

Question 14

Although it is, of course, difficult to predict, which one is more likely to start a nuclear attack -- the USA or the USSR?

Responses:

1. U.S.A.	38
2. USSR	45
3. Both	3
4. Don't know / no answer	13
	99%

Question 15

How likely is it that hostile attitudes between the U.S. and the USSR will escalate into a third world war?

Responses:

1. Very likely	2
2. Somewhat likely	18
3. Not too likely	60
4. Not at all likely	19
5. Don't know / no answer	1
	100%

Question 16a)

Do you believe that the Soviet Union is mainly interested in world domination or mainly interested in protecting its own national security?

Responses:

1. World domination	14
2. Protecting its own national security	84
3. Don't know / no answer	2
	100%

Question 16b)

And what about the United States -- is it mainly interested in world domination or mainly interested in protecting its own national security?

Responses:

1. World domination	28
2. Protecting its own national security	71
3. Don't know / no answer	1

Question 21

Do you think what Canada does to improve the environment can make a difference to the world, or do you think it won't make much difference because of pollution in many other countries around the world?

Responses:
1. Can make a difference	77
2. Won't make much difference	22
3. Don't know/no answer	1
	100%

Question 22

For Canada as a whole, is pollution a serious problem that's getting worse, a problem but one that is not so serious, or is pollution not much of a problem?

Responses:

APPENDIX B

BREAKDOWN BY PERSONAL CHARACTERISTICS

The tables in this section represent breakdowns for five demographic groupings for the questions in the survey -- language (Table 1), region (Table 2), sex (Table 3), age (Table 4), and income (Table 5). These breakdowns, or cross-tabulations, are presented as percentages within each of the groups, and therefore add up to a total of 100% (plus or minus errors due to rounding) vertically down each column for the responses to each question. The questions are listed in the order in which they appear in the original questionnaire. The percentages shown do not include "don't know" responses or non responses.
