of the one, we cannot support the principle of the other without stultifying ourselves. The hon. member for North Essex proposes that we should adopt a Bill relating to wrecking and to coasting privileges in Canadian waters. The hon. gentleman's Bill must be taken as a whole, it deals with those subjects together. If the principle of the hon. member's Bill is adopted, then we reject the principle laid down in the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). The hon. gentleman is on that committee. There is nothing contained in his Bill that he cannot have incorporated in the Bill before the committee, if he has sufficient influence in the committee, without his own Bill being referred to it, as well as with its being referred to it. The hon. gentleman, by acting on that committee, if he finds the Bill reported by the committee as unsatisfactory, may proceed with his own measure, or he may secure the rejection of the other upon the third reading. How is this House, if it supports the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), going to declare that the Bill of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson) shall have effect, as soon as, and remain in force as long as, like privileges of wrecking, towing and coasting are conceded to the United States? Does this House, after declaring itself in favor of the principle of the Bill of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson), propose that we shall not have freedom in the relieving of wrecked vessels upon the lakes, simply because the Americans will not allow us to share in the coasting trade along the Atlantic? That is the principle of the hon. gentleman's Bill; that is the provision he asks this House to support. The House has already, this afternoon, asserted an entirely different proposition. These two propositions cannot stand together. If the House supports the proposition of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson), it, in fact, resiles from the position it took in supporting the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). It seems to me that it is of great consequence to those who have property in ships, and to those who sail in and are employed in those ships, that they should have that property rescued and their lives protected as far as possible, no matter whether property is rescued or whether life is protected by a Canadian or an American vessel. It is true that the Government may, in any case of great distress, grant permission to an American towing vessel to come to the rescue of a stranded ship, but before communication with the Government can be had, the vessel may go to pieces and every person on board may be lost. That is the position, and it does seem to me a monstrous thing that we should undertake to jeopardise the lives of those who are employed on board those ships and the property that is invested in them, merely in the interest of those who have towing vessels on this side of the line. That is the proposition of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson). He says to the Americans: If you will not grant reciprocity—and the Americans have, so far as relieving wrecks is concerned, offered reciprocity—if you will not grant reciprocity in all these things, in the coasting trade and the relieving of ships in distress, we will not grant reciprocity in any of them. That is the proposition contained in this Bill, and against that proposition we have already pronounced in support of the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). The hon. First Minister shakes his head, but I maintain that is a clear proposition. In supporting the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) we have agreed that we will permit wrecking vessels to engage in wrecking on our coast, no matter whether the Americans agree to reciprocity in the coasting trade or not. There is no condition relating to the coasting trade attached to the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac. It is an inseparable portion of the proposition that we ask to make law in the Bill of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson). It is a principle of the Bill which is the gist of the whole Bill; and it is that which distinguishes his Bill from that of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). If he thinks that the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) is wrong in laying down too liberal a proposition, in granting terms which are too liberal, he will undertake to change it, and we will have an altered Bill, a Bill altered in principle, when it comes back to this House, and, if we choose to resile from the position we have taken to day, we may vote for a Bill essentially different in principle from the Bill which has now been read a second time. But the hon. gentleman says, I have here a Bill which I ask you to read a second time, and I ask you to read a second time a Bill which affirms a principle essentially different from the principle you affirmed a few minutes ago. A few years ago, we had a proposition made in this House that the rate of interest on money should be unlimited. We had another proposition a few minutes later that the rate of interest on money should be 8 per cent., and your predecessor in the Chair, Mr. Speaker, declared that the second Bill was out of order as being inconsistent in principle with the Bill which had been voted for a little while before. Now we are asked by some hon. gentlemen to read a second time a measure which, if we adopt it, will be wholly at variance with the one we have just adopted. I ask hon. gentlemen if it would be possible for these two measures, as they are now in this collection of Bills before us, to be adopted by this House? Could they be read the third time and sent to the Senate and read there three times, and ratified by His Excellency the Governor General? Certainly, the Bill that stood first in point of time would be in part repealed by the other measure. If these two measures cannot stand as they are here before us, then it is clear that the principle of the one is inconsistent with that of the other, and what we are asked now to do is to stultify the vote we gave half an hour ago.

Mr. McCARTHY. I was about to suggest that perhaps the better way would be to adjourn this debate. I agree with a great deal which has fallen from the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Mills). It appears to me that, if the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) is on the committee, as he is, he can possibly satisfy the committee that his Bill should become law, and the committee may make its provisions a part of the Bill of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). If he cannot satisfy the committee in that respect, there will be an opportunity later, if the debate stands adjourned, for my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Patterson) to move this Bill and to have it dealt with by the House. I must say that my own view is entirely in favor of the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac. It appears to me that the way in which we should look at this question is in our own interest, and in our own interest alone. It appears to me that it is in our own interest to conserve the interests of the vessel owners, and those who are interested in our marine, rather than the small or comparatively small number of those who are interested in wrecking. It is not because the United States has offered to us the privilege of reciprocity in wrecking that I would adopt such a measure, but it is because, upon the whole, as it appears to me, regard being had to all that we have heard and to all that we hear from those who are largely interested in marine matters, that the interest of this country would be better served if we permitted wrecking or the sending of our vessels by those who are prepared to undertake that business, although to that extent, and to that extent only, it may interfere with those who are specially interested in that industry in this country. I move that the debate be adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no doubt that that motion should be put, if my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Patterson) agrees to it; but I understand that the argument of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is that the two Bills are inconsistent in principle, that we cannot read the two together, that they are so utterly inconsistent that, having passed the second reading of one Bill and admitted the principle of it, we cannot pass this Bill; and yet the hon. gentleman says that the committee can report the Essex Bill instead of the Frontenac Bill. It is utterly inconsistent that the committee appointed to carry out the principle of the Frontenac Bill should rub that out altogether, and yet that the House cannot now entertain the Bill of my hon. friend from Essex. I do not see how the argument will hang together. I am very unwilling to agree to the restrictive doctrine of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to the extent to which he carries it, that the second reading of a Bill commits the House to the principle so far that you cannot pass any other Bill on the same subject if it goes further, if it adopts other clauses and makes other provisions. All we have done in passing the second reading of the Bill of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), is to say that we agree to the principle that foreign vessels should not be allowed to aid vessels which are wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters. My hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Patterson) proposes a Bill on the same principle, but he wishes to go a little further, and the clauses of his Bill are, in principle, the same as the Bill of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). The fourth clause of the Bill provides that:

"This Act shall take effect as soon as, and remain in force so long as, the like privileges of wrecking, towing and coasting in United States waters are extended to Canadian vessels by the Government of the United States."

That is an additional clause which is not in the Bill of my hon. friend from Frontenac. If the committee do not like it, they will throw it out. If they do like it, both Bills being sent to the same committee, they will insert it, although it may be inconsistent, according to my hon. friend's theory, with the principle of the Bill of my hon. friend from Frontenac. If my hon. friend's doctrine is true, then the very wise suggestion of my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that the committee might find a tertium quid, might find an alternative proposition, might decide that they would go half way and make certain conditions, and impose certain checks, could have no effect. It is monstrous, I must say, it is contrary to all my experience of the practice of Parliament, that we should be prohibited from sending these two Bills to a committee, and leaving it to the wisdom of the committee to adopt one, or to adopt the other, or to draw a Bill which may vary in every clause from the both of them, so that the principle is maintained, that foreign vessels may be allowed to enter our waters to save disabled vessels. I am rather surprised that my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) should fight this question so far, after the speeches which have been made by the hon. members for Norfolk and for Kent, both of whom spoke in favor of the extended principle contained in the Bill of my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Patterson).

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). In deference to the wishes of members on both sides of the House, I am prepared to accept the motion of my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I am aware that the probability is that, in doing so, in the present state of public business, I may not be able to reach this Bill again this Session. I take this opportunity of saying that it is a libel on the Department of Customs of Canada to say that a life has ever been momentarily in danger by any policy that they have carried out in connection with our wrecking system. If they have erred at all, if the Department of Customs have erred at all in this matter, it has been in showing too great a leniency and too great friendliness to American wrecking tugs seeking admission to Canadian waters.

Mr. CHARLTON. I hope the motion will not be withdrawn. I think this Bill ought to pass and be referred to the committee.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is practically the same thing; we can move these in committee.

Mr. CHARLTON. The committee will not have the Bill under consideration.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. They will have the ideas.

Mr. BOWELL. Before the debate closes I desire to say a word for fear a wrong impression may be left upon the minds of the members of this House from some of the remarks that fell from the hon. member from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), and also from the hon. member from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). The hon. gentleman complained on behalf of the wrecking and towing company, which is situated, I think, in his own constituency, because more active steps were not taken to seize certain wrecking and towing vessels that were permitted to assist in saving the property of a wrecked vessel in the western lakes. The facts were simply these: Application was made on behalf of the owners of a vessel for permission to use American appliances to save property. The answer made by the department was that if there were no Canadian appliances, or Canadian tugs, or wrecking apparatus, to be secured, then the American appliances might be used. The answer that was sent—not to the party who made application for permission to use American appliances, but to the collector of customs at that port—was that there were no wrecking appliances belonging to Canadians that could be used, and it was necessary, in order to save property, that the Americans should be permitted to operate, and permission was accordingly given. Then complaints were made immediately afterwards that these parties who had informed the collector that no Canadian appliances were available, had made a false statement, and that we should at once take measures to seize the property which had been used. I did not deem it advisable, under the circumstances, to give any such instruction; had the department done so, the Government would at once have been condemned by the parties who are always ready to condemn the Department of Customs for being too rigid in the enforcement of the law, and in this case for having first, through the collector, given permission to use the property, and then having seized it. It would have been another case in which the press of hon. gentlemen opposite would have deluged the whole country from one end to the other with condemnation of the iniquity of the Customs Department. The hon. member for Bothwell mentioned a case in which lives might be lost while waiting for permission from the department at Ottawa to use American tugs or American life-saving apparatus. Instructions have been given to all collectors that in cases where property is in immediate danger, or in cases where life is in danger, they should use any appliances at hand, whether foreign or domestic, without asking for permission. That, I think, is a sufficient answer to what the hon. gentleman terms a "monstrous thing," in which he supposes a loss of life might occur. But it is somewhat singular that we should have these hon. gentlemen taking such a strong position upon this question at the present moment, when we reflect that it was the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member who issued the first order to prevent the use of American appliances in the saving of either life or property where vessels were wrecked in Canadian waters or upon Canadian shores.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think you are mistaken. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was not then a member of the Government.

Mr. BOWELL. Now, the orders which have been enforced since the advent to power of the present Government, have not been so rigid, neither have they been as strictly enforced as the orders which were issued by our predecessors.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think that was before the member for Bothwell came into the Government.

Mr. BOWELL. Perhaps so. It was on the 1st of December, 1877. If the hon. gentleman was not in the Government—

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes, he was.

Mr. BOWELL—at least, he was an energetic supporter of the Government at that time, hence I take it for granted that he approved of their policy. I am not aware of any single act of that Government from 1873 to 1878 that he did not approve of—at least so far as the outside world knew. My only object in rising on this occasion was to set the House right in case there had been any misconception in this matter. I will not discuss the merits of either one Bill or the other—I have my own views upon them, and I think that when the committee meets probably they will obtain information which will show that there are great interests at stake in this country upon the question of wrecking, as well on the part of those who are in the business, as on the part of those who have other interests.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

FRAUDS UPON CHEESE AND BUTTER MANUFACTORIES.

Mr. BURDETT moved second reading of Bill (No. 16) to provide against frauds in the supplying of milk to cheese and butter manufactories.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have on the Order paper a number of Bills affecting more or less the criminal law; the Bill which the hon. gentleman has moved is one, and there are several others. I think amendments to the criminal law is a matter which properly devolves upon the Government, who should take care of legislation of the kind which the hon. gentleman proposes. This Bill, along with some others, deals with a matter that ought to be left to the consideration of a committee of the House, and when these Bills come to a second reading I propose to refer them to a committee, and I propose that the committee shall consist of Messrs. Weldon (St. John), Mills (Bothwell), Langelier (Quebec), Kirkpatrick, Girouard, Moncrieff, Landry, Davies and myself.

Mr. BURDETT. I have no objection to the position taken by the Minister of Justice, but it is desirable to get this Bill through the House during the present Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BURDETT. As the Bill passed by the Ontario Legislature has been declared ultra vires, unless some law is passed the cheese industry, which is a very large and important one, will suffer very materially.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think my hon. friend's name should be added to the committee, and probably also the names of other gentlemen who have Bills on the same subject, for it would be only fair that my hon. friend should have an opportunity of explaining to the committee the reasons why he desires that the provisions contained in that Bill should become law.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The object which the Minister of Justice has in view is to expedite the matter, and get it through. These Bills all affect the criminal law, and the Minister of Justice is primarily responsible to the House and the country for the criminal law legislation. It is, therefore, proposed to have this committee appointed, which has been drawn with some care, and have all the Bills considered so that there will be no conflict with respect to clauses and punishments. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Burdett) should be on the committee as well as any other hon gentleman in charge of a similar Bill, and that they should go with their Bills before the committee, if their names are not already on it.

Mr. BOWELL. Is it not a fact that the Premier of Ontario has given notice of his intention to appeal from the decision given by the courts below? He has declared, I understand from the public journals, that his Act is not ultra vires, that the decisions of the courts are not correct, and he intends to assert the rights of the Province of Ontario in that regard, and to re-enact the law.

Mr. BURDETT. I think, for two reasons, this House ought not to be deterred from taking action in this matter notwithstanding the fact that the Attorney General of Ontario may have made the intimation which the Minister of Customs has stated. The first reason is, that it is doubtful whether there can be an appeal from the decision given. In the second place, if a matter of this character affecting the butter and cheese industry was to be delayed until it could be carried through the different courts, the summer would be wasted and farmers would lose the summer business, by reason of the fact that many of them would not sell their milk to the factories, fearing they will be cheated. It is thus desirable that a Bill should be passed through the House this Session, otherwise great injury will be done to that interest, as I am instructed by those who are most interested in it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have added the names of Mr. Burdett and Mr. Madill to the committee.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

ELEVATORS AND HOISTS.

Mr. MADILL moved second reading of Bill (No. 13) to require the owners of elevators and hoists to guard against accident.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. JAMIESON. In resuming the adjourned debate, I desire to offer a very few remarks in reference to the amendment and the amendment to the amendment proposed to the resolution which I moved a few days ago in this House. I am not at all anxious to enter at any great length on the discussion at this stage, and my sole object at the present time is to lay the issue before the House in order that we may take an intelligent vote upon the question. In the first place we have the resolution which is on the Order paper in favor of the prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors with certain exceptions, and also indicating the lines on which a prohibitory measure should be formed. We have then the amendment of the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) which is simply for the effect so far as I can understand it of sugar coating the question in order that those who have no very strong or fixed opinions on the subject may be enabled to vote upon it. What I want is that we should have a square vote upon the question of prohibition. On a former occasion when a motion of this kind was made in the House we had an amendment much of the same character as that proposed by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood). We had an amendment to the amendment on that occasion also bringing about a square issue upon the question of the liquor traffic. We are not placed in that position to-night, but I trust that the issue shall be thoroughly understood so that hon. members in voting on this question will understand the effect of the vote which they are about to give. For my part, as the mover of this resolution, I cannot accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood). In my judgment it is too much of a milk and water character, and there is more water than milk in it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman object to water?

An hon. MEMBER. He would like it qualified.

Mr. JAMIESON. Water is very well in its own place.

An hon. MEMBER. But not in the stomach.

Mr. JAMIESON. But not in a principle when we are dealing with an important question like this. A word in reference to the amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). It is double barrelled and I cannot accept it in its present shape, neither could I accept it under the present circumstances were the two propositions separated and placed before the House in an independent form. So far as the proposition to submit this question to a plebiscite is concerned, I would remark that the temperance people of this Dominion have had some experience of a proposition of that kind in the past. The largest and most representative body of prohibitionists and temperance workers ever held in the Dominion was held in the city of Montreal in 1875, and the outcome of that convention was that resolutions were adopted asking the Government of the day to submit the question to a plebiscite. These resolutions were carried to the Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) and he took exception to the proposition, as we were afterwards informed, because there was no constitutional precedent for any such thing under the British Crown. Inasmuch as governments are very likely to follow in many respects the precedents set them by a preceding Government I apprehend that we would have a like answer from the present Government should this House accept this proposition. However if the motion for a plebiscite were proposed as a single proposition it would not be objectionable as it is in its present shape, where it is submitted in connection with the question of the compensation of those engaged in the traffic in intoxicating liquors. I am not here to-night to pronounce upon that question and I have no desire to enter into a discussion of it. My judgment is that the question of compensation as has already been decided by this House will more properly come up in connection with any measures that may be submitted to Parliament by the Government of the day for the prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. I trust that all who are in favor of the prohibition of the traffic will vote both against the amendment and the amendment to the amendment and in favor of the main motion which embodies the principles of prohibition pure and simple, and provides that it shall be carried into effect within a reasonable time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Before the question is put I wish to express my views on this question. I am very much in favor of the resolution as moved by the member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), and I am opposed to the amendment, as well as to the amendment to the amendment, on the ground that they are very indefinite in their expressions, and make no provisions for a plebiscite. I think, during the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment to the amendment, that he said the voice of the people might be taken in any way the people pleased: by municipal councils or any other way. If this were done it is certain to my mind that a plebiscite would not be taken at all, and, therefore, we would not get the voice of the people. Another clause in the amendment to the amendment which I cannot support is the one which brings up the question of compensation. It appears that the mover and the seconder do not agree with regard to the meaning of their own amendment. One wishes to compensate those engaged in the manufacture only, and the other wants to compensate all those engaged in the manufacture and sale as well. That is beyond the power of this Government to do. At all events, it involves a complex question; and what we want to-night is to know how many members in the House are favorable to prohibition. If they are favorable to the principle of prohibition, then when an Act is brought down based on that, we will discuss all these questions, and no doubt be led to a wise conclusion. I am under the impression that if a good measure were brought before the country, that the sentiment of the people would be found in support of a reasonable prohibitory bill. As everyone knows, a large proportion of the people of this country has favored even the Scott Act, and the Scott Act is only partially prohibitory, because it is a local option bill, and there are several circumstances which surround it and which prevent it from being so effective as a regular prohibitory measure would be. A measure that will prevent the importation and sale of intoxicants in this country would have a strong and efficient effect in subduing that curse of our country, and we all admit that intoxicating liquor is a curse to this country. We all believe that this is a system of iniquity that should be removed, and we ought to put our wisest judgment together to devise some means by which it can be removed. There is nothing in the amendment objectionable, for we are all in favor of prohibition when the country is ripe for it, but it does not go far enough. I will support the main motion, which, if carried, will lead to a prohibitory law, and oppose the amendment which raises issues which I am not able to decide upon until the Bill comes before the House.

House divided on amendment to amendment (Mr. Taylor) :

That all the words of the amendment be struck out, and also all the words in the main motion after the word "purposes," and the following substituted therefor:—"If it be found on a vote of the qualified electors of the Dominion having first been taken and a majority thereof are in favor of a prohibition law which shall also make full provision for compensating those engaged in the manufacture of such liquors."

Amendment negatived.

Mr. HOLTON. I notice that the hon. senior member for Halifax did not vote.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I am paired with Mr. Carling.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before the amendment is put I beg to move in amendment to it, that the following words be added:—

And that a vote of the qualified electors of Canada be taken at a convenient time to ascertain the opinion of the country upon the question.

He said: It seems to me that the proposition contained in the amendment, that such a measure is necessary as soon as public opinion will support it, is not a fair proposition. We want to know what the public opinion on the question is, and in order to ascertain that, it is necessary that a vote should be had. I quite admit that on the great majority of public questions it is desirable that Parliament itself should assume the responsibility of legislation; but Parliament has already pronounced its opinion that prohibition legislation is desirable, but it has said that, in its opinion, public opinion is not prepared for it. That may be the opinion of some hon. members of this House; but it is possible to settle that question, and to ascertain what public opinion is beyond all controversy, by taking a vote of those qualified to vote at an ordinary election. Then, when the House shall have ascertained by a vote taken at a convenient time, when it can be done without seriously interfering with the industries of the country, we shall know what the public opinion is; and if it is found ready to sustain prohibition legislation, we shall be prepared to legislate in accordance therewith.

Mr. CASEY. I cannot altogether agree with my hon. friend who has just sat down. I quite agree with the proposition contained in the amendment offered by my hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Wood) that prohibition might properly be enforced as soon as public opinion were ripe for it; but I question whether you could ascertain by a plebiscite such as is proposed by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) whether public opinion were ripe or not. We have had local plebiscites in many counties upon the Scott Act. In my own county, for example, that law was carried by a tremendous majority, between 700 and 800, and in spite of that fact it has been found impossible to efficiently enforce it, notwithstanding the best efforts of everybody concerned. Now, I beg leave to suggest the fear that, even though a majority of the duly qualified electors of Canada, were found to be in favor of the enforcement of total prohibition, it might be impossible to carry it into effect, as it has been locally in the case of the Scott Act. Now there is a difference as to ease of enforcement between a general act and a local one like the Scott Act; but the great difficulty, would be the same in both cases, the difficulty amounting to an impossibility almost, of obtaining satisfactory evidence to prove infraction of the law, and getting the general support of the public in carrying it out. I believe these objections are so serious that it will be assuming a tremendous risk, even if we find a majority of the duly qualified electors voting for it, to attempt to enforce prohibition. It might be, as has been the case in many counties in which the Scott Act has passed, that a large majority would be in favor of it one year and the next in favor of repealing it. I think it would be a serious blunder to make this experiment of general prohibition unless we were absolutely certain, that not only the majority of the electors were in favor of it in a theoretical way, but such a mass of public opinion as would enable the Act to be carried out after its passage. I believe the only way in which we can ascertain whether that can be done is the ordinary way in which a member ascertains the feelings of his constituents about other questions; and I see no reason for changing our mode of procedure with regard to prohibition any more than with regard to other matters. I shall therefore vote against the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell, and in the future I shall endeavor to ascertain in the best way I can whether the sentiment of my constituency is in favor of total prohibition or not, and such as to secure its enforcement if passed.

Mr. FREEMAN. It is evident that all those amendments are moved with a view of defeating the motion upon which we are called on to pronounce. The movers of these amendments can have no other object in view. We have here a square resolution for prohibition, and I hold that it is a question of so much importance that it does not become this House, from its practice in the past, to ask whether the country is prepared for it or not. A few nights ago we had a question before this House with respect to one item among hundreds in the tariff; and this House spent two sittings in considering that question, and I presume that those hon. gentlemen who are opposed to a prohibitory measure thought that that time was well consumed. When to-night we ask to have discussed a question of greater moment than any question that has ever come before this House, hon. gentlemen are uneasy. They think we should not come here again because we discussed this question two years ago. I hold that it is unbecoming of the members of this House to refuse to listen or take part in the discussion of this question. To ascertain whether the country is ripe for a question that comes before this House in not the practice of the House. Last Session a measure was introduced into the Senate to prohibit the bucket shop business. The country was not asked whether it was ready for that measure or not; there had been no expression of public opinion upon it; but the one consideration pressed upon the House was this: Is it for the benefit of the country that this measure should be passed? Will it be promoting the best interests of the country that the bucket shop business should be suppressed? It was not asked that there should be a vote of the people taken to ascertain whether they wanted bucket shops or not. The Parliament of the country decided the bucket shop business was injurious to our best interests, and that it was their duty to legislate it out of existence, and they did so. I think this liquor traffic is injurious to the best interests of the country, and I defy any hon. gentleman to stand up in his place here and show me one good that comes from it. I defy him to show me one advantage we derive from it. I defy him to show me one man made better by it. And I hold that as men sitting here, holding the future of the country in our hands, as it were, sent here to legislate for the benefit of the people, we should not treat this matter as lightly as we have been in the habit of treating it. And I ask hon. gentlemen whether in their consciences they dare to regard this as other than a matter of vital importance. Take the statistics of crime that were published in the newspapers a few days ago, and then tell me whether the liquor traffic is of any benefit. One-third of the cases in the police courts arose out of drunkenness. Was that a benefit to the country? A few nights ago, we had a discussion here with regard to the cost of the penitentiaries. Well, if you will give us a prohibitory law, we will reduce by one-third, at all events by one-third, the cost of your penitentiaries, the cost of your gaols, the cost of your police. We will lessen the cost of putting down crime and of sustaining good order by two-thirds; and unless it can be shown that the liquor trade gives us some offset to this, some compensating benefit, I hold it is our duty to pass a prohibitory law. It is said, and I believe the statistics prove it, that to-day there are half a million families in the United Kingdom of Great Britain who know nothing about home comfort. They know nothing about home happiness; everything that makes a home a place dear to the human heart, is unknown to them. What is the cause of that? The liquor traffic. The liquor traffic produces everywhere the same results. How many miserable families are there in Ottawa, made miserable through the liquor traffic? How many men in the penitentiary to-day who have reached there through the liquor traffic? How many destitute children in Ottawa made destitute through the liquor traffic? How many men whose lives have been wasted, men of great, noble, shining talents, whose talents have been lost to the country because of the liquor traffic? How many young people growing up to-day in this Dominion on the way to be drunkards, pursuing a course which must of necessity lead them to be drunkards, through the liquor traffic? I say, therefore, this House is in duty bound to vote for a prohibitory law. I know full well, and this country knows full well, that there is an adverse majority in this House against the Bill; and I feel great embarrassment when I speak on this subject before hon. members, knowing that a number of them are opposed to this prohibitory measure. The advocates of prohibition are in a great minority to-day, but the country is looking on. In 1874, petitions were presented to this House containing about 10,000 names, asking for a prohibitory law, these names representing 59,000 inhabitants. To-day that 10,000 has been multiplied very largely. I will not say just what number, but I say that 10,000 has been multiplied very largely, and the multiplication is going on. The principle of prohibition was recognised in the House at the time. We were told that we would have a stepping stone to prohibition. We were told that Parliament would give the Scott Act, and that from the Scott Act the step would be easy to prohibition. But we are told to-day by the opponents of the Scott Act, by the friends of the liquor traffic, that the Scott Act has failed. Well, if the Scott Act has failed, give us a full measure of prohibition—the principle which you recognised in 1874. The House is bound, if the Scott Act has failed, to give us something that will in some measure put down this terrible evil, some measure that will answer the purposes of prohibition. Some hon. gentlemen ask for compensation. Compensation for what? I would like to ask hon. members who voted for compensation, who is it who deserve compensation? I believe it is not disputed, that, in business, anything that disturbs the peace and harmony of the people, anything that is injurious to the commerce of the country, and to the good order and well-being of the Government, is a nuisance. We have proved, time and again, that this liquor traffic is an injury to the peace and happiness of the people and therefore a nuisance; and yet we are asked to give the men who have inflicted this nuisance on the Dominion, compensation for not being allowed to continue the evil. Is that the principle which is to be recognised by this House? I say we are willing to share compensation with you—compensation for the families ruined, compensation for the poverty and distress brought upon the country, compensation for all the property which the liquor traffic has taken out of the hands of those who were deluded by it, compensation for the outlay of this country on reformatories, gaols and prisons—compensate us for all these things, and then we will compensate the liquor sellers for the loss of their custom and business. Compensation is a thing which the people of this country will never agree to.

An hon. MEMBER. Amen.

Mr. FREEMAN. No doubt the hon. gentleman who said "amen" is a teetotaler. I hope I am right. If he would practise teetotalism, he would utter his amens in some other place than the House of Commons, I am sure. Now, while I vote for prohibition pure and simple, and that is my motto, and I am happy to say it is the motto of a majority of the people in my own Province. I have been forced out of the contention that I have made in my own Province that this country is ripe for prohibition. If I take the representatives of the people here as fairly representing their constituents in this great question in Ontario and Quebec, I am compelled to the conclusion that the people of these two upper Provinces are not ready for prohibition. In my Province, I believe a large and overwhelming majority of the people would to-day vote for prohibition, and I should be pleased if the vote were to be taken in my own Province, and I believe in the Maritime Provinces generally. If the question of prohibition could be left to the Provinces bordering on the sea, I am satisfied that in less than 12 months hence we would have a prohibitory law in those Provinces, and the people favoring it would be able to enforce it thoroughly. But I am not so sure, and my hopes fail me, when you put it to the whole Dominion of Canada. I feel, therefore, in duty bound to my convictions and to my conscience to vote for nothing but the pure and simple, clear and distinct question. Shall we have prohibition or shall we not? I shall vote for the prohibitory measure.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I desire to make a few observations on this question, although, by my arrangements with Mr. Carling, I cannot vote on it to-night. I was rather surprised at the observations made by the hon. member for Queen's, N. S. (Mr. Freeman), because I think the hon. member should be aware, and doubtless is aware, that the temperance bodies of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick presented petitions to this House last Session, asking for the passage of an Act similar to the proposition embodied in the amendment to the amendment now before the House. The temperance bodies of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and New Brunswick presented petitions to the Minister of Finance of that day, asking that the temperance question should be submitted to the people of the Dominion at a proper time, and that the result, if it were favorable to their views, should be embodied in the legislation of the country. I think, therefore, the hon. member is mistaken in the views he takes of the public sentiment in his own Province. They may, or may not be in a majority in that Province. I am not prepared to express an opinion on that, though I am prepared to state that I entertain a very moderate difference of opinion with the hon. gentleman as to the extent of public opinion in that Province on the subject. Be that as it may, and it is not material at present, if the temperance organisations in that Province asked that the question should be submitted to the people of the Dominion, and that their verdict should be embodied in the legislation of the country, I think the hon. gentleman is hardly consistent in opposing the resolution of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I think, it is very desirable that we should know to what extent the public opinion of this Dominion favors prohibition. We have had that question brought forward at different times under different circumstances, and it has been said, though I do not say it was the case, that it has been brought here for party purposes alone, and that many votes have been given in this House on the merits of the question itself which did not fairly reflect the opinion of the hon. members who gave those votes. Be that as it may, this question would be set at rest in a fair and proper manner if the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) should meet the approval of the House to-night. We are anxious to know how far public opinion would favor prohibition in this country, and having once ascertained the strength of the hold it has on the country, the Government of the day, whether Conservative or Liberal, would be bound to respect the verdict of the country taken in that way. For that reason I should strongly favor the amendment to the amendment, because I believe it would be a most satisfactory way of settling a question which is a very difficult one, as we all admit, a question which it is very desirable should be settled on the basis of intelligent public opinion, which can only be ascertained by going to the people themselves. For that reason I hope the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will be passed.

Mr. TAYLOR. I stated my views fully when I moved the amendment to the amendment which has just been voted down. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) differs from mine in this respect, that it does not carry with it compensation to the manufacturers. Now I believe that, if this question is ever submitted to the electorate of this country at all, it should be submitted having in view the legislation which is to follow it. I stated before that I would yield to no man in regard to my temperance views, but I believe in dealing fairly with those who are engaged in the manufacture of liquors, who have been so engaged ever since we had a Province of Canada, who have been co-partners with the Governments that have been in power all that time, and so have built up these industries. It would be unfair for the temperance people to say to these men to-morrow: You must close up your factories that have been built up under the different Governments of this country. Therefore, if the temperance people desire to act fairly, they should, when they submit this question to the people, propose compensation to these men, so that, no matter what Government may be in power, that Government will make compensation to those who are engaged in the manufacture of liquor. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) voted against my resolution, and I must differ with him in regard to his. My views are that we should vote on a fair and square issue and that, if the people are prepared to carry prohibition, they should carry compensation along with it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not vote against the hon. gentleman's proposition because I thought the parties were not entitled to compensation, but because I do not think that is a proper question to refer to a plébiscite.

Mr. TAYLOR. Let us go fairly before the people so that they may not afterwards say this is going to cost too much. Let them, when they vote for prohibition, vote for the expenses necessary to carry it out.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I cannot vote for the amendment proposed by hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) because I am on principle opposed to the agitation of this question before the country. I voted for the amendment just now, although I did not like the part of it which proposed to provide compensation, but in order to defeat the main motion, and because there is in that amendment a strong restriction as to compensation to manufacturers of liquor, a restriction which provides that this compensation shall be paid only when the principle is adopted by the electors. But I have no fear that the electors of this country would adopt such a measure. I am prepared to vote for all amendments that tend to defeat the main motion, because I think it unnecessary and useless to agitate this question, either in this House or in the country.

Mr. KIRK. For the very same reason given by the hon. gentleman which has just taken his seat I, too, intend to vote against every amendment which has been offered.

It appears to me that the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Queen's, so far as the feelings of the people of Nova Scotia are concerned, the Province from which we both come are very nearly correct. I think that I can endorse every word he says in regard to that sentiment. We have very good evidence of the state of feeling in that Province from the fact that although we have a very stringent license law in Nova Scotia, there is not a single county in the Province in which a license exists to-day or the sale of intoxicating liquors by retail, except in the city and county of Halifax. I think there cannot be a better evidence of the fact that the people of Nova Scotia are prepared for prohibition pure and simple, and prepared for it now. For that reason I shall vote for the resolution and against every amendment which has been placed in your hands, to defeat the object which the resolution has in view.

Mr. BERGIN. I cannot see the necessity for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I think all must be blind who cannot see that public opinion is strong at the present moment against prohibition in this country. The general elections showed to every member of this House how the public pulse beat in his county. I know that in my county, and in the counties adjoining, the prohibition question and the Scott Act question—practically the same—were strongly urged by the temperance people against my election and against the election of my colleagues, but we succeeded by large majorities. Since then we have had throughout the Province votes upon the repeal of the Canada Temperance Act, and in every county that Act, after a fair trial, so far as the temperance people were concerned, was overwhelmingly defeated and consequently repealed. Now, the general elections throughout the Dominion, and the Scott Act elections, have proved to a demonstration that there is no strong feeling for prohibition in this country, and that we would be putting the country to a very large expense, to a very great inconvenience, and to a very great loss, by taking the people from their labor to vote upon this question because, forsooth, some people who do not like to vote fairly and squarely against prohibition, desire to dodge it by calling for a plebiscite. We desire nothing of the kind. When the time comes that the people of this country demand prohibition, as shown by their votes at general elections, I shall be prepared to vote for it. I am willing to go further, and to say that I believe prohibition is the only cure for drunkenness, but I do not believe that it is practicable, or that it can ever be carried out. We must resort to a good license law, and a good license law properly enforced, will, I believe, lessen drunkenness in this country and lessen the evil effects of it. And whilst I speak of the evil effects of drunkenness, let me say that to the temperance people of this country more than to any other class, is it due that drunkenness has been in excess during the last few years. During the time that the Scott Act was in force we had, as we are told by reference to the statistics of the country, little or no crime in comparison with the crime before and since that period. Why, Sir, there were few or no convictions for crime, caused by drink, during the period of the Scott Act. It is notorious that in every county where the Scott Act was in force, the policy of the temperance men, or the so-called temperance men—for the majority of them were not sincere—was to show to the people of this country that there was little or no crime, that crime had decreased, that drunkenness had decreased, and as a consequence it was almost impossible to get a conviction, and indeed it was almost impossible to secure the arrest of any man, or bring him before a police magistrate, during the existence of the Canada Temperance Act. But the Canada Temperance Act had not been repealed a day till every poor wretch who happened to take a glass was hauled up before the police magistrate and fined; and now they point to the increase of convictions since that Act was repealed. It is this dishonesty, it is this intemperance on the part of men who have been leading agitators in the different counties, that have done the temperance cause so much harm, and it has a great deal to do with the want of success in that cause. Men like myself, who are total abstainers, but who do not feel that it is part of our mission to take our neighbors by the throat and prevent them from taking that which they honestly think they have a right to take—feel that it is this intemperance on the part of temperance agitators which has prevented the success of a license law in this country. And the Scott Act has done much in another direction to injure the temperance cause. It has led to the opening everywhere of unlicensed shops and unlicensed taverns that demoralise the public sentiment; and to-day, in every county where the Scott Act has been in force, we have a large number of this sort of grogeries, and, as a consequence, more or less drunkenness, although the number is gradually diminishing, I am happy to say, and with the enforcement of a license law I am sure it will continue to diminish until we have a comparatively happy state of affairs, such as we had before the initiation of the Canada Temperance Act. Still, we are suffering from the evil effects of it to-day. I yield to no man in this House in my temperance principles, but I rise in my place to protest against this thing being brought up Session after Session, until we have some evidence that the people of this country call for such legislation.

Mr. SCRIVER. Before this question is submitted to a vote, I desire to say a word or two. I do not see for my part how the temperance men of this House can do anything else but vote against any amendment to the broad resolution moved by the hon. member for North Lark (Mr. Jamieson). In all the public representative gatherings of temperance men at which I have been present, or taken a part in, or of the proceedings of which I have read an account, this question of submitting the advisability of having a prohibitory law to a plebiscite of the people, has never been raised, and has never been entertained for a moment. The temperance men have taken the ground that public sentiment is ripe for such a law, at all events that the representatives of the people assembled in Parliament should pass such a law. They have taken that position for a long time past. I do not see how they can consistently take any other position than that. For my own part, while I admit there is a certain plausibility in the motion, representing that it would be advisable to ascertain public sentiment with regard to this matter, I must say that I doubt whether any practical good would result from it. I believe in the educational influences of a prohibitory law, and upon that ground, as well as upon the ground that it is right and proper such legislation should be enacted, I think temperance men can do nothing else than vote directly and squarely in favor of the immediate enactment of a prohibitory law. That is my position, at all events.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). It is not my intention to detain the House at any length on this subject. I was somewhat surprised at my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) proposing the amendment to the amendment now before the House. No man in this House knows better than he does, few know as well, that the method he proposes for eliciting the opinion of the people upon this subject is one which is if not unconstitutional, I do not think it is unconstitutional, is at all events opposed to our system of legislation. We never since the period of Confederation, I do not believe in any one of the Provinces before Confederation—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Scott Act.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). We have never submitted in advance to the people the question whether they wish legislation of a certain character to be adopted by this House, we have never tried to ascertain the views of the people by means of a plebiscite. That is a system which is in vogue in the country to the south of us, one which is a part, I may say, of their constitution, almost every amendment to their constitution being first submitted to the people. As I understand it, we elicit the opinion of the people upon all public questions by having them submitted at the time the representatives of this Parliament go to their constituents. That is the constitutional method of eliciting public opinion upon any question that is likely to come before this Parliament. No man knows this better than the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and I am surprised, as I have said before, that he should have proposed this as a measure for eliciting the opinion of the people. Suppose that a vote of the people was taken upon this point in the manner proposed. Suppose that Ontario carried it by a majority and Quebec did not carry it by a majority, that New Brunswick carried it by a majority and Nova Scotia did not carry it by a majority, would we in this Parliament, in the face of such a state of things, in the face of such an expression of opinion, be justified in passing a prohibitory liquor law for the people of the whole Dominion, legislating as we are here for the whole Dominion, for all the Provinces, and not for any one Province in particular? For that reason, among other reasons, I am opposed to the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I am opposed also to that amendment because it does not carry with it the principle of compensation. As the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has said, and said truly, for years past, ever since we were a country, so to speak, we have licensed breweries and distilleries for the manufacture of liquor, ale and beer. We have derived large revenues from both institutions. We have got the money from the brewers and distillers and it has become a part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Portions of it have gone into our public works, and it can be truly said that to that extent we have been partners in the traffic. Rightly or wrongly, we have taken this money, and have encouraged them also by licensing them and taking their money for the manufacture of liquor, however objectionable that may be. I am not going to say one word against prohibition. I believe every honest man will be glad when the day comes that public sentiment is ripe for the reception and proper enforcement of prohibition. I believe there is no man if he is honest with himself, whether he believes in the principle or not as an abstract question, but will be glad if the time should arrive when the public sentiment of the country would welcome any measure that would do away with the evils of intemperance. But we have had during the past two or three years an experience we have never had before, at all events, in Ontario. We have had an experience here of a measure very prohibitory in its character—the Scott Act. I believe the effect of that Act has been to retard the progress of true temperance in a great many parts of the country. In the face of that, I can say safely to this House that any man desiring to see prohibition does not desire to see it until the time does arrive when the public sentiment of the country will be not only ripe for its reception but for its enforcement, as is embodied in the amendment I have moved. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), from his place during last Session of Parliament, drew an analogy which to my mind was complete, when speaking on this subject, or a subject very similar. He said it was not alone a question as to whether the people voted for or whether they were fit for the reception of the measure, but it was a question also whether the people were fit for the enforcement of it. That is a very important point to consider in connection with this whole question. It may be said, it has been said, that because there are violations of the criminal law in this country and of other laws, that therefore nothing could be said against the Scott Act or a prohibitory liquor law if there were violations of those laws. The analogy is not complete. The public sentiment of the country, the moral sentiment of the country is at the back of the police force in enforcing all infringements of the criminal law. But the moral sentiment of the country is not at the back of the police force or of liquor inspectors in endeavoring to enforce a prohibitory liquor law or the Scott Act, and until the time arrives when the moral sentiment, the honest public sentiment, is just as anxious and willing to assist the officers of the law in punishing any violations of a prohibitory law, equally as they are ready to enforce other laws made criminal, it never will be a success. For these reasons I believe the amendment I proposed and to which I have referred is a proper amendment for this House to adopt.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that his leader just voted for a plebiscite.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I did not.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). I do not think I would have offered any observations on the question before the House had it not been for a statement made by the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin). I utterly object, as a representative on the floor of this House, that the statement should go abroad that if no great progress has been made, as is asserted by that hon. gentleman, by the temperance cause during the last few years, the fault lies with the temperance people. I entirely object to that statement, and I would not have risen to say anything except for the fact that the hon. gentleman made that assertion, and made it very strongly indeed. I do not know but that the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has, in effect, made the same statement. I believe that if there has been a slow growth of temperance sentiment in this Dominion for the last two or three years, it is not the fault of the temperance people; but it is due rather to the exertions made by those opposed to temperance sentiment for the purpose of preventing that sentiment prevailing in this country, because the temperance sentiment is endeavoring to make strides forward and to enforce the law has been strenuously opposed by the liquor interest by all means in its power. When it is said that the moral sentiment of this country is not behind the police force in carrying out the law, I believe that is not a proper statement. I am satisfied the moral sentiment, or at all events a very large proportion of it, is behind the officers in carrying out even the Scott Act; but while that is true, and while the moral sentiment is quite strong, yet we find perhaps that the interested sentiment, the pecuniary interests of the persons engaged in the liquor traffic is somewhat stronger than the moral sentiment put forward, and, therefore, the moral sentiment has been checked. The moral sentiment having to oppose the liquor interest has, perhaps tired too soon of conducting prosecutions under the Scott Act, in trying to carry out the law; and the pecuniary interest has proved much stronger and has not been forced back from the fact of its being a pecuniary interest. They who opposed the carrying out of the laws felt that they would profit if they could eventually prevent the carrying out of the Scott Act or any other prohibitory law. What has been the great argument used by the opponents of the Scott Act wherever it has been in force? The greatest argument in our Province was that, if it was a general prohibitory law all over the Dominion a large number would support it, while they did not feel bound to support the Scott Act because it was only partially prohibitory. If it was a general prohibitory law which the Government would feel bound to carry out the sentiment of the people was that they would give it their moral and active support. A portion of the same people who made use of this argument then, now hold that as the Scott Act has to some extent been a failure and has not met the entire expectations of those who wished to see that Act in force, so a prohibitory law would not be successful. That is the sentiment of some of the people, but for my part I am in hopes that a prohibitory law would be successful if carried out. While I am not prepared to say whether it would be successful or not I believe the principle to be a correct one, and believing the principle of prohibition to be correct I am here as the representative of a constituency in this Dominion to vote in favor of that principle which I think is correct. I am here to record my vote, if it be any example to the people I represent, in favor of prohibition. The amendment submitted to this House is a very plausible one, but I shall feel it my duty to vote against it and against every amendment that may be proposed which will prevent a direct vote on prohibition, because I feel that any such amendment is an impedient put in the way of arriving at the point which we are discussing and on which I at any rate desire to vote.

Mr. JAMIESON. With reference to the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) I must say that at first, when the proposition was submitted by him, it seemed to me not to be an unfair proposition. However, on reflection, I have come to the conclusion that the better course for those who favor prohibition will be to vote squarely on the resolution and against all the amendments. I think that the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) is quite correct in reference to the position taken by the temperance men of the Dominion on this question. I quite agree with him that since 1875, at all events, I have not heard the question of a plebiscite mooted in any temperance body. It seems a fair proposition that the sentiment of the people should be taken on a law of this kind, but while I do not agree with all that has been said by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) I agree with him to this extent, that a plebiscite is not a usual course to adopt in this country. I have a word to say in reference to the position taken by my hon. friend from Cornwall (Mr. Bergin). My hon. friend is, I fear, backsliding somewhat on this question. If I recollect correctly sometime ago he was an ardent prohibitionist, but his opinions seem to have changed on this question. I am not here to charge that he is acting dishonestly, for I believe he is above that, but just take one of the united counties which my friend represents and I believe that the county council have sent to this House a petition in favor of prohibition and I am glad to say it was presented by my hon. friend. That would indicate at all events that he does not represent the sentiment of his constituents on this particular question. In addition to that my hon. friend has taken me to task because we have been introducing figures here which have gone to show that drunkenness and the punishment of drunkenness have increased since the Scott Act has been repealed in several counties of this Province. I am not aware that figures of that kind have been presented to this House. Although I used figures to make a comparison between the state of public morals before the Scott Act was in force and the state of public morals during the time the Scott Act was in force, I used no figures of the character referred to by the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin).

Mr. BERGIN. I said figures were used before and since, by temperance people. I did not say that the member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) was the whole temperance party, or that he used all the figures.

Mr. JAMIESON. Probably my hon. friend is correct in saying that parties have used these figures, and in my judgment perhaps very correctly. So far as public sentiment is concerned upon this question, I may say that I believe it is our duty if we deem a law correct in principle to pass that law, to use that law as an educator and to bring public sentiment up to the support of such a law. I believe that if this House was to pass a prohibitory law to-morrow the public sentiment of this country would support such a law, and we in this House at all events reflect the public sentiment of the country to a large extent. I believe it is our duty to ascertain if the principle is correct, and if the principle is found to be correct we should crystallise it into the statute law of the country. Then when that is done let us by every reasonable and proper means in our power endeavor to enforce that law, if it be in the interest of the public at large to do so. After giving the matter mature reflection I have decided to vote against all the amendments and in favor of the original resolution. As the mover of this resolution I am glad that it has brought about a very general discussion on this question which will do good in the future. I am not so unreasonable as to say that we ought to force our opinions on the people, for I believe, as a deliberative body, it is our duty to canvass every measure submitted to this House, and to give it a fair and reasonable consideration. In my judgment it is in the interest of the people that we should support this motion, and I trust that the hon. members of this House will take the same view.

Mr. EDWARDS. I am a temperance man, but one of those temperance men who is going to vote for the amendment of the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I do so because I believe that legislation of this kind should not be carried in this country adverse to the sentiments of the majority of the people. I will give the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) a practical illustration in my own case of the fact that in some degree, at all events, a vote of this House does not represent fully the sentiment of the people. I am a temperance man, and have voted and will vote for every resolution in favor of temperance. I do so because I believe there is no measure that would be so greatly in the interest of this country as a prohibitory measure; but I also believe that this country is not ripe for prohibition, and I will give you an illustration in my own experience. I represent a county which, with the county of Prescott, gave an anti-Scott Act majority of 2,000. Now, do I represent the people of my constituency when I get up here and vote for prohibition? I say I do not. Now, I am going to support the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Bothwell and, at the same time, if the main resolution comes to a vote, I will vote for it. The hon. member for Brockville said that a prohibitory liquor Act would be a very queer piece of legislation for this House to adopt, if there were a majority for it in Ontario and a majority against it in Quebec. Is not all our legislation legislation of that kind? Are there not many measures adopted in this country which if left to single Provinces would be rejected? Furthermore, I believe in being governed by majorities. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been sent here by the people to enact certain measures, and it is perfectly right that they should carry them into effect. But this question of temperance is one that has not been referred to the people, or that the members of this House are sent to vote upon at all. I am a temperance man, but not a temperance crank, and I do not believe in bothering this House with this question every Session. Let it be threshed out in one Session of each Parliament; that is sufficient; we do not require to vote on it every Session. I will vote for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bothwell, because I think we should not legislate in advance of the sentiment of the people, and the only way to arrive fairly and squarely at a decision is to let the entire people vote upon the question.

Amendment to the amendment negatived.

Mr. LABELLE. I noticed that the hon. member for Northumberland is in his seat and has not voted.

Mr. MITCHELL. I can only say that if I had been free to vote I should have voted for the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell; but as I have been paired with Sir Adolphe Caron, I could not do so.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Before the amendment is put, I would like to address a few words to this House. The motions before the House on this occasion are practically repetitions of the motions we had two years ago. The main motion we had then was framed in similar terms to the one we have before us now, and an amendment was moved to the effect:

"That this House, while admitting that brady, gin, whiskey and other alcoholic liquors might be prohibited, is of opinion, that the dealing in and sale of ale, porter, lager beer, cider, claret and other light wines should be exempted from the operation of the Canada Temperance Act."

That motion was defeated. That was a motion made for the purpose directly of amending the Scott Act, and was in effect that wherever the Scott Act had been passed by the people, light wines, cider and beer should not come within the operation of the Act, and the vote against that amendment was absolutely a vote against an amendment of the Scott Act to that effect. I also voted for a measure of prohibition the same as I intend to do to-day, if the House will permit me; but hon. members must know that there are two things, at any rate, which this House has not been in favor of so far. It has not been in favor of a vote of the people being taken when the question of compensation to manufacturers accompanies the question of prohibition, and it is also not in favor of a vote being taken at present on the question of prohibition. I voted for the amendment that the vote of the people should be taken in each of those instances, because I believe it is the people who should have the final say in this matter. However, this temperance question is not a new one, and if the personnel of this Parliament is any reflection of the opinions of the electorate of this country, it is evident the electorate are not in favor of prohibition just now. In addition to what I said a moment ago in reference to our Parliament being a reflection of the opinions of the people, let me call the attention of this House to the results of votes taken upon the Scott Act in 1888 in different counties. I see by the returns from the Secretary of State that there were twelve elections in 1888 for the purpose of considering the advisability of repealing the Scott Act. In eleven of these the Scott Act was directly defeated. In the other the old Dunkin Act was sustained, and in every one of those elections, except the one in which the Dunkin Act was sustained, the people repealed the Scott Act by large majorities. There is not one instance last year of the question being submitted to the people for the repeal of the Scott Act in which they did not repeal it by large majorities. In Arthabaska, Quebec, the majority against the Scott Act was 228; in Bruce, Ontario, 1,392; in Dufferin, Ontario, 213; in Halton, 197; in Huron, 1,310; in Norfolk, 722; in Stanstead, 142; in Simcoe, 3,102; in Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry, 2,143. That is evidently an expression showing that the people in all those counties were dissatisfied with the Scott Act. We have had an expression of opinion in the House to-day by the hon. member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Freeman), which may be the reflection also of the opinions of a number of his supporters on this particular question, and he stated that he would vote for nothing except prohibition pure and simple. Well, I agree with the hon. gentleman that he has the right to vote for prohibition pure and simple. I intend to do the same on this occasion. I am in favor of any legislation that will promote the interests of temperance; but at the same time I believe that progress is generally accomplished piece by piece, and that when people cannot obtain everything desired—total prohibition either with or without compensation—they should, if there is a midway, give that a trial. I will not take up the time of the House in discussing the advisability of light wines, beer and cider being drunk to the exclusion of strong liquor. That subject was very fully discussed in 1887. I would much prefer seeing the people indulge in nothing else but cider, light wines and beer, than have them indulge in the strong beverages that do so much harm. And I am sure every temperance advocate will be of the same opinion. There may be in this country counties where the Scott Act would not be carried, and yet the people of such counties might be in favor of the use of light wines, beer and cider under a license system. I know I shall be met at once by the objections of one or two temperance people, that it is all nonsense to try and sell light wines, beer and cider alone, and that in such case all other liquors will be sold at the bar. If it is true that intoxicating liquors are sold in the counties where the Scott Act is in force, it cannot be much worse to try the experiment of light wines and beer. I intend submitting to the House a resolution to the effect that when the Scott Act is being voted upon, the electorate will have the choice of three alternatives. One, to vote for the second part of the Act just as it is; the other, against the Act in toto; the third, for an Act prohibiting the sale of all intoxicating liquors with the exception of light wines, beer and cider. And if the people chose to carry the Act, excluding from its operation light wines, beer and cider, it is possible in those 11 counties I have just read to you, many of them would have taken the alternative. I intend to move, therefore:

That all the words after "that" in the amendment be struck out and the following substituted:—

That inasmuch as the result of recent votes taken under the Canada Temperance Act have been in favor of repeal, and inasmuch as the electors of some counties in Canada may be in favor of a license system for the sale of cider, light wines and beer only,

Be it resolved that, in the opinion of this House, the said Act should be amended so that, upon any vote of the electorate being taken under the Act, either for its adoption or its repeal, it shall be competent for the electors to vote on any one of the three following alternatives:—

1. Either for the Act; or
2. For the Act limiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, but excepting cider, light wines and beer from the operation thereof; or
3. Against the Act.

If this amendment should be defeated, I still reserve my right, and I will vote on the main question in favor of prohibition.

Mr. LISTER. That is not an amendment to this motion.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I anticipated that such an objection might be raised, but I find that, in the last Parliament, when this question came up, and the same resolution was moved by the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), Mr. Girouard moved in amendment that the Scott Act should be amended by exempting beer, cider and claret, and other light wines. A suggestion was made to the Speaker that that was not a proper amendment to the motion, and the Speaker ruled that it was in order, and the question was voted upon on that occasion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That amendment is not in order. It is not germane to the motion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think myself, it is not relevant to the proposition now before the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It might be a very proper motion to make, in order to amend the Scott Act, and to give an opportunity of voting for an intermediate proposition, but that is not a question now before us, and cannot be dealt with on the motion now before the House.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I have sent you down the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The objection may not have been raised upon that occasion.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. The objection was raised, and the Speaker ruled the amendment was in order.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Moncrieff) ruled out of order, and question put on the amendment (Mr. Wood, Brockville.)

Mr. FISHER. We have already had one or two amendments before the House upon which votes have been taken, and perhaps it has been observed that those who were responsible for the original motion proposed by the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) and seconded by myself have voted consistently against all amendments that have been proposed. It was necessary for us to take that course, after having, with due deliberation and consultation with the temperance bodies of the country, adopted the course we had. We conceive it to be our duty, as well as to be in the truest interests of the cause of temperance, to get the resolution in its entirety, as we proposed it, adopted by the House. In pursuance of that view, we voted against the amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and against the second amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and now we have come to the amendment itself. I would rather, on some grounds, have supported the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell, but, believing it necessary to come to a straight vote on the original motion, I deemed it my duty to vote against that amendment, and I see no course open to me, or to those who wish to see the original motion carried, other than to vote against the amendment of the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood). If that amendment should carry, I consider it would practically nullify all the good that would arise from the adoption of the original motion. It is in the memory of many of us that, in 1884, practically the same motion which is now before the House was made, and an amendment was moved which was practically, though not exactly in the words and form, the same as that of the hon. member for Brockville. If we are not to advance one step beyond that motion in the course of four years, I think we must consider that the temperance cause has stood still. I am not prepared to believe that that is so, or to support any motion which would lead the country to believe that such is the case. I, therefore, consider that the test vote on the temperance question must be taken on the amendment of the hon. member for Brockville. If that carries, and it may carry, it will practically nullify the original motion. We have already had such a motion carried, and now the temperance people want something more. For this House to reaffirm that motion of 1884 would be of no avail, and this House would be wanting in dignity to so act. If that resolution meant anything, the House, and the Government having the confidence of the House, ought to have acted upon the resolution. If it meant nothing, there is no reason for us to adopt it in any shape. I, therefore, call upon those who are desirous to see the temperance cause advanced and to see the original motion proposed by my hon. friend from North Lanark adopted, to vote against this amendment, and I tell them that they will be judged by the temperance people of this country according to the votes which they give on that amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. FISHER. The right hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." He knows perfectly well that in 1884 the temperance people of this country did not accept the vote of those who voted for the resolution of my hon. friend who sits opposite me, as it was amended by the amendment of Mr. White, at that time member for Cardwell—I say they did not accept the votes of those who voted for that amendment as being in favor of the cause of temperance. The right hon. gentleman knows it very well, and I can tell him, if he does not know it now, that the temperance men will take the same view now, and they will not accept the votes of those who are in favor of the resolution of the hon. gentleman for Brockville (Mr. Wood) as being votes in favor of the cause of temperance.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yesterday, before adjournment, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) asked what we were going on with to-morrow, and the answer given was that we will go on with Supply early. Subsequently a communication passed between the hon. gentleman and the Minister of Finance, in which it was stated that the Opposition would probably move an amendment on going into Supply, and this afternoon the hon. gentleman gave notice to my hon. friend that he was going to move on an important subject. We think it would be well that the discussion, which must be an important one and would most likely be a lengthy one, should not be undertaken on Friday, when we have to adjourn until Tuesday; accordingly, we will ask the hon. gentleman to allow us to go on with the Estimates, and agree to take up any motion that may be made on Tuesday and let the discussion proceed on Thursday and until it is finished. I throw out this suggestion to the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think the motion which we propose to make will occupy anything like the time the hon. gentleman supposes. It will probably be disposed of in from two to three hours, likely, I think by six o'clock. I do not like to interfere with the hon. gentleman's arrangements unnecessarily, but there are a good many reasons which would make it inconvenient to defer the amendment till Tuesday, when, I may intimate to the hon. gentleman, we probably shall have another motion for the consideration of the House. I think it will save time to the House if we carry out our intention. No doubt the subject we propose to introduce has a bearing on the whole question, but it is not our intention to discuss it at any great length on the present occasion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman could not control the discussion, and as hon. gentlemen on both sides are very apt to make arrangements to go away on Friday night, unless there is something specially keeping them here, I would press the hon. gentleman to allow the matter to stand over and allow us to go into Supply tonight. I think it will expedite business if these little courtesies across the floor are exchanged, and I will also say that we shall be exceedingly obliged to the hon. gentleman, if it is convenient, if, before the discussions come on, he will give us the points of the amendments. Of course, I cannot press it, except as a matter of convenience. It would enable us to be ready to meet the hon. gentleman, and as he is a formidable foe, we require to be well armed to meet him successfully or on equal terms. I shall be very much obliged to the hon. gentleman if he will allow us to go on with the Estimates to-night and put on our armour on Tuesday and fight it out. I should also be obliged if they would let me know on what grounds they are going to fight. It would be very convenient if the hon. gentleman would inform me.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I may just say to the hon. gentleman that our arrangements were a little disconcerted by the temporary indisposition of my hon. friend, Mr. Laurier, who has not been able to be in his place for a couple of days, otherwise the hon. gentleman should have in very good time the ipsissima verba and all the rest of the motion that we had intended to bring forward to-day. I must repeat to the hon. gentleman that the motion is one which could be disposed of in a short time if he will use the undoubted and very great influence which he possesses on his side of the House not to prolong the discussion. I think it would be for the public convenience to be done with the motion at once.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think there are some other gentlemen in this House besides the right hon. the leader of the Government and the acting leader of the Opposition, who have something to say about the progress of public business.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear. The Third party.

Mr. MITCHELL. I recollect an occasion last year when business of importance called me to Montreal and when I was excessively anxious that some questions in relation to the Customs Bill should be postponed, but I met with a decisive denial and refusal from a Cabinet Minister who went so far as to show an entire absence of courtesy to me. So much so was this the case that I was, practically, insulted by a member of the Cabinet because I remonstrated with him for pushing forward the matter and not assenting to consult the convenience of a member of this House. The leader of the Opposition, the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), has stated what everybody knows to be true. He has made that statement, speaking for himself and his party, and now I wish to speak for myself.

An hon. MEMBER. And your party.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have heard some slight whisperings as to what the motion is to be, and although I am not in the confidence of the gentlemen who initiate these thunderbolts, I have had some slight intimation of the motion. I will take up but a short time of the House, because I have something to say about it, as I think it is an important thing. Everyone knows, judging from the exhibition shown the other night on an important matter, how easy it is for the right hon. gentleman by a wave of his hand or a nod of his head to keep the gentlemen who follow him in their seats and to prevent them from speaking. We had an example of that the other night in a most marked manner. I hope, however, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) will not give way, but that he will go on with his motion, for if he does not he will probably compel me to proceed with it in his place.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am sorry that my hon. friend of the Left Centre (Mr. Mitchell) should differ from me in any one point, but as he very rarely differs with us one cannot complain. After the statement made by the First Minister, if he still persists in pressing it upon us, I think that parliamentary courtesy requires that we should yield to his request, particularly as I did not state to him the exact character of the motion to be made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I hope my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) will follow the example of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and that he will be Christian enough to forego any rudeness, which I hope was not designed, or any rudeness that was felt—

Mr. MITCHELL. That I "experienced," not "felt."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I hope the hon. gentleman will forego all that. It is a new year, and we have a new Session, and I hope that he will now allow us to proceed with the Estimates. I think, if he does so, that it will not defer or prolong this Session very much.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suppose, after such a recognition of the importance of the Left Centre in this House, that I can scarcely refuse to accept the influence which the tongue of the charmer has, not only on the House at large, but upon myself in particular. Therefore, I will have to follow the suit of the acting leader of the Opposition (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Mr. COOK. I regret exceedingly that the hon. the leader of the Government should object to this motion coming on now. I do not know exactly what the motion is myself, but I suppose that he must be in the secrets of our party, because he appeared to have some great fears that the motion is of great importance.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad my hon. friend appreciates what very justifiable apprehension I have of this motion, and I am glad that he is going to help us in having the matter postponed.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Salary of the Deputy Speaker..... $2,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Always reserving to myself the attitude that I have expressed as to the expediency of having a Deputy Speaker, I beg leave to say that if we are to have a Deputy Speaker, I am inclined to think that we cannot fill the deputy chair better than it is at present filled.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am very certain, Mr. Chairman, that you have very thoroughly deserved some recognition at the hands of the members of this House, although I must not be understood as in any way approving of the office itself.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, as you are the item that I have to speak to, I will say that if we are to have a Deputy Speaker I do not think that we could have one who could deal out more courtesy to every hon. member of this House than you do. Therefore, neither I nor the party which I represent shall offer any opposition to your occupying that office.

Mr. LANDERKIN. There was a time, Mr. Deputy Speaker, when I had an objection to the office of Deputy Speaker, but under the present circumstances I will heartily withdraw my previous objections.

Salaries per Clerk's Estimate..... $70,050

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who is god-father for this increase? It seems to me a considerable increase.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker will explain.

Mr. SPEAKER. The increase is made up as follows :—$50 each to twenty clerks, annual statutory increase; allowance to deputy sergeant-at-arms, in lieu of living rooms, $200. There was such a demand for rooms for the committees and for some other purposes, that we took from the deputy sergeant one of his rooms, which the Deputy Speaker has occupied during the last two years, and we gave Mr. Smith this increase of salary as an indemnity. The following clerks were promoted:—J. Dalton, to first class, $150; J. A. Polkinghorne, to second class, $200; E. P. Hartney, to first class, $200; R. Brewer, the assistant accountant, to first class, $200; C. E. Clarke, to second class, $150; J. Stansfield, to first class, $200. Then there are increases to T. Ouimet, $200; H. P. Macdonell, $100; W. Dube, $50; and N. Robidoux, $100, making a total increase of $2,800. I may explain, that at the end of last Session there was a demand on the part of many hon. members, which seemed to be received very cordially by the House, for some of these increases. Besides, a question usually arose at the end of each Session, as to extra allowances for clerks of the different committees. The committees were accustomed to recommend to the House bonuses to their clerks, varying from $100 to $400, for extra work. The sense of the House seemed to be that that practice should cease, and it was suggested that the salaries of the clerks should be re-adjusted, so that there would be no occasion for them to try and influence any of the members in favor of such bonuses. For that reason I suggested to the Commission on Internal Economy that there should be a kind of readjustment of salaries all around, so that every clerk would receive a permanent salary in conformity with the character and amount of his work. The House will readily understand that the work of these clerks varies according to circumstances. For instance, a third class clerk may be acting as an assistant to a first class or chief clerk whose powers of working, on account of age or illness, become impaired, so that the assistant has sometimes work of greater importance and responsibility than one would expect from an assistant with a small salary. These are the reasons why the salaries of these different clerks have to be adjusted every three or four years, and it is what has been done this year. In the Sergeant-at-Arms' estimates you will observe a small increase of $420. This is made up of the following increases:—$100 to the chief messenger, who had no increase for many years, and whose affability and efficiency everyone knows; $90 to Claire Hugg; $50 to the bank messenger; $50 to the clerk's messenger; $30 to the doorkeeper; and at the suggestion of some of the members, I also recommended an increase of $100 to the salary of Mr. Turgeon, the assistant chief messenger. You will observe that these increases produce a very small total increase in the expenses of Legislation, because there have been decreases amounting to about $2,500 in other branches of the service. Through good management and increased surveillance in the stationery office, the clerk thought we might reduce the expense of that department by about $1,500; and other decreases have been made in different departments, so that I think, on the whole, with a relatively small increase, greater efficiency in the service will be brought about to the great satisfaction, I hope, of hon. members.

Expenses of Committees, extra Sessional Clerks, &c.. $13,200

Mr. JONES (Halifax). How many extra clerks are there employed this year?

Mr. SPEAKER. The regular number, twenty-five.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Are they employed as private secretaries to hon. members opposite, or are they generally distributed?

Mr. SPEAKER. There are none that can be so employed, unless in their spare time. We have seen that only the regular number have been employed, according to the resolution of the House, and up to the present time twenty-five clerks have been able to do the work efficiently.

Printing Voters' Lists ..... $15,500

Mr. FOSTER. I will ask the House to allow me to reduce that to $10,000, and it is not certain that the whole of the reduced amount will be required.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before that vote is carried, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether any of these voters' lists have been distributed or not to any parties?

Mr. BOWELL. I answered that question the other day very fully. There had been none distributed, according to the memorandum given me by the Queen's Printer, except in counties where a vote was to be taken on the repeal of the Scott Act, and in one or two instances which at present I forget. I think my reply is fully recorded in Hansard.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Some hon. members of this House asked, and a reasonable request it appeared to be, to be allowed to buy one or two of these for their own convenience, and it appears very odd they could not obtain copies of the voters lists if they were actually printed in such a shape that they could be distributed in other cases.

Mr. BOWELL. I was not aware of application having been made for the purchase of voters' lists, until the Queen's Printer called my attention to the fact that application had been made for them. After consultation with the Minister of Justice, we came to the conclusion that it was not advisable, nor did the law justify, giving them to any person except in the cases to which I have referred, and had the Queen's Printer applied for permission in the first place, it could not have been given. The hon. gentleman will understand that the placing of the old voters' lists in type was simply to enable the department to forward them to the proper authorities, when a revision of the list would take place. Those that were given, were given upon the responsibility of the Queen's Printer himself, and after the attention of the Government was called to this, it was stopped.

Mr. TROW. Are the voters' lists now ready for distribution, and can they be purchased?

Mr. BOWELL. They are ready, but I do not understand that they can be purchased or obtained until the law is amended, and they are required by the proper authorities in preparing the next voters' lists. Then they will be sent in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Is it not possible some of these lists may have been sent out before this Order in Council was passed, because it was currently reported in the city of Hamilton some months ago—early in the fall—that the Conservatives of Hamilton had received copies in advance of the voters' lists, and were making use of them in their committees for the purpose of securing good lists for the next general elections? This statement was made in the Hamilton Times months before the assembling of Parliament, and it was not contradicted in the Hamilton Spectator, the Government organ, and the general impression amongst the public is that the statement is true. Is it not possible these lists were sent to the interested parties in Hamilton, and other places, probably, before the Order in Council was passed?

Mr. BOWELL. It is just possible that the lists may have been obtained by parties not entitled to them, but if so I have no knowledge of it, and my information from the Queen's Printer is that the statement made by the Opposition press in the west concerning this matter is not correct.

I will, however, make further enquiry and let the hon. gentleman know.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If this was done to any one party and refused to another, it would be very wrong. I should be very much disappointed if it is found that the statement is true.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). As bad as gazetting.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I never heard of it before now, but I do not see there is any illegality in allowing these lists to be issued. However, the Minister of Justice looked into it, and he is not here at present. Of course it will not do that the Queen's Printer should be obliged to strike off any number of these in order to supply either side. It may be a matter for consideration whether, when the lists are struck off, an additional number should be issued for sale at such a price to either side as would compensate for the extra expense. I merely throw that out as a suggestion, but, at all events, if any one man gets the lists his neighbor has an equal right to get them.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I cannot see why there should be any objection to either party getting the lists. They are for the public benefit, and as soon as printed by the Queen's Printer, they ought to be for sale. I do not see why they should be kept secret.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no reason whatever.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. While on this subject, I would like to ask the Government if they have caused to be made any comparative statement with regard to the expense of running the Printing Bureau as compared with the expense of getting the printing done by contract?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is too early for that.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It would not be too early if a man were in business for himself. In that case he would have found out by this whether the new system was paying or not.

Mr. McKAY. I have heard the statement of the hon. member with regard to advanced voters' lists having been sent to the city of Hamilton. I saw the statement first in one of the Hamilton papers. I knew nothing of it nor did I hear anything of it, but after reading the item I made enquiries and could not discover anyone in Hamilton who had received such advanced lists. I do not believe, from my enquiries, that any advanced lists came to the city of Hamilton, and I do not think there is a word of foundation for the statement made in the press.

Mr. BARRON. I happened to learn that the voters' lists had been distributed to some of my opponents in my own riding, and I at once applied to Ottawa to be given a voters list, and my application was refused. It is true I was referred to the Printing Bureau, and I applied there, and the answer was the lists were not being distributed. I thought at the time there must have been something very curious, because I was well aware of the fact that some of my opponents had the voters' lists and were making use of them for the ensuing election.

Mr. BOWELL. I will make enquiry as to the statement made by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron), and, if he can give me the names of those who received them, I will investigate the causes.

Library of Parliament..... $34,860

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see a vote here of $2,000 for binding newspapers. What is the rule in regard to that? What newspapers are selected?

Mr. FOSTER. I have only found in my experience in the library that a number of the principal newspapers are kept on file and are bound, such newspapers as the Globe, Mail, Empire, and others of the principal papers, not, I think, to a very large extent, but sufficient to keep the current records in a permanent form.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not myself object to preserving the newspapers. They may not be of very great interest to us now, but, 100 years hence, they may show to the people of that day a curious photograph of the affairs of the country at the present time. What I desired to know was upon what principle these newspapers are selected?

Mr. FOSTER. It is entirely in the hands of the librarians.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This seems to be a tolerably large amount for the purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make a note of it and enquire of the librarians.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the explanation of this revote of $2,500 for preparing and reprinting the catalogue of the library of American history?

Mr. FOSTER. I have a memorandum from the librarian, who says:

"The work has been going on. Part of the contingencies of the library has been used to pay the expense, and the bulk of the work remains over till the Government printing establishment is in working order. We shall need our vote during the coming year."

Printing, binding and distributing the laws..... $10,000

Mr. BOWELL. The Queen's Printer tells me that $6,000 will be sufficient.

Vote reduced to $5,000.

Printing, printing paper and bookbinding... .. $75,000

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Is it the intention of the Government to pursue the course they have been pursuing in the past, of awarding contracts for the supply of paper and afterwards giving orders for paper to the various stationers and paper mills throughout the country without a contract? That has been the system in the past to a large extent, as the examination of the Auditor General's Report from year to year will show. Very large amounts have been paid to paper manufacturers and stationers in Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal, and other places, for paper which has been used in the Government service, and which was not contracted for. I think that is a very wrong system, and it has resulted, I believe, in a suit being entered against the Government for damages by one of the parties who held the contract. I understand there is a suit now pending in the Exchequer Court, for damages claimed on behalf of some of the contractors, who are asking to be recouped for the loss they have sustained in not having the opportunity to supply all the paper the Government required for the public service. I think the system is not a good one and that it should cease. I would ask if the Government proposes to continue it?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not heard of a suit being brought as the hon. gentleman states, and the members of the Government who are beside me have not heard of it. The system followed now is the same, I think, as that which has been followed for some time past. It probably gives a little more facility for buying the exact kind of stock which is required. Stock is of a varied character, and it may be that purchases could be made to better advantage in that way at times, than by getting the whole thing under contract.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I have no personal knowledge of the suit being entered, but I have seen it stated in the public newspapers.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we should know of it if it had been entered.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I cannot see how the Government can make a better bargain without a contract than with a contract. The contract system is the proper one, and the one under which it is more likely that money will be saved than the system of giving orders in a promiscuous way here and there. Not only is the latter injurious in that respect, but I have been informed—and my authority in this matter is undoubted, because it is the authority of a man who sold the paper himself to some of the newspapers who secured contracts for printing immigration pamphlets—that the party who purchased the paper from him required that he should give a discount of 20 or 25 per cent.—I am not sure which—on the amount of the purchase. Thus the newspaper which did the work for the Government not only secured an enormous price for the printing, much more than the work could be done for by the Government contractors here, but obtained also a percentage or a discount of 20 or 25 per cent. on the paper which was used in these pamphlets, and the country suffered to that extent. This is a wrong system, and is not an honest mode of dealing with the public funds.

Mr. FOSTER. What city was that in ?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I am not going to give away the name of the dealer who gave me the information, but I make the statement deliberately.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make a note of this and will look into it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid the hon. gentleman's notes will be overburdened.

Mr. CASEY. I find that this Session there is great difficulty in getting copies of the departmental reports. We used to be able to get a considerable number of extra copies from the Distribution Office, but this year there are no extra copies there, and we are told to go to the departments for them. Those reports are printed for the information of the public, to be sent out to persons in the country who take an interest in these matters, and who desire to post themselves and their neighbors in regard to them. The item for printing is very large, and we ought to have something for it; we have a right to have accounts from all the departments in considerable numbers, to scatter about amongst our constituents, and if we are to have them at all, we had better get them in the Distribution Office as before. I think it would be much more convenient. Such a report as the Auditor General's, for example, I am sure my hon. friends opposite would be glad to scatter rather more freely than they have been doing amongst the people. It is a report in which they ought to take great pride as coming from an official of the Government, and I have no doubt they will not say that they have any reason to dread the scattering of any statements that appear in the document. I would like to understand from the Minister in charge of this branch, how it is going to be with the reports in general, and that one in particular ?

Mr. FOSTER. Exactly the same number of reports in each of the departments is being printed this year as have been ordered in previous years, and the same method of distribution is taking place as has taken place formerly. It may be that the whole number of copies which are to be printed have not arrived at the Distribution Office. Each department has a number which are printed off and sent to the Distribution Office for the use of members alone, in advance of the total number. But no different system is being followed from that of previous years. Then, I may say, with regard to the general distribution, it is a matter for serious consideration, I think, as to whether we are to increase the number which are printed for the sake of scattering them through the country, because there is a demand which might be very difficult to satisfy when once you went beyond the regulation number. It has heretofore been considered sufficient.

Mr. CASEY. I am very glad to hear this explanation from the Minister; but that is not the explanation I got from the Distribution Office. Mr. Botterell himself was not in, but I asked the gentleman in charge of the office, how it was they had no extra copies, was it because they had not yet been published? He said they were not going to have any, and that we had to go to the different departments this year, if we wanted to get extra copies. I am glad to hear that he was laboring under a mistake in making that statement. As to the total number of copies to be printed, I do not think the demand for them is altogether unlimited. Every member knows that he has certain constituents who make a specialty of one line or another, and who want to get a certain number of reports from that particular department. These larger reports no one cares to scatter very freely; it would be a waste of the public money to throw them around the country as freely as you do the smaller documents; but there is a very considerable demand from each constituency; and I hope if the present number is not found to meet the demand of members for such literature, that it will be increased. I think if there is such demand from members for more of that kind of literature, it ought to be provided. Some counties may want more than others. I think the demand ought to be met, and I do not think it will be so very excessive as to make any material difference in the expenses, and it will make a great difference with those who get them.

Mr. BOWELL. If such a demand for the Trade and Navigation Returns were met as the hon. gentleman suggests, the edition would have to be quadrupled. There is scarcely a member in the House who is not constantly asking for additional copies. I do not think there has been any change in the mode of distribution. The Secretary of State may possibly have adopted some system by which the distribution should take place from the Printing Bureau. I will enquire into that. But it will be very difficult, I assure the House, to make a distinction between the country and city members. If the member who represents a commercial constituency is given half a dozen copies, every other member would be equally entitled to it. The only deviation I have made in the distribution has been in favor of prominent members who represent commercial constituencies entirely, and also the leader of the Opposition who, as a rule, has applied for an extra number, and as far as possible we have supplied him with them. If the House is desirous of having a larger distribution they must give us a larger appropriation; for myself I have no objection to order the printing of a double number, or three times the number, if it is thought necessary in the interests of the country. I will only say to the hon. gentleman with reference to the Auditor General's Report, that it is very interesting reading, and I am quite sure he would like to have a much larger number for use in order to enlighten his constituents and the country generally. From past experience I very sincerely regret that there was not an Auditor General's Report published, containing all the minutiae of the transactions of the Government, while I had the honor of sitting on that side of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How you would have rung the changes.

Mr. BOWELL. Wouldn't I ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You would not have got through for ten months.

Mr. BOWELL. I would have done my duty to my country.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister of Customs did his duty very well as it was; he rang the changes continually on the items that were put before the House; and I quite agree with him that it would have made things more spicy if we had had a similar report in those days as we have now. Therefore, both sides of the House will agree as to the utility of this report. The Minister says that it is a useful thing, and we say so also. Of course, we cannot expect to have more of the reports of the Auditor General, or of the Trade and Navigation Returns, without paying more for them. But I would like to remind the hon. gentleman that even a quadruple edition, as he speaks of, in the case of the Trade and Navigation Returns, would not quadruple the expense by any means; it would only cost the price of the larger quantity of paper used, and the extra presswork; the composition and the translation, which form the largest part of the cost, having already been done. It does seem to me, when we look at the large cost of composition and translation, that a comparatively small edition is struck off for such a very considerable initial cost. He says there is a tremendous demand for the Trade and Navigation Returns, and I take that to indicate that more of them ought to be printed. I would urge it upon the Government, and would urge the members of this House to press it upon them, to have a larger number printed, for they will find that their constituents care a good deal for this sort of information, and it is their right to have it. I have no doubt that the Government will think proper to accede to the demand. It does not follow that every member requires one and the same number of copies. I can quite understand that in a large commercial centre a great many more copies of the Trade and Navigation Returns would be asked for than in my own county, for example, almost purely agricultural; but then there are other counties that want a different kind of literature, and I think each county should be supplied according to the demands from that county, and that, practically, a great number of these reports should be at the disposal of members. They need not all be printed at once. It might be necessary to strike off a few hundred more, or a thousand or two more, as time went on. I think that members should not be stinted, especially in such reports as those I have mentioned. We have a right to know how our own money is being expended, and how our trade and commerce are managed.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I have a suggestion to make which, I think, if put into operation, would get over this difficulty. Ever since I have had the honor of a seat in this House I have observed that an unlimited supply of emigration pamphlets have been furnished to the members to send to their constituents. Any member can go over to the Agricultural Department and order five hundred, or a thousand, or just as many copies of emigration pamphlets as he pleases. This system has been pursued from year to year. Members, as every one in the House knows, spend a large portion of their time in addressing to their constituents copies of emigration pamphlets, pamphlets describing British Columbia, pamphlets describing Ontario, Prince Edward Island, and all the Provinces of the Dominion. My idea is that these pamphlets are prepared for distribution abroad, not for distribution among the electors in the various constituencies in the Dominion. This money, if properly expended, would not be expended in sending these pamphlets to constituents of members of this House. The distribution of this literature among the people of Canada does no good. They receive these pamphlets and they are laid aside; it is true they are considered to be a mark of attention from their member, and the people think that he remembers the influence they exercised in the election and they will be glad to assist him again. But all this is doing no good to the country, it is doing no good to the public service, it is wasting the public money, it is wasting the time of members of this House in sending out that literature, and it has become a burden to the Post Office Department, because I am safe in saying that tons and tens of tons of this literature are sent out of the House every Session. The literature intended for distribution abroad is thus wasted upon our people at home, it is of no use whatever, and the money expended is thrown away. If the Government would make a new departure, and if, instead of supplying these immigration pamphlets, they would devote the money thus expended to providing a sufficient supply of blue-books, which contain information of value to every reader, they would be doing a public service. If the Government would give members more blue-books and do away with those immigration pamphlets, which are given to members without regard to numbers or expense, it would be a move in the right direction, and I suggest to members of the Government that this is a matter which should receive their serious consideration. They should put a stop to this system of distributing immigration literature to people to whom it does no good; it does not promote immigration, we do not want our people to emigrate from one Province to another, we want people to emigrate from foreign countries to this Dominion. This expenditure is a waste of the public money, and I contend that if the Government cannot see their way to give members more blue-books on the ground that that would increase the expenditure, then, at all events, they should curtail the expenditure on these immigration pamphlets and allow the supply of blue-books to be increased. There is no member who is not receiving from some of his constituents letters asking for blue-books, and it is impossible to obtain a supply equal to the demand.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I can hardly agree with the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) in his statement that the only use of these descriptive pamphlets of our country is to have them sent as inducements to foreigners to emigrate to this Dominion. While I admit that is the primary use to which they should be put, I think the hon. gentleman is entirely wrong in his conclusions respecting their circulation in our own country. We have no objection to inducing foreigners of the right class to settle in our country. It should be our object to do so, and if we are to get them in large numbers we must furnish them with the necessary information to enable them to form a correct estimate of the value of our country as one to which to emigrate, and furnish them with a correct idea as to the various parts of the country whither they may bend their course. But I submit there is another class, the very class to whom the hon. gentleman objected to furnish information, that is the young men of our own country who are contemplating moving from their present place to some other locality where they can establish themselves in life. I hold it is a matter of the utmost importance that information regarding the resources of our country and the best parts of our country to which to emigrate should be furnished to those parties. I need not tell this House, it has been mentioned over and over again, that there are 1,000,000 of our own people on the other side of the line. If pains had been taken properly to open up our own country to settlement, and to furnish correct information respecting its resources and the advantages offered to settlers, a great many of those people might have been saved to this country. Our friends across the line are well aware of this fact. You cannot enter a steamboat or a railway carriage but you are handed a pamphlet descriptive of the country, setting forth the advantages of this part and the other part, and making representations so as to induce people to leave this country and settle in their country. I hold that the expenditure made by the Government is not wasted. It is, on the contrary, absolutely necessary if we are going to induce our people, who are being crowded out of the older portions of the Provinces, or are seeking better fields of enterprise in the new Provinces, to remain in our country that we should keep them posted with regard to the resources of the North-West, and of the different points where they can settle with advantage, and the Government has been doing this by means of this expenditure.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) has stated that members have only to go to the Department of Agriculture and give an order for 500 or 1,000, or whatever number of copies they may require of pamphlets for distribution among their constituents. I admit that, perhaps, some years ago a number of immigration pamphlets were given to members for distribution in the different constituencies, but it was done only at their urgent request, and this literature was to be distributed among young men who intended leaving their country and going either to the United States or to our North-West. We have discontinued the publication of immigration pamphlets to a great extent, and I have had more than one complaint from members of the House this Session because we were not able to give them such supplies as they had received in previous Sessions, and because now we are not publishing any pamphlets for distribution in Ontario or in Canada, and, in fact, we have discontinued it altogether at present. The hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville), judging from the statements he made, is under a wrong impression. One of the objects we had in distributing the literature to which the hon. gentleman refers, was to give information to the young men of Canada, who are inclined perhaps by statements made in the public press and by gentlemen holding public positions to think the western States a better country in which to settle than our own country in the North-West. I think hon. gentlemen will remember that, a Session or two ago, such statements were made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and it was said that a large number of people were going to Dakota instead of our own North-West. It was the duty of the Government and this House to do everything possible to retain our young men in our own country, and to show that the North-West was preferable to Dakota or Minnesota, or any of the northern States. That information was given to the people through their representatives, and I think it has had a good effect in inducing our young men to go to our North-West instead of Dakota and Minnesota.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has that been the effect?

Mr. CARLING. I believe it has been the effect. From information we have received from our agents in the North-West, we learn that a number of people who have gone to the United States from Canada are now turning their attention to our North-West, and enquiries are being constantly made for our land regulations and a statement of the advantages offered by that country as compared with those offered by the United States. I feel satisfied that the information has proved to be of great value.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I am glad to hear the statement of the Minister of Agriculture that this year, at all events, the supply of pamphlets is to be curtailed. I think the hon. Minister is taking a wise step. This matter was brought to the attention of the House by me, some years ago, and I am glad the advice I then gave is now being acted on by the Minister of Agriculture. With regard to the statement of the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) that it is necessary to circulate such literature in order to keep our young men in the country, I may say that in some respects I agree with him, but I do not think it necessary to send the same pamphlet to the same man every year. The same pamphlets have been published every Session since I have been here, at all events, for several Sessions. An unlimited supply of the Guide Book have been circulated, Session after Session, and year after year, among our young men all over the Dominion.

Mr. CARLING. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the Department of Agriculture sent those books for distribution, or whether the department was asked by members for this literature, for the benefit of their constituents?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I believe that the members asked for this literature, but they asked for it in some cases, not for the purpose of enlightening our young men as to the merits of their own country, but just to have some communication with their electors. I think that this was the chief object they had in view.

Mr. CARLING. You cannot get any better information than is contained in the Guide Book.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Certainly it is good information, and it is information that is endorsed by every member on this side of the House. Every member on this side is just as attached to his country as any member on that side, if not more so. I do not believe that any statement ever made by a member on this side of the House has had any tendency to induce the young men of this country to seek homes in any other country. The members on the opposite side of this House are not any more loyal than the members on this side of the House. Sometimes it is necessary for us to state bare, bald facts, but they are distorted by members of the Government for political and party purposes. We have stated what we believe to be true, and our statements have been borne out by facts in the past history of Manitoba, that many of the people who have settled in that Province were driven out of the country by the land regulations, and other impediments placed on the settler.

An hon. MEMBER. Nonsense.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It is not nonsense, it is true. There are hundreds of men in Dakota to-day who were formerly inhabitants of Manitoba. That is a fact that cannot be disputed, and it is a fact that we should all look in the face and try to overcome. Therefore, I do not think it is in the power of any man to say that any member on this side of the House has by his statements induced men to settle in a foreign country. We have a country rich in every natural resource; our country speaks for itself, and we have a right to be proud of it, but it ill becomes any follower on the Government side to charge a member on this side of the House with uttering statements which tend to induce the young men of this country to settle in the United States. We are all anxious to see this country settled and to have it a great and growing nation, and in this respect we are as much interested on this side of the House as they are on the opposite benches. With regard to the statement of my friend from Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong), I would say that his reasoning would be all right if the supply of those books was limited to some extent, because if a supply of books is sent during any one year to the people of a section of a country it ought to be supposed that the information contained would be sufficient for some time to come. But the dose is repeated year after year and Session after Session. Tons and tons of this literature is literally wasted and thrown away. Why should it not be sent to foreign countries where we might secure some benefit from it. I believe that my suggestion is a good one, that it is in the interest of economy and in the interest of the people of this country, that instead of wasting the money of the people in distributing this literature at home we should send it to foreign countries, because our people have had a surfeit of it in years past. We should put this money into the blue-books and give the people of Canada all the information they ought to have.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If my hon. friend from North Brant (Mr. Somerville) is foolish enough to send the same pamphlet to the same parties year after year, I cannot help it. I can assure him that I am not foolish enough to do so, and I do not believe there is another man in this House who is. I can only repeat and reiterate what I said before, that it is a matter of the utmost importance that we should keep the merits and the claims of our country before the people of our country. Let me point out that the Americans see the importance of this, and carry it out to a much larger extent than we do. You can scarcely open any of the leading newspapers of the United States, without seeing large advertisements about the lands in western Kansas, in Texas, and other parts of the Union. The people on the other side of the line are wise enough to keep the matter before the public, and not only do they advertise in the papers of the United States, but also in the papers of the old and this country. A few years ago some acquaintance of mine in the State of Nebraska sent me a newspaper, and I remember seeing in it an account of where they had formed a new corporation for a county. They had organised a county council, and although there were only a few scattered inhabitants in the place, the very first thing which the new county council did was to grant $25,000 for the purpose of circulating information about the county in the papers of the old country. I believe we will be entirely lacking in our duty to Canada, if we do not take means to keep its advantages and its greatness before the whole world, and above all, before the people of our country, for I hold that one young man raised in Canada is worth three at least of those we get from other countries. I can stand in my own doorway, and I can look at the houses of five intelligent young men who have gone to Dakota and Nebraska, within the last few years. Every inducement that can be offered, should be held out to those young men to settle at home, and not to leave us to swell the ranks of a rival country. I hold it to be the duty of the Government of the day, by all the means in their power, to spread information regarding the resources and advantages of our country among our own people, and to try to induce young men to believe that they should stay in our country in preference to any country in the world.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). My hon. friend from South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) must know that it would materially militate against the Government if they had those pamphlets printed and did not have the opportunity of spreading them all over the country. My friend from South Middlesex expressed a strange idea, when he extolled the Government for producing such wonderful results in keeping the young men from going to a foreign country, while at the same time he remarked that from his own residence he could see the houses of several young men who had left their country and gone to the United States. If those pamphlets are so useful and so beneficial, and so much in the interests of the young men of this country, why is it that he has to lament the loss of those young men who have gone to the United States. He says he was not so foolish as to send the same copies to the same people every year, so he must have sent out fresh copies, but, notwithstanding that, the people have left the country, as he says himself. The very argument used by my hon. friend from South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) ought to show plainly enough that those pamphlets, instead of being of utility to his section of the country, have produced a very contrary effect. I would suggest to him that he would send a few blue-books instead of those pamphlets, and then perhaps he will not have to lament so seriously and so sadly the departure of young men from this country.

Mr. SOMERVILLE.

An hon. MEMBER. The reading of the blue-books would drive any man out of the country.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I have no doubt that if the young men of this country studied the extravagant expenditures made by the Government, it would be enough to drive them away. I agree with my hon. friend from North Brant (Mr. Somerville), that there has been an enormous and unnecessary expenditure in printing those pamphlets, but, of course, we have to remember that it has been beneficial to the Government of the day. From the statements made by the Minister of Agriculture, one would think that the young men are not leaving the country in as great numbers as formerly, although we know that they are. All he has to do is to look at the reports of his own agents. I would call his attention especially to the report of the agent at Winnipeg, who says that when on a pleasure tour through the western States, he found a great many people who had previously been located in Manitoba. I would advise him to recall that agent, and to restrain the publication of these pamphlets, and devote the money which would otherwise be expended upon them to proper and legitimate purposes which will be beneficial to the country.

Mr. SPROULE. I am surprised that the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) should raise the objection he does, for he, like all hon. gentlemen, must have been applied to from time to time by young men in his own locality who wished to change their locations, for these very pamphlets which he is now so strongly condemning; and such applications do not come from men belonging to one political party only. My experience is that they come from the farmers' institutes. Last year and the year before I received urgent appeals from the farmers' institutes to distribute the pamphlet known as Lynch's pamphlet on Butter Making, throughout the country.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That is not an immigration pamphlet.

Mr. SPROULE. I refer to this as one of the important pamphlets got out by the Government. I have also had applications from various members of these institutes, as well as from the grange societies in my locality, asking me to send them immigration pamphlets containing information about our own North-West, because many farmers' sons belonging to them wished to change their locality. I have been written to every Session since 1881 for such pamphlets in relation to agriculture and immigration, and I find these applications coming from both political parties. They value and appreciate them, and are thankful to the Minister of Agriculture that he has issued so many of them.

Mr. WATSON. I would just like to say that we cannot overestimate the value of distributing literature which will show the natural advantages of our country; but I believe the Department of Agriculture might adopt a better system than that of publishing such a book as the Guide Book, which in its present form is not suitable for circulation in Canada. It contains a sketch of all the Provinces in the Dominion. There is no use of sending a description of Ontario to Ontario settlers, or a description of Manitoba to Manitoba settlers. If a pamphlet were issued to show the advantages of our great North-West, it would be of immense value to distribute that in the eastern Provinces, because a great many people leave these Provinces for the west, and unfortunately a large number are settling in the western States. We have had frequent instances of men who went from the eastern Provinces and settled in Manitoba, and afterwards left for the western States; but I am glad to inform this House that many of them are now coming back to settle in Manitoba. Before they left the North-West they knew it was a good country to settle in, with good soil, if they had been let alone; but they were hampered at that time by restricted land regulations, by the disallowance of railways, and by the monopoly which existed from one end of the country to the other. They left the country; but knowing the quality of the soil, now that monopoly has been abolished, that lands which were formerly chequer-boarded by colonisation companies have been returned to the country for settlement, and that the policy of the Government has been changed, I am glad to say they are returning to the country; and we hope, with the competition in railways which we expect in the near future, that the country will rapidly settle up. The Local Government of Manitoba are doing considerable in their way to induce settlers to go there from the eastern Provinces. They are distributing literature at the expense of the Province, and in that way are doing good work. I would suggest that such pamphlets as the Guide Book might be divided up, and the portion referring to the North-West would be very good literature for hon. members to send to their constituents.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It is, of course, within the knowledge of this House that we have a printing bureau established at an enormous expense, and the understanding was that after its establishment all the Government printing would be done there at a less cost than was formerly the case under the contract system. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture if it is his intention to abandon the practice which has been in vogue for many years, of distributing this printing patronage among the various newspapers supporting the Government, and do away with the system by which such papers as the Hamilton Spectator got $15,000 or $20,000, and the Montreal Gazette and other papers got similar amounts yearly, for printing? I think it would be satisfactory to the members of this House and the country to know that it is the intention of the Minister of Agriculture to have these pamphlets and all the printing of his department done at the printing bureau.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I am glad to be able to agree on this occasion with the general tenor of the remarks of my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Watson), because they tend to show that the pamphlets issued by the hon. Minister have assisted immigration to the North-West. I am also glad to be able to agree with him that farmers are returning from Minnesota and Dakota to the Canadian North-West. I think that is a sign that the policy adopted by the Government has been a wise policy and beneficial to the country—

Mr. WATSON. The Local Government.

Mr. MACDOWALL—and now that the people understand it, now that they understand the advantages the Canadian North-West offers, they are wise enough to make use of those advantages. Referring to the pamphlets, I have a little paper in my hand, written by a practical farmer, Mr. W. A. Webster.

Mr. MULLOCK. In the civil service.

Mr. BOWELL. Does that make him any the worse?

Mr. MACDOWALL. I consider it a very valuable pamphlet. We have heard so much discussion in former times on the comparative value of Dakota and Minnesota, on the one side, as a farming country, and the Canadian North-West on the other, and we have heard so very much said in favor of Dakota and Minnesota, that I think it is just as well the world at large should have a comparison between these two countries made by a practical farmer, and this little pamphlet is very useful and interesting in that way. It gives the experience of an actual farmer, who makes his living by farming, and I think anyone who reads this will agree that the Canadian North-West is most assuredly a much better country for settlement than Dakota or Minnesota. One point alone will prove to the poor man that the Canadian North-West is a much better country for him than Dakota or Minnesota. Mr. Webster says that notices such as this can be commonly seen through Dakota or Minnesota: "All parties are warned not to let stock graze on our land." This is stuck up on the prairies where there may be none or very few inhabitants, because the land is owned by speculators. These speculators will not allow farmers owning stock to graze their cattle on the land, but in the Canadian North-West it is just the reverse. If a man has a crop, he is bound to put up what is called a legal fence, and the North-West Council passed an ordinance describing what a legal fence is. If this fence is put up round a piece of land, the owners of stock straying within this fenced enclosure can be prosecuted and made to pay damages; but it appears in Dakota and Minnesota, although the whole prairie may be unoccupied, the settler with a few head of stock cannot let them run at large, for fear of being prosecuted and mulcted in damages. There are also other matters referred to. Mr. Webster refers to the case of Captain Comstock, who purchased some land, as he believed, in Dakota from the United States Government. He paid the sum of $1.25 an acre for it, but as there happened to be, before the patent was transferred, a change of administration in Washington, he was told by the Land Commissioner, that he could not have the land; and, as he said, they did not give him the land or even return him his money. I do not think anything of that kind has ever occurred in the North-West. If a man pays for his land, the patent is issued with as little delay as possible. While on this point, I would like to compliment the Department of the Interior on the improved method which they have adopted during the last two or three years in the issuing of patents. These patents are now issued so quickly and so regularly that the purchasers of land have not a long time to wait for them. I would refer to another observation of Mr. Webster, to the effect that in Minnesota and Dakota a great deal of land grabbing has been going on, and that the class of settlers who went in there evidently did not go to make their homes in the country. They borrowed a yoke of steers, plowed a few furrows around the land, which they called breaking forty acres, and then, as soon as possible, they got their patents, merely to sell the land over again, and go somewhere else where they could repeat the same performance. The land laws in the Canadian North-West will not permit this, and that is a great advantage, because we do not want any speculators in the North-West, but wish to see the country occupied by bona fide settlers. There is another point worthy of notice in this pamphlet. After going through Minnesota and Dakota, Mr. Webster says:

"I have travelled over the Nelson county and examined it carefully. The Canadians there are generally in some little business; very few of them are farmers, and these few seem eager to sell out. Everything seems to be for sale."

We can find no such remarks with regard to the Canadian North-West in any of the United States pamphlets or newspapers, because such a state of affairs does not exist there. Canadians and others who have gone to our North-West have settled down, and though at first times were rather hard, they were men of iron energy and strong determination of will, who, in spite of all difficulties, are pushing their way and will make a country of it, whereas across the boundary line the land is being taken up in the manner described by Mr. Webster; and I venture to say, that after a few years our Canadian North-West will assume a much better position than that of the North-West on the other side of the boundary line. His pamphlet also goes on to show that an immense lot of land is held in Dakota and Minnesota by speculators, while in the Canadian North-West this is happily not the case. We have a very large field there for immigrants, and but little land is held by speculators except where it is held in very small lots, say lots of half a section, and by railway companies, and these companies well understand it is best for them, as it is for the country, that the land they hold should be rapidly occupied. I need only refer to the very able way in which the land of the Manitoba and North-Western Railway, in our Canadian North-West, has been administered by their very able commissioner. This company are adopting every means possible to colonise these lands and have them settled. They offer the lands to actual settlers at a small and fair price, and offer the settlers every inducement to settle on the land by giving them length of time to pay and an easy rate of interest. If we can have a few pamphlets such as Mr. Webster's distributed throughout the world, it will be the very best thing we can do. I was an emigrant from the old country myself, and adopted the course most emigrants take when coming out. I went to the steamboat offices and other places where pamphlets were to be had, and I read, not only the pamphlets relating to our Canadian North-West and the other Provinces, but also those dealing with Australia and New Zealand, and the effect produced on my mind by the emigration literature of Canada was such that I thought this country would afford better opportunities to an emigrant than Australia or New Zealand, and better opportunities to an emigrant who preferred to live under the flag of the glorious old Empire under which he had been born, than the United States.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What year does the hon. gentleman refer to?

Mr. MACDOWALL. I came to Canada in 1873, and there was an abundance of literature at that time—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes; of the right sort then.

Mr. MACDOWALL—and I hope to see this immigration literature, of the same class as that which has been so ably selected and sent to the old country by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, continued.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture will answer the question which I put to him before. I asked if he intended to pursue the course which had been adopted in his department in the past, in having immigration pamphlets printed by outside printers instead of at the printing bureau, which has been established by the Government for the purpose of economising in that respect? I might say, in response to the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall), that no one objects to the circulation of this literature abroad. We all desire that the advantages of Canada should be known, that it should be known that this is a good country for immigrants, but we do not think that this literature should be circulated in places where it can do no good.

Mr. CARLING. I believe the system of distributing the printing of immigration literature to the different newspapers was started by the Government of my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) in 1876 or 1877, and is continued by the present Administration. Since the commencement of this financial year, no pamphlets have been printed outside the Government printing office, and it is the intention of the Government to get all the literature of that kind printed at the Government printing office in future.

Mr. WATSON. I am glad to be able to agree with my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) on several points, as he agrees with me on some points. He congratulates the Interior Department on the way in which they are conducting their affairs in the west, but he does not condemn them for the way in which they conducted their business in the past. He confines his remarks to the last two or three years, and no doubt within the last two or three years things have improved. But the hon. gentleman should not be contented with congratulating the Government of the Dominion, because the fact that confidence is restored in the Province of Manitoba is due to our having a Government there to-day which is fighting for the rights of that Province, a Government that has taken the Dominion Government by the throat and demanded its just rights, and the result is that the Manitoba Government is receiving those rights, and the people who were leaving the Province, when a miserable servile Government was in power there, are returning to Manitoba now. As long as we have people in that Province who will maintain their rights, and a North-West Council in the Territories who will maintain their rights, and all we ask for is fair play—both Manitoba and the North-West Territories will prosper.

Mr. MULLOCK. The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) has quoted Mr. Webster as a reliable agriculturist, as a witness who satisfies him. I think he is quite right in quoting Mr. Webster. I do not know many men who are more extensively engaged in the farming business than he is. There are some people who are engaged in farming out the whole of Canada, and he is one of them. I have seen him engaged in farming in my own constituency, and I observe that he generally selects the winter, when we are all here in Ottawa, to conduct his farming operations. It is always a harvest season with him. He was harvesting in Haldimand in December last, and he was harvesting in Halton and East Hastings. In fact, he carries on his farming operations in every riding in which there is an election, and his farming is always on behalf of the Government, and of course he carries it on because it is a very profitable occupation on behalf of the head foreman of the whole Dominion. The member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) says he hopes the North-West will develop. I entirely agree with him in that, and had the gentlemen who have been farming that part of the country acted in the interest of the country, it would have been developed before this. But did the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan ever do anything to help to develop the North-West? Did he ever give a vote in this House to develop it? Did he give a vote to give railway competition to that country? Did he vote to relieve the people there of the objectionable features of the landlordism which we contended against from year to year? No, he only voted to send an agent of the Government to every elector in his constituency when he was running, and to tell the electors that the manner in which they voted would be sent down to the Government here and they had better vote right. That, of course, accounts for the hon. gentleman's being able to represent the riding here to-day. That country has been kept back by just such a class of men as this immigrant who came here in 1878. I admit that he showed one glimmer of intelligence when he was able to discriminate between Canada and other parts of Her Majesty's Dominions. He accepted the statements in the literature published by the Government of the hon. Alexander Mackenzie, and I can sympathise with him when he throws some little doubt upon the general reliability of the literature which has been distributed in regard to Canada since that date. If he could only think of the general interests of Canada and not endorse everything which comes from his party, he would see a far greater development, but he and many others will have reason to regret the unpatriotic course they take now in simply showing loyalty to their party, in season and out of season, in the House and out of the House, when they really are the principal obstructors of the progress of the North-West.

Mr. MACDOWALL. As the hon. gentleman has made some statements in regard to myself which are absolutely false, I must rise once more to give them a complete denial. He says that I sent Government agents to the voters in my constituency to cause them by threats to vote for me. The hon. gentleman will probably be very glad to hear that he was mistaken when he made that statement, and if anybody gave him information to that effect, he will no doubt be equally glad to hear that he was misinformed. Such was not the case. As to what I have said in this House or the votes I have given here, I have always considered the great interests of the country when I have spoken on public occasions, and I have always considered the great future of the Dominion which it is my hope to see some day a very great power in the world. I believe that, if the hon. gentleman had voted and acted as I have done, he would have done more to help the future development of this great Dominion than he has by adopting the course he has followed.

Mr. MULOCK. Last Session we had a little information on this point, and I think it was clearly established on the floor of this House that a person in the service of this Government—I have forgotten his name, but the Hansard will show it, I think he was a legal gentleman living in the hon. gentleman's own town of Prince Albert—took a great interest in promoting his election. He attended meetings of the free and independent electors of Saskatchewan, and he told them, what? Gentleman, you owe the Government for certain lands, you have not got your patents yet, you are under obligations to do certain duties, the time will come.

Mr. BOWELL. And that is so.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, suppose it is.

Mr. BOWELL. I am not talking to you, I am talking to this gentleman.

Mr. MULOCK. Very well, you are very well occupied.

Mr. BOWELL. Much better than I should be if I had a conversation with you.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Chairman, I entirely agree with you—

Mr. BOWELL. Then, there is no dispute between us.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Chairman, he stated who was the common agent in his election for himself and the Government, and this agent appealed to the "independent electors" as he calls them to-day. He said to them: You have been sufferers by the rebellion, you have claims against the Government for compensation, you will in a short time have these claims adjudicated upon by the Government of the day, and remember that there is an election coming on, and under the law applicable to the North-West the voting is open, and how every man votes is afterwards to be known to the Administration; it is the duty of the returning officer, the moment the election is over, to return the election roll to Ottawa, and the Government will understand how each man has voted, the Government will be obliged to take notice how every man votes; therefore it is of extreme importance to consider these facts in connection with your prospective claim for compensation. The member for Saskatchewan, through his agent and the agent of the Government, tells these "free and independent electors": "Remember that however you vote, your compensation depends which side you vote for," and that is what he calls, I suppose, letting them have their own way. He says that no Government influence helped him. I ask him now, did not the Government agent distribute a circular informing them that the way they voted would be made known to the right hon. gentleman who presides over the destinies of this country, and that he might be compelled to punish them if they were not good boys and do as they were told? He cannot deny it. Now tell us whether such a circular was distributed or not among those who sent you here.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I am sorry that the valuable time of the House should be taken up with this little matter, as it is a very small one indeed. It was fully discussed by my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Watson) last Session, and an explanation was given which, I think, ought to satisfy any reasonable man. I merely wish to repeat the explanation that was given last year, and to say that I have pleasure in correcting the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. He stated that a circular was issued by a gentleman who was both my agent and the agent of the Government, threatening the electors unless they voted for me. Now I have pleasure in being able to state that I can deny this.

Mr. MULOCK. What do you deny?

Mr. MACDOWALL. No agent of mine ever sent such a circular to the electors, and no agent for the Government ever acted as agent of mine; therefore I think the charge falls to the ground. With the regard to open voting in the North-West and the reference he has made to the "free and independent electors," as though he thought they were not very free and independent, let me tell him that the people of the North-West are exceedingly independent, and they know themselves what is best for themselves. I think they have several times asserted themselves, and whenever an election comes round they always will assert themselves; they will pronounce their own opinion, and I hope their own opinion will always be pronounced as wisely as it was in the last election.

Mr. WATSON. I regret to have to take up any more time of the House, but when statements are made here that are misleading, I feel it my duty to correct them. There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that a circular was sent around in the district of Prince Albert and in the district of Saskatchewan, by a gentleman there, who was acting on behalf of claimants, parties who had claims against the Government, and that circular was read in this House last Session, and was not denied by the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall). That circular was circulated by an agent of this Government who was acting on behalf of parties who had claims against the Government. The circular stated that they should vote for the Government candidate because the Government were sustained, and the way in which they voted would decide upon how their claims were considered. The circular also stated that the voting was open, and the voters' lists had to be returned to Ottawa to the Government that it might see how each individual had recorded his vote, whether for or against the Government candidate, and this was to be used as a reason why these men should vote for the hon. gentleman who now occupies the seat for Saskatchewan district. As for these electors being independent, I say, Mr. Chairman, it is a disgrace to have open voting in our North-West. There is no class of people in the Dominion of Canada to-day who are so dependent on the Government, on account of the use the Government may make of their votes. They are dependent on the Government for their patents, for their land for settlement, and their land claims, and when you have an agent who boldly issues a circular over his own name warning these people that they will be taken to account for recording their votes against the Government candidate, I say it is a disgrace to have open voting, under these circumstances, in our North-West.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it will be interesting to the House to hear exactly what that circular was, and although, I must admit, the discussion has taken a wide range, this is a matter of sufficient importance to be recalled to the attention of the House. The circular is as follows:—

"(Confidential.)

"PRINCE ALBERT,
"TUESDAY, 2nd March, 1887.

"DEAR SIR,—I deem it to be part of my duty, as solicitor for your rebellion losses—

"as solicitor for your rebellion losses"— —“ to inform you, in reference to the Federal elections, that on Friday last I telegraphed my agents in Ottawa, who are attending to your interests there, the following message :—

“ Please wire me what seems the real result of elections so far.

“ And yesterday I received by telegram the following reply :—

“ Government majority so far is 12. 204 constituencies have, so far, elected members; there remain eleven more to be held. It may be assumed that the Government will receive at least half of these.

“ Now, in conclusion, I will remind you that by section 51 of the Representation Act each vote is cast openly and his vote goes one for or against the Government in the poll books; and by section 61 of same Act the poll books must be forwarded to Ottawa after the election here. And it is certain that the Government is not defeated, the losses will be paid this Session, yours, I trust, with the rest.

“ WILLIAM V. MAOLISE.”

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta). The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) has made a grave misstatement with regard to the independent electors of the North-West. In the district of Alberta, which I have the honor to represent, I must say that I was not the Government candidate, but beat the Government candidate, and sit here as one of the independent men. It is true I did not run as an independent, but ran as a Conservative, and beat the Government candidate. So I think his statement that the people of the North-West did not know who they wished to represent them in the House of Commons, is far from being correct.

Mr. DAVIN. I am very sorry that the time of this House should be taken up with this sort of wrangling. The fact is this, that the Reform party seems to devote itself to the study of the infinitesimal, to grumbling at cab hire, uttering elegies on the disturbed old carpets, and talking a lot of nonsense, such as we have heard to-day, that does not bear examination for a moment; this is the way the great Reform party thinks the time of the country should be taken up. In regard to the statement about seed grain made by the hon. gentleman for North York (Mr. Mulock), I may tell him, as he was told here the very first Session, that his statement made in regard to the use of seed grain as an election machine has not an iota of foundation. It was shown, when first this question was brought up, that Reformers in several sections of the constituency had the distribution of this seed grain. But I have observed this about hon. gentlemen on the Reform side of the House, that they are like a beetle: if a beetle is running in a given direction and you turn him aside, still he tries to go right on; you turn him on his back and he more or less wriggles; put him on his feet again and he goes right on in the same direction. Place hon. gentlemen opposite on a certain track, let it be proved that there was no foundation for the course they are following or the statements they are making, still they run right on and repeat the same statement Session after Session, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) rises and makes the same speech for ten years successively with slight variation. Like a celebrated character in Shakespeare, all the hon. gentlemen on the Reform side of the House are eloquent in saying an infinite deal of nothing; and will anyone deny that in this committee we have had an infinite deal of nothing? The statement was made that the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall), sent round a circular. That was the statement made by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and the hon. member for Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) refutes his fellow member, the member for North York (Mr. Mulock), by reading the circular, and it turns out that the hon. gentleman's statement is wrong, and that the solicitor of certain claimants, taking his own view as to what was in the interests of those claimants, as he had a perfect right to do, wrote the circular. What on earth my hon. friend or the Government have to do with the fact that that man wrote that circular, I fail to understand. And so it is with everything else. I am sorry the time of the committee has been taken up in this manner, and I should like, but it is a hope of despair, to say I trust hon. gentlemen on the Reform side of the House, who fulfil a great function here as Her Majesty's Opposition, will rise to a higher plane and give us something better; we are tired of these pettifogging politics, and I should like, if for nothing else than the fun of the thing, to see them make a vigorous onslaught on the Government. What effect can it have on the Government to be peppering away at them with pea pods? Why, hon. gentlemen only make themselves ridiculous before the country. I should like to see a vigorous attack made, but I confess, having observed those hon. gentlemen for two Sessions and a half, it is a hope of despair. When the hon. leader is here—I am sorry he is poorly—I like to hear his silvery eloquence, but after all there is no thunderbolt in his thunder, and while the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), talks indeed a little more vigorously, I will not say it is all thunder and small beer, but I will say it is all stage thunder and concocted apollinaris. Sometimes the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) gets into his Bengal-tiger-mood, and deals very vigorously with us all. He is very sensitive if we say anything about him, but he does not care a bit how hard he deals with us, and the fact is that he deals us a kind of attack that has lost all interest, because it is a sort of stale draught of concocted assafoetida, and my intellectual stomach rebels against it. No man ever said more in the interest of the Reform party than what I am saying here now. I say to that party, that unless they change their tactics, they will not only become smaller by degrees and most un-Beautifully less, but their present confusion will become worse confounded. Why, they have so many leaders that one does not know what to make of it, and of course what they want is to extend their numbers, but, as Bigelow says, what is the use of adding to the tail when it is the head that is in need of strengthening.

Mr. WATSON. I do not suppose I can say anything as amusing to the House as the remarks made by the hon. member. He told us the other day that he was a kind of funnel which communicated the views of the Minister of the Interior to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and now he is acting as a kind of funnel for the Minister of Agriculture. He is accustomed to use funnels, I believe, and he is therefore the right man in the right place. He is an example of the loyal men of that party, a loyalty I might say for revenue purposes, for in the Auditor General's Report I see the Regina Leader entered for $4,976 for printing. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman wherein he has interested himself in the North-West? He has put notices on the paper in regard to the North-West. He introduced a Bill last Session providing for representation of the North-West, or for the Government of the North-West, by a Local Legislature, and he asked one or two questions in regard to the subject, and especially as to what the Government intended to do in regard to that Bill. I would ask the hon. gentleman and this House what he had to say when the Bill was brought before the House? Not one word is recorded of advocacy by him of the interests of the people in obtaining the establishment of a Local Legislature in the North-West. I say that the North-West should have a local representative body and have within itself the power to govern its whole country, and I admired the action of the hon. gentleman during the first portion of last Session in introducing a Bill with that object; but he saw fit to quietly withdraw it, I suppose at the bidding of his masters. We find the hon. gentleman on all occasions ready to rise and defend the Government in this House, but when matters are brought up that are of vital interest to the North-West, the hon. gentleman is not present to defend them. He is always acting as a funnel for some representative gentleman on that side of the House.

Mr. WELSH. A gas meter.

Mr. WATSON. He may properly be termed a funnel. There has probably been some time wasted in this discussion, but I hope what has been said may have effect, and that the House will be satisfied that undue influence is brought to bear on electors in the North-West under the open voting system. No doubt such pressure is brought to bear in the North-West, although probably I should not say so. This may be due in a great measure to the system of open voting. I know that at the election in East Assiniboia—I was there during the election—pressure was brought to bear, not by the hon. member who now represents that constituency, but by his predecessor who is now in the Senate. I know that undue influence was brought to bear there, and particularly on a class of people who were induced to come out and settle there on account of our free institutions, namely, the Crofters. Undue influence was brought to bear on them to my certain knowledge. The son of the First Minister was shown there as a Crofter, to start with. The people were told they would not receive any extension of time in connection with Lady Cathcart's payments unless they voted for Mr. Perley, and also that they would not receive a second homestead unless they voted for that gentleman, nor would they receive seed grain unless they voted for Mr. Perley. All these arguments were used on these poor people, and further than that, there was a man belonging to a particular religious denomination brought up there to work on the feelings of these poor people also. They were to lose their heavenly bread as well as their daily bread unless they voted for Mr. Perley.

Mr. DAVIN. As a personal reference has been made to me, permit me in two sentences to deal with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman. He says that I accomplished nothing last year in regard to responsible government. I put that notice on the paper, and what happened then? The right hon. gentleman brought down the 13th clause, and, according to the editor of the Edmonton Bulletin, who is now a member of the Legislative Assembly, and who is, perhaps, the strongest Reformer in the Dominion of Canada, has stated publicly, and stated in his paper, that the Advisory Board is practically responsible government. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Watson) has made the statement that in some way I am controlled by the Government, because, in looking over the Public Accounts he finds that a company called the Regina Leader Company, in which I am supposed to be interested, is down as having received certain sums.

Mr. MULOCK. How much?

Mr. DAVIN. I don't know.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Oh, it is infinitesimal to the hon. member?

Mr. DAVIN. Does the hon. gentleman know that the Dominion Government has no power whatever, any more than if the money was voted in England, to give the printing in the North-West to anybody. That is done entirely by the Advisory Board. I was able at one time, when I was proprietor, to actively apply myself to the conduct of that paper and to manage its business, and I can say that the profit from work done for the Government was very small. Hon. gentlemen rise up here and make a statement in reference to some items of the Public Accounts—be it $4,000, or $5,000, or $10,000—and endeavor to let the public go away with the idea that the man got a present of that money, while they seem to forget that work was done for that money. In the North-West I know that—what with the tremendous expense which was gone to in getting in printing materials and plant and working expenses you will find a number of books printed for the Local Government, as your statutes are printed here, at a price which did not leave 5 per cent. profit on the capital and labor.

Mr. WELSH. That is cutting it pretty fine.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not want to go too closely into the facts of the case, because, if I did, I might be interfering with the great policy of the Liberal party. Their policy does not amount to much more than this attack on expenditure, for which value was given to the Government in return. They have no other policy to bring forward, and there they sit, as Mr. Disraeli once said of a number of great statesmen, "like extinct volcanoes." They can erupt nothing that will challenge the public ear. They cannot contrive any policy that will attract the attention of the people of the country; they are absolutely without a policy, and, as a consequence of their being without a policy, they come down here and take up a whole night wrangling about cab fares. Another time one of those hon. members on the Opposition side of the House sheds tears about a torn-up carpet. Let the hon. gentleman not fret about this torn-up carpet, but let him dry his tears, because I can ease his soul on that matter. The Minister of Finance promised the other night to tell the hon. gentleman about that carpet, but I was so anxious to soothe the perturbed soul of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that I enquired about the carpet myself. I may tell him that when a carpet is torn up in one room it is sent to a less dignified habitation. If it is taken up from the floor of one room where there must be a best carpet it is sent to a committee room or some place else, where its old age and infirmity are not so readily conspicuous, and I can calm the mind of the member for Wellington with the assurance that there is not a yard of carpet wasted in this whole Dominion. I cannot say that this announcement has taken a plank from the Liberal platform, but it certainly has taken some of the carpet off a plank, or otherwise the platform of the Reform party might go to the country covered with a ragged carpet excogitated out of the agitated imagination of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen). Once more, I repeat this policy of small criticism is the only policy they have on the other side, and it is equivalent to saying before they can get to those benches they will have to evolve a man of genius from among them. But I do not think however that even the daring spirit of Darwin would even conceive that as possible. I can tell them that they will have to change their manners and their methods if they want to get to the other side of the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. Permit me to tender my thanks to the hon. member for the information he has given the House. He stated to us the other night, when the Minister of Interior was interrogated, that he was constituted a funnel through which would pass all the information we were asking. We see now that he is not only a funnel for the Minister of Interior, but that he is also a funnel for the Minister of Finance, for he has given us a little bit of information to-night that the Minister of Finance had promised to give to the House. He did not get the information from the Minister of Finance, but he appears to have wormed himself into the place where that carpet was used, and he now comes forward as the funnel through which the information passes to this House.

An hon. MEMBER. Where was the carpet?

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not know where it was; but the hon. gentleman is a funnel no matter where he goes. He appears to be a political funnel, and, as he has described himself, he is the funnel of his own party. We are grateful to him for the information he has given this side of the House, and I hope that to the end of the Session, whenever a Minister of the Crown fails to give information to the House, he will prove himself up to his undertaking, and prove himself this peculiar political funnel so that we will receive all the information needed. We have nothing to do with a funnel among our party, nor have we one and we do not want one, but I congratulate the party opposite on having this distinguished individual who represents the North-West discharging the peculiar duty of a funnel. He is an admirable one, because he appears to be able to convey any amount of information, and what the Ministers are not able to give he can find out for himself.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ALBERTA RAILWAY AND COAL COMPANY.

Mr. SHANLY moved third reading of Bill (No. 14) to incorporate the Alberta Railway and Coal Company.

Mr. WATSON. Before this Bill is read the third time, I wish to say that I feel, as representing a district of the Province of Manitoba, that it is of the utmost importance that coal should be laid down at the cheapest possible rate to the consumer. At the time the original Bill was passed, in 1885, granting power to this company to build a narrow gauge railway, and granting it a large subsidy of land, to assist it in constructing the railway, it was pointed out, by the promoters of the Bill, that it was intended to secure cheap fuel for the settlers in Manitoba and the North-West Territories. At that time, being accustomed to the actions of monopolies, and railway monopolies in particular, I felt that we should make provision that coal should be carried at a certain maximum rate per ton per mile. I find from experience that my contention at that time was right. I find that this company did not operate their mine or their railway in the interest of the settlers, but in the interest of the company. I suppose we should not blame them for that, because they are business men, and they desire to make as much money as they can; but we are here representing the people, and when we assist this company out of the resources of the country, we should see to it that the people's interests are protected. Now, I am glad to see that this company is composed of men of enterprise. They opened up their mine, and they built a narrow gauge railway, although that was a mistake. They now come to this Parliament for power to broaden the gauge and to extend the road to the south in order to open up a new field for the sale of their coal. I am glad that they are doing so, although this extension will enable the Western States to enter into competition for coal with the people of Manitoba and the North-West Territories. Now, I have taken the trouble to ascertain the cost of producing coal and the prices at which it is sold, and I will leave this House to judge whether we should not ask this company to carry coal at a certain maximum rate. I have obtained the figures from men who have experience in mining coal at this Galt Coal Mine. The cost of mining is put down at 80 cents per ton; the estimated interest on the mining plant, and wear and tear, 20 cents; screening and shipping charges, 8 cents; freight from Lethbridge to Dunmore, 110 miles, at  $\frac{3}{4}$  cents per ton per mile, 82 cents. That would make the cost of the coal at Dunmore \$1.90. To that we may add \$1 per ton for profit, which is considered a very fair profit. That makes \$2.90. This coal has to be transhipped at Dunmore from the narrow gauge cars to the broad gauge cars of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and 10 cents per ton is allowed for this, which would bring the cost of the coal at Dunmore, with \$1 profit, to \$3 per ton. I will give the freight charges to different points, to show that this company are charging an excessive price for coal, and that, notwithstanding the fact that the whole country in the vicinity of Lethbridge is a coal bed, the company have practically a monopoly of the supply of coal, because they own the railway and charge what they see fit. The distance from Calgary to Dunmore is 188 miles, and  $\frac{3}{4}$  cents per ton per mile on that distance would be \$1.41. That would make the cost of the coal at Calgary, with \$1 per ton profit, \$4.41. But that coal is sold on board the cars at Calgary at \$8 per ton, which means a total profit of \$4.59 per ton, which I think you will admit is a very large profit. Now, we will take the price at which coal is sold at Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie, and compare it with the cost. The cost of coal at Dunmore is \$1.90; the freight from Dunmore to Winnipeg, a special rate on coal which is given to the Galt Company by the Canadian Pacific Railway, is \$3.59, making the total cost of the coal, delivered at Winnipeg, \$5.49. The selling price of the Galt coal at Winnipeg, on board the cars, is \$7.50, showing a net profit to the Galt Company of \$2.01 per ton. Now, when you consider that the average sales at Winnipeg are estimated by the company at 20,000 tons a year, and allow the company a profit of \$1 per ton, which is a fair profit for so large a quantity, you will see that the Winnipeg people are contributing to this company, in excess of what they should for their coal, at least \$20,000 a year. The output of the Galt Coal Company, estimated by themselves, is some 200,000 tons annually, so that you can easily see what a handsome profit they are making on their undertaking, and I believe they intend increasing their output. Now, I will give you the prices stated by the Winnipeg Commercial as prevailing on the 18th of February, 1889. Under the heading of "Coal in Western Canada," it says:

"Five hundred and twelve tons of lump coal were taken out of the mines at Lethbridge, Alberta, on one day recently. 'This, with forty tons of nut, is the largest output for a single day,' says the Lethbridge News, 'since the mines have been running.' The coal industry in the Territories is steadily developing, and when the Galt railway is constructed into Montana, as it may be before another year, the industry will be given a great impetus at Lethbridge. The Lethbridge mine is the only one which has been worked steadily and continuously since it was first opened. With the increase in population, coal mining will become a vast industry in the Territories. * * * At present the Lethbridge is the only native article to be had in this market. It is used to considerable extent in Winnipeg and other Manitoban towns, and sells here retail at $3 per ton delivered, in competition with Pennsylvania anthracite at $10 per ton, and imported soft coal at $3.50 per ton."

Allowing 50 cents per ton for delivering the coal, the price given here agrees with the figures I have given. Now, I think the rate of  $\frac{3}{4}$  cents per ton per mile should be considered a fair rate for carrying the coal from Lethbridge to Dunmore, and from Dunmore to Calgary; and the rate I have given from Dunmore to Winnipeg is the exact rate charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to the Galt Coal Company. We find, in comparing rates, that the Government railway, the Intercolonial, carries coal at three-tenths of a cent per ton per mile. Of course, we all know that that does not pay, but the Government see fit to encourage the mining interest of Eastern Canada, and tax the whole country for carrying their coal. I will give you the figures and freight on soft coal from Pennsylvania delivered in Winnipeg. The cost of soft coal on points at Lake Erie delivered on board is \$1.25 per ton; the freight to Duluth or Port Arthur is \$1.25 per ton; and the cost of wharfage and transshipment is 12 $\frac{1}{2}$  cents per ton at Duluth or Port Arthur. That makes the cost of soft coal at Duluth, \$2.62 $\frac{1}{2}$ . That includes the freight; 516 miles from Duluth to Winnipeg, at  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a cent per ton per mile, \$3.87 $\frac{1}{2}$ . This makes the total cost of Pennsylvania soft coal at Winnipeg \$6.50, and the selling price is \$8.50. The Pennsylvania coal commands a little higher price than the Galt coal in the Winnipeg market, only 50 cents a ton more. Now, Sir, I do not propose to detain the House at greater length. I think I have shown sufficient reason why the amendment I propose to move should be accepted. There is no doubt it is of immense importance that we should have cheap coal in Manitoba and the North-West, and that cheap coal we cannot have so long as there is a coal monopoly; and there is practical monopoly existing to-day because the Galt Coal Company have the only railway that can carry coal from the mines where good coal is turned out, to the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I beg, therefore, to move in amendment that the Bill be not now read the third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions to insert a clause providing that the maximum rate on coal over the company's line shall not exceed one cent per ton per mile.

Mr. SPEAKER. Has notice been given of that amendment? I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to Rule 67.

Mr. WATSON. The only notice I have given lies in the fact that I consulted with the promoter of the Bill and told him I proposed to move this amendment.

Mr. TROW. When the Bill was reported on by the Committee in this House and application was made for the third reading, we objected, and I made some remarks on that occasion. My objecting to the Bill was on the principle my hon. friend has set forth, that it was creating a great monopoly, and that it would inflict a great hardship on the settlers on account of the extortionate prices charged by the company. I gave notice then verbally that this question would be brought up at the third reading.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon. gentleman should have given notice, according to Rule 67, which says:

"No important amendment may be proposed to any Private Bill in a Committee of the Whole House or at the third reading of the bill, unless one day's notice of the same shall have been given."

I put the question whether this amendment is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. In my opinion the notice must be given in writing according to the form generally followed—that is in writing, and then be entered in the Votes and Proceedings. As to the question whether the amendment is of the importance required by Rule 67, I think it is. It is really very important that this company should not be saddled with a limitation as to its power to charge freight, and this is what is proposed to be done by the amendment. I think the objection is well taken.

Mr. TROW. The object of the Government should be to encourage settlers in that country. The Government are aware, as the promoter of the Bill and most hon. gentlemen in this House are aware, that there are hundreds of miles in that section of this Dominion where the only fuel is coal. That country may not fill up as rapidly as we expect, but there are numerous settlements along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it would be an extreme hardship to them if the Government were not to place some restriction on the company such as that called for by this amendment. My hon. friend has just fixed what would be a reasonable compensation and profit to the company on their capital, and I understood the other night from the hon. the Minister of Justice that the Government were prepared to restrict the company in a certain measure, and that the tariff rates of the company would be regulated by the rule which the Government have adopted with regard to other lines. I hope the Bill will not pass in this shape, but that some provision will be made in favor of the poor settlers along the line.

Mr. SHANLY. With regard to one point to which my hon. friend refers, the scarcity of fuel, that country was without fuel until the Galt Coal Company solved the fuel question, and in solving the fuel question it also solved the question of settlement. The coal is delivered to the Canadian Pacific Railway at Danmore. It is delivered, practically speaking, at the mine. The railway and the mine are all one, and you might just as well ask this House to fix a market price for the coal as to fix the price of carrying it along the mine railway. The company are not coal carriers. The coal is carried by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the different points along their railway. The Galt Company, I repeat, practically deliver their coal at the mine, and their road is simply a switch from the mine to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the coal company can in no way control the carrying cost of the coal beyond Danmore.

Mr. SPROULE. While every one would desire to see the settlers of that country get their coal as cheap as possible, the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) is a very unreasonable one. The calculation he made is not a fair one as to the cost. It is entirely unreasonable since he fixes a rate below the rates in Ontario, where 100 tons are carried to one that is carried in the North-West. From Toronto to the section of country from which I come, 100 miles, the freight is over 1 cent a ton, taken by the car load, yet the hon. gentleman proposes that in this North-West country, a country but sparsely settled, and where there is but little freight, coal must be carried at  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a cent per ton. It costs over a cent a ton in our own country, and yet the hon. gentleman pretends it can be moved in that country at  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a cent per ton. The hon. gentleman also says it can be transhipped at 10 cents per ton. Well, I was in Port Arthur while a vessel was being unloaded, and on enquiry I found it cost 40 cents to take the coal out of the vessel and pile it on the wharf; so that 10 cents for transhipment is an entirely unreasonable price. I always understood that transshipment cost 40 cents to 50 cents per ton. Take those two items into account, and ascertain, as you will by comparison, that they are far below the actual cost, and judge the other items in the calculation by them, and I think it will be seen how unreasonable the hon. gentleman's calculation is. In a country where there is very little freight to carry, and where the money expended cannot bring any reasonable or adequate interest upon it in carrying freight, I think the company should be allowed a reasonable latitude. They are doing a great good to that section of the country, they have reduced the price of coal very much, and they are making improvements now which will reduce it still more; and I think they ought to have some return for the money which they have invested.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am rather surprised at the argument which has been used by the hon. gentleman who is promoting this Bill. He says the mining company are the proprietors of the mine, and the railway is merely a secondary matter in connection with the mine.

Mr. SHANLY. It is a part of the mine.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It can hardly be said to be a part of the mine. However, this railway received aid from this Parliament in the same way as other roads which were constructed in the North-West, and it is only on the ground of the public being interested in a railway that Parliament would be justified in giving aid to it, either in the form of land or of money. There must be some advantage to be derived by the country, beyond the mere interest in the construction of the road, before Parliament would be justified in giving aid to that road. When any company comes here for a charter which is to enable it to exercise rights of sovereignty, such as the expropriation of lands or the receipt of parliamentary aid, Parliament has a right to exercise a controlling influence and to declare how far the company shall be allowed to exercise those rights, which, in the case of a company which receives no aid and has no special right granted by Parliament or the Crown, would be granted. I would be sorry to see any restriction placed upon this or any other company which would make it a profitless investment, but Parliament is bound to see that it is not operated in such a way as to shut out the development of other mines, and that it is to be used for the carriage of the products of other mines to the market. If the position taken by the promoter of the Bill is sound, the company would have an absolute right to refuse to carry coal for any other company whatever. It would have a right to say to any other company, or to the owner of any other coal mine: You shall not be permitted for any sum you may choose to offer to send your coal by our road. It is certainly the duty of Parliament, in the public interest, to interfere, and to say how far, without sacrificing the interests of this company, without doing it any injustice, it will determine upon what terms it shall be a common carrier for the whole of the community. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) has declared that Parliament has no right to interfere in these matters. I say that, the moment a railway company is given the power of expropriation, or receives aid from the public Treasury, or receives a donation of public lands, it has invited the oversight of Parliament, and Parliament would be wanting in its duty if it permitted such a railway company to make exorbitant charges after receiving such aid from the country. Take, for instance, the Intercolonial Railway. I think the charges there are three-tenths of a cent per mile. I do not say that would be a sufficient charge in the North-West. I do not say that a cent a mile is an adequate charge to make the road profitable, but the promoter of the Bill is bound to show that it is not a sufficient charge, that a higher maximum charge should be fixed, and I would not distinguish this road from any other that has received aid from the public Treasury, but some charge or other should be fixed by Parliament in order to prevent the company sacrificing the public interest of the shareholders for the time being, no matter who they may be. I am pleased, as every hon. member must be, with the enterprise and energy which induced these persons to invest their capital and construct this road, and develop these mines in the public interest, but it was their own private interest they were promoting, it was with the view of putting money into their own pockets, and they served the public interest with that object. I do not find fault with that, but it is the duty of Parliament to see that the power given to them is not abused; and there is no doubt whatever that every railway corporation in the country, if it enjoys a monopoly will make the most of its opportunities. This road, I apprehend, will be no exception to the rule, and I would like the House to say how other mines in that section are to be developed, how persons are to be induced to invest their money in other mines, and enter into competition in the production of coal at the pit's mouth if no facility is given to them to bring their coal to market. Parliament does not want to aid a railway company for every coal company or every mine in that country. The railway ought to be run not only in the interest of this mining corporation, but in the interest of every other mining corporation that may undertake to work coal mines in that region. In the end that will be a benefit to the railway. It will certainly be better for the public because there will be no competition in the production of coal. If we were to-day to fix the price at 1 cent or even 2 cents, or at whatever the hon. gentleman might establish before this House to be a reasonable freight charge, the company, as long as they are the sole coal miners in that country, might put on the price of coal the amount which they would have to pay for the freight, allowing always for the coal which might be imported from abroad. But that would lead to the establishment of other mining companies and the development of other mines, and the cost of production, with a reasonable profit added, would fix the price of coal to the people of the North-West Territories. It would not, however, have that effect if one company has the control of the road which the public have in part built, and if they control it in such a way as to interfere with rival companies that may be engaged in mining operations. If we want to secure the settlement of that country, and we all desire it; if we want to develop the mineral resources of that country, and we certainly desire that, it is only right and proper for Parliament to exercise the powers it possesses, and, as in this case, to exercise the right in a reasonable way, not to the ruin or the absolute injury of those who have invested their money in it, but in such a way as to secure to the company a fair compensation for the capital they have invested, but at the same time secure the public against monopoly and oppression.

Mr. SHANLY. I think my hon. friend has misrepresented what I said, in one particular at all events. I have not said that the Alberta Railway is not prepared to carry all the business that will come to it from whatever source. It is ready to do it, it must do it. We are not asking for a charter, the charter is already existing; the road must accept whatever traffic comes to it. What the hon. gentleman proposes now is that we should make interference such as never has been made by any government in the case of any other chartered railway—that we should fix by Act of Parliament the rate at which the railway should carry coal. I would like to ask my hon. friend if he knows of any railway charter in this country or anywhere else that undertakes to fix the rate of freight. We have the right, of course, of appeal to the Privy Council; but as for Parliament determining what the rate shall be, I repeat what I said in the earlier part of the evening, that it would be better to strike at the root of the thing at once, and let Parliament state distinctly what shall be the price of coal in the market.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the local railways are compelled to carry cordwood at certain fixed rates.

Mr. SHANLY. They are local railways not chartered by this Dominion.

Mr. DAVIN. I am sorry to say that I cannot agree with my hon. friend that the Galt Mine has solved the fuel question in the North-West. The fuel question in the North-West cannot be said to be solved when, in the capital of the North-West, the lowest price charged for soft coal is $8.50 a ton, coal inferior in burning and staying qualities to the soft coal that comes from the United States. I think it is to be regretted that the company, whose enterprise we take pleasure in contemplating, have not sought to solve the fuel question in the North-West. Now, what happens? My hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Watson) has told the House that soft coal sells in Winnipeg for $8 a ton. Why is that? It is because when the coal gets to Winnipeg it comes into competition with coal from the United States, sold at a lower price than that coal is sold in Regina. In Regina the anthracite coal from the United States is loaded with the freight from Winnipeg to Regina, and, as a consequence, we pay $13 to $13.50 a ton for anthracite coal against $10 in Winnipeg. Well, the Galt coal immediately is put up 50 cents a ton. I think myself that as the Government is opening up that territory, and the fuel question being one that the Government has to grapple with, we might have expected that the Galt Company would, at least, have sold coal at Regina at the same price as they sell it in Winnipeg. Because what that comes to is this: that they will put on the very last cent that they can put on. When anthracite coal was $14 a ton we paid more than $8.50 for soft coal.

Mr. WATSON. Even $10.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, as high as $10 for soft coal from the Galt Mine; and when you pay $9 for soft coal and $13 for hard coal, you are burning gold, and you cannot be said to have solved the fuel question. Now I will say that probably we are on a wrong line when we charter branch lines in this House. My own opinion is that it would be far wiser for this Government to give to the Government of the North-West so many acres of land for the purpose of subsidising branch lines. This Local Assembly being on the spot, and being under the immediate control of the people of the Territories, would keep a watchful eye on every line of railway they charter, and would undoubtedly see that the interests of the people were more closely guarded than they can possibly be expected to be in this House. I am not fond of looking at analogies from the United States, but we may learn something sometimes from those enterprising and wide-awake Yankees. What happens when they organise a territory? They do as we do, they give the territory a governor, but they give it also an elective legislature, they pay the judges out of the federal fund, as well as the other officers, and they give so many hundred miles of land for the purpose of branch lines. See what was done in Minnesota. Minnesota has about 83,000 square miles. Assiniboia has about 93,000 square miles. When Minnesota was organised it got its governor, it got its legislature, its judges and officers, all paid out of the federal treasury, and it got 1,800 square miles of land for the purpose of chartering branch lines. And what has been the result? The branch lines chartered by that state, are paying 3 per cent. on the gross earnings into the treasury of the State of Minnesota, amounting to $600,000 a year. Therefore, I say that the system that we have pursued in dealing with the North-West is radically wrong. Our system has been to skim the cream and let it go into the pockets of the Canadian capitalist, or the English capitalist, or the Scotch capitalist, as the case may be. Our system has been not to strengthen the young territory, to coax it into vigor and leave it what native energy and physical resource might properly belong to it; on the contrary, we have taken away the strength that should be there, the milk that should have been there to nourish it, and then we have left it to fight the battle of life and struggle into existence as best it could. What is the result? The result is that we find rich men, rich companies, have hold of the North-West here and there, they have in fact, pecked the eyes, to some extent, out of the North-West. We find the country full of interests of persons hundreds and thousands of miles away from the country; and when you come to a town like Regina, or any other town along the line of railway, you find a lot of struggling men, whereas, if you had pursued the system you ought to have pursued, of allowing the wealth of the country to remain in the country, while it was young, you would have in all those places at the present moment rich men to help them forward, and you would have had the profits of their early enterprise helping to build the country up. There is no one in this House, on either side of it, can blame one party more than the other for the policy that has been pursued; because in the manifesto issued by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), in 1882, one of the planks was the land for the settler, the profits for the public. But who are the public, Sir? That was to say the profit for the Government; and how was the profit to come to the Government but by selling the land to some person who would have the money, and the man who would have the money to pay would not be the man who would settle there? The same policy has been pursued by both parties. It is a mistaken, it is a short-sighted policy. In regard to the railway such as my hon. friend is promoting, I think it is a short-sighted policy on the part of that company to pursue to go on the line of the highest possible profit; because, as sure as I am speaking here, when more people come into that country, and when we get control over the country, as we are bound to have, then it will not be conducive to the welfare of such companies that, in the earlier days of the Province, when the settlers were in struggling circumstances, they shaved us as close as ever they could. My hon. friend is quite mistaken in supposing that the fuel question has been solved. This is a very important thing for Parliament to take up; and let no hon. member here, from whatever part of the country he may come, regret any time that is taken in discussing a matter like this, because I tell you here, you are bound to give up all possible time to the discussion of North-West affairs, for you are our Government, you are the closest Government we have. It is your duty, we say. We are not yet in a position to deal with our own affairs in those Territories, and there is the more necessity that you should willingly give your time and attention to the North-West, because the majority of you, I say it with all respect, can know very little of the country you are bound to govern. Therefore, whenever any member, knowing anything about the North-West, presumes with great diffidence to speak to you on that question, you are bound to listen to him or else be false to your duty and misapprehend the issue he may put before you. What makes this still more serious is, that along that line of railway the nearest timber is at least from fifteen to twenty miles away. The farmer along the line of railway, where is he to get his fuel? The artisan, where is he to get his fuel? He has to pay $3.50 per load; I do not know whether it amounts to a cord, but I know it burns away pretty quickly; and he cannot get his timber anywhere else. The coal question is, therefore, a most serious matter, and one the Government is bound to consider, and if it can alleviate the position of the settler either in dealing with this railway or any other railway or any other company, the Government is bound to do it. So I have a great deal of sympathy with the view taken by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), and I am not sure that if proper notice had been given I would not have agreed with his motion. I think the proper way to have put it, if it is a wise plan at all—I am not discussing it now, for it is not necessary to discuss it as it has been ruled out of order—but if we were doing so, then what I think would be fair would be to have insisted that this railway company should carry coal at the same rate as it would be carried on other lines open to freight. That would, I think, have been fair, but there is a danger, if other mines are opened near Lethbridge, that this company controlling the line might possibly put on a freight rate that would be practically an embargo. I hope the House will excuse me for having trespassed on its time in regard to a matter like this, but it is a matter of vital importance to us in the North West, and I cannot emphasise it too strongly that this Parliament of Canada is the real Parliament dealing with our affairs in the North-West, and it is bound not to be impatient, but on the other hand to be patient and thoughtful in dealing with our affairs, because there is no part of the country to which they owe a more conscientious duty than that great Territory.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think hon. members from other Provinces in the Dominion have undoubtedly an interest in matters relating to the North-West as well as those members who live in that Territory. We have already contributed a very large sum of money towards the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway and to the development of that country. As has been stated by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, we are bound to protect the interests of the people of that country in regard to matters of legislation. A great many of our young men from the older Provinces are going into the North-West. It is, therefore, highly desirable that we should guard legislation so as to keep them free as far as possible from monopolies. The land regulations in the North-West undoubtedly have been a detriment to it. There have been a great many complaints with respect to the manner in which large sections of land have been locked up by speculators. That has undoubtedly injured the country, and now it is proposed to pass legislation which will vitally affect the interests of the settlers; and under these circumstances it becomes the duty of members to look carefully into every Act passed here, in order, if possible, to prevent corporations being formed here that would unreasonably and unjustly levy on the people exacting rates for commodities they require in excess of their value. This is apparent when we consider the fact that in the development of that country coal is one of the most important factors, and one upon which the development of the resources of the country will chiefly depend. The climate is cold, and great facilities should be afforded for delivering coal at different places where it will be required by the settlers. In that view of the case we should be very guarded in seeing that any measure, giving a charter for the construction of any railway for carrying coal or running to coal mines, should contain provisions and restrictions in the public interest and that the people should not be made subject to extravagant rates. The promoter of the Bill has drawn the attention of the House to the fact that no such restrictions have hitherto been inserted in Bills. We are prepared to admit that we have not been in the habit of restricting the powers of railways in that regard, but also it must be remembered that we have not acted towards the North-West, as we have acted towards other sections of the Dominion. It is well known that the fuel question in Toronto has been a very important one, especially that of supplying cordwood. It is well known, and the hon. senior member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) will remember it, that in the charter for The Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway, granted by the Ontario Legislature, a provision was inserted that wood should be carried to Toronto at a fixed rate per car per mile. The reason for inserting this provision was to secure to Toronto certain advantages, in the shape of cheap fuel, in return for the grant the city gave towards the construction of the road. If it was right in the case of Toronto, and in order to protect the interests of that trade centre, that she should guard her interests in the wood supply, and see that it was delivered at a reasonable rate per car per mile, is it not highly desirable that we should protect the interests of the settlers in the North-West in regard to the coal question in a similar way? It is nothing but fair that we should insert in this Bill a maximum rate which the company should be able to charge. It has been stated that three-tenths of a cent per ton per mile has been charged on the Intercolonial Railway for carrying coal. As a Dominion we have contributed to the development of the coal mines in Nova Scotia for the purpose of working up an intercolonial trade, and it was declared by the Minister of Railways last year that the road had actually been carrying coal at a loss, and that it was doing it, in the first place, in order to lay the coal down to consumers in Montreal and other points east, at the lowest possible cost, and, secondly, for assisting the coal miners of Nova Scotia. We, undoubtedly, have an interest in this line, for the country has contributed towards its construction in money and land grants. Although the company has the charter, we have a joint interest and we should see that the company properly handle that road, and that they will operate it and fix the rates in the interest of the public at large. We have a joint interest with them and, if we in our wisdom, and in the interest of the consumers of the country, choose to dictate that they should carry coal at a certain maximum rate per mile, we will take a step towards securing to the people who may become settlers of that country some advantage in return for the money and land grants we have given towards the construction of a railway. If that company was merely asking a charter and not asking for a land grant or a money consideration it would be quite a different thing, but when we consider that the country has contributed a great deal towards that line it is but fair that we should ask that company to consent to a reasonable fixed rate for the carriage of coal to such a city as Winnipeg, and beyond which rate they should not be permitted to go. We are laying the foundation of a great country in the North-West, and in doing so we should be careful to guard the interests of the people there. We all admit that we have made mistakes in the past in our land regulations and other legislation connected with the North-West. The hon. gentleman says that the Mackenzie Government made mistakes. It may be so, and I am not prepared to say whether it did or not, but if mistakes have been made it is an undoubted fact we have been forewarned by such mistakes. Had we not better be cautious as to what we should do in the future? If this coal mine is going to supply the people of a large district with coal, had we not better make the necessary provisions to prevent those people being imposed upon by high rates? The instances given by my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Watson) show plainly that the company is making a great profit at the present time. When we consider the fact that in the city of Winnipeg alone some forty thousand tons of coal are consumed in a year, and that as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Watson) pointed out, after the cost of mining and carriage, the company has two dollars a ton clear profit on that coal, we must see that they already enjoy an enormous mine of wealth. If in granting this charter we give them a further advantage and monopoly in addition to what they now enjoy we are only strengthening their hands and legalising what we all must see is an injustice to the people of the North-West. If we look at the matter in this light it is our duty to call a halt in the direction in which we are proceeding. If we see that the people are called upon to pay more now for coal than they ought to pay, is it not right that Parliament should interfere for their protection? Those people are not legislating for themselves, we are legislating for them, and they will have just right to find fault with this House if we place a law on the Statute book that will prove vexatious and oppressive to those people for all time to come. I hope that the hon. member from Grenville (Mr. Shanly) in view of these facts will not press this Bill to a third reading at present. I think that he should consent to hold it over in the hope that he and the representatives from that country should agree on a clause that would be mutually satisfactory, and which the members for the North-West would consent to accept in the interests of their people. I am sure the hon. gentleman has confidence in my friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and after having made the speech he did make on that particular question it will be readily seen that there must be some cause for complaint. The hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly) must see that the members from the North-West on both sides of the House, who are conversant with the whole facts of the case and condition of things as they are, have plainly stated that there are just grounds of complaint and that advantage will be taken of the people there if this charter passes in its present form. I think the member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly) should suggest to the North-West members that he will give them an opportunity of agreeing upon a clause which will meet their views in regard to this coal question and I am sure it will be a pleasure to the House to realise, that an amicable settlement has been come to. I impress this suggestion on the hon. member and I think that it would be the proper course for him to take.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I must confess that I see no just reason why, after the facts of the case have been placed before the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly) by the representatives from the North-West, he should not consent to some concessions to the people in this Bill. I believe that it certainly would be in the interests of the country that a concession should be made by this company. I am perfectly well aware, as stated by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), that we all ought feel a great deal of interest in whatever may conduce to the prosperity of our great possessions in the North-West. If this railroad company is going to ask this Legislature for certain rights and privileges they ought be willing in return to make certain concessions in the interests of the people. It is hardly a year since the country was asked to pledge its security to a very large amount for the purpose of removing a railway monopoly from this very section. This, I believe, is the first charter, since that time, that has been asked to grant power to run a railway in connection with the American lines. Although we pledged our security for $15,000,000 at that time to remove this monopoly we are now asked, by the very first charter that has come before this House, to place in the hands of another railway company a monopoly over the people of the North-West. I say that there is an inconsistency in the course that we are pursuing in this respect, and it certainly will prove a hardship on the settlers there if we pass the Bill in its present form. We have already made great concessions to this coal company. They have an extensive territory, they have rich mines, and they are now in a flourishing condition on account of the great benefits they have obtained from the country. They have obtained this from the people of the North-West, and if they come to us to ask us to grant them this charter, in order that they may impose on the people whatever rates they choose, I say it is very unreasonable and unfair.

Mr. TROW. I wish to call attention to the fact that the time for Private Bills has expired.

SEIZURES IN BEHRING'S SEA.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I desire, with the permission of the House, to put a question to the Government. I see in to-day's Empire the following announcement:—

"The Department of Fisheries has received information that the Canadian vessels seized by the United States in Behring Sea in 1887, and which have been held until this time pending negotiations on the question of disputed right of seizure, have been advertised to be sold in March. Those vessels were seized, it will be remembered, while they were on the high seas, many miles from land, peacefully pursuing the sealing business. They were towed to Sitka, Alaska, by the United States revenue cutter Corwin. The vessels in question are the Caroline, the Onward and the Hilton."

I would like to ask the Government whether there has been any correspondence with the Foreign Office on the subject, what is the nature of the communications, whether the Canadian Government has asked the British Government to send a cruiser to Behring's Sea for the purpose of preventing Canadian vessels from being maltreated, what answer has been received, what is the present state of the correspondence between the American Government and the Foreign Office, and what representations have been made by the Canadian Government with the view of protecting Canadian interests from depredation?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am afraid we cannot give the information to the hon. gentleman this evening. There has been some correspondence, and if the hon. gentleman wants to know what it is, he had better put a notice on the paper.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask whether the Government will bring down the correspondence as a matter of course without a motion, because if I put a notice on the paper it might never be reached, and I think everybody in the House is anxious to know how the matter stands.

Mr. TUPPER. I may say that all the correspondence that could be brought down before this Session was printed and brought down; and it is a question whether the correspondence which has occurred since can be brought down. Now that the hon. gentleman has mentioned the matter, it has to be considered how much more can be laid on the Table of the House.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Expenses in connection with Health Statistics..... $10,000

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Perhaps the Minister having charge of this item will explain what has been done during the past year, what success he has met with, and for what purposes the moneys have been expended.

Mr. CARLING. The same system that has been in vogue for the past few years was carried out last year of obtaining from the different cities and towns the returns which the hon. gentleman will find in the annual report. There has been no change since last year.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Have any new cities or towns been added?

Mr. CARLING. I cannot say positively, but I think three or four towns have been added to the list since last year.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Well, I have no doubt the hon. gentleman carefully reads and thoroughly examines his reports in order to satisfy himself of their truthfulness and correctness before he allows his name to be attached to them. But I find in his report that instead of there having been three or four towns added, there has been only one, and that is St. John's, in the Province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman also says we can find full particulars in his annual report. If hon. members will turn to that annual report in regard to health statistics, they will find that it amounts to about half-a-dozen lines; and this is the explanation he offers to us when he asks us to appropriate $10,000 for collecting these statistics. I will guarantee that the hon. Minister himself will hardly be prepared to say that he actually believes that there has been any material advantage derived from the expenditure of this money. It is true, there are a number of men in different parts of the country where there are boards of health who make a little money out of it, but I think I can challenge the hon. gentleman to state what material benefit the public derives from this expenditure. I think it is a waste of money. It may not be a large amount, but whether it is large or small, if the expenditure is to be continued, we out to have fuller explanations of the reason we are asked to make this appropriation. I can see no good in it; perhaps the Minister can. He may have some friends to benefit by it. I cannot understand in what way we are benefited in the least by the report coming down in the form in which it does, or by the money expended.

Mr. CARLING. This matter was discussed very fully last Session by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wilson) and other hon. gentlemen opposite, and I think it was admitted that the information procured from the different cities and towns in the Dominion was of great benefit to the country; and I think the House and the country will be satisfied with the information which has been obtained by the expenditure of a very small amount of money. We are adding to the number of cities and towns. There have been applications in my office by two or three other towns wishing to have medical men appointed to take the statistics. I am quite sure that the people are in favor of having statistics of this kind published so that they may know the general state of health in all our important centres.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I have no objection if the hon. gentleman wants to expend a certain amount of money, that those appropriations should be expended in the way that will be most beneficial. I called the hon. gentleman's attention a few years ago to the fact that in Ontario at least, almost every municipality had boards of health, and that if he felt disposed to unite with those boards his expenditure might prove of some material benefit. The hon. gentleman did not see his way to do that, because in some of the other Provinces there might not be similar boards of health, but if he will now adopt the system of utilising those boards of health he might find great benefit from that system. In Ontario those boards of health are rendering useful service.

Mr. CARLING. This money does assist the boards of health in the different cities and towns. The doctor who collects the statistics for us is a doctor appointed by the municipality. They pay him a salary, and we pay him so much for collecting the statistics, and I am sure that is of assistance to those boards of health.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). That is a very strange assistance. It may assist the doctor.

Mr. CARLING. He is the officer of the municipality.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). He is the one who profits by it. Is that the assistance you desire the public should have—merely putting more money into the doctor's pockets? The hon. gentleman says, that he is assisting the boards of health. But these boards are established by the municipalities on their own responsibility, and their officers are paid by the municipality. If I should happen to be a health officer, I should like the Minister of Agriculture to come to my assistance by adding to my remuneration.

Outlay towards the establishment and maintenance of Experimental Farms ..... $70,000

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). Some explanation is due with respect to the amount of money spent on that farm. There is a sum of $20,816 for drainage and labor. I have looked over this very carefully, and I think we are entitled to some explanation of the amount of drainage that has been done, and the amount expended in improving the farm. I find there is a very large amount of drainage made over six miles, and making a liberal allowance for the cost of the different items, I find that the drainage to this extent ought to have cost about $900. I put the figures at 40 cents for cutting the drain, 5 cents for putting the tiles, 5 cents for putting in the earth and covering up. But taking the statements of the cost of drains on other farms, I find that 40 cents per rod for two inch tiles would cover the whole expense of cutting the drains, putting in the tiles and covering up. I am astonished at the large sums expended on this farm. Besides this, I find for men with teams at $3 a day, $3,015 were expended, and for men with carts at $2 a day $2,346. Now, when we take these items and the amount for labor expended during last year on this farm, we find the total amount to be the nice little sum of $60.80 per acre during the present year on 450 acres of land. This is certainly an enormous sum of money to have expended on that farm during the year, for labor, for drainage and for teams. I would ask the hon. the Minister how many teams belonging to the farm are employed on it? I find that 18 horses have been bought since the farm was purchased, to be used on the farm. I expect those horses are still employed there, and that their labor has been put on the farm last summer, but not included in this item. During the year, the large sum of $242 commission has been paid for the purchase of horses to go on the farm. I maintain that if the foreman is at all capable, he ought to be able to go out into the country and purchase the necessary horses himself. If he is not, he is not fit for his position. A farm of that description ought to be carried on in pretty much the same manner as would be that of a successful farmer. In the matter of drainage, I would say there is almost no farming operation carried on in which the country at large requires so much information. I was engaged during last fall for a length of time attending Farmers' Institutes, and I found in almost every part of the country one of the questions put was: What will be the cost to put in a drain two or three feet deep? I think that the depths of the drains on this farm should be given, the cost of cutting them, the cost of putting in the tiles, and the cost of covering up, so that the country may be benefited by the experience of those carrying on the Experimental Farm. Details of all the operations should be given to the country. Then, with respect to the keeping of horses. I say that all the feeding on this farm, however it may be conducted, ought to be conducted on an experimental basis. During my visits to the Farmers' Institutes I was continually asked the question: What is the best method of feeding horses? Should all the grain be crushed or fed whole? If crushed, should it be fed with crushed hay or straw? I hold if the work is to be of benefit to the farmers, every operation carried on should be experimental and be mentioned in the annual report, and I am sorry we have not had the annual report, such as it is, given in the appendix to the report of the hon. Minister of Agriculture. I was only anxious that we should have the report before the subject came before the House. I would also like to ask the Minister whether they have experimented during this last summer in regard to green corn, and in reference to ensilage. I have found at every Farmers' Institute that I have attended that these are questions which excite great interest, and I think that experiments in reference to these subjects should be carried on every experimental farm in the country. I would also ask whether they have grown corn for green fodder to cattle; if more than one variety has been sown what are the varieties and what have been the results? These are all matters of great interest. I find also that a great amount of money has been spent for arbitrations and valuations, and I can hardly understand why. I find that 16 individuals have been engaged at the Experimental Farm in arbitrating and valuating, and their remuneration has varied from $356 to $22. There are two Mr. Cunningham's and a Mr. Masson employed. I understood from a conversation last year that these were farmers who were called in, and I would like to know if they were all employed at the same time, what were the services they rendered, and what is the reason for the difference in their payment. A sum of $1,164 was spent for arbitrations and valuations last year, and $493 was spent for the same purpose the year before, but I understood it was the Government arbitrators who were called in then in respect to some difficulty in purchasing the land. There is another matter to which I called attention last year, and that is the large sum paid for manure taken on the farm. In 1887, the amount was $1,682, and in 1888, $1,379 was spent. It may be necessary that manure should be taken on the farm at the commencement, but it should be experimented with very carefully, and I think the particulars in regard to this should be given, especially as I see that some fertilisers have also been used. This is the only money which the Government has set apart for the benefit of the farmers of the Dominion of Canada, and, unless the farm is conducted very carefully and economically, and the experiments are carried on in such a manner that the whole results can be given to the country, the expenditure will be of no benefit to us. One of the first things which the farmer has to study to-day is cheap production, how he can make a farm produce the greatest amount for the least outlay. If these large sums are necessary to be spent on this farm, it will put the farmers of the country or those who have the intention of engaging in farming out of the idea of going into agriculture. If it is necessary that these large sums should be expended in order to put a farm in order for experiments to be made, what is the general farmer to do? I think a strict account should be given of the expenditure of these large sums of money. I have every belief that the Minister of Agriculture and the manager at the farm are doing everything they can to make the farm a success. I believe that is their earnest desire. But I now desire to put a straight question to the Minister: How many men are engaged permanently on that farm at the present time?

Mr. CARLING. I can hardly answer that question at the moment, but I am sure there are not more than 25 all told.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). Are there men specially set apart to look after horses? I see they are experimenting with cows, and I should like to know if they are testing the feed, and what are the results?

Mr. CARLING. The hon. member has asked me a great many questions, and it would be almost impossible on the spot to answer them all, but I have every desire to give the hon. gentleman all the information he can possibly wish, and, if I have not all the information now, I shall be glad to furnish it to him at a later date. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) I am glad to know, is a practical agriculturist, and is also one of the directors of the Agricultural College at Guelph, and he must have some idea of the cost of keeping up a farm like that. The Guelph farm has been in operation for the last 15 or 16 years, if I am not wrongly informed.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). Fourteen years.

Mr. CARLING. I am sure there are a great many improvements to be made yet on that farm. I am sure that they have not arrived at perfection in managing the farm at Guelph. We have only had the Experimental Farm at Ottawa for two seasons, and during that time we have cleared 150 acres of rough land. All the underbrush, stumps, boulders, &c., have been cleaned off and the land brought under cultivation within a year or fifteen months. Then we have put in something over ten miles of tile drains. The hon. member says he can get drainage done for so much a rod. I dare say he can in the county of Huron, and perhaps on his own farm, but you cannot get drainage put down so cheaply were there is rough land, perhaps part of it rock, two feet below the surface, and where you have to put large main drains to run your side drains into, and perhaps have to blast a considerable amount of rock for that purpose. I assure the hon. gentleman that every dollar that has been expended on that farm has been expended with a view to economy, and, were it to be done again, it could not be done at a less expense than it has been. The farm is an experimental farm, and hon. members on both sides of the House have given a generous support to the votes which have been asked for carrying it on. I am satisfied that, when the chief director and the officers have the opportunity of making the experiments that will be made, they will give entire satisfaction to the country. In regard to the information the hon. gentleman has asked for, I can state to him that we have experimented with different kinds of manures. We have experimented with so many different varieties of wheat, so many different varieties of barley, of peas, of oats, of fruits and vegetables. All these experiments have been made, and the results will be given in the report prepared by Prof. Saunders. I am sorry the appendix to the report has not yet been laid before the members of the House. It is not the fault of the department nor the fault of Prof. Saunders, but it is because the printing could not be done as rapidly as we expected. The hon. gentleman will understand that the report of the Department of Agriculture is made for the calendar year, and not for the financial year; the report is made up from the first January in each year, it is now only the middle of February, so I think we have done remarkably well in bringing down the annual report, and I hope to be able to lay the appendix to the report on the Table of the House next Wednesday. I can give the hon. gentleman the quantity of oats, wheat, barley, rye, peas, fall wheat and fruits, and all the different articles that have been grown on the farm, and I will be able in a short time to give him the results, to show on what kinds of soil the wheat, or the barley, or the oats, were put, what kind of manure was used, and with what results. That is the information I believe that the hon. member for Huron wishes to obtain, and I shall be only too glad to give it to him, and I am sorry I cannot do so to-night.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I would say that my experience at Guelph has, perhaps, caused me to be a little more particular with respect to the questions I have put here. I have found that in respect to a public institution like this, it is important that it should start on a right basis first. When the employes of an institution get into a false system of carrying on the operations, it is very hard indeed to introduce a reform. That is one reason why I ask whether experiments were being made in feeding cows. I saw two or three hon. gentlemen on the opposite benches laughing at that question; their conduct only showed me the knowledge they have got of agriculture as a pursuit. That is one of the most important questions to-day engaging the attention of farmers—how can we succeed in feeding cows so that we can get the very best results; because the dairy interest is second in importance to no other, for the farmers in the Province of Ontario at least. I believe that every animal kept upon such a farm should be fed upon an experimental basis, and the produce of the animals, as compared with the feeding, should be given to the country. There is another question I would put—hon. gentleman may laugh at it—it is one with which we have had considerable difficulty at the farm at Guelph. It is this: Whether those employes who live upon the farm have any perquisites besides salary and the house they live in?

Mr. CARLING. No perquisites whatever are given to the officers of the farm. We pay them salaries and furnish them with houses. That is all.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I am happy to know that is the case, because some difficulty has been experienced at Guelph in that respect. There is another question. I find but little revenue has been derived from the farm. I would like to know from what source that revenue comes?

Mr. CARLING. It was from the sale of some of the produce, wheat or barley. I think much more than that has been paid credited to the Receiver General. According to law all moneys received for fruits sold are paid to the Receiver General, and I think at present there has been ten times that amount paid in; coming from the sale of a horse, perhaps, or a cow, or of grain.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron.) Can the hon. gentleman tell us how much revenue has been received from all sources?

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman will readily understand that we could not expect to have much revenue, as it has been really the first year that we have been in full operation. We cleared 150 acres of land last year, and have put in some ten miles of drainage, and are just commencing to get the farm in good working order. I will be only too glad to give the hon. gentleman all the information he asks in regard to how much money we have received for what has been sold up to the present time. I know that we sold this year some 2,000 quarts of strawberries of different varieties, I think some 50 or 60 varieties, also raspberries and fruit of different kinds. These are sold and the money is paid to the Receiver General.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the cost of the farm? It amounts to 400 acres, as I understand, and the hon. gentleman mentioned just now that 150 acres were in a rough state and required to be put in order at a considerable cost.

Mr. CARLING. The original cost of the farm, I think, was considerably over a hundred dollars an acre. We purchased from Mr. Booth something like 140 acres, at $100 an acre, and it was necessary to negotiate with some of the owners of adjacent property, and as we could not come to terms we expropriated the land and the matter was referred to arbitration. The arbitration was conducted in the Department of Justice, witnesses were called, and the arbitrators decided against the Government, and we had to pay the costs.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What did the whole farm costs?

Mr. CARLING. I think the original cost of the farm was between $70,000 and $80,000 for the land, exclusive of other expenses, such as for procuring title.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Is the Minister prepared to lay before the House an account of the results of the experiments with the new kinds of Russian wheat that were distributed last year in Ontario, the North-West Territories and Manitoba?

Mr. CARLING. The report and the bulletins are now in course of preparation, and I expect to give the hon. gentleman full information some time next week.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), has referred to a matter which I also intended to take up. I entirely approve of the action of Parliament in establishing experimental farms, which I hope will prove successful, and that the House will not be unduly economical in helping on towards their success. Whatever will tend to their success will no doubt receive the support of every hon. gentleman. Having reference to the item of spring wheat, I venture to say that the superintendent of the experimental farm should be extremely cautious in issuing with his recommendation any samples of grain of any kind whatever. Unfortunately, in this particular case, we have a superintendent of the farm here, and on all the Dominion Government farms an officer who is not himself a farmer. He is a theorist like many other good men, but he is not a practical man, and what makes the matter still worse, is the fact that the hon. gentleman who is Minister of Agriculture, happens to be very much the same kind of farmer as is the superintendent. Had it been different I think the reputation of the farm would not have suffered in the way it has suffered in the last year. A short time before the incident to which I intend to refer, a number of letters appeared in the Toronto press, and perhaps elsewhere, speaking somewhat favorably of what was called a Russian wheat, and the result was that the superintendent of the farm, I assume, led on by what he had read in the press, sent to Russia and obtained a large quantity of the wheat referred to in the press. Having got it to Canada he sent out notices to the public that the wheat was now ready for distribution and that such as applied for it could obtain it, I presume in small quantities. The wheat got more or less into distribution, and a quantity of it was submitted to the grain men of the Toronto Board of Trade. With what result? That this wheat issued by the superintendent, as what he calls Kubanka, turned out when examined by experts to be nothing but our old familiar wild goose wheat.

Mr. CARLING. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken as to the name of the wheat. Kubanka was not the wheat distributed by Professor Saunders, it was Ladoga wheat. Although the Board of Trade of Toronto made an unfavorable report with regard to that wheat, the Board of Trade of Montreal took a different view and reported favorably; and I may add that the greatest care has been taken with respect to the distribution of that particular kind of wheat. I think the House will agree with me that if we can introduce a particular kind of wheat from Russia or from any northern country in Europe, and that wheat proves equal to the Red Fyfe wheat in the North-West, and it will ripen from ten days to two weeks earlier than the Red Fyfe, we have accomplished a great deal for the country. Professor Saunders, as I have said, has taken very great care in sending out these samples of wheat, not in five, ten, fifty or a hundred bushels, but in three or four pound samples all over the Dominion, to leading farmers recommended by members of this House. Wheat has been sent, I believe, to Prince Edward Island, to Nova Scotia, to New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, the North-West Territories and British Columbia, and we have returns from the farmers to whom the samples were sent telling the department that they received the wheat, that the wheat was sown and harvested at particular times, the particular kind of soil and the yield. Professor Saunders has all these returns in his possession at the present time. In addition, this wheat has been thoroughly analysed by an expert, the chemist of the farm, and he pronounces it as good in quality as the Red Fyfe, that it contains the same quantity of gluten, that he has had some ground and made into bread, and the bakers pronounce it as good quality of wheat, although not quite so white in color as the Red Fyfe, but equal in every other respect. I think, as I have before said, if we have been able to bring out a sample of wheat from northern Russia suitable for our North-West, and which will ripen from ten days to two weeks earlier than the Red Fyfe, we have accomplished a great deal which will not only be advantageous to the North-West but to the whole Dominion, even if it should not be quoted on the market at quite so good a price as the Red Fyfe.

Mr. MULOCK. I am glad to receive the explanation of the Minister of Agriculture, although I hardly think it meets the case which he has sought to anticipate. I care not whether the wheat which he says was the Ladoga was that variety or not, but what I wish to say is this: that the superintendent distributed a wheat—I am informed by a practical man, a grain man, and a leading member of the Toronto Board of Trade—called the Kubanka, which proved to be only the old wild goose. I am unable to accept the hon. gentleman's explanation, honestly made as it no doubt is. The samples of wheat to which I refer were, I presume, issued by his department. They went to the Board of Trade, Toronto, and the grain section of that Board declared that this wheat brought out by the department from Russia was nothing more than the old wild goose wheat, which we have had in Canada for years, and which is very deficient in the most valuable element of wheat, namely, gluten. In fact, I am told to-day that the kind of wheat grown from this seed recommended by the department would not have been worth in the North-West within forty cents a bushel of the hard Fyfe variety.

Mr. CARLING. I can only say that the hon. gentleman had been misinformed. No such wheat has been distributed by the department.

Mr. MULOCK. Then I can only say that the Board of Trade of Toronto will have to settle that point with the Minister. They issued their warning to the farmers and to the public to have nothing to do with the hon. gentleman's wheat. I suppose he saw that notice?

Mr. CARLING. No.

Mr. MULOCK. It was published in the press of the day, in all the Toronto papers, and a warning was issued, similar to that given in regard to $15 a bushel wheat, that it was a dangerous article for farmers to experiment with. It is extraordinary that the report of such an important section of the Toronto Board of Trade is unknown to the Minister of Agriculture. It was his duty to have seen it, and to have called the attention of the superintendent to that report. If the report was incorrect he should have published a correct report; but until enquiry was made and an investigation held, and the public correctly informed, the statement made must be accepted. I sympathise with every movement that will assist the North-West in the development of that country in the growing of grain; and the hon. gentleman must not assume, because I have called attention to these matters, that I would disapprove of any effort in the direction that has been made. But, again, I repeat that the grain section of the Toronto Board of Trade examined samples of wheat which came to them. They said that this wheat came from the Experimental Farm, or, at all events, from the Government. I believe it came down from the North-West. Would the hon. gentleman say whether it was sent from the farm here or from one of the agencies?

Mr. CARLING. I cannot say.

Mr. MULOCK. They stated in their report that it was the wheat issued by Professor Saunders, and they condemned it, for the reason that it was said to contain too little gluten. The hon. gentleman is aware they made such a report, because he says that the Toronto Board made an unfavorable report, and that the Montreal Board of Trade made a favorable report. When did the hon. gentleman get information that there was an unfavorable report in regard to this wheat, for he says that he did not see it in the press? Since it came to his knowledge that a responsible body of men had condemned the wheat it was his bounden duty to have the analysis made, that he says has been made now, and to give to the public the benefit of that analysis. Was it not manifestly his duty to correct any misapprehension that may be created in the minds of the farmers of the country, through their thinking that the wheat was not sound on account of the report of the Toronto Board of Trade? The hon. gentleman tells us that he took the precaution to get an analysis to disprove the statement of the Toronto Board of Trade, but he has kept that report secret in his own bosom, and allowed the public to be misled up to the present time.

Mr. CARLING. I am sure that the hon. gentleman does not wish to misrepresent me. What I stated to the House was that the particular kind of wheat he mentioned was not the kind of wheat we distributed as having been imported from Russia, but a sample of Kubanka wheat obtained from Manitoba, which was sent with the Ladoga to the Toronto Board of Trade; and although I have every respect for the members of the Toronto Board of Trade, as business men, understanding the different kinds of grain, yet they, like the hon. gentleman and myself, are not practical farmers. I think the hon. gentleman is a farmer, and I have heard of his farming on a very extensive scale, but I do not suppose that he claims to be a practical farmer. I was told by Professor Saunders that a report had been made against the Ladoga wheat by the Toronto Board of Trade, and that a report had also been made by the Montreal Board of Trade in its favor. I asked Professor Saunders to enquire into the particulars with regard to this kind of wheat, to make experiments that he could rely upon, to have it thoroughly analysed, and to have reports from practical farmers to whom he had sent samples. This wheat has been grown on the farm at Indian Head in the North-West, it has been grown in Nova Scotia, and it has been grown on the central farm here; and, as I said, an analysis has been made of it by the chemist who has reported to the director of the farm that this wheat is equal to the Red Fyfe wheat.

Mr. MULOCK. What was the name of the chemist?

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Shutt.

Mr. MULOCK. A very capable man.

Mr. DAVIN. Is this the Ladoga wheat?

Mr. CARLING. Yes. It is only a few weeks ago since that analysis was completed, and in the reports of Professor Saunders and Mr. Shutt, which will be laid before the House, the hon. gentleman will get all the information he is anxious for.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough also to lay on the Table of the House the report of the Board of Trade of Toronto, the report of the Board of Trade of Montreal and the analysis in question?

Mr. CARLING. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. Do I understand that this analysis was made from the original seed or from what has been grown from it?

Mr. CARLING. I think, if I am correct, that it was wheat grown from the seed brought from Russia. I shall be happy to give the hon. gentleman all the reports that have been received and all the information in my department.

Mr. MULOCK. Can the hon. gentleman tell when he learned that the Toronto Board of Trade had condemned this wheat?

Mr. McNEILL. We all heard that long ago.

Mr. CARLING. I cannot recollect exactly.

Mr. MULOCK. Was that immediately referred to the chemist for analysis, or is it for the first time that this analysis has been made?

Mr. CARLING. The chemist was instructed to make an analysis some two or three months ago.

Mr. MULOCK. Will there be a report on the original seed, and on what has been grown since?

Mr. CARLING. I think the report is on the wheat grown in the North-West and on the farm.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman sees now what he has done? This seed wheat was distributed long before the analysis was made, and the hon. gentleman does not wake up to have an analysis made until after a whole season's growth. It was the product of the seed in question, and not the original seed that he analysed. He lost a whole season, and I don't think that this is properly discharging the duties of his office.

Mr. CARLING. How soon does the hon. gentleman think that an analysis can be made of wheat grown last season?

Mr. MULOCK. Well, the hon. gentleman imported three hundred bushels—

Mr. CARLING. Why does the hon. gentleman say "three hundred?"

Mr. MULOCK. I have been informed that. How many bushels did you get?

Mr. CARLING. One hundred bushels. There is no use exaggerating this matter. It is my object to get at facts and I want to give the truth to this House, and I hope the hon. gentleman does not want anything but the truth.

Mr. MULOCK. I want the facts, and the facts brought out now are that when this hundred bushels were distributed to be used as seed he must have known that a very important body of men had condemned the seed, and a body of men whose opinion is entitled to respect.

Mr. CARLING. Does the hon. gentleman know at what time they condemned it?

Mr. MULOCK. At the time of its distribution.

Mr. CARLING. What time was that?

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman ought to have the information in his department. My friend from Marquette (Mr. Watson) says it was in March. It was the original seed wheat that should have been analysed before it was grown, and the Minister admits that he neglected a whole season in this matter, and only a short time ago awakened to the fact that he ought give attention to it. I call that negligence of his duty to his department. If not I hope that he will clear it up by letting us know when he distributed the seed wheat, when the Board of Trade made the report, and when he had the analysis made.

Mr. DALY. I regret very much that this House should be treated to the kind of bosh and ignorance that the hon. gentleman who has just sat down is guilty of—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh!

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Oh!

Mr. DALY. I can call it nothing else, with all due respect to the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I think that when the Minister of Agriculture replied as he did to the member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and gave him all the facts in connection with the case, he should be satisfied. This Ladoga wheat—not Lagoda as the hon. gentleman terms it—was distributed by the hon. Minister of Agriculture in the year 1887. I had the honor of distributing it among my constituents within two weeks after I came to Ottawa in 1887. This wheat was sent to a number of farmers in Manitoba and the North-West, who sowed it and made their reports to the Minister of Agriculture in the ensuing fall. Those reports were very satisfactory. As the hon. gentleman has stated, the Board of Trade of Toronto did make an adverse report; but, as the hon. Minister of Agriculture has stated, the Board of Trade of Montreal made a report favorable to the wheat. It may be that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has not paid that attention which he might have done to a report from such a body as the Board of Trade of Toronto; but no doubt he considered that the report of the Board of Trade of Montreal had as much weight as that of the Board of Trade of Toronto. I know, and the hon. member for North York will bear me out, that when we met the Boards of Trades of Toronto and Montreal in the Tower Room last year in connection with the grading of our wheat, the Board of Toronto were opposed to a reduction of the grade, and the only opposition offered to the Board of Trade of Winnipeg was offered by the Board of Trade of Toronto. Therefore, as one coming from the Province of Manitoba, I cannot place any reliance on the report of the Board of Trade of Toronto with regard to the grade of wheat. The people of Manitoba have been desirous of obtaining some grade of wheat which would overcome the difficulties which the farmers in that country have to endure. We were very much pleased when the Minister of Agriculture sent to Russia for this wheat. It came from a latitude almost the same as that in which we grow our wheat. The experiments made there were satisfactory; but the grinding of the wheat was to be the crucial test. It was ascertained that it ripened as early as the Red Fyfe and in some cases earlier; but the question was whether when ground it would turn out as good an article of flour. As I have not seen the report of the grinding, I do not know what the result was, and we shall not be able to form an opinion as to the quality of the flour until we see that report. But I know one thing, and that is that the farmers of Manitoba are satisfied that the Red Fyfe is the best wheat they can possibly grow. I do not think this Ladoga wheat is equal in quality to the Red Fyfe; but if it is shown on experiment that it will ripen earlier, that it is equal to the circumstances surrounding farming in Manitoba, and that it will produce as good flour, then we may be satisfied to adopt it. But I hope the hon. member for North York will not rise in his seat and accuse the hon. Minister of Agriculture of dereliction of duty in not paying attention to the representation of the Board of Trade of Toronto, when the hon. gentleman has stated that the Board of Trade of Montreal presented a report directly opposite.

Mr. MULOCK.

Mr. MULOCK. Since this discussion began a memorandum has been placed in my hand which I will take the liberty of reading to the House. It is from a person who is an authority on this subject; I do not feel at liberty to mention his name.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh!

Mr. MULOCK. Well, he is a competent man. He is a member of the Board of Trade of Toronto. The memorandum has been sent down to me from the gallery, and I will read it:

“Two samples of wheat were submitted to the board, Ladoga and Kubanka. They are quite different in character—”

I did not refer to the Ladoga wheat, but the hon. Minister has attempted to direct this discussion to it—

“The former was considered by the Toronto Board a fair average spring wheat—”

That confirms what the Minister said—

“while the Kubanka was nothing more than wild goose.”

That is what I stated in the beginning. This memorandum is by a grain man, a responsible person who knows what he is talking about, and I suppose there are a dozen in the gallery at this moment who know the truth of what I am saying. I repeat, relying on information which I received, that Kubanka wheat was issued by the department, and was found on examination to be wild goose, which has been cultivated in this country for years, and which would not be worth more than 60 cents a bushel at Brandon to-day; and had the farmers of the North-West turned their attention to the growing of that wheat instead of Scotch Fyfe or some other suitable wheat, a very great blow would have been given to the farming industry of the North-West. That is the point which I made in the beginning, and which I adhere to until the Minister clears it up.

Mr. CARLING. I can safely say that the Kubanka wheat was not the wheat distributed throughout the country by Professor Saunders as Russian wheat. He may have had samples of both Kubanka and Ladoga wheat and sent them to the Board of Trade of Toronto for inspection, but I know that Ladoga wheat was the wheat which was distributed to the farmers throughout the country to experiment and report upon, and that is the wheat that has been analysed by the chemist, whose report will be sent down to the House in a few days.

Mr. MULOCK. Did you bring in some Kubanka with it?

Mr. CARLING. I do not remember. Prof. Saunders may have obtained a small quantity of Kubanka wheat, but I have heard him say over and over again that it was what is called goose wheat throughout the country. I know that the wheat distributed was the Ladoga and not the Kubanka.

Mr. DALY. For the information of the hon. member for North York I may say that a man named Johnston, the manager of a farm near Winnipeg, was the man who imported this Kubanka wheat and distributed it, and not the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. DAVIN. There is evidently some slight confusion in the mind of my hon. friend from North York about the wheat. He is anxious about the North-West. I have only to say that, so far as I know, no Kubanka wheat was sent to any of the farmers of the North-West. I happened to travel around among the farmers of the North-West last summer, and the varieties of wheat I found them using were Judkett, Red Fyfe, Ladoga and White Fyfe. Now, Sir, I can bear my testimony to the good the Experimental Farm is doing in the North-West. It is making every farmer there who is a man of enterprise and intelligence an experimenter, not only for his own sake but for the sake of the country. Now, Mr. W. C. Sanders—he is nothing to the Professor—lives near Moose Jaw, and is a very intelligent farmer. He experimented last year with Juddett wheat, with Red Fyfe, with Ladoga and with White Fyfe. He found that the Juddett ripened 15, and, in some cases, 19 days earlier than the Red Fyfe. I saw, the day after the Moose Jaw Agricultural Show, that wheat in the presence of leading agriculturists of that district, and they pronounced it fully equal to the Red Fyfe, just as hard as flint, with a fine kernel, and in fact very like the Red Fyfe. The experiment my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Daly) speaks of had not been made, namely, manufacturing it into flour; but the opinion of these men, who were experts, was that the Juddett, which had ripened 19 days earlier than the Red Fyfe, and had produced a very large amount to the ratio of the quantity sold, was destined to be the wheat of the North-West. With regard to the Ladoga, Mr. Sanders and Mr. Smail had also experimented on that. They found the Ladoga, while producing a kernel just as fine as the Red Fyfe, apparently as hard, had ripened from 10 to 14 days earlier than the Red Fyfe. I need not tell the House that if you have a wheat that will ripen 10 or 12 days earlier than the Red Fyfe and will give you a kernel as full, a body as large, and with as much gluten as the Red Fyfe, you have a wheat that will be of incalculable advantage to the North-West, for 7 days is a great gain in the North-West, the race of our farmers being with the frost. If we can outrun the frost, we have a country the most fruitful in the world to deal with. The results of the farms that I visited were most satisfactory. In fact they took a few bushels of grain, and in a few months the fruit thereof shook like the cedars of Lebanon. Now, we are only speaking of the Experimental Farm here. It is in touch with the farmers of the North-West Territories. Bulletins are sent to the leading farmers and published, and in this way all the farmers of the North-West Territories are instructed by means of this farm; and I was very glad to hear the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), who is always so fair, say he hoped these farms would not be starved. While on the subject, I will say a word about the Experimental Farm we have in the North-West. There experiments are being made in tree planting. Every kind of tree that would be supposed to have the best chance has been brought from Russia and elsewhere and planted there, and the most vital experiment to the North-West, to its prosperity, its comfort, and what will please the eye in that country is being made by Mr. McKay in the planting of trees. He is also planting apple trees and various fruit trees which are not yet grown in the North-West. We are not badly off for fruit. We have raspberries, strawberries, currants, wild cherries, and the Saskatoon berry, but we have not apples yet, and that is one of the things which is experimented on in the farms there. He has also experimented on various kinds of oats and wheat, the different times for sowing these and the different ways. He has experimented on fall wheat, and the result cannot fail to be of the greatest possible advantage to our farmers. Those gentlemen, who might be inclined to carp at a little expenditure in this matter, must remember that our farmers are not in a position like that of the tenant farmers of England. We cannot make a history such as the tenant farmers of Scotland made—the Midlothian farmers—whose example was imitated in England and Ireland, until you had regularly established, so to speak, an agricultural university, teaching the farmers in the old country how best to farm, and to drain, what manures are best, what portable manures can be used and so on. We cannot expect that. Yet even in England the people have called on the Government to take some action, and one of the most eminent writers has blamed the Imperial Government for not spending more money, and taking more interest in the development of agriculture in Great Britain; so that with the evidence we have before us in regard to the experiments in growing wheat and the experiments that have been made in other portions of agriculture and forest culture, I hope that the hon. gentleman who is at the head of the Agriculture Department will receive the strong support of this House in trying to do something for our farmers all over the Dominion. It must be remembered that it is a common cry that so much is being done for capitalists, so much for railway people, so much for the manufacturers, but nothing for the farmers. It would look very bad therefore if when an expenditure, which is so palpably and directly on behalf of the farmer, is proposed, we should cavil at it and show ourselves ungrateful in sustaining the means of knowledge, for knowledge in farming is power as in other walks.

Mr. WATSON. This is rather an interesting question to representatives from the North-West, and, as stated by the hon. gentleman, there cannot be too much attention given to the different varieties. We are glad to know that the Experimental Farm is experimenting in that direction. I hold to some extent the view expressed by the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock) when he said that an analysis should have been made of the wheat when it arrived from Russia. That wheat, the Ladoga, was pronounced by judges of wheat to be not so hard as Red Fyfe wheat and not of as good a color. This wheat, which was received from Russia, was worth in the markets at least 10 cents less a bushel than the Red Fyfe. It was claimed by Professor Saunders at that time that it would harden for climatic reasons in our North-West Territories, and that all wheat would be hardened by being grown there. I think Mr. Saunders should at that time have made an analysis of this wheat, and then from the proceeds of that seed have made another analysis and found out whether that wheat was improving in quality or not. The Government have been asked to bring down the report of the Board of Trade of Montreal. I should like to ask them to bring down the report of the Board of Trade of Winnipeg. They also reported on that wheat, and their verdict was that it would grade about No. 1 Northern. Well, as the hon. gentleman knows, that is a third class wheat in the Manitoba market, and worth about eight cents a bushel less than the Red Fyfe. The hon. gentleman for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) supported the Minister in his pretension that this wheat was good and reported favorably on by the Board of Trade at Montreal. The hon. gentleman had a memorandum placed in his hands by some gentleman, no doubt a good judge of wheat, who stated he would consider this Ladoga wheat a fair sample of spring wheat.

Mr. HESSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," as if a fair sample of spring wheat is a good sample of wheat. He is in error. There is No. 1 Hard, No. 2 Hard, No. 1 Northern, No. 2 Northern, and No. 1 Spring. That is the fifth grade of wheat. Surely that is not to be considered a good grade of wheat, or to be compared with the Red Fyfe we grow in the North-West. I believe, as a rule, that any new variety of wheat which is forwarded for experimenting gets rather a better chance than ordinary wheat. If there is a good place for it in the corner of the field, it is put there, and I have not heard of much difference in the ripening of this wheat and Red Fyfe. The best variety of soft wheat we have in Manitoba which will ripen early is the Golden Drop. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) speaks of Juddett as a hard wheat, but he is not an experienced judge of wheat. There is the Red Fern wheat, and there is no harder wheat grown, but the millers will not purchase that if they can get the Red Fyfe.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Ogilvie's man pronounced this Judkett wheat equal to the Red Fyfe.

Mr. WATSON. I am glad to hear it, but you will get no wheat as good as the Red Fyfe which will ripen earlier. It takes time to mature good wheat. Anything that matures earlier will be a poorer quality of wheat. It is a controversial question in the North-West, in the race between the farmers' wheat crop and the frost, whether it might not be better to grow the softer quality of wheat and get a surer crop. I am glad the Experimental Farm has been testing the qualities of these wheats, and it may be able to solve the question as to what is the best quality of wheat to grow in the North-West. I do not think it is worth discussing what is called the goose wheat. I would have desired that we should have had the report of the analyst on the different qualities of wheat, because that is what we have to rely upon. If the North-West at present is not fitted to grow a wheat that will command more than the average prices in the eastern markets, our country is no good, because the long hauls and the freights are such that we have to produce a wheat that will command a higher price in the markets of the east than the wheat which is grown in the east. I hope these experiments will be continued. There has been an experiment made in regard to the usefulness of frozen wheat for seed, and I know, from the experiments which have been made here, that they are about right. Several farmers in Manitoba have experimented with the frozen wheat, and the result of their experiments in their own soil has been about the same as that of the experiments made by Prof. Saunders on the Experimental Farm. Such experiments are of great value, because, without some authority as to the injury that might result from sowing wheat which has been injured to some extent by frost, the farmers might sow the grain and might have bad crops. Those tests are of great benefit to the country, and I hope the Minister of Agriculture will see that all these experiments are carried on and that there shall be no prejudice to any variety of wheat. It often happens that there is some prejudice in favor of the new varieties, but the plain facts and the results of the experiments should be stated to the public. The Board of Trade of Winnipeg is composed of men who are well qualified to judge of wheat, and they made a report which I hope the Minister will see fit to lay before the House.

Mr. CARLING. Professor Saunders is a very careful, cautious and judicious man, and he would hesitate very much in making any report in reference to this or any other kind of wheat until he was thoroughly satisfied of the accuracy. If this is not a hard wheat but a soft wheat, Professor Saunders will tell the public that it is so. If it is a hardy wheat, after obtaining reports from all parts of the country, after making an analysis of it, after it is ground and after bread is made from it, he will state its quality. He is making all kinds of experiments in order to be thoroughly satisfied that he is right before he makes his report, and when that report comes down, which will be, as I have stated, in the course of ten days, I will be only too glad if the hon. gentleman will make any possible criticism; but I am satisfied that Professor Saunders will send nothing to the public which is not in the public interest.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman opposite remarked that I said "hear, hear." When the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) was corrected by a stranger in the gallery and was put right, he had been endeavoring to suggest that the Minister of Agriculture was negligent of his duty and was allowing Professor Saunders to send out an inferior quality of wheat. I knew at the time that it was not an inferior kind of wheat which was distributed from the Experimental Farm, but that it was the Ladoga wheat. As a member of the Committee on Immigration and Colonisation, I knew what kind of wheat was being distributed, and its probabilities of success. It had been grown in a climate very similar to that of the North-West, and in a country where the season is even shorter. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) was evidently talking of what he did not understand, and I think he should admit that he was not properly informed in regard to that, because he was misrepresenting the facts after the Minister had stated that he was not distributing Kubanka wheat, but Ladoga.

Mr. MULOCK. I stated in the beginning what my informant afterwards confirmed. I stated that I was informed that the department had issued Kubanka wheat, and that the Toronto Board of Trade had pronounced against it. The Minister of Agriculture transferred the discussion to the subject of what he calls Ladoga wheat, and we went on that line for some time, and then came back to the other wheat. I am informed that the department issued to the Board of Trade two samples of wheat, one being the Kubanka and the other the Ladoga, and that the former was found to be nothing but the old goose wheat. That is what I stated, and that is what my informant tells me.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman was good enough, when he was corrected from the gallery by a gentleman who was a member of the Toronto Board of Trade, to admit that he was mistaken in saying that the Ladoga was a very inferior wheat. Now it was the goose wheat which has been condemned, but which was not being distributed by the agricultural farm; a small quantity, no doubt, had been procured for the purpose of testing it, but it was not distributed. I, myself, distributed some portions of the Ladoga wheat, and I had the best reports of it. I think the Minister is doing all he can, and hon. gentlemen are asking, perhaps, a little more information than he can possibly carry in his brain. We shall get all the information needed when the rest of the report comes down.

Mr. TEMPLE. I think I can give the House some information with reference to this Ladoga wheat. I got a sample of it from the Minister of Agriculture last spring, a small package, I think three pounds. I sent it home to one of my neighbors, and he sowed it beside a small strip of White Fyfe wheat. I am aware that it was a fortnight earlier than the White Fyfe, and that the three pounds produced one bushel of solid hard wheat. I think I can confirm the statement of the Minister of Agriculture and the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia, that it is the best wheat so far that I have seen, and that it can be raised profitably in our Province. We do not raise as much wheat as they do in the North-West or the Province of Ontario, but still we can grow wheat in our Province; and if we can find a kind of wheat that will ripen a fortnight earlier than that we have been sowing, it will prove a great advantage to the Province of New Brunswick. I am a farmer and have raised as many as 800 bushels of wheat in a year; consequently I am in a position to speak with knowledge on the subject.

Mr. McMILLAN. Last year I had a sample of barley and I consider it one of the best varieties I have seen, and I reported my experiment to the manager of the Central Farm. Let me say of Professor Saunders that I have had the pleasure of his acquaintance for a number of years, and I do not believe a more reliable man can be found in the country, or one that will give more correct results from the experiments. I am convinced that if there are any mistakes in the report they will be unknown to him. I would say also that the experiments in grain will be beneficial to every Province. I think they have got a variety of oats also that promises very fair, although they were only a moderate crop the first year. But there is one industry that has not been named yet; and that is the egg industry. I see that $100 has been spent in purchasing fowls for the Experimental Farm, and $75 in caring for them. The egg industry comes, I think, sixth in importance among the agricultural products of the Dominion, and we export over $2,000,000 worth. There are only five articles of which we export more in value than of eggs. I think, also, that we should go into very careful experiments in this direction, because these Government farms are able to make experiments that the average farmer has no opportunity of going into. The reason why I asked the amount of revenue derived from the farm was this: I found there had been 5,000 fruit baskets purchased, and if all these baskets had been sold with their contents for the small sum of 5 cents a piece, they would have yielded more than the whole revenue derived from the farm, which was only $207.37. I expected the Minister would have been able to give us more details; for instance, the amount expended on fencing, the amount expended for drainage, and the amount expended for clearing the land, because all these are items of importance to the agricultural community. However, I hope we shall have this information a little later.

Mr. SEMPLE. In regard to the barley, some of it was sent to my county—it was the two-rowed variety—and although it was found good for feeding, it was not suitable for malting purposes, and would not command a high price. I think the Minister of Agriculture ought to have been able to give us some information concerning results to-night, considering the large amount that has been expended on the farm. When we consider that from $70,000 to $80,000 has been spent in purchasing land and putting up the buildings afterwards, also paying the professors, and then $26,000 for labor, we should have had at least several satisfactory experiments made for the benefit of the public, whereas we have no account of a single experiment. I think there should have been an experiment made on one, or two, or ten acres, to show what amount of income could be derived from a certain portion of land in proportion to the expense laid out upon it in tilling, manuring, &c. For my part, the first time I saw this farm I thought it was a great mistake to purchase that land for an Experimental Farm. In the first place an enormous sum had to be paid for the purchase of the land; then 100 acres had to be cleared and drained, and after all that has been done the soil is of a poor description, and I do not think it will prove of good quality to grow crops. Another idea occurring to me the first time I saw it was, if the land was good why it was not cleared, being so near the city. I wondered why the owners of the land had not considered it of sufficient value to clear and cultivate it. The only thing I saw to recommend it was the nearness to the city, and I desired to see the experiments which I mentioned tried, because we hear it continually stated by those who are not engaged in the occupation that farming is a very remunerative business, and it is only by experiments and practical tests that it can be shown whether this assertion is correct or not. I would ask the Minister of Agriculture if he intends to make an experiment with the fertilisers that we were discussing the other day?

Mr. CARLING. Experiments have been made this last season, and I think we shall find the results stated in the appendix to the report.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). In looking through the Auditor General's Report, I find that in the matter of trees, vines and bushes, nearly $800 worth were purchased in the United States and only about $250 from our own nurserymen. I should like to know if that is to be taken as the proportion of purchases of trees and other products as between the United States' and our own nurseries, or are they purchased simply for experimental purposes? If for experimental purposes, would it not have been more fair to our own nurserymen to have bought about an equal share of their products and have made an even test in that way? What is the explanation of purchasing three times the quantity from United States' nurserymen as compared with the quantity from our own nurserymen?

Mr. CARLING. I can hardly at the moment give an explanation to the hon. gentleman, but I know that trees were purchased in the United States, Canada and Europe, and different trees have been obtained for experiment in Ontario and at the different branch farms. With respect to trees purchased in the United States, I shall be glad to give the hon. gentleman full information at a subsequent period.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No one can object to any reasonable expenditure in establishing these experimental farms, but it appears to me that the course of the Government in regard to this farm at Ottawa has been marked, to say the least of it, by very great extravagance, for which no proper explanation has been made either last year or this year. If I understood the Minister of Agriculture aright, this farm of 400 acres at Ottawa cost originally between $70,000 and $80,000. In addition to that amount of prime cost we find the Government have been obliged to spend $65,000 in one year's work. There may be reasons for a portion of that expenditure, but to tell me or to tell this House that it is necessary to expend $145,000 for fitting up 100 acres of an experimental farm is to tell me what I can hardly believe, and what the hon. gentleman has not satisfactorily explained. I cannot for the life of me see why such an experiment as we desire to carry out should not have been done, and exceedingly efficiently done at probably one-third or one-half the money already expended. There is no doubt we are in very great danger, in all these experiments, of injuring the cause we desire to serve, not of benefiting or promoting practical agriculture, but of expending money from which little benefit accrues, on account of the manner in which experiments are conducted. The Minister offered no explanation to my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), for the enormous charge of $26,000 for labor, for drainage and other purposes. The only thing he did say was, that of the 400 acres, which cost between $70,000 and $80,000, 150 acres were in such a condition that a very large sum, almost equal to the fee simple, had to be expended to get them into proper order. Although I do not pretend to be an authority as to the value of lands in Nova Scotia, yet I think on the Nappan Farm something of the same kind of extravagance has been manifested. There we see thirty-two acres bought at $140 an acre, and twenty acres more at $100 an acre. These are pretty stiff figures. I do not know where Nappan is, I regret to say. I understand from some hon. gentlemen that it is in the County of Cumberland, where, perhaps, land may have attained, for various purposes, exceptionally high figures, but in regard to all these figures the Government have shown little regard to the public purse in engaging in such large expenditures. No doubt, this Ottawa Experimental Farm, costing $145,000, has cost a great deal more than the value of any results we are able at present to obtain from it.

Mr. CARLING. With regard to the Nappan farm, hon. members from Nova Scotia will understand that marsh and dyke lands there, that is to say lands which are flooded with tides at certain seasons of the year, are worth from $100 to $140 an acre.

Mr. KIRK. In what part of Nova Scotia are they worth those sums?

Mr. CARLING. The dyke lands or marsh lands are considered to be of extra value; but the whole farm has not cost more than $53 an acre, although we did pay for about 30 acres of marsh land something like $140 an acre, which was considered a fair price.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. $140 an acre.

Mr. CARLING. I believe in Nova Scotia those dyke lands are valued very highly. With regard to the large expense in establishing the Experimental Farm near the city of Ottawa, I may say that the Government of Ontario have established a farm of 400 acres or 500 acres near the city of Guelph, and they paid for that farm originally $75,000, while the capital account up to the present time is something like $400,000. I fancy that farm has been conducted with all possible economy.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). The Minister must be mistaken. Up to last year the entire cost of the farm at Guelph was $280,000.

Mr. CARLING. I have it from a gentleman in whom I have every confidence, that the total cost up to the present time is over $400,000, the original cost being $75,000 for 500 acres. The land itself near Ottawa, with all the money that has been expended on it up to the present time, could be sold by the Government for an amount sufficient to cover the whole expense, including the cost of clearing and draining. I believe it to be of great advantage to have the farm so close to the city, so that the representatives of the people and the public in general can visit it and obtain all possible information in regard to experiments and other matters from the officers. The situation is a very good one, it being within two and a half or three miles from the centre of the city. I can assure the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that there has been no extravagance in the expenditure of money with regard to this farm. The land was purchased as cheaply as possible, and when we could not agree with the parties as to the price, arbitrators were called in and we obtained it at the lowest price possible. Everything that it was possible to do to keep down the expenditure has been done; but in obtaining a farm of nearly 500 acres we did not want to allow the clearing of 150 acres to spread over five or six years. The public expect results, and we thought it better at once to clear it up and place it in good condition, commence the experiments and give the results to the public. I am satisfied that when we have the farm in good working order and have conducted the experiments, the results will be entirely satisfactory to the public.

Mr. DICKEY. I know nothing about the farm in Ontario, but I hope the comments of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) are more accurate with respect to the Ottawa farm than they are with respect to the farm at Nappan. I can testify from personal knowledge that the farm which he speaks of has been bought at $140 an acre was well worth that, and in fact was cheap for the price. I may say that the particular portion which he selected for condemnation was really the cheapest part of the bargain. The total price paid for the farm is a fair price, it is not too much nor was it a bargain, but the adjoining farm which he did not mention, and which was purchased for $1,200, was bought at a great sacrifice. The Government got a great bargain in buying it at that price, for it was worth nearly double, but it was under mortgage and they got it through the mortgagee. I can testify that so far as the farm at Nappan is concerned there has been no disposition to extravagance, and the mode in which the farm is conducted is meeting with the approbation of the farmers in that neighborhood and is of immense service to them. Of course it is not taken hold of as rapidly at first as one might hope, but it is one of the things which begins at the top among intelligent farmers and has to work down. The intelligent farmers have become interested in it, they visit it, it is a constant object lesson to them, and they learn from it information which they could never obtain from books or pamphlets. It is doing a work which I believe cannot be done in any other way. The superintendent, who is a thoroughly practical man, has organised excursions to the farm, and by this means four or five hundred farmers have visited it and spread the knowledge they obtained there through the whole length and breadth of Nova Scotia. Without referring to the Ontario farm I am quite satisfied that every cent spent on the Nappan farm has been amply justified.

Mr. KIRK. How many acres in the Nappan farm?

Mr. CARLING. 310 acres.

Mr. KIRK. And that has cost $13,338.

Mr. DICKEY. Over $15,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It appears in the returns that there are only 200 acres, of which seventy-five acres appear to be of very little value as they were valued at only $13. That is what I presume my hon. friend refers to as the second farm. There were 100 acres purchased at various prices, averaging from $70 to $140 an acre, in all $10,000.

Mr. CARLING. I can state to the hon. gentleman that there are 300 acres at all events, and I think ten acres more.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They are not included here.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think the Minister must be mistaken, because if he will refer to page 147, he will find a voucher given by Mr. Saunders, the director, in reply to an enquiry from the Auditor General, giving a voucher to Mr. A. R. Dickey for $1,218. The quantity of land secured was a hundred acres and it now forms part of the Experimental Farm; the original purchase was 202 acres for $14,000, and the Dickey farm, $1,218. The hon. gentleman is right in saying that $140 is not an excessive price for some qualities of land in Nova Scotia, but the hon. gentleman ought remember that there is a great difference between what is called dyke land and marsh land. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the farm to say whether this was a dyke or farm or marsh land.

Mr. DICKEY. It is dyke land.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). There is also a very great difference in the value of the dyke land itself. The hon. gentleman is aware that some land reaches as high as $200 an acre in the Annapolis Valley.

Mr. DICKEY. Part of the farm is English dyke which was bought at $140, and part of it is salt marsh dyke which was bought at $100 an acre.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). At the time the purchase was made, the opinion of those who live in the neighborhood, and who are familiar with the value was that the price was excessive. Be that as it may the purchase has now been made. I observe that about $20,000 has been spent on this farm up to the present time. That farm was acquired in the early part of the year, and I presume the stock was not placed on it at a time when they would require to be fed with hay. I notice here a charge of $50 for hay; it is not a large amount to be sure, but I supposed that that dyke marsh would produce hay enough to feed stock.

Mr. CARLING. The farm was taken up very early in the spring before we could cut grass, I suppose.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I would ask the Minister whether it is his intention to make experiments on that farm as he has done at the Central Farm, and whether he proposes to make experiments in trees and fruit culture as well as with wheat and other grains? Also, whether the expenditure which has been made is sufficient to carry on those experiments and whether the farm is ready to be utilised for the purpose for which it was originally intended? A good deal has been said to-night with reference to the advantage of these farms, which I admit; but in order that this should be of benefit to the country, the information gained from them should be distributed generally. If this information as to the results from experiments in grains and fruits is confined to blue-books it will at best only reach very few people. I would suggest to the hon. Minister that as soon as he is in a position to give any reliable information on which the farmers throughout the country may base their expectations in future with reference to the different classes of grains and fruit, some cheap edition of the reports should be issued, and be very generally circulated throughout the Dominion. Without that I think we should lose very much of the advantage we hope to gain by these experimental farms, which in themselves are objects very much to be desired, and which I hope will be attended with the very best results.

Mr. CARLING. I would just say to my hon. friend that we are doing just what he suggests. Prof. Saunders issues bulletins, and over 12,000 farmers in the Dominion are now receiving them; and we shall be only too glad if hon. gentlemen will send in the names of prominent farmers in their constituencies, who take an interest in these experiments, with their post office addresses, and these bulletins will be regularly sent to them.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). To what extent would the hon. gentleman be disposed to send them? Of course, if we gave him a list of 4,000 or 5,000 farmers, it would be rather a heavy undertaking.

Mr. CARLING. I should think the hon. gentleman would have some regard to the expense, and would not wish them to be sent to that extent; but if he selects twenty or thirty or forty prominent farmers, and sends their names and addresses direct to Professor Saunders, the bulletins will be sent to them. An hon. member has just asked me whether they will be issued in French. I may say that they are distributed in both languages, and any names which may be sent by hon. members to me, or the secretary of the department, or Professor Saunders, will be promptly put upon the list.

Mr. MULOCK. Similar bulletins are issued by Cornell University, and it has a very good system. A note accompanies the first bulletin issued, asking the receiver to acknowledge its receipt and to state whether he desires to have it continued, and unless he does so the bulletins are not again sent to him. Perhaps it would be well, as a matter of economy, that Mr. Saunders should do the same thing.

Mr. CARLING. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has made the suggestion.

Mr. KIRK. Hon. gentlemen have spoken to-night of the benefits the farmers of the Dominion will receive from these experimental farms, not only that at Ottawa but those in other parts of the Dominion. To my mind the advantages to be derived by the farmers are yet to be ascertained. I am sorry the hon. Minister is not able to present the report of the superintendent of the farm at Ottawa before he asks us to vote this sum. Up to the present time members of the Opposition have been very ready to vote the money asked by the Minister without very much discussion, and I do not think that the hon. Minister can complain of the manner in which the discussion has gone on to-night. But, in looking over the expenses which have been made on account of these farms, and not knowing very much of the advantages the farmers have received from them up to the present time, it strikes one that a vast amount of money is being expended with very little return. So far as Nova Scotia is concerned, we do not expect much benefit from any importation of wheat, unless you can bring a better quality of wheat for the farmers of the west, and one which they can grow more cheaply, as we may in that way get our flour cheaper. But in looking over the accounts, it seems to me that the Experimental Farm here has been carried on in a rather extravagant manner. Apart from the cost of the Department of Agriculture, under the head of Civil Government, we have paid for salaries $25,939.40. Besides that, we have paid for farm laborers and drain diggers, $20,861.43. It does appear to me that this is a vast amount of money to pay for labor for one farm.

Mr. CARLING. It is not for the ordinary labor of carrying on the farm, but it is for clearing the farm and preparing it for the experiments.

Mr. KIRK. If I understand this amount of $25,939 was not paid for labor on the farm at all, but to scribes for writing, and I notice that the salaries paid range from $1 a day to girls up to $2,400 a year.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman is certainly reading from the wrong page, for we have no scribe there except one.

Mr. KIRK. I am reading from page C 126, of expenditures of the Agriculture Department, in connection with Civil Government. Then I notice that horses appear to be very high in price. I notice on page C 135, $550 entered as paid for a pair of horses, $250 for a dark chestnut and $235 for a light chestnut, and $500 for a span of heavy draught horses. These are very high prices to pay for farm horses. I notice also for the Nappan Farm that five horses were purchased at a cost of $1,025, or more than $200 each. I know something about the price of horses in Nova Scotia, and I know that there we can get a very good horse for less than $200; and it seems to me these are extravagant prices.

Mr. WATSON. What amount of land is under cultivation at Brandon this year, and how much will be under cultivation next year?

Mr. CARLING. I cannot answer that at present, but I will be glad to give the information, as I expect the agent in charge of the farm to be here in a day or two.

Mr. WATSON. Has he not made a report?

Mr. CARLING. The report is in the Appendix to Mr. Saunders' report and will be distributed to the members.

Mr. McMULLEN. I draw the attention of the Minister to the fact that these experimental farms and other places appear to be used as a means of recompensing political supporters. Take, for instance, Major's Hill Park. That place appears to be a kind of pasture ground for political hacks, as there is an enormous amount of money spent there that is absolutely useless. I also notice in connection with the Experimental Farm that no less than 19 valuers have been engaged at amounts running from $350 down to $50. What necessity was there for engaging valuers? Were they employed to value the horses and other purchases made? Was not Mr. Saunders capable of doing that work?

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Saunders did not employ the services of any gentleman to value any of the articles he has bought. These valuers were necessarily called in, in connection with the official arbitration, and by both sides. None of the charges the hon. gentleman refers to were contracted by Mr. Saunders for valuing horses or anything used on the farm.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was it absolutely necessary to have no less than 19 valuers?

Mr. CARLING. I cannot say. We had to expropriate, and we had to take this course. We left the matter in the hands of our solicitors, as did the claimants, and when the decision went against us we had to pay the costs.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see that Pinhey & Christie were paid $1,000 on account of costs and outlay. Was that their whole bill?

Mr. CARLING. They were employed on behalf of the department to look after these arbitrations. That includes the costs in connection with their part of the work. These arbitrations were made in the same way as in all other appropriations.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is a large amount of legal expenses.

Mr. CARLING. I cannot help that.

Mr. McMULLEN. I quite admit that in the establishment of an experimental farm expenses may have accrued over which the Minister had no control. There are always expenses at the outset, but now when we have everything we require I can see no reason why expenses of that character should again appear in the list. The House is quite willing to grant any sum necessary to advance the agricultural interest, but it would be highly unwise on our part to sanction the passing of items for useless expenditure. I hope that in future these expenses will not be run up to the enormous sum they have reached this year.

Mr. STE. MARIE. Will the hon. gentleman explain the charges for freight, $169.88 to the Canada Atlantic Railway Company, $878.38 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, making $1,048 for freight during the year?

Mr. CARLING. This is freight on material for the farm, drainage tiles lumber and other things, and it is not in connection with the ordinary working of the farm.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). Then I find there is paid to Ferguson $726, to O'Gara $312 and to L. A. Olivier $176; so that the total amount which it cost on that farm for arbitration and law costs was $3,879. When the Minister brings down his statement, will he also bring down a statement of the services rendered by these valuers and arbitrators, and of the amount paid for law costs? Of course, I understand that there must be a certain amount spent for examining titles and things of that kind.

Mr. CARLING. Mr. O'Gara was not employed by the Government at all, but by the owners of the land, to contest the purchase, and make us go to arbitration and bring forward the witnesses, and to put us to all the trouble he could. The decision was against us and we had to pay all his expenses.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It was a rule with the old black-letter lawyers that it was a disgrace to hold a piece of property that cost less than the patent, and it seems to me that we are getting back to that view when it costs so much to investigate the titles.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I suppose the Minister of Agriculture will publish the experiments which he has made with valuers and lawyers with the other experiments?

Mr. CARLING. I will speak to the professor about that.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I hope they will not use any more hand-spikes on this farm. I see they cost $1.50 each. In my time we used to make them ourselves.

Census and Statistics, including preliminary preparations for Census of 1891 ..... $15,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What gentleman has charge of that? I suppose the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. CARLING. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid it is rather late to make the suggestion, but it has appeared to me that it would be for the benefit of the public service to alter the date of our census taking. In England, the United States, and other countries, the census is taken at the same period—1880, 1890, or 1870, as the case may be—and it would be of great advantage if we could make our decennial period agree with that. I am not certain that the British North America Act does not stand in our way, but it would not be very difficult to have that changed, and the advantages are obvious. For purposes of comparison, it would be very advisable that we should have our census taken at the same time.

Mr. CARLING. The census is taken in Canada in the same year as in Great Britain and all her colonies, that is, not in 1880 and 1890, but in 1881 and 1891. The census year is uniform throughout the British Empire.

Mr. MULLOCK. That is a conclusive answer to the remarks of my hon. friend, and I think it would be highly undesirable to make any change.

Committee rose and reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11:35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 25th February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 70) to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act.—(Mr. Amyot.)

ALBERTA RAILWAY AND COAL COMPANY.

Mr. SHANLY moved the third reading of Bill (No. 14) to incorporate the Alberta Railway and Coal Company.

Mr. WATSON. When this Bill was last up for discussion on the third reading, I desired to move an amendment, which was ruled out of order, and I gave notice that I would move it when the Bill next came before the House. The amendment was as follows:—

"That the said Bill be not now read the third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole in order to insert a clause providing that the maximum rate of coal carried over the company's line shall not exceed one cent per ton per mile."

In talking over the matter with several gentlemen connected with the carrying of freight, I found there was a difference in opinion as to whether I should embody a maximum rate in my amendment or not. With the consent of the House I will drop the words referring to the rate of a cent per ton per mile, and move simply that the Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, so that the committee can fix a maximum rate. I, therefore, move:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions to insert a maximum rate per ton per mile.

Mr. SHANLY. I trust the House will not accept this amendment. I object to it upon general principles, because it would be entirely new legislation for Parliament to undertake to fix the tariff of railways. The general Railway Act provides a mode of appeal if railway rates are considered unjust. We might as well undertake to fix the tariff of the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway, and all the other railways of the Dominion, if we are to interfere, as in this instance, with an already chartered railway. I object to the amendment on general principles, because the legislation suggested would be novel and unjust. I object to it particularly because this railway, I repeat, is not seeking a new charter, it is a chartered and working line. I hold that it would be an interference with vested rights to take the opportunity, now that the company applies to Parliament to obtain power to expend more money and extend its road to the frontier, to try and impose a parliamentary tariff, as I may call it, on this road, which is already subject to the general provisions of the Railway Act, and in regard to whose tariff an appeal can be made to the Governor in Council if it should be considered onerous or unjust.

Bill (No. 52) to incorporate "The Lac Seul Railway Company."—(Mr. Daly.)

ONTARIO LOAN AND DEBENTURE COMPANY.

Mr. CARPENTER (for Mr. MONCRIEFF) moved second reading of Bill (No. 48) to consolidate the borrowing powers of the Ontario Loan and Debenture Company, and to authorise them to issue debenture stock.

Mr. LISTER. This Act ought to be explained. Under the law as it now stands those loan companies have the right to issue debentures for borrowing money.

Mr. CARPENTER. Perhaps it will be better to let the Bill stand until Mr. Moncrieff arrives.

Mr. MULOCK. Before doing so I would venture this suggestion. There are a great many loan companies in this Dominion now, and it appears to me it would be better to formulate a set of powers for loan companies, so that they would all have uniform charters. I remember at one time when the banks all had different charters and different powers, and the result caused great confusion. The staff were constantly changing from bank to bank, mistakes were liable to occur, and in questions arising before the courts each charter had to have a separate construction. Ultimately the Banking Act was adopted, and I believe that the change was found to be a good one. When we consider the amount of capital invested in loan companies, I think the Government will see that the money involved in those companies is sufficient to justify them in bringing in a uniform Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is a great deal in the hon. gentleman's suggestion. It would be well to have a general law for all those loan, debenture, and investment companies, so as to have certain general clauses to apply to them all, and if any particular corporation applies for special powers these should be included in the Bill. I think the suggestion is a valuable one. However, I do not suppose that we can get up that Bill this Session, but in the meantime I do not think we ought stop any Bill of this kind from going to its second reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Two other companies have this power now.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) says that two other companies now have the power asked for by this company.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not know what this company asks for.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Nor I.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not wish, therefore, to be understood as objecting to it, but I think in order to make a beginning it would be wise if the Committee on Banking and Commerce would insert in this and other Bills they may report upon, a clause that those companies shall be liable to be brought under the general Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. MULOCK. We did that, I think, in regard to railway Bills before we adopted the general clauses.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Some years ago I had occasion to suggest to the House that all those companies should be incorporated under a general law. This sort of special legislation has been done away with in the States, and in the State of Michigan all special Acts are abolished except for municipal corporations. They are all organised under a general law with this exception, and I think that a measure of that description should be adopted here. A moment ago I heard a couple of Bills ordered to stand because the Minister of Justice had no opportunity to look into their provisions. This is rather a cumbrous duty to impose upon the Minister of Justice, and I repeat what I have said on former occasions, that all those private Bills ought to be printed and circulated at the opening of the Session, so that all the members of the House could, if they liked, consider their provisions. The simplest mode would be to pass a general Act under which all those companies could be incorporated, and it would settle the question once for all. That is the suggestion I made some years ago, and the propriety of it is admitted to-day. It is not indispensable, but it is necessary that we should do this, and I do not see why we should not adopt such a course.

Motion for second reading allowed to stand.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE, KINGSTON.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved second reading of Bill (No. 46) to amend the Act respecting Queen's College at Kingston.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. gentleman ought to give the House some information with regard to this measure. I see it is a Bill relating to superior education, and it has to do with an institution which, I think, by the British North America Act, is placed exclusively under the control of the Provincial Legislature. I do not see upon what ground the hon. gentleman is asking this House to legislate on the subject. I do not think this House has anything to do with the subject of education, except as specially provided by the British North America Act. When the Provincial Legislatures encroach upon certain denominational rights by their legislation, then the parties have the right to come here and ask the protection of this House against such encroachment. But this Bill does not disclose anything of that sort; it does not disclose any attempt on the part of the Legislature to take away from any denomination any right that has been secured by the provisions of the Constitution. So far as I know, there are but two instances in which this House has undertaken to deal with the subject of education at all. The one is in regard to the establishment of a military school as an incident to our power to deal with the volunteer and defensive force of the country; and the other, in regard to the examination of parties who are to be employed as masters on board of ships. Whether in the second case we have exceeded our authority or not, it is not now necessary to discuss. But in this Bill it is proposed to deal with an institution which, by its Act of incorporation, is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Province of Ontario, within which it is situated. Its Act of incorporation, I believe, was passed years before the Union, but in the division of powers it would fall within the control of the Ontario Legislature, and that Legislature would have as much control over that charter as if it had been granted subsequent to the Union.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Queen's College at Kingston is, I contend, not a college of a provincial nature; its influence extends over the whole Dominion. It is an institution in connection with the Presbyterian Church of Canada, which extends from one end of the Dominion to the other, and its subscribers and supporters are found in every part of the Dominion. Moreover, the Royal charter under which it was founded gives it the right to carry on its work in all the Provinces of British North America. This Parliament has recognised its jurisdiction, because we have already passed an Act in reference to Queen's College at Kingston; and if my hon. friend will read the preamble of this Bill, he will see that its purpose is to amend the Act 45 Victoria, chapter 123, an Act passed here in the year 1882, establishing a university council, and changing some of the provisions of the Royal charter. Surely it comes within the jurisdiction of this House to pass an Act amending one of its own Acts. The Provincial Legislature at Toronto, or that at Quebec, could not pretend to amend an Act of this House. The present Bill provides that the university council may have the right to prescribe certain religious tests to the trustees. I submit that this question would be more easily and fairly discussed before the Committee on Private Bills.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Section 93 of the British North America Act provides that "in and for each Province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education."

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. This Bill does not relate to education. It only relates to the domestic affairs of this corporation, which carries on a work throughout the whole Dominion, and it is as much an Act under the jurisdiction of this House, as an Act relating to an hospital, or an Act relating to incorporated religious bodies.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The question is rather an important one as brought up by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and it must receive full consideration before this Bill becomes law; but my hon. friend who promotes the Bill, says very truly that, rightly or wrongly, the Dominion Parliament has passed an Act relating to Queen's College, and the Act which he now lays before this House is an amendment of the Dominion Act. Of course the objection of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) applies to the Act proposed to be amended, and as we have committed ourselves to that Act, of which this is merely an amendment—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is more.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—I would suggest to my hon. friend to allow this Act to go to the Committee on Private Bills. Of course, I do not agree with my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) that the Committee on Private Bills can discuss a constitutional question, but as this is an amendment to an Act we have already passed, they can decide whether it ought to be adopted or not, and then, when their report comes up, we can discuss the question of constitutionality.

Mr. CASEY. I differ from the right hon. First Minister in his opinion that the time to discuss the constitutional question is on the third reading. The right hon. gentleman says we have already affirmed the principle of interference with those educational institutions, by a former Act. It does not at all follow that our action then was justifiable. We have often, as the right hon. gentleman knows, passed Bills which were found afterwards to have been beyond our power. He must have a lively recollection of that. The time to consider the constitutional question is now, and the fact that such a Bill was passed before, shows only that its passing must have been due to inadvertence or to the absence of some who take a special interest in educational matters. It seems to me most extraordinary that this Parliament should have assumed—I was not aware of it until just now—to legislate on the subject at all. I do not see that there is even room for concurrent legislation in the matter. The British North America Act provides distinctly that education is to be within the control of the Provincial Legislatures; and we would be endorsing an utterly vicious principle if we were to assume to amend an Act which we had, in the first place, no right whatever to pass. This is a Bill which nobody who takes any interest in the colleges in Ontario can allow to pass without protest. Should it pass, it will be just as competent for this House to interfere with the management and the constitution of the University of Toronto, as it is to interfere with the University of Queen's, the one being just as much a Dominion institution as the other. In fact, neither of them is a Dominion institution; and if we have the right to meddle with the affairs of Queen's, we have an equal right to interfere with the affairs of the University College of Toronto. We would have the right just as well to say how the Senate of the Toronto University shall be elected, and to meddle with its affairs in every respect, for, although endowed by the Province, it is an educational institution like every other, and might be declared by this House to be a Dominion educational institution, just the same as Queen's College. The hon. member for Frontenac tries to bring the question within our powers by saying that this college operates in all parts of the Dominion. Of course, that is an unintentional inaccuracy of statement. The college only operates in Kingston, but no doubt draws its revenue and students from all parts of the Dominion, and even the United States. The University and College of Toronto draw students from all parts of the Dominion, and are to that extent as much Dominion institutions as Queen's. Take Victoria College, now at Cobourg, but shortly to be removed to Toronto under provincial legislation. Victoria is in exactly the same position as Queen's. It is supported by the Methodist Church throughout the Dominion, draws subscriptions and students from all parts of the Dominion, and is, therefore, entirely independent of provincial aid. It would be just as much in our rights to interfere with the management of Victoria College as with Queen's College. I am sure my right hon. friend would be the last to interfere with the concerns of a church college like that of Victoria. I do not think he could have been cognizant of our interference in the affairs of Queen's College, or he would not have permitted it. When he looks into this question, he will see it is improper to go on in the vicious line we have taken, and I would suggest that the Bill should stand until he has time to look into the constitutional question, and we should also have time to look into that matter, and the constitutional question should be argued on the second reading, and not before the Committee on Private Bills, or on the third reading, because then we are supposed to have settled all constitutional points with regard to the measure. We could only settle then whether the Bills were in a proper shape to pass. The right hon. gentleman will see this is opening up a very large subject, unsettling the bases of all the colleges in Ontario and Quebec—of the Ottawa College, or the Laval University—and will interfere with the appropriation which has been voted for Catholic education in Quebec in connection with the Jesuits' estates. The hon. gentleman is opening up the whole question of interference with provincial education, and the revenues of provincial colleges. I call upon all those who are interested in maintaining the independence of educational institutions, of whatever denomination, to insist that this House should not interfere with the independence of those institutions, and the rights given to Provincial Legislatures by the British North America Act.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. This Act does not propose at all to interfere with education. It does not interfere with the right of giving degrees or the manner of granting them, or anything of that sort, but the Queen's College, Kingston, is an institution under the Presbyterian Church of Canada. That church, when it was formed, under the name of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, applied to the different Provincial Legislatures, and obtained Acts incorporating it, and it was then believed that the temporalities would be regulated under the various Acts of the Provincial Legislatures. You will remember a suit which was taken by some clergyman in Montreal and was carried to the Privy Council, and there those Acts were declared unconstitutional. In consequence of that decision of the Privy Council, the Presbyterian Church had to come here and get the Act passed, chapter 124, 45 Victoria, relating to the temporalities fund of the Presbyterian Church of Canada. Now, the Queen's College of Kingston, was managed by this church; and the church authorities had obtained an Act from the Provincial Legislature giving them authority to constitute this council, but grave doubts were cast on the legality of the Act, and to remove all doubts they came to this House in 1882, at the same time that the Presbyterian Church of Canada came here and obtained the Act which it is now sought to amend.

Mr. LAURIER. Was it discussed at length?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes; the judgment of the Privy Council was then before every hon. member, and it must have been the opinions of hon. members that this House had jurisdiction in the matter, since they passed the Act to which I refer.

Mr. SCRIVER. It is the Bill you have now introduced which proposes to amend the Act of 1882.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes, and to allow the council then established to appoint certain trustees and to prescribe the religious tests which those trustees shall take.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I think the suggestion of the hon. gentleman for Elgin (Mr. Casey) should be adopted, because, if the Bill is read a second time we have adopted the principle of the Bill, and the committee will not be able to interfere with that principle. They cannot go back on the opinion of the House after the Bill has passed the second reading.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). This is a very important matter, because the Bill which was passed in 1882 was one which was intended to remedy a supposed defect in the Ontario Act, and the preamble contains a declaration that:

"Certain powers were by the said Act conferred upon the said council, and it is desirable to confirm all Acts and proceedings of, and connected with, the said council, done and taken under the said Act, and to confirm the constitution and the powers of the said council as set forth and provided by the said Act."

So it would seem that, on that occasion, the Dominion Parliament assumed power over Queen's College, and passed an Act to ratify the legislation of the Ontario Legislature.

Mr. CASEY. There was Ontario legislation on that subject.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). There was Ontario legislation, and the preamble refers to it in this way:

"Whereas an Act was passed by the Legislature of the Province of Ontario, in the 38th year of Her Majesty's reign, and chaptered 76, intitled 'An Act respecting Queen's College at Kingston,' and whereas doubts have arisen regarding the validity of the said Act, it is desirable to confirm all things which have been properly done relying upon the validity thereof."

It would seem, from the cursory attention I have been able to give to those measures, that, after the Presbyterian Church in Canada was united and became the general church for the whole country, Queen's College was anxious to become co-extensive with the Presbyterian Church in Canada, and the first section of this Act is evidently intended to make Queen's College the Canadian college under the Presbyterian Church. It was therefore brought under the control of the Dominion Parliament, but it seems to be very important that we should consider carefully the Act which was passed at that time, particularly when it was passed in order to give validity to a doubtful Act of the Province of Ontario.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with my hon. friend opposite as to the gravity of the question. My suggestion was that, in order to expedite business, as we had, rightly or wrongly, passed a Bill connected with the college, and this Bill is intended to amend the Dominion Act, we might, in order to expedite business, send it to the Committee on Private Bills in order that they might investigate the question of jurisdiction in regard to these amendments. On the report of the committee we may discuss the question. I need not say to an old parliamentarian like my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that it has been the practice for years that the second reading of a Bill of this kind might be understood to take place pro forma, and the discussion might take place at a later stage of the Bill. That is my proposition, and if the House agree that we have jurisdiction, then, on the subsequent stage, the Bill may be thrown over until the end of the Session; but I quite agree with my hon. friends, that, if we send the Bill to the committee, it must be with the understanding that the whole question of jurisdiction may be brought up at a later stage.

Mr. LAURIER. Under the circumstances I suppose we may adopt the plan suggested by the First Minister, that the Bill should be read to-day pro forma, and the question will come up at a later stage.

Mr. CASEY. If no question of jurisdiction is admitted, that is all right.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

TORONTO SCHOOL OF CAVALRY.

Mr. LOVITT (for Mr. LANGELIER, Montmorency) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish another School of Cavalry this year in the Province of Ontario; and if so, whether the officers forming part of the Quebec school will obtain promotion?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Estimates which have been brought down show the amount of money which is placed for the purpose of the School of Cavalry in Toronto. When the school is organised, the officers of the Quebec school will get promotion according to the ordinary regulations.

HOSPITAL DUES ON SHIPS.

Mr. LÉPINE asked, 1st. In what ports of the Dominion does the Government collect hospital dues on ships? 2nd. What amount was collected in each of the said ports during last season? 3rd. How many seamen were under treatment in each of the said ports during the season? 4th. How much did the Government pay to the hospitals of the several ports during last season?

Mr. TUPPER. The Government collects hospital dues in all ports in Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia. In reference to the second branch of the question, the accounts are made up for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, and are to be found on page 85 of the Auditor General's Report, which is now on the Table. In regard to the third and fourth sections of the question, I would suggest that, with the consent of the House, the hon. gentleman should change that into a motion for returns, as the information required in reply to the question is very lengthy.

Mr. CASEY. It might be laid on the Table.

Mr. TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. Did I understand the Minister to say that the information is ready if the motion were to pass now?

Mr. TUPPER. No, but it will be ready in a day or two. It is very lengthy.

DREDGE IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. PERRY asked, Are the repairs to the dredge Prince Edward completed? If so, what is the cost of the same? In which of the harbors of Prince Edward Island is the dredge to commence work, and at what date?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The repairs were completed in November last. The whole cost was $12,693. I am not in a position to say in which harbors the dredge will commence work, because I will have to cause a list to be made so as to see which is the most pressing.

FISHERY OVERSEER FOR ARTHABASKA.

Mr. TURCOT asked, Whether the Government have received from P. C. Bourke, since his appointment as fishery overseer for the district of Arthabaska, any money derived from fines; if so, what amounts have been collected from that source each year up to the date of the opening of the present Session, and from what persons?

Mr. TUPPER. No money has been received for fines from P. C. Bourke up to the present time. There has been no return of fines collected.

WHARF AT RIMOUSKI.

Mr. FISET asked, Who are the parties who tendered for the repairs now being made to the wharf at Rimouski by the Government? What is the amount of each tender? What is the name of the party to whom the contract was awarded?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The names of the parties who tendered, with the amounts of tenders, were Connors & McDonald, $14,373.30; Dussault & Beaulieu, $10,004.10; James Brown, $10,440.20; R. R. Call, $14,554.60; J. C. Plante, $17,627.40; Charles Velleux, $11,859.30. The contract was awarded to Dussault & Beaulieu.

ST. CHARLES BRANCH RAILWAY.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, 1. The total cost of the St. Charles Branch Railway, including stations, storehouses, and all accommodations, up to the 1st of January, 1889. 2. The length of the line?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The total cost of the St. Charles Branch Railway, including stations, storehouses, and all accommodations, up to the 1st of January, 1889, was $375,895.75. Length of line, 15 miles.

PICTOU BRANCH RAILWAY.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, The total cost of the Pictou Branch Railway, including stations, storehouses, and all accommodations, up to the 1st of January, 1889?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. $535,603.56.

CAYUGA POST OFFICE.

Mr. COLTER asked, What is the cost of the Cayuga post office up to the present time? To whom have the different payments been made, and the amount of said payments?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The site was purchased from Messrs. Humphrey & Murray for $450. There were professional services (C. G. Sander), amounting to about $43; survey and plans (Henry Lowe), $13; contractors (Draper Bros.), $8,380; travelling expenses, superintending architect's, &c., $73.30; foundation (A. Trudel), $6.30; blue prints (D. A. McLaughlin), $6.30; box fronts (E. Chanteloup), $536.15; advertising, $211.79; printing (Government printing office), $9.94; total, $9,735.03.

Mr. COLTER asked, Who has acted as superintendent of works in the construction of the Cayuga post office, and what remuneration has been paid or promised to such superintendent or inspector by the Government?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There was no special superintendent, or clerk of works, appointed. The superintendence was made by officials of the department.

SUMS PAID TO W. A. WEBSTER.

Mr. COLTER asked, What sums of money have been paid by the Government to W. A. Webster during each of the financial years, 1887 and 1888, and since the first day of July, 1888, and for what services was he paid?

Mr. CARLING. If my hon. friend will put this in the shape of a motion, I shall be very glad to bring the information down.

Some hon. MEMBERS. It will not be reached.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. O yes, it will. I will undertake that it shall be reached.

Mr. COLTER. If the hon. gentleman will consent, I would now move that the return be ordered.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Carried.

BREAKWATER AT SUMMERSIDE, P. E. I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Has the Department of Public Works received a petition praying for a breakwater at Summerside, Prince Edward Island? If so, is it the intention of the Minister of Public Works to order a survey of the contemplated work immediately?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A petition has been received from the Hon. Mr. Lefurgey and others, praying for the construction of a breakwater. Authority has been given to make an examination, which will be done at the proper time.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 71) respecting corrupt practices in Municipal Affairs (from the Senate).—(Mr. Thompson.)

Bill (No. 72) to make further provision respecting enquiries concerning Public Matters (from the Senate).—(Mr. Thompson.)

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—ACCIDENT TO MR. NOEL FORTIN.

Mr. Fiset moved for:

Report of enquiry and correspondence between the Government and Mr. Noel Fortin, of the Parish of St. Fabien, respecting an accident which happened to him on the Intercolonial Railway in April, 1887.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The return was made in answer to an Order of the House last Session. There is no subsequent correspondence.

Motion withdrawn.

RETURNS ORDERED.

1st. In what ports of the Dominion the Government collect hospital dues on ships? 2nd. What amount was collected in each of the said ports during last season? 3rd. How many seamen were under treatment in each of the said ports during the season? 4th. How much the Government have paid to the hospitals of the several ports during last season?—(Mr. Lépine.)

Return showing what sums of money have been paid by the Government to W. A. Webster during each of the financial years, 1887 and 1888, and since the 1st July, 1888, specifying the services for which he was paid.—(Mr. Colter.)

Return showing public buildings erected in various places throughout the Dominion from 1st July, 1867, to 1st January, 1889; giving date of first appropriation made for same, locality in which erected, and total cost to date of 1st January, 1889.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Return showing the date at which Mr. Speaker received the certificate of the Judge in each of the following cases—in the Election trial of Halton, Shelburne, Northumberland (East), Haldimand, Joliette, Laprairie, Maskinongé, Cumberland and Kent; the date of the Speaker's warrant, and the date of the writ for a new election.—(Mr. Mills, Bothwell.)

Copies of all correspondence with the Department of Railways and Canals on the subject of the late break in Cornwall Canal, and of all plans and suggestions by Civil Engineers and others for the prevention of the recurrence of such break; also there part of Mr. John Page, Chief Engineer of Canals, thereon.—(Mr. Bergin.)

Copies of all correspondence between the Governments of Ontario and Quebec, or any of the members of the said Governments, respecting the northern boundaries of the said two Provinces.—(Mr. Langelier, Montmorency.)

Copies of all Orders in Council, correspondence, and other documents respecting the disallowance of Acts passed by the Province of Quebec in 1887.—(Mr. Langelier, Montmorency.)

Copies of all Orders in Council, correspondence, and other documents respecting the disallowance of the Act respecting the Bar of the Province of Quebec, passed in 1883; in which Act the Batonnier Général was granted precedence over all other lawyers.—(Mr. Langelier, Montmorency.)

Copies of all Orders in Council, correspondence, and other documents respecting beach lots in the Province of Quebec.—(Mr. Langelier, Montmorency.)

Copies of all Orders in Council, correspondence, and other documents in relation to the disallowance of the Act respecting magistrates.—(Mr. Langelier, Montmorency.)

Copies of all Orders in Council, correspondence, and other documents in relation to the disallowance of the Act for the conversion of the debt.—(Mr. Langelier, Montmorency.)

Return of Customs buildings in cities and towns of less than 20,000 population, built or now under construction at the public expense; showing date of construction, cost to date, revenue derived during the last financial year, and population of the city or town in each case.—(Mr. Casey.)

Return of the number of deserters from the North-West Mounted Police for the ten years ended the 31st December, 1888; the number of the whole force in each of the years from 31st December, 1878, to 31st December, 1888. The number of recruiting parties sent out in each of the years of the ten ended on the 31st December, 1888, and the cost of the same.—(Mr. Davin.)

Return showing the amount of money paid on account of work performed or material furnished for opening or improving public roads or streets in the city of Ottawa, from the 1st of July, 1888, to the 1st of January, 1889. The names of the party or parties to whom paid, for what paid, and the amount. The name or names of all parties in charge as inspectors or superintendents, and the amount per day or month paid to them.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Return showing the total amount of expense incurred and moneys paid up to 1st January, 1889, on account of the preparation, publication and completion:

1. Of the various lists under the Dominion Franchise Act upon which the last General Election was held; and stating—

- (a) The total amount paid for printing;
- (b) The total amount paid to revising barristers;
- (c) The total amount paid to revising barristers, clerks and bailiffs;
- (d) The total amount paid for all other expenses in connection with preparation, publication and completion of the said lists;
- (e) Whether any claims against the Government in connection with the preparation of the lists are yet unsettled.

2. Showing the expense incurred up to 1st February, 1889, in connection with the preparation of the second voters' list under the Dominion Franchise Act, and stating—

- (a) The total cost of type used, or to be used, in setting up the lists;
- (b) The amount paid for composition in setting up the lists;
- (c) The cost of paper and presswork in preparation of the lists;
- (d) The cost or rental of plant used in connection with the preparation of said lists up to the above date;
- (e) Amount of all other expenses incurred in connection with the preparation of the said lists up to 1st February, 1889.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Copies of all correspondence respecting the awarding of the contract for carrying the mail between Becancour Station and Ste. Julie de Somerset, and between Inverness and Ste. Julie de Somerset, awarded in or about the month of April, 1888; also of all tenders connected therewith.—(Mr. Turcot.)

Return showing:—

1. The number of immigrants that have arrived at the several ports of entry in Canada each year, from 1st July, 1867, to 1st January, 1889, distinguishing their several occupations, with the number in each.
2. The number reported as having settled in Canada, and number that went to United States, in each year.
3. The number received at the several immigration offices in each year during same period.
4. The amount of money expended annually for immigration purposes.—(Mr. Brien.)

Return of all evidence, papers and correspondence relating to the liability of the Government to construct, or to aid in constructing, a bridge across the Grand River, at the village of York, in the county of Haldimand.—(Mr. Colter.)

Return of amount of export duty collected or paid on sawlogs and other lumber in the year 1888, specifying at what custom house such duty was paid, and the respective amounts paid at each custom house.—(Mr. Weldon, St. John.)

Return of the report of Henry F. Perley, Esq., upon the harbor of St. John, N.B., and the improvements recommended by him.—(Mr. Weldon, St. John.)

Return showing the amount of duty collected upon baskets and boxes containing fruits admitted free of duty since May 1st, 1888.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Return of report of Engineer Crawford in 1877-78 and all subsequent reports made on the Beauharnois Canal; also, reports of Engineers made on the North Shore of the St. Lawrence between Lakes St. Francis and St. Louis. Also, resolutions, letters, &c., of boards of trade, corporations, and even from individuals, regarding such works.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

Copies of all the correspondence with the Department of Railways and Canals in connection with the opening of the canals of the Dominion for Sunday traffic. Also a statement of the number of steamboats and vessels passing through the several canals between the date of the order permitting the same and the close of navigation in the year 1888. Also copies of all instructions to the superintendents of the several canals.—(Mr. Rykert.)

Copies of all reports of the engineers and other officers employed by the Department of Railways and Canals on the subject of water power in the new Welland Canal.—(Mr. Rykert.)

Copies of the several tenders and all papers, letters and contract for the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Copies of all correspondence, reports, &c., between the officials of the Intercolonial Railway and Mr. Louis Fortin, of St. Octave de Metis, in relation to the killing of a horse by the cars in October, 1888.—(Mr. Fiset.)

Return of all sales made of Indian lands on the west side of the Grand River, in the village of Cayuga, in the county of Haldimand; copies of all instructions given to the valuers of said lands the reports of said valuers, and all correspondence and papers relating thereto.—(Mr. Colter.)

HOME RULE FOR IRELAND.

On the Order, Resolutions on the subject of granting a measure of Home Rule to Ireland.—(Mr. Cook.)

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose these resolutions will not be opposed. If not, I will move them, in the absence of Mr. Cook.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think my hon. friend can argue this case so well as the hon. mover of the resolutions, and therefore they had better stand.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not propose to argue them. I submit them as an undiscussed motion.

Resolutions allowed to stand.

9TH BATTALION.

Mr. AMYOT moved for:

Address to His Excellency the Governor General for copies of all official correspondence between the Government and the commanding officer of the 9th Battalion, "Voltigeurs de Québec," during the North-West campaign of 1885, and respecting the same. 2nd. Copies of the various reports furnished to the Government and the military authorities by General Strange, respecting the part he took in the North-West campaign of 1885; as well as those respecting the dividing up of the force under his command. 3rd. Copies of the report furnished to General Strange by the commandant of the 9th Battalion, V.Q., respecting the operations carried out by the said 9th Battalion during the said campaign.

He said: When I last had the honor of addressing this House on this subject, I showed that the 9th Battalion had not volunteered its services, but did not think it would have been proper to refuse to serve when called on. The telegrams I quoted showed that they were very prompt in answering the call, for in a few hours we were ready to start. We went as fast as we could until we reached Winnipeg, where we went into camp, and there we remained a rather long time. I will read to the House the correspondence in the Winnipeg papers and telegrams, and explain how it was we succeeded at last in being sent further west. In the Manitoba daily Free Press, of 17th April, 1885, under the heading, "City Gossip," appeared the following:—

"Since the delay of the 9th Battalion of Quebec in this city, and the 65th of Montreal at Calgary, rumours have been circulated to the effect that they have refused to fight against the French half-breeds. The officers of the battalions wish to contradict the rumours, and say that they have come here armed and desirous of assisting in putting down the rebellion. They discountenance every act of violence, and the fact that they are here prepared, if need be, to shed their blood for the preservation of law and order speaks volumes for their loyalty to Canada. The feelings of the men have been deeply wounded by these false reports, as they are anxious to go to the front."

In answer to that the following appeared in the same paper under the heading, "The Quebec Battalion":—

"SIR,—When these unfortunate troubles broke out in the North-West, I was residing in Montreal as an ex-telegrapher. I volunteered to accompany the troops in connection with military field telegraphic operations. Here I was detailed to the 9th Battalion of Quebec. I would like space in your journal for a few words of vindication respecting an item in your issue of this morning, headed "City Gossip," being rather hard on the bravery of this command. As a British Canadian, not having previously known the personnel of the regiment, I can solemnly affirm, since my attachment to the corps, and in camp, I have freely mixed with the rank and file daily. As one who speaks French fluently, I have no hesitation in stating that no more patriotic, loyal and brave men, from Colonel Amyot down to the humblest private, have entered this town, prepared to do their duty, irrespective of creed or nationality, whether called from their peaceful homes to the far North-West, or to the lower Gulf Provinces. On the way here in crossing the gaps they are said to have made the fastest marching time and to have arrived without a single man on the sick list. They are miserably camped on a low marshy ground, daily waiting orders to proceed further west, but until these are given by General Middleton (who, by the way, is married to a French Canadian lady), they are reluctantly forced to remain 'squatters' in the outskirts of Winnipeg, a city that, to my eye, has before it a great future. These men are not even now fully equipped. It should not be forgotten either that the 65th of Montreal and this regiment were the first to proceed at a day's notice from the Province of Quebec to this far distant west, while nearly all that have followed and passed on since have had more time to fully equip and prepare.

"WINNIPEG, April 17, 1885."

"JOHN HORN.

To this communication the editor added, as a note:

"Mr. Horn seems to have misapprehended the remarks made in the paragraph to which he refers. They were not calculated to reflect on the men of the Quebec Battalions, but rather to contradict the disagreeable rumours circulated with regard to them."

On the 20th April, the following appeared in the Winnipeg Daily Sun:—

"The 9th Battalion is now in camp on the old Driving Park grounds, having removed from the camping grounds north of the trench. Their present location is much more comfortable. Col. Amyot, the well-souled French gentleman who is in command of the battalion, says the boys are all eager to go to the front. They do not like the idea of coming so far without doing some fighting. The colonel himself is anxious to go to the field."

We were then camped in a very bad place, and there is an idea which seems to have prevailed in the minds of the officers in command there that it would be well to discuss. I did not then publicly state that this idea prevailed among them, but I stated it privately to the Minister while doing in public my best to support the Department of Militia. This idea was that when men became volunteers they became merely animals, and should be treated as such—that they should be crowded together in a swamp and be made to endure every possible privation and hardship. In Winnipeg there were any amount of large buildings unoccupied in which the volunteers could have been accommodated, yet they were made unnecessarily to endure hardship which caused us the loss of two of our men. I do not believe the hon. the Minister is responsible for that, though at the time I wrote privately to him about it. I am sure, however, he could not find sufficient time to devise a remedy. As we were so long a time in Winnipeg I took upon myself to write the Minister of Militia the following remarks:

"Obtain, if possible, that we go further west than Winnipeg. It would have a good effect on the battalion and the public. Our loyalty is suspected because we remain too long here. Many other reasons, as the health, discipline and sobriety, necessitate our departure. We, though, entirely submit to orders.

In reply, I received the following:—

"To Lt.-Col. AMYOT,
"Commanding 9th Battalion.

"Use J. Wrigley's cipher. I am anxious to get your news. I think I can manage if you keep quiet and not let known that I am interfering. You are doing first-rate. (Ciphered.)

"A. P. CARON."

The day previous I had received the following telegram from the Minister in answer to a letter of mine, of which I have no copy, for it is a private letter, though I have no objection to its being placed on the Table of the House:—

"To Lt.-Col. AMYOT,
"Commanding 9th Battalion, Winnipeg.

"Your letter received. I thank you for it, and it has given me great pleasure for the good news you give me of your battalion. I place implicit confidence in you and in your command. Write me as often as you can and give me news. I take note of what you say about other matters in your letter.

"A. P. CARON."

On receiving the Minister's telegram, promising to do his best to obtain that we should go further on, I gave the news immediately to our men, who cheered heartily on receiving it. On the 23rd April, I received the following telegrams:—

"To Col. AMYOT.

"I telegraphed to General to do what you asked. He replied he had ordered you to Swift Current. Thanks for telegram. All friends are delighted to hear how well you are getting on.

"A. P. CARON."

"To Lt.-Col. AMYOT,
"9th Batt., Winnipeg.

"Acted immediately on your desire expressed, and telegraphed General who immediately replied on 22nd: Have already removed Ninth from Winnipeg to Swift Current some days ago. To-day he telegraphs me: Find Ninth have not yet left Winnipeg; have asked for explanations myself; telegraphed to Winnipeg to-day to ask what this means.

"A. P. CARON."

In answer to these telegrams, I sent the following, again in cypher:—

"Hon. A. P. CARON,
"Minister of Militia.

"Use Wrigley's cypher. I put in orders of battalion and it is known that no one but General Middleton can direct our movements and that Ottawa cannot interfere. Seventh infantry and all cavalry arrived after us are leaving to-day. We are humiliated. Please send us to Calgary. I send you a telegram for use before the House if you judge opportune.

"G. AMYOT."

We were complaining repeatedly that we had been forgotten in Winnipeg, and in fact we were. I do not want to throw blame on anyone for that, but, as a matter of fact, we were left in Winnipeg so long that it was only through my repeated telegrams and my repeated exertions that we were able to leave it. I do not remember exactly why we desired to go to Calgary, but I heard that the 65th Battalion of Montreal had gone there, and I was anxious to meet them somewhere during the campaign. On the same day that I received those telegrams, I telegraphed to the Minister:

"WINNIPEG, 23rd April, 1885.

"Hon. A. P. CARON,
"Minister of Militia, Ottawa.

"Weather being unusually bad, we have been put into barracks. My men generally well. Authorities do their best for us, and have been doing all the time. Do not believe contrary statements by hostile press. Awaiting orders to go further. We are all cheerful.

"G. AMYOT,
"Lt.-Col. Commanding 9th Battalion."

This telegram was sent, accompanied with another in cypher, in which I told the Minister he might use it before the House if he thought proper. I was then a friend of the Minister, and I thought he was a friend of mine. I did my best for him, and, while I was endeavoring to serve him, I was also trying to do the best I could to get comforts for the men who were with me. I received an answer to that on the 25th April:

"To Lt.-Col. AMYOT,
"9th Battalion, Swift Current.

"Telegram received. You will have heard news which assures part of your telegram. You are doing splendidly.

"A. P. CARON."

Before leaving Winnipeg, I saw the following article published in the Winnipeg Sun, on the 22nd April, 1885:—

"VISIT TO THE CAMPS.

"A reporter visited the camps this morning to see how the men had passed the night under canvas. Wading through the mud near the provincial jail, the writer finally reached the camp of the 9th, which is on the old Driving Park. Approaching the camp the sounds of vocal music were heard. Mark Tapley like, those Frenchmen can be jolly under all circumstances, notwithstanding that the rain had poured down all night, notwithstanding that they had procured but little sleep, and despite the fact that they were wet through, still they were 'jolly,' and as they sang with gusto many well-known French songs, the reporter who had been mentally cursing the fate that condemned him to such a tramp, relented and 'went out' in admiration towards those poor fellows who, under such adverse circumstances, could sing and make merry in their hearts. Colonel Amyot's tent was soon found. The colonel too, was in good spirits. He had slept in his tent all night. Cold? Yes, he had been very cold, but what of that? My men sleep in their tents, and what better am I than they? No, I must set the example. A good-hearted man Col. Amyot appears to be. He took the reporter about the grounds, glanced into the camps, pointed out the hardships the men had to endure, spoke kindly to his men, laughed heartily over a passing joke, and in fact carried sunshine about with him. But it was not upon the question of Col. Amyot the writer intended to dilate, but upon the hardships the men had to endure last night. Some of the tents had been pitched in lower portions of the ground than others, and these were completely flooded before midnight. The men had to turn out and seek shelter in tents more dry than the ones they had left. These Frenchmen are a very accommodating lot of fellows, and so the dry tents were crowded, and the joke and song passed around, and the boys laughed in very defiance of the elements. It was a miserable morning, but the breakfast was good, and the men 'tucked' in an unusual quantity and felt better. The announcement this morning that they would be removed during the day to the old Board of Trade Hotel, where proper shelter would be afforded, was received with pleasure, and at an early hour the men were all dressed and ready to start. The tents will be left standing until they dry, as it is against orders to strike wet tents."

The same paper, on 24th April said:

"DEPARTURE OF THE 9TH.

"Yesterday evening the 9th Battalion left for the front, and another stirring scene was enacted at the Canadian Pacific Railway depot. If ever soldiers were pleased at being ordered to the front, the men of the 9th were. Ever since they have been kept in the city they have had to put up with the most unbearable insinuations and charges of disloyalty, and their being ordered to the front convinced them that the Government had not lost confidence in the regiment from Quebec. It was nearly half-past six o'clock when the boys got ready to start, but by that time everything was in shape, and they fell in for the march to the depot. Along the line of route hundreds of spectators accorded them encouraging cheers, the men of the 9th responding with a number of rollicking French songs, which they sung quite lustily. On the platform of the depot the battalion formed into fours, and while the train that was to convey them to Swift Current was being made up, they were kept engaged shaking hands with friends, and receiving their good wishes. As usual, the agent of the Myrtle Navy Tobacco Company put in an appearance with a pound of tobacco for each man, and was given three hearty cheers for his acceptable present. About seven o'clock the men boarded the train, and a very few minutes afterwards it moved out amidst the hearty cheers of the vast concourse of people assembled to witness the departure. Before leaving, Col. Amyot expressed to a Sun reporter his great delight at having been sent to the front, and said that, while his men had been charged with being disloyal, he was certain they would give a good account of themselves if ever they met the rebel forces. The colonel anticipates that upon reaching Swift Current he shall be ordered to proceed to Battleford."

And then we left for Swift Current. I am happy to have been able to lay my hand on those documents, emanating from impartial and disinterested writers, who witnessed our conduct and heard our utterances in Winnipeg. You will remark that it is due to my own exertions if we were not forgotten any longer in Winnipeg, and if were sent at all to the wide prairies. Arrived at Swift Current, I had the advantage of meeting with General Laurie, now a member of this House, who kindly took me to the Saskatchewan landing and explained to me the whole method adopted for the war and the transport. It struck me that the march of the infantry, at that early season, would necessitate an immense outlay on teams, an immense expense, each horse eating his own load during the voyage, and that the pursuit of mounted enemy by the infantry, in a country where no fence nor ditches prevent the running of horses for thousands of miles was altogether a mistake. All the way from Swift Current to the landing, I saw teamsters were without protection, and carrying heavy loads of provisions. In the evening some of them gathered near a tent the light of which was a good target and indication to the enemy. Any amount of mischief might have arisen from that single cause. It was, perhaps, a presumption on my part, but seeing that I was not alone in my opinion, being entirely convinced that I was right in my appreciation of the way the war was conducted, I thought it my duty to communicate my views privately to a friend who had invited me repeatedly to do so. No harm and some good might result from that step. So I wired in cipher, to Sir A. P. Caron, in the following terms:—

"SWIFT CURRENT, 25th April, 1885.

"To Hon. A. P. CARON,

"Ottawa. (Cyphered.)

"Use Wrigley's slater. Arrived here all right. Found General Laurie a perfect soldier. Advance of Middleton troops too hurried, consequence being immense useless expense. Volunteers should be used for garrisons and protection of places and ammunitions. American scouts, and Indians and half-breeds doing the same kind of fight as rebels; should do the fighting and attacking part. Middleton force exposed to be slaughtered. Troops here hearty. Rely upon the Ninth.

"G. AMYOT."

A few days after that we left for Calgary. I wired our arrival to the Minister, and he answered me thus:

"OTTAWA, 29th April, 1885.

"To Col. AMYOT.

"Glad to hear of your safe arrival. We are all delighted with the manner you have got through your work.

"A. P. CARON."

And again on the 2nd May:

"OTTAWA, 2nd May, 1885.

"To Col. AMYOT.

"I was glad to hear from you. Sorry to hear of Ouimet's illness. You are doing well. Keep me posted.

"A. P. CARON."

On the 3rd of May I was informed by telegram from Major-General Laurie that Private Theodore Marois, of the 9th Battalion, had died in the hospital that morning. Private Marois had been left by us sick at Swift Current. The General wired me:

"We would have the funeral to-morrow unless you have special wish for other arrangements."

Well, as I had Marois' brother with me at Calgary, another of my soldiers, I thought it was due to him to have his brother's body brought to Calgary, and to give him a funeral service; and so I wired to General Laurie asking him if he would kindly send the body to Calgary. On May 4th, General Laurie wired to me in the following terms:—

Mr. AMYOT.

"SWIFT CURRENT, 4th May, 1885.

"To Lt.-Col. AMYOT,

"Will send body at 6.30 Monday morning, on train going through to Calgary. I much regret did not receive earlier notice hence arrangements are not as complete as desired. M. Morton, 9th Battalion, accompanies body.

"J. W. LAURIE"

I beg to thank Gen. Laurie for the kindness he showed me on that occasion. Besides, during all the campaign he did his best to help us in every way. I can repeat all that I said the first day I saw him. I found him to be a perfect soldier in every respect. I had left other parties sick in Winnipeg, and I wired to Doctor Kerr:—

"CALGARY, 4th May, 1885.

"To Dr. KERR,

"House Surgeon, Winnipeg.

"What became of the two who left hospital? What have you done with Blais' body. Why did you not wire me his death before.

"G. AMYOT."

I also wired to Col. Lamontagne, who was then in Winnipeg:

"CALGARY, 4th May, 1885.

"To Col. LAMONTAGNE,

"Winnipeg.

"Not hearing of five sick men left in hospital at Winnipeg, I telegraphed yesterday to surgeon. He answered that Blais died on the 13th, and does not say what he did with his body; he says two have left and he does not say where they are. This is a most atrocious negligence about Blais, and the whole concern."

The next communication I received was a telegram asking how much was due for the burial of Blais. I did not then give any of these facts to the public, as I might have done, because I was a friend of the Government, and because I thought the Minister was not responsible for what occurred; and my intention to-day is not to criticise him on these points, but it is well that the facts should be known in order that the department may avoid similar errors in case similar circumstances should ever arise again. This is what occurred in respect to Blais. His pockets were searched, and they took the money out of his pockets to pay funeral expenses. I have got letters and telegrams to establish that fact, if need be. I think this is wrong, it is unworthy of a great country.

Mr. MULOCK. Who did it?

Mr. AMYOT. Some of the officers in command at Winnipeg. Now about Marois. I was commanding the military district of Alberta, a district many hundred miles in extent. I was senior officer, and I thought I was justified in giving him a military funeral. I had a coffin made in Calgary, and we had services in a church. A grave was dug and we formed a military procession in which a great many of the citizens of Calgary took part. The population there was indeed most hospitable to us, and rendered us much service. I say again that I do not hold the Minister responsible for these things, but it is my duty to inform him of these facts. The expenses connected with this funeral amounted to nearly $50, and I got the Hudson Bay Co. to pay them, because they were paying all the expenses incurred there. I was authorised by General Strange to incur expenses generally, to sign the vouchers, and get them countersigned by Major Dowling. I have all those papers with me. I ordered those accounts paid, and they were paid, and since then I understand the Commission refuse to recognise them, and consequently nearly $50 were charged to poor Major Dowling, what amounts to a deduction from his pay. I now inform the Minister of these facts, and I am sure he will agree that this evil ought to be remedied. The funeral expenses of the late Marois are not yet paid, or rather they were paid at the time by a poor officer in the mounted police, and the Government of this country have refused to acknowledge the bill and to refund the money. This is something that I cannot approve, I condemn it, and I am sure the Government will admit that these expenses ought to be paid. As I said before, I had with me Marois' brother, and I thought it proper to give to the soldiers an idea of the respect the country had for their devotion, for their services and for their good conduct. But, as I said, I do not believe the Minister is cognisant of these facts. I only learned them recently myself; but I hope he will at once see that Major Dowling is refunded the money which has been withheld from him. The following is the letter sent by Major Dowling:—

"DONALD, B.C., 2nd December, 1888.

"Colonel AMYOT,
"9th Battalion, Quebec.

"SIR,—You will remember, during the North-West excitement, one of your soldiers died at Medicine Hat. His remains were brought to Calgary. The articles required for the sad occasion were furnished by the Hudson Bay Company. They refused to furnish unless I initialed the order, which I did at your request. After your regiment left for home I was called upon by the Hudson Bay Company to pay the amount, which I did, and then sent the order, receipted, with explanation, to the Hon. the Minister of Militia. My letter has not yet been answered. I have no copies of amount or letter. The expenditure was under $50. Will you please have this matter looked into and amount sent to me here.

"Yours truly,
"T. DOWLING,
"Inspector N.W.M.P."

When we arrived at Calgary, we found the public mind considerably agitated. The following correspondence will plainly show the position of affairs:—

"CALGARY, 4th May, 1885.

"To Major WALKER.

"SIR,—When Gen. Strange left here for the north, part of his instructions to me were that you would have charge of what is known as Home Guards, comprising the outlying district of Pine and Sheet Creeks and High River. In view of the present state of affairs, with a prospect of the Indians moving south, I would like to know what you have done in the matter, as I wish to report to Gen. Strange.

"I am aware that before the General left here, he talked matters over fully with you, and, if it is possible, I would like to forward your report by the courier leaving here at four o'clock p.m. to-day, as to what has been done in the premises.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"T. W. DOWLING,
"Insp. Comg. Post."

On the same day, at Calgary, I wrote to the Minister, as follows:—

"To Hon. A. P. CARON,
"Minister of Militia, Ottawa.

"CALGARY, May 4, '85.

"I learn by a telegram from Winnipeg, that Achille Blais, left sick in Winnipeg, died on the 30th. Was not informed before. Private Marois, left sick of pericardite at Swift Current, died there yesterday.

"Eighty men of my battalion gone to McLeod to relieve two companies of Osborne Smith, who wants to send 50 more of my men to Gleichen to relieve the rest of his battalion.

"Father Lacombe and Major Dowling, Dewdney's confidential agents, want rest of my battalion to stay here and want more troops, because it is a dangerous point. Please refer to Dewdney if necessary, and advise Middleton not to divide further the Ninth, and even to reinforce us here. Qu'Appelle, Swift Current and Calgary are key and basis that must be strongly defended. They command south and west and form reserve for the north. Provisions must go north from those points. I express you the views of Father Lacombe. The only one wanting to separate the Ninth in three parts, each of which would be useless, is Osborne Smith, who wants to have his own corps together. I have only 120 men left here. General Strange refused to shake hands with Indian Chiefs at an interview arranged by Father Lacombe. Indian rising may suddenly come. We have to be on the alert. You will have, at all events, to keep a force of over 2,000 in the North-West. War may last all summer. It will depend on chance of the fight. Every day, some Indians, afraid of what they have done, join the rebels.

"G. AMYOT."

On the same day, Major Dowling wired to Governor Dewdney, as follows:—

"CALGARY, May 4, '85.

"To Lieut.-Governor DEWDNEY,

"The great want here now is mounted men. There are here, in the company of W. L. Infantry, dozen men available as mounted men. I can purchase horses here, but great difficulty is saddles and suitable rifles. No revolvers or revolver ammunition in place.

"The officer commanding here has telegraphed Minister of Militia that what I have telegraphed to you should be carried out.

"T. DOWLING."

I was then in Calgary, and on the following day I wired the Minister of Militia, as follows:—

"CALGARY, 5th May, 1885.

"Hon. A. P. CARON,
"Minister of Militia.

"Pressing necessity that an experienced officer be appointed here with power to superintend despatching of supplies for Edmonton. General Strange report just arrived, says troops at Edmonton wanting supplies, though lots here. Ouimet, who cannot leave now, might be appointed. Strange appears to have left without arrangements. (Ciphered.)

"G. AMYOT."

On the 6th of May, I received the following:—

"EDMONTON, 6th May, 1885.

"To Col. AMYOT, Omdg. 9th.

"SIR,—My orders are distinct that you relieve detachment 91, with two companies 9 at McLeod, and that detachments at Gleichen, Langden and Crowfoot are to be relieved by same strength of your regiment. I have endeavored to point out to you importance of post at Crowfoot and Gleichen.

"Men of 91st will be sent forward with first convoy of supplies. I have given authority to Steamston to raise corps. You will assist him.

"T. B. STRANGE,
"Major-Genl. Cmdg. Alberta Force."

On the 7th of May, I received the following communication from Major Dowling:—

"CALGARY, May 7, 1885.

"Lt.-Col. AMYOT,
"Commanding Post.

"SIR,—I have the honor to report to you that telegrams which have passed through my hands on their way from Major General Strange to Major General Middleton, reported that there was nothing in the way of provisions at Edmonton, except flour and barley, and in view of this I would respectfully suggest that the Company of W. L. Inf. 7 now here, be ordered to proceed as escort with a large amount of supplies that are going to Edmonton to-day.

"There will be other supplies leaving here in two days which the Co. of W. L. Inf. 2, now at Gleichen, might be used to escort.

"There will be a third train shortly after, which the company relieved from McLeod might escort.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"T. DOWLING,
"N.W.M.P. Commanding Post."

On May 7th I wired to General Laurie:

"CALGARY, May 7, 1885.

"To Gen. LAURIE,
"Swift Current.

"Want advice. Am senior here. Lots of provisions to send north. General Strange wires to General Middleton that he is short of provisions. My instructions from here are to relieve one company at McLeod, one at Gleichen, and one here, and to send the three together as an escort to the first convoy of provisions at Edmonton. But it will take seven days before I have those three companies together, and it is a great delay for the teams ready to start. Can I, under circumstances, take upon myself to send the company here numbering forty-one with fifty armed teamsters as an escort to the first convoy of ammunitions. I think it would be safe.

"G. AMYOT."

On May 3rd I received the following from General Strange:—

"EDMONTON, May 3, 1885.

"Three companies Winnipeg Light Infantry to be relieved by 9th Battalion. Voltigeurs will be used to escort supply train to Edmonton. 20,000 rounds of Winchester ammunition has been telegraphed for, which requires strong escort on arrival.

"T. B. STRANGE,
"Major General Cg. Alberta District.

On the same day there was addressed to me a long communication from General Strange which I think it is important I should read to the House, in order that hon. members may thoroughly understand the subsequent correspondence. Hon. gentlemen will observe that I was frequently addressed as commanding officer of the district of Alberta. The circumstance that the Militia Department here never acknowledged it does not alter the fact. The communication received by me was as follows:

"EDMONTON, May 3, 1885.

"To Colonel AMYOT,
"Commanding Force at Calgary.

"SIR,—Yours of 29th April just received. I am glad once again to have the services of the 9th, and I feel sure that you and your officers and men will do their utmost.

"I left orders with Colonel Osborne Smith that on the arrival of next battalion, two companies were to be sent to Fort McLeod to relieve a company of W. L. Infantry, also one company to Gleichen, with detachments at Crowfoot and Langden. You do not state how many companies your battalion is composed of. I judge five, by the number of officers. The remaining companies of the W. L. I. coming from McLeod, Gleichen and Calgary will be sent forward to rejoin their battalion escorting the first convoy of provisions for Edmonton. Please put yourself in correspondence with Hudson Bay Co. (Mr. Hardisty). They have been appointed to supply troops and act as paymasters on my signature. In any emergency, you can sign for transport or supplies, and I would countersign afterwards.

"I wish to impress upon you the importance of watching the C. P. R. station at Crowfoot. It is on the trail leading from Sounding Lake, where bad Indians are collecting. They will go south if pressed from north. As your companies seem weak numerically, you had better station one company at Crowfoot, another at Gleichen, with two at McLeod. That would leave you one company at Calgary, but there are home-guards there, under Major Walker. Please put yourself in communication with him: he will give you every local information. Get maps for yourself and officers at Land Office and study them and the situation and make your officers do the same. I know you will take every opportunity to instruct and drill the men. They are happier employed, especially at aiming drill and extending for attack. You will find Father Lacombe a wise and brave man who will tell you all about the Indian situation.

I may say I did meet Father Lacombe, and he proved indefatigable in rendering us help. If those Indians did not join the rebels it was due in great part to his exertions. I saw him frequently and benefited greatly by his advice as well as by the advice of the citizens of Calgary.

"You are in a very responsible position and must learn all you can about the situation as regards Blackfeet, Sarcees, and Blood Indians. You will be assured they are perfectly loyal. So they are, because there are too many troops for them to be otherwise. You will pretend to trust them, but watch and be prepared. Any news of difficulty anywhere would make the Indians join against us. They are to be made to see that we are strongest and know it. They will try to steal cattle and horses, pretending all the time to be loyal; this, if permitted, will show them that we are afraid of them. Full instructions for guidance of detachments at Crowfoot, Gleichen and Langden will be handed over to your officers by those of W. L. I. they relieve. I am informed there are eight lodges of Crees camped near Gleichen; they are there for no good. If you have to move your men you can hire wagons through the Hudson's Bay Company. You can visit your posts by rail to Langden, Crowfoot, Gleichen. Please warn the officer commanding at Gleichen that a man whose name I need not mention, had in his possession ammunition for sale to Indians and half-breeds. He is to be watched. He will exercise a bad influence over your men if allowed. I left directions to have his action enquired into by Colonel McLeod. Will you please inform me what steps have been taken in this matter. Major Dowling will give you information and assistance on many points. Please remind him that I am trusting to him to keep up communication by courriers as far as Red Deer. The man at McPherson's Coulée, Dickson, was no use. I have provided for rest of road. He will also keep up courriers on McLeod Road. Major Cotton, North-West Mounted Police, commands McLeod District. You will communicate with him about your men. I want the ranges of objects round McLeod and all your posts marked. The order was given to the detachments of W. L. I. you relieve, they should tell relieving detachments. You should be on the lookout that such marks are not moved by evil persons. If you do not keep your officers and men's minds busy with preparations to do their duty, they will become demoralised by the dulness of doing nothing. Unless you are altered, you have lots of intelligence and energy and can understand and see the importance of every word I write.

"T. B. STRANGE,
"Major Gen. Comg."

[I wish to be informed what punishment was inflicted on constable Beaudoin, N. W. M. P., who threatened to shoot an officer of 65th.—T. B. S.]

On the 7th May, I wired to the Hon. Minister as follows:—

"CALGARY, 7th May, 1887.

"Hon. A. P. CARON,
"Minister of Militia, Ottawa.

"Instructions received from Strange permit me to help. I send a detachment with provisions. Everything will go all right, so do not be anxious. Will wire if necessary. Quimet going to Edmonton tomorrow.

"G. AMYOT."

On May the 8th, I wired to General Laurie in the following terms:—

"CALGARY, 8th May, 1885.

"To General LAURIE,
"Swift Current.

"Telegram received. Thanks. Have sent escort. Please tell me how many men at Swift Current, and if a detachment of 50 men could be sent to Gleichen.

Mr. AMYOT:

On the same day, I received the following reply:—

"SWIFT CURRENT, 8th May, 1885.

"To Col. AMYOT,
"Calgary.

"Seventh Fusiliers leave here to-morrow, and only half battalion, Halifax regiment left at Swift Current, so that could not furnish any detachment for Gleichen.

"J. W. LAURIE."

On the 11th May, General Strange wrote me as follows:—

"11th May, 1885.

"To Col. AMYOT,
"Commanding 9th Battalion, and Alberta District.

"Sir,—I got your letter saying that you thought best to send on detachments W. L. I., in detail as they arrived. It is dangerous, but you have done for the best. * * * The proper way to secure peace is to send large detachments of troops along the railroad, especially at Crawford and Gleichen, also at Fort McLeod. The Bloods and Blackfeet dare not then stir.

"If the young bucks choose to run away and join the Crees, they should not be allowed to return to their reserves.

"The old people and women should be kept on their reserves as hostages, but fed and treated kindly. * * * You should impress on the Minister what I have already represented to Gen. Middleton, that it is desirable immediately to send up troops and start a column from Crowfoot towards Sounding Lake, which is a rendezvous. The column from Crowfoot should be turned so as to meet Otter's column from Battleford, and mine from Fort Pitt, converging on Sounding Lake, where we could probably crush all that remained of rebellion before it supplies itself with renewed life, by devastating the cattle country with the aid of Blackfeet and Bloods.

"The country from Crowfoot to Sounding Lake is open, and easy. Here are fresh fields for you and the 9th Battalion.

"I am very sorry to hear that Major (so-and-so) has no home guards. He is terribly slow. Try and shove him along.

"Yours obediently,

"T. B. STRANGE,

"Major-General Commanding Alberta Field Force."

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. AMYOT. When at Calgary, seeing that the news from the war was far from being good, that Gen. Strange badly wanted some men, provisions and ammunition, that the Indians about us were far from looking quiet, and that the people in the surrounding country were all rather in a scare, after consultation with the principal citizens of Calgary, I sent a telegram to the Hon. Minister of Militia in similar terms to the one I had sent from Swift Current. That telegram was as follows:—

"CALGARY, 12th May, 1885.

"To Hon. A. P. CARON, Ottawa.

"General Strange badly wants supply of arms and ammunition applied for. Scouts wanted here. Ninth protects McLeod, Crowfoot, Gleichen, Langden and Calgary. All is quite smooth. For your private information, I persist in saying that this war should be made by men fighting in the same way as rebels. Volunteers more specially garrisoned. Our volunteers are being slaughtered. 500 scouts worth 2,000 volunteers. Men full of courage.

"G. AMYOT."

The words, "for your private information," were suppressed when part of this telegram was read to this House in 1886. I received the following telegram in answer to mine:—

"OTTAWA, 14th May, 1885.

"To Lt.-Col. AMYOT.

"Your suggestion noted, but is a matter of policy which I cannot alone decide, but will submit matter. Apply to General or Brigadier for scouts."

"A. P. CARON."

The next day the following telegram came to me:—

"OTTAWA, 15th May, 1885.

"To Lt.-Col. AMYOT.

"You have done too well for me to boycott you. Don't understand. Have answered all your despatches."

"A. P. CARON."

I presume I had sent a telegram complaining of something which had been unanswered. These telegrams were in cipher. They were designed to privately communicate to the Minister of Militia my impressions upon the way the war was conducted. He had invited me to do so. A letter of his said :

"MY DEAR AMYOT. Be sure that you need not fear in any way, when you write me privately. I keep your letters for myself"

I trusted him ; I trusted his sense of honor, his avowed friendship. I thought then that it was not judicious to bring 4,000 men of infantry to ruin, in an immense field unparalleled in the world as to its size, after a few mounted half breeds and Indians whom they might be years and years in reaching. Those enemies had the reputation of being excellent riders and sharpshooters, able to fly daily hundreds of miles. It was the easiest thing for them to capture immense unprotected convoys of provisions, and make any amount of prisoners. Some instances have shown that I was not wrong in my apprehensions. In fact, if Riel had not been a madman, if Dumont had seriously meant war, if they had followed the example of others and led the war in intercepting provisions, in capturing isolated men, instead of concentrating their small band at Batoche, if they had used the advantage which their full knowledge of the country gave them over the Canadian army, they would have obtained many successes which would have emboldened the Indians who might all have joined in the rebellion, putting in danger the lives and properties of all the white population spread over the North-West. That was what had to be feared. My last telegram was on the 12th of May ; two days later, on the 14th Poundmaker captured a large transport train, and made about 25 prisoners. How easy and with what disastrous effect it would have been for the rebels to frequently repeat the experience ! I thought then that 500 mounted men, skilful riders, sharpshooters, with perfect knowledge of the country as the cowboys had the reputation of being, would be worth, for a war of that kind, more than 2,000 infantry soldiers, a great part of whom knew not how to use a rifle nor to mount a horse. Gen. Middleton had himself to rely upon cavalry to run after Big Bear. Personal bravery has nothing to do with that. Whoever doubted the bravery of any of the divers nationalities of the northern continents ? Do not the French know that the English are brave ? Do not the English know that the French too are brave ? They met often enough, for and against each other to be mutually convinced of their respective and undisputed merits. Enough of them have died beside each other on all points of the globe to deserve mutual respect. But personal value and strategy are two different things. It is upon strategy, upon the plan of campaign that I was communicating with the Minister as he appears to have understood it himself, by using in his reply, the words : "It is a matter of policy." Whether I was right or wrong in my appreciation, is not the question to day. How did the war end ? Look at the Manitoba Daily Free Press of 8th June, 1885 :

"The 150 men under Major Hughes who went to reinforce Strange returned to-day. It has been decided to follow the Indians with the mounted men only."

In a despatch to Governor Aikins, of the 6th June, General Middleton says :

"Yesterday, on my way to Fort Pitt, I received information from Gen. Strange that Big Bear's Band had broken up virtually into 2 parties, and as he has still the McLeans and other prisoners, I am going to follow both trails with all my mounted men, and hope to catch him."

But the question is not whether I was right or wrong. I am not making the history of the campaign. It will doubtless be made in due time, and will contain curious details. But the question is : Was the Minister right in making public part of those private telegrams, in curtailing them, isolating them from surrounding circumstances, from answers and invitations to them, so as to make the public at large infer from them an evidence of cowardice on my part. We were, when he made those public, discussing the question of Riel's hanging. What had those private communications to do with that, I could never find out. By throwing contempt on me, personally, the Minister expected to diminish the value of my arguments. He, moreover, wanted to lower me so as to himself appear higher. If I judge by the constant attacks of a salaried press, he has succeeded to a great extent amongst those who are never so happy as when they make a point against a French-Canadian. But now that these events have long passed and years have elapsed, let us see what kind of a weapon the hon. Minister used on that occasion. As I said already, as the telegrams said (their being in cypher evidenced it) those communications were essentially private. What right had he to make them public ? He says : You had put upon the papers of the House a notice of motion asking for the correspondence. That meant official correspondence, but that did not entitle him to publish private correspondence, and to curtail it so as to give the same a false bearing. He could not publish it without violating the secrecy of friendship. He has shown by his action to what degree he may be trusted as a friend. You will remark, Mr. Speaker, that I am entirely on the defensive. I have to protect my reputation as a commandant of a volunteer corps, and I have to defend my battalion. Here I might at once declare that none in my battalion is directly or indirectly responsible for those telegrams. They were written by myself, upon my own responsibility. They were the result of conversations I had with experienced officers of the Canadian army, and with the civil authorities where I was located. I will give no names, because I do not want to implicate any one, or to enlarge the area of the discussion. I take my exclusive responsibility of the whole. As to the soldiers of the 9th, a set of men more devoted, brave, intelligent and competent could scarcely be found. Never did I find them hesitating to obey any order. One night, at Calgary's Fort, a report reached us that Indians had arrived and were surrounding and attacking the village, every one of the eighty men I had at the fort rushed to his rifle and wanted to go and meet the enemy at once. The trouble we had was to keep a few at the camp to mount the guard and protect it, as we were bound to do, against any surprise. I did, Sir, feel proud of such men. Now, Mr. Speaker, if my telegrams were wrong, if they exposed me to an attack of cowardice, why did the Minister encourage them, why did he ask for more and approve of the same ? Was it a trap he was setting ? If it was, that is a poor recompense for my devotedness to him personally and for all the steps I took to help him personally and politically. As Minister of Militia, he was representing the Government and the country. I leave both to judge of such treatment of a soldier who could have entrenched himself behind his parliamentary duties and not join his corps, but who preferred sacrificing every thing to help his country, and to prove that French-Canadians are as loyal as any other nationality to the Dominion flag, and were ready, at the peril of their lives, to work, with all the others, in the interest of the Canadian nation at large. I leave it to my fellow-countrymen, unbiassed by party feelings or passions, I leave it to history, to appreciate that way of acknowledging the services of a soldier who never contemplated anything else but the honor of his country and the maintaining of law and order. The hon. Minister and his friendly press will doubtless persist in misrepresenting me as they have done already. That I cannot prevent, but the ultimate result will not prove in their favor. Public opinion will be sufficiently enlightened to set matters right. It will be known and understood that what I wanted was to avoid immense expenses and loss of lives, and to adopt a judicious way of carrying out that war. I might apply to those who saw me at the head of my battalion and ask them if they did not find me up to my duty. I may ask what order did I ever receive which I did not immediately comply with? What is the thing I have done wrong? Where is there any act of mine worthy of blame? In what circumstance have I lacked in bravery? I have insulted the volunteer force, exclaims the ministerial press, by saying that 500 scouts would be worth 2,000 volunteers for that kind of fight. Well, Sir, I still contend that I was right in that. Let every captain of a company say how many of his men had not yet fired one single cartridge before going to the North-West. The single fact of putting a military jacket on one's shoulders is not sufficient to teach how to drill and fire a bullet. Scouts would have been more competent because they would have been mounted, and could have followed the mounted enemy over the immense prairie, and because they were accustomed to rifle shooting. I never experienced more than then how wrong we are, in Canada, not to devote more of our efforts to rifle shooting. In the North-West, drilling was only secondary in importance. Skirmishing, extended drill and firing were the essential parts. Our population is as apt to learn as any population in the world, but it is too late to learn on the eve or on the day of the fight. And, now, as to the protection of forts and convoys of provisions. Those who have been to the North-West know of what importance it is. Those who understand anything about war, know of what importance it is generally. In the Franco-German war, one of the elements of success for Germany was the organisation of étapes, for the purpose of supplying the troops regularly, with food and requisites of every kind. "The securing of these communications in the war of German armies, was of the highest and most vital importance," say those who wrote about that war. The great Napoleon used to say: "An army marches on its belly." In the North-West hundreds, nearly thousands, of heavy teams were daily employed in the transport of provisions and ammunition. Millions of dollars worth of the same were concentrated in what we call forts, but which were really composed of a few wooden stores, with no protection; we were not in an ordinary country, where at every mile's distance, even at every acre, there would be plenty of houses and barns, and where we would find ample provisions to feed the troops. On the contrary, hundreds of miles had to be traversed before we could reach one single house, and provisions had to be obtained from immense distances. If I insulted the volunteer force in saying or insinuating that they were not ready for actual fight, I am not alone in the deed. At the last meeting of Dominion Rifle Association, General Middleton is reported to have spoken as follows:

"In the course of a subsequent discussion General Middleton declared himself a disbeliever in the so loudly praised efficacy of rifle shooting. He made the same statement at Wimbledon. Lying down on one's stomach and taking careful aim was a different thing to shooting amidst the noise and smoke of an action. Some of the men who made bull's eyes at targets would find themselves made bull's eyes of in real war. He grudged the money given to the association, because he could not get enough for the militia. It would be noticed that very few privates won prizes at these competitions. The prize-winners were the officers and sergeants. The General said it was necessary that more money should be spent in instructing the rural battalions. Amongst the country corps he had found that seven or eight out of every 25 men had never pulled a trigger." (Globe, Feb. 21.)

Moreover, I find in the Mail of the 22nd instant the following editorial remarks:

"While on this subject, the question of the shooting abilities of the entire militia force naturally suggests itself. The Major-General observed the other day that if 30,000 of our 37,000 defenders were placed in a field, with instructions to shoot at a haystack, the probability is that the haystack would escape without injury. This speaks well for the remaining 7,000 militiamen, who, it is fair to presume, are well able to strike a haystack when they try. It is a special compliment to this remnant because, as everybody knows, the very last thing that is taught a volunteer in this country is the use of the weapon he is required to carry. Light is thrown upon this subject by the reports of the musketry instructors regarding the performances at the various annual camps. The men are for the most part recruits, and the instruction they receive in shooting is, as a rule, brief and summary. They come forward in squads and pop away at targets at various ranges, and then return to their corps efficient defenders of our country. Some of the instructors plainly hint that the entire business is a farce. One explains, in his report of last year, that with few exceptions the men know little or nothing of firing exercises, and another declares that some are armed with rifles that are positively dangerous to the firer, a circumstance which naturally discourages the marksman, however brave he may be. At one camp 1,062 men shot, and but 205 or twenty per cent. were what are called first-class shots. At another, 1,249 men shot, and only 275 were first-class. The proportion of efficient men, it will be observed, is remarkably small. But the fault does not lie with the men. It lies in the system that withholds instruction from them."

"What the Government does not do in the way of encouraging shooting the Dominion and kindred rifle associations are designed to do. But they too fail when they pay so much attention to officers who are already efficient, and so little to the rank and file and to the men who really require encouragement. No excuse is deemed necessary for plain speaking on this matter. It is absolutely necessary that combatants should learn how to shoot. If they do not we shall have to fall back upon the Dominion Rifle Association exclusively in the hour of danger. Or, failing that, it will be prudent to allow the officers to do the shooting, and the men, who cannot shoot, to give the word of command."

Large quantities were spread in convoys extending, with considerable interruptions, for hundreds and hundreds of miles. Had my opinion prevailed, had scouts been provided to run after the enemy, what better use could have been made of the volunteers who were then in the North-West than to charge them with the protection of those forts and convoys, with protecting and securing the line of communication. Such was then and still is my opinion. I frankly communicated it to a man who had invited me to do so, encouraged me to go on doing so, whom I thought a true friend, a man of honor. I leave it to you and to the country to judge whether I was right or wrong in my appreciation of the hon. Minister's character and aptitudes. But let us go on with the narration of events, based upon the documents which I have partly in my hands and of the whole of which I ask the production. I want to quote these documents to show that the presence of the 9th Battalion and the 65th Battalion in the North-West was not useless, especially in view of the direct danger of a rising of the Indians, and that those two battalions did their duty as well as the rest of the army, which did its duty so well during the rebellion.

"RIVER SASKATCHEWAN, 15th May.

"DEAR STIMSON,

"I have cut myself adrift at last after every sort of damnable detention? Am too far for you to wait for orders from me. Use this as authorising to get from Colonel Amyot rations and use your men as you propose. They will be paid as home-guard. I have done what I could to help. Colonel Amyot will do the same if you go to him.

"T. B. STRANGE."

"To Captain STIMSON.

"You are hereby authorised to order 24 saddles for use of troops to be sent by express from Chicago. Better order by telegraph to save time.

"T. B. STRANGE."

You must not forget that there were two armies there—General Middleton's army and General Strange's army. The first was concentrated near Batoche, while the other had gone to Edmonton to join Middleton by going down the Saskatchewan. Here is another letter from General Strange.

"RIVER SASKATCHEWAN, 15th May.

"To Major WALKER.

"I am too far for you to wait for orders from me in emergency. Colonel Amyot is authorised to authorise expenditure for me, and Major Dowling to countersign orders on Hudson Bay Company for money payments. Col. Amyot reports you have not one home guardsman. There must be an error. You can get Winchesters for you if you apply to him. When home guardsmen are employed as scouts they can get their rations, or an equivalent in money. I cannot be incessantly altering orders as to pay. The Alberta Rifles, scouting at the front, get only $1 75.

"T. B. STRANGE."

You will see that this authorised me to sign for General Strange, and so I did from that moment. I acted as quartermaster, paymaster, or commissariat officer, call it what you will. I had to examine the papers and sign these documents, and I was engaged in that from morning until night. Perhaps the Minister does not know that, but, if he sends for the papers, he will see the immense amount of work I had to perform. There is here, in following the ver telegrams, a question in reference to the scrip, but as I am afraid to take up too much of the time of the House, I will not now enter into it. You, Mr. Speaker, were also engaged in this war, and you wrote to me from Edmonton on the 15th May, as follows:—

“EDMONTON, 15th May, 1885.

“MY DEAR AMYOT,—We are starved here. Send us provisions in abundance, arms, ammunitions and saddles. The General earnestly asks for all that. A letter from Lake LaBiche informs us that the Hudson Bay Company's store has been sacked by the Indians of Beaver Lake, incited by ten emissaries from Big Bear's band, and the Catholic mission is in great danger. The sisters have fled to an island on the lake. We want reinforcements here, and you must insist with Caron so that he obtains some for us. Roads are good. We would be charmed to have you to come here to relieve us. This country is magnificent. We have seen Bishop Grandin this afternoon. He is in deep distress on account of the way events turn.

“Have you any news from Middleton? What is he doing? Write me what he is about.

“Entirely yours,

“J. ALD. OUMET.

“P.S.—Send us help in men, ammunition and provisions.”

Then another letter, which, like the last, is translated:

“FORT EDMONTON, 16th May, 1885.

“MY DEAR COLONEL,—General Strange writes to me and wants me to ask you to do your best so as to induce Walker and Stimson to immediately raise their scouts and he gives you power to authorise every expense for that. Don't you believe that everything goes very slowly? Decidedly we will spend the summer here. The great news here is that the Blackfeet are rising. What news have you got about that? Write to me.

“To you,

“J. ALD. OUMET.”

The news was very bad. We received news from Gen Strange that he was lacking in provisions, ammunition and men, and we had no good news from Gen. Middleton's army. All around us there seemed to prevail great excitement, and we had information that the Indians were preparing to rise here and there. I sent a telegram to Col Evanturel on the 16th May, as follows:

“LT. COL. EVANTUREL, “Gleichen.

“CALGARY, 16th May, 1885.

“We received telegram that ammunition coming by trail from Montana for Riel. Do your best to have trails watched and get information. Riel is captured and prisoner in Middleton's camp.

“G. AMYOT.”

On the same date I applied to Gen. Laurie:

“CALGARY, 16th May, 1885.

“GEN. LAURIE,
“Swift Current.

“Had to give ammunition to detachments. Forty rounds each left. Could you send me some and how much? We are surrounded by many tribes here.

“G. AMYOT.”

I must say here that the only orders I received at Calgary were to divide my battalion into four companies, of which I had to send two to Fort McLeod, 100 miles away, and the other two to Gleichen, Crowfoot and Langden. I received no directions as to what I was to do in any emergency. One of my officers, who was at Fort McLeod, Colonel Roy, a very valuable officer, wrote me on the 15th May, in the following terms:—

“LT.-COL. AMYOT,
“Commanding, Calgary,

“MCLEOD, 15th May, 1885.

“DEAR COLONEL,—We have just learned that a convoy of ammunitions has to-day been seized by the Indians; that causes much anxiety here, the rumor having spread rapidly. Major Cotton tells me it would be very proper to increase the contingent at Gleichen, that is to say to reinforce Evanturel or to call him back to you, rather than to leave him with such a small force, the place being more exposed than any other on account of the Blackfeet. We consider here, and for good reasons, that the Blood and Piegan are not to be trusted—far from it. We have now to beware of the redskins as they have succeeded once. There are many of them here and in the surroundings.

“It would be very important, even of the highest importance that Major Stewart would not leave Medicine Hat, or at least would not go too far from it, so that we could get him to come here (to McLeod) at the first signal. He is strongly inclined to remove further, which would be inopportune in the present time, as he would become entirely useless. The place the most exposed, I believe, with Gleichen and McLeod, is undoubtedly Calgary, so I believe that Evanturel's return to you would be most efficacious. I am told here that the Blackfeet may easily make a mouthful of Gleichen, and as there is nothing to be protected there, it is much better to go away from it than not to be stronger, than not to place there a strong force. We must not forget that there are here and in the surroundings large flocks of animals of all kinds to be protected, and that we are only 77 of the 9th and from 30 to 40 of the Mounted Police, so that Major Stewart must not go far away from Medicine Hat, and be ready to come to our rescue at the first signal. To these points are to be noted:—1. Re-inforce Evanturel or call him back to you; 2. Re-inforce yourself; 3. Prevent Stewart from going away from Medicine Hat, so that he may come to our rescue; 4. Protect the large flocks of animals near McLeod; 5. Not to trust the Indians more than necessary, more so after what has just occurred.

“A special courier takes this letter to you.

“THOMAS ROY,

“Lt.-Col. Commanding 9th Batt. V. Q., McLeod.”

Under the circumstances, after having received that telegram, after having received news from the north, from Gen. Strange, I wrote to the Minister of Militia in the following terms:—

“CALGARY, 17th May, 1885.

“HON. A. P. CARON,
“Minister of Militia, Ottawa.

“There are over 6,000 Indians surrounding Calgary. Up to now they have been peaceful, but many things indicate their joining Northern Indians in rebellion. Strange left when they were peaceful. Ordered the 9th, the only troops here for hundreds of miles, to be distributed in five detachments * * * and left authority to nobody to modify according to emergencies. In case of Southern Indians rising each of these detachments would be valueless and destroyed. Here I have 50 men, forty rounds of ammunition, no gun, no cavalry, no scouts to protect the most important place, the key and protection of immense territory. Cotton, left in charge of McLeod, sends me a special courier urging the necessity of getting back my men from Crowfoot, Gleichen and Langden, where there is nothing to protect, and where they are of no use, and to bring them here, or myself go there to gather an effective force. Father Lacombe wants that also. But I have no authority, I must send to Strange, 300 miles north; he sends back by Calgary to Middleton, who sends back to him and him to me; delay, three weeks. I can easily, without expense, get scouts here, ammunition, artillery and guns from Winnipeg, and move troops so as to check and even defeat Indians, but am fatally condemned to inaction and absurd danger, useless to country. Sorry to disturb you, but you must help me, and organise at once defense in south-west section, so as to shorten delays of action. War in the north and in the south will be two different things, with no time to communicate between the two seats of war. Prevention of war here would be better than cure.

I find in the Manitoba Daily Free Press of 13th May, a telegram in the following terms:—

“Reports have reached here that hostile Indians from Sounding Lake are on the war-path and making for Calgary. Reinforcements of troops are absolutely required here. After to-morrow there will only be three companies of the 9th. Quebec, here. More scouts are also required. Colonel Amyot is taking steps to supply the need. A portion of Major Hatton's mounted rangers will patrol the country between Edmonton and Red Deer. Indians are now on the Swift Current trail to intercept provisions.”

The Minister of Militia answered me in the following terms:—

“OTTAWA, 18th May, 1885.

“To Lieutenant-Colonel Amyot, 9th Battalion.

“Telegram received. The communication to General Middleton will inform you of result as soon as I hear from him.

“A. P. CARON.”

The same day I received from General Strange the following despatch:—

“VICTORIA, 18th May.

“Colonel Amyot.—I am informed 100 Snider and 50 Winchesters and 100 revolvers for this force arriving at Calgary. Don't send them without escort. None of 9th Battalion can be spared to go north unless other troops take their place. Ask for other troops. I have done so.

“T. B. STRANGE.”

While General Strange was forbidding me to send anything without escort, I received from General Middleton the following:—

“PINN'S CROSSING, 18th May, 1885.

“Lieutenant-Colonel Amyot, 9th Battalion.

“Hardly seems worth while to raise 20 scouts for such a purpose now.

“FRED. MIDDLETON,

“Major-General.”

The two generals held different opinions. General Middleton was far away from Calgary, while General Strange was in that section and knew that there was the great danger, and that it would be neither wise nor safe to send provisions or ammunition without an escort. If we refer to the Calgary press of that date we will see that the fears of the general were entertained by the people of that section. I received the following letter from General Strange:—

"VICTORIA, 19th May, 1885.

"DEAR COLONEL AMYOT,—Thank you for your kind letter. Your gentleness is a rebuke to my hastiness. You see I have a good deal in my hands and a good deal of obstruction from people it should not come from. Letters cross each other. I see now you have done all I ordered, and your judgment in sending on one company was correct. I am very much obliged to you for your energy and ability. I am sorry Mr. * * * is so indolent but as I could not get him to do anything, I can't expect you to do so. I would dismiss him and appoint some one else, only I know no one fit.

"Yours truly,

"T. B. STRANGE."

"P.S.—I think it very important you should have the twenty scouts. If you can get no other arms for them, you might retain twenty of the Winchesters ordered for this force, using this as your authority. Of course, if you can get others I would rather you did not take them, but now the Indians will be raiding everywhere in small bands. Don't pay any attention to O * * * people's rumors you will soon find out. They do nothing but talk; they will do nothing for their own defence, only try to rob Government by charging enormously for everything supplied to troops. I would be glad to see your battalion get a chance and am sure you and they would do your duty. Now you have sent forward supplies, you enable me to go on. The supplies have not yet reached me, but I advance to-morrow.

"T. B. S."

Then on 19th May, 1885, I sent the following telegram to the Minister of Militia:—

"CALGARY, 19th May, 1885.

"HON. J. A. P. CARON,
"Minister of Militia, Ottawa.

"Telegram about Middleton received; will wait. Strange and Oumet implore reinforcement of troops and arms and ammunition. Saddles ordered by Strange from Chicago are detained in Winnipeg for custom duties. Southern Indians still quiet; all well yet south and south west. Father Lacombe visiting Indians. No question of half-breeds here and Edmonton joining rebels.

"G. AMYOT."

The Minister answered me by telegram:

"OTTAWA, 20th May, 1885.

"Lt.-Col. AMYOT,
"Calgary.

"Know nothing about saddles; ammunition ordered from Chicago.

"A. P. CARON"

A few days afterwards I received a telegram from Winnipeg about the saddles:

"WINNIPEG, 20th May, 1885.

"Col. AMYOT,
"Calgary.

"Eight packages saddlery all here for General Strange, given up by Customs and forwarded 14th instant.

"W. R. MINGAY."

On 21st May I telegraphed to General Middleton in the following terms:—

"CALGARY, 21st May, 1885.

"General MIDDLETON,
"Clark's Crossing (to be forwarded).

"Colonel Oswald wires he is at Winnipeg, and anxious to go to the front. General Strange wants absolutely provisions that are here, ready to be sent, but I have no escort to send and cannot prudently send them without. Please send Oswald here. All is quite here and I will keep it so if you assist me to protect road to Edmonton.

"G. AMYOT."

The general answered me from Prince Albert:

"PRINCE ALBERT, 21st May,
"via CLARK'S CROSSING, 21st May,
"via QU'APPELLE, 22nd May,
"22nd May, 1885.

"To Lieut.-Col. AMYOT, 9th Bat.

"Have just heard that you have telegraphed to the Minister disputing the disposition of your regiment. This is contrary to military discipline and you will refrain from doing so again.

"FRED. MIDDLETON,
"Major General."

Mr. AMYOT.

I need not say that I was rather surprised to receive that telegram. I then prepared an answer to Gen. Middleton in the following terms:

"CALGARY, 22nd May, 1885.

"GENERAL MIDDLETON,
"Commanding Her Majesty's Army, North-West.

"DEAR SIR,—I have just received your telegram of the 20th instant, by which you condemn my having telegraphed the Minister of Militia 'disputing the disposition of my regiment.'

"The telegram in question, sent by me to Mr. Caron, read as follows:

"There are over 6,000 Indians surrounding Calgary. Up to now they have been peaceful, but many things indicate danger of their joining northern Indians in the rebellion. Strange (General) left when they were peaceful and ordered the Ninth, the only troops here for hundreds of miles, to be distributed in 5 detachments not far from his ranche and left authority to nobody to modify according to emergencies. In case of southern Indians rising each of these detachments would be valueless and destroyed. Here I have fifty men, forty rounds of ammunition, no gun, no cavalry, no scouts, to protect the most important place, the key and protection of immense territory. Cotton, left in charge of McLeod, sends me a special courier urging the necessity of getting back my men from Crowfoot, Gleichen and Langden, where there is nothing to protect and where they are of no use, and to bring them here or myself to go there to gather an effective force. Father Lacombe wants that also. But I have no authority, I must send to Strange, three hundred miles north; he sends back to Middleton who sends back to him and him to me; delay three weeks. I can easily, without heavy expense get scouts here, ammunition, artillery and gun from Winnipeg, and move troops so as to check and even defeat Indians, but am fatally condemned to inaction and absurd danger useless to country. Sorry to disturb you, but you must help me and organise at once defense in south-west section so as to shorten delays of action. War in the north and in the south will be two different things with no time to communicate between the two seats of war. Prevention of war here would be better than cure."

"This telegram, in my mind, was not intended as a criticism, but as a report as to facts and suggestions which I thought my duty to make. You pronounce the sending of the same to the Minister contrary to discipline, and in the name of discipline I at once submit to your decision and will act accordingly in the future. I am surprised though by the turns events take. These telegrams were essentially private, in cypher, sent to comply with the Minister's request that I should keep him posted on my views about the campaign.

"I have done my best, up to now, to fulfil my duties to the best of my ability without ever grumbling or complaining. Some commandants have bitterly complained of their battalions being sub-divided, and have that way succeeded in getting them together again. I do not want to follow that example, and would feel sorry to embarrass my chiefs.

"Allow me please to add, as I now speak to you—and not as a complaint but as an information—that I find myself in a peculiar position here. When General Strange—a most worthy officer, a true soldier—went to Edmonton, he left the senior officer then here, Lt. Colonel Smith, in command of all troops south of him (so I am told at least). After my stayings at Winnipeg and Swift Current, I reached Calgary. Smith had then gone north to join General Strange, and nobody ever gave me instructions of any kind, save as to the relieving of Smith's detachments by detachments of my own battalion, and the immediate sending of Smith's detachments to Edmonton, to join the rest of Colonel Smith's Battalion. Those orders have been executed. What would be my duty, my power of initiative if circumstances happened to change, has not been defined. I understand: my duty is to await orders, and to defend myself if attacked, but could I order some of the detachments together in case of immediate and great danger? You would exceedingly oblige me by intimating me your wishes about that and the extent of my duties. Please believe that my earnest desire is to worthily fill my humble part in that painful war we all sustain for the maintenance of the British flag. Such was my only object in leaving my parliamentary duties, and I want to give you a support unlimited in its extent.

"I am also embarrassed as to the sending of provisions and ammunition to General Strange. I know he badly wants them, but there is no military escort here for them, and the teams are loaded. But I am reported by Major Dowling that teamsters refuse to go without escort. It is true that I never received instructions about that. But being the senior officer here, I think it my duty to report to you the facts as they are. Lt. Colonel Oumet left in charge of Edmonton also urgently asks for some men and lots of ammunition and provisions.

"Yours very sincerely,

"G. AMYOT,

"Lt. Col. Commanding 9th Battalion V.Q."

When I had prepared that letter I received news of the capture of Batoche and the surrender of Riel, so I refrained from sending it. On 22nd May I received from Lieut.-Col. Whitehead the following telegram:—

"WINNIPEG, 22nd May, 1885.

"Lieut.-Col. AMYOT.

"You command Calgary district, and must exercise discretion in protecting supplies. McGibbon must direct transport, studying economy and prompt delivery.

"E. L. WHITEHEAD,
"Lieut.-Colonel."

On 27th May, I received from General Middleton the following:—

"Col. AMYOT, Calgary,

"BATTLEFORD, 27th May.

"Just heard from General Strange that he expects provisions from Calgary to Edmonton escorted by companies of Winnipeg Light Infantry and had directed Col. Onimet to send up company of 65th to Lac La Biche on being relieved by wing companies. Whose are these companies, and what troops have you got at Calgary? As far as I can make out there is no danger, either at Calgary or Edmonton, and now that the affair is nearly over, not likely to be. If you have not already done so, send them escort or no escort.

"FRED. MIDDLETON,
Major-General."

On 27th May I received from General Middleton, at Battleford, the following communication:—

"Lt.-Col. AMYOT, 9th Batt.

"BATTLEFORD, 27th May, 1885.

"If all is quiet at Calgary, as it is here and everywhere else, as far as I know, since Riel's defeat, it will be quite prudent to send teams to Genl. Strange. At any rate, you can spare some of your men. Is there not home guard at Calgary? I have ordered Oswald to garrison Regina and cannot send him to Calgary. Beardsy has given in, Poundmaker is my prisoner and I am surrounding Big Bear under pain of giving attack, and with it accompanying scares is pretty near at an end."

"FRED. MIDDLETON,
Major-General."

That statement was all right so far as that district was concerned where General Middleton was operating, but in our district the same condition of things did not prevail, as the following letter from you, Mr. Speaker, will bear out: (Translation.)

"DEAR CONFÈRE AND FRIEND—

"EDMONTON, 6th June, 1885.

"No news from Genl. Strange since 10 days. We are very uneasy here. If you have any news about him, please send the same to me."

"J. ALD OUMET."

Next, I received the following from the Minister of Militia, dated 19th June:—

"To Col. AMYOT, CALGARY.

"OTTAWA, 19th June, 1885.

"I do not see how you can organise a board, your battalion being alone at Calgary. No objection to your suggestion about Rocky Mountains. I am afraid sergeants' request cannot be obtained as their pay is fixed by Statute.

"A. P. CARON."

On 21st June, General Strange wrote to me as follows:—

"To Col. AMYOT.

"BEAVER RIVER via STRAUBENZIE, 21st June, 1885.

"I have notified Supply Officer McGibbon that no more supplies will be required for Alberta force via Edmonton. Make arrangements for return of 65th Regiment from Red Deer and Battle River. You will be glad to hear that the ladies of the McLean family, prisoners with Big Bear, are out of his clutches. They will soon, I trust, be in our camp. Big Bear himself has turned in his tracks, having, I suppose, got word that we are ahead of him. He has now gone south toward Turtle Lake, where Col. Otter is on the qui vive. Middleton has left me with orders to remain here while he moves round to Otter with cavalry.

"T. B. STRANGE,
Major-General Commanding Alberta District."

On 26th June General Middleton sent me the following from Fort Pitt:—

"Col. AMYOT,
Calgary.

"CAMP FORT PITT (via STRAUBENZIE) 26th June, 1885

"Take immediate steps to bring in all your detachments to Calgary that are not on the railway, as you pick these up on your way down to Winnipeg, and be prepared to move to Winnipeg by rail on receipt of further orders.

"FRED. MIDDLETON
Major-General."

Then we began the work of preparing for our return, and by kind permission of the Minister of Militia and General Middleton we made a trip to the Rocky Mountains. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company gave us a free train and we went as far as the railway was built, and I am glad to take this opportunity to thank the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the kindness they showed us on that occasion. I next received the following communication dated 1st July:—

"To Col. AMYOT:

"MOLEOD, 1st July, 1885.

"Many thanks for your aid in courier matter. What we wanted settled with regard to the newspaper is all right. Words cannot convey the regret we experienced in parting with Colonel Roy and your companies. You may well be proud of reputation your battalion has gained throughout the territories. Kindest regards.

"JOHN COTTON."

"Carling P. O."

Before leaving this part of the subject, I think it is my duty to say a few words in regard to the action of the hon. gentleman who fills the position of Postmaster General at that time. The Postmaster General, who is now Minister of Agriculture, treated us in the best possible manner. He was most kind to the volunteers and the whole force appreciated his kindness, and it is nothing but fair that from my place in Parliament and on behalf of my battalion and all the other members of the force I should tender him our best thanks for the way in which he treated us while in the North-West. He afforded us the greatest possible facilities with regard to post office accommodation, he allowed us to send our letters free and he did all he could to alleviate our hardships throughout the campaign. On returning from the Rocky Mountains I received the following telegram:

"PRINCE ALBERT, 9th July, 1885.

"To Col. AMYOT,—Send me soon as possible concise report of steps you took to secure tranquillity of district. General Middleton does not think there was danger of rising anywhere but about Batoche. Also report how you pushed on convoys of supplies and detachment. Address to me, post office, Winnipeg.

"T. B. STRANGE,
Major-General."

I prepared a report, of which I regret I have not a copy; neither have I a copy of the report of Col. Roy, who commanded the detachment at MacLeod, but I have copy of a report prepared by Colonel Evanturel, one of my best officers, and at this point I think it is due to that detachment to publish that report which has not yet been made public. It is as follows:—

"ON THE TRAIN en route TO WINNIPEG.

"To Lieut.-Col. G. AMYOT,

"Commandant 9th Battalion, P. Q.

"In compliance with a despatch addressed to you on the 9th instant by Gen. Strange, and which requested of you information as to the probability there had been of a rising among the Indians in the District of Alberta, I have the honor to make to you the following report:—

"On my arrival at Gleichen, Monday, 11th May, in command of the three detachments of Gleichen, Crowfoot and Langdon, I found that there was much disquietude and agitation among the white people of these three places.

"The Blackfeet, 2,300 in number, encamped a few miles from the railroad, and the three posts were quiet. Notwithstanding their quiet attitude it was necessary for us to be on our guard and to use great vigilance, because before my arrival the Blackfeet had been visited by certain Cree chiefs, among others, the one who bears the name of Little Pine, who afterwards was made prisoner by Gen. Middleton.

"The Cree chiefs had made all sorts of fine promises to the Blackfeet in order to induce them to make alliance with them. At Crowfoot, where fifteen of my men were stationed, before our arrival, disturbances had been caused by the Indians. The agitation had been so great among the white people of the neighborhood that the guardian of the section-house had thought it necessary one day to make his escape in a hand car, together with his family, such was his fear of being massacred by the Indians. At Gleichen the Blackfeet, peaceful in appearance, were constantly looking out for a quarrel, trying to do something wrong which would give them a pretext for commencing hostilities.

"They held regular and constant communications with the Indians of the North, and learned all the news from the seat of war sooner than we did, and almost as quickly as by telegraph. Moreover, we knew perfectly well that several Blackfeet, especially young men, had gone to join the rebels. We knew one named White Calf, chief of a band in the Blackfeet tribe, who, on his return from the north, paid several visits to us at the camp at Gleichen.

"On two different occasions there arose quarrels between the Indians and white people at Gleichen. It was necessary therefore that I should use the greatest prudence and observe the strictest impartiality in settling such difficulties, which might have resulted in the most serious endings. In every case the Indians who said they were injured rushed to arms and in the course of one of these quarrels an Indian took deliberate aim with his rifle, at close quarters, at a white man.

"I ought to say, that it is my conviction, that the presence of our soldiers in that part of the District of Alberta sufficed to check many attempts at quarrelling on the part of the Indians. Our uniform, differing from that of the Mounted Police, taught the Indians that we were regular troops sent by the Queen, which had the effect of inspiring them with respect and a salutary fear which we worked to increase by every possible and legitimate means.

"Once more, I may say that but for our presence in the locality, the Indians would not have hesitated or delayed to harass and impose upon the white people and commit depredations.

"I have the honor to be, your humble servant,

"ARTHUR EVANTUREL, Lieut.-Col.,

"Commandant of the Detachment at Gleichen of the "9th Battalion Voltigeurs of Quebec."

We went down to Winnipeg, and I am sorry to say we were again encamped in a swamp. We were expecting daily to come back, and we endured our discomforts and did not complain. I take this opportunity to say a few words more of the 65th of Montreal. I think it my duty, Mr. Speaker, while on this subject, to mention your valuable battalion, because, very possibly, it is the last time the matter will come before the House. In going over the Manitoba Free Press of Saturday last, I found the following, which seems to be a fair appreciation of the value of our Montreal volunteers. It is from the Winnipeg Free Press of 23rd June, 1885:

"No praise is too great for the Winnipeg Light Infantry, and the two companies of the 65th for the cheerful manner in which they have borne all the weariness of the long march from Calgary here. The men have tramped nearly 800 miles without a murmur, and latterly on reduced rations. There is no sugar in camp, no beans, no potatoes, no cheese, no coffee, no barley, very little hard tack, no oats for the horses, no soap to wash with, no chewing tobacco; but we have plenty of tea, plenty of bacon, canned meat and flour, and on we have gone, floundering through water at times nearly up to one's waist, longing for home news, all as sunburnt and black as Indians, but though disfigured still in the ring. The men and officers of the 65th deserve high praise. A great deal has been said and written about the regiment which has been unfavorable. It is untrue and consequently unjust. For nearly seven weeks the two regiments have been brigaded together, have marched together, have been under fire together, and my opinion of the Montreal men is that they have borne their hardships bravely and cheerfully. Last Thursday the column marched 27 miles. There was no chance for any one to ride, for the horses and mules were hardly able to keep up with their regular loads, without the additional weight of weary soldiers, and yet those two companies of French Canadians marched into camp at 8 p.m. having started at 5 a.m., singing as cheerfully and merrily as though marching through the streets of Montreal, and the same is true of the Light Infantry. When ordered to go down into the ravine at Red Deer rivers when and where the bullets were flying lively, the boys in the dark green coats never hesitated for a moment. With the inexperience of young soldiers, they bunched up too much together while going over the uncovered ground and suffered in consequence, an error which Colonel Osborne Smith, with greater experience, took care his men should not commit, and herein is the secret of the casualties to the Montreal men, but never for one moment did they hesitate or refuse to receive their baptism of fire. Montreal may well feel proud of her boys, and it is time that the truth concerning them was known. As many of the Montreal men cannot speak or understand English, and as very few of the men of the Light Infantry can speak or understand French, it is impossible to fraternise together as cordially as all desire. But in spite of this, the two regiments are on the very best of terms and will long remember each other."

I am sorry that you, from your position, Mr. Speaker, cannot speak for the battalion you commanded, but that quotation will make up a little for it. We found it hard waiting so long for General Middleton, and I sent the following telegram to the Minister:—

"Hon. A. P. CARON,
"Minister of Militia, Ottawa.

"WINNIPEG, 11th July, 1885.

"Detaining troops here for a local circus asked by the hotelkeepers is a most unfair treatment to those who left all their affairs by necessity of war. It is a gross political blunder, useless expense, cause of demoralisation for the troops.

"G. AMYOT."

I received immediately an answer from the Minister of Militia in the following terms:—

"Lt.-Col. AMYOT,
"Commanding 9th Batt., Winnipeg.

"OTTAWA, 11th July, 1885.

"I congratulate you on safe arrival. You will certainly not be delayed. Your friends all anxious to see you back.

"A. P. CARON."

I give credit to the hon. Minister that he took immediate measures that we should not wait any longer. He ordered the trains and the necessary steamers and we came back passing Owen Sound, where we had a splendid reception, and in Toronto where the whole people turned out to cheer our arrival. This was, in fact, one of the most pleasant remembrances of our trip. I heard that Parliament was about to close and I telegraphed to the Minister asking permission to stop a short while here and serve as a guard of honor to the Governor General, and I received the following reply:—
Mr. AMYOT.

"OTTAWA, 18th July, 1885.

"To Lieut.-Col. AMYOT,
"Will be glad to see you all back, and I congratulate you and your men on what you have done.

"A. P. CARON."

"OTTAWA, 19th July, 1885.

"To Lieut.-Col. AMYOT,
"With Midland Battery, Union Station.

"All right, will be delighted if you arrive in time.

"A. P. CARON."

We were received very gallantly in Ottawa by the then Speaker. His Excellency the Governor General was kind enough to address us some words of congratulation, and so did the hon. Minister of Militia. There was no question then of anything improper having been done by the battalion. Everything seemed bright, and everybody was satisfied. I am sorry that subsequent political events changed the whole of that. On our arrival at Quebec an immense gathering of citizens was held and an address was presented to us in the following terms:—

"To Lieut.-Col. Amyot to the Officers, Non-Commissioned Officers and Men of the 9th Battalion Voltigeurs de Québec.

"Near four months ago, in the worst season of the year for military operations, you have suddenly been called to take part in a remote expedition.

"Without being stopped by your personal affairs, nor by the supplications of your families, without being alarmed by the dangers which you would have to run, as well from the enemy as from the climate, you have, without hesitation, left your occupations, bid adieu to all you held most dear, and heartily throwing on your uniforms, a few hours afterwards, you were on board of the train which was to lead you, from place to place, to the foot of the Rocky Mountains.

"I would be untruthful if I affirmed that we saw you leaving with pleasure. Besides the regrets and anxiety of those who felt the departure of husbands, fathers, sons, brothers, intimate friends, we could not but see with grief that the war in which you were to be called to make so heavy sacrifices, to run so great dangers, was a war against compatriots. With what pleasure we would have seen you going to fight an alien stranger.

"But we were consoled by the ideal that law and public order must be sustained, that insurrection, excusable though it might have been, had to be repressed, and that the danger of excess against the unfortunates who had called to arms was less great when the repression was in your hands.

"To-day, our joy is without mixture of regrets and anxiety. To the pleasure of seeing you safe and sound amongst us is added the pride of finding that your conduct has been to the honor of your battalion, city, nationality and country.

"You have had no occasion to take part in a battle, but you have done something much harder, specially for men new in the military profession: you have, without complaining, suffered cold, hunger, fatigue, miseries of all kinds; you have, during many months, endured the garrison life in places far from civilised centres, deprived of all that may make life agreeable to men accustomed to live in a city as sociable as the old capital of the Province. To fight a battle personal courage suffices, and no man worthy of that name would lack that courage when occasion presents itself. But to endure what you have endured, to do what you have done, more than that is required; it necessitates that patience, that cool perseverance, that discipline which constitute military spirit, and which could not be too much praised in a volunteer corps of recent formation, without experience of active service. If you have shown such qualities in a war to which you were only called by your duty, and which you could not but deplore with every one of us, what could we not expect from you if—which God forbid—you were called to arm yourselves against an enemy from outside, who might invade our country, threatening our firesides? Each of those who proved themselves such good soldiers, when they had to fight misguided compatriots would be worth four men against an enemy for whom he would feel no sympathy.

"In welcoming with joy those who come back, we must not forget those who, having left us full of life and hope, have gone to die far from their families. I may assure the relatives of those last that they have the most ardent sympathies of the whole population of Quebec.

"Colonel Amyot, officers and soldiers of the 9th Battalion, in the name of our city, I tell you: 'You have well deserved of your country; we are proud of you, and we wish you the most cordial welcome.'

"Long live the 9th Battalion.

"F. LANGELEIR,
"Mayor."

All went well for many months; but when the Riel affair came up, the papers in our section of the country attacked me, because I attacked the Government on the Riel question. My officers and men, all became, and I think justly, indignant at that, and when I was leaving Quebec to attend to my duties in Parliament, the non-commissioned officers and men of my Battalion held a meeting, and passed the following resolutions unanimously—I read them because they are testimony from my men, which I never asked or suggested in any way, but which is the expression of their spontaneous feeling:—

“Resolved, that the non-commissioned officers and men of the 9th Battalion, V. Q., protest with all their might against the dishonest accusations proffered by certain newspapers of Quebec against their worthy commandant and themselves; that they are happy to declare that during the whole of the North-West expedition he has shown towards them a constant devotedness, an indefatigable zeal for their welfare, that he shared their miseries and fatigues and won their sincere admiration and attachment.

“That in many circumstances their commandant has exhibited an extraordinary energy to protect them and to promote the interests of every member of the 9th Battalion.

“That he has guarded their morals and conduct, and it is due to his exertions and those of our superior officers that the 9th has come back without a stain.

“That he has always been encouraging us by his example and urging upon us to work for the pride of Quebec.

“That the accusations proffered against him and us are false, malicious, and it is to be deplored that they are made by compatriots from our own city.

“That we pray for the happiness of our commandant, and that we desire to assure him of our unalterable attachment.

“That these resolutions be communicated to him at his departure for Ottawa, where, we doubt not, he will well know how to vindicate the honor of the battalion, so grossly and so unjustly slandered.

“Sergt. EDWARD LEBEL,
“Secretary.”

Well, Sir, before that time the hon. Minister of Militia had been knighted, and I felt proud of the fact, because he was a member of this House and a compatriot of mine, and I sent him a letter of congratulation. I have nothing to change in that; I think it was right for the Queen to confer that honor upon him. To that letter of congratulation he replied:

“St. PATRICK, 19th August, 1885.

“To Lieut.-Col. AMYOT.

“Many thanks for your congratulations, which I accept with much pleasure from you.

“A. P. CARON.”

Another letter of his to me says:

(Translation.)

“DEAR COLONEL AMYOT. “RIVIÈRE DU LOUP, 10th August, 1885.

“* * * I am glad to hear by Mr. Faucher de St. Maurice that you have been admirably received by your friends of Bellechasse.

“Yours truly,

This ends what I wanted to say about the 65th Battalion and about the 9th, so far as I am concerned. But there is another part of my motion, which relates to Major General Strange. I do not intend to enter personally into a discussion of that point, though there are some views which I think it my duty to lay before the country. I will content myself with quoting the following letter to La Presse of Montreal:—

“MILITARY COLONISATION RANCHE,
“P. O. GLEICHEN, ALBERTA, N.W.T.,
“26th July, 1886.

“SIR,—An article in La Presse, Montreal, 17th July, called my attention to the report of the Minister of Militia for the past year. I obtained a copy through a friend, as the department did not honor me with one.

“I am pained, but not surprised, to see the extraordinary injustice done to the gallant troops I commanded in the late campaign, especially to the 65th Battalion; though they are not alone, as ‘Steele’s Scouts’ and the ‘Alberta Mounted Rifles’ are absolutely omitted in the list of troops engaged in the campaign, as shown in the statement on the back of the map, from which the locality of ‘Frenchman’s Butte’ has been erased.

“In the Deputy Minister’s report, page xi, no mention is made of the casualties in the action at that place—‘Frenchman’s Butte’—the very existence of which has been so carefully suppressed.

“For myself it does not trouble me that the rank and file of major-general, which Her Majesty did me the honor to confer, has also been suppressed. This occurs in the case of no other officer mentioned in the report. Part of the report in question purports to be based on extracts from newspapers.

“It is a novelty to base official reports of military operations on disconnected and unauthenticated extracts from newspapers, when the official reports of the officers themselves are at hand.

“The singular egotism of the report in question ignores the first advance of the Alberta field force for the relief of Edmonton, and would make it seem that the force having miraculously appeared in Edmonton, commenced operations on the 20th May, the words being: ‘20th May, Strange, Edmonton, with 65th by boat, rest by trail.’ As a fact the 65th did not leave Edmonton by boat, but marched to Victoria.

“The object aimed at is evident to any casual reader of the report, and you will not be surprised to hear that a part of my official report has been omitted altogether. As it concerns the reputation of the soldiers I commanded it is to be regretted that an official report to Parliament must become the basis of history, which it will falsify by its omissions, which answer the same purpose as perversion of facts.

“I thank you for the justice with which you treat me. It is a contrast to the injustice I have suffered at the hands of Her Majesty’s Imperial Government, which has deprived me of my pension for the half year during which I left my home and sacrificed my private business, as did many others, to save this fair province from desolation and bloodshed.

“I have the honor to be, Sir,
“Your obedient servant,
“T. B. STRANGE,
“Major General, late Com. Alberta Force.”

“MILITARY COLONISATION RANCHE,
“P. O. GLEICHEN, ALBERTA, N.W.T.,
“1st October, 1887.

“To the Editor of the Tribune, Calgary, Alberta.

“SIR,—I am disinclined to bring forward a disagreeable subject which I have left a long time in abeyance, hoping for some explanation, or at least an answer to my letter to General Middleton, dated 17th June, 1887, asking if he or Sir Adolphe Caron had any objection to my publishing that part of my report which had not been published, despite the statements to the contrary. I have tried to do my duty to Canada as soldier and civilian for 16 years. If I leave her shores in silence, it would imply that I could not substantiate my statement ‘that a portion of my report had not been published and unnecessarily delayed.’ Such silence would moreover be unjust to the force I commanded.

“My despatch reporting the action at Frenchman’s Butte, 28th May, 1885, was in General Middleton’s hands two or three days after the event, as also Major Steele’s despatch to me of the action at Loon Lake, which I forwarded at once to General Middleton, who, moreover, received a duplicate copy (direct from Major Steele). That despatch has never been published.

“The despatch from Frenchman’s Butte was not published till the Canada Gazette of 22nd August, 1885, after my personal remonstrance on the subject.

“The bulk of my report was not published for a year after, i.e., in May, 1886, as an appendix to the general report laid before Parliament, and then a portion was omitted, which I now request you will publish, in justice to those I commanded, and the only means left me of proving my statement as to a portion of my report being omitted.

“General Middleton is reported in the Montreal Herald, 10th August, 1886, to have stated to a reporter of the Star, with reference to the suppression of part of my report: ‘Neither the Minister of Militia nor myself are to blame, for I handed in to Sir Adolphe the exact report furnished me by Major General Strange.’

“In answer to the question: ‘Does the report appear in the Blue Book exactly as you turned it in?’ Answer: ‘Exactly, not a comma has been changed.’

“When last in Ottawa, I saw General Middleton personally on the subject and pointed out to him what had been omitted from publication. He admitted the omission, but said that both he and Sir Adolphe Caron did not consider the omitted portion of any consequence, and that he (General Middleton) did not concur in the conclusions I had made. He also gave reasons (in which I do not concur) for the non-publication of Major Steele’s report. Subsequently, when I saw in the Canadian Militia Gazette, 9th June, 1887, that Sir Adolphe Caron had stated in Parliament (in reply to a question from Lt.-Colonel Amyot) that the only written reports received from General Strange were included in the general report published on the North-West Rebellion, and would be found in the appendices D and A, I wrote to General Middleton, as he had been my superior in rank during the campaign, asking if there would be any objection to my making public the unpublished portion of my report. Having waited upwards of three months for a reply, I request you to publish the following:—

“Omitted portion of Major General Strange’s report on the suppression of the North-West Rebellion, exclusive of the report of the action at Loon Lake, where Major Steel commanded, of which there is no copy in my possession:—

“RÉSUMÉ OF RESULT.

“The work done by the force under my command, and the results may be briefly stated as follows:—

“The cattle districts in the heart of the Indian reserves were secured, the frontier patrolled, and Indians and Fenian incursions prevented, and telegraph communication established.

"These results were mainly obtained by the raising of ranche cavalry and home-guards, supplemented by the presence of companies of infantry at Fort McLeod, Crowfoot, Gleichen and Calgary. These detachments secured the country against the rising of Blackfeet, Bloods, Piegans, Sarcees, &c., protected the railroad and prevented its abandonment by the Canadian Pacific Railway officials during the strike and alarm.

"No doubt the feeling of alarm was much exaggerated, but could not be otherwise, owing to the utter absence of arms among the settlers, and the impossibility of getting any from the Government.

"The transport and supply was extemporised, without even the embryo of the establishments considered necessary in a civilised country while our difficulties were increased by the complete absence of army supplies in the wilderness country through which we passed, and the want of road, telegraph, or even mail communication.

"Nevertheless, the rapid march of the 3 successive columns of this force, stamped out the incipient seeds of active rebellion among the turbulent tribes who had already commenced depredations, more of whom would have joined the Eastern outbreak but for the timely appearance and location of troops on their reserves, while a famine was prevented in the districts north of Edmonton by the convoys of provisions brought along the protected line of communication.

"A flotilla was built at Edmonton; a further supply of provisions collected, and the hazardous and delicate operations of moving troops simultaneously by land and river, in open boats, touch being maintained throughout, and a final successful junction effected within striking distance of the enemy.

"Not a day's delay occurred from start to finish, though our base of supply was more than 500 miles from our objective.

"The excellence and carefulness of the scouting almost precluded any chance of disaster, and quickly discovered the position of Big Bear, who was immediately attacked, the result being that although the numerical inferiority of our force prevented the capture of his position, his band was broken up and demoralised, the majority of the prisoners released, and the subsequent pursuit by the cavalry of this force under Major Steel completed the surrender of the remainder of the prisoners, the total dispersion of his band and his ultimate surrender. Not a shot was fired in connection with these results except by the Alberta Field Force, with only a loss of six wounded.

"Plainly drawing attention to these results is a duty I conceive due to the officers and men I feel it an honor to have command. By their patient endurance, sense of duty, courage and steadiness under fire, these results were produced."

"Your obedient servant,

"T. B. STRANGE,

"Major General, late Commanding Alberta Field Force."

I really do not know why this report has been suppressed. I cannot understand the reason, but I believe it was suppressed at the order of the Major General. Well, I do not recognise his right to suppress it; or if he has the right, I say he has exercised it wrongly. There is nothing in that report which does injustice to the troops that fought under General Strange's command, and there is no reason why General Middleton should keep to himself the whole glory of the campaign when Major General Strange earned a large share of it. I communicated with General Strange after he had left for the United States, and he wrote to me from Illinois, on March the 3rd, 1888, the following letter:—

"CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, U.S., 23rd March, 1888.

"My dear Colonel AMYOT,

"I have only just received yours dated 9th March, enclosing No. 9 of Votes of House of Commons, in which I see your motion as regards suppressed report and answer of Sir A. P. Caron, in Daily Citizen, which, however, makes a mistake in calling it the excised portion of a letter. It was portion of an official dispatch or report of military operations, over my signature, which no one had a right to alter or excise without my permission. If General Middleton thought I wrote anything untrue, he should have said so in his report or asked me to withdraw it. As it is, he first distinctly denied having omitted any portion, and then, when I spoke to him face to face and told him I had kept a copy of the report, he admitted that a portion had been omitted, but it was of no importance, &c. What Sir A. P. Caron said in the House, you know. If the days of duelling were not passed—I would say the two knights, Sir Fred. and Sir A. P. were liars—publicly; but as public opinion does not seem to be shocked at falsehoods from public men, it is no use to say anything beyond proving that I though not knighted am not the liar. And I send you copy of a letter I wrote which was published in the Tribune, Calgary, &c., with it a copy of the omitted portion of the despatch. When I wrote the letter, 26th July, 1886, I did not know exactly how much had been omitted as no copy was sent to me, and I borrowed one for a short time. Nevertheless my letter of 26th July is correct. I suppose my letter containing copy of omitted portion of despatch which was published in Calgary Tribune, October, 1887, you did not see. As I said before, I send you manuscript copy. As to any further steps you may take, 'being likely to add in any way to the harshness with which (you say) I have been treated by the Canadian Government,' you are welcome to take any steps you please. The Canadian Government cannot injure me any more than they have done. 'Damning with faint praise,' they have done worse.

Mr. AMYOT.

The absolute ignoring of a general who commanded an army in the field, in a practically independent command is, I think, unknown in the late annals of the British army, and in the eyes of the world condemns a man to a stigma. My friends in England were so much astonished that 3 or 4 letters had not been added to my name, that they enquired at Colonial Office, War Office and Home Guards, why I was ignored. They were told that the Canadian Government had been silent on the subject. Perhaps the Imperial Government would not have taken away my pension, had my services to the Canadian Government been in any way recognised by them or reference made to my services to the Imperial Parliament by the Dominion. In answer to your other questions, I have only received the daily pay and allowance of a colonel (not those of a major general) for the number of days I was employed on the public service. I have received no other compensation or remuneration for my services. I applied for $500 compensation for the expenses I was put to by having to leave my home and put my family in safety at Calgary—at extra expense as you know also for the loss to my business, &c., and the loss of 5,000 young trees which, having been packed in long cases, some fool thought they were rifles because addressed to me, and they were sent north. The $500 compensation was refused to me, though $10,000 would not repay me, for the Military Colonisation Ranche was ruined by my absence. The Claims Commission, however, paid the company for thirteen horses killed by Indians, and about 40 head of cattle driven off. I personally got no compensation. The Military Colonisation Ranche has been made to suffer through the hostility of the Blackfeet, who openly said they would be revenged on me for leading the troops against them, and burn me out of the country. They have done so by burning the ranch, which they could do with impunity. The North-West Mounted Police at Calgary gave no protection. Had there been no police in the country the ranchmen could have taken the matter into their own hands. I am trying to arrange for the sale of the ranche and of my property there. I hope shortly to be on my way to England, so soon as I can settle my affairs."

Further on he says:

"Sir A. P. Caron, in his answer, said I had been paid $2,000 (which was not even the pay of my rank) but he forgot to mention that his partner in the monopoly of Canadian honors got $20,000 in addition to his pay as a general! Of course I cannot compare myself to a man who was wounded in the hat! I enclose you cutting to show you that in vote of thanks every one is mentioned, including doctors and commissariat, but not the Alberta Field Force. Please return the cuttings. I mean to keep them as remembrance of the reward of my Canadian service.

"Yours truly,

"T. B. STRANGE."

I am not the only person who takes interest in the way in which General Strange has been treated by his brother in arms, General Middleton. I have here a letter from the Hon. Mr. Joly. I do not know whether he intended it to be published or not, but I think he will forgive me if I read it now:

"LEOLERCVILLE, P.Q., 14th April, 1888.

DEAR MR. AMYOT.

"General Strange leaves for England by the 26th of this month. You know how many services he paid to Canada since he came to Quebec; how he has virtually created our artillery; how many times he has been called upon to maintain order in Quebec; with what courage and moderation he has fulfilled that task; how he behaved in the North-West rebellion."

In fact, I saw him in Quebec during the time of the riots. He was there commanding the Citadel corps. He was in the midst of the firing, and people were killed at his side, but he never hesitated in his duty and in compelling the mob to keep the law. Mr. Joly goes on:

"And now he goes back to England, ruined, discouraged, without even the least mark of gratitude from the country to which he devoted himself for so many years, without the least evidence to show to his former companions in arms in England that he has done his duty. It would be so easy for the Federal Government to recommend him to the Imperial Government for one of those honorary distinctions, such as have been obtained by every one of the English officers who came here to serve the Canadian Government. Do you see any means of obtaining that consolation for a generous man, who deserves the esteem of all generous men? Do you believe I could do anything to help him? Is it better that I address myself directly to Sir Adolphe, or should I write to the papers to awaken public sympathy? Now that the poor General is going for ever, he will no more be in the way of anybody. We may, without fear, judge him upon his own merits and recompense him if he deserves it. That recompense will cost nothing to the Dominion, and for General Strange and his children it would be a precious gift.

"Truly yours,

"H. G. JOLY."

I hope, these facts being laid before the Government, that they will take them into consideration, and will find some way of recognising the services of that brave general, who was perfectly ruined in consequence of the war. He had a nice business in the North-West, but that was ruined. He had to leave his ranche, and he suffered such losses during the war that afterwards he had to sell everything he possessed. But General Strange is not the only one who has been unfairly dealt with. The country had, in the North-West, the services of another most valuable and distinguished officer, the youngest but not the least of the Major Generals of the British Army, my hon. colleague, the member for Shelburne (General Laurie). By his night and day's exertions, and the benefit of his vast experiences, Canada has saved hundreds of thousands of dollars, in the mode adopted by him for transport of supplies. If that branch of the service had entirely been left to him, we would not have experienced the capture of convoys and prisoners. But he seems to me to have been also a victim of that premeditated plan of cumulating upon one head the whole merit of the campaign. Then, can I forget the able commandants of battalions, some of whom died during a glorious career, including the regretted Colonel Williams, and who were all so very effective in organising their corps and leading them amidst hardships of all kinds, to the benefit and glory of the country? Not one of them has deserved one of the honors or honorable mentions invariably conferred upon the officers of corresponding rank in the British Army, under identical circumstances. No mention of Colonel Otter, who, with the gallant Queen's Own Rifles, a regiment of which any country would be proud, "B" Battery, Ottawa Sharpshooters and Battleford Volunteers, who took so effective a part in the fights; no mention of Major Steele, of Colonels Grassett, O'Brien, Tyrwhitt, Scott, Smith, Bremner, Denison and others. I might speak also—but I know he does not want me to do so—of our brave Surgeon-General; but he forbade me to say a word of him, and I will not do so. It is a well known fact that in England, at the end of every campaign, the title of C. B. is conferred upon every officer commanding a regiment, or any officer holding an equivalent rank. For officers of junior rank, a distinguished service order has been introduced. I might sum up the whole of these lengthy remarks by saying: 1st. In giving publicity to private telegrams, the Minister of Militia has betrayed the secrecy of friendship and lacked the sense of honor. 2nd. In curtailing and isolating them from surrounding circumstances, he has misrepresented them so as to mislead the public and most unfairly charge a soldier with want of courage and bravery. 3rd. In doing so, he has been most ungrateful towards a devoted partisan and friend, most unfair to a commanding officer of one of the two French battalions which went to the North-West, and whose conduct had received general and unlimited approval. 4th. He had himself called for those communications, had encouraged and approved of them, and, therefore, he was either sincerely then approving them or setting a mean trap. 5th. The military authorities have moreover suppressed that part of the official reports which related the share his fellow French countrymen had taken in the suppression of the rebellion, the noble way in which they had acted. 6th. They have treated with deplorable injustice Major General Strange whose past and actual services had been most useful to the country. 7th. They have failed in their duty in not recommending the superior officers who took part in the war, for Imperial honors, as it is usual in similar cases in England. By monopolising those honors upon the Minister of Militia and General Middleton, they have proved ungrateful to the Canadian force at large. Mr. Speaker, I have been defending myself. I might have attacked others—spoiled some reputations; but I do not feel the necessity of lowering any one in order to raise myself. I would have remained silent, perhaps, if the attacks made upon me concerned only myself. But, under the circumstances, it is my honor as a soldier which has been attacked, and as such it belongs to my country, and I would be a coward indeed if I did not defend it. I now with confidence leave the whole case in the hands of this honorable House and of my fellow countrymen.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, I always thought, and do so, possibly, more to-night than I ever did before, that life is too short to fight the same battle over and over again. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and who, no doubt, believes, and properly, that he has been contributing somewhat to the history of Canada, in the long speech he has delivered to-night, has, more than once, come before this House, and in different terms, and otherwise than he has done to-night, has laid before Parliament and Canada his interpretation of the events of the North-West. Sir, I shall be brief in the few remarks I intend to address to you in answer to the speech of the hon. gentleman. He states that it has been asserted that the services of the 9th Battalion were offered by him, and he has denied that statement. Mr. Speaker, my memory so far has been accurate in reference to the events which have been so often brought before Parliament. I remember the circumstance well—the hon. gentleman volunteered his services and the services of the battalion which he commanded. Moreover, I think that there are gentlemen still living who know whether I am wrong in making this statement, or whether the hon. gentleman has forgotten the circumstance under which he offered those services. Sir, I never for one moment hesitated to give the hon. gentleman the credit which he deserved for having offered his services, and the services of his battalion, to fight the battles of his own country. As we all know, at that time the North-West was in the hands of a man, or rather of a set of men, who were trying to subvert the Government of the country, who were trying to subvert the laws of the country—who were getting up a revolt in that part of Canada. Can it be said that there was a soldier in the volunteer force of Canada, which has always been so ready to answer the call of duty—is it possible to suppose that there was one soldier, or one commandant of a battalion, who would have refused to take service to maintain law and order and to defend the flag of his own country? Sir, I never accused the 9th Battalion, and the 9th Battalion has never been accused by anybody, to my knowledge, on the floor of this Parliament, of having failed to do everything that could have been expected of any one of the battalions of the militia of Canada, in the emergency which at that time arose. The hon. gentleman has cited the telegrams and letters which he has read to the House, and which indicate that whenever I had an opportunity of expressing my opinion, whenever I was given an occasion to speak of what our troops were doing at the front, and on the field of battle, I invariably expressed my admiration for the manner in which the 9th Battalion had fulfilled the duty which had been confided to them. It is perfectly true that I took every opportunity to say that the officers and men of the corps had done their duty, as Canada had a right to expect that every one of her volunteers would do on such an occasion. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman says—and it is impossible for me to understand why there should be any difference of opinion between us on that point—in one breath he says that I have attacked the 9th Battalion, and in another breath he read my telegrams where I congratulated him upon the success which attended his efforts to leave Quebec as rapidly as possible, and to get to the front, and upon the manner generally in which his battalion had fulfilled the duty which had been entrusted to it. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman says that at Winnipeg, in an interview with the reporter of the Free Press, he expressed his anxiety, and the anxiety of the 9th, about going to the front. Well, Sir, we all knew—no one in the Province of Quebec, or in the Dominion of Canada, unsuspected for one moment that the 9th would have desired to remain in Winnipeg when fighting was going on at some distance from that city. Sir, I knew the hon. gentleman and I have never accused him, as he has insinuated to-night, of not being as brave as I know him to be; but the hon. gentleman immediately takes up the cudgels, because I congratulated him upon his success as a warrior, and immediately he turns around and says: "You have abused me, because you said I did not want to fight." Well, Sir, I have never, in any interview or in any utterance which I have ever made in Parliament or out of Parliament, that I can recollect—I never in any way spoke of the hon. gentleman, except in terms similar to those expressed in the telegrams and letters which have been read by him to-night. The hon. gentleman has kindly stated that he did not accuse the Minister of Militia of having been at all careless or negligent in providing for the comfort of the troops, but he has said that when they got to Winnipeg the officers and men were like animals who were put in a swamp, and they had to stop in a place covered over with water. I regret exceedingly, as we all regretted it at the time, the severe test to which our militiamen and the force of Canada were placed, but I must remind the hon. gentleman that he took the quarters which had just been vacated by Colonel O'Brien's battalion, and I never heard any great complaint from Colonel O'Brien or any of his men. It may have been, I am quite prepared to admit it, that at the time when the hon. gentleman succeeded to Colonel O'Brien in that particular camp it may not have been in quite so favorable a condition as it was when occupied by Colonel O'Brien and his men. But I must say that under those circumstances, and the hon. gentleman knows it better than anyone else, it was impossible to do more than was done to meet the requirements of the force which was being sent to the front. The manner in which the officers and men of every battalion bore the hardships of the campaign has been the theme of admiration not only among Canadians but by people abroad, who have spoken with admiration of the manner in which our men withstood the hardships of the campaign. In so far as the Department of Militia was concerned, it was impossible at that moment and with the very short notice that was given to have prevented the hardships that occurred. The hon. gentleman has read several telegrams, and has stated that I, as Minister of Militia, telegraphed him: "I place implicit confidence in you and your battalion." I did. I never heard the statement contradicted except by the hon. gentleman himself. Although the hon. gentleman who, as he says, was a friend of mine at the time, a gentleman whom I had met time and again not only in Parliament, but out of Parliament as a friend, suddenly turned round and urged this cruel war against me. I never attempted to attack the hon. gentleman. I never had any quarrel with the hon. gentleman. It was only when the hon. gentleman attacked me, when he called upon me as a Minister of the Crown to produce letters and telegrams which were laid on the Table of this House, that the difficulty arose between us. I never attempted to publish or to open my lips about anything which had been communicated to me by the hon. gentleman until he made a motion in 1886, as follows:—

"Motion for correspondence containing letters and telegrams exchanged between General Middleton and Lt.-Col. Amyot during the expedition of the 9th Battalion to the North-West; also between the Minister of Militia and the said Lt.-Col. Amyot during the same time."

It was my bounden duty, I could not possibly avoid it, to produce the papers, and telegrams, and letters which the hon. gentleman himself as a member of Parliament insisted upon having produced; and the hon. gentleman has cast a slur upon my conduct for having produced those telegrams which he says were of a confidential nature. I have here every telegram and every letter which the hon. gentleman ever signed and ever addressed to me, and I say that no

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

telegram or letter marked private has ever been produced or published by me. The hon. gentleman says this difficulty is between ourselves. Why? The hon. gentleman had a plan of campaign of his own, and it did not altogether agree with the plan of campaign of the Major-General who was commanding the force. I had confidence in the hon. gentleman; but the Major-General was in command of the whole force, and naturally I had to allow the operations of the campaign to be conducted by the general commanding. I can understand why the hon. gentleman in that telegram tells me this matter is between ourselves, because if that telegram had been communicated to the Major-General, no doubt the hon. gentleman would have been severely censured, if not punished very severely, for having communicated it to me. The point I wish to make is that no telegram sent by him, no letter sent by him to me and marked private has ever been published or brought down by me or spoken of in Parliament or out of Parliament. I have a number of his letters here and a number of telegrams which have never been published, and which I do not intend to publish, and I repeat that none of his communications marked private have been published. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his remarks, said that at certain places provisions had been wanting, and the troops had not all they expected to have or should have had. That may be, but it was a proud moment for any man who had at heart the interests of Canada that, after that campaign was over and the men who had gone to the front returned, not a word of complaint was ever uttered. It may have been—I am perfectly certain it must have been—the case, that, at particular places, and under certain circumstances, the provisions were not what they should have been. But our men withstood all the discomforts and fought under those hardships which were absolutely indispensable to such a campaign, and I never heard a word of complaint. Why—when the battle has been fought and the men have returned to their homes and when they have done their duty—should this question be now brought forward? Why go back to those by-gone issues, to those events which properly now belong to past history, and which it can serve no good purpose to again bring forward and thrust before the notice of the public. It may have been that some provisions were wanting, and I am certain they must have been wanting. There must have been times when our men suffered for want of provisions, but I have never heard a word of complaint from any battalion, and I am confident it would have been better if the hon. gentleman had not again brought forward this matter. But I am attacked by the hon. gentleman in connection with the death of two of his comrades in arms in the North-West. I wish to put myself before the country and before Parliament in the position which I did take upon that occasion. The hon. gentleman says that Blais' pockets were rifled, and the few dollars found there were utilised by the officers of the department for the purpose of burying him. I have never boasted of what I done in this case, and I have never placed before Parliament the orders which were signed by myself and sent forward in reference to Blais. I telegraphed to Lieut. Colonel Lamontagne, Winnipeg, as follows:—

"Let me know out of what funds have been paid funeral expenses of Private Blais. Has it been done totally at the expense of the Government?"

"A. P. CARON."

I got an answer from Winnipeg:

"Partly of Blais' funds and balance by Government, under his uncle's, Mr. Beaudrie, of St. Boniface, direction. Letter explaining sent on 28th."

"E. LAMONTAGNE."

Mr. AMYOT. Did the hon. gentleman say his telegram was sent to me? I did not hear the beginning?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The beginning is a telegram from Winnipeg addressed to me at Ottawa, which I have read, and on the back of the telegram signed by myself I wrote :

"I wish all funeral expenses as already stated to be met by Government. In Blais' case there should be no discrimination made.

"A. P. CARON."

The hon. gentleman can see that it was not by my instructions that the pockets of Blais were rifled for the purpose of meeting the expenses of his funeral, for the first telegram which I sent was a telegram stating that I wished all the expenses connected with his funeral to be met by the Government. Of course I could not know what had been done up there, but my instructions to the officers of the department were such, as the telegrams and despatches show, and I could not be held accountable for what had taken place. I may moreover state that in letters received from Mr. Beaudrie, the uncle of that young man who died in Winnipeg, he insisted upon his contributing a share towards the funeral expenses. The next man to whom the hon. gentleman has drawn my attention, is the one who died at Calgary (Marois), and the hon. gentleman said that the expenses connected with his funeral have been deducted from the pay of Major Dowling. It may be true or it may not be true, and when I say it may be true I do not mean at all that the hon. gentleman said what he did not think to be true, but in so far as the records of the Militia Department are concerned, it is impossible to trace that anything has been deducted from Major Dowling's pay, or from any other officer's pay, to meet the funeral expenses of anybody. I did not know that the hon. gentleman was going over every incident of that campaign and I naturally was not prepared, as I might have been, to meet the charges which he has made on these different points. But so far as speaking from memory goes, I may say that so far as Marois is concerned no money was deducted from Major Dowling's pay to pay his funeral expenses. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot), when reading the letters which he was kind enough to read to the House, and in which he was kind enough to express his satisfaction at the manner in which I had been trying to do my duty as head of the department at that particular time, says that when he got to Ottawa everything had been all right. The hon. gentleman recollects well how happy we were all to greet him on his and his comrades return from the North-West. Your predecessor, Mr. Speaker, opened up the portals of the presidential hall to the volunteers who were returning from the North-West, and everyone, no matter what his nationality who happened to be in Ottawa, met together as one people glad to welcome them back, and to greet the volunteers who performed their duty so well. On that occasion, Sir, the hon. gentleman again expressed the satisfaction at what had been done. The hon. gentleman says it was all right up to the time he got to Ottawa. Well, everything was all right until the hon. gentleman chose to make it all wrong by attacking his old friends and by accusing them of having committed every possible atrocity, when they had only been doing their duty, as men who had been trusted by the country to do their duty as public men. The hon. gentleman has also stated that after the Riel matter the papers attacked him. Possibly they did, and I can say for one that they attacked more than the hon. gentleman. There were a good many persons who were severely criticised for the part they had taken in those sad events, but the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the newspapers, if they did attack him, attacked him because they said he had not been altogether consistent. They said that when he had been up in the North-West he praised everything that had been done, and that when he got back, thinking that those events might be fatal to the friends he had been supporting in politics for a number of years, he changed his views at that particular moment, and he immediately turned around and attacked those whom he had been supporting for a great many years. If the papers did retaliate it was because the hon. gentleman had placed himself in that position in which he could be fairly attacked for not having been altogether consistent in the course which he followed. Now the hon. gentleman has also referred to the report of Major General Strange. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot) has, I believe, expressed the view that this matter would not come before Parliament any more, and I really think it is time that it should not. I should like to place before you the report of Major General Strange in reference to the paper which the hon. gentleman says was sent to me by that officer and which was not produced or which was not published in its entirety :

"MEMORANDUM: Upon the application made by the hon. gentleman in Parliament (Mr. Amyot) on Monday next Address to His Excellency for copies of official correspondence between the Government and the commanding officer of the 9th Battalion, 'Voltigeurs de Quebec,' during the North-West Campaign of 1885 and respecting the same.

2. Copies of reports furnished to the Government and military authorities by Major General Strange, respecting the part that he took in the rebellion of 1885, as well as those respecting the dividing up of the forces under his command."

"3. Copies of the report furnished to General Strange by the Commandant of the 9th Battalion, V. Q., respecting the operations carried out by the said 9th Battalion during the said campaign."

I am now going to read to you the report made to me by Major General Fred. Middleton and signed by himself. This is the original document :

"There does not appear to be any correspondence on record in the Adjutant General's Office, between the Government and the officer commanding 9th Battalion Voltigeurs of Quebec, during the North-West campaign of 1885. Secondly, reports by Major General Strange, respecting the part he took in the North-West campaign of 1885, are to be found commencing respectively at pages 43 and 51 of the Annual Report on the Militia of 1885. There is nothing on record on the subject of dividing up the force under command of Major General Strange. Third, there is no report on record at Headquarters made by officer commanding 9th Battalion to Major General Strange, respecting operations carried out by said 9th Battalion during said campaign."

This is the official report from which I took the information which I conveyed to the House when the hon. gentlemen asked for the production of that report, which I said I could not produce. Now, I have very little to add to what I have stated. The hon. gentleman has been complaining a good deal of the papers which were produced, and of the papers which were not produced. It seems almost impossible to satisfy him; but I have so many of these valuable contributions to history that I am perfectly willing to allow the hon. gentleman to make his own selection of what he would like to be published, and what he would like to be left aside. But everything which has been produced and which can be produced will tend to show that there never was a misunderstanding between the hon. gentleman and the department up to the moment that he himself, returning from the campaign to Quebec, changed his front completely, and attacked the friends whom he had been supporting for so many years. One point I wish to call attention to. The hon. gentleman says that in publishing the telegrams which I did bring down to Parliament, I accused him, or made him appear, guilty of cowardice, I never accused the hon. gentleman of cowardice, and my telegrams to him which he has read indicate that, far from that, I stated time and again that I placed implicit confidence in him and his battalion; and why should he say that those telegrams which I published gave him the appearance of being guilty of cowardice? Why, they are the telegrams he himself wrote and sent to me; and surely I could not do better than give the opinion he himself entertained of his battalion and himself than by reading the papers he placed in my hands. I defy the hon. gentleman, however, to state that those telegrams or letters were private. It was on the motion which he himself made in Parliament, and which I was bound to obey, asking me to produce every letter and telegram which had been exchanged between the Minister of Militia and the commandant of the 9th Battalion, that I produced those letters and telegrams; and if anybody is to blame for their production, it is not the Minister, who obeyed the Order of the House on the motion of the hon. gentleman, who immediately turned around and complained of the production of such papers. In any case, I sincerely hope that these discussions on events which are now past will not recur as often as they have done in the past. I think we ought all join together as much as possible to try and pacify, instead of keeping up, the agitation which has been caused by those events. So far as I am concerned, I have never attacked the hon. gentleman. I have defended my department whenever it was attacked, as I mean to defend it whenever it is attacked by the hon. gentleman or any other gentleman; but I never, directly or indirectly, insinuated or hinted or said anything that could lead the hon. gentleman to stand up and state, as he did to-night, that I had accused his battalion and himself of cowardice. I never did; and the whole record of that campaign shows, fortunately for Canada, that there were no cowards among those who went to the front to fight the battles of the country. Every battalion did its duty, French and English, as one people, as we should be, all joined together to protect law and order when they are threatened; and I for one never, directly or indirectly, accused of cowardice any portion of that corps which I admired so much for having fulfilled its duty to the very utmost. I may add that, in so far as the production of the papers is concerned, the hon. gentleman's object no doubt was to make his speech, and to place himself right before the country; but it would be impossible, from any precedent known, to bring down the reports sent by one general of a division to the major-general, and to lay them before Parliament. The other papers the hon. gentleman has; he has read every letter and every telegram, and, consequently, it would be useless to put the Government to the expense of a very voluminous return, containing papers which he has in his possession and which he has read to-night.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no intention of entering into this discussion, which is largely personal between my hon. friend the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) and my hon. friend the Minister of Militia; and even if I had the inclination, I frankly confess that I have not the knowledge of the facts which would enable me to do so. But one or two facts connected with this discussion have been elicited which call for a comment or two. The gist of the charge, which has been made more than once by my hon. friend from Bellechasse against my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, is that the Minister of Militia brought forward and gave publicity to certain telegrams of the hon. member for Bellechasse, which, presented in that manner, were liable to make him appear guilty of cowardice. To this charge the answer of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia is that he never produced any telegrams or communications from the hon. member for Bellechasse except what he was forced to bring by the Order of the House upon a motion made by the hon. member for Bellechasse himself in the Session of 1885. Now, if my memory serves me rightly, this statement of the hon. Minister of Militia is not altogether accurate. So far as my memory serves me, my hon. friend, the Minister of Militia, brought down, at one time, some telegrams sent by my hon. friend, the member for Bellechasse, which, from the manner in which they were brought, appear to have been produced, not with the view of doing my hon. friend justice, but with a view of making a point against him. The occasion was the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny, at that time Mr. Landry—a motion of censure upon the Government for the execution of Louis Riel. To that motion the Government answered at once by the mouth of the Minister of Public Works, and the hon. the Minister of Public Works was followed by my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). Now my hon. friend from Bellechasse, as a soldier, did his duty—and did it well, according to the testimony now given by the hon. the Minister of Militia—in quelling the rebellion; but as a member of Parliament, as a political man, he seceded from the Government party which he had formerly supported, because in his opinion, the rebellion he had aided, and properly aided to quell, had been excited by the Government themselves. Upon that occasion he chose his ground, and seceded from his friends. At a later stage of the debate the Minister of Militia followed, and then, for the first time, those telegrams—not all the correspondence and telegrams which had passed between my hon. friend from Bellechasse, while he was commanding his regiment in the North-West, and the Minister of Militia, but one or two of them—were produced; and these, taken by themselves, might convey the impression that my hon. friend had been guilty of cowardice; and, certainly, listening to the Minister of Militia on that occasion, as he brought down those telegrams—telegrams which were brought down, not upon a motion, and not when the hon. gentleman was speaking as Minister of Militia, but when he was speaking as a member of the Administration, endeavoring to shield it from the censure which was then impending—it was impossible to come to any other conclusion but that they were brought down to make a point against my hon. friend from Bellechasse, and not with a view of doing him the justice to which he was entitled.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. They were brought down on a motion.

Mr. LAURIER. The motion had not been made then.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, it had.

Mr. LAURIER. My memory is not in accord with that of my hon. friend. At all events, on the 17th or 18th of March when the hon. gentleman spoke, the papers to which he now alludes had never been brought down to the House.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My hon. friend will allow me just to give him one date. The motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse was made on the 11th of March, and I spoke on the 17th.

Mr. AMYOT. It was a notice of motion; the motion was never made.

Mr. LAURIER. The notice had been given on the 11th of March and the motion had not been made, the papers had not been brought down; and when the hon. gentleman spoke, he spoke, not as the Minister of Militia defending his own department, but as a member of the Administration, defending the case of the Administration; and he chose to select one or two telegrams of my hon. friend from Bellechasse and lay them before the House. I put it to the hon. gentleman to say whether his intention could have been other than to humiliate my hon. friend. Well, my hon. friend promptly resented the conduct of the Minister; and I leave it to the Minister of Militia to say if his conduct on that occasion was guided by the rules of military honor or of friendship, which, up to that moment, had existed between him and my hon. friend. This is the gist of the charge brought by my hon. friend, a charge which he has brought more than once since with a view of exculpating himself from the insinuations made by the Minister of Militia on that occasion. I am glad to see that at last my hon. friend has succeeded in his object and extracted from the Minister of Militia the admission that during the campaign of the North-West my hon. friend acted like a brave soldier.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I always said so.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, the hon. gentleman was not so understood. Passing to another point of the discussion, I would like to call his attention to the question of the funeral of the man Marois. My hon. friend from Bellechasse, who was in command of the battalion, chose to give this man a military service, and I am sure his (my hon. friend's) object was praiseworthy, and I am sure also his object must have met with the approbation of the Minister of Militia. His object, no doubt, was to elevate the morals not only of the troops but of the whole population, and it was quite proper that an impressive service should be held over the body of one who had fought in the service of his country. But, to day, it appears, after three or four years have passed, that the expenses of that funeral service have not been paid. The statement has been made by my hon. friend, and is not denied by the Minister of Militia.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I say that it is impossible to find any trace of anything of that kind.

Mr. LAURIER. Will my hon. friend tell me, if he had been willing to exert himself a little, he would not have been able to find out whether that was the case or not. If the funeral expenses have not yet been paid, their non-payment is a disgrace to Canada, and I do not admit the excuse that the hon. gentleman is not able to find out. I have more confidence in my hon. friend than he has in himself. I am sure that if he will exert himself ever so little, he will be able to find out whether this is the case or not. If it is he will make it his duty at once to see that such an error—I will not qualify it by stronger language—should be remedied at once. I have a few words to say about General Strange. I have no censure to make of my hon. friend. I willingly give him the credit for having during the whole of that campaign discharged his duties in a manner most creditable to himself, but I believe also, if my hon. friend the Minister of Militia will exert himself, he will be able, not only to find what he has been unable to discover, so far with regard to the funeral expenses of Marois, but will also be able to have justice done to General Strange. Everyone who knows General Strange knows that he is a most deserving officer, brave soldier and honorable man, who did his country good service in her defence in 1885. Yet it appears that General Strange complains that a part of the report which he made on the operations during the campaign never found its way into the report of the Minister of Militia;—

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Not my report.

Mr. LAURIER.—and we have the statement made by the Commander of the Forces, that the whole of General Strange's report has been published. I will not lay the blame upon General Middleton or General Strange, but there is a strange discrepancy between the statements of these two officers. General Strange complains that the whole of his report has not been brought to light as it should have been, yet we have on the other hand the statement that everything which came from General Strange has been published. This is a most lamentable state of things, indeed, in the department of my hon. friend. My hon. friend ought to see at once that there is something wrong somewhere, when two honorable men, such as General Middleton and General Strange are making statements so opposed to each other. Perhaps, my hon. friend will say, on this question also, that it is impossible to find out who is in the wrong and who is in the right. Again I have to say to my hon. friend, that I have more confidence in him than he has in himself, and that if he will only exert himself a little he will find which is in the right.

Gen. LAURIE. I have occupied a seat for too short a time in this House to be able to follow the points raised by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), but I must express an opinion based on what the Minister of Militia has said, differing from him to some extent. He regrets that this matter has been brought forward this evening. From my point of view, I am exceedingly glad it has been brought forward, because the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has most industriously and carefully collated a history of the transactions connected with the service of his battalion, and has produced documents showing the views of the Minister of Militia in regard to him throughout the whole campaign, and showing that the reports which were commonly current through the country, reports which were industriously spread abroad by candid friends, who are often too candid in their expressions of opinion, were devoid of foundation. Imputations have been levelled against my hon. friend the member for Bellechasse that he was not zealous in the campaign, and imputations have been levelled against the Minister of Militia that he had not acted fairly towards the hon. member for Bellechasse. We have had it shown to-night that the Minister of Militia was in candid, free and frank communication with the member for Bellechasse during the whole of that campaign, and it is exceedingly satisfactory to find what the relations were which existed between them at that time. It is true that, from a military point of view, those relations were not what they should have been. As a soldier, I cannot recognise as correct the communications which passed between these gentlemen behind the back of the Major General. It is evident that there was a misunderstanding between the two gentlemen who were corresponding. The Minister of Militia naturally considered no communications as private. My hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) would have gone outside of his duty if he had communicated with the Minister in any other manner than privately. I am to blame to some extent for this misunderstanding. The hon. member for Bellechasse was under my command, and a very good soldier he was, and I do not hesitate to say so. He and his battalion were under my command, and I never wish to have a better battalion than the 9th Battalion of Quebec. I had also some English soldiers, and, if I were to have a command in the field, I would wish to have a combined force of those two nationalities, French-Canadians and English, and in such a case I have no doubt that Canada would come well out of any difficulty. But, whilst I recognised that I was in a position of command, I could not help recognising, in regard to the hon. member for Bellechasse, as in regard to other hon. gentlemen, such as my hon. friend opposite who was then commanding the 35th Battalion, that we were friends, as well as occupying the position of commander and commanded, and I have no doubt that, in the dual capacity of members of this House, supporters of the Government and officers commanding a battalion, communications may have passed between member and Minister which would hardly comport with the position of a commander of a battalion and the Minister directing the civil branch of the Militia. As I said, I was myself to a certain extent to blame. I have no doubt that some of the views expressed by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) may have come from me. We chatted at different times. Of course, soldiers on duty and off duty are necessarily in a different position. We chatted as to where money might be saved, and no doubt the potentialities and the possibilities were discussed, and no doubt out of these possibilities were evolved the suggestions which my hon. friend from Bellechasse made, believing them to be private, to his friend the Minister of Militia, who, being Minister, apparently looked upon everything coming from him as official. We have evidence that everything in the militia of Canada is not always conducted with due regard to regularity. We have the evidence of a resolution passed by the non-commissioned officers and privates of the battalion of my hon. friend from Bellechasse, when he was coming up here, expressing confidence in him. These things are, of course, entirely contrary to the Queen's Regulations, but I do not know that, on the whole, the militia force is the worse for it. It shows the good feeling which exists between officers and men. As to the services rendered by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) and others, who were not fortunate enough to be in the front rank, in the fighting rank, it is thoroughly understood amongst soldiers and administrators, and those who are in the military service, that the duties discharged in forwarding supplies and guarding the lines of communication are of as great importance as facing the enemy in the field. The House of Commons in England mourns the loss of one of the most distinguished officers of the British service, Colonel Duncan, who was on the line of communication on the Nile in the campaign which had for its object the relief of Khartoum. He was decorated by the Queen and received high honors for the faithful discharge of his duties on that line of communication. The Great Napoleon, speaking of his troops, said it was not the actual collision of the troops with the enemy in which the highest skill of a general was shown, but he said that an army marches on its stomach, that it has to be fed, and that the men who are charged with the supply of an army, with the furnishing of its ammunition and of its daily food deserved greater credit and had greater responsibilities than those who met the enemy in the field. In the latest report of the English Commission on the Civil Establishments of the Army, we have the evidence of Lord Wolseley, who certainly may be recognised as an authority on military matters. In answer to a question, he says that the officer in command of the lines of communication: "Is to be a military officer of rank, who at the same time is to be the focus in which all the civil departments of the army are centered. All the different strands of the rope, or the different strands of the various civil departments will be united in him, and he, as a military officer, will be responsible for the feeding and the supplying of the army in front, while at the same time he commands the lines of communication and is responsible for their defence." For this very reason, a military officer of rank, of experience, and of judgment and of known courage is placed in that position. A member of the committee asked if it was intended to make a kind of Intendant General, to which Lord Wolseley replied: "that it was not so intended, but that it was intended that the head and most of the officers, and perhaps all the officers eventually, should be military." Another member of the committee asked the question: "Combatant officers in fact?" Lord Wolseley said: "Combatant officers—in fact, staff officers—because they would be the only ones fit to be placed in charge of such a commission." There is Lord Wolseley's opinion, and he recognises that the most important position in which he can employ his best officers is on the line of communications, which have to be defended in case of emergency. Here is another point to show the dangerous position which that is. He is asked if the public would know, in such a case, whom to hang in case of failure. Lord Wolseley replies that now it would be very difficult to find out whom you could hang. It may not be out of place to refer to the story of Sir Thomas Picton in the Peninsula War. He was a quick-tempered man and was afterwards killed at Waterloo. He was determined that his troops should be fit for fighting, and one day he summoned the commissary and said to him: "If my men do not get their rations to-morrow morning, I will hang you." The commissary went to the Duke of Wellington and complained. The Duke said: "Did he threaten to hang you?" The commissary repeated that he did. "Then," said the Duke: "If I were you, I would take precious good care to have the provisions ready, because Sir Thomas Picton is a man of his word." We have heard it stated across the House that no imputations have been levelled against the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) in this House or by the Government. It is true that mistakes have been made, but it is not likely to those who know the hon. member for Bellechasse, who have met him on the platform or in the House, who know that he is a man with the courage of his convictions—is there anyone who does not recognise that he is one of the most pugnacious, one of the best fighting men in this House? Knowing him to be of that character, it would be childish for us to charge him with anything approaching the term that has been thrown at him outside; it is wild talk. The hon. gentleman knowing that we do know him, may be assured that no such idea of him is entertained by any man in this House, or by any man in a responsible position outside of it. It is wild talk, and he can well afford to disregard it.

Mr. AMYOT. I do not persist in pressing my motion, as my object has been attained, and I beg to thank the hon. gentlemen for the kind words they have uttered in my favor. As to Marois' funeral, I want to say that my authority is Major Dowling's letter, which I read to the House.

Gen. LAURIE. If I might say one word in explanation, I took upon myself the responsibility, as acting on behalf of the Minister, of paying all the expenses of sending Marois' body on to his regiment, that he might receive a military funeral.

Motion withdrawn.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11 p.m.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

STANLEY OF PRESTON.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I acknowledge with thanks the Address you have loyally adopted, in answer to the Speech with which I opened the Session.

I receive with satisfaction your assurance that the important measures submitted to you will receive your careful and full consideration.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

OTTAWA, 21st February, 1889.

ENQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. BOWMAN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Government whether they intend to bring down a return which I moved for last Session, in reference to the receipts and expenditures of fire insurance companies? At this stage of the Session, it would scarcely be worth while to repeat the motion, because it is not likely that it would be reached.

Mr. FOSTER. I will look into the matter.

PRIVILEGE—SECRET SERVICE FUND.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Before the Orders are called, I would like, with the consent of the House, to make a statement with regard to certain articles which have been published in some newspapers, both in Canada and outside of the country, based, I have no doubt, upon a letter contained in the last report of the Auditor General. I dare say the letter is quite familiar to hon. gentlemen who have seen the report. The Auditor General does not give his own letter to me; but the letter which I sent to him in reply, I will read:

"INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT,
OTTAWA, Jan. 17, 1889

"DEAR SIR,—In reply to yours of the 15th inst., calling my attention to two payments to me out of the 'Preventive Service' expenditure for 1887-88, for which there are no vouchers except the paid checks, and asking me to furnish you with information as to the disposition of these sums.

"This information I must, of course, decline to furnish. The sums referred to were expended in accordance with the intention of Parliament.

"I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
"JOHN COSTIGAN."

This letter seems to have been made the basis of those articles published in the newspapers which I will not now take up the time of this House in referring to; but no matter how questionable a newspaper in this country may be, articles published in it are sometimes copied into papers outside of the country. I, therefore, attach some importance to them; and in order to set myself right, I ask the House to bear with me while I explain this matter. Following the publication of this letter by the Auditor General, these papers took up the question, and declared, in connection with some proceedings before the Parnell Commission now sitting in the O. d. Country, that the secret service fund of this country was placed at my disposal, that I controlled that fund, and that very likely out of that fund I had paid money to the gentleman whose name has appeared in the press lately as that of LeCaron. So far as the members of this House are concerned, I do not think it would be necessary for me to deny that; but for parties outside it may be necessary for me to state, in the first place, that I have nothing to do with the secret service fund at the disposal of the Government. Every member here knows that for my department, every year, besides the appropriations to pay salaries and contingencies, a certain sum is set apart, called the Preventive Service Fund, out of which the Minister is authorised to make, without giving any vouchers, such payments as he considers to be in the public interest. On very few occasions have I exercised that right during the eight years that I have been in the department. I think not more than three or four occasions. I think the largest amount I have ever drawn from that fund was $500 during the last year covered by this report. I must state to the House that the expenditure last year was about $18,000 for the preventive service. Some payments are made at times without giving names or vouchers, for reasons well known and understood by Parliament when voting the money. I state that the whole $18,000 has been expended and accounted for in the ordinary way, like other public moneys, except the $500 referred to. I stated, of course, to Mr. McDougall, the auditor, that I did not think he had the right to ask for vouchers for the $500 expended, and when he discussed the matter with me, he agreed that I was right, but he said I should take him into my confidence. This, I said, I was not obliged to do. I merely state, so far as Mr. Le Caron is concerned, that I never heard of him until I saw his name mentioned in the Press, that I had no occasion to use him, and that he has never been employed in my service. I am not looking after the secret service in any respect, but solely after the Inland Revenue Department, and every dollar of money paid out of my department including the $500, has been paid to Canadians for services rendered within the Dominion of Canada in connection with my own department. Neither to men like Mr. Le Caron nor for services which he claims to have been rendered, and which, according to certain writers, entitle him to my sympathy, has any money been paid by me or through me or my department.

SUPPLY—THE FISHERIES.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. LAURIER. I now rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the question of the Fisheries, and to the position in which the relations between Canada and the United States stand with reference to this question. I submit at once, and it is a proposition to which no dissent will, I am sure, be offered, that there is not at this moment a more important question to Canada; and I submit at once also, that it is urgent that upon this question the Government and Parliament should speak promptly and with no uncertain sound. The only reference made to this subject by the Government at all since the opening of the Session was the paragraph contained in His Excellency's Speech to the effect that since the Washington Treaty had not been ratified by the American Senate, nothing remained for Canada to do but to continue to exercise her rights as prescribed by the Convention of 1818, until some satisfactory adjustment was arrived at by treaty between the two nations. In the early days of the Session, the hon. gentleman who represents the counties of Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), gave notice of a motion which was intimately connected with that subject. One would have expected that the Government would have availed themselves of the opportunity thus afforded them, to expose fully and minutely to the House the course they intended to follow and the policy at which they had arrived. But when this motion was called, it was postponed once, twice, three times, four times and five times, and every time at the request of the Government. A few days later, when my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), put the question to the Government, whether they intended to continue or not the modus vivendi, the answer he received was the convenient, ever at hand, always serviceable answer: "under consideration." It must then have become evident to every man in this House that the Government, upon this question, had no policy to offer, that they hold, as they have held of yore upon that and many other questions, an irresolute, vacillating, halting and hesitating policy, and that they will continue such policy until the time for deliberation will be passed, until the time for action will well nigh have passed away, until every action, even if taken in the right direction, will be taken too late and probably remain barren of result, powerless, perhaps, to repair the possibly irreparable injuries that may have been done in the meantime. Under such circumstances, when the Government refuse to rise equal to the duty of the hour, when they refuse to discharge the duties which are incumbent upon them, it becomes the duty of the Opposition to come to the front, to clear the way, and to show the Government what is the duty of the hour and what is the course which should be followed in the interest of the country at large. Were this a purely domestic question, the temptation would be great, perhaps, to fold our arms and to wait and profit by the ever-increasing embarrassment of the Government; but the issues are too great, the consequences are of too serious a character, and it is better, by far, to set aside all party tactics.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, better by far to lose all party advantage and to point out at once where the wrong is and where possibly may be obtained the remedy. What is the situation? At this moment there is an Act, which is the law of the neighboring Republic, whereby at any moment the President of the United States is authorised to close to our ships all entry to American ports, nay more, to prevent importations into the United States of any goods coming from Canada; and when we consider the fact that the exports last year of goods from Canada to the United States, exceeded the sum of forty million dollars, we have the evidence at once of the magnitude of the possible evils which may await Canada, should such a policy be put in force. This is the situation as it now exists. Here are the two principal offsprings of that great mother of nations, England, standing side by side, with every inducement of blood, of common origin and of a common history extending back into ages, to stand together on terms of the most intimate friendship, yet with their relations having reached such a degree of bitterness and hostility that at any moment we may have commercial war. A few days ago, in another debate, the opinion was quoted of an hon. gentleman who occupies a very high rank in the estimation of his party and country, Sir Charles Tupper, to the effect that the line is very thin which separates commercial war from actual war. His words may again be quoted as perfectly applicable to our present position. He said:

"We stood face to face with a Bill providing for non-intercourse between the United States and Canada. I need not tell you that that Bill meant commercial war. I need not tell you that it meant not only the ordinary suspension of friendly feeling and intercourse between the two countries, but that it involved much more. If that Bill had been brought into operation by a proclamation of the President of the United States, I have no hesitation in saying that we stood in relation to that great country of commercial war, and the line is very narrow which separates commercial war between the two countries from actual war."

Still, even not going so far as Sir Charles Tupper went on that occasion, the fact remains that the situation, even if it means nothing else than commercial war, is a most deplorable one. Well, for that situation I say that the Government of Canada is largely responsible. I do not say solely, but I say largely responsible. Justice and fairness compel me to say, and I say it frankly, that in many things the Government of the United States, in their conduct towards Canada, were as blameable as the Government of Canada were towards the United States. If I were an American and stood on the floor of Congress, I would deem it my duty to say to the American people, how, where, and when their conduct has been wanting towards Canada in fairness and generosity. But I am a Canadian, and I stand here on the floor of Parliament, and I deem it my duty to show to the Government where they have erred, where they have committed wrong, and where in my estimation it is possible to undo the wrong which has been done. Sir, on this side of the House we are of the opinion that, from the moment the American colonies severed their connection with the mother land, the most satisfactory relations that ever existed between the mother land and the new Republic, and between that Republic and Canada, were the relations which were created by the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. This is our belief; and upon that belief we act. We have made it an article of our programme to obtain, if possible, not merely a restoration, but an enlargement of that treaty. We have made it an article of our programme to convince, if possible, the two nations that it would be for their mutual benefit to restore and to enlarge the provisions of that treaty. There was a time not yet far distant, when to a large extent the Conservative party held the same views. They made those very views the basis of that system which since, by a strange misnomer, has been called the National Policy. The resolution introduced by the right hon. gentleman, at that time sitting on this side of the House, which has been the gospel of the new doctrine, which has been more than the law and the prophets to his party, has been often quoted to this House, and I might be dispensed from quoting it again, but the memory of hon. gentlemen on that side of the House is so short, so defective, so deceptive, and so treacherous, that it may be an act of charity again to quote that motion, and to show them the downward career they have followed ever since. The motion, after reciting all the benefits which were to follow from the adoption of the vague, indistinct policy which was called the National Policy in those days, went on in the following language:—

"And moving as it ought to do in the direction of a reciprocity of tariff with our neighbors, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country eventually reciprocity of trade."

That was the aim—a reciprocity of trade—and what is the result? Non-intercourse and a commercial war. Well, we believe that, as far as the hon. gentleman meant to have reciprocity of trade, he could not have adopted a worse policy than the policy which he adopted to achieve the end he had in view. Be this as it may, we on this side of the House still believe that the golden era of the commerce of Canada was the twelve years of the Reciprocity Treaty. It was not so only on account of the material prosperity which it assured to the people of Canada, but the treaty was also connected with other advantages, the importance of which no one can deny. First of all, it set at rest, for the time being, that ever vexing question of the fisheries. Then it tended to create and cement a growing amity between the two peoples. It is the individual experience, and it is the national experience as well, that amity will ever follow in the path of mutually advantageous trade relations; but, unfortunately, the growing amity, consequent upon that treaty, received a rude shock at the time of the civil war in the United States. It is a matter of history that, in that great struggle, when the existence of the Republic was trembling in the scales of destiny, the sympathies of the Government of Canada, and of a large number of the people of Canada, were not on the side which fought for right, and which eventually triumphed. In this, however, the Government of Canada were not more remiss than the rest of the civilised world, because, in that great struggle between freedom and slavery, the heart of the civilised world did not beat in favor of the side which was in favor of freedom. Even England, which had only a few years before abolished slavery in her own dominions, abetted the cause of slavery by covert acts, as far as possible, though not by overt acts. It was not that England sympathised with slavery, or did anything but hold it in abhorrence, but there was something which England, or at least the governing class of England, dreaded still more than slavery, and that was the democratic institutions of which the Republic was the embodiment, and which were then on trial. Times move fast in our day. The England of 1889 is no longer the England of 1861. To-day, England is almost a democratic country. We have recently seen a scion of the English aristocracy attempting to organize a Tory Democracy. Who, in 1861, would have imagined it possible to see those two words combined? In that respect, the England of 1861 was very much the same as the England of 1775, and the state of feeling in that country in 1775, which led to the rebellion of the American colonies, is spoken of by Mr. Green as follows, in his "History of the English People." Speaking of the tyrannical and despotic measures of the English Government, which finally drove the colonies into rebellion, he says:

"And behind all these grievances lay an uneasy sense of dread at the democratic form which the Government and society of the colonies had taken. The Governors sent from England wrote back words of honest surprise and terror at the levelling principles of the men about them. To statesmen at home the temper of the Colonial Legislatures, their protests, their bickerings with the Governors and with the Board of Trade, their constant refusal of supplies when their remonstrances were set aside, seemed all but republican."

Those feelings which actuated the English Government and the English Parliament in 1775 were the feelings which actuated the governing classes of England in 1861. It was the same thing with the rest of the civilised world. A French writer said in the early part of this century, referring to the American Republic: "just let that child grow out of her swaddling clothes." He prophesied that, before she reached maturity she would be rent asunder by factions, and, when the rebellion broke out, the secret of the sympathy manifested throughout the civilised world for the South was that there was a secret hope that the Republic would be so rent as to go out of existence, and that the fragments would be held as a warning that purely democratic institutions could not be permanently embodied in a Government. I can understand that being the feeling in European society, but I am at a loss to understand how it was that Canada, which in that day, as now, was a purely democratic country, did not throw its whole sympathy into the cause for which the North was then fighting. Not that we could do anything to help it. The North could fight its own battles. But, if we had shown anything like sympathy with the supporters of the American Union in their struggles with rebellion, they would have given us their friendship in return, as they have always been ready to do to those who sympathised with them. But, finding a hostile people on their border, the first thing they did, when they had the opportunity, was to cut us off from the reciprocal trade relations which we had with them. This is the first fault which, I think, has been committed by the Government of Canada in our relations with our neighbors. With the abolition of the treaty all the old quarrels, all the old difficulties in regard to the fisheries, were renewed. An occasion, however, soon arose which put into the hands of the Government of Canada an opportunity, to some extent, of restoring the facilities of trade between the two nations, and good fellowship at the same time. The close of the war had left many difficulties to be settled between England and the United States, and at last, as we all know, commissioners were appointed to settle those difficulties, and amongst the commissioners was one selected from Canada, the right hon. gentleman himself. Well, the Fishery question was one of the first and most important that the commission had to deal with. The British plenipotentiary offered to settle that question by a restoration of the Reciprocity Treaty, but, as we can well imagine, the feeling of irritation in the United States was still such that that offer was rejected. Shortly afterwards, however, the American plenipotentiaries offered to settle the question by obtaining access to our fisheries in exchange of free trade in coal, salt, fish, and from the 1st of July, 1874, the article of lumber. I am sorry to say that this offer, instead of being accepted, was asked by the British plenipotentiary to be supplemented with a money consideration, and this was refused. It is true, however, that the American plenipotentiaries had before that time offered to settle that question by a money payment. They seemed to have been willing to settle either by money payment, or by trade facilities; our plenipotentiary, on the contrary, offered to settle with them by trade facilities supplemented by a money payment. This was refused, and finally, as we know, the question was settled for a time by granting to the Americans, for the space of twelve years, access to our fisheries on the payment of a sum of money to be determined by arbitrators, and free trade in fish. Well, Sir, I do not hesitate to say that, in my estimation, of all the ways in which that question could have been settled, the most unfortunate was the way which was adopted, the most unfortunate was to settle it by a money consideration. It must have been then evident that what took place since must necessarily take place; that is to say, that as the terms stipulated and paid for had expired, the question would be re-opened with increased bitterness. However, this was done, and this was the second fault committed by our Government in the settlement of that question, and in the history of our relations with our neighbors. The right hon. gentleman at that time was in power, and shortly afterwards he lost power. When my hon. friend beside me was in power, the right hon. gentlemen, and his friends, being then in Opposition, turned savagely upon the Administration; they attacked it with all the means which a perverted ingenuity could devise, and they thought it honorable warfare, in order, if possible, to make a point against the Government, to open against the United States a campaign of brag and bluster. I have quoted the resolution introduced at that time by the right hon. gentleman. Well, if the matter had gone no further than that, I would not have much to say; but the resolution which was then introduced was intended to force the United States to give us the reciprocity which they would not give otherwise, and the feeling was intensified by the most violent speeches. Sir Charles Tupper, for instance, went to the Maritime Provinces, and stated there that by adopting a policy of retaliation, by Canada building up a tariff wall against the Americans, we would in a few years bring the Americans to their knees, and force them to give us reciprocity. In Prince Edward Island, he used the language again and again, and used it with some effect, because at that time the Islanders sent six representatives to this House, to help the Government to build that tariff wall which it was supposed was going to bring the Americans to their knees. I am glad to say, however, that since that time the people of Prince Edward Island have come to take a better view of the situation, and they now understand that in order to have reciprocity they must take some other way. Well, Sir, the least that can be said of our relations with our neighbors, is that such language and such conduct was not calculated to promote good feeling between the two nations. If the Americans were disposed at that time to enter into negotiations with us, with a view of establishing free trade between the two countries, the very moment that Canada pretended to be able to force them, that moment the Americans would stiffen their backs, and refuse to give to threats what they might have been disposed to give to negotiations. But that language had its effect in Canada. The Canadian people, believing the promises held out to them by the Conservative party, then in Opposition, returned that party to power, and gave them an opportunity to build their tariff wall and to establish a reciprocity of tariff. They did so, and what was the result? Why, the result was that in a few years, instead of opening the American markets to free trade, the first thing the Americans did was to take an opposite policy and to abolish the fishery articles of the Washington Treaty, to cut off from us what little advantage we had under that treaty, and to bring back the state of affairs which had before existed. This was a serious matter. When the Americans gave notice to the Government of Canada that they would not continue the fishery stipulations of the Washington Treaty, the Government had before them a great duty to perform. And how did they perform that duty? They performed it by a policy of masterly inactivity; they never budged; they never stirred; they observed upon that question a conspiracy of silence, remaining serenely indifferent as to what might be the consequences of the attitude of the United States. When we on this side reminded them that they had a duty to perform, when they were asked from this side to act, to do something, anything, to meet the new situation that had arisen, what was their invariable answer? Their answer always was: "Hush! hush! hush! don't ask for information; don't ask for anything whatever; leave the matter to us; you do not know what harm you may do to an international question of this sort, by asking for information; do not force our hands; leave it to us; everything will all come out right in time." They never stirred a finger in order to meet the new situation which was about to face them. Seeing this inaction on the part of the Government, we on this side of the House attempted to do in 1884, what we are doing at this moment; in face of the inactivity of the Government we attempted to clear the way, and to show them the duty which lay before them. My hon. friend behind me, from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr Davies), moved a resolution, in 1884, to which I call the special attention of the House, because it shows how the Government were guilty in that respect. The resolution was couched in the following language:—

"In view of the notice of the termination of the Fisheries articles of the Treaty of Washington, given by the United States to the British Government, and the consequent expiration, on the 1st July, 1885, of the reciprocal privileges and exemptions of that treaty, this House is of opinion that steps should be taken at an early day by the Government of Canada with the object of bringing about negotiations for a new treaty, providing for the citizens of Canada and the United States the reciprocal privileges of fishing, and freedom from duties now enjoyed, together with the addition of reciprocal freedom in the trade relations of the two countries, and that in any such negotiations Canada should be directly represented by someone nominated by its Government."

Here was a policy clearly indicated by the Opposition, by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, that the Government should at once enter into negotiations in order not only to meet the difficulty, but to meet it by an extension of trade facilities. What was the answer? The answer was just what I said a moment ago: Keep silent, do nothing, leave everything to us. I cannot do better than quote the language used by the right hon. gentleman on that occasion. He summed up his argument in the following words:—

"But the hon. gentleman says that the United States have shown a desire to extend their trade by having a reciprocity treaty with Mexico and the Sandwich Islands. Who commenced negotiations in these cases? Was it the Sandwich Islands and Mexico? No; it was the Government of the United States in both instances, who was desirous of getting control of the trade of those two nations, inferior in population, inferior in wealth, and very much subject to American influences. They desire to increase that influence and to obtain control of the trade of those two nations; but it was not King Kalakua, it was not the President of Mexico, who wanted the treaty; it was the Government of the United States that pressed upon those almost auxiliary nations and forced upon them, almost forced upon them, these treaties. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think we must to a certain extent pursue the same course."

"I think we must to a certain extent pursue the same course and in the same manner as the Government of the United States," was the reply. That Government went to Mexico and to the Sandwich Islands in order to obtain treaties of commerce with them; we must follow the same course and wait until the Government of the United States approach us, or, indeed, force the Government of the United States to come to us and ask us also to negotiate with them new commercial treaties. I cannot say I was surprised at that language. This was exactly in accordance with the policy always pursued by the hon. gentleman and his Government; it was the same policy which had been inaugurated in 1877, to force the Americans to come to us and not allow Canada to go to the Americans. The Government had a policy by which they were going to force the Americans to come to us; they have put it into effect piece by piece. First, they erected a tariff wall around this country; but that not being sufficient they made an addition. And what was that? The unwarrantable manner in which they commenced to execute the Convention of 1818. I take issue with the right hon. gentleman upon this, and I say that, in my estimation, no greater fault was ever committed by his Government than in the way they carried out the Convention of 1818 in 1885. They refused to ship the fish of Americans in bond. They seized their schooners for alleged or trivial offences of the customs law, and they placed upon the Convention of 1818 the narrowest construction it was possible to put upon it, a construction so narrow, and in some cases so inhuman, that there are instances where the schooners were forced back to sea without being allowed the privilege of buying a single article of food in a Canadian port. They expected to bring down the Americans by that policy. What was the result? The result was the Retaliation Bill—the Bill which was passed in 1887, when the American Congress authorised the President at any moment to sever commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada. The Government had not anticipated that action. Still they did not move. But it is well for Canada that there is in the United States a Canadian with a true Canadian heart, a man who has the honor of being daily abused by the Conservative press of this country, a man whose name, when it was mentioned the other day in connection with this very subject, was received with jeers, to their shame be it said, by the majority of this House. Erastus Wiman stepped to the front, and he did then what should have been done long before by the Government of Canada—he constituted himself ambassador for Canada to the United States, and had an interview with Mr. Bayard.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LAURIER. Is there any dissent expressed to that? Have hon. gentlemen opposite forgotten their own history? Have they forgotten the language which was used not later than twelve months ago by Sir Charles Tupper in this House? Have they forgotten the praise given on that occasion to Mr. Wiman by Sir Charles Tupper? If they have, let me recall the language used on that occasion by Sir Charles. He said:

"I know this, that a mutual friend—I have no objection to mentioning that it was Mr. Wiman—at an early day after this speech was delivered, intimated to me that he had had a long conversation with the Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Bayard, and that that gentleman had said that he would be very glad to have an opportunity of discussing the mutual relations of Canada and the United States with either my right hon. friend the Premier of Canada or myself."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chestnuts.

Mr. LAURIER. Chestnuts, says an hon. gentleman. Sir, I am really surprised that on a subject of such vital importance as this, so much levity should be displayed. But this is quite in keeping with the policy of the Government which hon. gentlemen opposite follow. If Mr. Wiman on that occasion had not stepped to the front, what would have been the consequences? I do not know, but the Government, at all events, thought it fit and proper at last to move, and they commenced to act upon the suggestion and the action of Mr. Wiman, and promptly Sir Charles Tupper went to Washington. He did what should have been done years ago, and he had an interview with Secretary of State Bayard. It is proper to refer to the correspondence which was the consequence of that interview between Sir Charles Tupper and Mr. Bayard. It originated in a letter written by Mr. Bayard to Sir Charles Tupper, and in which is to be found a very significant paragraph :

" I am confident we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and state-manlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries. I say commercial, because I do not propose to include, however indirectly, or by any indentment, however partial or oblique, the political relations of Canada and the United States, nor to effect the legislative independence of either country."

To this paragraph Sir Charles Tupper responded in a similar spirit :

" MY DEAR MR. BAYARD,—I had great pleasure in receiving your letter of May 31, evincing as it does the importance which you attach to an amicable adjustment of the Fisheries question and the maintenance of the cordial commercial relations between the United States and Canada, under which such vast and mutually beneficial results have grown up. I entirely concur in your statement that we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and that there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and state-manlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

It is a matter of history that in consequence of that correspondence, commissioners were appointed to meet at Washington to settle that question. And when they met, Sir Charles Tupper, remembering the paragraph which I have just quoted, remembering the spirit which had dictated that correspondence between himself and Mr. Bayard, was prompt in asking from the American plenipotentiaries a settlement of the question upon the very basis which had been laid down by Mr. Bayard—that is to say, a commercial basis. He made the following proposition :—

" That with the view of removing all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries, it is proposed by Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries that the fishermen of both countries shall have all the privileges enjoyed during the existence of the Fishery Articles of the Treaty of Washington, in consideration of a mutual arrangement providing for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada and Newfoundland."

Such was the proposition made by Sir Charles Tupper, and this proposition was in conformity with the proposition contained in the letter of Mr. Bayard to him. For what reason and for what cause was this proposition rejected by Mr. Bayard and the American plenipotentiaries? Simply on account of the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite had followed in regard to the Fishery Treaty, simply on account of the irritation which had been caused in the United States by the harsh and inhuman manner in which that treaty had been carried out. Perhaps, Sir, that will be disputed also, but if disputed, I can bring an important witness to support my statement, and my witness on this occasion will be Sir Charles Tupper himself. Speaking of this very fact and explaining the reason why the offer he had made had not been accepted, Sir Charles Tupper used the following words :—

" Mr. Bayard and those other gentlemen said that ' there is only one way to reach this (for Congress alone can take the duty off any article), and on account of the exasperation that has been excited in this country by those fishery difficulties, you have seen the result, you have an unanimous bill passed by the House of Representatives and passed by the Senate and assented to by the President, you have to meet what they hold was the inhospitable conduct (they used good deal stronger terms in some of their State papers I am very sorry to say) of Canada in reference to the treatment of their fishermen, our representatives have said that they would never purchase from Canada any immunity for their fishermen by reciprocal trade arrangements' imbued, as their minds were, with the idea that we had adopted that policy to force reciprocity upon them."

Now, Sir, you have the opinion of the man best qualified to give evidence upon that subject, that the reason why the free trade relations which were touched upon by Mr. Bayard in his correspondence with Mr. Tupper were not carried out, was just on account of the policy which had been followed by hon. gentlemen opposite upon that very question. The right hon. gentleman and his Government have always prided themselves upon their superior wisdom, and statesmanship, but upon this occasion I ask, where was the wisdom and where was the statesmanship? If the motion that my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Davies) made in 1884, when he suggested that the Government should send a commissioner to Washington in order to settle this question, had been adopted, then, Sir, does it not follow from what I have stated that there was a chance to be heard and a chance of obtaining what we had in view. At that time the Government would not yield to the pressure put upon them. They would not send a commissioner to Washington, but three years later they were forced to send one, and upon that occasion, as on many occasions when they acted, it was too late. If the Government had then acted in time they would have obtained some result; but they refused to act in time, and they lost everything. To day we see the same policy still pursued, the same policy of procrastination, and we are forced upon this occasion to suggest what, in our judgment, is the true policy that should be followed in the interest of Canada. What followed the result of the last negotiations at Washington? The treaty was rejected, it is true, and rejected by the American Senate, which has the power to deal with this question. Then came the celebrated Message from President Cleveland—and there is this to be said in favor of the President's Message, that he simply suggested (since he might be called upon at any time by the action of this Government to put the Retaliation Act in force) that a milder course should be adopted than the course demanded then. President Cleveland simply said to the American nation: " I may be called upon at any moment to put that Act into force, but I cannot put that Act into force without, to a large extent, injuring American trade. There is a better way of reaching the Canadian people, since they refuse to carry our fish in bond. Instead of shutting out all their imports it would be better for us to prevent them carrying their goods in bond upon our railways." Such, however, was the bitter sentiment of the American people against us at that time, that Congress refused to act upon the suggestion of President Cleveland. Nothing came of his suggestion; the Act remains in force; and at this moment we are just in this position: that, to-morrow, or the day after to-morrow, the new Administration may at any time, if they choose, cut off altogether the existing commercial relations between Canada and the United States. Again I ask: What is to be done? What is the policy that ought to be followed by Canada? I say to the Government: Reverse your policy, give up the policy of harshness which you have been following hitherto, and adopt the policy of conciliation; admit that you have been in the wrong, and endeavor, not by threats or by acts of violence, to obtain reciprocity of trade with this country, but endeavor to obtain it by negotiation and peaceable means. I am aware, from my past experience, that in daring as I do now, upon an international question, to say to the Government that they were in the wrong, and to say that the other nation was in the right, I will bring once more upon my head all the thundering indignation of the Conservative press and party. Be that as it may, I hold that there is all the more reason to speak upon the question, because it is an international question. Because the consequences may be graver, there is all the more reason to act, and to act promptly, and to speak in no uncertain tones. I know very well, from my past experience of the manner in which the Conservative party of this country have always understood party allegiance, that it is an act of disloyalty, that it is an act of treason, to attack Ministers who shield themselves behind the sacred name of country; but, Sir, I say without offence, that I do not care for the Ministers, but I do care for my country, which may suffer from their conduct. The tactics of the Conservative party are not new, they have always been the same, and it has always been held disloyalty and treason to attack the Conservative Ministers, even though it be to save the country. There was a time in the history of England when the American people, then colonists of England, were forced into rebellion by the harsh conduct of the British Government and by the tyrannical measures of the Imperial Parliament. There was, also, at that time the greatest Englishman of his day—a man who has done more than any man of his time to launch England on that career of military and commercial aggrandisement which has since signalled her course. Lord Chatham never ceased to call upon the Government, and on the English Parliament, to retrace their steps, and to abandon their policy of harshness and adopt the policy of conciliation. These gentlemen on the other side of the House have such slavish opinions—and I can use no other word but slavish—of loyalty, that it may not be amiss if I put before them the language used by Lord Chatham, the greatest Englishman of his time. He had to speak upon the policy which had driven the American colonists into rebellion; and he was speaking at a time when those colonists were in arms, fighting against His Majesty King George III. On one occasion he made use of this language:

“Every motive, therefore, of justice and of policy, of dignity and of prudence, urges you to allay the ferment in America—by a removal of your troops from Boston—by a repeal of your Acts of Parliament—and by demonstration of amicable dispositions towards your colonies. On the other hand, every danger and every hazard impend to deter you from perseverance in your present ruinous measures.”

On the same occasion he made use of the following language:—

“We shall be forced ultimately to retract; let us retract while we can, not when we must. I say we must necessarily undo these violent oppressive acts; they must be repealed; you will repeal them; I pledge myself for it, that you will in the end repeal them.”

They were repealed two years later, but they were repealed too late. Repealed in time, they would have had some effect; repealed too late they only encouraged the American colonies to persevere in their action. On another occasion he made use of this no less significant language:

“If I were an American, as I am an Englishman, while a foreign troop was landed in my country, I never would lay down my arms—never—never—never.”

Sir, this language was held to be treason at that time; such language would be held to be treason to-day. At that time it was held to be treason by the whole Conservative party, and still more by that well meaning, short-sighted, thick-headed Tory, King George III. He called Lord Chatham a trumpet of sedition; yet, if the voice of that trumpet of sedition had been heeded at that time, King George III would have saved to the British Crown the loss of those royal domains which England has ever since deplored. Well, Sir, the loyalty of that great man which does not pander to prejudices, which does not court the favor of king or mob, but which speaks the truth whenever the truth is called for, this is the loyalty of this side of the House. It is in the name of that loyalty I now speak; and, doubly encouraged by the language of that great man, I say to the Canadian Ministry of this day that they are repeating the same fault which was committed by the English Ministry of 1775, and in the same terms I appeal to them to retrace their steps and take a new course. If you ask me, Mr. Speaker, to come down to practical measures and to say what I would recommend, I answer: The Government themselves admit that a new treaty has to be negotiated. They say so in the Speech from the Throne, where I find this language:

“It now only remains for Canada to continue to maintain her rights as prescribed by the Convention of 1818, until some satisfactory readjustment is arranged by treaty between the two nations.”

That Speech was made on the 31st of January. They then contemplated acting under the Convention of 1818. I am glad to see that though to some extent they have not been able since then to come to any different decision, yet they have wavered a little in their opinion. When they were asked by my hon. friend behind me, a little while ago, whether they intended to put into force the modus vivendi, they said it was under consideration. They did not know whether they would or would not. Well, let us help them along a little, and let us say that, in our judgment at least, since they are to negotiate a new treaty, they should not go back and act upon the harsh clauses of the Convention of 1818, but rather upon the more generous clauses and dispositions of the modus vivendi. If you are to negotiate a new treaty, it stands to reason, if you commence to harass American fishermen by the enforcement of the clauses of the Convention of 1818, that that would be a very sorry prelude to all our negotiations. But if you go to Washington with the generous treatment provided under the modus vivendi, there is some reason to believe that an agreeable and satisfactory solution of the difficulty may be arrived at, in the only manner which would be satisfactory to both nations, that is to say, upon a basis of freer commercial relations between the two countries. Sir, there is every inducement for that policy. I give it as my deliberate opinion that ever since the abrogation of the Treaty of 1854, the relations of the two countries have never been satisfactory; they have never been openly hostile, but they have never been avowedly and generously friendly, always characterised by petty annoyances and vulgar bickerings; and, unfortunately, that state of things has also extended to the relations between the mother land and the republic. Nothing, I am sure, could be more painful to every friend of England than the hostility displayed during the last presidential contest towards England. It is my deliberate opinion that this hostility, displayed at this date towards England by the American people, is a blot on the fair fame of the United States, just as much as the hostility displayed during the civil war by England towards the United States, was a blot on the fair fame of England. It behooves us, situated as we are in this country, having the relations we have to the mother land, and connected geographically as we are with the United States, to help to create a better public sentiment in the two countries towards each other; and this view is largely shared, I am glad to say, by the whole Anglo-Saxon race in the two hemispheres. Though there are at this moment these unpleasant characteristics in the relations between England and the United States, there are no two nations in the world to-day which are so closely allied. Their trade is daily increasing, and to-day it already exceeds the trade of any other two nations. More than this, their intellectual life is every day getting more and more intimately interwoven. Books—all those important books which the literary world awaits on the tiptoe of expectation—are published simultaneously in London and New York. Actors exchange boards; preachers exchange pulpits; there is no artistic or literary fame originated in one country which is safe and secure until it has been sanctioned in the other. While all these facts are healthy, I, for my part, would want Canada to step into the movement, to turn a new leaf in her history, to forget the past, and to do her share to reach that which must be, I suppose, and I hope, the ultimate object, namely, closer and ever closer union between all countries of British origin and British institutions. With those views, I beg to move:

That all the words after the word “That” be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—“in view of the rejection by the Senate of the United States of the Washington Treaty of 1888, and the unfortunate and regrettable differences existing between Canada and the United States on the fishery and Trade questions, this House is of opinion that steps should be taken, at an early day, by the Government of Canada, for the satisfactory adjustment of such differences, and the securing of unrestricted freedom in the trade relations of the two countries, and that, in any negotiations entered upon for such purposes, Canada should be directly represented by someone nominated by its Government.”

That, in the meantime, and to permit of such negotiations being favorably entered on, and to afford evidence of the anxious desire of Canada to promote good feeling, and to remove all possible subjects of controversy, this House is of opinion that the modus vivendi proposed on behalf of the British Government to the Government of the United States with respect to the Fisheries should be continued in operation during the ensuing fishing season."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In all fairness, my hon. friend should have communicated the terms of his resolution to us in time to allow us to take it up and discuss it sentence by sentence, and paragraph by paragraph. The hon. gentleman has not confined his resolution to any one subject. He has brought into it a question which I thought was disposed of, namely, that Canada should be represented at Washington, and in all foreign countries, by her own ambassadors; he has brought in the modus vivendi, and ends, I suppose, with unrestricted reciprocity. These are the three subjects treated by his resolution. One of them has been disposed of, but the other two might well have been presented in separate resolutions, and have been the subject of separate discussions. However, my hon. friend has taken his own course, and we must for the nonce reply to his elaborate essay, if I may so call it, upon the situation of Canada with respect to the United States as regards her commercial relations. I cannot congratulate my hon. friend on the success with which he has shown that Canada has been altogether blameable, that the United States has been altogether, or nearly altogether, innocent of wrong, that these sixty millions of people have been trampled upon and oppressed by the five millions of Canada, and that we should change our position and conciliate these poor sixty millions of people in order to restore friendly relations between us. The hon. gentleman says: I advise hon. gentlemen opposite to change their course; I advise them to have the magnanimity to admit that they are wrong; I advise them to conciliate the United States. Well, we cannot accept the advice of the hon. gentleman; we cannot admit that we are wrong, because we have not been in the wrong; and what is still more remarkable, all he has to do, while advising us to admit that we are wrong, is to look at the treaty made last year with the United States, and he will find in it that the President of the United States, and the commissioners appointed by that president, and the gentlemen who signed that treaty, admit that every one of the pretensions of Canada, every one of the arguments used by Canada, every one of the positions taken by Canada, were just and right. Without one single exception, that treaty admits that all our pretensions, and the course we have taken under the Convention of 1818, were justified by their acceptance of the modus vivendi. The Americans admitted they would have to pay for the privileges which, before that, they contended were theirs by right, and the American fishermen willingly paid for those privileges; and the hon. gentleman comes forward and asks us to continue for another year that modus vivendi in which the two nations, in fact, declare that the United States ought to buy, and will buy, as a favor, what they formerly demanded as a right—and the hon. gentleman now asks us to admit that we are wrong. We are not wrong. We have been right from the beginning. We have been right in principle, and we have been right in practice. But the hon. gentleman, a friend, like other cosmopolitans, to every country but his own, at this moment, just at the commencement of a new régime in the United States, just two days before a new Government is about to enter on the administration of affairs in the United States—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Six days.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—a few days before there is going to be a new Government in the United States, with the new Government's policy undeclared, with no means of knowing what course is going to be taken by the United States, and at a time when we ought to know, the United States admitting that we are right, saying, here is a modus vivendi by which you agree to pay us for these privileges that formerly you improperly and illegally contended to be yours—the hon. gentleman comes down and says: Go on your knees, you have oppressed the United States, you have wronged the fishermen of the United States; go to Mr. Harrison, go to Mr. Blaine, and say to them: Oh, we were wrong from the beginning. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) says so; therefore it must be so. We must go down upon our knees, and after having given up everything in this world, after having admitted that we were wrong, after having admitted that we had acted inhumanly towards the American fishermen, after having admitted that we had wronged them and oppressed them, we should say to the Americans, now make a treaty. But the United States will say, what is the use of making a treaty? You have conceded everything that we asked for; you have given up everything that you had contended for; you have given up even what we admitted, through the President of the United States and the commissioners appointed by him, was wrong on our parts; although we had to confess that you were right and that we must ask as a privilege what we had asserted as a right; you have given all that up, and then you ask us to make a treaty. That is not the way, Sir, that equal treaties are made. That is not the way this Government proposes to make treaties; that is not the way by which you can get a settlement with the United States. You must stand upon your dignity; you must stand upon your rights. Now, the hon. gentleman said that we were vacillating in our conduct and in our course; that, when we were asked the question, which was as inexpediently asked as the hon. gentleman's motion now is inexpedient, and is put in at the wrong time and in the wrong way, whether we were to continue the modus vivendi, we said that was under consideration. That is now under consideration, and it will continue to be under consideration.

An hon. MEMBER. No doubt.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I beg that the hon. gentleman will not interrupt me. No one on this side interrupted my hon. friend in his remarks, but there is a persistent rudeness on the part of the Opposition, which is unparliamentary and must be objected to. I say that the question about the modus vivendi was inopportunistly put, because it was put before there was an opportunity, or a probability, or a chance—and I hope there is a good chance—of renewing commercial negotiations with the United States. That question was put just at the wrong time. Now, the hon. gentleman is shaking at us, as if we would be frightened at it, the Non-Intercourse Bill. Well, Canada discounted that non-intercourse threat a year ago. They are not afraid of it; they would regret to see it carried out, but if that Non-Intercourse Act is put into force by the United States, it will be a wrong-doing to a friendly people, because it is without cause. But, supposing that on the 4th of March, or whenever the inaugural address is presented, the President should announce—it is very improbable, I hope it is improbable, almost impossible—that he was going to carry out the Non-Intercourse Bill; suppose, on the 4th March, we were told that the Non-Intercourse Bill was going to be put into force, and that, before that, we said we would issue licenses for the whole year up to February, 1890, to all the American fishermen, what would be the consequence? While we should be prevented from all trade and intercourse by that Bill, we should have opened our fisheries and our markets to the Americans, and committed ourselves to the whole extent of the modus vivendi. We should have given them everything; they would have entered every port in Canada and transhipped their fish over our railways, and we could not help it, because there was the modus vivendi; and yet, at the same time, we could not send a herring into the United States because they had passed their Non-Intercourse Bill. Therefore, the Government stated that they had that under consideration. There was no inconvenience to anyone, because the fishing season has not commenced, and will not commence until shortly after the inaugural speech is delivered. It has not yet commenced, and there was no inconvenience to either Canadian or United States fishermen by withholding that until we saw what the policy of the United States was to be. I hope and believe, from information I have from unofficial sources—they are unofficial, but I think they are entitled to some credit—that the United States will not assume anything like a commercially hostile position towards Canada. If that be so, we shall have all the provisions of the Treaty of 1818, which were surrendered for the sake of peace and on payment of a license fee, to deal with, and we shall go to the United States and say: We offered you this before. And why did we offer it? It was in good fellowship, it was with the desire that the Canadian Government had, knowing the feeling of the Canadian people, to cultivate friendly relations and to enlarge commercial relations. The modus vivendi says this, that, in order to give an opportunity for the consideration of the treaty, and while the question of whether it shall be adopted or rejected is not decided, in order to give an opportunity for full consideration of it, Canada offers, of its own accord, the right, for a reasonable license fee, to buy bait, the right of transshipment, the right of repairs to the utmost extent, in order to give you an opportunity to consider the terms of the treaty, and pending the consideration and discussion of that treaty. The meaning of that was, of course, that, if the treaty was rejected, the reason for offering the modus vivendi had ended, but, with a happy prevision, the power was given to keep it afloat until February, 1890. Having that weapon in our hands, having that evidence of friendship and amity in our hands, having that proof of the desire of Canada to extend relations with the United States, of her desire to remove any cause of temporary irritation while negotiations were going on, it was extended lest perhaps the treaty might not be rejected, but kept under consideration for two years. We have that now in our power, and I need not tell the hon. gentleman opposite that, on the first intimation of a desire on the part of the United States to enter into enlarged trade relations with us, we shall be only too happy to enter upon them as well as on the more burning question of the fisheries. The hon. gentleman must know that we do not stand alone in this question of the modus vivendi, but that there is the important colony of Newfoundland, who have their rights and who have, as a matter of fact, issued many more licenses under the modus vivendi than Canada has done, and I am happy to tell the hon. gentleman, I am at liberty to tell him, that that important colony approves of our course in regard to the modus vivendi, and says it is desirous to act with us in every respect. With this important subject on our hands, in this crisis of our commercial connection with the United States, is it wonderful that we, acting not only as patriots but as men of common sense, are reserving ourselves, are keeping everything we have a right to keep, are holding our position and asserting our rights, and that we do not take the whole world into our confidence, even my hon. friend. As between man and man, there is no one in this House whom I would entrust with greater confidence than my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), but I would not even take him into our confidence in dealing with a foreign nation, because the hon. gentleman would be obliged in party duty to divulge my statements to those who surround him, and thus to divulge it as well to the United States. Now, the hon. gentleman said that the United States had not been altogether right, that they were blameable to a certain extent, but that we were blameable, and greatly blameable. I have already stated that, in my opinion, and with my full knowledge of all the facts, Canada has never asserted a claim that is not well founded. Canada has never set up a pretension under the Convention of 1818, that the Americans have not now finally admitted; Canada has never exceeded her rights and her claims under that convention, and I defy hon. gentlemen to point out one instance in which Canada can be obnoxious to that charge. And yet the hon. gentleman has evoked the shadow of Chatham, and he has read the passages in which Chatham said: "If I were an American, as I am an Englishman, I would never lay down my arms"—until those wrongs and impressions were removed of which he was speaking. Why, does the hon. gentleman suppose that there is any analogy between the two cases? Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has forgotten that the last, the dying speech that great man made, when he almost fell to the floor while making it, was a solemn protest against granting the United States their independence. Does the hon. gentleman remember that? The hon. gentleman called him a traitor, but he was no traitor. He fought the battles for the Americans as Burke and other great statesmen did; he fought the battle of the colonies, as English statesmen would do if we were oppressed; if Canada were oppressed at this moment, I have no doubt many men would rise in the English Parliament and defend our rights. So did Chatham, and so did Burke, defend the rights of the British subjects who inhabited the thirteen colonies now the United States. But he never thought of giving up everything, he never thought of conciliation purchased by abandoning the rights of Englishmen; while the hon. gentleman has got up and has wilfully, and of a malice aforethought, announced as wrongs what the United States have admitted to be rights. Now, the hon. gentleman has made a statement against which I must protest, and that is that the sympathies of the people of Canada, during the great war between the North and the South, were with the South. The sympathies, not only of the classes but of the masses, in England, were in favor of the South, I must admit, including the author of the famous phrase, "classes and masses," Mr. Gladstone. But it was not so with the people of Canada, and I defy the hon. gentleman to point to any one act committed by the Government, by the people, or by the magistracy of Canada, which showed any sympathy with the South as against the North in that awful and fratricidal war. Individuals might have their own opinions, but the Government of Canada—and I was a member of the Government of Canada in those days—were so anxious, and showed their anxiety so continually, that if the hon. gentleman will look over the records of that time he will find again and again thanks from the United States Government for preventing this country from being made a base of hostile operations against the United States; and Mr. Seward, in his terse language, said "I wish to God that England would behave half so well towards us as Canada does." Sir, I defy any one to show any improper or unfriendly act, on the part of Canada towards the Northern States during the whole of that war. Mr. Speaker, we had our shores lined with our own militiamen; at one moment we had nearly 10,000 men lining our shores, not to keep a foreign foe out, but to prevent those men from the South, who were abusing the hospitality which Canada, like England, offers to all the world, from making this country a base of operations against the United States. We know that when, notwithstanding all our precautions, a raid was made from Montreal upon St. Albans, and a bank was robbed, the Government came at once to Parliament and asked for a vote to restore the money that had been raided by those Southerners, who had wrongfully taken advantage of their position in Canada and the shelter we gave them. That money was restored by a vote of Parliament, it was voted cheerfully, without one single word of opposition. Look again on Lake Erie, when a seizure was made of a vessel which was turned into a piratical ship, the Government took immediate steps to surrender the wrongdoers. As regards the sympathy of the people of Canada, it was pronounced in favor of the North as the actions of the Government were in favor of a benevolent neutrality. I believe it has been said that 40,000 volunteers went from Canada and enlisted in the Northern army. That, I believe, is an exaggeration, but I do not know; the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) shakes his head as if it was not an exaggeration; but, at all events, the people of Canada showed, by going and shedding their best blood, and fighting for the cause of liberty and against slavery, that they were in sympathy with the United States. The statement which the hon. gentleman now makes, that the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 was denounced and terminated in consequence of the sympathy of Canada for the South, is erroneous—it was a mere pretext. It was partly induced, no doubt, by a feeling of irritation against England, and Congress thought that Canada, being a part of England, ought to pay a portion of the penalty. If the hon. gentleman would look into the matter with a commercial, rather than a political, eye, he would find that pressure was brought by the American farmer upon the American Congress, which was told that Canada had all the advantages, that we had the control of their market, and that it left nothing for them. That was the real cause why the treaty was ended, no doubt fostered as well by those who desired its abrogation for commercial reasons, as by those who raised a cry that Canada had been in sympathy with the South. Mr. Speaker, it is necessary that I should speak of these things, although, apparently, they do not seem to have much relevancy to the questions now before us. Then, the hon. gentleman spoke of the Washington Treaty of 1871—he says that I was there. Certainly I was there, I was one of the commissioners who settled that treaty, and the hon. gentleman may remember the objections that were taken in Parliament by his own friends against that treaty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, the hon. member for Bothwell, who was in Parliament at that time, took strong ground against the treaty; and yet one of the principal charges that have since been brought against the present Government was that we had not managed to get the treaty of 1871 continued for an indefinite period. What is the cry? It is: Why are you so negligent, why could you not have induced the United States to agree to a renewal of the treaty? One hon. gentleman opposite had compared me to Judas Iscariot, another gentleman compared me to Benedict Arnold, because I was so base a traitor to my country as to sign that abominable Treaty of 1871. Now the hon. gentleman comes and says: This has been a sleepy Government; they have always been too late. Why did they not press and insist upon having the Treaty of 1871 continued? Why, the answer is, because the Americans were resolved not to continue it. They thought the Treaty of 1871 oppressed them, tyrannised over them, and they, poor people, thought they must be free from that tyranny and oppression, and must become free men once again by the abrogation of that treaty. It was no fault of ours. But the hon. gentleman says: Oh, but you make a great mistake; the United States offered coal, salt and fish and lumber in exchange for our fisheries. We did not happen to think that the removal of the duty from coal, salt, fish and lumber was a sufficient compensation for the surrender of our right to our inshore fisheries to the United States, and all the consequential surrender. We did not think so. I may say, for now the history is past, that some of my colleagues on the commission thought we had better yield. An appeal was made to the home Government, and Mr. Gladstone said I was right, that it was not a sufficient compensation. But when this subject was being discussed the Canadian Parliament was sitting here, I being at that time in Washington, and Parliament suadente diabolo, and Mr. Holton passed a Bill taking the duty off coal and salt, and I was confronted by that vote of the Canadian Parliament. We were completely sold by our own people, and Mr. Hamilton Fish, chairman of the American Commission, with a quiet chuckle, said: "We withdraw our offer." The hon. gentleman spoke of the negotiations which took place before the treaty of last year, and he said it was owing to Mr. Wiman, whom we have been so much abusing, that negotiations were entered upon. Well, it is quite impossible to enter into, or discuss, or lay before the House, as hon. gentlemen who have been members of the Government must know, all the unofficial diplomatic communications that pass between power and power and Government and Government; but, Mr. Wiman, who is a Canadian, a clever and an able man, gave an opportunity to us, to Sir Charles Tupper, who was here on the nonce, for the time, to run down to Washington and see how the land lay. The outlook was very unpromising before. Hon. gentlemen had found out how unpromising it was when Mr. Brown went there on the same mission. We found out how unpromising it was when Mr., now Sir William, Howland and Sir Alexander Galt went to Washington. We found out that the more we tried the more we convinced the United States that reciprocity was a necessity, and that we must yield to their terms. The more we went down on our knees, the more we humbled ourselves, the more haughtily the Americans held back, as is the fashion of that people. But when we adopted, ex necessitate, after the termination of the Treaty of 1871, the course of defending our own waters, of keeping our own property to ourselves, of keeping poachers and smugglers out of our preserves, the moment they found there was going to be trouble between the two nations, and they have no desire to have any trouble (for I have no doubt the President and Mr. Bayard had no desire that difficulties should increase, or rather if there were difficulties that they should be removed) the position became somewhat changed. Then we commenced the negotiations respecting the fisheries. If the hon. gentleman will read candidly and carefully and apply his mind to the English of those despatches, he will see how reluctantly Mr. Bayard went further, and that we could not induce him, nor could the British Government induce him, to consent specifically and explicitly to a statement that the Commissioners should have full power to enter into the subject of a commercial treaty. But it is mentioned incidentally, and we were glad to get as much as we did. We were anxious, if it could be done with any promise of success, that the commissioners should not confine the discussion to the fisheries, but take up the subject of our trade relations. The commission was formed and the members proceeded to Washington. But the American commissioners withdrew even from the expressions that had been used in the previous correspondence; they refused to take up the question of trade and confined themselves to the fisheries. The hon. gentleman says that Mr. Bayard spoke of the irritation that had existed as being the cause of this. The irritation was merely a phrase used. The truth of the matter was this: The President of the United States was in a minority in the Senate; he ascertained that there was no chance for the adoption of any trade treaty, whether on the basis of the old reciprocity of 1854, or on a different basis, whether a contraction or an expansion of that treaty. I believe Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Bayard were sincerely anxious to settle the fisheries question, and as they knew that if any trade provisions were added to the articles respecting the fisheries, the treaty would be doomed from the beginning; they, for the purpose of getting a fishery treaty, for the purpose of giving the treaty a chance, the President, in effect, said: We must set aside all negotiations respecting trade relations; that subject must stand over to another and a happier day. That was the reason why the treaty was limited, as it was, to a settlement of the fisheries question. How justly was his appreciation of the situation we can now see, because even limited as it was, reasonable as that treaty was, so reasonable that the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), denounced it as an unworthy concession made by Sir Charles Tupper, on behalf of Canada—

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Read the hon. gentleman's own speech and you will see. He denounced the unworthy concessions that were made then. Notwithstanding that we had gone to the very verge of concession, notwithstanding that we had tried our utmost to bring the United States to adopt our treaty, it was rejected. Now the hon. gentleman says that we ought eat humble pie, that we ought go down on our knees to the Americans whether they will give us a treaty or not, whether they will pass a non-intercourse act or not, whether they will allow us to enter their country or not, and whether or not they pass a law keeping out Canadians from the United States as they have kept out Chinamen. Notwithstanding all this we must, forsooth, say to the people of the United States: "You may come into our waters, you may do just as you please, you can have the right to fish in our waters"—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the modus vivendi provide that?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; it does not. It provides for all the incidental claims that are made by the United States Government and that the United States fishermen to buy bait, to make repairs, to tranship, and so on. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that we are to give up all our rights at the same time that we may be excluded from the United States. I do not intend to discuss the trade portion of this resolution which means, I suppose, unrestricted reciprocity. I do not know whether it is unrestricted reciprocity in disguise or avowed. Is it undisguised or open? Will the hon. gentlemen let us know? I pause for a reply. Is it unrestricted reciprocity or is it something more shadowy, but yet looking like the original? This resolution will, I believe, meet with the condemnation of this House, as it will meet with the condemnation of this country. I believe and I know that the people of Canada will resent anything like humiliation or insult to their status or national honor. Servility may be the badge of a certain tribe in Canada, but servility is not the badge of the people of Canada. They will put up, if they are obliged to do it, with wrong, they will put up, if they are obliged to do it, with an interference with or obstruction to their trade, but they can say, and they do say, and I say it for them, and I know I am speaking the opinion of the majority of the people of Canada when I say, that we are anxious, yes, we are more than anxious, to enter into the most free relations with the United States, but—in the language of my resolution of 1876, which the hon. gentleman did me the honor to quote—only so far as the interests of Canada will allow. The interests of Canada are a sacred trust; they have been entrusted to us since 1878; I will not go back further than that. Those interests have not been sacrificed in our hands; those interests have been guarded by the support of Parliament and by the support of the people of Canada under our Government. The hon. gentleman knows that this motion is bound to be defeated in this House, and I will tell him that it is just as certain that it will meet with the opposition, and the indignant opposition, of the whole people of Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the House has listened to the speech of the right hon. gentleman with a very great deal of interest, and certainly with not a little disappointment. The right hon. gentleman began his speech by complaining that my hon. friend who made this motion did not communicate its terms to him. I remember that the right hon. gentleman for some time led the Opposition in this House, and I have no recollection of a single instance in which the right hon. gentleman communicated to the Government of that day, a motion which he intended to move in amendment to going into Supply, or in fact that he ever communicated his intention to move an amendment to any act or resolution of the Government. The hon. gentleman has given a summary of the history of this country during a former Administration of his, and he told us that while the people of the United States may justly complain of the hostility of England towards that country during the civil war, that no such complaint could fairly be made against the Government of this country. He told us further, that he himself was a member of the Government at the time, and he knew right well that the Government and the people of this country sympathised with the North as against the South. I am not going to enter into any controversy with the right hon. gentleman upon that subject, but my recollection of the events of that day is somewhat different from that of the right hon. gentleman. I think that I remember on one occasion when the Northern Army under General Hooker met with defeat at Chancellorsville that the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues stood up on the floor of Parliament—then sitting in Quebec—and cheered when they received the report of the success of the Southern Army. It was the conduct of the right hon. gentleman and those who were associated with him in the Government of that day which, much more than anything that was done by the Government of England, led to that feeling of hostility in the United States which extended over the entire North and which led to the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty in 1865. The right hon. gentleman has denied that he says that the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty was brought about by commercial considerations altogether, and that political considerations in no degree entered into the action of the Government of the United States. The right hon. gentleman's former colleague, the Commissioner to the United States last year (Sir Charles Tupper) entertained very different views from those expressed by the right hon. gentleman here to-day and I have no doubt whatever that the opinions expressed last year by Sir Charles Tupper, much more accurately represent the feeling which actuated the Congress and the people of the United States in the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty than those which the right hon. gentleman has expressed here to-day. Last year, Sir Charles Tupper said:

"It was not in consequence of any commercial reasons that the abrogation took place, but it was, as is well known in consequence of an unhappy sentiment which grew up in the United States, that during the time of the civil war which rent that country asunder the sympathy of the British North American Provinces were very strongly with the South."

Those were the opinions expressed by Sir Charles Tupper in this House last year, and I have no doubt whatever that they accurately represented the situation. The right hon. gentleman has referred to an incident connected with the Treaty of 1871. Let me say—and I generally recollect with a good deal of accuracy what has been said in years past in the debates of this House—that I do not remember any hon. gentleman on this side of the House calling the hon. gentleman Judas Iscariot or any other insulting name. I have no recollection of his having been designated Benedict Arnold. I think, if the hon. gentleman would consult the debates of that day, he would find a very great deal of difficulty in discovering those epithets, and my impression is that they are due to an imperfect recollection and a vivid imagination rather than the retentiveness of the hon. gentleman's memory. Now, the hon. gentleman has said that he received as a member of the commission an offer from the United States to permit the free importation of fish, coal, salt and lumber for all time to come into the United States for the privilege of fishing without restriction in Canadian waters. I have no doubt that offer was made; but, Sir, my information on that subject does not exactly agree with the information which the hon. gentleman has to-day communicated to the House. My information was that when this offer was made the hon. gentleman did not know exactly what our trade with the United States was in those articles, that he took time to consult his colleagues in Canada, and that before he received information back as a member of the commission at Washington, the American commissioners withdrew the proposition; and the hon. gentleman will see, if he looks at the date of the protocol, and the date of the proceedings of this House, that the repeal of the duties which had been imposed on those articles by the Parliament of Canada, took place before that offer had been made by the American Commissioners.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD The resolution was carried.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman cannot assign as a cause that which only happened after the event was concluded. The hon. gentleman will further remember that his Government was then in power. Sir George Cartier, a distinguished and influential member of the Administration, was then leading the House, and the hon. gentleman was supported by an overwhelming majority of the members of this House; and so far as I know, he never complained, never tendered his resignation to His Excellency, in consequence of that disastrous act on the part of the Canadian Government, so seriously affecting the interests of the Canadian people. All the hon. gentleman had to do at that time, if the event happened chronologically as he represents it, was to communicate to the House, and let his colleagues here know how seriously the repeal of those duties was likely to affect the negotiations carried on at Washington. If he had done that, there is no doubt the hon. gentleman could, by an overwhelming majority, have had the decision of the House reversed. Therefore I think the hon. gentleman can hardly shift to the shoulders of Parliament, a Parliament which was led by his colleagues in his absence, the responsibility of any wrong that was done on that occasion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not say it was wrong, but I say it caused an effect.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says everybody now praises the Treaty of 1871, which was found fault with and severely criticised from the Opposition benches in 1872. Well, Sir, I have never yet heard anybody on this side of the House approve of any of the provisions which on that occasion were condemned. The hon. gentleman conceded to the people of the United States for all time to come the free navigation of the St. Lawrence without securing anything in return except the navigation of Lake Michigan for a period of ten years. I do not know that anybody on this side of the House has approved of that provision. The hon. gentleman failed to secure the navigation of the Columbia River to any other than the Hudson Bay Company or parties trading with that company so long as the Hudson Bay Company should continue on that river. This came to an end, and the rights of anybody trading with that company came to an end at the same time. I have never heard anybody, who condemned the hon. gentleman's oversight on that occasion, say that it was a wise and proper conclusion. Then, we had the right to navigate, not only for commercial but for all purposes, the various rivers flowing through Canadian territory to the Pacific Ocean. The hon. gentleman ignoring what had occurred between Great Britain and the Russian Government, limited the right we had to all those rivers to their navigation for commercial purposes alone. Well, Sir, we condemned that act. We pointed out how neglectful the hon. gentleman was of the rights and interests of the people of Canada. Has the hon. gentleman ever found any one on this side of the House who criticised that provision of the Treaty of Washington, receding from the position he then took, and approving what the hon. gentleman did? Then, Sir, there was the provision with regard to the boundary and the position of the Island of San Juan. Has the hon. gentleman found any one on this side of the House to approve of what he did on that question? The hon. gentleman referred the question to the Emperor of Germany, to choose one or other of the main channels. It is well known that he was advised that the middle channel should have been selected, which would have given us the islands then in dispute; but the Emperor claimed that he had only to choose one or other of the main channels, and was debarred from acting in accordance with the true interpretation of the Treaty of 1846. We, on this side of the House, condemned that oversight on the part of the hon. gentleman, and so far as I know there is no one on this side of the House who ever said that he was right and we were wrong in our criticisms. So far as the Treaty of 1871 is concerned, every provision we took exception to at that time we take exception to still, and say that the hon. gentleman failed in his duty to the people of this country in permitting those provisions to be inserted in that treaty. The hon. gentleman says that everything that they did as a matter of public policy, whether growing out of our commercial relations or out of a strict interpretation of the Treaty of 1818, was admitted—every one of our contentions was admitted—by the Government of the United States in the negotiations of the treaty of last year. So far from that being the case, we were told by Sir Charles Tupper, in this House, that the illiberal construction, the narrow and straitened construction, that was put on the Treaty of 1818 by the Minister of Customs and the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, now the Minister of Finance, imposed serious obstacles in the way of the negotiations, and that when he went to the United States in the first instance he found few members of Congress disposed to sympathise with the American fishermen in their extreme pretensions; but when he went again for the purpose of carrying on those negotiations, he was met not only by a hostile representative body, but by a hostile press and an exasperated people of 60,000,000. That was the condition of things the Commissioner represented as a consequence of the policy pursued by the Government who were his colleagues. Now, did the United States admit the construction of the hon. gentleman? So far as that from being the case, so far was even the Canadian commissioner from admitting the soundness of the extreme position taken by the Government of Canada, that he stated it would be a most inhumane proceeding and one that would fail to receive the sympathy of any portion of the civilised world, if the Government were to persist in the course which they had adopted. He went on to say that vessels which entered Canadian ports in stress of weather, were not allowed to obtain the supplies necessary for their homeward trip were wrongfully dealt with. The hon. gentleman said:

"I say that under the Treaty of 1818, it is true we had the power to refuse. Under the strict interpretation of that treaty an American fisherman has no right to unload his cargo and to tranship or to sell it, but what I say is that in making this concession, which is an undoubted concession, we were only acting from the dictates of humanity and with a due regard to the credit and reputation of our own country all over the world."

That is the position taken by Sir Charles Tupper. When we look at the provisions of the Treaty of 1818, we find that all the restrictions imposed upon the fishing vessels of the United States were imposed for the purpose of preventing those vessels improperly fishing in Canadian waters. Those restrictions were incidental to the protection of our sovereignty over our own waters; and if it could be shown that these restrictions were unnecessary to that protection, then it was an improper construction of the Treaty of 1818 to so interpret it as to prevent American fishing vessels receiving the food and supplies which every civilised country accords to the vessels of another country in distress. There is, no doubt, a wide distinction between sovereign rights and police regulations. It is absurd to dignify or to undertake to raise to the position of sovereign rights, regulations which are mere regulations of police. Those restrictions upon American fishing vessels, those provisions against their entering Canadian waters except for certain specific purposes are not a declaration of sovereign rights. It would be absurd to dignify them by such a name, but they are declarations of our right to make extreme police regulations for the purpose of giving to the fisheries of Canada the adequate protection they may require. In the interpretation of every document you have to recognise the changes that society undergoes, the progress that a community makes. When the Treaty of 1818 was made there were no railways, no telegraph lines. There is not a word in the treaty to authorise an American fisherman to land for the purpose of sending a telegram, and you have the right, under a strict construction of the treaty, to say that no American shipmaster shall land to send a telegram or make any report. You have as much right to do that as to prevent them transshipping their fish. Yet, does any hon. gentleman maintain it would be a fair construction of the Treaty of 1818 to say that it does not give to American fishermen the right to send a telegram, and therefore they have no right to exercise any such privilege upon Canadian territory? The hon. gentleman, I understood, had somewhat withdrawn from the position he took two or three years ago. He withdrew last year from that position, but we have to-day the same position reasserted. We have it reasserted in His Excellency's speech; we have it here put forward; and, being so put forward, it was the bounden duty of my hon. friend, or some other hon. gentleman on this side, to declare what, at all events, is the policy of a large section of the Canadian people, and what, in spite of the declaration of the right hon. gentleman the First Minister, is, in my opinion, the policy of the great majority of the Canadian people.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) There are many rules to be considered in the interpretation of a treaty. I do not say that hon. gentlemen opposite have put an improper legal construction on it so far as the mere bare interpretation of the words of the Treaty of 1818 are concerned, but we must read a treaty, not wholly by the light of the events of 1818 but by the surrounding circumstances as they at this moment exist. The world has changed, society has progressed, there have been many inventions and many discoveries which have necessitated a change in the relations among independent states, and the Treaty of 1818 cannot be construed in every respect now as it was construed at the time it was entered into. Many of the provisions that the hon. gentleman has acted upon are justified solely as police regulations. They are not provisions of the treaty, but they are provisions which the construction of the treaty might authorise, if it can be shown they are necessary for the protection of those rights that were secured by the treaty. Under the Convention of 1818, the United States abandoned their pretensions to fish in certain British North American waters, but they retained the right to enter these ports for certain purposes specified, and agreed that they would not enter them for any other purpose whatever. The reasons for that provision, when we look at the protocols and at the correspondence that took place at the time, are easily seen. It was asserted on the part of the British negotiators that this interdiction was necessary for the protection of the fisheries, because if the Americans were permitted to enter for any other purpose except to obtain wood and water, or to escape stress of weather, they might fish on their way. It was therefore deemed necessary to have the power of excluding them for every other purpose. It is true that we have the power, but the question is whether we are justified in using it or not. That depends on whether it is necessary for the purpose for which it was given. If you can show it is no longer necessary this power should be exercised for the purpose of protecting the fisheries, then your right to exercise the power, so far as the vexed question is concerned is gone. I think the hon. gentleman will find at this time of the day it is pretty difficult to contend for a strict construction of the law. The hon. gentleman knows that the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Marine, who are largely responsible for the state of irritation that existed in consequence of what was done during the past three or four years, made these regulations, not for the purpose of preventing the Americans fishing in our waters, but as a matter of commercial policy, thinking that by imposing such restriction upon the American fishermen, the American Government, to secure the relaxation of those restrictions, would be disposed to enter into more favorable trade relations with us in respect of our fisheries than at that time existed. So hon. gentlemen will see that the object of the Government in making these regulations was altogether outside of the Treaty of 1818. The Treaty of 1818 had nothing whatever to do with our trade with the United States, it had nothing whatever to do with securing us more extended trade relations with the United States, it had nothing whatever to do with securing the free admission of our fish into the ports of the United States; it had to do simply with the exclusion of the American fishermen from fishing within the waters which are recognised as being within British North American sovereignty. It was for that purpose, and for that purpose alone, that these conditions were inserted in that treaty, and it is in pursuance or in maintenance of this right that the exercise of these powers of exclusion can alone be justified. If I were to ask hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House whether it is possible to defend those restrictions as a matter of right for the purpose of protecting the fisheries, I apprehend that no hon. gentleman on that side would seriously argue that we could so defend them. They were imposed for another and a different purpose. If I were to ask, can the right of exclusion which it is attempted to apply to protect these fisheries be applied in any case where the fisheries are within our sovereign control and where the treaty does not extend, we would have a fair test to show whether there was a use or abuse of the treaty in the making of these regulations. No one, I apprehend, will argue that, in those waters of Canada where fish may be found, if American fishermen who were fishing in their own waters and were to come within our waters for any purposes, we would have the right to exclude them; and, if we would not have a right to exclude them in such a case, we would not have the right to do so under the Treaty of 1818, because that treaty was not intended to do anything more than to assert our sovereignty over certain waters, and that we had such rights as were necessary, in accordance with the usages of nations, for the protection of our fisheries in those waters. I do not intend to go a step further in the discussion of this subject to-night than we went when the ratification of the Treaty of 1888 was under consideration. There were many of those proceedings to which we took exception then and to which we take exception now. It was one of the charges I made here last year when discussing that treaty, that hon. gentlemen were obliged to make concessions to the United States of certain sovereign rights belonging to this country in consequence of the mischievous assertion of their acts of commercial policy. Now, it is well known that the United States are claiming control over land-locked bays and waters upon their coast which are larger than those waters which we claim and which are conceded to be common waters by the convention or treaty made last year. I expressed my regret that these concessions were made, and I say that, if the Government had not pursued a mischievous and irritating policy with the view of forcing the United States into commercial relations which any one who had carefully considered the subject would see could not be accomplished in that way, then it would have not been necessary to make those concessions; but those concessions of sovereign rights were made in order to conciliate the United States, and allay the irritation which the hon. gentlemen by their policy evoked. We were told last year by Sir Charles Tupper that he found himself face to face with sixty millions of people hostile to this country. How came they to be hostile to this country? They were made hostile by the policy which the Government had pursued. The Government refused to permit Canadians to engage on board American vessels. How did they accomplish that? Could they say to any citizen of this country, you are not at liberty to enter into a contract with the captain of an American vessel? No; they could not in that way interfere with the liberty of Canadians, but what they did was to forbid an American vessel from coming into any port in Canada, and the men had to go to the United States ports in order to enter into any of these contracts. The hon. gentleman knows that at least 40 per cent. of the persons who are employed on American fishing vessels are citizens of Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island, and these people had been in the habit of bringing their vessels into Canadian ports on Saturday night and remaining there till Sunday evening. Those who were employed on the vessels had the opportunity of going to church or of remaining with their families. The Americans did the same. Then the hon. gentleman made a regulation that, unless the vessel paid Customs charges and entered at the port, it was liable to be fined; and fines were imposed, and vessels were seized under circumstances which were very vexatious, and under regulations which hon. gentlemen were obliged to abandon when these treaty negotiations were entered upon. There is no doubt that the Message of the President threatening retaliation after the treaty was rejected by Congress was largely due to the conduct of the Government here. In fact, it was a warning to the Government, it told them that, if they returned to the policy which existed before the negotiations were entered upon, the result would be retaliation. It was a warning to them that the policy which had been adopted to coerce the Americans to make agreements in reference to trade which would be favorable to the Canadian fishermen, so far from having a good result, had only served to provoke the most extreme hostility. Another thing of which we complained here last year, was that these treaty provisions were brought under the consideration of this House too soon. We called the attention of the Government to the fact, that it was highly inexpedient to call upon the House to ratify the provisions of the treaty when the United States Senate, one of the parties to the treaty, had not yet acted, when we did not know what its decision would be, and when, if the ratification by this House took place, it would be very difficult to withdraw from the position, and refuse to agree in any subsequent treaty to what we had already conceded in this. We called attention to the fact, that the new treaty which had been negotiated, and which was afterwards rejected by the United States, would be taken as the last point of departure in any new negotiations, and that the Americans would be in a position to withdraw from every provision in the treaty, while it would be impossible for this Government to withdraw from what they had conceded, and had asked Parliament to ratify. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Government has spoken of the relations between the two countries. He said a crisis existed between the countries. Ever since the hon. gentleman has been in office that has been the condition of things. There has never been a period, so far as I know, since the expiration of the fishery provisions of the Treaty of 1871, when a crisis did not exist. If the hon. gentleman were allowed to have his way, a crisis would always exist. The hon. gentleman spoke of the condition of things that existed during the civil war. Sir, I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that he and his friends rejoiced at the success of the South, that they rose to their feet and cheered in the House and sang a Southern song, when the report arrived of the defeat of the North at Chancellorville. I had some doubt as to whether any other hon. gentleman recollected the fact but on making enquiry at 6 o'clock, I find that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), who had a seat on the floor of Parliament at that time, remembers well the circumstances to which I refer, and I refer to it now as showing how far the right hon. gentleman, in his course of public life, has tended to evoke a feeling of hostility in this country, and to create a feeling of prejudice against the people on the other side of the line, and how far he has succeeded in promoting a feeling of hostility in the United States, which has stood in the way of beneficial commercial relations between the two countries. The hon. gentleman referred to the Non-intercourse Bill, and he said that my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) had shaken that Non-intercourse Bill in the face of the Government. Sir, my hon. friend did nothing of the sort. The hon. member who sits here for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) had upon the Orders of the House a notice to inquire into the best mode of carrying on the trade and commerce of this country when this Non-intercourse Bill came into effect. Why, Sir, the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House have adopted a course calculated to evoke hostility, calculated to provoke the people of the United States into putting this retaliatory measure into force. They have told us that we could get on well without the United States; that the railways of this country, especially of the Maritime Provinces, would not suffer if this Non-intercourse Bill were carried into effect. Sir, in my opinion it is time to consider how the trade relations between the two countries can be put upon a more satisfactory basis than that upon which they rest at this moment. It is important to consider how far a policy of conciliation, a policy of justice, in our intercourse with our neighbors, would tend to secure more satisfactory relations than exist at the present time between the two countries. My hon. friend has said that we and the people of the United States are both children of the same mother. That is a fact. The two countries have similar institutions, the people entertain the same religious opinions, they speak the same language, they have similar political institutions and a common literature. Why, Sir, even our fellow-countrymen in the Province of Quebec have their friends and fellow-countrymen, if I may so express myself, in the people of Louisiana; and so there is every reason that we, who are of the same race, of kindred institutions, of like literature and religion, should make an honest and earnest endeavor to secure more satisfactory trade relations with our neighbors than exist at the present time. Sir, it is possible for Canada to do a good deal in this matter, it is possible for her to secure, not only a better position for her own people, but it is possible for her to do very much to bring the mother country and the great Republic to the south of us, together; I say it is possible for us to do in this respect a great deal in the interest of the whole Empire as well as in the interests of our own people. Hon. gentlemen opposite have adopted a policy of irritation, their interest seems to point in the direction of keeping Canada and the United States commercially apart. One would suppose that they consider that trade relations between the two countries would be inimical to Canada, that the more we extended trade relations the worse it would be for ourselves. Sir, we cannot change our geographical position; we are beside the United States whether we wish it or not. In that respect our position is beyond our control, and the question we have to consider is whether we will endeavor to be agreeable or disagreeable to our neighbors, whether we will seek to promote a better understanding, or whether we shall seek to deal with the American people as the Jews dealt with the Samaritans. Sir, every new railway that is built from one country to the other, every new trade that springs up to enlarge the commerce between the two countries, is a guarantee of a more extended friendship and a more certain peace. In my opinion it is possible for the people of this country to secure more intimate trade relations with them than has existed in any previous period of our history. I know very well that a few years ago, if we had not lost the confidence of the country in the elections of 1878, before a year had gone round, in all probability we would have secured a commercial treaty establishing more extended trade relations with the United States than existed in any former period of our history. Sir, I found that the American Government were most anxious to meet our wishes, and to do whatever they could to oblige us. I remember being in that year in Manitoba. At that time the only means of sending produce out of the country—it was the first year that the wheat crop was exported—was to send it out in bags upon the boats that went up the Red River. Every bag at the boundary had attached to it a bonding seal, 8 cents were paid upon each bag of grain; it had to go to some point in Ontario before the bag could be emptied and it could only be used for one or two trips in the season. I remember writing from there to the Secretary of State at Washington, with whom I had personal acquaintance, calling his attention to this regulation, and recommending that the bags should be counted, that they should be emptied into the cars at Fisher's Landing, that the cars should be bonded, and that the bags should be returned on that boat. Well, Sir, instead of waiting to communicate with the American Custom house officer at the boundary by post, they telegraphed to him to give instructions in accordance with the sentiments of my letter, and after that the people of Manitoba were enabled to receive five or six cents a bushel more for their wheat than they received before. The American Government, so far from putting impediments in our way, did everything they could to meet our wishes. I remember when I came to St. Paul having my attention called to the bonding system for the transport of salt, and for the transport of hardware from the various parts of Ontario to the North-West Territories. At that time every piece of hardware had a bond attached to it, and instead of this being continued, the articles were counted and put in a car, and what was paid before on a single article, was afterwards only paid upon a car load. And so, whatever we asked to have done to remove impediments in the way of trade, and to facilitate intercourse between one portion of Canada and the other because at that time we had no means of communication, except through American territory—I say that everything that could be done was done by the Government at Washington to meet our wishes; and, Sir, it is clear that if the hon. gentlemen had taken as much pains to secure a better understanding as they have taken to irritate the people of the United States, a very different condition of things would exist at this moment from that in which we find ourselves. One would suppose from the course that was pursued by the Government, that their object was to create a feeling of hostility and of irritation, so as to keep the two countries as far apart as possible, as the surest means at their disposal for maintaining the so-called National Policy. If those hon. gentlemen desired to adopt a course calculated to irritate and to prevent success being achieved in any commercial negotiations, they could not have devised one more effectual than that which they pursued during the two years prior to the negotiations of the late treaty of Washington. The First Minister in speaking of the resolution now before the House, said its principal provision had already been discussed. That is a mistake. We declare ourselves in this resolution in favor of unrestricted reciprocity, and a larger measure of trade with the United States; in the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), which was voted on a few days ago, we declared ourselves in favor of Canada negotiating her own commercial treaties. We adhere to that, we adhere to this also. We believe that persons earnestly anxious to secure more favorable trade relations with the United States are capable of attaining that object, and that the best persons to enter on such negotiations are those who represent the Canadian people and who are responsible to the Canadian Parliament. If hon. gentlemen opposite do not succeed it will be a great misfortune to this country, and in my opinion it will be their own fault. They should remember that we are 5,000,000 of people lying alongside a nation of 60,000,000, and that it is not in the interest of this country to adopt a policy that is calculated to make those who are our immediate neighbors hostile to us. At this moment the United States are engaged in negotiations with countries of South America and with Mexico with respect to the trade relations of the western continent. How is it that Canada is not represented; how is it that our relations are not there discussed? The trade between Canada and the United States is twice what it is between the United States and any other country on this continent. The reason is obvious, namely, that hon. gentlemen opposite are opposed to such negotiations. They are opposed to arriving at a satisfactory commercial understanding, and those hon. gentlemen although they are opposed to it they have not the courage of their convictions. We know what hon. gentlemen said last year. While they profess still to stand by the resolution submitted to Parliament in 1876 by the present First Minister, many of them declare they believe that this country would gain nothing by reciprocity with the United States, not even in the natural products of the two countries. That opinion is still their opinion; and, although not publicly expressed, it is the view they entertain. They know right well that this policy of excessive protection is one that cannot stand unless they continue to have the support of the agricultural class. They know right well that if there was an opportunity of securing better trade relations with the United States, that support, even to the limited extent now given, would be withdrawn. They know right well that if they were without the agriculturists' support, their whole fabric, by which the people have been taxed and by which a few have been benefited for a limited period, would come to an end. What we propose in this resolution is to secure more extensive and intimate trade relations with those in our immediate vicinity. We have what they require, they have in their possession what can be produced more cheaply there than on this side of the border. We desire to trade with them. In spite of the barriers which hon. gentlemen opposite have erected, that trade amounts to 50 per cent. of our export trade, and yet in the face of that fact hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that this country has no special interest in more extended trade with our neighbors to the south. Without sacrificing any territorial rights, without abandoning any interest which pertains to the sovereignty of the British North American possessions, it is possible to secure a settlement of the fisheries question on a permanent basis and satisfactory to the people of the United States, without sacrificing any interests of this country, it is possible to secure satisfactory commercial relations by which the trade of the two countries would be developed in spite of those barriers which hon. gentlemen have during the past ten years endeavored to maintain. If hon. gentlemen opposite fail to secure those advantages to the people of this country, it will be their fault, and not because the people on the other side of the border are not prepared to enter into such negotiations and assented to such a settlement as I have indicated.

Mr. FOSTER. I have listened, Mr. Speaker, with a good deal of attention, if not with a good deal of profit, to the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and although I am not given to undue criticism I fail to find at what conclusion the hon. gentleman arrived in all the devious wanderings into which his mind led him. He started out and continued with a good many assertions, but it seems to me that his assertions lack the consequent proof which is necessary to make them strong, and at least to make them convincing. One of the first statements he made was that the regulations which were carried out, or as he said which were made, by the Minister of Customs and Minister of Marine, that is by the Government, after 1885, were not meant to protect the fisheries of the Dominion, but were meant for a totally different purpose, namely, to coerce the United States into granting commercial privileges to Canada. I take issue with the hon. gentleman on that question, and I defy him to point out the first scintilla of proof in the correspondence which has taken place, and it has been voluminous, between this country, Great Britain and the United States, and I defy him to produce any single item to prove that assertion from the utterances of any Minister of the Crown or any one responsible for the carrying out of those regulations. It is purely an invention of the hon. gentleman's brain and an invention which does him little credit and does very little good to his cause. I know, from having had to do with the regulations and with the carrying out of those regulations, that the purpose of them and the intent of them was no other than simply to protect the fisheries of this country as they were guaranteed to us by the Treaty of 1818, to protect our rights as we considered to be ours under the terms of that convention; and if the hon. gentleman chooses to run away with the idea that those regulations had a totally different aim and that that aim was to coerce the United States into granting commercial relations with us, the hon. gentleman is welcome to take it and run away with it and keep it for a constant companion. He said that the mischievous course which was begun by the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Marine, that is by the Government, with respect to the carrying out of the Treaty of 1818 was responsible for all the trouble that had arisen, and was the reason why no arrangement had been entered into or could be entered into with the United States of America. That is also an assertion which, I think, lacks proof. In looking around for a reason for the failure of the ratification of the draft treaty of 1888 the hon. gentleman simply makes this as an assertion, which he uses against the Government and he has not been able yet, nor has he yet attempted to cite any proof of the correctness of that allegation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We cited it last year.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has not quoted any proof of his allegation either from any source in Canada, or from any source outside of Canada. I think that the hon. gentleman might look upon this failure of proof as fairly indicative of the falsity of that assertion, and I think at least that the country will take it as indicative of its falsity. Great Britain was the power that made the Treaty of 1818 with the United States of America, Great Britain was the major party to that treaty, Great Britain revised all the correspondence which was carried on during the controversy from 1885 up to the present time and up to the time of the sitting of the Commission in the City of Washington, and the hon. gentleman fails to find in all our intercourse with the Home Government one single line in which that Government admonishes the Government of Canada for having gone one single step beyond the just rights which were guaranteed to this country by the Treaty of 1818. The continuance of peace between Great Britain and the United States is of so great moment that hon. gentlemen on the opposite of the House have averred again and again that England held so sacredly the good relations between the two countries that she would not even press for our rights. I say that when that state of things is known to exist it comes with very poor force as an argument from the hon. gentleman if he cannot find a single line in the correspondence with Great Britain which has such great interests at stake, admonishing us that we were taking a wrong course. He has to resort to making a single assertion propped up by no proof whatever, that it was the way in which Canada carried out those resolutions which caused all the trouble and which was responsible for the failure of the treaty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Sir Charles Tupper said so.

Mr. FOSTER. He did not say anything of the kind. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon for saying so abruptly that Sir Charles Tupper did not say so. While the point is fresh and as a good deal has been said about it, I may read what the then Minister of Finance stated in his speech to the House on the Fishery Treaty:

"I say when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries fell back upon the same policy his predecessor had adopted under like circumstances and took such measures as were absolutely necessary and indispensable for the protection of the rights and interests of the fishermen of Canada, the United States complained bitterly. Difficulties again took place. Fishermen, perhaps, are the most intractable and uncontrollable people in the world, and when a fisherman gets on board his little smack he thinks he is monarch of all he surveys, and he can go where he pleases, and do what he pleases. The result was that, as before, collisions occurred. Those parties brought themselves under the operation of the law, and it was absolutely necessary, as I have said, in the defence of the rights of Canadian fishermen, to make examples of those parties who showed that disregard for law. The result was, an entirely erroneous impression grew up throughout the United States. It was shared by the Government—by the Senate, by the House of Representatives. It was accepted by the great body of the people; and the press and the people of the United States, almost without exception, came to the conclusion, without a particle of ground to justify it, that Canada was enforcing a most harsh, ungenerous and unwarrantable construction of the terms of the Treaty of 1818, for the purpose of forcing reciprocal trade relations upon the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that this became a universal sentiment in that country. One can understand the mass of people in the United States sharing such an impression."

That is what Sir Charles Tupper said, and Sir Charles Tupper explicitly states in what I have read that this impression which was widely spread in the United States of America, was an erroneous impression although widely spread, and one which had not a particle of truth to rest upon. I leave my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) with the statement of Sir Charles Tupper in that respect to reconcile it with his own. In fact there were no new regulations made from the time that the Treaty of 1818 came to be enforced until the sitting of the commission in Washington. My hon. friend the Minister of Customs made not a single new regulation and he merely carried out what was the law of the land in order to protect the interests of this country in a commercial sense as well as to protect the fisheries. No new regulation was made by the Department of Marine and Fisheries outside the similar regulations which had been made in 1870-71. Those same regulations slightly differing and differing in non important particulars were the regulations of 1886-88, and the latter regulations were rather softened than otherwise. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Mills) presents a strong contrast in his speech to the hon. gentleman who preceded on that side of the House (Mr. Laurier). The hon. gentleman who preceded him commenced by saying that this should not be looked upon as a party question and that as far as he was concerned he would strive to divest himself of party feeling while discussing it; my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is not troubled with such scruples and he came to his task with the evident determination to make every point he could against the Government, no matter what injury he did to the country and no matter how long he should put off that day, which he proposed to himself as a happy day for this country. He could not resist, before concluding his speech, from bringing up an incident—I do not know whether the circumstances have occurred or not—regarding what he says was a scene in this House when the representatives of Canada sang songs in sympathy with the Southern cause and against the Northern cause at the time of the Union war. Be that true or be that not true, what good under the sun could the bringing up of that matter be to-day? What good is it to put it on the records of the House and send it broadcast to the country with which we hope and with which we wish to have improved relations both trade and otherwise. What good under the sun can be effected by resuscitating and giving new life and vigor to an incident like that, even though it did occur. It seemed as if my hon. friend looked about him to pick up every possible thing which could be irritant for the purpose of sending it to do its work of irritation in the minds and hearts of persons on the other side of the line. He commenced towards the latter part of his speech to give the House and country some information as to how it would be possible to bring about a better state of relations on the fishery question, and I listened with the utmost intentness until he should have evolved those different things that he said it was possible for us to do, but I got nothing definite from the hon. gentleman. He said geographical position was a great deal and I suppose that the geographical position remains the same whether my hon. friend is on the Treasury benches or not. He says that railway building will do a great deal to bring the two countries more closely together. I recollect, as we all recollect on both sides of the House, that if there is an hon. gentleman on that side of the House who has opposed railway development in this country more than any other member it is the member for Bothwell himself. So that one of the very things the development of which would bring about, as he said, a better state of trade relations between Canada and the United States, is a line of development which the hon. gentleman himself has opposed to the utmost. Then, his third point was that if hon. gentlemen opposite had remained in power one year longer after 1878, they would have had established a satisfactory state of trade relations between the two countries. That is another of the very well founded and well supported proofs that my hon. friend has given, supported by unimpeachable evidence drawn from the records, that a better state of trade relations could be brought about. He then asked why Canada was not included with Mexico and the various countries to the south in the invitation which has been issued by the United States for a general conference, and he states that it is because Canada through her present Government is opposed to better trade relations with the United States. Well, I always supposed that Canada was not included because she was not invited, because when the resolution was drawn the gentleman who made it and those who voted for it never named Canada at all. It was their own pleasure as to whom they should invite, and they did not invite Canada, while they did invite the others. However, on that point of treaty negotiations, it seems that, after all, however many treaty negotiations may have been started by the United States, with Mexico or other states near by or far away, very few have been brought to successful conclusions. My hon. friend says that the National Policy is what keeps us apart—that the idea of protection, which this Government and the party supporting it are allied with, keeps us from having better trade relations with the country to the south of us; and yet my hon. friend asserted a moment or two afterwards that he and his party had nailed their colors of unrestricted reciprocity to the mast, which means what? Putting themselves and this country under the yoke of a protective policy which gives almost double the protection we have in this country. The inconsistency of gentlemen who base themselves one day on the rock of free trade, and declare that its principles are the only correct financial and trade principles, and the very next day raise a hue and cry to get under a protective policy which runs twenty or thirty per cent. higher than the protective policy of this country, is an inconsistency which I think the hon. gentleman himself must feel the people of this country will not fail to see or be slow to appreciate. Now, Sir, I have done with my comments on the speech of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat. I have, however, a word or two to say with reference to the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition. He commenced by throwing the blame for what he considers the bad state of relations between us and the United States upon the Government of Canada and upon Canada generally. Then, he says, coming to the present day, as this state of relations is thus and so, and as when we ask questions of the Government, the leader of the Government gives us no decided answer and will not state his policy to us, but simply says that these matters are under consideration, it is time for us to move to show what ought to be done and to bring about a more satisfactory state of relations in this way. Now, it seems to me that if any country is going to make a trade treaty or any other kind of a treaty with a foreign power, it is not the best course for it to show its whole hand to the country and the world, to state just exactly what it wishes to give and what it hopes to gain in every way, and then, after having pledged itself to those conditions, to go to that foreign country and treat with it. On the contrary, it seems to me, that it is always the case that a Government, in treating with another, holds its position as firmly as it can, holds its better positions under cover as far as it can, and uses its advantages without pledging itself beforehand in order to draw as far as it can advantages from the country with which it negotiates. But my hon. friends opposite wish the Government to pledge itself before and as to what it will do, as they ask this Parliament to say to-day that whatever comes, before we enter into any fresh negotiations, we must pledge this country to maintain the modus vivendi with all the advantages it gives. Sir, I think it is not apparent that that is the best way in which to make favorable treaties with, or to gain advantages from, great countries with whom we wish to undertake negotiations. My hon. friend said that the Treaty of 1854 gave us the best relations that we ever had with the United States, and that it was the golden era of Canada, during which the amity which existed between the two countries was greater than that which has existed since; and, true to his idea that it was the Canadian Government which was to blame for the failure of all treaties and the abrogation of existing treaties, he stated that the reason that treaty was abrogated was that there was undue sympathy in Canada with the South, and that that reacted upon the Northern mind. Well, Sir, suppose for the sake of argument, what I am inclined to deny as a fact, that the feeling of the Canadian people was one of sympathy with the Southern power, that was no fault of the Canadian Government, and if it was a fault at all it was a fault which was held in common with a great many people in other parts of the world. But my own reading of history is that the historical basis is unsound which states that the Treaty of 1854 was abrogated because of ill-feeling on the part of the United States, for the sympathy which they supposed the people of Canada had with the South during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not say the people of Canada. I said the Government of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. I stated a moment or two ago that I was not addressing myself to the hon. member for Bothwell, but to some of the arguments offered to this House by the hon. leader of the Opposition. My own belief with regard to that is this, and I think it is historically correct, that that treaty would have been under existing circumstances brought to an end if there had been no war between the South and the North, and consequently no question of sympathy one way or the other. If you read the history of that time, from 1855 to 1866, you will find this state of facts. Commencing shortly after 1856 and continuing on in an increasing ratio until 1866, there was a feeling of dissatisfaction all along the border between these two countries with the state of things which grew out of the Treaty of 1854. That treaty made free between the two countries certain natural products, and from the very beginning of its operation the people of the States along the border, and the people affected by those States, began to come to the conclusion that that treaty was more in favor of Canada than of the United States. That while Canada had a larger proportion of the raw material which the United States required, that raw material was admitted free into the United States, while the manufactured goods coming from the United States, which they wished to supply to Canada, had to pay tariff duties. I hold in my hands elaborate reports containing the opinions of the Chambers of Commerce of the United States, from the extreme eastern limit of the line dividing us from the United States to the extreme limit of the great lakes, and there is scarcely a Chamber of Commerce from one end of that line to the other which was not outspoken against the unfairness of the Treaty of 1854 as regards the United States interests. That dissatisfaction culminated at last in a concurrent resolution, passed by the Legislature of New York, and which was taken up by the Congress of the United States; and any gentleman who will take the trouble to pursue it will find I am correct in stating that it was the dissatisfaction to which I refer that brought about the abrogation of the Treaty of 1854, and not any question of sympathy or sentiment. After the Treaty of 1854 had been abrogated in 1866, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) came to the Treaty of 1871. He reviewed the circumstances which surrounded the negotiations of that treaty, and while upon that subject I think it would be well to show that there was no lack of effort on the part of Canada towards securing then a larger measure of trade relations between the two countries than existed or than we were able to obtain. We find that at one of the conferences at which the Commissioners were present at Washington, in 1871, the American Commissioner said that:

"With the view of avoiding the discussion of the matters which subsequent negotiations might render it unnecessary to enter into, they thought it would be preferable to adopt the latter course and enquire what, in that case, would be the basis which the British Commissioners desired to propose."

What was the first proposition of the British Commissioners?

"The British Commissioners replied that they considered the Reciprocity Treaty of the 5th June, 1854, should be restored in principle. The American Commissioners declined to assent to the renewal of the former Reciprocity Treaty."

That does not bear out the assertion of my hon. friend that the Canadian Government has been opposed to larger trade relations between the two countries or to trade relations on the former basis. It shows, on the contrary, that in 1871 the British Commissioners, of whom Sir John A. Macdonald was one, stated at the very outset of the Conference that they were willing to go back to the Treaty of 1854, if not in entirety, in principle, and to base their negotiations upon that. That was, however, refused by the American Commissioners:

"The British Commissioners then suggested that, if any considerable modification were made in the tariff arrangements of the treaty the coasting trade of the United States and of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America should be reciprocally thrown open and that the navigation of the River St. Lawrence and of the Canadian canals should be also thrown open to the citizens of the United States on terms of equality with British subjects."

What was the proposition? It went further even than the preceding Treaty of 1854. It was that there should be reciprocity in coasting trade between the United States and the Provinces of British North America. The American Commissioners declined this proposal, and objected to any negotiation on the basis of the Reciprocity Treaty. What did they give as the reason for the abrogation of the old Reciprocity Treaty? Not that the North was angered against Canada because of the sympathy Canada had with the South with their struggle. No, they did not act on theories; they were business men, they were sent there to represent the business feeling and sentiment of the United States. The reason they gave was that the treaty had proved unsatisfactory to the people of the United States, and consequently had been terminated by notice from the Government of the United States, in pursuance of its provisions, and that its renewal was not in their interest and would not be in accord with the sentiment of the people. They further said that they were not at liberty to treat of the opening of the coasting trade of the United States to the subjects of Her Majesty residing in her possessions in North America. Those negotiations show that Canada, represented on the commission, was in favor of opening up better trade relations, if possible, with the United States, and was willing to go back at once to the basis of the Treaty of 1854. They show that the United States Commissioners refused, because such a treaty would not be to their interest; they show further that Canada was favorable to a reciprocity in coasting trade, but that this was also refused; and ultimately the proposition was made by the Americans to buy out the fishery rights of Canada for a sum of money, which was, of course, refused. At last the Treaty of 1871 was agreed upon and made operative between the two countries. Now, the Treaty of 1871 was certainly not abrogated because of feeling aroused by any conduct of Canada inimical to the conditions of that treaty. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not asserted that. The Treaty of 1871 was abrogated because the United States believed, first, that the money which they had paid as equivalent for the rights they gained under that treaty was excessive, and, secondly, that the treaty itself, that the rights given them by the treaty to fish in our limits and to enjoy certain commercial privileges in our limits were not worth anything to them. It is well to have that point thoroughly settled, and that cannot better be done than by going back to February, 1883, when notice was given that the Treaty of 1871 would be abrogated at the earliest possible moment. After it had been decided to abrogate the treaty and instructions had been given by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and after the chairman of that committee had brought the matter brought before the House, Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts, said :

"I think if the gentleman from Minnesota will hear the explanation which I will briefly give, it may, perhaps, satisfy him on all points, with reference to the propriety of the adoption of this measure. By the treaty of Washington certain sections were devoted to rights given in British waters to the American fishermen. The amount that the United States was to pay for the privilege was to be settled by the Halifax Commission. The sum that was to be awarded by the Commission paid for that right for the term of twelve years, and no longer. The sum awarded by the Halifax Commission was $5,500,000. We must now give notice, by the 1st of next July, of the abrogation of the clauses of that treaty and provisions is contained in the treaty for the abrogation of those clauses, and nothing else. So that the matter stands by itself, or else we enter upon another term, for which England may demand ample payment from the United States, according to the enormous and unjust awards of the Halifax Commission for privileges which nobody in the United States, who has investigated the subject, considers worth keeping."

That is the key of the whole affair. The opinion that obtained at that time in the United States—whether it obtains there now is another question—was that the privilege which the United States fishermen gave up of access to our inshore fisheries and the privileges they had commercially consequent upon that treaty, were not considered worth keeping. Mr. Rice continued :

"The Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs unanimously reported this resolution. It was adopted by the Senate without an objection : and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, having fully examined the matter, unanimously instructed me to move the adoption of the resolution by the House, which I now do, under that instruction. With this explanation, I trust that no objection will be made to the consideration of the resolution, which, I am very sure, I can satisfy everybody, ought to be adopted, to avoid liability to further payment of an extortionate sum to Great Britain, for that which is not considered worth anything to us by parties who are interested in the matter and who have examined into it."

And that is the underlying note of the indisposition of the United States of America to make any extension of that treaty or to negotiate further for a treaty on the same lines; and that especially in conjunction with another point, that the Treaty of 1818, as they contend, is a treaty which is obsolete, which has lost its force through lapse of time and from the great changes which have taken place since. These two things, the plea that the treaty was no longer binding or could not be made binding on the United States and the belief that the privileges to be gained in Canadian waters were no longer worth anything, and were so declared by those who had examined into them, were the two fundamental reasons why the United States Senate and the United States Congress have been disposed in the first place to get rid of the Treaty of 1818 as soon as they could and have been indisposed since that time to enter into any negotiations for a treaty providing for like privileges between the two countries. The hon. gentleman said that Canada was to blame for the abrogation of that treaty. In the light of these facts, can any one fairly hold that Canada was to blame for the denunciation of that treaty? When that treaty came near to the point of denunciation, what were all the indications? Those which I have read are some of them, but they are few. In the United States prints from one end of the country to the other, the same opinion was prevalent, that these privileges were worthless, and that they did not want them any further. That was the opinion expressed in the United States Congress, both in the Senate and in the House of Representatives. An attempt was made to have that treaty extended for a time. That attempt was made through diplomatic correspondence, and, finding that could not be done, it was attempted to have the terms of the treaty go along for a little while so as to allow time for negotiation. All these attempts failed. Hon. gentlemen say that nothing was done, that "hush" was the word, that it was a period of masterly inactivity. I ask any hon. gentleman who may be uninfluenced by party motives, who may take a fair and a candid view of the subject, how it is possible for one of the two parties to conclude a bargain in which it is indispensable that both shall have the wish, and that both shall agree before the bargain is made. There was one party to the bargain, the United States, denouncing the treaty at the earliest possible moment with a unanimity which was not broken by a single dissenting voice in public, and refusing to negotiate for another. When the President's Message came down in 1883, that part of it which related to this matter was not even noticed. When the President's Message came down in 1884, suggesting that a commission should be appointed, the dominant party in the legislative body, reported that they did not care for, and would not vote for a Commission to sit upon this matter. If you look into the report of the Senate Committee, you will find, after thorough investigation and after taking all the official documents, which were many and voluminous at the time, the same idea runs through them, that this treaty is obsolete and that they do not want the privileges in the Canadian waters under the old treaty. They say: "Let us denounce the treaty and we will not make another." We are stated to have been in fault not only because of dilatory action, which does not lie, but also because of arbitrary action. In what did that consist? That treaty came to an end on the 1st July, 1885. You might have said it was arbitrary if, when the American fishermen were with full fleets on the shores of Canada, men who did not have a very just idea of treaty rights, when they were in the midst of fishing season, Canada had done what she had a perfect right to do, if she had put her cruisers there and protected her fisheries and brought those who acted against the Treaty of 1818 to book and imposed the penalties that might have been imposed. But Canada did nothing of the kind. Going against a strong sentiment in this country even, going against the views of some hon. gentlemen opposite even, Canada said: "We will give a fair chance—for the sake of the United States? no; for the sake of the fishermen? no; but for the sake of negotiations which may take place, we will give a grace of six months, to give time for opening up negotiations, and, if possible, making a treaty. That period of six months was given, and it was not till April, 1886, that Canada, after full warning and full diplomatic correspondence, by means of which the position was plainly known, not only by the United States authorities, but by the United States fishermen themselves, seeing that nothing else could be done, felt she must for her just rights cling to the privileges guaranteed to her by the Treaty of 1818. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, says we did wrong, that our conduct was arbitrary, and his policy is to reverse that conduct and do differently. In what way did we do wrong? Were we wrong in our contentions as to the rights the Treaty of 1818 conferred upon us? Not in a single case. The law officers of the Crown of Great Britain, the officers of the Government of Great Britain, from the highest down, who had to do with our negotiations, have stated, and their opinion is on record, that in every single instance of Canada's action she was in her just right and did not pass beyond it. The hon. gentleman says that vexatious regulations were carried out, and, without a scintilla of proof and without an attempt to invoke the records in favor of what was said, my hon. friend stated this afternoon that we went so far as to drive away from our shores fishermen of the United States who were in want of bread to eat, that we turned them away from our harbors and refused them the rights of hospitality.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend says "hear, hear," and stands at the back of that assertion. I say that cannot be proved. I say that no document can be brought forward to prove it, and the United States diplomatic correspondence failed itself to prove it, and I think it is a little too much for men who still hold themselves to be patriots and lovers of their country, and who profess that their only object is to do their country ample justice, to make speeches of an hour or an hour and a half, in which there is no word of even mild condemnation of the course of the United States Government towards us, while every other sentence is laden with invective against the Government of Canada. There is no word of sympathy for the poor toiling fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, men who merit on the part of both sides of this House and from the country the strongest sympathy and the very best efforts for the betterment of their lot and the maintenance of their rights. There is not a word of sympathy for their rights or for themselves, but all the sympathy is directed to the United States, and all the invective is given to those who stood fairly, and honestly, and courteously, and with forbearance for the rights of our fishermen, and for the rights of Canadians. Now, Sir, of all the cases of all the vessels which, in those two years, were in the waters of Canada, the United States Government, through its diplomatic agents, brought only 30 cases of alleged grievances before the attention of the British Government and the Canadian Government. In the two years of 1886 and 1887 we know the number of fishermen that were down there, a large number, we know the constant going and coming, we know the surveillance we had over them, we know the number of those that were boarded, and when they were supervised by our officers and by our cruisers, yet out of all these, there were but 30 cases to which our attention was drawn as a matter of grievance, and there was but one out of the 30 cases in which, when we had given a complete answer, there was even a reply to the answer that we made, and that was in the case of that famous man Mædo Rose, who swore one way and then swore another way, and then swore back again on the old tack, and then came back again on the first tack. When he was in the United States he would swear for the United States, and when he was in Canada he would swear for Canada. That is the only case upon which they attempted to meet the reply that we gave them to the grievance that was alleged. Now, Sir, the case of the Mollie Adams is the only case upon which hon. gentlemen can base a declaration that a vessel was ever turned away in distress from the shores of Canada. The captain of the Mollie Adams was Solomon Jacobs, and if they will take the records of this case, which have been placed upon the Table of the House, and which are there for all to read, it will be seen beyond possibility of doubt that the captain of the Mollie Adams himself, when he went into port, asked the collector if he could buy a barrel of flour, and the collector, doing his duty, as he ought to do it under his instructions, asked him: "Have you enough provisions to do you, or are you in want?" and the captain of the Mollie Adams said he had enough provisions to take him back home, that he was not in want, and he sailed away and went home. Now, Sir, that is the only case, and this opinion which my hon. friend talks about as being so strong in the United States, is exactly what Sir Charles Tupper said it was, without a particle of foundation. It gained credence and currency in the United States, largely—from what circumstance? Because hon. gentlemen in this House, and hon. gentlemen who control papers in this country, put out as being true the contention of the skipper in the first instance, and sedulously avoided the proof that was given of the falsity of these statements, and the untenable position which they took, with a studied desire, as it would seem, to avoid examining into the case, and to rush to take up the case as first given by the person who had the grievance. That very feeling was added to, because the American papers copied more largely from our own papers and the speeches of our own public men than they did from the statements of those who had a grievance to give to them at first hand. Now, Sir, so much for that. My hon. friend said that it was the policy of himself and his party to go back to the Treaty of 1854, and to get that treaty and, if possible, to enlarge it. Now, I suppose my hon. friend, if he were in power to-morrow, and were to remain in power for ten years, has no idea that he could get the Treaty of 1854 again between this country and the United States. If he does think so I will refer him to a statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who is not at present in his seat, who, in 1883, in this House, as will be found on reference to the Hansard of that year, page 271, made this statement:

"It is perfectly hopeless to dream of obtaining a reciprocity treaty with the United States in the future, which is confined in its operations to the natural products of the soil of the two countries. Such a treaty will, as the Treaty of 1854, work almost exclusively to the advantage of the Canadians."

I refer my hon. friend to his confrère and party follower, to debate that subject between themselves and come to a conclusion. But, Sir, he said that if he does go back to the Treaty of 1854 he wishes to enlarge it. Then I put the onus of proof upon him to show to this House, and to his followers, and to the country that he hopes to have follow him, to show one single leaning in the strong dominant opinion of the United States which is in favor of increased trade relations on the lines that he lays down, and that his party lays down, and that they take as their fixed policy. Sir, do you find it in the Bills which have been introduced, either the Mill's Bill or the Senate Tariff Bill? Do you find it in the election which took place in the United States last year when both parties wrestled with each other for the supremacy, and brought out every point of practical policy that they supposed would influence the electors? Where, Sir, on all the platforms, and in all the speeches, will you find a single public platform advocating unrestricted reciprocity with Canada? Not in one single instance. But you find men high in political position in the United States, men who are either now dominant or who will be dominant in the administration, who simply say: "Yes, Canada can have all the advantages that the United States people have when she is of a mind to come under the United States flag, and not before." That, Sir, is the statement of the Hon. James G. Blain, who all people believe has a dominant influence in the Republican party, and who most people believe will have a dominant position in the Cabinet which is soon to be. Sir, you may find those men occupying the position of Mr. Sherman, one of the strongest men in the Republican party of the United States, who says: "Unrestricted reciprocity—yes, I would be favorable to it if it led to a certain conclusion"—and that conclusion was the absorption of Canada into the United States of America—"but I favor it only if it can be shown to me that it would lead to that conclusion." Sir, I do not speak here of the Butterworth's and the Hitt's, and the other men strong in position in the United States. I do not speak of the papers of New York, of Boston, and of Chicago, which show the dominant public sentiment of the country; in not one of these can you find a defender of unrestricted reciprocity; in every one you may find a reference to "manifest destiny," and to the time soon coming when as a ripe apple falls off the tree, Canada shall fall into the hands of the United States of America, and there shall be but one flag and one people from the North Pole down to the Gulf of Mexico. Sir, that is not the sentiment of young Canada to-day, that is not the sentiment of the best people in Canada to-day; and rather than join and link her fortunes with a destiny which is so strongly held out to her as being the only condition on which she can get these, to a large extent, mythical advantages, which are so much talked about, Canada comes to the sensible conclusion that, with a people of five or six millions, with a territory as large and as rich as her own, and a climate and a soil which are unequalled, with a stock, so far as her people goes, which combines the best excellences of the best peoples of the world, has a future before herself, and that while she will cultivate amity and the best feeling with her neighbors to the south, and with all other neighbors, she will pursue her own undeviating course, with the star of future promise full in view, and make a people by herself, maintaining her own institutions, her own commerce, her independent development through and through, keeping intact her institutions, her government, and those ties, stronger than some people think them to be at this day, which bind us to the mother country and to every portion of the British Empire the wide world over.

Mr. EDGAR. I hope the followers of the Government listened with great attention to the speeches delivered from the Treasury benches on this question, because they were most distinctly educational speeches. Why, we have heard from both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that there is something good in reciprocity after all. They say they are in favor of reciprocity with the United States and of cultivating the most friendly relations with our neighbors. But did we not hear last Session, night after night, when the debate on reciprocity was going on, speeches from the followers of those hon. gentlemen to show that we did not require reciprocity with the United States? Did they not enter into elaborate calculations to show that Canada was perfectly independent commercially, agriculturally and in every other way of the United States? The leaders of the Government have evidently learned something already if their followers have not done so, and they are trying to educate their followers in that direction. The Ministers have been educated by the country. Since last Session we on this side of the House have gained three seats from them in Conservative counties on the square and direct issue of unrestricted reciprocity.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. EDGAR. That counts six votes on a division in this House, and perhaps the Ministers think it is about time to begin to educate their party to accept unrestricted reciprocity. The Minister of Finance opened his remarks by informing the House that we were altogether wrong in declaring that their treatment of American vessels in 1886 was for any other purpose than the protection of our fisheries. The Minister said it was not to interfere with American commercial intercourse with Canada, but it was simply to protect the rights of our fishermen and the treaty rights to the fisheries that action was taken. I desire to contradict the Minister most positively, but in a parliamentary way. What we complain of is not any interference by the Canadian Government with American fishing vessels trying to poach on our fisheries within the three-mile limit, for we are entirely with the Government, always were with the Government as all Canadians are with the Government on that question, but it was when the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Marine also in their respective departments interfered with American vessels, wantonly and unnecessarily in 1883 and irritated and annoyed them. Was it for the protection of the fisheries that the case of the schooner Pearl Nelson occurred, where the captain of that vessel was fined $200? For what? For encroaching within the three-mile limit, for throwing his nets in our waters? Not at all, but he was fined $200 for simply putting ashore two native Canadians at their own homes to see their wives and children when in port. The fine was imposed for doing that and nothing else, and the Minister cannot deny it. More than that. A Canadian in that crew had died on board, and the captain of the vessel wanted to put the dead man's clothes on shore, to give them to his family; but he was prevented from doing so, because this fine of $200 had not been paid. And yet, the hon. gentleman rises in his seat, and lectures hon. members on this side of the House, for not having sympathy for the poor fi-hermen down by the sea. But those were Canadians, and those were fishermen whom he would not allow to come ashore, and the dead man whose clothes could not be landed was a Canadian fi-herman also. The Minister contradicted my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) flatly when he made the assertion that American vessels had been deprived of obtaining a reasonable quantity of provisions at a Canadian port. Does not the hon. gentleman remember the case of the Laura Sayward, at Shelburne, where the captain was refused permission to buy seven pounds of sugar, three pounds of coffee, one bushel of potatoes and two pounds of butter for the use of his little crew on the return voyage to Massachusetts. The hon. gentleman cannot deny it. Let him look at the Hansard of last Session, when I mentioned this very case, and when his colleague, the Minister of Customs, said it was perfectly right.

An hon. MEMBER. It does not make it right.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not think it does, but it was justified in this House last Session, and it is a fact. The hon. gentleman will perhaps still insist that the action of the Government has been simply to protect the fishing rights of Canada under the treaty, and not in regard to our municipal or domestic legislation. No doubt the Minister is quite familiar with the celebrated dispatch of 1st February, 1887, sent from Canada to England, which contained a copy of a report of a Committee of the Privy Council, signed by the Minister himself, who was then Minister of Marine. Whether he wrote the document or not I do not know. I rather suspect the Minister of Justice prepared it, but the Minister of Finance was responsible for it. In one clause of that document he describes the position the Canadian Government was taking and which at that time they were determined to maintain. The hon. gentleman said in that report of the Privy Council:

"It is not to be expected that after having earnestly insisted upon the necessity of a strict maintenance of these treaty rights and upon the respect due by foreign vessels while in Canadian waters to the municipal legislation by which all vessels resorting to those waters are governed, in the absence, moreover, of any decision of a legal tribunal to show that there has been any straining of the law in those cases in which it has been put in operation, the Canadian Government will suddenly and without the justification supplied by any new facts or arguments withdraw from the position taken up deliberately, and by doing so, in effect, plead guilty to the whole of the charges of oppression, inhumanity and bad faith which, in language wholly unwarranted by the circumstances of the case, have been made against it by the public men of the United States."

The Minister of Finance himself justified their action towards American vessels as regards the municipal legislation of this country, and it is of that we complain. We contend that in regard to all matters of petty detail the Government have been unreasonably hard. I do not pretend to say that all the cases reported in the United States were justifiably complained of—I do not think so at all. But very few cases were sufficient to irritate the people of the United States and the whole body of fishermen, and it was certainly extremely unwise, and under the circumstances criminal, for this Government to have allowed any of the cases to have occurred. The hon. gentleman has stated, however, that the English Government entirely supported them. I do not think that the English Government when it was negotiating with the Secretary of State at Washington was very likely in its public despatches to announce that the Canadians had been guilty of all the crimes that were attributed to them. I would not expect to find that told in the English despatches, but the Ministers know a great deal better than I do what were the private and confidential opinions of the English Government upon their course of action. But this I do know from the public despatches, that the English Government put their hand down upon the Canadian Government and prevented them in 1887 from repeating the course of treatment they were guilty of in 1886. If I am not out of order in referring to another debate, I may say that I remember distinctly on an occasion not long ago, in this House, that the Minister of Finance said that in 1887, they had no cause to interfere with the American fishermen because the season of 1886 had taught them to behave themselves. I think I can show that it was the English Government that taught the Canadian Government how to behave themselves in 1887. In this wonderful despatch which I quoted just now and which is a sort of no surrender despatch, the Canadian Government said that they had done perfectly right and that they would not surrender. That is just what the Finance Minister and the First Minister have said to-day. I quote from the despatch:

"Such a surrender on the part of Canada would involve their abandonment of a valuable portion of the national inheritance of the people of this country."

What followed this despatch? It must have been received towards the end of February, 1887, in Downing Street, and it could not have been received very long before the Secretary of State sent a cable message out to the Governor General here, dated 24th February, in which he said:

"Her Majesty's Government are disposed to think after much consideration of the entire subject—"

I have no doubt that consideration included the case of the Pearl Nelson and the Laura Sayward— —"that the best and simplest settlement of the difficulties might be arrived at, if both parties would agree, so as to permit discussion of the more extended relations, to ratify for a term at least, if not permanently, the condition of things that existed under the Treaty of Washington. Fish and fish production being again reciprocally admitted free of duty and the fisheries being once more reciprocally thrown open. They are further of opinion that it would be the clear interest of the Dominion that no suggestion of a pecuniary indemnification should be made in making this arrangement."

The plain English of that is that in 1887 and 1888 the Canadian Government was to allow the Americans the right to use their fisheries without stopping them. It was quite reasonable that this should be done or otherwise there is no doubt whatever that we would have been plunged into a war with the United States. What did our brave captains of the Canadian navy say to that? What did the Minister of Marine say to that? Why, Sir, he at once owned his mistake, and said he would cheerfully do what was suggested to him by the English Government. And Lord Lansdowne cabled back on the 26th February, almost the next day, to the English Secretary of State in the most dutiful and proper spirit:

"Referring to your telegram of the 24th February, Canadian Government is prepared to accept your suggestion of reverting temporarily to the condition of things existing under the Treaty of Washington without at present raising question of indemnity."

You see that is the way in which the Government taught the American fishermen how to behave themselves in 1887. The hon. gentleman says that Sir Charles Tupper approved of their action, but does he not remember, because I do very distinctly, and I think every one else in this House does too, that Sir Charles Tupper in speaking of this very construction of the Treaty of 1818 which the hon. Minister is defending to-night, said:

"It is one thing to hold a technical construction and it is another thing to enforce it."

That is all we say on this side of the House, and that is all we ever said. We do not deny that the technical construction of that treaty is right as construed by the Canadian Government. I remember the Minister of Finance the other night asking across the House whether we held that their interpretation of the Treaty of 1818 was right or wrong. I shall answer in the words of Sir Charles Tupper: "It is one thing to hold a technical construction and it is another thing to enforce it." If there is any one else besides Sir Charles Tupper who was acquainted with those fishery negotiations at Washington and who would likely be accepted as an authority by the other side of the House, I think that man would be Mr. Joseph Chamberlain. I think I can tell the hon. gentleman what Mr. Joseph Chamberlain thought of their course of conduct in 1886. At a banquet given him in New York while speaking of these same troubles with the fishing boats he used these words:

"This interference, whether justified by law or not, provoked great irritation and ill-feeling in this country."

That is Mr. Joseph Chamberlain's view of the situation. That is exactly the view we take on this side, and the view we always have taken. When we find those two gentlemen agreeing with us and disagreeing with the Ministry we may fairly regard ourselves as justified in the course we have taken in this matter. I may also say that the language of these gentlemen fully justifies the language which the leader of the Opposition used last summer, in the speech which he delivered at St. Thomas. Both the First Minister and the Minister of Finance to-day professed friendliness to the United States, and a desire for reciprocity, yet, when we profess friendliness to the United States they call it disloyalty, and when we say that we are in favor of reciprocity we are told by the other side that it is the same thing as annexation. A few minutes ago we had a vigorous denunciation by the Minister of Finance given to the annexation tendencies of certain persons, not mentioned, and he told us that a great many people in Washington were in favor of the annexation of Canada. He mentioned them by name, although he did not mention any on this side of the House by name. I can tell the Minister of Finance that if this Government opposes, as they opposed last Session, and if they continue to oppose, the efforts which we are making, and the suggestions which we offer to them towards obtaining larger commercial relations with the United States, they will be very apt to make a great many annexationists on the other side of the line, and on this side, too, because it is perfectly clear to those who observe the feeling of the people in Ontario at least, that they desire to have free trade relations with the United States.

Mr. RYKERT. No.

Mr. EDGAR. I will draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance to the hon. member for Lincoln. The hon. member is one of his reconstructed followers, and his able speech to-night has not convinced the hon. member yet. The hon. Minister had better take him in hand and give him another lecture. Well, apart from the hon. member for Lincoln, nearly everybody in the Province of Ontario is anxious to have larger trade relations with the people of the United States, and if the Government continue to announce that that desire on the part of the people will lead to annexation, they will make annexationists by the score in this country. But we say in order to get ample trade relations with the United States, annexation is not necessary, and therefore we persuade people not to be annexationists. Our policy prevents them from being annexationists. If they can get the commercial advantages without the political union, they will not be annexationists; but I am satisfied that an increasing number of people will say that if they are to be debarred by the Government from obtaining commercial advantages unless they accept the political union, they will be very much tempted to accept the political union; and therefore I warn hon. gentlemen opposite that they are making annexationists in this country every day that they resist our policy. Now, Sir, an important part of this motion involves the direct negotiation by Canadians, through their own accredited representatives, with the United States Government for the purpose of negotiating this treaty. I think that the experience which Canadians have had of English negotiators on behalf of Canada with the United States has not been very encouraging. On the contrary, it has been a disastrous history of failures all along; and I do not think that even the assistance which Sir Charles Tupper received during the negotiation of the Treaty of 1858 from Lord Sackville or from Mr. Chamberlain, could have been worth very much. I think he would have done quite as well, and very likely a good deal better, if he had been sent there as the direct representative of Canada. Now, Sir, I think there is a great practical advantage in sending our own representative to Washington. The hon. Minister of Finance referred to an Act of Congress providing for a conference of the States of Southern and Central America with the United States at Washington for the purpose of negotiating treaties of commerce, and said that Canada was not to be represented there because we had not been asked. Now, Sir, the Act providing for this conference, which was passed in Congress during last year, is similar to a Bill which was introduced during several sessions by Senator Sherman. In that Bill Senator Sherman made proposals for the encouragement of closer commercial relationship and in the interest and for the perpetuation of peace between the United States and the republics of Mexico and Central and South America, and the Empire of Brazil. He proposed that conference in a spirit of the broadest statesmanship: and if there is a man living to-day in the United States, who is a broadminded statesman, that man is Senator John Sherman. When he had one of those Bills of his before the Senate a short time ago, a gentleman who was in Canada, and who was intimate with Senator Sherman, wrote a letter asking him why he did not include Canada in his Bill; and I have permission to use an extract from the letter which Senator Sherman wrote to that gentleman in reply. He said:

"DEAR SIR.—The reason why the Dominion of Canada has not been included among the nations to be represented, is that under the form of Government existing there, we can only negotiate with and invite Great Britain, the paramount authority in Canada, to participate in the Congress. Both official etiquette and the subordination of Canada to the British Government prevent any negotiations with the Canadian authorities in such a Congress. I know very well that Canada is a much more important country for trade and commercial intercourse, and is in many respects more akin to us than any of the South American States. The fact that we speak the same language, are governed by kindred institutions, and are descended from the same source, would make it natural and easy to form closer commercial and business relations; but we cannot invite the Canadian Government into this Congress, composed as it is of independent States."

There is the reason from Senator Sherman himself why Canada is not invited into that Congress, and cannot send a representative there. Now, what is suggested in this proposal before the House to-night is that Canada should send her own direct representative to the United States, and if she were in a position to do so, we should be so far independent of the control of Downing Street in that matter that we would be accepted and admitted into that Congress to negotiate in that enormously important matter with the United States and the other countries represented there. Now, there is a most distinct practical illustration of the important commercial advantages that we should have by acquiring the right to send an independent negotiator. Well, Sir, at one time the hon. First Minister himself rather squinted in that direction. I dare say the hon. gentleman's colleagues will remember that Sir Leonard Tilley and Sir Charles Tupper were in London in 1879, and in order that Sir Alexander Galt might be appointed as a distinct negotiator for Canada at other countries, these distinguished gentleman, including the First Minister, signed a memo. which they sent into the Colonial Office, and which they concluded in these words:

"It is further submitted that the very large and augmenting commerce of Canada and the increasing extent of her trade with foreign nations are proving the absolute need—"

Of what? Why—

— "of direct negotiations with them for the proper protection of her interests."

The First Minister, Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Leonard Tilley actually ten years ago proposed to the English Government that Canada should have the right to enter into direct negotiations with foreign countries; and they went on to say:
Mr. EDGAR.

"The necessity has thus arisen for providing separate and distinct trade conventions with foreign powers with whom Canada has distinct trade."

If we have not distinct trade with the United States sufficient to justify us appointing a Minister to that country, I do not know of any country with which we have sufficient trade. You see, therefore, we are not so much in advance of what the right hon. the First Minister himself was in 1879. Now, I think the proposition is a perfectly feasible one. I do not think we would meet with any objection from England if this resolution were carried and if we were distinctly to ask for the right to make our own commercial treaties. That would be only asking the right to use the name of the Queen ourselves. We do not propose revolution, we do not propose that the name of Queen Victoria should not be used in those negotiations, and we think that, as subjects of Queen Victoria, we would be getting a good deal nearer to the Queen herself by being allowed to use her name in making our own commercial treaties. We use her name every day in our writs; we use it in all our domestic matters. I do not think we have very much disgraced her name by any use we made of it as Canadians, and I really do think it would tend to strengthen the silken ties that bind Canadians to the Empire if we were at liberty simply to use her name in making commercial treaties with foreign countries. What earthly objection could England have to our sending our representative to the United States to make a commercial treaty? The only possible objection that could be suggested is that in making these treaties we would be discriminating against England or against countries with which she has entered into commercial treaties containing the most favored nation clause. That is an objection which might have some force if negotiations of a similar kind had not already taken place, and if legislation connected with the duties on foreign goods had not already taken place here, which render it impossible for the English Government to make any objections of that kind. On many occasions and for a good many years England did object to Canada making discriminating arrangements of that kind. In June, 1868, the English Board of Trade protested against our statutory offer to the United States of reciprocity in natural products. That is the offer which hon. gentlemen opposite boast so much about as being sufficient to satisfy all reasonable requirements of the United States. The protest which the English Government made against that offer was combatted very cleverly by Sir John Rose, and the English Government yielded. If we go back to the Elgin Treaty of 1854, we find that under the terms of that treaty there was an express claim to discriminate against England and against all other countries. In 1854, there were a great many treaties between England and foreign nations in which Canada and the other colonies were included, and which contained the most favored nation clause. These treaties would therefore prevent Canada from making a treaty with the United States, offering special trade arrangements with that country, but in the face of that treaty, we made those arrangements. It might be said that although on the face of the Elgin Treaty, we had discriminated against other countries, still when we came to legislate on the subject of the articles which would be admitted into Canada free of duty, we put those articles on the free list as regards the rest of the world. Well, it happened that we did not do so. We did not put all those articles on the free list; several of them were not on it, and, therefore, in respect of those, we did discriminate against England and against the world. There was the article of dried fruits. In that the principle was asserted by Canada of her right to discriminate in favor of the United States. The United States was the only country from which we could import dried fruits free of duty; therefore we discriminated against all other countries in the world. Among others, there was Greece with which England had a treaty containing the most favored nation clause at that time, and including the colonies. That was a most material violation of that principle, and there was no protest at the time from England or Greece. I have heard a good deal of stress laid upon the speech which the Hon. George Brown made in the Senate on his return from negotiating the draft of a treaty at Washington in 1874. In that speech he suggested that the manufactured articles, which were to be admitted free of duty from the United States, should be placed on the free list, and at any rate, as far as Great Britain was concerned, that there should be no discrimination against her. Now, I think it is impossible that Mr. Brown could have intended to go any further in restricting the right of Canada to discriminate than the English Government itself proposed to go, and I find that when the draft of treaty, which the Hon. George Brown drew up, was sent over to England, the Government there submitted it to the Board of Trade for their consideration. Now, remember that that treaty not only included all the natural products of the Treaty of 1854, but also embraced a large number of manufactured articles, which it proposed to admit reciprocally free between Canada and the United States. The Board of Trade in England commented on that provision of the treaty, and these are the words they used:

"To this no objection can be taken, whatever criticisms may have been made on the original Reciprocity Treaty on the ground that Canada was setting up differential duties against this country and countries with which we have most favored nations treaties. No such objections can be taken now."

So that the English Government, through its own Department of Trade, distinctly and positively repudiated all desire to prevent Canada from setting up differential duties against England or any other country in the world, if it should be in the interest of Canada. This obsolete doctrine, that Canada could not set up differential or discriminating duties, was found in the original Governor General's instructions. Article 9 of those instructions was as follows:—

"You are not to assent in Our name to any Bill of the classes herein after specified, that is to say:"

And amongst them is this:

"Any Bill imposing differential duties."

There was a most distinct objection on the part of the English Government, which framed these instructions first, to our right to make those discriminating duties, but in 1876, Mr. Blake visited the Colonial Office, and the result of that visit was the disappearance of that clause in the Governor General's instructions. Not only did that clause disappear, but we have the reasons very frankly given by Colonial Secretary, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, in a despatch to Lord Lorne, dated the 3rd May, 1879, in which he says:

"The clause was at the instance of the late Government of the Dominion, omitted from the revised instructions because Her Majesty's Government thought it undesirable that those instructions should contain anything which could be interpreted as limiting or defining the legislative powers conferred in 1867 on the Dominion Parliament."

Now, that was entirely in the line of the report of the English Board of Trade in 1874. Yet, as an illustration of the profound ignorance of Canadian and colonial affairs shown by prominent English public men at the time, and of the necessity of our having Canadians to manage the negotiation of our own treaties, we find that Lord Kimberley actually, in 1882, attempted to fetter us again in this matter. After all that had passed, after the decision of the English Board of Trade, after more than once changing the royal instructions, and after all the incidents to which I have referred, Lord Kimberley, referring to the proposed commercial arrangement with Jamaica, undertook to take the old, old ground, and he said:

"I need scarcely say that Sir A. Musgrave is entirely right in his assumption that Her Majesty's Government could not sanction any arrangements which would involve the creation of differential duties in favor of Canada."

Even the present Government, or that of 1882, could not quite stand that from Lord Kimberley, and they of course knew better than he did how the position stood, and he was very soon made to withdraw the objection he had made to our negotiating an independent treaty with Jamaica. The memorandum of Council, which I entirely approve of, says:

"That, in accordance with this precedent, the Canadian Government claim that it is competent for any of the colonies possessing representative and responsible government to enter into mutual agreements for either partial or absolute free trade with the mother country, or with each other, or with both."

That memorandum is to be found in the Sessional Papers of 1883, No. 89, pages 38 and 39. The Minister of Finance no doubt has observed that, in this motion which is before the Chair to-day, nothing is proposed about the right of Canada to negotiate treaties with British American Provinces. I recollect a few days ago the Finance Minister making a great discovery in the debate on the motion respecting commercial treaties when he said that, in the resolution respecting commercial treaties which Mr. Blake had proposed in 1882, he had included the right to make treaties with British North American Provinces, and he wondered why it was not in that motion, and he pointed to its omission in the resolution of the other day as an evidence of disloyalty. Now he will see the reason, which is that shortly after 1882 the Government of the day obtained from the English Government the distinct acknowledgment that they could create differential duties and negotiate independent treaties with any other colony; and therefore my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would have displayed ignorance equal to that of the Finance Minister if he had included any such unnecessary proposal as that in his resolution. I think the hon. gentleman was not in the Government at that time, but he probably read the Government organs, and, if he had read the Montreal Gazette, he would have found the announcement in that paper which I have just mentioned to the House. I am not aware that it was ever vouchsafed by the Government to the House, but the Montreal Gazette announced it to the public in this way:

"We understand that the principle therein laid down by the Canadian Government has been conceded by the Imperial Government, and that hereafter the colonies are left free to enter upon reciprocal trade relations with each other, whether the arrangement involves discrimination against Great Britain or against other colonies than those immediately concerned."

And, in order to show that the Montreal Gazette, a few years ago, was not afraid to see Canada extending her independent trade relations, I will go on to read from the same article which says:

"There is in that concession no weakening of the tie that binds the various portions of the British possessions to the Empire; on the contrary, the freedom of action in the arrangement of whatever policy may be deemed by the colonies most conducive to their material progress and prosperity, can have no other effect than to strengthen the attachment of the colonies to the Crown."

I think that utterance was almost prophetic. It would refer to the resolution which was before the House last Session, to the one which has already been before the House this Session, and to the resolution in your hands to-day, Mr. Speaker, and I would distinctly draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to that article. Now, in order, if possible, to make it more certain that there can be no objection raised by anybody to Canada, making a discrimination in favor of this country and against any other country in her commercial treaty arrangements, I would just refer the hon. gentleman to the Revised Statutes of Canada, to section 11 of the Customs Act, in which there is a proposal standing to-day, and it has been standing on our statutes since 1879, and has been very often boasted of by the Government of the day, and that is the proposal to allow wines, when imported from France or Spain, to be taken off the customs lists, as regards those two countries only. Now, Sir, in that clause of the Customs Act, we distinctly offer to France or Spain, either one of them, a differential discriminating privilege against England and against all the world, in spite of the most favored nation clause in any English treaty. So that it is absolutely clear that the doctrine of differential duties, and of not discriminating against England, or against those favored nations, is absolutely a dead letter, and has been abandoned by English statesmen of every Government, both Liberal and Conservative; and it is, therefore, absolutely open to Canada to make whatever arrangement she likes with the United States about her own commercial matters. England has not, as I am aware of, discriminated in favor of Canada, and she is quite able in trade relations to take care of herself, and she has not asked that Canada should discriminate in her favor. Therefore, Sir, I think, it is the manly course for Canadians to say that, that only possible difficulty being out of the way, they should demand the right to negotiate treaties with all foreign nations, but more particularly with the United States at our doors, and for that reason, especially, I cordially support the motion of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10:50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 27th February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 82) to amend the Act to incorporate the Winnipeg and North Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergin.)

Bill (No. 83) to incorporate the Ontario, Manitoba and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Macdowall.)

PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Mr. BOWELL. With the consent of the House, I desire to move the addition of two members to the Printing Committee. The Senate appointed nineteen members on this committee instead of seventeen, and it is thought better that we should add two names rather than ask them to reduce the number. I beg to suggest the names of Messrs. Hickey and Ellis.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS.

Report of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery for the Dominion, for the year ending 30th June, 1888.—(Mr. Bowell.)

Annual Report of the Department of the Interior, for the year 1888.—(Mr. Dewdney.)

EXTRADITION ACT.

Mr. WELDON (Albert) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 84) to extend the provisions of the Extradition Act. Mr. EDGAR.

Act. He said: A Bill of this nature is of very grave importance now. The position of Canada with reference to the matter of extradition in a very singular one, partly by reason of her geographical position, and more largely by reason of what may be called historical accidents. To make more clear the purpose that I have in view in this short Bill, let me say a word with reference to the ruling policy underlying the whole matter of extradition law, whether embodied in treaties or statutes. The object of extradition is two-fold. It aims, first of all, more vigorously to enforce the criminal law, and, secondly, a matter of still greater importance, to enable particular communities to rid themselves of a very dangerous class of immigrants. Whatever view we take of the criminal law, we must agree that the objects of the law are to confine and in some cases to destroy very grave offenders, and furthermore, to restrain and to deter those who may be contemplating the commission of crime. The experience of hundreds of years has abundantly shown that the arm of justice is paralyzed when the criminal who has violated the laws of his country escapes punishment by crossing the boundary line. Here, in Canada, we are powerless to reach our hand beyond our boundary line and draw a criminal from a foreign country; but the second purpose, namely, to rid our country of a dangerous class of residents, fugitives seeking an asylum here on account of crimes they committed abroad, is a matter within our own powers, and with which the Parliament of Canada is competent to legislate. Our geographical position is peculiar. On the North American continent there are three political communities, Canada, the Republic of the United States, and Mexico. With the one we have no treaty; with the other we have a very narrow treaty, and the result is that the criminal classes of those two important nations to the south of us are found settling down in Canada. This is, so to speak, the very bottom of the basin; and with an international boundary 3,000 miles long, with increased facilities for travel, the mischiefs resulting from this immigration have been in later years greatly augmented. With reference to the historical accidents of the case, it is a singular fact that while the country of which we form part has now extradition treaties with all important states, all those treaties but one are of comparatively modern dates, and are modelled upon the statute which the English Parliament passed eighteen or nineteen years ago. The statute contains a full list of crimes and an excellent procedure, and was meant to be a guide and model for future treaties; and all the treaties which England has are modelled upon it with the exception of one. That one treaty, that imperfect, that old treaty, is the Ashburton Treaty, which was made forty-seven years ago, and that treaty is of more moment to us than all the others put together. The tenth article of the Ashburton Treaty of 1842 relates to extradition and is singularly defective. It will surprise hon. members who have not given attention to the matter, that it contains a list of but seven crimes, and of really but five. Of these five, four are violent crimes against the person and property, and there is but one commercial crime. The crimes named are murder, assault with intent to commit murder, piracy, robbery, and arson, and the only commercial crime is forgery, including the utterance of forged bills. Within the past forty or fifty years, there has been, for obvious reasons, a great increase of crime in commercial matters. There is an additional complexity in commercial transactions, there is a great extension of credit, a great multiplication of the forms of credit, a great enlargement of our paper money, a great development in the way of replacing these by cheques, and credit forms, and drafts, almost the equivalent of money. These developments have given occasion to a great increase of crime of a commercial character, yet there is in the treaty which determines our extradition relations with the United States, but the single commercial crime of forgery. During the years since 1842, efforts have been made by the diplomats of Great Britain and the United States, to replace the Ashburton Treaty by a better one. The Rosebery Treaty failed to pass in the American Senate. It is not my purpose to trace the reason, I can only deplore the result; and to day, despite the hopes we had a few years ago of a fuller treaty with a larger list of crimes and a better procedure, we are still governed by the old Treaty of 1842. We cannot have all we would like in this matter. Every member of this House would have earnestly wished to see a reasonable, wise treaty adopted by the two nations, and to see the Ashburton Treaty replaced by a wiser and fuller one. But if we cannot have the whole loaf, let us have the half. It is within the power of the Parliament of Canada to give to the people of Canada the very best half of an extradition treaty. It is within our power to drive from our own borders the more flagrant and atrocious criminals who seek Canada as an asylum. The Bill is very brief. It provides in substance that as between Canada and any country which has no extradition treaty with Great Britain affecting Canada, it shall be within the power of the Canadian Government to surrender criminals who are enjoying asylums from certain flagrant crimes committed in foreign countries; and in respect of a state with which we have a treaty, but an incomplete treaty, one containing too narrow a list of crimes, it is provided that the Canadian Executive may surrender criminals having committed one of the long list of crimes contained in the schedule of the Bill, on the demand of a foreign state. There is an ex post facto clause in the Bill, and a provision that the expenditure incurred in this matter of extradition, under the Bill, shall be borne by the state which demands the fugitive. The provision is made necessary, apparently, by some difficulties of three or four years' standing between the Canadian Government and some foreign powers, notably Belgium. The offences in this Bill are grave offences, and I desire to emphasise very strongly the fact that the Bill does not in any way impair or invade the right of asylum for political offenders, which in Canada, and in other parts of the Empire, they have enjoyed under all Canadian and British statutes. Long ago, England held out her arms to the people of oppressed nationalities who wished to find a home in that country, and that rule and policy has been carefully conserved in this. I call attention to the fact that, though this legislation is of an exceptional nature, the case is exceptional, and we rest upon strong authority. I will read a short paragraph from the report of a commission which was appointed ten years ago in the mother country to deal with the question of extradition. It was a very strong commission. I do not think that any stronger commission has been appointed during the reign of Queen Victoria. Among the members were the late Chief Justice of England, Lord Cockburn, Lord Blackburn, Russell Gurney, the Recorder of London, Mr. Baggallay, the present Master of the Rolls, who was then Sir Baliol Brett, Sir Fitzjames Stephen, who is now in Queen's Bench, Sir William Harcourt, and some others whose names I do not now recall. They reported in favor of adopting the course that we are proposing in this Bill, of not waiting for a treaty, but of going on by statute to cure the greater half of the evil. I will read this short extract from the first article of the report, which was made in 1878 by the commission, which was appointed the year before:

"We would, therefore, suggest that extradition treaties with other states, which appear to be practically of use only for the purpose of ensuring reciprocity, should no longer be held to be indispensable, and that, while the power in the Crown of entering into extradition treaties with other nations, as now existing by statute, should be still retained, statutory power should be given to the proper authorities to deliver up fugitive criminals whose surrender is asked for, irrespectively of the existence of any treaty between this country and the state against whose law the offence has been committed. It is as much to our advantage that such criminals should be punished, and that we should get rid of them, as it is to that of the foreign state that they should be brought within the reach of its law."

There are the reasons clearly given in support of the policy of this Bill. I will not now dwell on the multitude of the evils which exist under the present conditions. These may be dwelt upon better at a later stage. I think there is no more insidious danger than that great criminals from other states, carrying off their booty, and making their homes here, should defy the law, should spend their money here, and should corrupt and taint the morals of our young men. I think it is the duty of the people of Canada to protect themselves against this contagion.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ROSSEAU RIVER INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. LARIVIÈRE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to negotiate, at as early a date as possible, with the Indians of the Rosseau River, in the Province of Manitoba, for a change of their present reserve to a more suitable location for them, and to open to settlement the land now held by those Indians?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The land in the above reserve is of most excellent quality. It is also well wooded, and altogether a most suitable location for the Indians. It would not be in their interests to remove them.

LARUE, CASGRAIN, ANGERS & HAMEL.

Mr. TURCOT asked, What is the total amount paid for fees, costs, emoluments and disbursements since 1st January, 1885, to the following law firms:—1. Messrs. Larue, Angers & Casgrain; 2. Messrs. Larue, Angers, Casgrain & Hamel; 3. Messrs. Larue, Casgrain, Angers & Hamel; 4. Messrs. Casgrain & Angers; 5. Messrs. Casgrain, Angers & Lavery, and to Thos. Chas. Casgrain, Esq.?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The total amount paid to all these firms for costs, fees, emoluments and disbursements for the last four years has been $12,000. If the hon. gentleman desires the details, I think he will have to move for a return.

BELLE CREEK BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. WELSH asked, Has any survey been held on the Belle Creek Breakwater, Prince Edward Island, during the past season? If so, by what engineer, and what is the amount estimated by him of the cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, a survey was made. I am unable to state the name of the person who made the survey, as the orders were sent to the resident engineer at St. John, who, no doubt, detailed one of his assistants to do the work. The amount stated in the report as the estimated cost is $7,500.

OUTSTANDING NORTH-WEST SCRIP.

Mr. MULOCK asked, What is the total amount of North-West land scrip (colonization, volunteer, half-breed, police, and other kinds, if any) now outstanding?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I would ask the hon. member to allow that to stand for a week or so, and I will endeavor to get the information for him.

Mr. MULOCK. This day, week?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

BRESAYLOR HALF-BREEDS.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) asked, Whether any action has been taken by the Ministry in reference to a petition of the 25th of August, 1887, from the Bresaylor half-breeds for compensation for losses sustained during the North-West rebellion? Whether any compensation has been made to Charles Bremner, for the alleged destruction of cattle, and appropriation of his furs? Whether any steps have been taken to recover the value of his furs from the parties charged with the trespass?

Mr. DEWDNEY. No action has been taken in reference to the petition of the Bresaylor half breeds, except in the case of Charles Bremner. Shortly after I came into office the Minister of Justice called my attention to the promise which he gave the House last Session that further inquiry would be made respecting Bremner's claim for furs. I have given the matter consideration, and so soon as inquiries, which are now being pursued, are complete, definite action will be taken. No steps have as yet been taken to recover the value of the furs from anyone charged with the trespass.

CASCOMPEQUE HARBOR FOREMAN.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. PERRY) asked, Has the Government dismissed Mr. Achille Jobin, foreman for blasting rock in the harbor of Cascumpeque, Prince Edward Island? If so, what are the reasons for his dismissal? Has another foreman been appointed? If so, who is he? Has John P. Brennan, of Alberton, been appointed assistant foreman?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The services of Mr. Achille Jobin were dispensed with, as recommended by Mr. James B. Egan, the assistant engineer of the department in charge of the operations at Cascumpeque, who said it was not desirable that he should be continued on the work. Captain Gillis, late of the dredge Cape Breton, who had been serving the department since 1874, was appointed in his place. Mr. J. P. Brennan is not employed as assistant foreman.

NEW EDINBURGH AND GATINEAU FERRY.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth) asked, Who is the present lessee of the New Edinburgh and Gatineau Ferry? What is the annual rental? Are there any arrears of rent due by him? If so, how much? Are there any arrears of rent still due by the former lessee, C. H. Chabot, who was lessee from the year 1881 to 1885? If so, how much?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Thomas Mansfield is the present lessee. The annual rental is $350; balance due by him, $875. Arrearages due by C. H. Chabot, $920. Steps will be taken to collect arrearages.

ALBERT RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. WELDON (St. John) asked, Has the balance of the money granted to the Albert Railway Company been paid; how much money has been paid on account thereof since the 1st July, 1887, and to whom was the same paid?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. 1. No. 2. To Albert Railway Company, $2,341.19; to interest account, $770.94; to L. R. Harrison, for professional services, $111.12; total, $3,223.25.

AMERICAN FISHING VESSELS.

Mr. WELDON (St. John) asked, What masters of Government cruisers were authorised to enter and clear American fishing or other vessels during the year 1887? How many vessels were entered and cleared under such authority, and by whom?

Mr. DEWDNEY.

Mr. BOWELL. The following are the names of the masters and cruisers:—James McLean, of the steamer General Middleton; Charles Dakin, of the steamer Lansdowne; Thomas Quigley, of the L. Houlett; William McLaren, of the schooner Critic; Matthew Sweetzer, who did serve; Andrew Gordon, of the steamer Acadia; Charles T. Knowlton, of the schooner Advance; J. N. Pratt, of the schooner Capt. Howard; L. Pouliot, of the steamer Annie C. Moore. The department has no means of knowing how many vessels were entered and cleared by them. No return of the kind was ever made to the department except when called for. Their instructions were to send such reports and clearances to the nearest collector for registration in his books. I may add that if the hon. gentleman would like to know the number, he can send to each of the ports in the Maritime Provinces.

PICTOU BRANCH RAILWAY.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, The total length of the Pictou Branch Railway, from its junction with the Intercolonial to the terminus of said Pictou Branch at Pictou?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Fifteen miles.

INTEREST ON CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BONDS.

Mr. EDGAR asked, What sum has fallen due for interest upon the $15,000,000 of Canadian Pacific Railway bonds, as authorised in 1888? Has all interest been met by the railway company, or has the Government been called upon to pay any sum upon their guarantee of 3½ per cent; and if so, what sum, and when was it due, and when paid?

Mr. BOWELL. The first payment of six months' interest ($262,500) on $15,000,000, Canadian Pacific Railway bonds authorised last Session, fell due on the first of January, and has been made by the company.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN moved for:

Copies of all memorials addressed to the Government by the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories which sat recently at Regina.

He said: In making this motion I desire to occupy the time of the House for a few moments, and that the House listen, not to my words, but to the voice of what, without a figure of speech, may be properly called a New World. It has been opened up by you, and it is under your charge. It is some six years since that greater Canada was opened up by a railway, a railway which not merely opens up that great territory, but constitutes a highway for the world. It is a railway which will always be connected with the name of the right hon. gentleman, and had he nothing else upon which his fame might rest, that railway would secure his memory. It is a railway that realises the dreams of great and enthusiastic men. Lachine, near Montreal, marks the object of one, and the English Franklin aimed at doing, and gave his life in trying to do, what this great work has accomplished for the world. Now, Sir, six years ago I witnessed the opening of the first North-West Council, not the first North-West Council held in the Territory, but the first held at Regina. That council was crude, but in the succeeding years it did good work and laid the foundation of our educational and municipal systems, and our criminal and civil jurisprudence. At that time Brandon, which is now a flourishing city, whence we get one of our ablest members of this House, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly)—at that time Brandon was crude, and I remember that my hon. friend welcomed us to a tent club.

Earlier than that time, a little over six years ago, Calgary had no existence—it was merely Fort Calgary; Medicine Hat had no existence, Moose Jaw had no existence, and none of the flourishing little towns that stretch across the prairie now, had any existence. The prairie itself was practically virgin of the plough. Now it produces millions of bushels of grain, and we exported such quantities of grain the year before last, as to almost embarrass the Canadian Pacific Railway. Not only so, but coal mines have come into existence, sawmills, flour mills, cheese factories, dairies. Ranching and horse raising are carried on to a very large extent, and the day is at hand when we shall have smelting and reducing works there, and there is no reason why, at this moment, we should not have tanneries flourishing in Regina, Moose Jaw and Calgary. Every year at Calgary you have 10,000 hides, and 3,000 sheep-skins, so tanning could be carried forward successfully. The council has, within a short time, owing to the action of Parliament last year, grown into a Legislative Assembly. That Assembly sat last year, and I am only echoing the language of persons who visited it from the east, when it was in session, in stating that that Assembly need not fear comparison with any Provincial Assembly in the Dominion in the personnel of its members, in their intelligence, and in the zeal with which they give themselves to legislation. During that time the Minister of Interior presided over the destinies of that country, and took a deep interest in its welfare, and it is due to him to say, that the educational progress we have made has been largely due to the great interest he took in education in the Territories. I ask without fear the attention of members of this House for that portion of the Dominion, because I think this House is now sensible that in that vast and fertile region we have the solution of the difficulty in the way of Canada becoming one day, however distant, a self-contained nation. As regards the settlers who are in that prairie region, I will say this for them, that there are not in the whole Empire men more calculated by reason of their intelligence, morality and business qualities to lay the foundations of a great and prosperous community. They are all energetic, most of them are reading men, some are cultured men, and there is no doubt whatever, that the free and independent bearing which characterises the men in the North-West is due in part, possibly wholly, to their free surroundings. It may be that even the associations of the North-West have some influence on them. The associations connected with the North-West are of the most inspiring kind, for though a new land, it is a land which has historical associations of which people can never read or think of without enthusiasm. Some 150 years ago Pierre Gauthier de Varennes traversed those very regions, and Forts Du Pas, Fort du Grande Rapide, at the Rapids of the Saskatchewan, Fort La Corne, and other places familiar to North-West travellers, are among their footmarks that are living yet. That prairie region alone contains 123,000 square miles, reaching up from the arid plateau of the Missouri to the forests of the Saskatchewan and stretching away from Manitoba to the foot of the Rocky Mountains. That whole region maybe described as one vast wheat mine. There can be no doubt in the mind of any man who knows that country that it is destined to be the great wheat-producing region of the future. My hon. friends from Hamilton visited the country last year. Both of them went north and south and saw what sort of a country was there. The correspondent of the Empire, Professor Dawson, visited the country, and probably some hon. members have read his letters about the country; but my hon. friends from Hamilton, with visitors from Ontario, at an earlier period, saw with wonder the extraordinary crops produced. It is not merely, as I have already stated, a wheat-producing country. We have farmers in every part of the North-West who are also engaged in stock raising. If you go north of Regina or Moose Jaw, you will find farmers who came in there without $100, as they will tell you, owning herds with nearly their whole homestead cultivated. In the Qu'Appelle valley you will find several herds increasing at an almost mathematical ratio every year, and horse ranching south of Regina is most successful. I have here a pamphlet just issued by the Regina board of trade. I will not trouble the House with the details contained in this pamphlet.

Mr. MITCHELL. Read it.

Mr. DAVIN. I will not read it, even though that desire be expressed by the Third Party without a single dissenting voice, but I will give the House some idea of the character of the pamphlet. On page 13, there is the testimony of Robert Green, who came to the country without very much money, and who is now a prosperous man. He says:

"This year (1888) I had eighty acres cropped as follows: Wheat—29 acres, yielding 30 bushels per acre, which will grade No. 1. Oats—48 acres, yielding 60 bushels per acre, first-class quality and weighing 42 lbs. per bushel. Potatoes (Early Rose)—3 acres, yielding 350 bushels per acre. The binding of the grain averaged 3 lbs. of binding twine per acre. I have also a garden consisting of one acre of land on which I raised cabbage, cauliflower, turnips, beets, mangolds, &c., which for size and quality may be equalled but not excelled in any agricultural district in the world."

Then there is the testimony of Charles Martin to the same effect. Then there is the testimony of Walter Simpson, who spoke in a like manner. Adam Traynor, who spoke in a similar strain, said:

"I broke 100 acres here in 1886 with a gang plow drawn by four to seven oxen, the driest season we have had since the place was settled, and backset 70 acres of the same, besides doing what other work I had to do. Good days I broke 3½ acres per day, but my average during the month of June was about 3 acres per day; in backsetting about seven to eight inches deep, with six to seven oxen, I averaged about 2½ acres per day, on half mile furrows. I have my homestead all broke but about three-quarters of an acre where my house and granary stand, and nearly finished backsetting."

He goes on to give like testimony to the fruitfulness of the soil. J. W. Reynolds, eighteen miles north of Regina, advises young men to go to the country. He says:

"Yes; I like the country, climate good, health ditto; going to have school house right on my farm; Regina and Long Lake Railway runs across corner of my land. Have oxen, ten head of cattle, farm implements, good frame house. Just threshed, wheat gone over thirty bushels to the acre, No. 1 hard at that, and no frost. I think this is the country for good practical farmers, would like to see every half section taken up, and have no hesitation in advising energetic young men to come here."

Neil Martin gives similar testimony. Then we have the testimony of a Crofter, Donald McFayden, a hardy Scotchman of 57 years, who makes the following statement:

"I came to the Regina district on July 15th, 1887. I am located on Section 34, Township 20, Range 19. I have a wife and five children; built a good log house 19x15 last year; put in ten acres this spring on breaking; it is a beautiful crop. We have a good school house and a Scotch minister in our midst. When I landed in the country from Scotland I had no money. I like the country well, have good health, and I can in good conscience advise all in my native country who are not doing well to come to this country. All the Crofters in this section are doing well and like the country very much."

James Bole tells us:

"This year, 1888, I had 105 acres under crop (eighty acres wheat, twenty oats and five barley, potatoes and rye). The wheat on new land yielded thirty-five bushels to the acre, and took four lbs. of binding twine per acre. The oats were the finest I ever saw, standing nearly five feet high all over the field, and yielded eighty bushels to the acre,—this was fourteen acres on old land, part of which was cropped three years and part five years in succession. I had six acres of oats harrowed in on stubble without ploughing. This is a style of farming I do not approve of, but the spring was very late and I thought I would try it and grow green fodder if nothing else, but to my surprise it came on as thick and looked as well as any of the crop in the district; the field is not yet threshed, but I feel confident the six acres will yield 500 bushels. Mr. Ira Morgan, president of the Ontario Agricultural and Arts Association, who saw this field while standing, and Mr. McDonald, editor Mark Lane Express, who saw it in the sheaf, can testify to the correctness of this statement. My wheat this year grades No. 1 hard, and I have already sold 600 bushels to Regina dealers from $1.08 to $1.11 per bushel.

"At the present time I have seven horses and a small start in thoroughbred cattle; seven hogs ready for pork by Christmas, a binder, sulky plough, two hand ploughs, two waggons, sleighs, harness, a small house, comfortable stable, good well of water, and everything else necessary, all of which are paid for or at least provided for, and will have at least a thousand dollars additional to further improve the farm, enlarge the house and stables, and provide comforts which pioneer days did not afford.

"Considering that I am now past 60 years of age, and that I started without capital (having lost my farm in Ontario by endorsing and subsequent business failure), I think I can with clear conscience advise every man of sober habits and a determination to succeed to come to this country. Farming is pleasant, and to every man who knows his business and attends to it, is profitable. No forests to cut down, no draining, no taxes, as nature has given us good roads, everything a man could desire is here for the man who desires to use them."

John McIntyre, a brother of Mr. Duncan McIntyre, who has a very large farm, gives similar testimony. Thomas Barton, an Englishman whose farm I have visited myself, corroborates this. Mr. Barton's farm is certainly one of the most interesting places that one could visit, because it is a piece of England transferred to the wilds of the west. He has a cottage buried in flowers, and it is hard, when sitting in his parlor and looking at the wealth of flowers around you, to realise that you are in a cottage which was raised there five or six years ago when all was a wilderness around. Mr. Barton says:

"This year I invested in a threshing machine, and for the past month have been threshing in the district, and I can testify to the great productiveness of the soil. Have just got through at Mr. Henry Fisher's farm, where we threshed over 8,000 bushels of grain. Wheat is yielding all the way from 22 to 42 bushels to the acre, and oats from 50 to 90, and in a few cases, on my own farm, for example, over 100. I find Regina a good market for all kinds of farm produce, grain, butter, eggs, pork, and fat cattle always find ready sale. As to how I like the country, I say first-class. If a man works hard, and is a good manager, he will get rich quicker farming than in any other country in the world that I know anything about. All branches of farming can be carried on, dairying, cattle raising, wheat growing. Large areas of land can be put under cultivation in a short time, and there is plenty of pasture to start as big a herd of cattle as a man likes. Don't think I have any more to say, unless I might add that this appears to me to be the right country for good, hard working men, who are living in the old country from hand to mouth. To all such I say, sell all you have and come out here and start over again. If you are not a practical farmer, you will soon learn, if you are willing to learn and willing to work. Hoping, gentlemen, you will succeed in getting us more neighbors."

So, Sir, I could mention case after case. There is a gentleman here at present, Mr. Carss, who was a Carleton farmer well-known in this district, and he is now one of the most successful men in the whole North-West. He has a large herd, farms extensively, and has probably made some $20,000 in the North-West. He is here at the present moment, speaking to his friends in Carleton and giving them some idea of the Land of Promise where he himself has succeeded so well. A moment ago I spoke about the schools in the North-West, and I shall now refer to them again. This House will be glad to know that in that new region opened up six years ago we have 167 schools at the present time; the teachers are carefully examined, they have to have certificates just as your teachers have here; and as I have visited many of the schools I can bear testimony to their great efficiency. I would like to impress on the Government, and especially on the Minister of the Interior, that I really think a step might be taken further in the matter of education and something done in the way of having a high school at some central place. The children that went to our ordinary schools six years ago have now grown beyond the teachers, and we ought to have a high school for them. I spoke to you a moment ago about that Assembly which has charge of so important a part of our interests. It has very wide powers now and it is gliding into responsible government. That Assembly passed a number of memorials which it desired should be brought before this House. I do not intend to occupy your time at any great length, and I will rapidly describe what those memorials are. The first relates to a subject which need not be impressed upon any hon. member: it is the necessity of opening up as rapidly as possible the Saskatchewan district by railway communication. I believe the Government have done their part in this matter and that we shall soon have a railway opening up the Saskatchewan territory. It is a district of the North-West which is, if anything, more attractive than even our prairies along the line, because it is varied with hill and forest and stream, and the House will easily understand what an attractive place for immigration it will be when a railway gives facilities for the ingress of immigrants and for the egress of the crops and products which they grow. Of course, at the present moment there is no encouragement to settlers to grow crops, because, if they grow them, they have no market within reach. The next memorial relates to what are called the loyal half-breeds. I do not know much about the subject myself, but my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) will be better acquainted with the particulars. It is contended that there were some loyal half-breeds who suffered losses, and, notwithstanding their loyalty, their losses have not been recouped. The Assembly now pray that His Excellency will be authorised to have such steps taken as will cause a reconsideration of the whole subject of the claims of half-breeds for losses during the rebellion, with a view to compensate those who proved themselves to have been loyal, with such amounts as may be shown to be equal to their losses. The next memorial relates to providing seed grain for any person in a part of the North-West Territories whose crops may have failed. In the district with which I am connected there have been no failures whatever, and I am not aware of any failure in crops along the line. But I suppose there must have been failure in some districts, or this resolution would not have been passed by the Assembly. I come now to a resolution which deals with a burning question in the North-West, that is the liquor question. Ever since I went in there that question has created great restlessness, and I think myself it has created unreasonable restlessness when we remember that no man went into the territory without knowing that it was a prohibitory territory. Every man that went there knew that prohibition obtained, and as I have often said to some of my friends who grumbled very loudly on this subject, it was one on which they had no right to grumble about, because they knew it was a prohibitory territory when they went in there. Notwithstanding this, however, the question has created a great deal of feeling. The settlers somehow seem to think it hard that they had to ask a permit from anyone, and I have heard men, because they were refused a permit, talk as though they had good grounds for flat rebellion. I will say this in passing: The hon. gentleman who is Minister of Interior, and who had the administering of that permit system, had one of the most difficult tasks to perform that any man could undertake. No one course would please everybody, and to do one's duty in refusing a permit to men who ought not to get it was sure to make enemies. I always sympathised with the hon. gentleman in the difficult task he had to perform in dealing with that permit system. Now, here is the position at present. The four per cent. beer has been admitted wholesale by a special permit. It is not strong enough for some people, and it is too strong for others; the consequence is that there is a great desire to have this question settled, both on the part of those in favor of high license and on the part of those strictly temperance people who would like to see prohibition established, even unqualified by permit. There is a great deal to be said in favor of settling this question rapidly. In the first place, we can grow in the North-West the finest barley that ever rewarded farmer's toil, and beer and whiskey are both brought in from outside. Over 7,000 gallons of whiskey was brought in last year by permit, yielding a revenue of over $3,000 from permits; and yet the amount of whiskey brought in contraband from Montana Colonel Herchmer will tell you, is simply incalculable. Parties bring it in, cache it two miles from the town, and on moonlight nights go out and bring it in in small quantities. In this way a large amount of money is being sent out of the territory, while beer is being brought in and drunk which we could manufacture there. Again, we had manufactories of what is called Moose Jaw beer, a kind of beer made from hops, without malt in it. The four per cent. beer coming from Winnipeg has shut all these up. Mr. Allen, the son of a Toronto brewer, had $10,000 or $12,000 invested in a brewery at Moose Jaw, and this man has been ruined by this four per cent. beer coming in. Now, what is to be done? There is a great desire on the part of many people for a plebiscite, but a plebiscite is not known to the British constitution, and it might be a doubtful way of settling this matter. Let me tell you that Mr. Bliss, who is at the head of one of the temperance organisations, visited the North-West last summer, and stopped at Medicine Hat, Calgary, and other places; and after returning to Winnipeg he issued a pronouncement in which he said that it was of vital importance that the liquor question should be settled in the North-West Territory, and that the morals of the community required that it should be settled—how? By prohibition? No, but by high license. This Mr. Bliss will, no doubt, be known to my hon. friend from Norfolk. The Legislative Assembly proposed themselves to take the opinion of the people on the subject, and to pay the cost of doing so out of their own funds; but the judges whom they consulted told them that would be ultra vires. Then they passed this resolution:

"That, in the opinion of this Assembly, a vote of the Territories on the question of license vs. prohibition should immediately be taken.

"That in the event of provision for the taking of such vote not being made by the Dominion authorities at the next Session of the Dominion Parliament, it is the opinion of this assembly that powers similar to those enjoyed by provisions under the British North American Act in respect to the liquor question should forthwith be granted."

Of course, if the power were granted before they could legislate, one of two things should be done. They should not be allowed to use the power until after their term expired and they went to the country, or a dissolution should take place, in order that they might go to the country, and have the question decided at the polls. That would, no doubt, be a constitutional course; and, as we have practically manhood suffrage in the Territories, such a vote would effect the same purpose as a plebiscite. The next resolution deals with a matter of the greatest possible moment to the Territories, immigration, and makes suggestions:

"Your Committee would further recommend that a sum of $5,000 be voted from the general revenue fund of the Territories, and that this House, by every means at its disposal, press upon the Dominion Government the advisability of granting us the sum of $10,000; both of said sums to be used for immigration purposes. With such sums at the disposal of this House, your Committee are of the opinion that greater results would be had, both to the Dominion as a whole, and to these Territories in particular, than can be had by the expenditure of a like sum under the general immigration schemes of the Dominion. We would suggest that two permanent officials, selected by this House, be located in Great Britain; also that four agents be appointed by this House, one being from each of the Dominion electoral districts, who shall be located for a period of three months at four of the principal points in Eastern Canada and the United States, as, say, Montreal, Quebec, Toronto and Chicago. We would further suggest that several pamphlets be prepared, giving a full description of the various localities suitable for settlement within these vast Territories, believing, as we do, that it is impossible in a single pamphlet to do justice to the varied natural resources of our Territories. We would report that we have made an estimate of the probable cost of the scheme. We propose, as follows:—

Salaries.

Two permanent officials in Great Britain, at $100 per month, each .....	$3,400
Four men located in Eastern Canada and Chicago, three months, at $100 per month .....	1,200

Travelling Expenses.

Two officials in Great Britain, at $5 per day, each...	3,600
Four agents in Eastern Canada, at $5 per day, each...	1,800
Office expenses .....	2,000
Preparing and printing pamphlets .....	4,000

Total .....

The Government will perceive that they propose to give out of their own revenue $5,000, if $10,000 is given for the same purpose by the Dominion. Now, Sir, I cannot help thinking that greater benefits would result if the Local Government had to deal with this matter, and not the Dominion. The Department of Agriculture will necessarily deal very generally with the question of immigration; but if we had local agents controlled by the Advisory Board in Regina, their action would be focussed in certain channels, and the immigrants' attention would be directed, not to the North-West in a vague way, but to particular parts of the North-West having special attractions, and they would be put on board the train at Halifax and sent on to these destinations. The next resolution relates to half-breeds:

"The Assembly recommends that granting of scrip to half-breeds of Manitoba and the North-West Territories be extended to such half-breed heads of families and their children who, on the 15th day of July, 1870, were resident of non-ceded territory, and who have since moved to either Manitoba or the North-West Territories."

"The Assembly would further recommend that half-breeds residing in the North-West Territories on the 20th April, 1885, who were otherwise entitled to scrip, but who failed to comply with the conditions of the Order in Council of the 20th April, 1885, be granted scrip notwithstanding such Order in Council. As under the Half-breed Commission of the 20th of March, 1885, the Indian title, in so far as the half-breeds are concerned, only extends to those born prior to the 15th July, 1870, and as a number have been born to parents coming under the said commission of 1885, who, in the opinion of this Assembly, have equal rights to those already dealt with, this Assembly would draw the attention of the Dominion Government to the fact and urge that steps be taken to finally end all half-breed claims. This Assembly would also urge the appointment of judges of the North-West Territories as permanent commissioners, to adjust and investigate half-breed claims, as the system of the flying commission is very unsatisfactory to the people and unnecessarily expensive to the Government."

Now, I would state this argument to the House. Under the Manitoba Act of 1870, 1,400,000 acres of land were set apart for half-breed children. These did not extend outside of Manitoba. Therefore, the primitive contract made between the Government and the half-breeds did not extend outside of Manitoba, or to any other half-breeds or bands of half-breeds. We acknowledge the Indian title in the half-breed; we acknowledge that he has the Indian title. When we come to extinguish the Indian title with a band of Indians, what do we do? We make a treaty with them. We do not insist that Treaty six shall do for what we afterwards call Treaty seven. We do not insist that a treaty with the Blackfeet will do for a treaty with the Crees, but we act, as do sensible men in ordinary life; we deal frankly with the persons with whom we have to deal, in regard to the interests they control. Those half-breeds in the North-West were not in Manitoba at the time the Manitoba Act was passed, and the arrangement made to extinguish the Indian title in Manitoba. As we took no steps—and it was our fault that we took none—to extinguish the title in 1870 of the half-breeds in the North-West, and did nothing in 1885, how can we say to the half-breeds in the North-West in 1885: Now, we are going to deal with you as though you had been dealt with already in 1870 in Manitoba. I could never see the reason which would justify that position being taken, and I am perfectly certain the matter has only to be brought to the attention of Parliament and the Government to lead them to do what is statesmanlike and proper—to lead them to deal with the half-breeds to-day who were not in Manitoba and were not dealt with at that time, on the footing of the present, and on the same principle on which was based the settlement with the half-breeds in Manitoba, and give to the children that exist to-day what was given to the children in 1870. As a fact, the name of every half-breed child born in the country, up to the 20th April, 1885, is on record in the Department of the Interior, so that it is not necessary to do more than look into the affidavits. Then comes the third resolution in regard to the question of scrip:

"That the Dominion Government be requested to grant scrip to all those acting during the North-West rebellion as scouts under the Police Act."

I am happy to state that this matter of scrip, which has so often occupied our attention, is on the way to be satisfactorily settled by the Government. The next resolution relates to a body of men which is a credit to Canada. No Canadian visits the North-West without feeling proud of the Mounted Police. We have had English general officers visiting the North-West, and they looked with envy on that body of 1,100 men, each one of whom would be a model for a statue. These men who took part in putting down the rebellion, fought, when they had the opportunity, as gallantly as did the volunteers. They endured hardship, they did everything they had an opportunity of doing, and all they complain of is that they did not get more opportunity; and if they had had more opportunity, I believe we might have brought the rebellion to a close more rapidly and not less gloriously. Many of these policemen endured hardships, and it is no new thing for them to endure hardships. Their whole life, especially in the winter, is one of continuous strain, and there is no soldier's life as trying as the life of the Mounted Police, in the winter, up in the North-West. The Assembly passed this resolution:

"We would beg leave, respectfully, to point out that in great measure the services of this force were insufficiently appreciated in Canada, that the arguments advanced against their receiving such awards are, in our opinion, to a great extent, fallacious, and that we are confident such a bestowal will be hailed throughout the North-West as a satisfaction, and as an act of justice."

What they ask for is the same award of scrip as has been conferred on other corps, but I can tell you that many of the mounted police have told me they cared very little for scrip, but that certainly, as they had borne the brunt and heat of the day as well as others, they would like to have it; but they should also have a medal. Then comes a resolution with regard to the main trails. I do not expect to be able to clear up the mystery of the main trails and to enlighten Parliament on this recondite subject. The trails are from Macleod to Calgary, from Calgary to Edmonton and Athabasca Landing, from Swift Current to Battleford, and from Qu'Appelle to Prince Albert. These trails will require for some time to be kept in good order, and the Assembly reports:

"The condition of some of these trails at certain seasons of the year has proved to be dangerous to life and property, and communication between the different settlements made most difficult and supplies not only rendered much dearer but in fact almost impossible to obtain. Such a condition of affairs is a most important element in retarding settlement and the proper development of the Territories, and as the funds at the disposal of the Territorial Government are insufficient to make the necessary improvements and we consider the Dominion Government especially interested in those trails, we would therefore urge that the Dominion Government appropriate a special sum to be expended on the following trails: From Macleod to Calgary. From Calgary to Edmonton and Athabasca Landing. From Swift Current to Battleford. From Qu'Appelle to Prince Albert."

Now I come to a great question in the North-West. The resolution is very long but very important, which the council has passed, and I will ask the attention of hon. members while I read. It is as follows:—That it is desirable, in the interest of the settlers and of the settlement in the Territories, that the time of payment for pre-emption in arrears should be extended five years from the 1st of January, 1889, without interest, and on condition that homesteaders remain on and continuously cultivate their homesteads during that period:

"That it would be only just to those who entered the lands in the Territories, during the operation of the Act permitting second homesteading, that the right to second homesteading should in all cases be extended to them, provided they have continuously cultivated their first homesteads.

"That in the year 1885 a regulation was in force whereby persons entering for cancelled lands could secure only eighty acres for a homestead, and eighty acres as a pre-emption, and as this regulation was acknowledged to be unwise and unjust by its withdrawal, settlers in such a disadvantageous position should be allowed the same rights and privileges as other bona fide settlers, by being granted a full quarter section as a homestead."

The Assembly does not seem to be aware that in 1887 the late Minister of the Interior did away with the eighty acre homesteads and the eighty acre pre-emptions. What they do pray for, and what many contend should be done, is that those who have got the eighty acres homestead, and the eighty acres pre-emption, and have paid for the eighty acres pre-emption, should have the money returned, but since 1887 there have been no eighty acre pre-emptions or homesteads, the smallest being 160 acres.

"That, whereas in the years 1884, 1885 and 1886 persons entering for lands that had been cancelled, were charged, in addition to an extra fee for inspection, besides value for improvements that had been made, also an additional price for pre-emptions, varying from 25 cents to $1 per acre, which additional price was demanded at the time of making entry;

"And, whereas there was no good reason, in the greater value of such lands, for the additional charge per acre;

"Therefore, the prices of such pre-emptions should be reduced to the prices charged for uncancelled lands in the same districts; and moneys paid thereon should be applied to the payment of such pre-emptions at the said reduced price.

"That, whereas it has been proved that, for the success of the settler, it is necessary for him to engage in both grain and stock raising, and it has been demonstrated that for this purpose the settler requires not less than 320 acres of land;

"And whereas from the fact that many settlers have been unable to pay for their pre-emptions, it has been shown that the prices for pre-emptions have been placed at too high a figure, thus practically depriving many homesteaders of the benefit of pre-emptions, which are essential for success in mixed farming;

"That, in cases where pre-emptions have been cancelled during the past three years, because settlers were unable to pay for the same, these lands should not be held open for homesteading until the whole matter regarding pre-emptions has been further considered.

"Therefore, it is advisable that the prices of pre-emptions be reduced to the following figures, viz.: For lands within twenty miles of an operated railway, two dollars per acre, and for lands at a greater distance from an operated railway, one dollar per acre.

"That, in the interests of the Territories, specially of the prairie districts, it is desirable that every possible encouragement should be given to tree-culture;

"Therefore, it is desirable that arrangements should be made, whereby tree planting, with continued and successful cultivation, should be permitted to stand in the place of grain cultivation, acre for acre, as fulfilment of homestead duties;

"That, in paying for pre-emption, tree planting be allowed to count at the rate of five cents for each tree planted by the settlers and found growing on their homestead or pre-emption for two years next preceding such payment.

"That the present system of having odd-numbered sections withdrawn for homesteading is pernicious; that it is an injury to settlers, inasmuch as, preventing close settlement, it throws additional burdens on them for carrying on schools and for necessary improvements.

"Above all, because the settlement of the land is of more value, and will bring more revenue into the Treasury, than the possible sale of lands thus withheld from settlement will, and because the throwing open of these sections for homesteading would be further inducement for emigrants to come to these Territories, seeing they would then be able to enjoy the advantages of close neighborhood to other settlers.

"That, should it be found necessary in future to withhold public lands from homesteading for railway purposes, it would be well to provide that alternate quarter-sections be granted instead of alternate sections.

"Therefore, it is advisable that arrangements be made, where possible, to throw open all odd-numbered sections for homesteading, seeing that this would be in the true interests of the Territories, and also therefore of the Dominion.

"That, as the large portion of the Dominion lands is in the Territories, it is most desirable, in the interest of the settler, the Territories and the Dominion, that a Dominion Land Board should be established at some central and convenient point in the Territories.

"That His Honor the Lieutenant Governor will be pleased to transmit a memorial embodying this report to the proper authorities at Ottawa, for the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General in Council."

I have troubled the House with reading this long document to them, but it is so important, and deals with matters which are so important for the settlers, that I may be excused. Remember, it is the voice of an Assembly elected by a suffrage practically extending to every man over twenty-one years of age in the North-West Territories, and, as you have really the administration of our affairs in your hands, it is only right and proper that I should bring the views of these people before you. One of the main questions dealt with there is the second homesteading, and that question has two aspects. The first aspect is this: Men who come in under the Dominion Lands Act of 1883 came in with the right under that Act, when they got their patent, to get a second homestead. In 1886, on the 2nd of June, assent was given to an Act which took away this right that these people came in under. I consider that it was a most monstrous thing to do. It must have been done thoughtlessly, but it was a monstrous thing to do. In 1887, when I came down here, I put a little Bill on the paper, making some amendments to the Dominion Lands Act, and, amongst others, this relating to the second homestead. We saw my late lamented friend, the Hon. Thomas White, several times on that subject, my colleagues, the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Madowall), the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis), and the late member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Perley), who has gone to another place.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. DAVIN. Who says "Carried?" I hope there is not a gentleman in this House, either on the Reform or the Conservative side, who is so little aware of what his duties in this House are, and of what his duties as a member of Parliament are, as to hesitate to give whatever time is necessary to that great territory which you administer here. We saw the Hon. Thomas White several times, and we pressed, or rather I think I pressed, this question of the second homesteading on him. I rather think both my hon. friends differed with me on that, as well as the hon. gentleman who was then the member for Eastern Assiniboia. I may say here, in passing, if the House will excuse a personal word, that, when I have had to speak on this subject of the second homesteading before my constituent, I have stated on the platform what I say now, that my colleagues differed with me on this question of a second homestead, but I never introduced the subject without paying a tribute to the efficiency and the zeal of my colleagues, which I could not do here in their presence, because one can speak with more energy and enthusiasm behind the back of another than before his face. But, thereupon, some of those gentlemen who are always bent upon doing kind things and representing one exactly as one is, some newspaper would say that I had attacked my colleagues. This House is aware that it is not my custom to attack any man behind his back, especially men who are my personal friends. Well these gentlemen differed with me. However, I talked several times with the Hon. Thomas White about it, and I made an argument on going into committee on this Bill, just before we went to dinner, which I think irrefragable, and I call the attention of the Government to it now because it is an argument that cannot be got over. Under our legislation of 1886, men who never were entitled to a second homestead morally, that is to say, men who came into the country before such a thing as a second homestead was heard of, could get a second homestead, but not one man except those who came in during the eight days between the 25th May and 2nd June, who came in with that motive, could get a second homestead. I say that was a reductio ad absurdum of the position taken by the Government; and my hon friend, as you will see by the Hansard, rose up, after I sat down, and he said: "I have listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. gentleman, but he has not convinced me." However, I went over to him, I knew he was a journalist, and I knew very well that he would agree that such a thing as that would affect the public mind. I said to him: "Have you considered that argument?" He said: "I have, and I see the full force of it." Then I said: "You are going to act on it?" He said: "I do not think I can." Now I am not going to repeat the conversation that further took place between us; but he said: "I cannot act on it." Well, I got a little mad, that is to say, I got a little aggravated; it is very seldom that I get mad, but when I do, it is merely a righteous indignation. I came over to my place, and after thinking for a time, I went over to him again and I said: "Well, look here, you have been very good to us, you have done nearly everything that could have been done by your department. You have got rid of that eighty acres, and that forty mile limit for uncancelled homesteads. You have done all that you could for us. Now put that on one year and I will be satisfied for the present, and we will let the Bill slide through the committee, making a few amendments." I know he would. "Well," he said, "I will risk it," and it was put on, as you will have seen. Of course, I may point out to you that the hon. gentleman admitted the principle for that year. He put in it on from 1886 to 1887, as you will find it in the Act passed in that year. I said, "Put it on one year, and make that 1887, instead of 1886, and we will be satisfied for the present." The reason that I did that was this: half a loaf was better than no bread. That would enable all that came in in 1884, all that were entitled to second homesteads that year, 1887, to get them. No man that came in in 1885 could get a second homestead that year. I said to him, moreover, that nearly all our people came in in 1884. I did not know, until I went back to the Territories, that a large number had come in in 1885 and 1886. Now, Sir, that is one part of the second homesteading. There is another side to it. We have what are called cancelled homesteads, that is to say, a man comes and enters for a first homestead. He does not fulfil the conditions. There are certain conditions as to residence, six months' residence each, conditions as to the building of a house, and conditions as to cultivation. If he does not fulfil these, if it be shown clearly that he has neglected these, the commissioner in Winnipeg will most properly give directions to have the homestead cancelled. The rule passed by the land board about these cancelled homesteads was this, that no man entitled to a second homestead could second homestead a cancelled homestead unless within forty miles of his original homestead. Well, as a large number of speculators had gone in in 1882 and 1883, as a large amount of land was cancelled, this was a very bad arrangement, because it prevented the man who was in the country from going and taking up a desirable spot that had been taken up by these land grubbers, and it allowed the man just coming into the country to take it up. Well, Mr. White agreed that that should be reduced to six miles; and after the land board had met it was arranged that a man could second-homestead a cancelled homestead within six miles. Now, Sir, what we say is this: What is the virtue of this six miles? The original idea, no doubt, in the minds of those who declared that you could not homestead a cancelled homestead, except it were forty miles distant from the original homestead—I have no doubt that the original idea was this: if we allow them to second-homestead a cancelled homestead near their original homestead, they will get some friend to homestead a desirable location, then leave it, and then they will go by-and-by and second-homestead it. I believe that the danger of that sort of thing was never as great as was expected. Nearly all the ideas, or a priori speculations, of politicians as to what would happen in regard to the North-West, have turned out to be groundless. One of the speculations about this second homesteading was this: that Ontario farmers would go in and homestead, would build a house, would cultivate the place, and then Englishmen, or Irishmen, or Scotchmen, would come in and buy their holdings, and they would go off and second homestead. Well, of course, that was a poor idea, because it would give you a perambulating settlement. I may say here that the very moment that fact was brought to my attention in 1883—it was in the autumn of 1883 when I first saw this second-homestead policy—I raised my voice against it, and protested against it. I saw that it was a dangerous policy, and I condemned it as a bad policy. But I say that the fact of its being a bad policy does not always relieve you from your obligation that you entered into, which obligation you must carry out, even though it is under a bad policy. Now, Sir, it is not a good thing to drink champagne, for instance. If you drink enough of it, and drink it often enough, it will tear your liver to pieces. But if a man who is fond of champagne were to order some from Mr. Bate, and then, when Mr. Bate sent the bill, he were to sit down and write to him and say: "Dear Sir, drinking champagne is a mistake; it is bad for the liver; it is not conducive to general health; I have given up drinking champagne and as a matter of principle I won't pay your bill." Why, what would Mr. Bate say to him? He would say, "You are under obligation to pay, and I will hold you to it." Well, I will not trouble the House with the letters, but I have letters here from a number of these men who say they came in here having before their eyes pamphlets in which this very North-West Act of 1883 was quoted; they came in here with that promise of a second homestead playing on their wills, and what did they find? Why, they had scarcely fulfilled the conditions for getting a second homestead—three years it takes; on the 25th of May the clause was put in and it requires three years to perfect the conditions to get a second homestead; and on the 2nd June, 1886, the second homestead was done away with. They, of course, point out what a very unjust thing it is. You see how irritating it is to those who came in, in 1884, 1885 and 1886. The men who came in from the 25th May, 1883, or before, up to the 2nd June, 1884, could go, owing to the change that my hon. friend the late Minister of Interior made, and get a second homestead. The principle has been acknowledged. But men who came in in 1885 and 1886, with this same Act on the statute-book, cannot get a second homestead, because, as I tell you, the amendment that I was able to effect in 1887 only went the one year. Last year I did not bring it up, for a lamentable reason—because we had lost the man who had been such an ornament to this House. It may be said—I know that arguments of this kind are sometimes used—that this was permissive. I will say this for the late Minister, that he never attempted to press that objection; but I will call the attention of the Minister of Interior to the argument on that head. The 37th clause of the Dominion Lands Act, 1883, reads as follows:—

"Any person who has obtained a homestead patent after two years' residence, or a certificate countersigned by the Commissioner of Dominion Lands, as in the next preceding clause mentioned, with the additional statement that there has been three years' residence, may obtain another homestead and pre-emption entry."

Of course it would be quite unworthy of a Government to rest anything on that word "may"; but if anybody attempted to do so, what have we? We have that declared by the statute to be a right, so that any difficulty on that head is entirely removed. If we look at section 2, chapter 54 of the Revised Statutes, we find that pre-emption entry means:

"The entering on the books of a local agent for a preferential claim to acquire by purchase, in connection with the homestead, and on becoming entitled to the patent for the homestead, a quarter section, or part of a quarter section of land adjoining such homestead; and existing pre-emption right means the right of obtaining, and right to such quarter section."

If we turn to section 3, what do we find? It is declared with regard to pre-emptions:

"And further, such person shall forfeit his homestead and pre-emption right."

So that in one part of the Act, in regard to a matter where it is said he may obtain pre-emption, we have it declared that that is a right. But mark the language of section 43:

"No person who has obtained a homestead patent or a certificate countersigned by the Commissioner of Dominion Lands or a member of the Dominion Lands Board, as in the next preceding clause mentioned, shall be entitled to obtain another homestead entry; but nothing contained in this clause shall take away the right of any person who, before the 2nd day of June, 1886, had received such certificate or recommendation for a patent."

So that the Act of 1886, in so many words, declares that it was taking away, not a possibility of getting a second homestead at the discretion of the Minister, but taking away a right which it acknowledges in express terms. It is hardly necessary to take up the time of the House with the second branch of the second homestead question, because the Minister can deal with that administratively. But I will say this, as I have pointed out before, that I can see no advantage and no magic in the six-mile limit, and I pointed out, when I had the honor of an interview with the Minister of Interior when I first came down, that one of the best settlers north of Pense, Joseph Young, who has cultivated every acre of his homestead and pre-emption cultivatable, has next to him a cancelled homestead, but he cannot enter on it. It would be a very desirable thing for him if he could do so, for he has two stalwart sons and a family, and he is one of our best farmers. He came into the country with nothing and he is a well-to-do man to-day, and in no year, not even in 1886, did he fail to have a crop; he has had a crop every year, but he is a thoroughpaced farmer and is a first-rate man. He cannot, however, homestead that cancelled homestead adjoining his own, and what is the use of his going away? He is forty-five years old and does not want to go away six miles. But that, I repeat, is a matter which can be dealt with administratively, and so I will not trouble the House further with it beyond calling attention to a petition I have here which was presented to the Minister. It was sent to him by a large number of agricultural societies, urging this question of second homesteading, and also urging that time be given for payment of pre-emptions. I will say this, as I said to the farmers, that I think there is no need of their being very anxious about their being allowed time. So far as my experience of the department goes, no bona fide farmer has ever been pressed for his pre-emption payment if he could show that he was going along in a bona fide manner. I have always found that Mr. Smith, and the department here, the moment they were satisfied that the man was a bona fide settler, were willing to agree to any reasonable representations made, provided the matter was all right. So I never felt nervous in regard to that matter. I will only add this further, that the farmers around Moose Jaw and elsewhere are very anxious they should be given five years in which to pay for their pre-emptions. I will make a further comment on this resolution, because there is one clause in it with which I do not agree. It reads:

"Should it be found necessary in the future to withhold public lands from homesteading for railway purposes, it should be provided that alternate quarter sections be granted instead of alternate sections."

In the same resolution it is stated:

"It has been proved that for the success of the settler it is necessary for him to engage in both stock raising and grain, and it has been demonstrated that for this purpose a settler requires not less than 320 acres."

So one part of the resolution is, inadvertently, contrary to the other. In one part it says that 320 acres are necessary, and in another part it states that alternate quarter sections should be given to the railway. I have here a long communication that I received this morning from the agricultural society of Moose Jaw, referring to this part of the resolution and strongly condemning it, strongly emphasising this view, that they require to summer fallow, to go into mixed farming, and that farmers cannot raise crops profitably in the North-West unless they summer fallow. Part of the land has to be fallowed this year while crops are raised on another part, and crops should be grown this year on land which was summer fallowed last year. If you do not adopt that you will not farm successfully, and that is the way Mr. Young, to whom I referred a moment ago, farms. I want to say one word about the last part of that resolution, which asks for the establishment of a Dominion Lands Office in the Territories. This, I think, is a very important matter, and I may point out that the right hon. gentleman, in his report of 1882, declares it necessary to establish in the North-West a land board. However, when it was decided to establish this land board, instead of placing it in the North-West it was established at Winnipeg, in Manitoba. I think it would be a very wise thing to do what the Legislative Assembly suggests, and to move that land board to the North-West. At the present moment you are getting an enormous revenue from the North-West. This year I see gladly, by the report of the Minister of Interior, the revenue of the Department of the Interior is $540,005. No doubt some of that comes from Manitoba, but the main portion of it undoubtedly comes from the North-West Territory, and as the principal business of the land board will be done in the North-West Territory, I believe that if it were established at Regina, instead of at Winnipeg, it would be a great improvement. The last resolution of these gentlemen deals with the question of responsible government. It says:

"That there is no permanent responsible body whose business it is to prepare legislation for the consideration of this Assembly, and in consequence its legislative functions cannot be satisfactorily performed. For instance, the Assembly has had to present an humble address to His Honor the Lieutenant Governor, praying that he may be pleased to appoint a Committee to draft during the recess certain measures deemed advisable by the Assembly; measures which it should be the duty of Legislative Government to submit. That on these and other accounts the Assembly believes the present system to be unsatisfactory. That, therefore, the Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council that full responsible government should be given to the Territories with the other powers, in addition to those already possessed by the Assembly."

And a further resolution:

"That the amount annually voted by the Dominion Parliament for the expenses of government, &c., in the North-West Territories, should be given in the form of a definite grant instead of a rate which lapses at the end of the fiscal year for which it is voted;

"That the said grant should be placed at the disposal and subject to the vote of the North-West Legislative Assembly;

"That although the North-West Territories have not been admitted into Confederation as a Province, yet they consider that the fact of their paying taxes to the Federal Treasury, under the same laws, rules and regulations and provisions as the people of other parts of Canada, and having been called upon to exercise the functions of local self-government by the Parliament of Canada, they are entitled to receive a return on the amount paid by them into the Federal Treasury of a sum similar to that received by the various Provinces comprising the Canadian Confederation;

"That they consider that a greater proportion of taxation per head is paid by the people of the North-West Territories than by the people of any other part of Canada;

"That the cost of administering the Government of the North-West Territories is much larger in proportion to the population than in any other part of Canada by reason of the greater area and more widely scattered settlements;

"That the maintenance and improvement of main trails in the Territories should be the subject of special consideration at the hands of the Federal Parliament;

"That inasmuch as the lands, timber and minerals of the North-West Territories are held for sale by the Federal Government, which deprives the North-West Government of any revenue from these sources, and the Provinces of Confederation, with the exception of Manitoba, having revenues from said sources;

"Therefore your committee are strongly of opinion that a largely increased grant should be given to the North-West Territories for expenses of North-West Government, construction of roads and bridges, the improvement of main trails, and other public improvements."

The House will be glad to know, sir, that the Advisory Board has worked wonderfully well. Although I do not think any more than do those gentlemen, or the members of the Assembly, that that board is as effective a machine of government as complete responsible government would be, yet, Sir, I had an opportunity of observing the chamber during its session and I will say this, that the Advisory Board and the admirable manner in which Governor Royal fell in with the idea of making it a sliding scale to responsible government worked admirably and gave a new character altogether to the assembly as compared with the council. In the North-West Council, as my friend the Minister of Interior will remember, they discussed matters more like men in committee, but with the Advisory Board they at once fell in with the parliamentary practice, and the intelligence displayed by the gentlemen who are now members of that assembly and the capacity which they showed in their conduct of the proceedings, are fraught with the best promise for the future of that country. I wish to call the attention of the House for one moment to what might be called our claims on the Federal Government. Many gentlemen in this House and elsewhere think that we are always asking for something, and that we are, in fact, asking for too much. They think we are unreasonable in the North-West, while the fact is that we are entitled to a great deal more than we get.

Mr. SCRIVER. You are astonished at your own moderation.

Mr. DAVIN. My friend on the right says "we are astonished at our own moderation," and I have no objection to accept his language. The old council of 1887 petitioned for responsible government and the memorial set forth: That by the census of 1885 the population of the North-West Territories was 28,000, larger by 11,000 than that of Manitoba when she was admitted into Confederation. The population has much increased since that census, as evidenced from the new electoral districts erected. Manitoba was erected into a Province in 1870, and as we see in 33 Vic., cap. 3, sec. 25, she received $30,000 in support of government, 80 cents per head of the population, which was estimated at 17,000, and the salaries of the Lieutenant Governor, judges, charges in respect to customs, postal, fisheries, militia, geological, penitentiary department, and so on, were all paid by the Federal Treasury. In 1882, according to 45 Vic., cap. 5, when the population of Manitoba, according to the census of 1881, was 69,954, that Province was allowed 80 cents per head on 150,000 souls, indemnity for want of public lands of $45,000; and in 1870, because the Province was not in debt, 5 per cent. on $472,000, making altogether $238,000. By 48-49 Vic., cap. 50, she got swamp lands and 150,000 acres for a university and the indemnity for want of public lands increased to $100,000. Now I ask the attention of the House to this argument. It is an argument of proportion, such an argument as we all have made when learning the rule of three at school. If Manitoba, in 1882, with a census population of 69,954, was allowed 80 cents a head on a population of 150,000, then the North-West, four years after, it was declared by the census of 1885, to have a population of 28,000, must be entitled to 80 cents a head on about 80,000 people. But take the ratio adopted after one year, and we are entitled to 80 cents a head on 70,000, or $56,000; for government, $50,000; and for want of our public lands, $45,000. Then, if Manitoba with a population of 17,000, not having any debt, was entitled to 5 per cent. on $472,000, the North-West Territories, with a census population of 28,000, would be entitled to 5 per cent. on $774,000, or $38,700; and as we have more land than Manitoba, our gross revenue should amount to $239,700. We should also have 150,000 acres of land for a university, and money for our own lunatic asylum, as well as Manitoba. Now, Sir, the tone taken towards that western country is a tone which I believe will not be often taken in this House after hon. gentlemen come to see what its claims are; because at the present minute we must regard that western country as composed of Manitoba, the North-West Territories and British Columbia, all west of the great lakes; and what do you find? If you compare the amount that western country pays in customs duties with the amount paid by an old Province like Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, you will find that it pays more; and the paper which was put into my hands a few days ago by the Inland Revenue Department shows that we drink a great deal more beer per head west of the great lakes, and pay a great deal more of inland revenue than the two Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick put together.

An hon. MEMBER. It is a bad sign.

Mr. DAVIN. It may be a bad sign, but it shows that the people there are a very prosperous people, and can afford to spend a good deal of money on the four articles of beer, wine, tobacco and whiskey. I find also that the banking business done, taking into account discounts, the amount of capital invested, and all the details of banking, shows well for the western country. Now, my right hon. friend, in reply to a question, told me a few days ago that he did not intend to bring in a Bill this year giving full responsible government to the Territories; but, in passing, I wish to say that when that Bill is brought in, or probably it might be done now, a large portion of territory should be given to the Local Government to be used by it for subsidizing branch lines of railway. I am not fond, as this House knows, of drawing comparisons with what is done in the United States; but I may state that when they organise a territory in the United States, they pay out of the Federal treasury all the expenses that we do, they give the territories the school lands and the swamp lands, as we have done in the case of Manitoba; but they do more than that. When Minnesota, Wyoming, Dakota and Montana were organised, each of these Territories got a large extent of territory for subsidizing branch lines. Minnesota, with 83,000 square miles (Assiniboia has 93,000 square miles), received land for subsidizing 1,800 miles of railway, and with the swamps, started in possession of one-third of the Territory. What does that policy enable these Territories to do? It gives them, while young, that nutriment and vital force, without which anything young cannot thrive. As the right hon. the Prime Minister is now acting Minister of Railways, I should like to call his attention to this fact. At this hour the Government of Minnesota receives an income of $600,000 a year, 3 per cent. on the gross earnings of the lines of railway that it chartered and subsidised since 1849, when it was organised. But it may be said: "Ah, but those Territories were very populous. Not at all. In 1849, when Minnesota was organised, it had only a population of 6,000, and the aggregate population of all the four Territories at the respective dates of their organisation did not equal by five or six thousand the population of the North-West to day. That is a point which I submit as well worthy of the consideration of the Government, because I think we may err on the side of keeping the strings too much in our hands here at Ottawa, and not giving sufficient scope for the young giant, for which I plead here to-day, to develop his limbs. Now, it will be said to us, no doubt, you have got the Mounted Police. So we have, and we are very glad to have them; but elsewhere you have batteries, militia, and military schools, and we pay for those just as well as you pay for the Mounted Police; and before you know where you are, I believe in the next five years, you will find we shall have a population in those Territories which will be subscribing to your military schools, and batteries, and militia just as much as you are subscribing to the North West Mounted Police. And remember that in any case the cost of defence would fall on the Federal Government; so that you cannot fairly make anything of our having the Mounted Police. The feeling amongst the people, and especially amongst the members of this assembly, who now represent the people, is in favor of full responsible government. Now, I am not going to use the rhetorical language we sometimes hear in this House, and which I always regret to hear, used by men who should speak with the balance and restraint of statesmen.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend from Simcoe says "hear, hear," but if he was rightly reported in a speech that he made not far from here, he himself fell into this same rhetorical exaggeration. We sometimes hear it said in this House, that we are not free unless we have the right to make our own treaties. My hon. friend was reported as having said that we were not free unless we were represented in the Imperial Parliament, and took up our full share of Imperial responsibility. Of course when the noun "freedom" or the adjective "free" is used in this manner, it is used in a purely rhetorical sense and not in the broad signification, in which constitutional writers use it. When people speak properly of being free, what they mean is that their liberty cannot be interfered with, without their being tried before their peers, that they are not taxed without representation. The various ingredients of civil liberty that we are familiar with, we have in the North-West, but I do not think we have all the advantages that you have here. We suffer there from some disabilities that you do not suffer from, but I regard our position as a free and liberal condition. Every man can there speak the thing he will. I believe the North-West Territories will develop at a rapid rate. I see by the report of the Minister of Interior that a far larger number of homesteads were taken up last year than the year before. In 1886, 214,960 acres in homesteads were taken up; in 1887, 319,500; in 1888, 420,333. From that you see the progressive rate of increase at which homesteads have been taken up. Now, with the crop we had last year and the report of that crop going all over the world—for we have had visits from men from every part of the world—I believe you will find that next year, instead of 420,000 acres being taken up, that number will be greatly increased. I believe that certainly 700,000 or 800,000 acres in homesteads will be taken up, and the increase will go on at the same rate. There are many documents to which I might refer to show the progress made by the North-West. I have not said one word about what the committee of Senator Schu'tz, now Lieutenant Governor, showed we possessed in the Mackenzie River Basin; and in the present report of the Interior Department, I see that Mr. Burgess refers in glowing terms to the Yukon River district. Take the report of two years back in which there is an account given of the Yukon River, and you will find that men make as much as $500 a day mining gold in that district. They have made $300 and $350, and some $500 in one day. I do not say that happened as a general thing, but still it shows the value of that region. In the North-West Territories we have a large area of prairie land, most fertile and most abundant in its yield; we have gold, iron, coal, all the fruits of the earth, the forest, and the finest cattle raising country in the world. I say that there is the place that the means will be found to make this country a great and contented nation. I always regret when, in regard to this country, anything like sectional feeling, arising from race or religion or from any other source, is developed; and it is a great consolation to me to know that up in the North-West, we are freer than in any other part of Canada from those prejudices of race and religion which are really more inimical to our progress than anything else. I desire to see this great Canada of ours peopled with French, English, Scotch, Irish, Germans—and in the North-West we have Germans whose settlements are perfect wonders as evidences of what can be done by thrift and energy—I desire to see all these elements moulded into one nation. What I hope to see and what we ought to aim at—French, English, Irish and Scotch—and it will come some day, is to have a United Canada with a Canadian race inhabiting it, and I should like very much to say a few words especially to my French Canadian friends about the North West.

Some hon. MEMBERS: En français.

Mr. DAVIN. If the House will bear with me, since some of my French Canadian friends desire it, I will say a few words to them in their language, though I do so with a great deal of diffidence.

Je prétends, M. l'Orateur, qu'il est du devoir des Ecossais, des Irlandais, des Français et des Anglais de se fusionner pour former ici une race canadienne. Nous formerons ainsi une race plus grande que celle des Allemands, plus grande que celle des Celtes, plus grande que celle des Anglo-Saxons; une race qui réunira au jugement, à l'abnégation, à la discipline, à la sincérité du Saxon, la vivacité d'esprit, le goût des arts, le génie, l'ardeur, la puissance créatrice du Celte. J'espère que nous verrons cette race se développer en grandeur héroïque et recevoir du Nord-Ouest une inspiration de pouvoirs magnifiques.

Je me bornerai à dire en ce moment aux Canadiens-Français d'imiter l'exemple de leurs pères dont les faits et gestes dans le passé au Nord-Ouest sont dignes d'une admiration spéciale. Connaissions-nous nous-mêmes, rendons-nous compte de notre position, et prenons les moyens de fonder ici une nation canadienne. Et, M. l'Orateur, lorsque viendra le jour où nous aurons dans le Nord-Ouest une population plus considérable que dans les provinces d'Ontario et de Québec, lorsque le Nord-Ouest comptera au delà de 10,000,000 d'habitants, nous pourrons braver les contempteurs, les insulteurs et les intrigants, et peut-être adresser aux Wiman et autres les mots magnifiques qui s'échappent de l'âme du Cid quand il apprend que Chimène peut devenir le prix de sa valeur:—

“ Est-il quelqu'ennemi qu'à présent je ne dompte ?
Paraissez Navarrais, Maures et Castellans,
Et tout ce que l'Espagne a nourri de vaillants.
Unissez-vous ensemble, et faites une armée,
Pour combattre ma main de la sorte animée.
Joignez tous vos efforts contre un espoir si doux ;
Pour en venir à bout, c'est trop peu que de vous.”

What I have been saying in French, I can repeat in English in a word or two. I was emphasising the fact, that we should make ourselves here a patriotic people, and that instead of trying to emphasise the angles of difference that divide us, we should try to pare away the angles, so that by-and-by we might become one Canadian people, because we have the finest country in the world, and, when we have a larger population, with sentiments such as I have indicated pervading them, there is no power in the world that could affect us, but we could stand four square against all the blasts that blow. That is the best free translation that I can give of the magnificent words that Corneille puts in the mouth of the Cid.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will endeavor to say a few words on this subject before six o'clock. I am very much pleased that the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has brought up the question of the proper policy to be pursued by the Government in regard to the settlement of our vast domain in the North-West.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD There will probably be an interesting discussion on this subject, and, as it cannot go on after six o'clock, I would suggest that it had better stand over.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 19) to incorporate the Assiniboia, Edmonton and Ujiga Railway Company.—(Mr. Dawson.)

Bill (No. 21) respecting the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Railway Company, and to change the name of the company to “The New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway Company.”—(Mr. Wood, Westmoreland.)

Bill (No. 31) to incorporate the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

Bill (No. 35) respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. Ferguson, Welland.)

Bill (No. 48) to consolidate the borrowing powers of the Ontario Loan and Debenture Company, and to authorize them to issue debenture stock.—(Mr. Montariffe.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 57) to incorporate the Cobourg, Northumberland and Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Guillet.)

Bill (No. 58) respecting the Berlin and Canadian Pacific Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Bowman.)

Bill (No. 59) respecting the South Ontario Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

Bill (No. 60) respecting Steam Vessels to be used in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 61) to incorporate “The Manitoba and South-Eastern Railway Company.”—(Mr. LaRivière.)

Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company.—(Mr. Watson.)

Bill (No. 63) to enable the city of Winnipeg to utilise the Assiniboine River water power.—(Mr. Watson.)

Bill (No. 64) respecting the St. Lawrence and Atlantic Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Hall.)

Bill (No. 65) respecting the Atlantic and North-West Railway Company.—(Mr. Hall.)

Bill (No. 67) to incorporate the “Assiniboine Water Power Company.”—(Mr. Ross.)

Bill (No. 68) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Mr. MITCHELL. I feel it to be my duty as an independent member, to protest against this informal manner of passing Bills through this House. Bills have been passed through a stage which have not been printed in English and French, as the Rules of the House require; and I think we had better, in future, confine ourselves to the Rules, and not put Bills through in this rapid way.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, if any objection is taken, I must enforce the Rules, but I understood no objection was raised.

Mr. MITCHELL. I mention it for the purpose of stirring up the printers, so that we may have the Bills properly placed before the House, and be able to proceed with their consideration according to the Rules.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 3) to make further provision as to the prevention of cruelties, and to amend chapter 172 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intitled “An Act respecting Cruelty to Animals.”—(Mr. Brown.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. TISDALE. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman who is promoting this Bill to explain what it is he wants. We had a discussion the other evening on the second reading of the Bill, and I did not then ascertain. I find by reading the petition of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals at Hamilton, that certain statements are made. I will read the petition, so that the hon. gentleman may have an opportunity to explain to the committee what they do want. The petition on which this Bill was founded—I presume it is this, because it refers to a petition presented last year—sets forth :

"1. That at the instance of the above society (the Hamilton Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals), a petition largely signed was presented at the last Session of Parliament in favor of the passage of the Bill introduced by Adam Brown, Esq., senior member for Hamilton, to make further provision for the prevention of cruelty to animals, and especially against the using of any live animal or bird as a target to be shot at.

"2. That your petitioners hereby respectfully request that the Bill introduced by Adam Brown, Esq., at the present Session, for the purpose of preventing cruelty to animals, and especially against using any live animal or bird as a target to be shot at, may be passed by your honorable body."

"3. That your petitioners are aware that great cruelty is practised towards live birds at shooting tournaments, and on other occasions, for the mere amusement of the parties participating therein, and your petitioners think that, in the interests of humanity, the law should be amended so as to prevent such cruelty being practised."

I should like, as a starting point, to request the hon. gentleman to inform the committee whether he follows that petition now or not, because hon. members will notice that the petition only speaks of one thing, that is, the shooting at animals or birds as targets, while the provisions of the Bill are much wider than that. It may enable the hon. gentleman to reply better to this point, if I call the attention of the committee to the present law. Either the hon. gentleman wants two things, or he wants one thing; he either wants what the petition asks for, or more than it asks for. Certainly the petition only asks, so far as it mentions any specific thing, the stoppage of shooting at birds or other animals as targets. If the hon. gentleman wants to go further, there are two matters in the Bill which, in my opinion, should be discussed, and placed before this House. Do I understand the hon. gentleman that he wants to cover both points?

Mr. BROWN. Go on.

Mr. TISDALE. I shall, then, be very happy to proceed. I suppose that I will have to confine myself at present to the first clause of the Bill. In referring to that particular part of the Bill not aimed at trap-shooting, I may say that I believe this House desires to legislate upon things that require to be legislated upon, and I do not think it is desirous of legislating upon theories or on unnecessary matters. Some hon. gentlemen say, "let the hon. gentleman have his Bill if it does no harm," but I hold that the House should not lose its time in legislating except where legislation is necessary. The first clause of the Bill of the member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) does not enlarge on the provisions of the present Act, which will be found at page 1987 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, but it goes on to specify the general provisions of the present law, and says :

"Section one of chapter 172 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intitled: 'An Act respecting Cruelty to Animals,' is hereby amended by adding thereto the following words: 'and the expression 'animal' includes any horse, mare, gelding, bull, ox, cow, heifer, steer, calf, mule, ass, sheep, lamb, goat, pig, hog, sow, dog or cat, and every other domestic animal, fowl or bird, or wild animal, fowl or bird, tamed or domesticated."

The hon. gentleman proposes to add to the clause in the present law the names of a number of animals that are evidently covered by the generic terms in the Act now in force, and that clause in his Bill is entirely unnecessary. The three subsections of his Bill, as I had occasion to remark in opposing the second reading, are open to precisely the same objection. I submit, with all seriousness, that this Bill is unnecessary. We all know, although the hon. gentleman will not admit, that it is a trivial Bill, and that it is aimed simply at the trap-shooting at pigeons, and if the hon. gentleman would bring his Bill forward in this particular, we would, to use a familiar expression, know what he was after. I take exception to those three clauses of his Bill in the interests, not of the cities or the towns, but of the larger body of constituents of this country, the farmers of the Province I come from as well as the farmers of the other Provinces. Until I read the present law I had no idea that we had such a severe law about the handling of animals, and I hold that if you go among the farmers of Ontario and Quebec and the other Provinces, and tell them that they are so cruel to their stock and the animals they use, that they need still more stringent provisions than those in the present Act, they would be justly insulted. I must read the three clauses for you :

"Section two of the said Act is hereby repealed and the following section substituted in lieu thereof:—

"Everyone who—
"(a.) Wantonly, cruelly or unnecessarily beats, binds, ill-treats, abuses, overdrives or tortures any cattle, poultry, dog, domestic animal or bird; or—

"(b.) While driving any cattle or other animal is, by negligence or ill-usage in the driving thereof, the means whereby any mischief, damage or injury is done by any such cattle or other animal; or—

"(c.) In any manner encourages, aids or assists at the fighting or baiting of any bull, bear, badger, dog, cock, or other kind of animal, whether of domestic or wild nature."

I tell you that the people who own and use animals understand a great deal better how to treat them than those gentlemen who want theoretical legislation. Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that in not a single petition in favor of the Bill have they dared to say that any such sad condition of things exists as would require further legislation against cruelty to animals. Let me read you the heading of what I call the theatrical petition; it says :

"Prevention of Cruelty. To the Hon. the House of Commons and Parliament assembled. We the undersigned citizens of Toronto, humbly pray that the Bill, introduced by Mr. Adam Brown, for the better prevention of cruelty to animals, be adopted by your hon. body."

I am sure you were all amused, as I was to-day, to see the thirty of forty petitions presented by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) or by those that he handed them to. We have all courtesy enough to hand in a petition when we are asked to. He had those petitions printed, and sometimes only twenty or thirty persons signed them. If the petitions amount to anything it will be noticed that those opposed to the Bill stated the reasons why they opposed the Bill, but the petitions of the hon. gentleman from Hamilton (Mr. Brown) which were theatrically flourished all over the House did not give any reasons why the Bill should pass. I do not believe in theatrical legislation. I believe in our getting down to common sense, and while I oppose this Bill in principle I object to being classed as one who is cruel to animals. Has the member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) shown a tittle of evidence that the people of this country are cruel to animals. No, he has not. He has brought in a petition from a very excellent society which I am in favor of, but I think that they should keep within their own sphere. The hon. gentleman has failed entirely in proving that part of his case which asks for severe additional measures to be passed by this House for the prevention of cruelty to animals. Let me point out that, under the laws of the Province of Ontario, you cannot shoot a single bird except a pigeon, or an injurious, destructive or mischievous bird, out of a trap, because there is a severe law to punish you for shooting anything but destructive birds or game birds. All other birds are protected inasmuch as you cannot shoot them at all, not even out of a trap. I ask for evidence why this House should be asked to put upon the Statute-books a record that we need stronger laws to compel the people of this country to treat the animals they handle well and there is no evidence forthcoming. We have had enough of theatricals in this matter and enough talk to show that it is the intention to pass this Bill not upon common sense, or by arguments in its favor, but because of personal and individual influence, a proceeding which I strongly object to.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TISDALE. Well, if I am out of order, I am willing to submit; but I do say this is the fact, for I mean it, and I am one of those men who, when I have to discharge a duty, mention things plainly. This excellent society, which is going out of its way to ask for theoretical legislation without having a case, has induced the hon. gentleman to adopt its views for the time being and to represent them in this House. Some hon. gentlemen say that it will do no harm to pass this Bill. I say it does a great deal of harm to put a law on the Statute-book that is not necessary, and that is why I object to this Bill. I object also to being attacked as a cruelty-to-animals man. I love animals, and take good care of them; I have grown up in a farming community, and among people who know how to take care of animals, birds as well as dogs, cattle and horses. I have shot birds, and do not think it cruel to do so. But I have had ladies coming to me in the corridors and asking me not to oppose Mr. Brown's Bill. I object to all this. I tell you I do not come down here for that purpose. As I said the other night, and I feel it still more strongly to-night, if we do not put our foot down on this class of legislation, which comes before us day after day and week after week, the important interests of this country will be neglected. I have never shot a bird out of a trap, but I do not consider it cruel to shoot a bird. I have seen many more cruel deaths of birds which these humanitarians do not object to; I have seen them put to death when their necks had to be wrung two or three times; and yet these people consider that merciful, while shooting is cruel; and any gentleman who stands up here and says it is not cruel to shoot birds is put in the position of being declared cruel. To bring the matter to a question, I move, seconded by Mr. Small, that the Committee now rise.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I want to say a word on the first section of this Bill, because the hon. gentleman who has addressed the House and has entered into a general discussion of all the features of the Bill, has perhaps misunderstood or unintentionally misrepresented the nature of the first section. When the House compares this section with the section it is intended to amend, I think it will be relieved entirely of the hon. member's apprehensions that this is a Bill aimed at the farming interests of this country. I know, as far as my own section of the country is concerned, that there is no farmer who desires to torture birds, and that is the one provision contained in the first section. The first section of the existing law undertook to give a definition of the words used in the Act, and by some oversight it only defined the word cattle, whereas continually in the provisions of the Act the word animal is used, and it is proposed in the first section of this Bill to define the word animal, which includes in its ordinary sense any description of birds, which do not come under the designation of cattle. This is done, not at all for the purpose of saying that nobody shall shoot a bird or wring its neck or kill it, but that it is an offence of cruelty to animals to unmercifully treat a bird as well as any other living animal. That is the nature of the section the hon. gentleman has attacked.

Mr. TISDALE. I have no desire to split hairs with the hon. Minister of Justice. I am quite satisfied that he understands the question of law better than I do. But possibly I did not sufficiently express in detail what I intended the House to understand. I am quite prepared to concede that there is an enlargement of the provision to make it affect birds; but the latter part of my argument was that the birds are entirely merged in the protection already afforded by the law of Ontario, which prevents the shooting of birds at all.

Mr. MULOCK. How has this Parliament jurisdiction to deal with this class of property?

Mr. TISDALE. I do not think it can deal with insectivorous birds, because the Province of Ontario has dealt with them, and its law has not been disallowed. In this Bill there is an enlargement, but in my view it is not substantial, because, under the law of Ontario, you cannot destroy or trap or catch birds, or even interfere with their eggs.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is not this dealing with a question of property and civil rights?

Mr. TISDALE. I am bound to concede that this House has jurisdiction in regard to cruelty to animals; but the case of birds has already been seized by the Provincial Legislature. Conceding for the sake of argument that this House has jurisdiction, though I do not concede that, I submit that the present law of Ontario is a broader and stronger law, and, therefore, this Bill brings the question down to animals and domestic birds.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the attention of hon. Minister of Justice to the question of jurisdiction. It is true, we legislated upon the subject before; but, so far as I recollect, our legislation was not subject to discussion on this point. So far as wild animals are concerned, they are considered for the time being the property of those on whose lands or possessions they are found; and, applying this rule to the public lands of Ontario or any of the other Provinces, they would be under the jurisdiction of the Province as an incident of its proprietary rights. So far as fish are concerned, there is a provision here that the regulation of the sea coast and inland fisheries are under the control of this Parliament. Now our courts have held and the Supreme Court here has held that every regulation of this sort is a police regulation, and is an extension of the municipal power conferred upon the various Provinces under the British North America Act. Under this Act, the Provinces are authorised to legislate on the subject of municipal matters. One of those matters is the prevention of cruelty to animals. The preservation of peace and good order in the community, the prevention of immoralities, and all those offences which to some extent disturb the peace and good order of the community, but which are, in their moral character, below the rank of crimes, are under the control of the different Provinces, and the Provinces are authorised by the 15th sub-section of section 92 to impose punishment by fine, penalty or imprisonment for the enforcement of any provincial law. Now the Provinces, as far as I know, certainly Ontario, have legislated upon the subject. It is quite true that, so far as the Territories of Canada are concerned, beyond the limits of the Provinces, a law such as we have put on the Statute-book may operate, but that is not what the hon. member from Hamilton is aiming at. He wishes to have a law for the entire Dominion, and I submit for the special consideration of the Minister of Justice the question whether this is not a police regulation falling within the municipal authority of the different Provinces of the Dominion. I think it clearly is. The Provinces so legislated before the Union, and have so legislated since. There is on the Statute-book of Ontario, and, I believe, of the other Provinces, a measure similar to that. It has been amended from time to time, and in Ontario, I understand, a measure relating to this subject is now being amended during the present Session of that Legislature. If that is so, what is the object of legislating here on the subject? I am quite sure that in many respects we have been exceeding our powers by legislating in matters properly belonging to the Provinces. I do not think that practice ought to be encouraged, and it would be well this Parliament should be sure of its authority before undertaking to put the measure on the Statute-book. I am not considering the question of the wisdom of this legislation. I might agree in everything said by those who support the Bill. I think cruelty to animals ought to be discouraged; but, at the same time, it is important that legislation should be left to those bodies, to which, by the constitution, it is entrusted; and if we follow that rule, it does seem to me that, except, so far as the Territories are concerned, we should not undertake to legislate on the subject here.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In reply to the hon. member from Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), I must say that when that hon. gentleman was explaining what the law was, I presumed he was referring to the Dominion Statute. With regard to the Ontario law my recollection is—and I speak subject to correction, for my recollection is not distinct as to its provisions—that the Province of Ontario has legislated on this question with reference to the preservation of useful birds and not in any way for the purpose of preventing cruelty to animals. With regards to remarks of the hon. member from Bothwell, I feel, with all deference to his arguments, as positive that this matter is within our jurisdiction and not within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures, as if we were dealing with the crime of high treason. Now, the powers the Provincial Legislatures possess are not, as he quoted them from memory, the imposition of fines, penalties, or imprisonment for the enforcement of any law of the Province, but “for the enforcement of any law of the Province made in relation to any matter coming within the class of subjects enumerated” in the section the hon. gentleman referred to, and none of the matters enumerated have any bearing on this question any more than they have on any other branch of the criminal law. It is true the creation and establishment of municipal institutions are within the province of the Provincial Legislatures alone, and the hon. gentleman argues from that that everything which tends to the peace, order, quietness and security of a municipality comes within the control of the Local Legislature. If that were so, every offence against the law would be exclusively within the control of the Provincial Legislatures. But I take it, unless it immediately concerns the creation or maintenance of municipal institutions, everything which is an offence, unless it is an offence against a provincial statute, made in relation to those subjects, is a matter only for our jurisdiction. If I am mistaken in my view of the provisions of the Ontario Act, and if the Ontario Legislature has deemed it wise to legislate to prevent cruelty to birds, I would ask the hon. gentleman why it is that a provision of that kind, which he deems salutary for Ontario should not be extended by us to the rest of Canada if we have the power to do so; and as to the question of power I have made my argument. As to his argument that we are infringing on provincial rights because we are dealing with wild animals which may be found on the property of a Province, he is a little wide of the subject. We are not dealing with the question of property. We are making it an offence to a man to act cruelly to his own property, and we have the right to say that a man shall not ill-treat his horse, under the penalty of being sent to the penitentiary, just as we have the right to declare that he shall not injure his wife or one of his children under the penalty we choose to inflict. We might as well argue in the latter case that we are disturbing the relations between husband and wife, as to argue in the former that we are interfering with the rights of property in the Provinces. We are not dealing with any question of property at all, and surely we have the right to say that a man shall not be cruel to his horse just as we have the right to say that he shall not be cruel to his own family.

Mr. TISDALE. I have looked into the law of Ontario and I do not think the hon. the Minister of Justice has quite understood one of the points I made. My point is that the Province of Ontario having passed a law prohibiting cruelty to animals, and the Dominion Legislature having tacitly conceded that such law is within the jurisdiction of the Province, we have not the right now to legislate on the same subject for the Province of Ontario. If any of the other Provinces have not legislated on this subject, we might do so as regards them, but as regards the Province of Ontario that question is settled. The Ontario law is:

“It shall not be lawful to shoot, destroy, wound or injure, or to attempt to shoot, destroy, kill, wound or injure any bird whatsoever save and except eagles, falcons, hawks, owls, wild pigeons, black birds, king fishers, crows, jays, English sparrows and ravens and the birds specially mentioned in “The Act for the protection of game and fur-bearing animals.

“It shall not be lawful to take, capture, buy, sell, expose for sale, or have in possession any bird whatsoever, save the kinds hereinbefore or hereinafter excepted, or to set wholly or in part any net trap, springs, snare, cage or other machine.

“It shall not be lawful to take, injure, destroy or have in possession any nest, young or eggs of any bird whatsoever.”

With the exception of certain birds which are named, I maintain that it is an impossibility under the law of Ontario to be cruel to these birds, because you cannot catch them or shoot them or trap them or even have them in your possession, and therefore I contend that there is no necessity for this measure unless it is from a sentimental view desired to make further provision for that which is already provided. I do not profess to be an authority on provincial jurisdiction further than this, that, any Province having passed such laws, and those laws not having been disallowed, this Government has conceded that the subject is a matter of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), because, if his view is correct, the construction of the British North America Act would depend on which Legislature got first in the race. The question is, in which Legislature is the power vested, and that is a rather important question. The jurisdiction must be either in the Dominion Parliament or in the Provincial Legislatures. It cannot be in both. I must say that the argument of the Minister of Justice commends itself to my mind, that this is an offence coming within the criminal law, which is within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. A question might be raised that it is a matter more of a local and private nature, and that it therefore comes within the purview of the Provincial Legislatures, but it seems to me that, this Legislature being seized of the criminal law and having exclusive jurisdiction over that law, would have the right to make this an offence. I therefore think that the jurisdiction is rather within the Parliament of Canada than the Provincial Legislatures. Still, it is possible that a conflict might arise if you have the two Acts on the Statute book, and it is a matter which should be carefully considered. I am rather inclined to be in favor of this Bill, but I would like to see the last line in regard to wild animals and wild fowl eliminated from the section.

Mr. MULOCK. Sub-section three of section three purports to give one person the right to destroy another person's property. I fail to see how this Parliament can assume to interfere with any man's property in that way. To give, even through the medium of justices of the peace, the right to one man to destroy another man's property is, to that extent, robbing a man of his property. It is assuming that this Parliament can indirectly or directly take from one person and give to another. There is no pretence, in the language of the last clause, that it is in any way brought within the criminal law. Jurisdiction is not attached to the clause in any way through the medium of the criminal law, so it is simply a bare proposition that this Parliament has the power to divest a man of this property in favor of another man, and, therefore, I think that the last clause, which the Minister commended to the House when the Bill was up for the second reading, and which has some merits in itself, is really contrary to the interests of the public.

Mr. BROWN. Having somewhat exhaustively discussed the subject on the second reading of the Bill, I do not propose to occupy the attention of the committee for more than a few minutes. The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) has taken a strange position to-night. He conveys the insinuation that the friends of this Bill impute acts of cruelty to farmers. Nothing is more remote from my intention than that. Farmers are most kind to their animals. It is in the large cities that acts of cruelty exist, and it is there that the humane societies are working to get amendments to the law. I stand here as the spokesman of the various humane societies in Canada. When my hon. friend tells this House that I got the petitions printed in Ottawa, and sent them to Toronto to get them signed, he is very far astray. I sent no petitions to Toronto, or to Hamilton, or anywhere. They have come to me, and they have been numerously signed by good and kind-hearted people in every part of the country, and the only opposition to the Bill has emanated from some of the gun clubs. I am rather proud of the charge which my hon. friend threw across in this direction, that he had been assailed by ladies in the lobby to vote for my Bill. If we were to entrust all measures of kindness and humanity in regard to dumb animals to the ladies, the good cause would be safe.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BROWN. You may laugh if you like, but it is true I do not envy the hon. gentleman who thinks that the sympathy of the women of Canada is a thing which he has a right to sneer at. I leave the explanation of the Bill in the able hands of the Minister of Justice, but I state that acts of cruelty have been practiced for which the present law does not provide, and that this Bill, which I have introduced, and which I hope will become law, makes such provision as will effectually put a stop to many barbarous acts of cruelty, which, not only in regard to those who are concerned, but in regard to the surroundings in connection with these debasing sports, so called, are calculated to do harm to the people of Canada. I want the House to know the motives which led me to bring this Bill forward. The subject is exciting attention throughout the whole land. My hon. friend spoke of my spreading these petitions, among members of the House; I did so, and had I not a right to do so? These petitions came from Toronto and were presented by the members for that city and others, and to-day a petition was presented from the Women's Humane Society of this city. Appended to that petition are names of ladies who would be an ornament to any country in the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear. Name!

Mr. BROWN. I may tell hon. gentlemen that the name of the patroness of that society is the Lady Stanley of Preston, and the ladies who are on the managing committee of that society are ladies of which any country or any city might well be proud. The hon. member for Ottawa to-day had the honor of unrolling, in presence of the members here, a petition signed by a large number of the leading people of this city. I stand in my place here to-night and I say that of all the gun clubs in Canada, perhaps the St. Hubert's Gun Club of Ottawa is the most influential, and I venture to assert that the majority of the gentlemen composing that club are humane men, and they would support my Bill individually. My hon. friend has said that there was no cruelty in killing pigeons for food. I only object to killing them for the mere sake of killing. I tell him that I have known of cases of cruelty at pigeon matches where money was put up; and, as a rule, at these pigeon matches money is put up, and wherever there is a stake of that kind there is a general desire to see that the trapper is of the right sort, and if the birds do not get lively the trapper makes them lively. I have on my desk now the highest authority for stating that, at a match shot in Canada, one of the trappers had cayenne pepper in his pocket to put in the eyes of the poor birds to make them lively. There was cruelty, and it is to prevent such cruelty that this Bill is introduced. I could go on for an hour giving you similar instances. I appeal to the House to support this measure, calculated as it is to reflect great credit upon the members and much good to the country. My hon. friend says he is a humane man, but yet he sees defects in this Bill, the very object of which is to encourage humane actions. If he is of opinion that it will do no harm and is in the right direction, why should he object to it? He is the champion of a few gun clubs; he has a well known still hunter who sits beside him who does not speak much, but all the same he is a good hunter. Sir, I venture to hope that the good sense of this House will support this measure and pass it. The passage of this Bill will show the people of Canada that the sentiments of their representatives are in favor of further prevention of cruelty to animals.

Mr. BERGIN. I am afraid that the hon. gentleman who has last spoken and the Minister of Justice, have fallen under the flatteries, and the persuasions, and the blandishments of the ladies in the lobby, and I would not be at all surprised to find upon investigation that the fair ladies who so won the hearts of the susceptible Minister of Justice and the member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) had on their bonnets wings taken from birds for the purpose of adornment. Sir, I do not believe that all the kindness of heart in this country is centered in the so-called humane societies. We have in this country various associations, and we find that in the so-called humanitarian associations the cranks generally rule. Now, Sir, we in this country are the descendants of the sons and daughters of Great Britain; our fathers came to this country from England, Ireland and Scotland, inheriting a taste for sport which every true born Briton loves, and we hope to continue to perpetuate in this country the sports which our fathers loved and which they introduced here.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They did not introduce this.

Mr. BERGIN. I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by introducing this, but if he means that we did not introduce trap shooting from the old country then he is very much mistaken. There were pigeons shot in the old country by men of as kind hearts, eye, and as strong brain, and as truly loyal, as are any in Canada to-day. Sir, I repeat that this Bill is a charge of cruelty against the farmers of this country. The farmers, in almost every county in this country, almost immediately after the crops are in, every year have their turkey shooting matches, and is it not as cruel to shoot turkeys, eye, and more so, for they are much larger and may be supposed to suffer more? Is it not as cruel to shoot turkeys as it is to shoot pigeons? Are we, by passing this Bill, to deprive the young farmers of this country of their favorite pastime? Because under this Bill they will not be permitted to shoot turkeys at the usual season of the year; and besides you will deprive other people of their sport outside of the men who shoot pigeons and turkeys. Is it right to worry a fox?—I am speaking now as if I belong to one of the humane societies—is it right to worry a fox? Yet large sums of money are expended every year in keeping up our hunt clubs in Toronto and Montreal, which are a credit to this country. Is this sport to be put an end to because some people think that it is cruel to shoot pigeons from a trap? It is a thousand times more cruel to worry a fox to death with dogs. Sir, I have no doubt that the hon. member for Hamilton who to-day placed himself before this country as the man of the kind heart, who would scorn to be guilty of any cruelty, has forgotten that there is such a sport as fishing. He is, I believe, one of the most ardent fishermen in this country.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He fishes with butterflies.

Mr. BERGIN. I have not the least doubt of it. Yet if the hon. member for Hamilton is not a fisherman himself, I know the majority of his neighbors are, and that there are hundreds of gentlemen in this country who do not yield in kindness of heart to any one here, who visit the different fishing rivers in this country and kill their salmon and enjoy the sport. And is it to be supposed that the gentleman who kills 15 or 20 salmon a day is able to consume all this salmon? They kill them for the sake of killing, as the hon. gentleman says; and I repudiate entirely, on the part of those who oppose this Bill, any such thing as an intention to be cruel towards either animals, birds or fishes. And now a word about some of the officers of the humanitarian societies; I speak of what I have seen since this Legislature met. I have seen ladies who are prominent in these humanitarian societies, riding behind horses who have been clipped and exposed to the winter's cold, being in fact almost naked. I have seen these humanitarians driving lame horses in their carriages, and if it be cruel to shoot a pigeon, I think it is quite as cruel to drive a horse whose foot is so sore that it is difficult for him to put it to the ground. I have seen those horses standing before shops in this city for from half an hour to three-quarters of an hour, in the coldest weather, with the wind blowing upon them, and nothing to protect them. Yet, forsooth, we are to be told by people who are guilty of these things that they are the only people who are opposed to cruelty in this country, and they denounce us who are sportsmen because we indulge, in a legitimate way, in that which has come to us honestly from our fathers.

Mr. BARRON. I have no doubt that under this Bill it will be impossible for any one to clip his horse. The only question will be as to whether or not it is an act of cruelty. This Bill, I think, originated with the Humane Society in Toronto. They have published a book, which is used throughout the schools of Ontario, and in this book they state that they have already placed in the hands of Mr. Lees, a member of the Provincial Legislature, a Bill similar to this, and in that book they state the different acts of cruelty, one of which is the clipping of horses. I have no doubt that under sub-section a of section 2 it will be impossible for any one to clip his horse. It will rest, I repeat, with the magistrate to decide as to whether such is an act of cruelty. Some say it is and some say it is not. Having had some little experience I hold that it is not an act of cruelty, that it is absolutely necessary that some horses should be clipped in winter.

Mr. BERGIN. Is it necessary to have their tails cut off?

Mr. BARRON. That is another act of cruelty for which people may be tried under this Bill. I think myself, that docking a horse's tail as is sometimes practiced is an act of cruelty, and when persons not only simply cut the tail off but dock it so that the tail shall assume a particular shape, that is an act of cruelty.

Mr. BERGIN. It is fashionable all the same.

Mr. BARRON. I repeat that I do not think clipping a horse is an act of cruelty. In winter it is absolutely necessary, especially with long-haired horses, because we know that a horse in a state of perspiration will get cold if it stands and the perspiration is allowed to freeze on its coat, all of which can be avoided if the horse is clipped. My chief objection to that Bill is that in that particular it will open the door to all sorts of litigation, and it will leave in the hands of the magistrates the power to say whether horse clipping is or is not an act of cruelty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think some hon. members of the committee will be very apt to vote for or against the Bill from some misconception, because, judging from the remarks of my hon. friend, he has hardly gathered the meaning of the amendment proposed. The clause against which his speech was made is not a new clause; it was explained the other night. That clause has stood as the law of the land for some time. The hon. gentleman who has introduced the Bill seeks to amend the law in three particulars. It proposes to amend the interpretation clause by extending it to cover some additional animals, and it provides in sub-sections a and f certain new offences. I think that in committee, probably, if we reach that far, these offences will have to be more specifically defined, but I do not see why any humane person should object to the punishment of a person who, having the charge or custody of an animal, unnecessarily fails to provide the same with proper food, drink, shelter and protection from the weather. I do not see why a person who, having the charge or custody of an animal, wantonly and unnecessarily leaves, disables or abandons such animal, should go scott free. We have already placed a law on our Statute-book on this subject, and if the jurisdiction lies with the Parliament, as appears to be the general opinion, it is an exclusive jurisdiction, and if we determine to have a law on the Statute-book we should not approach it with any feelings of maudlin sentiment, but should look at the question as sensible men, and make the law, if possible, a perfect law. There is a provision against keeping animals or birds as targets to fire at. I do not believe true sportsmen are of the opinion that it is necessary to keep animals or birds as targets. I have been a member of a gun club for some years, and we have used clay pigeons, as have many other gun clubs. The two objections raised against this Bill are, first, on the ground of jurisdiction, and second, that the Bill goes too far. The first is untenable, and the second is really aimed at the law on the Statute-book, and not at this Bill at all.

Motion that the Committee rise agreed to: Yeas, 68; nays, 67.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COOK moved second reading of Bill (No. 9) to amend the Railway Act. He said: The first clause provides that—

"All railway trains for the conveyance of passengers shall be drawn up at the stations or other stopping places so as to enable passengers to alight from the car on to a platform which shall be constructed at each station or stopping place."

I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that all railway companies have platforms at their stations and that if they neglect to land passengers on the platforms it is directly the fault of the company. This clause will only cause railways to be more careful and will not cause them any additional expenditure whatever. We know that very serious accidents have occurred through the carelessness of the companies in landing passengers at the stations. I have in my mind now a case where a young man was killed in my own constituency but a short time ago. The North Simcoe Railway is now owned by the Grand Trunk Railway, and at the town of Orillia they have two platforms at the station, one platform connected with the station and another between the two sidings. The platform near the station is much lower than the outer platform and it is necessary to have a descent on the platform so that baggage can be taken on to it. A short while ago an able and energetic young man was returning home after attending his legal duties in Toronto and he was going down the declivity of the platform when he slipped and fell as the train was moving. Both his legs had to be amputated from the result of the injuries he received and a short time afterwards he died. All the papers in the county as well as the Toronto papers had articles on this unfortunate accident, and I can give you no better idea of the loss caused by the death of this young gentleman than to read an article from The Switch, a paper published in the town of Barrie:

"It is not beyond the functions of The Switch to record the sad event which has deprived the county—yes, the Province—of a promising and in many respects brilliant citizen in the person of Mr. Albert D. Kean, of Orillia. Though on the short side of 30 years of age and only about five years in the practice of his chosen profession—the law—he had already made a fine record and had won a position that would surely place him in the upper story of professional success. Those who knew him had high respect for his many good qualities of head and heart. A shrewd business man, a thinker and tremendous worker at all times, with due regard to all the relations of life adorning the social circle with his intellectual vivacity, indefatigable in church matters for its advancement and prosperity, his private life without blemish, exercising with all a practical charity that will ever be remembered to his credit, he almost seemed to have a premonition of a short existence and accordingly crowded into the short space allotted to him the work of an ordinary lifetime. We sympathisingly record our feeble tribute to a citizen's worth, and regret deeply that the brotherhood of a few days since has been severed by one of those casualties that now and then render families stricken and cause communities to reflect on that great transition inevitable to all of us."

It is not necessary for me to refer to any other case at the present time and there is no doubt that if we had had a law on the Statute-book to compel the railway company to land Mr. Kean upon the platform that his life would have been spared to his family and friends. I can recite a number of instances of this kind to my personal knowledge. I know that in the city of Toronto and at other places on the lines of the different railways they are very careless in landing their passengers. A short time ago I went to meet a friend at the Union Station in Toronto, where one side of the station is occupied by the Grand Trunk Company and the other by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I found that the whole siding on the Grand Trunk was occupied by empty cars and the train could not reach the station but had to stop at York Street, where the passengers had to alight, and I had to proceed there to meet my friend. I have several letters on this matter, but there are two which I consider of special importance and which I shall read to the House. This is a letter from Mr. J. Greenshields, who lives, I believe, in the city of Kingston, and who is a personal and political friend of the leader of the Government. It is as follows:—

"TORONTO, 12th February, 1889.

"H. H. COOK, Esq., M.P., Ottawa.

"DEAR SIR,—I see by the Parliamentary reports that you are about to introduce a Bill to compel railway companies to compensate passengers for damages done to baggage, which is caused through negligence of the companies in not providing proper means for the loading and unloading passenger's baggage. Anyone who has had occasion to travel on any of the roads must know the dreadful usage the property is subjected to. In very many places passengers with baggage instead of being put off at the platform are compelled to get off on a siding and have to cross another track in order to get to the platform. Negligence or carelessness cannot be charged to the employees of the road as they have no means to obviate the trouble as they are not supplied by the employers. I trust you will be successful in your endeavors, and see your Bill passed through and become law, as at present the travelling public have little or no redress. Another thing I think would be a move in the right direction that is to have the outside of the stations better lighted. If necessary I could give you the names of some of the stations where things could be made more pleasant for the travelling public.

"Very truly yours,
"J. GREENSHIELDS."

I have another letter from a gentleman of the name of Sturgeon Stewart, who represents the Byam Manufacturing Company of Canada, in which he says:

"I am pleased to learn that you are introducing a much-needed measure for regulating and governing railway corporations regarding the better protection of life and property. A few days since a train-load of passengers were landed in this city two hundred feet from any platform or building, with a freight train on one side and a ditch eighteen inches deep on the other, with a high fence beyond. Passengers had to jump two or three feet from the steps and find their way out as best they could; and a lady with two children came almost being run down by a moving freight train, but for the timely intervention of some of the passengers who observed its approach. Instances of a similar character are almost of daily occurrence in this city. Regarding the protection of property handled by railway companies, something is required to put a stop to almost criminal carelessness in this direction. Our travellers are much inconvenienced and our company frequently sustains severe losses by the destruction of our travellers' sample cases, the loss and inconvenience of which cannot be readily computed in dollars and cents. In the interests of the public, your Bill should receive the hearty and unanimous support of the entire House."

Now, these are the opinions of two gentlemen who are constantly travelling on some of the railroads in Canada. We can put a stop to accidents of this kind by compelling the railway companies to land their passengers at a platform at each station. We cannot legislate perhaps to prevent such terrible calamities as that which has occurred near Paris to-night; but we can legislate so as to compel the railway companies to attend to the travelling public as they should. I know that since I introduced this same Bill last year, the Grand Trunk Railway Company in particular, who were very careless in this respect in the past, have mended their ways to a large extent. I remember a few years ago, when I introduced the Bill to provide for the package of frogs, the railway companies took great exception to it; but after the matter had been agitated for a few years, the Northern Railway Company packed their frogs of their own accord; and even if this Bill should not pass this Session, if the railway companies believed that the Parliament of Canada would eventually take this matter in hand, I am satisfied that they would begin to treat passengers as they should be treated. But so far as I am concerned I do not propose to wait; I propose that we shall put an Act on the Statute-book to which the railway companies will be amenable. The next clause refers to the treatment of baggage. We know very well how our baggage is smashed on the railways. Let any one travel through Canada or the United States with a new trunk for a distance of three or four hundred miles, and he will find on the completion of his journey that his baggage has been so roughly used that very often it is broken. I do not think your baggage would sustain as much damage in a year's travel in Europe as it does in Canada in a week. This is due to nothing but the grossest carelessness on the part of the railway companies, and they should be made to take better care of our baggage. The third portion of the Bill relates to the penalty imposed; and I do not see how any hon. gentleman can take any exception to the measure, because the penalty is not excessive. The only effect the Bill will have will be to make the railway companies attend more closely to their duties, and it is in the interest of the railway companies to do so, now that we have so many rival roads. I must say that the Grand Trunk has improved since the opposition of the Canadian Pacific Railway was established between here and the city of Toronto. It has better cars than it had before, they are kept cleaner, and the company has evidently come to the conclusion that unless it deals in a better way with the public than it did before, it will not have as much of its traffic. I therefore move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. While I think the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook) is entitled to credit for his desire to amend the Railway Act in any direction that will bring greater comfort or convenience to the travelling public, still I believe that in amending any Act we should always keep in view the importance of making our legislation such that in the ordinary course of events it can be carried out and obeyed. Now, I apprehend that if this Bill were to become law, it would be utterly impossible for the railway companies in this country to comply with it. If such an Act were to become law it would be utterly impossible to keep within bounds. Take the first section, which reads as follows:—

"1. All railway trains for the conveyance of passengers shall be drawn up at the stations or other stopping places so as to enable passengers to alight from the car on to a platform which shall be constructed at each station or stopping place."

Under that section, in the case of a train composed of say twenty cars, the train would have to stop in such a position that all the passengers could get out on the platform. To accomplish this it would be imperative to place a constable or other officer, at the end of every car to prevent passengers alighting until car after car was brought up to the platform. Not to say anything about the expense, it would be practically impossible to carry this out in the case of trains that stop at flag stations, where there is not usually the convenience of a station or platform. Railway companies would either have to forego stopping at these places and thus deprive the public of a great convenience, or they would have to build a platform at each station, or other stopping place, no matter how insignificant. This would be a great drawback, especially in the case of new railways. In travelling through the North West, a couple of years ago, I noticed that along the whole length of some lines there was scarcely a regular station or platform, and the passengers were glad to get out at any convenient point. Shippers had their stuff piled and discharged at such points without either a platform or station. If this Bill were law, these companies would be unable to let their passengers off where it suited them, without breaking the law, and I am sure the travelling public would consider it a great deal more inconvenient to be obliged to land on a platform perhaps miles away from the nearest point to their destination, than to be let off at such point, although there was no platform. This Bill would necessitate the building of platforms at every casual place where a train happened to stop, or the number of stopping places would have to be greatly diminished. Again, railway companies conveying excursionists often stop at different places or pleasure grounds. One year a place may be selected at which the train stops, and another year the public may resort to a different place. If this Bill became law, the company would be liable to a penalty if the passengers were discharged where there was no platform, even though the passengers desired it. Often when trains were coming into cities inconvenience would result on account of passengers not being allowed to get out at street crossings nearest home because there was no platform, and therefore the company would not leave itself liable to a prosecution for violation of the law by allowing such passengers to leave the train unless at the regular stations. I think, therefore, it will be seen how utterly impossible it would be for any railway company to keep within the bounds of this measure. That part of the Bill which relates to baggage is not so objectionable, but I understand there is a law already which provides for proper care in the handling of baggage.

Mr. TISDALE. Had the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill taken the trouble to consult some lawyer, he would have discovered that the common law covers both the matters his Bill provides for. Last Session a great deal of time was taken up by the Committee of the Whole House in passing the general railway law, and all these matters were carefully considered, so that I cannot help thinking the hon. gentleman would consult the best interests of the country and also save the time of the House if he would withdraw this Bill. Surely after the exhaustive discussion which was given last Session to railway matters it is rather early now to bring in further amendments to the railway law. The common law meets the case. The common law requires railways to give proper accommodation to all classes of passengers. Now the common law has been the law for a great many years, and unless there is some special principle or some technical rule concerning which a statute can be framed, it is much better, according to the opinions of the great judges who have administered law in all parts of the Empire, to leave these matters to the general law than to try to improve them by some technical statute. Although, therefore, both the matters dealt with by the hon. gentleman are popular in one sense, the law is as strong in regard to them as any statute the hon. gentleman can frame. Last year we ventilated these matters very fully, and I do not see any improvement which the hon. gentleman can suggest to-day, but I can see that great detriment will be caused should his Bill pass. In the part of the country where I live, local railways were built, induced to stop at some places, and I know that a similar state of affairs exists in the hon. gentleman's section, where there were no platforms at all, not because it suited the railway companies to do so, but because it accommodates the people in the rural districts. The trains stop at road crossings where it would not pay to have a platform, and sometimes it is by considerable pressure that the company are induced to do this. On some railways in the western part of Ontario, there are over 50 stations which are an accommodation to the people. If the hon. gentleman's Bill passed, these stations would disappear and every one of them would be shut down, because it would not pay to have platforms there. The law therefore would prevent the very object the hon. gentleman has in view. It would do more harm than good, and certainly have the effect of causing great inconvenience.

Mr. BARRON. I do not profess to be as familiar with the circumstances and necessities of railways as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. I am quite aware of the fact that he has a great deal to do with the different railways throughout our country, and is more or less interested in them, and perhaps speaks somewhat from a railway standpoint. But when he criticises my hon. friend's measure on the ground that is quite unnecessary, because the common law of the land provides a remedy, I must inform the hon. gentleman that in this respect he is mistaken. The common law simply deals with the question of negligence, and the question which would have to be decided under it would be whether the company was guilty of negligence or not. The judge would have to decide that, and he might declare that under the circumstances negligence could not be attributed to the company. But this Bill states what is negligence. It does not leave it to a judge to say what is or what is not negligence, but it provides what will be negligence on the part of a railway company, and says that, unless a railway company does this, it will violate the Statute law of the land. I think, therefore, that the point taken by the gentleman who preceded me is not well taken. I think it is well that the Statute law should provide that the railway company should deliver passengers at the station. Moreover, I think it should provide that railway companies should handle baggage more carefully than they have in the past. I ask hon. gentlemen if they have not seen again and again the employés of a railway bundling the baggage out, throwing trunks out indiscriminately and baggage being smashed by the way in which it has been thrown on the station. I suppose it is quite true that the parties who suffer might have some remedy at common law, but I think it is infinitely better that the Statute should point out that such an act is negligent rather than that it should be left to a judge to say whether the act is negligent or not. I, therefore, think the point taken by the hon. gentleman who preceded me is not a good point, and that my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Cook) is right in proposing this measure.

Mr. TISDALE. I rise to make a personal explanation.

Mr. COOK. You had better occupy the whole time.

Mr. TISDALE. I rise to make a personal explanation and I think I am in order. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Barron) said I was interested in railway companies. I desire to state that I have not a dollar's worth of interest of any sort in any railway in the world. That is all I wish to say. In my career in this House, so far as it has gone, I have never made a reflection of that kind upon any hon. gentleman. I rely upon arguments, and, though I do not think the hon. gentleman meant to make a harsh insinuation, I object to that style of discussion from either side of the House, and I hope that in future the hon. gentleman will inform himself as to the facts before making such a statement.

Mr. BARRON. The hon. member seems to be super-sensitive. He speaks like a man who has a guilty conscience. I did not say he had a money interest in railways, but I said he spoke from a railway standpoint, and I say so still. I never intended to say that he was interested in railways from a money point of view.

Mr. TISDALE. I certainly understood the hon. gentleman to speak more broadly. If he did not intend that, he should say so, and I will accept his statement.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. After listening to the arguments on both sides, one is impressed with the fact, that there are inconveniences which this Bill seeks to remedy. The inconveniences, undoubtedly, are caused by the carelessness of companies in failing to draw up their trains at regular stations, and at places for which they have sold tickets to passengers. No doubt, that is frequently done through carelessness, and, so far as it can be remedied, it should be remedied. The other disadvantage is the careless handling of baggage, which we have all witnessed. It is true, that this Bill only attaches penalties to the infraction of the common law. If any inconvenience occurs to a passenger by the train not stopping at the proper place, or by his baggage being injured, he has his remedy at common law. It may or may not be expedient to attach penalties to these acts in addition to the common law remedy for damages, but I call the attention of the House to the fact, that the Bill will introduce greater inconveniences, as my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) says, than those which it proposes to remedy. I will mention some of them for the consideration of the promoter of the Bill, if he thinks fit to go further with it. It is customary, I think, on all railway lines, and certainly on the more important lines, to have stopping places at certain seasons of the year for the convenience of business people. That is so also with regard to a few families living at a little distance from the regular station, for whose convenience the railway company makes a stoppage where there is no regular station. Then, as my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) has just said, there is the case of long excursion trains, which cannot be brought up in many cases to the small platforms at which the passengers are to land. But, under the provisions of this Bill, it would be necessary that, at every one of these stopping places which are temporary and merely for the convenience of individuals where no business is transacted except the getting on and off of passengers, the railway company must erect a platform. That, of course, would be utterly impracticable, and would lead to the closing of every one of these accommodation stopping places and, in that way, would inflict a greater inconvenience on the public than the inconveniences which the hon. gentleman refers to. The first section of this Bill says :

" all railway trains for the conveyance of passengers shall be drawn up at the stations or other stopping places so as to enable passengers to alight from the car on to a platform which shall be constructed at each station or stopping place."

So that, at every one of these temporary stopping places for the convenience of persons travelling in certain seasons of the year, the railway company would subject itself to a penalty for according that accommodation. Further, at many of these occasional stopping places, there are steep grades, and, under the provisions of this Bill, if the train passed the stopping place or platform, it would be absolutely necessary, for the mere convenience of one or two passengers, to back the whole train on a steep grade, and in many cases that would involve a great deal of delay and expense. In fact, on these two grounds, the Bill would practically close all stopping places of that description.

Then, we have the cases which exist in Toronto, Hamilton and some other cities, where, for the convenience of passengers, they are allowed to alight from, and to enter the train at a momentary stopping place on the streets. That would also have to be stopped, because it would be impossible to put a platform on the streets. Then it often happens that the platform is so near the highway that it is absolutely impossible that the baggage could be taken from the train, and the train could pass on so as to allow the passengers to alight from the passenger cars without the train standing on the highway, and the Act passed last Session makes it an offence for a train to stand across a street for more than three minutes. Now with regard to the second section, I think it is open to a good deal of objection, to part of which, perhaps, the hon. gentleman has not had his attention called. The Bill says :

" Passengers' baggage shall not be thrown or cast from the baggage car to the platform, but proper appliances shall be provided on which baggage, not removed by hand, shall be removed undamaged from the baggage car to the platform."

The hon. gentleman means, I suppose, that passengers' baggage shall not be thrown out carelessly but that it shall be removed with care. But he has made it a penal offence if baggage is found in a damaged condition at all; that is to say, if the baggage is found, on its removal from the baggage car to the platform, to be damaged, the company is liable to this penalty. It surely ought to be enough to impose a penalty if the damage occurs through any fault of the company's officers. Under this clause I think the burden would clearly be upon the company, and not upon the owner, to show that the baggage was not damaged through any fault of their officers. Then the third section says :

" For each neglect to comply with the provision of the two sections next preceding, the railway company shall, in addition to any other liabilities, incur a penalty which shall be recoverable by any person who sues for the same."

Now it sometimes happens that the railway companies are not at all at fault for the carelessness of those who act as baggagemen. It sometimes happens that railway companies take the utmost care to have the baggage properly handled, and they impose fines upon baggagemen for using violence. I know several cases of baggagemen having been dismissed for wilful disobedience to the orders of the company in that respect; and yet this Bill, instead of imposing a penalty upon the person who has been guilty, namely, the baggageman himself, who has violated the orders of the company, makes the company liable to the penalty. Taking all these circumstances into consideration, I would suggest that this Bill be read the second time, without the House considering itself bound to the principle of the Bill, and that it be referred to the committee which I named the other evening for the consideration of other Bills imposing penalties. It would be better to have it considered there than in the Railway Committee.

Mr. COOK. If there are objections to the Bill, I am willing to take the course suggested by the Minister of Justice. I quite appreciate the objection taken to the second clause by the Minister of Justice, but I do not think the objections made by other hon. gentlemen are quite so well taken. At the same time the Bill might be amended by striking out the first clause so that it would not interfere with cars stopping upon the highway and letting out passengers at a place where there would not be a station. The object I have is to compel the railway companies to land their passengers on the platform instead of between two trains. It often happens that passengers have to pass between two trains and cross the track to get to the platform. Last year, in introducing a similar Bill, I believe I did not mention that the railway companies have a practice of landing passengers between freight trains. For instance, you may take any of the stations on the line of a road where two freight trains meet and the passenger train passes them; the company finds it more convenient to run the freight trains on two opposite tracks and let the express, with the passengers, pass between them, so that the passengers getting off there have to cross the track to get to the platform. All I want to do is to compel them to run their freight trains on outside tracks so as to bring the passenger train up to the railway station next to the platform. Of course if the train happens to be a long one, longer than the platform is, a provision can be made to meet that case. I do not wish to put the company to any unnecessary expense, but I think that they should treat the public in a manner in which the public ought to be treated. I have much pleasure in accepting the suggestion made by the Minister of Justice as to the disposition of this Bill.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Another strong objection to that Bill is that under present circumstances the railway companies are bound to provide proper means and appliances for discharging passengers from their trains, and if, from any negligence or carelessness on the part of the company, an accident occurs or any person suffers damage, he has a remedy. The difficulty in this case would be that if by chance a train, long or short, did not draw up to the platform, though no one was injured thereby, yet the company would be liable to the penalty. There you see you are imposing penalties on companies for no damage done, and you put them at the mercy of a common informer who might wish to bring an action against them. In many instances when a long train comes to a station, the company will discharge the first cars and then haul up the train farther, and it is impossible to keep the people in, as they will pass out in order to reach the platform. At present, under our existing law, if a person suffers damage from the negligence of the company in not having proper appliances for alighting, &c., he has a remedy against the company, and, generally speaking, the company suffers pretty severely. But in addition to that, if by neglect, either by overrunning the platform, or having a long train, or through some other cause, one of the cars connected with the train is not opposite the platform, still the company is liable to a penalty at the suit of any common informer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would suggest that the hon. member who has charge of this Bill, as he has taken a great deal of interest in it, should be put on this special committee.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection.
Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

ASSESSMENT OF SALARIES IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. ELLIS moved that Bill No. (18) to authorise the assessment of incomes of persons in the service of Canada be read the second time. He said: The object of this Bill is to authorise the assessment of persons having a salary or income, in the service of Canada, for municipal or civic purposes. As is well known at present, through some presumed prescriptive right, the salaries of persons in the service of Canada can not be assessed for any purpose, such as schools, or streets, or police, or fire, or for any of the purposes for which the salaries or incomes of other citizens are taxed. I think it has been decided by the Ontario courts that there is no power, either under the municipal or the provincial laws, to assess the salaries. It seems to be only right and fair that employés of the Dominion Government who live in cities and who enjoy all the privileges which the city affords, including police protection and public schools and like advantages, should pay a fair share of the assessment wherever incomes are assessed in Provinces. In some places, I am aware, there is no income tax, and in such instances the Bill will not apply. In those cases all persons are reached under the system there existing. Where the assessment is levied wholly on real estate the whole population is reached in that way, but in places where there is an income tax there is an unfairness committed by exempting employés of the Dominion Government. The object of the Bill is to remove that unfairness. It is supported by the general voice of the country, and there seems to be no good reason why the civil servants of Canada should be exempt from the assessment. The very fact that superannuation is provided for them on their retirement gives them an advantage which is not enjoyed by other persons, and I think this is a further reason why the House should agree to the passage of this measure. As regards officials drawing comparatively small salaries, I may remark that most of the assessment laws provide an exemption so the law would not bear too harshly on them. The object sought to be attained is to make the local law applicable to all cases.

Mr. RYKERT. I think this Bill cannot go to a second reading, for two reasons. We have a Rule of this House which requires all Bills that involve a charge on the people or on any class to originate in Committee of the Whole. On page 523 of Mr. Bourinot's work there is the following:—

"It is the invariable rule that all measures involving a charge upon the people or any class thereof should be first considered in a Committee of the Whole, Rule 88, Order.

"If any motion be made on the House for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned until such future day as the House may think fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a Committee of the Whole House before any resolution or vote of the House do pass thereon."

The Rule stated also applies to the imposition of any state tax or charge upon the people or any class thereof. Then there is another reason laid down also in Mr. Bourinot's work:

"It is now a fixed principle of constitutional government that all propositions to impose taxes shall be made only with the assent of the Ministers of the Crown and with their sanction."

Under these circumstances I contend that this Bill should originate in Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. AMYOT. I have another reason against further progress being made with this Bill. I do not see that this House has power to deal with assessments to be levied for municipal or school purposes. That is a subject wholly within the jurisdiction of the Local Governments.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I have some little doubt as to the power of Parliament to deal with this subject, but, if it is possible to do so, I think that the employés of the Dominion Government should be made liable with other persons for these provincial and municipal taxes. It does not really affect Ottawa alone, but also every city throughout the Dominion, as the courts of the different Provinces—I know this has been the case in New Brunswick and Ontario—have decided that the salaries of these officers are free from assessment. In fact it is carried out to a very great extent, and a large number of the employés of the Intercolonial Railway are free from any local or town or county assessment, and as the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) has stated, even from paying school taxes. It was never intended that all these persons should escape; and as the courts have decided that the Local Legislatures have no power, then the question arises as to whether we have power in this Parliament. The question is not that mentioned by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) that this Bill proposes a tax in the sense he has put forward, but the question is, can we delegate the power to Local Governments to make the assessment? It is doubtful to my mind whether that can be done, because the effect of this Bill is that as the Dominion Parliament and the Provincial Legislatures having together the power of the Imperial Parliament vested in them, and as the courts have decided that the power to deal with this question does not rest with the Local Legislatures, then it must rest in the Dominion Parliament. If this can be done and if this proposal, which is a just one, can be carried out, all the employés of the Dominion would be compelled to pay their share of taxes which confer a benefit on them in common with other denizens of towns and cities.

Mr. RYKERT. I have taken objection to the Bill on a point of Order, and I ask your ruling on it, Mr. Speaker. I contend that this Bill must originate in Committee of the Whole House, as it involves a charge on the people and a tax on a class of the people.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is quite clear that this Bill must originate in Committee of the Whole. The Bill, as I understand, states that there is a certain class who are not liable to assessment, and they shall be made liable to assessment. It, therefore, appears to me the reason of the Rule would apply in this case as in any other.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is an abstract resolution so far.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am afraid the Civil Service would find it a concrete process very quickly.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is nothing in the Bill that provides for taxation; it does not provide any tax. I do not think we have power to do what the mover asks this House to do, but that is a different question. With regard to our power to pass this Bill, I do not think the objection of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) is well taken, because the Local Legislatures would still be the parties to exercise that power. This is not power to tax. When this question is before the Local Legislatures, supposing this Bill to pass, they will then have the question of taxation before them.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) argues from the theory on which this Bill proceeds, rather than on its actual provisions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have not looked at the Bill.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman would give attention to section 2, he would find that this is its exact provision, and that a certain class of the people not now liable to taxation shall hereafter be liable. It enforces a liability upon them. It says:

"An official or employé in the service of Canada so assessed shall be liable for the payment of the amount assessed; and the laws and regulations for the assessing, levying and collecting of taxes on salaries or incomes, or on both, in force in the place or locality in which any such official or employé is a resident, shall apply to such official or employé in the same manner as to any other person taxed in such place or locality upon salary or income, or on both."

We all know that those laws are in existence now, and the moment this Bill receives the Royal Assent hundreds of persons in this country will be immediately taxed to the same extent under the provisions of this Bill as if they were taxed by a Dominion officer. If the decision be correct now, these officers are exempt by this Legislature, and I fully agree with the hon. gentleman opposite that we have not the power to legislate in this way. If we possess the authority to deal with the subject we have no power to delegate that to the Provincial Legislatures which have their powers from the British North America Act. The change must be accomplished in another way.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We have no power to tax for municipal purposes, and we cannot confer the power to tax for municipal purposes, because if we could it would be an indication that the power is vested in us. And it is not vested in us. Of course if we are to touch on the merits of the question I will give you my views upon it, but we must discuss the regularity of the proceeding before we discuss the merits of the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. First, this being a charge upon a class of the people it must commence in the Committee of the Whole, and there is the other point that it must be on the recommendation of the Crown.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Let me ask the hon. gentleman how he considers this is a tax on any class of Her Majesty's subjects. The first clause removes the disability to tax a certain class. It says:

"From and after the passing of this Act, the salaries or incomes, or both, of officials and employés in the service of Canada, derived from their employment in such service, shall be liable for assessment for civic, municipal and school purposes in the places or localities in which such officials and employés reside, in the same manner and to the same extent as the salaries or incomes, or both, of other residents of these places or localities, derived from other sources."

They are not liable to taxation by any provision of this Act.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Let me ask the hon. gentleman one question. Is there any difference between imposing a burden and removing an exemption? I think not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No civil servant would be liable by virtue of the operation of this Act. He might be liable by some Acts of a Provincial Legislature consequent on the operation of this Act, but the liability arises entirely by virtue of some other legislation and not by virtue of this Act.

Mr. SPEAKER. The general principle that all measures having the effect to impose some new charge on the people must originate first in the Committee of the Whole House is admitted by both sides. The only question then is as to the application of this general principle to this special measure. I read that by the first clause of the Bill it is provided that the salaries of public officials may be assessed, and, furthermore, in the second clause, that if they are assessed at present, or if they be assessed in future, that such assessment shall be legal. It is clear to my mind that the effect of this Bill, the moment it becomes law, will be to legalise all assessments so already made or to be made. I must hold, therefore, that the Bill comes under the operation of the general rule, as imposing new charges on a certain class of the people, that is, the public officials and employés, and that it must originate in the Committee of the Whole, and, furthermore, emanate from the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand, Sir, that you rule on the other point, that this Bill should receive the assent of the Crown? I hardly think that this is correct. As you have ruled on one point, you might as well rule on the other, and I do not think the Government would be impartial persons, as the Bill would tax them.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have ruled that the Bill is out of order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10:30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 28th February, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. BROWN moved that the House resolve itself, on Monday next, into Committee of the Whole to consider further Bill (No. 3) to make further provision as to the prevention of cruelty to animals and to amend chapter 172 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intituled: "An Act concerning Cruelty to Animals." He said: Certain hon. gentlemen who approve of the principle of the Bill have taken exception to certain clauses, and I am quite prepared, in committee, to make such explanations which I hope will be satisfactory, especially with reference to the two last clauses, to which my attention has been particularly drawn. If my explanations are not satisfactory in committee, I am prepared to make some modifications in the Bill.

Mr. TISDALE moved in amendment that all the words after "That" be struck out and the following substituted: "Bill No. 3 be considered this day six months." He said: Hon. gentleman can quite understand that I do not propose to make a speech on this question, but simply wish to explain the necessity for the amendment. The necessity is that unless this amendment be carried, the hon. gentleman, if defeated to-day, can again renew his motion. I wish to dispose of the whole question.

Mr. LISTER. I think the hon. gentleman ought to have an opportunity of bringing this Bill before the House again. There is no doubt a good deal of good in it, and if what is bad can be expunged in the committee, I would be disposed to vote for the measure. I opposed the Bill the other night because the hon. gentleman would not accept my advice, but after his remarks of to-day, I feel disposed to give him another opportunity of pressing his Bill.

Mr. TROW. I would ask the ruling of the Speaker on the point, whether once the Committee of the Whole has disposed of the Bill, the Bill is not without the jurisdiction of the House. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole reported that the committee do rise, without asking leave to sit again, and it strikes me forcibly that effectually disposes of the Bill for this Session.

Mr. SPEAKER. The reason why the committee rose without making a report was that there was nothing to report. Now, the proper proceeding has been taken by the hon. member from Hamilton, and that is to give another order for the House to consider the Bill again in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). The Bill is not now before the House, and therefore the amendment of the hon. member from Simcoe (Mr. Tisdale) to have it read six months hence, is not in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion is that the Bill be further considered on Monday next in Committee of the Whole House, and the amendment, I think, is quite correct, that the order be made that the Bill be so considered this day six months.

House divided on amendment:

POSTAL SERVICE AMENDMENT ACT.

Mr. HAGGART moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 93) to amend the Act respecting the Postal Service. He said: There are several important amendments in this Bill. The first change introduced is for the purpose of compelling steamboats navigating Canadian waters to carry Her Majesty's mails, or persons travelling with them, at such rate as the Postmaster General may order them to be carried, or on such terms as the Governor General in Council may prescribe. The object of this clause is, instead of giving subsidies to different lines of steamboats for carrying the mails, to fix the price of carrying the mails in all inland waters on some fixed principle, either by the weight of the matter carried, or according to distance, or in some other form that may be prescribed by a board selected for that purpose, or, in other words, to give the Government the same power of carrying the mails on the inland waters as they have now on the railways throughout the Dominion. The second clause is an amendment of section 2 of the Post Office Act. This section has been amended so as to include decoy letters, that is, letters posted by the inspectors or other officers of the department. It was thought that decoy letters did not come within the ordinary meaning of letters, and it is for the purpose of punishing parties who steal them the same as when they steal other letters. There is another verbal change which is intended to include parcels which are mailed in English post offices. The third paragraph is an amendment to section 9 of the Act, letter d. It is for the purpose of excluding immoral publications, or immoral photographs, and to make the punishment the same and the forfeiture the same. The second paragraph is an amendment to section 9, letter k. It is repealed, and it gives the Postmaster General power to prescribe and enforce the rate at which registered letters are carried throughout the Dominion. The object of the clause is to give the Postmaster General power to increase, if thought necessary, the rate placed on registered letters carried from one section of the Dominion to another. The intention of the department at present is to raise the rate and make it similar to the English and American prices for carrying registered letters. Section 20 of the Act allows an increase in the weight of letters to be carried for three cents from half an ounce to an ounce. Section 21 of the said Act is repealed, and a clause is put in which raises the rate of drop letters from one cent per half ounce to two cents per ounce, nearly doubles the rate of drop letters, and makes it similar to the rate in the United Kingdom and the United States, on the same class of letters. In no part of the world that we know of are drop letters posted and delivered at the same rate that they are in Canada. It makes a letter delivered to a postmaster as a drop letter, pay the same charge as similar letters in the United Kingdom and the United States, whether there is a city delivery or not. Section 25 of the said Act is repealed, and the rate of postage on periodicals printed and published in Canada, and issued less frequently than at intervals of seven days remains the same, but it prescribes that a newspaper must be issued at periods not less than seven days, so newspapers can only pass free that are published either daily or weekly, and all published at longer intervals pay a fixed rate of one cent per pound. The next clause amends the definition of a newspaper to make it correspond with the definition in England. The clause afterwards authorises the Postmaster General to make arrangements with foreign countries as to parcel post. The clause after that is for the purpose of making more clear what a dead letter is. The next clause is one that has been amended to suit the altered relations between the Customs Department and the Post Office Department, and to secure the payment of parcel posts passing through the post office, and to facilitate the transmission of the same; also for the purpose of preventing the annoyances to which persons are sometimes subjected at post offices on account of the customs duty. The rest of the clauses regulates the manner and mode of making the printed return to Parliament, in order to make it in accordance with the system on which the post office is managed now, and to eliminate from it all returns which are made at present by the Auditor General.

Mr. TROW. Do I understand the Postmaster General to say that he increases the rate upon drop letters generally 100 per cent.?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I would ask the Minister whether he proposes to make any provision respecting letters that are not fully paid, whether they cannot be forwarded and the amount collected at their destination, the same as in England? It is frequently very inconvenient, and sometimes attended with a great deal of loss to parties who put on the stamps all right enough, but from the want of adhesive property in the stamps, they get knocked off, and the letters are returned to the writers after considerable delay. It appears to me, that the public service would not be injured if the hon. gentleman would provide that letters here, as in England, in such cases, should be delivered, subject to the double postage, or whatever postage the department might see fit to put upon them.

Mr. HAGGART. The matter has been very fully considered in the department. All letters which are insufficiently prepaid are forwarded, and a double rate of postage collected when they arrive at their destination. The objection to the system proposed by my hon. friend from Halifax is this: if you allow a letter to be forwarded which has no postage stamp at all, you revert to the old system of sending letters without postage stamps at all, and impose upon the party receiving them, perhaps a double postage. The proposition is that, when a letter is insufficiently stamped, it shall be forwarded to its destination, and a double penalty attached.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That is not the old law.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Does the Postmaster General propose to make any change in regard to registration stamps?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It has been announced that the present stamp was to be discontinued, and the ordinary two cent stamp substituted. The present system often causes considerable inconvenience.

Mr. HAGGART. That change has been already made, that is, departmentally made. An order has been given by the department to the post offices, that where a two cent stamp is attached for registration, the letter will not require the registration stamp. The intention of the department is to increase the registration fees, and to make them similar to the fees in Great Britain and the United States, and at the same time to provide more security for the transmission of registered letters than at present, and also to compel the registration of all letters which include valuables.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The proposition to increase the postage on drop letters is a very serious one, and the hon. gentleman should inform the House, before the Bill proceeds very far, of the grounds on which the Government are asking such an important increase.

Mr. HAGGART. As this is a money Bill, it must, of course, be introduced by resolution, and when it is before the House I shall be able to explain the reasons.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is one feature of the Bill which is decidedly objectionable, and that is the increased cost of forwarding registered letters. It is well known that a very large proportion of our people send small remittances, such, for example, as remittances to mutual insurance companies, by registered letter. The registered letter is growing in favor in Canada and is being largely adopted, especially for small amounts, and it is a pity that the present arrangement should be disturbed. The proposed increase would press on a class who are not well able to bear an additional drain for increased postage. It is unfortunate the present arrangement should be disturbed, when it has given satisfaction.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Another matter I should like to bring before the notice of the Postmaster General is the possibility of reducing the rates charged for money orders. At present the rate is too high, and great convenience would be caused to the public if it were reduced.

Mr. CASEY. What is the increase in the charge on registered letters?

Mr. JONES (Halifax).

Mr. HAGGART. There is no amount fixed in the Bill; it is proposed to give power to the Governor in Council to increase the amount.

Bill read the first time.

Bill (No. 95) relating to the Supreme Court.—(Mr. Weldon, St. John.)

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Translation) asked, Whether the Government have received an engineer's report on the works connected with the railway of the Great Northern Railway Company, comprising that part thereof extending from the Villages of New Glasgow and Ste. Sophie, in the County of Terrebonne, through the Parish of St. Lin, in the County of L'Assomption; if so, what is the conclusion of the said report? have the Government made any payments, in view of the said works, and what is the amount of such payments, if any?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). In answer to the first question of the hon. member, my answer is: Yes, in 1885. To the second question, enquiring as to what the conclusion of the report is: it implies slight works, and the road is completed so as to allow running on it at a rate of twelve miles an hour. To the third question: $25,088 has been paid.

SAWDUST DEPOSITS IN THE OTTAWA RIVER.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. EDWARDS) asked, When the report of the engineer who made an examination of the Ottawa River between Ottawa and Grenville, as to the effect of putting sawdust and mill refuse in the river, will be brought down?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The report of the engineer acting on behalf of the lumber merchants was received by the department on Tuesday last. The report of the engineer who had been sent by my department the year previous, was not made and received by the chief engineer until that officer, the first assistant engineer, had been called before the committee of the Senate and examined there. He gave all his information to them, and the whole matter was published and delivered to the public. Copies of the plan were furnished to the engineer, Mr. Fleming, who acted for the merchants lately and who conducted the examination on their behalf.

CUSTOMS APPRAISERS.

Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency) asked, Whether the positions as appraisers held by the late Louis Bilodeau and by Honoré Plamondon have been filled, and if so, who are the persons appointed? Have the persons appointed appraisers in place of the said Louis Bilodeau and Honoré Plamondon salaries commensurate with the importance of their duties?

Mr. BOWELL. Appraisers have been appointed since the death of the late Louis Bilodeau and Honoré Plamondon, but they were not specially named as filling the vacancies caused by such deaths. The appraising staff now comprise three officers in place of two when Mr. Bilodeau and Mr. Plamondon were serving. The salaries of the present appraising staff at the port of Quebec are considered to be commensurate with the services rendered.

Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency) asked, What are the salaries paid to customs appraisers in the cities of Montreal and Toronto?

Mr. BOWELL. The salaries paid to the appraising staff at Montreal range from $600 to $1,500, and at Toronto from $800 to $1,600. I might add that if the hon. gentleman would refer to the Trade and Navigation Returns, he would be able to find the name of each and the amount he received.

Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency) asked, Whether there are, in the Quebec custom house, appraisers for groceries and dry-goods; and if so, who they are?

Mr. BOWELL. The appraisers at the port of Quebec have not been appointed to any particular branch of the service, but to the appraisement of any goods that may be received at the port, and for which they are considered the most qualified.

Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency) asked, Whether the Government are aware of the existence, in the Quebec custom house, for five years past, of several vacancies which have not been filled up; and that the mercantile interests of Quebec are suffering seriously from the fact that the said vacancies have not been so filled up?

Mr. BOWELL. The Government is aware that vacancies have occurred at the Quebec custom house during the past five years, some of which have not been filled. It is not aware that the mercantile interests of Quebec are "suffering seriously" from the fact that such vacancies have not been filled up. The department is, however, aware that persons who are applicants for positions in the Quebec customs office have made representations that the staff should be increased. It is considered, after full investigation by the Government, that the staff at Quebec custom house is ample to serve all legitimate requirements of the port. There are on the permanent staff at Quebec, at present, 41 officers; in 1878, there were 43 officers.

Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency) asked, How many appraisers are attached to the Quebec custom house; what are their names and their respective salaries?

Mr. BOWELL. The appraising staff at the port of Quebec at present consists of one appraiser, one assistant appraiser, and one acting appraiser. Their names are: F. Martineau, appraiser, salary $800; James G. Watters, assistant appraiser, salary $700; A. V. Dion, acting appraiser, salary $900.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT HALIFAX.

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to enquire when the papers connected with the dismissal of Mr. Ross from the collectorship of the port of Halifax are to be expected?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. They will be brought down without delay.

Mr. LAURIER. Can you say nothing more definite than that?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I may say they will be brought down soon.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Really, considering that my hon. friend asked for those papers a month ago, it does seem to be very extraordinary that papers of that sort cannot be produced sooner than within a month, with all the resources at the disposal of the Government.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman had asked the question when the Minister of Customs was in his place, he would have got a more positive answer.

Mr. LAURIER. I will ask the question again to-morrow.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

House resumed consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Davin for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, praying for all memorials addressed to the Government by the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories which sat recently at Regina.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to say a few words on this motion of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and I propose to review very briefly the leading points in the policy of the Government with reference to the administration of North-West affairs in connection with the sale and management of public lands. It is a matter of the utmost importance to this country that that vast stretch of wilderness should be settled, and I presume, Sir, that all parties of Canadians are ready to unite in recommending and approving any policy calculated to produce that desirable result. I must further say that I consider the policy of the Government from the time its first regulation was issued in July, 1879, down to the present moment, as having been a policy not calculated to secure the development of that great country. It has been a policy not conceived and not carried out in the interests of the settlers who live in that country or who may be induced to go there. The Reform party of this Dominion—the Opposition in this House—challenged this policy of the Government as long ago as April, 1880, and for nine years we have continued to protest against the course that the Government have chosen to pursue with regard to the administration of our great public domain in the North-West. The regulation issued on the 9th July, 1879, provided for the setting apart of five belts upon each side of the assumed line of the railway. The first belt was to be five miles wide, the second belt was to be fifteen miles wide, the third belt twenty miles wide, the fourth belt twenty miles wide, and the fifth belt fifty miles wide. Lands in the first belt were to be held at $6 per acre, in the second belt at $5, in the third belt at $3.50, in the fourth belt at $2, and in the fifth belt at $1 per acre. The lands not set apart for homestead and pre-emption were to be sold upon credit, requiring the payment of one-tenth down and the balance in nine equal annual instalments, bearing interest at 6 per cent. It was then held by the Opposition that the opening for sale upon credit of a vast amount of land at $1 per acre, requiring the payment of only 10 cents per acre upon the land, the granting of easy terms on the balance, and the sale of this land in unlimited quantities, was a policy calculated to foster and produce speculations in this land. These regulations were modified on the 14th October, 1879. The lands under the modified regulations in belt "A" were held at $5 per acre, in belt "B" at $4, in belt "C" at $3, in belt "D" at $2, and in belt "E" at $1 per acre, with the same policy continued as to selling upon credit, and with the same objectionable feature of the policy in encouraging speculation in the public lands of the North-West. There was one modification of those regulations in May, 1881, and on the 1st January, 1882, regulations were issued which, I believe, are still in force. Those regulations provided two schemes for colonisation, which were in point of fact, two schemes calculated to still further promote the operations of speculators in these public lands. Colonisation "plan No. 1" provided that lands in alternate sections could be purchased by colonisation companies at $2 per acre, the price at which they were held to settlers, with a provision that upon compliance with some requirements as to settlement, a rebate of one-half should be made; the effect of this being to give the colonisation companies—organisations of capitalists—an opportunity to buy lands at half-price, and this led to a good deal of speculation. Plan

"No. 2" provided for the sale of the entire amount of land in townships at $2 per acre for cash, with the same provision as to rebate of one-half of the amount paid, upon compliance with certain conditions. Here was a policy which could not be said to have been conceived or executed in the interests of the settlers; here was a policy in both those instances, to sell the public lands in unlimited quantities at a dollar per acre on credit, and a policy which encouraged the organisation of those colonisation companies that were practically calculated to promote speculation in the lands of the North-West, and that were not conceived in the interests of the settlers. The Opposition challenged this policy as early as 1880. On the 5th April, 1880, the following resolution was moved with regard to the Government's land policy:

"Mr. Charlton moved that the House do now go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

"1. Resolved, That in the opinion of this House, the proper policy with reference to the disposition of the public lands of Canada should be, as far as practicable, to sell such lands to actual settlers only, on reasonable conditions of settlement, and in lots or quantities limited to the area which can be reasonably occupied by a settler; and that the sale of public lands to speculators, free from conditions of settlement, is impolitic and calculated to injuriously affect the settlement of the country, by keeping large quantities of land locked up for years, and by obliging the settlers thereon ultimately to pay a price much larger than that which is paid into the public Treasury for the same."

"2. Resolved, That, as under the existing regulations respecting the disposal of public lands, for the purposes of the Canadian Pacific Railway, large quantities of fertile lands are being offered for sale, and sold to speculators at one dollar per acre, for one-tenth cash down, and the balance in nine equal annual instalments, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum—terms which enable the speculator to obtain control of lands for a cash outlay of ten cents per acre; thereby, not only in effect, loaning to the speculator on the part of the Government, nine-tenths of the capital required for speculative investments, but giving rise, as experience shows, to great expense in the keeping of accounts, and to indefinite delays in the realisation of the stipulated price; that, so long as the system of selling public lands to speculators without conditions of settlement or restrictions as to quantity is continued, the price at which such lands are sold should be paid in full in cash, at the time of sale."

It was moved in amendment by Mr. White, of Cardwell:

"That all the words after 'That' be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof: 'the policy of the Government for the disposal of the public lands in Manitoba and the North-West, is well calculated to promote the rapid settlement of that region, and to raise the moneys required for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, without further burthening the people, and that it deserves the support and approval of this House.'"

Well, Sir, that policy received the approval of the House by a vote of 120 to 40, but the allegation of the amendment, that the policy was one calculated to promote the rapid settlement of the country and to raise the moneys necessary to pay for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, has been belied by subsequent events. So far from its promoting the rapid settlement of that country, there are to-day, according to the estimate made by the Government, but 132,000 settlers in Manitoba and but 100,000, including Indians, or about 50,000 whites, in the North-West Territories—a population of from 170,000 to 180,000 settlers who have gone into the whole of that vast region during the nine years that have elapsed since the question was discussed in this House; and so far from realising the $58,000,000, or any portion of it, that we were told was to be realised by 1891 from the sale of lands, we have realised nothing. The sale of lands has not paid the expenses of management; and in place of having any considerable sum to apply to the liquidation of the expenses incurred by the Government in the construction of the railway, we are actually out $70,000,000 in hard cash, the sum given to the railway in the form of bonuses, the cost of the portion which was constructed and handed over to the company, and the $10,000,000 given to the company in exchange for a portion of its land grant. Now, it is evident that the predictions made by the Government with reference to the results that would follow the inauguration of this policy in 1879 have not been fulfilled; that, in point of fact, the whole thing has proved in a great measure a flat failure; that we have not induced settlement to the North-West; that the country has not prospered; that something has been the matter; and I shall show, a little further on, that in addition to its policy towards the settlers, the Government has erred in other matters. The Opposition steadily adhered to the policy it laid down in 1879. On the 16th of March, 1881, when the Dominion Lands Act was under consideration in this House, amendments to that Act were moved in the following directions. The first was by Mr. Mills, who moved:

"That the Bill be recommitted, with instructions to amend the fourth clause by providing a limitation of the area of land which may be sold by the Government to one person."

Which, of course, was lost. It was moved by Mr. Charlton:

"That the Bill be recommitted, with instructions to amend the fourth clause by enacting that except or otherwise provided by resolution of this House, all lands shall be disposed of subject to conditions of actual settlement."

Which, of course, was lost. It was moved by Mr. Holton:

"That the Bill be recommitted, with instructions to amend the fourth clause by providing that the unappropriated even-numbered sections in each township shall be disposed of only upon condition of actual settlement."

Which was lost. Mr. Blake then moved:

"That the Bill be recommitted, with instructions to amend the fourth clause by providing that the price of Dominion lands, sold without conditions of settlement, shall be payable in cash at the time of sale."

Which was lost. All these amendments were in the direction of the public interest. There was not one of them that did not contain a principle that ought to have been embodied in the Bill, without the necessity of any amendment being offered by the Opposition at all, and the passage of these amendments in the negative was in every case detrimental to the interest of the country. Then, following these challenges of the Government's land policy, we have other votes on record with regard to the same matter. On the 27th of March, 1882, the leader of the Opposition in the House challenged the policy of the Government with reference to the disposition of coal lands and pasture lands, by the following motion:—

"That the future of the vast Territories of the North-West is largely dependent on the supply of fuel at a moderate rate;

"That the present information as to the country and the coal areas is not sufficient to warrant Parliament in creating long-enduring interests in large quantities of coal areas;

"That the regulations as to coal lands laid on the Table make no provision for the application, as a general rule, of the just principle of public competition to the acquisition of those valuable lands, and thus leave open the door to disadvantageous cessions of the public domain for the benefit of individuals;

"That the said regulations make no adequate provisions to check the consolidation of large blocks of the coal lands in a few hands and the consequent restriction of competition and enhancement of the price of coal;

"That the said regulations make no adequate provision to secure any working of the coal mines by the lessee;

"That the said regulations provide, by arrangement, for 21-year leases, renewable, for the creation of interests of longer duration than prudence at this time would, as a general rule, lay down;

"That they make no proper provision for the settlement of the terms of renewal;

"That the said regulations do not become operative, if disapproved of by this House; and the House is responsible for their coming into operation;

"That this House disapproves of said regulations."

Which was lost on a division. Then Mr. Blake moved:

"That in the opinion of this House the existing system of granting timber limits is liable to result in gross abuse, and in the cession of valuable interests in the public domain for inadequate considerations to favoured individuals;

"That it is expedient to apply the just principle of public competition to the granting of timber limits."

That liability to abuse was fully realised in the history of the granting of timber limits since the year 1882. We have still further an amendment moved to Bill No. 145, relating to public lands of the Dominion. In 1883, on the 2nd of May, Mr. Charlton then moved:

"That the said Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole in order to amend the same by striking out all after the words 'Governor in Council' in line five, sub-section one, section twenty-four, and substituting the following: 'provided that all sales of agricultural lands shall, unless under exceptional circumstances, applicable to particular lots, be made on condition of actual settlement by the purchaser, and in quantities limited to the number of acres which can be reasonably occupied by one settler.'"

Now, the line of the Opposition as developed was, first, and that was the primary point in the principle they adopted, that the sale of lands in the North-West should be made to actual settlers only, subject to conditions of settlement. That was a salutary and just provision which would have effectually prevented the operations of speculative companies in that country, and in failing to adopt it the Government are largely responsible for the evil consequences that have followed in the settlement of the country and the dissatisfaction that has existed there. Then, the Opposition took ground distinctly in favor of the competitive principle with regard to the placing of coal lands, pasture leases and timber limits. The Opposition have always held that these being the property of the public, it was the duty of the Government to secure as large a return from them as possible. We held that the granting of pasture leases at one cent an acre, without inviting competition, that the granting of coal lands and of timber limits upon the terms on which the Government did grant them, without inviting competition, was detrimental to the interests of the people, and not consonant with the principles of just and honest government. What do we find with reference to timber licenses? We find that at the time the last return was made, over 25,000 square miles of timber limits had been granted by Order in Council, at a uniform rate, without reference to the value of the limits; and hon. gentlemen know that in many cases these limits, which were granted for $5 per square mile, without inviting competition, were worth vastly more in many cases than the small amount received by the Government. It has been ascertained since that an hon. member of this House was interested in a limit for which $50,000 was received by those interested, but which had been obtained from the Government for the sum of $250. The whole system was rotten, and the Government failed to secure for the country the large revenue that would have been secured from the sale of timber lands, coal leases, or the leasing of pasture ranches. The only restriction imposed with regard to pasture ranches was, that no friend of the Government could have a lease of more than 50,000 acres. The leases should have been put up at auction, and the Government should have taken pains to secure for the property the price it was worth, and that public competition alone could determine. The system adopted of selling timber licenses at a uniform rate of $5 per square mile when, perhaps, in the one case they might be worth a hundred times as much as in another, and of leasing pasture lands at one cent per acre, and of granting coal leases on the terms on which the Government granted them, has worked in the interests of the friends of the Government, but not in the interests of the people. We have had attempts made to justify the conduct of the Government; we have had feeble attempts made to show that the development of the North-West should be considered on the whole as satisfactory. I deny in toto that that is the case. I maintain, on the contrary, that the policy of the Government has been uniformly in the interest of the speculator and the moneyed man, and uniformly against the interest of the settler and the poor man. By the system of credit sales of unlimited areas at one dollar an acre, requiring but the payment of ten cents per acre down, the policy of the Government with regard to colonisation companies has enabled the latter to obtain large areas of land at but half the price which the settlers must pay, and by their system of leasing of pasture lands, timber lands and coal lands; by all these things they have militated against the interest of the North-West. Then the Government have steadily persisted in charging prices to the population of the North-West much higher than those charged by the United States. They have steadily persisted in homestead regulations less liberal and less productive of settlement than those of the United States. They have seemed to be unaware of the fact that our public lands, as compared with those of the United States, are remote; they seem to be unaware of the fact that a settler going to the lands of Manitoba or the North-West would necessarily pass almost through, or very nearly by, a territory offering vast acres of public land at great inducements to settlers, and that, other things being equal, settlers would be more liable to take up land in Dakota than in our North-West. Yet, in face of the fact that in the Territory of Dakota public lands within the limits of the railway grants are sold at $2.50, and outside of the railway grants at $1.25 per acre, and that this land is more eligibly situated, being nearer the railways, nearer markets, where agricultural implements and other goods can be more readily and cheaply obtained, and offering attractions to the settler infinitely greater than those offered in our North-West,—as if those inducements were not enough, the Government, in order to shut out immigration more effectually, must place our lands at a figure higher than lands can be obtained in the United States, and their policy in this respect has been very effective, as shown by the immigration returns. Now, we have here a memorial from the North-West Assembly, and these men upon the spot, knowing the wants of the country, petition the Government in exactly the line the Opposition has advocated for nine years past. They ask the Government to make the price of pre-emptions within twenty miles of the railways at $2 per acre, and outside of that at $1 per acre. If the Government were to do that they would then be offering inducements to settlers somewhat better than those offered by the United States Government, and would have some show of securing that settlement we desire and which it is necessary we should have, and which we never can have with higher prices on our side besides the other disadvantages to settlers. What we want in the North-West is not that friends of the Government may make money out of timber limits, not that friends of the Government may acquire cattle ranches and coal mine licenses and timber licenses at low rates, but what we want is the entry of settlers who will bring that country under cultivation; and in order to secure settlers we have to consider their interests. That is what we have not yet done. The policy of the Government has been, practically, to leave out of view the interests of the settler in the North-West. Now I hold, without detaining the House much longer, that the true policy of this Government is to make the inducements for settlement in the North-West greater than those offered by the United States. Our policy is to offer our lands cheaper than the American Government offer theirs. Our policy is to give homestead regulations at least as attractive as those in the United States. In the United States, the homestead settler can take up public lands wherever he can find them. The checker-board system is not adopted there, that system which has created the isolation of one settler from another, and has made it difficult for the settlers to have schools, and roads, and other advantages. But the homestead settlers in the United States can take lands in bodies and in blocks wherever they can find them. The United States will grant lands to homestead settlers without restriction as to location, their policy being to get settlers to take up the lands and have the wilderness converted into a cultivated country. Let our Government adopt that policy in our North-West. If a homesteader wants a piece of land, let him take it where ever it can be found belonging to the Government. If he wants to buy land, sell him that land at a reasonable price, $2 an acre within railway limits, and $1 an acre outside. If the Government would adopt that policy, we would see a larger movement of settlers to the North-West than we have in the last nine years. We would not have in the next nine years the beggarly showing which we have for the last nine years, of an influx of 132,000 people to Manitoba and 40,000 to the North-West. I believe that we have not, by 25 per cent., as many native-born Canadians in the North-West as there are in the Territory of Dakota in the United States. The reason is that the settler in Dakota has had greater inducements held out to him, while the policy of this Government has been such as to repel him from our North-West. It is time that a change should be made, and I hope that the hon gentleman who now occupies the position of head of the great Department of the Interior, who has lived in the North-West and must necessarily know the wants of that country and the feelings of the settlers in that country, will administer the affairs of that department in a different spirit, in a spirit favorable to the settlers, and that, under his administration, we may secure for that great country the influx of a great body of settlers, and the development of its resources.

Mr. MACDOWALL. As this is a question which interests particularly those members who come from the North-West, I will ask permission to occupy a few minutes of the time of the House in regard to it. The range which has been opened before us is extremely wide, as the memorials of the North-West Assembly embrace a great many subjects, but these are all of great interest to the settlers in the North-West. The question of the Dominion lands, to which the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has referred, is one of great importance, because, of course, the settlers come in there with the intention of settling on the land, and making their living upon it as farmers. I do not think, however, that we can find very great fault with the land laws as they stand, or, at any rate, with the new regulations which I understand the Minister of the Interior is likely to introduce, in order that things be made so much easier and better for the settler so that it would be difficult to improve upon them. Of course, it is a matter of very great importance to have the land for the settlers as cheap as possible, but at the same time, we have to bear in mind that a great deal of money is being spent on the development of the North-West, and that country must bear to some extent, its share of the cost. The price of land at $2 and $2.50 an acre is not too high. If land is worth 20 cents an acre, it is certainly worth $2, and I do not think any settler who has occupied what he considers a good location, when he has got his patent, would sacrifice it for such a small sum as $1 an acre. In addition to this, the only thing the members from the North-West would urge upon the Government is this. As a rule, the people who come in there are not very rich. They have hard times before them for the first few years, and, if they are not able to pay for their land within the stipulated three years, they should be given a certain time within which to pay, and the interest should not be too high. For my part, I should like to see the interest thrown off altogether, but this cannot be done, because the sale of land, whether it is by the Government, or by individuals, is a business transaction, and must be carried on in a business manner. While on this land question, I must refer to the remarks made by the mover of the resolution (Mr. Davin), in regard to second homesteading. He referred to a discussion which took place in this House on that subject in 1887, and he urged that the granting of second homesteads should be extended for a longer period to settlers now in the North-West. I should be sorry to see this done. In 1887, when this matter was before the House, I took the same stand, and, when I returned to the district of Saskatchewan, I found that my conduct was endorsed by the people there. What we ought to consider is what is the proper spirit of the

Mr. CHARLTON.

Homestead Act. I understand it to be to encourage people to settle upon the lands who will become actual settlers and who mean to make their homes in the country, and to reside there with their families, but, if you give a homestead to one man and allow him to throw it up and to take another homestead in another place, you are creating a class of speculators. When this was before the House, I compared two of the prominent cities of the North-West, Winnipeg on the one hand and Prince Albert on the other—and I compared the country which surrounded those cities. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) smiles at the idea of comparing Winnipeg with Prince Albert, but I think that I compared the two cities which were most fit for comparison. If you go out from Winnipeg for many miles around, you will find a large proportion of the country unsettled. These lands were scriped by speculators, and the land remains unsettled, but, in the country surrounding Prince Albert, you will find that it is occupied by men who are making improvements on their farms, and I do not think there is any comparison at all between the country surrounding those two cities. I know that the people of Winnipeg have endeavored, to the best of their ability, to get the lands immediately surrounding the city into the market. Winnipeg has to depend now, to a great extent, on its wholesale business. The retail business is small, because there are so few people surrounding the city, and it is principally confined to those who live in the town. I believe that, if you wish to have prosperous towns, you must have the country settled close up to the town, so as to give a retail business first and a wholesale business afterwards. One of the memorials from the North-West Council, to which I desire to call special attention, is a memorial to the Dominion Government praying them to make such arrangements as to ensure the immediate construction of a railway to the settlements on the North Saskatchewan. I am in hearty sympathy and accord with that memorial. In the preamble they first state that the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway had cut off the markets of those settlements, and that, in consequence of that, the people were unable to find means of getting rid of the produce which they raised. The consequence was that they were being brought into a most undesirable state of poverty. I do not want to enter into great details at this time on that subject, because I am happy to state that arrangements are being carried on by a certain railway company pointing towards the construction of the road to Prince Albert and Battleford, which I hope will be concluded next month, and which will give the needed railway communication. If those arrangements are not concluded at that time, I shall have a motion to lay before the House, and shall then have an opportunity to go further into details in regard to the subject. I will simply say now that I cannot urge too strongly on the Minister of Interior and his colleagues that there is a great necessity, in fact an immediate necessity, that the land grants for railways in that country should be located at once, if any work is to be carried out. It is absolutely necessary that those who invest their money in these undertakings should know exactly what security they have got, and it is impossible for them to tell what the security is worth until they know where these lands are, the lands being security for building the railways. Another question to which I wish to refer is that of granting scrip to the half-breeds of the North-West. This question has raised a great deal of discussion in the House before. The half-breeds in the North-West have petitioned to the North-West Assembly, and the North-West Assembly has petitioned the hon. gentlemen who form the Government of this country, that scrip should be granted to the children of all half-breeds who were born before March, 1885. They consider that they are justly entitled to it, because an arrangement was not made with the half-breeds in the North-West until 1885, when scrip was issued to them. We know that the half-breeds in Manitoba were settled with in 1870, but the half-breeds in the North-West were not settled with until 1885; and, as my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) very wisely and very well pointed out, the half-breeds in the North-West were a different class, in a way, from the half-breeds in Manitoba, they were in the same position with regard to the half-breeds in Manitoba as the Blackfeet Indians would bear to the Cree Indians; consequently, when a settlement was made with the half-breeds in Manitoba, it did not follow that a settlement was made with the half-breeds in the North-West—in fact, it rather follows that a settlement was not made with them, as no steps were taken to settle their claims. I should like, therefore, to hear the hon. Minister express himself in a manner that will enable me to say to my half-breed friends in the North-West that they are likely to get scrip; because no settlement has been made with them, they had no word in making the treaty as to surrendering their rights; they accepted what was given them, but with this protest, they demanded that this scrip should be issued to all children who were born at the time of settlement. The next question I wish to come to is the liquor question. Ever since representation was granted to the people of the North-West in the local assembly, this has been a question of more or less interest. I was a member of that assembly some years ago, in the earlier days of representative government in the North-West, and memorials were forwarded to Ottawa every year on this question. I think it is only natural that this should be the case, when you consider the relative position of the people in the North West and the people in the rest of Canada. On this question there is an arbitrary Act which applies to the people of the North-West, and to them only, affecting their comforts and their every day life; and this arbitrary Act was passed by a Parliament in which the people to whom alone it applies had no voice. Consequently, I maintain that it became an unconstitutional Act as soon as representation was given to the North-West in this House. The hon. members who, with me, have represented the North-West in this House, for the last three Sessions, have always been directing attention to this matter, and the North-West Assembly has now placed itself on record with regard to it. What they demand is that either this question be submitted to a popular vote, so that the people themselves may decide it, or that the North-West Territories be placed in the same position as the older Provinces in respect to the license question, and the admission of liquor into the Territories. I, myself, would go even a little further, and say that there is a third alternative which, I think, would be better still, and that is, to refer the liquor question to the North-West Assembly, and give them power to deal with it. My reason is that I believe that the people of the North-West are sufficiently intelligent to know themselves a great deal better than anyone else what would be best for them in this respect. At the same time, if a license system is established in the North-West, it would be necessary, I presume, to follow the rule that applies to other Provinces, and to grant the fees, &c., collected for licenses within the Territory to the North-West Government; so, I think that, perhaps the fairest way of settling this question would be to give the North-West Assembly power to deal with the liquor question. While I am on this subject I would point out that there is a great difference between the way in which the liquor question stands in the older Provinces, and the way in which it stands in the North-West. In the older Provinces the people themselves have been allowed to say whether any restriction should be imposed; but when this restriction has been imposed under the Canada Temperance Act, although liquor is not allowed to be sold at the bars in those counties which are under the operation of that Act, still liquor can be manufactured in those counties, and exported from them. In older Provinces you can manufacture liquor and you can export it, but in the North-West you are allowed by a permit from the Lieutenant Governor, to import it, but you are not allowed to manufacture it, and that is a very remarkable difference. Now, we who live in the North-West think that we ought to be allowed to manufacture the liquor that we are now allowed to import. We think that long ago we might have been allowed to manufacture the beer that was imported into the country, and I believe that if we had been allowed to manufacture beer and sell it, it would have been a very admirable thing, and probably would have prevented, in a great measure, the agitation that has now arisen throughout the North West for an alteration in the liquor laws. Now, I just want to return to the question of the land board. My hon. friend from West Assiniboia thought it would be better if the land board were transferred further west, and located at Regina. For my part, I think it would be a very admirable thing to have the land board in a central place in the Territory, but if we want to make it convenient to the people I am sure that the present location of the land board in Winnipeg is a great deal better, because at present Winnipeg is most accessible to the people in all parts of the Territory. People coming from the northern districts, such as Touchwood Hills, Prince Albert, Batoche, and along the line of the Manitoba and North-Western Railway, when they come from their homes and reach a railway, would have to go back to Regina. The usual tendency is to go east to do their business, but in that case they would have to go west to Regina, and then resume their journey again, retracing the distance they had already travelled. The land board is a great deal more accessible in Winnipeg, because it does away with this extra travel. I also wish to say a few words with reference to scrip being granted to the North-West Mounted Police. During last Session of Parliament this matter came up on a motion of my hon. friend for West Assiniboia, and it was promised at that time that this question should be reconsidered. I urged at that time, very strongly, that this scrip should be given to the police, because I believed they deserved it. They are, as everybody knows, a very fine body of men. They did their duty at the time of the rebellion, but before the rebellion occurred they did a greater duty than they did even then, for they did a great work for Canada. It is well known that before the Indian Department was organised throughout the North West, the mounted police were stationed at posts throughout that vast territory, and I believe the credit, in a great measure, is due to the police for having handled the Indians so well as to control the country without shedding a single drop of blood. This is a matter of very great importance, although notice has not often been called to it, and therefore it may appear to be a very small matter. I believe the mounted police, from the very first day they entered the country up to the present time, have done their duty thoroughly, and are as much entitled to scrip for services rendered during the rebellion as were the provisional corps sent up there from Kingston, Quebec, Toronto and other places which received scrip. They are all alike enrolled to serve the interests of the Dominion at large, and whether they serve in the North-West or in the older Provinces, still they are doing their duty by their country, and if rewards are going I think it is only a matter of justice that all the corps should be rewarded alike.

Mr. WATSON. I do not intend to occupy the time of the House at any length on this occasion. We have listened with interest to the remarks of the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and the other members who have spoken to day. I have simply to say that I must back up, in a great measure, the sentiments of my hon. friend, the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), with regard to the past policy of the Government in dealing with public lands in the North-West. It has always been contended by me since I have had a seat in this House, that the lands of the Dominion should be administered in the interests of the Dominion at large. It is to be regretted that we have not a larger population in the North-West and Manitoba to-day, and I hold that the land regulations of the Government have had much to do with the lack of population there. The system pursued by the Government of granting large tracts to colonisation companies, and of making large reservations that were held exclusively for sale, has had a great deal to do with the sparse settlement that exists in the North-West to-day. I am pleased to be able to state that the land regulations of to-day are better than the regulations that prevailed a few years ago, and I was also glad to learn from the Minister of Interior, in an interview I had with him this morning, that some changes will be introduced during the present Session which will considerably improve the land regulations of the North-West. In regard to the price of land referred to by the member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall), I entirely differ with him in regard to that matter. It is a bad policy to place the land at such prices that actual settlers cannot afford to buy them and enter into the actual work of farming. The price of $250 per acre to the actual settler is too high for any man to pay for land in the North-West, to be devoted exclusively to farming purposes. As I have always contended, having some knowledge of the early settlement of that country, I hold that all the lands, odd and even sections, in the interest of Canada, should have been administered for the actual settlers instead of holding them for sale. I know that as regards a considerable portion of the country I represent, the land sales of 1880-81 proved a curse to the settlers. The odd sections were sold by public competition, and the average price realised was about $2.60 per acre, the upset price being $2.50 per acre. Speculators entered into a combination to pay as little as possible over the upset price, and the lands were sold at that figure. I know they have been held by the speculators who purchased them and who hold them to-day, and they are waiting in order to try and realise the amount they paid at that sale.

Mr. WILSON. They cannot do it.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. gentleman owns some of the land himself. He purchased it at $2.60 per acre and has never had an opportunity of realising that price for it since. This has prevented settlement. In regard to land grants for railway companies, I believe it is necessary for the Government to give large tracts to encourage railway building, for the country can only be opened up by the construction of railways, and it is necessary to give a portion of the public domain for their assistance; but instead of giving land grants as in the past, I would suggest to the House and the Government that a different policy should be pursued, and that instead of giving alternate sections the Government should give alternate townships. This would be in the interest of settlement. Out of a township of thirty-six sections there are only sixteen sections available for homesteading; two sections belong to the Hudson's Bay Company, two sections are public school lands, and all the remaining odd sections are reserved for sale or for railway grants. That being the case, there are only sixteen sections in a township of six miles square that are available for homesteaders. I submit, from what knowledge I have in regard to settlement in that country, that it would be much better, in the interests of the settler and of settlement, to reserve for railway purposes, or for sale, alternate townships instead of alternate sections. I have stated that I had been informed that some amendments were to be introduced to improve the land regulations of the North-West, and I will reserve anything further I have to say until those amendments are before the House, and until they have been acted on by the Minister of Interior. I must say, however, that I approve of the principle that has been adopted by the Minister of Interior in consulting the members for Manitoba and the North-West with respect to the regulations in force in that part of the country, and I am glad to know that some matters which I have brought before this House and the department for years are now being acted upon, particularly with respect to settlers being allowed to procure dead timber for fuel, and some other matters which I suppose will be explained by the Minister of Interior.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, I must say that I speak under very unusual circumstances to-night. It is not often that we have such a beggarly array on the other side of the House. I do not know whether or not the announcement that I was about to address the House after recess is the occasion for my hon. friends of the opposite side of the House staying away.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They are more pleasantly engaged elsewhere.

Mr. DALY. Be that as it may, I am glad to see that they have left the warhorse of Prince Edward Island here, and he will probably know how to take care of me. I regret, however, that the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is not here, because I would not have spoken on this occasion had it not been that that hon. gentleman got on his feet and made some remarks which I did not think it right to pass without making some reference to, and correcting his statements. During the three Sessions that I have been in Parliament that hon. gentleman has taken occasion upon every opportunity to discuss the affairs of the North-West and Manitoba, and to make attacks upon the land laws in force there. He has reiterated here this afternoon what he stated last year and the year previous, and I learn from gentlemen who sat in this House before I did, that he repeated this afternoon what he stated during Sessions before this present Parliament opened. I do not see what is to be gained by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) standing in this House and continually reiterating and making statements which have been refuted, time and time again, from the floor of Parliament. I have had occasion during the past two years, as I have the occasion now, to refute the statements made by the hon. gentleman, and particularly the allegation which he made this afternoon that the land laws of the United States were far more liberal to the settlers than the land laws of Canada at present in operation in Manitoba and the North-West. I showed the hon. gentleman last year that this was not so. I proved to him the year previous that it was not the fact, and my hon. friend the member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross) did the same, but, notwithstanding that, he gets up and makes a general statement against the land laws without giving us any particulars to support it. If, in the opinion of the hon. gentleman, the land laws of the United States are more liberal than the land laws of Canada, why does he not make some specific statement to bear out the allegations he makes? Are the land laws of the United States more liberal than the same laws of Canada? I say that they are not as liberal as our laws, and I will prove it. All that we require is that if a young man comes to Manitoba he should be 18 years of age, and that he should have not homesteaded previously. That young man goes to the land office, he says that he is eighteen years of age, that he had not homesteaded previously, and he is given his entry. He goes out to the land, performs six months duty in each year for three years, and at the end of that time he gives notice to the nearest land agent that he wants to apply for his patent. He has not to travel thirty, or forty, or fifty miles, as the case may be, to the nearest land office, but on receipt of that notice, which he sends, an inspector is sent out, and that inspector takes the evidence of the settler and the evidence of his neighbors to show that he has fulfilled the conditions. The consequence is that within a very short time the report of the inspector is made, and the settler receives a notification from the land office to the effect that his land is recommended for patent. Now, Sir, if the settler in the North-West is a foreigner, we do not ask, when he goes to the land office, that he should become a subject of Her Majesty the Queen. We do not ask him to forswear allegiance from the country whence he came, but if a young man goes to a land office in the United States they require that he should be twenty-one years of age and in addition, if he is the subject of a foreign nation he is required to take the oath of allegiance to the President of the United States, and to forswear allegiance from the country from which he came, and particularly the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland. As I have stated before, the young settler requires to put in three years homestead duty in our lands in Manitoba or the North-West Territories. But if a young man requires a homestead in Dakota or the Territories of the United States, he has to put in five years. We offer to settlers 160 acres of a homestead, and 160 acres pre-emption, but they have no such regulation in the United States. A man cannot pre-empt after he has homesteaded, and his pre-emption means that he has gone to the land office and sworn that he is 21 years of age, that he has put in six months' residence on that pre-emption, and then he buys it at $2.50 an acre. The best way I can describe the matter, so far as this question of pre-empting lands in Dakota is concerned, is to read an extract from the very able pamphlet of W. A. Webster, which is now in the hands of most of the members of this House. At page 5, Mr. Webster says as follows:—

"The land laws here are greatly abused. To enter on land one must be a citizen 21 years old, and must reside on the land five years before he can get his patent; but the homesteader takes advantage of a clause in the Act, which allows him to commute, after six months' residence, by paying $2.50 an acre, if, during these six months, he shall have built a habitable house and cultivated ten acres of land. Now, this is the practice: Four young men enter for the land at the land office. They go to the place where the four corners of their sections meet, and there build a sod cabin 12 feet square, as a joint house for all four. They dig four holes a few feet deep and call them wells; borrow a yoke of steers and plough a few furrows around the house, and call that forty acres; sleep a few nights in the cabin and 'prove up;' mortgage their homesteads to the speculators and get money to get their patents. If they have a few dollars left they look on that as clear gain, put them in their pockets, go off to some other county where they are not known and go through the same operation again and again, while the speculator gets the land and tries to sell it for $10 an acre. One man told me that he had homesteaded nine times and was going to do so once more. The remains of those cabins are to be met with all over the prairie, without a sign of life about them. One of those deserted cabins, with a board nailed across the door, had a notice on it, of which the following is a verbatim copy:—

"Four miles from a nayber,
 "Sixty miles from a post opis,
 "Twenty miles from a ralerode,
 "A Hundred and Atey from timber,
 "250 feet from water. God bless our Home.
 "We have gone east to spend the winter with my wife's relations."

Now, Sir, it is not necessary for me to quote further from this pamphlet. I have met men in Canada who have lived in Dakota, and I have met men who are coming across again from the States to Manitoba and the North-West, and they curse the day that ever they set foot on American soil. I heard the member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), the other day, say that Canadians were returning from Dakota and Minnesota. There is no question about that fact, for they are making entries at our customs house every day. When the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) stated this afternoon, that our land laws were not as liberal as the land laws of the United States, that gentleman must have known, from the reiterated statements of myself and other members of the North-West, who probably know more about these matters than he does, that he was stating what was not correct. I cannot understand why, Session after Session, he should make that statement, if it were not for the fact that he is more interested in peopling the American North-West, than he is in peopling the North-West of Canada. The hon. gentleman says that we have a very poor showing as regards the population in Manitoba and the North-West. He stated to the House this afternoon, that the population of Manitoba is 132,000. Now, Sir, according to the census of 1885, only three years ago, the population was 108,000. So we have increased 24,000 people in population in three years. I do not think that is a bad showing, and if the hon. gentleman will examine the ratio of increase according to the census returns of the United States, he will find that our percentage of increase is as large as the percentage of increase of any state in the Union. Now, as regards immigration, I do not think that the member for South Norfolk will say that the Government is pursuing a wrong policy, as I contend they are, in not voting a larger annual sum for immigration. I think the hon. gentleman holds the same ideas with the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in effect that the Government should not be blamed for not making a larger appropriation for immigration. Let us consider where the population of Dakota and Minnesota come from. It comes from the people of the Eastern States as well as from foreign countries. Immigration from foreign countries has been flowing into Dakota and Minnesota for the last thirty or forty years. I contend that the best immigration agent for any country is a man who comes to our country and prospers and who goes back to the land from which he came and tells the friends amongst whom he lived in his early days, of his success. Give us the same length of time Dakota and Minnesota have had to populate, and I maintain that in Manitoba and the North-West we will have a larger population than they have to-day. I was told by an agent of the Local Government of Manitoba in Ontario, a month ago, that there were over 2,000 Manitobans in Quebec and Ontario. Those 2,000 men will do more to populate our country—and possibly to depopulate your older Provinces down here—than all the immigration pamphlets you could have printed. If we look at the Argentine Republic, which is seeking to increase its population, we will find that it is spending five million dollars this year on immigration. It is making every possible effort to take people there. What I maintain is, that if our Government gave us a more liberal immigration grant, our population would probably increase at a greater ratio. But, however that may be, I am perfectly satisfied that it is only a matter of time when our population will be just as great as that of Dakota and the other western territories of the United States. Any hon. gentleman from that country will tell you to-day that we have a contented, a happy and a prosperous people. When I tell you that the little town I come from, although scarcely seven years old, in 1887 shipped 8,000,000 pounds of freight, you will come to the conclusion that we have made great progress. We, last year, shipped 1,500,000 bushels of wheat. All that ought to be required of the members of this House, either those from our Province, or those from the other Provinces, is to have faith in our great North-West—to believe that it is only a matter of time when that country will be peopled; and if the people who are to come in should be of the same class as those there now, we shall have the fairest Province in this great Confederation. The hon. gentleman, by his remarks this afternoon, would give those who are imperfectly informed to understand that it is better for a man who wants to emigrate to go to Dakota, or some other part of the United States, than to go to Manitoba, or our own North-West. That must be the natural conclusion to be drawn from his remarks, because he made the general statement that Dakota and Minnesota were more prosperous than the Canadian North-West, and that their land laws were more liberal. Let any American newspaper man or railway man take the speech of the hon. gentleman, and he could obtain half a dozen emigrants with it. Now, what is the condition of the people of Dakota, as compared with the condition of our own people? Take the matter of taxation. Mr. Webster states in his pamphlet, among other things, at page 14:

"And I further affirm that there is no emigration from Manitoba to Dakota, for the above and other reasons; and, further, the near future of Dakota, financially, is not of the kind to inspire confidence in the mind of a thoughtful immigrant farmer. On the 1st of June, 1887, the farm mortgage debt of Dakota was $45,000,000. That sum, if equally divided, would be a mortgage of $400 on every family in Dakota. But all are not farmers; so much the worse for those that are. At the same date the average six mortgages on six sections of 160 acres was $800, drawing an interest of 10 per cent. Add to this the county debts, averaging $30,000, and the thoughtful farmer can see why taxes are high, and why it is hard to make wheat growing profitable in Dakota."

He says with regard to Manitoba:

"I know of no country in which municipal taxes are as low as in Manitoba. Nature made the roads, leaving only the bridges for the municipalities to build."

In this connection, I may say that our municipal taxes in Manitoba in the last few years have been very much reduced, and there are several municipalities in the county of Brandon that have balances in the bank. The city of Brandon, on the 1st of January, after providing for the interest on its coupons and for every other demand, had $3,500 to its credit in the bank; the municipality of Elton had $4,000; and the municipality of Cornwallis had $1,500. The municipality of Oak Lake and the municipality of Blanchard, in the county of Marquette, had also large balances in the bank. If the municipalities are prosperous, I think that is good evidence that the people must be prosperous. Now, I say in answer to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that our land laws are far more liberal than those prevailing in Dakota and the western States; and it does not behoove him, or any other member of this House, to make the general statement he has made. Our land laws have not been all that we could have wished them to be; but if any hon. gentleman imagines that the land laws of the United States are perfect, all he has to do is to go to the library to find volume after volume of the decisions of the land officers at Washington, and to find that they have had more trouble with their land laws than we have had. There are certain matters that we would like to have changed, but we are glad to have as Minister of the Interior a gentleman who has spent eight or ten years of his life in the North-West, and is conversant with our wants and requirements; and as the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) said this afternoon, from the interview that we had with the hon. Minister to-day, we are satisfied that he is desirous of giving the settlers of that country all that is required to make the land laws of this Parliament satisfactory to them. I do not wish to state anything of what occurred at that interview; but as the representative of one of the constituencies of Manitoba, I am well satisfied with what the hon. Minister promised. When the new land regulations are laid before the House, we shall have a full discussion of the question, and I will reserve any further remarks I have to make until that occasion.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am very glad indeed to hear the glowing accounts given by the hon. gentleman of the prosperity of the North-West. I am sure it is a matter of great satisfaction to us all to learn that the prospects of the country are so bright. We shall indeed be pleased to see a large influx of population into that country. I also listened with great interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). He put the case of the settlers in very plain and pointed terms, and endeavored to show what changes were, in his opinion, necessary in the land regulations. I think it will not be denied that things occurred in that country which we have to regret, and that mistakes have been made in connection with the land regulations. It was a very unfortunate arrangement by which the Government permitted large sections of that country to be taken up by colonisation companies and withheld from actual settlers for years, so that many persons who went in there were prevented from settling where they wanted to. If the arrangements had been such that the actual settler could have gone in and taken up land wherever he wished to locate, I believe a larger population would be there than there is at present. These are matters that we have to deplore, and I earnestly hope, along with the gentlemen who have spoken, that the Minister now in charge of that department will make such changes as will give the actual settler greater advantages than he has enjoyed in that country hitherto. But while we are prepared to lend our hearty encouragement to every movement that will tend to fill that country with population and promote its development, that would tend to bring it up to the standard where I would like to see it, a great populous and wealthy country. There is another side of the question that has not been touched by any hon. gentleman opposite, the question of expense. I hold that in their arrangements the Government have expended enormous sums of money for the purpose of meeting the wishes of political friends and finding soft and easy resting places for those who were pressing upon them for lucrative positions. When we come to consider the condition of things as we find them by the Auditor General's Report, we have to deplore the fact that an enormous amount of money has been expended compared with the amount received in return. I find that we expended altogether last year, including the expenses of the Winnipeg board, and the expenses west of Winnipeg, as follows: Dominion lands, outside service, $149,536.61. We expended on the Half breed Commission $6,714.39, and we expended on the registrars, of whom we have seven, $13,386.32. Now this is in all an expenditure for officials in the North-West, including the Land Board at Winnipeg, and all west of that, of $169,637.32. Now, what were our receipts? Our entire income last year from the sales of lands, mainly coal lands, ranching grants, and all other sources was $267,973.51, leaving a balance to our credit of $98,336.18. That virtually means that for all the money received in the North-West, we have actually paid out 60 per cent. for hired service, agents, inspectors, travellers, and the like. I want to give a resume of the account, as it now stands, for the last year. As I stated before, we have expended $149,534.61 under the head of Dominion lands account. That includes contingencies. Then we have expended in the Department of the Interior, inside service, salaries here at Ottawa, $35,011.43; on surveys, $136,009.02; salaries at Ottawa, Dominion lands, $76,604.67; contingencies at Ottawa belonging to Department of Interior, $22,137.02. In all we have expended in the Department of Interior, including the expenses in Ottawa, and the expenses in the North-West, and the surveys, $420,744.76. Now, let us look at the receipts. We have received from Dominion lands and ranching leases, &c., $217,688.01; from ordnance lands, $36,239.88; from the registry office, $7,212.02; fines and forfeitures, $7,065.76; and other fines $372.79; in all we have collected $267,973.50. Deducting that from our expenditure, we are actually at a positive loss in the operation of the Department, including the surveys for last year, of $166,172.22, but allowing that the surveys performed last year, which cost $106,000, should be charged to capital account, we are actually at a loss of $60,172.22, on last year's operations. Now, to give the House a little idea of the manner in which this condition of things is brought about I will just give you the list of the different receipts and expenditures of the Dominion land agencies in the North-West :

In all the North-West, we collected during the last year for lands, ranching grants, coal dues, and for all purposes that come within the range of Dominion lands, $192,640.43, and we actually expended for the services of registrars, inspectors, agents and others, $153,740.24, leaving a net balance to our credit of $38,900.15. I will give you a little idea of the expenses at Winnipeg. They are really surprising. To begin with, Mr. William Pearce, superintendent of mines, has a salary of $3,200; Mr. H. H. Smith, commissioner, has a salary of $5,000 a year; Mr. Rufus Stephenson, inspector of colorisation companies, gets $3,000; and I venture to say that there are people in the Province of Ontario who will make a declaration before any judge or jury that Mr. Stephenson was not in the North-West altogether four months, and was in his comfortable home in Ontario at least eight months of the year for which he drew $3,000 as inspector, and over $3,000 for expenses. Then we come to Mr. D. J. Macdonnell. He is employed in the Land Office at Winnipeg, and gets $3 a day. Mr. J. M. Gordon, inspector of agencies, receives $2,000 a year. Mr. Dolbear receives $3 a day. Mr. Burpé receives $1,800 a year; and so it goes on. The total expense of the Land Board at Winnipeg is $30,745.57. But we have seven agencies in the North-West, and to give an idea of the expenses of these agencies, I will read some of the items. Mr. E. T. Smith, the agent at Brandon, has a salary of $1,200 a year. Mr. W. H. Hiam has a salary of $1,200 a year. Mr. A. W. Reynolds, in the same agency, receives $3 a day. Mr. C. D. Rickards has about the same salary, and there are a lot of other men. At Calgary, we have Mr. Amos Rowe receiving $1,200. Mr. Meyer receiving over $1,000 a year. Mr. Michael Harris the same, and Mr. McQuilken receiving about the same. In addition to that, there is Mr. T. A. McLean, registrar, receiving $1,200 a year, and Mr. Rochester receiving $3 a day, and many others. The sums paid in that agency run up in the same ratio. I cannot understand how hon. gentlemen opposite can expect that the people will put up with the extravagance which exists in the North West. It appears to be filled up by officials who never did anything and, since they have been sent there, do nothing. At Prince Albert, I find that Mr. J. McTaggart, agent, receives $1,200; Mr. Schmidt, clerk, is employed at $3 a day; Mr. Sproat, registrar, receives $1,200; and Mr. Waggoner, crown timber agent, receives the same amount. In addition to that, $240 is paid to Mrs. E. W. Sproat for rent for the registry office, and there are a number of other officials who receive smaller salaries. At Regina, Mr. W. H. Stevenson, agent, receives $1,200; A. J. Fraser, clerk, $1,095. There is also there a Mr. P. M. Barker, instructor of registrars. This is a most peculiar thing. We have only seven registrars in the North-West, and, in order to give these men information as to how they should do their duty, we have to send up an instructor. I do not know for a certainty who this Mr. Barker is, but I think he once lived in Orangeville, and

I think he is related to the hon. member for Simcoe. If I am wrong, I can be corrected. However, Mr. Barker is there, and for instructing the registrars in these seven offices he receives $1,600 a year and travelling expenses. I say it is an outrage on the people of this country to ask them to put up with this condition of things. The Government have inaugurated a most extravagant course in the North-West. The average salary paid at the different offices, leaving out Winnipeg, where the cost is over $30,000 a year, is $7,700 for each of the 16 agencies. I think it is time that a host of these unnecessary officers were discharged from the service, and that the Government should cut down the expenses within reasonable and decent limits. When we consider the glowing statements that were made in this House from year to year, as to what would likely be the result in the North-West, we cannot forget what Sir Charles Tupper stated we might expect. The Premier, when he was trying to induce the House to pass the vote of $30,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, said he had made a careful calculation based on his extended experience and also on information received from other sources, and that he was in a position to assure the House that we might reasonably anticipate that by the year 1890 we would have gathered out of that country $71,305,000. Instead of that, in 1889, we find that we are $160,000 short of expenses. Then Sir Leonard Tilley in his Budget Speech delivered shortly before he left us, gave a very glowing account of what he looked forward to as the result of our enterprise in the North-West. He told us that he had carefully made out his figures, and he was a little more careful than the First Minister, but he said he believed that by the year 1891 we would have a net balance from the North-West of $53,693,251. If it had not been for these statements, if it had not been for the assurance given by men of experience and possessing, as they did largely, the confidence of the people of the country, I say that the people would never at the last election have endorsed the course which hon. gentlemen took in connection with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We are perfectly willing to acknowledge that it was a necessity, that it was desirable that it should be built, but the course of extravagance which was followed in building it, and in the way in which money was dealt out in order to keep members of this House in line, was nothing short of a disgrace, and the people were deceived in regard to the prospect of the result of the building of that road. Instead of our getting seventy-one millions as we were promised in 1890, or fifty-three millions as we were promised in 1891, we find a large balance chargeable to that country for managing expenses alone, and we do not take into account the immense amount of money which was spent on the unfortunate war there, in which about $8,000,000 were spent unnecessarily, because, if the proper steps had been taken, that war would not have occurred. We do not take into account the cost of the Mounted Police, the number of which was raised from 500 to 1,000. The expense of that force last year was $860,000, and $876,000 was expended for feeding Indians. Putting these sums with the amount on the debit side for the administration of the land office alone, we find that we are over $2,000,000 short on the transactions of last year. When these men from Manitoba and the North-West are urging extended and liberal action towards that country, I think it behoves the people to cry a halt in the expenditures there. There are a number of useless officials in the North-West who are enjoying a good time at the expense of the country, and the sooner they are removed, and the staff cut down to the number required for the necessities of the service, the better for the people. When a short time ago the leader of the House, who is not at present in his seat, characterised it as being a "happy hunting ground for political hacks," he called it really what it had been made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and it is time we should put a stop to it. Why, Sir, hon. gentlemen should feel ashamed that a man like Rufus Stephenson should be foisted upon this country, both he and his son, he himself drawing $3,000 a year and travelling expenses, and a son in an office in Winnipeg drawing $2,000; and I do not know how many more relations he has living upon the country, I believe that every relation he has will be provided for at the public expense if this Government continues much longer in power. Now, Sir, I say it is time that we called a halt; it is time the Government were in a position to announce to this House that they intend to stop the extravagance that exists in the North-West. We shall be glad to encourage them in the direction of securing an increase of settlement. We do not deny that it is absolutely necessary in the interest of this Dominion that the country should be settled. We will offer then every encouragement, we will say every word we can in its favor. I believe myself it is going to be a great country, I believe it is the best unsettled country on the continent of America to-day. But I am sorry to say that by the blunders of this Government, by the manner in which that country has been handled and operated in the interests of political friends, by the manner in which her resources have been squandered, timber limits, land grants, and one thing and another having been used for political purposes, to serve political ends, that country in the past has been cursed, and I hope that curse will now be removed, and that in the future every inducement possible will be held out to the people of the old world to come there and make comfortable homes for themselves, and that the restrictions that have weighed upon settlement there, and have driven people across the border, will be removed. I say, that so far as the older sections of the country is concerned, we cannot afford to go on and spend recklessly, in the way we have been doing, the money of the people of this country in a manner that is altogether unnecessary. I claim that it is quite unnecessary. I claim that no man who will go through that country, as I went through it, and see on every hand fellows in official position, fellows occupying easy quarters and drawing large salaries, but will come to the conclusion that that country has been cursed. I hope the Minister, now in charge will put in the pruning hook at once, and that whatever the evils of the past may have been in regard to officials there, these evils will now be put a stop to. Why, Sir, there are evils in other directions. I am sorry to say, that my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is no exception, because I see that the organ of which undoubtedly he is chief—or used to be, and I suppose he is still—is getting $5,000 a year for printing. It appears that every one who supports the Government thinks he must get some little picking, some little advantage for himself. Now, I say we have had enough of this thing, it has just gone far enough, in the interests of the people of this country, and I hope that the members of this House will stand shoulder to shoulder, and persistently sit upon this thing, and not permit it to exist any longer, cut off these unnecessary and extravagant officials, and come down to a common sense position. The course that we have been pursuing in the past in the North West, has been a curse to the country; we have cursed it by our land regulations; we have cursed it by our mining regulations, by our railway regulations and in other ways; now let us remove all the restrictions and give the people an opportunity to rise, let us take off the unnecessary burden put upon them in the way of officials that are now roaming around that country, and cut down the expenditure to what is actually necessary. Then I believe that the country will prosper and will go on prospering. But I believe if you do not do that, if you allow this horde of officials and these monopolies to continue to exist as they have in the past, the same curse will continue to rest upon that country. Now, I consider it my duty, in the interest of the constituency I represent, and the Province from which I come, to make these remarks. I do not offer any objection to one word that has been said by the representatives of that country; I give them credit for advocating the cause of their country; they would not be doing their duty if they did not advocate it, but I also hold that it is our duty to keep control of these things. We, in the older Provinces, have an interest in that country, because we have to help to bear the burden, we have got to pay the taxes, we have to contribute towards the enormous sums that will annually fall upon the shoulders of the people of this country to meet the annual expense and the enormously increased interest on our public debt, to pay for the improvements that have been made up there; and I say it is our duty to raise our voice in the interests of the people and to declare that we object to see the taxes increased from year to year, that we object to see imposed upon them new burdens which cannot be rolled away for many years to come. I hope the course of this House will show the Minister of Interior that we desire him to put in the pruning hook, and let us begin at once to do what we ought to have done long ago.

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta). In speaking upon these resolutions passed by the Legislative Assembly of the North-West last November, and that have been laid upon the Table by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), I wish to say he has echoed my sentiments exactly. In the first part of his speech he also gave us a glowing description of the agricultural capacity of the North-West. There was one industry, however, which he did not speak of, and that is the ranching industry. We have in the district of Alberta, as you all know, a large expanse of open prairies, where we can graze cattle the year round. We have in the northern portion of the territory some of the finest, if not the very finest, farming land that lies out of doors. All we require is a railway in the North Saskatchewan country in order to develop that immense wheat country. Speaking of the ranching country, I may say that in the southern portion of Alberta you will see herds of cattle which have been put into that country during the last five years. There are at present, I suppose, about 130,000 horned cattle in the district of Alberta. The first year we had to import cattle, but last year I suppose the district of Alberta exported 5,000 head of steers, and probably as many more were consumed for home consumption, making 10,000 head of steers, while, five years ago, we had to import all the beef that was used in the country from the United States. Now these 10,000 head of steers, at $40 a piece—which they would bring at least, while many of them brought $50—would make $400,000 for that new industry that has been established in the North-West. Then we have another industry that has just been established in that country, and that is the raising of horses. We have at present, I presume, at least 20,000 in the district of Alberta, and I wish to remind the Minister of Agriculture that in his quarantine list he has left out horses. I see he has discriminated against all other animals except horses, I wish he would include horses on the list in his quarantine regulations. They are raising a great many horses in the vast country to the south of us, and we know at the present time there is some disease amongst horses on the south side of the line; therefore I think the Minister ought to put horses on the list, but I would not advise him to give as many days as he does in the case of cattle. Then within the last few years in the district of Alberta there have been large tracts of land held by speculators from the east who never intended to put stock on them. The present Minister of Interior, since he assumed office, has thrown open at least 1,500,000 acres which, otherwise, would not have been opened to settlers, and this has brought a great many people to our section of the country with a view to settling there, while previously no one thought of going there as it was considered that if the land was leased a man could not settle on it. This action of the Government has removed all cause of complaint in that direction. There is now sufficient land of the very finest class thrown open to which settlers can go and have the advantage of being near towns where they can carry on mixed farming and enjoy the best advantages. The first resolution passed by the Legislative Assembly reads as follows:—

“That this Assembly regards the question as of first importance and urges the Dominion Government to take immediate action in giving an outlet by railway to the pioneer settlements of the North Saskatchewan.”

Edmonton, Prince Albert and St. Albert are old settlements, I suppose Fort Edmonton was established 100 years ago, and all that these towns and the outlying country require is railway communication to make them, as I have said, the Garden of Eden. The next resolution is with respect to the half-breeds resident in the electoral districts bordering on the North Saskatchewan. The North Saskatchewan runs both through my district, that of Alberta, and the Saskatchewan district. There are a great many half-breeds who live on the border of the Saskatchewan River, having settled there in old days. The resolution to which I refer reads as follows:—

“Whereas it has been represented to this Assembly by some of its members that among the half-breeds resident in the electoral districts bordering on the Saskatchewan, who preferred claims for losses during the rebellion of 1885 before the Commissioners on such claims, and whose claims have been rejected, some, who were known to have been loyal, had their claims rejected, while others who were known to have been directly implicated in the uprising have had their claims allowed. That such apparent discrimination has given rise to a wide spread feeling among the half-breeds referred to that those who remained loyal have not received the justice intended by the Government at the hands of the Commissioners. Be it resolved, &c.”

I think that a commission should be appointed, as the resolution sets forth, consisting of a judge of the Supreme Court of the North-West Territories, so that all claims may be wiped out, and not be brought before Parliament year after year. The next resolution upon which I will touch was passed on the 23rd of last November, and it sets forth:

“That in the opinion of that Assembly a vote of the Territories on the question of license versus prohibition should immediately be taken.”

This is one of the most burning questions of the North-West. The people should be allowed to decide whether they would have free whiskey or high license, or have the liquor as in the Eastern Provinces. Liquor is now brought into the country, and the Government derive no revenue from it. I have no doubt, if a vote of the people were taken to-morrow, every man in the business of selling liquor would vote against free whiskey and with the temperance party, simply because to do otherwise would be to destroy his means of livelihood. There are in Calgary to-day not less than 25 saloons selling liquor. Neither the town of Calgary nor the Dominion Government derive any revenue from that sale. It will be asked, where does the liquor come from? It comes from British Columbia, Manitoba and Montana. Under these circumstances, it would be better if the people of the North-West were allowed to have a vote on this subject, or at least be placed on the same footing as the people in other portions of the Dominion, so that they could pass the Scott Act or not as they desired. It is certain that you can never prohibit the sale of liquor in the North-West as long as it is manufactured. I hope, therefore, that the Government will take this resolution more especially under their consideration, and will endeavor to deal with it in such a way that we can have this question settled either by the vote of the people or by the Dominion Parliament. The next resolution takes up the question of immigration. I think the Government should without doubt grant more liberal aid to immigration to the North-West than they have given hitherto. There should be immense quantities of pamphlets circulated through all portions of Europe, the United States and even Eastern Canada. I venture to say that the United States Government have sent out ten car loads of immigration pamphlets to one sent by the Dominion Government, and the reason why their country has been settled is because it has been advertised. With regard to placing agents in Great Britain and the United States, I fully agree with the resolution and the remarks of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). It is asked that the sum of $15,000 be placed at the disposal of the Territories, and this would be a mere drop in the bucket as compared with other expenses that are going on, and it would benefit the country tenfold. The next resolution deals with the subject of the settlers being allowed to use dry wood for fuel. That, I believe, has been already arranged, and I have simply to say that the people of the North West should be allowed to burn up the dry wood that is going to waste without paying revenue to the Dominion. There is another question I wish to urge upon the Minister of Inland Revenue, and that is the appointment of a hide inspector at McLeod and Calgary. At the present time when so many cattle are being shipped out of the country, it has become very important that all the hides should be inspected before the cattle leave the country. Even if a man kills meat on the prairie he should be compelled to bring in the hides, so that it would be known whether he had killed his own animals or those of his neighbors. The cost would be but very light and it could easily be paid out of the revenue, by simply putting a fee upon our hide inspector. In this same resolution the Assembly recommends as follows:—

“As under the Half-breed Commission of the 20th March, 1885, the Indian title, in as far as half-breeds are concerned, only extends to those born prior to 15th July, 1870, and as a number have been born to parents coming under the said Commission of 1885, who in the opinion of this Assembly have equal rights to those already dealt with: This Assembly would draw the attention of the Dominion Government to the fact and urge that steps be taken to finally end all half-breed claims.”

We all know that there are quite a number of half-breeds in the North-West Territories who when this treaty was made with them in 1870 were in Manitoba, but before they were settled with they moved to the North-West. Those people were not settled with until 1885 and then only those who were included in the Treaty of 1870 had their claims met by the Government, leaving the children born between 1870 and 1885 out of the treaty. There is no reason in the world why those children should not receive the same benefits as the other so long as their title is not extinguished. If the Government had paid everyone of them in 1870 there would probably have been no rebellion in 1885. I would strongly recommend to the Government that this matter should be attended to at once and that the claims of those excluded from the treaties should be considered in the same way as the claims of the others, viz., by a commission of the judges of the North-West Territories. The Assembly also recommends:

“That the Dominion Government be asked to grant scrip to all those acting during the North-West Rebellion as scouts under the Police Act.”

They also recommend that the North-West Mounted Police, who rendered valuable services during the rebellion, should be rewarded. I think that this is a very fair request to make to the Government. There is not the slightest doubt that any one who acted as a scout during the rebellion, as well as the members of the North-West Mounted Police force should receive the same compensation as others. They are certainly better entitled to recognition at the hands of the Government than many of those who received it. I cannot see why the scouts and the Mounted Police should not be treated the same as the militia and volunteer forces. They did as good work as any of the others, and they should receive the same reward. They have been precluded from even the small recompense of receiving medals, with the exception of just a few who were in actual combat. I know that some of the home guards who never left their homes at all were presented with medals, but the police and the scouts who took an active part were left out in the cold. Whether the police were in action or not, I hold that every man of them who was in the field should at least receive a medal. Those medals would not cost much; I suppose not more than $1.25 each, and that amount would never be felt by the Dominion of Canada. Another resolution of the Assembly says:

"We, your committee, find that several trails are made use of for carrying Her Majesty's mails, as well as being the main highways leading from one settlement to another. We find that certain streams, rivers and sloughs on those trails form strong impediments, not only to settlement, but interfere, to a great extent, in the conveyance of Her Majesty's mails, besides causing an increased expenditure of that very important item.

"The condition of some of those trails, at certain seasons of the year, has proven to be dangerous to life and property, and communication between the different settlements made most difficult and supplies not only rendered much dearer, but, in fact, almost impossible to obtain.

"Such a condition of affairs is a most important element in retarding settlement and the proper development of the Territories, and as the funds at the disposal of the Territorial Government are insufficient to make the necessary improvements, and we consider the Dominion Government especially interested in those trails, we would, therefore, urge that the Dominion Government appropriate a special sum to be expended on the following trails, viz.:—

"From Macleod to Calgary.

"From Calgary to Edmonton and Athabasca Landing.

"From Swift Current to Battleford.

"From Qu'Appelle to Prince Albert."

I call particular attention to the necessity for improving the trail between Macleod and Calgary. There are four rivers on that trail which during at least four months in the year are almost impossible to cross, and only one, at Elbow River, is bridged at the present time. I would urge on the members of the Cabinet, and especially on the Minister of Public Works, to see that an appropriation is put in the Estimates for the bridging of these streams. The work is most important to the people of that district, and it should not be neglected. The same remarks apply to the trail from Calgary to Edmonton, and the trail from Lethbridge to Macleod. This latter trail is only a short distance of thirty miles, and we have two of the largest rivers of the North-West to cross on it, which at all seasons of the year are unfordable. In the spring when the ice is soft and coming down, it is almost impossible to get across this river in any way. Not only are those rivers dangerous to property, but scarcely a spring passes that there are not lives lost there. Permit me to make some comments on the statements of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) with regard to colonisation companies in the North-West, for I have some experience up there, and I know something about the condition of things in the Territories. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that the two colonisation companies in the district of Alberta have been a great benefit to the country, instead, as he would try to make out, an injury and a disadvantage. There are only two companies in operation at the present time in the North West, as the lands held by the others have been thrown open, but I can say that these two companies have been a boon to that section of the country. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the expenses incurred in connection with the administration of affairs in the North-West and it is a subject which he has been constantly growling about in this House. It has got to be a chestnut with the hon. member and I have heard him singing the same old song for the last three years. If we ask for the expenditure of public money up there it is because we need it to develop our great country, and whatever is expended on us now is in a sense only borrowed money, for in a few years we will be able to pay it back to the Dominion Treasury one hundred fold. The hon. member has spoken of the high salaries paid to Dominion land agents. They get the small sum of $1,200 a year each and when a man has to board himself out of that in the Territories it cannot be considered in any sense a high salary. Why, we have to pay a cowboy $600 a year and board him into the bargain, and if he is a first class man we have to pay him $1,800 a year and board him too. Talk about $1,200 a year to a Dominion land agent who must be an educated and intelligent man, who knows the country, when we have to pay sometimes nearly double that to a good cowboy. I should say that the Government ought raise the salaries of the land agents to $1,500 a year and then it would look more like decent pay. The hon. gentleman has also spoken of the office expenses of those registry offices. What does he want to do with them? Does he want to close them all up and let them take care of themselves? I suppose that would be his remedy and that would be his policy to bring population and settlers into the North-West Territories. There is another matter to which I wish to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite who are constantly complaining in this House about the expense of feeding the Indians. I have lived a good while in the North-West and I know more about the Indians than some of the hon. gentlemen who pretend to dictate to us the way in which we should treat them. Let me tell those members that they will find it a great deal cheaper to feed the small number of Indians that we are feeding at the present time than to have constantly a row on our hands. It is a good deal easier to feed the Indians than to fight them, a fact which they have learned in the United States, and of which they have bitter experience. I shall not take up the time of this House further on this question. There are other matters effecting the interests of the North-West which will be brought to the attention of Parliament and the members interested in that district will probably have an opportunity of referring to them again.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I do not propose to occupy the time of the House with any lengthened remarks on this subject to-night, because I think several opportunities will be afforded before the close of the Session for dealing with almost every subject touched on by hon. gentlemen to-day. I think, by this time the House will have found out that there is more than one "funnel" through which we can obtain very valuable and interesting information, with regard to North-West matters. I am sure, we feel very much indebted to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) for bringing up these questions, and not only making hon. gentlemen acquainted with the resolutions passed by the Legislative Assembly last autumn, but affording an opportunity for an expression of views by hon. gentlemen who are interested in our western country, and giving myself and the Government an opportunity for giving a greater and more intelligent consideration to the several matters included in his resolution. The hon. gentleman went over these resolutions seriatim; but I do not think an extended reply will be expected from me, because hon. gentlemen are aware, that all these memorials are now under the consideration of the Government, and the Government's reply to them, will in a very short time be forwarded to the Lieutenant Governor for the information of his Legislative Assembly. The hon. gentleman was kind enough, in connection with the resolution which he considered of great importance, the prohibition resolution, to say, that he sympathised with me during the years that the permit system was placed under my control. All I can say in reference to that is that I did not find the duty a very pleasant one, and I sympathise with my successor who is now in my shoes in dealing with it. I shall only be too glad to see some change made in that respect. As I said to my constituents last autumn when addressing them, I do not care much what change may be made, because I think no change can be made that will not be an improvement on the present system. During the seven years that I occupied the position of Lieutenant Governor, I carried out the duties connected with that disagreeable portion of my office to the best of my ability; and in looking back over those years, I do not consider that if I had to perform those duties over again, I could perform them with greater justice or conscientiousness than I did. In regard to another important matter which has been referred to by my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall), namely, the appeal made on behalf of the half-breeds, I may say that the Government are giving very serious attention to that matter, and I am sure that they feel inclined to do all they possibly can to carry out the views expressed by my hon. friends from the North West. With regard to the appeals also made on behalf of the scouts and the Mounted Police who were engaged during the rebellion, for scrip, that is a matter which it appears to me should receive the favorable consideration of the Government, and I shall exercise what little influence I have to bring about the wishes of my hon. friend. With regards to the remarks of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), I may say that I do not agree with him in the views he has expressed with regard to our land laws. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) spoke very freely on that subject, when I think my hon. friend from Norfolk was not in the House, stating that on several occasions he has differed from the hon. gentleman on the subject of our land laws as compared with those of the United States. He, as well as some other hon. members, consider our land laws as liberal if not more liberal than those of the United States. However, I am not as well acquainted with those laws as the hon. gentleman opposite; but it does appear to me very singular that hon. gentlemen should differ so much in that respect. One feature of the United States land regulations may be more liberal than ours, for while within the railway belt, some 50 to 80 miles on each side of the railway, what is known as the chequer-board system is adopted, outside this belt a settler can homestead on every quarter-section. That may be better than our policy, and I do not see how our policy can be improved except as suggested by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) by giving land grants to railways in alternate townships instead of in alternate sections. I agree with him in that entirely, and I may say that the Government in dealing with any application made to them are acting upon that view, and in future when any land grants are given, they will be given in that way. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and several other members have diverged a good deal from what I expected would be the line of the debate. That hon. gentleman came loaded with figures which I was not quite able to follow, and which I am not able at present to controvert. I may say that I was also loaded up with figures, but unfortunately I have left my gun behind me. But I differ from the hon. gentleman in the conclusions he has arrived at, and I hope to take some other opportunity of giving a comparison as to the cost of management of the North-West under the present Government with the cost during the years the hon. gentleman's friends were in power. I can show him that our management has been infinitely more economical than theirs. Now the hon. member for South Norfolk stated that he thought that our policy had been wrong in not putting up to competition coal lands, pasture lands and timber lands. Well, we have a very large coal area, and I am not aware that there is any great demand or rush for those coal lands, and I do not think that if they were put up at auction we would derive more benefit from them than we do now. It requires very large capital to enter into the coal mining enterprise, and for that reason there is not a very great demand in that direction. Our coal area is of immense extent, and the coal is a very valuable commodity, which should be carefully handled and protected, and in whatever we do our great aim should be to have it worked as economically as possible, and get it into the hands of the settlers at as cheap a rate as possible. I intend to take measures similar to those taken in the United States in order to prevent any monopoly of our coal deposits, and will bring in an amendment to this effect when dealing with our Lands Act. With regard to our rancho lands, I do not think, if they were put up at auction, we should derive any more financial benefit from them than we do. The policy, when leases were first established, was to induce ranchmen to bring capital into the country in order to start the cattle industry there. The price we have obtained for those leases has not been extravagant, but a great many of those who have leases are not paying their rent, and I do not think they intend paying it, as they do not consider the privileges they derive from their leases sufficient to induce them to pay their rent. I do not think if we were to put those ranches up at auction that we would get any greater benefit from them than we do. As regards timber limits, no doubt the hon. gentleman knows that for some years past they have been put up at competition. With regard to the land law generally, in which of late I have taken special interest, I feel very much in the same way as do my colleagues in the North-West. I am as anxious as they are that we should do all we can in the interest of the settlers. In all new countries, whether mining or agricultural, the early pioneer is the one who has to face the greatest difficulties, and the one we ought to protect and assist as much as possible. I was glad to hear from the hon. member from Marquette and others that the interview we had this morning in regard to matters generally in the North-West was satisfactory, and that some conclusions I had arrived at were satisfactory to those hon. gentlemen. I shall be always willing at any time to receive their suggestions and do my share in bringing about any changes which will be in the interests of the settlers. It is hardly the time for me to answer the hon. member from North Wellington. I may say that my impression is that the officials are not overpaid, and I may tell the hon. gentleman that I had this morning an appeal from the members of the west who waited upon me, and who certainly know what they are talking about, to increase the salaries of certain officials in the North-West Territories. I do not think I need detain the House longer except to thank my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) for bringing this matter up, and giving me an opportunity of hearing the different views of hon. gentlemen, which will be of great assistance to the Government in coming to a conclusion on the subject under discussion.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE COMBINATIONS.

On the Order being called for second reading of Bill (No. 11) for the prevention and suppression of combinations formed in restraint of trade.—(Mr. Wallace.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would ask the hon. gentleman to let that stand.

Mr. WALLACE. The Government proposes to take next Thursday as Government day, and I would like to have the assurance of the hon. gentleman that opportunity will be given me to bring the Bill before the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no hesitation in saying that an opportunity will be given to have the Bill read the second time.

Motion allowed to stand.

PROTECTION TO LABORERS.

On the Order being called for the second reading of Bill (No. 53) for the protection of persons employed by contractors engaged in the construction of railways under Acts passed by the Parliament of Canada.—(Mr. Purcell.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow that Order to stand, as the Bill has only been distributed to-day.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity to bring the Bill down again.

Motion allowed to stand.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 9:50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 1st March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

WRECKING IN CANADIAN WATERS.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK presented report of the Select Committee on Bill (No. 2) to permit foreign vessels to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters.

Mr. CHARLTON. I was a member of that committee and failed to get the notice to attend. The hon. member for North Essex was also a member of the committee and was absent, and I regret that the committee has taken action in the matter in the absence of two members most directly interested.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am sorry that the hon. members referred to were absent, but I presumed the notices were sent to them as well as to the others. The committee were unanimous in the report they made, and it did not occur to us that we should postpone the proceedings of the committee to find out whether the hon. gentleman intended to attend or to take any further interest in the matter. I can only say that there was a full quorum. There were ten members of the committee present, and they were unanimous in the report made.

Mr. BOWELL. It would be as well, as the Bill is materially changed from the original Bill, to have it reprinted for circulation among the members.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I received notice to attend, and there was a large number present, who were unanimous in their finding.

Mr. CHARLTON. I received notice after the committee had met, and I went to the room at eleven o'clock, but the committee had adjourned.

P. E. I.—WINTER COMMUNICATION.

Mr. LANDRY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 96) to incorporate the Prince Edward Island and Continental Railway and Ferry Company. He said: I would ask leave to call the attention of the Government and of this House to the importance of this Bill. I shall not make any extended remarks at this stage, because on the second reading I shall have an opportunity of speaking at greater length.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

I wish simply to point out now that we hope, if this Bill becomes law and this company is organised, that, in the carrying out of the intentions of this Act, the contract between Prince Edward Island and the rest of the Dominion as to winter communication will be more effectually carried out than it has been in the past. From that point of view, I think it is a Bill of very great importance, and I therefore wish to ask the attention especially of the Government, as well as of other members, to the measure.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ESTREATED RECOGNISANCES BILL.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 97) to amend chapter 179 of the Revised Statutes. He said: Under the Indictable Offences Act, and the Summary Convictions Act, provision is made in a number of sections to enable the magistrate before whom an accused person is brought, or a person who gives evidence, to take recognisances for the appearance of the accused afterwards, or that the person will prosecute, or that the witness will attend, or for his reappearance on an adjournment, or for the appearance of a person who has been seized on a distress warrant, but it is not provided what the magistrate is to do with the recognisance when he takes it. Two or three years ago, an Act was passed in regard to the manner in which recognisances were to be estreated, but there is no provision in the existing law, by which these recognisances should be forwarded to the Superior Courts, in order that they may be enforced. It is to fill up that hiatus in the law that I have introduced this Bill, and I trust the Minister of Justice will examine into it, and, if he finds, as I am sure he will find, that I am right, that there is a very great omission in the existing law, the consequences of which are that prisoners go unwhipped of justice, he will take the Bill under his wing and will give it Government support, so as to allow it to get through this Session.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COMMERCIAL UNION WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I desire to place before the House a matter of information which will be of very great interest, I presume, to every member of the House and to the Government. A telegram has to-day been received from Washington, which reads:

"House of Representatives this morning passed my resolution to promote Commercial Union with Canada. Nearly unanimous vote.

"ROBERT R. HITT."

Mr. FOSTER. That is a very bad hit.

JESUITS' ESTATES BILL.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to give notice that, on the first convenient occasion I will move a resolution on the subject of the disallowance of the Act respecting the Jesuits' Estates passed in the Province of Quebec. I would have moved in this matter at an earlier period of the Session, were it not that the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron) had taken up this question, but, after a delay of two weeks, I find he has put a notice on the paper, which, from its position, can hardly be reached during the present Session, or, at any rate, until so late as to prevent a proper discussion of the subject.

Mr. SPEAKER. When members desire to bring up matters before the Orders of the Day are called, they should do so before those Orders are called, and should not interrupt other members after the Orders are called.

SUPPLY—THE FISHERIES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply."

And the motion of Mr. Laurier in amendment thereto, that all the words after the word "that" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—

"In view of the rejection by the Senate of the United States of the Washington Treaty of 1888, and the unfortunate and regrettable differences existing between Canada and the United States on the fishery and trade questions, this House is of the opinion that steps should be taken at an early day by the Government of Canada for the satisfactory adjustment of such differences, and the securing of unrestricted freedom in the trade relations of the two countries, and that in any negotiations entered upon for such purposes, Canada should be directly represented by some one nominated by its Government.

"That in the meantime and to permit of such negotiations being favorably entered on, and to afford evidence of the anxious desire of Canada to promote good feeling and to remove all possible subjects of controversy, this House is of opinion that the modus vivendi proposed on behalf of the British Government to the Government of the United States with respect to the fisheries should be continued in operation during the ensuing fishing season."

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I rise to continue the debate on the resolutions moved by my hon. and esteemed friend, the member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), a few days ago. The resolution which was offered to the House contained three propositions of a very important character to the people of this country, which open up three important living subjects before the people, and which, in my opinion, before many years have passed, will have to be decided on the lines which are proposed by the great Liberal party. The first is the fishery dispute. It is a question which has engaged the attention of both parties for a great many years, but more particularly since the abrogation of the Washington Treaty, and it has created a good deal of annoyance, irritation and misunderstanding between the two countries—a condition of matters which is not pleasing to either of those countries—and it behooves us, not as a party or as a Government, but as the people of this country, to endeavor to settle this question on equitable lines. What is the difference between the contention of Canada and the contention of the United States? I understand that the principal difference has regard to the interpretation of that clause of the treaty which indicates, by its verbal construction, that the Americans have no right to come into our ports, except for four purposes—to secure water, to secure wood, for repairs, and for shelter. Now, Sir, it has been contended by the Government of Canada that this is the construction which we should put upon that clause of the treaty. I do not impute to the Government of this country any fault in vindicating what they suppose to be the rights and dignity of Canada, but I do believe that the construction placed upon the treaty is of too narrow a character, it is too much of a verbal character; and I do not believe that it will be borne out by the British Government, who is responsible for the settlement of this matter. The United States contend that we put too narrow and too illiberal a construction upon that clause; and contend that they have the right to come in as well to buy provisions and other necessaries during the fishing season, and to tranship their fish in bond across Canadian territory. Now, Sir, who has the settlement of this question? It is well known to every person in this House that this question must be settled by the British Government; it is in Great Britain that the treaty-making power is vested and not in Canada. We know, from expressions used by the Colonial Secretary of that Government, in 1871, in reference to this very matter under dispute, that the English Government is not favorable to the contention or to the interpretation put upon it by the Canadian Government. Allow me to read to this House the opinion of the British Government as expressed by Lord Kimberly, who was then Colonial Secretary, in a letter written by him to the Governor General of Canada, for the information of the Government of Canada, upon the interpretation of that clause. In February, 1871, Lord Kimberly wrote as follows:—

"The exclusion of American fishermen from resorting to Canadian ports, except for the purpose of shelter, and of repairing damages therein, to purchasing wood and of obtaining water, might be warranted by the letter of the Treaty of 1818, and by the terms of the Imperial Act 59 George III, chapter 38, but Her Majesty's Government feel bound to state that it seems to them an extreme measure, inconsistent with the general policy of the Empire, and they are disposed to concede this point to the United States Government under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent smuggling, and to guard against any substantial invasions of the exclusive rights of fishing which may be reserved to British subjects."

Now, Sir, that is the opinion of the British Government upon the very point that is in dispute between Canada and the United States; and as the British Government will have to decide this matter, they certainly will not go back upon the opinion they expressed in 1871 through her Colonial Secretary, and, so far as I have read or have been enabled to gather, the British Government have expressed no other opinion. Now let me further quote from another letter sent by Lord Kimberly to the Governor General of Canada during the same year:

"I think it right, however, to add that the responsibility of determining what is the true construction of a treaty made by Her Majesty with any foreign power, must remain in Her Majesty's Government, and that the degree to which this country would make itself a party to the stricter enforcements of the treaty rights, may depend not only upon the literal construction of the treaty, but on the moderation and reasonableness with which those rights are asserted."

You will see that the opinion expressed by the British Government in 1871 was that they had the power of deciding this question, and that if circumstances arose in which Great Britain was called upon to decide it, she would certainly decide it in the favor of the contention of the United States—that is, she would decide it upon broad principles of equity between two great nations. Therefore, I am of opinion that if this matter is brought before the British Government for solution, they would never hold the contention of the Canadian Government, since they have already placed upon record the opinion that I have cited; and surely the British Government would never think of going to war for the purpose of assisting Canada in upholding a contention in which the British Government did not believe. The British Government also says that the Canadian contention it is not only extreme, but it is contrary to the Imperial policy; therefore if they assisted Canada in carrying out that contention, they would be opposing what in their opinion is contrary to Imperial policy. Therefore, I am of opinion that the Government of this country should meet the United States upon honorable and dignified ground, and propose something that would lead us out of this difficulty before we are compelled to back down, after having involved our country still further in irritations and annoyances so unpleasant and dangerous. But there are other considerations to be borne in mind. Supposing that Canada conceded what is set forth in the Colonial Secretary's letter, who would be the loser? There are two sides to this question. Suppose Canada allowed United States fishermen to come into our ports for the purpose of purchasing provisions, bait, nets, &c., necessary to fishermen, certainly that would be an advantage to the American fishermen as it would bring their basis of operations much nearer their employment. That is one side. Now, look at the other side, and ascertain whether our own people would not be largely benefited also. If these fishermen were allowed to come into Canadian ports for the purpose of purchasing those necessary articles—such as seines, tackling, ropes, nets, bait, provisions and other things—they would become customers to the people of the Eastern Provinces, and would assist our own people by affording them a market for those articles in the production of which they are engaged. In this way they would be largely benefited. Then, again, there are a large number of men in Nova Scotia and neighboring Provinces ready to be engaged on fishing vessels; they want money to support their families, and if the American fishermen were allowed to come upon the Canadian shore for the purpose of engaging men to go out to the deep sea fisheries, large numbers of Canadian people would obtain employment and earn money with which to support their families; and so in a hundred ways our people would be largely benefited, much more benefited in this particular respect than any injury that might accrue by the concession of the point in dispute between the two countries. There is another point to which I beg leave to draw the attention of the House. Suppose that the Canadian Government is not willing to concede this point, what is to be the outcome? The consequences might lead to trouble and excite an irritation the results of which might be deplorable. The Americans propose to themselves three alternatives of settling this matter. I would place them before the people of this country and ask which they prefer to accept? I will read from an official document presented to the Congress of the United States by a commission that was appointed to report upon the matter. The commissioners say, speaking for the United States, first:

"We must live under the treaty, and be constantly embroiled with the British Government as to its proper interpretation."

That is what she has been doing for a great many years. She has been embroiled with the British Government a great many times since 1818, and she has been particularly embroiled with the British Government since 1885, leading to irritation and annoyances which are not pleasant to either country. Or, second:

"We must reform that interpretation by a fair and just agreement between this country and the British Government."

Is not that a just and right way to solve the difficulty—to interpret that treaty along the lines of international equity which should exist between great nations in the settlement of disputes. Or, third:

"We must abandon the treaty and adopt a policy of retaliation to protect our rights."

I do not suppose there is any hon. member, on the Conservative or on the Reform side of this House, who would like to see the last alternative adopted by the United States. We were told the other day by the leader of the Government that he did not fear retaliation. But if retaliation should come—and there is no improbability in the matter—it would certainly affect the interests of Canada as well as those of the United States, and if we are a wise people we can settle the difficulty on a better principle than that of allowing one Government to enter upon a policy of retaliation against another. It would at least be wise and honorable to go half way and to say to the United States: Come, let us reason together on this matter and settle it on the lines of equity and honor between nation and nation. This is an important question, and in relation to it the people of this country should not act as partisans. It is a matter particularly affecting Canada. It is one that affects Reformers as well as Conservatives and every true Canadian, and it is to the interest of everyone that politics and partisanship should be laid aside, and like men and Canadians ask ourselves: What is the best way of settling a dispute which has caused so much irritation and annoyance? I am not speaking from a political standpoint to-day, but from a Canadian standpoint, and if we are in the wrong let us yield, but if we are in the right, according to the judgments of the very highest authorities, let us maintain that right with dignity. But surely there are wise men who can find a way by which this question can be settled, and at the same time maintain the friendly relations existing between the two countries. Mr. Speaker, there is another question which is of great importance to this country. It came before us the other day. It is a question which should be thoroughly ventilated and discussed by both parties with a view to arriving at a proper conclusion. It is a question into which our political partisanship should not run, but it should be decided in the interests of our country, not only of our present country, but of our future country, which we expect to be much greater and grander than anything we possess to-day. But if we are continually considering questions from political and sectional standpoints, the future of this country will not be as great as it is expected to be; but if we stand shoulder to shoulder like true Canadians we will arrive at wise conclusions in regard to these national questions that are pressing upon our attention. We, as Canadians, possess a country which contains within itself the greatest possibilities.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am very glad to know there are very many hon. gentlemen opposite who entertain bright expectations with regard to the greatness of our country. I also do so. I am a Canadian, born in Canada, and I love Canada far above even Britain herself, and it is our duty as Canadians to work out our own destiny. This country extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, containing within itself every element of greatness, has a great destiny in store for it, if Canadians are true to their country and to themselves. We possess vast tracts of the finest agricultural land upon which the sun ever shone; we have vast forests of timber, the finest that stands upon the continent of America; we have the finest mineral resources to be found in any nation, in different parts of this country, and only awaiting capital and labor for their development, and we have fishing interests in the east and the west surpassing any other fishing interests in the world. With these vast storehouses of natural wealth around us, and with a people full of pluck, vigor and skill, we shall work out a great destiny, provided we stand shoulder to shoulder and apply our great natural forces to accomplish that end. We have great responsibilities resting upon us. We have the responsibility of developing these vast resources; and in order to be placed in an equal position with the other countries surrounding us, I hold that we must have a wider and greater constitutional freedom to open up markets for our products. Even at the present time we have the home market glutted, and we are compelled to send a large portion of our product to foreign countries, and if we hope to compete successfully in the markets of foreign countries with rival nations, we must possess equal privileges with them. We must possess the power to make our own commercial treaties with foreign countries. Again, there is great responsibility resting upon us in view of our geographical relations to the great country to the south. We are contiguous with the greatest nation on this continent for three thousand miles, and it behooves us to act so that we may avoid everything of an irritating character between the two countries. It becomes us to watch that there be no overt act committed that may give umbrage to the United States Government, and that nothing shall be done that will interfere with trade and commerce between the two countries. I believe, if we possessed the constitutional powers to make our own treaties, and if we were able to send a representative direct to Washington, we would be better able to avoid contentions than we are under the present system. It is our duty to go to Great Britain and ask Her Majesty's Government to extend to us the constitutional liberty to make our own treaties, so that we may be better able to develop this portion of the Empire, and, by developing this Dominion, add to the dignity and prestige of the British Empire as a whole, and thus we will take greater pride and delight in calling ourselves Canadians, though citizens of the Empire. There is another responsibility resting upon us, and that is with regard to opening up foreign markets for the people of Canada. It may be asked have we opened up foreign markets to as great an extent as possible? Have we extended our commerce to all those foreign countries that are prepared to receive the products of the Canadian people? I do not think so. It only requires an investigation to ascertain that our foreign markets are very limited, and it behoves the Canadian Government, and the Canadian people to seek to extend their trade and commerce into those countries where the people are prepared to buy from us, and in order to do this we require power to enter into negotiations with those countries and to consummate those negotiations by trade treaties. When we consider we have here 5,000,000 of intelligent people, largely composed of the most intelligent classes from foreign countries—of intelligent Scotchmen, Englishmen, Irishmen, Frenchmen and Germans—many of whom, on arriving here, were already skilled in the art of government, and have become still further skilled in the art of constitutional government in Canada, it is not too much to ask that to this Dominion should be given the power of making her own treaties. I think, Sir, that on looking over the history of this country we will find that we have neither abused nor ill-used the constitutional power granted to us by the British Government. On the contrary, we have used that constitutional power to promote the interests and prosperity of our country, and to increase the dignity and the prestige of the British Empire. We can, therefore, with grace and dignity go to the foot of the Throne of England and ask that further constitutional powers be bestowed upon us. We were told, about fifty years ago—many of the hon. gentlemen I address will not remember, but you know it from your historical readings—when we asked for responsible Government, that it was a step towards the dissolution of that tie which binds us to the British Empire; but the sequel has taught us differently. We are more loyal to-day, our affections towards the British Empire are stronger to-day, and the bonds that bind us to the British Crown are stronger to-day than they were fifty years ago, when a constitutional Government was given us. The more power we obtain, the more loyal we become to the British Empire, and the more dignified we appear in the eyes of the world. We know how to take care of the power placed in our hands. I believe that if the British Government is approached by the Government of this country, and if the matter is laid before them, in a plain and reasonable way, the power of making our own trade treaties will be cordially granted this country. It has been asked in this House: "Has not the diplomacy of England been sufficiently favorable to Canada in all cases in which that diplomacy was used?" Sir, the diplomacy of England has not, on the whole, been conducive to Canadian interests. In 1794, Lord Dorchester said that we should give up to the United States all the territory west of Niagara Falls, because the great ships of England could not pass beyond that, and the territory beyond was of no use to England. Wiser and better counsels prevailed, and that vast and fertile territory west of Niagara Falls, has been secured to the Canadian people. As the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) put it the other day, the "greater Canada" has been reserved to the Canadian people. In 1842, when the boundary settlement was made between the Province of New Brunswick and the State of Maine, the Americans took advantage of the ignorance of the English diplomatists, and they withheld an important map from the consideration of the commission, by the withholding of which, and on account of the ignorance of the diplomatists sent from England, a large portion of New Brunswick was taken from Canada and annexed to the State of Maine. Need I refer further into the diplomacy of Great Britain in matters pertaining to Canada, to prove that my statement is true? Let me refer to the circumstances attending the commission on the boundaries of Oregon. The American Government went to Maltby & Co., the celebrated geographers, and purchased a terrestrial globe. It marked the divisions of Oregon on it to suit itself, and made the English commissioners believe that these outlines were made by the great geographers. This proved an important factor in the decision of the commission. The ignorance of the English diplomatists was again taken advantage of, and the boundary was fixed in opposition to the interests of Canada. Many of you remember, as I remember, the time the Fenians invaded this country. Those men were allowed, in the United States, to hold meetings in open day for the purpose of discussing and perfecting their plans to invade Canada. They left the United States ports under the very eyes of the United States authorities without any remonstrance whatever, and they entered this country at Ridgeway, destroying public and private property. Not only that, but many of our own gallant young men who turned out from the University of Toronto to defend the institutions of their country, were slain by those bad men who came from the United States. What was the result of British diplomacy in this matter? A few years afterwards the United States Government made a demand upon the English Government for compensation for the destruction of the Alabama during the war, and it received $15,000,000 from the British Commissioners. I believe that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government was one of the High Commissioners at that time. When our claim for compensation against the United States was pressed upon the British plenipotentiaries, they asked our Minister to withdraw his claim, and they did not press it upon the United States Government. The British Government gave us only a guarantee under a loan of twelve and a half million dollars. The interests of Canada were neglected. This was another instance in which the interests of Canada were sacrificed by the British ambassadors. The Canadian Government had the advantage of the Imperial guarantee, but not a single cent was paid to our private citizens who had their property destroyed on that occasion. You will remember, Sir, that in 1878 we had the Halifax Commission. That commission was for the purpose of deciding the value of our fisheries to the American fishermen during the continuance of the Washington Treaty. The English Government proposed to send a man here to arbitrate for us, but to the credit of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), who then led the Government, he told the English Government that we could settle this matter very well on this side of the water, and that he would appoint his own arbitrator. That power was at once granted by the British Government, and the hon. gentleman made a wise choice of his commissioner in the person of the present Sir A. T. Galt. The result of that commission was that an award of five and half million dollars was made, and it proved highly satisfactory to the Canadian people. This satisfactory result was obtained because we were represented by a Canadian who understood our interest, who went there in the interests of Canada, and whose whole thought was to benefit the country which appointed him. After all the failures and sacrifices we suffered at the hands of British diplomatists, it will be abundant evidence to prove to every person in this House, that we should have the power to appoint our own agents, to carry on negotiations with other countries. I ask the people of this country, who can discharge their duty best in the interests of Canada? Is it not the party whose interests are to be served, whose markets are to be enlarged, whose country is to be developed and whose trade and commerce are to be extended? Are not these the proper parties to send to a foreign power, to transact business in which Canada is deeply interested? Let me point out to this House, that our foreign markets have been neglected. I do not know whether an endeavor has been made to improve them or not, but the fact remains, that the Government has failed to establish any market for Canada in foreign countries of any importance whatever. In 1879, when the Government inaugurated the National Policy in this country, it was said by the Reform party that it would destroy our trade with the Americans. The Government's answer was that they were entering into negotiations with foreign countries, for the purpose of opening up new markets for us, and that even if the Americans did not take a single dollar's worth from us, Canada would derive as much profit from these new foreign markets. Now, it will be interesting to this House, and the people of this country, to know whether these promises have been realised or not, and to show whether they have or not, I wish to refer to the increase that has taken place in the last ten years in our trade with foreign countries other than the United States. Sir, when I consider that one-third of our people are of French extraction; when I consider that one-third of our population are people whose language, manners, customs and religion are the same as those of France, I wonder at our limited trade with that country. I would reasonably expect our trade with France to be very large? France requires many articles produced by the skill and enterprise of the Canadian people, and is able to supply us with many of the articles our people require, and it would be natural that a large trade should exist with that country. But a large trade does not exist; and I ask whose fault it is? I do not say it is the Government's fault; it is the fault of the system. We are not able to send our High Commissioner to France to make direct negotiations, but all negotiations with that country have to filter through the British Foreign Office and the British Embassy in France; and these roundabout methods prevented Sir Alexander Galt, in 1878, arranging a treaty with France in favor of Canada. Now, Sir, to show the limited character of our trade with France, let me say that we imported from that country in 1888—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is going back to the discussion of the question that was disposed of in the House the other day.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The principle is embraced in the present resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is only incidentally embraced; and the hon. gentleman cannot make a speech on the subject that was the other day discussed and negatived.

Mr. MITCHELL. It strikes me that the hon. gentleman is not violating the Rule in the manner in which Your Honor suggests, but is incidentally referring to the failure of the Administration, in relation to the management of public matters, in dealing with the question of trade.

Mr. SPEAKER. As long as the speech of the hon. gentleman could be taken in the sense just noticed by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), I allowed him to go on, but now I think he is entering into a speech on the subject.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I understood from the wording of the resolution that it embraced the principle of making our own treaties through our own accredited agents, by stating that in any negotiations between Canada and the United States, Canada should be represented directly by her own, accredited agent; and that, in my opinion, involves the principle of dealing in the same way with any other country as well as the United States. I did not refer to any arguments used in the discussion the other day, or to any person who took part in that discussion. I thought I was perfectly at liberty to run along the line indicated by the wording of that resolution. I am only a young member, and, of course, I only throw out these suggestions. I do not assume to give any information to the Speaker at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would just like to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the resolution, which says: that steps should be taken at an early day, by the Government of Canada, for the satisfactory adjustment of such fishery differences, and the securing of unrestricted freedom in the trade relations of the two countries, and that, in any negotiations entered upon for such purposes, Canada should be directly represented by some one nominated by its Government. The resolution disposed of the other day had relation only to commercial treaties. This has specific relation to the settlement of our fishery differences. Many gentlemen might hold that it was necessary to have our own representative to settle our fishery differences, and not to make ordinary arrangements. Therein the two resolutions are not alike.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have not decided that the hon. gentleman could not make his speech, but that that question is only an incident to the present question before the House; only he must not go too far.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I was about to say that our trade relations with France are not what we would naturally expect them to be. Our imports from France in 1888 amounted to $2,245,000, not a very large import, but a very large one when compared with our total export to that country, which only amounted to $383,000. Now, unless it can be shown that France has no capacity for anything we produce, I think there must be some reasonable explanation for the meagreness of our trade with that great country. I have already said that Sir Alexander Galt was sent to France as High Commissioner to negotiate a treaty a few years ago, and, according to his statement, he found a very great difficulty in negotiating, because he was not permitted to go into the immediate presence of the parties with whom he had business. He stated that one of the greatest difficulties in negotiating treaties of that kind was the fact that those negotiations had to go through so many hands. I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the British Minister has to build his reputation, not upon colonial interests, but on British interests; and when we find British interests coming into contact with colonial interests in these negotiations, we cannot reasonably expect that the British Minister will use his influence for Canada in opposition to the interests of Great Britain. Was there any point in the negotiations of 1878 that was in favor of Great Britain? Yes, there was. British ships entering France for sale were only charged a Customs duty of 2 francs per ton, while Canadian-built ships were charged 40 francs per ton. Do you suppose that any man, being human as the British Minister is, and being interested in the prosperity of those whom he represented, could be expected to make a treaty in the interests of Canada when the interests of the ship-building industry of Great Britain were opposed to it? It was of the greatest interest to Canada to arrange a treaty with France so that her ships could go into the French markets on the same terms as British ships. That treaty was very nearly concluded. But the delays in the British Foreign Office, and the necessity of waiting for the action of the British Minister, resulted in the failure of that treaty; and our ships continued for a time to be charged 40 francs, and British ships only 2 francs a ton of duty. It may be said that we did not suffer long in this respect; but when the duty was reduced on Canadian vessels to 2 francs a ton, then the French Government gave a bounty to their own built ships to such an extent as to give a greater protection to their own vessels and a greater restriction to ours. Now, I hold, if we had a plenipotentiary there, appointed directly by the Government of Canada, with power to negotiate directly with the French authorities any treaty based upon these negotiations, being subject to ratification by the Canadian Parliament, our relations with France would be better than they are; and if the treaty was contrary to Imperial policy, Great Britain had the same power that she now possesses, of disallowing the Acts of the Canadian Parliament. In this respect there will be no interference with her rights, and we would have all the advantages of direct negotiations with the countries into whose markets we wish to send our products. Let us next refer to Spain. With Spain we have hardly any trade, although effort after effort has been made by two of the greatest statesmen that ever occupied the Treasury benches of this country, who went to Spain to make a treaty. Sir Alexander Galt was sent to Spain a few years ago, and did all he possibly could to negotiate a treaty, but failed; and the other great statesman, the late Finance Minister, one of the best diplomats probably in the country to-day, went there three or four times, and he, to a certain extent, failed also. Let me give you Sir Alexander Galt's reason for his failure, as quoted by Sir Charles Tupper in his Budget Speech in 1887. Sir Alexander Galt had left a document for the perusal of Sir Charles Tupper in regard to this particular matter, and Sir Charles Tupper said:

"I may say, Sir, in that relation, that in 1884 Sir Alexander Galt, before his appointment as High Commissioner for Canada in London, was charged with the duty of endeavoring to negotiate with Spain a treaty of advanced commercial trade relations with Cuba and Porto Rico. That treaty, hon. gentlemen know, Sir Alexander Galt was not able to carry to completion, and when I had the honor of succeeding him in the office of High Commissioner, he left for my information and perusal a document in which he said that he found himself greatly hampered in discharging the duties imposed upon him by the Government of Canada, because he only stood in the position of a commercial commissioner, and it was necessary that all his negotiations with the Government of Spain should be filtered through Her Majesty's Minister at the Court of Madrid."

Sir Charles Tupper then went to Spain, having received from the Government of Great Britain greater power, greater latitude and greater constitutional freedom, as he says himself. And how did he succeed? He said:

"I will read to this House an extract from a letter sent by the Foreign Office to the Colonial Office, dated 26th July, 1884, and forwarded to me for the information of the Canadian Government:

"If the Spanish Government are favorably disposed a fuller power for these negotiations will be given to Sir Robert Morrier."

"—who was then Ambassador of Her Majesty's Government at Madrid—

"and Sir Charles Tupper jointly. The actual negotiation would probably be conducted by Sir Charles Tupper; but the convention, if concluded, must be signed by both plenipotentiaries, and be entered into between Her Majesty and the King of Spain, with the special object of regulating Canadian trade with the Spanish territories specified in the convention."

"I am quite certain that the House will appreciate the great importance of that arrangement, and they will feel that the discussions that have taken place in this House have, no doubt, done good in relation to that question. They will feel that another step has been gained by the concession from Her Majesty's Government in this matter of trade negotiations, and that Canada is to have the freest and fullest scope."

As I said at the beginning, I appeal to both sides of the House to discuss this question not as partisans, but as Canadians.

Mr. LANDERKIN. There are no Canadians on the other side.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The question is whether we shall be better served in foreign countries by having plenipotentiaries of our own there or not, and I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite have as much interest in that question as we have. Sir Charles Tupper was of opinion that the discussion which took place here in 1882 was of very great importance in getting the powers, which he obtained, granted to him; and I believe that the discussion of this question to-day in Parliament, in a sober, honest and reasonable way, will tend largely to the benefit of Canada, even if it does not lead to our being given the full power of sending representatives to foreign courts, fully equipped with all necessary powers, it will have a beneficial effect on the Government of England in inducing it to clothe Canada with the power of making its own commercial treaties. That was the opinion of Sir Charles Tupper in the debate which took place on this subject in 1887. Sir Charles Tupper then said:

"I am quite certain that the House will appreciate the great importance of that arrangement, and will feel that the discussions which have taken place in this House have, no doubt, done good in relation to that question. They will feel that another point has been gained by the concession from Her Majesty's Government in this matter of trade negotiations, and that Canada is to have the freest and fullest scope."

Now, there is the admission of Sir Charles Tupper himself, that a freer and greater scope than we possessed in the past is absolutely necessary, in order that we may negotiate our treaties to greater advantage; and we have the opinion of Sir Alexander Galt that his failure to bring about a treaty was that all his negotiations with the Government of Spain had to be filtered through Her Majesty's Ministers at the Court of Madrid. Sir Charles Tupper went with full liberty to negotiate with the Government of Spain, and, consequently, he succeeded in obtaining advantageous terms. I want to show you, irrespective of that matter, that our trade relations with other countries are not growing as we expected them to grow. You may attribute the cause to what reason you like, but I attribute the failure to the want of power to negotiate directly with these countries by our own accredited agents. We have been told that efforts were brought to bear to extend our trade with foreign countries. The right hon. the First Minister said in 1882:

"I am not aware that before 1878 any step of any kind was taken by the Government to develop our trade. But the first thing we did was to attempt to develop our trade with foreign countries. We had to provide for an occasional over-production, we supposed there might be sometimes a plethora of manufactures, that our markets would be glutted, and so we commenced at once our negotiations in order to make arrangements with foreign countries which would likely exchange commodities with us."

Now, let us see how successful we have been in our efforts to promote trade with foreign countries. We exported to France in 1878, goods to the value of $369,000; in 1888, ten years later, we exported to the value of $397,000, being an increase of but $28,300 in ten years, not as much goods as would fill a good wholesale store in Ottawa. We exported to Germany in 1878, goods to the value of $22,300, and in 1882, $198,500, showing an increase in ten years of but $76,200, or about sufficient to fill two stores in Ottawa. Take the exports to Spain. In 1874 we sent Spain $49,000 worth of goods, and in 1883, $52,300 worth, being an increase in ten years of $2,100, notwithstanding the fact that we sent our High Commissioner there, at a large expense, to negotiate a treaty for the improvement of that trade. Again, we have been opening up communications with Japan and China, which produce a number of articles which we consume, and which require a number of articles which we produce. Our exports in 1878, notwithstanding the poor policy of my hon. friend who led the Government at that time, as stated by the then Opposition, amounted to $102,570, and in 1888, they were only $132,400, or an increase of $29,880 in those ten years, notwithstanding the increased facilities afforded. Let me point out what the leader of the present Government said in regard with our trade with Brazil. He twitted the Opposition with not opening up a trade with foreign countries, and, in 1882, he used the following words:—

"In the first place, we went to a nation on this side of the Atlantic, and we now got the official—the not ostentations, but to a great extent the expressed assistance of Her Majesty's representative at the Court of Brazil; and now we have a line of steamships running monthly between Quebec and Brazil, and although that trade is in its infancy, I think the indications are clear that one of our best markets in the future will be Brazil. The commodities of the two countries are of such diverse nature that we can profitably send our productions to Brazil and receive hers in exchange."

He says there that we have the expressed assurance of the English Minister in Brazil; that we have his promise that he will assist us to extend our trade there; that we have a monthly line of steamships between Canada and Brazil, and that the products of the two countries are so different that Brazil becomes a great market for us and Canada is a market for them. Here are three elements of success in opening up a commerce with Brazil. What has been the result of the effort. I ask the Government and the country to point out if there is not something wrong. The Government blamed us for not opening up markets in foreign countries, and we find this: In 1882, the first year in which the exports to Brazil were separately stated, we exported the value of $193,500 to that country; in 1883, $370,000; in 1884, $339,000; in 1885, $311,000—coming down all that time, and that notwithstanding these increased facilities. In 1886, we exported to Brazil $352,500 worth; in 1887, $429,400, and in 1888, $333,000. And that is the result, notwithstanding all these facilities, and notwithstanding the idle boast that a large trade was to be created with that country, to make up the trade we were losing by the restrictive policy of the Government in shutting us out from the American market. If we Canadians stand shoulder to shoulder, and have less political partisanship, and give our attention to the interests and prosperity of the country, the day will soon come when the young men of Canada will take a greater interest in the affairs of the country than they do now, when they will speak in the language hoped for by the late illustrious and eloquent statesman, D'Arcy McGee, when he said:

"When I can hear our young men say as proudly, 'our federation, our kingdom, our country,' as young men of other countries do when speaking of their own, I shall then have less apprehension for the result of whatever trials the future may have in store for us."

Give the people of this country the liberty and the constitutional freedom to extend our trade relations by direct methods, and we shall build up a country which will be prosperous in every way; and, instead of our young men leaving our country, to become good citizens of the United States, they will remain with us and have a true patriotic sentiment in their bosom, and we will hear young Canadians say when speaking of their country, our Dominion, our country, our federation.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I thought it was probable that some hon. gentleman from the other side of the House would have been disposed to answer the very able address which has just been delivered by my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Macdonald, Huron). He has travelled over ground which is interesting to us all. He has produced his case with a moderation and a clearness which I am sure must have commended itself to the judgment of hon. members of this House; and, if nothing else were said to-day on our side of the House, than what has been so well said by that hon. gentleman, I should be disposed to rest our case there. But there is more to be said on that subject, and, in following the line of argument introduced by the hon. mover of this resolution, I think it is interesting to observe that the discussion on the part of hon. members on the other side of the House has been mainly directed to prove that the motion itself, the argument by which it was supported by the hon. gentleman who introduced it, and the object of the Opposition in bringing it forward, were unpatriotic and inopportune. It was said to be unpatriotic, inasmuch, at a moment like the present, we were saying that we were anxious for a renewal of reciprocity, and that without it the interests of this country could not succeed. If such were the case, if there were any apprehensions that anything said in this debate could be taken hold of by the Americans, as showing that we, in this country, could not live and prosper without access to their markets, or without an immediate treaty with them, I should be the last man in this House to raise my voice on such an occasion, because, in this Parliament, and on other occasions when I have been called upon to express an opinion upon our trade relations with the States, I have always guarded myself to the fullest extent, I have been always careful not to lay too strong a stress upon the absolute necessity of an urgent appeal to the United States. Last year I gave to the House the opinions which I had delivered through the press and on the platform in my own Province on that subject. My observations were quoted here at considerable length on that occasion, and they all showed that I was willing to support the Government in every reasonable step they took in order to obtain the renewal of reciprocity with that country. But the cause of complaint which we had, and which we still have, with the Conservative party is that, according to our judgment, they have not taken the opportune time to negotiate with the people of the United States. Perhaps their position as a party may stand in their way. I am disposed to think that has a very considerable effect. When you consider the position of the Conservative party in regard to the United States, I think we can see in it, beneath the lines, a very strong reason why the people of the United States are less friendly disposed to deal with a Conservative Government in this country than they would be with a Liberal Government if it was in power. I recollect in 1878, during the time when we had very important discussions on the National Policy, when we had the eloquent tones of the late Minister of Finance and other hon. gentlemen then sitting on this side of the House, that, day after day and week after week, those hon. gentlemen were directing the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that this was becoming, as they termed it, a slaughter market for the manufacturers of the United States, that the United States had not shown at that time any earnest disposition to negotiate with them, and pending such a condition of affairs they, if placed in power, were going to say to the people of the United States that they would put them in a position either to shut them out of our market or compel them to come to our own terms. That view of the case was represented day after day, and month after month, on every platform throughout the country, and in the press of the party; and that was so well understood by the people and the Government of the United States that it created in their minds a feeling of active hostility against the Government of this country, and it has been one of the main causes, in my judgment, why, during all these long years, the Americans have held their hand, and have been less willing than we would like, to negotiate a treaty of greater freedom between the two countries. That such a treaty may be negotiated we come at this moment to offer to the Government of this country our humble support. We come in no factious mood; we come, according to our resolution, in order to pave the way to remove those difficulties which have been existing, to remove the irritation which exists to-day, caused by the regrettable rejection of the late Treaty of Washington. We say that we, as the Liberal party of this country, are willing to assist the Government of the day in so far as we represent the public sentiment of this country, to negotiate a treaty of freedom of commerce between the two countries. Is there anything blameable in that, Mr. Speaker? Why, Sir, I think that any man who has the interest of his country at heart might freely stand up here and offer his advice to the Government, who are merely the executive of the country. If there is anything wrong in such a view—why, I can point to hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House who, when these speeches were delivered last Session on our trade relations with the United States, spoke in the same terms, and did not receive from the Treasury benches any condemnation for the sentiments they expressed. There is one hon. gentleman in this House who, perhaps, above all others would be the last unduly to defer in any way to the people of the United States, one hon. gentleman who, in all his public utterances—and they are all well worth perusing, and I always listen to him with the greatest possible pleasure—is careful to uphold the rights of this country. On that occasion that hon. gentleman said:

"For years past the people of the United States have kept up a tariff wall against us. Over and over again we have entreated them to take it down, and they have just as often refused."

That hon. gentleman was the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). He says that the people of Canada have "entreated" the people of the United States to take down their tariff wall, but they have refused. We are not "entreating" them in the resolutions before the House; we do not go so far as the hon. member for Bruce did in his address last year; we are not begging or entreating them to take down the tariff wall against the people of this country, but are merely saying to the Government that it is our opinion that, in view of the unfortunate rejection of this treaty, they should again approach the Government of the United States in a friendly spirit and endeavor, if possible, to arrange with them a renewal of the treaty between the two countries. I say, Sir, that is a position which the Liberal party may well take, and may well stand by; it is a policy which the people of this country will sustain, and they will give us all the more credit for it because we are willing to come forward at any time to assist the Government with our support in the event of their making a treaty with the United States. Now, Sir, during last Session we had a discussion of that treaty, and various lines of argument were pursued; but there was a line of argument pursued by many hon. gentlemen against our reciprocity movement, on the ground that the people of this country were well enough situated as they are, and that we do not require access to the American market. Hon. gentlemen, at great length, entered into a comparison of the position of the Canadian farmer and the American farmer, of the Canadian and the American fishermen, of the Canadian and American lumbermen. Taking up the debate of last year at random, I find in almost every speech references made by hon. gentlemen opposite, going to show that either the people of this country are well enough off as they are, or that they would not be advantaged by having the markets of the United States opened to them. The late lamented Minister of the Interior, in a very able address last year, in reply to my hon. friend who introduced that resolution, endeavored to prove, at very considerable length, that the people of this country were not in need of access to the American market. He said that we were making steady, and successful, and substantial progress, and that, taking us altogether, our various industries were in a more healthy and satisfactory condition than were similar industries on the other side of the line. Referring in the first place to the fishermen, the hon. gentleman, on page 166 of the Hansard, said:

"Every one who has watched the progress of the fisheries and the fishing trade during the last two years in our Maritime Provinces, knows that there has never been—I think I am within the mark in saying there has never been in the history of the Maritime Provinces more profitable fishing than that which occurred during the last two years."

He was going on to prove that under the present condition of affairs the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces were doing as well without a treaty with the United States as they would with that market open to them. Now, if the hon. gentleman had been familiar with the course of trade in that large branch of our industry, I venture to think he never would have indulged in such an observation. If hon. gentlemen were to visit the Maritime Provinces to day, particularly Nova Scotia, they would find there large quantities of fish of a valuable character, for which there is no market in the West Indies, which can only find a market in the United States, at whatever rate it may bring; because the market in the West Indies will only take a certain quantity, and when we go beyond that quantity it has to go to the United States to be sold for whatever it will bring. Hon. gentlemen should also be aware that this great industry in the Maritime Provinces can only be further developed by the freest access to the American market. It is useless for us to attempt for one moment to fit out our bankers for their hazardous voyages; it is useless for the merchants of Nova Scotia to invest their money, as they have been disposed to invest it, in building fast vessels and thoroughly equipping them under the command of experienced masters, and with able crews on board, and sending them on their trips, when, on returning well laden after a hard season's service, their catch realises no fair price in their own market, and is excluded from the natural market alongside of us. I say this is a branch of the subject which, to us in Nova Scotia, exceeds for the moment all other considerations, because it is a natural product; it is one not rewarded or fostered by any National Policy; the laws of this country do not and cannot affect the quantity which is taken, but the regulations of this country with other countries form the only means whereby the product of this great industry can be profitably realised in the country lying alongside of us. The hon. gentleman then went on to show that the farmers, as well as the fishermen, were prosperous. He, on that occasion, endeavored to prove that they had no need of a reciprocity treaty with the United States. The hon. gentleman said:

"Now, the hon. gentlemen tell us the farmers would be better off if they went to the States. Happily for us we have the record of the farmers of the States. They will be, I have no doubt, interesting. I think I can say this with perfect truth, that on the face of God's earth there is not to-day a body of men, take them on the average, who are as well to do as the farmers of Ontario at the present time."

And he goes on to contrast the unenviable position in which the farmers of the United States were placed, showing that their products in the American markets were lower at that time than were similar products in the markets of Canada; and he concluded by saying:

"So that I think, Mr. Speaker, in the face of these facts and figures, which are official on both sides of the line, from the officers of the Ontario Government so far as Ontario is concerned, and from the officers of the American Government so far as the United States are concerned, we may fairly say that the farmers of Canada find nothing to envy in the position of their neighbors on the other side of the line."

I make these quotations, Mr. Speaker, to show that the arguments of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, in the early part of last Session, went to prove, if they went to prove anything, that we did not require any treaty with the United States at all; they went to prove, if they went to prove anything, that we were better off as we were. I could quote a dozen speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite to the same effect, and I could show that opinions expressed by the lamented gentleman to whom I have referred were concurred in by leading members on that side of the House. A speech also was delivered here by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKeen), who said:

"There is another industry, on which I shall touch but slightly, as it has been dealt with ably by hon. gentlemen who preceded me, and who are better acquainted with it than I am, and as it will be also treated by hon. gentlemen who will follow me. I refer now to our fishing industry, which is one of the most important of this Dominion. It has been said that this industry has been seriously injured, and that it is becoming demoralised, and that our fishermen are unable to obtain remunerative wages, owing to the present depression of trade. If you will allow me, I will quote a few figures from the Fisheries Report, showing the number of men employed, the capital invested, and the value of the products of Nova Scotia for the years 1881 to 1886, inclusive."

The hon. gentleman gave us a return of the figures from 1881 to 1886, and he then went on to say:

"If we take the last two years of free fishing to the United States fishermen within our three-mile limit, namely 1883 to 1884, we find that taking the value of the fishing product and the number of men engaged, it amounted in 1883 to $261 per man, and in 1884 to $292 per man. Then take the year 1886, the first of Canada's protecting her shore limits, and when a duty was simultaneously imposed on our fish in the United States. It was found that the fishery product of Nova Scotia is $306 per man engaged, showing that the protection afforded our fishermen is already being realised. The above figures, which have but recently been brought to my notice, bear out the views of intelligent fishermen with whom I have conversed on the subject in my own county and who are emphatically of the opinion that the protection to our three-mile limit is of more value to them than free American markets ever can be."

This was the same view with respect to the fishermen which the other hon. gentleman expressed with regard to the farmers. In both of these cases a dozen other hon. gentlemen concurred in these sentiments, and, in fact, they were the sentiments embodied in every speech in the early part of that debate. Hon. gentlemen proceeded to prove, first, that we did not require any trade treaty with the United States. They said: We are willing to have a treaty with the United States, but, as a matter of fact, we do not require it, because our farmers and fishermen are better off without it. It is to disprove such a condition of affairs, that we on this side of the House take issue with hon. gentlemen. It is quite true that after those speeches were delivered in the early part of last Session, the Government took a rather different course of action. Those speeches, as hon. gentlemen will remember, were all delivered before the return of the late Finance Minister from his official duties at Washington, and when the late Minister of Finance made his appearance in this House and delivered that celebrated speech which has been quoted over and over again, it was amusing to watch the consternation exhibited by those hon. gentlemen opposite who had spoken on that occasion. When the late Minister of Finance told us he had offered unrestricted reciprocity, hon. gentlemen opposite thought their ears must have failed them. It cannot be possible, they said, that after all we have been led to say by the Government here, that after the Government have quietly sat in their positions day after day and have permitted us to commit ourselves, and as far as we are able, the party to which we belong, to the proposition that we do not require a large measure of reciprocity with the United States, that when we in our speeches have over and over again proved to our own satisfaction, if not to the satisfaction of the House, that we are better off as we are, that our fishermen and farmers are better off as they are than with access to the American market, at the last moment the Minister of Finance steps in and says: Gentlemen, I offered unrestricted reciprocity to the United States, and I meant it to be unrestricted reciprocity. I meant it, he emphasised, it was not accidental, as you might be almost led to suppose; but he said: I offered them unrestricted reciprocity, and I meant it; I desired to see how far they would go. Of course, if the Americans had met him in the same spirit with which he made that proposition, a broad and statesmanlike proposition, is there any hon. gentleman here who would not be prepared to admit, or who would be prepared to deny that we would have unrestricted reciprocity to-day. I say, Sir, that if the Government of the United States had met the proposition of the Minister of Finance when he made it, as he says, in that broad and liberal spirit, and if they had taken up the discussion of that question and recommended such a policy to the United States Government, although it was beyond their functions and it could not be done by Executive act but only by Congress—if they had said that, so far as our desire and influence extend, we are disposed to recommend that policy to Congress, then, instead of the rejection of the Fisheries Treaty, unfortunately for the Americans, we would have been enjoying the blessings of unrestricted reciprocity with 65,000,000 people alongside of us. From that moment, a very considerable change came over the spirit of the dreams of hon. gentlemen opposite. They could not obliterate what they said, they could not go back on the Government of which they were such strong and ardent supporters, and so they thought their best policy was to submit with all possible grace and retain allegiance to their party. But we remember very shortly afterwards there followed the celebrated explanation in this House with respect to fruit trees on which a duty was paid. We remember, when we first brought this to the notice of this Parliament, during the absence of the hon. the Minister of Finance at Washington, we were told frequently by the Government, and by members of that side of the House, that they could not place the fruit trees on the free list, in the same manner as they were placed on the free list in the United States, under the statutory offer made by this House. We remember the eloquent terms in which the hon. the Minister of Justice denounced such an idea as traitorous to the best interests of the country.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did nothing of the kind. What I said, as I have repeatedly stated in the presence of the hon. gentleman, was, that to admit the interpretation that we were bound to put these articles upon the free list, because the United States had chosen to make us an offer in regard to one of the subjects in the statutory offer—that to admit that interpretation of the statute would be treason to Parliament. I expressed no opinion as to putting those goods on the free list.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I have no doubt the hon. gentleman will have the benefit of hearing his own words before this debate is over.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. My words as they are?

Mr. JONES (Halifax.) Yes, as they are. We do not desire to give any other interpretation to the hon. gentleman's words than what the plain language would convey, but I venture to say that every gentleman in this House listening, as they always do, with pleasure to the Minister of Justice—gathered from his utterances that the idea of admitting that class of importations from the United States free of duty, simply because the United States had admitted our goods under statutory offer, would be treason to the interests of the country. At all events, this is what was generally understood from his remarks. Be that as it may, the hon. gentleman and others soon saw their way to take a different position on the return of the Minister of Finance from Washington. That hon. gentleman said to them: "Give up playing statesmanship, give up indulging in those utterances which are unworthy of public men, you have a statutory offer on your statute books made to a friendly nation alongside of you, and when they accept that in good faith it is your duty to accept it on the same terms. Under the castigation I might say (probably a word not so severe as that would imply the fact as well), but, at all events, under the strong language which the Minister of Finance used on that occasion, the Government supporters, although they grumbled a little and looked rueful for a time, gladly accepted the position and said it was a good thing, after all, to admit those articles duty free into this country. Since then we find that there have been other evidences of back downs by this Government. We find that we have before us an evidence of their change of view with regard to our relations to the United States in the wreckage Bill now before this House. Hon. gentlemen may say that this is not very important, but the change about face of the Government towards a measure of that kind is very significant in character. Hon. gentlemen will remember that last year when this Bill was introduced it was quietly snubbed by leading members on the Government side of the House. They said: It will never do to allow the thin end of the wedge of reciprocity even in the wrecking laws between the two countries; it will never do to allow an American vessel to assist a British vessel in British waters, or to allow a British vessel to assist an American or British vessel in American waters, and, as we all remember, that Bill was lost in this House. Precisely the same Bill is brought in this year, and a change seems to have come over the feelings of hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. They seem to think that, after all, it is not so bad to have intercourse with our friends across the line, it is not such a bad thing to allow them to come across here to save the property and lives of our subjects, and it is not such a bad thing, after all, to allow Canadians the benefit of employing their capital in American harbors. They have apparently satisfied themselves upon these grounds, and they think it is just as well to allow the Bill to pass. Beneath all this, and between the lines you will see that these hon. gentlemen are preparing for themselves a way by which they may recede from the position they have taken on this matter. If I am not very much mistaken we will see the Government go still further in this direction before this Session is over. There was another question with regard to sawlogs. The Government proposed—unconstitutionally, I hold, because they had no right under our Constitution—to impose an export duty on sawlogs. Hon. gentlemen know that the clause of the British North America Act which was originally intended to confer that power was expressly eliminated, at Lord Carnarvon's suggestion, when the commissioners met in London. The American Government held it to be unconstitutional. It is unconstitutional in England, and the Imperial Government would not permit, so far as they were concerned, that a clause should be put in the British North America Act under which this Parliament should be empowered to impose any export duty on any of the products of the country. Still the Government imposed this export duty on sawlogs, and with what results? The duty was small at first, but it went on increasing and last year an additional amount was put on by Order in Council. We saw the result reflected immediately in the American Congress. We saw an Act introduced there that if any country chose to put an export duty upon the product of that country the original duty in their country should be increased, plus the export duty of the country from which those articles were exported. This great industry of Canada stood in a position of great peril; and having a vast amount of property jeopardised and having all those valuable timber limits throughout the west made of very little practical value, they found that they would have to recede from their policy in this direction. The Minister of Finance last year accurately described the position of the country with regard to the dealings of our friends across the border, when he said: "It is all very well to have a technical right, but it is a very different thing to carry it out." That is just what these gentlemen find out when they are disposed to put a most extraordinary construction upon our relations with our friends in the United States. If I may judge from the comments of the Press favorable to the Government of the day, I think this House may congratulate the Government on the fact that the export duty on saw logs will also be removed from the burdens of this country. That will be back down number three. I contended at the outset, that the Government of the day had embittered the public feeling in the United States against them, and that they are now, at the last moment, endeavoring to remove that impression. We saw them a very short time ago dealing, in my judgment, very harshly with an old public official, the collector at Halifax. We saw them dismiss from his office an officer who for fourteen years had discharged the duties of that important position with great acceptance to the mercantile community; and I believe I am right in saying that I never knew a case which excited so much sympathy, among Conservatives as well as Liberals, as the dismissal of Mr. Ross. I am not going to deny that Mr. Ross was technically wrong; I am not going to defend him further than to say that he committed an error of judgment, and he made an immediate apology. He went beyond his orders in allowing the fish of an American vessel to be transhipped at Halifax, but the moment that he found that he made a mistake, he notified the Government, and humbly apologised. Now, I think it would have been a graceful act on the part of the Administration to have said to Mr. Ross: It is true, you have done wrong, you have exceeded your powers, but you are an old public servant, and while, no doubt, like other public servants in this country who have occasionally committed errors of judgment, you have made a mistake, and we disapprove entirely of your action, and shall have to manifest it in some way, either by your temporary suspension or otherwise, yet we are not going to take the extreme step of removing you from office. Is there any man in this House, on either side, who, if he were to review his whole life, public as well as private, could hold up his hand and say that he had never committed an error of judgment from want of consideration? That was the case with Mr. Ross; but his dismissal was intended to intensify the feeling towards the United States. Here was an officer who had shown some kindness to an American fisherman in distress; here was an officer who, on his own responsibility, had done a friendly act, and nothing more, towards a neighboring fisherman; and for that act he was dismissed. Do hon. gentlemen opposite think that that did not go home to the people of the United States? Do they not know that Mr. Ross's dismissal was flashed over every telegraph wire from one end of the United States to the other as an act of hostility to the United States? No act of the Government was so calculated to arouse a bitter feeling towards the Government of this country as their sacrifice of a man who had shown kindness to an American fisherman in distress. But what did the Government next do? After the dismissal of the old collector, a new collector was appointed, and not a month had elapsed when another American fisherman comes into the port of Halifax, and asks for what? Not for the privilege of sending forward to his own market 5,000 or 8,000 lbs of fish, which were of no great value; but he asked the privilege of making the port of Halifax a base of operations for carrying on his fishing business. He asked the collector for the liberty of buying in that market all the articles he required for the prosecution of his fishing, his supplies having given out. The new collector was wise in his generation, and I commend him for it; he immediately communicated with the Government at Ottawa. And now we see the changed position of the Government on that matter. A month ago they dismissed their collector for allowing 8,000 lbs. of halibut to be shipped to the United States, and a month has not elapsed when a vessel comes in without provisions, when she could not have gone back to the bank if permission to buy needed supplies had been refused, and when all its captain could have asked was liberty to get enough supplies to take the crew to their own homes; but the Government go back on their record, and they instruct the collector to allow that fisherman to make the port of Halifax his base of operations. If that decision of the Government is indicative of their policy for the rest of the season, we shall have the whole fishing fleet of the United States coming into the port of Halifax for their supplies. Now, this fisherman had not complied with the modus vivendi in securing a license; he had not paid anything into the revenues of this country to entitle him to any privilege in the way of securing supplies in our ports; but the Government, in the most important point of the controversy between the two countries to-day, so far as the fishing interests are concerned, made a complete back down. Well, Sir, that act goes much further than the policy called for by the resolution of the hon. leader of the Opposition. What does that resolution say? It merely says that, in the judgment of this House, the modus vivendi, whereby all these irritating differences and misunderstandings between the two countries could be avoided, shall be continued pending negotiations. That is the spirit in which the modus vivendi was proposed. If hon. gentlemen will turn to it, they will find that it is expressed in almost the same emphatic language.

It was offered to the Americans as a means whereby, pending the ratification or the rejection of the treaty by the two Government of Canada, all cases of irritation between the countries might happily be avoided. That was the origin of the modus vivendi, that was its scope and intention, and all we ask for now by the resolution before the House is that the modus vivendi shall be continued, if the Government are disposed to negotiate anew with our friends across the line. I say that position is a natural one, it is a consistent one, it is a statesmanlike one, it is the line of policy laid down by the Minister of Finance in his position as negotiator in behalf of Canada; and it is the position which, I heartily believe, will be approved of by the people. If we require an illustration, I may go back to the time when the Treaty of Washington expired. What did the Conservative Government of that day do? Did they immediately exclude the Americans from our harbors? Did they immediately fit out cruisers to protect our shores? Did they annoy the Americans, as they have of late, with all our custom house regulations? No, they still hoped to be able to negotiate a new treaty, and with the object of preventing any irritation during the negotiations, they allowed the Americans the use of our fisheries for six months free. We do not ask them to be free under the present resolution. We merely ask that they shall be permitted to go in, as was originally intended by the Treaty of Washington, and under that treaty they should pay the amount which is provided in it, if they require to take advantage of it. If the Government of the day are disposed, in individual cases and applications, to allow these vessels to come in, as they have already done, without any payment of a fee, and to obtain supplies and reship their cargoes, they are going very much further than we propose to go under the resolution submitted to the House. I am not going to condemn the Government or approve of them beforehand, but I say that, having committed themselves to the policy which they carried out only the week before last, in Halifax, of permitting an American vessel to obtain supplies there, they will have to take a new departure and exclude American vessels altogether or give them the benefit of the modus vivendi. It may be they are awaiting the arrival of that distinguished gentleman who is now on his way out, to throw some light on the subject, to tell them how far they are to back down, and how to back down most gracefully. We know how readily they succumbed to the hon. gentleman's eloquent observations last year, and I have no doubt that when he makes his appearance, he will be able to show the Government that the moderate suggestion we have made is in the interest of peace between the two countries, and thus enable the Administration to approach the American Government with the concurrence of both sides of the House, Hon. gentlemen on that side of the House are in a measure responsible for leading the American Government to suppose that if they refuse to come to terms we will be ready for annexation, for they are constantly telling us indirectly that one-half of the people of the country are in favor of annexation.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I say indirectly. The hon. gentleman must not forget that the Government have pointed out to the people of this country that unrestricted reciprocity means annexation and nothing else. They have through their press and public utterances declared that every man who is in favor of unrestricted reciprocity is an annexationist in disguise.

Mr. HAGGART. That is true.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I knew the hon. gentleman would admit that the position I take is a sound one. Admitting that such is the case, what is the natural result? We have had several elections in this country lately. We know that unrestricted reciprocity has been accepted as the policy of the Liberal party, who are at least half, if not more than half the people, and much more than half the best elements of the country, and the press of the hon. gentlemen opposite says that the Liberal party, having adopted the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, are all annexationists. Look at the elections that have lately taken place. Look at Halton, Joliette and Haldimand. All these elections were run on the question of unrestricted reciprocity, and the inference from the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite is that the majority who returned members to support the Liberal party are in favor of annexation. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite if the inference is not a natural and reasonable one. By the continued reiteration of such statements for party purposes, the press of the hon. gentlemen opposite and the Government have done irreparable injury, because if they could convince the people of the United States that we are only waiting to be admitted into the Union until unrestricted reciprocity is approved by our people, it is natural that the Americans will say: Well, we will wait a little longer, until the unrestricted reciprocity advocates get a little larger majority, and then we will take them in. For such a condition of public sentiment in the United States, the Conservative party of this country is solely responsible. Another view taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, with reference to the Treaty of 1872, was this, that it was discontinued on account of the feeling of unfriendliness during the civil war which existed on this side of the border. Possibly that might have had something to do with it at that time, but it was long after that. No doubt, however, this feeling was intensified by the hostile position of the Conservative party, and their public strictures on the policy of the United States. But the hon. the First Minister, the other night, told us what was also one very important factor with regard to this treaty. There was ranking in the minds of the people of the United States the fact that we had got from them $5,500,000 as a balance between the rights we conferred and the privileges we received. We know that that was a very important factor, in the opinion of the American people, in regard to that treaty. It was a very unreasonable one, we know, but it is useless to reason with a people when they get an idea in their heads, as it is apparently useless to reason with my hon. friends opposite, when they have made up their minds to a certain course, and run their heads against a stone wall in reference to our trade relations with the United States, and then have to back down. However, the people of the United States had that idea in their heads, and they had another idea which was equally dangerous, and that was that they could get no further renewal of that treaty, except for a further monetary consideration. I took occasion at a previous time to refer to that matter. If the Government, before that treaty expired, when they received a notice from the United States that they were about to terminate it, had intimated to the people of the United States that they were willing to renew it without any monetary consideration at all, I believe that cause of irritation would have been very largely removed. I have had intercourse with very many of the leading people of the United States who are largely instrumental in forming public opinion in regard to that branch of our relations with that country, and they have pointed out that, as they had had to pay five millions and a half for the previous twelve years, we would naturally want as much for the next twelve years. That was a fatal mistake, but the Government allowed it to go on from day to day without letting the Americans know that we would not require the money payment as well as other considerations. We have offered this resolution in good faith to the Government, and to hon. gentlemen on the other side, and we mean it in good faith.

Mr. RYKERT. Oh.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). My hon. friend laughs and I am glad he is pleased.

Mr. RYKERT. You are only joking.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hands of the Government will be strengthened, I hope, by the knowledge that they have behind them in any negotiations they may make, a body of men on this side amounting, I think, to eighty-five or ninety. We have not counted them for some time, but they are gaining every day. The Government must admit that their case cannot be weakened, but must be strengthened in dealing with the people across the line, when they know that they have the public sentiment, not only of their own friends, but of the Liberal party, who are willing to assist them in all reasonable and feasible negotiations. This is a matter of great importance. The trade relations between two great countries like these are matters of paramount consideration, and I would not for a moment stand here and throw any obstacle in the way of their negotiations with our friends across the border. I believe it is possible, by a friendly approach, and by making it understood that the people here, while we think they have not dealt justly with us, are still willing to meet them in friendly discussion, from such a discussion to eliminate a policy which will be acceptable to us as well as to them and to England, and we must remember that England is a very important factor in this matter, because she naturally looks with great interest to see such a large and important colony as this, lying alongside of sixty millions of people, preserve its intercourse with that people on such a basis as to prevent any causes of irritation arising between these two great Anglo-Saxon powers. It is in the interest of peace between England and the United States, as well as the commercial interests of our people, and, if the Government do not accept this expression of opinion from this side of the House, and do not at the earliest possible opportunity approach the Americans with a friendly and sincere desire to bring about an early, a large, a full and a comprehensive measure of reciprocity between these two people, I say they will fail in their duty and in the discharge of their responsibility to the people of this country.

Mr. KENNY. As I listened to the address of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) the other evening, —and I always do so with a great deal of pleasure—and to the resolution which he proposed, asking that the modus vivendi should be continued, I was very much afraid that we would not have the pleasure of hearing from the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), for, remembering what that hon. gentleman had stated and how he had argued in this House when the Fishery Treaty was under consideration last year, I was puzzled to know how he could reconcile his views with the resolution which his leader had proposed. But, with that versatility which characterises his party, he is always equal to such an emergency. We have been taunted from that side of the House with having backed down. In my short parliamentary experience, I never witnessed such a back down as we have heard here to-day. The hon. gentleman tells us that the United States of America is the only market for our fish. Does he not know that, of the productions of our own Province of Nova Scotia, not more than one-third goes to the United States?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman misunderstood me if he thinks I said that the United States was the only market for our fish.

Mr. KENNY. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that if we lost the United States market for our fish, our fishermen would be seriously injured.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I said, after the other markets were supplied,

Mr. KENNY. Of course, after all the rest of the world is supplied, there will be no great demand for fish. The hon. gentleman says that in the United States we would have a fish market of 65,000,000 people. That would mean that every American would have one herring, and that would be 65,000,000 herrings. If they were to take two herrings apiece—and they would be likely to take two herrings now that Lent is coming on—they would require 130,000,000 herrings. That reminds me of that well-known character, Colonel Sellers, who has been well known to all the members of this House. He found out that there were 600,000,000 people in Africa, and that every one of those had a sore eye, and would want a bottle of eye-wash. That would require 600,000,000 bottles, and the more they used, the more they would want. They would, therefore, require at least 1,200,000,000 bottles of eye-wash. In the same way, my hon. friend says we should look at these 65,000,000 people who are wanting to consume our fish. My hon. friend is a commercial man of very high standing in the community in which he resides, and he is an authority in regard to the business with which he is connected, and he ought to be infinitely more conversant with this fish business than I am, having studied the question, which I have not looked into lately. He should have told the House that, during the past 21 years, our trade (including Newfoundland) in fish with the United States has not increased $500,000. Now, Sir, my hon. friend knows that that is not a per capita increase, that the Americans do not actually take as much of our fish per capita as they were taking 21 years ago. But he desires that, under the modus vivendi, the Americans should have the privilege of transshipment. Why, Sir, that is the very thing he contended against last year, and he was so positive on it that he actually went back to his utterances on the Treaty of 1871, and particularly to what he had said on that occasion, which I will now read you from the Hansard:

“ Any concessions to the Americans giving them the use of our ports for shelter, bait and transport, without concessions on their side of a satisfactory character in return, would, I feel confident, never prove acceptable to our people, nor be ratified by Parliament.”

An hon. gentleman who is leading an active commercial life like my hon. friend, can hardly carry all the speeches that he has made in his memory. Again, the hon. gentleman, not only through the course of the debate, but when the different clauses of the treaty were under discussion, called the attention of the hon. Finance Minister of the day to the fact that he was very much afraid that under the clause—I think it was clause 12—Canadian vessels would not enjoy in American waters the same privileges which that article accorded to American vessels in our waters. But to-day he is prepared to sacrifice the interests of Canadian fishermen without getting anything in return from the Americans. That is what the modus vivendi means, and although I do not pose before this House as an authority on fishing matters, I say that the majority of the fishermen of Nova Scotia would be opposed to such a measure, and I am sure it would not be in their interest to adopt it. The hon. gentleman is an advocate of the transshipment of fish. Why does he not, if he has the interest of the fishermen so much at heart, advise the transshipment of fish by steamers to the West Indies? Why does he not oppose the system which prevails to-day of allowing French fish to come into our ports, fish which receives a bounty of $1.80 per quintal, and so prevent such great injury to our fishermen; there is a platform on which we could meet in common, because then we would be advocating in common the interests of our fishermen. But what is to be the remedy? The remedy is to be a change of Government. That is invariably the point to which all arguments from that side lead. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman has pointed, as an index of the change of public opinion, to two elections which have been held in the western part of this country; he wisely made no reference to his own Province, because he knows and feels that there never was a party so firmly entrenched in the affections of a people as the party led by the right hon. Premier of this country is to-day in the affection of the people of Nova Scotia. Let me point to instances; let me point, not to Haldimand, with its meagre majority, but let me point, first of all, to Pictou, now represented by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and we are all glad to see the prominent position which he occupies in this country to-day. What is the result there? Was it a majority of 30, or 40, or 50? No, Sir; he was returned by acclamation. Let me point again to Cumberland, where two elections have taken place, the county so ably represented by my hon. friend Mr. Dickey. Let me point again to Shelburne, to Victoria, to Colchester. I think that is a pretty good answer to my hon. friend as to the change of sentiment that has taken place in the Province from which we both come—

Mr. KIRK. How many million dollars have the Government expended to bring it about?

Mr. RYKERT. A sore pill for you.

Mr. MITCHELL. Shut up, Charley.

Mr. KIRK. What about the ship railway and the short line?

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman contends that it would be in the interest of Nova Scotia and the fishermen of that Province that the modus vivendi should be continued. Sir, I take entirely antagonistic ground to that proposition. I say it is not in the interests of the people of Nova Scotia, or to the honor or dignity of this Dominion. What does he want us to do? Does he want us to crouch, to crawl on our knees to the American people, and ask them, for heaven's sake, to take pity upon us, that we are so poor that we cannot even find a market for our products; "take pity upon us, you 65,000,000 of people, you charitable people, you good people, take compassion on us." Sir, we have a great admiration for the American people, but we are not ready to fall into their arms yet. Why, Sir, has not Great Britain, has not Canada, made every effort to secure a treaty and fair business relations with them? We were not only refused the Fishery Treaty, but Great Britain has been refused the Extradition Treaty; and further than that, the representative of Great Britain was sent from that country in a way which must have filled every British subject with a feeling of humiliation; not only that, but the American Government, to whom we are told to crouch, this expiring American Government, actually recalled from London almost the best representative that the United States has ever had there, because, forsooth, it was supposed that gentleman was favorable to Great Britain. Now, Sir, under these circumstances, are we, the Canadian people, to go to Washington and say, "Have compassion on us, or we perish?" No, Sir. The hon. gentleman has used this debate as a means of calling the attention of the House—and in a manner at which I was very much surprised, under all the circumstances—to the dismissal of Mr. Ross, late collector of Customs at Halifax. For Mr. Ross, personally, I entertain the warmest feelings of friendship and regard; and knowing well that Mr. Ross, who, I imagined, had claims for consideration upon hon. gentlemen opposite, knowing well that he had requested that this matter should not be brought up in the House, I say it was an act of injustice, of unkindness, to have mentioned it in this House. Imagine, gentlemen, if any friend of ours had, through any misfortune, lost his situation in the public service, and if it was well known round these benches that he did not wish his case mentioned in Parliament, is there a man on this side of the House who, forgetting old friendship, would so disregard the wishes of an old comrade? I do not believe there is. I say it is not fair, it is unkind to Mr. Ross, to bring his name up in this way. I know this is Liberty Hall, and we assert very great liberty in debate here, but when a friend has asked us not to bring his name up here, I say it is a breach of friendship to do so. Let us look at this question of Mr. Ross. Mr. Ross was a long time in the public service. Before he entered the public service he was Minister of Militia in the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, and it is not for me to state the circumstances under which he lost that position or retired from his position of Minister of Militia in that Government. There are hon. gentlemen now listening to me who know a great deal more about it than I do, and if they were so disposed they could enlighten the House. I may say, however, that his retirement from the position of Minister of Militia was not voluntary; so this is not the first time that Mr. Ross has had to complain of the Governments of Canada. It is, at all events, a fact that he retired from the position of Minister of Militia and was succeeded by the Hon. Mr. Vail; and there was an interval—I forget the exact dates, but an interval of some three or four weeks when Mr. Ross held no position. Then the position of collector of customs at Halifax was assigned to him. The gravity of Mr. Ross' offence necessitated some emphatic action at the hands of this Government. On all previous occasions Mr. Ross had communicated with his Government, and very properly so. He should have assumed no responsibility, particularly as he knew from the instructions of his department that the relations between the two countries on the Fisheries question were in a very critical condition, and it was all the more necessary for him to be more cautious than under ordinary circumstances. But he transgressed the regulations of his department on a very important occasion, and the danger was that unless this transgression was emphasised not only the Government of the United States, but also the British Government would imagine that a precedent has been established, and therefore it became painfully necessary for the Government of the day to dismiss Mr. Ross or sanction his retirement. The hon. gentleman says that this intensified the unfriendly feeling which, he contends, exists between the people of the United States and Canada. So far as my reading of the American journals goes, and so far as my intercourse with American people, outside of the politicians who are looking for votes, goes, I do not believe there is any intensely hostile feeling to the people of Canada in the United States. But the sweeping assertion has been made that this dismissal has "intensified the feeling." There is no journal in the northern part of the United States which is considered to be a better exponent of republican feeling or a greater authority on fishing matters than the Boston Advertiser, and it referred in the following terms to the dismissal of the collector at Halifax:—

"The dismissal of the collector of customs at Halifax is an instructive object lesson to our Administration of the proper course to pursue towards officials who concede contested points to foreign nations. Collector Ross granted the application of Consul General Phelan for the necessary bonding papers to enable the transshipment of the fresh fish cargo of a Gloucester schooner to this city from Halifax. We need not say that we assert the American right under the mutual covenants of 1830, and ordinary international comity, to make such transshipments, but the right has been denied by the Government at Ottawa, and the collector of customs, in conceding it, in this instance, without instructions from the Dominion Government, made disavowal necessary to maintain the Canada position unimpaired."

This is an American authority, not the ipse dixit of any hon. gentleman, and this American journal says this course was absolutely necessary. It continues:

"Disavowal was made signal by the request for the resignation of the offending collector. As a matter of fact the cargo was not shipped overland, and the Canadian Minister of Customs does not regard its transfer as distinctly conceding the American claims, but as the concessions might be interpreted as impairing the Canadian case, it was sharply repudiated. We are sorry for the obliging collector, but our Administration can profit by the example of Canada in the treatment of officials who fail to maintain the asserted rights of the nation."

I think this is the best answer that can be given, not from the Canadian standpoint, but from the American standpoint, of the necessity that existed for such recognition of the transgression of regulations by Mr. Ross as he received. Referring again to what has appeared in an American paper in connection with this matter - because it is not fair that the Government should be blamed for upholding the dignity of our country, and adhering to the proper interpretation of international treaties—I find the following despatch appeared in American papers in connection with the transshipment of the cargo of the M. A. Batson:

"Capt Campbell packed 8,000 pounds of halibut in ice boxes and transhipped it by the steamer Carroll to Boston. The vessel has no license, and Capt. Campbell says he made the transshipment under the rights given Americans by the bonding arrangements of the Treaty of Washington. This is the first attempt made to tranship."

This despatch was telegraphed to American journals, and thus intensified American feeling, or, at all events, if it did not intensify American feeling, it proclaimed to Americans that Canada had conceded the most important point in the treaty. I may say that while I was in Halifax I had a conversation on this matter with the Consul General of the United States, a most efficient, capable, honorable officer, and that gentleman expressed to me his utter astonishment at Mr. Ross' conduct. He said that to him it was incomprehensible; and Mr. Ross himself has never attempted to explain it; he cannot do so. But what was more important was the impression it produced on the mind of the American Consul General. That gentleman, I believe, when he found the transshipment had taken place to the United States, telegraphed to his Government that Canada had conceded transshipment. Hon. gentlemen can imagine to what difficulties that might have led; so much so that the Consul General expressed to me his utter surprise that Mr. Ross should have taken such a step without consulting his Government, and have acted contrary to his written, positive and clear instructions. But the circumstances of that case were remarkable. That vessel came into Halifax and all the repairs she required involved only an outlay of 50 cents. If I could imagine such a thing, one would almost suppose an attempt was made to make up a case; I do not insinuate that for one moment, but it is extraordinary that all the repairs required involved an expenditure of only 50 cents. That is entirely different to the other case to which the hon. gentleman has referred. The second case to which he has called attention, and it is a comparatively recent occurrence, is that of an American fishing vessel which came into Halifax harbor in distress. She had experienced very stormy weather and had lost a portion of her rigging, and permission was asked to refit in Halifax, not, as the hon. gentleman has said to make Halifax her basis of supplies, but permission to obtain there the necessary outfit to enable her to return home, and whilst this was being done her cargo was allowed to be transhipped. Shall we be ever able to satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite? At one moment they say: You are too severely strict with the people of the United States. They ask nothing from the Americans, but contend that we must surrender everything to them. The next moment they blame the Government because it has allowed in one instance a vessel to be refitted. In regard to the question generally of the modus vivendi, my hon. friend (Mr. Jones), to whom I always listen with a great deal of attention, has treated us to a dissertation regarding the farmers of Ontario, the log export duty, a reciprocity treaty, and many other questions which, to my mind, are hardly relevant to a fisheries question. But it will be for the people of Canada to adjudicate upon this question at the proper time, and, notwithstanding the jubilation with which hon. gentlemen opposite view certain elections that have taken place in the Province of Ontario, I firmly believe, knowing well the feeling of my own Province at least, that when the time comes the people of Canada, and the people of Nova Scotia, will recognise that in the matter of this modus vivendi as in all other important matters, their interests are quite safe in the hands of the Government led by my friend the right hon. Premier.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

SUPPLY—THE FISHERIES.

House resumed debate on Mr. Foster's proposed motion and on Mr. Laurier's amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. In rising to take part in this discussion I may say that I am pleased to find that by hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House, with some few exceptions, it has been approached in a manner comparatively free from that party strife and those party references which have too often distinguished discussions in this House. I think it is a matter of great importance to Canada that, in discussing a question where international interests are involved, and particularly when the issues to be tried have yet to be settled between the countries interested in the matter, that we should endeavor to avoid as far as possible saying anything of an acrimonious nature, or anything that would place the gentlemen who for the time being are in charge of the affairs of this country, in a position of disadvantage in carrying on any negotiations which may hereafter take place. I think that is the true spirit in which we should legislate in this country. So far as I myself am concerned, whatever other parties may do, I have held myself free in every discussion since I have been in this House, whether in the Government or outside of it, and endeavored to control myself in such a way when addressing this Parliament that anything I might say, no matter whether against the Government of the day, or whether in favor of my party interests, when I had party interests, I endeavored in every such case to avoid saying anything that would be detrimental to Canada in any negotiations that might be carried on. That is the line I propose to take to-night, and I will ask this House to bear with me for a very short time in deed. On this subject, last Session, I delivered a speech of some two and a half hours duration, when the Fishery Treaty was before the House. Sir Charles Tupper then ably laid the views entertained by him and the Government he represented before Parliament, and I feel it would be taxing the time of this House too much if I were to occupy more than a very brief space in stating my views on this question. It is well that we should know what is ahead of us, and I may be permitted to claim a little prophetic vision on this subject. I can see that the advent of Sir Charles Tupper (who so ably conducted the negotiations at Washington, and although he conducted them, not to my satisfaction, I am quite satisfied he did the best he could).—I am glad to find that he is again on the ocean coming to Canada, and that he will arrive within the next forty-eight hours in New York.

Some hon. MEMBERS. He is there now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am very glad that he is there. I have no doubt as to the object of his mission to this country. I have no doubt in my mind that Sir Charles Tupper is coming out here charged by the British Government to lay before the Cabinet of the Dominion of Canada, the views, personally intimated to him, which the English Cabinet entertains in relation to this question. We all know that the British Government are extremely desirous to avoid any difficulty with our neighbors to the south of the boundary line. We know it is neither their interests nor inclination that those difficulties should exist, and we know from past experience that they have been only too ready to sacrifice the interests of Canada for the sake of peace. While I make this statement, I am not one who regrets that peace has been maintained. I believe that any sacrifice, short of the loss of national honor, is not too dearly made in order to obtain that great object with a people who are so nearly allied to us in race, in religion, in language and in everything that tends to advance civilisation and christianity at the present day. I am pleased to believe that the sentiments of both sides of this House will be as far as they can, to promote the object which the British Government have in view in maintaining that peace. I want to warn the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, from experience of the last twenty-five years, of the manner in which British views have been expressed, and I want also to warn the people of Canada, I desire to warn them that there is a limit, an extent to which they may not go, and satisfy the public mind of Canada. It may not be out of place at present for me to place briefly before the House the actual position of the Fishery question. I will not go back beyond the Convention of 1818, when the rights of the people of Canada were recognised and admitted by the people of the United States, and when were defined the privileges the people of Canada should possess and the rights the Americans should have. It was then defined that the line of three miles—and I make the statement now in order to meet the statement made by the right hon. the First Minister and by the Minister of Finance the other day, that they had always guarded the true interests and preserved intact all the rights granted to Canada by the Convention of 1818, and that to-day we were enforcing the rights of the Treaty of 1818 just as they had been enforced in years past. By that Treaty of 1818, we all know that the Americans agreed they should have no rights within a line of three miles drawn from the headlands, bays, and coasts and shores of Canada. My hon. friend will bear me out in saying that for forty years after that treaty was made the construction put upon it was that the Americans had no right within any one of these bays or within three miles line from headland to headland along our shores and coasts. For forty years the British Government protected that construction, and the Americans acknowledged it, and I refer to my speech of last Session for all the authorities and quotations to sustain that assertion. Does the right hon. gentleman mean to say that to-day we are assuming the position which we maintained for forty years in relation to the rights Canada possesses, and which, with the protection of the parent Government, we enjoyed up to the Elgin Treaty of 1854? I may say here that I agree with hon. gentlemen who hold that the Elgin Treaty was eminently in the interests of this Canada of ours. Under that treaty, for the twelve years of its existence, the trade of this country increased to an enormous extent with the American States, just as that of the American States increased with us. I hold that the treaty was mutually beneficial, and that if it had been continued Canada would be in a very different position to-day. At the time the treaty was made one of its conditions was that the Americans should enjoy free intercourse in common with the citizens of Canada in the fisheries along our coasts. The expiration of that treaty brought about the suspension of that particular privilege. But although the rights of the Americans to participate in our fisheries ceased at the termination of the treaty, we found ourselves in this position, that while the British Government, up to the time of the Elgin Treaty, had sustained the claim of Canada to the headlands, bays, harbors and ports of Canada, and for three miles outside of them, while the British Government had up to that time sustained that construction of the treaty and the Americans, had admitted it, yet, when the treaty expired in 1866, we know that while the Government of Canada claimed our full rights—and I will do my right hon. friend the credit of saying that at that time the despatches written under his instructions claiming that construction and the enforcement of our rights on the part of the mother country, were a credit to him and to the Government of which he was one of the heads at the time—the British Government endeavored, in order to avoid difficulties with the United States, to get some arrangement made by which we should allow the Americans to come in and fish for one year. Well, that privilege was conceded. The right hon. gentleman sent down to the Maritime Provinces, for that was before Confederation, to induce us to aid him in coming to some arrangement, and the Maritimes Provinces consented to an arrangement by which for one year American fishermen should enjoy with ours the same privileges they had enjoyed during the twelve years existence of the Elgin Treaty. After 1867, when Confederation was established and the Department of Marine and Fisheries created and organized, we had to take up the question; and before the next fishing season we represented to the British Government that it was inadvisable to continue that system; that our rights having revived and those of the Americans having dropped after the expiration of the Elgin Treaty, it was not advisable to continue granting them that privilege. We represented that if we continued, year after year, to allow them to come in and participate in those fisheries, without any reciprocal advantages being given by them, they would in lapse of time consider our title had been prescribed and claim the privilege as an absolute right. We were induced, however, by the British Government, for three years to permit that kind of thing to go on, and we saw at last it would only end in our losing our rights altogether unless some action was taken. We did take some action I was, under the direction of the right hon. the First Minister, empowered to put on a force for the protection of our fisheries, and did so; and while that continued our rights were tolerably well protected, but only to a limited extent. The British Government would not allow us to enforce our rights beyond three miles of the shore. The old question of the headlands they desired should remain in abeyance, and under the direction of the Secretary of State for the Colonies of that day, we had to rescind the instructions which I had issued. Canada had no power to protect her rights beyond the three-mile shore limit, that being the municipal extent of her jurisdiction, and the force she put on was merely a police force. Her Majesty's vessels were the only source we had to look to for protection of our rights under the Convention of 1818. At that time, however, there were indications on the part of the British Government that in all probability they would abandon the claim which they for forty years had sustained in regard to the headlands. My hon. friend says now, speaking of his Government, that they have abandoned no portion of the rights which Canada acquired under the Treaty of 1818; but I would like to say this to him, that when he makes that remark, he has failed to observe the fact that we have never attempted to enforce, because the British Government would not do it, and we for want of municipal jurisdiction outside of the three-mile limit could not do it, that special right which we formerly enjoyed and which has remained in abeyance. I mention that fact, not to bring a charge against the Government of the day, for I believe they have endeavored to press upon the British administration in the strongest way they could the necessity which exists of enforcing our complete rights; but the Americans, from the laxity of the rule which had crept in and from the fact that for twelve years during the existence of the Elgin Treaty they had enjoyed almost complete immunity, the British Government felt reluctant to enforce the question of our rights to the headlands and bays. I mention this for two reasons. First, to point out to the hon. gentleman that he is wrong in his statement, that the Government of Canada to-day are enforcing and carrying out every right which Canada enjoyed under the Convention of 1818. I make it for another reason, and I may say here, in referring to Sir Charles Tupper's advent to the shores of America again, that he has come for a purpose. I venture to prophesy that his chief object is, under personal instructions from the Ministry of England, to confer with the Cabinet of Canada, and that he will again be an ambassador to Washington, or, at all events, a confidential missionary for the purpose of viewing out the land. My belief is that we will find ourselves in the same position now as we found ourselves in in former years where the British Government have had a finger in the pie in regard to our negotiations. If there were one thing more than another which would make me view with satisfaction the position of hon. gentlemen in bringing forward a resolution declaring that we should have our own commercial treaties arranged by our own men, it is this case of the last Washington Treaty. I have no doubt that Sir Charles Tupper will go down to Washington again, and I may say that there are few men, if any, in Canada who are better qualified to carry on such negotiations than that hon. gentleman, and, though I do not agree with the provisions of the treaty which was made last year or believe that it was in the interest of Canada, I said then and I say now that I believed he used every means in his power, and that, if he failed to get what Canada was entitled to, it was because he was restrained by the other representatives of the English Government and by that Government under whom he acted. I mention this now, because I do not know what steps the Government may take in regard to the renewal of negotiations, and I have no doubt that negotiations will be renewed.

If we can believe what we hear, if we can believe that the statements we see in the press are true, and if we can believe what the right hon. gentleman said the other day in this House, negotiations have already been renewed in an informal way.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I did not at all intend to convey the idea that any negotiations, formal or informal, were commenced. I simply said that I had unofficial information as to the feelings of the incoming Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. I certainly understood that some negotiations had taken place, or some representations had been made to the right hon. gentleman in regard to the feelings of the new administration.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not intend to convey that at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. Of course I accept the right hon. gentleman's statement, and I take that back. However, we find in some of the papers published in the United States positive statements as to what is going on in Washington. We know there are gentlemen there now who are interesting themselves in that matter, and those gentlemen, I think, I may safely say, are in communication with the right hon. gentleman on the subject. Whether he has authorized those negotiations or not, I cannot say, and, therefore, I will not assume that he has, but I think we may fairly assume that, gentlemen who are negotiating in that way—and the right hon. gentleman admits that he has knowledge of something of the kind going on—do not, as a rule, do that without some encouragement from those who are in authority here. Further, if the right hon. gentleman has people there who are feeling the way to bring these difficulties to a friendly termination, he is only doing what is in the interests of the country and in the interest of his Government, and for my part I entirely approve of it. We all know that there are certain informal steps to be taken before we can approach a matter of such great importance as this, and I am only glad to hear that something of that kind is being done by someone in concert with the Government of the day, and that I hope it will have a satisfactory result. I would like to ask my right hon. friend a question in regard to the treaty of last year which this House unanimously adopted, not because they believed it was in the interests of Canada, or that Canada had received fair play in that treaty, but because they desired to see peace prevail. We, on this side of the House, knew that, when the ambassador of the right hon. gentleman and the English Government came here with a treaty completed between the English ambassadors on the one hand and the American Government on the other hand, it would be adopted by this House, whether we liked it or not. We, on this side of the House, stated clearly that we did not believe it was a fair treaty for Canada, and I repeat now what I think it is my duty to repeat, especially when negotiations may be further renewed, that that treaty was almost a complete give-away of what Canada had contended for for the last twenty years, and had enjoyed for over fifty years. I urge upon the Government that, in the renewal of negotiations, we should not be simply content to claim what was in the treaty of last year, because that was rejected by the United States Senate, but that we should claim what we are entitled to, the privileges which have been recognised and enforced by the British Government on our behalf and which have been acknowledged by every Government from 1818 down, and that we should let the Americans know that, though for the sake of peace that Treaty was accepted last year, it was not because it was what we thought Canada was entitled to, but that it was simply in the interests of peace that we accepted what was proposed. Let any man take a map and draw a line three miles outside of the headlands on our three thousand miles of coast, let him take the fishing privileges and the water territory, which that includes, and then let him look at the delimitations which Sir Charles Tupper laid before this House, and he will see what a fragmentary portion of our rights is reserved under that treaty. But our hands were tied on this side of the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite are bound to follow the right hon. gentleman no matter what arrangement he might take, and all we could do was to assent to that arrangement. After the treaty was assented to here, a very unkind remark was made by an hon. Minister, who asked why we did not challenge the treaty, take a vote upon it, and test the feeling of the House. We had no power to test the public feeling. All we could do, when the Government submitted it to us, was to protest against it and accept it. We had one consolation. We thought, if we accepted it unanimously, it would be accepted by the Senate of the United States, and it would be a great boon to Canada, though we gave all those privileges away. It would have been a boon to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces if the United States Senate had accepted that treaty, as it would have given them peace, though at the sacrifice of their interests. I do not wish to make any reflections on our neighbors, but there cannot be much doubt that the Senate rejected that treaty because the Republican majority in that House felt bound to defeat their Democratic opponents, and, on grounds of party policy mainly they were bound to reject that treaty. I am not going to take up much of the time of the House in regard to what I stated at such great length last year and supported by such clear proof, as to the treatment which we have received from the British Government; but I am afraid that the British Government will again send some half-hearted and weak-hearted man to Washington, who will influence the commissioner whom Canada may send, if she does send one, and that we will be over-ridden again, not in the interests of this country, but in the interests of Britain, and because of their desire to maintain peace at the risk of all the interests of Canada. Sir, I hope this will not be the case, but when I look at what has taken place in the last twenty-five years—and I am pretty well conversant with the correspondence which has taken place during that time—I must say that I look with dread upon any renewal of negotiations where the British Government has anything to do with them. Why, Sir, the High Commissioner told us last year that there was a great power behind us. If that power is only behind us, and is only a sham, only a dummy, what is the use of it? We would have been far better alone. I believe one of the causes which defeated that treaty in the Senate was a dislike and hatred to England. We know there is in that great country an element of eight millions of Irishmen, and we know the feelings that have been excited in the Irishmen in the United States toward Great Britain, and we know that has always had a controlling influence whenever England's name has been mentioned, or England's interests are involved in the States. What I fear now is that that feeling is still in existence, and when we come to have our interests dealt with, we will find that we shall have that feeling to fight, as well as the political one. Now I think I have said enough of that portion of the question which is under consideration. It has been stated that negotiations had been going on with the view to renewed trade relations between the Americans and Canada. Sir, I believe that there has been for some time, notwithstanding the statements made from the other side of the House, a growing feeling on the part of the people of the United States towards closer commercial and business relations with the people of this country. We all know that a strong party feeling exists in the United States in favor of a reduction of their high tariff, that their accumulated revenues have come to be an embarrassment to the trade of the country, and that each party is shifting around to find the best way to reduce the revenue which they find to be detrimental to the prosperity of their country. Sir, we have had announced to-day the action of the Congress of the United States, who have almost unanimously adopted a resolution submitted by Mr. Hitt, a very prominent and able man, in favor of Commercial Union. Now, Sir, I am no Commercial Unionist, I have never been, and the paper I control has endeavored to show the difficulties which would surround any arrangement for Commercial Union. But, Sir, I will tell you what I am. I am in favor of more extended trade with the United States in another shape very closely allied to Commercial Union. I have often been asked: "What is the difference between Commercial Union and the Unrestricted Reciprocity which your paper, the Herald, advocates, and which you have always advocated in Parliament?" The difference is this, and it is just as well that it should be stated: In the case of Commercial Union it would be an assimilation of the tariffs, they would be the same in both countries, and the arrangement of that tariff could only be attained by a conference, and the result would be that sixty millions could not give way to five millions, and unless they let the tail wag the dog Canada would have very little to say about it. For that reason I have not been in favor of Commercial Union. But let us get Unrestricted Reciprocity. Let each country make its own tariff, and let both agree to assimilate them to one another as far as they can, and it is no odds whether they would be exactly the same or not. There is very little difference between the two now; the difference is only that probably the United States would control the regulation of the tariff. Under Unrestricted Reciprocity that could not be, because we in Canada would make our own tariff. Why should we not? Are we not doing it now? Are we not rapidly approaching to the high standard of taxation that exists in the United States? There the tendency is to lower the tariff, here the tendency is to raise it. This very week, this very day I believe, at all events yesterday—a delegation of millers were down to ask for an increase of a dollar a barrel on the food of the poor man, upon the flour that he eats. Sir, look at the iron men. The Government have been pestered with them ever since this Parliament opened—delegation after delegation of them coming on. I asked one of them the other day: "What is the average condition of the tariff in regard to its effect on iron products now?" He told me, 50 per cent. He said the blast furnaces which Sir Charles Tupper portrayed, that would be scattered all over the country, built here and there, and everywhere, when this high tariff was adopted some years ago—why, he said, not one of them has ever been constructed, not a new one started yet. But they are actually asking for higher duties to be put on iron; these representatives of the one blast furnace in Canada, the Londonderry Works, come here and ask for an increased duty of 10 per cent. to be put upon iron imported into the country. We find the ten rolling mills sending delegations here to oppose that, and asking the Government not to increase the duty. The fact is, the chickens are coming home to roost amongst these iron men, and they are finding out the difficulty, the evil effects of the policy adopted by this protective Government, this so called National Policy, which my right hon. friend led the country into adopting years ago, led it with misrepresentation—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With your assistance.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes with my assistance, because I was deluded; but thank God the scales have fallen from my eyes. When, in order to drive the Mackenzie Government out of power—and I was as anxious to do it as my right hon. friend was—yes, I am honest about the thing, I do not carry two faces under one hat, I say what I think and what I know to be true—when the right hon. gentleman talked of this National Policy, about which he had no more conviction, but only accepted it as an opportunist, he accepted it because he was told that it would carry him into power, and it did. But when I accepted it as first propounded, there was no talk of a duty of 50 cents per barrel upon flour, no talk of 50 per cent. duty upon iron used by every farmer, every lumberman and every fisherman in the country. It was by misrepresentation that my hon. friend succeeded in sailing into power on his National Policy, with a promise of only a 25 per cent. maximum rate.

Mr. JONES. "Telegraph to Boyd."

Mr. MITCHELL. Of course he telegraphed to Boyd, and Boyd telegraphed back. He told Boyd that there was to be no increase over 25 per cent.

Mr. LISTER. Merely a readjustment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I know my right hon. friend pretty well; we have foregathered before now. I may say that is the reason the hon. gentleman taunts me with assisting him in getting the National Policy imposed upon this country. I did help him, but it was under false pretences. I never dreamed of a duty of 50 cents a barrel on flour, 40 cents upon corn meal, $2 upon pork, 35 per cent. upon cottons, worn by the people, 35 per cent. upon woollens, 150 per cent. upon some other articles that I named the other night. Sir, this tariff has grown like the horse leech; it is "give, give" all the time. They want more and more, and they are coming here and asking for it now. I saw some millers here to-day, I believe some of them are in the gallery listening to me now; they want an increased duty upon flour, $1 a barrel is all they want. I should like to know what the poor fishermen, and lumbermen, and farmers in my county—they are all half farmers, half lumbermen and half fishermen, for that is the class we have on our shores—would say if I quietly sat here and consented to such proposition without resenting it and protesting against it as I am doing to-night, and as I shall continue to do if such a proposition is attempted to be carried. That is the kind of National Policy my right hon. friend has reached. He has advanced from a National Policy to adopt a protective policy, and a mighty hard one at that. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about not being able to make an arrangement with the United States. Why, is it because there is any great difference between the tariffs of the two countries? No. The Americans have had a high protective tariff for many years until they have found it to be an incubus, that it has produced and fostered the growth of institutions which are cursing the country in the form of "combines" and that it is taxing the many for special purposes to enrich the few. That is about what the protective policy has done there. The right hon. gentleman having once got the wedge entered by means of the National Policy, plausible as his theory was at the time, because it had then none of the objectionable features in regard to taxing the poor man's bread, has continued and is still continuing to drive it home, and while I fear he is doing it in a way that will injure the people, I hope it will drive him from power. I do not propose to continue my remarks; I feel that after occupying over two hours last Session in placing my views on the fisheries question before the House, I should not tax the patience of the House too much to-night.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. MITCHELL. The leader of the Government, when replying to the leader of the Opposition the other day, made some observations on which I will say a few words, and I hope my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition will excuse me if I say a word in his defence. I have no right to speak for him, but with his permission I will just say this: The right hon. gentleman charged my hon. friend with being a friend to every country but his own. That expression came with very bad grace from the hon. gentleman. He also said that he did not want to go on his bended knees to the United States, and beg them to give us reciprocity. Is there no method of approaching an independent and splendid people other than by actions either of of servility or of defiance? The right hon. gentleman on the one hand, assumes an attitude of opposition and defiance to them, and, on the other hand, he says: Do you want Canada to go on bended knees to ask the United States to give us reciprocity. There is a medium course which should be adopted by a statesman,—it is that of conciliation, one whereby he might approach a great country such as the United States, and while he commanded their respect, at the same time he would lead them to consider any proposition which might be made to them in a fair and honorable spirit. That is the course I should like to see adopted, not the course which the right hon. gentleman and his Government have pursued for several years past towards that country. Is he likely to accomplish anything with that people by the course which he has pursued with regard to the fisheries? When the treaty expired in 1886, what course did he pursue? The most stringent one possible. I do not know what the instructions were that were given to the commanders of the cruisers, because, up to this day, although they have been several times asked for, they have never been produced, or we have never ascertained what they were, but we do know what the effect has been. The hon. gentleman's officers—I hold him responsible for their actions—have pursued a course towards the fishermen of the United States that was not warranted by the circumstances. When the D. J. Adams and the Doughty were seized within three days in the Bay of Fundy, they were seized on the most frivolous pretext. They were held in the port of Halifax for months and months, and I believe they were only released—I have been told so by an hon. friend on this side of the House—when the treaty which Sir Charles Tupper assisted to negotiate was agreed upon. I have never seen evidence of that release or despatches relating to it, but I am informed by some of my hon. friends that they saw something of the kind and that those vessels were released after the treaty was made. I told the right hon. gentleman when he seized the D. C. Adams that he had acted wrongly and that the Government's action could not be sustained, and moreover that the course pursued was not only very frivolous but very vexatious and annoying to a proud spirited people like the Americans. The right hon. the First Minister the other day, when dealing with the statements made by the leader of the Opposition, said the Government had not done a single act which they were not justified in doing. I say there have been innumerable such acts and the seizures of those two vessels were acts not justified by the facts. Is it the way to conciliate a great people like the people of the United States, to have their flag pulled down by one of our cruisers? Is there anything that a proud people would resent more quickly than such an act? Yet this was done by the master of one of the cruisers. I am in favor of protecting the fisheries of this country, I am in favor of protecting our rights, and of doing it in a manly and independent way, but I am in favor of doing it with that moderation and that conciliation as well for the prejudices, as the feelings and rights of others, as we would like to have shown to ourselves. That course has not been pursued by the right hon. gentleman and his Government, and I desire now to state, that the course which the Government pursued in 1886, was not pursued in 1887, I am glad to say, because of the warning they received, and the effect was, that even the High Commissioner himself, resented the course taken, and the policy was changed. I believe it is our duty, while we uphold our rights, to uphold them in a manner so as to give as little offence as possible to those with whom we are brought in contact, and if we expect to accomplish anything by entering into negotiations with the people of the United States, we must act fairly and squarely, and not act so as to provoke trouble, and seek to become aggressive. It is to the interest of this country that we should endeavor to secure renewed trade relations with the people of the United States. I believe they have now opened the door by the resolution which has been passed by Congress, and hon. gentlemen opposite can no longer say we have to go cringing to the United States. They have invited us to approach them; they have passed unanimously a resolution in Congress declaring themselves in favor of Commercial Union, and the Commercial Union may not be what we desire nor perhaps what we would consider. Yet it is such a long step on the way to what we desire, namely Unrestricted Reciprocity, that if negotiations were properly handled we could no doubt accomplish our object. But I fear for the result. The leader of the Government, after building up the sugar refineries, who are making enormous profits year after year, the cotton factories which are making large dividends, and some of them are already coming to grief because the unnatural bounties offered have caused so many to be established—after building up iron foundries and rolling mills, nail factories and factories of various kinds, the right hon. gentleman will find himself embarrassed in placing such a proposition before the United States as they can accept. The right hon. gentleman will find that he will not be assisted by those men who had in the past made contributions for election purposes. They will be very apt to split upon him, and the public will obtain a good deal of information about these matters which they do not now possess, and in place of handing the right hon. gentlemen contributions at the next general election they will very coolly tell him: No, we have done enough for you, you must now hold your own, you have gone back on us. Of course, that is assuming the right hon. gentleman goes to the United States with a desire to make a fair reciprocal arrangement, and if he does not, I do not suppose he will succeed in getting one. I have now stated briefly my views upon this matter. I would have gone at greater length into it were it not that I did so last year and I do not feel like inflicting upon the the House a repetition of the arguments which I used at length last Session. With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude.

Mr. CASEY. I regard the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down as being of special weight to this House and to the country. The views of a gentleman who was once an honest supporter of what he conceived to be the National Policy as explained by the author of it, and his views on the National Policy as it exists to-day are particularly valuable. If the promises made to the country in regard to the National Policy have been so falsified subsequently, that one of its original supporters has been compelled contrary to his old associations, and contrary to his convictions on the subject, to condemn that policy that he once supported, it says a great deal against the policy in question. Coming back to the subject more immediately before us,—the resolution proposed by the hon. the leader of this side of the House and the answer of the right hon. the Premier to my hon. friend's speech, I am reluctantly compelled to say that the policy of the Government as hitherto practised in regard to the fisheries, and as outlined by the hon. gentleman's speech on the question is the genuine old fashioned, true blue, Tory policy of bluster and back down. When the Washington Treaty came to a conclusion by notice from the United States there was a short interval of the policy of bluster indulged in. Then it was found that negotiations must be entered into and the Government most flagrantly backed down from the position they had taken in the early stages of the discussion. They had told Canadians, and told the Government of the United States, that to surrender certain rights in regard to these fisheries would be to surrender territorial rights—a part of the heritage of this country and which could not be surrendered without treason to the best interests of the people. The Commissioner of this Government, in conjunction with the British Commissioner, went to Washington and surrendered these rights. Not only did they do this, but they arranged a modus vivendi, of which so much as been said, giving a certain qualified admission to our fisheries on certain terms which were to subsist until the negotiations were finally closed, and it was found to be utterly impossible to conclude the treaty. In that the Government practised the policy of bluster and back down. In the new negotiations which had been initiated as would appear through the instrumentality of the same gentleman who inaugurated the last negotiations—the instrumentality of the annexationist and traitor Erastus Wiman, the policy of bluster has been practised, so far at least as the public utterances of the Government in Canada are concerned. I do not know what has been said to the United States Government by their special ambassador, but I know that their policy in Canada has been one of bluster. I beg to prophesy that perhaps before the end of this Session, and certainly before a very long time thereafter a policy of back down will have succeeded to this policy of bluster and we shall find the Government taking in many respects, if not in all, the suggestions and the position which we urge they ought to take now. With whatever rivals or opponents the Government of the day is engaged; whether it be with a few hundred half-breeds in the North-West or sixty millions of people to the south of us, we always find that they pursue a policy of bluster, in the first place, and of back down in the second place, when they find that bluster won't do. It is that which galls them in discussing this motion of my right hon. friend in front of me (Mr. Laurier.) It galls them to know, as they do in their heart and conscience, that in a short time they will have to adopt the hon. gentleman's suggestion, and perhaps to go further than he has urged them to do. It is evident that they are not comfortable in their minds on this subject, and not only are they uncomfortable, but, I might say in a metaphorical sense, that they are feeling ill. The proof of this is that when a man feels sick he generally sends for the doctor. The Government undoubtedly feel sick on the present occasion for they have sent for the doctor: they have sent for the great medicine man of the party, the gentleman who is the great healer of all breaches in the party, their great deliverer, without whom nothing is done that is done on that side of the House; and upon whom the chief of the party seems to rely as upon a superior and overpowering intellect. Without Sir Charles Tupper nothing of importance has been done for years past, and when we see him appear suddenly in Ottawa, a couple of months before he was expected, we know that the patient has been very ill, and that the doctor has been sent for to try, if possible, to cure his malady. Whether the doctor will be successful or not it is impossible to say, but I am quite certain that that distinguished physician, diplomatist and politician, will, in all probability, inaugurate a new course of treatment. The drugs to be administered to the Government, and the nostrums to their supporters and the pabulum to be given to the United States Government will all be changed. We shall have a total change of tone in the treatment of this great question now that the great doctor, the great medicine man and the great general mediator of the Conservative party and of its chieftain, has arrived on the scene. Before I go further into these general remarks I want to allude to some statements made by the right hon. the Premier when we last discussed this question. He told us that when he was negotiating the Washington Treaty in 1871 he was heavily handicapped and he was prevented from securing what he wished by the fact of a certain resolution regarding the duty on American products having been passed here in his absence. In relating briefly the course of discussion between him and the American commissioners and the offer they made, he said :

"But when this subject was being discussed the Canadian Parliament was sitting here, I being at that time in Washington, and Parliament suendo diabolo, Mr. Holton passed a Bill taking the duty off coal and salt, and I was confronted by that vote of the Canadian Parliament. We were completely sold by our own people, and Mr. Hamilton Fish, chairman of the American Commission, with a quiet chuckle, said : We withdraw our offer."

Now, Sir, this statement was not new on the part of the hon. gentleman, for so long ago as 1872 when he was making a speech in Peterborough during the election campaign, he gave us a somewhat similar account of these transactions. He said :

"From day to day I was fighting that battle. In that struggle I had every chance of success—that at least a fair chance of success—when judge of my surprise, my honor, when I found that in my absence Parliament then sitting at Ottawa took the Opposition, not regarding the peculiar position of the representatives of this country on the Commission, regardless, I say it boldly, of the interests of this country with an utter want of patriotism in this case at least, and in defiance of the remonstrances, even of the earnest entreaties of my colleagues, proposed and forced upon Parliament a repeal of the National Policy Act by which we had put a duty on certain American productions such as flour, coal and salt."

Now, Sir, that proves that even as early as 1872 the hon. gentleman's recollection of that matter was considerably muddled; for, although the proceedings had only taken place a year and a half before, he had managed to give as complete a misstatement as possible of the facts of the case. Instead of his colleagues having earnestly protested and entreated against the passage of the Act in question, repealing the so-called National Policy, I find in the Votes and Proceedings of the 22nd of March, on which day the vote was taken, that every colleague of the hon. gentleman who was then in the House voted for that Act against which he says they earnestly entreated. I find the names of Hincks, Howe, Langevin, Robitaille, Tilley, Tupper, and two gentlemen who are still in the House, Cameron of Inverness and Costigan, recorded as voting for that resolution which the hon. gentleman said killed the negotiations at Washington. It might be possible to excuse a slip of memory on the part of the right hon. gentleman at this late date, but it was not excusable then. After hearing the right hon. gentleman state that Hamilton Fish, with a quiet chuckle, "We withdraw the offer," I consulted a friend now in the House, who recalled to my memory the fact that Hamilton Fish had written a letter on this subject shortly after the negotiations. It is published in the Globe of the 27th of August, 1872, and is as follows :

"DAVID MILLS, Esq., Clearville, Canada.

"SIR,—Your letter dated 5th July was not received until within the last three days. You ask whether the action of the Canadian Parliament in March, 1871, in repealing the Act of the previous year, imposing duties on coal, salt, flour, &c., influenced the action of the Government of the United States in declining to admit salt, lumber and coal, the products of Canada, free from duty. Your reference is undoubtedly to the proceedings of the Joint High Commission in session in Washington in the spring of 1871. I have no hesitation in saying that the position and determination of the American Commissioners with regard to the question of duties on articles the products of Canada, were not in the slightest degree influenced by the action of the Canadian Parliament, repealing the Act imposing duties on American products.

"I am,

"Very respectfully yours,

"HAMILTON FISH,

"Secretary of State, U. S."

That is Mr. Fish's account of the interview. The right hon. gentleman says that Mr. Fish, with a quiet chuckle, said : "We withdraw the offer," and said it in consequence of the action of the Canadian Government. Mr. Fish, immediately after the event in question, said that action had not the slightest influence upon their decision. But we scarcely need Mr. Fish's testimony on the subject, for we find from the Journals of the House that this action of the Canadian Parliament took place on the 22nd of March, and we find from the protocols of the Commission itself that it was on the 25th of March, three days after, that the American Commissioners made the offer, and that they did not withdraw it until the 17th of April. Therefore, the action of the Canadian Parliament could have had nothing to do with the position of the American Commissioners in the matter, even if we had not Mr. Fish's positive statement to the contrary. But, Sir, if it were possible that it had any effect on the result, the right hon. gentleman is as responsible as his colleagues for that action. Whether it was the devil or Mr. Holton who persuaded his colleagues to vote in that way, he is responsible for their action, and must bear that responsibility. Now, Sir, this is not the only peculiar statement made by the right hon. gentleman in his speech the other day; and since we have found him so clearly wrong in this, I think we may judge his other statements by the same standard. It is quite clear, in regard to that matter, that either his memory is totally untrustworthy, or that he was misinformed as to the fact of the case. The latter supposition is out of the question since he was one of the parties concerned in the negotiations. Therefore his memory, to put it mildly, is utterly untrustworthy in stating past facts concerning negotiations in which he was engaged. But when he comes to speak of later matters, we find him equally untrustworthy. He says :

"We adopted, ex necessitate, after the termination of the Treaty of 1871, the course of defending our own waters, of keeping our own property to ourselves, of keeping poachers and smugglers out of our preserves."

Well, Sir, did the hon. gentleman and his colleagues do that? I think it is in the memory of every member of this House that in the first fishing season after the termination of that treaty, the Government gave up everything, which he says incorrectly my hon. friend and leader proposes to do on this basis of the modus vivendi. They did worse than that. They gave the Americans the free use of our fisheries in that fishing season without any modus vivendi or license at all; they let them go on and fish just as if the treaty was not in existence; and it was not until a year after that they began the policy of bluster which finally, as I have said, ended in the policy of breakdown. Then, he goes on :

"Mr. Bayard went further, and we could not induce him, Sir Charles could not induce him, nor could the British Government induce him, to consent specifically and explicitly to a statement that the Commissioners should have full power to enter into the subject of a commercial treaty. But it is mentioned incidentally."

What is the fact, Sir? The fact is that after Mr. Erastus Wiman, the annexationist traitor as they called him, had put Sir Charles Tupper into communication with Mr. Bayard, Mr. Bayard was the first to suggest, as the only basis of a satisfactory arrangement between the two countries, a treaty securing enlarged commercial relations between us, not as an incidental, but as the main basis of any possible solution of the difficulty. And when the Commission met and was asked to consider commercial questions, the right hon. gentleman says :

"The American commissioners withdrew even from the expressions that had been used in the previous correspondence; they refused to take up the question of trade relations, they confined themselves to the fisheries."

One would naturally suppose from this that there had been some change of attitude on the part of the American Government; but the protocols show an entirely different state of things. They do not show that there was any change of intention on the part of Mr. Bayard or his colleagues. They only show that after the Commission met, the American Commissioners stated that they had no power from Congress to negotiate a commercial treaty at all, but only power to negotiate as to the meaning of the Treaty of 1818, and they said: We cannot go beyond our powers. Nobody on the part of the United States Government has said that they were unwilling to consider the question of a commercial treaty, it was merely to state, as a simple legal fact, that they had not power to consider such a question, and it is utterly unfair and beyond the question to take that statement as a proof that the American Government are unwilling to consider any such question. The hon. the Minister of Finance took the same line that the United States Government were not willing to consider any such question, he challenged everybody on this side to show a single leading opinion in the strong dominant public opinion of the United States in favor of increased trade relations on the lines we laid down. Further on, he said:

"I do not speak here of the Butterworths and the Hitts, and the other men strong in position in the United States; I do not speak of the papers of New York, Boston and Chicago, which show the dominant public sentiment of the country; in not one of these can you find a defendant of unrestricted reciprocity; in every one you may find a reference to "manifest destiny."

The best answer to that is given by the resolution passed almost unanimously by the Congress of the United States in favor of commercial union with Canada, or reciprocity on a basis which appears to amount to about the same thing. If the people of the United States are willing to consider commercial union, they are willing to consider extended trade relations with Canada. The challenge of the hon. gentleman has been met, and he will have to confess that when he threw out that challenge in the heat of discussion he exposed himself to a crushing reply which has been given by the Congress of the United States. It is proven now by the only body who can speak authoritatively for the American people that they are not only ready but anxious to consider trade relations with Canada, and if our Government refuses, as they will refuse by negating this resolution, to take steps towards negotiating with the United States Government for improved trade relations, they will be throwing away an offer which may not be repeated. All my hon. friend's motion asks for is that we should deal in a neighborly manner with our neighbors; all he asks for is that we should enter into negotiations for the purpose of settling the trade question and the question of the fisheries on a friendly basis, which Sir Charles Tupper and Mr. Bayard agreed, two years ago, was the only basis on which these questions could be settled. Hon. gentlemen opposite find a great deal of fault because we ask to be represented by Canadians in the making of our treaties. Well, we were represented by a Canadian when the last treaty was made, and the only trouble was that his hands were tied. He was under the direction of a man, not a Canadian, who did not care for Canadian interests, and whose principal ambition was to return to England with a treaty of some kind, no matter what might be the fate of the treaty afterwards. The presence of Mr. Chamberlain was no doubt the cause of the treaty being so little favorable to Canada, and of its rejection afterwards, such as it was, by the Senate of the United States. I have no hesitation in saying that if Sir Charles Tupper had been alone, he would have made a much better treaty, and it would have been accepted by the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite say, when we speak of making treaties as Canadians and by the authority of the Queen in Canada instead of the Queen in England, that we are becoming disloyal; they say that in that case we would have to negotiate without the prestige of England at our back, and without the assistance of British diplomacy, and without any guarantee that the treaties would be enforced by British power. This is pure nonsense. The Queen is Queen of Canada as well as of Great Britain. What she does by the advice of her

Ministers in Canada, through the medium of the Governor General, is done by her and on the advice of her Ministers as much as if it were done on the advice of her Ministers in Downing street and by her direct authority. The treaty-making power is a prerogative of the Queen which she can delegate to her representative here, the Governor General, and if this treaty were made altogether between Canadian Ambassadors and American Commissioners, and ratified only by this Parliament, it would be just as much a treaty between Great Britain and the States as if it had been made through the medium of her Ministers in Downing street. The Queen's prerogative is the same no matter whether the medium of exercising it comes from Downing street or otherwise, and we should have the prestige of England at our back and the guarantee of British authorities in a treaty made by Canadian Ambassadors just as we would in a treaty made by those sent from England. The treaty would be just as binding on the British Government and the British Government would be just as much bound to enforce it, as if it were made by Ambassadors sent directly from home. The only question is, how can such treaties be most conveniently made? It stands to reason and common sense that they can be better made by ambassadors from here, conversant with the wants and circumstances of the country, than by those from from England who know nothing about them and care less. Where has the friction arisen with regard to the Treaty of 1818 or the Washington Treaty? It has arisen in the carrying out of the treaties, in the way American fishermen have been treated under their provisions. The most critical part, the carrying out of the treaty has been left to the right hon. the First Minister. Will he then dare to assert if he has ever to administer or to conduct matters which are more diplomatic than political in their nature, if he has ever to decide how a treaty shall be administered and what measure of treatment shall be meted out to American fishermen, that he is incapable of properly deciding what the treaty should be in the first place? If the Canadian Government is fit to be entrusted with the execution of treaties, is it not fit to be entrusted with the making of treaties? A treaty made by Canadians with Americans would be much less likely to give rise to friction than one made by Englishmen who have less knowledge of our circumstances and affairs. For all these reasons I shall be happy to vote for the motion of my hon. friend, if I should happen to be here when the division is taken. Unfortunately I have to leave to-night for home, and may not be here when the vote is taken, but I wish to declare my unhesitating adherence to the principle of the motion and my strong desire to support it if I can possibly do so by my vote in the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it is a matter of deep regret that in a question of so great importance as this the Government side of the House should have been prevented giving expression to their views, as they have been. We have had not a word from them for the last two days of the debate since the right hon. the First Minister spoke. My attention is called to the fact that a few remarks were made this afternoon by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), but as they had no reference to the subject matter under discussion but solely to some small municipal dispute in Halifax, they may be passed by as not being really part of the debate at all. It has been admitted by the leader of the Government that the leader of the Opposition did not overrate the importance of this resolution, and when one comes to think it is a matter affecting our international relations with the great country lying to the south with whom we do the larger part of our business and with whom we are more intimately connected than with any other country, it is not necessary to say the importance of the resolution cannot be over-estimated. It may be considered, as a matter of party tactics, a mistake that we should have propounded a policy for the Government. In domestic matters I know it is generally thought best not to prescribe until you are called in; but in a matter, we as we conceive it, of overwhelming national importance, in which the greatest interests possible are at stake, we feel we would not be discharging our duty to the country if at a political crisis in the affairs of the country we remained silent. We put the question the other day in order to obviate any discussion on the matter as to the policy of the Government. When the treaty in Washington was ratified a year ago, we heard the Government taking great pains to provide that the modus vivendi should not terminate when the treaty was rejected by the Senate of the United States. They contemplated distinctly the rejection of that treaty and inserted a provision in their Bill that it should be in the power of the Government to prolong for another year the modus vivendi, even if the treaty was rejected. Under those circumstances and knowing that we were approaching another fishing season within a few days of the time when the Government were proposing to come to some conclusion on the question, we submitted quietly to the Government a question whether or no they had made up their minds to maintain the modus vivendi in force for another year; and we were told, with the usual official reply that the matter was under the consideration of the Government. We have noticed for many years back that there has been a total lack of policy in regard to this fishery question on the part of the Government. We have noticed that their policy has changed with the changing seasons; that one year they were bellicose and another year submissive; that one year they were defiant with their cruisers on the water, and that another year they withdrew their cruisers and submitted to anything. There has been a lack of policy, a want of statesmanship and a display of ignorance on the part of the Government that brought us almost to the verge of war with our neighbors to the south, as the Commissioner of the Government himself stated last year, and that should not be repeated. I almost fear, however, from the speech delivered by the leader of the Government the other day, that we are again to be relegated to the dangerous condition of affairs which existed in 1886. The hon. gentleman was as mysterious then as he was in 1885, he was just as full of bounce and defiance, and, so far as he came to any conclusion at all, we had a right to suppose he was going to commit Parliament to a repetition of that policy. The words which he had put into the mouth of the Governor General indicated that the policy of the Government was to carry out the Treaty of 1818, whatever that may mean, and we had a right to presume that the Government intended to carry it out in the manner in which they attempted to carry it out in 1886. We made up our minds that, if that was the case, it should not be done without the most solemn protest which we on this side could place on the records of the House. We prepared that protest, and, feeling the magnitude of the question, we decided to take the Government into our confidence, we did not desire to make any party capital, but we made up our minds that we would tell them what was the policy we thought they ought to pursue. That might be bad tactics from a party standpoint, but the leader of the Opposition was prepared, as he has been on other occasions, to sacrifice party for the good of his country; and to-night we stand before the House with this additional fact which has been communicated by telegraph, that our neighbors to the south are not disposed to carry on an international warfare with us, but are disposed to treat us kindly and cordially. We have before us the great fact that a proposal for absolute free trade between the two countries has been carried almost unanimously by one branch of the United States Congress. That may be surrounded by conditions which may not commend themselves to every one of us, but the fact remains that Congress is willing to deal with this country in some way so as to have an absolute system of free trade between the United States and Canada. That being the case, it behoves us seriously to consider whether we should adopt any policy which should irritate or annoy the Congress of that great country, or turn away those kindly feelings which they have exhibited. It is perfectly plain that the policies of the two parties in this country are different in reference to this matter. The policy of the Government, as I have said, was announced in the Speech from the Throne and it is a reversion to the condition of affairs which existed before the Washington Treaty was agreed to. We are referred back to the Treaty of 1818, and, if that treaty is carried out in the manner in which the Government carried it out before the Washington Treaty was agreed to, we will find ourselves in the same deplorable condition in which we were during the last two or three years. The policy of the Liberal party has been formulated in this resolution, and that policy is one of conciliation. We wish the Government to hold out the right hand of fellowship to our neighbors. We desire that these matters of dispute should be settled not by the arbitrament of the sword, but by kindly and friendly arbitration. We wish that ambassadors should be sent from this country to place before the people of the United States the demands we make and the grounds upon which we will agree to a new treaty, and we think it is well that, while these negotiations are proceeding, matters should remain in such a shape that neither the officials of the Government in the Maritime Provinces nor the captains of fishing vessels should have the power to bring about such a state of things as that which Sir Charles Tupper deprecated in 1886. But the same statement which we have heard so many times before is made, that this is inopportune, that this, of all times, is the most inopportune for our propounding a policy. Why is it inopportune? Is not the fishing season close upon you? Must you not shortly come to a conclusion? What evil can possibly happen by the Opposition putting on record their view that the policy of the Government should be one of conciliation and negotiation? The hon. gentleman will tell us, as he told us in 1883, in 1884, and in 1885, that upon this question we should not exercise an opinion, or, if we had an opinion, we should keep it to ourselves. When I asked a question the other day, in reference to this subject of the international relations between the two countries, the hon. gentleman said that nothing could be more inopportune, but he failed to show why it was inopportune. Does he imagine that the electorate of this country should remain in ignorance of the policy of the Government on this great question, a policy which means weal or woe to them? I say that the Opposition would be recreant to their duty, if they had not, by resolution and by debate, demanded of the Government an expression of opinion, and tried to find out what they are going to do. I believe, that our fishery troubles have been largely due to the hon. gentleman's policy of procrastination. He will not make up his mind to anything. A few years ago, when the American Government gave notice of their determination to abrogate that treaty, the hon. gentleman was at the head of the Government. What did he do? He did nothing. He was reminded by Lord Derby, the Colonial Secretary at that time, who forwarded the notice from the United States terminating the fishery clauses of the Washington Treaty, in the month of March I think it was, that he should make up his mind what course he should take. Again in the month of May, he was reminded by Lord Derby that he should make up his mind on the subject and formulate some policy. But the hon. gentleman said nothing, and, according to the papers brought down, it does not appear that he ever acknowledged the receipt of the dispatch in any way. In the month of January, 1884, he was—I was going to say, admonished—but certainly he had his memory jogged by Lord Derby upon this great question, and finally, in December, 1884, he was pressed by the English Government hard upon the point, who told him that the time had come when these fishery articles were about to expire, and he must make up his mind to some action, conciliatory or otherwise, with regard to the fisheries of this great Dominion. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman did nothing, and the then Opposition came forward with a resolution to this House, and laid down what they considered to be the true policy. In a resolution which I had the honor to move in March, 1884, the Liberal party of this Dominion propounded a policy which they thought should be adopted; and I have no hesitation in saying, from knowledge which I have since acquired, that if the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government had accepted the offer made by the Liberal party, and had sent a man to Washington to negotiate a treaty, I have the very best means of knowing that if he had sent the right man, a man in earnest, he could have succeeded in negotiating a proper treaty. The public mind of the United States at that time had not been irritated and annoyed; the politicians were not in the state of mind that they were in 1887, when they passed the Non-Intercourse Bill; the leading men of the United States were more than anxious that the fishery trouble should be settled upon an amicable, a peaceful, and a friendly basis. Sir, I charge upon the hon. gentleman to-night that by his supineness, by his procrastination, by his want of statesmanship upon these occasions, he let the golden moment go by, and he is chargeable before this country with all the evils which flowed from it, and with the vast loss, financial, pecuniary and otherwise, which accrued to it from the condition in which the country found itself in 1885-86-87. Well, Sir, what was his reply on that occasion? It was almost in the stereotyped form in which he gave it to the leader of the Opposition a day or two ago: "We are not going down upon our knees to the Yankees. It is not consistent with the dignity of this great country to go down upon our knees to the United States." Sir, who asked him to go down upon his knees to the United States? I suppose there is such a thing, as was stated by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), as friendly negotiation upon an even footing. I suppose that it would be no humiliation to Canada to send a duly accredited agent to Washington, sanctioned by the Imperial Government, with power to negotiate a friendly treaty, and to settle the fishery disputes. Where would be the humiliation? Is it a humiliation for 5,000,000 of people to treat with 60,000,000, their great neighbors to the south? The thing is ridiculous and childish. The hon. gentleman answered us then that he would not do it. But what did he do? He put off the evil day till the last moment, and when the last moment came and he could not put it off an hour longer, he voluntarily offered to surrender the whole of the territorial and fishing rights of this Dominion, during 1885, for nothing. He found himself in a corner, put there by his own want of statesmanship, his own want of judgment, and he offered to give them free fishing if they would give us free fish. The hon. gentleman did not get his offer accepted. Why? Because he had left it too late. The hon. gentleman gave the free fishing but he did not get the free fish. The people of this country saw what was national humiliation, if anything was; they saw their territorial and their fishing rights, which has been secured to them by treaty, given up absolutely to the people of the United States for a whole season, and not a single concession asked in return. The hon. gentleman, two or three years afterwards, tried to take credit in this House and before this country, that that was on his part a conciliatory and friendly act. It was nothing of the sort. He acted only when it was forced from him, when he could do no better. He let the golden moment go by, he refused to listen to advice from this side of the House, and he refused to listen to the advice of Lord Derby who tendered it to him on four separate occasions; the result was that he found himself in a fix, he had to surrender, and he surrendered ignominiously. Sir, when the season went by what did the hon. gentleman do? What did he do at the end of 1885? He found a very strong feeling had grown up in the Maritime Provinces among the fishermen that their rights were not being looked after, that the hon. gentleman, as the common feeling down in the Maritime Provinces expressed it, did not care a snap for the fishermen or for the fisheries as long as he could remain in power. What did he do then? Prompted by fear and the result of his previous policy, he turned around and adopted a bellicose policy. He told us that he was going to teach the Americans that they would not only not have access to our fisheries, not only would they not have the right to come in to fish in our waters at all, but they were not to have even those common rights which one nation extends to another in the matter of its mercantile marine. Why, Sir, we had in 1886 the spectacle of the Customs laws of this country being dragged in, nominally to carry out the article of the Convention of 1818, but practically to drive the American people to desperation. Sir, they did not try to carry out the Treaty of 1818 in an honest, square and manly way; they resorted to every conceivable regulation of the Customs, with the result of driving the American people to desperation. The hon. gentleman adopted a policy the result of which was that in 1886 he had seized over 68 vessels of the Americans, he had refused them access to our harbors, he had seized them every time they had come into a harbor unless they reported themselves, he had refused them the right to purchase such supplies as belong to an ordinary merchant ship, he had put upon record his deliberate policy that if he allowed an American vessel to enter our harbor for any purpose whatever, that would be a surrender of the rights and privileges we had under the Treaty of 1818. Sir, he tried that policy for one year, he seized these vessels, and at the end of the year what did he find? He found himself brought into collision with the American Government, he found that the American Government, representing the American people, were in an irritated state, and were determined to defend themselves from the suicidal policy he had adopted; he found they had passed their Non-Intercourse Bill and a spectacle was seen in the American Congress seldom seen there, of an entire Congress rising with unanimity and passing a Non-Intercourse Bill with Canada, because they believed that their people had been treated unkindly, unfriendly and in a harsh and bellicose spirit. The hon. gentleman thought he was bringing the Americans, as he said, to their knees, but he did not do it, he simply brought them to their senses, and they told him then and there: If this policy is to be pursued by you we will adopt a retaliatory policy on our part. What was the consequence? The hon. gentleman who would not even negotiate with the Americans in 1885, who thought it was an indignity on the part of Canada to send an ambassador there, or a plenipotentiary even, to negotiate unofficially, was obliged to send down his Minister of Finance to see if the troubled waters could not be quieted. We had Sir Charles Tupper going down to Washington in the year 1887, and, Sir, before he went, the American Government had laid before the British Government their complaints. Their complaint was not so much that we had put a wrong construction upon the Treaty of 1818; it is true, they did not agree with our construction, but their main complaint was not that our construction was incorrect. Sir, the construction put upon the Treaty of 1818 by our Government, technically, was correct, there is no doubt about that. I think that construction was endorsed and approved of by every lawyer on both sides of the House. But the construction of the treaty was one thing, and the policy of carrying out the construction we put upon it, was another; and the American Government contended, not so much against the construction of the Treaty of 1818, which we put upon it, as against the policy that we had adopted in our attempts to carry it out. Sir, we have Mr. Phelps, Minister of the United States at the Court of St. James, telling the Imperial Government in a despatch what the complaint was. In that despatch he says:

"And quite aside from any question arising upon construction of the treaty, the provisions of the Custom House Acts and Regulations have been systematically enforced against American ships for alleged petty and technical violations of legal requirements in a manner so unreasonable, unfriendly, and so unjust as to render the privileges accorded by the treaty practically nugatory.

"It is not for a moment contended by the United States Government that American vessels should be exempt from those reasonable port and Custom House regulations which are in force in countries where such vessels have occasion to visit. If they choose to violate such requirements, the Government will not attempt to screen them from the just and legal consequence.

"But what the United States Government complain of in these cases is that the existing regulations have been construed with a technical strictness, and enforced with a severity, in cases of inadvertent and accidental violation where no harm was done, which is both unusual and unnecessary, whereby the voyages of vessels had been broken up and heavy penalties incurred. That the liberal and reasonable construction of these laws that had prevailed for many years, and to which the fishermen have been accustomed, was changed without any notice given. On every opportunity of unnecessary interference with the American fishing vessels to the prejudice and destruction of their business has been availed of."

That was the complaint formulated by the American Government. It was not, as I have said, so much against the construction which we put upon the Treaty of 1818 as against the policy we adopted in enforcing our Customs laws. I call attention for a moment to the policy of the Government which was laid down at that time by the Minister of Marine and the Minister of Customs and endorsed by the entire Government in minutes of Council. I do this to show that that policy resulted in the most injurious consequences to this country, and I do it to show that if hon. gentlemen opposite intend to repeat that policy they will find the results to be as bad and injurious as they were in 1886. It was contended by those Ministers that the Americans had the right by the Treaty of 1818 to enter our ports for four specific purposes, and they said: We will not allow you to enter for any other purposes, no matter whether humane purposes or charitable purposes, or such purposes as common humanity would dictate. What did they say? The Minister of Marine [and Fisheries in his report said:

"It is not however the case that the Convention of 1818 affected only the inshore fisheries of the British Provinces; it was framed with the object of affording a complete and exclusive definition of the rights and liberties which the fishermen of the United States were thenceforth to enjoy in following their vocation as far as these rights would be affected by facilities for access to the shores or waters of the British Provinces or for intercourse with their people. It is therefore no undue expansion of the scope of that convention to interpret strictly those of its provisions by which such access is denied, except to the vessels requiring it for the purposes specifically described.

"Such an undue expansion would, upon the other hand, certainly take place, if under cover of its provisions, or of any agreements relating to general commercial intercourse which may have since been made, permission were accorded to the United States' fishermen to resort habitually to the harbors of the Dominion, not for sake of seeking safety for their vessels or for avoiding risk of human life, but in order to use those harbors as a general base of operations from which to prosecute and organise with greater advantage to themselves the industry in which they are engaged."

In following that up, the Minister of Justice goes on to say further:

"For this purpose it was necessary to keep out foreign fishing vessels, excepting in cases of dire necessity, no matter under what pretext they might desire to come in. The fisheries could not be preserved to our people if every one of the United States fishing vessels that were accustomed to swarm along our coast could claim the right to enter our harbors, to post a letter or send a telegram or buy a newspaper, to obtain a physician in case of illness or a surgeon in case of accident, to land or bring off a passenger, or even to lend assistance to the inhabitants in fire, flood or pestilence, or to buy medicines or to purchase a new rope."

That was the policy laid down by the hon. gentlemen and approved in minutes of Council. The hon. gentleman at that time represented to the British Government that it was absolutely essential for the protection of our fisheries that we should carry out the strict letter of the treaty, and under no pretext, not even to obtain a surgeon in case of accident or a physician in case of illness, should we allow American fishermen to enter our ports. They sent home a Minute of Council prepared by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in December of that year, in which they laid down the lines of their policy still more clearly, in which they said they could not be expected to deviate in the slightest degree from the policy they had carried out that year. That despatch said:

"It is not to be expected that after having earnestly insisted upon the necessity of a strict maintenance of these treaty rights, and upon the respect due by foreign vessels, while in Canadian waters, the municipal legislation by which all vessels resorting to those waters are governed, in the absence moreover of any decision of a legal tribunal to show that there has been any straining of the law in those cases in which it has been put in operation, that the Canadian Government will suddenly and without the justification supplied by any new facts or arguments, withdraw from a position taken up deliberately and by doing so in effect plead guilty to the whole of the charges of oppression, inhumanity and bad faith which, in language wholly unwarranted by the circumstances of the case, have been made against it by the public men of the United States.

"Such a surrender on the part of Canada would involve the abandonment of a valuable portion of the national inheritance of the Canadian people, who would certainly visit with just reprobation those who were guilty of so serious a neglect of the trusts committed to their charge."

That was the policy the Government laid down in 1886, that was the policy they submitted to the Imperial Government at the close of that year, that was the policy in regard to which they said they would be committing a breach of trust if they surrendered one iota, and it was the policy which they told the British Government they were prepared to stand by. What took place? When they saw the storm which that policy had brought about their ears and saw that the American Government had taken up the question seriously, when they were brought face to face with a Non-Intercourse Bill which would prove one of the most serious evils which could possibly be inflicted on the Canadian people, some of the longer headed members of the Government saw that this game of brag, blow and bluster would not succeed and would not be tolerated. So they did then what should have been done the previous year, they did at the last moment what should have been done earlier, and they endeavored to act so as to appease the American people. The entire policy was changed, and notwithstanding the statement made by the Minister of Finance the other day, I say that in 1887 an entirely new policy was brought in force as compared with that of 1886. In 1886 the Government had seized, chiefly for infractions of the Customs laws, over sixty-eight American ships; and in 1887, when they were face to face with a Non-Intercourse Bill, they did not seize one vessel. They had cruisers in our waters, the flags were flying, they made a great parade and expended large sums of public money, but it was only a sham battle. They never seized an American vessel or hauled down an American flag; and when President Cleveland was called upon to report to the United States Senate as to whether there had been a repetition of the insults, as they termed them, which occurred in 1886, he replied that nothing of the kind had taken place. I call attention to the report which the President made to Congress at that time. He says in that report:

"Soon after the passage of the Act of 3rd March, 1887, the negotiation which had been proceeding for several months previously progressed actively, and the proposed conference and the presence at this capital of the plenipotentiaries of the two Governments, out of which the since rejected treaty of 7th February, 1888, eventuated, had their natural influence in repressing causes of complaint in relation to the fisheries. Therefore, since 3rd March, 1887, no case has been reported to the Department of State wherein complaint was made of unfriendly or unlawful treatment of American fishing vessels on the part of the Canadian authorities in which reparation was not promptly and satisfactorily obtained by the United States Consul General at Halifax."

This proves that the policy of the Government changed entirely, and that the bluster, and the brag, and the blow, and the cannons, and all that kind of thing which they indulged in in 1886 had ceased, and that in the year 1887 they became as quiet as lambs. There is no doubt in the mind of any man who has studied the question that Sir Charles Tupper when he went to Washington in 1887 agreed that there should be no more of those seizures and cruel harshness of which the Americans complained. President Cleveland says so in so many words in the extract which I have just read to the House. In 1887 with the Non-Inter-course Bill so staring us in the face the present Government did what they should have done in the previous year. We had a treaty agreed to in 1888 and we had attached to that treaty a modus vivendi. The Government did not wait until that treaty became the law of the land. They did not wait until the treaty was ratified by the Executive of the United States, but they came to this Parliament and asked us to ratify the treaty before it had been submitted to the Executive of the United States. I thought that was a great blunder at the time for they were binding not only the plenipotentiary of Her Majesty to agree to the treaty, but they were binding the Canadian people through their Parliament to that treaty. What did we find then when the treaty was brought down? We found that it conceded to the Americans 90 per cent. of the claims they had made. It was a treaty of concession from beginning to end, and this Government abandoned their policy which they declared to be absolutely essential for the protection of our fisheries and they conceded to the Americans the rights which they had been clamoring for and which the Canadian Government withheld from them in 1886. A more complete back down never was seen in the history of this country. That treaty was rejected by the United States Senate and so far as those clauses are concerned which relate to the delimitation in our waters, or so far as those clauses are concerned which make an offer on our part in return for some concession to be made on theirs, those clauses are not in force to-day. I submit to this House that, in so far as the Government agreed to put a new interpretation on the Treaty of 1818, and in so far as that new interpretation is embodied in the Treaty of 1888, that treaty having been ratified by this Parliament, we are bound by the interpretation put on the Treaty of 1818 in the Washington Treaty of last year. It binds us now; it will bind us for all time to come and if that is the case the hon. gentlemen occupying the Treasury benches to-day have agreed to an interpretation of the Treaty of 1818 which admits the American vessels to our waters and gives them rights which the Canadian Government declared in 1886 to the Imperial Government would be an entire surrender of our fishery interests. The policy of the Government is an arbitrary, capricious and unstatesmanlike policy from the beginning. In 1885 they gave up the fisheries for nothing. In 1886 they enforced Customs laws against the American fishermen with an unnecessary harshness and severity which drove the people to desperation. They told the Imperial Government that it was absolutely necessary that they should pursue this course because if they did not, it would be the giving up of all our rights. Yet in 1888, they agreed to a treaty and made this Parliament consent to it which surrendered every right which they said was necessary for the maintenance of those fisheries for ourselves. What is the state of affairs now. Formerly the Government exacted a formal entry and clearance from fishermen of the States temporarily seeking shelter in our ports, by an article of the Treaty of 1888 they abandoned that, and American fishermen by their own interpretation of that treaty can enter our harbors without making formal entries and clearances. They can enter our harbors now for the purpose of obtaining provisions, for the purpose of obtaining whatever supplies they need for homeward voyages, and having obtained a license they can get permits at all times. There has been an abolition of the pilotage charges, and the right of transhipment and sale has been conceded to them as incidental to repairs. We were told in 1886 that if these concessions were surrendered it would be the abandonment of all our rights under the Treaty of 1818. The point I want to make is this: that whether they agreed to the modus vivendi or not our Government cannot go behind or beyond the interpretation of the Treaty of 1818 which they laid down in the Treaty of Washington of 1888. If that is so, let us see where exactly we are. This last treaty conceded almost everything to the United States, and in this connection we must remember the Message which President Cleveland sent to his Congress. In respect to that treaty he said:

"The history of events in the last two years shows that no feature of Canadian administration was more harassing and injurious than the compulsion upon our fishing vessels to make formal entry and clearance on every occasion of temporarily seeking shelter in Canadian ports and harbors.

"Such inconvenience is provided against in the proposed treaty, and this most frequent and just cause of complaint is removed.

"The articles permitting our fishermen to obtain provisions and the ordinary supplies of trading vessels on their homeward voyages and under which they are accorded the further and even more important privilege on all occasions of purchasing such casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to trading vessels are of great importance and value.

"The licenses which are to be granted without charge and on application, in order to enable our fishermen to enjoy these privileges, are reasonable and proper checks in the hands of the local authorities to identify the recipients and prevent abuse, and can form no impediment to those who intend to use them fairly.

"The hospitality secured for our vessels in all cases of actual distress, with liberty to unload and sell and tranship their cargoes is full and liberal. These provisions will secure the substantial enjoyment of the treaty rights for our fishermen under the Treaty of 1818, for which contention has been steadily made in the correspondence of the Department of State, and our Minister at London, and by the American negotiators of the present treaty.

President Cleveland therefore contended—and I think he contended with great force—that the contentions made on behalf of the United States Government had been nearly all conceded in this treaty. I cannot see for the life of me how this Government in interpreting the Treaty of 1818 as they did can hereafter go behind or beyond the interpretation which they conceded in the Washington Treaty of 1888, and which they asked this Parliament to assent to and which this Parliament formally did assent to. The right hon. gentleman the Premier in the speech which he made the other day undertook to make several statements which I think were made without much reflection. And they certainly were inconsistent with the facts. The hon. gentleman in the opening part of his speech somewhat enthusiastically made some boasts which I think on reflection he will regret having made. He stated, to the surprise of this House, and I am sure it will be to the surprise of the country, that every contention the Government had ever made had been conceded by the Americans. I never heard a more audacious statement by any gentleman in the House or out of it. I could hardly believe my ears, and I waited until the official report of the hon. gentleman's remarks came out to see whether my ears had deceived me at the time. But I find they did not, and the hon. gentleman's organs are publishing that speech and declaring it to be a great, logical and statesmanlike speech.

Mr. HESSON. A good speech.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman may be a good judge, but I do not think it was. It was delivered, I was glad to see, with more than the usual physical vigor of the right hon. gentleman, and that we are all glad of; but I do not think it was marked by that statesmanlike prudence and caution which in a great matter, affecting the

"Well, we cannot accept the advice of the hon. gentleman; we cannot admit that we are wrong, because we have not been in the wrong; and what is still more remarkable, all he has to do, while advising us to admit that we are wrong, is to look at the treaty made last year with the United States, and he will find in it that the President of the United States, and the commissioners appointed by that president, and the gentlemen who signed that treaty, admit that every one of the pretensions of Canada, every one of the arguments used by Canada, every one of the positions taken by Canada, were just and right. Without one single exception, that treaty admits that all our pretensions, and all the course we have taken under the Convention of 1888, were justified by their acceptance of the modus vivendi."

Sir, a more audacious statement or one more inconsistent with the facts never was made in Parliament or out of it. The hon. gentleman knows that so far from the contentions of the Government having been acceded to, they surrendered every contention they made. I read to the House to-night the contentions the Minister of Justice made and Minister of Finance made, the contentions endorsed by the minute of Council which the Government sent home to the Imperial Government; I told you what they did in 1886 with regard to the practical working out of those contentions; and in the treaty everyone of those contentions was surrendered. The hon. gentlemen did not pretend to say when they came down and asked us to agree to the treaty, that the construction they had put on the Treaty of 1818 was to be carried out in the new treaty. No, Sir, but the right hon. gentleman when he spoke the other evening went on to make still more clear what he meant:

"Canada has never set up a pretension under the Convention of 1818, that the Americans have not now finally admitted; Canada has never exceeded her rights and her claims under that convention, and I defy hon. gentlemen to point out one instance in which Canada can be obnoxious to that charge."

Well, Sir, I was astonished. I remember a year ago, when the Finance Minister, speaking as the mouthpiece of the Government on the floor of the House, and recommending that that treaty of his should be accepted by the House and the country, declared that he was bound to say that in negotiating that treaty he could not hold by the contentions which the junior Ministers of the Government had put forward. He said he would have been criminal if he had resisted the application of the United States Government for a modification of those contentions. He told us that the Treaty of 1818 was marked all through by concessions on our part from what he had contended for before, but that it was proper and right, and the only way of arriving at a satisfactory solution. I do not want to exaggerate one word of the language that the hon. gentleman used. I will read what he said and then hon. gentlemen can see how much ground there was for the proud boast the leader of the Government made the other day that every practical contention his Government had made with respect to the Treaty of 1818 had been yielded by the United States Government. Sir Charles Tupper, said:

"Our concessions did not stop there. I am quite ready to admit, and I think it might as well be stated in the outset, that the Canadian Government would find it, I would find it, quite as difficult as our friends the plenipotentiaries of the United States would find it, to justify this treaty if it was to be examined in the light of the extreme contentions maintained on both sides previously. I need not inform the House that in diplomatic intercourse it is customary, it is right for the representatives of a Government to state the strongest and most advanced ground that they possibly can sustain in relation to every question, and I would not like, I confess, to be tried before the House by the ground taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries."

And yet in the face of the language of his own plenipotentiary, the right hon. the leader of the Government states that we made no concessions, but that the Americans yielded every contention that we had made. Sir Charles Tupper went on:

"Looking at the question in that broad and national spirit, looking at it with a desire to remove the possibility of what I consider would be the greatest misfortune that could happen to the civilised world, a collision between the two great English-speaking nations, looking at it from that broad standpoint, it would have been criminal on my part and on the part of those who represented Her Majesty's Government and the interests of the people of Canada if they had by making fair and reasonable concessions, not endeavored, to find a common ground that would present a solution of those important and serious questions."

We find, therefore, that so far from the hon. gentleman's boastful statement being agreeable to the fact, it is at direct variance with the fact as stated by his own Finance Minister, the man who framed the treaty, and who ought to know something about it. Their contentions were blown to the winds by the treaty the hon. gentleman agreed to and asked this House to agree to. They yielded up to the Americans at the point of the bayonet concession after concession, right after right, which they had declared to be necessary to the maintenance of our fishery interests. I told them then, as I tell them now, that I did not condemn those concessions so much in themselves, but I condemned the men who made them. The right hon. gentleman the other day pointed across the House to me, saying that I had condemned the concessions made by the Government in that treaty. His words were:

"How justly was his appreciation of the situation we can now see, because even limited as it was, reasonable as that treaty was, so reasonable that the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), denounced it as an unworthy concession made by Sir Charles Tupper, on behalf of Canada—

"An hon. MEMBER. No.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Read the hon. gentleman's own speech and you will see. He denounced the unworthy concessions that were made then."

I did not denounce as unworthy the concessions in themselves, but I denounced the men who made them as unworthy. It is not pleasant to quote one's own speech, but when my statement has been challenged in this way, I shall be pardoned if I refer for a moment to what I did say. I pointed out that the concessions made were concessions on points which the Minister of Marine and the Minister of Justice had declared to be vital points, and necessary for the maintenance of Canadian interest, that any surrender of them would be an ignoble surrender, and that the people of Canada would call seriously to account the men who made any of those concessions; and I said it did not become the men who made any of those concessions, after having used the language they had used in the previous year, to come down and recommend the House to accept them. If the concessions had been made voluntary, Canada would have reaped great advantage, but made as they were they might in themselves be right, but they throw discredit upon the men who made them. The language I made use of then was this:

"I am not, just for the moment, contending that these concessions are unjust in themselves, but I am contending that the men who declared a year ago that they were unjust, and that they could not possibly concede them, and that the concession of them would prove ruinous to Canada, stand to-day in a position the most unenviable that any statesmen can possibly occupy, when they ask us now to accept this treaty, which concedes everything which they said before could not possibly be conceded because it would be ruinous. They should step down and let other men make the concessions."

Further on I remarked:

"If we had voluntarily ceded to them these concessions which have been wrung from us under this treaty we would to-day be standing in a proud position."

So the hon. gentleman will see he was entirely wrong in stating that I had condemned the concessions in this House. I did not. I condemned the men who made them, and the manner in which they were made. What was the object of the modus vivendi? Does that object still exist? After the treaty had been concluded between the plenipotentiaries of both countries, they agreed upon a modus vivendi. The offer was made by the Imperial plenipotentiaries to the United States plenipotentiaries for the purpose of finding some solution of the difficulties until a treaty could be submitted to both Parliaments and to the Congress of the United States. And that modus vivendi, in its preamble, recites the reasons why the English plenipotentiaries submitted it to the Americans:

"The treaty having been signed the British Plenipotentiaries desire to state that they have been considering the position which will be created by the immediate commencement of the fishing season before the treaty can possibly be ratified by the Senate of the United States, by the Parliament of Canada and the Legislature of Newfoundland.

"In the absence of such ratification, the old conditions which have given rise to much friction and irritation might be revived and might interfere with the unprejudiced consideration of the treaty by the legislative bodies concerned.

"Under these circumstances, and with the further object of affording evidence of their anxious desire to promote good feeling and to remove all possible subjects of controversy, the British plenipotentiaries are ready to make the following temporary arrangement for a period not exceeding two years, in order to afford a modus vivendi pending the ratification of the treaty."

Their anxious desire was to promote good feeling and to remove all possible causes of controversy. That is the object we have in proposing that the modus vivendi should be continued the coming season. The hon. gentleman knows a new party is coming into power in the United States, he knows that it will become his bounden duty to approach that new party and to negotiate with them for the settlement of difficulties, and he knows that it is impossible such negotiation can be successfully carried on unless the public minds of both countries are in a better condition than they were in when Sir Charles Tupper went to Washington in 1887. He knows that it will be impossible to carry on any negotiations unless a kinder feeling exists between the two countries than existed then. When I heard the hon. gentleman denounce the modus vivendi the other night, one would suppose it was something dreadful. His object was to make those who had not studied the question, believe that the Opposition were prepared to give up all Canada's rights in her fisheries, and that our proposition involved national humiliation, and he called on his friends to resist any such humiliating effort. He said:

"Now the hon. gentleman says that we ought to eat humble pie, that we ought to go down on our knees to the Americans whether they will give us a treaty or not, whether they will pass a non-intercourse act or not, whether they will allow us to enter their country or not, and whether or not they pass a law keeping out Canadians from the United States as they have kept out Chinamen. Notwithstanding all this we must, forsooth, say to the people of the United States: 'You may come into our waters, you may do just as you please, you can have the right to fish in our waters.'"

Why the hon. gentleman ought to have known that the modus vivendi does not surrender to the United States any territorial right of Canada at all. It does not propose to surrender to them the right to fish in our waters at all, and all this wonderful surrender which the hon. gentleman's vivid imagination pictured is a mere creature of fiction and does not exist in reality at all. What does the modus vivendi provide? It provides for the recognition by the United States of our right to prevent transhipping fish and purchasing supplies or bait and shipping men. It provides that if they pay a certain sum per ton, American fishermen may enjoy these rights. It provides that on payment of $1.50 a ton, the American fishermen have the right to go into our waters to tranship fish, to purchase fishing supplies, and to ship their men. That is all; and the hon. gentleman denounces this as something approaching national humiliation. He says:

"This resolution will, I believe, meet with the condemnation of this House, as it will meet with the condemnation of this country. I believe and I know that the people of Canada will resent anything like humiliation to their status or national honor."

Why, who prepared this modus vivendi and who is responsible for it? It is a proposition emanating from his own plenipotentiary, his own appointee; and if it involves national dishonor, then the national honor of Canada was humiliated during the year 1888 when it was in operation. If the repetition of it in 1889 means national humiliation, then we were subjected to national humiliation last year. The hon. gentleman went on to make use of an argument which I was surprised at, an ad captandum argument, and I dare say it may have captured some gentleman not acquainted with the fishery question. What did he say? He said: Look what would happen if you proclaimed the modus vivendi? We will issue our licenses, and then the United States will, possibly, bring their Non-intercourse Bill into force. They will have the right to come into our waters, to tranship their fish, and purchase supplies, and we will not be able to sell them a herring. But, Sir, the main object of the modus vivendi was to prevent the Non-intercourse Bill coming into force at all. The hon. gentleman knows that at any moment the Non-intercourse Bill may be brought into force, and that the most serious consequences which can be inflicted upon Canada will follow. I will not picture those consequences. They were pictured in terrifying language by the hon. gentleman's Minister last year. If the modus vivendi does not come into force, you will, probably, he said, have a state of facts brought about which may bring the Non-intercourse Bill into force. It is to prevent that we propose the modus vivendi should continue for another year. Our object is to do what we can, consistent with national honor, to maintain friendly feeling between the two countries. We do not want to see the Non-intercourse Bill put into force, we want to extend the boundaries of our trade, and make it as free as we can, consistent with our political autonomy. We believe in our hearts, honestly and fairly, that the best mode of preventing the Non-intercourse Bill being brought into operation would be to maintain the modus vivendi. If it is maintained, the Non-intercourse Bill cannot be put into force. If any hon. gentleman will look at the preamble, he will find that the President of the United States is only vested with power to bring the Bill into force when we improperly and harshly enforce against American fishing vessels the rights we believe they have in our waters. The Non-intercourse Bill declares:

"Whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters, or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either of all such cases it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of, or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels shall come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere; and, also, to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish, or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States."

Now we are face to face with that Act. That Act may be brought into force any day. It may be brought into force as, and when we act towards United States fishing vessels as we did in 1886, and I warn the hon. gentleman that, if that Non-intercourse Bill is brought into force through his action, he will be held responsible by the people of this country. He is entering upon a course which is fraught with danger. If he does not continue that modus vivendi, if he does not continue to deal with the people of the United States, and to endeavor to solve on an amicable basis the fishery difficulties which exist between the two countries, he will incur a responsibility greater than any he has ever incurred in the course of his long political career. There could be no evil which could arise to the people of the Maritime Provinces so great as to be cut off from intercourse with the people of the south. What? That none of our vessels should be allowed to trade with them, or to enter their harbors? Does the hon. gentleman know what that means? It means paralysis of our trade; it means ruin to our people. The hon. gentleman will be called to account for it, if it should happen. The hon. gentleman knows well that this modus vivendi was proposed by his own plenipotentiary with the avowed object of preventing, by any possibility, that state of facts arising which might bring the Nonintercourse Bill into force; and we urge this upon him now because we feel the gravity of the crisis. We do not want to be brought into a commercial war with the people of the United States. I do not believe nor does anyone on this side of the House believe that we could not live in this country if we were cut off from intercourse with the United States. No doubt, we might live in a sort of way, but I hope that the stoppage of intercourse will never come in our time or in the time of our children. We, on our part, desire to bring closer and closer the commercial relations which have existed in the past, which exist to-day, and which I hope will exist in the future, between us and our friends to the south. We desire to make those relations as free as they possibly can be made; and we desire that any advance which is made by the people or the Congress of the United States should be met by us on this side of the line. We desire to welcome it, and to meet it by kindly feeling and by kindly measures so that a treaty may be arranged between the two countries, consistent with the rights of both and calculated to develop the natural trade which should exist between two great English-speaking peoples. We are in favor of the broadest and freest commercial relations, consistent with our political autonomy. We believe that, if a Government were in power that desired to make those relations with the United States, a better time for doing so never existed than exists to-day. Though an irritated feeling may have existed a year or two ago, as Sir Charles Tupper stated in this House, I believe that, if we reciprocated the kindly feelings which are expressed in that country, we would find an answer there. In any case, it is well that the policies of the two parties should be laid before the country. We are for conciliation. We are in favor of negotiating with that people in order to remove all difficulties, and we are not for going back to the state of affairs which existed in 1855 or in 1886. We do not desire commercial war or other any kind of war, but we desire that our trade and our intercourse with them should grow, and that everything in the way of that should be removed as far as fiscal regulations or treaty arrangements can do so, and that should be known to be the policy of the Liberal party. We have proposed that to our friends opposite, though we may lose a tactical advantage by doing so, but we believe that it is in the true interests of the country, and we hoped that it would be accepted by those hon. gentlemen.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We must all sympathise very deeply indeed with our friends on the Opposition benches in the disposition to self sacrifice which has moved them to ignore all the "tactical advantages" which they see they are losing by the motion now before the House. I venture to say that, if there is any "tactical benefit" which they will lose, it will not be from any intention on their part to sacrifice any political advantage in regard to this matter, but from the unfortunate misjudgment which is characteristic of their whole policy. Having addressed the House at some length on this subject on a former occasion, I had intended to allow the vote to be taken without saying anything now, but, considering the wide range which the debate has taken, the charges which have been heaped up against the Administration, and the violence of the language we have just listened to against the First Minister, I may perhaps be allowed to take up a little of the time of the House in replying to charges which have been refuted a hundred times before, but which are repeated each time with greater violence and persistency. If I may be permitted to refer so far back as to the speech of the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution which is before the House, I would do so in order to call the attention of the House to the great range which this debate has taken, in order, I suppose, that hon. gentlemen opposite might not derive any "tactical advantage" from it. The leader of the Opposition ransacked the history of the country, and blamed the Government not simply for the policy which the Premier has laid before the House and before the country since the year 1867, for he took a wider range and blamed the policy which has been pursued in this country for the last twenty-five years. The hon. gentleman went back and endeavored to trace the history of the conditions which led so many English-speaking people to sympathise with the Southern States in the war of secession, and he concluded his observations on that subject, after drawing the attention of the House to the fact that, if this was a fault at all, it was a fault shared by almost the whole civilised world as well as by nearly the whole of Canada, by saying:

"I can understand that being the feeling in European society, but I am at a loss to understand how it was that Canada, which in that day, as now, was a purely democratic country, did not throw its whole sympathy into the cause for which the North was then fighting. Not that we could do anything to help it. The North could fight its own battles. But if we had shown anything like sympathy with the supporters of the American Union in their struggles with the rebels, they would have given us their friendship in return, as they have always been ready to do to those who sympathised with them. But finding a hostile people on their border, the first thing they did, when they had the opportunity, was to cut us off from the reciprocal trade relations which we had with them. This is the first fault which, I think, has been committed by the Government of Canada."

It is gratifying to know that when the hon. gentleman went back to a period in the history of this country prior even to Confederation, to find matter for an attack on the First Minister, he could only base that attack upon the existence, in all quarters of the civilised world, of a measure of sympathy with the Southern people; and that though he declared that that was the first charge which he had to make against the Government of this country, he was unable to mention a circumstance or an act in respect to which he could impute fault to the Government of this country. I mention that for the purpose of showing how disdainful these gentlemen are of deriving any "tactical advantage" in this debate, and how eager they are, at any rate, not to be limited in their field of discussion and of criticism, because the facts are not at hand to justify the criticism. Now, Sir, following down the history of this subject for more than twenty years, we were treated in the admirable address made by the leader of the Opposition, and we were treated in the less admirable address—if I am compelled to say so—to which we have listened this evening, to one long and persistent attack upon the Administration with regard to the fisheries question traced down to this hour. We were told that, at every point of the controversy, at every turn of history, we had been false to our duty to the country, and that we had failed to take any step either to solve this question or to protect the rights of the country in regard to it. The leader of the Opposition said that the repeal of the fishery articles of the Washington Treaty came, and that nothing was done; and we were told to-night that that was another illustration of the dilatory policy of the First Minister, who folded his hands and let events take their course, and attempted to redeem them when it was too late. It is old history, it is threadbare history, but it is true, nevertheless, that the efforts and sacrifices which the First Minister and his Government made to renew the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington, and to keep them in force, and the sacrifices which he proposed to make, from first to last, and not his inaction, met with the condemnation of the Opposition in this House, and of their press in the country. We know, Sir, that in order to obtain a prolongation of the fishery articles of the Treaty of 1871, coupled with a trade arrangement which would be to the advantage of the two countries, he proposed that the benefits conferred upon American citizens by the fishery articles of the Treaty of 1871, should be extended until the close of the fishing season which had then begun, and that the cry went up in this House, and it went through the press of this country: "But the Americans will never accept that, because it is suspected by them that you are going to demand a money equivalent, such as you obtained before." But in order to be explicit and clear the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues communicated with the home authorities, and the home authorities communicated with Washington and declared: "You are to have, for the remainder of the fishing season, the advantages which the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington conferred upon you, and that without stint and without price." Then the cry in the House and country changed, and it was: that we had made a dishonorable sacrifice to the United States; we were told that we should have manned our fleet, that we should have run up the flag and run out the guns, and taken a vote of $50,000 in the Estimates for fisheries protection. But for that purpose the last two or three years the cry is that we folded our hands and did nothing—that we let the fishery articles expire without attempting to renew them. The hon. gentleman who addressed the House this evening says that at the expiration of the fishery articles of 1871 the Opposition proposed a policy to this House which would have been successful. By some extraordinary inspiration he is able to tell the House that if we had adopted his resolution in favor of reciprocity in 1885, that policy would have been accepted by the United States. He has other sources of information than those which are open to all the rest of the people of North America, for every journal which has spoken upon the subject, every public man in the United States whose utterances are worth reading, have with one voice declared in regard to this fishery question, that the one thing that they would not submit to is to have fishery negotiations and reciprocity negotiations mixed up. The one supreme difficulty which the negotiators had to meet with in Washington last year, as everybody knows now, was the conviction which has gained ground in the United States, and which has gained ground more than anything else by reason of the persistence with which this question of reciprocity has been projected into the discussion by the Opposition in this House—the one supreme difficulty they had to meet was the conviction that we did not care so much about our fishing rights, but that we were perishing for reciprocity, and that we were raising the fishery question in order to compel reciprocity. Sir, if the Government in 1885 had linked the two questions together they would have both met a common fate that would have disposed of the question for a good many years to come. But the proposal made to the American Government was to consider the whole question of the fisheries, and in order to get a broad and liberal settlement of the question, as I have said, we threw open the fishing grounds as well as commercial privileges to the American fishermen for the remainder of the season of 1885, on the assurance of the President of the United States that he would recommend to Congress that a commission should be appointed to consider the whole question of the fishery relations of the two countries. That, I suppose, was a policy that should have been acceptable to gentlemen opposite as well as to the Government; and yet, in relation to this matter we are told that the whole fault was on the Government of Canada. What was the result? After the United States had enjoyed our fishing grounds for nearly six long months, together with the right of obtaining supplies, transhipment, and all that, when the President sent down his Message recommending the commission to Congress, how was it received by the Senate? That body would not take action affirmatively or otherwise on the President's Message, but a resolution was passed declaring that such a commission was unworthy of receiving a vote from Congress for its expensess. Was the Message of the President sustained in Congress even by his own supporters? No, Sir; and there were only seventeen members of the Senate of the United States voting against a proposal that such a commission was not worthy of receiving a dollar from the public Treasury. Yet we are told that we have made no concessions to these people, and that every fault in the whole negotiations of the last twenty years has been with us. Then we were told by the leader of the Opposition, and by the gentleman who addressed the House to-night, that we had put an unwarrantable interpretation on the Treaty of 1818, as soon as we found in 1886 that we could not obtain the settlement of the question. The leader of the Opposition was very distinct and specific as to what this unwarrantable interpretation was—a refusal to tranship was too narrow a construction of that treaty. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) dignified it with a more caustic name than that the other evening—he declared that our interpretation of the Treaty of 1818 was pedantic. The leader of the Opposition said it was narrow and inhuman, and that vessels were sent to sea without provisions under our interpretation of that treaty. Now let me be plain and specific with the House in stating, at least, what I humbly believe the interpretation to have been, historically and as a matter of fact. The hon. member from Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) to-night quoted from the despatch of Mr. Phelps, in which Mr. Phelps said that he did not so much complain of the treaty itself as of the harshness with which it was executed, and the suddenness with which it was put in force. It was put in force by themselves, because they revoked the fishery articles of 1871, which had suspended its operation. Sir, that interpretation—I state it with the utmost emphasis—the interpretation which we put on the Treaty of 1818 in 1886, was precisely the interpretation which it had received from the Provincial Governments, backed up by the guns and fleets of Great Britain for 70 years. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) gave hon. gentlemen opposite a lesson upon that subject when he assured the House that for the first forty years of the treaty, not only was it put in force and carried out by the fleets of England, but that it was carried out far beyond the limits at sea where we ever attempted to enforce it, away beyond the headlands where, he said, the fleets of England alone could keep the peace, and it was by the fleets of England that the treaty was enforced during the first forty years of its existence. Yet we are told by an hon. member, whose words will have weight as a leader of a party—whose words I am sure will be received with great weight in the United States, that it was a new, an illiberal construction that we sought to enforce, and the despatch of Mr. Phelps was read to this House to-night stating that it was a sudden and new interpretation that was put upon the Treaty of 1818. I ventured in as strong language as could courteously be used, in a report to His Excellency upon that despatch of Mr. Phelps, not only to assert, but to prove that our interpretation had been concurred in by Great Britain herself for seventy years, and I venture to think I so far succeeded in this, that, in the first place, Mr. Phelps made no attempt to controvert my argument, and, in the second place, Mr. Phelps was informed by Lord Roseberry that there were no two opinions in England upon the question. Let me state that, instead of adopting a new interpretation of the Treaty of 1818, we were enforcing just in its plain terms an Imperial statute passed in 1819, and the statutes of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia passed before Confederation and the statute of Canada passed twenty years ago. Yet we were told to-night that it was an entirely new interpretation we were putting on the treaty, and an entirely new and objectionable mode of enforcing it. We have been told that our policy is shifting and changing, and that we are unable to hold for two Sessions consecutively the same policy. I wish to show how hon. gentlemen opposite have changed and chopped in their criticisms. Why, let the House remember this: that, in 1886, all these 68 seizures to which the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has referred had been made, that the D. J. Adams and the Doughty had been seized, that every reason for making seizures had been adopted and enforced during that long and troublesome period in our fisheries dispute. Let me remind the House, moreover, that the reports made by the present Minister of Finance, then Minister of Fisheries, and myself, and which had been approved by Council, and which were denounced by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) to-night, as "brag, and blow, and bluster," were put upon the records of this House early in 1887. Nay, more, they had been put before the Parliament of Great Britain early in the autumn of 1886, and had been then published by our own newspapers here. Accordingly, every man who took any interest in this question knew their contents, and when this House assembled in 1887, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and all his associates had read my report on the D. J. Adams seizure, and Mr. Foster's report on that whole question. They had read and digested all those reports which they now declare were "brag, blow and bluster"—and did they ask the House to condemn them then? Did the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) rise in his place and condemn them? Did the leader of the Opposition rise and say: "this is brag, blow and bluster?" Did they say: "this is a narrow, cruel and harsh interpretation of the Treaty of 1818?" Did they say those 68 vessels should not have been seized, that we treated the Americans harshly, that we had seized too many American vessels? The records will show. But I find on looking over the records that, on the 17th June, 1887, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) did bring this subject before the House. He brought it to the notice of the House on a report which he says to-night is "brag, blow and bluster."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, no.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will not be able to accept the hon. gentleman's denial of a statement which I heard him make a few moments ago.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will, perhaps, do me the justice to allow me to explain.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has intimated two or three times that I spoke of his report as being a report of brag, blow and bluster. The hon. gentleman is misrepresenting me entirely. I never did make use of such language to-night or on any occasion, but to-night and on previous occasions I have said that as far as the law is concerned, I agree with the hon. gentleman.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is not the point. The hon. gentleman has stated to-night that he was unable, and that any lawyer would be unable to differ from me so far as the interpretation of the document was concerned, but he said that these reports and Orders in Council and the policy of the Government based on them was mere "brag, blow and bluster." But I do not care if the hon. gentleman did not say so, it was in 1887 that he should have condemned us if he thought we should be condemned. I want to contrast now the attitude which he has taken to-night with his attitude when the whole policy was fresh before the country, when he had the reports in his hands, when he knew the whole history of the 68 seizures, but when he was not quite so certain whether it would be to their advantage or disadvantage to attack us. In disclaiming any desire to embarrass the Government with respect to this question, the hon. gentleman said, on 17th June, 1887:

"My intention is simply to discuss this question in the light of the facts as they exist at present. The Government having, as I said, neglected their duties, and being now through that neglect brought face to face with the present condition of affairs, namely, the expiration of the Washington Treaty, I think I expressed the opinion of both sides that in taking steps to protect our fisheries, the Government carried out the wishes of the very large majority of the people."

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Hear, hear. I say so now.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The policy which we had carried out was well understood. The hon. gentleman had the reports in his hands, the Order in Council and the records of the 68 cruel seizures which he has detailed to-night—all the data on which was based the policy which he now described as "brag, blow and bluster." The hon. gentleman continued:

"I am quite sure that under the then circumstances that was the only proper course to be taken; and so far as they have taken that course they have my cordial support."

We had it, but only for one Session. —

"I am not going to open up those grave questions which have been discussed" —

With "brag, blow and bluster?" No. —

"— with very great ability by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I have given a good deal of time to the reading of the papers on those questions" —

The hon. gentleman had not been misled or taken by surprise. —

"— and I think that so far as the controversy is concerned between Mr. Bayard and Mr. Phelps, the American Minister to England, on the one side," —

And to-night the hon. gentleman took the report of Mr. Phelps and backed it up. —

"— and the gentleman who acted for Canada on our side, our case has been very well presented."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). I do not deny that to-night.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is one other point on which I wish to refresh the hon. gentleman's memory, even though it be as to very recent history. We heard to-night about the dreadful category of 68 seizures,—we heard it over and over again. The fact was that what the hon. gentleman complained of on 17th June, 1887, with that list before him, was that the seizures were all made in the harbors and that the cruisers had not gone out and searched the seas for those vessels. Why, he said, the fishery protection has been a farce because our cruisers have searched for American vessels only in the harbors of Canada while they should have taken them on the seas:

"It would strike those who know something about the habits of the American fishermen as very singular, that, if the poachers were watched, only one was seized for fishing within the 3-mile limit. The charge which I make—and I do that without making any charge of improper conduct against those who are carrying on the service—is that their time was devoted too much to the boarding and taking control of American vessels in harbors, while they did not give the proper protection they should have given to the sea-coast fisheries outside."

I shall give the hon. gentleman the full benefit of his statement, and of course anything that is in his favor I will read to him:

"It was a matter of public notoriety, it was talked of at every fireside, it was talked of at every dinner table, it was talked of in every exchange in the Maritime Provinces, that the cruisers were almost all the time in harbor. It may be that it was necessary for them to be in harbor. It may be that it was necessary for them to watch these vessels but my experience, and the information I have derived from those who have the best knowledge of the subject, leads me to believe that it was altogether improper for them to remain in harbor for the time they did. I find, taking up the copies of the different boarding books of these different vessels, that the information I had, and the facts which were generally known in the Maritime Provinces, are endorsed by the official statement which is obtainable here. I find, in the first place, that the schooner L. Houlett, under command of Captain Lorway, boarded 264 vessels; and one would suppose, in looking at this book, that this gentleman and his vessel had been exceedingly active in looking after these poachers and protecting our fisheries, but a critical examination of the paper will show that there was nothing of the kind. Why? Because, of the 264 vessels that he boarded, 259 were vessels lying at anchor in the different harbors of the Provinces, and he only boarded 5 vessels outside of the harbor. One of these five vessels was that which was seized for an actual fishing within the limits, the Highland Light, and she has been condemned and sold; and the other four vessels he boarded outside of the harbor while they were supposed to be trespassing within the bounds. Hon. gentlemen will see at once that this was a very small proportion. Then, we have the Critic, commanded by Captain McLaren, which boarded 125 vessels in all, but 132 of these were at anchor in the harbor, and only three outside. The F. E. Conrod, Captain Smeltzer in command, boarded 48 vessels, and of these seven were outside a harbor, at the mouth of the Baie des Chaleurs, and he reports that he boarded them and warned them not to enter the bay; but, outside of these seven, he does not seem to have boarded a single American fishing craft when it was engaged in prosecuting the fishing business in the Maritime Provinces. The Terror, Captain Quigley, boarded 73 vessels in all, and all of these were in the harbor except one, which he boarded at the mouth of the harbor of Shelburne. Then we have the General Middleton; that vessel was more or less concerned in the Bay of Fundy, with the fishing of which I am not very well acquainted, but they appear to be all small boats of two tons, three and six tons, and so on, so I will not refer to that. They are not what we call fishing vessels at all. The Lizzie Lindsay, Captain Pouliot in command, boarded 27 vessels in all; two of these were outside and the other 25 were in the harbor. The Lansdowne, commanded by Captain Dakins, boarded 93 vessels in all. Nine of these were at sea, and 82 were in harbor. Hon. gentlemen would imagine, on a first glance, that a man who boards 72 vessels has evidently done a good deal of work, but, if you examine the return, you will find that as many as forty of those were lying in the same harbor at the same time, and were all boarded on one day.

“ Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What of that ?

“ Mr. DAVIES. I say that these vessels were in the same harbor, and the work done consisted of boarding them in the harbor. I think he should have devoted more time to sailing along the coasts and boarding them there.”

Now, Sir, all those seizures which were made, were for vessels improperly entering the harbors without proper justification, or for violating customs laws while they were there, and the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) contention was that in regard to that very business of boarding vessels—and he need not attempt to confuse the ear of the House by pretending that it was with a view of preventing fishing outside—with regard to that very boarding of vessels he said it should have been extended to our coasts outside. Suppose the American vessels had been boarded outside. What a cry would have gone up, if instead of a record of 68 seizures made in our own harbors and waters, the hon. member was able to point to a number of seizures which were made outside our harbors. How he would tell the House that the American fishermen were persecuted while pursuing their lawful calling along our coasts. I want to call the attention of this House for a few moments to a statement which has been repeated, I am very sorry to say, very many times outside of this House. This statement has very seldom been heard here, because it is only in the American brief on the fishery question—that we have been guilty of the inhumanity of driving vessels to sea without sufficient provisions for the maintenance of their crews. The House was told a night or two ago, and it has been referred to once or twice since; and the Senate of the United States has been informed in indignant terms and with strong language that we have been guilty of inhumanity which no maritime people had ever been guilty of before. The case of the Molly Adams has been cited as an illustration of that. Now, Sir, as that statement has been repeated in this House—and now it will be repeated for all time to come in the American brief on this question as having been said in this House—I must ask leave even to persecute the ear of the House by repeating an oft told tale, and to assert that that offence was never committed by the Government of Canada or by any one of its officers. The statement which has been made on the part of the United States is this: that the Molly Adams was a vessel which had rescued a shipwrecked Canadian crew, that it had given to the shipwrecked Canadian crew a portion of its provisions, and that when that vessel brought that crew into our waters and landed them on our coasts, they were driven to sea without the right to replenish their provisions. How is it, that the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, as well as those who have referred to the matter since, will take the American statement of the case and fling it in the face of those who have to negotiate arrangements for this country, when the statement has been refuted as plainly as a lying statement ever was, and when everybody knows that the refutation which we have made of it has never provoked a single word of reply? Our answer with regard to this case has gone before the United States Senate, it has gone to the State Department of the United States, it has been transferred to the man who made the charge, and more than a year has rolled by, and it is only in political discussions that we hear revived the dead story which we killed long ago. Let me read for a moment to the House what the statement is upon our side, and the statement as I have said has never been challenged even by the man who made the contrary statement :

“ Capt. Jacobs declares that on or about the 26th September last, during very heavy weather, he fell in with the bark Neskilita which had run on a bar at Malpeque harbor and became a total wreck. That he took off the crew, 17 in number, at 12 o'clock at night, carried them to his own vessel, fed them for three days, and then gave them $60 with which to pay their fare home, and provisions to last them on their way. He states that the captain of the Canadian cruiser Critic came on board, was told the circumstances, but offered no assistance, and that no one on shore would take the wrecked men unless he became responsible for the payment of their board. The collector at Malpeque, in his report, says that early on the morning after the wreck, soon after the news reached him, he repaired to the harbor to see what assistance could be given; that he then met the captain of the Neskilita in company with Capt. Jacobs, and was told by the latter that the crew of the wrecked vessel was comfortably cared for on his vessel and that nothing more could be done. Capt. McLaren of the Critic says that he had once visited the Molly Adams and was told by Capt. Jacobs that ‘he had made all arrangements for the crew.’ The collector and Capt. McLaren agree in stating, from information gathered by them, that the crew of the wrecked vessel came to shore in their own boat unassisted, and after boarding a United States vessel were invited by Capt. Jacobs, with whom the captain of the Neskilita had beforetimes sailed out of Gloucester, to go on board the Molly Adams.”

So that this crew had not been rescued at all by the Mollie Adams.—

“ The collector was asked by the captain of the Neskilita if he would assist himself and crew to their homes, and answered that he could not unless assured that they themselves were without means for that purpose, in which case he would have to telegraph to Ottawa for instructions. The captain of the Neskilita made no further application. The Minister observes that it is the practice of the Dominion Government to assist shipwrecked and destitute sailors, in certain cases of great hardship, to their destination or homes, but in all cases it must be clear that they must be destitute, and the application for assistance must be made to Ottawa through the Collector of Customs. Had such an application been made by the captain of the Neskilita, it would have received due consideration. In answer to the charge that board could not be obtained for the wrecked crew, it is stated by Capt. McLaren that the crew of a United States vessel, wrecked about the same time, found no difficulty in getting board and that the captain of the Neskilita had himself arranged to board with the collector, who expressed surprise at his failing to come. Capt. Jacobs complains that he was not allowed to land from his vessel the material saved from the wreck. To this charge the collector replies that he received no intimation of any wreck material, except the crew's luggage, being on board the Mollie Adams, and Capt. Jacobs made no request to him regarding the landing of wrecked material, and that he (the collector) gave all assistance in his power to the captain of the Neskilita in saving material from the wreck. It was subsequently discovered that Capt. Jacobs had on board the Mollie Adams a seine from the wrecked vessel belonging to the underwriters, for taking care of which, when obliged to give it up, Capt. Jacobs claimed that he was paid the sum of $10. Capt. Jacobs states that he was put to a loss of ten days' fishing by his detention with the Neskilita. The reports of both the collector and Capt. McLaren agree in giving a very different and sufficient reason, viz, very bad weather, consequent inability to fish, a disability experienced by the whole fishing fleet at that time anchored in Malpeque. The second complaint of Mr. Bayard is that when Capt. Jacobs, experiencing a dearth of provisions as a consequence of his charitable action, shortly after put into Port Medway, and asked to purchase half a barrel of flour and enough provisions to take him home, the collector, ‘with full knowledge of all the circumstances,’ refused the request and threatened him with seizure if he bought anything whatever. The collector's report hereto annexed, shows that Capt. Jacobs entered his port on the 25th October, fully one month after the occurrence at Malpeque; that in entering he made affirmation that he called for shelter and repairs, and for no other purpose whatever; that just before leaving he asked permission to purchase half a barrel of flour, and when asked by the collector if he was without provisions, he replied that he was not, adding that he had 'a good supply of all kinds of provisions except flour, and enough of that to last him home unless he met some unusual delay.'

These are the facts on which we are told that we drove American fishermen to sea without provisions, after they had rendered charitable aid to our own people. There is also the case which was referred to by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Edgar), the case of the Laura Sayeward, in which there was a persistent attempt made to fasten on the officers of this Government the charge of harshness to an American who desired to obtain provisions in the port of Shelburne.

MR. EDGAR. Does the hon. gentleman refer to my remarks in this debate? Because I never mentioned that case at all, nor the case of the Mollie Adams either.

SIR JOHN THOMPSON. I do not require to cite what the hon. member said in this debate. I am referring to his discussion of the case last winter. Upon his representation of the case to the House a more general reference was made this Session to it in the argument on the other side of the House, as to our inhumanity, and I want to put our case with regard to that vessel on the footing on which I think it ought to be placed. There was an affidavit made by Medeo Rose, the captain of an American fishing vessel, that he came into the port of Shelburne, and was denied the right to purchase provisions there. Upon that an enquiry was made, the result of which was that we not only got the affidavit of the Collector of Customs that the statement was entirely untrue, that he had treated the man courteously, and that the captain had never asked the privilege of buying provisions, but we also got the affidavit of the man himself that his former statement was untrue. These statements went to Washington and were brought to the attention of that roving commission appointed by the Senate to discover what claims could be made against Canada; and fearing prosecution for perjury and that his claim would be thrown out, this man made a statement that he had made his second affidavit in consequence of intimidation. But the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has brought down and laid on the Table of the House a clear and explicit reply to that statement by the collector himself, who distinctly negatives every statement made as to coercion or intimidation to get this man to retract his affidavit; next, we have the affidavit of the magistrate who took the affidavit of Medeo Rose, and who says that it was made with the greatest willingness, and without the slightest fear or compulsion; and, lastly, we have the written statement of the United States Consular Agent at Shelburne that the statements of our officers are true, and that when Medeo Rose applied to him he never mentioned any such complaint. But that case will not disappear from the brief, either in the United States or on the other side of the House. But, Sir, when we are charged with cruelty, and narrow, inhuman treatment of American fishing vessels, what has the House to say of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) who spoke for an hour this afternoon in an attempt to persuade the House that we should carry out the modus vivendi for another year, although we are aware that, last Session, that hon. gentleman denounced the modus vivendi, and declared that the people of the Maritime Provinces never would submit to have these American fishermen come in even for shelter. He said that the people of the Maritime Provinces would look upon a concession to allow them to come in for shelter and transhipment and the purchase of bait as a complete sacrifice of all their rights. This hon. gentleman, who sits in council with the Opposition and rises to debate this question every time it is discussed, first on this side and then on the other, but always against the Government, declared last winter that American fishermen should not be permitted to come in for shelter; to-day demands that far greater privileges should be continued for another year by means of the modus vivendi. Now, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has referred in strong terms to the contention set up in my report. I will not again characterize his remarks, as he does not like the terms I applied to them, when he called that contention one of brag and bluster. But he said that my contention was that we must exclude American fishermen from buying a rope, sending a telegram, mailing a letter or going for a physician. If he reads my report—as he endorsed it in 1887 he will endorse it again—he will find that it makes no such statement. Yet that same assertion has been put forward in the press against the negotiators of the treaty last year. It has been said that I argued successfully that we must deprive the Americans of these privileges, or give up our fishing rights altogether. The contention I put forward in that report was not so, but it may be stated in a few words. Mr. Phelps' contention had been this: that the Convention of 1818, which renounced all other privileges except the privilege of coming into Canadian waters for wood, water, shelter and repairs, surely did not renounce the right to come in to buy a rope, to mail a letter, to send a telegram, or to apply for a doctor; and what I said was not that it was necessary to exclude American fishermen from these trifling privileges, but that we could not admit such an interpretation of the treaty as would give them the right to come in for such purposes. I said that admitting that the Treaty of 1818 was intended to prevent Americans fishing in our waters, if they had the right to haunt our waters on the mere pretext of mailing a letter, or sending a telegram, or landing a man, or shipping men, or buying a rope, the provisions of the treaty would be frittered away. I said, and I think every sensible man who understands the question will agree with me, that that would be the natural result; but I did not say that to extend in mercy the right to call for provisions in cases of necessity, or to call for a physician, would deprive us of a right to enforce the treaty altogether, as was insinuated in the observations made to-night. When I come to call the attention of the House to the provision we made in 1888, and which we were told was a complete negation of all our record, I will show that those rights were not ceded to the United States. I will show that the Americans were confined simply to the privileges they had under the Treaty of 1818 until they should choose to buy other privileges—those which we said were ours to sell and not theirs to take. But if the House will look at the report made in 1870 by the then Minister of Fisheries, the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), they will find that the thing which is declared to-night to be so offensive was the thing which he stood for 18 or 19 years ago. He said:

"But notwithstanding this definite restriction, the majority of United States citizens engaged in the fisheries, finding it to their own advantage to supply them selves in our limits with requisites for the fishing voyages, and with materials needed to carry on their business, endeavor to deal with traders and inhabitants of various places along the coast, and even without reference to our Customs regulations. The revenue officers and other authorities have persistently denied this privilege. Its practical effect would be to extend indefinitely the precise rights secured to them by treaty."

So he goes on at length and I will not follow him out, but it is declared there, in 1870, that to allow the Americans to claim exemption from Customs regulations would be to extend indefinitely the privileges given by the treaty. Now, we have been told several times, in most emphatic language, that the object of enforcing the Customs laws against American fishermen was not to protect our fisheries but to drive the Americans to exasperation. Well, the enforcement of the Customs laws has been simply this: We stated in 1886 that the American fishermen had the right, under the Treaty of 1818, to come into our waters for wood and water, and shelter and repairs, but that in so doing they were obliged to observe the municipal law, which compelled every vessel no matter from what country, entering one of our ports to report herself and declare what her business was. So that if an American fisherman chooses to visit our coast for any of the purposes, which give him the right to enter, the Collector of Customs must know his business, must know whether it is lawful, must know what he has and what he gets, and see that he does not violate any of the provisions of the Customs law. But if fishing vessels were allowed to come and go and stay as long as they pleased, there would be no chance for preserving either our rights to our fisheries, or our Customs laws. Let those who complain in regard to the Customs laws—let those who say that they are unnecessarily severe—turn to the Revised Statutes of the United States, section 2,774, and they will find there what the requirements of the United States are with regard to vessels entering American waters. They will find that every vessel, once she goes into American waters, must enter at the Customs before she dares to depart. It is true she has twenty-four hours to enter, but she has not the privilege to leave in the twenty-four hours, under a heavy penalty; and if they will turn to the reports of the cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, which are noted in the margin of that section of the Revised Statutes of the United States, they will find that by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court those provisions are held to extend to every vessel, even when driven by tempest into American harbors. So that for the last eighty or ninety years, and to-day, the statutory provisions of the United States have been as strict as has been our law, which we enforced in 1886. I suppose it will be said, as it has been said on the part of the United States, and as has been said here to-night: "Is it not cruel and unneighborly to the sixty millions of people who are our neighbors, that we should compel American vessels coming to our ports to enter at the Customs house when we know they come in for shelter or repairs?" As I told the House, it is necessary that we should have some supervision over these fishing vessels in our waters, and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) was so sensible of the necessity of such supervision, that he wanted them boarded before they came in. This is no new provision. In the United States, as late as 22nd June, 1887, after the Committee of the Senate had made a report of these 63 so-called outrages which were spoken of to-night—after our conduct had been stigmatised all over the United States as harsh and brutal because we enforced the Customs laws, and when we were enforcing the Customs laws, as stated by the hon. member for Queen's, to exasperate the people of the United States, it will be found that Mr. Fairchild, Secretary of the Treasury, gave an important decision on 22nd June, 1887. In that case, which was the case of some Spanish fishing smacks which had run in under stress of weather to buy provisions, and, having bought provisions, because they dared to depart without reporting at the Customs, they were seized and fined by the collector $500; but Mr. Fairchild had the magnanimity to reduce the fines to $40 for each smack. It was a pretty severe warning to them not to venture to enter an American harbor for necessary supplies to sustain life without making entry at the Customs house in accordance with the Revised Statutes of the United States, the nature of which he pointed out to them, and made them remember in a way they and their neighbors are not likely to forget. Now, we were told that it was a happy thing for Canada that there existed in the borders of the United States a Canadian citizen, who, finding that the United States and Canada were almost approaching the verge of war on account of Canada having maintained the simple, plain and undoubted rights which she had exercised and enjoyed for upwards of 70 years, volunteered to act as mediator. We were told it was a happy thing there existed a mediator who could bring the two nations together. This matter was called to the attention of the House by what I think was a misconstruction of the language the hon.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Minister of Finance used last Session. It was brought to the attention of the House as if the whole credit of these negotiations, and of any negotiations having taken place at all, was due to a private citizen of Canada now living in the United States. Now, the fact is, that before Mr. Wiman made a single proposal in the direction of negotiations between the Governments of Canada and the United States, despatches had passed between the Washington and the British Governments, and between the British Government and Canada, putting these negotiations on foot, and declaring that there were to be negotiations in which all the relations between the two countries relating to trade, as well as to fisheries, were to be taken up; and it was only after negotiations were thoroughly on foot that Mr. Wiman interjected himself and proposed, before these negotiations should be formally opened, that it would be expedient for some member of the Canadian Government to proceed to the capital of the United States. Yet the House was told the other night, and to-night, that had it not been for that mediation the two countries would have been at each other's throats, and mediation would have been impossible. I do not intend to question the motives which Mr. Wiman had in his interference, nor do I doubt his desire to promote peace between the two countries. But I say that the small part which he played in the transaction has been magnified to ridiculous proportions in this debate. It was said, also, by the leader of the Opposition that Mr. Bayard had written a letter to Sir Charles Tupper proposing trade negotiations, and that, when the proposals had been made by the British plenipotentiaries in the terms of that letter, they were refused because of the irritation which the United States Government felt at the action of Canada on the fishery question. The fact is, and, if the hon. member who made the statement will examine the record, he will be so convinced of it that I believe he will withdraw his assertion, that between those two periods there was nothing whatever in the conduct of Canada to cause any irritation on the part of the United States Government or people. There had been no opportunity for such irritation, because the winter had intervened and spring had not commenced. There had been no frequenting of our waters by American fishing vessels, there had been no action taken, there had been no irritation, no threat, or anything on our part which could give any reason for the withdrawal of the proposal. The statement to that effect which has been made in this debate, with a view to injure the Government, the assertion that we embarrassed those negotiations by pursuing a course of irritation in the meantime, is absolutely contrary to the fact and without a particle of foundation. When the offer was made, it was rejected for reasons which are patent to everybody in the two countries, namely: that, while no doubt Mr. Bayard was sincere in the proposal he made originally that the discussions should include matters of trade and commerce, he found in the interval, not that we had treated his people harshly, and that he was, therefore, justified in withdrawing his proposal, but that the temper and feeling of the two parties in the United States, of one of which he was a member, was such that they would not agree to anything of the sort, and that if any attempt was made on the part of the United States to discuss trade concessions there was an end to the slightest hope of a treaty being concluded in regard to the fisheries. That which was due to the strong feeling of the republican party against free trade and to the sensitiveness of the democratic party to the charge of favoring free trade, has been, for the first time, put down to the blustering course pursued by the Government of Canada. We have been told that we backed down in 1887—that so volatile, so fluctuating was our policy that, while in 1886 we persisted in these seizures, in 1887 we had not a single seizure to record. The reason for that is as plain and as obvious to the hon. gentleman who made the statement as it is to us on this side of the House, namely, that the policy pursued by the Canadian Government in 1886 made its determination to enforce the fishery rights of Canada known to every American fisherman. They knew, by the seizure of the David J. Adams in 1886, that we did not intend to permit American vessels to purchase bait in our ports. They knew, by the seizure of the Doughty in 1886, that we did not intend to permit the shipping of men on American fishing vessels in our ports. They knew by all these other seizures—as they have been called, though they were really mere arrests—that they must report at our Customs when they entered our harbors. In 1887 they did report at our Customs, they did not ship their men in our harbors, and they did not attempt to buy bait in our ports; and that was simply because the police surveillance in 1886 had been effectual, and not because any instruction was withdrawn, or a line or a dot of our policy was changed in 1887. We were told also that part of the hidden history of these negotiations was that, when Sir Charles Tupper went to Washington in 1887, he made the promise that there should be no more seizures in 1887. I know something of his mind in regard to that matter; and I say, unhesitatingly, that that is without the slightest foundation. Even if he had so far forgotten himself as to say so, he had no authority whatever from the Government of Canada to that effect. In any case he could not have been so foolish as to make any such promise at the very outset of the negotiations. Then we were told that we backed down on account of the Retaliation Act being introduced, and that it was that which made us take back all the policy of "brag and bluster." While everyone would have regretted the enforcement of the Retaliation Act, so far from that having been a reason for our backing down, we went to Washington after a statement in writing by Grover Cleveland that it would be injurious to the great commercial interests of the United States to put that Act in force, and that he would not do so, had been published. We were told again that every contention was given up on the part of Canada and that the statement made by the First Minister as to the contentions of Canada having been maintained was so extraordinary that the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) could not believe his ears and waited until he could read it. I venture to say that that statement will be borne out by everyone who reads the controversy and who reads the treaty. Everyone knows what were the leading points of discussion between the two countries. Let him look at the treaty, and he will see how they were adjusted. They were settled in a way which was not dishonorable to the United States, but in a manner which adopted the contentions of Canada in regard to every one of them. The United States had asserted that their fishermen had the right to come into our ports for every one of the four objects mentioned in the original treaty, without entering at the Customs. They contended that they had the right to tranship their cargoes, to buy bait and supplies, and to enter our ports for all purposes that were not immediately connected with fishing. By the Treaty of 1888, did we admit that their contention was correct, and that they should have these privileges for all time to come? No; but, as was well expressed by a leading Senator in the United States, when you read the controversy which took place before the Treaty of 1888, you find all these matters referred to as matters of right, and when you read the treaty you find they are matters of purchase. It is one thing to say: "This is our property, and no one shall deprive us of it;" and it is another thing to say that, for the sake of good neighborhood, and to settle the question on terms not injurious to our fishermen, and in order to give us a fair market for our fish: "These rights which we have said belong to us we will sell for a reasonable price to you." And because it was provided that the United States would not any more contend that these things were theirs, but would buy them, the hon. gentleman says we gave away everything which we had contended for; and it is because of this that the statement of the Premier was well made, that while these privileges are not, within reasonable limits, denied any longer to the fishermen of the United States, they are no longer held by them as a matter of right, as they claimed them to be before the Treaty of 1888. As regards the question of enforcement of the Customs laws, as regards the question of how far it is safe to allow them to use our ports without complying with the Customs laws, you will see that we do not give them the unlimited right of coming into our harbors without complying with the Customs laws; and even if my report bears the strong construction which the hon. member for Queen's said to-night it does, you will find they limit themselves in the use of our ports, even for the purposes of the Treaty of 1818, and that even when they come in for any of the four purposes for which they have a right under the Treaty of 1818, they must report at the Customs if they stay longer than a certain time, and under all circumstances if they have any communication with the shore. If the American fishermen or the American Government had conceded that in 1886 there would have been no necessity for making the seizures which we made, but when the negotiators came together and found that these terms could be made by them and accepted by us, there was an end of the controversy. The rights of American fishermen received a fair limitation—and a limitation which is not inconsistent with the full enjoyment that was necessary to them—of the privileges which were secured by the Treaty of 1818. Another extraordinary statement was made by the hon. member for Queen's—and I have his words this time exactly before me—that Sir Charles Tupper stated that he could not hold by any of the contentions which had been made by the junior ministers; and he further said, in the course of the debate last Session, in introducing the treaty to the House, that he would have been criminal if he had tried to maintain their contentions. I need not tell the House that not one word of this statement was ever uttered by Sir Charles Tupper on the floor of this House or elsewhere. What Sir Charles Tupper did say on that occasion was: that it was impossible for him to sustain the full contentions which had been made by his colleagues; and, indeed, that was a matter which went without saying. He went to Washington, not for the purpose of settling our right as a regular tribunal would settle it, but for the purpose of making a bargain; and whoever heard of two parties being able to make a bargain when both of them stuck to the strongest contention as to the rights which he possessed? Sir Charles Tupper did say:

"I need not inform the House that, in diplomatic intercourse, it is customary, it is right, for the representative of a government to state the strongest and most advanced grounds that they possibly can sustain in relation to every question, and I would not like, I confess, to be tried before the House—"

The hon. member for Queen's interpreted it as "tried before the House on our reports as to what the law was." No; he was speaking of having his treaty tried before the House, as maintaining the strictest right we had contended for.—

"—to be tried before the House by the ground taken by my hon. friends the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries."

Then the hon. member, finding that that was as far as he could safely go in his quotation, said: "Then the contentions made in other parts of the report went to the winds." Did they? If the hon. gentleman had had the courage to read on he would have found that Sir Chas. Tupper said:

"The ground they took was quite right; they were authorised by the strict terms of the treaty in taking the strong ground they did; they would have failed in their duty to this House and to this country, if, called upon to deal with this question as a matter of diplomatic intercourse and discussion between the Governments of the United States and of Canada, they had not taken the extreme contention that the literal terms of the Treaty of 1818 would warrant."

—And everybody knows, since I have brought it to the attention of the House, that even if Sir Charles Tupper called it an "extreme contention" the hon. member for Queen's differed from him, as I stated before, so far as to call it a very fair statement of our case and a very able report. Now the hon. member for Queen's further erred in the criticism which he made of this modus vivendi. He declares that the Premier, in reply to the mover of the resolution, discussed it as if it were an act of humiliation, and the hon. member for Queen's endeavored to assure the House that there was no humiliation about it—that it was a perfectly fair arrangement. He said—and I ask the members of the House to remember it—that this modus vivendi gives up no territorial right of Canada. Nor does it? But the House will remember that the modus vivendi is but the shadow of the treaty itself. It is precisely of the same shape and nature as the treaty is, it is just what the treaty is, only an agreement that the treaty shall be accepted in all its terms before it can be ratified; and, therefore, when the hon. gentleman commends the modus vivendi to the House as giving up none of the territorial rights of Canada, I think it does not lie in his mouth to declare that the treaty itself, which is but the substance of this modus vivendi made perpetual, may properly be called a complete give away of the rights of Canada. But I am sorry to say that the hon. gentleman stands in strict and sharp contrast with himself again with regard to that question. I think he was right to-night, in commending the modus vivendi, but I think he entirely misunderstood the First Minister when he supposed that the First Minister was denouncing the modus vivendi when he spoke of the humiliation of begging reciprocity or any other concessions from the United States. When the Premier made the observations commented on, he was not referring to the terms of the modus vivendi at all, which, so far as I understand the statements of the Premier, has not been condemned in any particular. As I understand the question the decision of himself and his colleagues as to continuing the modus vivendi in force, is entirely in suspense, not for purposes of delay and procrastination, but for the purposes of seeing whether we are to get anything like an equivalent for the rights which we are conceding, and for the purpose of seeing that we do not open all the privileges of our coasts to the people of the United States, while they may refuse all privileges of their coasts to us. But this is what the hon. gentleman said about it last year:

"I would say nothing about the modus vivendi. If the treaty was good in itself, if it was an honorable and fair treaty, I would not object to a modus vivendi being agreed upon for two years, such as was offered by the commissioners from Great Britain and attached to the treaty here. But there are not only the concessions in the treaty, it appears as if the Government were not able to give the Americans enough, and as soon as they had given all they asked, the Government then said that in good fellowship and with a wish to promote good feeling we propose for the next two years, for a nominal sum, to give them everything they can possibly ask and all that our fishermen enjoy on our shores."

Now, I think the hon. member was mistaken last year, and I think he was right to-night in declaring that the modus vivendi gives up none of the territorial rights of our people, and does not give up either everything that the Americans ask, or everything our own fishermen enjoy on our own shores. But he was mistaken also in this particular; he misinterpreted, I think, the object of the modus vivendi itself. He took exception to the remark of the First Minister that to concede now the modus vivendi would be to enable the American fishermen, at a small price, to enjoy commercial privileges on our coast, when there is a new administration coming into office within a week which might close all the ports of the United States to our people. That was the point the First Minister made, and I think it was well made. And for the purpose of testing that, let us see the reply of the hon. gentleman. He says:

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

"Does not the House know that the modus vivendi was adopted for the purpose of preventing that Retaliation Act coming into force?"

I say not at all. The object of the modus vivendi, and it is declared on its face, is this: The treaty was negotiated in February, it could not, in all probability, be ratified by the Senate for some months then to come; in the meantime our coast would be frequented by American fishermen wanting to trade, and it was thought that, either through rashness or precipitation on the part of the American fishermen, who might suppose that the treaty had already come into force, or the desire of some of them who might want to make political trouble, as some of them had avowed was their intention, with a view afterwards of resorting to a Republican Government to redress their wrongs, it was feared this might so precipitate matters on the coast, as to cause a danger that a rupture might take place, which would induce the Senate to say: "Now hostilities have commenced again, let there be an end to the Fishery Treaty." And it was in order to preserve peace, until the decision of the Senate should be pronounced on the treaty itself, that the modus vivendi was adopted, and it had no possible relation to the Retaliation Act. But the hon. gentleman says that the Premier's point was wrong; for this reason, that so long as the modus vivendi is kept in force there could be no complaint of wrong done to American fishermen, and therefore no pretence for the Retaliation Act being enforced. He is entirely mistaken. Let us adopt this resolution to-night, let us put the modus vivendi in force to-morrow, and although it is in force an American fisherman could come down on our coast and say: "I will not take any license under the modus vivendi, but I stand on my rights as an American citizen, as contended for by Mr. Bayard and all our people, and I claim the right to go in and buy bait and tranship my cargo without taking out any license whatever." In that case the old contentions would be revived. We must maintain the rights of Canada, and then the President of the United States has it within his power for any cause of that kind to declare that the Retaliation Act shall come into force. Hon. members will find on reading its provisions, that it is most sweeping in its statement of the reasons for which it may be put into operation. It declares that if the rights of American fishermen are infringed in Canadian waters, that if their ships are not allowed the same privileges in our waters as Canadian ships are allowed in American waters—forgetting that they were paid and bountifully paid for the discrimination—it declares that if the privilege of coming into Canadian ports under a touch and trade license is refused—not a modus vivendi license—if, under these circumstances, or any of these circumstances a collision should occur between the authorities and the American fishermen, there would be the pretext for putting the Retaliation Act in force, after this House has declared in its bounty and its generosity that the modus vivendi at all hazards must be extended to American fishermen, and we would have the humiliation of knowing that the Retaliation Act was enforced at the very time when we had bound ourselves for the whole year to open our coasts and give full privileges to every American fisherman who might choose to pay for a license. So the House will, I think, be of the opinion that on this question a discussion is premature at this juncture of public affairs. I desire to call attention, before concluding, to one point which I forgot in my haste a few moments ago, and that was the position taken by the United States authorities themselves as to our right to enforce our own laws upon our coasts. I will cite from a letter of Mr. Bayard himself, addressed to American fishermen who complained to him of the treatment which they received on our Atlantic coasts. Mr. Bayard said:

"You are well aware that questions are now pending between this Government and that of Great Britain in relation to the jurisdiction and to the rights of American fishing vessels in the territorial waters of British North America, and we will relax no effort to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the difficulties. In the meantime it is the duty and the manifest interest of all American fishermen entering Canadian jurisdiction to ascertain and obey the laws and regulations therein in force."

That is all the Government of Canada ever did. All they said was this: that to the whole world our ports are free, except for the restriction on American fishermen by the Treaty of 1818, and that when they came into our waters they are bound, as Mr. Bayard subsequently told them they were bound, to enquire what the law of the country was and to obey it. I have shown the House that the law of our country in its terms, enforcement and execution is precisely that which it has been ever since the Treaty of 1818 was made, and is substantially the same as the law and enforcement of the law is in the United States itself. I have only one other observation to make and that is in regard to the challenge or taunt with which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) closed, the extraordinary statement which he hurled at the head of the First Minister in his loudest tones, and with gesticulations as strong and vehement as if he really credited his own assertions, that if the Retaliation Act were put in force the people of this country would hold him responsible and hold him criminally responsible. Well, Mr. Speaker, all I have to say about that matter is, that while no one would regret the enforcement of any act of retaliation by either of the two countries more strongly than I would, or apprehend more seriously the consequences than I would, if any such danger and difficulty should come, the Canadian Government would be able to leave its record to the judgment of any man of fairness, honesty and probity. We have had to deal with the United States through the medium of the Imperial Government which, as the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) pointed out to the House, has always been most watchful and most critical of the action of an ambitious colony in its treatment of a neighboring foreign power. Under the guidance and with the advice and co-operation of that Government, from time to time, we have made the concession which was made in 1825—made in vain in 1835—we have made the concessions which were offered in 1838, which those hon. gentlemen say were concessions of all we had ever contended for, but which we think were not dishonorable concessions at all. We have made all those concessions; we have done nothing more than uphold the municipal law of our own country, which Mr. Bayard told the American fishermen it was their duty and their manifest interest to enquire into and obey—we have done nothing more than that, and we have done it with the approval of the Imperial Government in a manner which induced Lord Roseberry to use the words which I quoted a few moments ago when on Mr. Phelps asking him to submit the question of the correctness of the reports of my colleague and myself again to the law officers of the Crown, the noble lord said:

"If you want that course adopted you must raise some new question, because on the old case there are no two opinions in England."

We have done all that, and done it in spite of a mode of attack adopted by the Opposition, which was oftentimes unfair. If the United States Government should unwisely and in an unneighborly way enforce any Retaliation Act against Canada, I venture to say that when the bitterness of present political disputes has passed away, and this subject is reviewed by men of intelligence and reason, they will say that the fault did not rest upon Canada; and I shall be glad for the sake of my own country if we are able to say as well that it was not in any way induced by the attacks made from the other side of the House, which have been put forward at this moment with the purpose, or at least with the effect of convincing statesmen in the United States that we are completely at the mercy of that country, and are bound to change our policy and surrender our rights at their dictation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) may be congratulated on having accomplished a very difficult task. My hon. friend has at last succeeded in removing the padlock which the wise precautions of the First Minister have up to this moment placed on the lips of the gentlemen behind him. It was a very difficult task and no wonder when we consider the sort of case that those hon. gentlemen, and particularly the Minister of Justice, have to present and defend in this House. I will say for the Minister of Justice that from his own narrow and technical point—narrow and technical point, I repeat—he has done as he did in his despatches, he has made a very fair exposé of the strict legal aspect of the case, but, unhappily, he has failed utterly to comprehend or to state to this country or to this House any of the broad statesmanlike views upon which this great question alone can be properly discussed. Knowing what we all know, knowing what no man knows better than the hon. gentleman, knowing that the right hon. gentleman and hon. gentlemen will have to recede on this point, just as they have receded on every other point, that they are preparing for a new somerset, that they will have to undo their Orders in Council, that they will have to repeal the declarations they have made, and that in all human probability before another month has rolled over our heads, or, perhaps, another week has passed, they will have to contradict themselves and their followers further, and once more cease to use all these petty pedantries as to whether the constructions of a treaty made 71 years ago are exactly and literally to be carried out in the year of grace 1889, we may well wonder why they should thus insist on dragging themselves and their followers through the dirt to no purpose. Now, Sir, as regards the statements made by the Minister of Justice. This House heard him in the very opening paragraph almost of his speech, declare that no American of note had ever proposed to mix up the fishery question with our trade relations. We heard the hon. gentleman declare that. I ask is the Secretary of State of Mr. Cleveland's administration, Mr. Bayard, an American of note? Is Mr. Bayard a man whose voice ought to be heard on this question? What did Mr. Bayard say on this subject? The hon. gentleman in a later part of his speech absolutely gave us the most direct and flat contradiction possible of his own statement made about half an hour before in regard to this matter. Mr. Bayard says:

"The immediate difficulty to be settled is found in the Treaty of 1818 between the United States and Great Britain, which has been quæstio vexata ever since it was concluded, and to-day is suffered to interfere with and seriously embarrass the good understanding of both countries in the important commercial relations and interests which have come into being since its ratification, and for the adjustment of which it is wholly inadequate, as has been unhappily proved by the events of the past two years. I am confident we both seek to obtain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment, on a liberal and statesmanlike plan, of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

With that letter in the hon. gentleman's hand; he has had—I will not say the audacity—but he has had the want of consideration to assure this House that no American of note ever proposed to mix up the fishery question with the trade questions which we now propose to discuss. That is a sample of the correctness of statement, of the accuracy and of the breadth of view which the Minister of Justice has brought to the discussion of this important question. In connection with that the hon. gentleman says that Mr. Bayard subsequently withdrew his proposition, and that Mr. Bayard withdrew it because he found that the American Senate would not allow any interference with treaty privileges on their part. The Minister of Justice would have done well to look a little closer into what Sir Charles Tupper said on that question. What Sir Charles Tupper said was, that the commissioners and Mr. Bayard who was along with them:

"Withdrew that proposition because such was the hostility of public men with regard to Canada and the treatment of Canada by their fishermen that if to-morrow any relaxation of the tariff of the United States was made by an Act of Congress, it would contain a clause excepting Canada from its operation so as to deny us the advantage."

That was Sir Charles Tupper's statement, as explicit and as express as words could be, that he found it impossible and that Mr. Bayard found it impossible to carry out Mr. Bayard's proposition to induce them to negotiate on trade questions, because such was the hostility created in the minds of American public men by our treatment of United States fishermen that he could not hope for a hearing. I leave to the House to consider, when a gentleman so well versed in the details of this case as the Minister of Justice must naturally be, can make two such assertions in the course of an hour's speech, so totally at variance with the facts actually before him and some of which he actually quoted, I ask how can he expect us to believe that he is perfectly correct in all the minute details which he proceeded to inflict upon the House as to the Molie Adams, the D. J. Adams, or any other of the numerous family of Adams which were brought in contact with our cruisers. I will take occasion to call the attention of the House to a very unfair allegation made by the Minister of Justice with respect to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). He alleges that my hon. friend was to blame and that he showed he had no proper conception of the case, because he made the complaint that in these 63 seizures which were made by us in 1886, almost all the seizures were made, not for a violation of our fishery regulations, not because the American boats had been caught poaching in our waters, but on account of a breach of some petty Customs regulations committed in harbor. The Minister of Justice attempts to say that there is a contradiction in the argument of my hon. friend for Queen's. The argument of my hon. friend from first to last, was that the gentlemen opposite continued—at any rate except in very few and very rare instances—to seize these American fishing boats not because they were poaching in Canadian waters, not because they were improperly taking fish, but that they pursued them in an inhospitable and foolish manner considering the relations of the two countries, for certain petty breaches of Customs laws which fishermen could hardly be expected to be familiar with; and that in so doing they undoubtedly did to a very great extent—as not my friend from Queen's, but as Sir Charles Tupper pointed out—exasperate the people of the States, exasperate the fishermen, exasperate Congress, exasperate the whole press of the United States and by their conduct bring us into a very perilous position as regards the United States. I further call the attention of the House to this: that the hon. gentleman, the Minister of Justice, wisely perhaps did not attempt in the slightest degree to explain away the statement made by Sir Charles Tupper, quoted by me on a recent occasion, and quoted again by my hon. friend, to show that, be it right or be it wrong—for the moment we will not discuss that question—the policy of the Government had brought us to the verge of commercial war—as Sir Charles Tupper declared, within an ace of actual war—with the United States; had brought the people of the United States into a state of extreme, it may be unreasonable, exasperation. That the hon. gentleman did not attempt to deny or explain. What he did attempt to do was, forsooth, cram into the minds of the members of this House—men who must be supposed to have some acquaintance with affairs—that preposterous, ridiculous statement, that whereas we seized 68 vessels for various breaches of the fishery regulations or the Customs laws in 1886, while in the succeeding year we did not arrest one, yet there was no change of policy. Sir, is there a man within the sound of my voice who could believe such a statement to be possible? Sir Charles Tupper declared more than once that fishermen were—I suppose those of Canada as well as of the United States—a most lawless set of men, who could not easily be controlled; and yet the hon. the Minister of Justice says that the reason there were no seizures or arrests made in 1887, was that the American fishermen were converted all at once into most peaceable and law-abiding persons. We have heard of certain very miraculous conversions, there is no doubt of it; but the conversion of the American fishermen, who were described by Sir Charles Tupper as a most lawless crew, into peaceable and law-abiding citizens, so that not one of them, though there were 800 or more vessels in our waters, ever committed the smallest breach of the fishery regulations or the Customs laws from the beginning of the season of 1887 to the close, is certainly a most remarkable occurrence. Well, I leave to the Minister of Justice or his colleagues to reconcile the repeated statements made by Sir Charles Tupper when he was advocating the passage of the Fishery Treaty in this House, that he was obliged to make numerous concessions for the sake of peace, with the declaration of the First Minister that no concessions at all were made. These two statements cannot both be true, and I leave it to the hon. gentlemen—it is no particular concern of mine—to say which is the truth. I humbly submit that the two positions are utterly irreconcilable, to say the least. But my intention in rising was not so much to deal with what I must, in humble imitation again of Sir Charles Tupper, describe as the narrow view taken of the Convention of 1818 by the First Minister and the then Minister of Marine. My position to-night is this: that by the conduct of the Government we are brought face to face with the situation described by Sir Charles Tupper in words which I do not require to repeat; and, under these circumstances, although I admit most freely that my hon. friend took a grave responsibility on himself when he offered his advice to the Government on this critical question, I say that if ever the leader of an Opposition was justified from the past conduct of the Government, in taking the sense of the House as to the future policy of the Government, my hon. friend has been justified on this present occasion. Now, Sir, I have said before, and I repeat, that until these discussions commenced, very few people in Canada—I suppose but few in this House, I know but few in the country—ever comprehended the extreme peril into which, by the evidence of their own commissioner, the conduct of the Government in 1886 had dragged the people of Canada in 1887. Sir, the Opposition may have been to blame; they may have done wrong; but if there is anything that the Opposition in this House are to blame for, if there is anything we have to reproach ourselves with, it is not that we have spoken out now, but that we have been reticent so long when we saw how these hon. gentlemen were abusing their trust. Sir, we had an excuse. So long as those negotiations were pending, so long as there was a reasonable chance that the Government would be able to bring them to a profitable conclusion, so long I think there was an excuse for the Opposition remaining silent; but it is only too clear, not from the words so much as from the acts of the Government, that from the moment at any rate that Sir Charles Tupper turned his back upon them, they have become utterly oblivious of the possible consequences of the events of 1886 and 1887. Seeing that the Government of Canada were entering on a dangerous policy which had already placed the country on the brink of a commercial war, we asked them if they intended to revert to the modus vivendi. If they did not mean to do so, then all we can say is that their conduct in refusing to say so is quite inexplicable. Now, three things, it appears to me, are perfectly clear from the facts disclosed by Sir Charles Tupper in the speech to which I have referred. One of those I have repeated—and it cannot be repeated too often—is that the Government in 1886, by their very strict interpretation of an old and all but obsolete convention, without bearing in mind the changes that have taken place in the circumstances of the country since, had brought us into a very perilous predicament; it is equally clear that in 1847 we escaped from the peril by the skin of our teeth, almost from a mere accident, what the hon. Minister of Justice says to the contrary notwithstanding; and I take issue with him entirely as to the manner in which he spoke of the intervention of Mr. Erastus Wiman. I know perhaps not all that the Minister knows, but I know a good deal of what took place on that occasion, and I say that Mr. Erastus Wiman rendered an important service to Canada, and that the hon. gentleman has no right to attempt to underrate or belittle the services that gentleman rendered, or the language that was used by Sir Charles Tupper in recognition of them; and I am very sure that if Sir Charles Tupper were on the floor of this House to-day, he would not endorse the statement just made by the hon. Minister of Justice. I should like to know if the hon. gentleman will say, if they are at liberty to say it, that they have no unofficial communication with Mr. Erastus Wiman at this hour.

Mr. MITCHELL. They are not bound to criminate themselves.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps not; and as this matter is being discussed on strictly legal and technical grounds I will not press that question. Now I say, knowing these things, knowing the relations in which we stood, knowing the narrow escape we had, seeing, as we do, that the Government appear to have forgotten the lessons which were taught them, seeing that they do not appear (although I am willing to hope that they are coming to a better mood under pressure) at any rate until very recently, to have at all appreciated the danger they escaped, it would be an act of criminal folly on our part if we were to allow this Session to pass without putting ourselves, at any rate, right before the country, and pointing out the proper policy which, in the interest of Canada, should be pursued. I desire to say for my own part that although I have not pretended to any technical or minute acquaintance with the subject of the fisheries, which I had very limited opportunity of mastering in detail, I say that I myself hold the wisdom of the former course taken by the Government to be most dubious. Probably enough they were legally and technically correct; I do not dispute that, but what I do say is that, on the other hand, the Americans were perfectly right in pointing out that the whole conditions were changed. You cannot ignore this. If we touched the American frontier only at the one point where our fisheries exist, if we had nothing to say to them in other matters, we might then consider this question wholly apart, we might put entirely out of view all the communications which the Americans have granted us across our frontier, through their territory, in a great variety of ways. But I say we cannot do that, and so the whole position has to be dealt with. We must face the question that we are concerned with the Americans in five hundred different ways besides the mere question of the fisheries. I am not going to follow the hon. gentleman into the question as to how far it may or may not be consistent with the preservation of our treaties to accord to Americans the right to transshipment in bond or the right to purchase bait or allow them certain privileges as to entrance to our harbors. If I understood the hon. gentleman's position it amounted to this: that it was almost impossible to grant the Americans the privileges they desire without great peril to our inshore fisheries; but I find that, in the treaty of 1888, we have agreed to concede to the Americans for a comparatively small sum of money those identical privileges, if they chose to take out a license under the modus vivendi, which in the despatches he alleges with considerable show of reason, perhaps, could not be granted without great peril to the preservation of our fisheries. That I understood to be the hon. gentleman's position, that I understand to be the result of the treaty. If I am mistaken in this, I would be glad to be corrected. That I understood the hon. gentleman to have repeated before and to have repeated to-night. Now, we are all prepared to protect our territorial limits to the best of our ability; we are all prepared to protect our inshore fisheries within those limits that properly belong to us. In all other respects, looking at the whole situation, bearing in mind the peril which has been incurred by the policy which the hon. gentleman has persisted in carrying out; looking at the enormous importance of the interests which have sprung up between Canada and the United States, especially within the last twenty or thirty years; looking at the use we make of their soil and territories and the privilege of transshipping—taking these into consideration, we say the time has come for a broad and liberal policy in every respect in dealing with the United States. But if we choose to stand on our strict legal rights, how are we or the British Government either to blame the United States if they elect to stand on their extreme legal rights, with great injury to both. There is not the slightest doubt, if the United States chose to put in force their Non-Intercourse Bill, they will injure as many Americans as Canadians, but that would not make our position anything better but rather much the worse. If hon. gentlemen do not do that, what we have to look forward to is this: we will have a repetition of the sorry farce which was played out in 1887. First, we will see a policy (or at least there was great danger of seeing a policy pursued) which will lead to much ill-blood between ourselves and the United States. Then things would have grown serious, then there would have been danger of collision, then England would have stepped in as she did before, and some English commissioner, or another Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, would have been sent to take the Canadian Minister by the ear and administer a double dose of humble pie. Canada would have been degraded and humiliated. We would have been forced in the long run to make all the concessions which we now propose to make freely and voluntarily, with this result; that we would get no thanks at all. Such is the certain issue, and no one knows it better than the right hon. gentleman, because it is a game that hon. gentleman has played before to his own profit, though not the profit of the people of Canada. Yet knowing that, the hon. gentleman will persist in playing this dangerous game. It seems to be absurd for the hon. gentleman and his friends to talk as if they really and sincerely desired to aid in cultivating friendly relations with the people of the United States. They must be judged by their acts. Was it to show their extreme friendliness to the people of the United States that, a year ago, they attempted to repudiate their own statutory offer to admit certain articles free if the United States did the same? Was it to give the United States a better opinion of the good faith and honor of Canada that, after Sir Charles Tupper had practically taken his colleagues by the throat and compelled them to undo their own work and eat their own words on the floor of this House—was it for the purpose of inspiring the Americans with a high idea of the honor and faith of the Government of Canada, that the Minister of Customs, backed by the Government, resorted to that most petty and contemptible evasion of the plain terms of the meaning of the statutory Act, when he imposed, not a duty on the fruit, but a duty on the packages in which the fruit was conveyed. What am I to say of the desire to promote good relations which lead to the insane folly of hon. gentlemen opposite in the matter of the export duty on logs? But the other day, as if of express purpose to challenge the ill-will of the United States, they increased the duty on saw logs, running the risk of disturbing a trade that is counted by tens of millions. They know they will have to abandon this absurd impost; and I venture again to say that long before this House rises, we will find that what they did then they will be glad to undo and revoke. I am not going to pursue that question. It would be worth pursuing, but at this late hour I must refrain, tempting as the subject is because it shows the utter carelessness, recklessness and imbecility with which the affairs of the country are administered, the utter folly with which the Government acts on questions of trade of the greatest possible moment. Here is a trade of ten million dollars absolutely put in peril for the sake of an export duty of ten thousand dollars additional, and that when the Government must have known that at the very moment they were raising this export duty, we were importing free from the United States probably six or seven times as many saw logs as we were sending to them. The object of the hon. gentleman, I am afraid, was only too apparent to those who choose to read between the lines and to look below the surface. Those hon. gentlemen when they commit those acts, when they challenge the United States—because these acts of theirs were a direct challenge to the United States to adopt retaliatory measures, a challenge which we have seen the Congress and people of the United States no way slow to accept—when they committed those acts, their object was altogether too apparent. They dreaded the rising tide of public opinion in favor of freer commercial relations with the people of the United States. They thought that we on this side might make political gain of it. They knew that if our contention was successful, it would interfere a great deal with certain interests from which they draw much comfort and assistance from time to time. They do not dare to say they dread reciprocity in open terms. They cannot say that, because they carried the elections in which the Mackenzie Government were defeated, to an enormous extent, and especially in the Maritime Provinces, by deluding the people into believing that, by imposing enormous duties on the goods which they imported, they would, in all probability, obtain reciprocity with the United States.

Mr. KIRK. And they were not to raise the duties.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes; as my hon friend reminds me, they were not to raise the tariff, but only to readjust it. I believe, however, that there is a change coming rapidly over the spirit of their dream. I think they are gradually awakening to the fact that, by these unfriendly acts—and they were most unfriendly acts towards the people of the United States—they are provoking a feeling which is not encouraging for the policy they have professed to pursue. Up to a recent time, it appeared to be their policy to provoke and chafe the people of the United States, and then turn around and say to us: the United States are hostile to you, they are going to put duties on your products and there is no chance of our making reciprocal trade relations with them. This day's work shows that the United States—to their credit and honor be it said—are not actuated by hostile feelings to the people of Canada. They have extended an olive branch to us; and, if hon. gentlemen opposite are wise, if they can rise for once to the level of the post they fill, they will even at this twelfth hour endeavor for their own sakes, if not for the sake of the country, to obtain some reasonable proposition from the United States, and to make reasonable propositions to them, by which in time, if not forthwith, the structure of fairer and fuller commercial relations between the two countries may be built up. I have said that the policy pursued up to this time was one which called in the highest degree for censure at the hands of the Opposition, and of the people of Canada. That policy contained a double fraud. These hon. gentlemen thought they were perfectly safe in vamping and blustering—I mean particularly in talking as they did about having the whole army and navy of England at their back. I tell those hon. gentlemen that neither the army nor the navy of England will ever be used for the purpose of allowing us to embroil them with the United States, and well they know it. They talk about this matter, they vapor and they bluster, and, when serious peril is incurred, they back down as they have done before, and then they tell the people: We stood up for your rights until greater interests came into question, and we could not interpose against the interests of the Empire. At the same time, they will say to England: We have sacrificed the rights of Canada for the sake of the Empire, and we hope you will consider it, and give us your consideration. Being traitors both to Canada and to the Empire, they will probably, like some other traitors, succeed in obtaining rewards from both. But to Canada this means injury and degradation; it means that the United States will be more or less irritated; that, in the long run, we will have to make concessions and will receive no thanks for them, because concessions which are forced out of us, and are known to be forced out of us by the orders of the Imperial Government, will never conciliate the United States. That is not the way in which the United States ought to be approached. Our position is difficult enough. I admit that it must be always, in the nature of the case, a position requiring great caution when a small country of four or five millions of people has to deal with one of the greatest nations in the world. I agree with some things which have been stated on the other side of the House. I agree that it is eminently in the interests of Canada that our policy should be firm, dignified and prudent in dealing with the United States; but where I take issue with the hon. gentlemen opposite is that their policy is neither firm, prudent nor dignified; that what they do in one day they are in haste to reverse the next, that they are consistent only in one thing, which is to inspire the United States with a feeling of contempt for the conduct of the Canadian Government. Now, if these hon. gentlemen were prepared, having counted the cost, to stand firm to any policy they had adopted, although I might think rather lightly of their discretion, I would admire their valor in thinking that they were able to contend with a power like that to the south of us. I agree, however, with the Minister of Finance, who stated that we could not single-handed contend with the United States; and, under those circumstances, it is of no service to us to advance pretensions which the Government know at a later date, and probably at a shortly later date, they will be compelled to abandon. No greater calamity could befall the people of this country than for the United States to be hostile to us; and, if the policy of this Government has made them so hostile, this Government would have committed as great a treason as they well could against the welfare and good government of Canada. In any case, it is not the part of brave men, when confronted with such a situation, to indulge in bluster or to talk about the army and the navy we would have at our back. We might have to face such a contingency, and, if we had to do so, the situation should be faced manfully, but with a full knowledge of the gravity of the situation. This is a matter in which petty provocations and small annoyances on the part of the Government are calculated to do enormous injury to this country, and also to the friendly relations which should exist between the people of Great Britain and the people of the United States. We have to study not only to be right but to appear to be right, and to show that we desire to be good neighbors to the people of the United States and to cultivate good relations with them. In that way only could the people of Canada truly serve the Empire of which we form a part. That is of all things the greatest service we can render to the British Empire, and it is clear, if we are going to do that, that it is advisable for us, in the words of this resolution, under existing circumstances, to remove any causes of irritation, especially when there is a new Government coming into power in the United States. I thoroughly and cordially endorse the proposition of my hon. friend that, without delay and without being forced into doing what we will be ultimately forced into, we should freely offer the Americans the continuation of the modus vivendi, which allows their fishermen, for a reasonable compensation, all these privileges that have been in dispute between us so long, and which is now clear, from the actions of the hon. gentlemen themselves, from the very terms of the treaty, can be safely given without any danger of seriously injuring our inshore fisheries, or of seriously incommoding our fishermen.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT,

House divided on amendment (Mr. Laurier).

Amendment negatived, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

To pay pension to Lady Cartier. .... $1,200

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose the Finance Minister intends still to deliver the Budget Speech on Tuesday.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1:15 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 4th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the absence of the First Minister, I will move the resolution of which he has given notice :

That Government business shall have precedence every Thursday, on and after Thursday, 7th March next, during the present Session, after Questions put by Members.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes; there is no objection to that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before that is adopted, I may say that it seems that the Government are always very anxious to get as many days in the week as they can, for public business. But how do we stand in regard to private business? There are six pages of private business standing on the Order Paper, and we know that three-fourths of that will not be reached this Session, if it should last six weeks yet. Now, I think the Government are a little premature in wanting to take away one of the days belonging to private members. We shall only have Monday—practically the business of this House in the hands of private members is confined to Monday. On Monday, we find that the private Bills come in before the motions, so we have only about three or four hours out of the week for the business of private members. Now, I want to say to my hon. friend that this kind of thing is going to interfere with the private business of the country. We ought to have an opportunity of having our private business and private questions put before this House. Now, Sir, I wish to say that the only way that some of us can get justice done to our constituents is to take extraordinary means to accomplish it. I have had for the last three years notices on the paper for claims for damages for lands for railways that have been taken from my constituents, of which I can get no fair and reasonable adjustment. We are told, as I have been told for the last three years: "Wait till we get over the Session and we will give directions to have it done;" and although I waited three years, these promises have not yet been fulfilled. My duty to my constituents requires me to oppose this motion or else indicate to my hon. friends the course I mean to take. If they persist in this course, I shall feel it to be my duty, every time they move to go into Committee of Supply, to take up one of the notices that I have given relating to the private grievances of my constituents, and to move an amendment before going into Supply. I think the Government had better leave a little more time for private members to get through their private business, rather than have motions made on going into Committee of Supply which may take up three, or four, or five hours in discussion. Sir, I recollect a case, some years ago, when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was at the head of the Government, when I thought that one of my constituents, a poor, unfortunate widow woman, was not treated rightly in a matter involving an amount of about $40. Sir, I could not get the Government to act, and I took the only means open to me, which was to move an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply. I did that night after night for some three or four weeks; I felt it my duty, at the expense of the delay to public business, to do this, and it was only after some three or four weeks that my hon. friend saw the policy of at once meeting the case and dealing with it, and settling it. I want to say to my hon. friends on the other side of the House, that, if they do not want another delay like this in carrying on the business of the country, they had better refrain from taking away the reasonable time which belongs to private members, at so early a period in the Session. But if they wish to avoid this, let them say at once to those private members who have business of that kind: Come over to our departments and let us go into the matter quietly and coolly between ourselves to see whether we cannot settle these claims—because I am bound to have these claims settled, I do not care what it costs, nor what time it occupies. I merely warn hon. gentlemen that if they insist in taking this day, I shall at every opportunity move one of the motions of which I have given notice, with a view of seeing if I cannot get justice done to the people I represent.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will say to my hon. friend that the motion that has just been made will not prevent hon. members taking up private matters as usual. Thursday will be for public Bills, and all these notices of motions and private matters will be dealt with on Mondays and Wednesdays as usual; therefore I think that the object of my hon. friend will not stand. About the claims he speaks of, I hope that when he brings them to the notice of the Government, as he suggests, some means will be devised by which they can be set right so that justice may be done, and that my hon. friend will be satisfied with the decisions that will be come to. Therefore I hope that my hon. friend will not object to the motion.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will just put my hon. friend right on one point. He says we will have Mondays and Wednesdays to bring these for private members' business. This is a private day, and we have five pages of notices of motion on the paper, of grievances, real or supposed, and we cannot reach one of these to-day. I would remark to my right hon. friend, who has come in since I spoke first, that we have only until six o'clock to-night. Private Bills are first taken up, and then questions put by members, of which there are two pages, and we will not get through with these before six o'clock. There is a ball going on at a very distinguished portion of this city to-night, and I should not be at all surprised if my hon. friends opposite desired to go to this ball and asked us for an adjournment, and so our whole day is taken away and we cannot reach one of these private motions until Wednesday; and no man knows better than the hon. Minister of Public Works that we have no chance whatever of reaching the notices of motions on that day. Are we to be deprived of every opportunity of placing private grievances before this House for consideration and adjustment, by the taking away of the Thursday from us? It is unreasonable. The first Wednesday is a holiday, and, I believe, they expect to get through by Easter. I want the Government to tell us whether they are disposed to deal with these private grievances? I have had for three years some of these cases before this House, and have been told, time and again, that they will be dealt with before the close of the Session, or immediately after, but the Session passes over, and I have never been able to get these claims settled. Now, if the Government will say to private members—I am speaking for myself alone—if the Minister will say to me: Come to my office and talk the matter over quietly for the purpose of settlement, then I shall have nothing more to say about it, and, for the present, I will withdraw my objections to the motion. The right hon. gentleman was kind enough the other day to send me candies across the House. I was very much obliged to him, and accepted them as an indication that the olive branch was extended to me; and, although we have not been as cordial for the last year or two as we ought to have been as public men, I may say that if he is prepared to say to me, as the acting Minister of Railways did, that he would talk the matter over privately with me, I will be willing to withdraw my objection to this motion; but if he does not, I can assure him that every time the Government move to go into Committee of Supply I shall move an amendment for the purpose of having a discussion on my grievances, as it appears that is the only way I can get justice done to my constituents.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We'll, I am like Davy Crockett's coon—I must come down. I will be very glad to sit down with the hon. gentleman if my colleague, the Minister of Railways, is not able to meet him himself, and to go over these matters with him, and to discuss them; and I shall always have a sufficient assortment of candies for the use of my hon. friend.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would the hon. gentleman kindly name the day when he will do that?—because that is very indefinite; I would like to have something specific.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I won't say "to-morrow."
Motion agreed to.

WINDING-UP ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 98) to amend the Winding-up Act, chapter 129 of the Revised Statutes. He said: The intention of this Bill is to make provision for winding-up companies incorporated by this Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 32) to incorporate the Victoria, Saanich and New Westminster Railway Company.—(Mr. Prior.)

MONTREAL AND OTTAWA BOOM COMPANY'S BILL.

Order for second reading of Bill (No. 23) to incorporate the Montreal and Ottawa Boom Company (Mr. Girouard), read.

Mr. GIROUARD. This Bill was introduced by Mr. Perley, one of the members for Ottawa. After the first reading, I agreed to take charge of it, on condition that it would be modified so as to meet some of the serious objections I had against the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. That you had against the Bill?

Mr. GIROUARD. That I had against the Bill as introduced.

Mr. MITCHELL. A lot of us had objections to it.

Mr. GIROUARD. I will tell the hon. gentleman and the House a little later what my objections were. I had an interview with the promoters of the Bill, and I found that it did not state fairly the object they had in view. The Bill asked that the promoters should have power to build wharves, piers, slides, dams, booms, or other improvements over any part of the River Ottawa from the Chaudière Falls at Ottawa, to the north westerly end of the Island of Montreal, and either on one or both of the channels to the north-west of the said Island and on the shores adjoining the said extent of said river. The promoters, who are owners of sawmills in Ottawa, Hull and elsewhere in the country, contemplated removing to, or at least building mills on the northern portion of the Island of Montreal in my county. They point out many advantages that would be obtained by so doing. In the first place, they say that by building over a large extent of territory, which they find north of that Island, they would be able to reduce very materially the rate of insurance which they are paying in Ottawa and Hull, where there is a little space for mills. In the second place, they say they would be able to use the sawdust in supplying their furnaces, as they intend to run their machinery by steam instead of water power, and they would at once get rid of a nuisance that is very seriously felt in the district of Ottawa and elsewhere. In the third place, they say they would almost be able to pay the wages of their men from the sale of edgings and scraps in the city of Montreal. Finally, they point out a great many other advantages that would arise from building mills near a great commercial centre and seaport like Montreal. The cost of transportation of lumber in logs being about four-fifths less than under the present mode; manufactured lumber would be made cheaper in Montreal. I need not say that if such a scheme were realised, it would be of great advantage, not only to my constituency, but also to the Island of Montreal generally, and to the whole trade of Canada. For the purpose of establishing that industry, the promoters want booming powers, not from Ottawa to Montreal as is mentioned in the Bill, and which is the very serious objection to it and to which I cannot give my consent personally—they do not ask, I say, to boom the river from Ottawa to Montreal, but, as I ascertained in the interview with the promoters, they want simply to boom the foot of the Carillon Rapids, so as to be able to catch loose logs that come down. The promoters will take those logs, tied together, above and below those rapids to the channel north of the Island of Montreal, where they want to build another boom. These are the only two points where they wish to have power to construct booms. Of course, in so booming the river, the promoters desire to give compensation to all riparian proprietors and all persons who may suffer either at the time of the construction of the boom or at any time subsequently. The promoters propose that the plans, according to which the booms will be constructed, shall be laid before the House; and not only so, but that those booms shall remain under the absolute control of the Government, and be open to the public, and be constructed at the cost of the promoters. Another condition in regard to the construction of the booms, which they are willing to insert, is that the boom shall not in any way whatever obstruct the navigation of the river, either at the Carillon Canal, or at any other place. It is not surprising, considering that the Bill does not set forth exactly the true purpose and object the promoters had in view, and considering the very extensive powers asked by this Bill, that a serious agitation should have taken place in the country along the Ottawa River, and among the forwarders, and even in the board of trade of Montreal, which looked with alarm at the booming of the whole river from Ottawa to Montreal. The Bill was not framed by me, and was not introduced by me. I objected to it from the beginning, but I consented to take charge of it in the House, on the condition that, after receiving the second reading, it should be modified in the Committee of Railways and Canals, to which I intended to move its reference. But, considering the strong feeling which has been shown in the House against the Bill by the number of petitions presented against it, I fear this course cannot succeed; and for these reasons, with notice to the House and the country that the Bill will be presented another Session with the necessary modifications, in order that its true nature and purpose shall not be misunderstood, I move for leave to withdraw the Bill, and that the Order be discharged.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has adopted the course he has just taken with respect to this Bill, a Bill more detrimental to the prosperity of the country and to the interests of free navigation, I can scarcely imagine it is possible to introduce, for this Bill asks for the promoters power to practically boom the river from the Chaudière Falls to the Island of Montreal. I hope we are not so dead to the interests of justice that we will give away these rights over the largest tributary of the St. Lawrence, as this Bill contemplates. It is amazing to me that a Bill of that kind should be presented to this House, and that we should be expected to sanction and confirm it. Sir, I am glad the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) has withdrawn his Bill, but I am sorry that he indicates that he will bring it up again next year. Let me make a few suggestions to my hon. friend. There is no one here who desires to prevent any one to have every proper facility to carry on manufacturing industries, and particularly that one of our principal industries, the manufacture of saw-logs. If they want to move their mills from further up the Ottawa River to the back of the Island of Montreal, in order to obtain the advantages that my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) points out, it is a very proper thing for them to do, but they can do that without any Bill of this kind whatever. They can obtain the right from private individuals to put up their mills, and they can get from the Government permission to extend their booms for commercial purposes without any such Bill as this, which would give the monopoly of the whole river. There is no reason why they should put up a boom below the Carillon Falls to interfere with the navigation, not alone of steamboats, but of the barges which float the lumber from here to New York. What the gentlemen connected with this company should do is to make up their minds what property they require, and then go to the owners of that property and make a private arrangement for the purchase of it if they can; but they do not require to come to this House to ask us to give them the entire control over that great tributary of the St. Lawrence system. It is an outrage that such an application should be made, and I am glad that my hon. friend sees the folly of it. Since he has now withdrawn the Bill, I hope he will not bring it up again next Session.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I am glad that my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) has withdrawn this Bill, but I regret that he announces his intention of bringing it up again, for it is certainly one of the most outrageous pieces of legislation I ever heard of. This Bill proposes to give to a private company the possession of the River Ottawa between Ottawa and Montreal; and not only will it give them power to take possession of the river, but also possession of the properties alongside of the river. I am still more surprised to see this Bill supported by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), because he is in a better position to know the objections to this Bill than any other member in this House. He does not forget—for it is not very long since he obtained a judgment in damages—and I think a very good judgment it was—against an owner who moored a raft for a few weeks in front of the property of my hon. friend. If this Bill passed, every property owner on the Ottawa River might be deprived of the view of the river from his residence, and of all the advantages of living alongside of this beautiful stream, and he could get no compensation, because this company would say that they were empowered by the Ottawa Government to build booms, or wharves, or anything they pleased along the river. There are a great number of very fine country residences, belonging to parties in Montreal, on the Ottawa River, and immense booms might be stretched in front of those fine properties, so as to render them perfectly worthless. My hon. friend, who obtained damages from the owner of the raft, knows this very well too. I do not remember the name of the person against whom he obtained the damages, but the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) will remember that it was proved, that the simple fact of such a raft being moored in front of a country residence depreciated the value of the property. Raftsmen may be very good in their own rank, but they are not a very particular class of people; and it was proved in the case of my hon. friend, who obtained damages from the owner of the raft, that they were not desirable neighbors, and that they rendered his property almost uninhabitable. Every property on the Ottawa River would be placed in the same position if this Bill passed, and the owners would have no remedy in law. I hope my hon. friend, when he reflects on the consequences of the passage of such a Bill as this, will give up the idea of bringing it up again next Session.

Mr. GIROUARD. I am sorry that my two hon. friends do not seem to understand me in the explanation which I gave to the House. I object to this Bill myself, because the purpose of it is to get possession of the whole river.

Mr. MITCHELL. Hear, hear.

Mr. GIROUARD. I say that in the most explicit terms. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Langelier) that there is great objection in having a raft moored in front of any property. It is against the law at the present time; and I would never consent to have it changed without providing full compensation. I would point out that there is a clause in this Bill whereby, if anyone should suffer damages because of the construction of a boom, or anything connected with it, in front of his property, he can receive full compensation. It is a very different thing in the case of the raft referred to by my hon. friend, because the owner of that raft wished to moor it there the whole summer without paying anything

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Where is the clause for compensation in the Bill?

Mr. GIROUARD. There is a clause providing for compensation, and the promoters of this Bill intended to pay compensation for any property they might injure or take possession of. There is a provision, just at the end of section three, which says: "that they will pay compensation to any individual injured thereby." The promoters of this Bill intend to pay compensation in front of any property where they will have their boom. They intend inserting in the next Bill a clause to arrange compensation by private agreement with the proprietors, so that nobody will have cause to complain. I am surprised that my hon. friend did not understand my opening remarks. I said that the reason why I objected to this Bill was because it gave the company control of the river between Ottawa and Montreal, and I object to that. They want to have the right to boom at the foot of the Carillon Rapids, but in such a way as not to interfere with navigation. I believe that this boom can be erected without any interference with navigation, but if that cannot be done, the Bill will not have my support.

Mr. MITCHELL. Hear, hear.

Mr. GIROUARD. I intend to introduce the Bill in a different form next Session.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, we will see what the Bill looks like then.

Mr. GIROUARD. Very well.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I told my hon. friend who has this Bill in charge, that it was out of the question to have it passed in this House, because it interfered, not only with private property, but with public works of great magnitude which had cost a great sum of money to the country, and that we could not allow the company to interfere with the navigation of that river. My hon. friend speaks of the compensation that the company would have to pay to private individuals, but I suppose that we should not give such powers to a private company except for very strong reasons, and because the granting of such powers would be in the public interest. The powers now asked for are purely and simply in the interests of a private company, and we should certainly respect the rights of riparian proprietors as much as we should respect the rights of a private company. If this Bill were for the public good, generally, it would be all right. Of course private rights must give way before the public good, with proper compensation; but if it is only to substitute one private interest for another I don't think it is a measure that we should support. I stated to my hon. friend, also, that I had very great doubts that the Bill could be gone on with in the modified shape in which it was intended to bring it before the committee; and I tell him now, so that the parties who wish to have this power may know, that unless they give good proof that the rights they are asking will not interfere with navigation or with the public works on the river, or with private rights to any considerable extent, he cannot expect the Bill, at all events, to have my support.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am very much pleased to hear the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, because I think this is one of the most important matters we possibly could have to deal with—the right of navigation of one of our principal rivers. I only regret that the hon. Minister did not take an earlier opportunity to express the views of the Government on this Bill, instead of waiting until an opposition had been created on this side of the House against it. But I am glad to see that they have awakened to the public interest, and will not allow the navigation of the Ottawa River to be obstructed in the interest of private individuals.

Bill withdrawn.

SULTANA ISLAND, LAKE OF THE WOODS.

Mr. BARRON (for Mr. WILSON, Elgin) asked, Has the Government of Canada sold Sultana Island, in the Lake of the Woods? If so, by what right or authority did the Government exercise the power of selling? To whom was the sale made? When was it made, and for what price?

Mr. DEWDNEY. A sale was made of a portion of Sultana Island, in the Lake of the Woods, containing 27·07 acres, at the rate of $5 per acre, to Henry Bulmer, jr., Jacob Hendricks Henesy, Charles Alexander Moore, and Simmons Stuart Scoville. The sale was made under surrender dated the 8th of October, 1886, duly obtained from the Indians in accordance with the provisions of the Indian Act, the Island being a part of Reserve 38 B, which was set apart for the Indians under Treaty 3, made with them in 1873.

THE ALASKA BOUNDARY LINE.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Has the Government entered into any arrangement with the Government of the United States regarding the defining of the boundary line between the Territories of the Dominion of Canada and the Territory of Alaska? If such arrangement has been entered into, when and in what manner is the survey to be proceeded with? If such arrangement has not been entered into between the two Governments, are negotiations in progress looking to arrangements for the survey of the boundary line referred to?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Negotiations are in progress looking to an arrangement for the survey of the boundary line referred to, between Her Majesty's Government and the United States Government.

TÊTE DU PONT BARRACKS, KINGSTON.

Mr. INNES (for Mr. PLATT) asked, Has the Government sold, leased, rented or otherwise disposed of, Tête du Pont barracks, Kingston, Ontario? Is it the intention of the Government to sell, lease, rent or otherwise dispose of said barracks during the present year? What use is made of said property at present?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Government has neither sold, leased, rented, nor otherwise disposed of Tête du Pont barracks in Kingston, Ontario. It is not the intention of the Government to sell, lease, rent or otherwise dispose of said barracks during the present year. This property is at present occupied by Battery "B" of Canadian Artillery.

CORRUPT PRACTICES TRIALS AT PICTON.

Mr. INNES (for Mr. PLATT) asked, Did the Minister of Justice, or any other person as Attorney General of Canada, appoint or instruct counsel to assist the local authorities in the Corrupt Practices trials held at Picton on the 6th day of January, 1888? At whose suggestion, or upon whose recommendation was such counsel appointed? Who was the person so appointed, and what fee did he receive for his services?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Counsel was so employed by the acting Minister of Justice, as required by section 73 of chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes, on the report of the judge, under section 71 of that Act, and at the suggestion also of the county crown attorney of the county of Prince Edward, Mr. Lowe, Q.C. Mr. Wallace Nesbitt was so appointed, and received $100 for his services.

THE DREDGE CAPE BRETON.

Mr. CAMERON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to provide for the loss of clothing, &c., sustained by the captain and laborers employed on the dredge Cape Breton, which was lost in the Straits of Northumberland during a gale in the fall of 1887?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the intention of the Government.

CUSTOM HOUSE OFFICER AT WEST BAY, N.S.

Mr. CAMERON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish a custom house officer at West Bay, county of Inverness, Nova Scotia, this year?

Mr. BOWELL. The Government will establish a custom house officer at West Bay, as soon as they are convinced that the requirements of the revenue call for that step.

CAUGHNAWAGA INDIANS.

Mr. DOYON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to allow the Indians of Caughnawaga, in the county of Laprairie, to hold an election of councillors, or an election of chiefs, in accordance with the provisions of the Indian Advancement Act; if so, when do they propose to grant them permission to do so?

Mr. DEWDNEY. A recommendation has been made to the Governor General in Council, that the Indian Advancement Act be applied to the above band of Indians, and that an election of councillors under the provisions of that Act be held on the 26th March next.

PROTECTION FOR LAPRAIRIE VILLAGE.

Mr. DOYON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates a sufficient sum to complete the works, already begun, to protect the village of Laprairie from the danger of being damaged by ice and inundation; if so, what sum does the Government propose to devote to this purpose?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, it is not possible to make known at present the intention of the Government on this subject. The hon. member will have to wait until the Supplementary Estimates are laid before the House.

CHARLES SAVARY.

Mr. EDGAR (for Mr. LISTER) asked, Is there employed in any of the departments of the Government, a person by the name of Charles Savary? If so, what is the date of his appointment, what is his salary, and what are his duties?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; he has been employed in the Department of the Secretary of State since the 24th or 25th of last month. He is to be employed two months. His salary is $2 a day. He is connected with the correspondence branch.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES, LAKE ST. JOHN.

Mr. COUTURE asked, Did the Government receive a deputation from Lake St. John, asking for railway subsidies? If so, by whom was the deputation presented to the Ministers? What was the answer of the latter?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may say that I, on behalf of the Government, received a deputation from Lake St. John asking for railway subsidies. The deputation was presented to the hon. the Minister of Militia, and the answer was that their representation should be taken into consideration.

Mr. COUTURE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to insert in the Supplementary Estimates, a sum of money to assist in the construction of the branch of the Lake St. John Railway from Chambord to Chicoutimi and St. Alphonse, a distance of sixty-seven miles? If not, why not?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The intention of the Government will be shown when the Supplementary Estimates are brought down.

CHICOUTIMI AND SAGUENAY COUNTIES.

Mr. COUTURE asked, What amount has been voted for expenditure in the counties of Chicoutimi and Saguenay since January, 1887? 2. What portion of that amount has been expended? For what purposes? 3. Has J. A. Gagné had the patronage of the county of Chicoutimi? If so, why?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In answer to the hon. member, I may say that the amount of the subsidy was $7,750. The amount spent was as follows: for the construction of a jetty, $2,863; for repairs, $4,394.37, making a total of $7,215. The patronage of the county belongs to the Government, and has been exercised by the Government, who are responsible for all the appointments that have been made.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, What have been the total receipts and expenditure of the Intercolonial Railway, year by year, since it was first put in operation, and up to this date?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is rather an extensive question to be answered. If the hon. gentleman would make it a motion, the papers would be brought down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the hon. gentleman the information from the 1st of July to date?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have not.

LA CLOCHE ISLAND.

Mr. FISHER asked, 1. Has the Government of Canada sold Cloche or La Cloche Island, in Georgian Bay, north of Manitoulin, to any one? 2. If so, to whom? 3. At what date was it sold? 4. For how much was it sold? 5. Under what authority or by what title did the Government of Canada claim to have power to sell the island? 6. What was the extent of area and timber on said island?

Mr. DEWDNEY. La Cloche Island, in Lake Huron was sold to S. W. Bouchner, on 7th July, 1881, for $2,500. The department sold the island for the benefit of the Indians under the authority of the Manitoulin Treaty of 1862, as being an island adjacent to the great Manitoulin Island. The island is estimated to contain 6,000 acres. There was no estimate at the time of sale of the quantity of timber thereon, but the agent of the department at Manitowaning recommended the sale of the land and timber at the above sum, but at the same time reported that the soil on the island was for the most part worthless.

PRINTING BUREAU.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, 1. What sum has been expended for plant and other purposes for the Printing Bureau, from 1st July, 1888, to 1st February, 1889? 2. What total sum has been expended on account of building for said Printing Bureau to 1st February, 1889?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. On the plant the amount expended is $82,452.89 to which $531.60 are to be added for the organisation, making a total of $82,984.49. The cost of the building up to the 1st of February, 1889, is $129,146.01.

EXPERIMENTAL FARM.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What amount has been expended on the Experimental Farm at Ottawa, from the 1st July, 1888, to the 1st February, 1889?

Mr. CARLING. I must ask my hon. friend to let this question stand, as the information has to be obtained from two departments. I will be able to bring it down some time during the week.

INTERCOLONIAL DINING ROOMS.

Mr. GUAY asked, 1. Whether the persons who keep the dining rooms at the stations of Lévis, Trois Pistoles, Campbellton and Moncton, on the Intercolonial Railway, have secured that privilege under tenders called for by the Government; if so, when did the Government call for tenders, and in what newspapers were such calls published? 2. If the said privilege was not awarded under tenders, what amount do the parties keeping the said dining rooms pay yearly to the Government?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The persons who keep the dining rooms at the stations mentioned did not procure the privilege by tenders. The Government did not call for tenders, and the parties do not pay anything to the Government.

EXPORTS VIA UNITED STATES.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) asked, Whether, in making up the quantity of goods exported from Canada to Great
Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Britain, articles passing through United States territory, in bond, for shipment to Great Britain, are included?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

JOSIAH ROSS—CUSTOMS SEIZURE.

Mr. COLTER asked, 1. Whether any seizure has been made, by authority of the Customs Department, upon the property of one Josiah Ross, at the village of Fort Erie, in the county of Welland? 2. The alleged offence of said Josiah Ross? 3. The terms on which it has been proposed to release the goods of said Josiah Ross from said seizure by the Customs Department, or any employé thereof at the village of Fort Erie, or in the vicinity thereof?

Mr. BOWELL. A seizure has been made on the property of one Josiah Ross, of the village of Fort Erie, in the county of Welland, not, however, by the authority of the Customs Department, but under the provisions of the law which give customs officers power to make seizures. The Customs Department had no knowledge of the seizure until it was made, and the fact reported to Ottawa. The alleged offence of the said Josiah Ross is that of smuggling and under-valuation. No terms have been proposed to release the goods of the said Josiah Ross from seizure by the Customs Department, nor by any employé thereof at the village of Fort Erie or in the vicinity thereof, to the knowledge of the department, nor can or will any terms be proposed until Mr. Inspector Newburn, who has been instructed to make an investigation, reports fully the facts connected with the said seizure.

SIX NATION INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. COLTER asked, Whether it is the intention of the Dominion Government to take immediate steps for the sale of Indian lands, surrendered for sale by the Six Nation Indians in the village of Caledonia, in the county of Haldimand, and what is the total acreage of said Indian lands?

Mr. DEWDNEY. A number of lots have been sold in the town plot of Caledonia, and steps have been taken by the department to ascertain the names of the squatters on the unsold lands in the town plot, the value and extent of their improvements, and also the value of the lots distinct from the improvements, with a view to the same, and any other lots that are disposable, being sold at an early date. The total area of the lots in the town-plot of Caledonia is 460 acres.

YORK-SIMCOE BATTALION KIT ALLOWANCE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I told the hon. member (Mr. Mulock) who has a motion on the paper in regard to this subject, that I would give him an answer to-day. The Government, after full consideration of the facts, have resolved to give the York and Simcoe Battalion the kit allowance while they were on active duty in the North-West.

Mr. MULOCK. Do I understand that provision will be made for that in the Supplementary Estimates?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. I would call the attention of the Minister to a point which I think requires attention if complete justice is to be done in this matter. The kit allowance was made to other battalions. It was made, for example, to the 10th Royals, who went out on service, I think, at about the same time, and returned about the same time as the battalion whose claim I have been urging. Those battalions were paid, but it will be three years and a half later when the men to whom I refer are paid. If they are to be treated in the same way as the other battalions, it will be necessary to add to the kit allowance a sufficient sum to put them on the same footing by paying them interest for three and a half years.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I dare say we shall be able to deal with that matter.

Mr. MULOCK. I only suggest it now, in case it might be found that the amount placed in the Supplementary Estimates would not be sufficient.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. DAVIN. With the consent of my hon. friend, the member for Alberta (Mr. Davis), who seconds this motion, I will make a slight change in it. Before moving it, I should like to make a few remarks as to my reasons for proposing the motion. Generally speaking, I think that the immediate object of a motion like this might be accomplished as well by going to the Minister dealing with the department, and discussing the matter with him, but there are peculiar circumstances in the North-West which I think make it necessary and expedient, in the interests of the public service, that I should make the motion I do here to-day. I desire to call the attention of the House, and of the Government, to the enormous powers which are given to the commissioner of the North-West Mounted Police by the North-West Mounted Police Act. According to the 18th section:

"Every member of the force, other than a commissioned officer, who is convicted of any of the following offences:

- "(a). Disobeying the lawful command of, or striking his superior.
- "(b). Oppressive or tyrannical conduct towards his inferior.
- "(c). Intoxication, however slight.
- "(d). Having intoxicating liquor illegally in his possession, or concealed.
- "(e). Directly or indirectly receiving any gratuity."

and so on. A number of possible offences and possible breaches of discipline are mentioned, and here comes the sub clause declaring what the power of the commissioner is, that any man committing any of the offences mentioned, which reach from a to v,

"Shall be held to have committed a breach of discipline.

"The commissioner, assistant commissioner, or the superintendent commanding at any post, or such other commissioned officer as is thereunto empowered by the commissioner, may forthwith, on a charge in writing of any one or more of the foregoing offences being preferred against any member of the force, other than a commissioned officer, cause the person so charged to be brought before him, and he shall then and there, in a summary way, investigate the said charge or charges, and on oath, if he thinks fit, and, if proved to his satisfaction, shall thereof convict the offender, who shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding one month's pay, or to imprisonment with hard labor for a term not exceeding one year, or to both fine and imprisonment, in addition to any punishment to which the offender is liable in respect of such offence under any law in force in the North-West Territories or in any Province in which the offence is committed."

Another clause provides that he may be summarily dismissed. What I wish to call the attention of the House and the Government to is this, that the commissioner gets a power greater than Lord Wolseley has, greater than the commander-in-chief of the Imperial forces has. There is no man in Her Majesty's service in the Empire who has power to deal with a common soldier as the commissioner of our North-West army has to deal with a constable. Any man who reads the Queen's Regulations will see that these regulations provide for a gradation of offences and a gradation of punishments. I grant that, in the early days, before you had railways and when the police were isolated more than they are now, you might give a power to the commissioner or his representative, the assistant commissioner, or the inspector, or the superintendent, as vast as he is given there. But, on the face of that Act, and particularly of that 18th clause, any man would see that there is a very great danger indeed of the abuse of such a power. Even if you were to take a judge from the bench, a man accustomed to deal with issues, and were to place him with a power like that in a case where there was no appeal, no surveillance whatever, where he would have absolute auto-cracy within himself, there would be a danger of an abuse of a power so vast; but the average man, no matter how capable he may be, whom we get to be commissioner of the police, if he have a military training, is not fitted by that military training for the exercise of the nicely balanced judgment which is required in a judge; and, if he have no military training and no experience, and such a power as this is placed in his hands, there is a great temptation and a great danger, no matter who the man is, that the vast power so conferred upon him may be abused. My object in making this motion is to effect a general rather than a particular purpose. I find that the returns I asked for could not be ready this Session, and it has been represented to me from other quarters in the west that several of our best sergeants and other non-commissioned officers, at the present moment, are men in whose record some flaw might be found. I should be very sorry, in seeking to accomplish a public end, to place on public record stains on the past history of a man who may be now doing well and serving his country, when the object I have in view can be accomplished in another way. I, therefore, move for a return of the papers in the case of A. D. Looz of the North-West Mounted Police, the nature of his offence, before whom tried, his length of service, his previous record for good conduct or otherwise, and the punishment given, and whether the proceedings were public or otherwise, and whether the accused was allowed to make any defence. I have taken this one case from a number of others, and I think I need not say that I have not by any means taken the strongest. I have taken what I thought was an average case which was treated with great severity. It is a very common thing for a man who is unaccustomed to deal with judicial proceedings, or to exercise judicial power, or to legislate, to think—as the history of all legislatures and of all criminal proceedings in all countries shows—that severe punishments are likely to accomplish the most salutary ends. But we know very well that unless we nicely adapt the punishment to the conscience of the community that are around the person punished, the end of the punishment, instead of being salutary, is the reverse. In the mounted police, with which I am dealing just now, I have observed this—unless the punishment more or less corresponds to the offence, the salutary effect is lost. When it is too severe the strong adverse criticism in the force against the severity, reacts badly on the discipline of the corps, and outside it finds an echo, so that there is a double influence working to prevent the punishment having the effect it ought to have. Now I will mention a case that I have selected from others, which I consider requires very strong punishment; it is also a case that will strongly appeal to the sympathies—and a severe punishment will appeal to the sympathies of the people, and I have taken it for that reason, I have selected this case because I want to show that, although in learning of the facts myself, I felt indignation, I felt that a very severe punishment was necessary—yet I think I can show the right hon. gentleman who both as Prime Minister and as taking control of the mounted police, is doubly interested in this matter—I think I can show him that here is a case of severity of punishment in which, on account of its severity, the punishment fails in the very effect that it is intended to produce. This man came down to Regina; he got drunk, and he insulted a lady on the street—tried to kiss her. It was a very grave and serious offence; and when he was going to the barracks in a waggon, it seems that there was a young woman coming up in the waggon and there were several police there, and his conversation and utterances were of a very gross kind. Now, Sir, I say that man, taking into account his character and his official position—he was a constable, his position was to guard against outrages of that sort rather than to commit them—I say that it was a very gross offence. I can easily understand how the commissioner felt indignant, both because of the offence itself, and because of its bringing disgrace upon the corps to which the man belonged. But, Sir, when I tell you that the sentence on the man was twelve months' imprisonment and dismissal from the force at the end of the term, you cannot but agree that this punishment altogether exceeded the offence. Now, there are several cases. They are all recorded over in the comptroller's office, and after the Session is over, if the right hon. gentleman—because it would be impossible to expect him to do so with a multitude of affairs pressing on his department at this time—but if he can spare an hour, or get a report as to some of the cases, I promise him that he will have the materials of coming to the same conclusion that I have come to from observation, that the sentences which have been passed for offences against discipline, in the North-West Mounted Police, for the last two or three years, have exceeded what justice demands, and in exceeding what justice demands, to a great extent have failed in the object aimed at by the punishment. Of course, I need not remind the right hon. gentleman, who is not only a statesman, but a lawyer, of what every tyro in legal studies knows, that in the history of criminal jurisprudence, punishments have had to be adjusted in accordance with the conscience and common sense of the community; and what happened in the past, must happen to-day. What I would suggest, with great respect and great diffidence, is this: That a few clauses might be added to the Police Act, not leaving such power in the hands of any commanding officer. The Queen's regulations are very elaborate; I do not think it would be necessary as to have anything so elaborate as that, but I can easily conceive that a few clauses might be added to this Act, which would place the constable who committed the offence in a position so that he would not feel as he does now, that he is at the mercy of one will. No matter how just a man is, it is a terrible thing to be at the mercy of one will without any standard whatever to appeal to; but he should feel as a soldier who is tried for any offence feels—as a soldier in the British army feels—that he has, what every man in the British dominions should feel, except in war time, whether a soldier or civilian, if he is tried for any offence, that he is tried according to law, and not at the mercy of any single will. I understand that there will be a measure brought down; but I infer that that measure only deals with pensions. Of course, I apprehend that in such a measure the suggestions that I have ventured to make, might be acted upon.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad my hon. friend has altered his original intention of moving for a general return of the names of the various constables and mounted police who have been subject to punishment, and the nature of their offence; because, as he has truly said, it might greatly injure a deserving man—they are young men, most of them—who may have committed some offence, and may have been punished for it, and may have been all the better for that punishment. But it would be very hard that there should be put upon the record of Parliament all their offences and their punishments. My hon. friend has seen that, and has amended his motion, confining it to one man. With regard to that man I think I cannot agree that this motion should be carried, and therefore I ask that the debate be adjourned, until I look at the papers, and have an opportunity of seeing whether there has been an injustice done to that man, and injury to the discipline of the force; and I want to see whether the papers ought to be brought down. It has been decided in England, and it is known in Parliament, that the worst court in the world to try a case of insubordination or breach of discipline in the army, is the House of Commons. The principle is that each case should be judged by those who are responsible for the management and the discipline of the army; and it is only in very rare cases, and where gross wrong and gross barbarity is shown, that the House of Commons have ventured to interfere. As I understand from the speech of the hon. gentleman, the complaint is not against the justice of the sentence, but against its severity, and he says the powers given by the statute to the commanding officer are much larger than those given by the Queen's Regulations. I, at present, cannot charge my memory as to where those clauses were got, how they came to be embodied in the original draft of the Mounted Police Act, or in any of the amendments, but I presume they were taken from the general regulations which govern the Irish Police. There is a great difference between a police and a mere soldiery. Soldiers are trained to obey orders, and in time of war to fight, but their duties begin and end there, whereas a constabulary force is governed by quite different considerations. They are superior men, their responsibilities are much greater, and consequently any errors committed are much more serious. Constables are guardians of the public peace, they are peace officers, they are to see that there is no breach of the law, and are to act with great discretion; and so much is it necessary that men of discretion as well as physical strength should be chosen, that it would be quite sufficient justification for the commanding officer to discharge a man if he showed by his conduct that he was wanting in ordinary common sense and discretion. A single policeman committing an indiscreet act, when he came in contact either with an Indian, with a smuggler, or with a cattle lifter, or other persons who commit offences against the law, may cause incalculable misery, on the peaceable settlers, and therefore the laws must be more stringent, the punishment must be more instant and immediate, and the sentence should be more severe. As to this case, I do not know anything about it; I cannot know anything about it, for I never heard of it until this moment. But the hon. gentleman must remember that while the sentences may be severe, there is always such a thing as a pardon, a remission of a portion of the penalty. It may be necessary in the North-West, and it is necessary, that the sentences should be very severe, but at all times there is an appeal from the commissioner, at present to myself, as being in charge of the mounted police force, and if there has been undue severity, or if there has been marked contrition, or good conduct, or any circumstance warranting interference with the sentence, of course it will be considered, and each case will be considered on its own merits. It is of the very greatest importance, I cannot emphasise the importance too strongly, that the sentences should be immediate and severe. The hon. gentleman has spoken of this case. Here it appears is a police officer, and each police officer must be a man of education, because he must be able to read and write before he is eligible for the force, a man who is appointed to keep the peace and prevent others breaking the peace, and who has sworn to arrest all persons breaking the law—what is said of this man? First, he is drunk; next, he assaulted a lady; and, in the third place, when travelling in a carriage with a young woman, he used improper, obscene and indecent language to her. I cannot fancy a greater series of crimes in the case of a police officer than that alleged against this man by the hon. gentleman, and I think the commissioner was warranted in saying that this man was not fit to remain in the force and he deserved a long term of punishment. The warning to other officers of the force is of more consequence than the punishment of this man himself. A year, I admit, is a long time off a man's life; but, as I have already stated, the whole circumstances have to be considered. The case can be referred to me, and it will be referred to me now that the hon. gentleman has brought it up in this marked manner; I will enquire into it, and if there are any mitigating circumstances, this man will get the advantage of them.

I hope the hon. gentleman, having brought this matter up, and having obtained from me a statement that the case will be looked into, and having stated generally his views on the subject, will be satisfied, and will withdraw his motion.

Mr. WATSON. I think if this motion is allowed to pass, it should pass in the form in which it appears on the Notice Paper. I do not, however, think that the House should allow it to be withdrawn. Commissioner Herchmer was appointed by the Government to command the Mounted Police, and they, no doubt, felt he was a good man for the position. Very few constables in the Mounted Police have been punished for insubordination, and I believe that, generally, they act up to the rules and perform the duties for which they are appointed. Any person who has read the Regina Leader for the last few months must feel that the hon. gentleman who has brought this question up in the House is actuated more by personal animosity towards that gentleman than anything else.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Order.

Mr. WATSON. The Regina Leader has abused Commissioner Herchmer, and I would suppose that the cause of this action has more connection with the editor of that paper and Commissioner Herchmer than anything else. It appears to me, as the First Minister has stated, that the punishment given this constable is none too severe; and in justice to the commissioner all the evidence taken should be brought before this House, so that hon. members will be able to decide whether the commissioner was doing his duty, as the officer in charge of the North-West police, or not.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it is to be regretted that the hon. member has made this motion. It is, in fact, an appeal to the House from the decision of a judicial officer without the hon. gentleman having first adopted the means within his reach of taking an appeal to the Minister of Interior. Until he has done that, and until justice has been denied, I think it is a great mistake to have appealed to Parliament, and Parliament cannot too strongly emphasise its disapproval of such proceedings. We will have it announced throughout the country that this appeal has been taken from the action of a judicial officer—for the commissioner is a judicial officer, and one of the series of judicial officers extending from the highest judge in the land down to the ordinary magistrate. And if it is to be the practice that every time a decision is given against the view of an hon. gentleman, and, perhaps—I do not say it exists in this case—having a grievance, and, therefore, unable to take a disinterested view, and who may therefore assume that the decision is not a reasonable one, the case has to be brought before Parliament, that is a proceeding much to be regretted. Whatever may be the condition of affairs, I think, until every other intermediate tribunal has been exhausted, this House should not be appealed to in any case. I am glad the First Minister has expressed disapproval of the conduct of the hon. gentleman, and I trust it will be a long time before the judiciary, for this is a branch of the judiciary, will be threatened in this manner again. As one interested in the maintenance of law and order, I hold that a practice such as this will be destructive of all law and order, and we cannot too strongly emphasise our disapproval of an hon. gentleman appealing to the House under such conditions.

Mr. DAVIN. I am exceedingly glad that I brought forward this motion. I am glad for two reasons: first, because I have heard the weighty utterance of the right hon. gentleman, that the matter will be considered in the case of this man. But that is a small matter, for I have not merely done that, but, as Desdemona says to Othello, "I understand a meaning in the words but not the word." There is more in what the Prime Minister has said than what met the ear of Parliament, because I know, from what the right hon. gentleman said, that this matter will be looked into thoroughly and that the object I had in view will be attained. As for the criticism from the hon. gentleman for Marquette (Mr. Watson) who knows so much about this thing, and the criticism full of knowledge of my hon. and learned friend the vice-chancellor of a university (Mr. Mulock) who connects the position of Commissioner Herchmer, adjudicating in offences against discipline on one of those constables, as a part of the judiciary of this country—as for their criticisms, they are beneath reply, Sir, because they are beneath contempt.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. DAVIN. I am not surprised that motives should be attributed to me by the member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), because the sole weapon which seems to their minds to have any cutting power in it, that ever is used by Opposition members, is some miserable, dirty weapon of attributing motives when they do not utter slanders. Let me tell him that, without using any unparliamentary language, I can fling back his invective.

Mr. WATSON. Can you?

Mr. DAVIN. Cannot I? I can! There is a document in the possession of the department of which the right hon. the Premier is the head, which can be produced, and which will prove that, in so far as I had any influence in the North-West, I was most unwilling that anything should be said against Commissioner Herchmer. That document is in existence.

Mr. WATSON. Is it the Regina Leader?

Mr. DAVIN. The Regina Leader! No. That document is there, and it will show that, so far from having any enmity against Commissioner Herchmer, I can say with the utmost truth that neither in the past nor at any other time have I had the least ill-feeling against that gentleman. I say that here in Parliament, and I can say it in a more solemn place if necessary, and I repeat again that I never had any enmity against Commissioner Herchmer. The criticism of that learned gentleman behind me (Mr. Mulock), who may one day be a judge in the event of two conditions—either that the hon. and learned member who leads the Opposition in such a distinguished manner should cross the floor, or if some other chance event may take place. That hon. gentleman says that this is part and parcel of the judiciary of the country.

Mr. MULOCK. How did this man come to be in jail for twelve months, if Mr. Herchmer is not a judge?

Mr. DAVIN. He comes to be in jail on account of the North-West Mounted Police Act.

Mr. MULOCK. Who sentenced him?

Mr. DAVIN. Commissioner Herchmer did. I grant you that the man who sentences another is a judge, but will any man say that the word "judge," in his case, bears the same signification as the word "judge" applied to one of the judges of the Superior or County Courts. When the hon. gentleman attempts to use an argument that way he uses a term (if I may talk in the language of logicians) that is undistributed, and his reasoning is fallacious. The North-West Mounted Police Act gives the commissioner power to deal in the most summary manner, and I can tell the member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), who is so fond of talking about North-West matters, and who pretends to be such a great friend of the North-West, that the people of the North-West—and that important portion of it, the Mounted Police—will not thank him for the statement he has made here to-day. It is a notorious fact, as any man who knows the North-West knows, that the sentences that have been passed during the last three years on the North-West Mounted Police for breaches of discipline have been too severe. I stated in my opening remarks that I instanced this case, not as the worst case that could be taken, but as a case that I thought would be but a fair specimen. I hold that this was a great offence on the part of the constable, and I emphasised the fact that he had been a peace officer, just as my hon. friend dwelt on that point also, but I hold that neither the Minister of Justice, nor the Premier, nor any man in this House who is fit to pronounce a judgment on such a subject, will say that that sentence was not far too severe, and that the punishment was out of keeping with the offence committed. There are other cases of a severe character, and I repeat that it is notorious in the North-West that these punishments have been too severe.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the hon. gentleman should not make those broad and general charges on the floor of this House against Commissioner Herchmer. If I might suggest to the First Minister a course, I think he might very properly ask that the hon. gentleman should not make those sweeping charges against this judge, without giving particulars. This is an aggravation of the hon. gentleman's original offence.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, am I to be told that on the floor of Parliament a man cannot deal with a subject which is publicly bruited about in the large district to which he belongs. Suppose we were discussing, not these constables who are completely at the mercy of any man having the uniform of an officer, before whom they are tried, but persons of great wealth and standing and great influence in this country, we should not find hon. gentlemen talking about a matter of which they know nothing whatever. I do not know what the motives of these hon. gentlemen may be, for I will not attribute unworthy motives to them, but I will tell the House that so long as I have a seat in this Parliament, so long the persons who have few friends, so long the persons who are weak and who have no advocate, shall always find an advocate and a helper in me. You cannot imagine a more helpless being than a constable in the North-West Mounted Police who should be charged with any offence. Now, as the commissioner is a judge, I will suppose for a moment—though, perhaps, I should not suggest such a thing as possible—that he should be a man of violent passions, of a vindictive turn of mind, or a man given to favoritism. Will any man tell me that it is a nice position for a constable to be placed, under the heel of a man of that character and possessing so much power? If he takes a prejudice against a man, he could give him twelve months' imprisonment for the smallest of the offences enumerated in that 18th clause. My right hon. friend, and the hon. and learned gentleman behind me (Mr. Mulock), spoke of an appeal. Of course, there is no appeal, except in a figurative sense; this Act provides for no appeal. Who hears of the case? A man is brought before this "judge;" his case is tried; he is sentenced; how are you to get at the facts? You know very well that the avenue to the true public is carefully guarded. Now, I say it is the duty of this Parliament and the duty of the Government to provide for such a state of things by such legislation as will secure—because it can be done—all the authority necessary to the officers of this force, and at the same time afford some protection to the members of the force who happen to be charged before the commissioner or before any officer. I am not now charging anything; I carefully abstained, in my opening remarks, on grounds that would appeal to any man, from making this a personal question. But I am sorry that it is from the Reform or Liberal side of this House that two voices should be raised, wantonly raised by men knowing nothing at all about the matter in issue, and raised in the favor of tyranny. My voice was raised in favor of producing a state of things that would not impair discipline or authority, but rather add to the authority of this so-called judge—because it is only in a figurative sense that he belongs to the great category of judges; my object was not only not to impair, but rather add to his authority, and also to afford to those who might be brought before him such small protection as might be given by regulations that would be quite consonant with the utmost and severest discipline. Now, with great deference to the right hon. gentleman, though I agree with him that punishment in such a force must be severe, I ask him, if you deal out the severest punishment, which is twelve months' imprisonment, for an offence that ordinary judges would regard as properly punished with three months' imprisonment, what punishment are you going to inflict when a very grave offence has been committed? I again repeat that the history of criminal jurisprudence shows that unless you adapt the punishment to the conscience of the community around you, and in some way make it balance with the offence, your punishment fails of its effect. Anyone can look at the record of this case, which will be found in Mr. White's books in the Comptroller's Office. The facts of the case are well known in the North-West, and I do not think anything would be gained by having the facts of one case placed before us. I rather think my hon. friends will find, notwithstanding their criticisms, that the object I have in view will prove to have been effected, and I hope we shall see some arrangements made whereby discipline shall be preserved, and the constables will not be wholly helpless when they stand before the commissioner. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). Before the motion is withdrawn, I wish to say that I have been very much impressed, indeed, by the eloquence of the hon. member; but I understood him to state that during the past three years, sentences of undue severity have been passed upon officers subordinate to the Commissioner of the Mounted Police; and in order to strengthen the hon. member's position before this House and the country, I think he should be given an opportunity to answer this question: Has the hon. member officially communicated with the head of the department during the past three years, any case or cases where undue severity has been inflicted upon any of these subordinate officers, or has the case which he particularises, and which, according to his statement, occurred about six months ago, been officially brought by him under the notice of the head of the department?

Motion withdrawn.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Order, resolution declaring the inexpediency of the practice in the House of Commons of Canada of remaining in Session past the hour of midnight, and providing for the discontinuance of the same.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Mr. CHARLTON. I thought of asking that this question should stand, but I think we can get through with it by six o'clock. It hardly needs any argument on my part, I think, to convince hon. members of this House—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I wish to make a suggestion to my hon. friend. I understand that some of the members, the younger members especially, like my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, have appointments elsewhere this evening, and perhaps it would be as well if the House did not meet after six o'clock. That being the case, perhaps my hon. friend had better not press his motion, as the discussion would probably last till after that time.

Mr. CHARLTON. I suppose my motion will keep its place.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). My hon. friend's motion is not to declare that the House shall sit until twelve, but that it shall not sit after. There is no interest because the House is going to rise at six to preclude his motion from keeping its place.

CLAIM OF GUNNER FARLEY.

Mr. FISHER moved for :

Return of copies of all claims, correspondence, papers and reports respecting the demand of Gunner Farley, of the Shefford Field Battery, for compensation for the loss of his horse, which died in consequence of injuries received returning from the camp at Richmond, P. Q., in 1886.

He said: In view of the fact that the object I had in view in making this motion has been attained, the hon. the Minister of Militia having complied with my wishes, I beg to withdraw it.

Motion withdrawn.

LÉVIS POST OFFICE.

Mr. GUAY (translation) moved for :

Copies of all petitions and resolutions forwarded to the Government by the citizens or corporation of the town of Lévis respecting the building of a post office in the town of Lévis.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have but few words to add in support of the motion which I have just had the honor of making before this House. In accordance with the instructions which have been given me by the citizens of the town of Lévis—and I think that their information is well founded in fact—numerous petitions signed by the citizens of Lévis, and resolutions unanimously adopted by the municipal council of the town were forwarded to the Government some years ago, asking for the building of a post office, and a house to house delivery of letters and parcels within the limits of the town. My object in making this motion, is to engage anew the attention of the Government, and especially that of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, who is the dispenser of the beneficent favors of the Government in the district of Quebec, to the fact of the importance of these petitions and of these resolutions, and to insist upon the urgent necessity which exists for building a post office in the town of Lévis, and of providing for the house delivery of letters, as is done in a great number of towns and villages of less importance than the town of Lévis. I have ascertained, Mr. Speaker, since I have had the honor of occupying a seat in this House, that every year considerable sums of money have been voted away by this House, at the request of the Government, to build post and custom houses in towns which are far from occupying the important position which the town of Lévis does. In fact it must not be forgotten that the town of Lévis occupies the third place among the towns of the Province of Quebec from its population, the importance of its manufactures and the increase in its trade, and I might add from the number and superiority of its educational institutions. The population of the town of Lévis, is reckoned at the present day, to be from 8,000 to 10,000 souls. This town is the centre of a great number of manufacturing interests, and is the terminus of several railways; amongst others, the Quebec Central, the Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk, and I hope before long that it will be that of the Great Eastern also, which is destined to bind together all the parishes on the south side of the St. Lawrence from Montreal to Lévis. I take advantage of this opportunity to express the hope that the Government will find the means this Session to assist in the building of this railway, in order to prolong its line from Sorel to the town of Lévis. I think that the time has come in which the Government must take into consideration the requests of my constituents of the town of Lévis, and place in the Supplementary Estimates a sum sufficient to render justice to the citizens of the town of Lévis, by building a post office in that city. One thing they may rest assured of, the expenditure which will be occasioned by an improved system will hardly cost more than the very primitive system which is carried on at the present time. There are now in the town four post offices spread over a distance of from five to six miles. A certain number of our citizens are at a considerable distance from any one of these offices. I am informed that the Government pays annually, for this very elementary postal service, nearly $2,000. Well, I believe that after having built a post office, the Government might very easily pay the salary of a postmaster and three or four messengers to make a house delivery of the letters and parcels, without sensibly increasing the public expenditure. It must not be overlooked—and I trust that the hon. the Minister of Public Works has remarked it of his own accord—that this improvement in the public interest has been asked for not only by the citizens of the town in their petitions, but it has been asked for in a very pressing way by the Board of Trade, by the town council, by the press, and if I can credit the report, a deputation will shortly come to Ottawa to ask of the Government the realisation of this project so important to the petitioners. If I was asking for a special favor for the town of Lévis, Mr. Speaker, I might add that there is not probably in the whole Province a town which more than this one deserves favors from the hands of the present Government, the hon. the Minister of Public Works knows it as well as I do; but I do not ask for any special favor. I plead only for an act of bare justice, and I venture to hope that the hon. Minister will comprehend the importance of the request which I am making at this moment and that he will discover some way of rendering justice to the taxpayers and citizens of the town of Lévis, by providing this year for the construction of a post office, the need of which is so keenly felt in that town.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) I will only reply to the hon. member, after the deputation which he announces shall have come here, I will know then more fully what they desire, although the hon. member has given me his personal views on the matter. As to what the Government will do, I cannot say now, but we shall see when the deputation has arrived.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) It would be well, Mr. Speaker, for us to understand once for all on what principle the Government is guided in the building of post offices and other public edifices. Does it regulate its conduct in this respect by the political support given to it by various localities, or according to the requirements and rights of these places? If we take the estimates for the present year, we shall find there that several localities in the Province of Quebec—not to go beyond the Province of Quebec—that several localities are going to be presented with post offices. Now, many of these places have not one-half or one-third of the population of certain other places which are not mentioned there. For example, I find that this year a sum of $6,900 is asked to build a post office at Aylmer; we have been already asked $7,000 last year, for this post office, and Aylmer is a village. I see also that $7,000 is asked to complete the post office at Joliette; we voted $10,000 last year for the same purpose. I find further, that for a post office at Laprairie, which is but a small village, we are asked this year to vote $7,000, over and above the sum of $10,000 which we voted last year. We are asked to vote $6,000 for the building of a post office at Lachine. But there is nothing whatever asked for towards the building of a post office in the important town of Lévis, in support of which my friend the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) has just spoken. The hon. the Minister of Public Works knows better than any one in this House the importance of this town. It is at the present day the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway, the Grand Trunk, the Quebec Central, and will be soon the terminus of other railways. Before long, the Quebec Central will be united with the great network of railways in New England, and yet Lévis has not a decent post office. We have, alongside Quebec City, a village which ought to be a city if its inhabitants were a little more ambitious or less modest; I refer to St. Sauveur de Québec which has a population of 15,000 souls. Well, St. Sauveur has no post office. How does it happen that these places have been always passed over when public buildings were being erected in small places which have not a quarter of their population? Aylmer has not one-fifth of the population of St. Sauveur de Québec; nevertheless a post office is being built there, but not a word is spoken about building one at St. Sauveur, which is, as I have stated, a locality of much greater importance. It would be well, once for all, to know how we stand. If it is understood that in order to have a post office or other public building, a county must return a member who supports the Government, then the counties which elect Opposition members will know what to expect. If, on the contrary, the Government is influenced by the needs of the locality and by the number of its population and the importance of its industries then the places I have just spoken of ought to have post offices given to them. I think that the Government should place in the Supplementary Estimates for this year a sum for the building of a post office at Lévis, and another sum for a post office at St. Sauveur de Québec. There are a number of places, I repeat, which have obtained these favors in the past and which will doubtless obtain them in the future, which do not deserve to have them half so well as the two places I have just mentioned.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERY BOUNTY IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. McINTYRE moved for:

Copy of the names of fishermen in Prince Edward Island who for the last two years have made claims for the fishery bounty, and whose claims have been rejected; also for copies of the reports of the officers or parties against such claims, and the names and residences of such officers or parties.

He said: The fishermen of Prince Edward Island generally are not satisfied with the manner in which the fishery bounty has been distributed. This has been more particularly the case with the fishermen of King's county. The complaint on their part is that political considerations have been allowed to influence the distribution of this fund in the hands of the different officers. Year after year, for several years back, I have received letters from fishermen that, after having fished for the specified time and caught the requisite quantity of fish, and having sent in their application and sworn to its correctness, they have, notwithstanding this, on the slightest excuse, or on no excuse at all, on the part of the sub-collectors, who have usually charge of this matter, had their claims rejected. On the other hand, I had been informed that the wardens have given certain information to the sub-collector which has induced him to refuse the certificate to those who were making application, and thus the fishermen, without any further hearing, were deprived of the bounty which of right belonged to them. I desire to state a case or two in point. I think it was in 1886—but I am not quite certain as to the year—during the summer a seining boat on the coast with twelve men, fishing during the whole summer, and, when the time came for the fishermen to receive their cheques, nine of them received their cheques and the other three were without them. It is rather peculiar that the nine who received their bounties were Conservatives, and the three who were deprived were

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec).

Liberals. The next year one of these men wrote to me, making a statement of the facts in connection with the case. I wrote back asking for affidavits from two or three of these men who had fished with them and had received their bounties. I had sent to me three affidavits from men who had received their bounties and one from the neighboring magistrate. I then went to the department and explained the matter, and showed this to Mr. Tilton, the Deputy Minister. After overhauling the matter carefully he came to the conclusion that these men were entitled to their bounty. All the information which I could obtain was that the grounds upon which these three men were deprived of their bounty before, came from information supplied by a neighboring fishery warden. Another case in point is where a father and son fished for the season and sent in their claim, and when the time came for them to receive their cheques, they went for them. The father received his cheque, but there was none for the son. The father wrote to me during the Session, and I went to the department and found that the two cheques were sent down on the same day. I communicated this fact to the fisherman, and he went to the sub-collector of the port and told him he wanted his cheque or the equivalent in money. After a while the sub-collector said he would allow him the $3, which I think was the amount owing to him. He said that would suit him as well, as he owed something to a local grocer, and he could give him credit for that. That was the course taken by the sub-collector. I do not desire to make any comment upon that, but I understand that these cheques must be endorsed by the parties in whose favor they are made. I could recount such cases as these by the dozen, but I think these are enough to let the Minister understand how this fishery bounty is distributed in my county. I think it is a hardship for fishermen, after fishing the season round, after getting the required quantity of fish, to be deprived of their bounties on the most flimsy pretext, and often upon none at all. The case, as it stands, is enough to show that that is the fact. It is the opinion of the fishermen, as it is my opinion also, that the bounty should be increased. If our fishermen are to pay the large taxes which they are paying year after year, for their food, their clothing, and the material which enters largely into their outfit, they should receive greater encouragement than they are receiving at the present time. For many years the French Government have given a bounty, a large bounty, I think ten francs, to the French fisherman for every quintal of fish sold in the foreign markets. Our fishermen are paying a large amount for the benefit of a few manufacturers; and if the Americans are going to continue the heavy duties they now charge, the least the Government should do is to give a bounty to our fishermen equal to the amount the Americans charge on our fish. The present Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated that he had heard no complaint from the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. That may be true, and the reason is that the fishermen have got tired of making useless remonstrances to the department and obtaining no consideration for them. I trust that the present Minister, in whom the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces have every confidence, will see that they receive the bounty to which they are entitled. There ought to be some shorter way of arriving at the fact as to who is really entitled to the bounty, than the system that obtains now. It appears to me that there are cases in which the fishery overseer should have power to make an examination, cases of fishermen whose claims were being presented. Let him go round from place to place at stated periods and ascertain the facts as relating to these matters. It could be very easily done. The fishery overseer in Prince Edward Island is not overburdened with work, and this plan would do away with a good deal of the uneasiness in connection with this matter which now prevails.

Mr. TUPPER. There is, of course, no objection to comply with the motion of the hon. gentleman, with a slight amendment, to which, I believe, the hon. gentleman does not object. I understand the hon. gentleman has no reference to those claims that have not been adjudicated upon, and, therefore, with that alteration, I have no objection to the motion passing, that is, that it be changed so as to read for the years 1886 and 1887, instead of the last two years. In reference to the specific cases which the hon. gentleman has mentioned, I am not familiar with either of them, as they were settled and decided upon before I entered upon the administration of the department. I may point out, however, that out of the 637 claims that were filed by the fishermen of King's County, to which allusion has been made, those claims represented 1,323 fishermen, and of these 637 claims, 602 were allowed, and 35 rejected.

Mr. McINTYRE. When was that?

Mr. TUPPER. That was for 1887, King's County, to which I understand the hon. gentleman alluded. If the facts were as the hon. gentleman mentioned, with regard to the crew of twelve, in which nine Conservatives were paid their bounty, and three Reformers were refused, and upon the grounds he suggested, that would be a course that I would not for a moment defend, and I should certainly look into the case, and ascertain how far the department is responsible, or to what extent any official under the department is responsible for a case of that kind. Then, in reference to dealing with these bounty cheques, that is a practice that is not tolerated or countenanced by the department, but a practice very difficult, indeed, to stop. The fishermen are most anxious, at times, to use the checks paid on the bounty, or use the credit that they gain by having filled the claims, and they are oftentimes induced to obtain a discount on these cheques by some officer in the locality charged with the investigation of the claims. Of course, that practice has been a great abuse in reference to the quasi judicial position of the officer in charge of that settlement, and the officer who reports to the department. There has been only one case specifically brought to my notice, personally, of an officer who does that, and that I am at present investigating. I may mention that, as the hon. gentleman has suggested is quite the case, that the cheques are payable to the party entitled, under the Act regulating the bounties, and under the Order in Council passed under that Act, they are made out in the names of the fishermen, and to be cashed, must be endorsed by the fishermen.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). There can be no doubt that in disposing of so much money, the system may be open to abuse, and sometimes, no doubt, the system has led to abuse. I am aware of one case in my own county that I brought to the notice of the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries last year, which was so evident that the department promised to look into the affair, though I do not know whether they have given it the investigation that was promised. The person who had charge of the distribution of the cheques, or making out the claims, in one section of my county, was a gentleman of good standing, and I did not care to mention his name on the floor of the House; but I told the Minister of Marine at that time, that according to the papers which had been placed in my hands—and they were sworn to—that man, who was a magistrate too, had returned names of parties for bounties that had not been issued at all; he had returned the names of his own sons, who were mere boys in his store, and had obtained checks in that way under various pretences. I did not pretend to say at that time, nor do I now, whether the charge was correct, but I offered to give the department all the particulars, with a view to assisting them in arriving at a correct distribution of the money, which, I have no doubt, is their desire. I am aware since that time that the practice has been continued, I think very unfortunately, of placing these cheques in the hands of local shopkeepers. I know that within Halifax city a list of the bounties there was placed in the hands of one local shopkeeper, and the fishermen coming in from the outports have come to this man, and he makes out their cheques for them, and I presume—I do not affirm it—they all have dealings with him, and that he receives a certain amount of indirect advantage. It has been stated to me, and I think it is correct, that on several occasions, notably on more than one occasion, people have gone to this man and he has made out their claims, pretending that they had grounds for making their application; where they are Conservatives their claims were always admitted, where they happened, unfortunately for them, to belong to the other side of politics of the day, the shopkeeper and the Government which he represented, did not see their way clear to grant them the same bounty which had been granted to the other fishermen along the side of them. Now, this statement has been made to me over and over again, and an investigation was held in Halifax not very long ago, under circumstances which were rather peculiar, if my information is correct. It was stated then that one man's application was made out and his bounty was granted, when he was proved to have been in the hospital at Halifax all summer. Now I do not say this information is correct, but the best evidence has been brought to prove the charge; but whether it is true or not, the whole system of distribution of the cheques of the fishermen, is open to very grave abuse. It is placed by the Government in the hands of small shopkeepers and men of that kind who are influential in the various districts, and who deal directly or indirectly with the fishermen. It is time the system was changed. The cheques have been distributed at particular times and under particular circumstances, and, as I mentioned last year in the House, during the local election a clerk was sent from the custom house in Halifax to distribute cheques along the shore. He was rather badly treated by the Government, I must confess, because he hired a team in Dartmouth to go along the eastern shore and distribute the cheques, thinking the Government would recompense him. But having lost the election, the Government did not feel inclined to make any further investment in that direction, and so a case has been before the courts in Halifax in regard to team hire.

Mr. TUPPER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman advises me to pay the claim for the horse and team?

Mr. JONES. Will the hon. gentleman act on my advice?

Mr. TUPPER. I will take it into consideration.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). If the hon. gentleman is willing to accept my advice on this point, I hope he will also adopt my suggestions on other points, and under these circumstances we will see an improvement in the administration of the department. I do not bring any accusation against the present Minister of Marine, for this matter relates to the past year. All this is a condition of affairs which, I repeat, calls for an investigation and for a change in the administration of the department. I suppose the Government will always favor their own friends, we expect it, and we have seen it. The Conservative party think not only the revenues of the country belong to them, but the whole country belongs to them, and whenever they obtain any money they take good care to distribute it among their own friends. But we hope they are not altogether beyond public opinion, and they are not too old to learn and improve the administration of the Fisheries Department in this particular. There is no branch of the public service which more needs improvement and change than that connected with the distribution of these bounties among the fishermen.

Mr. PERRY. I am glad the hon. member for King's (Mr. McIntyre) has brought this motion before the House because we have had great cause for complaint in the County of Prince, which I have the honor to represent. It appears to me that when the fishermen who claim bounties declare they are entitled to them, and when they are called upon to go before magistrates and make a solemn declaration that they have fished the prescribed time and taken the necessary catch, no Government officer should be able to declare in effect that those men had taken a false oath. I hope the hon. gentleman who has taken the important position at the head of the department will see to it that during the coming summer these wrongs will not be perpetrated on the fishermen. I agree with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) that the whole system is liable to be abused; but I consider it to press very hardly on fishermen that after a fisherman has gone before a magistrate and sworn that he has fished so long and has caught so many pounds of different kinds of fish, that then a fishery officer, who probably does not live within 5 or 6 miles of the fisherman, should take the responsibility of declaring that the fisherman has made a false declaration. I look upon that as a gross injustice, and I hope it will be remedied. I have three cases of this kind at Tignish, and this is the third session I have endeavored to get these cases rectified. In order to obtain an investigation by the department so much red-tape procedure has to be gone through that when the small amount is obtained after three or four years, it is scarcely worth receiving. There should be some other means by which these cases can be decided. The department has now two Commissioners in Prince Edward Island, a head Commissioner and an assistant Commissioner. And they should be authorised to judge as to whether fishermen applying for the bounties are entitled to them or not. I hope we shall not hear any longer of such wrongs being perpetrated on the fishermen.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I desire to draw the attention of the Minister to the cases of D. McNeill, M. Munn, F. MacLoed, all of Little Sands, Prince Edward Island. In each of these cases evidence was adduced before the fishery commissioner that they had caught the required quantity of fish, but they failed to receive their bounties during 1886. I have written to the fishery commissioners time and again, but have never received any answer from them.

Mr. TUPPER. How long ago was it?

Mr. ROBERTSON. In 1886. The fishermen have to give evidence under oath that they are entitled to the bounty, and although this was done the fishery commissioner paid not the slightest attention to the claim. I am informed that the fishery warden felt so sore about the matter that he resigned his position, because the fishery commissioner had not even answered his letter, in which it was shown that the men had fished the necessary time, and had caught the required quantity of fish.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all petitions presented to the Government by the residents of the Townships of the front of Young and the front of Escott, in the County of Leeds, Ontario, praying that an Act passed by the Local Legislature of the Province of Ontario, assented to the 23rd March, 1885, intitled: "An Act to provide for the union of the Townships of the front of Young and front of Escott," might be disallowed.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Statement showing the amount of expenditure on account of the Central Experimental Farm, from the first day of July, 1888, to the first day of January, 1889. Also the total cost of the Central Experimental Farm, to the first day of January, 1889.—(Mr. McMillan, Huron.)

Return showing the amount received by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company from the sale of the $15,000,000 of Mortgage Bonds which the Company were by the Act 51 Victoria, chapter 32, authorised to issue, and the payment made, and to whom made, and for what, by the said company out of such proceeds.—(Mr. Ste. Marie.)

THE JESUITS ESTATES BILL.

Mr. BARRON. I was out of the House a few moments ago when my motion was called in regard to copies of a report and other papers respecting the Jesuits Estates Bill. It is absolutely necessary that this return should be brought down so that we may be able, intelligently, to discuss the motion of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), when it is moved. I, therefore, ask that the return be brought down as soon as possible.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Has the motion been passed?

Mr. BARRON. I ask leave to move it now, if there is no objection.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think you had better leave it on the paper.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is this another effort to cut off the rights of private members?

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 6 o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 5th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADJOURNMENT FOR ASH WEDNESDAY.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that when this House adjourns to-day it stand adjourned until three o'clock, p.m., on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, in rising to make my first financial statement before this House, it would not be otherwise than natural that I should experience feelings of trepidation, and even of timidity. When I look at the line of men, distinguished Canadians, who, since Confederation, have had entrusted to them the keeping of the purse-strings of this country, men in every case of acknowledged ability and of an experience far greater than my own, when I have regard, as well, to the responsible nature of the duties which have been devolved upon me, and the fact that every action of the present leaves its impress upon the future, I would be the reverse of serious or thoughtful if I did not throw myself to-day upon the kindness of the House, and ask those who are older and more experienced than myself for their generous indulgence, and ask also for the equally generous sympathy of those who are, in point of years, more nearly my contemporaries and co-laborers in the work of this House. The wise and the vigorous policy of the preceding years, a kindly providence which, during the past year, has not forgotten this, one of her most favored countries, and a growing spirit of confidence in commercial operations, have contributed to a fullness of the Treasury, and to a peace and prosperity, general throughout the country, which serve to make easier the otherwise formidable task which has fallen to my lot. Canada to-day, standing in this her majority year, and looking back upon the record of her past, has every reason, I think, to survey that record with pride, and turning towards the future, although it may have its difficulties which are to be surmounted, I believe that from this same vantage ground she has every right to step forward into that future, with full assurance that in it she will find peace, plenty, prosperity and continued greatness. Standing upon this point of vantage ground, this country asks no concealment of the real facts of her record, she asks no flattery, and while she does not wish to have concealed from her the difficulties incident to progress in all climes and in all ages, I think she is willing to stand by the record of facts, and whatever merits or demerits my statement may have, I trust, that so far as it goes, it will have the merit of candour, frankness and plainness of statement. With these few preliminary remarks, I beg the indulgence of the House while I proceed to the common-place and not always interesting statement with respect to the past the present and the succeeding year. For the year 1887-88 the statement of my predecessor was that Customs would yield $22,000,000; Excise, $6,450,000; Miscellaneous, $7,550,000, a total of $36,000,000. The actual receipts have been as follows:—Customs, $22,105,926; Excise, $6,071,486; Miscellaneous, $7,731,050, or a total of $35,908,463; or less than the estimate by $91,536. This difference in the actual receipts, as compared with the estimated receipts, arises from a falling off in the Excise of $378,513, whereas Customs shows an increase of $105,926, and Miscellaneous, an increase of $181,050. The following are the principal items of increase, compared with 1886-87:—

Brass, and manufactures of .....	$ 7,152 19
Grain of all kinds .....	21,894 31
Drugs, Dyes, Chemicals and Medicines .....	37,503 25

In the Excise, as I have stated, there was a falling off of $378,513 in duty collected. The statement shows that in 1886-87 the number of gallons of spirits upon which Excise duty was paid was 2,882,265 gallons, while in 1887-88 the quantity was 2,405,716, a difference in quantity of 476,549 gallons, giving a difference in revenue of $638,697.94—a very considerable falling off, as the House will see, in the revenue from spirits. Malt liquors, however, show a decided increase, the quantity being 48,640,467 lbs. in 1887-88, as compared with 42,630,440 lbs. in 1886-87, the increase being $6,010,027, and the increase in revenue being $60,102.19. In cigars there is an increase of 4,811,735 in number, and an increase in revenue of $23,373.68. In tobacco of all kinds, including snuff, there is an increase of 4,1439 lbs., and an increased duty of $72,363.30. The expenditure as estimated for by my predecessor in office, was $37,000,000. The actual expenditure has been $36,718,494, a difference of $281,506 on the right side, so far as the accounts are concerned. Sir Charles Tupper estimated there would be a deficiency of $1,000,000 as between the receipts and expenditure for the year 1887. His estimate happily was over the mark, and the total deficit amounts to only $810,031. It is, however, to be remembered by the House, and it will be remembered as well by the country, that although we speak of a deficit in 1887-88 of $810,031, we must also keep in mind that there has been a set-off against the public debt of $1,939,077 as sinking fund and investment for interest on sinking fund, so that there is an offset against the debt of $1,939,077 and a deficit of $810,031. That is to say, if we had not offset the debt by the amount named, we would not have had a deficit on the consolidated fund account, but a surplus of $1,129,046. The items of capital expenditure in the year 1887-88 are as follows:—

Railways and Canals .....	$1,798,704
Public Works.....	963,778
Dominion Lands.....	135,048
North-West Rebellion.....	539,930
Total.....	$4,437,460

To this is to be added the expenditure for railway subsidies under the Acts, $1,207,041, and a redemption of debt, $3,185,633, making a total capital expenditure of $8,650,159. But as the redemption of debt counts on both sides it does not affect the net debt, and the statement with reference to the net debt is as follows:—

On 1st July, 1887, it amounted to .....	$227,313,911
On 1st July, 1888, it amounted to .....	234,531,358
Increase for the year.....	$7,217,447

That has been explained by the different items of capital expenditure which I have read, and this House is now in possession of the facts as to the items upon which this capital expenditure was made. For the year 1888-89, the estimates made by my predecessor were as follows:—That

Customs would yield.....	$12,500,000
Excise would yield.....	6,650,000
Miscellaneous.....	7,760,000
Total.....	$36,900,000

Up to the 28th of February, 1889, the receipts for the eight months are as follows:—

Customs .....	$16,303,700
Excise .....	4,619,841
Miscellaneous .....	4,693,225
Total for eight months.....	$25,616,766

If we estimate for the remaining four months in this year a revenue equal to the revenue of the four similar months of 1887-88, there would be added to the above receipts for the eight months, in

Customs .....	$ 8,230,271
Excise .....	2,448,302
Miscellaneous .....	3,305,955
Total .....	$13,984,528

Which will make the amended estimate as follows:—

Customs.....	$ 23,533,971
Excise .....	7,068,143
Miscellaneous.....	7,999,182
Total .....	$38,601,294

To be within the mark I will call the amended estimate upon the above basis $38,500,000, as contrasted with the $36,900,000 estimated for last year. Then with reference to the expenditure: For the full year 1887-88, the expenditure was $36,718,494. From the 1st July to 28th February of the present year the expenditure was $21,972,826. If we add to the expenditure for those eight months past, a similar amount to that expended on the four last months of the past year, which I think will be sufficient, there is to be added to that, $14,397,565, making a total upon that basis of expenditure of $36,371,391. There will be some further Supplementary Estimates to make up for Governor General's warrants and for some other expenses of that year, and I think it is safe to say that it will be within the mark that the expenditure for the present year will amount to $36,600,000 as against estimated revenue of $33,500,000, leaving for the current year, I think, without any probability of doubt, a surplus of $1,900,000. That, Mr. Speaker, I think is a very satisfactory statement to be made to the House and the country. It is a condition of things which has not arisen from any increased rate of taxation, but under the very same tariff as the preceding year's receipts were based upon. Consequently, it shows an increased ability to consume, and therefore an increase in the prosperity of the country. The capital expenditure for 1888-89 is estimated as follows:—

CAPITAL EXPENDITURE, 1888-1889.

	Paid to 31st January, 1889.	Estimated from Feb. 1st to 30th June.	Total.
Railways and Canals.....	$ 2,414,557 00	$ 358,310 00	$ 2,772,867 00
Public Works.....	219,283 77	166,416 23	385,700 00
Dominion Lands.....	61,342 41	38,657 59	100,000 00
North-West Rebellion.....	1,205 11	.....	1,205 11
Railway Subsidies.....	614,443 09	538,985 00	1,153,428 00
Redemption of Debt.....	2,122,023 21	972,362 9.	3,094,386 12
Total Capital Expenditure, 1888-89.....			$7,537,586 23

The estimate for the succeeding four months in this year was according to the best information that I could get from the different departments. The total capital expenditure, as I have pointed out, will be $7,537,586.23, of which, of course, $3,094,386 being for redemption of debt will not affect the net debt estimate. The net debt on

30th June, 1888, was .....	$234,531,358 00
28th February, 1889.....	$236,095,114 34
1st July, 1889 (estimated) .....	$336,650,000 00

We now come to the year 1889-90, about which there is, of course, less certainty. Having regard to the state of things in the present year, and to the very general favorable outlook for commerce and trade, not only in our own country but in the great commercial countries of the world, I have made an estimate for 1889-90, which is based upon the continuance of the prosperity and the continuance of those results of trade which have obtained for the present current year, and I have simply calculated for increased revenue on the increase of population, which you may expect in the year, of 1½ per cent. My estimate for 1889-90, is as follows:

Income—Customs .....	$23,900,000
Excise .....	7,125,000
Miscellaneous .....	8,150,000
Total.....	$39,175,000

This is based on the present rates of tariff and a continuance of the present condition of the country, as I have said before. The estimates that have been laid before the House amount to $35,400,000. I cannot say with certainty what will be the total amount of the supplementary estimates yet to be brought down. If we can succeed in curbing the naturally kind and generous heart of my colleague the hon. Minister of Public Works, and if we may rely on the general sense of Mr. FOSTER, economy and desire to do with as reasonable an amount as possible which has been so eminently manifested by members on both sides of the House, I think I may fairly expect that the supplementary estimates will not reach an exceedingly high figure. However, to make an estimate which will be inside the mark, suppose we say that the estimates now brought down shall be increased to $36,500,000, we shall then have a surplus for the year 1889-90 of $2,675,000. That, I think, will also be satisfactory to the House, inasmuch as this estimate is not based upon any increase in the rates of tariff, but simply upon the present rates of tariff, and the general condition of the business of the country. It might not be unprofitable to call the attention of the House to the items of the estimates brought down, as compared with the estimates of the preceding year, because I think they show a fairly satisfactory list of decreases. The items in which there are increases are not very many, and can be easily explained. For the public debt, including sinking fund, there is an increase of $18,061, because, of course, the debt being larger on account of the loan, and the sinking fund investments increasing year by year, there must necessarily be an addition. In Civil Government there is an increase of $5,107; but the House must bear in mind that we have transferred this year an item of $13,053 from the immigration vote, where it formerly was, to Civil Government; so that, taking into account that transfer as well as the statutory increases which have been provided for, an absolute saving of some $3,000 has been made. The total amount of the statutory increases for 1888-89 are $20,702, which, added to the amount of the transfer from the immigration vote, makes $33,785; from this amount take the net increase of $5,107, and the result shows that we have saved, outside of the statutory increases, $28,678 in other items of Civil Government, which, although not a large sum, indicates economy, and, I hope, is but a step in the right direction. The next increase is in the administration of justice, $12,060. As this is vouched for by my hon. friend and colleague the Minister of Justice, I have no doubt it is a perfectly satisfactory increase, and one which will be quite palatable to the gentlemen of the legal persuasion on both sides of the House, who, I observe, never object to an increase in the salaries of the judges. This, however, is not caused by an increase in the salaries of the judges, but is owing to appointments of new judges, and also to the expense incurred in the establishment of the new Exchequer Court. There is a slight increase in Dominion Police, of $1,400, rendered necessary by the employment of extra men about the new building, which will soon be occupied. The other increases are not large, until you come to the Department of Indian Affairs, in which there is an increase of $32,138, made necessary by the establishment of industrial schools, a policy which has been tried with most excellent results in the country to the south of us, and which is based upon a sentiment which I am sure will commend itself to both sides of this House. The other large increase is in Railways and Canals, $293,625, which is largely on the Intercolonial Railway, rendered necessary by the purchase of new rolling stock for the accommodation of an increased traffic, and which will be offset in part, if not altogether, by increased earnings. When you come to the list of decreases, it is fairly long and fairly satisfactory. There is a decrease in the management of penitentiaries of $4,322, in legislation of $9,335, in arts, agriculture and statistics, of $14,000, and in immigration of $21,254. Assisted passages have been entirely done away with, and all arrearages with reference to them have been paid up. There is a reduction in quarantine of $24,200, in pensions and superannuations of $15,965, in militia of $29,700, in railways and canals (income) of $74,643, and in public works of $1,007,894, though I suppose, when the supplementary estimates are brought down, the last figure will be somewhat reduced. In lighthouse and coast service there is a reduction of $59,500. That, however, does not mean that there will be less efficiency in that service, but it is owing to the fact that for a number of years past, a larger vote has been taken for this service than has ever been expended, and the experience of a number of years has shown that it is possible, with due regard for events that may occur, though at present unforeseen, to make the vote that much smaller without impairing the efficiency of the service. In subsidies to Province, there is a decrease of $8,454, based upon changes which have taken place in the arrangement, which, I may say, is now practically concluded, between the Dominion and the old Provinces of Canada, with reference to the settlement of their accounts. There is a decrease in the Mounted Police vote of $26,783, and in miscellaneous of $162,621. In all, the decrease from the estimate of last year amounts to $1,328,977, which will, no doubt, be somewhat pulled down, as I have stated, by the supplementary estimates which have yet to appear. Now, after having given as best I could, without occupying too much of the time of the House, an explanation of the expenditure of the three years of which I have treated, I wish to say a word or two with reference to the condition of the debt of Canada as it stands at present. In 1867, the net debt of Canada was $75,728,641; in 1874, when we had completed the Union of the Provinces, which now form Confederation, it was $108,324,964. At present, it is $234,531,353. The burden of carrying a debt is measured by the amount required to pay the interest. Measured in that way, we find that in 1868, it required a per capita payment of $1.29 to meet the interest; in 1874, it required a per capita payment of $1.34; and in 1888, a per capita payment of $1.79. The increase in 1888, over 1868, was, therefore, 50 cents per head, and over 1874, 45 cents per head. It is also important to note the decrease in the rate of interest. In 1868, the rate of net interest averaged $4.51; in 1874, it averaged $3.62; and in 1888, the average net rate of interest has fallen to $3.12. It must also be remembered, in making a fair estimate of this debt, that there was assumed, as debts of the Provinces, not created for federal purposes, a sum of $109,430,148.69 which, although it added that much to the indebtedness of the Federal power, relieved the different Provinces by exactly the same amount, and placed the management of that large indebtedness in the hands of the Federal Government, where it is managed at a smaller rate of interest and with less burden to the country in general than if it had been left in the hands of the Provinces. Deducing this debt assumed for the Provinces of $109,430,148.69 from the net debt, in 1888, of $234,531,353, we have a federal net debt of $125,101,209.51 in excess of the assumed debts, and which is offset by this consideration, that during that period named there has been a total capital expenditure of $179,709,974. Thus, our capital expenditure, which has been almost entirely for public works necessary for this country, has exceeded the increase of the debt for strictly federal purposes by $54,608,764.69. I may say that the excess in the net debt per head necessary to bear the burden of this debt, in 1888, over 1868, is 50 cents per capita; over 1874, 45 cents per capita; over 1879, 20 cents per capita; and over 1880, only 15 cents per capita. In 1880, my hon. friend who preceded me (Sir Charles Tupper), and who to-day I am glad to see on the floor of this House, was struggling with the problem of railway connection between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboard of this country—a problem which had engaged the best attention of the best minds of this country since Confederation, and which bore so intimately on the future prosperity and progress of Canada, that it assumed the status of the foremost question in our politics, the solving of which would reflect credit on the minds engaged in it and would cause them to be held in grateful remembrance by this country. In 1880, we had not made the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and we had not commenced to incur that vast expenditure which we afterwards incurred in the subsidy we gave for finishing the remaining part of the Pacific trans-continental railway, which had not been undertaken as a Government construction. Taking the net interest per head in 1880 and comparing it with that of 1868, when the Pacific Railway had been finished and the large expenditure we had incurred to complete it was added to our public debt, as it is, we find that the additional interest burden which the country was made to feel to carry that indebtedness was but 14 cents per head of its population. It is a common error to take the debt of Canada and compare it with the federal debt of the United States, in order to make a point as against Canada and in favor of the United States, or, to speak more truly, to make a point against the Government which is now in power on account of its alleged extravagance in increasing the public debt. I do not know that a more unfair comparison could be instituted than a comparison between the Federal debt of the United States and the federal debt of the Dominion of Canada. Broadly stated, the comparer says: Look at the United States; to-day it has a debt of $20.42 per head of its population. Look at the Dominion of Canada; to-day it has a debt of $17.16 per head of its population; and the comparison always tends, as these financial comparisons must, to prejudice the minds of those who do not see through it, in favor of the country which, seemingly, has a lighter debt and against the country which, seemingly, has a heavier debt. Now, if by a simple statement to-day I can set, to a certain extent, at rest and dispose of this comparison of two things so dissimilar, I shall feel that I have performed a duty, not only to the party in power, but to this House and to the country as well. Things which are dissimilar cannot be fairly compared. The constitution of the United States and the constitution of Canada are very different, so far as financial matters are concerned which lead to public debts and to public expenditures. The United States, in the first place, assumes no debts of its different States. The Dominion of Canada has assumed the debts of its Provinces to the amount of $109,430,148.69. The United States pays no subsidies to its different States. The Dominion of Canada has paid in subsidies to its different Provinces, since Confederation, $72,316,029.95. The United States, assuming no debts of its States, pays no interest upon the debt which it does not assume. The Dominion of Canada has paid in interest on the debts assumed for the different Provinces, $98,344,248.20 from Confederation up to the present time. Then, as regards the Administration of Justice, I think I am right in saying that, in the United States of America, they pay the nine Judges of the United States Supreme Court, they pay Circuit Judges, nine in number, and they pay District Judges thirty in number. Outside of that, they incur no expenditure for the Administration of Justice. In the Dominion of Canada, we all know the state of things in relation to the payment for the Administration of Justice, and from Confederation up to the present time there has been paid for the Administration of Justice, $10,821,542.90. If Canada had based her system on the same foundation as that of the United States in reference to the Administration of Justice, we would certainly not have had to pay more than one-half of that amount. Then, in regard to Immigration and Quarantine, we find that we have paid $5,571,631.81 since Confederation. The United States Government pays little or nothing for Immigration and Quarantine. For Militia and Defence, this Government has paid $21,851,635.50 since Confederation. In the United States, they keep up West Point Academy, and a small standing army, but the Militia throughout that vast country is kept up at the expense of the different States, so that, if Canada had been in the same position as to these matters as the United States, it would have saved at least one-half of that sum. For Penitentiaries, we have expended since Confederation, $5,611,696.54. The Penitentiaries in the United States are supported, not at the charge of the Federal power, but at the charge of the different States. Then, we have expended for the salaries of Governors, $2,250,643.01. In the country to the south of us the salaries of the Governors are paid by the States and not by the Federal power. If Canada had set out on the same basis as the United States, she would have saved the assumed debts of the Provinces, the subsidies paid to the Provinces, the interest paid on the debt assumed from the Provinces, the amount paid out for Penitentiaries, the amount paid for the salaries of Governors, at least half the amount she has paid for Militia and Defence, at least half the amount paid for the Administration of Justice, and the whole amount paid for Immigration and Quarantine amounting in all to no less a sum than $309,860,987.40. The net debt of Canada to-day is $234,531,353; so that, if Canada had set out from the first on the same basis as the United States, and had made no payments that the Federal Government in that country does not make, she not only would have had no debt at present, but would have had a surplus of $75,329,624.40.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen may treat this as a good joke, but from their point of view it is no joke, for, as soon as this gets before the people and into the minds of the people, a stock argument of the hon. gentlemen opposite will be forever taken from them, which is their comparison on an unfair basis of the debt of the United States with ours, and always to the advantage of the United States and to our disadvantage. But, coming to the question of debt, Canada is not the country most burdened in the world in that respect. The whole of the Provinces of Australasia show a debt per head of $218.65; New South Wales, $199.20; Victoria, $156.82. Then France has a debt of $179.66 per head, and Belgium of $62.15. So that this country, as far as its indebtedness is concerned, has, in the first place, a debt which I believe is not disproportionate to its ability to pay; and in the second place, that it is not in a disadvantageous position when compared with other progressive countries in the world. Sometimes we talk of national debt as if it meant ruin and disaster. I have before me a table showing the net and funded debt of the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Baltimore and Philadelphia. Those five cities combined have a debt of $243,252,729, or $57.48 per head. Leaving the question of the debt for a moment, I come now to the question of taxation and its incidence upon the country. Before taking up that question, however, with the kind indulgence of the House, let me ask their attention to a fact which is patent to all hon. members, but which I repeat in order that we may bear it in mind as this discussion progresses. That is, that it is unfair to take the total revenue of the country as an index of the burden of taxation on the people. The total revenue is made up of the Customs tax and the Excise tax, and what we may call the gross earnings, such as the proceeds of our Post Office, the proceeds of our Railways, the proceeds of our Public Works, the tolls and fares, and fees, that are paid upon them for services which they render to the country. There are also public funds which are invested in different ways, which earn and yield so much to the revenue of the country, so that, in every case, we have first to take away the earnings from the total revenue in order to get at what is really to be denominated the taxation of the country—that is the Customs and Excise duties. I hold in my hands a tabulated statement as follows, showing:—

EARNINGS AND TAXATION by Customs and Excise Duties, and proportion to population, 1868-1888.

From this table it will be seen that in 1868, the earnings of the country amounted to $1,987,247.41, which was equal to 59 cents per head of the population. In 1888, the earnings amounted to $7,731,050.35, or $1.55 per head of the population. That is a gratifying increase in the earnings, which do not mean taxation, from Confederation up to the present time. The Customs receipts in 1868 were $8,578,380, or

Mr. FOSTER.

$2.54 per head. The yield from that source in 1888, was $22,105,926, or $4.44 per head. The Excise revenue in 1868, was $3,002,588, or 89 cents per head, while the yield from Excise in 1888 was $6,071,487, or $1.21 per head. The gross amount of taxation in 1868 was $11,700,681, an average of $3.47 per head, and in 1888, it was $28,177,413, or an average of $5.66 per head. That is a fair, plain and our did statement of the increase which has taken place in the earnings and in customs in this country from 1868 to 1888. Now, a distinction might be made between what we may call voluntary taxation and that which is not denominated strictly under that name, but which it is difficult indeed to find a term well to define. What I mean is this — and the statement may go for what it is worth, and it is made particularly with reference to a favorite method of comparison or calculation which states that the taxation of this country is so much per head of its population, as indicating, by the naming of it in that way, that every man, woman and child in the country has perforce to pay that much per head into the coffers of the country. Taxation, then, may be of two kinds—voluntary, and what you may call involuntary taxation. What I mean by it is this: I, for my part, do not use tobacco and do not use intoxicating liquor. My case, which is the case of hundreds of thousands, I think of millions, of people in this country —

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. FOSTER. If not of millions now, it will be by-and-by, at no very long period, when my pleasant friend, who is looking upon me, comes to think as I do, and as so many others of the people of this country do think. The total revenue for 1887-88 was $35,908,463.53, or an average of $7.22 per head. The earnings amounted to $7,731,050, which was $1.55 per head. That leaves $28,177,413 for what we call taxation, an average of $5.66 per head. But out of this £8 million odd dollars there was paid into the coffers of the country $8,084,780 for tobacco and liquors alone, an equivalent of $1.78 per head of the people. Now that is a voluntary tax. A man may pay that or he may not. If he chooses to think that these are luxuries which he wishes, or if he chooses to denominate them necessities which he must have, he pays a tax upon them. They do not fall in the line of such necessary articles as the staple foods and the staple articles of wear; so that if you take them out, it leaves a per capita taxation, on an average, in this country, of $3.88, instead of a total taxation of $5.66 per head. But, Sir, I wish to go a step further, and say that this method of per capita calculation is a clumsy and a misleading method, in my opinion, and I wish to give the House my reasons for it. The critic says: "There is a certain revenue which is collected in this country; divide that by the number of people in the country, and it gives you to-day $5.66 per head. For a family of five this means that they pay $28.30 into the coffers of the country. That is an inordinate taxation, and the poor man especially who lives by his day's work, is not able to pay that and keep his family together and live fairly prosperous in the world." Now, I say that the incidence of taxation, so far as my opinion goes, is not fairly stated by a calculation of that kind. I think we all agree that luxuries should pay most, and that necessary and staple articles should either pay less, or pay nothing at all; and that if taxation is to be laid, we, at least on this side of the House, believe that it should be so laid as to compensate, by its stimulation of industries, its employment of labor, and the increased consumption which it gives, for the taxation which is laid upon the country, and which is necessary for the carrying on of the Government. Now, if that be true, I affirm that Canada to-day, in her geographical position, with her natural resources, of the peculiar kinds that they are, is a country which is particularly happily situated for the system of taxation which has been the policy of this country from 1878 until the present day. For, Sir, Canada is a country which, in comparison with most other countries in the world, has an advantage in possessing an over-supply of the great staples which are necessary for food, for lodging, and for the staple wants of the country. She has her forests with their immense resources, and the houses that are to be built, the barns that the farmers and the people require, and these works which require lumber as their staple, find in the country itself great resources in that respect, with a surplus going every year into the foreign markets of the world. The same is true with reference to the great cereal productions of the world. Canada is a country which produces more wheat, produces more barley, produces more staple foods of most kinds than is necessary for the sustenance of her people, and in those ways she is happily situated so far as the great necessities of life are concerned. Now, to come down to what may be considered a very common, but I think, a very practical illustration, let me take the case of three persons to illustrate the incidence of the taxation. Here is your well-to-do man, who has means, who has luxurious tastes, and who is disposed to gratify them. With that no one finds fault, but this country says that if he is disposed to gratify them, and has the means to do it, he shall pay a tax for doing it if he goes outside the country to get his luxuries and to get the things which he desires. Sir, if such a man as that buys in the city of New York $1,000 worth of fine furniture and brings it into Canada, the country taxes him to the extent of $350 upon that. If he is musically inclined and buys a piano which is worth $1,000, he pays upon that, when it comes across the customs line, $230. If he is fond of statuary and makes an investment in that line to the extent of $500, he pays $175 in duty in bringing it across the line. If he buys expensive plate to the value of $500, the duty upon it is $150. If he wears jewelry, or buys it for his household and brings it from a foreign country to the value of $500, he pays $100 duty upon it. If he is fond of wine and lays in 20 dozen of champagne, he pays upon that a tax of $130. If he requires silks for the wear of himself and his family, to the modest tune of $300, and imports them, he pays a tax of $90. If he wishes a fine carriage and sees one to satisfy him there, and brings it across the line, and pays for it $500, he pays a duty of $175 upon it. Upon carpets for his house of extra make, which he may buy in a foreign market to the extent of $800 in value, he pays a duty of 25 per cent, or $200. Upon that modest stock of luxuries for a man of means who is disposed to gratify his desires in that respect, he has paid into the treasury of the country $1,600 in duty. That is one man's contribution, but it is the contribution of a rich man who wishes these luxuries, who imports them from abroad, and who, the country says, being able to pay for them, must keep up the revenue of the country by paying a tax upon them. Now, Sir, we will take No. 2, and that is the case of the farmer of this country, whom we all love, and for whom we all desire to do the best we can. The farmer of this country lives upon his farm in the rich Province of Ontario, we shall say. Nearly all the foods that are used by the farmer are raised upon his own farm and pay no duty; the wheat he raises he has ground at the neighboring mill, it is brought into his home and he pays no duty upon it. The home itself, the outhouses, the barns, all that is necessary in the way of housing for the work of the farm is built out of woods which grow in this country, of which we have a surplus and upon which he pays no duty.

Mr. McMULLEN. What about the nails?

Mr. FOSTER. The clothing for himself and his family is in many cases made from the wool which is raised by the farmer himself, or, if not raised by the farmer himself, he clothes himself and his family with the products of our mills, the raw material of which is admitted free. His lumber of all kinds, his furniture of all staple and solid kinds, his farming machinery, is made, and made to the best advantage, out of the woods of his own country. His fuel grows in the forests which are all about him, or is found in the mines in inexhaustible quantities in this country. So that, taking it in the gross, in the rough, the staple articles of consumption, and of housing, and of fuel for the farmer are those of which this country produces a surplus, which are free within the borders of this country and upon which not one cent of tax is paid. An hon. gentleman said: "What about the nails?" With that infinitesimal cast of mind which characterises him, out of the hundreds and thousands of dollars which are required to buy raw materials for the home, and which are free to the farmer who buys them, the hon. gentleman's mind leads him to look at the few pounds of nails which are necessary to keep the structure together, and upon which a duty may perhaps be paid. That argument, as an hon. gentleman suggests, is clinched.

Mr. LANDERKIN. All our farmers do not wear home-spun.

Mr. FOSTER. No. 3 is the artisan. He does not live on a farm on which he is able to raise what he consumes, but he lives in a village or town; but the articles of food which he buys, the clothing which he wears, the lumber he requires for house purposes, the furniture which he puts into his home, the tools which he uses to a large extent and the fuel he burns, which are the larger items in the expenditure of the artisan as well as in the expenditure of the farmer, are obtained in this country, which produces a surplus of them, and no duty is paid upon them. So, I say, that in this country with its present fiscal system and with its peculiar natural advantages, the system of tariff arrangement under which we live is one which brings the incidence of taxation where it should rest most heavily, upon the man who buys luxuries and has expensive tastes and is willing to gratify them, and least heavily upon the farmer, the well-to-do middleman and the artisan and upon the laboring class. There is this other fact, which I think is one of considerable importance, that the peculiar structure of our tariff arrangement makes this almost a necessity, at least it makes it a possibility, that the raw material which comes in as the material for manufactures is untaxed, and while the manufactured article pays tax, the stimulus given leads to the establishment of new industries, which in their turn gather about them labor and so afford employment to the people, and make in their turn centres for the consumption of the surplus products of the country. Sir, to make that argument just a little stronger, let me say that if hon. members will look into the customs returns they will find that more than 200 articles which enter into the manufacture of goods come in duty free, and that one-third of the total imports for home consumption were, in 1887-88, admitted free of duty in this country. Sir, the comparison is made as well between the debt of the United States and the debt of Canada as it is between the taxation of the United States and the taxation of Canada, and the basis in one respect is almost as unfair as the basis in the other. But, Sir, I have looked through the figures of the taxation borne by the people of the United States, and I find that if you take twenty-one years, corresponding to the life of the Dominion of Canada, in the United States, in Customs and Excise—that is what you may call tax—they have paid at the rate, taking the average of their people, of $6.64 per head during that period. If you take the amount paid by the people of Canada for Customs and Excise in the same time, the average for its population is but $4.94 per head, a difference in favor of the Canadian citizen of $1.70 on the amount of Customs and Excise taxation for the period of twenty-one years ending 1887-88. That is, if Canada, during those twenty-one years, had been as heavily taxed for Customs and Excise as were the people of the United States, they would have paid, taking our average population at 4,000,000 souls, $142,800,000 more than the people did pay under our reduced system of taxation as compared with that of the United States. If you take the last eight years, from 1881 to 1888, the taxation paid in the United States was $5.87 per head, and in Canada $5.74, a difference of 13 cents per head in favor of Canada for that period. For the year 1888, the tax per head in the United States was $5.51 per head, whilst in Canada it was $5.66, a difference of 15 cents in favor of the United States, which arises from the fact that the United States, undertaking none of that large class of expenditures such as we have in Canada, and which I mentioned a few moments ago, has from her surplus, with her large population and immense trade, paid a large amount towards reducing her public debt, and, consequently, is reducing the per capita rate of taxation which the people are obliged to pay. But, when you talk of taxation in the United States, you talk simply on the line of comparison of the federal taxes, forgetting that each State has also its taxes, and, if you add the taxation of the different States for 1887-88, which amounts to $1.08 per head, to the federal taxation of $5.51 per head, you obtain the total corresponding taxation paid by the people—$6.59 per head in the United States as against $5.66 in Canada, a difference in favor of Canada of 93 cents per head of the population. Why, sometimes people think that only a country like Canada, enjoying a protective tariff, has to pay Customs and Excise taxes. If we go to Great Britain, what do we find? We find the taxes gathered there in 1888 were as follows:—

Mr. FOSTER.

Customs .....	$ 85,158,253.36	amount per capita.	$2.30
Excise .....	124,551,485.20	do	3.36
Stamps .....	63,457,777.00	do	1.71
Land Tax.....	5,005,800.00	do	0.13
House Tax.....	9,428,400.00	do	0.25
Property and Income Tax...	70,178,400.00	do	1.89
Total Revenue .....	357,780,115.56	do	9.64

So there is a tax paid under these different heads of $9.64 per head of the population in free trade Great Britain. I undertake to say, after carefully looking into this matter, that taking the incidence of taxation in Great Britain and comparing it with Canada, it is much more severe and onerous upon the poorer classes of Great Britain than it is upon the poorer classes of Canada, and it does not have the beneficial effect there in the way of stimulating industries and giving employment to labor as it has in Canada. I find in France the tax per head reaches $12.86, or a difference in favor of Canada of $7.20 per head. In Australasia the tax per head is $12.79, or a difference in favor of Canada of $7.13. I think you will agree with me that in considering taxation, it is always necessary to have regard to the application of the money which is raised by taxation, and when we come to look into that a little we will find that Canada stands in a position of immense vantage ground in this respect, as compared with the United States of America or Great Britain. In the United States for the last year we find that they made the following payments:

Paid interest on debt.....	$44,715,007
Pensions.....	80,288,508
Civil expenses.....	22,852,334
Redemption of debt.....	83,084,405
Military.....	38,522,436
Navy.....	16,926,437
Total.....	$286,389,127

So that for those expenses alone, nearly all of which are for war, or for the results of war, or for the keeping up of the military status, there was paid by the United States $286,389,127, out of a total expenditure altogether of $342,738,364. Now, Sir, when you look at Great Britain, you will find my statement equally true with reference to the application of taxation. Great Britain last year paid the following sums in expenditure:—

Interest on debt.....	£28,213,911
Naval and military.....	30,758,687
Civil list and administration.....	19,691,950

Or a total of £76,674,548 sterling for these services, while only £10,749,097 was paid for the collection of revenue, Post Office service, telegraph service and packet service. I say that, having regard to the application of taxation, there is no comparison, as far as the benefit to the people is concerned, between the taxes which are raised in Great Britain and the United States and those which are raised in Canada. With the exception of the money expended as a result of the unhappy outbreak in the North-West, every cent of taxation, speaking in the gross, which is raised in Canada, and which has been raised here since Confederation, has gone, not for war, not for waste, not to make up the ravages of war or to pay for the consequences of war, but it has gone to construct productive public works which have repaid the country for the outlay and have made this a country where business is speeded, where commerce finds splendid facilities, and where the people have every resource at their command to make them a business people, with profit to themselves and prosperity to the country. It is sometimes said, and it is a potent word to conjure with, that "taxation" is a bugbear to the people. It is a bugbear to unintelligent people, but it is not a bugbear to intelligent people, and if conjurers conjure with it to-day they conjure with a word and an instrument which is not less reprehensible than the old instruments of the conjurers of other days. I believe it is a fact which stands upon a basis sound and certain, that taxation is the only gateway to progress and development in a country, and that if a people sit down and determine that from this day forth no taxation is to be raised, they sit down to a condition stationary and without progress and which will soon leave them very far behind in the race of nations, with the keen competition of to-day. Take a town of 10,000 people which to-day is without a sewage system, without a proper street system, without a police system, without lighting system, without a fire protection service; bring those 10,000 people together and let them look into the matter and come to the conclusion that it is necessary for promoting the health of the city and for their status, as compared with other and competing cities, that they shall have all these great public services. How are they to secure them? There is only one gateway through which they can march to the enjoyment of those enlightened and efficient services for their town, and that is through the gateway of taxation. The people of the city and the property of the city must be taxed, or they cannot secure, and cannot maintain the efficient services which every progressive city of to-day holds it must have. What is true of the city is true of the country as well. The point to be looked at is, as to how the taxation is applied, as to whether more is raised than is necessary for its proper application, and in considering whether or not the country is overtaxed, or unduly taxed. What have we in Canada as a result of what the people of the country have paid into the public treasury? We have, in the first place, an enlarged domain, and an enlarged population; we have added to the original four Provinces of Canada three other Provinces, and an extensive, almost illimitable country, illimitable in its acreage, and still more illimitable in its wealth of minerals and of timber, and of resources to be reaped from the cultivation of large and fertile tracts of land. That cost us money, and money had to be paid into the treasury, and out of the treasury again, in order to get this enlarged domain, and to make a place for this enlarged population. That is something to be considered as an offset against the amounts that have been paid in taxation. We have added to and developed our productive capacity as well. Lands that were useless because there was no access to them, and where, even if persons got to them, there was no way of getting the produce back from them, have been opened up by railways and by facilities for transporting these products. There was no other way of getting these facilities but by levying taxation upon the people and obtaining the money with which to build and with which to make those improvements. Why, Sir, not later than 1877, in Manitoba and the North-West Territories we were confronted by the fact that only 500 bushels of wheat were exported. In 1887 from Manitoba alone were exported 10,400,000 bushels of wheat, and in 1889 the estimate for Manitoba and the North-West is that their wheat yield will supply all the needs of the country and leave for export 20,000,000 bushels of wheat, with an acreage of 700,000 acres under crop. That is possible to-day because the people of this country chose to tax themselves in order, in the first place, to obtain possession of that part of Canada, and in the second place, to open up the country with railways and public works so as to make it possible for the people to till the land and to get the product of the land to the market. Then, Sir, we find that the transport charges have been very much cheapened. We have paid heavy sums of money for our canals, but we have got increased facilities and cheapness of transport for the outlay, and if these public works do not add directly in revenue to the treasury, they are of great advantage to the progress of the country and of almost untold benefit in promoting our commerce. In 1872 the tolls per ton through the Welland Canal were 16.26 cents, and in 1888 the tolls were only 12.52 per cent.; thus between 1872 and 1888 there has been a reduction in tolls on the Welland Canal of 23 per cent., and a reduction of the St. Lawrence rates of 48½ per cent. That is so much actually saved in the transport of those staple cereals and articles of commerce which floated out from the interior of the country towards the seaboard and to the great markets of the world, as well as the staples which come from foreign countries, and which make their way into the interior of this country by the same route; and although it is true to say that no increased revenue comes from these works, there is a broader way of looking at the matter. Although the public treasury is not enriched, yet the public business and the general prosperity of the country are made greater by the reduction of the tolls, and by another great fact, that the enlargement of these canals renders possible the use of a larger class of vessels, which carry a larger quantity of grain, and consequently at cheaper rates than could prevail with the old depth of water in the canals, when very much smaller and inferior vessels had to be used. And so we may set down as compensations for this expenditure, these facilities for business and an added attractive power which distinguishes the country in competition with other countries which do not possess these improvements; and if we are to go forward in the race of competition with other new countries to-day, it is a necessity, as well as a wise and prudent policy, to open up our country; but to open it up we require money to establish and maintain all these lines of communication, and we can only get the money by asking it from the people. But, I may be asked, is this thing to go on forever? Are we to be continually increasing our debt? Are we to be continually increasing the amount that we raise from the people in the way of yearly contribution? Sir, I think that to-day Canada, standing on the vantage ground of twenty-one years of progress, is in a better position to look out upon the future, with a greater probability of accurately forecasting what will be the result, than she has been at any preceding year of her history. The debts of the Provinces had to be assumed as the old Provinces were brought in. These have now been brought in. In the great territory which lies to the west of us, there are materials for other Provinces which, by-and-by, will have to be formed and furnished. The great St. Lawrence channel has been deepened; our canals have been largely built, and when the expenditures which are at present contracted for shall have been made in the course of about three years, we shall have a line of communication from the extreme end of the Great Lakes down to Montreal; we shall find a depth of water on the Sault Ste. Marie Canal of 18 feet, on the Welland Canal of 14 feet, and on the St. Lawrence canals and river a depth sufficient to carry the vessels which go through the Welland Canal down to Montreal, and so to the seaboard. We have built the Intercolonial Railway, the great line of communication between the Maritime Provinces and central part of this country; we have built the Canadian Pacific Railway, giving our large contribution to it, which connects that line of railway with the Pacific; we have given our contribution to the Short Line Railway, which within a few months will be open to the Maritime Province ports; and we have given other contributions to other lines of railway, more local, but not less useful in their nature. All the vast initial expenses incident to this opening up of our territory, and this completing of the channels of communication between our different Provinces, have been incurred; and it does seem as if to-day we are in a position to take stock of the future, and fairly to answer the question as to whether or not we shall go on rolling up the debt, as some of my friends would say—whether or not we shall go on taking larger amounts of taxation from the people. The engagements for the next three years for capital expenditure are, on a fair estimate, something like this:

	1889-90.	1890-91.	1891-92.
Canals.....	$2,636,521	$3,111,576	$3,310,103
Railways.....	1,200,000	.....	.....
Public Works.....	407,000	Est. 250,000	Est. 250,000
Railway Subsidies.....	1,095,204	229,387	.....
Redemption of Debt.....	2,417,267	5,000,000	1,800,000
Dominion Lands.....	100,000	100,000	100,000
	$7,855,990	$8,690,963	$5,460,103
Less—Redemption of Debt.....	2,417,267	5,000,000	1,800,000
	$5,438,723	$3,690,963	$3,660,103

Making a total for the three years of $12,789,789. Now, Sir, what have we to meet this with? We have an estimated three years surplus of $6,000,000; a balance from the loan still on hand on the 1st of July, 1889, of $2,500,000; and a sinking fund, which is to be offset against the public debt, of say $2,000,000 per year, making $6,000,000; a total of $14,500,000, to meet the capital expenditure of $12,789,789, leaving $2,000,000 for other capital expenditures than those I have mentioned. So that, putting these two facts and these two sets of items together, my own opinion as a member of the Government, and it is an opinion in which I know I shall have all reasonable support from my colleagues in the Government in retaining and maintaining, is that, taking for granted that the condition of the country during the three years to come shall be equally prosperous with its condition to-day, should no extraordinary events arise to cause extraordinary expenses, for the three years ending on the 30th of June, 1892, we ought to meet our capital engagements, pay what we have to pay in the running expenses of the country, and add not one dollar to the net debt of the country. What I mean is this, if I have not made myself clear, that counting in the sinking fund investment, which is laid up as against gross debt, we ought in the next three years to meet all our capital engagements to the amount I have mentioned, and at the end of that time have no greater net debt than we shall have on the 1st of July, 1889; and this is estimated on the basis of the tariff which we have to-day, without contemplating any increase in the tax rate. After 1892, with equal prosperity, with an increased population, and with consequently increased consumption and increased contributions to the revenue, on the same rate of tariff, I believe that, unless extraordinary events occur which call for extraordinary expenditure, this country ought to go on for a series of years without any increase of debt at all, providing for necessary capital expenditure and the services of the country out of the revenues which come in to make up the consolidated revenue of the country. That is my forecast, and one which I believe, if nothing intervenes of an unexpected character, will be fully carried out by the march of events. Now, I come to the question of the loan which has been put upon the London market, through the instrumentality of the High Commissioner, in June, 1888. It was placed on the market on the 15th June, 1888, the conditions being that the interest should be payable one-half yearly, 1st of January and 1st of July, at 3 per cent. per annum. The lowest rate at which a Canadian loan had been floated heretofore was 3½ per cent. This loan had been floated a few years ago, and it was believed, in looking over the field and seeing the state of our own securities and our 3½ per cents. and the state of the money market, that there was a favorable opportunity for placing upon the English market a Canadian loan at 3 per cent.—or at a less rate of interest than that at which any colony ever floated a loan in the London market. The minimum price fixed for this 3 per cent. loan was 92½, which rate was fixed, calculating upon the value of our 3½ per cents., which at that time, were bringing 104 or 105 in the market. The amount placed upon the market was £4,000,000, and the time fixed for the loan to run was 50 years. The reception of that loan upon the London market was gratifying, I am sure, to all Canadians. Not only was the amount asked for taken up, but £12,000,000 were subscribed, being three times the amount asked for. There is no doubt circumstances were somewhat favorable to the placing of the loan upon the market at that time, and I think great credit is due to the High Commissioner (Sir Charles Tupper) for selecting the precise time at which he should call for tenders. Being in London, his advices were acted upon by the Government, and having full knowledge of the state of the money market, he chose the time which, as circumstances afterwards proved, was the most opportune that could have been chosen in the year 1888, for the floating of the loan. I hold in my hand a statement of the different loans which have been placed on the London market since 1867. It is as follows:—

Mr. FOSTER.

*Or 50 years calculated for 25 years only.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman state the exact net product of the loan?

Mr. FOSTER. The amount of the loan was £1,000,000. The discount paid was £300,419 15s. 9d.; one per cent. commission, £10,000; stamps, £3,026 12s. 6d. Total amount passed by the Auditor to date, £243,446 8s. 3d. One quarter per cent brokerage £10,000; stamp duty, £9,778 11s. 3d.; printing and advertising, £2,350 13s. 0d.; stamps, £ 80; being a total of £222,309 4s. 3d., which is still held by the Auditor General for fuller information, but which, he informs me, he considers will be all right and be in the end paid. Total amount to be taken from the face of the loan for all charges, £265,755 12s. 6d., leaving £3,734,244 7s. 6d. as the net amount of the loan, and the rate is 3.27 per cent. The favorable nature of a loan is measured by the returns it gives to investors in comparison with other loans running upon the British market. Our 3½ per cents. at that date were quoted at 105½, which would return to the investor, redemption included, £3 4s. 6d per year. Our 4's, due in 1904 and 1908, were quoted at 109½, which would return to the investor, redemption included, £3 5s. 9d. Our 4's reduced, falling due in 1910, were quoted at 110½, which gave to the investor £3 6s. 0d. Our 4's, 1910-35, were quoted at 112½ which gave to the investor £3 9s. 0d.; whilst the 3's gave the investor, redemption included, as in the other cases, but £3 4s. 1d.; and as the advantage of a loan, as far as we are concerned, and the return to the investor bear an inverse proportion, it will be seen that the loan placed upon the market in 1888 is more favorable for Canada than the quotations as to the running loans upon the market and the other securities that I have mentioned.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does this loan bear a sinking fund?

Mr. FOSTER. No. I desire to say a word as to the amount which was asked for. Some criticism has taken place in the press, and no doubt some criticism will take place here, in regard to our having asked for a loan of £4,000,000, when we have, by our own admission, a certain surplus on hand unused. At that time we had to meet temporary loans at Glyn's and Baring's, amounting to \$6,252,106; we had to meet sinking fund and interest, payable in London on the 1st of July, amounting to \$2,147,354; we had to meet the redemption of debt in the current year of \$3,594,386, making in all, \$11,793,845. We had also to meet the redemption of debt in 1889-90, amounting to \$2,417,267, making in all, \$14,211,113, which we had to meet either on the 1st July, in reference to the temporary loans and the redemption of debt for that year, and during the current year for the redemption of debt in 1889-90. That would leave a surplus of \$4,250,177. Then we had to face a large capital expenditure which Parliament had already authorized on the canals, on the Sault Ste. Marie canal—prospectively, at least, and which is now under contract—and an expenditure for the St. Lawrence canals, running over three years. In addition to that, we had the railway to Cape Breton, which was under construction, and which will not be completed until the end of the current year. For all these, a large capital expenditure would have to be incurred. Taking these into account, it became a matter of choice if we should go on the London market for a loan of £3,000,000 at that time and pay all the calls upon us, with the prospect of incurring a larger amount of expenditure afterwards, leaving four or five millions of dollars which would be required within the next year or eighteen months for which we would have either to place temporary loans or to go on the market again, and it was decided that the most economical course was to take the whole amount at that time, because of the state of the market then, and because of the fact that the money would be required within the period I have mentioned. Besides, for temporary loans we have to pay 4 per cent., and sometimes more. We have not been able to get them at a rate less than that. It was, therefore, thought that the most economical course would be to borrow the larger amount and preclude the necessity of getting these temporary loans or going on the market for another loan. I suppose something will be said as to the disposition of the surplus, and I may as well make a statement to the House at this time as to that matter. On the 1st July we had at our command £1,000,000 which we needed to place somewhere. That million was in London. It was impossible at that time to get a rate of more than 7-8 per cent. for that money in London. The money market seemed to be filled. Rates were ruling very low, and there was no possibility of saying at what time a change would take place so that we might get a larger rate. Therefore, after thinking the whole matter over, it was considered best, as exchange was largely in our favor from London to New York at that time, to send the money by exchange to New York, under which operation we gained a fair sum for the exchange. We were running the risk of placing the money at a better rate of interest here than we could get in London. It was certain that we could get a considerably larger rate, and we could not know how much larger amount we might possibly get. Under these circumstances, the money was exchanged to New York, and, as I said before, a certain sum was made by the exchange. The money was then placed in four Canadian banks at the best rate they would give at that time, which was  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. It was the intention of the Government, taking into consideration the rates of exchange as they have been on the average for a number of years, to keep that money on deposit until the 1st January, and then, as the exchange would be, according to previous experience, likely to be favorable, to send the money from New York to London, under which arrangement a large amount would have been gained by the re-exchange, and those two sums so gained, being added to the amount received for the money deposited here, would have given us a much larger interest than we could have obtained by leaving it in London.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How did that work out?

Mr. FOSTER. It did not work out as we expected. The rates of exchange during the past year, as my hon. friend knows, have been altogether abnormal, owing to the slow movement of the cotton crop, the cost of wheat in consequence of the speculative prices which prevailed here and which precluded shipments, and to the large imports into the United States. Consequently, there was a difference in the exchange between New York and London which had not obtained for a long series of years, and there was altogether a difference in the normal rulings of exchange, so that, when the 1st January arrived, instead of there being the usual state of things, gold was being shipped to London, and it would not have been profitable for us to exchange to London. Under those circumstances, we made arrangements with the banks, and, according to the statement which I brought down to the House a few days ago, a large amount of this money remains in deposit in the Canadian banks at from 3 to  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., running until the 1st July, 1889. I suppose that no person can well make calculations in business matters extending over a number of years, on the basis of the records for that period, who is not liable to be upset in his calculations by the force of abnormal causes. Those causes have rather upset the calculations made for the present year, but this fact remains, that, when this money will have been returned to pay what we have to pay in London, taking all the cost and all the interest we have received for deposits, we shall find at the worst that we shall have paid for the million of pounds that we had on surplus for the year a rate not exceeding 4 per cent., which is certainly not more than we would have had to pay for a temporary loan which we would have had to make a year afterwards.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him one question? Was any obligation formally entered into on the part of the Government of Canada that they would use their sinking fund to purchase those 3 per cent. securities, and, if so, was that a positive obligation?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend means, if I understand him, are we to buy—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you to use your sinking fund to make purchases out of the 3 per cent. loan?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. I think, so far as my information goes, that our investments for sinking fund purposes are to be made out of the 3 per cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a positive pledge?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it was a positive pledge, I cannot speak certainly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman's predecessor can tell him.

Mr. FOSTER. But I know that is what we are doing, and that is, I think, what we should do, because I think it has its advantages, taken all in all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When the hon. gentleman returns after six perhaps he will be able to tell the House whether the pledge was a positive one or not. Something depends upon that.

Mr. FOSTER. I will be able to say, but I do not think it was a positive pledge. As showing the favorable nature of that loan of which I have been speaking, as compared with loans of other countries which were negotiated during the same year, I will read the following table, showing the loans effected by various countries in 1888, with the per cent., and price received:

	Loan.	Per Cent	Price Received.
Victoria .....	£15,000,000	4	£108 $\frac{3}{4}$
Mexico .....	3,700,000	6	78 $\frac{1}{2}$

In respect to the Indian loan, we all know that it is much the same as a loan by the Government of Great Britain itself. Some of those countries are fair countries for comparison with Canada; others may not be so fair; but, as is shown in the case of all of them, even of that of India, I think, considering the circumstances which rule in an Indian loan, as compared with a colonial one, the late loan by Canada, may be considered to be very satisfactory indeed. So much with reference to the loan. I now ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I turn to another and more interesting subject—the commerce of the country for the past year. In speaking of the commerce of Canada one can scarcely avoid taking into consideration the state of commercial operations and commercial confidence in Great Britain and the United States of America, because these two great countries, with which we have so large a commerce, and which have so large a commerce with the rest of the world, are, as it were, barometers of the commercial feeling and of the commercial enterprise of the world. I find that in Great Britain the year that has just passed has been a fairly prosperous year, taking it through and through, and trade in Great Britain, as shown from all advices, has steadily improved. It has been sound and progressive, and there has been an absence of speculation, which has been especially marked, and business is reported as being more active at the present time than it has been for many years past. A great impetus has been given to the shipping trade, and to shipbuilding in Great Britain, as in our own country, by the rise in freights that has taken place within the last year, and I find that the tonnage which was built in 1888 in Great Britain was nearly double the tonnage which was built in 1886, and largely in excess on that which was built in 1887. As a consequence of the revival in the shipbuilding trade and in the carrying trade, there has been a stimulation of the coal production, and the demand by shipowners and shipbuilders has caused a large output, and a rise of wages for those who work the mines. The iron industry has been helped as well, and cotton shipments have increased. One very good index of the state of Great Britain is that, whereas at the end of 1877, 20 labor societies, reporting a membership of 197,000 men, reported 13,700 unemployed, or 7 per cent., at the end of 1888, 21 societies with a membership of 249,000, reported only 8,200 unemployed, or 3 per cent. Throughout Great Britain, according to latest advices, there is a growing confidence and a cheery outlook for the trade in the future. Much the same may be said with the trade of the United States. The features of the trade of the United States for the last year have been its heavy output of pig iron, the highly satisfactory condition of its various industries and its cotton trade especially, and the large output of anthracite coal, the largest, I think, in the history of the country. In reference to Canada, hon. gentlemen are, I suppose, as well acquainted with the condition of the country as myself, and it would not be news to them to state that throughout Canada there has been a fairly average, or more than an average condition of trade, during the past year; that although the harvest was not of the best, it was compensated for its deficiency in quantity, in some parts, by a larger growth in others, and over the country generally by an increased scale of prices. The manufacturing industries are fairly prosperous, the textile industries especially, the large stocks which were held, as was the case in Great Britain and the case in the United States, having been worked off, the mills are now running on low stocks, with orders in advance, which is a far more healthy state of things than having large stocks on hand. I find that in Great Britain and the United States, and in Canada as well, there is an advance in prices, and there is an indication, in addition to an advance in prices, of a significant addition in wages in the large industries of the country. It would not be well for us to do otherwise than to note in our own country what is of so much importance to the shipping, especially of the Maritime Provinces, the large increase of freights which has taken place and which has made that industry, which, as far as the carrying trade is concerned, has not been very prosperous for the last number of years, look very encouraging, and bring in good returns to the owners of vessels. With reference to our foreign trade, the total in value was, in exports, $90,203,000, and the imports were $110,894,630, an increase in the exports of $687,189, and a decrease in the imports of $1,997,606; being a total decrease in the trade of $1,310,417. Our exports, I find, increased to the United States, France, Portugal, the West Indies, South America, China and Japan, Australia and other countries; and they decreased with respect to Great Britain, Germany, Spain, Italy, Holland, Belgium, Newfoundland and Switzerland, the decreases being small, with the exception of Great Britain, and the decrease in trade with Great Britain being largely due to the smaller shipments of cereals and cattle for which the causes are apparent to the country. I find the exports last year were the highest, with the exception of those of 1881, 1882, 1883 and 1884. The imports were the highest since Confederation, with the exception of 1883, 1884, 1887, 1872, 1873, 1874, 1875. The balance of trade is less against the country than in the preceding year, the percentage this year being 18.6 excess of total imports over total exports as against 20.7 last year, and against an average of 20.4 for the last six years. I am not going to discuss the oft-discussed question of the balance of trade which has been well threshed out in this country, and which I suppose is well understood by both sides of the House. But, Sir, I wish to say a word with reference to what I consider to be a very important point in comparisons, and in order to introduce it, I will read an extract from a speech which I think was delivered by my hon. friend opposite (Sir Richard Cartwright) at Oakville, on August 13th, 1888, and the extract I have taken is from the report in the Globe. The speaker said:

"How is it that we find that while in 1873 the total volume of the trade of the Dominion was $217,000,000 in value, yet in 1887, after eight or nine hundred thousand people had been added to the population in spite of exodus and misgovernment, instead of increasing, the volume has fallen off and sunk to about $200,000,000? How is it that we find that whereas fifteen years ago we had a total trade amounting to $58 per head, we have now, taking the figures of our opponents, a total of but $42 per head."

Sir, I think that the hon. gentleman need not have gone further than his own intelligence, and his own knowledge of commercial affairs, to have given the question a satisfactory answer. I wish to refer to it here, because I consider it is a comparison which is not strictly fair, and that other facts ought to be brought out in the statement of comparative trade, as shown by our returns, comparing 1873 with 1887, for we find, on looking into the values of goods in this country, in the United States, in Great Britain, and the world over, that 1873 was the highest year for values in a series of years from 1868, I might go further back, down to 1887, and that the lowest series of values was reached in 1887-88. There are two ways by which you can compare the trade of the country. You can compare it by its value, and by its volume. Our returns simply compare by value, and not by volume; and if, for instance, wheat falls 50 per cent. one year as compared with another, this country might export twice the quantity at the time of the lowest value, yet, according to the trade return, the exports would be no greater, and the idea conveyed would be that there was no greater production, and that no greater results came from the increased production of this country throughout. I have here a statement which has been prepared for a number of years, and brought up to date by Mr. Griffin, Secretary of the Board of Trade of England, giving the values of enumerated articles of export and imports for 1873, and from that year up. The modus operandi of getting at these returns is simply this: Mr. Griffin goes to the custom houses and obtains the declared value of goods as entered at the custom houses, and he then deduces therefrom the rate value. Having got the rate value in 1873, he applies that to the year with which he compares 1873, and he thus obtains a fair comparison of the volume of trade upon equal rates as between the different years. Looking at the matter in that light, we find that the total exports from Great Britain, according to the declared values, were, in 1879, $363,000,000; 1883, $427,000,000; 1884, $380,390,000; 1885, $371,000,000; 1886, $350,000,000. Those are at the declared values; but if we take the values at the rates of 1873 and compare them, we find, for instance, that whereas the declared value of the exports of Great Britain for 1886 was $350,000,000, its value calculated by the prices of 1873 was $509,000,000. That is to say, that, instead of the trade being but $350,000,000 in 1886, if the prices had been equal to the prices of 1873 it would have shown $509,000,000, or more than 50 per cent. increase in the volume of trade as compared between 1873 and 1886. If you take the imports in like manner, the declared value of imports in 1886 was $212,000,000; the value of the imports at the rate of 1873 was $349,000,000. So, in the case of exports they were 45 per cent. higher at the rate of 1873, and the imports 64 per cent. higher, as will be seen by the following figures:—

TABLE which shows in millions of dollars the value of exports and imports of enumerated articles and of all articles for the years named, both as declared and as calculated, at the rates of 1873.

Increase of 1886 over 1873, at prices of 1873, over declared values.....					45 p.c.		64 p.c.

While it is fair to say that there are the returns, and the values show so much in 1873, and so much in 1886, it is also but right to go behind that statement and enquire whether there has been a fall or a rise in prices as between those two years, and ascertain how the volume of trade compares between those two periods, for, unless you obtain those facts, you have not a fair comparison and you cannot make a fair statement with respect to the trade of a country. A comparison of the prices of various articles in 1873 and 1886 as shown by British Customs declared values shows the enormous fall that has taken place in prices since the first named year, as will be seen by the following figures:

Now, what I hold is this, and I think it is plain to every member of this House, that there has been a large fall in prices between 1873 and 1886, and 1887 and 1888. These prices taken in England, may be held as a fair index of the rise and fall of the prices in Canada—not in all articles, but in the staples in which we trade with Great Britain in the way of imports and in the way of exports. Therefore I think the conclusion is fair, that in saying that in 1873 the trade was $217,000,000, whilst in 1888 it was but $201,000,000, and thereby, trying to deduce the fact that the country is not so prosperous so far as its trade is concerned, you do not state the whole truth of the case. You have to go still further than this and calculate that there is a fall in values in the articles which I have mentioned, and to the percentage which I have mentioned, and in almost all other articles to a greater or lesser extent, and then you come to what I believe to be the true basis of comparing the commerce of the country, so far as regards the real advantages which are derived therefrom. You have to take into account the volume of trade, which you can only get by a comparison of prices between the years. A sufficient answer to the question of my hon. friend is this: that although the values in 1873 showed $217,000,000, the volume of trade in 1873, as can be easily seen from the fall in prices, was far less than the volume of trade in 1887, and, therefore, the prosperity of the country in all that pertains to enlarged commerce so far as this volume of trade is concerned, was greater in 1888 than it was in 1873. Now with reference to the foreign trade of the country. I think it can be discerned in the spirit of the country, and I find it in conversation with business men and on examination of the business enterprise of the country, that the spirit is developing in this country for increasing our foreign trade more than it has been increased for a number of years past, and for this there are causes which I shall mention presently.

B

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My friends on the other side are quite willing to bear me out in that statement, because, if it be true, as I have no doubt it is, they try to gather from that statement, some comfort for a lost cause of their own. The spirit for increasing foreign trade is developing in this country, and it is developing because of this reason. The time was when the trade and industries of this country were in a depressed state, when from 1874 to 1873 the doors of Parliament were besieged by the representatives of the industries of this country which were being slaughtered from the United States markets. Those representatives then came here and besought the hon. gentlemen who then occupied the Treasury benches to protect the industries and the trade of this country against ruinous competition. Why did they do this? Because, Sir, from 1866 until that time unavailing efforts had been made by both Governments, and by both parties, in all candor and earnestness, to have the trade between our country and the United States again placed on the basis of 1854 or some reciprocal basis. All these negotiations were unavailing, and in the end events had come to such a crisis that the people of this country were rapidly coming to the conclusion that if we could not get a reciprocity treaty with the country alongside of us, we should at least carve out a policy of our own, we should build up our own industries, we should give them the protection that was necessary towards building them up, we should make a commerce internal which we had been strangers to up to that time, and we should lay the foundation for reaching out to a foreign trade which can be only reached out to after that foundation has been laid in the internal industries and commerce of the country itself. Just as this Government came to the aid of the people in 1878, and gave them that measure of protection which established their industries, and which has encouraged and fostered them from 1879 to the present, just as the Government came to the aid of the country then, the Government is ready and willing to come to the aid of the country now and implement to the best of its ability this desire which is growing and stretching out from the true and solid basis of trade prosperity at home, into a foreign trade with other countries, so that we may compete with foreign countries in the different wares that we make and the different products that we raise. This country and this Government has always been desirous of extending its trade to foreign countries. In all honesty and candor that can be maintained and it cannot be denied. No matter what Government has been on the Treasury benches, no matter what party has been in power, there has been a continuous and a persistent attempt to cultivate better trade relations between this country and the United States of America in a reciprocity that should be fair and equally beneficent to both countries. The negotiations of 1866, of 1869, of 1871, and of 1888, all bear testimony to that. But, Sir, if the country to the south of us will not go upon the lines of the late Reciprocity Treaty, if it will not trade upon lines which are fair and equal to both countries, and if it continues to show, as it has done in the Senate Bill, and as it has in the President's Message, delivered only yesterday, its reiterated adherence to the high and strong protective system that it has placed about its trade—then, Sir, it becomes this country to build upon its own foundations, to develop its own vast natural resources, and to further strengthen the internal industries of the country which will enable her to extend her trade into other countries, and to meet there the competition which will be encountered as Canadians can meet it. This spirit of the people is being implemented by the Government. There are, lying to the south of us, countries that are willing to trade with us and in which an advantageous trade to Canada could be established. The vast country of South America, with its different governments, with its vast natural resources, with its demand for certain articles which we can supply of the best kind, is ready for trade with us on equal conditions with all other countries of the world. The West Indies, rich in elements of trade which complement ours and needing a great many of the products and manufactures which we can supply, afford a field for what we believe to be a permanent and profitable trade. In order to carry out that trade profitably we believe there must be not only regular communication between the two countries, but that there must be also fairly rapid communication as well. This Government is prepared, and has given indications of its determination, to implement the desire of our people to trade with those countries and build up a profitable commerce, and the Government has put in the Estimates, as we have seen, a sum which Parliament will be asked to vote to establish steam communication between this country, South America and the West Indies. I have no doubt at all that if this policy is fairly carried out, as I believe it will be, there can be worked up between Canada and those countries of which I have made mention a large and profitable trade even in the existing state of the tariff relations of the countries concerned. Lying far out to the east of us are China and Japan, and the Government mindful of the possibilities of trade in that direction which has already been developed, has pledged itself to implement the subsidy of the home Government to a direct line of steam communication between the western terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway on the Pacific coast and those countries. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has already for a number of months had its steamers on that line, and the possibilities of working up a fairly remunerative and profitable trade have been abundantly shown in that time. Why, Sir, to-day the surplus product of our cotton mills finds a profitable market in those distant countries, which a few years ago were inaccessible to a profitable trade, but which to-day, thanks to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and to the enterprise of this country in assisting in the construction of its road, and thanks to that same company for putting on this line of steam communication, we have a direct line, and one of the best lines, of communication with those great countries to the east. Then, down on the Southern Pacific Ocean lies a vast continent of islands, which have certain wants which Canada can implement, and certain productions which Canada can take; and the Government proposes to ask Parliament to aid in the establishment of a direct line of communication between our western coast and the colonies of Australia and New Zealand; and I think I am permitted to state here that advices which have been received from the Australian colonies are favorable to the consideration of the question of closer trade relations between Canada and the vast countries which lie in the Southern Pacific. Then, we have had an Atlantic service which for a series of years, though fairly good, has not been as good as it should be, taken in connection with the competing lines sailing to the great ports to the south of us; and the Government to-day are considering what means are best adapted for improving that service, and placing it on such a footing that Canadians need not be at all ashamed to compare their route with the lines of steamships which connect with the ports of New York, Boston and Baltimore. In all this there has been the double aim to develop the industry of the country within, and to extend our trade and commerce without. We have done the first, and now our competition is overflowing the borders of our domestic markets and seeking profitable markets outside; and I could, if time permitted, give the House facts which have been gathered from different manufacturers in this country showing to what an extent they have worked up profitable fields for their goods during the last three years in those distant countries of which I have spoken. And, Sir, I believe that to be the proper Canadian policy, that we should look first to this country, first to its industrial improvement and to the development of its great natural resources, that we should live in comity and peace with the nations to the south of us and all other countries in the world; but at the same time, that neither threats of non-intercourse, nor blandishments from without, nor specious pleas from within, should ever be sufficient to induce this country to hand over its commercial independence to any other country in the world. With a share of this continent larger in size than the Republic to the south of us, and immeasurably rich in natural resources, with a population the most hardy in the world by virtue of our climate, with immense productions of the great staples of the world's consumption and use, with a future before us of peace assured under a flag of a country which is the most powerful on the sea and the most powerful the wide world over, I believe that Canada's future lies in a path of steady, courteous treatment of all countries with whom we have intercourse, and of a steady persistent development of her own commercial lines of policy, for the benefit of her own people, and for a land which is to be the home of future millions.

After Recess.

Mr. FOSTER. When the House took recess, I was making some remarks with reference to the commerce of Canada and her development in one line of commercial enterprise. That was especially with reference to her foreign commerce, the tables for which are given in our blue-books, and which are the data upon which we must rely for our chief calculations with reference to the improvement of our foreign trade. It will, however, be apparent to the House that the foreign trade of a country is but one branch of the great stream of commercial life and enterprise which helps to develop a country and to transport its products from the place of production to the place of market. There is another branch of the commerce of a country which, although it may not be in the early stages, of so great development and so great importance, has, nevertheless, from the very start, an importance of its own which continually grows and continually widens, step by step, with the growth and development of the country; and in many cases comes to be, after a series of years, not only equal in volume to the foreign commerce of the country, but in certain particulars is of greater importance, and has a larger influence upon its development. Our returns and our statistics, unfortunately, give us but a very imperfect idea of the volume and extent, and the growth, year by year, of this stream of internal or domestic commerce, and what we do get is simply picked up here and there from sources which may be reliable of themselves, but which, being scattered, renders it difficult to generalise, from the information taken at various points, and difficult to come to a conclusion that can be relied upon to comprehend the full extent and full importance of our commerce. However, this much we may take as certain, that in 1867, at the time of the union of the Provinces, the domestic commerce and internal trade, as between the Provinces now forming the Confederation, was very small in extent, and, as I hope to be able to prove, it has been very rapid in its growth, until at present it has attained a development of the utmost importance to the country, and which deserves to be studied by all who would fairly appreciate our progress, and who would arrive at we right conclusions with reference to the effect of the policy have adopted. There were certain circumstances that made the exchange of internal commerce impossible to any large extent in 1867. In the first place, these Provinces which formed British North America, outside of Newfoundland, were scattered. Each had its own Government; each had its own commercial tariff; each had its hopes and aspirations bounded by its own limits; and the means of communication as between the different parts of each Province, and the means of communication between Province and Province, were of a quality and extent which were not to be compared to those that now exist, and their inferior extent must have been powerful in preventing any large internal exchange of products. Besides the hostile tariffs and the lack of communication, there was also a lack of mutual industries and of mutual knowledge. To build up internal commerce and to get the full benefits in unifying a country and in stimulating by the example of one part and the influence of one section, other sections to meet in point of trade the demand and the supply which are thus created,—in order to do that, there must be centres of industry in different sections of the country which become more or less the means of developing individual sectional resources and creating interprovincial demand and supply. By means of these centres an internal demand and supply is created which causes an interchange of products and builds up internal commerce. There should also be, besides these mutual industries, a mutual knowledge existing between the different parts of a country. Now, in 1867, that knowledge was at its minimum. The people of Nova Scotia may have had, in its different sections, a good idea of the Province of Nova Scotia as a whole. They knew a little of New Brunswick, but little in comparison to what they do now. Of Prince Edward Island and of Nova Scotia the same may be said, although these Provinces, lying more closely together and being more easily traversed, had a larger amount of mutual knowledge and mutual interests than existed between, say, the Maritime Provinces and the central part of the Dominion, or between the central part of the Dominion and the extreme western Provinces. So that, taking all these things into consideration, it is impossible that there should have been a very large stream of internal trade, and the growth that has taken place in that can be fairly appreciated by studying for a moment the growth of communications, the increase of lines of transport between Province and Province and between the different sections of each Province. Since that time, the whole of the Provinces have been placed under one central Government. Since that time, these have been joined together by lines of communication extending from the remotest part of the east to the Pacific coast, and branching out in hundreds of different directions to every section of the country, and all of these have means of communication, have had an influence, one cannot overrate, in developing sections through which they pass, as well as of rendering the general current of commerce and of communication more easy of constant flow. I believe, if we had the full statistics of internal commerce and domestic trade of this country, that to-day they would prove a revelation to our people, and we would place more store upon that increased domestic trade, instead of placing so much store by the whole stress of our investigation on our foreign trade, when we knew the extent of this current which is vivifying every part of Confederation in its internal progress. We may, however, get at something of this from different sources. Within the last few months, there has been sitting at various times and at various parts of the Dominion of Canada, a commission of labor appointed by this Government which has been examining into the condition of labor and the relations between it and capital in the various industries; and in the course of their investigations, a mass of most useful knowledge has been gathered, and is now compiled in their report, a study of which will help us to a better appreciation of many of these questions than we have hitherto been able to come at. I hold in my hand some gleanings prepared on the subject taken from the information gathered by that commission. Before taking up the items to which I have alluded, I find that the records of the Intercolonial Railway show that there is a steady improvement of trade which continues to develop between the Maritime and the Upper Provinces and the far west. Take last year's returns alone, and we find that the Maritime Provinces have sent to the Upper Provinces, coal, and fish, and refined sugar, and cottons, tackle and cordage and twine, hardware, woodenware, leather hats, cloths, woollens, chocolate, glue, dry goods, soaps, potatoes, oats, starch, manufactures of iron, cattle, machinery, boots and shoes, building stone, hay, fruit trees, plaster, lumber, grindstones, and numerous other articles of smaller volume. We find that the St. Lawrence provinces have sent manufactures of iron, flour and meal, coarse grains, oats, barley, corn, meats, agricultural implements, woodenwork, wire fencing, earthenware, paints and colors, hides, cheese, and numerous other articles. The Marysville Cotton Mill, a mill of very large capacity near Fredericton, reports sales in 1888 to the Upper Provinces over four times in advance of the previous year. We find the Nova Scotia Steel and Forge Co. of New Glasgow reports sales during the past five years of nearly one million of dollars, and they are making steady progress, and in tons their output for last year shows 35 per cent. increase over that of the previous year, and the sales for the Upper Provinces continue to increase. St. John Cotton Mills have sent between $900,000 and $1,000,000 worth of their products to the Upper Provinces the last four years, and their sales in 1888 to these Provinces were 70 per cent. more than those of 1886. We find the Moncton Cotton Mills report a steady increase in their sales to the upper Provinces. We find the Moncton Sugar Refinery reports sales to the Upper Provinces of 13,296,000 lbs. of their products. We find the Yarmouth Woollen Mills report 20 per cent. increase in their sales to the upper Provinces in 1888 over 1887. Coming now to the items of information in the Labor Report, I glean from the Royal Labor Commission report the following: Take the Province of New Brunswick. Mr. R. Butler, of St. John, says, "The demand for Canadian stone is becoming greater." Mr. Sutherland, of the Frenchport Quarry, says, "We have been sending stone to Ottawa and Hamilton, and grindstones and box stone to Montreal." Epps, Dodd & Co., of the St. George's Granite Quarries, say, "Two-thirds of our goods go to Ontario." Mr. Broad, of the St. Stephen's Broad Axe and Edge Tool Manufactory, says, "We ship to British Columbia and Montreal, and our agents in Montreal send all over Quebec and Ontario." Mr. Coutts, of the St. George's Granite Quarries, says, "Our market is principally in the United States and Ontario." Mr. Fowler, edge tool manufacturer of St. John says, "I sell springs and axles in Montreal." Messrs. Allison of St. John, dry goods and shirt manufacturers, say, "We sell all the goods in Montreal and the Maritime Provinces." Mr. Brown, harness maker, says, "We use altogether Upper Province leather. North-West hides are the best." Mr. Burnham, furniture manufacturer, says, "Some woods for furniture we get in Canada. What furniture we do not make ourselves, we get from Ontario and Nova Scotia." Mr. McAvity, St. John, brass founder, says, "We sell most of our goods in Ontario." Mr. Connors, of the St. John Rope Works, says, "We send a great deal of bindery twine to Ontario and Manitoba." A carriage builder says, "Very few American carriages are imported into St. John. There used to be a number imported a few years ago." Mr. Edgecombe says, "We get carriages from Guelph and Montreal." Mr. Robinson, carriage builder, says, "There are very few American springs imported now. We get leather tops from the Upper Provinces, other parts of carriages from Galt and Guelph. We import from away up in Ontario." Mr. Shaw, carriage builder, says, "We sell our carriages all over the Maritime Provinces, and we have sent some as far as Ontario." Mr. DeWolfe, of St. Stephens, carriage builder, says, "There is a great improvement in Canadian colors, and I think they compare favorably with any colors made. This year we have used Canadian colors principally." Mr. Ganong, confectioner, says, "We consider Canadian sugar fully equal to American. The average price has been lower than in the States. We use mostly Canadian." Mr. Bell, cigar manufacturer of St. John, says, "We sell and ship goods to Quebec." Mr. A. Gibson, of Marysville, cotton manufacturer, says, "We find our market all over Canada—Manitoba, British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec." Mr. Hazelhurst, Excelsior manufacturer, says, "We have sent Excelsior to Montreal." Mr. Russel, spool manufacturer, says, "We ship our Excelsior to different parts of the Dominion, as far as Toronto." Mr. Macfarland, manufacturer of small hardware, says: "We send all over Canada, as far as British Columbia." Mr. Ketchum, Coldbrook Rolling Mills, says: "We sell most of our iron in the Maritime Provinces and Quebec." Mr. Leetch, paper bag maker, says: "We get stock for our bags and tags in Montreal. We find it to be cheaper and just as good as that imported." Mr. Moore, nail manufacturer, of St. John, says: "Our trade with the west is limited, but we have sent copper goods to Toronto and Montreal." Mr. Thompson, manufacturer of paints, says: "We find a market all over these Provinces and down in lower Quebec." Mr. Nelson, paper manufacturer, says: "We send west to Toronto." Mr. O'Neill, boots and shoes, says: "We get our leather from Ontario. I find a great improvement in Canadian goods." Mr. Henderson, mantels and grates, says: "We have a market in Ottawa and Montreal." Mr. Stevens, manufacturer of hosiery, says: "We buy a great deal of fine yarns from Quebec Province." Mr. Vroom, manufacturer of slippers and oil-tanned larrigans, says: "We sell our goods principally in Ontario and Quebec, and get some leather from Ontario." Mr. Young, nut and bolt works, says: "The rivets that we make are mostly sold in Montreal. We are able to compete with Toronto and Montreal firms, and our business is steadily increasing." A few examples from Nova Scotia. Mr. Allison, of the J. P. Mott works, says: "The consumption of chocolate all over the Dominion has steadily increased for some years back." Mr. Boak, fish merchant of Halifax, says: "We ship of fresh fish between 200 and 250 tons in the season, most of it to the Upper Provinces." Mr. Oland, brewer, says: "We get about 500 bushels of malt a week from Ontario." Mr. O'Mullin, brewer, says: "We purchase our malt in Ontario." Mr. Smallwood, of the Acme Skate Factory, says: "We sell our skates all over the Dominion." Mr. Stairs, Dartmouth Rope Works, says: "We send cordage to Ontario and binder twine to Ontario, Manitoba and the North-West." Mr. Turnbull, of the Nova Scotia Sugar Refinery, says: "75 per cent. of our output goes into Canada, throughout the Dominion." Now, these are but some samples of what a more diligent and extended examination would show to be a large and increasing volume of trade which is taking place and continually growing between the outlying portions of this Dominion, and especially in this respect between the Maritime Provinces and the Upper Provinces, and conversely. If we take again, as an index of this trade, the statistics of the Intercolonial Railway, the great central line of communication between the Maritime Provinces and the west, we find a very instructive series of figures, some of which I have tabulated, and will read to the House. In 1876-77, the number of tons carried over the Intercolonial was 421,327. In 1887-88, the number was 1,275,995 tons, an increase of 202 per cent. In 1876-77, 254,710 barrels of flour were carried over the road, and in 1887-88, 845,750, an increase of 232 per cent. The grain carried in 1876-77, was 292,852 bushels, and in 1887-88, 1,211,540 bushels, an increase of 314 per cent. In 1876-77, there was carried 58,096,475 feet of lumber, and in 1887-88, 196,444,819 feet, an increase of 238 per cent. The number of live stock carried in 1876-77, was 37,414, and in 1887-88, 90,439, an increase of 141 per cent. The quantity of other goods carried in 1876-77, was 311,756 tons, and in 1887-88, 877,395, an increase of 181 per cent. The passengers carried in 1876-77, were 613,420, and in 1887-88, 996,194, an increase of 62 per cent. The earnings in 1876-77, were $682,549, and in 1887-88, $1,778,539, an increase of 160 per cent. The working expenses in 1876-77, were $896,175, and in 1887-88, $2,065,538, an increase of 130 per cent. Taking the tons of raw sugar shipped from Halifax and St. John, we find that in 1884, 21,538 tons were shipped, and in 1888, 23,742 tons, an increase of 10 per cent. The tons of refined sugar shipped from Halifax, Moncton and Dartmouth in 1884 were 20,796, and in 1888, 30,917, an increase of 49 per cent. The tons of coal shipped from Nova Scotia to the Chaudière Junction were in 1884, 112,898, and in 1888, 184,662, an increase of 64 per cent. I think, Sir, that no person can read this table of increase and percentages of increase, without being struck with the enormous development of the traffic on that the great central line of communication between the Maritime and the Upper Provinces.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before the Minister passes from that subject I would like to enquire whether there are any conclusions or estimates as to the amount of our internal commerce last year, in dollars, as a whole?

Mr. FOSTER. None that I know of, it is impossible to get it. There are no statistics which will give it; we can only get bits of information and generalise as best we can from these. I have here a statement of the principal articles transported over the Intercolonial Railway from the Upper Provinces to stations in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick:

Articles.	Tons.
Iron and manufactured iron.....	1,372

Passing from the indications which are given by the figures which I have read as to the amount of trade which is taking place in an increasing volume over the Intercolonial Railway, and between the Maritime and Upper Provinces, and conversely, let us enquire for a moment what is taking place on a different element and by a different mode of carrying power, as is shown in the coasting trade in the Dominion of Canada. I have here a table the results of which, I think, will be equally satisfactory to the Canadian who is proud of the progress of his country, as the figures which I have read of railway traffic over the Intercolonial Railway:

	1879.	1888.	Increase.	Per cent.
Canadian coasting trade.	$12,066,683	$18,789,279	$6,722,596	56

In respect to the steamer tonnage, we find, as shown above, an increase of 50 per cent. during those two periods. Of sailing vessels, the increase was 73 per cent, showing that although there is a large increase in the steam tonnage of coasting vessels, the sailing vessel, for coasting purposes, still keeps its place ahead of steam. These figures and this progress, while gratifying to all Canadians—because now all Canadians take an interest in every section of this country—must be particularly gratifying to the representatives and the people of British Columbia, who are so proud of their beautiful Province and who have such confidence in its future development. Sir, we find that the development of the coal trade gives us another indication which may be relied upon, to a certain extent. Coal and iron, of course, are being stimulated in their production, output and manufacture. The coal product in Canada in 1868 amounted to 623,392 tons; the produce in 1888 was 2,449,793 tons, an immense increase mainly taking place in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton, and on the Pacific coast, although the coal areas, which are known to exist all over the North-West, are being profitably worked at several points, and the output is largely increasing in the great west, or the middle section of our country. Taking the Canadian Pacific Railway, the great line of communication which joins our central system with the Pacific coast, we find that the increase of interprovincial traffic is also satisfactory. The tons carried by the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1885 were 1,996,355; in 1888 they were 2,508,600. Passengers carried in 1885 were 1,660,719; in 1888 the number was 2,239,800. The earnings of that road in 1885 were $8,368,493; in 1888 the earnings were $13,195,535. The inter-provincial tonnage carried east and west from Port Arthur during the 11 months of 1887-88 are as follows: In 1887, 176,421 tons; in 1888, 278,213 tons, an increase in the 11 months of 101,792 tons. The Asiatic freight also furnishes an indication of the stimulation of domestic industries carried out in exports to a foreign country, and I think it would not be uninteresting to the House, in this conjunction, to have the figures of actual proceeding. In 1887 the inward and outward Asiatic freight was 11,589 tons; 1888, 13,048 tons. In 1887 the quantity of tea carried was 13,805,022 lbs.; 1888, 13,444,269. In 1887 the silk carried was 466,687 lbs.; 1888, 475,014. In 1887, general merchandises, 2,388,158 lbs.; 1888, 2,056,787; In 1887, cotton goods, 5,798,173 lbs.; 1888, 8,826,772 lbs.; In 1887, machinery, 55,591 lbs.; 1888, 467,539 lbs. In 1887, general merchandise, 486,608; 1888, 298,037. In 1887, cotton goods from Canadian mills, 1,742,205 lbs.; 1888, 2,009,947 lbs. This bears out the assertion I made in the early part of my statement that there has been a decided increase in the exports of Canadian cotton mills to China and Japan. As showing the movement of grain in Manitoba and the North-West in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway it may be mentioned that in 1887 the grain moved by the Canadian Pacific Railway from Manitoba and the North-West reached 11,741,160 bushels, while the local grain movement in Manitoba was 1,248,219 bushels, making the total grain movement over the Canadian Pacific Railway that year 12,989,379 bushels. From these indications, which are after all but partial indications, I think we may be justified in believing that the development of the internal commerce of this country has marched apace, as it was natural it should do, with the opening up of new sections, with the establishment of industries and especially with the establishment of facilities for communication between outlying parts of the same Provinces and between the different Provinces forming the Dominion. I will weary the House no longer with my statement so far as that is concerned, believing however that the items gathered with a good deal of pains and trouble cannot but be interesting and instructive to the people of this country. And now, in conclusion, I will ask your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, while I call the attention of this House to an extract from a speech delivered by the leader of the Opposition at Oakville, in August, 1888, as it was published in the Globe. The hon. gentleman, speaking there made this, as I think, extraordinary statement. He said:

"It is now 21 years since Confederation was established. We started with the hope—is it not true?—we started with the hope, as it was told at that time, that we would link together the British Provinces on the continent of America, that we would bind them together with ties of affection and mutual pride and that we would make them a nation. Such was our dream, such was our hope often expressed, often repeated. Now, I ask every one in this audience, no matter what may have been in the past his political predilections, no matter whether he has been a Conservative or a Reformer—I ask every one in this audience, looking back over the time, how far have we advanced in the task we set ourselves to perform 21 years ago? Sir, the painful answer must be that we have not advanced one iota, one single jot."

The House and I think the country as well will understand why I denominated this an extraordinary utterance for a gentleman who has the political knowledge, and who I believe has at heart—I should like to believe at least that he has at heart—that patriotism which a Canadian statesman should possess. What are the assertions he makes? First, that what we have set out to do was to link together the British Provinces on the continent of America. We have not advanced one single jot in that respect, says the hon. gentleman. Second, to bind together in bonds of mutual affection and pride the people of this country. We have not advanced a single iota in that direction, says the hon. gentleman. Third, to make of this country a nation. And there has been no advance in that regard. Sir, I think an hon. gentleman who could make an assertion like this in view of the 21 years of progress of this Confederation must have shut his eyes to every part of the record which was plainly written before him, if he could not see the progress made in every part of this country towards linking together these outlying Provinces. I think he must have closed his ears to the sounds of progress which would have greeted them if he had kept them open from every part of the country, showing with every fall of the hammer, with every turn of the wheel, the mutual interests which were being welded together, and which were being brought into play on the line of making these people interdependent on each other, of making them essential to each others wants, and especially linking them together in the bonds of commercial union and in the bonds of social and political union as well. Let me take up, if you please, Mr. Speaker, these items a little in detail. First, the hon. gentleman said we have not made a single step in advance towards linking the Provinces together. I think the visitor who approached these shores in 1867 and took a survey of the Canadian Provinces as they were then and the same visitor who returns to-day to our shores and takes a survey of Canada as it is to-day, cannot but be impressed with the sharp contrast presented in every line, and particularly in the condition of the country now as compared with the condition of the country then. At that time we had Provinces widely scattered, with hostile tariffs, with no lines of communication. The Maritime Provinces during seven months of the year had no way to reach the Upper Provinces except through foreign territory, and no way during the other months of the year except by a long circuitous route by the sea. The two Provinces in the centre of the country had no access to the great country of the North-West except through a foreign country part of the way and then to make an overland journey by river or by vehicle into some portions of the country in the North-West. The North-West itself was a terra incognita, it was unknown even to the few people who lived in some sections of it. It was as unknown as is the centre of Africa to the people of the Maritime Provinces, and to the mass of the people of the two centre Provinces as well. The mountains that run north and south between British Columbia and the North-West forbade all intercourse between that country and the Pacific Province. Now, what appears? The visitor who comes here to-day finds a very different state of things. He finds Nova Scotia intersected with railways running to almost every important part of the country. He finds New Brunswick intersected with railways, possessing a larger mileage in proportion to her population than probably any other country in the world. He sees long lines of splendid communication stretching from Halifax to Montreal, stretching from Montreal to the Pacific and joining with steamship lines east and west, thus forming a communication which unites the great east in Europe with the great east in Asia by the shortest and best route for much of the commerce and for the largest proportion of the passenger traffic between those great sections of the world. He found then, Sir, different Governments, he found then different tariffs, he found then the hopes and the thoughts of each Province bounded within itself, without any great future to look to; and no student of history either in the past or in the present will fail to see the vast effect, and the mighty developing influence that the hope of an expanding future has upon the growth of a young country. Make it believe that there is nothing in the future in point of great development or of national status, that there is not a future of hope and promise and you have put one of the strongest limits to a country's developing powers. To-day we find Nova Scotians, New Brunswickers, Prince Edward Islanders, men from Ontario and Quebec, and every other Province, not feeling so much that they are bound by the limits of their own Province, but believing and feeling and working out that feeling and belief that they are now citizens of a larger country, that they are citizens of a country which, in extent and in resources, is greater than most countries of the world, and is inferior to but few. We live now under one Government; we have the uniting power which comes from a common political literature; we have all that uniting power which comes from a common commerce and intercourse which spreads from end to end of the country along well travelled lines, and it is simply astonishing to me that a man of intelligence and a man of patriotism can stand up in any portion of Canada in this year 1888, and can say that, as far as linking together the Provinces, there has not been a single step made in advance from 1867 to 1888. That hon. gentleman said, in the second place, that what was proposed was to bind the people together in ties of mutual respect and affection, and that in that direction no advance had been made. I take issue with my hon. friend on that point and take issue with him most strongly. I, as a New Brunswick man, plead guilty to ties of mutual respect and affection for my hon. friend, with his kindly manner, with his cultured intellect, and, Sir, I should never have known my hon. friend, in all probability, had it not been that these Provinces became united, and that in this gradual getting together of people from different parts of this country I became acquainted with him. What has taken place in this one particular is but a sample of what is taking place every day, for the people of one part of the country become acquainted with the people of another to whom they would have remained strangers for ever if it had not been that the Provinces were united into a one country, with a common Government a mutual commerce and a common political centre. It is hard to analyse and it is most difficult to estimate the real importance of what takes place in this silent and quiet way. Every visitor from the remote part of one Province or who goes from the older Provinces to the far west, has a power injected into his life which finds its way out into the associations of his whole after life, and which acting upon many units in the way in which it acts on the one does more than we can imagine to make us one people, and to combine together in ties of mutual affection and esteem the people of this common country, living as they do under one common government. The hon. gentleman said that what was proposed at the outset was to make of this country a nation; whatever he could have meant by that, whether it was meant that the country should take gradually upon itself the larger life, the more generous sentiments and the confidence and pride which comes from greatness continually in progress and continually in growth or whether my hon. friend meant Independence I do not know. I do know that whether it be one or the other, as far as all essential elements of growing nationality and greatness are concerned, there has been a power at work in this Dominion of Canada from 1868 to 1888 which has simply been marvellous in its width and its force, as well as in its resultant effects. What are the elements of national life whether you mean independent national life, or whether you mean the life of a great half continent like ours united in mutual bonds of affection of blood and of common nationality with other countries equally large in extent and greater in population all belonging to the one great Empire, what I ask are the elements of national life? They are great resources, great industries, great traffic and consequent great development. Look at the resources of this country. Has there been no revelation from 1868 to 1888?

Mr. MILLS. None whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. None whatever, says my hon. friend. Well, there never will be so long as such a Bourbon as my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is a judge of what has been a revelation. Has there been no revelation of the great resources of this country to the people of Canada from 1868 to the present time?

Mr. LANDERKIN. The national debt.

Mr. FOSTER. Has there been no revelation of the immense resources in lands which belong to the country and of the productive soil power which at the time of Confederation was not dreamed of by the inhabitants of the country; has there been no revelation of our great resources of mines and mineral wealth. My hon. friend who sits opposite to me (Mr. Charlton) has been for the last few months a worthy member of a Mining Commission which has gone east and west and north and south. I have read speeches by that hon. gentleman, and I have read reports of the investigations of that commission, and I believe I am perfectly right in saying that within six months a revelation had been made to my hon. friend himself of the resources and variety and value of the mining riches of this country. In the North-West and in parts of the older Provinces these resources are gradually coming to light, until to-day, in the Dominion of Canada, resources which are of immense extent and which in the future will become immense sources of wealth to this country have become apparent to all.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes, if we can get them developed.

Mr. FOSTER. Sir, has there not been an increase in great industries since 1868 till to-day? That question has been so often discussed on the floor of this House, and has a literature which is so well known to the people of this country, that it would be bold in me to attempt to take up the time of this House for a single moment in trying to establish the fact that from 1868 to 1888 there has been an immense stride forward in the establishment of industrial life and of industrial centres in this country. Has there been no great and growing traffic in this country? Why, Sir, our export trade, judged by values alone, has increased from 1868 to 1888 60 per cent., and our total trade 50 per cent; and if the difference in value were taken into account, the trade in volume would be found to have increased in those twenty years more I believe than twice its amount. To-day the Dominion of Canada, in the 21st year of its existence, has a foreign commerce, in addition to its internal trade, amounting in value to $41.40 per capita of its population, while the United States has a per capita foreign trade of but $:3. Now let me ask this House to listen to some few statements which will show by the strongest kind of argument, the immense development which has taken place in the manufactures of this country. I have before me a table of the averages and percentages of raw material imported into Canada for home consumption, the items of which show an immense development of industrial life, and consequently of trade life of the country. In order to make this statement as fair as I possibly could, instead of taking single years and comparing them, I have taken two years at the beginning and two years at the end, and compared the average of the two years together in each case. These figures I will hand to the reporter, so that they may be spread upon the records:—

Mr. FOSTER.

This table, Sir, shows the immense progress which has been made in the importation of raw materials which go into the industrial establishments of this country, and which are worked up by the labor and industry of the country, showing, in the first place, a development of industrial life and product of the country, and in the second place, what is a corollary of that, an increase in the internal commerce of the country. In the exports from Canada the same development is shown :

From this it will be seen that the discounts in charter banks show an increase since Confederation of 243 per cent. The total production of coal shows an increase of 293 per cent.; the total consumption of coal shows an increase of 631 per cent.; the total average of fire insurance at risk in Canada, shows an increase of 263·7½ per cent. All these goes to prove the immense development which has taken place in the country as regards its industries, as regards its moneyed institutions, as regards the savings of the people, and as regards the general indications and the general business prosperity of the country. In the face of all this knitting together, in the face of this better acquaintance and of consequent better appreciation, which has been so powerful an agent in our progress, during the twenty-one years of Confederation—in the face of all these evidences of great material development, I think the statement of my hon. friend was an extraordinary statement—an untrue statement—an unfortunate statement and one which had far better remained unsaid, that from 1868 until to-day, we have made no step forward in linking together the different Provinces, in making the ties of mutual respect and affection stronger between the various parts, or in building up these elements which go to make a nation. In concluding the statement which, by the kind indulgence of this House I have been permitted to make and which, I must say, has been listened to with such kind attention by hon. gentlemen on both sides, allow me to add that I believe Canada now, having attained her majority of twenty-one years, has, as I said at the opening of my remarks, a record which can be regarded with just pride and admiration. Looking back upon her progress during the past 21 years, we can be filled with the fullness of hope for her progress in the untrodden future, confident in the vastness of her resources, in the intelligence and commercial fibre of her people, in the enterprise of her business men, and in the great facilities for commerce, which, thanks to the generous expenditure of this people and the Government are found in those great lines of communication which permeate all parts of the country—resting upon these and their certain influences and effects, I believe that Canada, to-day, can look forward to a future full of peace, of plenty, and of continued prosperity. So far as I am concerned, as a citizen, and I hope not an unobservant citizen, of this country and of the course of her past history, and as a lover of my country, wishful for her peace and prosperity, for her best and safest political status, I believe that we have every reason to be fond of and to look with pride on Canada. Whether we be Frenchmen or Englishmen or Scotchmen or Irishmen or Swedes or Icelanders or Mennonites, the welding progress is at work, and every day we are becoming more truly Canadians in heart and sentiment, attached to our country, confident in its resources, and hopeful of its future. In moving that you do now leave the Chair and that the House go into Committee of Supply, I beg to state that although a great many representations have been made to myself as Finance Minister and to my colleague the Minister of Customs, with reference to changes and re-adjustments of the tariff,—many of which have had some merit in themselves and others of which seem to have had little merit, so far as commending themselves to our attention for change or re-adjustment was concerned,—I have made the statement which I made to-day upon the basis of the present tariff arrangements, feeling certain that if upon fuller consideration of some few points which yet remain to be decided, any re-adjustment or change may take place, it will not be of a character and importance to materially alter the statement which I have made or change the basis to any large extent of what we may hope to receive from the different revenues of the country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In much that has been said, I am glad to say I agree with the hon. Minister of Finance; and as no doubt it will promote the harmony of this evening, that I should do so, I will first enumerate the points on which I agree with him, before it becomes my unpleasant duty to insinuate certain doubts which exist in my mind as to the perfect accuracy of his statement in other respects. First of all I agree entirely with the hon. gentleman in saying that if you dwarf the aspirations of a young and growing people like ours, you are sure, as the hon. gentleman has rightly said, to do it an infinite injury; and I append to that the rider that you will do exceedingly great injury if you refuse to a young and rising people, the right, under proper conditions, to make its own treaties and to appoint its own negotiators. I agree also with the hon. gentleman to the fullest extent that it would be most desirable that we should link together the various sister Provinces of this Confederation in the closest bonds of union. No man can feel that more intensely than I, but I beg leave to doubt whether the facts disclosed in our own records, to which I took occasion to call the attention of this House and the country some few months ago, such facts as that by the last census we possess persons natives of Ontario there were settled in the Maritime Provinces only 748 while on the other hand, twenty-five years ago there were 7,600 natives of the Maritime Provinces to be found in Ontario alone and in 1881 the number had been reduced to 7,200—I beg leave to doubt if facts like these are altogether indicative of that close and cordial and intimate union, which I, as well as the hon. the Minister of Finance, so much desire to see. I agree entirely with the hon. gentleman that the value of every financial statement depends to a very great degree on the accuracy of the estimate which the Minister of Finance, for the time being, shall be able to make of the expenses of the year to come, and I propose a little later on to give this House some very remarkable illustrations of the marvellous accuracy that has been attained during the last few years by the hon. gentleman's predecessors in that particular. I will add that another most valuable index of the value of a financial statement consists in the honesty with which the public accounts for years past have been prepared and the accuracy with which the items properly chargeable to income are charged to that account and not to capital. With respect to the volume of trade, I am entirely in accord with the hon. gentleman that you must consider value as well as quantity. But the hon. gentleman, not being as old a member of the House as some of the rest of us, is not aware that I spent tedious hours in endeavoring to teach the hon. gentlemen beside him that elementary truth eleven years ago; but I preached to deaf ears, and could not convince those hon. gentlemen, (though the proof was clear and incontestable) of that simple elementary fact, the truth of which the hon. gentleman has now discovered, that you must take value as well as quantity into account in estimating that. I advise him to extend the educational process, he has begun, and try to convince the hon. gentleman on his right, and the hon. gentleman on his left, of that truth, of which I was not able to convince them. So I agree with him that it is quite fair, in discussing deficits, to consider that the large amount which is put to sinking fund may be fairly reckoned as a matter of offset but when I expounded that doctrine in 1877-78, I was met by the colleagues of the hon. gentleman with shouts of derision; and again I urge upon the hon. gentleman the expediency of instructing his colleagues on the right and on the left in that elementary principle of finance. We all admit on this side of the House, and we all agree, not merely in principle, but in practice, and when we were in power, we put our principles into practice; that it is most grossly unfair that a poor man should pay more taxes than a rich man, in proportion to his means. Why, that is the fundamental principle of our opposition to the hon. gentleman's protective tariff. Every specific duty which he lays on, pro tanto, is an injury and an injustice, and does inflict a heavier tax on the poor man than on the rich man. When I look around the House, and see that probably my hon. friend himself, probably myself and probably my hon. friends around me are wearing garments which came into this country at a tax of 20 per cent., whereas our poorer neighbors have to pay 30, 40, 50 and even 60 per cent. for their garments under the present tariff, I agree with the hon. gentleman that it is most grossly unfair that poor men should be compelled to pay twice and even three times as much as rich men pay, as they do under the present tariff. I agree again with the hon. gentleman that all over the world the rate of interest has fallen, immensely within the last few years, and also in the fact, which he did not state so clearly, though no doubt a gentleman of his intelligence saw it, that it is therefore that to-day loans can be made on better terms than they could a few years ago. That likewise is an elementary truth which I am glad to see he perceives, but which it was very difficult to convince his hon. colleagues of in discussing the transactions which have taken place in the last few years. And here I will take the opportunity to say—though I shall refer to it at greater length later on if time permit—that, on the whole, I am glad to bear my testimony to the fact that, as far as I can judge, the last 3 per cent. loan was a good loan, was well made, and the time well chosen. Further, I am agreed with the hon. gentleman, that it is most desirable that we should have larger trade with other countries, that there is a great and increasing sentiment all over this country, in favor of an enlarged trade with other countries; and I advise him, and I advise the Government and the people of Canada, to seek that trade where it can be found a hundred times better in quantity, and twenty times more profitably to us—next to us, at our doors, within half a day's journey of us—than to go ten thousand miles away, and ransack the Antipodes for a trade which, when we get it, will not be worth one hundredth part of that which I am afraid the hon. gentleman is disposed to turn his back upon. I also agree with the Minister of Finance—and I am delighted to find that there are so many points of agreement between us—"that our manufacturers could meet competition as Canadians can meet it, and ought to meet it. That is our doctrine also, and I believe the best manufacturers in Canada will endorse that doctrine. They do not want, as I believe, a hot-bed protection; and, if the facts are true as stated by the hon. gentleman, if the time has come when Canadian cotton manufacturers are able to undersell English goods in neutral markets, does not the hon. gentleman perceive that the obvious inference is that our manufacturers must be able to manufacture as cheaply as English manufacturers, and that therefore they do not need any more protection? I am therefore surprised that the hon. gentleman does not propose to reduce the duties on cotton manufactures, because I cannot possibly imagine that he means that it is to the public advantage that Canadian manufacturers should sell their goods below cost in foreign markets, and so tax the Canadian consumer doubly for the benefit of the heathen Chinese. If that be not the case, and I cannot for a moment suppose that that is the view of the hon. gentleman, if the Canadian manufacturer is now able to compete in equal markets, on equal terms, with English and American manufacturers, what does he need of further protection at our hands? I am delighted also to agree with the hon. gentleman that prices fluctuate from causes which no Government can control.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). "Flies on the wheel."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Prices fluctuate from causes which no Government can control, and the rider I put to that is that it is most dishonest for politicians who know better to state that a Government can keep up the prices of articles—notably the price of farm produce, for example. I agree with the hon. gentleman that it is in every sense the true policy of Canada to extend a steady, courteous treatment to its neighbors, and not on the Thursday to repeal a statutory declaration which they had assented to years ago, and on the Monday to restore it to the Statute-book; nor to attempt to evade solemn obligations by such little petty devices as putting taxes on the packages which contain articles which they agreed were to enter free. Lastly, I agree with the hon. gentleman on the whole in the proposition on which he laid so much stress, that, if trade continues to increase, if all things go well, if the North-West fills up rapidly, if no new demands arise and no naughty No. 8 should come into existence to disturb the repose of the Finance Minister, if, in short, we have smooth seas and fair winds, all will go well enough. It is not altogether the first time that we have heard these prophecies from the predecessor of the hon. gentleman—not the hon. gentleman who occupies a place on the floor this evening, and whom I am glad to see here, but another predecessor of the hon. gentleman, the Elijah, whose mantle appears to have fallen on the hon. gentleman himself, and who, in smooth and dulcet tones, was wont to prophesy smooth things to us, not one of which, I am sorry to say, has as yet come to pass, though I hope my hon. friend opposite may be more fortunate in that respect than his predecessor. Having thus briefly indicated the points of agreement between the hon. gentleman and myself, into which I will enter at more detail further on, I may now venture to indicate certain points of difference. For example, though I agree perfectly with him that it is not quite fair to measure the incidence of taxation in a country by the mere per capita rate, I cannot agree with him that the incidence of taxation in Canada on the poor man is less than it is in Great Britain. I think he labors under a great delusion there; and, Sir, as I, for all the hon. gentleman may say to the contrary, am a great admirer of the British system of taxation, as I think it far superior to our own system of taxation, if the hon. gentleman wants to know, I will call his attention to certain facts which I suppose must be well known to a man of his reading and intelligence, which will show him that he labored under a very great delusion indeed when he said that the poor man in Canada was less subject to taxation than the poor man in England. He is quite right in saying that so far as regards excise taxation, that is purely voluntary. No man need smoke, and no man need drink, as the hon. gentleman told us, unless of his own free will.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Nor shave.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Which, no doubt, is a source of expense, though not as yet of taxation; I do not know what may be in store for us, though. Now, Sir, in England taxes are raised, as he rightly said, in these several ways; first, by excise, which is voluntary in his sense of the word; second by stamps, which does not touch the poor man in England to any appreciable extent; thirdly, by the land tax; fourthly, the customs; and fifthly, the house tax, and by the income and property tax. Of all these forms of taxation in England none necessarily touch the poor man except a certain part of the customs. Now, Sir, England raises 20 million pounds sterling by her customs duties, and how does she raise it? 9½ millions from tobacco, which is a voluntary tax, 4 millions from rum, brandy and other spirits; and one million and a quarter from wine; so that, in other words, of all the taxes in England the only tax a poor man need pay is his proportion of the balance of 5 million pounds sterling of customs duties. What does that amount to? We know that the population of England is close upon 36 millions, and taking for this occasion the per capita argument, the English artisan, if he chooses, can escape with an average tax per head for himself and his family of 66 cents per annum, as against $4 per head paid by every artisan and his family here. Our tax on the poor man is 600 per cent.—as the hon. gentleman likes that way of calculating it—greater than the taxation of his fellow in England. I differ with the hon. gentleman—and I will give him, if he likes, in the amplest detail, my reasons for differing, though not at the present moment—in the wisdom of comparing the taxation in Canada and the taxation in the United States during the last twenty-one years. We will work that problem out as long, and as often, and as fully as the hon. gentleman can desire, but for the present let him and the House be content with this simple statement, which he can verify at his leisure from the records of both countries: Twenty-one years ago the average necessary taxation per head of the people of Canada was 33 per cent. of that then borne by the people of the United States; to-day the necessary taxation of the people of Canada is 50 per cent. greater than the average necessary taxation of the people of the United States, if you deduct a hundred millions, or thereabouts, that they use for reducing their debt. Then, Sir, I take leave to differ with the hon. gentleman as to the truth of that remarkable statement which he made, that every cent of taxation raised in Canada has not been wasted, but has been properly spent, not in bribery or corrupt practices, but in productive public works, of which, as I shall presently show the House, the Intercolonial Railway affords a most notable and remarkable specimen. Likewise I have my doubts whether the history of the world will show that increased taxation is the only path of national development, though it may be the only short cut by which a number of Government supporters in a poor country can bloom suddenly into millionaires. Sir, I have my doubts of the correctness of the hon. gentleman in intimating that we showed profound wisdom in assuming the debts of the Provinces, and that the United States were guilty of great folly in refusing to do likewise. I also doubt extremely whether the hon. gentleman was well advised in the comparison which he proposed to institute with Australasia and the Australian colonies, and at a later date I will lay before the House certain reasons which I think will convince the hon. gentleman that he spoke unadvisedly with his lips when he challenged a comparison with Australasia, without going a little more thoroughly into the subject, or, to use his own words, without looking a little more deeply below the surface than he did. When the hon. gentleman stated, as I understood him to do, that he expected that we would have an export of twenty million bushels of grain this year from the North-West, I would be delighted to believe he was correct, but I would like exceedingly to know on what grounds he made these statements. I would like to know what amount has yet been exported from the Province of Manitoba, and the North-West, what amount may be in the elevators, what likelihood there is of his figures being reached; and if the hon. gentleman wishes, I will give him the floor to state his reasons for making that statement, which is an important one, and valuable if true, and one which I would be very glad to see confirmed. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman made another statement in regard to which I have some difficulty in understanding him. As I took him down—and I am open to correction if I am wrong—the hon. gentleman stated that we had got fifty-one million dollars worth more public works than the additional debt represented.

Mr. FOSTER. Capital expenditure.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I would like to know where that came from. Now, I happen to know, on the authority of the hon. gentleman's own returns, that the total surplusses we accumulated in the last twenty-one years amount exactly to thirteen millions, as I understand it. That is all the surplus over our debt that we had to invest in public works, or in anything else, and where he gets his fifty-one millions is a thing that—I won't say that no fellow understands, because, I suppose, the hon. gentleman understands it—but I humbly profess my entire inability to comprehend it without further details which, I dare say, the hon. gentleman will give at a convenient season. Then, I have my doubts—and I see here several influential and notable representatives of the farmers of Ontario who can speak on this point—whether he is quite correct in saying that the farmers of Ontario pay no duty on their food. The farmers of Ontario, if I understand the case, use a good deal of sugar, and a good deal of rice, a good deal of dried fruits, and not a little spices and various other condiments with their food. Are these not taxed, and highly taxed too? Nor, would I put out of sight the question whether there may not be, some of them, so far lost, to—what shall I say? so far lost to wisdom and self-restraint as to take a little beer with their dinner too.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Therefore, I think that the farmers of Ontario do pay some duty on a portion, at any rate, of their food. Then as to the trifling duty on their farm implements, which the hon. gentleman thought, and told my hon friend behind me, was such an infinitesimal thing. I think if the hon. gentleman had only spent six months on a farm in the North-West Territories, he would come to the conclusion that the duty on farm machinery was an extremely onerous burden on the farmers who are doing their best to develop that noble country. One little thing I did notice. The hon. Minister of Finance spoke very highly of his predecessors, not even excepting myself. Then he proceeded to observe that there were a number of stock assertions which he intimated those who formerly held the position of Finance Minister entirely failed to answer, but which the Finance Minister now incumbent of the office would remove forever. I fear that the hon. gentleman has not taken sufficient stock of the obstinacy of Bourbons like my hon. friend from Bothwell; I fear he will find that these same assertions have deep roots, far-reaching roots and that not even his great talents, not even his most lucid explanations, will entirely avail to remove from the popular mind those delusions which his talented predecessors, on his own showing, have hitherto failed to eradicate. I have now a word or two to say as to the general position. I repeat that I agree with the Finance Minister that the value of the financial side of his statement depends almost entirely on these two things: First, on the accuracy of the Estimates submitted to Parliament at the time of making the financial statement; and second, on the accuracy of the accounts of last year's expenses which are furnished to us. Now, it may interest the House to know—as we cannot tell for a period of two years or thereabouts, how accurate the hon. gentleman has been, and I was glad to observe that he took occasion to correct his earlier estimate by adding \$1,250,000 to the modest sum of \$35,440,000 with which he started—I repeat it may interest the House to know what has been the actual result of our experiments for the last four years. I find that in 1885 an original estimate was brought down of \$29,811,639; but when the year closed we found the total expenditure was \$35,037,060, being an excess in expenditure over the original Estimate of \$6,225,421. Of this it is only fair to point out that \$1,697,851 were due to unforeseen causes—if they can be said to be unforeseen, that is to say, that abominable misgovernment produced a revolt in the North-West, and the disproportion between the original estimates submitted in 1885 and the expenditure may therefore be reduced to \$4,527,570. In 1886, we were called to consider the financial condition of this country on an estimated expenditure of \$31,757,032, which swelled finally to an actual expenditure of \$39,011,612, being an excess of \$7,254,580 over the expenditure, from which on the same principle I would deduct \$3,177,220 for war expenditures, making an excess for that year of \$4,077,360. We find in 1887 an estimated expenditure of \$33,124,000 and an actual admitted expenditure of \$35,637,000, being an excess of \$2,533,130, to which in all conscience ought to be added \$456,000 most improperly charged to capital account, making a total excess over estimated expense of \$3,000,000 odd. In a similar manner in 1888 we had, when the statement was made to us, an estimated expense of \$35,041,855, which has resulted in an actual expense of \$36,718,000, being an excess of \$1,676,000, to which ought to be added \$674,000 for items improperly charged to capital account. The result of all this is, that in the last four years the original estimates on which the financial statements were based have been exceeded on an average by \$3,000,000 or more. I do not say, no body can as yet say, how the hon. gentleman's estimates may fare; but I submit, with the evidence of those four years before us, it is hardly unreasonable on our part to express some doubts as to whether the hon. gentleman's estimates will be verified, and the surplus on which he has calculated is likely to be realised. Independently of that, I have another thing to say to the hon. gentleman. I had hoped that when the hon. gentleman assumed the office he now holds he would have had the manliness and sound sense to depart from the evil ways into which the department had fallen, and he would have returned to the honest mode of stating public accounts practiced under Mr. McLelan and under Sir Leonard Tilley. I have to say now, that I regard the statement of the Public Accounts for the years 1887 and 1888 as open to very grave exception indeed. In my opinion those accounts have been cooked; I will not say those accounts are fraudulent because things are done under political exigency and the necessities of state which are supposed to be spoken of in a different fashion from the way in which we would treat such transactions if they occurred in ordinary bookkeeping. But when you take the Public Accounts you will see that prior to 1887 the capital received for lands was not credited as revenue—and you will find that this rule had been formally agreed to in this House—so long as any portion of the charges for surveying the lands were put to capital account. We find this in 1887 reversed. We find that the whole revenue from lands is taken and credited as ordinary income, amounting to \$191,000; but we find \$162,391 for expenses of these Dominion lands charged to capital contrary to the practice of Mr. McLelan and Sir Leonard Tilley with respect to this account. Then as to money spent for expenses of the rebellion we have \$293,917 charged to capital account, although nothing of that kind had been done with the very large sum expended in 1885 or 1886, the result being, without taking into account for the moment the vexed question of improper charges in regard to the Intercolonial Railway, that contrary to the deliberately settled policy agreed upon by this House and carried out for several years by two successive Finance Ministers, a surplus of \$96,832 was forced for 1887, whereas there was a real deficit of at least \$363,000. We find, I am sorry to say, that the present Finance Minister has gone on in the same evil way. He has admitted a deficit of \$810,031. By some hocus pocus with respect to the Post Office, although those accounts in my hands show there is an actual deficit for 1888 in the Post Office service of \$729,978, that is reduced in the hon. gentleman's statement to \$567,000 by some mode of reckoning five quarters' revenue within the one year. It may be that the department has collected from the postmasters money held back by them, although until an explanation of a fuller character be given by the hon. gentleman—and he did not allude to this matter at all—all I can do is to point out that according to the mode of computation which prevailed in 1887, the deficit would have been, \$972,978 instead of \$810,000. But as to the charge of \$135,047 on account of Dominion lands charged against capital account, while the hon. gentleman took credit for every penny of \$217,000 received from these lands as ordinary revenue, I say that is simply fraudulent book-keeping, and the same remark applies to the charge of \$539,929 for North-West rebellion losses. I cannot for one moment admit that there is any ground whatever for treating that as an asset or as a thing for which we have received any return or which ought to appear in any way in the capital account of this country. I may say that this practice of keeping two accounts, one an ordinary account and one a capital account, is being grossly abused and is likely to be grossly abused in order to blind the eyes of the people of this country to the real actual extravagance of these hon. gentlemen. Looking over the Intercolonial Railway accounts, in my judgment, although that I admit it to be a question in dispute, I believe that \$408,385 ought to be added to our ordinary expenditure, and I further state that even on the hon. gentleman's own showing, even only taking the lines laid down by his predecessors, Mr. McLelan and Sir Leonard Tilley, our true deficit for 1888 is not \$810,000, but the true deficit is as nearly as possible \$1,500,000, and if you add the sums improperly charged to the Intercolonial account, and the item of the Post Office, the genuine deficit would be over \$2,000,000, or as nearly as might be \$2,056,000. With respect to two of these items every man can see for himself if he turns to the Public Accounts that what I have stated is absolutely and exactly correct. He will see (at page 50, table 7) that for a period of four years and more, not one penny of these Dominion land receipts was credited to income, by Mr. McLelan or Sir Leonard Tilley. During the time that they made charges on that score to capital account, they carefully abstained, to their credit be it said, from violating the agreement come to between this House and the Premier, that no charges should be made on the one side without giving credit at the same time on the other. As regards the rebellion losses I commend the hon. gentleman again to the example of Mr. McLelan, who had the courage and the manliness to charge six million dollars to ordinary expenditure in the two years of 1885 and 1886, while for the purpose of making a false balance we find in 1887 and 1888 these comparatively trifling sums of \$293,000 and \$547,000 charged to capital account. Of course the reason for this is obvious. Hon. gentlemen do not like to have four successive deficits staring them in the face, and so they deliberately turn round on their own predecessors, and alter their whole method of book-keeping to suit this present exigency. I am glad to hear that we are not likely to have any more of these rebellion losses to pay, but I enter my protest once for all against this most vicious practice of crediting the whole receipts received from our Dominion lands and charging part of the expenses to the ordinary income and part to capital account. I ask what confidence the Minister expects us to place in his statement, what confidence can he expect us to place in all those calculations which he is good enough to submit, when we find in matters absolutely under his own control that he cannot resist the temptation of making things appear a few hundred thousand dollars better than they really are, although by so doing he flies directly in the face of his own predecessors in office? Now, Sir, I come to a matter which bears a good deal on much of what the hon. gentleman has said, a matter which bears very largely on the extent to which we have succeeded in creating a genuine self-sustaining traffic between the various Provinces of this Dominion, and also on the extent to which his statement can be relied upon that we have spent no portion of our taxation except on "productive public works." I have here the statement of the revenue we received from the Intercolonial Railway in the year 1888. It amounted to, all told, \$2,912,783. Our expenditure for working the Intercolonial Railway during that year amounted to \$3,276,441. To that I add \$408,485 for items of rolling stock and for matters of that kind which, in my judgment, are improperly charged to capital account and which ought to have gone to the ordinary expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for that year, I add also interest on the cost which I find recorded in our Public Accounts, interest on \$47,178,000 at  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., which is the rate the hon. gentleman will find that sum stands us in. That amount to \$2,110,000, so that we are to-day working the Intercolonial Railway at an expense to the people of Canada of \$5,744,836 for expenses, for interest and for items improperly charged to capital account. We get back from it \$2,912,783, so that for every dollar of revenue we receive from the Intercolonial Railway \$2 are to-day paid out of the Treasury of Canada, as a proof of the value of that road in producing a genuine self-sustaining commerce and in uniting our scattered Provinces together, and of conveying coal from the Springhill mines to the consumers in Montreal and elsewhere at rates far below actual cost of carriage. Now this is an illustration which this House will do well to ponder on. There you have the result of having a road built for political purposes and the result of having a road run for political purposes. I say that the management of that Intercolonial Railway is not honest or these results would never be produced. When you find that after that road has been opened for thirteen or fourteen years, after you had all possible opportunities for developing its traffic, when you find that year after year a million or more than a million is demanded for so-called capital account, when you find with all this that that railway is not only not able to produce one single cent in return of interest but that you have to charge on your own showing \$363,000 a year dead loss, I say, Sir, that speaks louder than any man can speak as to the value of political roads and of the value to the country of running them for political purposes. As if to make the matter worse the hon. gentleman alluded to-night, and other gentlemen have alluded elsewhere to the wisdom, the good policy and the sagacity the Government are displaying—while the Intercolonial Railway is a dead loss on our hands to the tune of hundreds of thousands of dollars—in having taken hundreds of thousands of other dollars out of the public chest to construct a short line to compete with the Intercolonial Railway, and to cut the Intercolonial Railway's throat and to add still more to the burdens of the taxpayers—the people of Canada. Sir, the hon. gentleman spoke, and I dare say correctly enough, of what may be called our ascertained liabilities, for railroad subsidies, for canals, for public works of various kinds; but the hon. gentleman did not dwell on the chance of our having made upon us a heavy demand for further railway subsidies. Now, Sir, I have never wavered or flinched from saying that although in certain individual instances good might come from this system of railway subsidies, the thing is vicious and wrong in itself, unless they be granted for purposes of the clearest general utility to the entire Dominion; but I tell the hon. gentleman this: let him not deceive himself, let him not deceive this House, by imagining that he and his colleagues can, at their own supreme will and pleasure, give subsidies for railways to this supporter or that supporter, and then turn around and say to the people of Canada: Now that we have glutted our own supporters, now that we have paid these men for the assistance they have given us, we are going to shut down, and you other constituencies and other Provinces and other portions of this Dominion who could not be bought or whom it was not worth our while to buy, shall have nothing because we do not see fit to continue the system any longer. Sir, that cannot be. There may be good reasons for putting a stop to the system, but it does not lie in the hon. gentleman to say that they can put a stop to it without a good deal better reason than they have yet given. We have heard nothing of another question, which is the subject of an arbitration that may involve many millions, between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government of this country, and in connection with which, if I am informed aright, judging from the proportions the lawyers' bills have assumed, a very heavy bill may have to be paid sooner or later. Nor did the hon. gentleman allude to the fact, which cannot be lost sight of in a financial statement, that we have given a guarantee to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and that we may have to pay the interest on some \$15,000,000 for fifty years. Nor did he allude to the fact that almost every Province of this Dominion has claims on the general treasury as yet unsettled. Sir, I shall have something to say on that subject before I close; but meanwhile, let me point out that for all these things, be they right or wrong, wise or foolish, the policy of these hon. gentlemen is responsible. If there be a difficulty or a danger or a heavy contingent liability, it is to their policy and that alone that the people of Canada owe it that besides our heavy ascertained liabilities there are immense contingent liabilities which no man can wisely overlook in estimating the future. And now, Sir, I have a word or two further to say. I am for a moment going to pass from the financial side of the question, to consider the mode in which the money we have to spend is got from the people, and I have to say this—and now is the time to say it, because now, if ever, should the grievances of the people be stated in no unhesitating sound: I say there is one feature of this protective tariff which is daily and hourly growing into more odious prominence, and that is the complete subjection of this Government to certain combines in this country, to certain manufacturing establishments in this country, and certain friends of theirs who, on emergency, can come down with their cheques for \$5,000 or \$10,000 or it may be \$20,000, whenever the money can do most good to their friends, the Government. Now, Sir, is it not enough that these same combines should be able to exact 35 per cent., as most of them can, from the people of this country? Is it not enough that they have the legal means of exaction, but are we to permit that the Minister of Customs, or, for aught I know, a mere understrapper of the Minister of Customs, shall arbitrarily and tyrannically add half as much more to the taxes the people have to pay? Sir, this is a growing abuse. I have cases now in my mind, in which distinguished manufacturers in this country have gone to the agents of a combine, and have said to them: We will give you the price of this article in cash in the United States, and add to it the cost of the freight, add the whole Canadian duty, besides if you will give us goods at these rates; and they have been refused; and they have then brought the goods in from the United States, paid the cash price in the United States, paid the freight and have been prepared to pay the honest duty or the duty the Government ought to have levied; and yet at the instance of these identical combines the Government of Canada, or the Customs Department of the Government, arbitrarily and tyrannically added 50 per cent. to the true valuation of those articles, and compelled those men to pay 50 per cent. more than the law intended they should. Sir, we shall have something to say on this matter, please heaven, before the House rises, and, therefore, I shall confine my present remarks regarding it to a very few words. But I say that the thing to which I allude is one of the most monstrous features of the Customs Act as it now exists. We gave the Minister of Customs this power to be used in extreme emergencies to prevent fraud, and that power is now being used to commit fraud. If there were nothing more to condemn this system, the judgment recently pronounced in a certain well known case, by the highest tribunal in the land, the tendency it exhibits to encourage a system of blackmail and partiality to political supporters, and to foster the greatest political corruption besides, ought to be enough to condemn this feature of the protective tariff in the eyes of an honest man. It is the natural and inevitable fruit of a high protective system, and it does this threefold wrong. First of all it wrongs the revenue, because its effect is to force people into subjection to the combines, and the Government gets no duty on what would otherwise be imported; secondly, it is an injury to the manufacturers of the best class; and thirdly, as the manufactures pass the charge on to the consumers, the whole body of the consumers likewise suffer from this infamous wrong. For that wrong there is no genuine redress save taking away the power these men have abused. Sir, there was one good point in the hon. gentleman's statement. For the first time for many years, the Minister of Finance declares that he is not going to add a fresh batch of oppressive taxes to the burthens of the people of this country. Well, Sir, we will wait until this House rises before we rejoice too much in that announcement; but in the meantime, as the hon. gentleman was good enough to give us a list of the taxes which wealthy men pay in this country, I will give him a list of the taxes which poor men pay on articles of daily and hourly use which are necessary to all of them. In the first place, Sir,

I find that we imported into Canada last year $449,446 worth of coal oil, on which $351,886 of duty was collected, being a rate of 80 per cent. on the necessary article of light most largely used by the poor of this country. We imported $5,154,000 worth of sugar, on which a duty was paid of $3,433,324, being at the rate of 67 per cent. on an article which goes very largely into the consumption of the poorer classes; and that is very far indeed from representing the real tax, because probably an equal sum or nearly an equal sum, under our present scheme of taxation, finds its way into the pockets of the rich refiners. On the articles of coarse woollens and the like, while most of us in this House can obtain the goods we wear at an average rate of 20 per cent. our poorer brethren are obliged to pay 40, 50, 60 and 70 per cent. on the materials they think it convenient to use as clothing. Now this tariff, amongst its other injustices, continues to perpetrate one very gross injustice, to which I believe the attention of the Government was called lately, in the case of the millers of Canada. Where else would there be found a system, called a protective system, in which the Canadian miller is absolutely discriminated against in favor of the American miller. That is protection reversed. You injure your own manufacturer for the benefit of the foreign manufacturer, and when the former points out that such is the case, on the clearest evidence, you cannot venture to redress the wrong you have done. I observe that the hon. gentleman, particularly in the closing part of his speech, indulged in a very great deal of assumption which I cannot characterise as at all well founded. He and his friends behind him would, forsooth, cram down the minds of the people of this country and the throats of gentlemen of this House that all the progress that has been made in Canada for the last twenty-one years is due, forsooth, to those hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. I have not time, it would probably require several hours, to review in minute detail all the statements the hon. gentleman submitted. They will be reviewed, Sir, before the vote is taken on the question submitted to you. Do not be afraid; there are plenty of able, zealous, intelligent gentlemen beside and around me who will not leave one sophistry, one false statement unanswered, but human strength has its limits and I cannot undertake to go over the whole work to-night. I will, in my reply, confine myself simply to chalking out the outlines, and no doubt the picture will be amply filled in by my hon. friends. What do the statements of the hon. gentleman prove? They prove, it is true, that in spite of bad policy, in spite of misgovernment, an advance, aye, and a considerable advance, has been made in some directions. That nobody here has ever denied. I have never denied it, and I have never heard one of my hon. friends deny it. But what we do say is this, that in many other directions we have not advanced. We say that a good deal of what is claimed as advancement is not, in the proper sense of the term, really an advancement, but that it is rather a case in which what one man gains another man is pretty sure to lose. When hon. gentlemen talk of the leaps and bounds and the progress which Canada has recently made, they appear to forget one important consideration. Within the last seven or eight years what between the sums borrowed and spent by the Government, what between the sums borrowed and spent by great corporations like the Canadian Pacific Railway and others, probably not far short of $200,000,000 of borrowed capital has been spent in Canada. That is coming to an end. The hon. gentleman has told us so, and we all know it is so, and in making his calculations for the future, I recommend the hon. Minister of Finance to bear in mind that this huge capital expenditure is now coming to an end to all intents and purposes, at any rate the greater part of it, but that both in our case and the case of the corporations to which I allude, one thing remains,—the interest remains a charge on the earnings of the people of Canada to be paid for all time to come. Now, it appears to me the hon. the Minister of Finance has omitted in his résumé certain vital points. I think that if he will take the trouble to examine the works of those writers who most deserve respect, and to confer with those men whose opinions on this subject best deserve respect, he will find that they will be disposed to agree with me, at any rate thus far, in saying that in a country like Canada, that in a country of the age of Canada, that in a country in the state of settlement of Canada, the real, true indices of prosperity are these: First of all, and to this I specially call the attention of the House, the rapidity of the increase of population in Canada; next, and we will have more to say on this presently, the rapidity of the increase of the total volume of trade; and next, and here I fear I take issue with the hon. gentleman, the importance of the debt decreasing, both absolutely and relatively, and the importance of our taxation decreasing, both absolutely and relatively; again, the rapid progress of settlement in such new countries as we may be fortunate enough to acquire; the growth of new cities and towns, the capacity to attract and to retain such emigrants as come to this country; and, last but not least, the wise, just and equitable distribution of property among the masses of the people. Those I say are the true signs of prosperity in a country like Canada. On the other hand, I say that the true signs of an arrested development in a country like Canada are these: When you find population, particularly in the rural districts, either stationary or retrograde; when you find the volume of trade either stationary or retrograde; when you fail and fail egregiously in settling and filling up new territory; when you are not able to point to new towns or villages springing up in any number; when you find a decrease in the selling value of agricultural lands in the country; when you find a rapid increase of the debt and of the taxes and a rapid efflux of people from the country, whether they be emigrants coming to this country or whether they be your own people who seek to improve their position by removing to another land. Now, I ask this House which sets of conditions on the whole exists in Canada to-day? Let us review these in detail. Hon. gentlemen will remember that a very few days ago I put the question to the Minister of Agriculture as to the population which he estimated to exist in this country, and I asked him on what his estimate was founded, and to divide it among the several Provinces. The hon. gentleman was kind enough to send over to me his memo., and I found, as indeed I had expected, that this elaborate statement of 4,946,497 souls was simply the purest guesswork, that there was not one particle of foundation for the statement so formally submitted, other than this, that if—if, Mr. Speaker—the population during these seven or eight years had increased in the same ratio as it did in Canada between 1871 and 1881, then these results would follow. I have also the hon. gentleman's own statement, as recorded in the books of his department, of the immigrants who settled in Canada during 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, 1885, 1886 and 1887; and I call the attention of the House to certain remarkable results which flow from these two separate statements of the Government beyond possible contradiction. I find that in the years I have named we received in Canada 630,744 immigrants, who, according to the statement of the Department of Agriculture, are expressly declared to have settled in Canada, besides the large number who passed through and went away. I find that our population in 1881 was 4,432,481. Adding to these the 630,744 above-named, it is clear that we would have, without any natural increase at all, 4,955,554, and therefore that, on the showing of the Minister of Agriculture himself, on the evidence formally laid on the Table of this House in the books of his department, during the last seven years there has been a dead loss of 9,000, besides the whole natural increase of the people of Canada, which, in seven years, at 2½ per cent., on their own showing, would be 700,000 souls. So, if the Department of Agriculture be correct, 630,744 immigrants came here, and in that case 700,000 Canadians have been extruded from this country to make room for them. I will give five or ten minutes of my time to the Minister of Agriculture—oh, I see he is not present—or to any of his colleagues to point out any inaccuracies in my statement. If the statements of the Department of Agriculture are correct, it inevitably follows that we have lost more than 700,000 people from 1880 up to the month of April, 1888. That is their own statement. That is the result which must inevitably be deduced from their own declaration. I am going to come to the rescue. I do not think the case is half as bad as these hon. gentlemen have depicted it. In the first place I do not believe that the statements of the Department of Agriculture are worth the paper they are written on, I do not believe they are worth one cent of the $3,500,000 which we have spent during those seven years in order to bring immigrants here; nor do I believe that their elaborate logarithmical calculations are worth anything. I doubt extremely whether there is in Canada at present a population of 4,946,000. We know that the Ontario statistics are the only reliable ones we have.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear." Probably those hon. gentlemen have not paid much attention to these matters, but, if they wait until I get through, they can contradict me if they are able. I say that these Ontario statistics are the only reliable ones we have. I do not say that they are absolutely reliable, but that they are the only ones which approach to reliability. During the decade from 1871 to 1881, they showed very accurately the increase of population which took place then, and I think that it is more than probable that they will show accurately what increase has taken place since. They show an increase of 180,000 in those seven years. I believe it will be found that the actual increase in the Dominion is a little more than double that—perhaps about 400,000—but I do not believe that, of the 630,000 immigrants, there are more than one-sixth and perhaps not one-tenth part remaining in Canada. We have been bringing these men here and paying their passages to enable them to drift to the southward, and indeed to act as anti-immigration agents to the detriment of the people of Canada. Let me remind the House of two things. We had numerous disputes three or four years ago as to the population of the North-West Territories and Manitoba. In 1885 and 1886 censuses were taken of those territories, and the result was to show, without any possibility of contradiction, that the Opposition were right in all points but one. They had estimated the population of Manitoba and the North-West too highly. They had gone beyond the mark in their fear to err, while the reports of the Department of Agriculture gave this most remarkable result: They showed by most positive statements for the years 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, 1885 and 1886, that 166,803 settlers had gone to Manitoba and the North-West, though, when the census was taken, there were only 118,000 whites found in all that country. According to the census of 1881, and allowing for natural increase, we should have had 74,000 in 1886 without one single immigrant. Deduct that from 118,000, and you have this remarkable result: The department asserted that 166,803 had settled in that country in seven years, and they gave the figures: 1881, 22,001; 1882, 53,751; 1883, 42,772; 1884, 24,240; 1885, 7,240; 1886, 11,599; total, 166,803. Well, of these 166,803 who they said had gone there, who they stated in public documents were there, we find only 41,095, and the remaining 122,708 had vanished into thinnest air, and in this way was confirmed the remarkable accuracy of the statements of hon. gentlemen on this side. Then, again, when hon. gentlemen opposite took upon them to contradict men who had carefully studied the questions relating to the population of this country, I challenged them, as I challenge them now, to go to the Catholic clergy in the Province of Quebec, who possess good statistics in regard to the movement of the Catholic population there, and to ask them as to the exodus of their people, and to judge by that how far the statements which I and others have made are correct. That challenge was thrown out three years ago. I repeat it now, and I ask the hon. gentlemen, if they venture to dispute my statements, to take the means which present themselves readily and naturally to find out the truth, so that we may discover who is right and who is wrong in regard to this most important question as to the rate at which the population of Canada is increasing. In the meantime, however, I call attention to this fact that, on the authority of the statement made by hon. gentlemen on the floor of Parliament and of those made in the returns of the Department of Agriculture, there has been an exodus of 700,000 of the people of Canada in the last seven years. Now, a word or two as to the question of the volume of trade. The hon. gentleman was not able to deny the fact that, whereas, with a population of three millions and three-quarters in 1874, we had a volume of trade of $217,000,000, we have now, with a population which he calls five millions, a volume of trade of $193,000,000, taking goods entered for consumption; and that amounted, in round numbers, to $58 per head in 1874 and to $40 a head in 1888. It is true that it is right, as he said, to estimate value as well as quantity. He was right in saying that no one knew better than I did that there were often great fluctuations in value. I pointed that out time and again in this House ten and eleven years ago, but it is not fair to say that in a country which should be growing and advancing as Canada should be, we should be content, forsooth, with such a showing, even if the hon. gentleman could establish what he did not establish at all, that there has been a considerable droop in the value of our exports and imports. He referred to the droop which had taken place in the value of exports and imports into England, but it does not follow that the value of our imports and exports should droop in the same ratio. I believe myself that there has been a droop. I believe that prices are considerably lower to-day than they were in the time when we were in office, and I call the attention of the House, and of the hon. gentleman, and of my friends here to the fact that, when the Mackenzie Government was in power, the prices of farmers' produce were far better than they are under the National Policy, and further, though we did not promise to make prices good, or to keep prices up to abnormal rates, the hon. gentleman and his friends got into office by the most audacious and impudent declarations that they, under the National Policy, had power to make markets for the farmers, had power to raise the prices of all the things the farmers had to sell. The hon. gentleman likes to compare Canada and Australia. Well, Sir, I will give him a comparison which will do him, perhaps, some good. I find that in 1874 New South Wales, which has, by-the-by, something very like a revenue tariff and a free trade system, had a total volume of exports and imports of 90 millions. Now the prices of their productions were much higher in 1874, as I suppose he knows, than in 1887; but in 1887 New South Wales had a volume of exports and imports of 175 millions, that is, it has grown from 90 to 175 millions, nearly doubled; while Canada has crept down from 217 to 200 millions. I suppose that he will admit that the same causes were at work in New South Wales, lowering or altering the prices of exports and imports, as in Canada, and if he does not know it, proof can easily be advanced. But my contention is that we ought to go on, we are a young country, we are a growing country, we are increasing in population, even under all disadvantages, faster than old countries like England, or many countries in Europe, and be the alteration in value what he pleases, it is a proof, I repeat, of arrested development, that the volume of trade to-day in Canada is nearly $20,000,000 a year less than it was fifteen years ago. Now there was another note I gave, that was the failure to settle the new territory we had acquired. Sir, this also, is a matter of notoriety. Here we have their own census returns, showing the most lamentable failure, showing, if they are to be believed at all, that such was the result of policy of the Government that of 166,000 settlers who went to the North-West and settled there with the intention of remaining, only 44,000 were found by actual count five or six years thereafter. Now, Sir, very recently, for four or five hours together, this House rang with declarations from hon. gentlemen representing that country, setting forth the unexampled fertility, setting forth the unexampled excellence, setting forth the beauties of that country in terms so glowing that I came to the conclusion that really and truly the earthly paradise was situated north of latitude 49, and that Regina was only another name for Eden—if only Mr. Commissioner Herchmer were removed. Sir, cannot these gentlemen see that every word that was said then, every word that is said now, (and much of it may be said truly) in praise of the fertility, in praise of the excellence, in praise of the resources, in praise of the chances of development of that country, are the severest possible condemnation of the Government opposite, who have squandered 100 millions of the people's money in pretending to promote colonisations, and have only this beggarly and miserable account of settlement to exhibit for it to-day? Sir, I come to another point which may fairly be said to be in dispute, where again I give a challenge to these hon. gentlemen. When talking about the proofs of the decrease in the value of property in Canada, I say that to my certain knowledge, to the certain knowledge of scores of friends whom I see here, in the great Province of Ontario more particularly, there has been, in the last 8 or 10 years, a great and notable depreciation in the value of farm lands. I believe that if proper investigation were had, if these hon. gentlemen would do as I asked them, if they would appoint a proper committee of members of this House, with power to investigate this matter thoroughly, then we would have had, and I am very sorry for it, the most unanswerable proof that over the greater portion of the Province of Ontario, over the greater portion of the 20 millions acres of farm land which it contains, there has been a very great reduction in the actual selling value, amounting, in all probability, to something like 8 or 10 dollars per acre for every one of these 20 million acres. That is the statement which I make, that is a statement which I know, from friends who are very largely interested in forming correct conclusions on this subject, represents probably less than the entire reduction in the selling value; and if you want to frame a true national balance sheet, you have got to set such a reduction as that in the selling value of the farm lands in Ontario—of the other Provinces I do not venture to speak—as an offset against your little petty addition to the savings bank deposits, and the deposits in the other banks, and a score of these other indices of prosperity on which the hon. gentleman so much relied. Now as to the increase of the debt, the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that all this sophistry, all this petty quibbling evasion, will not avail to alter the fact that Canada entered Confederation with a debt of 75 millions, whereas to-day, on the first of March, the net debt is 236 millions, with very doubtful assets for part of the remainder—will not avail to alter the fact that 21 years ago the total taxation of Canada was about 11 millions, and to-day, on his own showing, the total taxation of Canada is 31 millions, or he expects it to be—it won't avail to alter these things, nor is it in the slightest use for him to waste the time of the House, or to waste his own time, in innumerable calculations as to the development of certain minor industries here and there, or the question whether our taxation per head is a few cents more or a few cents less than that of the United States. Now as to immigration, here again I present to the hon. gentleman his own statements. If these statements have one scintilla of truth, if the estimated population be correct, if the statements in the hon. gentleman's other returns and statistics are correct, it is only too clear that there has been a monstrous loss of the people of Canada. If indeed those immigrants whom the hon. gentleman says came here, have come and settled here, then three-quarters of a million of the best of our people have gone from us. That is the inevitable result, and to that I again call the attention of the hon. gentleman. Sir, it is known to everybody that all through the rural districts of Ontario there is scarcely a single county where the rural population is gaining to-day; there may be gains in a few towns, there may be gains in a few cities, but the rural population is stationary, is in a position of arrested development, and one of the main causes of that is the unjust and oppressive incidence of taxation, particularly on the agricultural portion of this community.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. HESSON. The farmers in Ontario have been enlarging their farms, where they had fifty acres, they now have 100, where they had 100 they now have 200.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then the others have gone, and they who owned the fifty acres and the 100 acres have departed. Gentlemen, like my hon. friend have been laying field to field and buying up farms, and the bold yeomanry who used to send him here, have departed to the other side of the line. Why, Sir, within a few miles of my hon. friend's residence there stands the little town of Brussels, which I formerly had the honor of representing, and from it I was sent the other day—not for the purpose of using it here, it was a mere matter of investigation on the part of an enterprising newspaper proprietor—I was sent an account of the number of men—not women and children—who had gone from the little town of Brussels, with a total population of 1,200 souls, within the last ten years. How many would the hon. gentleman suppose there were? Twelve hundred souls would represent about 250 adults, males, I suppose, and seventy of them were found to be now residents in the United States. Their names were given, their residences were given. From the little town of Brussels alone seventy men, representing probably seventy families, had gone to the United States. I hope and trust that is an extreme instance, but I am afraid it is only a fair illustration of what is taking place, not in Ontario alone, but in Nova Scotia, in Prince Edward Island, in New Brunswick, and everywhere throughout this Dominion, and I am afraid that until it got its present Government in Manitoba as well.

Mr. HESSON. Brussels is improving every year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have great regard for Brussels, but that does not alter the fact that 70 men formerly resident in Brussels are now residents in the United States. As the Minister of Finance was seized with the spirit of prophecy, and as I hold it is rather dangerous to prophesy until you know, I may be permitted to call his attention to what befell a certain predecessor who likewise prophesied a few years ago. In 1882 I had a little controversy with Sir Leonard Tilley on subjects very closely akin to those I am discussing to-night. That hon. gentleman undertook to tell the House where we would find ourselves in 1890. We have nine or ten months to go upon, but here is Sir Leonard's statement, to which I call the attention of the House, delivered in the full spirit of prophecy as to where we would be in 1890. Sir Leonard declared:

"But between this and 1890 the amount that is to be paid into the sinking fund, and which forms part of our annual charges upon the consolidated revenue, will average $1,500,000 a year for the next nine years. That will give for the deduction of the debt $13,500,000. Then the surplus for the nine years—

"An hon. MEMBER (Sir Richard Cartwright). Oh!

"Sir LEONARD TILLEY. An hon. member says "oh," but when we have $4,500,000 assured for this year, when there is no doubt, after the reduction which we propose to make, that there will be a surplus of $3,000,000 for the next year, it is not, I think, asking too much for the hon. gentleman to accept as reasonable a surplus of $1,000,000 a year for the remaining seven years of the nine commencing on the 1st July last, that would make $14,500,000, and would, with the sinking fund, reduce the net debt to $175,897,680. But if we estimate the increase of population at but 18 per cent. only during the ten years—the increase of the last decade—the result will be then, taking the population at that period, and the debt as stated, the net debt will be $34.27 per head. Then if we have any extraordinary increase of our population (which I think it is but right to expect we will, but which I have not estimated for here) it will be ample to meet, at any rate, any extraordinary expenditure that may be chargeable to the debt which we are not anticipating at the present moment. But, more than that, if the 150,000,000 acres of arable land that will be the property of the Government after handing over to the syndicate 35,000,000 acres, and which is now established as fit for the settlement, yields but one dollar an acre for half of it (the other half being offered as a free gift to settlers) it will meet the whole expenditure of the Government on the Pacific Railway and in the North-West down to 1890. If that be the case, then our debt, which certainly is not alarming, provided we realise from these lands the sum that I have stated, would only be about $100,000,000 instead of $175,000,000, or less than $20 per head."

I say nothing about the $75,000,000, for it is a sore subject I know. But here was a calculation made by a gentleman of great experience, an eminent predecessor of the hon. gentleman, by whom we were assured as a basis for our future action that at worst the debt would be only $175,000,000, in 1890 when Monday's Gazette shows that the net debt is $236,000,000; and, therefore, I respectfully suggest to the hon. gentleman that it would be well for him bearing that in mind to be cautious a little as to any prophecies in which he may indulge. I may remind him that a greater man even than the apostle of temperance, even the Premier himself announced to us, first, that we would have in 1890 $71,000,000 cash in hand from land sales, but, on having the statement revised and making deductions for the expenses of management, it was then calculated that $58,300,000 would positively be paid to us by the year 1890; and not to be behind hand Sir Charles Tupper asserted not that there would be 20,000,000 bushels sent from Manitoba by 1890 but that 640,000,000 bushels of wheat were to be shipped from the North-West, and the hon. gentleman was seriously exercised as to how we would get enough railways in to carry the grain away. It is not without a feeling of pleasure I recall that whereas the two first named authorities only promised us tens of millions, Sir Charles Tupper was much more generous and went into hundreds of millions, and all three of them were positive, I remember, that if Parliament would only allow them to have reciprocity of tariffs we would have reciprocity of trade with the United States rapidly, one named within two years, I think, to the people of the Maritime Provinces. Likewise they declared that every cent of the whole cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway would be repaid in full within the shortest possible space of time to the people of this country, and the North-West would fill up and blossom as the rose in such a manner as we have never dreamed of seeing. It may interest the House to know what that destroyer of such promises, the Public Accounts, shows on this question. Whereas we ought to have $58,000,000 at our credit at the latest on 1st January, 1891, I regret to say that up to the present time our total receipts amount to $4,250,000 and the expenditure to $5,500,000, so that we are $1,250,000 on the wrong side of the account. In all this there are to my mind just two redeeming points, always accepting the promise that we are not going to be taxed much more heavily. I think, and I give the hon. gentleman the benefit of my opinion, Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

that, so far as I am able to judge, the drain of population from Canada is at last showing signs of diminishing. I think that is the case, I hope it is the case, I trust further investigation will confirm it, and I believe also that having at last got rid of the railway monopoly there is a fair chance of Manitoba filling up under the present Provincial Government and of redeeming to some extent the extravagant promises heretofore made on her account. But what are the replies to these facts which I have stated? In part a judicious silence has been observed. Hon. gentlemen opposite have shown discretion in not contradicting certain of the statements made, but in part I must say hon. gentlemen have taken refuge in pure evasion and in part in very audacious denial of well known facts. As to a great deal of what I have said, denial is perfectly hopeless. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot deny the increase of debt, although they may adduce excuses for it; they cannot deny the increase of taxation, and they cannot deny the enormous proportions of the fixed charges under which we labor, and which is a very serious point indeed. They cannot deny that up to the present time the settlement of the North-West has resulted in egregious failure, largely due to the trade policy, to the land policy and to the railway monopoly policy of the present Government. They cannot deny that the accounts of the Intercolonial Railway show that for every dollar received Canada is charged two dollars per annum. As to other statement, hon. gentlemen opposite find it easy when assertions are made to make counter-assertions and then refuse investigation, acting to some extent after the examples set by the Minister of Finance on a recent occasion when that hon. gentleman voted that he was in favor of granting prohibition when it was clear the people of Canada were ready for it, and then refused point blank to take measures to ascertain in the only way in which it could possibly be done what the wishes of the people of Canada were on the subject of prohibition. Hon. gentlemen opposite are in the habit of drawing a red herring across the scent; and they do that notably in the case of the National Policy. Now, Sir, what did it amount to all that the hon. gentleman said at the close of his speech and through his speech? It amounted to this: Those hon. gentlemen are prepared to claim that every single solitary result of every new invention that has been made for the last ten years, that every reduction in the price of raw material, that even a fall in the rate of interest all the world over is a new triumph for the National Policy. Should wool become cheaper—I do not know what my hon. friend from the rural district would say to that—but if wool should become cheaper, if iron becomes cheaper, if beet root is grown more largely, these hon. gentlemen claim it is a fresh triumph of the National Policy that articles made from those materials are cheaper than before. Was there anything more clear after the speech of the Minister of Finance, than that the real, and only, and true, and legitimate way to make goods cheaper is to tax them. That is the latest, greatest, grandest triumph of economic science as expounded by the hon. gentleman. Why should he stop there, why did he not go further? If the Government by putting taxes on goods can make them cheaper, why not extend their beneficent providence a little further. They might as well, and they could just as easily enact that water should run up hill, and that would be found very convenient for a variety of mechanical purposes. But are the prices of farm produce lower than they used to be? Are the prices of land throughout Ontario, Quebec and the other Provinces lower than they used to be? Have wages become less than they used to be? Does the population of our rural districts become fewer? Do our people leave us, to this the answer is, these things are the result of are causes over which no government have any control. This kind of argument scarcely deserves an answer, and for such arguments as this, I have simply to say that when I hear them gravely stated I hardly know for whom to feel the most contempt—for the individuals who lie and profit by their lies or for the dupes who believe and bleed. In all this one thing only does not vary, and that is the steady growth of taxation. The value of farms may fluctuate; prices may go up and prices may go down, but the number and the weight of our taxes goes on, and on, and on for ever. It was the fashion many years ago to speak of “the ignorant impatience of taxation” I think that Lord Castleragh was the author of that phrase. Well, nous avons changé tout cela, and in these days the true statesmen in considering the position of things here would deplore ten times more the “ignorant patience” with taxation which our people manifest. It is easier to cajole than it is to oppress, and I say that one of the worst consequences of the false theory which hon. gentlemen have developed, that it is possible to enrich a people by increasing its taxes is this, that they have thereby done away with almost the only efficient check and curb to extravagance. I have noticed this for the last eight or ten years, in fact ever since this doctrine took root in the public mind in Canada, and if I had not noticed it the growth of public expenditure would proclaim it to men who chose to open their eyes and see. But now, Sir, I hear that a reign of economy is to set in. Mr. Speaker, what new villainy is afloat? What dark mystery of iniquity is being hatched now? I must say that when I hear these gentlemen talking of economy my utmost suspicions are aroused. Can the leopard change his spots; can the Ethiopian change his skin; can we expect grapes from thorns and figs from thistles? Is it not bad enough to cook our accounts; is it not bad enough to pay $82,929 for law costs and keep a Minister of Justice, and a Deputy Minister of Justice, and a staff and contingents besides? Is it not bad enough to pay $327,000 for bribing newspapers as we see by these Public Accounts, without counting the cost of printing for the Immigration Department and for matters connected with legislation? Is it not bad enough to pay five or six hundred thousand dollars for putting in types and plant and new printing machinery. Is it not bad enough to see $400,000 voted for a Franchise Bill for the express purpose of disrating many of the electors of this country? Is it not bad enough to see $175,000 spent in 18 months for the purchase and work on one experimental farm at Ottawa, which, though it be a desirable thing, could bring us all the good that is ever likely to come from it for an expenditure of one quarter the amount? Is it not bad enough to see $700 a year paid for each convict in the prison at Manitoba? Is it not bad enough to see $287,000 spent for the lighting, and the heating, and the furniture, and the taking care of the grounds here and at Rideau Hall? Why, Sir, this is more than some of our most important Provinces get as their per capita subsidy. We absolutely spend on these trifles, on our gas bill, our water bill and outlay for keeping the grounds in order here and at Major's Hill Park and at Rideau Hall $287,000 a year and yet the Government talks to us about economy. All over this country we find in little villages of seven or eight hundred, aye, even of three or four hundred souls, public works erected at a cost of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars as bribes to these constituencies and buildings erected which incur an expenditure of over $1,200 a year, including interest and maintenance, for the purpose of providing shelter or a post office which does not give us a revenue of more than $400 a year. Could this condition of things exist in England or the United States? Were I able to stand on the floor of the House of Commons or on the floor of Congress and to point to items in the Public Accounts showing that in England five or six hundred thousand pounds sterling went to subsidise the Times, and any other paper, which stood ready to stab some public man under the fifth rib, if in the United States I could point to a subsidy of four millions a year paid for the purpose of retaining United States papers in the service of the Government, would that Government in the United States, or would that Government in England last for one single day? No, Sir, they would be hurled from the places that they had misused; yet in our Auditor General's Report year after year we find that two or three hundred thousand dollars are deliberately expended for no other purpose than to bribe, from one end of this Dominion to the other, some particular newspapers which it may be convenient for the Ministers to subsidise out of the public pockets. These men talk of economy! Why, look at their expenditure on public lands. The total income in 1887 was $191,781. What was the total expenditure? To collect $191,000 we expended $461,474. In 1888 we did better; we collected $217,000, and it only cost us $426,820 to do it; and I dare say that next year we will collect $220,000 and only spend $420,000. Now, in that sum for the collection of revenue I include the sum charged to capital account, the sum spent in the department, the Minister's salary and contingencies, and I get this grand result which I present to these advocates of economy: in two years we have succeeded spending $888,296 for the purpose of collecting $488,864, in towards the bill of $58,000,000 due on the 1st January, 1891. Sir, I won't repeat what I have said of the management of the Intercolonial Railway further than this, that when you spend $5,750,000, counting interest, to collect $2,980,000, it is time indeed for economy in the management of our public affairs. I will take the whole record of hon. gentlemen, during the last twenty-one years. They began in 1867, with an expenditure of $13,500,000, when I came into office in 1874, I found bills awaiting me of $24,250,000, though I only spent $23,300,000; when I left office in 1878 my expenditure was $23,500,000. You heard to-day that our expenditure for 1888, not including sums improperly charged to capital expenditure, was now $46,713,000. There, Sir, is a record of these hon. gentlemen's past economy in two lines. I will not say anything, because really I have not time to discuss it, of that notable stroke of business of borrowing money at 3½ per cent. and lending it at 1½ per cent.; but when I look at the records of the savings banks, and when I see that the Government of Canada deem it prudent and economical to borrow thirty or forty millions at 30 per cent. above the current market rates, I must observe that it is a kind of economy which does not particularly recommend itself to my judgment, at any rate. Our position is remarkable in another respect, that, unfortunately for us, we have a very large nominal income; I say unfortunately, because when you have an apparent income of $36,000,000 or $37,000,000, a great many expenses, which are really very large for our means, appear to worthy people to be very small. It hardly strikes them as of the real importance it is when we talk of an expenditure of $200,000 or $300,000 as being important against a total income of $36,750,000. But when we come to analyse the facts, what do we find? We find a nominal income of $36,000,000, but after deducting the expenses of collection of the revenue and fixed charges, we find a real income of $9,750,000, which, if you deduct the sums improperly charged to capital account, would be reduced to $9,250,000. That is the true position of the affairs of Canada to-day; that is to say, that 75 per cent. of our whole income, in one form or other, is mortgaged. I will give the hon. gentleman the totals from his own estimates:

Interest on sinking fund .....	$12,107,725
Subsidies .....	4,100,000
Charges for collection of revenue .....	8,774,000
Charges for Indians .....	1,078,000
Total .....	$26,060,000

Which represent to all intents and purposes fixed charges against a nominal income of $36,000,000. Now,

Sir, out of that comparatively small income of about $10,000,000 what do we find? We find charges like these: Civil government, $1,316,000; charges for keeping these buildings and Rideau Hall in order, lighting and warming and repairing them, $300,000; law costs and newspapers, $100,000; pensions and superannuation, $326,000. That is the way that our money goes on an effective income of about $10,000,000 a year all told. Now, I desire to say this: In my mind, looking at the real condition of our affairs, it would not be true, I have never pretended that it was true, to say that Canada had made no progress at all, or even that Canada had not made considerable progress in certain directions. In twenty-one years, or even in ten years or seven years, Canada, being such as she is, and inhabited by a people such as ours, could not fail to make some progress in some directions, no matter how bad the system of government almost, or how bad the fiscal system under which it was administered. But what I do say is, that the progress made has been partial and one-sided. It has been far below par, far less than our natural resources warranted us in expecting; and I say that whether you take as the standard of comparison, our own progress in former years, or the progress of sister colonies, such as New South Wales or any of the other Australian colonies, or if you prefer it, the progress of the United States when their population was the same as ours, or its progress at the present moment. A great deal of the progress which hon. gentlemen opposite claim is purely and simply displacement; what one man has gained has been in too many cases another man's loss. Why, Sir, but the other day the Legislature of Ontario was compelled to pass a law to prevent one town taking manufactories from another, that is, to prevent it bonusing a manufacturer engaged in business in another town to induce him to remove his factory to them, and so injuring its neighbors for its own special profit. Now, it is perfectly true, that certain towns and cities have grown, some of them considerably; and I for one do not grudge them any growth that is fairly made or due to the natural advantages of their position. I am willing to join hon. gentlemen opposite in congratulating the country on the remarkable progress made by such cities as Toronto, in Ontario, or Montreal in Quebec. But is the growth of those cities to be taken as a fair indication of the growth of the population generally? What has been the growth in the good city of Quebec or the good cities of Halifax, St. John or Charlottetown? True, some places have benefited, though quite as much, I believe, from the natural advantages of their position as from anything in the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. But I say that while it is very doubtful if the progress that has been made would not have been quite as great if these artificial stimuli had been withdrawn, what there can be no possibility of doubt about is this, that under the false pretext of advancing a few interests we have enormously increased our debts and our taxes, we have suffered a frightful loss of people, and we have failed to settle the new territory on which so much depends. Briefly, I say, that the policy of the Government has resulted in this: It has made a few score, peradventure a few hundreds, of men much richer than they ought honestly to have been, and has made several millions of people, from one end of the country to the other, very much poorer than they ought to be to-day. Now I am not so young a politician as not to know that for purposes of political support, and notably in Canada to-day, the rich few are able, to a very great extent, to outweigh the many. I know perfectly well that they are exceedingly useful for the purpose of supplying those necessary funds which are required to manipulate refractory constituencies. I know that they understand, and understand well, how to control the public press, aye, and how to hoodwink a very considerable number of people at whose expense they are growing rich. The hon. gentleman was wise enough not to say much about another point, for I have noticed in these discussions that his friends in the House and his friends outside want to talk a great deal of the notable victory which the protective policy lately obtained in the United States, when Free Trade and Cleveland received a popular majority of 100,000 in the whole of the United States. They are very fond of pointing to the number of the seats they hold in this House as conclusive and absolute proof of their superior sagacity and wisdom. Well, I can tell the hon. gentleman that I know myself of twelve seats in the Province of Ontario, enough to have completely reversed their position in Ontario and most completely reversed their position in the House, if they had been transferred to where they belonged—I know of twelve seats in Ontario which were carried by a collective majority, for the whole twelve, of 383 votes. Why, I myself, my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Somerville), my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland)—could have polled, if we had chosen to exert ourselves, an additional Liberal majority in those three constituencies, ten times greater than the whole collective majority of 383 in the twelve counties I have referred to. And that majority of 383 was obtained by bribery, by virtue of the Gerrymander Act, by virtue of Franchise Bills, by virtue of Indian votes, by virtue of public buildings, erected in places 500 or 600 strong, and by every other known means of corruption of which I have heard or read. I now come to a still more important question, and that is: What possible remedies for these evils, which have grown to such a height, can we suggest? In my opinion the remedies are two. First of all—and as to this I do not blame the hon. the Minister of Finance so much, because he is but a young member of the Cabinet, and, though he is constitutionally responsible for the sins of the Government, still he is not responsible, morally, for all of them, fortunately for himself. He would have a heavy burden to carry out into the wilderness if he were to be made the scapegoat. Now these hon. gentlemen, for their own reasons, for their own objects, have chosen deliberately to destroy the whole financial basis on which our Confederation rested, and I say there is but one remedy for that. We have now come to a point when, if we wish to establish sound relations among the Provinces of the Dominion, we must put a check on the one hand to this unfair and vexatious interference on the part of the Dominion Government with provincial rights; and, on the other hand, to the constant demand by the Provinces on the Treasury of the Dominion. I say that our present system is as bad as bad can be; I say that it is faulty in every possible respect; I say that it is unsound, both in principle and practice, and is contrary to every constitutional doctrine by which representative countries have ever been governed. What does it mean? It means that one body of men are to spend the money and another to find it. Could you devise a system which does more mischief, which gives of necessity more encouragement to bribery, which offers a more direct premium to extravagance than the policy the hon. gentlemen opposite have initiated. They were not to blame perhaps for the introduction of the system of subsidies in the first instance, because it is probable Confederation could not have been brought about otherwise; but they are to blame, and they have been to blame, after Confederation was once brought about, for destroying the financial basis on which Confederation rested. The remedy I offer is revision of the constitution. We may have to pay handsomely for past folly, but almost at any cost it is better that we should establish matters once for all on a firm and stable basis, that the Provinces should go their way and manage their own affairs, and the Dominion Parliament for the future go its way and manage its own affairs. The second remedy is the one indicated by me and my friends here in our places last year. That remedy is to seek for trade relations where alone really valuable enlarged trade relations can be found. It is to seek for them within our reach and at our door, not 10,000 miles away—not in the Antipodes, not to go to South America for what we can get ten times better in North America and at one-twentieth of the cost and trouble; but let me say that if ever official returns spoke in trumpet tones in confirmation of the policy advocated on this side and of the line we took last year, they are the identical trade returns I have in my hand. What are the facts? I have mentioned them before, but they will bear reciting again. What do these returns tell us? They tell us that last year, out of a total trade of $193,050,000, we had a trade with the United States alone of $91,053,913; they tell us that out of a total volume of exports of our own produce of $81,382,000, not mentioning goods we do not produce, the United States has bought from us $40,407,483 worth, Great Britain, $33,648,000, and the whole of the rest of the world, excepting the United States, $40,974,060—just $500,000 worth more than the United States did; and yet we are to turn our back on the United States and are to go 10,000 miles away to see if somebody will buy a few dollars worth of goods from us. Now, is it not a thing which he that runs may read, a thing which ought to open, if anything can open, the eyes of gentlemen opposite, that at the very moment when they were occupied in this House belittling our trade with the United States last year—they are learning more wisdom now, I am happy to say—talking grandiloquently of how well Canada could do without the trade of the United States, the United States trade with us was growing by leaps and bounds. Could there be a better proof of the immense possibilities that that trade would afford to us, under proper development, than the fact that, fettered and handcuffed as it is, with all the impediments that two hostile tariffs can throw in its way, nevertheless last year, while we were deliberately refusing to consider the question, that trade increased by well nigh $10,000,000; and those returns hardly indicate the true extent of that trade. In the first place, it is well known that our exports to the United States are systematically under-valued. It is well known that what are called short returns are probably a good deal too small. I have here the United States returns for 1887, and likewise our own returns for 1887, and I call the attention of the House to a few notable facts. According to the United States returns, in 1887 we sent to the United States, paying duty, 58,071 cattle. Our own returns only showed 45,981. We sent to the United States, by their returns, 20,695 horses; our returns only showed 18,527. We sent to the United States 477,753 sheep, according to their returns, while our returns only showed 363,000, besides a large number of all these kinds of animals entered as not paying duty. I cannot say how much may be involved in that item, but it does appear to me that a very considerable amount ought to be added on both sides, exports and imports, to the volume of our trade with the United States, and the more so as it is known to me, and I dare say to the Minister of Customs, that in spite of all the restrictions which he has placed on that trade, and in spite of all the vigilance of his officers, a great many goods do find their way into Canada without the formality of going through the Custom house.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

An hon. MEMBER. Do you call that a formality.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will not say that going through the Custom house is often a mere formality, but I will say without paying tribute to our Canadian Cæsar. I am not going at this hour to repeat many of the arguments which I used last year. Those arguments, have not yet been met or answered, and therefore I will refer hon. gentlemen opposite to the speech which I then delivered for the further arguments I could very easily advance in regard to this matter. I have no doubt that, if any hon. gentlemen on that side desire to take up our challenge, they will find many of my hon. friends here ready to make our views plain to their understanding, if they are not now. What is wanted just now is rather to understand exactly the obstacles which are in our way, and I contend that the chief obstacle to the carrying out of the well understood and well ascertained wishes of the people of Canada is the conduct and the past attitude of the Government of Canada. Their fault in that respect is very much the same as their fault in the matter of the fisheries. They have managed, in some way or other, to convince the people of the United States, and to convince the Government of the United States, that the Government of Canada, whatever the people of Canada may be, are not at all desirous of cultivating friendly relations with the United States. I cannot stop to discuss how much of that feeling may be due to the downright stupidity of the Government, as shown in the case of the export duty on sawlogs, how much of it may be due to mere selfishness, how much may be due to a desire on their part to promote their own interests and the interests of the combines and manufacturers which they represent, but there is too much reason to fear that these men are to-day the secret opponents of the wishes of the people of Canada. They hardly dare openly to avow the hostility to the United States which they manifested last year, because they had several lessons which must have opened their eyes to the fact that a very large number of the people of Canada desire full and free and unrestricted trade with the United States; but there is danger that privately they will do everything they can to make a fair treaty impossible. It cannot well be otherwise. Reciprocity between the United States and Canada means wealth and freedom to a very large proportion of our people—freedom particularly from unjust taxation, and from the power which is put in the hands of the monopolists who are grinding the people of Canada to pieces to-day. Therefore, the Government to-day cannot earnestly seek to promote reciprocity, though it may be in their interests to so pretend. Unless the people of Canada convince them that it is at their peril if they push their negligence any further they will conduct these negotiations in such a way as to lead to foreseen and predestined failure. I do not think they will dare to provoke the United States, but I believe they will privately interpose obstacles between what we desire and its accomplishment. This is a case in which you must judge these men not by their words but by their acts, and it is by their acts in the past that we have to judge them; it is by noting such paltry quibbles as that in regard to packages of fruit, it is by such mistakes as that in regard to the export duty on logs, it is by such acts as these that I judge that, if they dared, they would be openly hostile to the United States. I have shown what I believed, and I have given reasons for my belief, to be in the true interest of this country at present. I am very far from saying that the position in which we now find ourselves was the inevitable result of Confederation. I believe, on the contrary, that with reasonable prudence, our position might be very much better than it is. But it is idle to discuss that now. We are not concerned with what might have been, but with what is at this day and this hour. I contend that our position is one of arrested development, and I say that, all things considered, this is the best way out of it. I say that not only is the project we advocate eminently calculated to benefit us materially, but I claim for it this great benefit, this indirect result, that, if it were carried out, it would necessarily curb the extravagance we deplore, and would, to a great extent, though perhaps not altogether, because that mainly depends on the people themselves, ensure honest government in this country. The moment is opporture. Almost the last act of the House of Representatives in the United States was to pass unanimously a resolution which may not perhaps indicate the precise mode or the precise way in which commercial relations between the two countries can best be settled, but which I take and which the Government should take, as holding out the olive branch to us, which is more than we deserve or than the Government deserves on the part of the United States. It is a declaration that they are prepared to treat with us for freer trade relations, and it is an answer to the absurd statement which has been made that the United States had not any desire for free and fair trade on free and fair terms with the people of Canada. More than that, it is a triumphant vindication of the position which we have always taken on this subject. Let us do our duty. Let us show to the United States that we are truly desirous of freedom of trade and friendly relations with them, and I am perfectly certain that, when the time comes and the United States are fairly approached, they will be willing to meet us in the same spirit. In order that there may be no mistake, and that the Government may understand that we are determined to fight this question out on the same lines that we have always fought it, I beg to move in amendment that you do not now leave the Chair, but that all the words after "that" be struck out, and that it be resolved :

In the present condition of affairs, and in view of the recent action of the House of Representatives of the United States, it is expedient that steps should be taken to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

Mr. TUPPER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11:45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 7th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 99) to incorporate the Three Rivers and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Riopel.)

CAUGHNAWAGA INDIAN RESERVE—SURVEY.

Mr. DOYON asked, Whether Mr. McLea Walbank has completed the survey of the Indian Reserve of Caughnawaga in the county of Laprairie? Whether he has furnished to the Government a report of his operations? What sums have been paid, up to this date, to Mr. Walbank, or to others, for making the said survey, and how much remains due to him?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The work of the survey of the above reserve commenced in the fall of 1882, and was only completed last season. It proved to be a very complicated matter, owing to the very irregular manner in which the Indians had taken up locations on the reserve—the outlines of which had to be surveyed with a view to ascertain what were the improvements made by each claimant and the value of the same. The reserve contains 12,327½ acres, and the cost of the survey of the same, when completed, will be about $—,000—Mr. Walbank has reported to the department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

NATURAL GAS IN WESTERN ONTARIO—MR. COSTE'S REPORT.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland) asked, Has Mr. Coste reported upon the result of his investigations during the past season on the subject of natural gas in western Ontario?

Mr. DEWDNEY. On reference to the last annual report of the Interior Department, at page 30 will be found Mr. Coste's report on his investigation during the past season on the subject of natural gas in western Ontario.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland) asked, Is Mr. Coste still on the staff of the Geological Survey; if not, when did he resign?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Mr. Coste is still in the service of the Geological Survey.

QUEBEC MONEY ORDER OFFICES.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, Is it the intention of the Government to make the post offices of all the county towns in the Province of Quebec offices at which money orders are issued and paid?

Mr. HAGGART. It is not the intention of the Government to make the post offices of all the county towns in the Province of Quebec offices at which money orders are issued and paid.

THE POSTMASTER OF CHESTER, P.Q.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, Has the Government received any complaint against the postmaster of Chester, county of Arthabaska, and if so, has any action been taken against such complaint?

Mr. HAGGART. A complaint was made by Mr. Oct. Gaudet, but subsequently withdrawn. A complaint was also made by the mail carrier, Mr. D. Coté, respecting the alleged refusal of the postmaster to give him the mail. This was referred to the Post Office Inspector to arrange.

DAILY MAIL BETWEEN MURRAY HARBOR SOUTH AND MONTAGUE.

Mr. ROBERTSON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish a daily mail between Murray Harbor South and Montague?

Mr. HAGGART. An application for a daily mail between Murray Harbor South and Montague, has been received and sent to the Post Office Inspector for report.

Mr. WELSH (for Mr. DAVIES, P.E.I.) asked, Was any survey held on the breakwater at New London, P.E.I., during the summer of 1888? If so, by whom? Was a report of the condition of the breakwater made to the department, and is it the intention of the Minister to cause the breakwater to be repaired and extended during the coming season?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am informed by the chief engineer of my department that there was no survey, and, therefore, I am not able to answer the second part of the question. My attention being called to it, I will see what can be done.

THE SHIPPING OF SEAMEN.

Mr. WELDON (St. John) asked, What instructions (if any) have been given to the shipping master in St. John, N.B., as to the shipping of seamen in United States vessels? Has the Government received any official notice or been otherwise informed of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to the Secretary of State upon the subject, in which he states:—"And should the Canadian Government approve of the action of the shipping master at St. John, I shall deem it my duty to instruct the officers of this department to require all shipments of seamen upon British vessels in American ports to be made before the United States Commissioners, and not before foreign Consular Officers."

Mr. TUPPER. The only instructions given to the shipping master at the port of St. John have been to the effect that the provisions of the Act relating to the shipping of seamen should be carried out. The Government has not received the information to which the hon. gentleman alludes.

A LOST DREDGE.

Mr. CAMERON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to provide funds for the purchase or construction of a dredge to replace the dredge which was lost in the Straits of Northumberland during a gale in the fall of 1887?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government does not intend during this Session to ask money for a new dredge.

FISHING IN RIVER MATANE.

Mr. FISET asked, Whether the right of fishing in River Matane has been leased or farmed only? If so, to whom, for how many years, and at what price, and on what conditions has the same been leased?

Mr. TUPPER. The right of angling in this river is leased to Sir Alexander Galt by an indenture dated the 1st of January, 1887. The lease expires in nine years from that date. The consideration of the lease is $100 a year.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to-morrow to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend "The Customs Act" and the Act amending the same, and to provide: (a) That the bringing of goods into Canada by land conveyance other than railway cars shall be prohibited during the night and on statutory holidays, except under permit and supervision; (b) That the Board of Customs and Dominion appraisers shall be authorised to review the valuations of port appraisers; (c) That in every case the value for duty shall include the charges of transportation and shipment, and shall be that of the quantity imported; (d) That such value shall include any royalty, rent or charge in respect of exclusive rights or territorial limits; (e) That goods entered for warehouse shall be placed therein without delay; (f) That information shall be exigible as to goods in transit through Canada for statistical and other purposes; (g) That the manner of ascertaining the time of exportation from any place out of Canada shall be defined; (h) That moneys deposited in lieu of articles smuggled, and subject to seizure, shall be treated in like manner as if such articles had been seized.

Motion agreed to.

INSPECTION, ETC., OF TIMBER AND LUMBER.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to-morrow to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to assimilate and amend the laws in force in the several Provinces in relation to the inspection, culling and measuring of timber and lumber, and to provide that the Governor in Council may authorise the payment of a sum not exceeding ten dollars a day for each day's actual service, and not exceeding in the whole three hundred dollars in any one year to each examiner of inspectors of timber, and of an annual salary not exceeding two thousand dollars to each chief inspector of timber; that every manufacturer of timber or lumber shall pay to the Crown an annual registration fee of two dollars, if his annual output is less than one million feet, board measure, and of ten dollars when such output is greater, and in addition one-fifth of one cent for each thousand feet, board measure, of timber manufactured by him, except square timber, and one-tenth of one cent for each ton of forty cubic feet of square timber manufactured by him; and that as respects the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, out of the sum so paid, and any moneys granted by Parliament, the Governor in Council may grant annuities, not exceeding two hundred dollars in each case, to such cullers as are now in receipt of like annuities, or who are not appointed inspectors and whose services are dispensed with.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (for Sir JOHN MACDONALD) moved that the House resolve itself into committee to-morrow to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that a pension made be paid to any member of the North-West Mounted Police Force, other than a commissioned officer, for life, if such member joined the force subsequent to the 23rd day of May, 1873, and completed twenty-five years' service, or if, having completed fifteen years' service, he retires in consequence of bodily or mental infirmity, subject to an obligation in the latter case to return to duty if the incapacity ceases; and that the scale on which such pensions shall be calculated shall be as follows:—If the member has completed fifteen but less than twenty-one years' service, one-fiftieth of the annual pay for each completed year of service; twenty-one and less than twenty-five years' service, twenty-fiftieths, and in addition two-fiftieths for every completed year of service over twenty; twenty-five years, thirty-fiftieths, and in addition one-fiftieth for every completed year over twenty-five, not to exceed, however, two-thirds of his annual pay at retirement; and further, that the annual pay shall be deemed to be the average annual pay, exclusive of extra pay or allowances, during the three years preceding retirement; and also that if the infirmity causing the retirement is caused by the default or evil habits of the member retiring, a less amount may be fixed by the Governor in Council as his pension.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE ACT.

Mr. HAGGART moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to-morrow to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the sum payable for registration of a letter, unquestionably containing valuable matter, by an official of the Post Office, in default of its being presented for registration, shall be fixed in like manner as other registration charges; that the postage on local or drop letters shall be two cents per ounce; on periodicals issued less frequently than at intervals of seven days, from office of publication, and on specimen newspapers, one cent per pound; that no periodical may be carried free of postage under the 26th section of "The Post Office Act" if it is published at intervals of more than seven days; that the postage on other printed matter, and on packages of seeds and matters of a cognate description, shall be one cent for each four ounces, and on printer's manuscript and proof, maps, lithographs, photographs, documents partly printed and partly written (not being letters), such as deeds and policies of insurance, and on miscellaneous mailable matter, one cent for each two ounces.

Motion agreed to.

REQUEST FOR A MAP.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the permission of the House to have a map of Canada suspended on the wall for the purposes of illustration during the Budget debate. I think it is very likely that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as well as other speakers, may wish to refer to it in discussing the question before the House. I presume there will be no objection to this.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Showing the New England States.

Mr. FOSTER. Canada as it is to be.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not suppose there is any objection to the request of the hon. gentleman, if the House wishes a map to be there. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman wants a map while he is speaking?

Mr. CHARLTON. While any member is speaking in this debate, in order to illustrate the geographical relations of the two countries. The map could be hung on the wall just below the Speaker's gallery.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I understand that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries does not require a map, but after he is through, if the hon. gentleman wishes a map it can be hung up for his speech.

Mr. CHARLTON. I should like it to be hung up now, though, if it should be any detriment to the Minister of Marine in speaking, it might be hung afterwards; but I would like the question settled now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I presume that when an hon. gentleman asks for such a simple thing as that a map should be placed on the wall for the illustration of his speech, there can be no possible objection to it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There does not seem to be any objection, but if the hon. gentleman would allow the matter to stand until the recess at six o'clock, a map might be put up during the two hours we are away.

Mr. CHARLTON. That would answer very well, unless some gentleman should require it for purposes of illustration before six o'clock.

ORDER FOR PAPERS.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the House proceeds with the Orders of the Day, I would like to call attention to another matter. At the first meeting for business of the Public Accounts Committee, held ten days ago, an order was made that the Militia Department should produce before the committee certain documents and vouchers. These papers are, no doubt, pretty voluminous, and it has been the custom, heretofore, to have them placed in the hands of the clerk of the committee for the inspection of those interested in them, prior to the meeting of the committee. It is ten days since that order was made by the Public Accounts Committee, and the committee has not yet been called together, and, up to the meeting of the House this afternoon, the order has not been complied with by the Militia Department, although it has been complied with by the Auditor General. If the Public Accounts Committee is at all to discharge its duties satisfactorily in examining into the expenditure of the $36,000,000 spent last year, its orders should be complied with. I may say further, that the fact of the first meeting of the Public Accounts Committee being held in the fifth week after the opening of Parliament, is hardly a proper compliance with the spirit of the House in establishing a Public Accounts Committee for the purpose of auditing the Public Accounts. If this information is withheld, or only given at a time when it is useless, then, I would submit whether there is any necessity for continuing the committee at all.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The order of the Public Accounts Committee was communicated to my department the same day or the day after. I gave immediate instructions to have the papers prepared. The hon. gentleman says they have not yet been furnished. I will enquire into the matter and see the cause of the delay, but, so far as my instructions are concerned, I gave orders to have the papers prepared forthwith. The work is voluminous, and possibly the clerks may be at work yet, but I shall enquire and let the hon. gentleman know to-morrow.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member was present at the meeting when the order was made, and, therefore, it did not take until the succeeding day for him to know that such an order had issued; nor do I think the excuse of taking time to copy the papers is a valid one. I want the originals, and the order of the committee was for the originals.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw attention to the fact that although we are now in the fifth week of the Session and a great many orders have been granted for returns, only seven returns have been brought down. If hon. members are to discharge their duties intelligently, they must be put in possession of these returns in fair time. I hope the Government will see that they are brought down without further delay. We have had a great many brought down which are either statutory returns or returns ordered last year. It appears to have become the habit to bring down returns the Session following the one when the orders were given. This system should be stopped, if hon. gentlemen are to discharge their duties properly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am informed that not only the returns ordered by my hon. friend from York (Mr. Mulock) have not been brought down, but that quite a number of other returns moved for by my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Somerville) and ordered by the Public Accounts Committee to be prepared, have not yet been brought down. It is quite true that the Public Accounts Committee have only had two meetings, one of which was for organisation, but we have now been five weeks in Session, and if the Government cannot bring down papers ordered, it will make the meeting of the Public Accounts Committee a perfect farce.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE, &c.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I call the attention of the House to item No. 9, respecting bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes. I intend moving the House into Committee on this Bill on Tuesday next.

SPEEDY TRIAL OF INDICTABLE OFFENCES.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 17) to make further provision respecting the speedy trial of certain indictable offences.—(Sir John Thompson.)

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was thought better to re-enact the Statute than merely to amend it, and it has been altered in such a way as to be applicable to the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The provisions relating to indictable offences will be administered in those Provinces by the county court judges, and I have several amendments which I will place before the chairman for the purpose of simplifying some of the provisions of the Bill as originally drafted. As regards the subject of jurisdiction, in order to remove all doubt and difficulty, I propose that the Bill shall not come into force, in the Provinces mentioned, until concurrent legislation be adopted by their Legislatures. Communication has been had with the Province of Nova Scotia, during recess, and I believe an enactment will be passed in the Nova Scotia Legislature to confer the jurisdiction on county court judges there. It may be that this Parliament has the power to do so, but I think it inexpedient, even if we had the power, to exercise it without the concurrence of the authority which has constituted the court. I intend, therefore, to ask for an amendment which will bring the Bill into force only by proclamation.

On section 2,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I propose to strike out subsection b and sub-sections 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 in that clause, and to substitute other provisions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). By the British North America Act, the constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction are under the provincial Legislatures. Is not the hon. gentleman undertaking to interfere with that jurisdiction of the provincial Legislatures? You are not creating a court for the better administration of the laws of Canada, but you are stating what is the jurisdiction, or in what court a criminal shall be tried for the offence of which he is charged.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Irrespective of any question as to our right to confer or impose jurisdiction, I am endeavoring to deal with the subject as in the line of procedure altogether. I think, if the hon. gentleman will give his attention to the suggestion that I endeavored to explain a few moments ago, he will find that we will accomplish that result. If we come to the view the hon. gentleman has just expressed, that it is not in our power at all to create a tribunal—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not say that.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I thought that was one of the hon. gentleman's objections.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I stated that we have expressly conferred upon us the power to create courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada. But we are not doing that. We are undertaking to confer jurisdiction upon a provincial court, and to state in what court the criminal shall be tried. Now, what I am calling the attention of the Minister of Justice to is, that by the British North America Act, so far as provincial courts are concerned, it is for the provincial Legislatures to say what shall be the jurisdiction of each court, and it is for them to say in what court the criminal offence shall be tried.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman has no difficulty about the right to create a criminal court, I think there can be no objection to the Bill at all. It is true that these courts, as now created, are constituted by the provincial authority; but the committee will remember that we have the power, under the British North America Act, to impose our jurisdiction and our business upon the provincial courts as established by the provincial authority. That, I think, is clear. It is on that principle that legislation has proceeded all along. But we intend, in principle, to avoid any conflict of that kind by the amendment, as I explained.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In the case the hon. gentleman refers to, I think the decision of the Privy Council goes to show that we created a new court. It became a court created by the Parliament of Canada, and it was only a mode of designating those who were to be the judges in that court—if my recollection of the decision be correct. But this is a wholly different matter, and I do not see how the hon. gentleman can make a jurisdiction expressly given to the court to try a particular case, a matter of procedure. It is something altogether apart from procedure. If you were to lay down that rule in every case, you would simply take power to determine what the procedure should be and to determine where a criminal should be tried, and then this provision of subsection 14 of section 92 would be inoperative—the administration of justice in the Province, and the maintenance and organisation of provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction. Now, if the provincial Legislature were to say—and I think this would be a fair test of the question of jurisdiction—that a criminal shall be tried in a particular court that it names, and not elsewhere, could the hon. gentleman or could the House, by the Bill of the hon. gentleman, give jurisdiction to one of these courts in this way? I do not think so. It seems to me clear that we cannot do so. It would be, in effect, rendering nugatory this provision of the constitution concerning criminal jurisdiction, including procedure in civil matters in those courts. The hon. gentleman goes much beyond that, and designates the court in which the crime shall be tried.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think it makes the slightest difference by what name we call the method we adopt. This Parliament has power to regulate the mode of trying controverted elections, and it took the Superior Courts of the Provinces and imposed upon them—without any provincial enactment whatever, those courts having been created and organised by provincial enactment—the jurisdiction to try controverted elections. It was held that that was intra vires of the Parliament of Canada. It was one of two things—it seems to me to be a matter of perfect indifference which it was—either we were creating a new tribunal for the purpose of wielding a jurisdiction which we had power to create, and the procedure of which we had power to regulate, or we were imposing that jurisdiction upon a court already created by another authority. It was declared that we had power to do that, and that is expressly what I propose to do by this Bill. I think it is immaterial whether we are, in effect, creating a new tribunal for the purpose of dealing with criminal procedure, or whether we are imposing the new procedure upon an existing tribunal created by the Province.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think, in the case the hon. gentleman refers to, and the decision in that case, there is this point made by the Judicial Committee. They state that the jurisdiction conferred upon the court was not an ordinary civil jurisdiction, but it was one that belonged to Parliament, and was specially vested in Parliament; and that Parliament, in designating a particular tribunal for the purpose of trying controverted elections, was simply conferring upon that tribunal a part of its own authority which it exercised itself for a special purpose, and that in doing so, while it stated that the judges of certain courts should be constituted a tribunal for this trial, it was creating a tribunal for that special purpose. That did not interfere with the jurisdiction of the Provinces in creating the courts; it did not deal with the civil or criminal law at all, it dealt with the law of Parliament. It was creating a special tribunal outside these functions that were mentioned as belonging to the Local Legislature under the head of civil and criminal jurisdiction; it was the institution of a court by a special Act, the members of which are designated in a particular way; and I do not see that that has any bearing at all upon the case that is now before us. Here we are dealing with a matter that is specially within the powers of the Local Legislatures. It is not a law of Parliament, such as the matter dealt with in that Act and decided by the Judicial Committee. This is a power within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, or the Local Legislatures of the respective Provinces, and the Act says that it includes "the administration of justice in the Provinces, including the constitution, maintenance and organisation of provincial courts." Now, how is the court constituted? Not simply by saying that it shall be composed of four or five judges, but by stating, in addition to the number of judges that shall constitute the court, what their jurisdiction is to be. If you create what you call a court, and do not confer upon it any jurisdiction, why, it would not be a judicial tribunal; the Act itself would be a mockery. You designate the power which the court is to possess. Now, the powers that the Local Legislatures may designate a court to possess, are everything relating to the criminal and civil law of the Dominion as well as everything relating to the civil law, both of the Dominion and of the Legislature. If you are not satisfied with the manner in which that power is exercised, there is a special power conferred upon you to create courts of your own. You cannot, by creating these courts, take away the jurisdiction belonging to the provincial courts. If you introduce a Bill to declare that all the laws of Canada shall be administered by special courts, while you may confer concurrent jurisdiction on those courts, you cannot take away from the provincial courts the power already conferred upon them. The present Bill goes beyond the question of procedure and deals with the constitution of the court: it states in what court the trial should be had, and in so doing it is interfering with the powers belonging to the provincial Legislatures.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am unable to see any distinction between the question involved in this Bill and that which has been previously rescinded, for the reason that in dealing with any subject over which we have power we could take a provincial court and confer jurisdiction on it. It matters not whether the result of that was simply to add that jurisdiction to the provincial court, or really to turn the provincial court into a Dominion court. It is proposed, however, that the Act shall be suspended until the Legislatures of the Provinces shall have an opportunity of conferring the jurisdiction in question.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The proposed court will be constituted by the Dominion Government, and, in my opinion, this question is more in the nature of procedure, and the power has been already exercised. No doubt election courts stand on different footing, but under the Winding-up Act and the Insolvent Act power was given to a single judge to exercise similar powers to those proposed.

On schedule A,

Mr. DAWSON. There are two new temporary judicial districts, the districts of Manitoulin and Rainy River, which I would suggest should be included in the first section of this Bill.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think they are only magisterial divisions as yet.

Mr. DAWSON. There are no judges yet appointed, only stipendiary magistrates; but judges may be appointed at any time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. But before judges may be appointed, there must be legislation by the Ontario Legislature erecting them into judicial districts. I understand that a Bill is to be passed at the present Session of the Ontario Legislature for that purpose, and after that it will be competent to amend this Act to include them. But I think it would be unwise to include them until a county judge is appointed.

Committee rose and reported.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster: That Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion few Ministers occupying the very important position of Finance Minister of the Administration of the day have had the great satisfaction which was enjoyed by the present occupant of that position a few evenings ago, when, by an extraordinary array of statistics, by his careful and exhaustive review of the twenty-one years of our national existence, he was able to force from the financial critic of the Treasury benches a confession of that hon. gentleman's utter inability to meet him, or to challenge any of the very strong positions which he took up at the outset of the debate. That hon. gentleman did, for a moment, go through the form of meeting some of the hon. Minister's propositions, with the statement that he was happy to agree with him in reference to those propositions. But he invariably misconstrued the proposition so as to suit his own case, and after preliminary observations of that kind, dived into his desk and took out the arguments that he has handled Session after Session, year after year. Over and over again he would wheel round, in his favorite, warlike position, place his back to the enemy, and endeavor to rally his forces. Like the celebrated general in the oft-told story, he himself was unable to do anything, but he pointed out to his followers the enemy on the field of battle, and said he knew there were men on those back benches who would face the position taken up by the Finance Minister, and after repeating his old speech and his old indictment, he started for home. I say that was a gratifying position for the Minister of Finance. And what was really the whole sum and substance of the criticism of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)? He went over his old brief, he gave us the old arguments, cooked accounts and all, that had been made and refuted over and over again, and then, fearing that he had omitted any of those wonderful calculations and theories, so familiar to us all, he said: For the rest, I refer hon. gentlemen to Hansard. Well, I could, with satisfaction, perhaps, to the House, simply refer hon. members to the replies to be found in Hansard, which were made to the hon. gentleman's speeches; but I have a more satisfactory refutation than that as to every charge almost which he made in this debate against the honor of the Government and against the position and the policy stated by the Minister of Finance. I need not refer him to Hansard, but after Hansard had been well studied, after everyone of his indictments and elaborate financial criticisms had been spread broadcast throughout the country, I can refer him to the elections of 1882 and 1887. The answer to his specious and ingenious criticisms can be found there. But I would call the attention of the House to the extraordinary charge made by a gentleman occupying the important position the hon. gentleman does—the oft-reiterated charge that the Government (if he meant the words in the sense in which he used them) have cooked accounts. That is no new charge. Did the hon. gentleman really believe that he was bringing it for the first time to the attention of the House and the country? There is nothing in the statement he made, or in the facts to which he alluded, that will bear out, in the slightest degree, that very serious charge made against the Minister of the day, and his predecessors. The hon. gentleman made that charge on the floor of the House last year, and there, one gentleman, Mr. McLellan, to whom he alluded in this debate, and to whom he gave a certificate of character on that score, explained to this House the principle upon which those accounts were made out, and the reasons for in some years charging to capital account what in others was charged to revenue. I will not weary the House by going over the explanation which that hon. gentleman made, but will adopt the hon. gentleman's style of argument, and refer to Hansard (vide Hansard, vol. 2, 1888, page 1096). There will be found the answer to the hon. gentleman's charge, and in that same volume will be found the answer to every criticism the hon. gentleman has made. But with reference to the criticisms in which he endeavored to assail the Finance Department, I have reason to believe the Minister of Finance will take an early opportunity before this subject is disposed of, to give the hon. gentleman what further information there is to be given on that score. When we reflect that that hon. gentleman dared to use, in this House, such language in reference to his opponents, as to describe them as knaves, and the majority of the people as dupes, because the people have expressed their confidence in the Administration of the day, it is high time to remind him, not only of the position he occupies in the counsels of this country, but of the fact that his past record is not of a character to entitle him to hurl those charges across the floor of the House. I wish to tell him that his extraordinary career, his extraordinary characteristics, financially and otherwise, are all known to the people of this country, who have had a very unhappy experience of his official life. The principles to which he has adhered are not only extraordinary, but, to a large extent, amusing. He has been engaged in making calculations from the day he entered political life down to the present, and the manner in which he impressed the great organ of public opinion, the Toronto Globe, when he sat on this side of the House behind the leader of this Government, is worth recalling. His calculations, after careful revision, were then pronounced, by perhaps the ablest man that ever conducted that journal, amusing in the highest degree, and he was told to stick to the figuring business and keep up his amusing character. He has done so. He has sustained the character wonderfully well. What could be more amusing than his attitude in this debate? Fancy the hon. gentleman standing as a financial critic and attacking the Budget Speech in this particular, that there was no estimate made for a contingent liability, that the Government of the day had not come down to Parliament and said: We are fighting tooth and nail, a claim made against the Government for a large amount; we are disputing absolutely any liability before the arbitration, that matter is now sub judice; but so fearful, so faint-hearted are we in the action we have taken, that we ask Parliament to provide a sum of money to pay a claim we utterly repudiate and disavow. I repeat the hon. gentleman does not occupy a position which entitles him to hurl this unpleasant charge, to use a mild term, across the House. It will be necessary for me to remind the House that he has been all his life, a rather long political life, a man of two ideas, whether as Conservative or Reformer. I would point out to the recollection of hon. gentlemen, that as far back as 1865, when he just entered political life, he started out with those ideas, and to his credit, if consistency be a credit, he has maintained them down to the present day, with a slight exception, and that was when he was permitted to act as Finance Minister. During those short four or five years in that long career, those two ideas were suppressed, and they gave place to what I believe, in my own judgment, were much more creditable ideas to him and much better for the country. Those ideas were, and they will certainly be recognised by all who have followed him in his later day speeches:—Fear and the exodus. He began in 1865, to argue the necessity of Confederation in order to prevent a terrific exodus from the old Provinces of Canada, and to prevent the absorption of these Provinces into the American Union. These were the ideas which he propounded and by which he endeavored to terrify the people, so as to make them firm believers in Confederation. And what have you seen to-day, what have you noticed in years past, and, in fact, ever since that hon. gentleman, with many of his party, have been driven desperate by defeat after defeat? You find them using the same arguments, and referring to the same exodus, which they used at that time to frighten the people of Canada into the opposite course, now to frighten them into the American Union or into such close relations with that country as would break up Confederation, annihilate our national existence, and place us at the mercy of our neighbors. At Ingersoll, and even in this House, the hon. gentleman did not hesitate to point out—though I am glad to know, or, at least, I believe, he had not much support from either side of this House—that England was unable to protect this country against the United States or any other foreign country that might assail us. He endeavored to place in the minds of the people the idea that we should make any bargain we could with the people of the American Union, in order to save us from absorption, as he put it. He went on again to argue as to this question of fear, and he used almost the same language as he did in 1865 on that subject, though then it was with the opposite view. If the House will permit me to make good the point I have taken, I will give a sample of the arguments the hon. gentleman used when he was holding the opposite opinions to those he now holds, and I advance them to show how true it is that he is a man of two ideas, and that he has made no change in the style and method which he adopted in order to induce the people of Canada to agree with him. In 1865 he said:

"I must again revert to the condition in which we found ourselves during the last few years, and I ask every hon. member to answer for himself whether it was one which it gives him any pleasure to look back upon? Was it pleasant for us, Mr. Speaker, a young country without one penny of debt which has not been incurred for purposes of public utility—was it pleasant for us, I ask, to find our revenue yearly out-running our expenditure in the ratio of 20, 30 or even 40 per cent. per annum? Was it pleasant for us to know that some of our once busiest and most prosperous cities were being depopulated under the pressure of exorbitant taxation? Was it pleasant for us, inhabiting a country able to sustain ten times the present population, to find capital and immigrants alike fleeing from our shores, even if they had to take refuge in a land desolated by civil war? Was it pleasant for us, Sir, the old colony of England which has ever vindicated its attachment to the Empire in fair fight, to know that our apathy and negligence in taking steps for our own defence was fast making us the by-word to both friend and foe?"

That is the language the hon. gentleman now uses in order to induce the people of this country to take the very opposite step from that which they took after those arguments were addressed to them at that time. Not only in 1865, but in 1878, his arguments were almost altogether based on these two points—fear of the United States, and the exodus of the people of Canada. As I have said, he came into power for a short time, and in that time he used as much ingenuity as he now uses in the opposite direction, to show that the exodus was imaginary, and that it was not as great from Canada as it was from the Eastern States of the American Union. That is what he tried to convince the people of during that painful period of our country's history. When Parliament assembled in 1882, the great questions were those of free trade and protection, and these were the arguments he used at that time. So it was in 1888. After the year 1887, when he took the sharp and short turn in regard to the National Policy, you find that he used then, and he now again uses, the arguments which he previously used on the other side. In regard to the question of population, which exercises the hon. gentleman so much, I want to remind him, and to remind the House, that there is a great responsibility resting upon the shoulders of the Opposition for a large portion of the exodus. These hon. gentlemen have endeavored to convince the people in this country, as well as intending immigrants, not only that our land laws are hard and bad to live under in the North-West Territories, but, day after day, they make the fiercest possible assaults, not only upon our institutions, but upon the possibility of our being able to carve out for ourselves an independent commercial and national existence on this continent. Coming from a large Opposition with a large following in the country, these arguments from so many ingenious men, and many able men, must have their weight and must affect the amount of immigration. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was able to remind my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Hesson) that, in his constituency, where he had a considerable amount of influence, seventy men had left within a few months. I believe that all those who accept the hon. gentleman's arguments must necessarily leave the country. I shall not give my own words as to the other side of this question, but I quote from an American review an article written by a man of whom the Maritime Provinces have reason to be proud, Prof. Schurmann, a man who has given his attention not only to matters educational, but who takes a live interest in his country's welfare. In that article he met the speeches of the hon. member for South Oxford and went into the question, and in a very able review, he cited the statistics of the two countries to show that, a century ago, the population of Canada was one-twentieth that of the United States, that fifty years ago it was one-eleventh of that population, and he estimated that, in 1890, in spite of their enormous gains in immigration, our population will be one-thirteenth of theirs; and he contended that, as the best American lands are already taken up, while ours, which are also richer, are still unoccupied, it is manifest destiny that Canada is now to become the home of foreign settlers on this continent. That is the firm conviction of the people of this country. These gentlemen may enjoy for a time their little triumph in having retarded the settlement of that great country in the North-West, but the time must come, whether there be a good Government or a bad Government in power, when that country will be the only good territory for the occupation for this vast flood of immigrants to enter and settle upon. Before the right hon. gentleman carries out his promise and appeals to the people of this country, we may be able to force the member for South Oxford, by additional statistics, to admit our success in that direction, as he was forced to admit that the statistics which were cited by the hon. the Minister of Finance proved the point he made in the debate, that Canada had made substantial growth, and had prospered since 1868. The hon. gentleman once left his old friends, and the old spirit apparently has not died out of him, because, on a most important point taken by the Finance Minister he left his new friends. The Finance Minister, attacked the position which was taken by the leader of the Opposition at Oakville, when he contended that there had been a decline in the value of Canadian trade. He pointed out that that was apparently a misrepresentation, and that it was an unfair point to take against the country to omit to state the volume of trade and simply allude to the value, and that, in taking that point which was against the progress of the country, he had done an indefensible thing. That important point was taken, and the hon. member for South Oxford for a moment deserted his present leader as he deserted his past leader, in order to have the pleasure and opportunity of stating that that had been his position all along, and that, when he was Finance Minister, he contended that it was unfair to take the value of our imports and exports simply, but that the volume and value of our trade should be taken together. For the purpose of making that point he went back, not only upon his present leader, but a little later on, against the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who, during the speech of the Minister of Finance, had interjected the remark that we had not advanced one jot since 1868. The hon. gentleman for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was forced, by the array of figures and the array of facts which the Minister of Finance brought forward, to admit that we had made substantial progress. But we do not depend upon his admissions, we do not ask his admissions. Voluntary admissions are made day after day by members of that party who are not desperately driven, by those who are in office in the Province of Ontario, who are not in the same condition as hon. gentlemen on the opposite benches in this House; time and again, in recent months, they have declared their conviction that this country has made substantial growth, nay, imposing progress since Confederation. Mr. Mowat and Mr. Ross have made most eloquent speeches upon that subject, and those speeches have done good throughout the country, because they serve to offset these hon. gentlemen, who are not so careful in their statements as to the progress of this country, and who, perhaps, have a reason for their desperation not known to those who are in office in the Province of Ontario. In regard to the volume and value of trade, it is important in this connection to consider the position taken by the hon. member for South Oxford, during the time that he was Minister of Finance, year after year, as he well knows, and as he himself stated in this debate, when there was a regular and a persistent decline, not only in the volume but in the value of our trade, when, for instance, in 1874, when the aggregate trade was 217 millions, it steadily declined, year after year, down to 153 millions in 1879—that hon. gentleman pleaded to this House and to the country, that it was not so bad as it really appeared; he said that though the values were declining, and though the volume was declining, the decline in the volume was not alarming. Why, Mr. Speaker, he went further, and his argument then is of special importance now, when we see but a temporary decline, when we have not reached the low point of 1879. We find that in 1879 the aggregate trade, in round numbers, was $159,000,000, whereas to-day it is $201,000,000. In this connection it is important to recollect another argument of that hon. gentleman when he was Minister of Finance. He turned to the United States, that country that now elicits his warmest admiration, the very fiscal policy of which country has assumed in his eyes entirely new proportions of late; he turned to that country, and stated that during the most prosperous period in its history, when all went well with the American States, there was a steady decline in the value and volume of their foreign trade for 15 years, and he gave us the years. He said that in 1832 the imports amounted to $100,000,000, and they rose in 1836 to $189,000,000. But he stated that 15 years elapsed after 1836 before those imports again reached the figure of 189 millions, and this, said the hon. gentleman, in a period of great prosperity, and with a population growing from 15 to 25 millions. That was all very well in the United States. That was a first-rate argument when he was Minister of Finance, but, forsooth, to-day, while he admitted the force of the Minister of Finance's argument, he endeavored to make a point out of the fact that our trade, large as it was, fabulous, even, if the hon. gentleman's theory in regard to population be correct, was not steadily increasing. He endeavored to make that point a little later on, when he turned to the trade of New South Wales. I have not the figures for the last year, but I notice that this country, that is bounding on in prosperity, the trade of which colony is said to be steadily growing, and I hope it is, and must be steadily growing if the hon. gentleman's argument be true, I notice in regard to it that 15 years may elapse and the foreign trade be at a standstill, and yet a country may prosper and grow rich. I find in the Statesman's Year Book, from which I take the figures, that, speaking in round numbers, the trade, including bullion and specie, was £21,000,000 in 1882, and was £15,000,000 in 1886. I have not the figures for 1887-88, but they matter not in connection with the point with which I am dealing. The hon. gentleman devoted a great deal of time to the protective policy, but he is certainly not an authority on that. When resisting the movement in this country for a protective tariff, he staked his financial reputation upon a prophecy and upon a calculation that if you raised the tariff about 17½ per cent. in this country you would have no imports, you would have no means of raising your revenue, and you would have to resort to direct taxation of a most serious kind. He finds to-day, even in his complaint, that the imports of this country are not so large as he claims they should be, that they have risen from 93 millions in 1878, under a 17½ tariff, to 110 millions in 1888, under a protective tariff, and with a decline in values. I will give a few figures to show that the importance and expansion of our commerce is indeed wonderful, as the Minister of Finance has claimed. We find, according to Mr. Giffin, an eminent authority on that question, quoted in Canada a few days ago, that the price of Scotch pig iron has declined from 127s. in 1873, down to 41s. 11d., in 1888; coals, from 30s. in 1873, to 17s. 6d., in 1888; copper, from £91 to £73; wool, per pack, from £23 to £11; and sugar, per cwt., from 21s. 6d. to 13s. 3d. When we find that these are the facts, and then consider that, notwithstanding the decline in values, we have an increase in the value of our import trade, I say, again, that the expansion of our commerce is established at once. We know, also, that we have been supplying ourselves with an immense amount of goods, and an immense amount of manufactures, that we formerly imported, and for which we were dependent upon other countries; we know that as we become self-sustaining, a large number of dutiable articles go off the list, articles upon which we collected a revenue. But there takes place something else, as is shown by the history of all countries having a protective tariff, that a certain line of articles manufactured by the poor and underpaid labor of foreign countries, does not come into this country to such an extent as before, in competition with our own fairly paid labor. Then we find, Mr. Speaker, that the consuming power of the people, growing rich under a protective policy, becomes so great and grows so quickly that other articles, such as luxuries, upon which a revenue tariff is placed, are increased in quantity, and the exchequer feels the effect. So that in reference to that calculation, a calculation of a most important character, the hon. gentleman was, at least, unhappy. But I must hurry on, as my intention is to occupy as brief a period as possible in this important debate. Now, the hon. gentleman attacked a protective tariff at one part of his speech, though he wound up by a resolution which virtually proposes to double the rate of protection which exists to-day. But, inconsistent as that gentleman nearly always is, he attacked the policy of protection. While, on the one hand, he asks us to join a country which is enjoying the greatest protection almost of any country in the world, while he asks us to adopt the American tariff, on the other hand, at another period, he said he took pride in stating that he preferred the British system. He has not the courage of his convictions, and the people know it. He is in love with direct taxation, but he dare not avow it openly. However, he has endeavored to get the thin edge of the wedge inserted. He tried on the people at one time, the effect of direct taxation, and he certainly found it not very popular, and, like his old leader, whose presence I am glad to greet in the House to-day, when he came face to face with the steady, thinking people of the country, with the laboring people, he took back his free trade theories and went down on his knees to a protective tariff. But he attacks a protective tariff to-day, although he may take as sudden a change as he did before, at the time of the next general election. He attacks our position on this ground: He says, Why should you seek a foreign market, when you believe in protection; of what value are foreign markets to this country? Is the hon. gentleman playing with the question? Does he not know that his allies in the United States, Messrs. Butterworth and Hitt, are great protectionists, and they are straining every nerve to get possession of this market, and to slaughter their goods here, and to make us hewers of wood and drawers of water, as of old. The hon. gentleman knows it quite well. And, moreover, he knows that the American people have just elected an extreme protectionist party to power in the United States; he knows, too, that no free trade party can get a foothold there, and he knows well the immense efforts they make, by granting subsidies and otherwise, to obtain admission into foreign markets. And more than that, he knows right well how they have succeeded. In the Australian colonies, notwithstanding the mother country's free trade tariff and its lower-price labor, they have gained a foothold there. He knows that British consuls report that in colony after colony of the Empire, American goods are found competing with British goods, and not only American, but German goods also. The hon. gentleman should study the arguments of his opponents and learn, if he is ignorant now as not to know it, that it is the policy of all countries enjoying a protective tariff to secure as much foreign trade as possible as is consistent with their own manufacturing interests and their own labor interests, and they succeed. And so he will find out, if he consults his allies to whom I have already alluded, that you may be a protectionist and yet make an effort to obtain increased foreign trade, and even succeed in obtaining a considerable share of foreign trade. We know well that American and foreign goods have been slaughtered in our market. The hon. gentleman himself admits—I have the reference to his speech here, if he has forgotten it—that during his regime goods from American factories were slaughtered in this market. This fact goes to show that this condition of things can occur in a country even though it is enjoying for the time a protective tariff. Protective countries require foreign markets just as the United States, require our market. The manufacturers will sell their goods there at cheaper prices, they will slaughter them there, in order that they may keep their hands employed and be able to await the arrival of better times in their own country. It is too late, either in Canada or on this continent, to go back to first principles and discuss free trade and protection, when there is not a single member in this House, on either side of it, who would stand up and say that he would put his free trade principles into practice.

Mr. GILLMOR. I would.

Mr. TUPPER. And no one would dare to go to the people and say that he intended to raise the revenue of the country in any other way than by indirect taxation. No man yet has had the courage to express such convictions, if they have been convictions. The home market is of great importance. It is not dear to the manufacturer alone, but to the farmer as well. The hon. gentleman has attempted to place in conflict the two great interests of this country, the manufacturing interest and the farming interest. If he has read the doctrines of free traders, he will remember surely that when Mr. Cobden was arguing in favor of free trade in England, and his opponents were arraying those two classes there against each other, his statement was—and we have found it to be true, as the elections have shown in this country—that you cannot help the manufacturer without helping the farmer, since the manufacturer is the farmer's best customer. The home market is more valuable always. Commercial history teaches us that fact in every country. While we desire to secure the foreign market as well, we require a stable home market to enable our manufacturers to furnish employment to their hands, and it is necessary to the success of the farmer as well,—and the farmers understand it thoroughly well. The hon. gentleman affects a love for the British system. If the House will permit me, I will quote a sentence from a recent speech by Mr. Goschen, the British Chancellor of the Exchequer. He is as great a free trader as there is in English politics to-day, and, standing before an audience in Birmingham on Dec. 7th, he told the people there exactly what the income tax was under the British system which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) loves so well. He was proposing to reduce that tax, and, naturally, he desired to show that his measure was deserving of sympathy and support:

"The relief of the income tax was not a relief simply or mainly for the rich. The income tax is a tax that bears with terrible weight on the struggling tradesman, on the professional man, on the clerk who has £300 or £400 a year, on the small farmer who can scarcely make both ends meet. These are the men who are deserving of sympathy, and I protest, not only as Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I protest as a citizen, that it is not this class on which, in the mere impossibility of finding other resources, you should always place the burden of taxation whenever more money is wanted. I thought that the income-taxpayer had a fair claim to be relieved, and that relief has been given, and the income tax, which stood at 8d. in the pound has been reduced to 6d."

The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) tells us to-day that he likes the British system, that he desires to again have the opportunity of imposing direct taxation on the people, of imposing it on struggling tradesmen and small farmers, who, he says, are already suffering from so many burdens. He knows not only that the British system has led to poorly-paid labor to such an extent as has been described, but an examination shows that under the "sweating" system goods are produced at very cheap rates in the mother country, and at whose cost? For that reason, from every labor district in Canada, I believe, and from every Province representatives are to be found sitting on this side of the House; the labor interests are totally adverse to the hon. gentleman's financial doctrine; the labor organisations, whether in Great Britain, the United States, or this country, are protective, every one of them, and the policy of this country is essentially framed in the interests of labor. That is one reason of its success, and it is for this reason that hon. gentlemen opposite have a slim chance and little opportunity of ousting this Government from power. The hon. gentleman contended that the Finance Minister had denied that the farmers paid any taxes, and that they paid taxes upon machinery, or that in any respect they were affected by the tariff. The Finance Minister made no such statement. An hon. member who is always interjecting, apparently for the purpose of interjecting, and nothing else, called out "Nails" when my hon. friend was discussing the farmer's purchases and the articles which the farmer chiefly used. My hon. friend spoke not of machinery; as to whether the articles are dearer on that account or not, I am not now going to discuss. Time after time this question has been fully discussed in this House, and it has been shown that, even if the people do pay a little more for their goods, it is something to have a tariff policy that enables them to obtain money wherewith to buy them. Make the goods as cheap as you like, they say, let them be slaughtered in this country! We have had that experience, and our experience is this, that when these goods become so cheap, the inability of the intending consumer is often absolutely taken away, so that the people understand that. Take, for instance, the question of coal, upon which hon. gentlemen from the west now and then excite themselves. The cry was all through Ontario that the price of coal was increased to the consumers in consequence of the tax of 60 cents per ton. The hon. gentlemen know that experience has illustrated the entire fallacy of that argument in this respect, that since that tariff was removed the price of coal has increased, and that the hard coal supply of Ontario is now practically in the hands of an American monopoly. That has been the experience in that regard—and so it is not true in most of the cases, though in some it may be—that the price of an article is slightly increased by a moderate protective tariff such as ours. Then, another point is sought to be made in regard to the farmers of Ontario. I was surprised to hear from the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), notwithstanding his fondness for extravagant remarks and extravagant speeches,—I was surprised to hear that hon. gentleman endeavor to show before an intelligent audience in this House, that the value of farm lands was decreasing, especially in Ontario, and that the decrease was a result of the policy of the Government. The hon. gentleman ought to have admitted, and, admitting it, then pointed his argument to some other direction, that whether it be in free trade England, or in the United States with the high protective tariff, or in Canada with a lower protective tariff, the value of farming property, all the world over, has decreased during the last few years.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. TUPPER. Hon. gentlemen say "no." I tell them that an eminent English authority, Mr. J. S. Jeans, has made a calculation of this, in a very interesting work which he has written lately. Mr. Jeans is a gentleman who has on many occasions lectured before some of the most intelligent audiences in England. He has made the calculation that both in America and in England the value of farming property has decreased in the last few years by something like 100 per cent. The member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), when speaking in regard to the farms of Ontario, was not one-half or one-tenth so bad as that. I hesitate to give the House the statement, but since the hon. member for South Oxford challenged it, I will read it, as it is not long:

"In America, as in England, and indeed all over Europe, there has been a great fall in prices within the last two or three years, affecting nearly all agricultural products; in some cases those have been reduced in value 100 per cent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What would be left after taking off 100 per cent.? You would wipe it out altogether.

Mr. TUPPER. The statement is 100 per cent., and I do not intend to argue the question out as to whether the arithmetic is good or not, but I will refer the hon. member to the member for South Oxford, who said that the Canadian laboring men, or poorer classes, pay 600 per cent. more taxes than the corresponding class in England.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman know so little of arithmetic as not to know that you may multiply ten thousand per cent., but that you cannot deduct it?

Mr. TUPPER. I think I know, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman is ashamed of his own calculation, and cannot justify it. Now, as to the condition of the farmers; and I will call the attention of the House to a very valuable authority, the statement of a Reform journal in the Province of Nova Scotia. Let us see as to whether our farmers are to be in so much better a position when we are part and parcel of the American Union, as under the terms of this resolution we will be. In July last, after Unrestricted Reciprocity had been fully aired before the country, the Morning Chronicle stated: "That the farmers of the States, in every way favorably situated, had been declining in prosperity, farms had been mortgaged, and profits were vanishing away." Hon. gentlemen well know that the Province of Ontario, especially with its position to the Western States and the neighboring States of the American Union was magnificently portrayed to the credit of Ontario, last Session, by hon. gentlemen who are much better prepared to deal minutely with the question than I am, and those statements, up to this day, have not been answered. Now, if the condition of the farmers in the States be as described by this Reform journal, where is the advantage of this market of sixty millions of people to Canada? The American farmers enjoy that market, they are within the sacred confines of the American limits, and, notwithstanding those wonderful pictures drawn by hon. gentlemen opposite of what would follow if the customs lines were taken down, we find that the American farms are being heavily mortgaged, and that all their property is vanishing away. The hon. gentleman was not in good fighting trim the other night, for he candidly confessed that he could not attack the success of the late loan, yet, although he admitted that it was a good loan and that it was placed at the right time, he could not leave the subject without the sneering remark that money was very cheap all the world over, and that no credit was due to the Government for the success of the loan. I will not weary the House on that, further than to refer hon. members to a very able article in the Globe newspaper which gives a comparative statement, and which, in that comparative statement, supports the able and unanswerable arguments of the Minister of Finance, showing that not only was it a successful loan, made when money was cheap, but that, comparatively, it was the best loan ever negotiated by a colony, and its comparison with the credit of other countries, including the colonies, was such as to show that in itself it was a most extraordinarily successful financial transaction. However, we will take, though it was given ungracefully, his testimony to the acts of the Minister of Finance, though some, I fear, will feel a little dubious as to the loan being a success, because the hon. gentleman himself admitted it. The member for South Oxford could not resume his seat without, as he has often times done before, and without much success, showing his unmistakable hostility to the interests of the Maritime Provinces. The member for South Oxford showed particular hostility to the Intercolonial Railway as well as to those works which chiefly concern us in the Maritime Provinces, namely, the Short Line Railway, subsidies to railway, subsidies to Provinces, and the assumption of provincial debts. Those have been burning questions with us in the Maritime Provinces, and both his friends and his foes in politics in those Provinces have been advocating them from Confederation up to the present time and they have been making oftentimes ingenious claims that their legitimate demands had not been satisfied. They find to day that the second in command of this ship on the Opposition side is their bitterest foe, that he is opposed to the benefits which they derive at the hands of the Conservative party, and that if he got into power he would drive them to his favorite system of direct taxation which he lauded so much, by cutting away their means of government. He went on to attack the Intercolonial Railway, and he laid down a principle by which I shall judge his own Government when he was in power. He stated that there was a loss in working that railway, and that this proved that it was run and built for political purposes. Does that follow as a necessary consequence, or is that one of the fanciful calculations of the ex-Minister of Finance. If it is a true test, then what must have been the political rascality of that hon. gentleman's Government, because the figures show that in the operation of that road, he, himself, is on record as stating that that railway would be run at a loss of, perhaps, $600,000 annually. The figures show that the loss of operating that line was far greater under the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member than it is under the Government of the present day. The facts and figures established more than that: they established that while we are hauling more than twice the traffic, while the system has been more enlarged, not only the losses on this road, but those on the canals, which the hon. gentlemen did not attack, have been a benefit to the merchants and people of Ontario and Quebec, as well as to the people of the Maritime Provinces; and members from the Maritimes Provinces, both Liberal and Conservative, will join in resisting the attack on our vital interests now made and threatened by the hon. member for South Oxford. The facts are that, in 1878, Government railways, including the Prince Edward Island Railway, and the Intercolonial Railway, consisted of 913 miles, whereas in 1888, they consisted of 1,185 miles. The facts show that the traffic carried in 1878, was 561,633 tons, while in 1888, owing to the expansion of our internal trade, as pointed out by the Finance Minister, it amounted to 1,348,426 tons. Now, I ask the House again to note that the principle enunciated by the hon. gentleman is that when there is a loss on working that road, it is due to political corruption. In 1878 the loss on working the smaller system and carrying a much smaller quantity of traffic, was $716,083, whereas in 1887-88 the loss was only half, being $363,043. The hon. gentleman has unwittingly given me an opportunity to testify to the marked success in the management of that road and the economy practised under the present Administration, as contrasted with its management under the Administration of which the hon. gentleman was a member. But one word on behalf of that road. I have said that it was of importance to the Maritime Provinces; but it is important to the Dominion of Canada as a whole. That railway, which the hon. member for South Oxford himself stated—and I could give him the speech, if he desired proof of the statement—would involve a loss of $600,000 a year to operate it, was one of the bonds of the Union, was one of those features of the Union which he himself advocated in 1865—a road with regard to which George Brown said he would give five Intercolonial Railways for the sake of Confederation; and he was a friend of Confederation, no matter on which side of the House he sat, and to his dying day, I believe, never enunciated the principles which his former friends are enunciating now.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How much was charged to capital account on the Intercolonial Railway in 1888?

Mr. TUPPER. We will go into the details later on. But at present I will tell the hon. gentleman that that subject was threshed out in this House last Session, and the discussion can be found in Hansard. Hon. gentlemen never have anything new; they tell the same old story to the House, and with the same success. Now, I wish to point out to the House the importance of that road. Along its route, where forests once stood, you find to-day thriving towns and villages, in which great manufacturing industries are springing up. In Springhill, in the county of Cumberland, there are 7,000 people where there were only two or three hundred a few years ago. The people engaged in the industry of coal mining not only pay enormous sums into the public revenue in the shape of duty, but, by sending their coal over the Intercolonial Railway, to the western Provinces, enable the Government to keep the other freights up to their present figures. These bodies of consumers, in turn, buy from the people of western Canada; and thus they benefit, not merely the locality in which they operate, but contribute to the public coffers, and promote the business interests of the people of this country; and he would be a bold man who would attempt to stop that road and carry on Confederation. But I do not think these hon. gentlemen are much in love with Confederation to-day. We find the hon. member violently attacking the Short Line Railway system. What is his position? He found himself in a miserable minority when he attacked it in this House at its inception. He found his whole party deserting him. He found members from the Maritime Provinces, on one side and on the other side, standing up and claiming that railway as a right; and the majority of the people of this country, represented as well by the members from the Province of Ontario, supported us in our claim to the extension of our great continental system to our Maritime Province ports. We found the votes in this House against him such as 39 to 107, 36 to 101 and 35 to 101; and yet he goes back to his enmity towards the Maritime Provinces who have supported this Government since Confederation, and continue to support it. The Chamber of Commerce of the city of Halifax has just passed a resolution demanding the extension of that line to that city. Are they dupes? Are they men who have been purchased? Will the hon. gentleman hurl his anathemas against them as men who are urging expenditures from corrupt motives? The hon. gentleman attacked railway subsidies, and yet he knows that the business men of this country, irrespective of politics, have urged the granting these subsidies. He knows, moreover, that every railway which has been subsidised by this Parliament has been subsidised on the ground that for the small expenditure involved, if you could secure the introduction of sufficient capital for the construction and working of the railway, this country would be recouped a hundred and a thousand times over by the business that would be promoted and the settlements that would spring up as results of that policy. That is a policy eminently popular and successful; and when the hon. gentleman says such expenditures are used for corrupt purposes, he knows more of his friends than of his enemies, and he must be speaking of his friends in Ontario and his friends in Nova Scotia, who are now for a short time in power. Now, I must go on to notice a very important feature in connection with this debate. The hon. Minister of Finance took a strong position on the justifiability of what he called our national debt, the net debt of this country, and he was able to show that we had more than enough public works, and useful public works, to justify the expenditure of every dollar that went into those works.

The hon. member for South Oxford was unable to do more than to use the old argument, rather weak, it seems to me, of merely saying that, whereas the debt was $75,000,000 in 1867, it was $236,000,000 in 1889. But I wish to call attention to the able argument of the hon. gentleman in justification of the expenditure of every dollar. I wish to recall to the hon. gentleman's memory his justification, at a time when he, as Finance Minister, stated to this House, that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway would involve an expenditure of $100,000,000, and it was difficult to say how much more a year to run and operate that road. I called the attention of the House to a statement made by the hon. gentleman as to the advisability of this debt. I am not alluding to the familiar statement made by that hon. gentleman in England to the money lenders, when he told them that all the debt which had been incurred by his predecessors, and which he had denounced in this House as extravagant, had been incurred for general purposes of public utility, but I want to remind the hon. gentleman that at one time when he was of opinion we would have to spend a hundred million dollars in building the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that it would cost us something like $8,000,000 a year to run it, according to the calculations of some engineers. In 1875, he came down to the House and, as Finance Minister, told us why we should incur this expenditure. He said:

"We have completed the Intercolonial Railway and the Prince Edward Island Railway, and are, therefore, free to turn our undivided energies and attention to the task of enlarging and improving our canals and constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway."

And these are the purposes for which our debt has been incurred. He went on to say:

"One thing we may fairly say to our people, that the sacrifices which we are called upon to make are not being undertaken for any selfish local object, but, in the largest sense, in the future interest of the whole of the Provinces of the Dominion. We have chosen to take upon ourselves a truly Imperial task—a greater task than was ever undertaken by any nation of our age and resources—that of colonising and developing a most enormous extent of country, not so much for our own benefit as that of generations yet to come."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In which you have infamously failed.

Mr. TUPPER:

"That such an enterprise is one which will require our utmost energies I do not for one moment deny, but although I admit this, and admit also that while engaged in its prosecution, we must be willing to forego other works of much greater immediate advantage, yet I hold it is far better we should do so than even seem to fail in meeting the obligations to which I have referred. I believe that every man who has paid any serious attention to the future of Canada, knows right well that with us this matter is a struggle for the possibility of carrying out a distinct national existence. This, at any rate, is an object for which we may well call upon our people for any reasonable sacrifice, and it will be at once the desire and the interest of the Government to take care that such sacrifices, as may be inevitable, shall yet be restrained within due bounds. Perhaps, after all, it is as well that we, like other people, should be compelled to test our strength and nerve."

I call particular attention to this:

"Better, indeed, in this respect, since we may thus undergo in peaceful fashion the ordeal to which all countries which have ever achieved any real greatness have had sooner or later to submit, though, for the most part, it has come in the shape of wasting and desolating war."

If there was any justification required for the progressive, the bold, the plucky, the Canadian policy of this Government, we have it from the man who, while believing in all that, dared not put it to the touch. We have it from the man who was virtually turned out of office, because, in reference to trade questions, as in reference to national public works, he had not the courage of his convictions. Now, I had intended to say more, but I see it is within ten minutes of six, and I wish to keep my promise, notwithstanding great temptation, of occupying the House no longer than six o'clock. But let me turn for a moment to the resolution of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman has been, and his party has been—and I say this meaning it in good faith—driven back to this desperate and foolish course. I say they were ashamed, in the beginning of this Session, after the defeat of the Democratic party, to whose coat-tails they had tied themselves, to knock again at the door of the American Republic, but, having been taunted, after their attacks in piecemeal fashion on the tariff, they have been driven, for better or worse, to make anew the foul attack they made last year on the policy of this country. But no matter how they may endeavor to confuse the public mind, the people understand that the Liberal-Conservative party, as a whole, are still ready to make a fair trade arrangement with the United States, whenever the United States are prepared to enter into such an arrangement. We have said, time and time again, to the Government at Washington; we have said it in all the official correspondence, as these gentlemen themselves admit, and our plenipotentiaries have said it; and, true to that policy, we are not taking an attitude unworthy of Canadians, we are not taking a cringing attitude. I believe we will yet succeed in making a fair arrangement with the Republican Government lately installed at Washington, and we will do it as men and as Canadians, just as independent in Canada in reference to our future and our present as the Americans, to their credit, are independent in the United States. We have by our policy won the admiration of one of the leading men of the present Cabinet, and with the indulgence of the House I will quote from an important speech made by Mr. Blaine in reference to our Government and its policy. Mr. Blaine is able to speak now with great authority, and his remarks will show how the policy of our Government is regarded in the United States. Attempts have been made, time and again, to convince the Government and the people of the United States that we desire to irritate and annoy them, and to place us in such a position as to make it impossible for the party in power here to treat at Washington. But Mr. Blaine understood those petty political attempts, and thus speaks:

"I have nothing whatever to say against the Dominion of Canada as a Government or against its inhabitants. The Dominion of Canada is an energetic and able Government. There are able and clever men at the head of it. They have done a wonderful work and they have made wonderful progress, and I don't believe there is a citizen of the United States, from one end of the country to the other, that envies the people of the Dominion all the prosperity they may attain."

Then he goes on to claim that while we cannot have what this hon. gentleman desires we should now petition for. The hon. gentleman wants the people of Canada, after having gone to Washington time and again, now to throw ourselves at the feet of the men who he says are holding out the olive branch. They are holding out offers like the spider to the fly. The olive branch of Mr. Hitt means nothing else than the policy the hon. gentleman himself deprecated on the floor of the House last year. He was told then, as plainly as one man could be told by another, that while the people of the United States were ready for commercial union, and while Mr. Hitt will permit us to go into their country and be controlled and managed at their own sweet will, yet unrestricted reciprocity was impossible. The hon. gentleman is hard to convince, but, if he will read the speech of Mr. Blaine, he will see that while we may yet make a fair and proper arrangement with reference to trade and otherwise with the American Government, we do not injure our interests by respecting ourselves, and while we are anxious to extend our trade relations consistent with the interests of this country, consistent with our laboring, our farming and manufacturing interests, whether with the United States or any other country, it will be a sorry day when both parties in Canada take up the position assumed by hon. gentlemen opposite, a position they denounced time and time again, a position which has been denounced by their veteran leader, and a policy which certainly does not inspire respect in the Dominion of Canada. So I say that the people of this country are not of a cringing kind, they have shown that they are able to grapple with these great works to which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) alluded, their nerve has been tested, and we stand to day in a position in which we are able to make out such a magnificent case as that which was made by the exponent of the National Policy, of the policy of this Government, while the hon. gentleman opposite had time and again attempted to arraign that policy and endeavored to destroy it, though he showed his utter inability to meet that statement to any extent. In conclusion, I believe that, as in the past, we are able, so long as we remain a portion of the Empire, not merely to govern ourselves, and prove ourselves worthy of responsible Government, but, as has been shown, to maintain the interests of this country, either in regard to commerce in general or in regard to the fisheries; and, while we are willing to make any fair compromise, or any fair settlement of these subjects, we are not ready to surrender the commercial interests of this country to the United States any more than we are to surrender our fisheries interests, which have been so much discussed of late.

After Recess.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to see absent from their places to-night the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to whose remarks I wish to direct a few words before proceeding with the more important part of the discussion. If the Finance Minister were present, I would compliment him upon the creditable manner in which he made his maiden financial statement, a statement which was, I am sure, satisfactory to his friends upon that side of the House, and one which, on the whole, reflected credit upon him. I hope that the hon. gentleman will be able to redeem the promises that he has made to the country with reference to preventing an increase in the public debt, keeping down the expenditure, and engaging in a career of economy that has not characterized the Government's financial history for a few years past. I must warn that hon. gentleman, however, that many influences will be brought to bear to thwart his laudable purposes in that respect. The party with which he is connected and for whom he acts as Finance Minister, has for many years engaged in the expenditure of money in a lavish manner, and I fear that reformation in that respect is scarcely to be hoped for. I only hope that he may be correct in his anticipations, and may be able to give us an administration of public affairs such as he has promised in his Budget speech the other afternoon. With regard to some of his statements I shall have occasion to refer to them in the course of the few remarks which I shall make to-night. I wish, also, to refer briefly to a few statements made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) who spoke this afternoon. He is a worthy son of a worthy sire, and to use a common expression which has more force than elegance, he is "a chip of the old block." His father, I recollect, some years ago, promised us that about this time we would be having 640 million bushels of wheat annually from the North-West. We have not had the wheat yet, but the son this afternoon did as much as he possibly could to give us the chaff. The hon. gentleman dealt rather severely with my hon. friend at my right (Sir Richard Cartwright). I think, however, it scarcely needs any trouble on my part to attempt a defence of that hon. gentleman, whose record itself is a sufficient defence, and who is amply capable of defending himself. The hon. gentleman seemed to suppose that because the arguments produced on this side of the House to the country had not carried the elections of 1882 and in 1887, that, perforce, we were wrong. Now, majorities are not always right, minorities are not always wrong. You may advance truth that will not convince the public, that is more often the case than otherwise. But, Sir, there were other reasons that might be cited to account for the result of those elections, than the arguments presented to the country. We had, for instance, the Gerrymander Act of 1882, by which, in the Province of Ontario, 200,000 Conservatives were enabled to exercise as much power in the elections as 300,000 Reformers, and which, at least, gave to the present Government 12 or 14 seats. We had in 1887 the Franchise Bill, and we had called to the aid of the Government, the revising barrister, and this one Act in 1882, and this other Act in 1887, were sufficient to account for the results of those elections; and I feel certain but that for the revising barrister's kindly intervention in behalf of the Government in 1886, the Reform party would have carried the elections in this country in 1887. Then the hon. gentleman makes a feeble attempt to defend the Finance Department from the charge of cooking the accounts. Now, Sir, this is useless. It is beyond all controversy that the accounts are cooked, that the book-keeping is of a character that would not bear the investigation of an accountant, that the expenses chargeable to the administration of Dominion lands in the North-West are charged to capital account, and the receipts are credited to consolidated fund; and in this way and in other ways of that kind, the public accounts are made to represent a result which the facts do not warrant. We have his reference to the fact that my hon. friend, as he asserts, had said that in case of war with the United States, we would not be able to secure very great assistance from England. Now, Sir, unfortunately, that is the case. In case of war with the United States, England would be utterly unable to place an armed force upon the frontier between these two countries, adequate to the defence of Canada. The United States, with no greater exertion than was put forth in the rebellion of 1861 to 1864, could place in the field an army of 3,000,000 men, and it is folly to talk of England being able to cope with such a force, in British North America, so far from her base of operations. It is true that, so far as land operations are concerned, England would be unable to afford to us adequate assistance and protection. Then the hon. gentleman refers to the exodus, and he charges upon us responsibility for the exodus from this country. As well charge upon the physician responsibility for the occurrence of the disease because he had given a diagnosis of the case; as well charge the physician with responsibility for the result of a disease whose treatment had been repudiated and not adopted. The Liberal party merely pointed out the causes that led to the exodus. They urged the Government that these causes should be removed, and they have, in their places in this House, and in their efforts in the country, from time to time, striven to remove the causes that produced this lamentable state of affairs. But so far from responsibility resting upon their shoulders, they merely have labored to the best of their ability to avert the evil results, which unfortunately, have fallen upon us in this regard. Then the hon. gentleman accused my hon. friend, at my right, of attacking protection, and then moving a resolution in this House by which he proposed to double our protection. The hon. gentleman is evidently unable to dissociate in his mind the nature of the resolutions demanding unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union. It is not commercial union that is advocated by my hon. friend it is not commercial union that is asked for by this resolution, but unrestricted reciprocity, and unrestricted reciprocity would leave in our hands the entire control of our own tariff, except in so far as relating to imports and exports between this country and the United States. He says that Mr. Hitt and Mr. Butterworth are protectionists, that they want possession of this market, that they desire to reduce the people of this country to the position of hewers of wood and drawers of water. Mr. Hitt and Mr.

Butterworth, it is true, are protectionists, but they desire to see the scope of free intercourse upon this continent enlarged; they desire to see a policy adopted that will be mutually beneficial and advantageous to their own country and to the Dominion of Canada. They are truly patriotic in their efforts to promote the interests, not only of the United States, but the interests of all the Anglo-Saxon commonwealths upon the continent of North America. He next refers to the income tax, and endeavors to create the impression that my hon. friend, in his reference some time ago to the income tax, had advocated a tax that would press with great severity upon all classes of people in this country, upon the artisan, upon the wage-earner, and upon every class of individuals who have any income at all. That depends entirely upon the character of the income tax; it depends entirely upon the limits to which that income tax comes down. It may be a tax upon incomes of a thousand dollars and upwards, upon two thousand and upwards—the limit of the taxable income may be so large as to affect the rich man only—and it was in that sense, as I distinctly remember, that my hon. friend referred to this question. Then we have paraded before us the old stock arguments about a home market. Protection to the industries of the country for the benefit of the farmer, forsooth! Why, what is the condition of the farmer in this country to-day? Living, Sir, in a country which is one of the dearest in the world to purchase in, and one of the cheapest in the world to sell in, so far as the products of his labor are concerned, selling the products of the soil for very much less than they were sold for during the régime of my hon. friend at my right, struggling with difficulties created by this very party which taxes everything that he produces and reduces the purchasing power of the natural customer to whom he sells his productions, not only increases the cost of what he purchases but diminishes the price of what he sells. Then the hon. gentleman refers to the Intercolonial Railway, and he tells us that this road has been an immense benefit. Well, in a sense it has. It has been a great benefit to certain coal mine owners; it has been an enormous benefit to the owners of the Springhill mines, and to-day this road is carrying coal for less than the bare cost of transportation, and is charging other classes of freight much higher in proportion than it charges for the transportation of coal; and in this way it is an immense benefit to the owners of the coal mines, and it discriminates in favor of those men and against the farmers and producers and other business classes of this country. It is said that the road was not built for political reasons. I combat that and I assert it was. It has cost up to this time over $50,000,000, which is an annual incubus on the country. We lose every cent of interest on that sum, amounting to not less than $1,500,000 a year.

Mr. MITCHELL. That arises from bad management.

Mr. CHARLTON. And in addition it costs $300,000 or $400,000 yearly, even with the accounts cooked and sums charged to capital that should be charged to running expenses of the road, in excess of earnings. The hon. Minister of Marine has told us that the loss in running the road in 1888 was only one-half what it was in 1878. There was a difference in the mode of keeping the accounts. In 1878 what was charged to running expenses came properly under that head, while in 1888 every dollar which by any excuse could be charged against capital account was charged there, in order to reduce nominally the cost of operating the road. Then the hon. gentleman told us that the Liberal party in this House were ashamed, at the beginning of the Session, to speak of unrestricted reciprocity. I am sure my hon. friends to my right and my left will laugh at such an assertion, because the party pledged itself to that issue last year, the party has stood by that issue every day since, and upon that issue it stands to-day and on that issue it will stand to-morrow, and it will fight this question out on this line to the bitter end, it will go to the country on this question, and it will carry the country on it. No, we were not ashamed of this issue at the beginning of the Session, we are not ashamed of this issue now. My hon. friend has placed this resolution before the House in accordance with a decision the party arrived at within two or three days of the time we came to Ottawa. The hon. Minister informed the House that they, the Conservative party, the Government party, were still willing to make a fair and liberal treaty with the United States? Are still ready? When have they been willing to make a fair and reasonable treaty? When have they shown a disposition to meet the United States on fair, liberal and equitable terms? When have they offered any treaty on any other lines than the Treaty of 1854, which the Americans disavowed and abrogated in 1866, and which they have told us year after year ever since they never would renew on those conditions. And with the assertion staring us in the face that another treaty would not be given us on those conditions, it is little short of an insult to the common sense of hon. members to tell us that the Government party are ready to make a fair and liberal treaty and are using their utmost efforts to negotiate one. The hon. gentleman quoted from the present Secretary of State of the United States, who has repeated the statement that a treaty with Canada upon the lines of the old treaty was entirely inadmissible and was not to be thought of.

So much for the position taken by the Minister of Marine, and I pass now to the consideration of the question which comes up directly in connection with the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is a question of great importance, it is a question of greater importance than any other question that is now before the people of this country, and it is a question of greater importance than any other question which has been before this country for ten years past at least. The Minister of Finance referred to the necessity of securing wider markets, he referred to the necessity of extending our trade. And how does he propose to do it? Why, he cannot think of sacrificing the interests of that small circle of individuals who are benefited by the National Policy; he cannot think of sacrificing the interests of men who are useful in election contests, because they are directly interested in maintaining the Government in power, and are ready to pay for that interest. He must maintain the interests of those men, even if he does so at the sacrifice of the interests of nineteen-twentieths of the people of Canada. And he proposes, not to take the great market lying at our very doors, not to take the natural market with 60,000,000 of customers lying alongside of us, but he proposes to hunt up new markets, to subsidise steamship lines, to construct more railways, to reach China, Japan, India, to go to South America, to open up trade with the Argentine Republic, with Patagonia, with the West Indies, to commence trade with Samoa, with Tahiti, to open up trade with Uganda, with the Upper Congo, and other places far distant from us. Yes, that is the panacea of the hon. gentleman for the commercial distress of this country—to open up those far distant markets which it is almost impossible to reach and which are worthless when reached, and to leave the great market at our very doors, by refusing to enter into an arrangement with 60,000,000 people whereby we could secure commercial advantages which would lift this country from the condition of depression in which it at present remains. It reminds me of the story of a sea captain who, when his ship was lying at the mouth of the Amazon, and, although out of sight of land, was in the midst of an ocean of fresh water, hailed a passing vessel and asked for a supply of water. The captain said: "Throw a bucket overboard; why, you are in the midst of an ocean of fresh water." So the hon. gentleman is in the midst of an ocean of trade if he will only avail himself of the opportunity, and he does not need to go to Patagonia, Samoa, Tahiti, the Congo and other distant lands. Let him turn his attention to the country lying at our very doors.

The condition of civilised states, and especially the Anglo-Saxon communities, has been for many generations past a condition of development and progress. The evolution in the case of Anglo-Saxon states has been rapid and continuous. They are continually advancing to a higher social and potential plane. If we contrast the condition of England, for instance, in 1700, with its population of five and a half millions, with but one considerable city, with a commerce infinitesimal in its proportions to that of the commerce of to-day, with small provincial towns, with a rude husbandry in the interior, without social development, without manufacturing development, without commercial development—if we compare that country with the England of to-day, the transition is a wonderful one. If we compare Canada in 1759, with its 60,000 people clustering along the banks of the St. Lawrence, with Canada of 1869, with its railway lines extending across the continent, with its development in manufactures, commerce and agriculture, with its population of 5,000,000, here again is a wonderful transition. If we compare the United States in 1776, with their 3,000,000 of people, a country which in 1790 had but four cities of over 10,000 inhabitants, which possessed only 75 post offices, 1,800 miles of postal route, which paid only $22,000 a year for the transportation of the mails—if we compare that country with the United States of to-day with 62,000,000 people, with its vast development in commerce, manufactures and agriculture, this is a wonderful transition. And the condition of these countries is constantly changing and the circumstances surrounding these countries are changing. They are impelled forward by forces from within and by forces from without, and we need to note these changing conditions; we need to govern ourselves by these changing conditions, and to let the circumstances of our case adapt themselves to these conditions. In 1776 these thirteen colonies and Canada went different roads. They had lived together under one Government, subject to the same king, for seventeen years, and when the thirteen colonies revolted, Canada had not been associated with those colonies long enough to follow their example. The circumstances of the case were entirely different and they took different ways, and the result of those experiments we may see to-day: in the one case in the creation of a great nation with its own history, with its own national life and with the world looking to it as one of the great powers of the earth, while in the other case we see as the result of the experiment the creation of a great colony, without a history of its own, challenging the attention of the world, and shining, not in its own light, but in the borrowed light of another luminary. For many years, there was not much in the conditions surrounding us to make intercourse between the two countries so desirable as it is to-day. From 1776 to 1842, the colonies were protected by the English corn laws; differential duties were imposed in their interest upon breadstuffs, lumber, and timber, and the desire for free intercourse with the American States or colonies naturally had no pronounced existence. The American States have prospered and grown rapidly, and a condition of things more favorable to their growth could not have been desired. Since 1842, when the corn laws were abolished, the desirability of intercourse with the United States became greater and greater each year, and in 1849 an annexation party was already in existence in this country, many of the members of which have since been in connection with the party at present in power. We had Sir John Rose, Sir A. T. Galt, the Hon. J. J. C. Abbott, and other gentlemen high in the Conservative ranks, who were members of that party.

In 1854, however, free intercourse with the United States was secured, and when that intercourse was secured the annexation party disappeared. The country enjoyed that free intercourse for twelve years, and grew and prospered under it. In 1866, when that reciprocity was abrogated the country felt the disastrous influence of that abrogation in the severest manner, and there has not been a day since the abrogation of that treaty that Canada has not desired its renewal; there has not been a day since the abrogation of that treaty when it would not be in the highest degree desirable, in the light of Canada's interests, to have renewed that treaty; and, as year after year rolled by, the desirability of renewing it became more palpable and greater. When the treaty was abrogated the United States had a population, probably, of thirty-five million souls, and to-day that nation has a population of at least sixty-two millions. To-day it has more than double the wealth it had in 1866; to-day it is a much more desirable country, or customer, to deal with than it was in 1866; and to-day it is infinitely more desirable to secure reciprocity with the United States in the interests of Canada than it was in 1866. That country with its sixty-two million inhabitants, with its fifty-eight thousand millions of wealth (ten thousand millions more than England) with its vast manufacturing industries, its vast internal commerce, its immense and growing progress and development, is a desirable customer for us to have; and, notwithstanding all the restrictions upon trade, notwithstanding the commercial hostility between us, nature asserts itself, our geographical position asserts itself, and the trade of Canada, under all those adverse circumstances with the United States, is greater than the trade of Canada with any other nation of the world.

Why is it that we have seen in the past one hundred years so marvellous a development in this country to the south of us. In 1776 they commenced with free trade between thirteen States, and as one State after another has been added to that confederation the area and scope of this reciprocal free trade has been extended. The number of States banded together in this Zollverein, or this customs union if you may term it so, have increased from 13 to 42. The population under this arrangement has increased from three millions to sixty-two millions, and, as population has increased, as the number of States have been increased, as the scope of the operation of these free trade influences have been extended, their beneficent character has become more and more apparent. Does any man suppose that if tariffs had existed between each of these States, or if the States were divided into groups with a tariff between one group and another, that we would have seen that development which has taken place in the United States within the last hundred years. No man of sense will assert that such would have been the case. This country with its different zones, its great variety of climate, its great variety of production—a country embracing within its own limits almost all the productions of the known world,—was a magnificent field for the operation of free trade, for the development of the influences and results that flow from free trade and notwithstanding that their own fiscal policy with regard to other countries has been faulty yet the advantages of free intercommunication between all these States has been so great, that we see the results before us to-day in the accumulation of its great power, its greater wealth than any other country in the world, in its greater extent of manufactures than any other country in the world, and its ability to raise a greater revenue and undergo a greater stress in that respect than any other power in Christendom. To-day, Sir, we in Canada are situated outside of that magic circle. My friend the Minister of Finance the other night depicted in glowing and very powerful terms the repressing results of the existence of tariffs between the various Provinces comprising this Dominion before Con-ederation. He pointed out how those barriers upon trade restricted commercial transactions between the Provinces, how great since the removal of those tariffs have been the developments of internal commerce, and now beneficent had been the consequence of that removal of the tariffs between the Provinces now comprising the Dominion. It struck me as being singular that hon. gentleman could not have gone further and realised how great would be the advantage of sweeping away the tariff over a still wider area, how great would be the advantage of removing the tariff not only between the seven Provinces of Confederation but between these seven Provinces and the 42 States of the American Union and having a free intercourse between 49 commonwealths instead of seven. I think the argument is one that he cannot fail to see the force of. If the removal of trade restrictions is good for seven commonwealths it is better still for 49. If the seven Provinces derive advantages from unimpeded commercial transactions, the widening of that circle and the introduction of a greater number of commonwealths to that circle, through which free communication was the rule, would be conferring still greater advantages than those he pointed out in the case of the provinces comprising this Dominion.

The position of our Canadian Provinces with regard to the United States is a peculiar one. There is a stretch of conterminous line from ocean to ocean. There is no mountain barrier between the two countries, there is no natural barrier of any character whatever, but they lie facing each other, and the very rivers and inland seas that spread along a portion of this line instead of being obstructions and barriers invite trade, and serve as highways for intercommunication from one to the other, and in spite of all these restrictions do secure an enormous burden of commerce between these two great countries. Now, Sir, if you look at the map, you will find that the Dominion of Canada is divided into four distinct geographical sections. The Maritime Provinces are separated from Quebec and Ontario by a wide stretch of rocky, uninhabited country; Ontario and Quebec are separated from the fertile belt of the North-West by nearly a thousand miles of wilderness which is almost worthless for agricultural purposes; the fertile region of the North-West is separated from British Columbia by a wide stretch of plain and mountain. These four geographical areas are distinct from each other; and in its geographical affinities each one is more a part of the United States for commercial purposes than a part of this Dominion. Take, for instance, the Maritime Provinces: The State of Maine projects like a wedge northward, separating them from the rest of Canada, and almost reaching the St. Lawrence. To carry on trade transactions between New Brunswick or Nova Scotia and Quebec we have to use the Intercolonial Railway for hundreds of miles; while these Provinces can reach with facility such markets as Portland, Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore for a tithe of the cost which is to-day required to reach Quebec. The potatoes of Prince Edward Island can be laid down in Boston for five cents a bushel, or a little more; coal, lumber and all the other productions of these Provinces can be carried very cheaply to the great seaboard cities of the United States. The natural geographical affinity between these countries compels trade, notwithstanding tariff restrictions and commercial hostility; and if these restrictions were removed an enormous trade would be the result. Then, we take Quebec, possessing the gateway of the great lakes, the natural outlet of the vast country to the west; and but for commercial hostility and restrictive tariffs the trade of that country would have gone down the St. Lawrence to the sea, and 300 miles of artificial water communication between Lake Erie and the Hudson River would, perhaps, never have been built. Before the construction of that water route, all the trade of western New York, Ohio and the west went down the St. Lawrence; and Montreal might have continued to enjoy that trade, and might have been one of the great commercial centres of the continent to-day; but for commercial hostility it might have been the imperial gateway of the mighty west. But Montreal stands to-day on the St. Lawrence, with all its magnificent advantages and its magnificent site, a third-rate city. Quebec has easy access to the great commercial centres of the United States by the Richelieu River, Lake Champlain, Whitehall Canal and the Hudson River to New York, and by railway lines she can easily reach Portland, Boston and New York. All these great centres are at her very door; these are her natural markets; her geographical affinities are with the Middle and Eastern States. Then, if we come west to Ontario, we find that conditions compelling trade with the country to the south are still more potent. We find this great Province resting upon four great inland seas, with the waters of Ontario, Erie, Huron and Superior, washing her shores from Kingston to Port Arthur. We find this Province projecting like a wedge 420 miles south into American territory, from the 49th nearly to the 42nd parallel. We find that the commerce of Michigan, of Chicago, and the country west of Chicago, finds its shortest route to the ocean across the territory of this Province. We find new lines pushing to the Sault Ste. Marie, and leading across this Province to the sea. We find lines from Minneapolis, from St. Paul, from Duluth and from Pembina converging at the Sault; and we find, on looking at the map, that the shortest possible route from northern Michigan, northern Wisconsin, Minnesota, north and south Dakota, Montana, and a portion of Nebraska, to the seaboard, is right across the territory of this Province, from the Sault Ste. Marie eastward. Why, it is the geographical key to the energetic zone of this continent, that country lying between the 38th and 46th parallels of latitude, with its great centres of population, development and wealth. Ontario, I say, possesses the geographical key to this great region. She can reach with her productions, by means of this great line of inland seas, and with her railway lines, the great markets of this continent, with the utmost facility and ease; and her position for reaching these markets is better than the position of Michigan, Indiana, or any portion of the American territory to the west of these States; and notwithstanding repression and restriction, she has a vast commerce with the great American centres of population. Why, within a few hours' ride of her eastern border in New York, with 3,000,000 inhabitants within 20 miles of its city hall; two or three hours further on is Philadelphia, with a million inhabitants; a few hours further to the east is Boston, with 300,000 or 400,000 people; close by is Buffalo, with a quarter of a million, Rochester with 100,000, and Albany with 100,000; just across Lake Erie is Cleveland, with 300,000; just across the boundary of her western peninsula is Detroit, with 175,000; and within easy reach of her western territory is Chicago, with 900,000 inhabitants. I repeat that her geographical position enables her to obtain access to all these centres of population with greater facility than any of the Western States, except Ohio. Now, Mr. Speaker, am I to be told, is any sane man to be told, that this great Province, with its 200,000 square miles of territory, with its immense stretch of sea coast, with its agricultural, its mineral and its timber resources, would not be vastly benefited by sweeping away those restrictions that separate it from its natural market? Why, Sir, it is preposterous to make such an assertion. To consider the question for five minutes is sufficient to convince any reasonable man that vast advantages would be secured to this Province by free access to the markets to the south of us. Then, we pass on to Manitoba and the North-West, and here again we have to pass through a wilderness of a thousand miles which separates that country from the settled portion of the Dominion to the east. Here we find a country which is a natural part of the Mississippi Valley. Almost a rebellion was provoked in Manitoba because its people were not able to secure access to the markets lying in the south. Their trade naturally tends to such cities as St. Paul, Minneapolis and Chicago; and notwithstanding all the restrictions placed upon it, an immense and ever growing trade has sprung up between Manitoba and the North-West and those cities. And when we pass on to British Columbia, what do we find there? Why, nature decrees that British Columbia must have extended trade relations with Washington, Oregon and California. These are commonwealths in the same geographical group as herself. To carry on commerce with the east necessitates crossing five ranges of mountains and a thousand miles of plain at great cost; the incurring of this expenditure for transportation is unnatural. Trade by this outlet must be forced, and natural conditions compel British Columbia to trade extensively with the three American States on the Pacific slope; and to remove all the restrictions existing between British Columbia and these States would be to confer untold benefits on the former. Take these four geographical groups of the Dominion—the Maritime Provinces, the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario, the Province of Manitoba and the Territories of the North West and British Columbia—nature has decreed that each one of the four shall trade more naturally and on more advantageous terms with the country to the south of the line than with any other geographical group in the Dominion. Now, I say in each nature asserts itself, notwithstanding the policy of my hon. friend and his party, as shown in our trade returns of last year. Our imports for consumption from, and our exports to the United States and other countries in 1888, were as follows:—

United States.....	$91,053,913
Great Britain.....	79,383,705
All other countries.....	22,612,482
	$193,050,100

Our imports for consumption during the same year were:

From United States.....	$48,481,848
do Great Britain.....	39,298,721
do all other countries.....	15,066,531
	$102,847,100

Our exports were:

To United States.....	$42,572,065
Great Britain.....	40,084,984
All other countries.....	7,545,951
	$90,203,000

And this in spite of hostile tariffs—this by virtue of the decrees of nature and geography, and in spite of the policy of hon gentlemen on the opposite side. We imported from the United States over $9,000,000 worth of goods more than we did from Great Britain, and we exported to the United States $2,500,000 worth of goods more than we did to Great Britain, by virtue of the inexorable decrees of nature and geography. We had a period, as I said a few moments ago, of twelve years free trade with the United States, and during that period our trade with the United States developed to an extent which must teach a lesson that cannot fail to be understood. Reciprocity was brought about in 1854. We began in 1854 with an export trade to the United States of $10,473,000. That was without the stimulating effect of free trade. The next year, under free trade, that export had risen to $19,316,000, an increase of $9,000,000—an increase of nearly 100 per cent. in one year under the operation of free trade; and during the twelve years, from 1854 to 1866, that export trade to the United States increased from $10,473,000 to $39,950,000—an increase of 260 per cent. in twelve years. That included all the Provinces now comprised in the Dominion. In 1854, the exports of Old Canada to the United States amounted to $8,649,000; the next year, under free trade, they jumped to $16,727,000; and in 1866 they reached $34,770,000. And this, without estimating shortage in inland returns, which were very much less in 1854 than in 1866. Now, with an increase of trade between the various Provinces of this Dominion of 280 per cent. in those twelve years, with an increase of trade between Old Canada and the United States of over 300 per cent. in the twelve years under free trade, I wish to contrast the condition of our trade since then under the policy of protection; but before doing so, I will say that had the annual increase between 1855 and 1866 been maintained to the present time, our exports to the United States alone would last year have reached $94,000,000, and had the ratio of increase been maintained in the twenty-two years following the abrogation of the treaty, that was maintained during the twelve years of the operation of the treaty, our exports to the United States last year would have exceeded $150,000,000.

Mr. BOWELL. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend may smile, but I believe the exports would have been greater than are indicated by this calculation. Now, against this increase of $29,476,000, or an actual increase, estimating the inland returns shortage, which was $3,413,000 greater in 1866 than 1855, of $31,490,000 during this period of free trade—what have we to say with regard to the increase of trade since? Our exports last year were only $2,620,000 greater than in 1866, or, deducting difference in shortage at inland ports between 1855 and 1866, our increase in exports in 1888, as compared with 1866, was but $1,522,000 against $31,490,000 in the 12 years during the operation of the treaty. This fact speaks volumes, and needs no comment. If the one policy gave this country an increase in exports of $31,490,000 in 12 years, and the other policy gave in 22 years an increase of $1,522,000, the two facts placed side by side, tell their own story, and need no comment. Great as were the advantages this country derived from free trade, those advantages were minimised by certain currency troubles that existed in the United States, at the close of the rebellion. From 1862 to 1866, the reckless gambling in gold, the depreciation of American currency, the reduction in the purchasing power of that currency, greatly diminished the advantages that this country would have derived from free trade had there been stable currency in the United States; and when the Reciprocity Treaty was abrogated, almost immediately following that event came a more stable condition of American currency and a revival of business in that country, and an improvement in trade in consequence of that revival. We had the good effects of reciprocity minimised by this condition of currency, and we had the evil effects of the abrogation of the treaty for the first few years minimised by the return of the United States to a sounder currency; but even with these evils minimising the advantages in the one case and the disadvantages in the other, the results, as I have explained them to you, strikingly illustrate the great advantages to be derived by this country from free intercourse with the United States. What do our farmers remember about the years during the years which the Reciprocity Treaty was in operation? Talk with any farmer who lived then, and he will tell you of the excellent markets we had for our produce and cattle and stock. He will tell you that buyers swarmed in the country, he will tell you that there was an active demand for everything he had—and these are the days the farmers look back to as the bright days in the history of their country, these are the days they desire to see come again, and these are the days they are going to vote to have come again. These are the days that my hon. friend's resolution promises shall come to them again, and they will try that resolution, at all events, before they are convinced that they cannot have them again.

My hon. friend in his speech the other night showed, I was sorry to see, that he did not know anything of a definite nature about the volume of our internal commerce. He told us it was great, I believe it is great. Internal commerce is naturally very much greater than external commerce. We have a large railway mileage, we have an extensive business done on those railways, we have extensive transactions between the various Provinces of this Dominion and also between various portions of the same Province, and I have no doubt that the internal commerce of Canada is a very large one, and I have no doubt further that, if the area over which our commercial transactions exist was extended, those transactions would be increased over that area, and I think it is easily demonstrated that the internal commerce of the United States is in proportion very much greater than our own. In the report of Mr. Switzer, the chief of the Bureau of Statistics in the United States, the last report made, we find a rather astounding calculation. I confess it startled me. It may be exaggerated or not, but it is made in an official document of the United States, and that statement is that the internal commerce of the United States in 1887 amounted to $32,874,000,000. That is 360 times greater than the commerce of Canada with the United States, it is 170 times greater than the commerce of Canada with all the world. It is true that this is an enormous figure. It is two and a half times larger than the export and import trade of the world in 1880. It is twenty-five times more than the import and export trade of the United States in 1886. Whether it is closely correct or not, it shows how vast is the volume of commerce which courses through the business veins of that great country, and enlivens and vivifies the great industries within its borders. If one will stop to consider how grand a theatre for unfettered commercial intercourse is furnished by the northern part of the American continent, he can never for a moment imagine that the policy of our hon. friend opposite is a policy conceived in the interest of the country. Take this vast country, stretching from the Gulf of Mexico to the Arctic Ocean, with its great sweep of sea coast—the Mexican Gulf sea coast, the Atlantic sea coast, all along the States and along Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, along the coast of Labrador and up to the Arctic Ocean, and then the line of coast from Behring's Straits to the State of California—take that great country with its intercommunication by means of its rivers and inland seas—the Mississippi system with its 16,000 miles of navigation, the rivers flowing into the Atlantic, the St. Lawrence, the Mackenzie, the Yukon, the inland seas and all those great arteries of communication stretching throughout that country in every direction, and furnishing the means of intercommunication; take all the range and varieties of climate which exist from the sub-tropic climate to the Arctic; take its variety of products and consider that every known production on the face of the globe can be obtained within its boundaries; take its mines, its forests and its fisheries, its railway development, and estimate what will be the future of this great country and its future population when it has a population to day of sixty-seven millions. It is destined to be the seat of the greatest empire the world has seen, the home of civilisation. The best hope of humanity are centered upon this great land; and the future development of the wealth and population of this country will be beyond our knowledge and beyond our imagination. We are now outside of this union, and we have been invited to participate in the advantages which may result from the intercourse which should take place between us; and I say that every consideration of self-interest should induce us, if nothing else would, to break down the trade barriers which exist between us. Let those barriers be broken down, and the ever-expanding and cumulative forces of trade intercourse cannot stop at the boundary but will go on increasing for the advantage of both parties to the agreement. We have nothing to keep us apart in connection with race distinctions. The French in Louisiana and the Anglo-Saxons in the other States get along easily enough and without difficulty; so also we trust will the French of Quebec and the Anglo-Saxons of North America. We have substantially the same institutions as they have. We have a common language. We have similar laws. We have religious affinities with our neighbors. There is nothing to prevent these two countries from living together in peace and amity, as far as their commercial relations are concerned. What are the forces which fight against the continuance of the barriers which impede trade? What are the forces which forbid that these two countries shall remain in a state of commercial hostility with one another? They are geography, nature, racial affinity, business interest, common sense, and the intermingling of the two peoples. We have now at least a million native Canadians in the United States, we have from a million and a quarter to a million and a half of the descendants of Canadians in that country. Do they exercise any influence on the opinion of that great people? We have perhaps half a million of foreign immigrants who have gone there after coming to this country, and that is a mighty force which is drawing these two countries more and more together, and is impressing on the mind of both countries the desirability of free commercial intercourse and the absurdity of maintaining the condition of things which now exist. I assume, then, that free intercourse is desirable, and perhaps I will enter a little more fully later into some particular reasons why it is desirable.

I assert now that the Government of this country show practically no sense of the importance of this question. I assert that they are trifling with the people of this country, that they are making an assertion that they have sought diligently to obtain free commercial relations with them, when they know, and every man of sense knows, that these overtures were made in a direction that they knew were fore-ordained to failure. They have professed to make overtures for free trade relations upon lines which they have been told again and again would never be accepted, they have studiously refrained from making overtures upon any line which was likely to be successful, and they have shown clearly and unmistakably that they do not want to have free trade relations and would not take them on any obtainable terms; but they seek to allay the feeling in the country in favor of this exchange of trade by professing that they are seeking for and are desirous of free trade relations, and that they will obtain them as soon as the United States will grant them on reasonable and equitable terms. Well, Sir, they will never get them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. They will never get them, because they will not sacrifice the interests of a small minority of the population of this country that are bleeding the majority, they will not sacrifice their interests for the interests of the millions of this country. They have been placed in power by a little clique of manufacturers, by a small favored ring, for whom the Government legislate, and whose interests are paramount, in the estimation of this Government, to the interests of the farmer, the lumberman, the ship owner, the fisherman, and the laborer; and for that reason they will never get it because they will never seek for it on terms upon which they can obtain it. They have been invited to come and get it. I have in my hand an invitation from the mouthpiece of the American nation, from their Minister of Foreign Affairs, to an hon. gentleman who no longer has a seat in this House. A plainer and more urgent invitation to open negotiations with a view to obtaining freer trade relations, never was proffered by one country to another, a letter of Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State of the United

State, written on the 31st May, 1887, to "My dear Sir Charles."

Some hon. MEMBER}. Oh, Oh.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; it is a bad pill for our friends, and I do not wonder that it extorts from them that expression of agony and pain. Mr. Bayard says:

"It is evident that the commercial intercourse between the inhabitants of Canada and those of the United States has grown into too vast proportions to be exposed much longer to this wordy triangular duel, and more direct and responsible methods should be resorted to. Your own able, earnest and patriotic services in the Government and Parliament of the Dominion are well known, and afford ample proof of your comprehension of the resources, rapidly increasing interests, and needs of British North America. On the other hand, I believe I am animated by an equal desire to serve my own country, and trust to do it worthily. The immediate difficulty to be settled is found in the Treaty of 1818 between the United States and Great Britain which has been questio vezata ever since it was concluded, and to-day is suffered to interfere with and seriously embarrass the good understanding of both countries in the important commercial relations and interests which have come into being since its ratification, and for the adjustment of which it is wholly inadequate, as has been unhappily proved by the events of the past two years. I am confident we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries. I say commercial because I do not propose to include, however, indirectly, or by any intendment, however, partial or oblique, the political relations of Canada and the United States, nor to effect the legislative independence of either country."

Now, I ask, Mr. Speaker, is not that an overture inviting this country to enter upon negotiations for the purpose of securing a modification, at least, of the trade restrictions existing between the two countries? I ask if that is not an overture that should have been responded to, if we had received it in a proper spirit, by an attempt, at least, to secure this modification of trade restrictions? Sir, I assert that it was an overture which was not met in the right spirit, and that no attempt was made by the Government of this country to meet Mr. Bayard on the lines that would have secured a modification of these trade restrictions—I assert that broadly. On the contrary, this Government has pursued towards the United States a policy of irritation, a policy of irritation characterised by the mode in which the fishery regulations were enforced, which I do not need to allude to more particularly, as it has been alluded to already. This spirit of irritation has been manifested in other respects; it has been manifested in the treatment of the question of canal tolls. We have imposed upon vessels passing through the Welland Canal a toll of 20 cents a ton, and we have granted a rebate to those vessels going to the port of Montreal of 18 cents a ton. We have discriminated against the American commerce passing through that canal to the extent of 18-20, and that in face of that fact that our shipping has been permitted to use the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, an expensive work, costing over five million dollars, entirely free of charge. For years, ever since the construction of that canal, the United States Government has kept it in repair, and furnished a force to operate its locks; and every Canadian vessel that has passed through that canal has done so without payment of a cent. The same with the St. Clair Flats Canal; the same with the improvements of the Lime Kiln Crossing, and its expensive works which the American Government have permitted us to use entirely free of charge. In return for this neighborly conduct, we levy upon their commerce passing through the Welland Canal 20 cents a ton, and we discriminate against commerce going to their ports, by rebating 18 cents of that 20 cents a ton to all vessels going to Montreal. Sir, that is not neighborly treatment. Then, when we granted the free admission of fruits, we destroyed entirely all evidences of friendly feeling and kindness of spirit in this matter by that poor little contemptible tax of one cent a basket on the baskets in which the fruit comes; and the collection of that tax, I am told by fruit importers, in some cases led to serious loss on whole car loads of fruit. They were side-tracked, in order to go through the formalities of a customs entry; the owner in some point in Ontario would be required to come down and enter them, and by the time he had got through the entry and paid the one cent a basket on his purchase, the fruit, especially in the case of peaches, would be badly damaged in consequence of the delay. I have a letter in my pocket to that effect. No doubt this tax cannot yield anything of any consequence; nevertheless it is irritating in its character, more so perhaps than it would be if an amount of revenue of any consequence was realised from it, and it seems to me that nothing could have been more impolitic than the petty cheese-paring spirit manifested. We had this spirit manifested the other day in respect to a few curlers coming over from Buffalo to engage in a friendly game with another party at Toronto, and bringing with them an illuminated address. They were required to give bonds that their curling stones would not be kept in Canada but would be carried back, and they were charged $1.75 duty on their illuminated address that they were going to present to the curling club in Toronto. Well, it is $1.75 gained for the Government and bad feeling engendered. I do not think this is wise conduct; I do not think we are making enough, in the shape of revenue, to compensate for the effect upon friendly relations between the two countries, by these small affairs. Then we have the raising of invoices. I know of one case where a party who wished to import certain malleable goods, went to the parties producing the goods in this country and offered them the cost of these goods with the entire amount of duty added. It was refused, and he imported the goods, and the Customs placed its own valuation upon those goods and made him pay duty on 50 per cent. more than their cost. This is not the kind of policy that produces good feeling, it is not a kind of policy that is commendable or politic. Then we are greatly interested in sending fresh fish to the United States free of duty. We import a small amount of fresh fish from the United States, and we impose a duty of half a cent a pound on this fish, jeopardising the whole vast trade of this country with the United States in fresh fish—another specimen of the wisdom of the Government in their management of international relations. There has been, I am sorry to say, an unfriendly spirit manifested in many things. The Americans believe that spirit is unfriendly, and these manifestations have provoked resentment of a very serious character. It is believed in the United States that we have purposely made our fishery regulations oppressive and troublesome for the purpose of extorting from them concessions, and, naturally, they say: "We will see you further before we will give you any concessions under these circumstances." If our friends will read Æsop's Fables—

Mr. BOWELL. We are hearing them now.

Mr. CHARLTON—there is an instance related where the wind concluded that it would make a man open his cloak. It blew upon him with great force, and the more the wind blew the tighter the man wrapped his cloak around him. It was found impossible for the wind to compel that man to throw open his cloak. Well, it ceased its efforts, and then the sun shone out warm and benignant upon the man, and after it had shone a few minutes he unbuttoned his cloak. Warmer and warmer it got, and finally the warmth of the sun compelled him to remove his coat. And so it will be here. It is said molasses will catch more flies than vinegar. I believe it is true; and if we want to obtain concessions we do not want to provoke unfriendly conflict by seizing American vessels, charging one cent a basket on their peach baskets, a duty on their illuminated addresses and make them give bonds on curling stones. These are things we should not do. On the contrary, we want to treat them in a broad, generous and friendly spirit and thus engender that cordial feeling which will lead to trade concessions.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance the other night took the ground that our progress had been in the highest degree satisfactory, that we had, I understood him to assert, very little to wish for, that, under all the circumstances, we could not have expected to have progressed more rapidly or to have occupied a more favorable position than we now occupied. If our growth and development have been satisfactory, why there is no great reason to require change or modification of our commercial relations; and I propose to inquire briefly and in a very candid manner whether our growth and development have been of a satisfactory character. First with respect to increase of population. In 1871 we had 3,635,000 inhabitants; in 1881, 4,324,000 inhabitants, the increase being 689,000 souls, an increase of about 18½ per cent. I turn to the United States and find the increase in that country in the decade commencing one year earlier and ending one year earlier was 30 8, as against 18½ in Canada. This is not satisfactory. Here we have a difference in the increase of population of the two countries of more than 11 per cent. against ourselves, and there is no reason for it. This is a strong vigorous race in Canada, a race which would naturally increase more rapidly than the population in the United States, and if our increase in population was 11 per cent. less than that of the United States our ratio of progress and development is shown to be unsatisfactory by that one fact. As I stated a while ago, we have probably in the United States to day one million of Canadians; last census showed 712,000 and the ratio of increase that obtained between 1870 and 1880 would give within a fraction of one million. All these facts prove that our progress has not been satisfactory. There is another matter which shows this fact still more clearly: The United States have developed in excess of Canada in many respects. They raised last year $700,000,000 worth of corn, a larger quantity of wheat than we raised per head, an enormous quantity of wines and fruits, of which we raised comparatively nothing, a larger quantity of wool, more sheep, a vastly larger number of swine, in proportion to population; and of articles that we do not produce, tobacco to the value of $43,372,000; cotton to the value of $254,117,000; sugar 145,000 hogsheads. In manufactures, where Canada produced in 1881 to the value of $309,676,000, the United States produced in 1880 $5,369,667,000 worth, or equal to five-tenths per capita in excess of our production. All industries, according to Mulhall, reached, in the United States the value of £2,281,000,000, Canada £167,000,000, or equal to two-tenths per capita in excess of our production. Mulhall gives the wealth of the United States and other countries in 1880 in pounds sterling, that of the United States being £9,495,000,000, and that of Canada £550,000,000, a per capita excess in favor of the United States of five-tenths. This shows a vast development in that country as compared with Canada.

In regard to public debt, notwithstanding the plausible explanation of the Minister of Finance, our position is a most unsatisfactory one. Our debt on the 1st February, 1889, was $230,370,564, or equal to $47.33 per head—I think the Minister of Finance made it a few cents less: The debt of the United States on the same date was $1,121,845,973. The Pacific Railway debts it is fair, under our mode of calculation giving the net debt, to deduct as good and valuable assets. They are about to make some arrangements by which they will amply secure the United States on a 3 per cent. 50-year loan, at which rate the Government can borrow the money. Deducting the Pacific Railway debt, the principal and interest of the United States debt, February 1st, 1889, was $1,009,982,000, or $16.82 per head on a basis of population of 60,000,000, against $47.33 per head in Canada on a basis of 5,000,000. If we add State debts, as the hon. gentleman said we should do, the net amount of which is $170,000,000, this makes the total equal to a per capita charge for national and State debts of $19.67, as against $47.33 in Canada. That is not a satisfactory condition of things. The hon. gentleman, at great length, compared the expenses of this country with the expenses of the United States. I have prepared some statistics on these heads. I find our debt has increased, since Confederation, $160,941,923, or three fold. The increase of our debt in the last ten years was $96,308,495. While our debt increased three fold, the American debt was reduced from $2,508,151,211, in 1867, down to $1,121,845,973, February 1st, 1889, without deducting the Pacific Railway assets, which are, in round numbers, $111,000,000. In the period since 1873 the United States have reduced their debt by $511,635,306, while during that period we have increased our debt by $96,000,000. So in the matter of public debt, the comparison is a very unsatisfactory one for this country. Then we were told by the hon. gentleman that the United States pays no judges except a few Supreme Court judges, and has no immigration and quarantine charges, no governors to pay, no militia to sustain, no penitentiaries to keep up, and that if our expenditure had been on the same basis as that of the United States, instead of having a debt to-day, we would have had a surplus of $45,000,000. I would ask the hon. gentleman how that calculation was worked out. I would ask the hon. gentleman what would have been the position in this country under circumstances such as those encountered in the United States from 1861 to 1864, when a supreme struggle for existence occurred during which the American people accumulated their great debt? Why, this country would have been ruined. The expenses under the following heads in the countries respectively, were as follows:—

United States Pension Charges, 1888 .....	$ 80,288,508
Per capita, $1.33 .....
Canada Pension charges, 1888 .....	120,333
Per capita, 2-4 .....
United States Military Establishment .....	33,522,436

It must be borne in mind that the United States, last year, reduced their debt by $112,163,000. That came out of their excise and customs duties, and that leaves their expenses at $231,000,000, or a per capita expense, aside from the payment of the debt, of $3.85 per head, as against $5.63 in Canada. If we add to that, as my friend probably claims we should do, the per capita taxation for States of $1.03 per head it would make for both of those $4.93 as against $5.63 in Canada, or still an excess in our case of 70 cents per head. The United States pays 180·6 per head for pensions more than we do. It is an abnormal and not a permanent charge, and if we set this aside it would leave our per capita expenditure $2 greater than the expenditure of the United States and the various State governments combined. I do not think the comparison is a favorable one to us. The lesson furnished to us is a suggestive one, and that lesson is that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance does really need to practice economy for we are on the high road to difficulties. The hon. Minister draws a rosy picture of our condition because he is able to point out that our debt per capita is not so much as it is in France or Belgium and other European countries, which are ground down to the earth by the expense of maintaining vast armies. These countries are continually preparing for war and practically live in a state of war every year. Their population is ground down by all the burdens that can possibly be imposed upon them; and yet forsooth, the Minister of Finance says we should congratulate ourselves because our condition is not quite so bad as theirs. I do not know that I need waste more time on this question, I had some more figures bearing on it but I may say that the conclusions drawn by my friend the Minister of Finance will not bear investigation, and that our condition as compared with the United States in matters relating to the finances of the two countries is an unfavorable one.

Mr. FOSTER. Your figures and mine about taxation are just the same.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am aware that in some respects they are, but you attempted to draw conclusions from them that were in no wise warranted by the facts. Our railways show a still greater disparity in the development of the two countries. We carried in 1887 upon our railways 16,356,335 tons of freight; of this freight 2,580,000 was carried by the Canada Southern, and 6,458,000 by the Grand Trunk Railway. It would be a moderate estimate to assume that 3,000,000 of this freight was freight in transit through Canada from one part of the United States to the other, leaving the actual transit of freight in Canada about 13,300,000 tons. That same year the United States railways carried 552,074,752 tons, and we have therefore this result, that the carriage of freight in Canada was 3·27 tons per head and in the United States it was 9·12 tons per head, or about three times as much freight on the railways in the United States as upon Canadian railways. The number of passengers carried upon the railways of Canada was 10,608,638, and the passengers carried upon the United States railways amounted to 428,225,573, or 2·14 in Canada to 7 per head in the United States, again about three times the volume of passenger trade in the United States than there was in Canada. The total earnings of the railways in Canada was $38,842,000 and on the United States railways $931,385,154, so that the railways in Canada earned $7·75 per head as compared with $15·52 in the United States. We have the advantage of the United States in our railway system in one respect, for we have $129,810,000 of Government money in our railways or $26 per capita, while in the United States they have only $65,000,000 invested, or $1·08 per head, and that is not a subsidy but a loan. The statistics which I have quoted must prove pretty clearly that in the matter of the development of our trade, in the matter of increase of population, in the matter of debt burden, and in all the particulars which I have mentioned the comparison between the two countries show that it is not favorable to our country, and that a condition of things prevails here which we should not desire. I do not parade the fact for the sake of deriving any satisfaction from it, but it is necessary for us to face the situation, and to know exactly our condition, and in making our calculations we should know what is necessary to be done. We want to know exactly the basis upon which our calculation should be made, and recognising the necessity for this knowledge it is perfectly proper that we should examine the question in this sense.

I referred a short time ago to the vast internal commerce of the United States, and I referred to that as proof of the great advantages derived by that country from unrestricted commercial intercourse between all those States. No more striking proof of this can be had than the statement made in the report that the internal commerce between the States was two and a-half times greater than the total export and import trade of the entire world in 1880. It was twenty-five times greater than the foreign commerce of the United States, import and export, which in 1886 was $1,314,960,000. It was thirty times greater per capita than the commerce between Canada and the United States. I say that this vast internal commerce is one, which if we are wise, we should desire to enter into and to obtain the benefit of.

Mr. HAGGART. Where did you get those figures as regards the internal trade?

Mr. CHARLTON. From the report of Mr. Switzler, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the United States on the Internal Commerce of the United States for 1887, page 570.

I have just one more item of comparison to make between the trade of those two countries. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance was kind enough to refer to me the other night in very friendly and kindly terms in connection with my labors on the Mining Commission of Ontario, and he stated, as was true, that in that capacity I had been able to have my ideas as to the great extent and capabilities of this country, in a mineral sense, very much enlarged. I had. I found that we have enormous mineral resources. I was glad to see how widely they are extended and how great they were, and I found out another thing also; I found from Ottawa to Port Arthur, wherever I went, one universal cry—and there was not a dissenting voice to that cry—on the part of every man interested in minerals, copper, iron silver, gold, and structural materials. They all said: "Give us access to the American markets, we are languishing for the want of a market; we are cribbed, cabined and confined; our energies are repressed and we can do nothing. Right across the line are unlimited markets for the products of our mines, but we are debarred from that market by the trade restrictions that exist between the two countries." I heard this complaint so often repeated that I finally became aware—and I am sure that a very few men of this country are fully aware of it—of the vast importance of this question as regards the mineral development of this country. No other great interest in Canada is suffering so severely or would be benefited so greatly by the removal of trade restrictions as the mining interests of this Dominion. Now, what is the state of our mineral development as compared with that of the United States? In Mr. Coste's report we find it stated that the mineral production of Canada last year was $15,000,000; but he includes in that statement brick, coke, iron, steel and tiles. As iron, he gives both the ore and the iron; one is a duplicate of the other. The American report gives neither iron, nor coke, nor steel, nor tiles nor brick; and when we eliminate these articles from Mr. Coste's report for the sake of a comparison on a fair basis, we find that our mineral production last year was $12,113,000, while the mineral production of the United States was $542,284,000, or a per capita excess in the United States over Canada of 3·75, or nearly four times as much as ours. In these circumstances, we cannot flatter ourselves that our mineral production is on a satisfactory basis. Going into particulars, I find that the Americans produced per capita 12 times as much iron ore as Canada, 21½ times as much pig iron, 150 times as much lead, 4·05 times as much coal, 16·15 times as much coke, 3·07 times as much building stone, 3·2 times as much brick and tile, 4·25 times as much lime, and 8 times as much cement as we did. Consequently I arrive at the conclusion that our mineral development, compared with that of the United States, is by no means satisfactory. And when I come to sum up the comparative development of these two countries, I find that in increase of population in a decade, our increase amounts to 18.75 against the United States' increase of 30.8. In agricultural products their production exceeds ours greatly in corn, wheat, wool, sheep, swine, fruits, wine, cotton, tobacco and sugar. In manufacture they exceed us by 5.10 per capita, in the products of industry they exceed us 2.10, in wealth they exceed us by 5.10; in debt we exceed them in the ratio of $17.33 against $6.82 per capita. In railway commerce they exceed us by 9.2 against 3.27 per capita; in passengers they exceed us in the ratio of 7 against 2.14 per capita; in earnings they exceed us by $15.52 against $1.75 per capita. Their internal commerce is 300 times as much as our commerce with them, and 170 times as much as our commerce with the world; and in mineral development they exceed us according to the statement I have given. Now, from these facts I arrive at the conclusion that our progress is not satisfactory as compared with theirs in any of the respects that go to make up the growth of a great state. I assert that but for the exodus, this country to-day would have had a population of 8,000,000 in place of 5,000,000, and the Province of Ontario would have had a population exceeding 4,000,000; and let any man picture to himself the condition of things that we should have seen to-day if the Dominion had a population of 8,000,000 in place of the condition we find actually prevailing. Now, Sir, what is the cause of this state of things? Is it lack of energy and vigor on the part of the race that inhabits this country? No, Sir, it is not. There is not a more vigorous or energetic race on this continent or in this world than the population of Canada. Canadians in the United States are everywhere making their way, and are considered the most valuable element almost in the population of that country. Let two young men go to any business house in Chicago or any other part of the west, having equal education and equal advantages, a man from Canada, and a man from the Middle or Eastern States, and in nine cases out of ten the Canadian will get the preference, simply because he is a Canadian, because of the reputation Canadians have in the United States for energy, vigor and intelligence. Well, Sir, is it on account of bad laws or institutions? No, Sir, it is not. The laws of this country are good; the institutions of this country are good. It may be that they have been badly administered in some cases; I think they have. It is our business very often to criticise the administration of affairs; but on the whole, considering the circumstances surrounding us and the difficulties confronting the administration of this country, the administration of affairs has not perhaps been so very much worse than we might suppose was inevitable. But I assert that the laws and institutions of the country are in no wise responsible for the case I present to this House and the country. Well, Sir, is it for lack of natural resources? No, it is not. Our natural resources in our fisheries, our timber, our mines, our minerals, and our soil, are enormous—resources sufficient, Sir, for one of the greatest nations of the globe. It is not for lack of resources, from want of energy or vigor in our people, it is not from any fault in our laws and institutions, that this country has not progressed as it should have done. Well, what is the cause? Why, Sir, it is defiance of natural laws; it is defiance of the requirements of geographical affinity; it is defiance of race affinity; it is defiance of the requirements of common sense; it is because we shut ourselves out from our natural markets; it is the want of continental free trade;—that is the trouble with this country.

We are told that the National Policy is a grand institution. Our friend the Minister of Finance told us the other day that he could not sacrifice that one little feature of our policy on any consideration whatever. He told us that if we could get commercial intercourse with the United States in natural products, shut out their manufactures, and continue to foster our National Policy, we should be all right; but as for sacrificing the National Policy, it was not to be for one moment thought of; and in connection with that, the hon. Minister made an assertion that seemed to me rather astounding. He was descanting on the desirability of opening up foreign markets, and he told us in explicit terms that our cotton mills were able to find a profitable market for their products in those neutral markets where they must meet British competition on equal terms. If that be true, if they can find a profitable market in China, India, and Japan, where they must sell in competition with goods from Manchester without any advantage of tariff on their side, I want to ask why they cannot do it here—why it is necessary to have from 25 to 35 per cent. duty against those goods coming into Canada. I would like to know how that is; and I am afraid that if that is the case, this arrangement made by Secretary Fairchild, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, against the protective tariff of that country, has a vast amount of truth in it which will apply to this country. The Secretary of State says in this annual report for 1888:

"Beside the vexed economic question as to whether a country can make itself prosperous by a tariff, whether it can increase the relative average comfort of its whole people by diverting a portion of its labor and capital from the employments which could be most profitably followed under natural conditions, thereby making certain of the necessities of life more costly than they would be otherwise, there is a higher moral question which may well be asked, and that is, can a government be kept pure and free which, through the agency of its laws, offers vast pecuniary temptations to some kinds of business?"

"There are many indications that this question must be answered in the negative. There are many proofs that large classes of our business men have come to depend for success upon their skill in manipulating Governmental agencies, rather than upon industry, intelligence and honorable competition."

Does the hon. the Minister of Finance know anything about that?

"Is it not possible that eagerness for the money which men assume comes to them only through government, may lead them to use an overgrowing proportion of their gains to possess and influence the supposed source of their wealth. And will not the endeavor to make men rich soon become the chief function of our government? Is not this already the case? If these dangers exist, if they are not overestimated, then can it be doubted that the true welfare of our people calls for the rescue of the government from them as speedily as may be? This can only be done by severing government from private business; steps should at once be taken in that direction, always, however let me repeat, bearing in mind interests which may have become established under present laws; to the end that they may not suffer unduly while beneficent reforms are made."

Now, I fear that is the case in this country. I fear that these interests which seek to control the government do, in a large measure, control it; and instead of relying on their own energy, skill and capital, rely on undue favors from the Government for the profits which they seek to make. In fact, I am certain this is the case. But supposing we concede the National Policy is all it claims to be, conceding that it may actually create a home market in this country and will serve the purposes it is intended to serve, conceding all this, we have to the south of us a country that has been engaged in the same business of building up a home market for the last 25 years. During that time they have imposed heavy duties on their imports, they have fostered and created to some extent a great manufacturing interest, and I hold it would be the part of wisdom for Canada to seek access to that great market, created by the taxation of that country for 25 years, rather than undergo the expensive and not very desirable process which that country has undergone in the creation of that market. Break down the barriers, and instead of waiting 25 years to create a market in Canada, let us get access to the American market which is already created. If the National Policy is a correct policy, here is a short cut to the very result you are striving for, and which otherwise it will take you 25 years to attain, and which when you have attained it will not give you one-thirteenth the market that will be opened to you by the adoption of the policy of free trade with the United States. I commend this policy to the hon. the Minister of Finance. It will be a stroke of genius on his part, and obviate the difficulties which beset the delusive course the Government have adopted.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be a great Hitt!

Mr. CHARLTON. It would be a very good Hitt indeed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is the best way to Foster a market.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to say a few words upon a very important branch of that part of my subject, which relates to the desirability of securing access to the American markets; that is the bearing which continental free trade would have on the mineral development of our country. Last year we produced in Canada 76,330 tons of iron ore, while the production of the United States amounted to 11,300,000 tons. We exported last year from Ontario 13,534 tons of iron ore, and from the whole Dominion 13,544 tons, and the total export of ore from Ontario since 1869 has been 524,511 tons. When we compare this trade with the volume of trade for a single year from Lake Superior, we will be astounded at its small proportions. It must be borne in mind that we have enormous deposits of iron ore, mines that are accessible and easily reached by railway, at quite convenient distances from lake navigation, and it is supposed we are capable of placing an unlimited amount of ore in the American market. The shipments of ore from Lake Superior ports to Lake Erie ports last year amounted to 5,023,279 tons, and that ore was worth at the point of shipment about $20,000,000. In its transportation about $6,000,000 was paid for freight. That volume of ore from Lake Superior was 350 times greater than the entire export from Ontario for last year, and nine and a half times greater than the entire export from Ontario since 1869—nine and a-half times greater in one year than the whole exports of Ontario during twenty years. We have enormous quantities of ore. We have discovered west of Port Arthur the Minnesota iron range projecting into our territory, of unknown extent, which it is believed contains sufficient ore to supply the whole consumption of this continent for centuries. That ore can be easily reached, yet, under the depressing policy of this Government, we have only a beggarly showing of 15,534 tons exported from Ontario while 5,023,000 long tons have been exported from Lake Superior. From the port of Two Harbors on Lake Superior the shipments from the Vermilion mine on this range, in 1884, amounted to 62,124 tons, and reached, in 1888, 511,539 tons. There are vast possibilities for the development of this trade, but it can be developed only on the condition that the duty shall be removed, and this ore admitted to the American market free. Last year we produced 24,827 tons of pig iron, and the United States produced 6,417,000 tons. The charcoal production of Michigan was 180,000 tons. If the duty were removed we could supply the whole of that trade as advantageously as Michigan. We could produce enormous quantities of iron in Nova Scotia. I am told by men conversant with the business that there is but one point in America where iron can be produced at a cheaper rate than at Picou, and that is at Birmingham in Alabama. With free access to the American market, there is no reason why we should not see an enormous production of iron in the mines of Nova Scotia, and of charcoal iron in Ontario, where the timber is contiguous to the ore, and the iron can be cheaply manufactured.

In coal we produced 2,368,891 tons last year, while the United States produced 116,049,604 tons of anthracite and bituminous. We exported from Nova Scotia to the United States, 92,176 tons. Now, when I look at the position of Nova Scotia mines, they being the only coal mines on the Atlantic seaboard, being the most favorably situated for supplying every port on that seaboard,—when I look at the position of these mines, I am astonished that the exports should be but 92,000 tons in one year. The New England States require, according to a rough estimate, 4,000,000 tons of bituminous coal a year, and New York requires a large quantity also. Were these duties removed, there is no doubt that Nova Scotia could sell to the New England States and New York three million tons, or thirty times the amount of the present export. There cannot be any doubt that an enormous development of the coal business of Nova Scotia would result from the removal of these duties.

Then, with regard to copper, we have many mines of copper in this country, but many of them are not large enough to warrant the erection of smelting works, and copper mine owners tell me in every case that it would be of great importance if they could ship their copper to the American market. At present, they are charged five cents per pound duty on the copper contained in their ores.

Then there is the question of salt. We have in the Lake Haron basin probably an extent of 1,200 square miles of a salt district producing the best salt on this continent. The product in 1887 was 425,000 barrels, while the product in Michigan was 3,900,000 barrels. Were that market open to our producers, and were the duty on coal slack removed, there is no reason whatever why we should not compete with the Michigan producer, or share with him the enormous product of 3,900,000 barrels a year.

Then, as to building stone, we have at various points in Ontario marble, granite, freestone, and sandstone of the most excellent quality. At Nepigon Bay, on Lake Superior, there are immense quarries of freestone of a quality which stands the test of fire and frost better than any freestone in the market. We have mountains of marble. The Commission visited one marble quarry near Sault Ste. Marie, which was close to navigation, where vessels could load the stone without difficulty. It was 5,000 feet wide, and 50 feet high, and it went down into the bowels of the earth below the possibility of reckoning, and it went back into the country for several miles. But for the duty on marble, the manager told us that he could do a very large trade in that stone, and would, if the duty were removed, erect a mill for sawing and polishing that would employ 300 men. In 1887, the United States produced $25,000,000 of building stone and marble, while Canada produced only $558,491 worth. The exports of Canada to the United States of stone amounted to $65,300, of which Ontario exported $21,224. There was the beggarly amount of $21,000 worth of stone of all kinds exported to the United States from Ontario, as compared with the produce in the United States of $25,000,000 worth. The quarries of Ontario are so situated that marble, granite, freestone and sandstone could be exported, if it were not for the duties, at the least possible cost to Chicago with its 900,000 inhabitants, to Milwaukee, Detroit, Cleveland, and Buffalo—all first-class cities which are using great quantities of stone in construction every year; and we, with the facilities for conveying that stone by water, combined with the superior quality of our stone could defy competition but for these duties, though, as a matter of fact, we only exported this small amount of $21,000 worth. Then, as to brick, cement, lime, and so on, Canada produced in 1887 $1,633,525, while the United States produced $75,661,000. Of this we exported $238,625, of which Ontario exported $21,217. There is a great chance of development in this trade, and we have just as good a chance for reaching these great cities with this class of production as we have with stone, provided the duties were removed, and we could extend our communication with more distant parts of the United States by means of the Erie Canal and other means of communication. In the production of these structural materials, the opportunity opening for trade with a free American market is without limit. The business might employ millions of capital and tens of thousands of laborers but for the tariff. The total export of minerals from Ontario during the years from 1869 to 1888 was of the value of $17,675,391. Of that, $14,332,497 went to the United States, $3,340,317 to Great Britain, while $2,577 went to all the rest of the world. We have vast mineral resources in Ontario, as well as in British Columbia and Nova Scotia. We have silver and gold in this country. The Commission visited a silver district west of Port Arthur which, I believe, will prove to be the finest silver district on this continent. I believe my hon. friend the member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) will bear me out in the statement that that it is likely to be the most productive silver region known on the American continent. That district would receive a vast development from the removal of trade restrictions. It is true that there is no duty on silver ore, but, if we could obtain the introduction of machinery free of duty and could attract the attention of American capitalists to that region, we would obtain a great impetus to the development of the silver resources west of Port Arthur and the gold resources near the Lake of the Woods.

I recently visited the south, and I saw that millions of dollars were pouring into that country, that a magical era of development had commenced, and that a new south was being created. Birmingham, Alabama, is a town of 50,000 inhabitants, which has grown up, I might say, like Jonah's gourd, in a night. I saw another city, called Bessemer city, with great furnaces and rolling mills, where not a tree was cut twenty months ago. I saw towns being built up, cities springing into existence, railways under construction or recently built, and agriculture benefited by the vast amount of capital which was poured into that country, and I asked myself: Why do we not share in this swelling tide progress? The answer is that the duties keep the capital out. Americans look upon Canada as a foreign country. The truth is that the duties deprive us of the advantages which we might otherwise obtain, and of the millions of capital which would come in here, the railways which would be constructed, the cities which would be built, and the vast development of our interests which would result if those duties were removed. I believe that in five years, with free trade with the United States, our mineral production would receive a development equal to $20,000,000 a year, and that would involve an expenditure of $12,000,000 per annum for labor alone. I want to know if the laborers of this country are not interested in a policy which in minerals alone, would add, in all probability, $12,000,000 a year to the expenditure for labor.

Now, I wish to call attention to the Provinces in this Dominion whose exports of the produce of Canada to the United States exceed their exports to Great Britain. First, we have Ontario, which in 1883 exported $23,074,733 to the United States and $4,000,360 to Great Britain. Nova Scotia exported $1,115,641 to the United States, and $1,823,832 to Great Britain. Prince Edward Island exported $915,951 to the United States and $80,626 to Great Britain. British Columbia in the same year exported $2,228,385 to the United States, and $1,029,110 to Great Britain. So that, from those Provinces, there were $29,334,710 worth of exports to the United States, and $6,933,928 to Great Britain. What does that teach? Here are four of the seven Provinces that export to the United States almost five times more than their total exports to England. When I come to the classification of these exports, the produce of Canada to the United States and the exports to Great Britain, I find the following:

Mr. CHARLTON.

	United States.	Great Britain.
The Mine .....	$ 3,341,308	$ 478,260
The Fisheries .....	3,123,853	1,544,901
The Forest .....	10,622,338	8,932,177
Agricultural Products .....	10,306,278	4,292,640
Miscellaneous Articles .....	701,616	66,840
	$28,095,393	$15,314,318

This shows the vast volume of our trade with the United States, and the character of that trade; it shows that four Provinces of the Dominion have enormously greater transactions with the United States than with Great Britain. In the items of agricultural produce exported from Canada to the United States and Great Britain, I find the following, and this is a table worthy of careful scrutiny:

	United States.	Great Britain.
Horses .....	$2,402,371	$ 36,750
Sheep .....	1,027,410	211,861
Poultry .....	123,222	1,982
Eggs .....	2,119,532	262
Hides, horns and skins .....	515,220	25,634
Wool .....	223,125	.....
Barley .....	6,468,317	700
Beans .....	124,214	.....
Hay .....	800,632	64,781
Malt .....	154,145	.....
Potatoes .....	357,570	973
Vegetables .....	93,102	259
	$14,427,900	$343,220

Sir, these returns require no comment. They show how vast our trade is with the United States, and they show that in all these important productions our trade is almost exclusively with the United States; and the constructive loss of the country through being debarred of access to that market that we enjoyed between 1854 and 1866, is actually and positively beyond computation or belief. Now, the duty paid on our exports of $37,323,161 to the United States last year amounted, at a rough estimate, to $5,750,000, of which $2,500,000 was upon our agricultural products. It is an interesting question, and I referred to it last year, it is indeed a matter of prime importance, to understand the bearing of the case—who pays this duty—of probably $5,750,000 on the productions of Canada that went into the United States, on which duty was collected in that country. Now, I propose to examine the proportion that our imports to the United States bear to the total production of that country in the same line:

	Canadian Export.	United States Production.	Proportion.
Mine .....	$ 3,341,308	542,284,000	1/80
Fisheries .....	3,123,853	42,536,000	1/13
Forest .....	10,622,338	291,585,000	1/27
Horses .....	No. 19,925	13,172,936	5/83
Horned cattle .....	No. 40,047	49,235,000	1/120
Swine .....	No. 1,276	44,348,000	1/3400
Sheep .....	No. 353,999	43,544,000	1/122
Eggs .....	doz. 14,147,739	.....	.....
Hides and skins .....	$ 515,220	.....	.....
Wool .....	lbs. 354,189	285,000,000	1/800
Barley .....	bu h. 9,360,521	60,000,000	1/6
Wheat .....	bush. 777,698	457,218,000	1/585
Hay .....	tons. 84,068	41,796,000	1/487
Malt .....	bush. 193,14	18,273,000	1/90
Potatoes .....	bush. 2,486,441	168,051,000	1/67

Now, Sir, under these circumstances, with the small volume of our importations to that country as compared with the production of the same article in that country, it is preposterous to suppose that the duty levied upon these articles depressed the price of the enormous bulk of these several articles in that country to whose amount the volume of our importations bore such an insignificant proportion. We paid the duty. We receive for our horses, for our coal, for our barley, for every article upon that list that we exported to the United States, just exactly the amount received in that country, less the duty taken from it. In fact, that is not a fair statement of the case, because we lose more than that. The purchaser of an article for importation into the United States, if that article is for sale, and he expects to make a profit upon it, will add his profit to the amount of the duty, as it is a part of the cost. Then the existence of trade restrictions all operates to prevent competition and to keep out a certain class of buyers. Whenever a purchase is made for importation to the United States, the purchaser must take out a consul's certificate; he makes the entry at the Customs and runs the risk of seizure. There is a large class of purchasers who do not care to embark in trade under these conditions, and we are suffering from these disadvantages in the duties. First of all, we lose the amount of the duties; then we lose the profit that the dealer importing these articles to the United States receives upon this duty, which is part of the cost; then we lose the benefit of that active competition which will exist in this country if the purchaser is free to trade without any restrictions or any customs regulations to deter him. I believe it is a fair calculation that there is a loss in these three respects of not less than $10,000,000 a year on the importations from this country to the United States. That is the amount that would be realised under the present system of importations from the United States as measured by the returns of last year, to say nothing of the increase of trade that would ensue if the duties were removed. The rate of duty paid upon our various exports to the United States are, on coal and iron ore, 75 cents per ton; canned fish, about 20 per cent.; lumber, $1 to $2; shingles, 35 per cent.; horses, cattle, swine and sheep, 20 per cent.; wool, 10 cents per pound; barley and wheat, 10 cents per bushel; malt and flax seed, 20 cents per bushel; peas, 10 cents per bushel; hops, 8 cents per pound; butter, 4 cents per pound; hay, $2 per ton; potatoes, 15 cents per bushel, &c.

Let us see what we buy from the people of the United States. Among other things we bought last year, in large quantities, coal, iron and steel manufacturings, tools, pianos and musical instruments, paper, coal oil, printing presses, watches, clocks, furniture, books, cotton goods, cordage, glassware, plated ware, boots and shoes, India-rubber goods, castings, hardware, iron, sewing machines, straw goods, hats, jewelry, &c. We paid in duty last year $7,131,000 on dutiable goods of the value of $27,076,680, imported from the United States, and imported from the same country free goods amounting to $21,384,168. We paid in addition profits upon duty as part of cost amounting to $3,000,000 more, and between the loss to this country on importations from Canada into the United States and on importations from the United States into Canada on dutiable goods, we were $20,000,000 worse off than we would have been under free trade. So much for the advantages which would be derived from the removal of the present restrictions between the two countries.

I am occupying the time of the House longer than I had intended, but I wish before resuming my seat to refer briefly to the objections raised to this policy of unrestricted reciprocity. I desire to meet, as well as I can, any and all the objections raised by hon. gentlemen opposite or by their friends in the country with respect to it. First, they tell us—and I have met this objection in a measure before—what is the use of this agitation; in what respect is your position different from our own? We are in favor of reciprocity with the United States, you have not a monopoly of that principle, we are in favor of it. I deny it. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not in favor of it, because they persistently refuse to make advances to secure it on terms which they know are the only admissible terms, and if they will not accept admissible terms but insist on seeking to secure impracticable terms, it is no use of their talking about being in favor of this policy. It cannot be secured on the terms they propose. Reciprocity in natural products the United States will never grant. Why?

Because the former treaty did not work to their advantage or satisfaction. What was the volume of free importations each way during the 12 years from 1855 to 1866? The free importations from the United States to Canada amounted during that period to $124,872,233. The free imports to the United States from Canada amounted to $239,792,234, or almost double. The treaty did not work satisfactorily to the United States. Everything we wanted to sell to the Americans we sold to them, but we did not allow them the privilege of sending to us the products and manufactures they could exchange for our natural products, and it was not a fair reciprocity treaty. And, Sir, if we wish to have a fair reciprocity treaty now, it must be unrestricted reciprocity, a treaty permitting unrestricted interchange of commodities of every nature and character between the two countries, and that is the kind of reciprocity treaty the United States are willing to grant and it is not the kind of reciprocity which our friends on the Government benches are willing to accept.

The next objection is, that we cannot get unrestricted reciprocity, that it is no use agitating about the matter or talking about it or holding out inducements to lead the people to believe that it is a feasible project. I deny it. I think we have abundant reason for saying that this is not so. We have as a reason the resolution of Congress passed the other day by a nearly unanimous vote, and which only failed to be taken up by the Senate by a technical objection being raised by a single member to its immediate consideration, although it had been unanimously reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. But for that circumstance we would have had the resolution of the House passed by the Senate.

Mr. McNEILL. What was the resolution?

Mr. CHARLTON. It was a resolution of Mr. Hitt in favor of commercial union. It indicates, on the part of the United States, a willingness to treat, for unrestricted reciprocity is one of the outcomes of commercial union, and commercial union is one way of arriving at unrestricted reciprocity, and another way is that which we prefer, and we are warranted in the belief from the passing of this resolution, that a good opportunity is presented to enter into negotiations for the attainment of our object, and that they would be willing to grant us terms somewhat different to those which they now propose. At all events it is worth trying. This objection that we cannot get unrestricted reciprocity is negatived by the passage of this resolution, and at least we are warranted by its passage in attempting negotiations to secure unrestricted reciprocity in a different way from that in which it is presented to us by the resolution passed by the House of Representatives. The feeling in the United States, and I saw it evinced in Washington when I was there lately, is an unmistakable desire on the part of American public men to cultivate friendly relations with Canada, to impress upon Canadians who visit their capital, their desire to treat us fairly and in a friendly spirit, and to show that they are ready to enter into a reciprocity treaty on a fair and equitable basis. There can be no doubt we can get it if we desire it, and the assertion that we cannot get it is not borne out by the facts.

The next objection is, that it is disloyal. To whom is it disloyal? If a policy is calculated to benefit the great mass of the people of this country it is not disloyal to them, because the highest requirement of loyalty is to be loyal to your own people and to promote their best interests. It may be a disloyal policy if you take into consideration exclusively the benefits accruing to a small ring of manufacturers in this country. It may be disloyal if you take into consideration the interests of another ring of manufacturers in Great Britain. Our imports from Great Britain last year amounted to the value of $39,000,000. We will assume they were all manufactured goods. I do not believe unrestricted reciprocity would diminish that trade; it would increase our prosperity and our purchasing power, and the tendency would be to increase rather than diminish the trade with Great Britain. But we will suppose that trade was obliterated, that we blotted out the entire importations to the value of $39,000,000, what interests would be affected? How much capital is invested to produce those goods? Not more than $20,000,000. How many operatives are employed? Not over 26,000; at least not over 100,000 are directly or indirectly employed in connection with our importations from Great Britain last year. Is our policy disloyal which would benefit five millions of Canadians at the expense of the owners of $20,000,000 of capital, and at the expense of 100,000 people in England employed in manufacturing the goods we import? My sense of the requirements of loyalty would lead me to prefer the interests of 5,000,000 here to 100,000 people in England. My sense of loyalty would lead me to prefer the interests of English capitalists who have invested $600,000,000 in Canada to the interests of British capitalists who have invested $20,000,000 in manufacturing English goods imported into this country. The true loyalty is such as promotes the interests of our own people at home, and that is the object of the policy we advocate.

Then we are told that England would not sanction such an arrangement. I do not know about that. England did sanction a treaty called the Brown Draft Treaty, which amounted almost to unrestricted free trade, which put a very large number of articles on the free list. Here is an incident which has a bearing on this case:

"In 1874, when the Reciprocity Treaty was being negotiated by Minister Thornton, the English Government instructed him to modify it at the suggestion of the Canadian Ministry and make such additions to the list of American goods to be admitted free into Canada as the Canadians desired."

He did so and made out a long list of American articles to be admitted free of duty, so long that it was almost free trade. Not one of these articles coming from England was to be admitted free of duty. This draft of a treaty was sent to Lord Derby, who answered that the whole proceeding was approved, and the English Government assented to the arrangement admitting American goods free to a British colony, where a tariff of 20 or 40 per cent. was to be laid upon the same kind of goods coming from England or any other country than the United States. That was done by Lord Thornton and Lord Derby in 1874, and in view of that precedent, I do not think we have any reason for saying that if we desire unrestricted reciprocity with the United States and arrange the basis of a treaty, that England would refuse assent to that treaty any more than she refused assent to the Brown draft treaty of 1874.

The next objection raised against this treaty is that it would lead to annexation and it strikes me that the Government party are a little inconsistent in this matter, when they state that this policy will lead to annexation, that the Americans want annexation and that the Americans will not give us a treaty. There is an apparent contradiction there. The charge that this treaty will lead to annexation implies a good deal. It implies that the treaty will work so well and that the prosperity of the country under this treaty will be so great that Canadians will want more of it, that they will want to go the whole figure and not only have commercial union with the United States but political union as well. Now, I think, Sir, that the fact is that unrestricted reciprocity would give us just exactly what those who want annexation would desire, that is free trade relations with the United States. I do not believe there is one man in a hundred in this country who is an annexationist because he is dissatisfied with our political institutions or because he believes that American political institutions are superior to ours, but he is an annexationist because he desires to see this tariff wall broken down and he sees no other mode of obtaining that object than annexation. Give to that man the advantages that follow from the obliteration of those tariff restrictions and you give him all he wants and he ceases to be an annexationist. Just as in 1854, following the manifesto of 1849 which was signed by many of the friends of the party opposite, the existence of the annexation party ceased when the reciprocity treaty of 1854 was agreed upon, and we heard no more of annexation during the continuance of that treaty. We would not hear of annexation now if we had unrestricted reciprocity with the States. In any event I am disposed to take the prosperity that will result from this arrangement and run the risk. The future will take care of itself. Nature has decreed these two countries to live on intimate terms, nature has decreed that we should be geographically and commercially very closely allied with each other, and the endeavors of our friends on the opposite side to prevent the consummation of this decree of nature reminds me of the reported efforts of Mrs. Partington who one morning went down to the Atlantic beach and attempted to keep out the tide with her broom. You cannot keep back this tide of commercial free relations between the two countries. You cannot prevent these two peoples from securing free intercourse with each other. Your efforts in this direction will be surely unavailing. The people are bound to have this continent open to free play and interchange of these mighty agencies that have vivified the United States and made it the great nation which it is to-day. The population of this Dominion will be satisfied with nothing less than this and those paltry objections that are raised by the party in power will be swept away by the people as cobwebs disappear before the brush of the sweeper, and the tide will roll in as it did that morning down at Long Branch when Mrs. Partington stood on the beach and tried to keep it out with her broom.

Mr. FOSTER. That was a fable.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not so much a fable as it is an illustration of the puny efforts of man to counteract the forces and oppose the decrees of nature.

The next objection that is raised to unrestricted reciprocity is that it will lead to direct taxation. Well, this was a serious difficulty, and although as I have shown we will save in this arrangement twenty millions a year to the people of this country besides the prospective profits resulting from greatly increased trade, yet the people would not hesitate I presume if they thought that these twenty millions of dollars were to be purchases at the expense of direct taxation of two or three million dollars a year. But I do not believe that direct taxation would be the result, and I know that perhaps this is the only really plausible and strong objection to the consummation of this arrangement. Now, Sir, I wish to-night to indulge in a little theory in regard to this matter; a little theoretical speculation upon a branch of the argument that is not exactly pertinent to the subject. We have from the United States a proffer of commercial union, and it is something that is not expressed in the resolution before you. We expect if we make this arrangement to get it on a different basis, but as a mere matter of theory and to get into a region of speculation I wish to enquire for a moment what will be the probable result to us as regards this question of direct taxation if unrestricted reciprocity is secured upon the basis of commercial union—a basis be it observed which as I have said we do not propose to accept, a basis upon which we are not proposing a treaty, but it is only fair to give some degree of attention to this proposal so as to enquire what its effects would be. The United States customs last year amounted to $219,091,173, their excise tax $124,296,871 or a total of $343,388,044. Our customs and excise amounted to $28,177,412. Under commercial union the total customs and excise of each country would go into a common fund. Now on the supposition that this arrangement was talked of that common fund would have amounted last year to $371,565,456. This arrangement would have however involved a sacrifice of the duties collected by the United States upon Canadian imports as well as duties collected by Canada upon United States imports, amounting to an aggregate of thirteen million dollars. The consolidated fund would be diminished by that sum, and deducting that the total would amount to $358,565,456. The percentage cost of collection would be somewhat reduced on this fund by the taking away of the interior line of customs houses in both countries. This common fund would be divided on the basis of population, giving to us one-thirteenth, or we would lose one-thirteenth of the total loss that resulted from the loss to both countries of the revenue derived by each from the importations from the other, and it would leave to us a share, on this basis of division, after deducting this $13,000,000 from the consolidated fund of $27,582,000, or $595,000 less than the revenue derived last year from customs and excise. But if the United States should reduce their tariff, as they propose to do, to the extent of $40,000,000 and we should deduct from that consolidated fund $40,000,000, in addition to the $13,000,000 joint loss of revenue, we should then have, as our share of this revenue, $24,500,000. That would be the financial aspect of the case under commercial union. Now, we must always bear in mind that our tariff on importations from outside countries would be somewhat increased. We must also bear in mind that these two countries are expanding rapidly, that our expansion would be much more rapid than it is now, so that the tendency would be to have a largely increased revenue year by year. But if we were limited to the same rate as at present, we should have $3,675,000 less revenue from customs and excise taxation under the circumstances named than we have at present. Could we make good that deficiency? We must bear in mind that we would save the cost of our whole interior line of customs houses. We could easily make a large saving in our militia appropriations; living on terms of peace with our neighbors, we would not require to prepare so fully for war. We could make a large saving in expense on public works, in subsidies, in the cost of the civil service, in the cost of the franchise. Then, we would enjoy an increased prosperity in trade, and the extension of business would produce a great increase in the traffic on Government railways and consequently a large expansion in their earnings, enabling them to wipe out that annual sum which we have to contribute to make up the deficiency in their expenses, and probably produce a surplus in their earnings. Under this proposed arrangement of Mr. Hitt, if we were to negotiate on that basis, I assert that if it were carried into practice, there would be no revenue difficulty whatever to meet.

Next, I come to the consideration of the question of unrestricted reciprocity. This is more difficult. Last year we had a revenue of $28,177,000. If we should enter into this arrangement, we would sacrifice the duty on American importations, amounting to $7,131,000, which would leave us a revenue of $21,000,000. Well, that is a considerable shrinkage. Of course, we have to consider that the new arrangement would greatly increase our population, our resources, our trade, and our wealth, and that the exodus would be stopped.

Mr. WHITE (Kenfrew). Would it not increase our importations from the United States? There would be no revenue from them.

Mr. CHARLTON. It might increase our importations from the United States; if it did not, it would be of very little use. It would double and treble our importations from the United States. The profit derived by our farmers from their trade with the United States would be three times as great as it is now. The ability of our people to purchase would be vastly increased, both from the United States and from all foreign nations in the world, and that would increase our revenue; there is no doubt of it. Our hon. friends opposite will insist on looking upon Canada as the country it is to-day with 5,000,000 inhabitants, increasing at the rate of 18 per cent. in a decade, instead of Canada we would be then, with rapid expansion, rapid growth, rapid increase of population, importations and wealth. But can we make this revenue up? We can. What was our revenue in 1880? It was $18,479,000, and we had a deficit of $1,543,000, making our expenditure in that year $20,022,000. Now, how rapidly did we increase that expenditure from 1880 to the present time? Ought we to increase it faster than our population has increased? I think not. I think our expenditure to-day should bear that proportion to the expenditure of 1880 that our population to-day bears to the population of 1880; and if that proportion had been maintained, our expenditure to-day would not have been increased more than 20 per cent., or $4,000,000, which would have left the revenue from Customs and Excise last year at $24,022,000 instead of $28,177,000. Now, can we raise that $24,000,000? Can we get our expenditure back to that figure? I think we can; I know we can; but to do so there would have to be a greater inducement than that which rests on the Minister of Finance now, something more than a bare desire; it would have to be the imperative inducement of necessity, and under that pressure the thing could be done. How could it be done? We could save $200,000 in the cost of the collection of customs revenue, because we would not need so many custom houses as we have now. We could abolish such custom houses as that recently established at Hagersville for the benefit of Mr. Montague. We would save $100,000 in the cost of the collection of excise revenues; we could save $200,000 of the expenditure on immigration, or for the matter of that the whole cost of immigration; we could save $500,000 in the cost of militia; in our appropriations for public works, we could save $1,000,000 or $1,500,000; we could save on civil service, and superannuation, if necessary $250,000 at least; we could arrange our tariff on sugar so as to take the money we put into the pockets of the refiners at present and put it into the revenue, and at the same time secure to our people their sugar as cheaply as they get it now; in that way we could save possibly $1,700,000. Then, the increased earnings on Government railways, owing to increased business, would probably amount to $750,000 a year. And all these items would sum up to about $5,000,000. I think we could meet the expenses under the rigid economy which would be necessary; the thing could be done, and it would be a benefit to the country. Our expenses to-day are enormously great. The United States in 1840, with a population of 17,000,000, spent but $24,000,000 a year on the army, the navy, pensions, Indians and miscellaneous appropriations—everything in connection with the administration of the Government; and we are told that we cannot get down to the same limit with a population of 5,000,000, a population less than one-third as great. I do not believe it; I believe the thing can be done, and done easily. Then, other sources of revenue could be discovered. If necessary we could readjust the tariff. There are articles in the tariff on which duties could be imposed, if it were necessary to subject the country to that deprivation. Then, it must always be borne in mind that there would be an enormous saving to the country in the cost of goods imported, and in enhanced prices received for goods exported, besides prospective gains resulting from large operations in trade.

The next objection is that the Yankees would make our tariff. Well, that would be rather humiliating. But they certainly would not make it under unrestricted reciprocity the only basis on which we propose to secure this arrangement. It gives us perfect control of our tariff, and the only concession we would make to the Americans would be the admission of their goods free of duty. That dismisses the charge, so far as the scheme before the House is concerned. But even under commercial union, the Americans would not necessarily have control of our tariff. In the arrangement of that treaty, there would be two parties to be consulted, and each party would possess exactly as much power as the other. One party will be Canada, the other the United States. The smallest iota of difference between the two powers with regard to that treaty will prevent the consummation of it. We must consent to every feature of that tariff. We must have granted to us such terms as we would require with regard to any future changes in that tariff. We would be one of the contracting parties with the same power and weight as the other; and unless that power be conceded, it is not necessary to make a treaty. It is preposterous to say that we will delegate to the United States the power to make our tariff under such an arrangement. In our own hands will be the regulation of every detail of the treaty and of every detail regarding the mode in which changes shall be at any subsequent time brought about.

The next objection is that it will ruin our manufactures. I might say with justice and truth that our manufactures are ruining us. I might say that they are bleeding our producing classes in this country. I might say that they are a great octopus which is sucking the life blood out of all except the small favored ring, and I do not know that I would sympathise very much with these men if they were punished. I do not believe, however, that it would hurt them; and if it would, I do not know that I would sacrifice the interests of the farmer, the lumberman, the fishermen, the miner or the laborer even to save the manufacturer. I would proceed upon the sound old adage, of the greatest good to the greatest number, and if the policy was to benefit a thousand men and only injure ten, I would not feel bound to do any more for the ten than extend them my sympathy. But I do not believe it would injure the manufacturers. I find a remarkable tendency in the United States to expand in manufactures in the newer districts. I find by the census returns from 1871 to 1881, that the increase in manufactures in the Dominion was 40 per cent., and that in Ontario the increase was 38 per cent. in those ten years. I find that in the older manufacturing States, the increase in manufactures, in the ten years from 1870 to 1880, has been as follows:—

Massachusetts.....	14	per cent.
New York.....	37	do
Connecticut.....	15	do
New Jersey.....	50	do
Pennsylvania.....	5	do
Michigan.....	59	do
Illinois.....	101	do
Wisconsin.....	67	do
Minnesota.....	228	do
Iowa.....	52	do
California.....	74	do

In every one of the newer States the proportion of increase has been vastly greater than in the old manufacturing States. The figures showing increase for a decade are as follows:—

1871 to 1881.
Canada.....	$38,000,000	40 per cent.
Ontario.....	43,283,000	38
1870 to 1880.
Massachusetts.....	77,223,000	14
New York.....	295,502,000	37
Connecticut.....	24,632,000	15
New Jersey.....	85,143,000	5
Pennsylvania.....	32,934,000	5
Ohio.....	78,585,000	30
Indiana.....	39,389,000	36
Michigan.....	56,000,000	59
Illinois.....	208,224,000	101
Minnesota.....	52,955,000	228
Iowa.....	24,511,000	52
California.....	49,624,000	74

Mr. CHARLTON.

In some of the principal cities of the west the increase in production of manufactures from 1870 to 1880 is as follows:—

Louisville.....	$ 35,000,000
Chicago.....	242,000,000
Milwaukee.....	43,000,000
St. Louis.....	114,000,000
San Francisco.....	78,000,000
Birmingham.....	50,000,000

I am not very much alarmed about the manufactures of this country. I do not take any stock in the doctrine of Canadian inferiority. I do not believe in it. I believe that with equal chances we can compete with the Americans. I believe that we have the energy, we have as cheap capital, and cheaper labor, and I see no reason under Heaven why, with the whole market of this continent open to our manufactures, we should not have an equal chance with the Americans. It is certain that there would be a great impetus in certain natural lines. For instance, the production of lumber could not fail to be greatly increased. In the production of planed lumber, the American tariff absolutely prevents our engaging, while if the duty were removed we would find millions of dollars invested in it in this country. In the production of doors and sashes, house trimmings, we are precluded by the American tariff. Yet this is a vast business which we would otherwise naturally, to a great extent, control. In the manufacture of furniture, wooden ware, leather, for which we have special advantages, we would inevitably vastly increase our business. We would increase the manufacture of iron and woollens, and there is one branch where the chances for expansion are limitless, that is the manufacture of paper from pulp. We have the facilities for this branch, in the possession of limitless quantities of the poplar and other woods required, and would naturally supply the continent with this article, the business in which would amount to millions of dollars a year. I have no fear as to the result of free trade on the manufacturing business in this country. Here and there perhaps a little exotic industry, pampered into existence by a high tariff, would be swept away, but as a whole our manufactures would vastly extend their business under the operation of free trade.

Now, some of our friends opposite—for it is not a party issue at present—propose an offset, and this proposition is at least an indication that there is a feeling of unrest in the country. It indicates that there is an acknowledgment of the desirability, if not the necessity of some change in the condition of Canada. That scheme proposed by them is Imperial Federation. I have no doubt that in some respects a closer union of the colonies with England would be advantageous to the colonies, based however upon one absolutely necessary concession upon the part of England, and that is the enactment of discriminatory duties in favor of the colonies. If England will give us the corn laws again; if she will place duties upon food and lumber, wool and raw materials imported from any country besides the colonies, and admit the productions of the colonies free, we would have advantages in the English market very great as compared with other countries, and it might be worthy of our consideration whether we would not go into such an arrangement. But have we any reason to suppose that she will? Have we not every reason to suppose that she will not? Have we not the express declaration of her leaders, not of one but of both parties, that England will never consider for a moment the propriety of levying duties upon the raw materials and the food of the people. She never will, and if she does not, then the scheme has no attraction for us. We would have our burdens increased by this arrangement, we would have an undue and undesirable interference with our autonomy, and it would not be desirable for us to have our affairs settled by the Parliament at Westminster in which we had a small representation of twenty or thirty members. We would never consent to such a thing.

We want no share in paying the expenses of England's foreign wars; we do not want to assist her in fighting the Afghans in Afghanistan, or the Arabs in the Upper Egypt, or the Zulus in South Africa. We do not want to bear a share of the expense of maintaining her army or navy. Such an arrangement would largely increase our burthens. We might be called upon, if England required it, to furnish a large quota of troops to help her, and we would prefer to run our own concerns, attend to our own business, and trade on equal and unrestricted terms with our neighbors to the south.

I am happy to say I am about through, and I feel as much relieved as my friend opposite. I have indulged perhaps in some criticism that may not be palatable to my hon. friends opposite, and if I have, I entreat them not to "bring in the Sepoy to shoot me in my tracks." I have spoken, as I believe, in the interests of the people of this country, and I believe I have advanced sentiments and opinions which will carry the vast majority of the people. If there is common sense, if there is a deep appreciation of what appertains to their best interests, this policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States must and will commend itself to the great majority of the people of Canada. Our friends on the other side may hoot, they may scout it, they may laugh it to scorn, but the logic of events will convince them that they have failed to interpret the signs of the times. If this arrangement is consummated, if these two great peoples are brought into more intimate commercial relations with each other, if the barriers that keep back the forces which have advanced the United States so greatly in their course are removed, and we are allowed to have the unimpeded play of those forces upon us, we will reach the position which we hope to see. Without the play of those forces upon us, without the intercourse with that people and the influence of the forces which have made the United States a people of sixty-two millions and the richest nation in the world, we will continue in the way we have been plodding on in a ratio of progress which is unsatisfactory and slow. The bearing of this question as between England and the United States, were this arrangement consummated, would be most salutary. The only cause of trouble that I can see at present existing between these two countries is likely to arise in Canada itself, and, with free trade relations with unimpeded commercial intercourse, with perfect amity which the removal of these causes of dissatisfaction and irritation would bring about, the relations between the United States and England would naturally become more amicable, and would therefore be more conducive to the prosperity and well being of both of these great branches of the Anglo Saxon race and of every other Anglo Saxon community on the face of the globe. Those two great countries produced last year 63 per cent. of all the iron that was produced in the world; 69 per cent. of all the steel that was produced in the world; they had one-half of all the exports and imports of the whole globe; they had 68 per cent. of the shipping, and 60 per cent. of the manufactures of the world. These two great powers, acting in concert, with amicable relations between them, are able to sway the destinies of the world. The idea of Anglo-Saxon unity is a magnificent dream, but I believe it is destined to become a mighty reality; and with the United States, with its vast capabilities, its vast power, and its enormous wealth, creating, as it is, a mighty navy, with England commanding the approach to the Mediterranean and to the Red Sea, and swaying one-fifth the population of the world, with an Empire in India, another Empire at the Antipodes, and a third founded in South Africa, I say that these two nations acting in concert would promote the best interests of civilisation and realise the highest hopes of humanity. And the most pregnant step towards that union would, in my opinion, be to bring about uninterrupted, unimpeded trade between the seven commonwealths of the Dominion of Canada and the forty-two commonwealths of the United States of America. We can promote that great end, and at the same time promote our own interests by bringing to bear the forces that will make this country populous and wealthy, with its mines developed, with its agricultural resources developed, with its commercial resources developed, with the prairies covered with prosperous towns and thriving villages, and brought under cultivation by millions of people who will then populate them. The coming of the time when these results will be fully consummated will be greatly accelerated by the adoption of this proposed measure which forms the cardinal plank in the policy of the Liberal party of this Dominion. Believing it to be my duty to further that result as much as I can, I beg to second the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford and to pledge for the promotion of it my support in this House and outside of it.

Mr. WHITE. (Renfrew). Mr. Speaker, rising, as I do, at this late hour of the night, to discuss the motion placed in your hands, it is not my intention to occupy the time of the House at any very great length. The able exposition which the hon. the Minister of Finance has given of the fiscal position of Canada to-day, and the brilliant speech delivered this afternoon by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries are, in my opinion, a sufficient defence of the Government's policy, and the whole case of the Conservative party might well be left to them; but, after listening to the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken on the other side of the House, I deem it my duty as a Canadian to raise my voice in opposition to the views which that hon. gentleman has put forth. In listening to the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), and to the manner in which he decried the position of Canada and lauded the position of the United States, I thought that the speech he delivered to-night would have been more appropriately delivered on the floor of Congress. It is a regrettable circumstance that a gentleman who is charged with the mandate of a constituency owing allegiance to the British Empire should have given expression to the sentiments to which that hon. gentleman has given expression to-night. It is not my intention to follow him through all the intricacies of figures and statistics with which he regaled the House, but I shall endeavor, as concisely as I can, to present my views as to the position of Canada to-day and the possibilities of obtaining a larger measure of trade relations with the people of the United States, and what would be the position of Canada or the advantages to be gained by such a larger measure of trade. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in the speech he delivered here the other night, followed the course which he has adopted from 1879 to the present time. He began by decrying this country. He continued, as he has done on former occasions, by declaring that the people, by supporting the policy of the present Administration, had given evidence of their folly and stupidity. I have listened to that statement every Session since the time when the people in their might hurled the hon. gentleman and the Government of which he was a member from the position which they occupied from 1873 to 1878. Now, the hon. gentleman declares that the country is in such a position that it requires some drastic measure to remove the evils under which it is laboring, and in support of that he said that we were suffering from an exodus, that we were suffering from a depreciation in the value of our farming lands, and that we were suffering in various other ways of which he spoke. I do not propose to deal to-night with the question of the exodus, but I would call attention to this fact: We all remember with what volubility the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) Session after Session laid before Parliament what he was pleased to call the school statistics of the Province of Ontario. And that he deduced from these school statistics the fact that we were losing instead of gaining in our populations. I am glad to see that the hon. member has on this occasion, at all events, abandoned the arguments which he used in that respect, and the statistics which he has been using during several Sessions of Parliament heretofore. But he has declared upon the authority of the statistician of the Province of Ontario that farm lands in that Province have been declining in value, and that he declares to be an evidence of the decadence of the wealth of this country. Sir, I do not propose to call in question the honesty of the compiler of the statistics of the Province of Ontario, but I think that any body who looks at the report that gentleman has made, and which I hold in my hand, must come to the conclusion that the information upon which these statistics are based, cannot be possibly correct. Let us see what he says:

"A comparison of the totals for the last six years indicate a very variable course throughout in the value of farm lands. In 1883 the high figure of $654,793,025 was reached, but in the next year it tumbled to $625,478,708; again in 1886 the $650,003,000 was nearly attained, only to drop back to $636,983,775 in 1887."

I ask any member in this House from the Province of Ontario whether he believes that from 1883 to 1886 there has been these variations that are recorded in this report of Mr. Blue, the statistician of the Province of Ontario, in the value of farm land in that Province. I believe there is no one within the sound of my voice who knows anything about the circumstances of the Province of Ontario, who will disagree with me in the statement which I make, that there cannot have been any such a variation as that which this gentleman declares to have occurred in the value of farm land in that Province. But, Sir, suppose it were a fact; and suppose that the statements made by this gentleman were true, and suppose the value of farm lands was declining in the Province of Ontario, as the hon. gentleman opposite declares, what do we find to be the case in the United States, that country to which these hon. gentlemen look for a remedy for the evils under which they declare Canada to be laboring at the present time? Sir, if you take the statistics furnished by the census returns of 1870 and 1880, you will find that the improved farm lands, including buildings, in the whole United States, in 1870, were valued at $39.32 per acre; in 1880 they were valued at $35.42, or a diminution of about $4 an acre throughout the whole United States between these two years. If you come to the great state of New York, which lies alongside of the Province of Ontario, you will find that that diminution was from $65.18, on the average, in 1870, to $59.61 in 1880. So you will find in regard to many of the States of the Union, that there was a diminution in values between the returns as furnished by the census of 1870 and that of 1880; there was a diminution in the value of improved farm lands in the United States greater than any that has been exhibited in the Province of Ontario. And let me say to my hon. friend that in making the calculation and the comparison which I have made, I have taken into consideration the fact that in 1870 gold was at a premium of 25 03, and I have deducted from the valuations of 1870 the excess that was shown by the premium upon gold in that year as compared with 1880. In addition to the statement which my hon. friend made in regard to the diminution of the value of farm lands in the Province of Ontario, he also put before the House the statement—and it is a true statement, I do not pretend to deny it—that there was a diminution in the trade returns of Canada from 1873 to 1888. As I find by the Hansard report, he took the whole volume of the trade of 1873 at $217,000,000; but in making his comparison with the trade in 1888, he spoke only of the importations that were entered for consumption in the latter year; so that in that respect, at all events, the comparison which the hon. gentleman made was not perfectly correct. But there is no doubt that the volume of trade in 1873 amounted altogether to $217,801,000, whilst in 1888 it had fallen to $201,017,000. But it seems to me somewhat singular that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in making these comparisons respecting the diminution in the volume of trade in Canada, invariably selects the year 1873 instead of the year 1878. What do we find to be the condition of things in 1878? We find that whilst those hon. gentlemen came into office with a volume of trade of 217 millions, when they left office in 1879 the volume of trade had fallen to 153 millions. I do not pretend to say that that was due altogether to the maladministration of the then Government, but I do say that the hon. gentleman, in making his comparisons to show the decadence of Canada, ought to take into consideration the circumstances that existed during that time, particularly as that hon. gentleman made his comparisons for the purpose of denouncing the Conservative party and the Government that has held office since 1879. I say, then, that in all justice to the Conservative party and to the Government whose maladministration he denounces, he ought to make his comparisons, not between 1873 or 1874, when the present leader of the Government held office, but he ought to make his comparison between 1878, the last year of the administration of his Government, and the present time. Now, let me point out this important fact in connection with the volume of trade between the years 1873 and 1888. The whole of the imports and the exports of both these years I have included in the comparison which I have made. If you will look at the returns you will find that in 1873 the imports and exports of coin and bullion amount to $6,854,000 as against $2,193,000 in 1888, and if you will eliminate these figures from the returns of this year—which should not properly enter into these returns, because they do not form any part of the volume of exports and imports—if you eliminate these sums from the consideration of the volume of trade in these two years, you will find that the diminution has not been so great as these hon. gentlemen pretend it has been. But, Sir, we are told to look to the United States, and if you take the trade returns of that country you will find that from 1881 down to 1887 almost the same course of events has occurred that have occurred in the Dominion of Canada. For instance, you will find that in 1880 the volume of trade in the United States amounted to 1,503 millions, in 1881 it amounted to 1,545 millions. In 1882 it fell to 1,475 millions; in 1883 it raised again to 1,547 millions; in 1884 it fell to 1,408 millions; in 1885 to 1,319 millions, and in 1886 to 1,314 millions; or a diminution in the volume of trade between 1885 and 1883 of about 200 million dollars, showing that not alone in Canada has there been a diminution of trade during those years. Not only is that the case, but if you go back to the returns of the United States—that country to which we are told to look as a remedy for all the evils under which we are suffering—you will find the volume of trade in that country in 1826 amounted to $335,390,546, in 1843, just seven years later, the whole volume of trade, exports and imports, amounted to $79,727,593, or a diminution during those six years of $255,000,000. But did that circumstance induce the people of the United States to decry their country, did it make the people of the United States despair for their future? Not by any means. But the amount of the foreign trade of a country, of its exports and imports, is not always, if we are to believe the statement of the lieutenant of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the gentleman who has just spoken and who has seconded the resolution—if we are to believe the statement of that hon. gentleman, the amount of foreign trade is not always the measure of a country's prosperity. Let me say that the first ideas in favor of the principle of protection I imbibed were imbibed to a considerable extent from a speech made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) on the floor of Parliament in 1876. That hon. gentleman then depicted the advantage to be obtained from a protective policy, and not only did he do that, but he made this statement:

"We have at our own doors all the illustrations and experience of protection and its benefits required for our government and guidance. The United States have adopted a protective policy under which their manufactures have been fostered and promoted, until in 1870 their products reached the sum of $4,253,000,000, giving employment to 2,000,000 operatives and distributing over $775,500,000 in wages."

But this next paragraph is that to which I desire, more particularly, to draw the attention of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) continued:

"It has been charged that protection has prevented the extension of foreign commerce in that country. That may be true; but it is estimated that the domestic commerce of the United States reached the enormous proportions of 200,000,000 tons, valued at $10,000,000,000. What is the foreign commerce of that country compared with the vast domestic trade that goes on increasing without the fluctuations or risk of foreign trade."

I commend to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) the statement made by the hon. gentleman who has seconded his resolution, and I ask him to consider whether the vast impetus given to interprovincial trade by the adoption of the National Policy has not benefited the country to a very considerable extent, even though at the expense of our foreign commerce. I wish to draw attention to the further fact, that whilst the volume of trade in 1873, imports and exports, amounted to a considerable sum greater than in 1888, yet the excess of imports over exports in 1873 was $33,221,000, whilst in 1888 it only amounted to $20,691,000. So there was a diminution in the excess of our imports over our exports as between those two years of about $18,000,000, which was more than the difference of the volume of trade, including exports and imports during those two years. I desire to say a word or two as to what the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said in reference to the effect of the National Policy upon the farmers. He declared that the effect of the National Policy was to make this the dearest country for the farmers to purchase in and the cheapest in which to sell their farm produce. I have here the statement which that hon. gentleman made in 1876, and unless he has greatly changed his views since that time, I think it will be shown that the position he takes now—and I do not know that he has ever recanted the position he took in 1876—is not at all in consonance with the position he took in that year when he was advocating before Parliament a policy of protection. He said:

"I believe the interests of the nation at large will be promoted by judicious protection. I believe that the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be promoted by protection, and that the manufacturer, being brought to the door of the farmer, would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable if the market were three thousand miles away. With a home market of this kind established to manufacturers by protection, the agriculturist can benefit his soil by producing a rotation of crops. The purchasing power of money is not a correct measure of the purchasing power of labor. A farmer raises a bushel of corn which he sells for fifty cents in a foreign market, and with the proceeds he can buy three yards of cotton; but, supposing the manufactures are brought to his door, and the better price which it creates increases the price to 60 cents or 70 cents per bushel, and although import duties are levied on cottons from Manchester so as to add largely to its price, still he may be enabled to buy four yards of cotton with his bushel of corn instead of the three yards it was able to purchase before, as the purchasing power of his labor is increased."

So I place Mr. Charlton of 1876 against Mr. Charlton of 1878 in regard to the views which he then and now expressed as to the effect of a protective policy upon the interests of the farmers. But in addition to that, I think I am able to show that a protective policy has been beneficial to the people of Canada in this respect. I find upon examining the Trade and Navigation Returns that in 1878, before there was an impost duty upon agricultural products coming into Canada, we imported for home consumption $13,575,825 in value of agricultural products, that in 1888 we imported for home consumption $1,909,000 worth, or a reduction of nearly $12,000,000 during those years. I am quite free to admit that the Trade and Navigation Returns of 1878, compiled as they were without any regard to duty, would leave the impression that all the agricultural products imported during that year were entered for home consumption, while many of them were exported. In view of that fact, I take the whole exportation for 1888, including the whole quantity entered for home consumption and what was brought in for export, and the total importations of agricultural products amounted in 1878 to $13,575,825, while in 1888 it amounted to $7,392,363. In addition to that I am able to quote from the Globe a comparison of prices the day before yesterday of certain agricultural products in Toronto and Buffalo. I find in Toronto red wheat was $1.09; Buffalo, $1.04; oats, Toronto, 36c. to 37c.; Buffalo, 31c.; rye, Toronto, 60c.; Buffalo, 54c. to 55c. Yet we are told that the obliteration of the lines between Canada and the United States would be a benefit to Canada. It becomes us in dealing with the question to consider not only what benefits would accrue to the people of Canada, but as to whether we in Canada can without sacrificing our position as a colony—if you choose to call us such—without sacrificing our future as owing allegiance to the Crown of Great Britain, whether we can secure from the people of the United States that which those gentlemen declare to be the remedy for all those evils under which we labor. It has been attempted to be proven by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, that there are no difficulties in the way of our securing reciprocity with the United States, or indeed commercial union, if such be the position which they take up, without sacrificing our independence in the slightest way. Before I come to this point, however, let me consider the question as to whether we would be materially benefited by being a part of the United States, which we practically would be if this policy of hon. gentlemen opposite were adopted. It has been said by the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and he presented a long array of figures to the House to prove the position he took, that we, in Canada, and especially in the Province of Ontario, to which I think he more especially referred, were in a much worse condition as regards our taxation than the people of the United States. I will give that gentleman an extract from the Globe newspaper of the 10th November, 1888, taken from an article in which I am bound to say the Globe endeavors to prove that the position of the people of Ontario was worse than that of the people of the United States, yet the facts which they were obliged to present for the consideration of the people are such as will lead to an entirely different conclusion. In speaking with regard to the taxation of the United States as compared with Canada it has been the fashion to compare only the federal debt and federal taxation in the two countries, but in this article to which I refer not only the federal taxation but also the municipal and state taxation is taken into account. Here let me say that my hon. friend from South Oxford takes the ground that the estimates which the hon. the Minister of Agriculture made in regard to our population of the present time are mere guess estimates. What else could they be? How could the Minister of Agriculture estimate the population upon any basis other than that of the previous census. The estimate of the population has been made on the basis of last census and on the accretion to population that took place between the census of 1871 and the census of 1881, and yet my hon. friend opposite takes the ground that that basis of calculation is entirely inaccurate and that no credence should be given to it. The Globe in this article to which I have referred gives the population of Canada at 4,800,000, and the population of the States of 60,000,000, and there is a foot note to that statement as follows: "The present population is slightly underestimated in both cases," that is both in the case of Canada and the United States. Taking this as a basis of calculation, they bring about the following result:—The taxation per head in Ontario is: federal, $5.98 per head; municipal and state taxation per head, $4.70; total, $10.68. In the State of Ohio the taxation, per head, is: federal, $5.60; municipal and state taxation, per head, $8; total, $13.60. In Michigan the taxation per head is: federal, $5.60; municipal and state taxation, per head, $5.27; total, $10.87. The Globe goes further and makes a comparison between the taxation in Ontario at $10.68 per head, and in the whole of the United States at $11.62 per head, thus showing that the taxation per head in the United States, including federal, state and municipal, amounts to nearly $1 per head more than it does in the Province of Ontario, notwithstanding that hon. gentlemen opposite have been telling us that we were loaded to the ground with taxation in this country. Our hon. friends on the other side, both the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) have told us that if the people of Canada have pronounced in favor of the policy that the present Administration have faithfully and honestly carried out from 1879—in accordance with their previous promises—up to the present time, that it is not because of the force of that policy, but because of the Gerrymander Act and because of the revising barristers. I do not propose to deal with those questions at any considerable length. We have heard from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House every possible excuse for the position in which they are placed, except the real and true one. We have heard it explained that they were in continued opposition because of the Gerrymander Act in the Province of Ontario, but I should like to know by what means the present Administration could have given to the Province of Ontario the four additional members which they were entitled to by the Act of Confederation without having to some extent as those gentlemen declare gerrymandered the constituencies. I say, Sir, that the basis on which the present Administration readjusted the representation of the Province of Ontario was a perfectly correct basis, and that they only readjusted it on the basis of population.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Do not try to defend that act?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). My hon. friend dissents from that, but notwithstanding the fact that he thought the Gerrymander Act was going to relegate him to private life, so popular was he with the people of his constituency that we find him here with his genial countenance ready to attack the Government on every occasion. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the revising barristers were instrumental, to a very considerable extent, in bringing about the result of the election in 1887. I do not see my friend the member for North York (Mr. Mulock) in his seat at the present moment; but if he were I would recall to his mind certain statements he made in reference to Judge Morgan in the county which he represents, and in which that hon. gentleman declares that although Judge Morgan had been attacked by the press of the Liberal party throughout the Province of Ontario, the course pursued by him in the revising of those lists was one of utmost impartiality and was to his entire satisfaction. Sir, not only is the taxation in the United States greater than it is in the Province of Ontario, but we have the additional fact that in many parts of the United States the condition of the farming population is very much worse than it is in the Province of Ontario. I take from the Globe newspaper of the 15th of December, 1888, the following statement:—

“A rebellion against mortgages has achieved success in western Kansas, to the extent that a legislature has been elected purposely to deal with the eastern Shylocks. During the last few years a number of companies dealing with western farm mortgages have been launched. Most of them do respectable business, but some of them are the veriest sharks. All of them profess to lend only to one-third of the value, yet there have been thousands of foreclosures after the mortgages had endured two or three years and the farms have been found insufficient to satisfy the mortgages. Part of this failure is due to the crops having been destroyed by drouth for three years in succession, and part to inequitable laws. The new legislature is pledged to pass an Act allowing a mortgagor three years in which to redeem property that has been foreclosed upon. This, however, will not effect a revolution in the climate. The long and the short of it is that the arid belt is played out as a place for settlement.”

That is what they say in regard to the State of Kansas, a State which I have heard lauded on the floor of this House by leading members of the Opposition time and time again. I could give other statistics to show the condition of the farmers of the United States, which I think would inevitably lead to the conclusion that the people of Canada, especially in the Province of Ontario, are not in the dire straits that these gentlemen would lead us to suppose. But, Sir, suppose it were necessary for the people of Canada to look for some solution of the difficulties under which they are laboring. Could they find that solution, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and every calm and thinking man in this House, by making overtures to the people of the United States? Let us consider for a moment the course of events connected with past negotiations between Canada and the United States regarding trade relations. We had the Treaty of 1854, under which it is alleged both Canada and the United States prospered to a very considerable extent. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) stated that that treaty was not favorable to the people of the United States, that it was an unfair treaty, because free goods were imported from Canada into the United States to double the value of goods imported into Canada from the United States during the existence of that treaty. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman surely forgot that the population of the United States was ten times greater than the population of Canada, and it was only natural that there should be a larger importation of goods from Canada into the United States than from the United States into Canada; so that the only illustration the hon. gentleman gave of the alleged unfairness of that treaty does not show unfairness at all. Well, the time came when that treaty expired by limitation of time. The people of Canada did not give the United States any intimation that they wished it to be abrogated. That intimation came from the United States, and not only that, but all the efforts made by Canada—efforts which were denounced by leaders of the Reform party, and notably by the Globe newspaper, at that time—were wholly unsuccessful in securing any renewal of reciprocal relations with the United States. Moreover, an American, holding an official position in Montreal at that time, actually reported to his superiors in the United States, that, by withholding from the people of Canada a renewal of that treaty, they would force us into annexation with the United States. Sir, the same condition of things exists to-day, but I am sorry to say that the opinion which prevails in the United States that by withholding from us equitable and fair trade relations with that country will force us into annexation, is stimulated by the expressions of members of Parliament on the floor of Parliament and elsewhere. Sir, I think I have the best evidence of the fact that the people of the United States are not prepared to give us any measure of reciprocity unless it is conditioned upon our becoming politically united with that country. I hold in my hand a report of an interview which is alleged to have taken place between the Washington correspondent of the New York Sun and Senator John Sherman, and which is reproduced in the Toronto Globe of 3rd December, 1888. Mr. Sherman is reported as follows:—

“I studied the proposal for commercial reciprocity only to be convinced that it was illusory and impracticable. A Reciprocity Treaty with Canada would be acceptable to the Dominion, but would never be tolerated by our people. The bargain would be too one sided. We should offer them a free market of 80,000,000 people for the raw material in exchange for a free market of 5,000,000 for our manufactures. That is what our people look at. It is of no use to discuss the theoretical advantages of reciprocity. The American people won't have it, and the question may as well be dismissed at once. Political union is another thing. The advantages it offers are more equal. Canada would gain all the advantages reciprocity offers her, would retain all the political freedom she now has, and would reach the additional advantage of almost unlimited American capital to develop her material resources, build up manufactures and exploit her industrial and commercial possibilities generally. This would attract immigration which is now drawn into Canada by constant effort on the part of the Government, only to drift over the frontier into the United States."

I presume the hon. gentleman took his inspiration from the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) on the floor of Parliament in regard to that matter.—

"American capital and immigrant labor, aided by free connection with American railroads, would develop the country at an incredible rate. They understand this perfectly in Canada." The advantages of political consolidation with Canada to the United States are no less palpable and obvious. Unless immediate, they will be even greater in the long run. At the outset we shall add $300,000,000 to our present debt of 1,400 millions—a mere bagatelle,——"

I recommend that to the consideration of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who considered the present debt of $236,000,000 as bearing upon the people of Canada with such an enormous pressure that they were unable to withstand it:

"—in return for which we shall not only add five millions to our taxable population, but acquire valuable and extensive public works, whose title is now in the Dominion Government, railroads, canals, public buildings, fortifications, &c. But this present gain is not worth considering in comparison with the future advantages to accrue to the American Republic from the vast extension of her territory. I doubt if we foresee these any more adequately now than the Americans of Jefferson's time saw the potential value of the Louisiana purchase. The material wealth, undeveloped resources and industrial possibilities of the great British North-West are, even yet, only dimly understood."

Here is another paragraph I would like to commend to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright):

"The most extravagant estimate of its productive capacity and power to support a thriving population is probably below the reality."

I think I heard my hon. friend the other night ridiculing the estimate which had been made by the ex-Finance Minister (Sir Charles Tupper) in regard to the productiveness of that country.—

"The most extravagant estimate of its productive capacity and power to support a thriving population is probably below the reality, that union with the American republic, free connection with the American railroads and opening to American immigration and enterprise would reveal and which will be revealed in no other way."

Mr. Sherman says that the development of our country will be furthered in no other way than by political union with the United States, and I am quite sure he was led into that belief by the statements which have been made by leading members of this House upon the floor of Parliament and outside in discussing political affairs. There is another view to be taken of this question as regards the farmers. We are told that reciprocity with the United States would be of the greatest possible benefit to the farmers of Canada. Well, when we come to consider that the farmers of Canada would be brought into competition with a people who export agricultural products in vast quantities, the great advantage to our farmers will not be so manifest. I find, on examining the Trade and Navigation Returns of the United States, that the Americans exported agricultural products to the extent of $500,840,000, or 73·23 per cent. of the whole quantity of their exports. Now, I presume it is unfair that we should include in that calculation all the exports of agricultural products from the United States, such as cotton and tobacco, and perhaps we should, for the purposes of comparison, limit ourselves to the exports of agricultural products from that country, such as are produced in Canada. But we find that the Americans exported $283,000,000 worth of agricultural products similar to those produced in Canada, so that our farmers would be brought into competition, if we were a part of the United States, if we had free admission into their markets and they into ours, with a people who exported $283,000,000 worth of agricultural products, or about 40 per cent. of the whole export from the United States to the whole world. A good many things were said by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to which I would like to draw the attention of the House, but the time at my disposal will hardly allow me to enter so fully into these matters as I should like. I was going on to say that the people of the United States in 1834 abrogated the treaty which had existed from 1834 down to that time, and that all the efforts made by Canada to renew that treaty were wholly unavailing. We found however it was possible to live on this American continent without becoming part and parcel of the United States, and I venture to say that from 1866 down to 1873 the prosperity of Canada was as great as at any other period of its history. In 1874, after the Mackenzie Administration had obtained power, they deemed it proper in the interests of Canada to secure a renewal of reciprocity with the people of the United States, and the Hon. George Brown was sent to Washington to negotiate a treaty. That treaty was promptly rejected by the Senate of the United States. It has been alleged by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that in the treaty negotiated by the Hon. George Brown, in 1874, it was proposed to admit goods from the United States free of duty into Canada, which would be taxed if coming from Great Britain. On that point I wish to draw attention to Mr. Brown's own statement, made on the floor of the Senate, and subsequent to the negotiation of the treaty. He said:

"The first of these objections is that the treaty discriminated against Great Britain in favor of the United States. Nothing could be more unfounded than this. It was perfectly understood from the opening of the negotiations that no article could be free from duty in regard to the United States that was not also free with regard to Great Britain, and nothing else was ever contemplated for a moment."

There was nothing contemplated in that treaty with regard to admitting products from the United States into Canada free, which were not admitted free from the mother country. That treaty having been rejected by the Senate of the United States, matters went on until the celebrated letter was written, to which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) referred to-night. He told us there never was any more complete, any more frank offer to open enlarged trade negotiations with the United States than that which was made in the letter addressed to Sir Charles Tupper by Mr. Secretary Bayard. Well, what was the result? It was true the letter indicated a desire on the part of Mr. Bayard for enlarged trade relations, but when the Commission met in Washington, and when an offer was made by the British Plenipotentiaries to start upon the basis of enlarged trade relations, that offer was promptly rejected by Mr. Bayard. Not only was that offer rejected, but when the treaty which the American Government of the day, declared to be a fair treaty, was submitted to the Senate of the United States, it also was promptly rejected, and we were told in effect that no treaty negotiated between England and the United States, which had for its purpose the settlement of any dispute between the United States and Canada, would be accepted by the Senate of the United States. Did the President of the United States hold to the position which he had taken with regard to that treaty. On the contrary, he sent to Congress a Message in which, after having declared his view that the Treaty with England, which had for its object the settlement of the disputes which existed between this country and the United States, was a fair treaty, yet, because the Senate of the United States had rejected it, he proposed to impose additional restrictions on the trade between Canada and the United States. I pointed out the opinion which was held by Senator Sherman and the opinions which were expressed as to the negotiation of a reciprocity treaty between the United States and Canada, but I find the opinion of a much more prominent gentleman than Senator Sherman, Mr. Blaine, the present Secretary of State in the United States, and he says :

"I have here an official copy of the Mills Tariff Bill as it passed the Democratic House, and as it lies on the tables of the Republican Senate. If I were to give it a name locally befitting its character, I should say it was 'a Bill for the destruction of the material interests of Maine.' It is a Bill to throw open our American market to our Canadian neighbors without any consideration or recompense or exchange, but absolutely free of all charge. (A voice, 'they shan't have them.') It invites the Canadians to bring in, without duty, every form of timber, hewn and sawed and squared and sided, and every other form which wood is manufactured at the saw mill. Lest one might escape they put in a general clause which covers every possible article. The Bill then provides for admitting free of duty all forms of farm products, grains and vegetables and fruits and flowers, and for admitting all their wool, every form of stone that can be quarried, their meat of all kinds, their milk and their eggs, their poultry, their game. In fact the Democratic House says to our Canadian neighbors: 'If you want our American markets without cost and without price, you may have them, for everything that comes from your forest, from your farm, from your orchards, from your gardens, from your dairies and your flocks. All your meats and your poultry and your game, the stones from your quarries and the bricks from your yard. If you have grown weary waiting and wishing for the markets of the United States, I, Grover Cleveland, President, therefore propose to relieve your fatigue, and to ask you to walk in and sit down and make you self at home in our highways and our byways, and especially in our market place.' My friends, this giving away of our markets strikes me all the more remarkable because the very men who passed this Tariff Bill in the House have been urging us for years to renew the reciprocity treaty with Canada. For the last twenty-two years since it expired many efforts have been made in Congress to reopen the negotiation for a reciprocity treaty, and having got tired, I suppose the Democratic party now proposes to establish a reciprocity treaty all on one side, and without asking the Government of the Dominion to give way to a single point, without asking them to concede any item or line or word in their tariff. This Bill gives away almost every material interest in Maine. Why, gentlemen, viewing that merely as a trade, as a swap, I should be utterly ashamed of any decent horse jockey in Maine that could not do better. There is not a horse jockey in Maine who would not lose his standing with his fellows if he traded his horses on as poor a basis as the Democratic administration proposes to trade with Canada."

And further on he says :

"The value of a day's work, the protection of our industries, the preservation of American rights, are all larger questions than party organisation or party triumph. You pay your taxes in Maine; you pay your taxes in the United States; you yield obedience; you owe allegiance; you observe the laws, you live under the flag. You stand ready to fight for the national union, as you have already fought. Beyond the frontier, across that river, our neighbors choose another government, another allegiance. They are subjects of Queen Victoria, they are loyal to Her Majesty. They live under a foreign flag. They do exactly as they have a right to do. I neither dispute their right nor envy their situation. It is their right to choose for themselves, as it is our right to choose for ourselves. But I am opposed, teetotally opposed, to giving the Canadians the sentimental satisfaction of waving the British flag, paying British taxes and the actual cash remuneration of American markets. (Great applause) They cannot have both at the same time. If they come with us they can have what we have, but it is an absolute wrong against the rights of American citizens that millions of men who owe the United States no allegiance, and who have no part nor lot with us, who are not of us, but choose to be foreign to us; it is an absolute wrong for a Democratic congress to say that they shall have exactly the same share in our markets and the same privileges of trade under our flag that we have."

That is the expression of opinion of a gentleman who holds now the position of Secretary of State, the first position in the Cabinet at Washington. I say it is as impossible for us, if we continue to hold our allegiance to the Crown of Great Britain, as I hope we shall, to induce the American people to remove the barriers which had been set up, not at our instance but at theirs, as to accomplish anything which is utterly impossible of accomplishment. The position we hold here in Canada is one of which we ought to be proud. We are told by the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that the people of Canada are equal to the people of any other nation in the world. We are told that we have unlimited resources in this country, which only require development to make us a great country. But what is the price which they propose that we shall pay for the development of our natural resources? It is nothing less than the giving away of our country to a foreign nation. That is their position. I think it is an untenable position. I, as a native Canadian, as a man born in Canada and having lived all my life in this country, am not prepared to subscribe to such a doctrine. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) stated that, when the American colonies revolted, the people of Canada chose to continue their allegiance to the British Crown. Not only was that the case, but there were in those thirteen colonies a considerable number of people who held their allegiance to the British Crown so dear that they left their homes and came to this country and settled in what was then a wilderness. I believe that the sentiment which prevailed with those people who left the thirteen American colonies when they revolted from the British Crown still prevails in the minds of a large majority of the people of Canada. I believe that the people of Canada are able to work out their own destiny on this American continent. I believe they will be able eventually to develop their own resources, and to become a power on this continent; and, for my part, I hope the time will never arrive when we will be so abject as to sue at the feet of the people of the United States not only for reciprocal trade relations with them, but for what that involves in the minds of the leading statesmen of the United States, political union with that country. I admire the people of the United States, I believe they are a great people, they are Anglo-Saxons, they spring from the same race as ourselves, and while I quite admit the greatness of their country and the magnitude of their trade, I believe, Sir, that we are able, on this North American continent, to maintain our autonomy, and I, for one, am opposed to the amendment of the hon. gentleman.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 8th March, 1889.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not see the Finance Minister in his place, but before the Orders are called I would like to suggest that it would be desirable to have a meeting of the Public Accounts Committee called. The chairman is not here.

Mr. BOWELL. The instructions left to the chairman were to call a meeting of the Committee as soon as the papers which had been moved for were ready.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There may be other things besides the papers.

Mr. BOWELL. Well, I will see that it is called for Tuesday.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The room will be occupied on Tuesday by the Railway Committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, say Wednesday, then.

Mr. BOWELL. Very well.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) stated yesterday that he had called for the original papers. I wish to read to the House the motion which he himself placed before the committee :

"That there be laid before Public Accounts Committee at its next meeting, all accounts and vouchers for militia clothing supplied during the fiscal year : also, all contracts under which such clothing has been supplied ; also, all invitations for tenders to supply all or any of such clothing, and whether by advertisement, notice, letter, telegram, cablegram, or otherwise, and of all replies thereto ; also a classified statement (having regard to the respective kinds of clothing supplied) of all expenditure for militia clothing during such year ; and that Lieut.-Cols. Powell, Panet and Macpherson be requested to attend this Committee at its next meeting."

I read the motion to show that the demand made was not for the originals, and in any case I was not going to supply the originals. They will be brought before the committee when the proper officer in charge of them can take charge of them there. This order was placed in the hands of the officers of the department, and they immediately went to work to have the papers copied, and I hope they will be completed by to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will remember that the hon. member for North York, in the remarks he made on his motion, said that he would like to have the original papers, and also to have the officers of the department before the committee to be examined with regard to them.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I did not so understand. The hon. gentleman stated that he was anxious to have the officers named in this motion before the committee to be examined ; but he never, to my knowledge, mentioned anything about originals, because, if he had done so, I would have told him just what I have said to-day. The motion does not refer to any originals, and the ordinary practice is not to send originals to the committee unless the proper officer in charge of them is to be examined.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I suppose, now that the hon. gentleman knows what the desire of the hon. member for North York is, he will have the originals.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, I will have the originals, but I was not going to send them up.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think the hon. Minister of Militia has made much of a point, further than to prove what a slow institution his department is. He said he would have obeyed the order of the committee, if he had to supply copies. If so, he has had ten days in which to comply with that order, and, so far as I know, up to this moment it has not been in the slightest degree complied with. He may have put some clerks at work in his office, but we will see, when these papers are produced, whether the explanation he offers is a sufficient explanation for his not having been able to get these papers copied by the ninth day after they were ordered, or whether this is a sham excuse like many other excuses of the hon. gentleman. The First Minister shakes his head, but that does not change my opinion. I have seen too much of the tactics of the Minister of Militia not to know how ready he is to give excuses which are not justified by the circumstances of the case. However, I reserve any further remarks until we see whether the papers to be produced are sufficient to justify him in saying that he could not, with all the force at his command, have got them ready in less time than nine days.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think the hon. gentleman has no right to speak here of any sham excuses. There is no reason why I should sham, and the bullying of the hon. gentleman, which is almost continuous, is not called for, as I try to be civil to him as well as I can, and much more than I ought to be. I told the hon. gentleman exactly what the facts were. I placed the order of the committee before the officers of my department, and upon that order the necessary papers were being prepared, and they will be ready by to-morrow. When the hon. gentleman gets the papers, he can make any further remarks he likes. I am perfectly ready to meet him and his remarks whenever he chooses to make any.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think —

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. I just want an opportunity of replying.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon. Minister of Militia must certainly be wrong with regard to the mode of procedure in the Public Accounts Committee. When an order is passed there for any documents, the originals are always produced. This is the seventh Session that I have been a member of that committee, and I do not remember any occasion on which the originals of any documents ordered were not produced. The reason for producing the originals is that it is much more easy to produce them than to make copies. It would be an endless task, if the officers of the various departments were called on to make copies of every document the committee asks for. The Public Accounts Committee ought to be called together more frequently. Here we are in the sixth week of the Session, and we have not yet had a meeting for the prosecution of business, and the orders which were passed at the last meeting for the production of papers have not yet been complied with. If the committee is to be of any use at all, it should not be put off from week to week until the close of the Session before it can examine accounts, when it will be too late to do anything.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. the Minister of Militia has said that he is having his accounts copied for the purpose of placing them before the committee. I have been a member of the committee for some years and have never yet known of copies of accounts being brought down. We have always had the originals. Last year an order of the committee was passed to bring down the accounts in reference to Rideau Hall, and the originals were brought down. I cannot understand why an exception should be made in this case. What we want is the original accounts, and those are what we ordered.

Mr. MULOCK. The fact is that the Department of Militia has broken down. When the Minister of Militia asks this House to accept his explanations, let me remind him of our last experience with him. He said, a few evenings ago, when asked to explain certain expenditures, that the vouchers would be found with the Auditor General, but, at the very first meeting of the Public Accounts Committee, he had to admit that there was no foundation whatever for that statement. We always find that it is his wicked partner who is at fault. He always lays the blame on his clerk.

Mr. SPEAKER. It will be apparent to the House that it is very inconvenient to break the Rules in this way, and I shall insist on the Rule being followed in future that no debate can take place at this stage of the proceedings.

PRIVILEGE.—CAUGHNAWAGA RESERVE.

Mr. DOYON. (Translation.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw the attention of the Government to a fact respecting the survey of the Indian reserve at Caughnawaga, in the County of Laprairie. The survey has been executed by Mr. McLea Walbank. Last year I had the honor of questioning the Government on several occasions in the matter of this survey. The survey was begun in 1882, and we are desirous—the Indians more particularly—of having the report of Mr. Walbank. When I made my inquiry of the Ministry the last time, I asked whether it was their intention to lay before this House Mr. Walbank's report when he had finished his survey. The Hon. the First Minister answered that there would be no objection to laying before Parliament the report of the surveyor's operations whenever this report was received. Lately, I had the honor of inquiring of the Ministry whether the survey had been completed, and whether the report of Mr. Walbank had been placed in their possession; after receiving an affirmative answer, I looked for and still look for the laying of this report before the House, in order that we can take communication of it. This action of mine is fair enough, it is now nearly seven years since this work was commenced; and the survey of some twelve or thirteen thousand acres of land has already cost the country the sum of $22,000. I hope that the hon. members of this House will understand our anxiety to procure this report. I wait for an answer from the Ministry in this matter.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) The Hon. the Minister of the Interior not being in his place, I am not able to state when the report will be laid before the House. I do not know whether the First Minister has promised that this report should be brought down.

Mr. DOYON. (Translation.) I have already stated that last year the First Minister had answered my inquiry by saying that the report would be laid before the House as soon as received.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) I shall draw the attention of the Minister of the Interior to what the hon. member has stated, in order that he may make himself acquainted with the case. I am persuaded that no difficulty will be raised.

RULES OF COURT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 55) respecting rules of court in relation of criminal matters.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It has been held incompetent for Local Legislatures to authorise the rule-making power in relation to proceedings which partake of a criminal nature, or even of a quasi-criminal nature, and, therefore, I have brought in this Bill to give the judges the requisite authority to make the necessary rules.

Bill reported and read the third time, and passed.

CORRUPT PRACTICES IN MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 71) respecting corrupt practices in municipal affairs. He said: This is a Bill from the Senate, and it proceeds on the principle that it is expedient to declare the law as to offences against municipalities, and to enact penalties in respect of such offences. The principal offences the Bill deals with are attempts to influence the votes of members of municipal councils, and the acceptance by members of such councils of a consideration for such votes, either in council or in committee.

Mr. EDGAR. Will the Minister of Justice tell us whether this is based upon similar penalties already existing in regard to the legislative bodies of the country, or whether it specially provides for the punishment of these acts in municipal bodies, and whether it goes further than the present law in regard to legislatures?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it does not go further than the common law in regard to legislative or municipal bodies. The Bill itself deals with such offences in regard to municipal bodies only.

Mr. DOYON.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that this is rather a stretch of the criminal law in dealing with these bodies. The municipal bodies are under the Provincial Legislatures. They exist altogether by the legislation of the Local Parliaments. They are created by them, and they may be wiped out of existence at any moment. They owe their existence to the action of the Local Legislature, and it seems to me that, when the Local Legislature is authorised to accompany any statute it may pass with the penalties which may be necessary to carry it into effect, the Local Legislature has power to provide for this case. For instance, I have no doubt that the Local Legislature has power to provide that a local returning officer should hold an election in a particular way, subject to fine and imprisonment if he should be derelict in his duty, or if anything irregular or disorderly should take place. They can provide the means by which their own laws shall be enforced and obedience to them secured. I do not mean to say that, if it were found by experience that the powers with which the Local Legislatures are invested were inadequate, we might not act here, but it seems to me that, as far as the discharge of official duty by any officer of the Local Legislature is concerned, the powers with which the Local Legislature is invested are sufficient to secure respect for its authority. That seems to have been the intention of the law. The powers of the one Government are not enlisted merely for the purpose of enforcing the authority of the other. Suppose, for instance, that they were to provide the mode by which the local elections should be held, and that any party who stole the poll book should be punished by hard labor for a number of years. I have no doubt they are competent to pass such a law, and I think that is wholly distinct from the general provisions of the criminal law. We recognise this fact here, that although the power to deal with the subject of property and civil rights is vested in the Local Legislature, nevertheless where a power is specifically conferred upon us, although it comes within the definition of property and civil rights, we have exclusive jurisdiction so far as that specific power is concerned. We have here conferred upon us generally power to legislate upon the subject of crime, but that general power given to us in respect to crime, no more limits the specific powers given to the Local Legislatures, to provide for a provincial crime, than does the granting of powers on the subject of property and civil rights, prevent us from dealing with the specific class of cases falling within the definition given to us here by the British North America Act. Now, I think that is perfectly clear; and that being the case, why should we deal with the class of cases which the hon. gentleman proposes to deal with here? If there were great and notorious offences committed in the way here described, and it was found that the provisions made or which might be made by the Local Legislature were inadequate for the punishment of infractions of the law, and for the offences which were committed by this particular class, then I think there might be some warrant for our interference, so far as the expediency of the question is concerned. I do not think there has been any statement given to us showing that it is expedient for us to act. I point out, as a matter of principle, that we ought not to deal with it, because, as a matter of principle, the Local Legislatures are expressly authorised to provide, by fine and imprisonment, for the punishment of such offences as may be committed against their local authority. Now, that being the case, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman will require to make out a very strong case before he can interfere with the exercise of that power given to the Local Legislatures, and deal with the subject under the general power of criminal law. It has been well said by a Chief Justice of the United States, in an important case, that under any federal system the boundary which separates the federal authority from the local authority is as clear and distinct as if they were separate and distinct political communities—distinct nationalities. When the certain powers given to the Local Legislatures are exclusive, let us for a moment suppose that the Local Legislatures possessed these powers outside of the Dominion altogether, that it was a separate territorial entity, as well as a separate personal entity or corporation, and you will see at once the impropriety of undertaking to extend the powers of your criminal jurisdiction to a class of cases such as this.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think the hon. member is quite correct in stating that municipalities are unknown to this Parliament. It is true that they are not created by this Parliament, they are created by the Local Legislature, but, inasmuch as every one of the Local Legislatures in Canada has, by competent authority, established these municipalities all over Canada, I think it is rather a refinement to say that this Parliament cannot take notice of the existence of these municipalities. Now, in proposing legislation of this kind, we are not seeking to interfere with the law relating to municipalities, we are not constituting municipalities, we are not delegating to them power, we are not increasing their powers. We find these municipalities existing all over Canada, and we simply say that it shall be hereafter a crime to attempt to corrupt a member or an officer of that municipality, and that it shall be a crime for a municipal officer to accept corruptly a consideration for his vote, or for any act as a municipal officer. I take it that we have precisely the same right to protect municipalities against the bribery of their officers, as to protect them against a breach of trust in their officers. We have a right to protect their property, and we have a right to pass a Bill relating to criminal law and say that it shall be a crime to steal the property of a municipality, and we have the right to regulate the mode in which a person who steals the property of a municipality shall be indicted, tried and convicted. I do not dispute for a moment the proposition that the Local Legislatures have power to enforce the regulations of their municipalities, but I say this is not a question of enforcing the regulations of any municipality, nor is it legislation to interfere with municipal law. We propose by this Bill, if the common law does not do so already, to raise to the rank of a crime, by virtue of our power over the criminal law, the offence of bribing an officer of the municipality, and the offence of accepting a bribe on the part of such officers. Now, it seems to me that that is a matter which it is quite incompetent for the Local Legislatures to do, and it is a matter which, in my humble judgment, the common law does already reach, but, inasmuch as it has been supposed that this law does not reach members of municipalities in various places who are guilty of these acts, I think it is wise that this House should legislate, and that we should say that if there be any doubt upon the subject as to the nature of the common law, that doubt shall be set at rest, and that if it were not a crime before, it shall hereafter be a crime to destroy the existence or usefulness of a municipality by corrupt acts.

Mr. AMYOT. I am very glad this measure is brought down. I do not look upon it as diminishing the power of municipalities, but as sanctioning their power. We do not declare that the elections shall be voided—this would belong to the Local Legislature, which has power to make it a crime to be guilty of bribery, corruption or intimidation. But I think we should extend these provisions to every corporation that is created by law, either by the Federal or by the Local Legislature; and that in respect to every corporate body the elections should be held according to the principles laid down in this Bill, so that the purity of the elections may be protected. I entirely concur with the views of the Minister of Justice on that point. I think it is sanctioning the powers of the local municipalities, and all the corporations existing in virtue of the Local Legislatures; but I wish the hon. member would make this Bill the common law of the country for any election held by a body corporate and politic.

On section 2,

Mr. MILLS. Is there any special reason that this House should legislate on the subject of municipal bodies, and not legislate in regard to Provincial Legislatures? Is it a more serious offence to commit bribery at municipal elections than it is to commit bribery at provincial elections. The Minister of Justice assumes by this Bill, that a Local Legislature cannot punish as a criminal offence any act, and if he chooses to raise a particular act to the rank of a crime, that then it is within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. But the decision of the Queen vs. Russell by the Privy Council, shows that that body, at all events, assumed there were certain specific provincial offences which Local Legislatures were authorised to punish as crimes. By calling the offence under an institution which owes its existence to a provincial Act, a misdemeanor, does not change the character of the offence. This House has not, by the British North America Act, any exclusive jurisdiction over words in the dictionary. The Local Legislature may call an offence against the local law a misdemeanor. There is nothing in the British North America Act to prevent it. It is true the Local Legislature cannot legislate on the subject of crime generally, whether for grave or trifling offences, but they can legislate to enforce their local laws where necessary by making the violation of those laws a criminal offence, specifically, not generally. There is a distinction between a wrong done, say by a treasurer appropriating public funds, and wrong done by him with respect to the discharge of some duty of a special character; and so it is with respect to those parties who are exercising authority under the Municipal Act. There is a difference between the law that is executed under the control of the Provinces and the ordinary criminal law.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I hope the hon. gentleman will not doubt me when I say that I always like to hear his views on these subjects, although I hardly ever agree with him. I do not dispute at all the proposition that this Parliament has no exclusive authority over the dictionary, but we have authority over the criminal law. If a Local Legislature declares a certain offence a felony, although that word happened to be in the dictionary, it, notwithstanding, has an inseparable connection with the subject of the criminal law, and could not be dealt with by the Local Legislature. It is one thing to have it in the dictionary—and we cannot expel it from there—but it is quite another thing to have it made an enactment. I do not doubt, for a single moment, the capacity of this Parliament to make it a misdemeanor, or a still greater offence if they thought fit, to bribe a member of the Legislature. The hon. gentleman asks me why I introduce legislation with reference to municipalities which I do not propose with reference to Parliament. I can only say that the demand for this legislation has been made with reference to municipalities, and has not been made in reference to Parliament. There was some difficulty in hearing the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), at this distance, but I understood his proposal to be, to make it a misdemeanor to bribe, or to accept a bribe, at elections for municipal councils.

Mr. AMYOT. I referred, not only to municipal elections, but to every corporation recognised by law, such as banks, &c. My object was to extend the law so as to make it a common law offence.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Hon. gentlemen will see that we would have to introduce a new subject into the Act to deal with the purity of elections of municipal councillors. The one subject which this Bill proposes to deal with is the corruption of municipal councillors after they have been elected. We would be changing altogether the character of the Bill if we made it to deal with municipal elections, although there is, no doubt, a good deal of force in his suggestion that it is desirable to suppress offences of that kind.

On section 3,

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the clause in the Bill extending the time for bringing those charges to three years. Three years seems to be rather a long period to have those charges hanging over a person's head, and it might be that blackmailing would result. I think that in the Dominion Elections Act the time is one year.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection to make it two years. I think it is a little different from the case of elections, for it may take some time to discover those offences.

Committee rose and reported, and Bill read the third time and passed.

ENQUIRIES CONCERNING PUBLIC MATTERS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No 72) to make further provision respecting enquiries concerning Public Matters. (From the Senate.) He said: I do not know whether this Bill requires any explanation. It originated in a suggestion from the Government of Quebec in relation to an enquiry into a public matter which interested that body. It appears the progress of the enquiry was arrested by a claim of privilege on the part of a witness, and it was apprehended the same would be made in regard to other witnesses. The purpose of the Bill is, that witnesses being examined in the course of public enquiries set on foot by the authority of His Excellency or the Lieutenant Governors, shall not be privileged from giving evidence. The single safeguard in the Bill is that the witness will not be liable to be prosecuted in respect to the evidence given there, unless he be under indictment for having given false evidence. I propose to amend the third clause by inserting after the words, in the sixth line, "administration of justice therein," the words "or in reference to any municipal matter," and in the ninth line the word "himself" should be "him."

Mr. EDGAR. In this clause which protects the witness, the Minister of Justice refers to more subjects of enquiry than are covered by the Act in the Revised Statutes. I suppose enquiries as to municipal matters would only be enquired into under a provincial commission, and unless he intends that enquiries into the administration of justice shall be enquired into by a provincial commission, I think that he ought to amend the operative section of chapter 114 to cover that.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not intended to take that power. It is only intended to extend the provisions of the enquiry under the authority of the Lieutenant Governors.

Committee rose and reported, and Bill read the third time and passed.

CONDITIONAL RELEASE OF FIRST OFFENDERS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 91) to permit the conditional release of first offenders in certain cases. He said: The object of this Bill is very succinctly stated in the preamble:

Mr. AMYOT:

"To make provision for cases where the reformation of persons convicted of first offences may, by reason of the offender's youth or the trivial nature of the offence, be brought about without imprisonment."

It has been the practice, in Ontario at least, for the judges to exercise to some extent this jurisdiction, by permitting young prisoners charged with first offences to be liberated on recognisances to appear on a subsequent day when sentence might be delivered, and not to require them so to appear or receive sentence unless they commit some other breach of the law. I am not aware of any authority which justifies that practice. I am aware that, occasionally, in Great Britain, in individual cases in which the judge has been strongly convinced that a conviction should not have taken place, he has undertaken to exercise a similar power to release the prisoner without sentence, on his own recognisance. The power, however, has rarely been acted upon, and only in cases in the old country where the conviction has been obviously improper, as the result of facts proved, or has been such a great hardship, in consequence of the oppressive nature of the law administered, as to induce the judge to take upon himself personally the high responsibility of defeating the conviction. It is better, I think, that the system should receive the sanction of law so far as it properly can, and that it should have the safeguards which this Bill proposes, and by which it is provided that in the case of a subsequent offence, the prisoner can be summoned to receive punishment. The Bill is a practical adaptation of chapter 25 of the Imperial Statutes of 1837.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on proposed motion of Mr. Foster: That Mr. Speaker leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply, and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment.

Mr. ARSTRONG. After the able and exhaustive speeches made on both sides of the House on the question now before us, it is not my intention to bore the House by a long speech, and in the remarks I wish to make I shall confine myself almost exclusively to the question from the farmer's standpoint. I wish to speak on the question as a practical farmer, and to endeavor to point out how he is affected. About a year ago I gave a notice of motion in this House in favor of commercial union with the United States. That motion I allowed to drop. I did so for two special reasons. First, because notice had been given of another motion in favor of unrestricted reciprocity. Reciprocity was the great object we had in view, and although I had a preference for commercial union over unrestricted reciprocity, still, provided we obtained reciprocity, I did not care so much what the mode might be. Another reason was that I was afraid of offending a few of the weak brethren. I was in favor of reciprocity then, and I am in favor of it still. I believe it is preferable to any other mode of free trade with the United States which can possibly be adopted. I may, at the outset, mention two or three objections urged against commercial union. One of them was urged with a great deal of spirit last night by the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White), and it is the only very strong objection I have ever heard made against it. But so far as the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) is concerned, so far as others who have spoken on the subject are concerned, and so far as the public prints opposed to the measure are concerned, the objection has never gone further than bald, bare assertion. The assertion to which I refer is that commercial union would lead to giving the Americans the control of our tariff. As I said before, this is but a simple assertion, and that is no proof of a proposition, and we have never had any argument adduced to prove that such would be the case. Why, is it not true that, if ever an arrangement of this kind is made with the United States or with any other country, Canada goes into the negotiations altogether as an independent party? They will have the right and the power to say whether they will or will not agree to any measures that are to be proposed, and, if any arrangement of that kind is ever made between Canada and the United States, or between Canada and any other countries, it will have to be by the full and free consent of the Canadians. They will be independent parties to the bargain. They will have just as much to say in making that bargain as the other party will; and is it giving any other party the control of our tariff, simply because we agree with that party that, for a certain period of years, a common tariff, to be mutually agreed upon, should prevail between the two countries and the rest of the world? The assertion of the statement carries with it its own absurdity and its own condemnation. The same objection might be made against unrestricted reciprocity, and, without either commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity, I confidently assert that the Americans have in effect the control of the tariff of Canada. To make my meaning clear, I will say this. We all agree that the Americans have a much higher tariff, apparently, than we in Canada have, but that does not prevent smuggling into this country. Suppose, for example, that the tariff was lowered in the United States, say 5 or 10 per cent., or below ours, what would be the result? Increased smuggling into this country, in consequence of the lowering of their tariff below our own. The merest child in public business can understand that, in that case, it would take half the people of this country to prevent the other half from smuggling. So, in that way, the Americans really have the control of our tariff. It may be objected to this that there is no danger of such a state of affairs, that the Americans have a higher tariff than ours, and that that tariff is likely to be continued. I believe nothing can be further from the truth than such a statement. I need not tell this House that, for nearly twelve months, a strong agitation has been going on in the United States for the reduction of the tariff, for the reduction of the taxation, and that a Presidential election has recently been run on that question, and I need not tell the House that 100,000 majority of the electors voted for that reduction. The workmen of the United States, the farmers and all the industrial classes are beginning to feel the terrible load under which they are ground down, and they are crying out for a lowering of the tariff and a reduction of the taxes. We know, when once an agitation of that kind commences, how fast it proceeds in a country like the United States where the people are supreme. Once let the agitation fairly set in, and it will go down and down with railroad speed until it will reach the point that nothing will be collected in the way of taxation beyond what is necessary for carrying on the Government of the country; and when that point is reached, Canada cannot possibly keep up the high tariff she now has, so that commercial union, as we understand it, a certain agreement for a certain number of years to have a set tariff, is the only security we have for the permanency of our tariff. Another strong argument for commercial union over unrestricted reciprocity is the fact that, if it were adopted, we could do away with the whole of our Custom houses along the border. The very idea of commercial union is to have a common tariff and common Excise regulations, to collect common tariff duties and common Excise duties, so that there would be no need for the long string of Custom houses which extends over our 3,000 miles of frontier, or for the needless host of Custom house officials whom we now have, but who could be dismissed and sent to do something which would be of real benefit to the country. Then, another argument in favor of commercial union over unrestricted reciprocity, is that it is altogether practicable. A year ago, it was fashionable to say that we could not get commercial union, that the United States would not grant it to us, that they were too astute to grant us any such measure. At the last Session of the House, we had an hon. gentleman, whose abilities we all admire, who had been sent to Washington to negotiate a treaty, and after he came back, he stated from his place in this House, that such a thing was practicable. I will quote his own words from the Hansard of 1888, page 681. He said:

"I tell you that I did not meet a man of any party, I did not meet an American statesman who would not hold up both hands for commercial union with Canada."

That was Sir Charles Tupper's statement twelve months ago, and events that have very lately happened show how correctly he gauged public opinion on the other side. It was only the other day that a resolution in favor of commercial union with Canada passed unanimously the House of Representatives of the United States. It passed the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate unanimously, and when it came to the Senate, there was only one man who objected to it, and it was, therefore, laid over for further consideration. We, therefore, see that commercial union is altogether practicable. Now, whether we ask for commercial union or for unrestricted reciprocity, I wish to say at the outset that we are not going to the Americans asking for this as paupers, telling them that we cannot do without it. We are going there as an independent nation, offering them equal privileges to those we ask from them. We say to the Americans, We buy a vast quantity of what you have to sell, and you buy a great deal of what we have to sell; it is for our mutual benefit that the barriers that obstruct our trade should be broken down. We meet them on equal terms, and offer them as good as we get. Neither do I advocate this measure on the ground which, I am sorry to say, has sometimes been taken, that the farmers of this country are a poor, miserable, half-starved class that cannot live without it. Any such statement is a libel on the farmers of this Dominion. Considering the industry of our farming population, considering the intelligence and the skill they bring to bear on their profession, it is impossible, under present circumstances, that they can be any such poor, miserable class. I repudiate the idea altogether, but I do say that, considering the amount of capital that the farmers of this Dominion have had to invest in their property, in their plant, in the implements and the stock necessary for them to carry on their calling, considering the great skill, the untiring industry and the indomitable perseverance they have shown in their calling,—taking all these things into consideration, I do assert, without fear of contradiction, that the farmers are not reaping that profit which they have a right to expect. That is all that I assert about them, that they do not reap the profit from their calling that their industry, and their skill, and the amount of capital they have invested, entitle them to expect, and we seek by this measure which is now before the House to enable them to get something like a fair share of what they have fairly earned. Now, we are told by almost every speaker from the other side of the House, that we have a better market than the United States, that Britain is our natural market, that we ought to trade with Britain, that it is patriotic to trade with Britain, that it is more profitable for us to trade with Britain. Well, Sir, it is more patriotic and profitable to trade with Britain, why do we not do it? The reason why we do not do it, and the reason why we do trade with the Americans, simply is because, for nearly the half of what we have to sell the United States is our natural market; that is the simple reason why we trade with them. Sir, this is shown by the large trade that we do with them in spite of the two tariff walls that have been erected one on each side of the line to prevent us from trading with them; and also in spite of the fact that every ounce of produce of any description that we send to Great Britain, is allowed to enter that country without the payment of a shilling of duty. We have actually free access to her market, while we have a tariff wall between us and the United States; yet in spite of that tariff wall, we sell more to the Americans than we do to the inhabitants of Great Britain. We see this fact more strongly brought out in the circumstance that our trade with the United States is constantly increasing, while our trade with Great Britain is diminishing. Allow me to draw the attention of the House to a few figures taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns, to prove this position. In 1887, we imported from Great Britain $44,962,233 worth; from the United States we imported $45,107,066 worth. In that same year we exported to Great Britain $44,571,312 worth; we exported to the United States $34,658,275 worth. Now compare that with the year 1888. Last year we exported to Great Britain $40,084,984 worth; while we exported to the United States $42,572,065 worth. Then, in the same year, 1888, we imported from Great Britain $39,298,721 worth; while we imported from the United States $48,481,843 worth, a decrease in our trade with Great Britain, in 1888, as compared with 1887, of $10,149,840 worth; and showing an increase of our trade with the United States for the same year of $11,288,572 worth. This shows that our trade with the United States during 1888 was greater than our trade with Great Britain, to the amount of $11,670,208 worth; and all this increase, Sir, in spite of the two tariff walls that have been erected, one on each side of the line, to prevent us from trading with the Americans. Our aggregate trade with the whole world, in 1888, was $201,097,630; of that, the enormous amount of $91,053,913 worth was with the United States, or only $4,747,451 worth less than one-half of our trade with the whole world. This has been, as I said before, in spite of these tariff walls, and it shows, if anything on earth can show, that trade will follow its natural channel in spite of all the barriers that you erect against it, and it shows, too, that the country that tries to fight geography in the matter of trade, fights a losing battle. Then, Sir, the importance of the United States market to this country is further shown by the fact—and I wish to emphasise this—that they take what we have no market for in Great Britain or anywhere else. I want to draw particular attention to this fact in respect to horses, and I may say, as a practical farmer, that the raising of horses for sale is one of the most profitable branches of farming at the present time. Well, where is our market for the surplus horses that we raise? In 1888, we exported to Great Britain 246 horses, of the value of $36,750. In the same year, we exported to the United States 19,845 horses, of the value of $2,402,371. The United States was the only market we had for these horses, and except for that market they could not have been sold. We shipped of cattle to Great Britain, 54,248, valued at $4,123,873. We exported to the United States 40,047 valued at $648,178. When the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. McMillan) was speaking last year, the question was thrown across the floor respecting the small value of the cattle shipped to the United States as compared with those shipped to Great Britain. The difference is easily explained. The cattle shipped to Great Britain are principally raised in Ontario, and consist mainly of heavy steers weighing from 1,300 to 1,700 lbs., a few of which cattle are now coming down from the North-West; while those shipped to the States are light cattle, cows and young cattle. There is no market in England for them, and it would not pay to send them over. Accordingly, the United States is the only market for our light cattle. There is another feature of this matter. The Trade and Navigation Returns show that a great many of the cattle exported to the United States are sent from the Maritime Provinces; in fact, as a general rule New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island do not raise a class of cattle fit for shipment to the old country. The cattle there are for dairying purposes, and for this class we find our market in the United States. We exported of sheep to Great Britain 30,421, of the value of $211,881. These also came chiefly from the far west. In regard to the statements contained in our Trade and Navigation Returns, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) showed the other night that they did not tally with those of the United States authorities, and that the latter show a much larger number of cattle, sheep and horses imported than do our Trade and Navigation Returns, and I am inclined to believe, through no fault of the Minister of Customs, that much stock is shipped to the United States which is never reported to the Customs Department. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, we exported 359,353,999 sheep to the United States, for which we received $1,027,410. Again, they are a class of sheep for which there is no sale in England, and it would not pay to send them there. The larger proportion of those sheep came from Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and were sent to the Boston market. They were principally lambs and light sheep, for which we have no other market. Next, in regard to grain. Of barley we exported to Great Britain 1,657 bushels. The truth of the matter is we have no market in England for our barley. The attempt made to malt our barley there proved to be a failure, as it would not make the quality of ale and porter required. On the other hand, it makes the ale and porter and lager which the Americans love, and the result is we have the best barley on the continent and they buy it. Last year they purchased from us 9,365,021 bushels. If it were not for that market it would not pay our people to raise a bushel of barley, for it is an unprofitable crop to raise for feed. Of hay, we shipped to Great Britain 6,044½ tons, for which we received $64,781, while we shipped to the United States 84,068 tons. This came principally from the Province of Quebec, it furnishing 74,970 tons. The total value of the shipments to the States was $800,622. In regard to potatoes, which are an important product in some parts of the Dominion, we exported to Great Britain 1,427 bushels, of the value of $973; while we exported to the United States 2,484,441 bushels, of the value of $957,570. This is a vital matter to some of the Maritime Provinces. An enormous quantity is raised in Prince Edward Island, and large quantities also in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and for these crops the Eastern States are their only markets. Before they are able to reach that market, however, they have to pay a duty of 15 cents per bushel in addition to the expense of carriage, so, in effect, they have to give one bushel of potatoes to get another bushel into market. But that does not end the matter, for, when the farmer brings back his money, the manufacturers' "combines" go through his pockets and take a large part of what remains. Is it any wonder he is dissatisfied and asks for a change? Of wool, Great Britain did not take from us a single ounce. It may be said that we can have no object in exporting wool, as we import wool, and we cannot, therefore, want to ship our wool. We do want to ship it. We have in the west some excellent breeders of long-wool sheep, principally Cotswold, these breeders having brought stock from the old country, as they preferred that to any other breed. This class of wool is not manufactured in the Dominion, and so we have not a profitable market for it. In the United States it is used for combing, and it is there we sell it. The Americans took 954,975 lbs., for which they paid $223,206. Another article, of which we export largely, is eggs. We exported to Great Britain 2,379 dozen, for which we received $262. We exported to the United States 14,147,739 dozen, for which we received the splendid sum of $2,119,582. Our lumbering, mining and fishing interests are in precisely a similar position as are our farming interests in this respect. Of those products we exported the following quantities: Products of the mine, to the value of $4,110,937; of the fisheries, $7,793,183; of the forest, $21,302,914. Of these the United States took, of the products of the mine, $3,341,308; of the fisheries, $3,123,853; of the products of the forest, $10,622,338; of the farm, $17,902,021. We, therefore, find that it is a matter of vital importance to all those industries that we should have for them free access to the American market. Now, Sir, having detained you so long with figures, I want the particular attention of the House for a few minutes, while I deal with some of the objections that are urged against the adoption of unrestricted reciprocity. We are told, first of all, that it would be hurtful, and even ruinous to our manufacturing industries, and here the question comes in, is it right, and proper, and just, that all these other great industries of the country should be hampered, and hindered, and impoverished in their operation so that one single industry, and that not by any means the largest, should thrive and make large profits. That is an important question, whether it is fair that all these should suffer for the sake of one single industry. Now, Sir, it is hard to get a correct estimate of the amount of capital employed in each of the great industries of the country, but we can easily find out from our Trade and Navigation Returns how much of the products of each of these great industries have been exported out of the country, after supplying the necessities of our own people; that is, how much has been exported over and above what we wanted to consume ourselves. In 1888 we exported of the products of the mine, $4,110,937 worth; of the products of the fisheries, $7,793,183; of the products of the forest, $21,302,814; of the products of the farm, $40,155,657 worth; making a grand total of $73,362,591 worth. Now, Sir, how much did we export of the products of our manufactures after supplying the wants of our own people? Why, Sir, the magnificent sum of $4,161,282 worth. But, Sir, there are not a few who are well fitted and able to judge of the effect of such a measure as that proposed in the motion of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who declare that it would have exactly a contrary effect on the manufacturers, and there are not a few of our manufacturers, and amongst those, the very best and ablest of them, who declare that they are not afraid of open and fair competition with the Americans, that they are ready to have the barriers thrown down and to take their chance in any common market with the people of the United States of America. Again, we find that the manufacturers are now complaining of hard times. This, Sir, is the natural result of the National Policy, as it is called, or the protective system. Its first effect was to induce the investment of immense amounts of capital in manufacturing enterprise. The result was that the business was overdone, and not having an outlet for their actual production, they had to prey upon the people of this country. About a year ago, I went into the establishment of one of the oldest established and largest manufacturers in London. After the question, "Are you afraid of fair competition with the United States of America, are you willing that the tariff would be thrown off on both sides of the line?" the manufacturer answered: "Afraid! Why, there were young men who learned the business in my shop and who are in the United States of America to-day, getting from $1,500 to $2,500 a year, for overseeing works; surely, if they can hold their own with the Americans, I am not afraid that I can do it too." The fact of the matter is, that the protection afforded by this National Policy has confined our market to our own people, for the moment you enter upon a system of that kind, you cut the country off from the other markets of the world. Therefore, I say that any such assertions about the people of this country, as that they cannot compete with any other country in the world, is a slander upon our people. I hold, Sir, that man for man Canadians are as good as any men on the face of the earth, and are able to hold their own in any contest with any peoples in the world. I may remark here that the principal reason why this policy was asked, or why it was given to the country, was, as we were told, that it would secure reciprocity with the United States of America. The great cry that was raised in 1878 was "let us have reciprocity in trade, and if we cannot have that we must have reciprocity in tariff." It was the open declared intention to force the Americans to give us reciprocity in trade by our adopting reciprocity in tariff. I need not tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in this country of ours, although we have immense resources, these are in a large measure undeveloped. I believe, Sir, that in our forests, and lying in the earth in the shape of ores, we have immense resources that have never yet been developed and that in a great measure have never yet been discovered. Now, Sir, what we want for these is an outlet and a larger market. In our own country we have not this larger market. We have copper here in almost untold quantities. I have seen, Sir, at the Sudbury Mines specimens of ore thrown out which was too rich to mine and which could not be torn off from the parent body, and every pound of copper shipped to the other side is met by a tariff of 3½ cents a pound. That is entirely preventing us from availing ourselves of the benefits of that natural market. Then, again, we have large and rich mines of what is known as nickle, one of the most important metals for economical purposes that we have. The United States is our only market for nickle and they want it there, but every pound of it that goes in the United States is met with a tax of 12½ cents. Then we come to the question of our iron resources. In 1887 the hon. Sir Charles Tupper, when delivering his budget speech, told us that he had at last discovered what this country really needed, that he had discovered a great want, and that the rectifying of that wrong was about to give this country prosperity. He said that the great cause of complaint in this country, the fact which would account for our poverty, was that we had not a scientific tariff on iron, and he proposed to give us prosperity by imposing such a tariff upon us. He adopted that tariff, and of certain kinds of iron he just about doubled the price to the people of this country. And how much better off have we been? Those who had the privilege of listening to his speech on that occasion can remember the glowing terms in which he spoke of our resources of iron. He told us of the vast stores of iron ore lying unused in the bowels of the earth; he told us of the great stretches of forest which could be converted into charcoal; he told us of our great deposits of lime-stone which were necessary to effect the fusion of the metal; and he told us of the immense armies of men who would require to be employed to cut down the timber and to convert it into charcoal, to mine the iron ore, and to smelt the iron. He told us it would be the dawn of a new era of prosperity; nay, so positive was he of the truth of what he asserted that he told us precisely what was going to be the result in one particular. He said that the imposition of this tariff on iron, in conjunction with the removal of the duty on anthracite coal, would have a certain effect. What was that effect? He said that the moment—no waiting, no possibility of being deceived—the moment this is done, we shall have blast furnaces at Cobourg, at Weller's Bay and at Kingston. Well, Sir, I have made enquiries, and I have not seen an individual who has seen a blast furnace at any of those places. I have seen many people who have travelled throughout the country, and not one of them has heard the wood-cutter's axe felling trees to be converted into charcoal. They are still standing in the sun, and the iron is still lying in the bowels of the earth. Now, why was this prediction, so confidently made, not realised? Was it because that illustrious statesman had miscalculated the resources of this country, or overestimated their value? No such thing. Even his exuberant imagination could hardly overestimate the undeveloped wealth, in those respects, which we have in this country. Well, how is it that his predictions have been so completely falsified? For the simple reason that, although we have the resources and the appliances necessary for the production of the wealth he alluded to, yet the main thing is wanting, and that is a market. We were told that this country required to import 260,000 tons of iron in a year. That seems a vast quantity, but let me tell this House that there are two, if not three, establishments on the other side of the line, any one of which could supply that quantity in any given year, so that it is evident that, if we are confined to the Canadian market, the prediction of our late Finance Minister is doomed to be still unfulfilled. But, Sir, I may tell you where there is a market. In 1887, according to the Iron and Mining Review of the United States, there were 1,800,000 tons of iron imported into the United States, in spite of a prohibitory tariff. Give us that market, and the dream of the late Finance Minister will be in a fair way to be realised. Another objection often urged against any such measure is that if we were to have free trade with the United States, while we maintained our tariff against Great Britain, and other countries, it would be unfair discrimination against Great Britain. Well, Sir, in reply to that, I say that is just exactly what we are doing now: we are discriminating against Great Britain today. In 1887 we imported from Great Britain $39,298,721 worth of goods, on which we collected a duty of $8,972,739. In the same year we imported from the United States $48,481,848 worth, on which we collected a duty of only $7,109,233. In other words, we imported $9,183,127 worth of goods more from the United States than we did from Great Britain, and charged on them $1,863,506 less duty. It may be said that that is accounted for in a great measure by the fact that we admit so many things from the United States free of duty. But I ask again, is that not discriminating against Great Britain just as much as if you had a discriminating tariff? No matter under what guise you admit these goods, the effect is the same so far as Great Britain is concerned; and the question of discrimination is only one of degree. But, Sir, Great Britain has other interests in Canada besides those of a merely mercantile nature. Great Britain, Sir, has the interest that a creditor has in a debtor—the interest of seeing that everything is done that can possibly be done to enable us to pay our great indebtedness to her with promptitude. That, Sir, is a consideration that far outweighs the question of the quantity of goods we buy from Great Britain. According to the London Economist, in June, 1887, our indebtedness to Great Britain, all told, amounted to somewhere between six and seven hundred millions of dollars, and it is a matter of the utmost importance to the people of Britain, that we should be in a thriving and prosperous condition, so as to be able to meet our indebtedness when it comes due, and to meet the interest on it until it is due. Then, Sir, there is this other fact to be considered. Great Britain is independent of every other nation on the face of the earth in the matter of tariffs. It makes no difference what tariff wall any nation erects to keep out her goods, she can get her goods over it, because every nation in the world needs her goods, and no matter what duty they impose, they must take them. Another objection—and it is the old stock objection against everything proposed for the benefit of the country from this side of the House—is that this measure would lead to annexation. We were told, even by so sensible a gentleman as the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White), that that would be the result of commercial union. Well, Sir, all experience, as well as common sense, teaches that it would have just the contrary effect. I think too much is said about annexation sentiment in this country. I believe the people of this Dominion are loyal to the Crown of Great Britain, and that if ever the tie that binds us to Great Britain is broken, it will be through the action of the mother country herself, and not through any action of ours. Now let me draw attention to one or two facts. In the year 1849 there was an immense agitation going on in certain parts of this country in favor of annexation. A league was formed, in a city not more than a thousand miles from here, called "the annexation league," which held regular meetings. I have seen a list of the members, and I know that some of them were men of high standing in this country, men who have since been honored with seats in the cabinet alongside the right hon. the First Minister. And what was it that put a stop to that agitation? It was neither more nor less than the Reciprocity Treaty which we were able to effect in 1854, and from that day until the treaty was abrogated not a whisper of annexation was heard in this country. In 1865, when the Americans abrogated that treaty, the Government of this country made representations to the home Government and the strongest ground they urged in favor of renewal of the reciprocity treaty was that such renewal would prevent any movement in this country for annexation. Again, in 1869, a minute of Council was passed by this Government and sent to the Colonial Secretary, urging upon the Imperial Government the expediency of doing all they could to procure a renewal of that reciprocity treaty, and the principal reason urged was that its renewal would prevent anything in the shape of annexation feeling in this Dominion. Is it not, therefore, the height of absurdity, is it not the most childish folly, for men in this House to declare that reciprocity now would have exactly the contrary effect it has had when formerly in force? So far from reciprocity stirring up any annexation feeling, all our experience in the past has shown that it would be the most effective means of preventing the spread of any such feeling. I do not think there is any fear of anything like an annexation agitation spreading in the country, but if anything would give currency to such a sentiment it would be our being denied the privileges which we would enjoy under unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union. It is by debarring our people from the privileges and profits which they would enjoy under free trade with the United States that an annexation feeling can be developed. If you want to make the people contented with the Government, make them contented with their circumstances; show them the Government has done everything man can do to procure all the advantages within their reach—do that, and you will take away all desire for a change of circumstances. The hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) read a long extract last night from an interview with Senator Sherman. I hardly know what he intended to prove by that, but it proved to every thinking man in this House one thing, and that was that the only opposition to a treaty of this kind in the States is due to the fact that the Americans believe once this policy is adopted there will be an end, at once, and forever, to all annexation feeling in Canada. Senator Sherman strongly opposed reciprocity on this very ground. He held the old Monroe doctrine, that the two countries ought to be one, and he objected to anything that would prevent such a consummation; and he felt that nothing was more calculative to prevent any such consummation than to give us all the privileges which we would enjoy under annexation without it. I referred, at the outset of my remarks, to a measure lately passed through the House of Representatives at Washington, and which would have passed through the Senate but for the objection of one of its members. Who was the Senator who made the objection? Why, it was Senator Blair, the man who appeared in the annexation resolution. He did not object to commercial union on its merits. I believe Sir Charles Tupper is right in saying that there is not a man of any standing in the United States who is not thoroughly convinced that unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union would be a benefit to both countries, but Senator Blair objected to either solely on the ground that if such concession was granted to Canada, it would kill, once and forever, all annexation sentiment. Some time ago, in the debate on the treaty-making power in this House, the hon. the Minister of Finance said that the right to make our treaties was about the only tie that bound this country to Great Britain. Well, if that is the only tie, the sooner it is broken the better, because he will find that this country is not going to submit much longer to that tie; but I believe we are bound by ties immeasurably stronger than anything of the kind. We are bound by ties of affection, the ties of a common history, the ties of kinship, the ties of common interest—we have a share in the glories of the old Empire—these are ties immeasurably stronger than mere commercial consideration, or any paltry treaty-making power. But Great Britain has another interest in the settlement of this question. I need not tell this House that the fishery question is one that causes a great deal of irritation, not only between this country and the United States, but between that country and Great Britain, and I believe it is immeasurably more important to Great Britain than that difficulty should be permanently settled than any question of trade, or of dollars and cents, between the two countries. I believe that—as Secretary Bayard wrote to Sir Charles Tupper, and Sir Charles Tupper wrote to Secretary Bayard—the only permanent settlement between the two countries of the fisheries question can only be on the line of the resolution now before the House, or on the line of commercial union, and the result in either case would be certain. It is clearly of immense importance to Great Britain that this question should be settled in a satisfactory manner. I do not intend to blame the Government altogether, or to blame them at all, for putting in force the law in regard to the fisheries. The Government of the day are the guardians of the rights of the people. It is their sworn duty to execute the laws which the people pass for the protection of their rights, so that, in protecting our fisheries from encroachment, the Government were simply carrying out their sworn duty in protecting the rights of the people. As to whether they were harsh in carrying the law into effect or not, I am not now going to express an opinion, but I will say that, whether it was harsh or not, the Government had the laws to carry out, and on behalf of the Government I wish also to state that, although the law provides for redress where illegal seizure or injustice is done, as far as I know—and I think I have studied the question pretty closely—no one of those who were affected by these seizures has appealed to a court of law to obtain redress against the action of the Government. That is prima facie evidence that the Government have carried out the law in a pretty judicial spirit. The law was there and had to be carried out, and whether they carried it out in a harsh or a mild spirit, the fact remains that, as long as things remain in their present position, the grounds of difference between this country and the United States, and between the United States and Great Britain, must remain, and it is, therefore, of great importance to Great Britain that this question should be settled in a pacific way. We are, perhaps, too apt to overlook the importance of this aspect of the case. On the other side of the line is a people akin to ourselves, speaking the same language, having the same literature, having the same ancestry also. If we are proud of the former glories of Great Britain, so also are they, because that is their fatherland and the bones of their forefathers rest there; and we can hardly estimate what an immensely important matter it would be to the world if these two nations could have everything removed which obstructs peaceable and quiet intercourse between them, so as to work together for common objects, and what the results would be to the world at large. If these two great nations, who possess the largest share of the commerce of the world, and the largest shares of the sinews of war, the wealth of the world, were acting together in concert, bound together as they are by a common tie, they could regulate the foreign policy of the nations of the world. When any small nationality was oppressed, they could say to the oppressor: This thing must stop, and it would have to be stopped. The fact is, that in such a case those two nations could make war impossible, and it requires no great stretch of imagination or fancy to see the great boon that would result to humanity, if the armies of the world could be abolished, if the hundreds of thousands of men who are to-day maintained in idleness, and who are supported by the sweat of the poor laboring men and women, could be engaged in active employment of a peaceful kind. Then, consider what an immense boon it would be, as far as the commerce of the world is concerned, if men could engage in commerce and in manufactures in every part of the world, without being afraid of being disturbed by any internal or external commotion, what an impetus it would give to the business of the world. It is impossible to overestimate the immense benefit which such a proposition as this might be the beginning of, and which, in future years, with two such countries combining for that peaceable object, acting in all matters in harmony as they should do, would probably bring about universal peace as the result. As I see it is six o'clock, I will conclude my remarks by supporting, with great pleasure, the motion of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

SEIZURE OF BRITISH SCHOONER.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would call the attention of the Government to the following despatch, which appears in the evening papers:—

"BOOTH BAY, ME, March 8.—The British schooner Gleaner, from St. John for New York, was seized here at noon by the customs officers for non-entry, and is now in charge of the revenue cutter Woodbine. The fine is $1,500."
