I am surprised to learn that the U.K. Government has amended its draft aide-mémoire, as originally contained in Circular D.235, and now proposes to put it forward in the context of a broader approach to the United States Government on the general program under Article VII as a whole. This broader approach would be intended to involve bilateral discussion of the whole field of economic relations and the drawing up of an orderly program of discussion of all the topics arising under Article VII including monetary policy, international investment, the regulation of primary products and commercial policy. The British delegation would be headed by a Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and the primary objects of the talks would be to obtain broad United States-United Kingdom agreement on an orderly agenda for the discussion of Article VII. In this connection, it is said: "We continue, as in the past, to regard of the greatest importance the attainment of prior agreement on such matters between our two governments before they are discussed in a wide international field."

As I understand it, our Commercial Policy delegation encouraged the United Kingdom to make an approach to the United States along the lines of the original aide-mémoire, but there was no indication during the course of the London talks of the proposal to include all subjects arising under Article VII in the bilateral discussions. This must be a later development.

It would seem that the monetary policy proposal would cut across other discussions of this problem which have been forecast; it was Dr. White's idea that after submission of his finally revised plan to the Finance Ministers of the various United and Associated Nations, a drafting committee representing six or seven nations (including Canada) would be set up to prepare a final draft and agenda for a conference this fall of Finance Ministers or of experts. All through his monetary discussions the United States Treasurer was most anxious to avoid the appearance that the plan had been worked out by two or three of the great powers and most careful to give every small country an opportunity to participate in parliamentary discussions. Furthermore, while perhaps we cannot validly object to United Kingdom-United States explorations of the other subjects listed with the object of preparing an agenda as it were, for broader international discussions, I think we should object to their undertaking bilateral discussions with a view to reaching an agreement, to which they would then ask other countries to adhere. We should insist on having a share, at least in the formulation of any international agreement on these economic matters which are of such high importance to Canada.

It seems to me that we need to ask for definite clarification of the sentence which I have quoted above. We should also consider whether we should make our views known in regard to the monetary discussions and as to the object or product of the discussions on other subjects.

Le secrétaire au Trésor des États-Unis au ministre des Finances
Secretary of the Treasury of United States to Minister of Finance

Washington, September 14, 1943

My dear Mr. Minister,

On March 4, 1943, I sent to the finance ministers of the United Nations and the countries associated with them a tentative draft proposal for an international stabilization fund, prepared by the technical experts of the United States Treasury in cooperation with the technical experts of other departments of this Government. At that time, I asked the finance ministers to submit this tentative proposal for critical study by their technical experts and to send their experts to Washington for informal discussions with the technical experts of this Government.

These exploratory technical discussions have been going on for some time. The discussions have been very helpful in clarifying the problems connected with international monetary cooperation and in calling forth suggestions for modifications in the tentative proposal. As a result of these discussions, the technical experts of the United States have prepared a revised draft of the tentative proposal for an International Stabilization Fund. While this draft embodies some of the suggestions of the technical experts of other countries, it does not necessarily represent the views of the experts of any other country.

I particularly wish to express to you my appreciation for the contributions to the discussions made by the technical experts that you sent to Washington. The many conversations they held with the experts of the United States were extremely helpful to us and we hope to them. As you will note we have embodied in the revised draft a large number of their suggestions.

There is enclosed for your consideration the revised draft of the tentative proposal for an International Stabilization Fund¹. It is my intention to keep you fully informed of further developments in connection with the proposals for international monetary cooperation.

Sincerely yours,

H. MORGENTHAU JR.

The attached teletype, WA-6340 of December 21st^t, contains the text of an aide-mémoire^t delivered by the Department of State to our Legation in Washington this morning. The United States Government proposes "confidential exploratory conversations in the near future between officials of our two countries, for the purpose of reaching general agreement on an orderly agenda for future discussions of a more definitive character looking towards the implementation of the principles set forth in the Exchange of Notes of November 30th, 1942".

Conversations along these lines have already taken place between officials of the United States and United Kingdom Governments. These conversations were held in Washington in October of this year, when a United Kingdom group, headed by Lord Keynes and Mr. Liesching of the United Kingdom Board of Trade, discussed some questions of international commercial and financial policy with a group of United States officials headed by Mr. Myron Taylor. They reached a very large and encouraging measure of agreement as to the objectives and next steps. The United Kingdom officials took their progress report back to London for submission to their Government, with a view to resuming discussions with the United States early in the new year. It is expected that they will be back in Washington about the end of January or the beginning of February.

Mr. Hickerson, of the Department of State, told me not long ago that the United States Government hoped to have direct discussions on the same agenda with Canada before resuming discussions with the United Kingdom. They were not then in a position to suggest a date for these discussions because they had already invited the Russians to participate in similar exploratory talks, and felt they had to wait until definite arrangements had been made with the Russians before proposing a meeting with us. The Russians have been rather dilatory in replying, and the United States now propose that talks with Canada take place before talks with the U.S.S.R. This is a most important invitation, and particularly for Canada. I feel, very strongly, that what we do, or leave undone, in these next few months may determine the whole course of international economic relations. In this particular field Canada is in a key position because of the volume of our trading interest and of our special relationship with the United States and with the United Kingdom. The latter countries are working towards a programme of multilateral action to free world trade. It is a very ambitious and wide-ranging programme, which may be too ambitious for achievement during these next critical months when the essential decisions have to be taken. If the progress of the war in Europe permits of any slackening or diversion of our industrial war effort, business energies will be directed into the old channels. Tariffs and preferences, which have been for practical purposes inoperative for three or four years, will become important again, and new vested interests will develop which are quite likely to prevent the really radical changes in trade relationships which the world needs, and Canada as much as any other country.

I think there may be a chance, right now, of securing a comprehensive and thoroughgoing trade agreement with the United States, which could be the first major instalment of the multilateral programme which nearly everybody recognizes as the desirable goal. The American invitation for general talks on economic policy is an opportunity to find out whether they would be ready to go along with us right now in something pretty big.

This is a pretty incoherent note, and I should like to have an opportunity of talking to you about some of its implications.

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D. 1168

London, December 24, 1943

IMPORTANT. SECRET. Article 7 discussions. Minister of State has reported that informal discussions with United States officials in Washington, September-October were held in a very friendly atmosphere and represented a useful and encouraging, though necessarily non-committal, exchange of views. At the conclusion of the talks certain documents were drawn up giving an agreed account of the discussions and a summary of the progress made under the various heads and it was felt that the respective groups of officials should report to their Governments with a view to arrangements being made, if this was mutually agreeable for the discussions to be resumed at a suitable opportunity in the New Year.

2. The documents resulting from the discussions have been submitted to the War Cabinet and are now being studied in detail with a view to further Ministerial consideration of the issues of policy involved. In the meantime a member of our Embassy at Washington, in a conversation at the State Department, has gathered that the Americans, on their side, are making progress with the examination of the documents and hope in about six weeks' time to be in a position to suggest resumption of the conversations between their officials and ours, with a view to matters being carried a stage further.

3. During the discussions in Washington steps were taken by our officials to keep Dominion representatives there broadly informed of the progress of the talks and copies of the agreed documents were sent last month to our High Commissioners in the Dominions with a view to their being communicated to Dominion Governments as soon as they had been submitted to the War Cabinet here. Copies of the documents[†] will thus be reaching you from our High Commissioner immediately after the receipt of this telegram. They cover broadly the following subjects. Monetary policy, commercial policy, commodity policy, maintenance of full employment and cartels.

4. No doubt your Government will feel as we have done that some time must be allowed for the study of these documents and of the main issues and implications arising out of them before discussion of these important and far reaching topics could usefully be carried further. In view, however, of the information received from the State Department in paragraph 2 above the time-table has become an important factor. If the United States officials are likely to be ready to discuss further with us by February we feel that it would be a mistake for us not to show corresponding readiness on our side to resume discussions at the earliest practicable moment. On the other hand we attach the highest importance to there being a further exchange of views between our respective officials before any steps are taken to resume conversations with the United States.

5. These considerations lead us to make the suggestion that as a preliminary to resumption of conversations with United States officials a further meeting between our officials and those of Dominion Governments and Government of India should be held in London in February on the several questions covered by the Washington documents. The two sets of discussions, which took place in London in October 1942 and June 1943, were in our view of the greatest possible value and we feel that the holding of a further meeting on the same lines would be greatly to be preferred to any attempt to exchange views and ideas by telegram over such a complicated series of subjects. We very much hope, therefore, that this suggestion will commend itself to you in which event perhaps you would agree that we might aim at say Monday, 21st February, as provisional date for opening of meeting.

6. If this suggestion is acceptable it would, of course, be most important to keep proposed arrangements secret as on previous occasions. Suitable opportunity would, however, be taken to inform United States Government of proposed talks. Ends.

IMPORTANT. SECRET. Your cypher telegram Circular D. 1168 December 24th, suggesting further conferences of officials in London to supplement discussions held in October 1942 and June 1943.

On December 21st State Department suggested that informal exploratory and non-committal discussions be held in Washington between United States and Canadian officials early in January on "an orderly Agenda for future discussions of a more definitive character looking towards implementation of principles set forth in the Exchange of Notes of November 30th, 1942, between the United States and Canada, including commercial policy, the regulation of primary products and related subjects such as private international cartel problems". The invitation has been accepted and discussions will begin January 3rd. It is expected that the discussions will be along similar lines to those with United Kingdom officials in September and October last. It is our intention to support strongly the views already put forward at London and since developed by your officials at Washington for the negotiation of a multilateral Convention of Commerce looking to the reduction of high tariff rates and the removal of barriers to international trade.

It is hoped that these conversations will throw further light on the attitude of the United States Government toward the early opening of general negotiations for the conclusion of a multilateral Convention of Commerce. We are strongly of the opinion that every effort should be made to push forward as rapidly as possible with this project and would be prepared to participate in the meetings you suggest in London on February 21st next or at an earlier date if you consider it practicable.

We are grateful for this information and are glad to know of attitude which will be adopted by your officials in proposed conversations in Washington. It would be very helpful if they could keep our representatives there in touch with the progress of the talks.

2. We are pleased to learn that suggestion for London meeting in February is acceptable to Canadian Government, and fully appreciate your desire that discussions should be pushed forward as rapidly as possible. It has been felt, however, that if full value is to be obtained from proposed meeting, some little time must necessarily be allowed to enable Dominion officials to study Washington documents and obtain instructions from their Governments. After allowing for this and for travelling time from more distant Dominions, February 21st seemed earliest date likely to be practicable.

London, April 7, 1943

MOST SECRET. We have now for some time past had under examination question of post-war civil aviation. It seems to us that time has now come when it would be desirable for us to take the lead in approaching other Governments and in particular the United States Government in the matter. As you are aware, there has been considerable discussion in the United States in which divergent views have been expressed ranging from advocacy of "free air" policy to policy of internationalisation under United Nations control adumbrated by Vice-President Wallace.

2. We have now had two preliminary meetings on the subject with Dominion High Commissioners in London to whom we have communicated reports of the official committees whose advice we have received. As a result, we have reached conclusion that best course is for us now to put forward proposal of full internationalisation after the war of all air transport services. By this we understand a system in which all such services throughout the world would be controlled by one central authority. Such a system should prove most economical owing to advantages of rationalisation and large scale operation and also by securing abandonment of air transport as an instrument of national policy contribute substantially to the security and harmony of the world.

3. If it is generally agreed that this procedure should be adopted it would seem to be desirable that the first approach should be made to the United States Government and we should hope that you should agree also to join with us in commending the proposal to United States Government.

4. If as is quite possible the plan is rejected by United States or other Governments, the question arises what alternative plan would be most advantageous from our point of view and at the same time most likely to command general acceptance. We have, without reaching any final conclusions, given some preliminary consideration to this point and as indicated above have communicated to Dominion High Commissioners in London the results of the work done on this by our advisers. But we think, and trust you will agree, that the best procedure will be to put forward as our proposal the system of complete internationalisation and to invite those who reject that plan to propound their alternative plan for making adequate provision for the necessary development of air transport without imperilling security or provoking a serious clash of national interests. Ends.

Ottawa, April 9, 1943

Dear Mr. Robertson,

Thanks for your letter of April 8th[†] enclosing most secret Dominions Office Circular telegram No. D. 206 of April 7th, on the subject of post-war civil aviation.

I have read the despatch and your draft reply and am wholly in accord with your suggested reply.⁷⁸

In my opinion it will be most unfortunate if the United Kingdom Government force a discussion of post-war aviation at this time. The United States Government is in no mood to consider a policy of full internationalism after the war, and to open the subject would be to invite high pressure work from every commercial airline, with the probable result that the hand of Congress and the President may be forced in the direction of the opposite policy.

Having in mind that the United States have, and are likely to have for some years, a monopoly of modern air transport planes, it seems to me that the policy should be to let the United States lead the way in discussions of international aviation. Canada and the United States are likely to have a common viewpoint, as our problems in international aviation are identical.

Yours very truly,

MOST SECRET. Canada No. 86, Union of South Africa No. 36. My telegram Circular D. 206 of April 7th, civil aviation.

Following is reply from His Majesty's Government in the Commonwealth of Australia in telegram No. 116 of May 13th, Begins: Addressed Secdomin, London, No. 116, repeated Prime Minister, Wellington No. 86. Your telegram Circular D. 206, post-war aviation. Commonwealth Government has carefully considered questions raised by you and agrees that it is desirable for an approach to be made to United States Government on this matter. We assume that if response is favourable early approach will also be made to U.S.S.R. and United Nations.

2. Our view is that the starting point should be an affirmation that civil aviation is subject to those principles of international collaboration which we also hope to see applied to the related problems of a world system of security and post-war economic reorganization. Feel that if any major post-war issue, such as civil aviation, is decided ad hoc along the lines merely of national interest, the general hopes for the settlement of other issues on the international plane will be undermined.

3. As regards the actual content of the approach, we fear that the presentation to the United States of a simple proposal for full internationalisation might arouse suspicion that it is aimed at limiting their undoubted potential advantage in air transportation and might immediately lead to the presentation of an alternative plan designed to conserve purely American interests. We would prefer a more general approach on the issue whether or not the principles and spirit of international collaboration which United States spokesmen have affirmed apply to civil aviation, and if so whether the United States would cooperate in considering ways and means by which such collaboration may be brought about for mutual benefit.

4. For its own part the Commonwealth Government holds the preliminary view that international collaboration in civil aviation for mutual benefit might best be secured through the

(a) General inclusion of all air transport services within the terms of a convention which would supersede and take over the powers of the International Convention on Aerial Navigation⁷⁹ with powers revised and extended to control all international air transport;

(b) Actual operation of certain services, (i.e., main international routes) by an International Air Transport authority.

Such a system should, we consider, be framed to allow:

(a) Devolution by the international authority of its management either within regions or on particular routes;

(b) Special arrangements for the conduct of international services and the conduct of short local services between neighbouring countries under bilateral or multilateral agreements subject to supervision by the International authority.

5. We would emphasize that these are preliminary general ideas only and would hope to be able to make a contribution to practical details of such a scheme at the appropriate time. It seems evident that the settlement of such details will depend partly on the parallel elaboration of a general system of security. Ends.

Until the Government has received and considered the report we are not likely to be able to elaborate the statement of April 2nd.

2. We have studied with interest the reports[†] of the three advisory bodies which the United Kingdom Government have asked to report on aspects of post-war civil aviation⁸¹. These reports have been of great assistance to us.

3. We doubt the wisdom of putting forward to the United States at this stage "proposals" on air transport. Our impression is that to put forward proposals now, and especially proposals for all-out internationalization, would be to court rejection. We think there is much more likelihood of substantial agreement being reached among the United Nations on this important subject if the presentation of specific proposals is deferred for the time being. Moreover we have not yet completed our own examination of the question. When that examination has been completed we would be glad to begin preliminary talks with officials of the Governments of others of the United Nations especially the United Kingdom and the other nations of the Commonwealth, the United States (and the U.S.S.R.). We believe that discussions of this character are an essential preliminary to the making of proposals. It may be that as a result of these informal discussions between officials a number of Governments concerned will find that they are in substantial agreement and they can then put forward generally agreed proposals for the consideration of other Governments.

At the same time we feel that before we enter into informal discussions with United States representatives we should have attempted to reach some general conclusions as to the scheme of post-war air transport which would be generally acceptable to and best serve the interests of the members of the British Commonwealth.

With the object of making rapid progress in the matter and following up the suggestion made by the Canadian Government, we should like to propose that at the earliest convenient date arrangements should be made for a meeting which might be in London, if that is convenient to other Governments, of officials representing the several Governments on a purely informal and exploratory basis with a view to attempting to work out in greater detail the general ideas such as those set out in paragraph 4 of the Commonwealth Government's telegram of May 13th⁸² which could afford the basis for useful informal discussions with United States representatives.

In the meantime we shall continue our own examination of the problem. We shall hope to have some suggestion ready to put before such a meeting and we should welcome any suggestions which you may feel able to contribute. We have been given to understand that the United States representatives may be ready to discuss matters in the course of the next month and we should therefore like to arrange a meeting of representatives of the British Commonwealth at any rate by the middle of June by which time we gather that it is hoped that the Canadian Government will have completed their preliminary survey of the subject. Ottawa, June 1, 1943

There was a brief discussion in War Committee last night on the subject of civil aviation when Mr. Howe raised the question of the despatch from the United Kingdom inviting Canadian participation in informal discussions.⁸³ The only positive attitude advanced in this connection was that of Mr. Howe who was definitely against participation in any negotiations and who emphasized that this aloofness would be the best method of maintaining a strong and independent position for Canada. If the War Committee through lack of interest in the general subject should accept Mr. Howe's position, Canada might find herself relegated to the rank of a minor power in aviation. There is undoubtedly going to be some measure of internationalization in civil aviation, even though it be limited merely to the establishment of an international regulatory body. Canada has the right to be considered one of the major powers in this field, but unless Canada participates actively from the outset in the steps taken towards establishment of whatever agency is set up in the discussions on general international air policy, the government may find itself in an even more difficult position than it did in the Relief and Rehabilitation discussions. It may be added that there would be sound grounds for political criticism of the administration if it even became known that Canada had pursued an isolationist attitude by avoiding these discussions.

POST-WAR CIVIL AVIATION—PROPOSED LONDON MEETING

8. THE SECRETARY read a communication from the U.K. government, proposing early informal discussions in London between Commonwealth representatives, as a preliminary to discussions between the United Kingdom and the United States.

Copies of the communication had been circulated to Ministers concerned.

(Telegram Circular D. 316, Dominions Office to External Affairs, May 27, 1943).

9. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR reported the view of the Air Staff that Canada should take part in the discussions proposed; R.C.A.F. personnel should be included among the Canadian participants.

(Memorandum, Air Member for Air Staff, Department of National Defence for Air to the Chief of the Air Staff, June 2, 1943[†]).

10. MR. POWER felt that Canada should avoid anything which would create the impression that a common front was being established by the members of the Commonwealth. When the time came for international discussion on a broader basis, the government should be in a position to participate therein without previous commitment.

11. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY expressed the opinion that, when the time came for an international conference, Canada should be a major participant, on her own account, not as one of a Commonwealth group. Participation, beforehand, in discussions now proposed by the British Government would, in this respect, prejudice the Canadian position later on.

12. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS suggested that Canadian interests were perhaps even more closely connected with those of the United States than with those of the United Kingdom. Further, the subject was one upon which the views of the U.K. and U.S. governments were likely to be sharply divergent.

Preliminary Commonwealth discussions might be misconstrued in Washington and thereby prejudice subsequent discussions with the United States. Furthermore, it should be noted that the United Kingdom were not proposing multilateral discussions in Washington, following the London meeting, but bilateral discussions with the United States, at which the United Kingdom would represent the interests of the Commonwealth. This would hardly be satisfactory from the Canadian point of view.

It might be preferable to bring the United States into the discussions from the outset at an informal meeting with Commonwealth representatives which might be held at Ottawa.

13. THE PRIME MINISTER agreed with the observations of the Under-Secretary. Without refusing participation in prior Commonwealth discussions, the government might suggest to the U.K. government the preferable alternative of discussions in Ottawa, to which the United States should be invited. If this suggestion were not acceptable to the U.K. government, their proposal for a purely Commonwealth meeting could be reconsidered.

14. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that, as an alternative to the proposed Commonwealth meeting in London, it be suggested to the U.K. government that informal discussions be held in Ottawa and that both Commonwealth and the United States representatives be invited to participate.

Canadian Government agree that early discussion of the international aspects of post-war civil aviation is desirable. We do not feel, however, that preliminary Commonwealth discussions preparatory to United Kingdom discussions with the United States will provide the best approach to mutually satisfactory general arrangements. The suggested analogy with the procedure agreed on for preliminary Commonwealth talks in the field of commercial policy is not very close.

Having in mind that our connections in the civil aviation field with the United States are as close and numerous as our connections with any of the Commonwealth countries, we see obvious objections to course of preliminary consultation in London which might be construed as an attempt to formulate a concerted Commonwealth policy before we had had an opportunity of exchanging views direct with the United States.

In the circumstances we think there is much to be said for inviting the United States to participate from the beginning in the exploratory conversations about civil aviation policy, and would be glad to have such talks take place in Ottawa as soon as the other countries concerned could arrange to be represented here. If this suggestion commends itself to the United Kingdom Government we would be glad to ascertain whether the other Commonwealth Governments and the United States would be ready to take part in such an informal exploratory meeting.

SECRET. My telegram No. 1283, June 9th.

Yesterday afternoon I attended meeting of Special Cabinet Committee called for purpose of discussing proposal for meeting in Ottawa on post-war transport, as conveyed your telegram to Dominions Office No. 96, June 6th. 11 Ministers, 4 High Commissioners and representative of India on War Cabinet were present. There appeared to be general agreement that Ottawa was appropriate place for proposed exploratory conversations and that United States should be invited to meet with United Kingdom and Dominion representatives. It was felt, however, by the meeting that British Commonwealth Governments should have opportunity of exchanging views on, and considering principles relating to post-war civil aviation before entering into conference with United States or other Governments. Secondly, it was also felt that Soviet Government would misunderstand a meeting for such a purpose held between United States and British Commonwealth delegations to which they were not invited, as Russia has such a great interest in the problem of post-war aviation. The Foreign Secretary said that on his return from North America, Soviet Ambassador had made inquiries as to whether subject of post-war aviation policy had been discussed in Washington.

On the first point it was assumed that United Kingdom and Australian, New Zealand and South African delegates would arrive in Ottawa a week or so in advance of the meeting for informal talks with Canadian authorities.

It was decided at the meeting that a brief statement should be drafted immediately by United Kingdom Government giving their views as to the main principles which they think should govern policy. This will be telegraphed to the four Dominions for their consideration, in the hope that these views might be generally acceptable as a basis for discussion. When these exchanges have taken place I am hopeful that United Kingdom Government will agree to proposal for Ottawa meeting, but I think you may assume that they will propose that it should be widened to include representatives of Governments of Soviet Russia and China.

I stressed the inadvisability of confronting the Americans with a cut and dried plan, and I also urged importance of engaging in conversations with the United States authorities with the least possible delay. The meeting appeared to agree with the importance of both points.

Would greatly appreciate early reply giving your views on above for my guidance.

SECRET. Your telegram No. 1336 of June 16. Proposed meeting in Ottawa on post-war air transport.

1. Please inform the United Kingdom Government that, while the Canadian Government sees no objection to an exchange of views between the Commonwealth Governments prior to the proposed meeting, it would not favour preliminary talks in Ottawa between Commonwealth officials since these talks would be open to the same objections as the proposed preliminary conversations in London (see our telegram No. 96 of June 6 to the Dominions Office).

2. You may add that

(a) We are looking forward to receiving from the United Kingdom Government a statement of their views as to the main principles which should govern the post-war organization of air transport and shall be glad to comment on this statement.

(b) We shall be glad to give favourable consideration to a United Kingdom proposal that representatives from the U.S.S.R. and China be invited to the Ottawa meeting, though we feel that if other countries in addition to the Commonwealth countries and United States are invited it will be increasingly difficult to preserve confidential character of discussions and to exclude others of United Nations with obvious interests in post-war civil aviation policy.

(c) In our opinion the meeting in Ottawa should be between officials and not on the ministerial level; it should be informal, exploratory and non-committal.

London, June 30, 1943

IMPORTANT. MOST SECRET. Post-war civil aviation.

Your telegram June 6th, No. 96, and further comments communicated through High Commissioner for Canada on June 24th have been carefully considered by War Cabinet. We are glad to note that Canadian Government agree that early discussion of international aspects of this question is desirable and we welcome suggestion that discussions might be held in Ottawa. United Kingdom Government would be happy to send representatives to a conference either at Ottawa or elsewhere, as may be convenient, at which other British Commonwealth Governments and United States Government would be represented. Having regard, however, to general relations with Soviet Government and to interest which they have shown in civil aviation (Soviet Ambassador has reverted to subject with Foreign Secretary again since date of my telegram April 27th, Circular D. 243¹), we should consider it essential that Soviet Government should be invited to any such conference. If this were to result in United States Government pressing that China should also be invited we should not object and would not consider it a necessary consequence that invitation should be extended to other foreign Governments.

2. We note that Canadian Government are agreeable to an exchange of views between Governments of British Commonwealth prior to proposed international meeting. With a view to facilitating this exchange we are drawing up, and will shortly communicate to Dominion Governments, a statement of our views as to principles on which an approach to an international settlement of problem could most usefully be founded. We shall welcome views of Dominion Governments on this statement, but it seems to us impracticable to deal with this matter fully and satisfactorily by telegram and we consider it essential that there should be an opportunity for preliminary discussions between representatives of members of British Commonwealth on basis of such an exchange of views before entering into international discussions. We attach utmost importance to closest possible collaboration with United States Government on this as on other matters and we well understand special importance to Canada of such collaboration, particularly in field of civil aviation. But we cannot accept position that United States authorities can properly take exception to preliminary consultations between members of British Commonwealth or that there is a serious risk of antagonising United States Government by making arrangements for such consultations. Naturally we should be prepared to give, or join in giving, suitable intimation in advance to United States authorities of our intention to do so. For our part, therefore, we feel bound to make an endeavour to arrange a meeting with representatives of such other members of British Commonwealth as wish to take part in advance of proposed international meeting. Such a meeting might be held either at place of the international meeting or at some other convenient place.

3. As regards status of our representatives at proposed international meeting, our view is that important issues of policy will arise which will call for handling on the Ministerial level. This would, in our view, correspond to probable status of United States delegates, and we think that for this reason also Ministerial representation at proposed conference seems essential.

4. Should be grateful for early expression of further views of Canadian Government in light of above.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION; PROPOSED CONFERENCE

20. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS reported that the U.K. government had now replied to the Canadian proposals regarding the nature and composition of the proposed meeting.

The U.K. government were agreeable to the discussions taking place in Ottawa and including the U.S. government. They continued to feel, however, that preliminary discussions should take place between members of the Commonwealth. They also felt that the U.S.S.R., and possibly China, should be invited, along with the United States. In their view, too, the conference should take place on the ministerial level.

(Telegram, No. 114, Dominions Office to External Affairs, June 30, 1943).

21. MR. ROBERTSON suggested that this reply did not meet the Canadian government's point that the proposed meeting would be more likely to succeed if the United States participated from the outset rather than following Commonwealth discussions.

Furthermore, a "ministerial" conference and the inclusion of China and the U.S.S.R. would inevitably involve publicity and would place on Canada responsibility for excluding other United Nations which might well feel that they were entitled to participate.

22. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY pointed out that civil air transport policy was closely linked with post-war military security. It should be possible, at an international discussion, to agree on certain broad principles which would be acceptable to the United Nations. General international discussions, however, should, if possible, be delayed until the countries concerned were prepared to come to some agreement.

While it would be in Canada's interest to delay action, it appeared that other countries were anxious to proceed with discussions. Further, decisions as to the organization of post-war civil air transport could not be delayed until the conclusion of hostilities. It would be in Canada's interest to play a leading role and nothing should be done to prejudice the chances of Canadian participation in discussions with the United Kingdom and the United States.

23. THE PRIME MINISTER expressed the opinion that Canada could not agree to the U.S. government being excluded from discussions in the initial stages. On the other hand there was no reason why there should not be preliminary exchanges of view in writing between the nations concerned. We should not agree to holding in Canada, at this time, a large international conference of the nature now proposed by the U.K. government.

24. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs prepare, in the light of the discussion, a draft reply to the U.K. government.

MOST SECRET. My telegram of May 27th, Circular D. 316, post-war civil aviation. Our further examination of the problem has now led us to formulate provisionally certain general principles which we should ourselves be ready to adopt as part of a general agreement and to put forward as basis for international discussion. These are set out for consideration of other British Commonwealth Governments in my immediately following telegram. Should be glad to learn your views as soon as possible.

London, July 3, 1943

IMPORTANT. MOST SECRET. Repeated to Southern Rhodesia No. 234. My immediately preceding telegram. Following is statement, Begins: It is now clear that full internationalization of post-war air transport will not meet with general acceptance and it is important that, in the preparation of forthcoming International Conference, the members of the British Commonwealth should reach agreement among themselves on certain general principles, as a basis for discussion with the United States and other nations. The following principles are suggested:

1. The members of the Commonwealth will endeavour to achieve the maximum degree of international cooperation in the development, operation and regulation of air transport in the interests of mankind as a whole.

2. They will support establishment of an International Air Transport authority to administer a convention which would:

(1) Define whatever doctrine of freedom of the air is accepted and require its acceptance by ratifying States (see four below);

(2) Prescribe safety regulations, such as those contained in 1919 Convention, e.g., rules of air, airworthiness, licensing of personnel and aircraft, ground signal meteorological procedure, prohibition of carriage of dangerous goods, etc.; and provide for enforcement of regulations by maintenance of a qualified inspectorate;

(3) Provide for standardization, so far as possible, of radio equipment and technique, ground services and meteorological facilities;

(4) Deal with customs and immigration procedure together with sanitary regulations;

(5) Lay down conditions for exemption of fuel and oil from customs and excise duties;

(6) Provide that States would license only those agencies which both undertook to observe the International Convention and agreed to abide by rulings of Operators Conference (see nine below) as regards rates of carriage, frequencies, etc. States should undertake to withdraw license from any airline which disregarded these obligations;

(7) Provide that if any State failed to withdraw a license in the circumstances referred to, the other States participating in the Convention would deny facilities to airline concerned;

(8) Provide for collection and review of information about services maintained, operational costs, nature and extent of subsidies, rates of carriage, landing fees, etc.;

(9) Secure recognition of principle that all states should be responsible for provision in accordance with specifications laid down in the Convention of ground facilities needed in their territories. (In the case of countries unable or unwilling to provide for the necessary facilities, special arrangements involving financial assistance would probably be necessary; in the case of ex-enemy countries, the facilities would need to be administered and controlled internationally);

(10) Provide for arbitration machinery to decide appeals against imposition of unreasonable landing fees and servicing charges, etc.

3. The members of the Commonwealth will support the establishment of international operating agencies on particular routes or in particular areas, especially in the case of services now operated by enemy airlines in Europe and in the Far East.

4. In principle, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom would welcome a greater measure of "freedom of the air" than existed before the war. They hold the view, however, that this question cannot be considered as a separate and self-contained issue and that extent to which freedom of the air can be realized must depend on general acceptance of an enlightened international settlement.

5. Subject to the above, "freedom of the air" is understood by the United Kingdom Government to mean the following:

(1) The right of innocent passage;

(2) The right to land for non-traffic purposes (e.g., refuelling, repair, emergency, etc.);

(3) The right to land passengers, mails and freight embarked in aircraft's own country of origin.

6. The Convention should not preclude its signatories from dealing with the following rights by direct negotiations between any two or more countries concerned:

(1) The right to embark passengers, mails and freight destined for aircraft's own country of origin;

(2) The right to convey passengers, mails and freight between two countries neither being the aircraft's own country of origin;

(3) The right to convey passengers, mails and freight between two points in any one country not being the aircraft's own country of origin. These last three questions appear to be appropriate for negotiations between individual signatories to general Convention and this would give fullest scope for members of Commonwealth to make individual arrangements, both amongst themselves and also with foreign countries.

7. The members of the Commonwealth will, subject to above principles, seek to develop intra-Imperial services on a co-operative basis to fullest extent, either by joint arrangement between chosen instruments of United Kingdom and Dominion Government respectively by creation of a Commonwealth Air Transport Operating Corporation, or by any other method.

8. The members of the Commonwealth will combine to develop aeronautical education, research, and technical developments to fullest extent.

9. In order to eliminate uneconomic competition as far as possible, and to keep subsidies within reasonable bounds, it would be desirable to regulate by agreement the frequency of services and quotas, the standards of passenger accomodation, the rates of carriage, etc. Some of these questions are perhaps not best handled in first instance by Governmental negotiation and it might be preferable to leave them to be agreed to by operating agencies concerned through some machinery similar to that of a shipping conference, subject to endorsement where appropriate by international authority. Agreement on rates, frequencies, etc., combined with right to adequate ground services by countries concerned, should help to limit scale of cash subsidies.

10. The problem of continental Europe is a particularly difficult one in which considerations of security must necessarily play a primary part. It will probably have to be settled in principle (in conjunction with United States and U.S.S.R.) within framework of post-war security before it can be discussed with other United Nations. Provision will have to be made for various trunk routes which will necessarily pass through continental Europe, but, as regards continent's internal services, it might be desirable to secure agreement upon constitution of a single international operating organization to undertake the operation of all services in continental Europe, the whole continent being regarded as one unit for this purpose. It would, however, be necessary to take account of desire of certain countries, e.g., France, the Netherlands, etc., to operate services of their own from their European territories to their overseas possessions. Ends.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION; PROPOSED CONFERENCE

1. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS submitted a draft telegram to the U.K. government, prepared in the light of the discussion of the British proposals at the meeting of July 2nd.

It was proposed that the U.K. government be informed that Canada would be unable to participate in a prior Commonwealth meeting in advance of discussions with the United States on the grounds that the chances of substantial international agreement would be lessened by such a prior meeting. Moreover, in view of the proposed extension of the conference to include the U.S.S.R. and China and to place the discussions on a ministerial level, the Canadian government no longer felt that the meeting should be held in Ottawa.

(Draft telegram, External Affairs to Canadian High Commissioner, London, July 7, 1943[†]).

2. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, approved the despatch of a communication to the U.K. government in the sense of the draft submitted, and agreed that it be revised in certain particulars.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION; GENERAL POLICY

3. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS submitted a message from the U.K. government proposing that the members of the Commonwealth reach agreement on certain general principles to govern post-war international air transport as a basis for discussion with the United States and other nations. The message contained a statement of such principles for the consideration of Dominion governments.

(Telegrams D. 388 and D. 389, Dominions Office to External Affairs, dated July 2 and 3, 1943).

4. MR. ROBERTSON pointed out that the arguments against a prior Commonwealth meeting were also applicable to the adoption by members of the Commonwealth of agreed general principles in advance of an international conference or consultation with the U.S. government. There would not be the same objection, however, to a preliminary exchange of views upon the principles suggested by the United Kingdom.

The U.K. government's message expressed the view that full internationalization was not now feasible. The Canadian government had not expressed themselves as opposing internationalization but had pointed out that the time did not appear suitable for proposing such a policy to the United States. The present British proposals went not nearly so far in this respect.

5. THE PRIME MINISTER expressed the view that, while full internationalization might not prove acceptable, nevertheless it should not be ruled out, at this stage, before general international discussions had taken place.

The Commonwealth countries should exchange views on these questions but should not seek to reach prior agreement which might prejudice the course of subsequent international discussions.

6. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY felt that internationalization would not be an acceptable or workable policy.

Canada should retain full control of all landing rights on Canadian soil, and should negotiate with each country wishing to obtain permission to land at Canadian points. Moreover, Canada should insist that negotiations for such rights be carried on between governments and not between private companies.

7. MR. ROBERTSON suggested that Canada had a special interest in internationalization of her northwestern air routes between the U.S.S.R. and the United States.

8. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussions, agreed:

(a) that the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs prepare, in the light of the discussion, a draft communication to the U.K. government regarding the proposal that the members of the Commonwealth reach agreement on general principles of air transport policy as a basis for wider international discussions; and,

(b) that the general principles of policy suggested by the U.K. government be referred to the Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport for consideration and report.

Ottawa, July 9, 1943

MOST SECRET. Your telegram No. 1472 of July 2^d. Post-war civil aviation.

Please give the United Kingdom Government a reply to Dominions Office telegram No. 114 of June 30 along the following lines:

1. Desirability of prior Commonwealth consultations:

We regret that the earlier exchanges of views have not made our position clear. Our opinion that it would be inadvisable to hold a meeting between the nations of the Commonwealth prior to the planned meeting with the United States was based on our belief that in this field of air transport policy the chances of getting substantial international agreement on a desirable policy would be lessened by the holding of prior Commonwealth discussions. We fully recognize the force of the general arguments for holding prior Commonwealth discussions, but we feel that in this case the disadvantages outweigh the advantages. Our view, which is supported by the advice of our Legation in Washington, is that there is a real danger that the proposed discussions would be misunderstood in Washington and that any such misunderstanding would be an inauspicious beginning for the wider talks. This is the sole basis for our attitude toward the United Kingdom proposal that prior Commonwealth consultations should take place.

2. For these reasons the Canadian Government regrets that it would be unable to participate in a meeting with representatives of the other nations of the British Commonwealth in advance of the proposed international meeting with the United States. We feel that the beneficial results which the United Kingdom Government would expect to emerge from such prior discussions can be achieved by a preliminary exchange of views in writing between Commonwealth Governments. Indeed we are at present engaged in preparing our comments upon the United Kingdom's suggested statement of general principles.

3. Place and character of discussions:

When in our telegram No.96 of June 6, we said that we would be glad to have talks on air transport take place in Ottawa, we were thinking in terms of discussions which would be restricted to officials of the Commonwealth nations and the United States, which would not be on the ministerial level, and which would be informal and exploratory. Our view has been that a conference on the ministerial level should be postponed until there was reason to believe that some form of fairly specific agreement could be reached. We felt that a considerable amount of purely informal, exploratory and noncommittal discussions between officials would be required before initiating discussions between ministers. It is now proposed by the United Kingdom not only to extend the discussions to countries other than the Commonwealth nations and the United States but also to place the discussions on the ministerial level. In the circumstances we are not in a position to undertake the calling of the meeting.

4. The issues involved in the forthcoming international discussions on air transport are very large. Unless the United Nations can reach agreement on satisfactory air policies, the prospects of achieving an enduring peace settlement will be slight. This is why we feel as we do about a line of preliminary approach which, it seems to us, may prejudice the chances of successful agreement.

REPORT FROM THE INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE ON AIR TRANSPORT POLICY ON THE DRAFT PRINCIPLES OF POST-WAR AIR TRANSPORT POLICY FORWARDED BY THE UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT

I The United Kingdom Government has drafted for the consideration of the other nations of the Commonwealth a provisional statement of the general principles of air transport policy which it would be ready to put forward as a basis for discussion with the United States and other nations and to adopt as part of a general international agreement. The United Kingdom believes that it is important that, prior to the forthcoming international discussions on air transport policy, the five nations of the Commonwealth should reach agreement on a statement of this character. They have, therefore, asked for our comments on their draft statement.

II The Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport Policy recommends that a reply along the following lines be sent to Mr. Massey by despatch for transmission to the United Kingdom Government, and that summaries of the reply be cabled to the Canadian High Commissioners in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa for transmission to the Governments of those countries:

COMMENTS OF THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT ON THE PROVISIONAL STATEMENT OF POLICY ON AIR TRANSPORT CONTAINED IN DOMINIONS OFFICE
CIRCULAR TELEGRAM NO. D.389 OF JULY 3, 1943

1. The Canadian Government welcomes this most useful draft statement of United Kingdom views and is glad to accept the invitation of the United Kingdom Government that it offer its comments for the consideration of the United Kingdom and the other Commonwealth Governments.

2. The Canadian Government, however, is of the opinion that it would be premature at this stage for any group of governments to attempt to reach agreement on a joint statement of the character proposed by the United Kingdom Government. At a later stage in the international discussions over air transport policy it may be desirable for groups of governments to present joint agreed proposals for the consideration of other governments. Such a procedure was indeed contemplated in our reply of May 22, 1943⁸⁴, to Dominions Office circular telegram D. 206 of April 7. One advantage in postponing the presentation of joint agreed statements until after preliminary informal and noncommittal international conversations have taken place is that the statements can then be framed in the light of the ideas and interests of other governments as expressed in these discussions. The authorship of the principles set forth in the statement thus becomes ambiguous — an advantage in international discussions of this character where it is unwise for alternative schemes to be identified with particular actions. In our opinion there is danger that the success of subsequent negotiations will be prejudiced by the presentation of joint agreed statement at this stage. In this connection we have noted with interest the view of the South African Government that a precise or complete formulation of policy before discussions with the United States is unnecessary and we concur in their opinion that "It might well, in fact, prove to be a positive advantage in this difficult and specially susceptible field to engage in preliminary United States conversations without any cut and dried scheme allowing positive ideas to emerge from an initial acceptance of the need for collaboration".

3. Our opinion is that at this stage it is more important that any statement of national policy stress broad principles and objectives than that it advocate any particular method of attaining these objectives. We concur in the opinion of the Australian Government (their telegram No. 116 of May 13)⁸⁵ that the starting point in the forthcoming international discussions should be an affirmation that air transport must be made subject to those principles of international collaboration which we also hope to see applied to the related problems of a world system of security and post-war economic reorganization and that if any major post-war issue, such as civil aviation, is decided ad hoc along the lines merely of national interest, the general hopes for the settlement of other issues on the international plane will be undermined. The intimate relationship between air transport policy and any future world system of security might well be emphasized, namely, the effect on the disarmament efforts in the inter-war period of the failure to subject air transport to effective international control, the dangerous pre-war Axis penetration of the air transport systems in Latin America, the fact that national air transport companies and national aircraft industries constitute a war potential of great and ever-increasing importance, the danger that unless there is a wise and far-seeing settlement of air transport policy international controversies over air transport will embitter international relations and thus make more difficult the task of preserving peace. There might also usefully be included in the statement an appreciation of the vital role which air transport, freed from national rivalries and uneconomic competition, might play in developing the resources of the world and in increasing understanding among the peoples of the world. This would indicate the close relationship between future air transport policy and world prosperity.

4. We also believe that a statement of the kind envisaged by the United Kingdom might usefully set forth the larger considerations, so clearly put forward in the Shelmardine, Finlay and Barlow reports, which have been influential in leading the United Kingdom government to decide to reject as undesirable both the pre-war system of bilateral and multilateral bargaining and unrestricted freedom of the air.

5. We note that the United Kingdom government is of the opinion that it is now clear that full internationalization of post-war air transport will not meet with general acceptance. While we have expressed doubts about the tactical wisdom of the previous United Kingdom proposal to put up a scheme of all-out internationalization to the United States, we believe that no policy which might prove feasible should be eliminated from discussion in advance of the international meetings and we are therefore of the opinion that the forthcoming international meetings should discuss the merits and demerits of full international-ization and of partial internationalization and of any other policy which might prove feasible.

6. Three of the main proposals of the United Kingdom are:

- (a) the establishment of an international air transport authority which would administer an international air transport convention;
- (b) the establishment of international operating agencies on particular routes or in particular areas such as the continent of Europe; and
- (c) cooperation by the members of the Commonwealth in technical developments and in the development of aeronautical education and research.

There would appear to us to be advantages in setting up a single world authority which might have three main divisions: a regulatory division with functions of the character of those proposed by the United Kingdom for an international air transport authority; an operating division which would control and supervise airlines on such routes and in such areas as it may be found desirable to subject to international operation; a research division which would encourage the development of aeronautical education and research. Such a single world authority would be the international instrument for attaining the high purposes set forth in the first paragraph of the United Kingdom statement; the achievement in the interests of mankind as a whole of the maximum degree of international cooperation in the threefold aspects of air transport — regulation, operation and development. Under the world authority regional authorities might usefully be set up.

7. Subject to the considerations set forth above, we have the following more detailed comments to make on the United Kingdom provisional statement:

- (a) Paragraph 1 and subparagraphs 2,3,4,5 and 8 of paragraph 3: We agree.
- (b) Subparagraph 1 of paragraph 2 and paragraphs 4 and 6 — Freedom of the air. We agree that the extent to which “freedom of the air” can, in the general world interest, be granted depends on the acceptance by the nations of the world of an enlightened international settlement on air transport. In any discussion of freedom of the air, we consider that it would be wise to adopt the terms used by Mr. Payne, Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board of the United States, in his speech of April 9th, 1943: the right of commercial air transit and the right of commercial outlet. The former includes the right of innocent passage and the right to land for non-traffic purposes. The latter includes the right to land in order to take on and discharge passengers, mail and freight. In view of Canada’s position on a number of the most important international air routes, Canada would be making a considerable sacrifice of immediate national interests if, under an international air transport convention, it gave to the aircraft of all signatories of the convention the right of commercial air transit over Canada. Our agreement to the right of commercial air transit would thus constitute a substantial contribution by Canada to an enlightened international settlement and our agreement would therefore be contingent on the other signatories to the convention being willing to make comparable contributions in order to make possible the establishment of an effective and satisfactory world authority which would be capable of achieving the development, operation and regulation of air transport in the interests of mankind as a whole.

(c) Subparagraphs 6 and 7 of paragraph 2 – Licensing. We agree that states should license only those agencies which undertake to observe the terms of the international convention. We have doubts, however, about the proposals for operators' conferences. (See subparagraph (i) below).

(d) Subparagraph 9 of paragraph 2 – Ground facilities. Owing to the large area of Canada and its position on major international air routes, this proposal raises questions of such direct and immediate importance to Canada that we are not prepared at present to comment. We are giving the matter further consideration.

(e) Subparagraph 10 of paragraph 2 – Arbitration machinery. The international convention should provide that in the imposition of landing fees and services charges, where the operating conditions and the size of the aircraft used are similar, there should be no discrimination between domestic aircraft and the aircraft of any signatory of the convention. The arbitration machinery to decide appeals against the imposition of unreasonable fees and charges should be provided by the world regulatory authority.

(f) Paragraphs 3 and 10 – International operating agencies on particular routes such as those now operated by enemy airlines in Europe and the Far East and in particular areas such as the continent of Europe. We agree that an international operating agency for the continent of Europe may well be desirable. We also agree that the ex-enemy powers should certainly not be permitted, for at least a probationary period, to own and operate airlines and we would add that, in order to accomplish this objective, it will be necessary to prevent those powers from securing control of airlines in other countries under the cloak of dummy companies. We do not think that the fact that a particular airline outside Europe may now be operated by enemy interests constitutes of itself sufficient grounds for deciding that it should be operated by an international agency.

(g) Paragraph 7 – Development of intra-Commonwealth services on a co-operative basis. In our opinion it would be premature at this stage, when no international discussions have taken place, to attempt to define with any precision the nature of the post-war cooperation between the nations of the Commonwealth on the development of air services between them.

(h) Paragraph 8 – Aeronautical education, etc. We believe that cooperation in the development of aeronautical education and research should be on the widest possible basis. That is why we suggested in paragraph 6 above that this should be one of the three main functions of the world authority.

(i) Paragraph 9 and subparagraph 6 of paragraph 2 – Operators' conferences. We are doubtful of the wisdom of encouraging the holding of operators' conferences for the purpose of reaching agreement on frequency of services, standards of passenger accommodation and rates of carriage. One objection we see to this proposal is that operators' conferences would not contain representatives of users' interests in each country or of the interests of countries which are not operating airlines on that route. We agree that there must be some control of subsidies but we are not yet ready to propose a method of attaining this objective. We are giving the matter further consideration.

(j) Paragraph 10 — The problem of the continent of Europe. While we agree that considerations of security must necessarily play a primary part in determining the proper organization of air transport in the continent of Europe, we feel that the problem in Europe differs only in degree from problems elsewhere in the world and that it would be unwise to withdraw consideration of the European problem from the general international discussions. Indeed, we think that a discussion of the European problem can provide a useful introduction to the whole question of the relationship of air transport policy to problems of world security and would make clear the necessity of considering the problems of air transport not as predominantly commercial problems but as predominantly political and security problems. Unless the nations of the world can make this common approach to the problems of air policy, the prospects of achieving an enlightened international settlement of this question will be slight.

London, July 23, 1943

MOST SECRET. Your telegram No. 1181, July 9th, and my telegram No. 1583, July 13th¹, Air Transport Policy.

I have received the following communication from the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, Begins:

2. As regards the question of prior Commonwealth consultations, we are of course, entirely in sympathy with the main object which I understand your Government has in view, namely the need for securing a satisfactory agreement with the United States Government on this subject. At the same time, we are anxious to ensure that the fullest possible measure of agreement is reached between members of the British Commonwealth, and we feel that, in view of the importance of the issues raised, it may not be possible to secure agreement by correspondence. While we do not wholly share the view of your Government that preliminary discussion between the members of the Commonwealth should lead to difficulties with the United States Government, we are anxious to find some solution of this problem which should not be open to the difficulties which your Government see in the matter. We therefore suggest that, when the replies of the various Governments to our telegrams of the 3rd July⁸⁶, setting out our general provisional views on the question are received, there should then be a meeting between members of the Government here and yourself and the other Dominion High Commissioners in London, attended, if practicable, by any necessary experts who may be coming from the Dominions to attend the proposed international meeting. This meeting which need not be publicized in any way should, we suggest, take place about a fortnight in front of the date of the international gathering which we hope that the Canadian Government would call to meet in Canada.

3. As regards the question of representation at the proposed international gathering, we agree that the work of such a conference must inevitably be of a consultative and exploratory character. The United States and Soviet representatives at such a meeting are unlikely to be Ministers of Cabinet rank and moreover, it is clear that full decisions could not be taken by such a conference but would have to be left to a subsequent conference representative of all the United Nations, or at any rate those mainly interested in civil aviation.

4. At the same time, for Parliamentary reasons here, we feel that it would be inadvisable that the United Kingdom representation at such a conference should consist solely of officials, and we think that the most useful precedent would be that of the delegation sent to the recent Food Conference at Hot Springs, at which, it will be recalled, a delegation of officials was headed by a Parliamentary Under-Secretary.

5. I should be glad to learn whether the above suggestions would be acceptable to the Canadian Government. If so, we suggest that the next step would be that the Canadian Government should issue the necessary invitations to the United States and Soviet Governments and to the other members of the British Commonwealth to attend a consultative and exploratory conference in Canada and that we should at the same time issue an invitation to the members of the Commonwealth to agree that, when their replies to our talk [sic] of July 3rd have been received, these should be discussed at a meeting in London between United Kingdom Ministers and the respective High Commissioners attended by such experts as can be made available in order to clear up any outstanding points.

6. I should be glad to learn as soon as possible the views of your Government on the above suggestion.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION

25. THE UNITED KINGDOM PRIME MINISTER referred to the difference of opinion between the U.K. and Canadian governments with regard to the advisability of special Commonwealth discussions, in advance of a meeting with the United States and other countries.

It was difficult to see how the U.S. government could reasonably take exception to such prior Commonwealth discussions. It would be a natural and proper thing for the nations of the Commonwealth to hold a "family council" in such circumstances.

26. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY referred to the position of the United States air lines who were laying plans for large expansion after the war, including extensive developments northward, over Canadian territory.

Under these conditions it would be unwise for Canada to embark upon any formulation of policy with other nations, without some prior opportunity for obtaining the views of the U.S. government.

27. THE CANADIAN PRIME MINISTER said that it was the view of the Canadian government that the institution of prior Commonwealth discussions, on these important questions, would create, in the United States, the impression that the members of the Commonwealth were seeking to achieve a common policy before consulting the U.S. government, and would thereby prejudice the course of any subsequent international conference and the hope of achieving a satisfactory result.

This was true in other fields of post-war policy, as well as in civil aviation.

28. MR. CHURCHILL said that he had recently made international air transport his own special concern. It was his intention to hold preliminary discussions, on the subject, with the President. During the coming week Mr. King would participate with him in discussing the subject with Mr. Roosevelt.

The U.K. government and other members of the Commonwealth were, however, anxious to have exploratory discussions among themselves. For that reason it was intended to proceed on this basis, whether or not Canada felt able to participate.

At the same time, Canada's position vis-à-vis the United States would be strengthened if members of the Commonwealth could reach common agreement.

29. THE MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES pointed out that Canada's reluctance to participate in Commonwealth discussions arose not so much from fear that the U.S. government itself would misunderstand the purpose of such discussions, but rather from apprehension as to the influence upon American opinion and policy of the powerful private companies which controlled air transport in that country.

Discussions on general post-war air policy, from which the United States were excluded, would present the private air lines with an opportunity to exert powerful pressure which would prejudice satisfactory international negotiations on a wider basis.

30. MR. CHURCHILL said that this was an element in the Canadian position which had not, perhaps, been appreciated by the U.K. government. The Lord President of the Council would bring it to the attention of their colleagues in the War Cabinet, upon his return.

31. IT WAS UNDERSTOOD that the general question would be raised by Mr. Churchill, at Hyde Park, and be discussed further in subsequent conversations between the President, Mr. Churchill and Mr. King.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION; COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE; POLICY

11. THE UNITED KINGDOM PRIME MINISTER said that he had not had an opportunity, since last meeting with the War Committee, of going into this question with President Roosevelt. He intended to do so, however, during his forthcoming visit to Washington. The Canadian government would be kept informed of the results of these discussions.

Meanwhile, the U.K. government remained of the opinion that early Commonwealth discussions were an essential preliminary to any broader international conference. It was unlikely that the U.S. government would take any exception to such a prior meeting and he proposed to raise the point with Mr. Roosevelt. We could not forego our right to "family" councils on these matters.

12. THE PRIME MINISTER pointed out that the Canadian objection to a prior Commonwealth meeting had arisen from a desire to avoid creating an unfavourable impression in the United States which would prejudice the prospects of a satisfactory solution of these important international questions.

If, in advance of any Commonwealth discussions, it were clearly understood by U.S. authorities that such a meeting would be informal and exploratory and that it would in no way prejudice the freedom of action of the participants, the Canadian government would be prepared to reconsider their objections to being represented at a meeting in London.

As to the locale of any subsequent international gathering, when Canada had suggested that discussions might be held in Ottawa, it had been contemplated that they would be confined to representatives of the Commonwealth countries and the United States. Subsequently, the United Kingdom had proposed the inclusion of Soviet and, possibly, Chinese representatives (though not of other United Nations). This proposal had altered the situation. In the light of developments the Canadian government were not prepared, at this time, to undertake the sponsoring of an international conference.

13. MR. CHURCHILL read from a paper of June 22, 1943⁸⁹, which contained a statement of his own provisional views on civil aviation and had been prepared for consideration by the U.K. War Cabinet. He would welcome the comments of the Prime Minister upon the views therein set out.

Many people felt that at present complete internationalization was an unattainable ideal. There was much to be said for the principle of "a fair field and no favour".

14. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY expressed the opinion that Canadian policy should be based upon free interchange of air traffic with each country exercising a reasonable control over its own territory.

A strong international board should be set up by international agreement with powers of control and regulation.

15. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, noted that Mr. Churchill would, in the near future, discuss with President Roosevelt the subject of post-war international air transport and would communicate the result of these discussions to the Canadian government, and agreed:

(1) that Canada consent to be represented at a preliminary Commonwealth meeting on the subject, in London, in the near future, on the understanding that the meeting be informal and exploratory and involve no commitment on the part of the government, and that the nature of the meeting be fully understood, in advance, by the U.S. government; and,

(2) that the questions of the basis and locale of any subsequent international conference stand over for subsequent consideration.

civil aviation.

The difficulty of getting agreement among the Dominions at this stage should not prevent the formulation of British policy after consultation with them. At the same time it is important and urgent to ascertain the views and wishes of the United States. Everything will be much easier if an informal understanding is reached with them. It would be well in the first instance to find out what the President thinks about it all, and after we have somewhat shaped our views I shall be ready to address him personally.

Mémorandum

London, June 22, 1943

CIVIL AVIATION

1. The background of present discussions about Post-War Civil Aviation is dominated by memories of pre-war chaos and fears of the intentions of certain American interests. Before the war practically every country ran highly subsidised and uneconomic air lines in cut-throat competition with its neighbours; small Powers levied blackmail on lines passing over their territories; military prohibitions on numerous frontiers entailed long detours. Since the war United States interests have, in the course of coming to our aid, established themselves on a number of routes; and their aircraft industry is in a better position than ours to step into civil aviation the moment war ends.

2. Excessive hopes are, I fear, founded upon the widespread belief that after the war we shall have to build civil aircraft in great numbers, and that here is a field in which the means of avoiding unemployment may be found. In fact, however, there is no industry which will undergo a more intense and severe contraction than the aircraft industry, including all branches of its splendid, skilled personnel. We must not lose our sense of proportion in presence of the vast scale of the war effort in the air, or imagine that anything like this prodigy of wartime flying can be maintained by mankind in the present age. No doubt as recovery from war devastation sets in, many more people will travel by air; but this will occupy hardly a tithe of the aircraft now carrying bombs to Germany. Civil aircraft last so long, perhaps four years, they are exposed to so few risks and have such a quick turn-round, that a very large traffic can be supported by a very small annual output.

3. Taking our own country as an example, less than a million and a half passengers left this island for Europe by sea and air in a good pre-war year. If all of these were carried by air, they would not require, I am informed, more than about 150 aircraft in running order with, say, an additional 100 for holiday periods. The number of travellers from here to other Continents was under 150,000. Having regard to the longer turn-round, these could be carried in, say, another 150 planes. Hence, even if all passengers leaving these shores went by air, a fleet of 1,000 civil aircraft would be more than ample to carry them. Considerably less than 40 new aircraft built a month would suffice to maintain this fleet as compared with the 400 heavy bombers a month we shall soon be making. These figures are merely illustrations. It will probably be many years before the development of mail, freight and passenger traffic will supersede this general picture.

4. Our two earliest studies of post-war civil aviation[†] have recommended complete internationalisation. If by this is meant a kind of Volapuk Esperanto cosmopolitan organisation managed and staffed by committees of all peoples great and small, with pilots of every country from Peru to China (especially China), flying every kind of machine in every direction, many people will feel that this is at present an unattainable ideal. It is unnecessary, however, now to consider the argument for and against this and kindred proposals, since they are clearly unacceptable to the United States, the Dominions and probably Russia. We must agree upon some less high-spirited line of approach to guide us in the forthcoming international discussions.

5. After the war some world organisation, or some grouping of Continental Councils, will be set up for maintaining peace. Air power resulting from civil aviation will necessarily be subject to the control of this body or bodies. We must be careful not to stereotype development, and there is much to be said for the principle of "a fair field and no favour". Any disputes that arise should be referred for adjustment to bodies set up under the world organisation.

6. Within this framework the three main facets of our policy seem to be:

1. For strategic and political reasons, we must develop under our control large, efficient air lines binding the British Commonwealth and Empire together. Owing to the long hauls, low payloads, and the need for services which cannot be justified on purely commercial grounds, these will be costly.

2. We should, of course, expand internal air lines so far as practicable. This expansion is unlikely to be large because distances in the United Kingdom are so short that the time taken to reach the airfields from the city centres will make it hard for the air lines to compete with our excellent railway and motor services, at any rate until helicopter feeding services or some equivalent are developed.

3. The best size for an air transport system is an area containing large towns 200 or 300 miles apart, like the United States of America, or the U.S.S.R., or Europe. We should make a strong British effort to excel in the profitable European traffic.

7. The following fundamental topics will have to form part of a general convention:

1. Everyone agrees that some minimum of international regulation is necessary concerning navigation devices, safety standards, meteorological services, customs, quarantine, etc. Methods of putting this into effect and financing it will have to be agreed.

2. It is reasonably assumed (on the analogy of roads, lighthouses, etc.) that each Government will provide airfields, ground facilities, meteorological services, etc., in its own territory. (Assistance might have to be given to small countries like Iraq.) Methods of fixing landing charges, etc., will have to be agreed.

3. We have also to find a fair via media between the principle of a nation's sovereignty over its own air (which strictly applied would hamper development) and the doctrine of the Freedom of the Air, which unbridled would be rejected.

8. This third topic is likely to be the most difficult. The main stages involved are:

- (i) The right of innocent passage.
- (ii) The right to land for non-traffic purposes.
- (iii) The right to land passengers and freight embarked in the aircraft's own country of origin.
- (iv) The right to embark passengers, etc., destined for the aircraft's own country of origin.
- (v) The right to embark and set down passengers, etc., at two intermediate points (whether in the same country or not) en route.
- (vi) The right of nationals of any country to run an air service between one foreign country and another.
- (vii) The right of nationals of any country to run air services inside other foreign countries.

Points (i), (ii) and (iii) are, I observe commended in the Memorandum by the Minister without Portfolio (W.P. (43) 251)[†]. Points (iv), (v) and (vi) are more controversial; but, subject to certain safeguards about subsidies to be mentioned presently, we should press for them if our basic policy is to be "a fair field and no favour". Whether these safeguards would also justify us in adopting point (vii) should be carefully considered.

9. A convention containing these points alone would not prevent the evils and shortcomings of pre-war days, and we should perhaps be inadequately protected against Pan-American infiltration in the immediate post-war period. These difficulties could, however, be largely met if the scope of the body or bodies working under the World Council or under Continental Councils dealing with aviation comprised the ascertainment and regulation of any subsidies paid. Admittedly this is a difficult task, but it should not be beyond the wit of man to deal with it. In America, I understand Congress already insists upon the publication of detailed accounts as a condition of giving subsidies.

10. If we could discover what subsidies were being received, the difficulties about accepting points (iv), (v) and (vi), and possibly (vii), could be met by a condition that no subsidised air line — or at any rate no line subsidised beyond an agreed general minimum — could of right take up or set down passengers or freight in another country's territory. Any government would be free to subidise its own internal lines as much as it wished. Such an arrangement would enable us to subsidise our Commonwealth and Imperial Air Lines, as we shall have to do, but would save us from unfair competition in running services between various sovereign European countries. Possibly special intra-Empire arrangements might be wanted to safeguard air lines inside certain Dominions against British competition.

We should, of course, closely investigate whether and to what extent Mr. Berle's alternative suggestion about an agreement on rates might meet the ends we have in view.

11. It might be convenient to form some, ostensibly, international corporation to run all the Air Services in Western Europe. With Germany and Italy forbidden ownership of aircraft, and the remaining countries newly rescued from them, and dependent on us for all sorts of help, it should not be impossible for us to play a leading part in this body. Whether the Americans would agree to this territory having (for purposes of the above-mentioned subsidy privilege) the status of a national unit will have to be explored. Perhaps we could offer them an acceptable quid pro quo in South America.

Questions not conflicting with the general agreements could be dealt with by bilateral negotiations.

12. These notes concern themselves only with the international aspects of civil aviation. Many arguable domestic issues will arise in applying these principles. Should there be one corporation controlling all British air lines or a number of rival companies, what should be the position of the shipping and railway lines; on what system should British subsidies, if any, be paid; what should be the degree of Government control; what Ministry should be responsible and so forth? Discussion of these points should not obstruct or delay the creation of the main international framework.

SECRET. Your telegram No. 1699 of July 23. Discussions on air transport policy.

1. The question of the holding of a preliminary Commonwealth meeting to discuss air transport policy has been discussed by the War Committee on two occasions with Mr. Churchill. Mr. Churchill is also going to bring the matter up in his discussions with Mr. Roosevelt this week. He is to give us a report of these discussions and as soon as we receive this report I shall transmit it to you.

2. As a result of the discussions with Mr. Churchill, he was informed at the meeting of War Committee on August 31, that the Canadian government would participate in a preliminary Commonwealth meeting in London in the near future on the understanding that the meeting be informal and exploratory and involve no commitments on the part of the government and that the nature of the meeting be fully understood by the United States government.

3. As to the locale of any subsequent international gathering, it was made clear to Mr. Churchill at the War Committee meeting that when Canada had suggested that discussions might be held in Ottawa it had been contemplated that they would be confined to representatives of the Commonwealth countries and the United States. Subsequently, the United Kingdom had proposed the inclusion of Soviet and possibly Chinese representatives (though not of other United Nations). This proposal had altered the situation. In the light of developments the Canadian government is not prepared, at this time, to undertake the sponsoring of an international conference.

4. We are now preparing a statement of our views on the nature of the Commonwealth and international discussions. As soon as this is approved I shall send it to you for transmission to the United Kingdom government.

5. I should be interested in learning whether the United Kingdom government expects to receive soon the replies of the Australian, New Zealand and South African governments to their circular telegram of July 3 setting forth a provisional statement of their views on air transport.

27. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS reported that the U.K. government had now been notified of Canada's willingness to participate in Commonwealth discussions, in accordance with the decision of August 31st, and submitted a draft despatch as to the nature of the conference and subsequent international meetings on civil aviation questions. Copies had been sent to those immediately concerned.

(Draft despatch, Secretary of State for External Affairs to Canadian High Commissioner, London, Sept. 4, 1943¹).

28. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY felt that it would be inadvisable for Canada, in any way, to commit herself in advance of the London discussions. It would be preferable to withhold our expressions of view until the meeting itself.

At the same time, it would be desirable to obtain, informally, some indication of U.S. views before the Commonwealth meeting took place.

29. THE PRIME MINISTER pointed out that comments on the U.K. Prime Minister's memorandum on air transport, submitted at the meeting of August 31st, should be made available to the U.K. government at an early date.

30. MR. ROBERTSON expressed the opinion that, at an early stage in the London meetings, Canada should attempt to clarify the position with regard to the 1935 Agreement.⁹⁰

31. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the communication submitted be not sent and that consideration of the general question be deferred pending further study of Mr. Churchill's memorandum.

1. I have discussed civil aviation question with the President. I made it clear that we regard a preliminary Conference as purely British Empire and Commonwealth affair, but that, on account of our present intimate relationship, I should like to know how he felt about it. He did not see any objection to our talking things over amongst ourselves beforehand and I am sure he will put no unfavourable construction upon it. I hope, therefore, you will send a Canadian representative or delegation to a meeting in London where we can explore topic with intention of doing best we can for ourselves and our American friends without ignoring interest of other Powers.

2. As regards proposal [for an] international Conference, President considers that this should wait until matter has been discussed at forthcoming tripartite Anglo-Soviet-American meetings.

3. I understand preliminary American views to be that:

- (I) There should be private ownership.
- (II) Key points should be available for international use on reciprocal basis.
- (III) International traffic should be reserved to international companies.
- (IV) Government support may be required on an international basis for certain non-paying routes. Ends.

MOST SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following from the Prime Minister for the Prime Minister, Begins:

"My colleagues and I have studied with care your memorandum of June 22 in which you set forth some provisional views on post-war civil aviation. We are glad to take advantage of your invitation to comment. We feel, as you do, that there are great advantages in a full exchange of views before minds are definitely made up.

2. With much of what you have written we are in agreement. We agree that it is essential that our thinking on the post-war problem should not be coloured by unwarranted optimism about the probable scale of post-war air traffic. Clearly, too, some minimum of international regulation is necessary concerning navigation devices, safety standards, meteorological services, customs, quarantine etc. The main problem is to find some working compromise between the two principles of a nation's unrestricted sovereignty over its own air and unbridled freedom of the air.

3. Instead, however, of commenting at length on the points on which we are in agreement we think that, in order to make progress, it would be best if we were to concentrate on the points on which we are most likely to differ.

4. We note that, in your opinion, complete internationalization of air transport and kindred proposals are clearly unacceptable to the United States, the Dominions and probably Russia. So far as Australia, New Zealand and Canada are concerned, there seems to be some misunderstanding here since, according to the cables which we have received from the Dominions Office, Australia favours the internationalization of the main transfrontier routes and New Zealand favours the internationalization of all transfrontier routes, while we have deliberately not committed ourselves one way or the other except to say that, in our opinion, the forthcoming international discussions should include the advantages and disadvantages of internationalization.

5. We would, of course, welcome the establishment and maintenance of efficient airlines between the several parts of the Commonwealth. We feel, however, as we know you do, that there are a number of considerations to be kept in mind in setting up airlines within the Commonwealth. One is that some of them might require subsidies out of proportion to their economic, strategic or political value. Another is that, in order to limit the amount of subsidy, efforts, which in the long run might prove to be unwise, might be made to shield British Commonwealth airlines from competition from other airlines, perhaps by the establishment of something like an "imperial preferential" system in air transport. It might be argued that the establishment of such a system would be contrary to the spirit of article VII of the various mutual aid agreements between the United States and the several other United Nations and to the corresponding provision of the Canada-United States agreement.⁹¹ These agreements, it will be recalled, pledge the signatories to "the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce".

6. So far as the specific proposal on subsidies which is set forth in the memorandum is concerned, it seems to us unlikely that the United States would agree to it since under this proposal the British countries could subsidize airlines from North America to Northern Europe, Australia and Africa while the United States could either not subsidize comparable services or could give them only limited subsidies.

7. While the Canadian government is not wedded to any specific scheme for the organization of post-war civil air transport, we are of the opinion that a truly representative international authority must be established and must be given extensive powers to control and regulate international services, possibly through licensing and through the control of rates, schedules and standards of operation. From the control of this authority we would except domestic services and those international services which are merely short transfrontier extensions of domestic services to contiguous countries. Ends.

AIR TRANSPORT DISCUSSIONS IN LONDON

1. The Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport Policy agreed yesterday on a report to the War Committee setting forth the Committee's views of the Canadian interest in and approach to the post-war organization of air transport. This report, if approved by the War Committee, is for the use of the Canadian representatives to the Commonwealth discussions in London next month. It will come before the War Committee at its meeting tomorrow.

2. The report does not go as far in the direction of recommending international operation as some of the members of the Committee, including Dr. Clark and myself, would have liked. It merely recommends that Canada "should seriously consider" the setting up of international operating companies. I think that the majority of the members of the Committee feel that Canada should, in the forthcoming discussions, be prepared to support or, if necessary, to initiate proposals for the international operation of the main international routes. They feel very strongly that such a policy would help to lessen the risks of new rivalries between countries which in their turn might involve the risks of new wars.

3. Mr. C.P. Edwards and Mr. H.J. Symington were opposed to a recommendation in favour of internationalization. They stated that Mr. Howe concurred in their views. Where we differed was in attempting to gauge how much weight should be given to political and security arguments in favour of international operation when weighing the advantages and disadvantages of such a policy in comparison with those of continued operation of the main international lines by national airline companies.

4. The importance of the decision which will have to be made during the next year or so on the post-war organization of air transport may be a key one. If we can settle this problem right we shall have gone a long way to establishing a new world order of security. If we don't settle it right our chances of another world war in the foreseeable future are greatly increased.

5. As one of the lesser powers our influence on the solution of the problem of post-war military security will not be very big. We are, however, an important air power — important both in war and in peace — and we are thus in a position to have something to say about the settlement of international air transport policy and thus indirectly to a sound settlement of the whole problem of post-war security.

6. You will remember the statement of general Government policy approved by the War Committee on July 28th and communicated to all the Commonwealth governments, that the problems of air transport must be considered "not as predominantly commercial problems but as predominantly political and security problems" and your statement to the House of Commons on April 2nd that Canada is "prepared to support in international negotiations whatever international air transport policy can be demonstrated as being best calculated to serve not only the immediate national interests of Canada but also our overriding interest in the establishment of an international order which will prevent the outbreak of another world war."

7. The real question is what legitimate national ambitions in the air Canada is willing to consider foregoing on the chance that this will help to prevent another world war. If it could be conclusively demonstrated that the giving up by Canada and other countries of national ambitions to operate transfrontier air services would reduce the danger of another world war by ten percent or even one-tenth of one percent, nobody would hesitate. But the trouble is that we are dealing with uncertainties, and all we can say is that we believe that the chances of maintaining peace would be greater if the main international air routes were operated by internationalized airlines than by national companies. I think that an argument could be made which would convince most Canadians that it was right to base Canadian policy in Commonwealth and international discussions on air transport on the supremacy of considerations of international security over considerations of national and commercial prestige. It may be that due to the opposition of the United States and other powers proposals for international operation may not get very far. But if the job is to be attempted now is surely the time to do it.

Report of Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport Policy

MOST SECRET

Ottawa, September 28, 1943

(Approved by the Cabinet War Committee, October 6, 1943.)

The Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport Policy submits for approval the following notes on questions of policy likely to arise during the forthcoming Commonwealth discussions in London on air transport policy:

The understanding on which the Canadian government has accepted the invitation of the United Kingdom government to participate in Commonwealth discussions in London is "that the meeting be informal and exploratory and involve no commitments on the part of the government". In view of this understanding the Canadian representatives will not be expected to support or reject any specific proposal on the organization of air transport. For use in these discussions the following provisional statement of the Canadian interest in and approach to the post-war organization of air transport has been prepared.

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

1. Canada believes that a policy of international collaboration and cooperation in air transport is necessary and will support whatever air transport policy is best calculated not only to serve the immediate national interests of Canada but also to contribute to the establishment of an international order which will prevent the outbreak of another world war.

2. Because of the close connection between air transport and security, the international problems of air transport are more political and security problems than commercial problems. Any proposed international agreement on air transport will have to help solve the political and security problems of the post-war world and be judged by its contribution to the establishment of a permanent system of general security.

3. The post-war settlement of air transport problems must also fit in with those principles of economic collaboration which have been accepted by the United Nations and which have as their object the freeing of international trade. These principles include "the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce" and the "reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers". Consideration should be given to the question whether the establishment of preferential arrangements in air transport would conflict with these undertakings.

4. Effective control will require an international air transport authority, established under an international air transport convention. All signatories of the convention should be entitled to representation at periodic meetings of the authority. Those countries, large or small, which are of the greatest importance in international air transport should be represented on the governing body of the authority.

5. The problem is to find some method of international control which will be effective and, at the same time, generally acceptable. The pre-war system under which the legal principle of unrestricted national sovereignty over the air was used to enforce a "closed sky" would be far too restrictive in practice. Relaxation of the application of the principle of national sovereignty, even though limited to freedom of air transit, if unsupported by effective international controls, would probably lead to the domination of the international air routes by certain great powers and the virtual exclusion of other countries from participation in international traffic. However, since some form of freedom of air transit may be advocated by the United States in the international discussions its implications should be faced at the London meetings by Canada and the other Commonwealth countries. In view of Canada's position on a number of the most important international air routes, agreement by Canada to the right of commercial air transit would constitute a substantial contribution to the solution of the problem of international air transport. Our agreement on this point should, therefore, be contingent on the other signatories to the convention making contributions of comparable importance.⁹²

⁹² The following note was in the original:

The right of commercial air transit is the right to cross any country and to land for servicing. It does not include the right to pick up or discharge passengers and cargo. This right is known as the right of commercial outlet

PROBABLE UNITED KINGDOM PROPOSALS

6. The kind of proposals which the United Kingdom may put forward in the London talks are:

(a) That intra-Commonwealth services be reserved to a jointly-owned and controlled Commonwealth airlines corporation or corporations or to the airlines of the various parts of the Commonwealth on the ground that these are "domestic" or "internal" services. The reservation of intra-Commonwealth services to Commonwealth airlines would not be of any particular material advantage to Canada. It appears to be incompatible with the spirit of the undertaking against discriminatory treatment in international commerce and might lead to the creation of rival closed imperial systems.

(b) That an Empire air board be constituted with power to allocate routes within the Empire to the airline companies of the several parts of the Empire. Canada could get little out of an Empire air board and there is danger that such a board might give a decision reserving the North Atlantic, the route Canada is chiefly interested in, to the United Kingdom or might force Canada into a joint operation with the United Kingdom.

(c) That an Empire airlines corporation or a series of regional Empire airlines corporations be established to operate routes from one part of the Empire to another part and perhaps to operate routes to foreign countries as well. The reluctance of the United Kingdom to terminate the 1935 Anglo-Irish-Canadian Agreement indicates that they will seek to establish a joint Commonwealth operating company on the North Atlantic dominated by them and to extend the principles of the 1935 agreement to other Empire air services. Such proposals are not in accord with the actual line of development of Canadian civil aviation and might involve Canada in the payment of subsidies which would be disproportionate to the economic, political or security value to Canada of the subsidized services. Canadian airline operators might also find it difficult to work efficiently with the operators of United Kingdom airline companies. These disadvantages from the Canadian point of view do not appear to be offset by any comparable advantages in the economic, political or security field except that, if the proposal were successful, it would increase the aggregate strength of the Commonwealth in civil air transport and thus increase its aggregate striking power in war.

(d) That, if more ambitious proposals fail, the air services of the members of the Commonwealth should at least be granted preferential treatment within the Commonwealth. One form this preferential treatment might take is that Commonwealth airlines be exempted (within the Commonwealth) from any international rules which may be agreed upon limiting the amount of subsidies paid by nations to airline companies engaged in international traffic. This particular proposal on subsidies is probably unrealistic as a basis of discussion with the United States since its tendency would be to give Commonwealth airlines a monopoly on the principal routes between North America, and Northern and Western Europe, Africa and Australasia. This and other proposals to establish some sort of imperial preferential system in air transport also appear to be incompatible with the spirit of the undertakings against discriminatory treatment in international commerce.

A further general criticism which can be made against all four proposals and kindred proposals is that none of them makes allowance for Canada's special relations with the United States and that they involve a rather challenging extension of the doctrine that membership in the British Commonwealth entitles Commonwealth countries to grant each other special and exclusive privileges. Their tendency would be towards the granting of tariff preferences to British aircraft. These might be so high as to force Canadian airline companies to use aircraft which would be less efficient for their purpose than United States aircraft. Finally the proposals are all more or less incompatible with the kind of international regime which we would like to see in air transport since they would not help to prevent after the war a revival, on a greatly enhanced scale, of the pre-war international rivalry in air transport which led, especially in Europe, to wasteful competition, excessive government subsidies, failure to meet genuine air transport needs on an economic basis, and international friction.

7. These and kindred proposals will be put up by the United Kingdom as something to fall back on if, because of the opposition of other powers, it should prove impossible to achieve a sound international settlement. It will be argued that agreement by the nations of the Commonwealth on this kind of second-best policy will strengthen the bargaining position of the Commonwealth in the forthcoming discussions with their principal competitor in air transport — the United States, whose position will be very strong because of the activities of its military air transport commands, the hold it will have on many countries because of assistance given in the building of air bases, the size and efficiency of its aircraft industry, and the power, experience and aggressiveness of its airline companies. The argument will also be made that for political and security reasons the Commonwealth must have as large an air transport organization (and as large an aircraft industry) as possible. One weakness in these arguments from the Canadian point of view is that Canada would put into the Commonwealth pot more bargaining counters than it would get out even if the combined Commonwealth bargaining strength were to be used in the interests of the whole Commonwealth. The danger in the proposals is that their adoption by the members of the Commonwealth prior to the holding of discussions with the United States would prejudice the chances of success in these discussions. In order successfully to combat these proposals it will not be sufficient for the Canadian representatives to adopt a negative attitude which would lay the Canadian government open to the charge of being uncooperative. The Canadian representatives should therefore be prepared to raise for discussion at the Commonwealth meetings some positive and feasible alternatives to the proposals which the United Kingdom is likely to put forward.

8. One point which they might make at the very outset is that, in view of the undesirability of creating a closed imperial preferential system in air transport, the meeting should canvass the possibility that, in the event of failure to achieve a sound general international settlement, it should be open to non-Commonwealth states to adhere at any time as full and equal members to any Commonwealth scheme of cooperation in air transport. The Commonwealth states would thus become partners in a wider association of nations which were willing to accept the obligations of membership in a cooperative scheme in return for its privileges. This association, if successful, could be the nucleus of an eventually universal system of international cooperation in air transport. One of the chief arguments for this proposal is that a nuclear association of this kind, even though its members granted each other preferential treatment, could probably be framed so as not to violate the undertaking against discrimination. The analogy would be a low tariff club open to any nation which agreed to reduce its tariffs against other member nations by a stated amount or to a stated level.

INTERNATIONALIZATION

9. The Canadian representatives should be prepared to discuss or, if the War Committee believes it desirable, to raise an even more fundamental proposal — namely that the main international airlines, or most of them, should be owned and operated, not by national companies but by internationally owned companies.

10. In the opinion of the Department of External Affairs, if international airlines are to be owned and operated by national airline companies and if rights of transit and commercial outlet are to be negotiated by bilateral agreements, Canada's position athwart the main strategic air routes between Europe and North America and Asia and North America may be difficult especially if the relations between the United States and any of the major powers of Europe or Asia should become strained. The joint operation of the airlines on these routes by international corporations rather than by competing national companies would ease this situation as, of course, would the granting of general freedom of transit by a multilateral convention. Canada has, therefore, a certain security interest in the international operation of the routes across the North Pacific, the Arctic routes and possibly the North Atlantic routes. Moreover, internationalization might provide a politically feasible method of sharing equitably between the users the very heavy costs of constructing and maintaining in the Canadian north the necessary ground facilities which would cost a good deal more than their direct value to Canadian services. There is also a general interest in the formation of joint international operating companies on the main international routes based on the contribution which this would make to world security. This argument for internationalization does not apply with the same force to domestic services or to transfrontier extensions of domestic lines to contiguous countries. The objections set forth in this paragraph to the operation of the main international routes by national airline companies apply with even greater force to a proposal to establish a Commonwealth airlines corporation.

11. Internationalization would also contribute to the rationalization of air transport leading to a lowering of the costs of carriage of passengers, mail and freight. If, for example, there is free competition on the North Atlantic, the airline companies of some eight or ten countries or groups of countries may, five years or so after the conclusion of hostilities in Europe, be operating transatlantic services — the U.S.S.R., Scandinavia, Poland, the Netherlands, France, Great Britain, Canada, the United States, and perhaps Switzerland and Ireland. A single joint international company on this route could probably operate more cheaply and efficiently than eight competing companies. Similarly on the north Pacific route and the route between North America and Australia there will probably not be enough traffic for many years to come to warrant the operation of more than one company except at a considerable loss. This argument for internationalization, like the security and political arguments for it, does not constitute an argument for a Commonwealth airlines corporation, at least on the North Atlantic, since the formation of such a corporation would merely reduce the number of competing national companies from eight to seven.

12. The practical operational difficulties in the way of internationalization are great. Clearly, one centralized operating body would be impracticable and it would be necessary to set up a number of regional operating organizations which would exercise powers delegated to them from a central authority. Another possibility would be for the nations concerned in the airlines in a particular region to form a joint operating company in which all the nations principally concerned could participate.

INTERNATIONAL AIR TRANSPORT AUTHORITY

13. Whatever is done about the setting up of international operating companies, it will be necessary to establish an international air transport authority with effective regulatory powers over such matters as rates, schedules, subsidies, safety regulations and standards of operation.

14. The international air transport authority might be given not merely regulatory powers but also powers to license the air transport companies of the various signatories to the convention to operate transfrontier routes (subject to the exception of transfrontier services between two contiguous countries). Services to which the air authority had issued a certificate of public convenience and necessity would possess freedom of air transit over those foreign countries prescribed in the certificate but they could not land in a foreign country to take up or discharge passengers and cargo without the permission of the country concerned secured through diplomatic channels.

15. CONCLUSIONS

(1) Canada favours the establishment of an international air transport authority which should cooperate closely with whatever general security organization is established and whose powers would include:

(a) the establishment of safety regulations and their enforcement by a qualified international inspectorate;

(b) the standardization, so far as possible, of radio equipment and technique, ground services and meteorological facilities;

(c) the collection and review of information about services maintained, operational costs, the nature and extent of subsidies, rates of carriage, landing fees, etc.;

(d) the control, if possible, of subsidies to national services operating over international routes;

(e) the elimination of discriminatory treatment between domestic aircraft and the aircraft of any signatory of the convention in the imposition of landing fees and services charges where the operating conditions and the size of the aircraft are comparable;

(f) the establishment of arbitration procedure to decide appeals against the imposition of unreasonable or discriminatory fees and charges; and

(g) the facilitating of the exchange of information on technical air developments.

(2) Canada should seriously consider the giving of licensing powers to the international air transport authority if preliminary discussions with the nations principally concerned show that there is general agreement on the principles which should guide the authority in granting or withholding licenses and that the application of these principles would result in a fair and equitable division of routes and services between the airline companies of the various nations.

(3) Canada should seriously consider the formation of joint international regional organizations to operate the airlines on the main international routes if practicable schemes for their operation can be worked out and if there is a reasonable chance of their securing the support of a sufficient number of the powers of chief importance in the air. The regional operating organizations might be set up by a central international corporation which would be owned and controlled by the nations of the world or each regional organization might be independently organized and be owned and controlled by the nations principally concerned or by the designated airlines of those nations.

(4) Membership on the governing body of any regulatory, licensing or operating authority should be granted to those countries large or small which are of the greatest importance in international air transport.

(5) Consideration should be given to the fact that on grounds of security and of rationalization, Canadian interests in north Pacific services would be adequately protected by Canadian participation in a joint company which would operate all commercial air services between North America and Northern Asia.

(6) No international authority should be given control of domestic traffic or transfrontier extensions of domestic lines to contiguous countries (e.g. Canada-United States services).

(7) Any international settlement which permits national airline companies to operate across the North Atlantic should permit Canada to operate its own airline company on that route. Any international settlement should also guarantee that a Canadian airline is given treatment on other international routes no less favourable than that accorded under like circumstances and conditions to the airlines of other nations. The other international routes in which Canada is likely to be especially interested are:

(a) Canada - West Indies - Brazil, with possible branch extensions in the Caribbean and to adjacent countries;

(b) Canada - Australasia;

(c) Canada - Far East;

(d) Canada - Mexico.

Dear Mr. Massey,

I enclose a copy of a report, dated September 28th, which the Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport Policy has made to the Cabinet War Committee. If this is approved by the War Committee, it will serve as the general instructions for the Canadian representatives at the discussions in London on air transport policy. We shall, of course, communicate with you officially about this report after the War Committee meets on October 6th.

You will note that reference is made in the latter part of this report to the advantages of international operation. I think that it would be very useful to have a thorough discussion in London of the possibilities in this respect. The first two reports submitted to the United Kingdom Government — the Shelmerdine and Finlay reports — advocated it, and the Barlow Committee gave it general support. Nothing has happened since these reports were written to make less cogent the arguments which they advanced. There should, therefore, be some readiness on the United Kingdom side to consider international operation. In a memorandum from the New Zealand Government, dated June 24th¹, it was stated that they supported the general principle of internationalization, subject to the retention of internal services by the national authority concerned. The Australian Government also informed the Dominions Office (their telegram No. 116 of May 13th)⁹³ that they favoured “the actual operation of certain services (i.e. the main international routes) by an international air transport authority”.

We may assume, therefore, that the general arguments pro and con will be brought up at the meeting. You may find some useful material in the attached Departmental memorandum by Escott Reid, dated August 2nd, the purpose of which is to develop the distinctively Canadian arguments which favour internationalization. Although this is addressed to the Prime Minister, it has not been submitted to him, and it is sent to you for your personal use. I enclose, also, a later memorandum by the same author, dated October 1st, which deals particularly with the question of bases in the Canadian north.

There may be a tendency on the part of some of those participating in the London meeting to consider that the future of commercial air transport should be determined primarily on commercial grounds, and should start from the assumption that the victorious United Nations will have achieved an operative security system. This is, of course, a very dangerous assumption to make. A good many of us here feel that an effective means of regulating air transport is an integral part of post-war security and that if we cannot devise a working system in this field there will be a good deal smaller chance of our enjoying peace for the remainder of our somewhat harassed lives.

This, furthermore, is one aspect of post-war organization in which Canada has a special right to make known her views. We occupy a strategic position, our own security might be endangered if bitter international rivalries in the air were to occur, and we are also an important air power, both in war and in peace, both by the extent of our own air development and by our control over parts of vital air routes.

You are, I think, already familiar with the opinions that we are inclined to hold here about further development of international policy in this field. You are also familiar with the reasons which led to our reluctance to have prior Commonwealth discussions. There may be an attempt in London to secure some sort of informal agreement on a Commonwealth air transport scheme. As the first enclosure shows, there is strong opposition in Ottawa to any such plan.

This is rather a disjointed letter, written late at night, and it may not be very helpful to you. We should appreciate being kept informed of the progress of the London talks.

Yours sincerely,

H. H. WRONG

CANADA'S POSITION ON THE MAIN AIR ROUTES BETWEEN NORTH AMERICA AND NORTHERN AND CENTRAL EUROPE AND NORTHERN ASIA; SOME GENERAL POLITICAL AND SECURITY CONSIDERATIONS

1. An air map of the world, such as that which is attached, shows clearly Canada's position athwart most of the important intercontinental air routes between North America and northern and central Europe and northern Asia. The main air routes from the middle and eastern United States to Siberia and the Far East pass over Canada either by the Northwest Staging route or by the Mackenzie River basin. All the direct air routes from the United States to Scandinavia and European Russia pass over Canada, as do most of the routes from the United States to central and eastern Europe.

2. Before the war it was possible to say that Canada was fortunate both in its neighbours and in its lack of neighbours. This statement is increasingly becoming less and less true. All the countries of the north are now neighbours of Canada, and, what is more important, we have become a potential buffer state between the two most powerful nations of the world — the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. Throughout all our history we have been to some extent a buffer state between Great Britain and the United States. But though because of this we know something of the difficulties and disadvantages of being a buffer state we have not for many decades had the experience of being a buffer state between two powerful nations whose relations may from time to time become dangerously strained.

3. During the nineteenth century first class powers, in order to strengthen their military position, kept pushing their naval bases farther and farther out from their own shores. The United States, for example, was not content to make the Caribbean a United States lake. It established naval bases in Hawaii and the Philippines. Unless, after this war, we all come within some effective system of collective security it would seem likely that first class powers, in order to strengthen their military position, will push their air bases farther and farther out from their own home territories. To protect the Panama Canal, which is a lifeline of the United States, the United States may want air bases on the east coast of South America as far south as Belem and Natal and on the west coast as far south as Lima. To protect itself from attack across the North Atlantic it may want air bases in Iceland, Greenland, Newfoundland and possibly Labrador. To protect itself against attack from Asia and northern Europe it may want bases not only in Alaska and perhaps the Japanese Kuriles but also across northern Canada. It is perhaps significant that the Fortune article of May 1943 on Canada and air transport concluded with a reference to the possibility that the United States might want to acquire the right "to set up some kind of defenses along Canada's vast open subpolar frontier".

4. If the United States wanted to construct a Maginot line of air defences in the Canadian North we would be put in the unhappy position of Belgium in the three or four years preceding the war. In an effort to maintain some freedom of action on the grave issues of peace and war, we would be must reluctant to have bases built on our territory by one of our great neighbours. To construct and maintain them ourselves would involve us in enormous expense. Moreover to construct bases directed against one of our great neighbours and not the other would line us up in one of the opposing camps — the very thing which we would be trying to avoid.

5. It would not, of course, be merely a simple question of bases. If relations between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. were strained we would, on a whole host of questions, be subjected to competing pressures and pulls from the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. and we would have a most unhappy time trying to preserve a nice balance between them.

6. The granting of rights to the commercial airlines of other countries to fly the intercontinental air routes across Canada would involve us in particularly acute embarrassments and dangers. By the time the war in the Far East ends it seems probable that the public of the United States will, under the combined influence of the actual facts of air warfare and of the preachings of Seversky as interpreted by Walt Disney and other popularizers, be thinking in terms of the dangers of future intercontinental air warfare, of "World War III" beginning with a dozen simultaneous Pearl Harbours in San Francisco, Seattle, Chicago, Detroit, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, San Diego and Norfolk. Unless the people of the United States can be assured of security by some other method, they may not only demand outlying air bases to protect the United States, they may also demand that potentially unfriendly powers should not, by flying intercontinental commercial routes to North America, gain experience which would be valuable in future military air operations. The United States might, in consequence, try to restrict Soviet flights very severely and might expect Canada to follow suit. If Canada, in deference to United States fears, were to subject Soviet aircraft to restrictions more onerous than those to which the aircraft of other nations, such as the United States, Great Britain, Sweden and France were subjected to, the Soviet Union would consider that the act was unfriendly. If Canada were not to discriminate against Soviet aircraft, the United States would consider that the act was unfriendly, certainly not that of a good neighbour with which arrangements for the defence of North America had been concerted through a Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

7. In the inter-war period Canada's support of collective security was based almost entirely on our long run general interest in the creation of an ordered and prosperous world. We felt that we were producers of security rather than potential consumers. We did not fear involvement in war by either a direct attack on our own territory or by an attack on the United States over our territory. The danger of attack on Canada was, as you said in your speech of May 24, 1938, "minor in degree and second-hand in origin". We were reluctant to play an active role in threatening sanctions against possible aggressors because if the aggression occurred and the sanctions were applied and led to war, the brunt of the disaster and the sufferings would fall not on our peoples and cities but on the peoples and cities of those countries on the spot. The revolutionary developments in air transport and air warfare which have already occurred and which are likely to be accentuated in the next decade are changing all that. As the main guardian of the northern approaches to North America and as a potential buffer state between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. we will in another ten years or so be in danger of being involved in a future war either by a direct attack on our own territory or by an attack launched against one of our neighbours over our territory. We are thus potential consumers of security in the future and may expect to draw out of a pool of international security as much as we put in. Canada is also likely to have greater freedom of action within a collective security system than within the alternative system of bilateral and multilateral defensive alliances under which the United States would think of us in terms of the contribution which we could make to the defence of North America. Certainly we would be better off with United Nations air bases in Northern Canada than with United States bases there.

8. Not only have air developments thus strengthened the case for our supporting the establishment of an effective collective system, they have also, it seems to me, provided good reasons for our supporting or, if necessary, initiating proposals for the internationalization of at least the more important intercontinental air routes. Our position athwart strategic international air routes in a world in which there may be strained relations between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. might, as has been pointed out above, become embarrassing and dangerous if intercontinental airlines were nationally owned and were regulated only by bilateral agreements. We might be a good deal better off if we were to forego the possibility of extending Trans Canada Air Lines into foreign countries in order to secure the internationalization of all airlines operating between North America and the Soviet Union.

9. I have not in this memorandum thought it necessary to touch on the general long run arguments in favour of the establishment after this war of an effective system of collective security and of such agencies of the world order as internationalized airlines and an international air police force. The arguments are the same as those advanced before the war but because of the greater destructiveness of war and the diminishing size of the world they are more compelling today. We must in some way, as you said in 1938, "adjust our international relations to the economic forces, the scientific inventions which have made all nations neighbours, adjust our theories and practices of national sovereignty to the requirements of world co-operation." We must develop "the new political machinery, the new political attitudes, the new political experience and capacity that are required for living together in such close quarters." That new political machinery, it seems to me, can be invented and constructed only as the result of a supreme effort of social imagination and social invention based on intellectual integrity and intellectual courage of a high order. One of the things which worries me is that the leaders of the principal United Nations will be so emotionally, intellectually and physically exhausted by the end of hostilities that their power to imagine, to invent and to construct the new international political and economic institutions of which the world stands in need will be at a low ebb.

THE CONSTRUCTION AND MAINTENANCE OF AIR
FACILITIES IN THE CANADIAN NORTH

During the next ten or twenty years the northern air routes over Canada will become increasingly important for the carriage of transit air traffic over Canada. (By northern air routes is meant air routes north of a line from Goose Bay to The Pas to Prince Rupert). The use of these air routes by large, long-distance, intercontinental aircraft would necessitate the construction and maintenance in northern Canada of a considerable number of first class air bases, intermediate landing strips and other airways facilities which would either not be required for domestic Canadian traffic or would be required on a much more modest scale.

2. When, due to the development of northern flying, a request comes to Canada in the future from foreign companies or governments that airports be built or extended in the Canadian north, Canada will have to choose between the following courses of action:

- (1) Refuse to build the ports or to allow anyone else to build them.

(2) Build them on condition that the companies using the fields agree to pay landing fees and service charges sufficiently high to amortize the cost of construction and cover the cost of maintenance.

(3) Build them with the aid of financial contributions from the countries or companies which intend to use the ports.

(4) Permit the foreign companies or countries which intend to use the ports to build and maintain them.

3. The first course is scarcely feasible politically; it would be difficult, if not impossible, for Canada to play dog-in-the-manger and thus be put in the position of wilfully and unreasonably obstructing the development of international air traffic. Moreover, such an exercise of sovereignty over the Canadian Arctic might well result in other nations questioning the basis of Canada's claim to sovereignty over the islands which lie between the Canadian mainland and the North Pole.

4. The second course would not result in Canada being reimbursed unless the companies used the bases for a long period of time and our experience during the war with the northern bases shows how experts in the United States can so quickly change their minds about the value of northern air routes. In order to meet this difficulty the companies might be bound by a contract to pay fees and charges of not less than so much a year for so many years. The danger in this would be that the general public in the country of the companies using the bases would grow to feel in the course of time that since their companies were in fact putting up the money for the bases they had a moral right to use them not only in peace but in war.

5. Thus, the second course is open to the same objections as the third and fourth possible courses of action namely that permitting foreign governments or foreign companies to build and maintain airports in Canada would limit Canada's freedom of action in the event of international political tension.

6. It is interesting to note that the third course is the one which has been followed by Canada, though reluctantly, during this war. Thus, we built the airfields on the Northwest Ferry Route to a standard which we considered adequate. When the United States required a higher standard we let them pay the additional costs with the result that there seems to be a growing body of opinion in the United States which feels that since the United States government helped to pay for these bases United States commercial airlines ought to have the right to use them in perpetuity.

7. The following description of the sort of thing which may happen in future unless there is international operation of the intercontinental air routes over the Canadian north may help to make the problem clear. To begin with, there will be a high pressure campaign in the press, on the radio and in the legislatures and municipal councils in the central and western United States about the desirability of establishing a direct air service to the British Isles from such cities as San Francisco and Denver. The United States promoters of the scheme will enlist the support of interested groups in Saskatchewan and Manitoba since direct air routes from the Pacific Coast of the United States and from the United States Middle West to England would go over those two provinces. After the public campaign in the United States and Canada had gathered momentum the Canadian government would receive a request from the United States government for permission for a United States airline company or companies to operate from San Francisco and Denver to Great Britain over northern Canada. While the Canadian government was considering the matter a campaign would break out in the United States press to the effect that Canada was playing dog-in-the-manger and was holding up the development of essential air routes. Canada might then reply to the United States government that it would be happy to give the necessary permission for the establishment of these services if it were not that they involved very considerable expenditures for the construction and maintenance of air bases in the Canadian north and that for the present the Canadian government could not contemplate making a commitment for expenditures of this size. The United States might reply that, in view of the importance of the early establishment of these routes, the United States government or the commercial companies concerned would be glad to construct and maintain the bases. All the time the agitation in the press of the Western and Pacific United States and in Manitoba and Saskatchewan would gather force. The Canadian government would thus be neatly placed in a position in which its choice would be limited to alternatives which were all undesirable from the Canadian point of view.

8. In view of the considerations set forth above it would appear that Canada has a direct and immediate national interest in the international operation of the intercontinental air routes over the Canadian north since internationalization would provide a politically feasible method of sharing equitably between the users the very heavy costs of constructing and maintaining in the Canadian north the necessary ground facilities which would cost a good deal more than their direct value to Canadian services.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION; REPORT OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE RE FORTHCOMING COMMONWEALTH MEETING

12. THE SECRETARY referred to the report of the Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport Policy, submitted at the meeting of September 29th. The Canadian delegation would consist of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the Canadian High Commissioner in London, Mr. H.J. Symington, and Mr. J.R. Baldwin, Secretary. Copies of the report had been circulated.

(Report of Interdepartmental Committee, Sept. 28, 1943 — C.W.C. document 626).

13. THE ASSISTANT UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS observed that the question of further international discussions would probably arise during the London meetings, since it was understood that this subject would be considered at the forthcoming conversations in Moscow between the United Kingdom, the United States and the U.S.S.R.

14. THE PRIME MINISTER felt that, as a major air power, Canada was entitled to be represented at any future international conference on civil aviation. This should be clearly understood in London.

Any international conference called subsequent to the London meeting should not be held in Canada.

15. MR. KING drew particular attention to and read paragraphs 9 to 12 of the Interdepartmental Committee's report with respect to internationalization. These paragraphs stated that the Canadian representatives should be prepared to discuss the proposal that the main international air lines or most of them be owned and operated by internationally owned companies. This proposal was supported by strong military and political considerations of great importance to Canada and to the maintenance of world peace.

16. MR. HOWE expressed the opinion that the report should be approved.

Canada would have little to gain, however, by initiating proposals for internationalization. On the basis of experience under the 1935 Agreement, operation by internationally owned corporations would not meet Canadian requirements nor afford us a measure of control consistent with our position. On the other hand, there would be certain regions where international operation would be desirable.

A preferable solution was the proposal, contained in the Interdepartmental Committee's report, for the establishment of an international licensing authority, which would divide and allocate routes and services between the various nations.

17. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, approved the report of the Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport Policy as a provisional statement of the Canadian interest in and approach to post-war organization of air transport, for the guidance of the Canadian participants in the forthcoming Commonwealth discussions.

London, October 13, 1943

MOST IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Further to my telegram No. 2414, October 7th[†], air transport policy.

1. Conversations ended today with acceptance of reports of three Sub-Committees.

2. The Sub-Committee on security with particular reference to internationalisation, composed of High Commissioners and United Kingdom Minister of State, Richard Law, agreed paramount importance security consideration in air transport. Therefore, although civil aviation of fundamental importance, it should be examined by competent defence authorities and any international air authority should be responsible to any security organisation. Agreed this problem should receive immediate consideration.

3. Sub-Committee under Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Air, Captain H.H. Balfour, attended by Mr. Symington and Mr. Baldwin, recommended an international convention establishing the first four freedoms described in paragraphs 5 and 6 of Dominions Office telegram Circular D.389, July 3rd, 1943. Acceptance of these freedoms to be subject to establishment in same convention of an international air authority with extensive powers of regulation and allocation. Powers of allocation considered satisfactory and our interests safeguarded.

4. Sub-Committee on intra-Imperial co-operation, composed of Dominions Secretary, Viscount Cranborne, Lord Beaverbrook, Mr. Howe and High Commissioners, suggested each Government put forward proposals and be responsible for operation of sections of all-British route adjacent to its territory. This scheme would not be preferential and is entirely subject to proposed international authority. Consider we have very adequate share of routes.

5. All conclusions tentative and intended only as basis for further exploration and discussion with other nations. Final report of conversations[†] follows by air bag tomorrow.

6. Lords Beaverbrook and Leathers and Mr. Howe were requested by the meeting to proceed to Washington at the end of next week for further conversations in the light of the views expressed in the conversations here.

PERSONAL

London, October 13, 1943

Dear Escott [Reid],

Herewith my personal impressions on the conversations which ended in a blaze of glory in the amazing period of two-and-a-half days.

We reached London Saturday afternoon after a very cold crossing. Sunday evening I spent several hours with the High Commissioner going over all aspects of the coming discussions and trying to bring out particularly those points relating to security which the Department was anxious to have emphasized.

On Monday morning the discussions began formally, and it was at once evident that the Chairman, Lord Beaverbrook, wished to get them finished as rapidly as possible. He is not, of course, a technical expert on the subject of air transport, and he has given the general impression of a man who has been made responsible for doing a certain job and is more anxious to get that job finished than to embark on long and tedious wrangling. From that point of view he was a good Chairman, and showed every disposition to meet the views of the Commonwealth rather than to sit back and argue. I suspect, however, that he puts more stress on the idea of an all-Red route than upon the establishment of effective international authority. That again may have been a good thing from our point of view since he raised no objections to the proposals for such an authority.

Internationalisation came up at the very beginning of the discussions, and it was obvious at once that as far as the majority of the United Kingdom people were concerned the prospect of internationalisation had been discarded completely. Suggestions for a modified or regional internationalisation did not receive any hearing, and it was only with some difficulty that Mr. Massey and Mr. Bruce (Australia) kept the subject open. In consequence the matter was referred to a special Sub-Committee and you will see from the accompanying report that at least the door has been kept open although the report may be less than was hoped for. The two main points are:

- (1) Provision to bring the International Authority under a World Security Organisation, and to allow nations to suggest joint operations to the Authority for security reasons, and
- (2) Provision for further study of the security considerations involved.

The right of commercial transit and the right of commercial outlet as between countries at terminals of services proved to be generally acceptable on the understanding that a satisfactory regulatory authority would be established. Commercial outlet in intermediary countries would be subject to bilateral governmental agreement. The general question of the powers and functions of an authority were referred to the Sub-Committee which Mr. Symington and myself attended. It turned out that apart from ourselves one or two of the United Kingdom people were the only ones who had given serious consideration to the nature of an international Licensing Authority with the result that the United Kingdom and Canada between them did most of the drafting. The document[†] that was finally produced and approved covers only broad principles since there is a general disposition to leave lesser details for later consideration after the United States have been brought into the picture. Moreover, whenever a major problem arose, while considerable discussion might ensue there was no attempt to reach agreement on solution, on the grounds that it would be better to leave these broad problems to be thrashed out more thoroughly in Washington and at subsequent international conferences. For your information the main points which provided difficulty were:

- (1) The relationship between the Assembly and the Operational Executive;

- (2) The method of choice of the membership of the Executive;
- (3) The standards to be used in case proportional voting should be employed in the Assembly;
- (4) The definition of internal and international services.

I think you will find, however, that the document produced follows fairly closely the lines we were developing in Ottawa.

The Sub-Committee on Intra-Imperial Co-operation was the cause of some worry, particularly since Mr. Howe has seen a great deal of Lord Beaverbrook privately, and has discussed this matter at length. I have managed, however, to breakfast with Mr. Howe almost every morning and find out what happened on the previous day from him. The proposals that were brought forward and accepted should, I believe, be studied very carefully in Ottawa to see if acceptable. They appear to leave plenty of opportunity for independence of action, and while they included an expression of opinion in favour of an all-Red route, responsibility for development and operation is pretty well left to each Government concerned. I made certain it was clearly understood that any such scheme must not be preferential and that to protect against this the international sections of Empire air links must be completely subject to the International Authority. As a matter of fact, in conversations Lord Beaverbrook has agreed:

- (1) That Canada should be allowed equal rights on the route between the United Kingdom and Canada, i.e. each to operate a service;
- (2) That Canada should operate to the British territories in the West Indies and Latin America without United Kingdom competition;
- (3) That a Pacific route would be operated jointly by Australia, New Zealand and Canada without United Kingdom participation.

I have received the impression that the United Kingdom is primarily concerned in getting a free hand in Europe, the Mediterranean and the Middle East.

Mr. Howe is going to Washington towards the end of next week with Lord Beaverbrook and Lord Leathers, as you know. I understand that Lord Beaverbrook will probably be taking one or two, or even more, special advisers with him. I think the evidence here has demonstrated clearly that it is very desirable that Mr. Howe should have someone with him as well. He has assumed so far that Mr. Symington and I will travel to Washington with him (possibly in the same plane with Lord Beaverbrook and Lord Leathers). We have both, however, asked him not to make any arrangements in this connection at present, since other arrangements may be desired by Ottawa. I imagine Mr. Howe will send a word to Ottawa on this subject tomorrow. My own plans remain somewhat vague. I shall spend the next two days in the War Cabinet Office here in any case. It may be desirable for me to make a full report in Ottawa before the Washington discussions, and for the moment I am thinking of trying to get the first plane possible out of here to Canada next week. Mr. Symington may do the same. This, however, will depend upon Mr. Howe's desires, and upon such comments as may be received from Ottawa.

In case Mr. Howe should go on his own I am preparing a complete memorandum for him covering those points in connection with the International Licensing Authority which caused most controversy, and which remain unsettled, as well as a number of the lesser points which were not raised at all in the discussion here. I hope, in addition, that a quite complete statement of opinion from Ottawa will be forthcoming by the end of the week, or at the earliest at the beginning of next week, for his guidance. I assume, of course, that the discussions in Washington will centre primarily around the proposed International Authority, although here again I think every precaution should be taken to see that security considerations are brought into the picture.

You may wish to show a copy of this letter to Mr. Robertson and Mr. Heeney.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN R. B[ALDWIN]

P.S. I want to explain one more matter, namely, the United Kingdom press release on the conversations. I mentioned this yesterday to Mr. Howe, and both he and Mr. Massey discussed it with Lord Beaverbrook this morning. I discovered at lunchtime, however, that no arrangements had been made to forward the proposed release to Ottawa or to notify you of the time of release. We at once got a copy of the release from Lord Beaverbrook's office and it is being put on the wires now, but I am afraid it will arrive in Ottawa just about the time it is given to the press here. It was, I am afraid, a very unfortunate oversight. Very sorry about this, but it was at level beyond my reach!

You have received copies of telegrams Nos. 2488, 2491[†], 2493[†] and 2494[†] of October 13, regarding the Civil Aviation discussions in London. They finished up very quickly and, so far as we can see from the summary of conclusions, quite satisfactorily.

You will note in para 6 of telegram No. 2488 that Lord Beaverbrook, Lord Leathers and Mr. Howe were requested by the meeting to proceed to Washington at the end of next week for further conversations in the light of the views developed at the meeting in London. This looks as if they would be going to Washington as a single delegation representing the "British Commonwealth and Empire". The political implications of a Canadian Minister forming part of a joint delegation responsible to the Commonwealth Governments collectively, are pretty important, and you will, I imagine, wish to have them considered in the War Committee. In whatever capacity Mr. Howe is to take part in the discussions in Washington, whether as a representative of Canada or as one of the representatives of the Commonwealth meeting in London, it would I think be desirable to have him come back to Ottawa to talk things over with the War Committee before the discussions with the United States authorities begin.⁹⁴

Mr. Churchill's insistence on the "family" character of the discussions, his reiterated use of his new phrase "Commonwealth and Empire" and its pendant "The Dominions and India" are significant straws. Recent developments in civil aviation and related fields are, I am afraid, going to force us to look pretty seriously at the implications for Canada of the prevailing trend towards Imperial centralization. Smuts' thinking has been in this direction for a number of years, and within the last two months Curtin and Evatt have come round to recommending a Central Consultative Commonwealth Council⁹⁵. My own feeling has been that we were maintaining a pretty satisfactory working relationship with the countries of the Commonwealth and with the other members of the United Nations outside it. I see no good reason for attempting to tip the present balance one way or another, but I am rather afraid that efforts in other quarters to strengthen and tighten the Imperial connection at the expense of our relations with other countries may not only have some bad effects on our relations with those other countries, but may reopen domestic political differences about our relationship to the Commonwealth and to the international community in general. It is very difficult to see clearly the shape of things to come after the war is over or to be dogmatic about the sort of orientation of international relationships in which Canada's true interest lies. At the same time we should I think be pretty careful about accepting any modification of our present relationships with the countries of the Commonwealth, the United States, or other foreign countries, until we are clear in our minds as to just what these altering relationships may imply.

I attach despatch No. A.330 of October 14, 1943 from Canada House[†] transmitting the reports on the Commonwealth Conversations on Air Transport Policy[†]. I have marked the references which I have made, which are the usual references.

I also attach the original and three carbons of a personal letter to me from Baldwin,⁹⁶ I have kept one carbon for myself. I would suggest that Mr. Heeney, Mr. Pearson and perhaps the Prime Minister be sent copies of Baldwin's personal letter.⁹⁷

I am hoping that in accordance with the request which we made of him, Mr. Massey will send us a full report on the discussions.

The issues raised in the reports are important, and I should not like to comment on them until I have given the matter careful consideration. At the moment all I am prepared to say is that I feel that these reports should be carefully considered by both the interdepartmental committee and the War Committee before Canada participates in any further intergovernmental discussions. I shall give you a memorandum on these reports tomorrow morning.

I hope that the War Committee tomorrow will decide to request the interdepartmental committee for recommendations on whether or not the government should concur in these reports and on the nature of the instructions which should be given to our representatives in the forthcoming Washington meeting. In view of the importance of the subject and of the Washington meeting, I hope that the War Committee will be in favour of Canada's being represented by a sizeable delegation which should, in my opinion, include from the interdepartmental committee yourself and myself, as well as Hanna,⁹⁸ Symington and Baldwin. It would also be desirable to have Pearson included, and either Wer-shof or Miss Bingay. I assume it would also be necessary to include Edwards. Perhaps, indeed, to avoid hard feeling, it would be politic to make the interdepartmental committee the delegation to Washington, adding Mr. Howe.⁹⁹

⁹⁹ Marginal note:

We won't be able to fix the character of the Washington discussions Mr. Reid. We'll have to see what kind of delegations the U.S. and U.K. send and on what level they will meet.

The most important objective at the moment should, I think, be to keep the issues open. The British, as you will note, have done their utmost to thrust to one side proposals for the international operation of all the main international air lines. We ought, I think, [to] make certain that these proposals are discussed in full and sympathetically at the conference of nations principally interested in air transport. We can push the door open by using the first clause of the annex to the report of the London discussions where it is stated that it was decided "that the security aspect of civil aviation was of fundamental importance and should be examined by the competent authorities at the very earliest opportunity". The competent authorities are clearly the defence departments and the foreign offices.¹⁰⁰

You will have seen the account in the Gazette this morning of Mr. Howe's press conference, in which he is reported to have said that the Empire is united on a plan of post-war aviation. If this is the way the Gazette headlined it, I assume that the headlines are similar in the London press. We are being made to look very foolish in the eyes of members and officials of the United Kingdom government, who are familiar with the long exchange of correspondence which we had with the United Kingdom on the convening of this preliminary Empire meeting. Not only have we gone back on what we insisted on for three months, but we have advertised to the world that we have agreed to a united front—the very thing that we said would prejudice the success of future international discussions.

Since there is clearly danger that Mr. Howe may give further press conferences, either in the United Kingdom or on his arrival in Montreal and Ottawa, could not something be done to persuade him not to say anything more to the press until the War Committee has had a chance to discuss the matter with him?¹⁰¹

Dear Arnold [Heeney],

I have already sent Escott some preliminary comments on the discussions. I presume you have seen these. There is a certain amount that, naturally, I do not wish to put on paper. The following observations may, however, be helpful in case weather delays our return.

As regards the Washington conversations, you will recall that before the discussions here took place it was suggested by the Dominions Office that Lord Beaverbrook, after the International meeting, proposed that United Kingdom and Canadian representatives should hold informal exploratory discussions in Washington to see if any agreement could be reached on broad principles. It was apparent as soon as we arrived that this was strongly in his mind and he at once invited Mr. Howe to accompany him. Mr. Howe at first accepted but, after subsequent discussion, was persuaded that it would obviously be desirable for him to return first to Ottawa. Both Mr. Symington and I felt quite strongly on this point.

It was obviously necessary to inform the other Commonwealth representatives here of these proposed conversations and if possible to secure their agreement on the desirability of this step. This was done at the conclusion of the discussions and no objections were raised, although the Australian High Commissioner obviously had some reservations regarding the Australian relationship to these discussions.

The formula arrived at, i.e., that Lord Beaverbrook and Lord Leathers and Mr. Howe were requested to proceed to Washington, was not intended, certainly as far as we were concerned, to imply that these three men were to go as a Commonwealth or Empire delegation.¹⁰² Mr. Howe was included because Canada was a major air power and it was intended that primarily he should represent Canadian interests. I think, however, it would be well to safeguard our position by having the official comment from the Canadian Government on the conversations make it quite clear that we understand that the Washington Delegation is not a delegation representing the Empire as a whole. Mr. Howe stressed this point in his Press Conference yesterday, when he stated that it was not proposed to approach other Nations with a cut and dried Empire policy. On the other hand, there is no doubt whatsoever that Lord Beaverbrook will have the interests of the other members of the Commonwealth strongly in mind during the Washington conversations, and I know that Mr. Howe is inclined to feel that it might be a good idea for Canada informally to represent the interests of the other members of the Commonwealth, exclusive of the U.K., if they agree. This is obviously open to some criticism.

Tentatively, my plans for a draft report to War Committee run along the following lines:

A comparatively short, (perhaps two pages), statement on the nature of the discussions and the main points brought forward with the three reports of the sub-committees attached thereto.

I think the scheme for an international authority is proceeding satisfactorily and I have no objections to raise on this point, although the more difficult problems have not yet been settled.

¹⁰² Marginal note:

Certainly this was the understanding of Mr. Symington and myself.

The report of the Security Sub-Committee was intended primarily to bring the international authority under any world security organisation and definitely to keep the door open for further study of this question. My own feeling is that Canada should press at once for the further study contemplated in this report and that we should suggest to the U.K. that Mr. Howe be accompanied at Washington by a senior official, (if not Mr. Robertson then Mr. Pearson), to look after these considerations.

For your personal information on the subject of Imperial co-operation, I do not think we have got into any difficulties as yet, but unless great care is exercised we may. Mr. Howe's general approach was that our main objection to Imperial co-operation was based on the fear that Canada would not get her fair share. As a result of private bargaining with Lord Beaverbrook, he has obtained promises of much more than a fair share in reality. He and Mr. Symington have both agreed also that any scheme for Imperial co-operation must be subject to the general powers of the International authority, but he is obviously not as worried over the danger of a discriminatory system developing as I have been.

My suggestion, (which I have not put forward to him yet), is that the War Committee might accept the outlines of Imperial co-operation subject to the understanding that it should not be a discriminatory system and should express the opinion that further details be not worked out until the general outlines of an International authority are agreed upon, so that any schemes for Imperial co-operation could be made part of the broader picture.

I think you will appreciate that I have had a very difficult task to fulfil, particularly in view of the position which I held. I have had no difficulty in discussing matters fully with Mr. Howe and Mr. Symington and have got along excellently with them. On the other hand, being listed as Secretary to the delegation rather than a member or an adviser, placed me under a considerable handicap, particularly with regard to the U.K., since other delegation secretaries were not experts in any sense of the word and filled very limited roles. As a result, I was automatically excluded from a considerable number of the more important private discussions and all that I could do afterwards was to find out what happened and bring forward such reservations as I felt should have been entered. Had I realised the difficulties in this situation I would most certainly have raised this question before I left Ottawa.

Sincerely yours,

J. R. BALDWIN

Memorandum from Secretary, Delegation to the Commonwealth Air Conversations, to Secretary to the Cabinet

MOST SECRET

My own suggestions regarding the action that might be taken by the War Committee are roughly as follows:

1. That it be made quite clear to the United Kingdom that we do not consider that the Washington conversations should be on the basis of presenting an Empire point of view with a delegation representing the Empire. This point was made in the discussions and again by Mr. Howe in a press conference, but it cannot be overemphasized in view of the general tendency of the United Kingdom to stress Empire solidarity, and in view of the fact that other Commonwealth representatives did not seem particularly worried over the dangers of this. In other words, Canadians should participate in the discussions in Washington as representatives only of the Canadian government.

2. That Mr. Howe be accompanied by a senior official charged with responsibility for raising the security considerations described in the sub-committee's report.

3. That the proposed International Authority be approved in principle as a basis for further discussion. In view of the way the discussion developed, I think that Canadian delegates in further conversations should be instructed that Canada must have a place on the operational executive of any Authority.

4. That machinery be established at once, as recommended, for the further study of security considerations.

5. That the elaboration of details of any Imperial co-operation be delayed pending further international discussions in order to bring any Imperial scheme within the framework of broader International organization. I think also we should put on paper what was informally understood in the discussions, namely, that any Imperial scheme must not be discriminatory and must be subject to any broader authority set up.

Rapport de la délégation aux conversations du Commonwealth sur le transport aérien

Report of Delegation to the Commonwealth Air Conversations

Ottawa, October 26, 1943

1. The Commonwealth air conversations which began on Monday morning, October 11th, and were completed on Wednesday morning, October 13th, were attended on behalf of Canada by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the Canadian High Commissioner, the President of Trans-Canada Air Lines and Mr. J. R. Baldwin, Secretary.

It was evident that the United Kingdom placed great importance on the views expressed by the Canadian representatives and was anxious to obtain the complete co-operation of Canada in achieving an agreement which would assist in the maintenance of world peace and the full development of international air transport.

It was made clear from the outset that the meetings were to be an exploratory and informal exchange of views and that the delegates could not commit their governments and would merely report back to them regarding the points upon which it appeared agreement might be reached. On this basis the sessions proceeded.

2. Plenary sessions were held on Monday morning and the first half of Monday afternoon. Political and military security, with particular reference to internationalization, was the first subject raised. The representatives of Canada and Australia strongly expressed the view that international civil aviation must, in all respects, be made subject to considerations of military security. Accordingly, a sub-committee was appointed to prepare a report on this matter. Canada was represented on this sub-committee by the High Commissioner.

3. The meeting then proceeded to consider what "freedoms" should be accepted as necessary or desirable in any general international agreement. The right of innocent passage and the right to land for emergency purposes and refuelling were immediately accepted as essential. Considerable discussion took place regarding the right to disembark traffic from the aircraft's own country of origin in the country of destination, and the right to embark traffic there for the aircraft's own country of origin. Canada took the position that in conceding all these rights she was contributing more than almost any other country. It was finally decided that the concession of these last two "freedoms" was necessary if a satisfactory international agreement was to be reached but that they should only be granted subject to the acceptance of the other provisions of a Convention providing for the establishment of a satisfactory international regulatory authority.

4. The possibility of establishing by Convention an International Authority with power to regulate international air services was then considered. U.K. proposals provided for the main work of such an Authority to be carried on through an Operators' Conference, but Canada took the position that the Authority should be a body nominated by government rather than appointed by operating lines. This position was accepted by the other Commonwealth representatives but with some hesitation by the United Kingdom. The nature of a Convention which would establish such an Authority and provide for the "freedoms" referred to in paragraph 3 was then referred to a sub-committee which was attended by Mr. Symington and Mr. Baldwin.

5. At the afternoon session, on October 11th, discussion turned to the question of intra-Commonwealth co-operation in any international system. After some discussion it was agreed that intra-Commonwealth air communications should be established and the matter was referred to a sub-committee which was attended by Mr. Howe and Mr. Massey. It was understood that any co-operation within the Commonwealth should not be discriminatory, and accordingly, the routes involved should be subject to the proposed international Authority.

6. These sub-committees met on Monday afternoon, October 11th, and during Tuesday, October 12th, and presented their reports to the final plenary session on Wednesday morning, October 13th. No attempt was made to reach final agreement on detailed plans or on the main points of difference encountered in the sub-committees, since it was recognized that such points must be settled at subsequent broader discussions and that to reach final agreement now might present the appearance of a detailed and complete Empire scheme. The reports of the sub-committees[†] are attached hereto.

7. The plenary session unanimously accepted these reports, it again being agreed that the conclusions reached did not represent any cut and dried Imperial policy but rather broad principles which, if approved by their respective Governments, the Commonwealth representatives would be prepared to support in subsequent international discussions.

8. In discussions between Mr. Howe and Lord Beaverbrook, it was agreed that in any Empire system, Canada would:

(a) operate the route from Canada to Bermuda and the British West Indies with such extension into South America as may subsequently be agreed upon. Generally it was agreed that any north and south British routes in the Americas would be operated by Canada.

(b) Operate that part of the Pacific route from Canada to Australia and New Zealand either by way of Siberia, China and Malaya, or by way of Honolulu and the Pacific Islands, which terminates in Canada, on the understanding that the operation of the route as a whole would be divided between Canada, Australia and New Zealand as the three Dominions may agree.

(c) Share equally with the United Kingdom all British routes between America and the United Kingdom, it being understood that the Canadian share would be operated by a Canadian company and the United Kingdom share by a United Kingdom company.

9. Following the final plenary session, at a special meeting of the senior U.K. representatives, the Minister of Munitions and Supply and the High Commissioners, Lord Beaverbrook, as Chairman of the discussions, indicated that he and Lord Leathers proposed to proceed to Washington for further informal and exploratory discussions with U.S. representatives along the lines of the London conversations. He also suggested that the United Kingdom were most anxious to have Mr. Howe participate in these discussions. The other Dominions representatives expressed satisfaction that a representative from the Dominions would be present and would be fully informed.

Lord Beaverbrook also indicated that the conversations in Washington would be followed at an early date by a broader international conference.

C. D. HOWE
Chairman

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AIR TRANSPORT;
REPORT OF LONDON CONVERSATIONS

17. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY submitted the report of the Canadian delegation to the Commonwealth discussions held on October 11th to 13th. Copies of the report had been circulated.

Emphasis had been given to security considerations in the organization of post-war air transport and it had been recommended that further study be given to this problem. It had been generally agreed that freedom of transit and a limited freedom of commercial outlet should be accepted, subject to the establishment of an effective international authority with power to regulate air transport and allocate international routes. Proposals for services to connect the various parts of the Commonwealth had been considered on a basis which would allow each nation concerned to operate that part of the service adjacent to its own territory, and which would avoid the establishment of a discriminatory system by placing it under the control of the proposed international authority.

Following the meetings in London, Lord Beaverbrook and Lord Leathers had indicated their intention of visiting Washington for informal conversations with U.S. Authorities, and had invited Mr. Howe to accompany them.

(Report of Canadian delegation, Oct. 26, 1943 — C.W.C. document 640).

18. THE PRIME MINISTER pointed out, in reference to the proposed conversations in Washington, that it was important to avoid creating the impression that British and Canadian Ministers would compose a delegation representing the British Commonwealth.

While it was certainly desirable that Mr. Howe should participate in the proposed conversations with the United States, it should be clear that he would do so as the representative of Canada.

19. MR. HOWE said that it had not been intended that the U.K. and Canadian representatives should act together for the Commonwealth or Empire. They would have no mandate for such representation. His own participation would be solely in the interests of Canada. In any event, the proposed conversations would be on the same informal and exploratory basis as those held in London.

20. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, noted the report submitted by the Minister and referred it to the Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport Policy for consideration and report.

Report of Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport Policy to Cabinet War Committee

[Ottawa,] November 9, 1943

In accordance with the instructions of the War Committee on October 21st and 27th,¹⁰³ 1943, the Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport Policy submits the following comments on the report of the Canadian delegation to the conversations recently held in London between representatives of the Commonwealth governments.

The Committee wishes to express its appreciation of the large and important part played in the conversations by the Canadian representatives and of the value of the contributions which they made.

I. THE PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION

The Committee recommends that the tentative outline of an international convention providing for the establishment of an international air transport authority be used as a basis for discussions with other nations. This outline leaves open a number of points of importance to Canada.

The Committee is preparing articles for a draft convention filling in these gaps in a way intended to protect Canadian interests. These draft articles will be available for the Canadian participants in the forthcoming international discussions.

After careful consideration of the proposals for an international authority the Committee has come to the opinion that, to avoid the possibility of any misunderstanding at a later date, it would be desirable that the other governments participating in the London conversations be informed of the interpretation which Canada places on the more important points which have been left open in the outline of the international convention.

1. Canada, as the fourth greatest air power among the United Nations, expects to be a full member of the executive of the international air transport authority.

2. The jurisdiction of the international authority will extend to all international services, including services between member nations of the Commonwealth, provided that nations may reserve for bilateral arrangement those services which are extensions of domestic services to contiguous and to immediately adjacent territories. Canada, for example, will wish to reserve all such services from Canada to the United States.

3. Routes will not be allocated by the international authority to the British Commonwealth as a whole but to its component member states.

4. If the voting power of the various member nations in the international air transport assembly is to be proportionate to their importance in air transport, Canada considers that its voting strength should be relatively high. Canada does not concur in one suggestion put forward in the London discussions that the criterion of voting power should be "international traffic interest", i.e. the relative volume of international air traffic originating in a country.

5. The implications of the proposed four freedoms are being carefully studied and, while readiness to consider their acceptance offers a basis for further international discussions, it is possible that some extension may prove necessary.

6. One of the most difficult problems to be faced in working out the implications of the proposed international convention is the determination of the criteria to be used in allocating quotas to countries operating international services. One criterion suggested in London was the "international traffic interest" of the states in the region. This was defined to mean the relative volume, expressed in passenger-miles and ton-miles, of the air traffic originating in each country. The Committee is of the opinion that this criterion would probably be undesirable and accordingly must be given further careful consideration.

7. One of the suggestions made by the United Kingdom participants in the London discussions was that international operating agencies be established to operate the air services in Europe, the Middle East and the Far East, and the sub-committee on security recommended that "from the point of view of European security, immediate consideration should be given to the feasibility of establishing a European operating agency". It was the understanding of the Canadian representatives in the London conversations that any international operating agencies would be subject to the international authority. The authority or the regional panels it sets up would not, of course, be restricted to establishing international operating agencies in the three regions mentioned by the United Kingdom since there might well be found to be other routes which, for security or other reasons, might best be operated by an international agency.

8. We reiterate our belief in the desirability of the views of the British Commonwealth countries remaining fluid until full discussions have taken place with the other United Nations which are chiefly concerned, e.g. the U.S.A., the U.S.S.R., China, Brazil, France and the Netherlands. We think it is desirable that the presentation by any group of governments of jointly agreed proposals should be postponed until after these discussions have taken place. It is, in our opinion, especially important that our European allies be given no cause to feel that their interests and susceptibilities are in danger of being slighted and that they will be expected to be content with minor roles in the international air transport authority and the bodies set up under it.

II. SUB-COMMITTEE ON SECURITY

The Committee recommends that the report of the sub-committee dealing with security questions be used as a basis for further exploratory discussions and that, to avoid the possibility of misunderstanding, the other governments participating in the London meetings be informed that Canada interprets this report to imply acceptance of the following principles:

1. The nations of the Commonwealth will support whatever air transport policy is best calculated not only to serve their immediate national interests but also to contribute to the establishment of an international order which will prevent the outbreak of another world war.

2. Because of the close connection between air transport and security, the international problems of air transport are more political and security problems than commercial problems.

3. Any proposed international agreement on air transport will have to help solve the political and security problems of the post-war world and be judged by its contribution to the establishment of a permanent system of general security.

(These statements were approved, so far as the Canadian government is concerned, by the War Committee on October 6, 1943.)

III. COOPERATION WITHIN THE COMMONWEALTH

The Committee agrees that it is desirable that speedy air communications be established and maintained after the war between the member nations of the Commonwealth. The Department of External Affairs has raised certain questions in regard to the wording of the report on cooperation within the Commonwealth, and it is understood that a note on this subject will be presented to the War Committee by the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION; COMMONWEALTH
 CONVERSATIONS; CONCLUSIONS

8. THE SECRETARY submitted a report of the Interdepartmental Committee on Air Transport Policy, on the report of the Canadian representatives to the London meeting. Copies had been circulated.

It was recommended by the Committee that the outline of an international convention and the report of the Sub-committee on Security drafted in London be used as a basis for discussions with other nations. To avoid the possibility of any misunderstanding at a later date, it was suggested that the other participants in the conversations be informed of the interpretation which Canada placed on certain of the more important points which had been left open in the outline of the proposed international convention, and in the report of the Sub-committee on Security.

(I.C.A.T.P. Report, Nov. 9, 1943 — C.W.C. document 650).

9. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS expressed the opinion that while the report of the London Sub-committee on Air Co-operation within the Commonwealth appeared to provide a satisfactory basis for co-operation in practice, the wording of the report might be taken to convey certain undesirable implications with regard to relations between members of the Commonwealth. In order to correct any such misconceptions, a re-draft of the Sub-committee's report had been prepared which might be communicated to the other governments concerned.

(External Affairs re-draft of London Sub-Committee report, Nov. 10, 1943[†]).

10. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY accepted the revisions submitted by the Under-Secretary.

With regard to the proposed international convention and the report on Security, the points mentioned by the Interdepartmental Committee had all been made clear, in London, by the Canadian representatives. They had been consciously omitted from the documents drafted there in order to make it possible to reach broad agreement on principles. The communication of the precise views of the government, at this stage, to other governments would prejudice the success of the further exploratory discussions in which we expected to participate. This should be left until such further discussions were undertaken.

11. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the report of the Interdepartmental Committee be accepted as stating the views of the government with regard to an international convention and security and as a basis for further discussions with other nations, but not for transmission to other governments at this time; and,

(b) that the revised draft of the London Sub-committee's report on Co-operation within the Commonwealth, submitted by the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, be approved and transmitted to the other participants in the Commonwealth conversations.

Ottawa, November 16, 1943

SECRET. Your despatch No. A. 330 of October 14[†] transmitting the three reports[†] of the sub-committees of the Commonwealth meeting on air transport policy.

1. Please inform the United Kingdom government and the representatives in London of the other governments participating in the conversations that in the opinion of the Canadian government the recommendations embodied in the reports provide a very useful basis for further discussions. At the moment we do not wish to make any specific comments on the reports on an international convention and on internationalization with particular reference to security but we would suggest for the consideration of the other governments participating in the London conversations that the wording of the report on the "all-British air route" might appropriately be recast in some such form as follows:

(1) In planning the air routes of the post-war period provision should be made for the establishment and operation of routes connecting Great Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India and the principal British Colonies.

(2) It is proposed that Great Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and India should be invited to assume responsibility for the operation of the sections of these routes adjacent to the territory of each.

(3) The sections which will become the responsibility of each Government will in the first instance be proposed by the Government concerned with the understanding that the Governments of the Commonwealth will endeavour to see that an unbroken chain of responsibility is created covering the entire plan.

(4) The Governments operating the various sections will constitute a coordinating committee which will be concerned with questions such as the use of reasonably uniform equipment, regularity of services and in general all matters affecting the plan as a whole.

2. In this connection we note that when the subject of security was referred to the sub-committee consisting of Mr. Law and the High Commissioners the general opinion appeared to be that the sub-committee was to consider the connection between air transport and general security. The sub-committee, however, in its report narrowed its terms of reference to "the problem of internationalization with particular reference to its bearing on imperial security". It would, we think, have been more appropriate to have acted on the wider terms of reference. Our own views on the connection between air transport and general security are summarized in the first two paragraphs of the report approved by the War Committee on October 6.¹⁰⁴

1. I have made no progress at all with negotiations about a meeting in Washington. The Americans have told us that the time is not quite opportune for an agreement on civil aviation.

2. I consider there is little chance of progress in Washington until after the election. If we made a good bargain, the Republicans in America will blame the Administration. If we made a bad bargain, the Conservatives in Great Britain will blame us. In either case any agreement would be confounded.

3. A mere exchange of ideas without an agreement would commit us to our pronouncements as official representatives while leaving the American airlines free to pursue their ambitions.

4. A conference in London would be open to the same objections.

5. Will you let me have your personal opinions please on the present outlook for a Washington Conference, and on my attitude to it which is in effect abandoning the project until after the Presidential election.¹⁰⁵

London, November 19, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your telegram No. 2069 of November 16th on the subject of the Commonwealth meetings on air transport policy.

2. In accordance with your instructions I have communicated to the United Kingdom Government and the representatives in London of the other Governments participating in these meetings, the changes in the report on the "All-British air route" which you have suggested.

3. I have noted carefully the paragraph in your telegram relating to the terms of reference of the Sub-Committee which considered the question of air transport in relation to general security. In the discussion at the initial meeting which took place on October 11th the Sub-Committee is referred to as follows:

"That a Committee under the Chairmanship of the Minister of State should examine the security aspects of post-war international air transport, with particular reference to the various schemes of internationalisation which had been recommended; and should report back to the meeting as soon as possible."

These terms of reference, as you will see, were quite wide and in the discussion which took place when the Sub-Committee met, the subject was treated on broad lines. The wider terms of reference were in fact acted upon, although it is possible the preamble of the report may have suggested to you a narrower interpretation.

I have etc.

I am enclosing a copy of a secret and personal message from Lord Beaverbrook to Mr. Howe¹⁰⁶, which was sent to you for transmission. Copy has already gone to Mr. Howe. I had a word with Mr. Atherton on Thursday about the present position of civil aviation proposals¹⁰⁷. He did not know when talks would begin, but thought it had been all for the best that they had not followed immediately on the Commonwealth discussions in London. United States official opinion had not taken sufficiently definite shape at that time for useful international conversations. I gathered that the United States would be prepared to have the right of innocent passage and the right to land anywhere for non-traffic purposes confirmed by general international agreement. These are the first two of the "Four Freedoms" endorsed in the London discussions. Atherton was of the impression that the United States thought that the other two Freedoms, the right to land passengers from the country of origin and the right to take up passengers for the country of origin of the aircraft, should be negotiated between individual countries.

This would not be satisfactory from our point of view because we would like to have all four "Freedoms" confirmed together under a general international agreement. In agreeing to freedom of transit, we in Canada are, in effect, making a considerable concession, for which we would wish to get simultaneous compensation by receiving the right to land passengers from Canadian planes anywhere, and to pick up passengers, anywhere, whose ultimate destination was Canada.

said that the Canadian point of view toward the Commonwealth civil aviation discussions was "known, understood and appreciated" by the United States. He did not enlarge on this. Dear Mr. Robertson,

Thanks for your secret and personal letter of November 20th[†], enclosing copy of your note to the Prime Minister¹⁰⁹ which was transmitted with Lord Beaverbrook's secret message to me, No. 2920 of November 18th.

It seems to me that Lord Beaverbrook's message is characteristically exaggerated as referring to the United States attitude. I have no doubt that the United States will carry on the discussions with Britain as soon as their own views can be put in order.

The third and fourth "Freedoms" to which your note refers can in fact hardly be exercised without the consent of the company¹¹⁰ concerned, and must in any event be subject to regulation by an international authority. Transport planes must operate on established routes, and routes can only be established with the co-operation of the country concerned. I do not think that there is any fundamental difference between the viewpoint of the London Conference and the viewpoint expressed by Mr. Atherton, as far as the third and fourth "Freedoms" are concerned.

Yours sincerely,

C. D. HOWE

London, May 23, 1942

My telegram No. 207 of January 24th[†] and my letter of February 4th[†]. Inter-Allied post-war relief.

Mr. Winant has now presented to Mr. Eden the United States Government's views with regard to post-war relief. In a brief summary these are that:

(a) A United Nations Relief Council should be established. Membership should consist of high ranking representatives of United Nations and other friendly Governments who would be invited to send observers. In view of large membership Relief Council could only act as channel of communication with Governments.

(b) To provide for centralization of responsibility an Executive Committee is proposed to consist of United Kingdom, China, Soviet Union and the United States representatives with American representative as president. Consideration would have to be given to the representation of other Governments on the Committee. The extent of the powers of the Committee must be a subject for preliminary discussions.

(c) Technical Advisory Sub-Committees would be established to assist the Executive Committee in details of policy in respect of such subjects as refugees, transport, finance etc., etc.

It is suggested that the present Allied Post-War Requirements Bureau might be reconstituted as a Permanent Advisory Committee on European relief.

As the proposed Executive Committee would not deal with the operational details it is proposed to appoint a Director General of relief operations who would organise a United Nations Relief Bureau which would be the actual working organization. The Director General would be responsible, under the Executive Committee, for carrying out all aspects of relief operations. The United Nations Relief Bureau would be instructed to obtain the full co-operation of the Red Cross and other competent private relief agencies.

United Kingdom Government welcome the United States proposals. Before accepting them they wish to obtain concurrence of Dominion Governments. They have asked me to say that they are anxious to obtain your agreement in principle as soon as possible and to add for your information that they think it would probably be necessary for the organization dealing with post-war relief to be centered on Washington but that some subsidiary part of the organization might continue to function in London. United States Government have asked that Sir Frederick Leith-Ross should go to the United States immediately for a round-table discussion to be held in Washington between representatives of the British, American, Soviet and Chinese Governments, and that, when agreement has been reached at this preliminary conference, a conference should be called of all representatives of the United Nations Relief Council. Sir Frederick Leith-Ross has instructions to keep in constant touch with the Canadian and other Dominion Legations in Washington and to consult them as to their views.

United Kingdom authorities emphasize that United States proposals should be treated as highly confidential for the present. They are particularly anxious that the Soviet authorities should not learn that they have received the United States views until there has been time to consider the best way of bringing the proposals before them.

It has been noted that preliminary draft of proposed organization does not provide for Canadian representation on Executive Committee, which is to be set up. In view of Canada's probable post-war position as a major supplier of needed foodstuffs, it will probably be found necessary to raise the question of the form of Canadian participation before proposed organization takes definite shape.

POST-WAR RELIEF AND REHABILITATION — UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION

5. THE SECRETARY reported that Sir Frederick Leith-Ross, Chairman of the inter-Allied Committee in London, was at present in Ottawa for the discussion of plans for the establishment of a "United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration".

These plans, which had originated in Washington, provided for an organization to be governed by a Council, consisting of representatives of each of the United Nations party to its establishment. A Policy Committee, consisting of representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R., and China, would act as a steering committee and exercise the powers of the Council, between sessions. A Director General would carry out operations determined by the Council and the Policy Committee. Funds, supplies and services, as well as administrative expenses, would be borne by the member governments. A brief explanatory note had been circulated.

6. MR. HEENEY pointed out that the proposals for control of this body differed remarkably from the principles which had obtained for the "combined" organizations, full membership of which was limited to the United Kingdom and the United States. The new administration would be under the effective control of four nations rather than two.

7. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS pointed out that the government had already agreed in principle to the establishment of an inter-Allied relief organization, along the lines described, subject to reservation of the Canadian claim to full membership on the governing body, based on the special Canadian interest in post-war food relief questions.

8. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE said that the old argument that acceptance of full Canadian representation would open the door to similar claims by other nations, must be met at some stage; it might just as well be met now. It should be remembered that the Canadian people expected Canada to take a full part in international undertakings of this kind and even assumed that we were doing so.

9. THE PRIME MINISTER observed that Canada would be expected to contribute substantially to post-war relief. This constituted a strong argument for representation. Other nations were interested principally in the role of recipients.

10. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, concluded that the proposals submitted did not provide for adequate Canadian representation in the organization of post-war relief and rehabilitation measures.¹

38. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS referred to the conclusion reached at the meeting of July the 31st, 1942,² regarding proposals for a post-war relief organization. The War Committee had been of the opinion that the scheme did not provide for adequate Canadian representation.

This point had been taken up with the United Kingdom who had agreed that Canada should be included in the Policy Committee which should be expanded to seven members. This view had been communicated to other Dominion governments and to the U.S.S.R. New Zealand and South Africa had agreed to the suggestion and it was understood that the U.S.S.R. would accept it as well. An explanatory note had been circulated.

PLACE OF CANADA ON INTERNATIONAL RELIEF ORGANIZATION

You will recall that the United Kingdom sponsored an amendment to the proposals drafted in Washington which provided for the enlargement of the Policy Committee from four to seven members, the intention being that these members should be the United States, United Kingdom, U.S.S.R. and China as originally proposed, with the addition of Canada, a European ally and a Latin American country. This suggestion was submitted by London to Washington, Moscow, and Chungking. There is good reason to believe that it is acceptable in Washington and Chungking, but we have now been informed that Moscow has raised objections.

I attach a copy of a letter from Mr. Malcolm MacDonald dated December 24th[†] which contains the text of a memorandum from the Soviet Government commenting on the draft scheme, and also telegram No. 3197 of December 28th from Mr. Massey[†] reporting a discussion between Eden and Maisky on the subject. This telegram also states that London is officially forwarding their comments on the draft to Washington and that these comments will include the proposal for enlarging the Policy Committee.

The Soviet objections on this point are based on the view that decisions by the Committee should be unanimous and that the enlargement of the Committee would make unanimity difficult to secure. I doubt the wisdom of a specific unanimity rule and feel that a compromise on the lines suggested by Eden to Maisky³ should be worked out.⁴

The general trend of the Soviet criticism is to limit the power of the international relief authority. They are suggesting that the next stage should be a discussion between the United Kingdom, United States, U.S.S.R. and China, and Eden seems to have concurred in this.⁵

*Mémoire du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

[Ottawa,] January 18, 1943

Mr. Malcolm MacDonald called this afternoon for a discussion with Wrong and myself of the latest developments in the negotiations over the form of the agreement for the establishment of the United Nations Relief Organization. He left with me informally copies of five telegrams[†] which he had received from London on this subject. These were—

1. a report from Lord Halifax of a discussion between Mr. Noel Hall of the British Embassy and Mr. Acheson of the State Department on January 8th;
2. a further report from Lord Halifax of a meeting on January 11th between Mr. Hull, the Soviet and Chinese Ambassadors and himself; and
- 3,4 and 5.—three telegrams of instructions sent to Lord Halifax by the Foreign Office on January 16th.

The position revealed by these telegrams is that there is no substantial difference outstanding between the U.K., the U.S., the U.S.S.R. and China on the form of the draft agreement except with respect to the point in which we are mainly interested—the enlargement of the Policy Committee from four to seven members so as to include in addition to the four great powers Canada, a Latin-American Ally (Brazil) and a European Ally. On this point something approaching an impasse has been reached with the United Kingdom strongly supporting the enlargement of the Committee, Russia strongly opposing and the United States and China definitely inclined to side with Russia. The issue has been broadened in these discussions so that its solution seems almost certain to affect the form of other post-war organizations.

On January 8th Acheson told Hall that Mr. Hull was disposed to favour a four-Power Committee on the ground that it would be very difficult to select one European Ally to fill the seventh place after the addition of Canada and Brazil. Halifax was instructed in reply to press for the enlargement of the Committee at the four-Power meeting on January 11th not only because of the strength of the Canadian claim for membership but also because they felt in London that the European Allies might not accept the Committee if they were not represented on it. At the four-Power meeting on January 11th other points about the draft agreement were rapidly disposed of. Litvinof argued against the enlargement of the Committee on the ground that what was done in connection with relief would be taken as a pattern for future arrangements in settling other post-war matters. Halifax reported that his argument had considerable effect on Mr. Hull.

With regard to the Canadian position Acheson suggested at this meeting that a way round the difficulty might be for Canada and the United Kingdom to be represented by two members with but one vote or alternatively that a committee of supplying countries might be set up. Halifax seems to have confined himself to pointing out that neither solution would meet the legitimate claims of the European Allies for a voice on the Policy Committee.

The instructions sent by Eden to Halifax on January 16th deal with the seven-power arrangements and with Litvinof's criticism. They say that they have been forced in London to the conclusion that the Four-Power basis will not normally be appropriate for international organizations dealing with economic problems while agreeing that it is important that the four great powers "should retain ultimate control over post-war military and political arrangements." In the case of relief the claim of Canada to membership on the directing body is described as "irresistible". Other arguments for enlargement are advanced and the hope is expressed that the Soviet Government will accept more extended control over relief and other international economic institutions, if they "can be convinced of our sincere belief in the desirability of a Four-Power political set up." Halifax is instructed to press as strongly as possible for the Seven-Power Committee.

With regard to Acheson's two suggestions, the idea of a shared membership between Canada and the United Kingdom is rejected by London as a device to give one vote to the British Empire and because the Canadian claim for membership is made on its merits as a major supplier. They also point out the dangers of introducing this principle of multiple representation. They say that if it were adopted they would have to consider whether the United Kingdom should not stand down in favour of Canada.

Acheson's second suggestion for the establishment of a Committee of Supplying countries is also rejected among other grounds because such a Committee would tend to exercise the real control of the organization. The instructions also repeat in a convincing form the arguments for representation of the European Allies on the Committee pointing out that it is essential that they should cooperate willingly and maintaining that however difficult it may be for them to agree to one European representative the alternative of complete exclusion will be less acceptable and will risk the breakdown of the whole scheme.

Mr. MacDonald said that he had been instructed to consult us informally on the situation. He is telegraphing his own comments to London but he would greatly appreciate some word from you. He is leaving for Washington tomorrow and could travel to Montreal on the same train which you will be taking if this would suit your convenience. I attach a memorandum⁶ which, if you agree with it, you might give to him or authorize me to hand to him in your name. I think it important that we should enter an immediate warning against our acceptance of the Four-Power pattern for post-war organization. This is the first occasion on which the question has come up in specific form. I would not restrict our objection to economic international organizations alone.

SECRET. My immediately preceding telegram¹. Following is substance of memorandum, Begins: The questions raised in the recent discussion in Washington over the constitution of the Policy Committee of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration are of interest to the Canadian Government not only in connection with the immediate question but also for their bearing on the pattern of other post-war international institutions.

With regard to the immediate question it is unnecessary to repeat the arguments for the inclusion of Canada in the Policy Committee. The merits of the Canadian claim have been recognized as irresistible by the United Kingdom Government. Mr. Acheson's suggestion that a single membership on this Committee should be shared between the United Kingdom and Canada is entirely unacceptable. His alternative suggestion for the establishment of a Committee of representatives of supplying countries would, if it were accepted, raise in our view more problems than it would solve.

We also share the opinion of the United Kingdom Government that the success of the whole relief plan will be jeopardized if it is to be controlled by a body on which none of the European Allies is represented. Difficult as the selection of one European representative may be, total exclusion from the Policy Committee would be still more difficult for the European Allies to accept.

On the broader aspects of these discussions we are concerned to note the emphasis placed by the representative of the Soviet Government on the limitation of membership of all international bodies set up to deal with the post-war settlement to representatives of the Soviet Union, China, the United States and the United Kingdom. While experience between the wars has shown the great practical difficulties of applying to membership in international bodies the legal concept of the equality of states, we are confident that no workable international system can be based on the concentration of influence and authority wholly in bodies composed of a few great powers to the exclusion of all the rest. It is not always the largest powers that have the greatest contribution to make to the work of these bodies or the greatest stake in their success. In international economic organizations such as the Relief Administration representation on such bodies can often be determined on a functional basis and in our view this principle should be applied whenever it is feasible. We are glad to note that the United Kingdom Government strongly advocate the participation of governments other than the four main powers among the United Nations in international organizations dealing with economic problems.

We find it essential, however, completely to reserve the position of the Canadian Government as to the conception that ultimate control over post-war military and political arrangements should be retained exclusively by the four great powers. The United Nations cannot in our view be merely divided into one group of great powers exercising responsibility on behalf of them all for the political and military settlement, and another group composed of all the rest who are excluded from responsibility, no matter how great their contribution may be nor how profound their interest in the questions to be settled. [Ottawa,] February 3, 1943

INTERNATIONAL RELIEF ORGANIZATION

On January 21st the War Committee approved a memorandum to be presented to the United Kingdom High Commissioner which emphasized the need for effective Canadian representation and opposed the view, held by the Soviet Government with some support in other quarters, that effective membership of bodies set up to deal with the post-war settlement should be limited to the four largest Powers among the United Nations. This memorandum was given to Mr. Malcolm MacDonald on January 22nd and he has telegraphed its text, with his own observations in support, to London and Washington. We telegraphed the substance of the memorandum to Mr. Massey and Mr. McCarthy and asked the Legation in Washington to discuss the situation with the British Embassy, and also with the Department of State if an approach from us would not be embarrassing to the British Ambassador. It was undesirable that the case for effective Canadian representation should be made in Washington by the British Ambassador alone.

Mr. Pearson has reported on the action taken in Washington in message WA-383 of January 27th[†]. After consulting with Mr. Noel Hall of the British Embassy he talked the whole matter over with Mr. Acheson, Assistant Secretary of State. Mr. Acheson was friendly and cooperative, saying that the difficulty over enlarging the Policy Committee to include Canada and two other members was caused by Russia and not by the United States and was purely political, probably arising because Russia did not want Poland on the Committee. He suggested that it might be necessary to revise the whole scheme and said he would welcome proposals from Canada. A reply was sent to Washington in message EX-355 of January 30th[†]. This said that while we were most anxious that the Relief Organization should be effective and that the devastated regions should be promptly aided, we did not feel able to make suggestions on the scope and character of the whole Organization; so far as Canada was concerned we believed that it would be very difficult after the war for us to play our expected part unless we could satisfy Parliament and the public that we had a fair share in the direction of the Organization. We suggested a further discussion with Acheson.

Mr. Pearson has now reported (WA-455 of February 1st[†]) that he has learnt from Mr. Hall that Mr. Acheson's position has stiffened, probably as a result of a discussion with Mr. Hull and Mr. Welles, and that, therefore, a further approach to him is unlikely to be productive. He suggests that a formal note should be presented to the Secretary of State by Mr. McCarthy setting forth the Canadian position. He is not optimistic that this will produce the desired results and thinks that the matter may have to be taken up by you with the President or, alternatively, that we may have to abandon our position.

I think that the time has come for a discussion of the situation by Mr. McCarthy with Mr. Hull. If we were to abandon our position in connection with the Relief Organization the consequences might be far-reaching and we might find ourselves sitting on the side-lines while other and still more important parts of the post-war settlement are being arranged. I doubt, however, whether it would be wise to present a formal note to the Secretary of State. This would require an answer in the name of the Government of the United States and if they took an adverse position it would be very difficult to bring about a change. Rather than freeze the situation at this time, I suggest that Mr. McCarthy should be instructed to see Mr. Hull personally and after reviewing the situation orally with him to leave with him a memorandum on the lines of the attached draft[†].

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Minister in United States

Ottawa, February 8, 1943

IMPORTANT. SECRET. Following from the Prime Minister, [Begins:] The War Committee has again considered the situation which has arisen over the relationship of Canada to the proposed United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. You already have full information on the state of the negotiations and on the prevailing attitude in the Department of State. As you know from messages EX-243[†] and 244[†] of January 22nd this question raises in our view very important issues which may well affect the influence and place of Canada on other international bodies to be set up to deal with the post-war settlement.

We, therefore, feel it essential to present our case strongly — a case which is “irresistible” in the view of the United Kingdom Government. You should see Mr. Cordell Hull personally as soon as possible and outline the position to him leaving with him the memorandum, the text of which is given below. This memorandum has been approved by the War Committee. You should inform the British Ambassador of your discussion with Mr. Hull and give him a copy of the memorandum for his information. If Mr. Hull is not receptive to this approach it will probably be necessary to take the matter up with the President.

The text of the memorandum is as follows, Begins:

The Canadian Government has been informed of the course of the negotiations for the establishment of a United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, and of the suggestions made by the United Kingdom Government that the proposed Policy Committee of the Administration should be enlarged so as to include, in addition to representatives of the United States the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union, and China, members from three other countries, one of which would be Canada. It is understood that objection has been taken to this enlargement.

The Canadian Government considers that the enlargement of the Policy Committee (if this Committee retains in the final scheme the importance given to it in the draft proposals) is necessary to ensure the effectiveness of the Relief Administration. Unless this change is made or other alterations with equivalent effects are adopted, Canada, and no doubt other countries, will not be able to cooperate in the work of the administration as fully as they would be prepared to do if they were responsible partners in a joint international enterprise. The purpose of the Canadian Government in making their position clear at this time is to ensure that the place of Canada in the councils of the Relief Administration will match that Administration's anticipated dependence on Canada as a supplier of relief goods. Unless such a relationship is recognized by the principal participating powers Canadian cooperation in this essential project will be prejudiced from the outset. The Canadian Government and people are ready to do their full share in the task of organizing and providing post-war relief. They do not feel they can do so if effective participation in the formulation of policy is to be restricted to the four greatest powers, two of which will themselves be major recipients of relief.

There is already a good deal of public questioning over the place accorded to Canada in the various inter-allied bodies which have been set up for the direction of the war. During wartime problems of this nature are to some extent disguised, because of public concentration on the attainment of victory and because of the secrecy which must surround many aspects of war direction. After the fighting ends, the issues will be seen nakedly. The full activities of the Relief Administration will not begin until the war is over; and it will be very difficult, or even impossible, to persuade the Parliament and people of Canada to accept the financial burdens and other sacrifices, such perhaps as the continuation of rationing and other restrictions on the domestic supply of consumers' goods, which will be necessary for the provision of relief through the Administration on the expected scale, unless they are satisfied that their representatives exercise their due part in its direction.

It is appreciated that there are great practical difficulties in creating effective international agencies that are properly representative of the United Nations. These difficulties are a challenge to statesmanship; they must be faced and on their solution depends in large measure the possibility of an enduring peace. No lasting international system can be based on the concentration of influence and authority in bodies composed of a few large powers to the exclusion of the rest. Such a system would be a denial of the democratic principle. It would also be unreal, for it is not always the largest powers that have the greatest contribution to make to the work of these bodies, or the greatest stake in their success. In the opinion of the Canadian Government representation of countries on international bodies should be determined on a functional basis whenever functional criteria can be applied; this principle can be given wide application particularly in the case of international economic and technical organizations such as the Relief Administration.

The Canadian Government, therefore, hopes that the Government of the United States will support the alteration of the draft scheme for the creation of the Relief Administration so that it will make provision for the full participation of Canada in its direction. Ends.

You will have seen teletype message WA-627[†] containing Mr. Pearson's report of his interviews with Mr. Sumner Welles and Mr. Acheson about Canadian membership on the Policy Committee of the United Nations Relief Organization.

Since the objection to the enlargement of the Committee comes from the U.S.S.R., Welles' suggestion that the question might be discussed between Canadian, American and Soviet representatives in Washington is not unreasonable. It might be better, however, as a first step, for us to have a talk about the situation with Mr. Gousev here and perhaps give him a copy of the memorandum setting forth the Canadian Government's position which has been communicated to the Department of State⁸. Now that there is a Soviet Minister in Canada, it would seem more logical to discuss such a question with him than to ask our Legation in Washington to take it up with the Soviet Embassy there⁹.

With regard to the difficulties over the European member of the Policy Committee, I have been wondering whether there may not be merit in the suggestion that Sweden or Switzerland should be named to the Committee instead of one of the exiled Governments in London¹⁰. I understand that the Russian objections are primarily to having Poland named as the seventh member of the Committee. From a practical administrative point of view, there appears to be a good deal to be said for having either Sweden or Switzerland participate, since the use of their territories and personnel would be very helpful to any emergency relief organization which started in Europe immediately after the close of the war. There would be difficulty in adding either Sweden or Switzerland to the Policy Committee of a United Nations organization since they do not belong to the United Nations. It might, however, be feasible to insert a clause authorizing a Policy Committee of six to co-opt a European neutral country as an additional member.

My telegram No. 224 of February 9th. Relief Organization. Since it seems probable that the only important obstacle to the inclusion of Canada in the Policy Committee is Soviet opposition on political grounds, we have asked the Soviet Minister here to inform his Government of our views and have given him a copy of the Aide-Mémoire left with the Under-Secretary of State of the United States on February 10th.

We have suggested in Washington that consideration might be given to inclusion in Policy Committee of Sweden or Switzerland in place of one Allied European Government. This might be done by altering the draft plan so as to authorize a Policy Committee of 6 to co-opt a neutral European country as an additional member. This change would meet Russian objections to the possible selection of Poland and on other grounds full participation of Sweden or Switzerland might be useful in getting relief started in Europe immediately after the end of hostilities. You might mention this suggestion to the United Kingdom authorities.

UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION

12. THE SECRETARY submitted a report on Canada's relationship to the proposed organization and discussions with U.K., U.S., and Soviet representatives as to Canadian participation.

A memorandum, approved by the War Committee on February 4th, had been presented to the U.S. government and copies had also been given to the Soviet Minister in Ottawa and to the Soviet Ambassador in Washington.

In spite of these representations and the strong and steady support which the United Kingdom had given to the Canadian case, the U.S.S.R., supported by China and the United States, remained opposed to the expansion of the Policy Committee. It seemed likely that the draft agreement, unaltered in this respect, would soon be submitted to the other United Nations and a meeting to discuss it might be called in Washington before long.

In these circumstances, Canadian policy should be determined, and consideration might be given to one of three courses:

- (a) to leave matters as they were without further stressing the Canadian case (this would be tantamount to withdrawal); or,
- (b) to intimate to the four great powers that it would not be possible for Canada to participate in the proposed administration, unless she were given a position commensurate with her expected contribution; or,
- (c) to consult other of the United Nations such as the Netherlands, Belgium and Greece, to ascertain in advance whether there would be any support for a thorough-going revision of the draft agreement.

Copies of the report had been circulated.

13. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR did not favour any consultation with other United Nations. This would give the appearance of trying to form a bloc to oppose the proposals of the four great powers.

Canada should adopt the second course suggested, and make known to Washington that we could not participate unless the Canadian position as a major supplier was recognized and the governing body expanded to give Canada a voice in effective control.

14. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS pointed out that Canada was not alone in being excluded from the Policy Committee. With the exception of the four great powers all other United Nations, some with substantial claims to be included, were in a similar position.

It might be desirable for some exchange of views to take place among the other United Nations in advance of any meeting.

15. THE PRIME MINISTER expressed the opinion that the Canadian government could not change their position. To agree to participate in an organization to which Canada would be expected to be a major contributor without an effective voice in its direction would be to sacrifice the essential support of the Canadian people for the whole undertaking.

If Canada stood firm and made it clear that participation was contingent upon a fair share in direction it was possible that reasonable adjustments could be made. This course was preferable to having Canada raise her voice in open protest at a general meeting of the United Nations, or consult others in advance.

16. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the second course be adopted and that Canada maintain her position, intimating to the U.K., U.S., Soviet and Chinese Governments that, unless a position in the administration commensurate with her expected contribution were accorded, it would be impossible for Canada to participate.

Mr. Pearson telephoned from Washington this afternoon to say that he had advised the representatives of the four Powers of the Canadian attitude in respect of the proposed composition of the International Relief Policy Committee. He had learned that Hall of the British Embassy and Acheson of the State Department had been discussing a possible alternative arrangement under which Canada would be designated in the International Relief Agreement as Chairman of the Suppliers Committee, and as such entitled to sit with the Policy Committee when supply questions were before it. It was represented that, in practice, this would be tantamount to membership.

Mr. Wrong thought that an acceptable arrangement would be to have the Chairman of the Suppliers Committee "ex-officio" a member of the Policy Committee.¹¹

The representatives of the United States, United Kingdom, China and U.S.S.R. met at the State Department this morning and considered the draft convention. Previously I had told the British Embassy that the Canadian Government would be more likely to favour the compromise proposal regarding the Policy Committee outlined in my message of yesterday¹² if the words "will sit in with" were changed to read "should be ex officio a member of" the Committee. Speaking personally, I added that the compromise as at present drafted hardly seemed to give satisfactory recognition to the Canadian position. Apparently this suggestion was discussed at the meeting this morning and the proposed compromise clause regarding the Committee has been altered to read "The Central Committee shall invite the participation of the representative serving as chairman of the Committee of Suppliers, at those of its meetings at which policies affecting the provision of supplies are discussed". You will note that the change from "will sit in" to "participation" would make our association with the Committee stronger but does not go so far as complete membership. You will note also that the name "Policy Committee" has been changed to "Central Committee". I believe this has been done with a view to playing down the importance of this Committee. Another change in the draft provides for the appointment of Deputy Directors General to assist the Director General, one of whom will probably represent the European Powers.

At the meeting this morning the four representatives agreed, subject to confirmation from Moscow for Litvinof, that the United States Government should be authorized to communicate officially with the Canadian Government on behalf of all four, their intention to support Canada's chairmanship of the Suppliers' Committee. Incidentally, this Committee will probably consist of Canada, Australia, United States of America, Brazil and United Kingdom.

I understand that there will be another meeting of the Four Powers within a day or two to clear up two or three more points of detail, after which the draft convention will be circulated to the United Nations. The Four Powers will then again meet to consider the draft in the light of any observations which may have been received from the other United Nations and in the hope that at the subsequent conference of the United Nations to consider the whole matter, the Four Powers may be able to act as a unit in recommending the draft to the other nations. The British Embassy feel that it will be difficult for them to stand out against the compromise clause in respect of the Central Committee as now drafted, and that on the whole it provides a satisfactory solution of this problem. They have, however, submitted the matter to London. Ends.

I have read cypher teletype WA-931 from the Canadian Minister at Washington regarding the United Nations Relief Organization and I am appalled by the continuing evidence it gives of lack of foresight and of realism on the part of some of our world leaders today.

It seems to me there is only one answer to be given by us, and that answer should be given now, "Thank you, boys, but count us out. We are still trying to run a democracy and there is some historical evidence to support the thesis that democracies cannot be taxed without representation. We have tried to lead our people in a full-out effort for the war, and we had hoped that we could continue to lead them in such a way as to get their support behind the provision of relief and maintenance for battle-scarred Europe in the post-war years. We will not be able to secure their support for such a program if it, as well as the economic affairs of the world generally, are to be run as a monopoly by the Four Great Powers."

I would refuse to consider a compromise or have any of our representatives talk about the terms of a possible compromise. The compromise suggested seems wholly of the kind that we saw in the Combined Food Board fiasco, but it is far more dangerous. What is done in this case will set the pattern for postwar economic organization as well as for post-war political organization. If we have any trump cards, it is in connection with this matter.

Any Canadian Government that accepts such a compromise would soon be brought to realities by the public – and would deserve what they would get.

UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION

1. THE SECRETARY submitted an External Affairs report of recent discussions, copies of which had been circulated.

The decision taken by the War Committee on February 24th had been communicated to the U.S. government and to the British, Soviet and Chinese Ambassadors in Washington. As a result, it would probably be proposed that a Canadian be selected as chairman of a Committee of Supplies and that, as such, the Canadian representative be invited to participate in the meetings of the "Central" (formerly "Policy") Committee, when matters affecting the provision of supplies were discussed.

2. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS explained that under this new proposal Canada would provide the chairman of an important Committee and obtain representation on the Central Committee, which, though subject to formal limitations, might in practice mean almost complete participation. On the other hand, such an arrangement would leave the general principle of four-power control unchanged and provide no precedent in relation to other bodies.

No decision was necessary at the moment. A draft statement presumably incorporating the new proposal was to be circulated to the United Nations in the near future.

3. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE expressed the opinion that the government should not recede from the stand which had been taken. Canadian participation should be contingent upon full membership on the Central Committee. No other basis would be understood or accepted by the Canadian people.

4. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE suggested that the new proposal was merely an attempt to meet Canada's objections indirectly, without affecting the principle of four-power control of United Nations' organizations.

5. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR pointed out that, in this particular instance, as a major contributor of relief, Canada had a strong case for full membership. In regard to other bodies our claims would not be so firmly based. It was all the more important, therefore, to maintain our stand in this case. Otherwise, a serious precedent would be established against us.

6. THE PRIME MINISTER agreed with the views expressed. While no further decision was required, it should be intimated to the governments concerned that the Canadian government remained of the same opinion regarding Canadian membership on the Central Committee.

7. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, noted the report submitted and agreed that the Canadian Minister in Washington be instructed accordingly.

SECRET. Following for Pearson from Robertson, Begins: Confirming our telephone conversation on the Relief Administration the "compromise" suggested at the last four-Power meeting was considered by the War Committee yesterday. The opinion was strongly and unanimously expressed that it would not be acceptable and that Canadian participation in the Relief Administration should be contingent on full Canadian membership on the Central Committee. It was decided that it should be intimated to the Governments concerned that the Canadian Government adheres to its view that Canada should be directly represented on the Central Committee.

For your guidance in the discussions of this matter in Washington, it is felt here that this is a test case, on the satisfactory solution of which other and perhaps more important issues will depend. If we cannot go into the Central Committee by the front door we are unwilling to use a side or back entrance. TELETYPE WA-1017

IMMEDIATE. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: Your EX-676 of February 26th[†]. United Nations Relief Organization.

I saw Acheson this afternoon and told him that the compromise suggested for the purpose of associating Canada with the Central Committee of the U.N.R.R. organization was unacceptable to the Canadian Government, who remained of the opinion that Canada should be given full membership in the above Committee. I said that this attitude was determined, not only by the inherent justice of Canada's contention in respect of this matter, but that also it was felt that the U.N.R.R. organization might well be taken as the model for other post-war United Nations organizations. Canada did not wish to do anything which would indicate that she accepted the view that such organizations should in all cases be controlled by the Four Powers.

Acheson expressed very great disappointment that the compromise which had been reached with such great difficulty (he was thinking of Russia on the one hand and of the United Kingdom on the other) should have been found unacceptable to the Canadian Government. He felt that, in so far as the importance of Canada to the relief organization was concerned, this would be very definitely recognized by our chairmanship of the Supplies Committee (which, with the Director General's organization, would be the effective working relief bodies) as well as by our participation in what would virtually be all the activities of the Central Committee. He also felt that the U.N.R.R. organization would certainly not be a model for post-war political, economic or financial United Nations organizations. It was designed to deal with a specific problem, not the problem of post-war reconstruction generally, but the narrower problem, of relief for disabled countries and destitute peoples. He did not himself feel that the Canadian position in relation to any other post-war organization would be prejudiced by our acceptance of the compromise as proposed. He saw little possibility of meeting our request for full membership. The Russians and Chinese had dug themselves in firmly in opposition to a Central Committee of seven. The Russians were not willing to accept a Committee of seven even if Poland were excluded from membership. They felt that Great Britain would likely push the claims of the Netherlands which would mean a Committee of three Anglo-Saxon Powers and two of their protégés (Brazil and the Netherlands) with Russia and China alone outside this line-up. No matter how unreasonable this attitude on the part of Russia may appear to be, it was one which had to be taken into consideration and which Acheson felt would not change. He was wondering what the next step should be and suggested in this regard that once they received final accession of Russia to the Draft Convention, it might possibly be of some use if he himself could go to Ottawa and explain the position as the United States saw it to the Prime Minister and his colleagues. He threw this idea out tentatively but I thought I had better pass it on to you.

I have informed the British Embassy of the content of this telegram. Ends.

UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION

16. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS reported developments since the last meeting.

In accordance with the decision of March 3rd, the governments concerned had been informed that the suggested compromise for Canadian participation would not be acceptable to the Canadian Government.

(Telegrams, EX-763 and WA-1017, External Affairs to Canadian Minister, Washington, and reply, Mar. 4, 1943).

17. MR. ROBERTSON also read a draft communication to the Canadian Legation in Washington for the guidance of the Minister as to the attitude of the Canadian government on the subject.¹³

18. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE expressed the opinion that Canada should not limit the basis of her representations solely to her claim as a major supplier to full membership on the Central Committee of the Relief Administration. This would, in effect, accept the principle of control of international organizations by the great powers, with the addition, in this case, of Canada.

The main point at issue was that of participation of the lesser nations in United Nations organizations. Our representations in respect of the Relief Administration should not be inconsistent with the general democratic position that all of the allied countries should have a voice in the conduct of affairs.

19. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the draft communication submitted be revised in the light of the discussion.

Ottawa, March 9, 1943

SECRET

Sir,

With regard to the Relief Administration it may be useful to amplify the information given in my message EX-763 of March 4th. I enclose a copy of a memorandum on the subject¹ which was circulated to the Cabinet War Committee in advance of their meeting on March 3rd. The War Committee emphatically took the view that the compromise suggested at the last four-power meeting would not be acceptable. I am surprised to learn from Mr. Pearson's letter of March 2nd that both Mr. R.H. Brand and Mr. Acheson have thought that the position adopted by the Canadian Government was caused in part by their concern over the export of Canadian wheat. This is entirely a misconception and you should do your best to remove it from the minds of any who entertain it in Washington. I also enclose the full text of the letter from the Deputy Minister of Finance from which I quoted an extract in my message. This indicates in an emphatic form some of the grounds which have influenced the Government to take this stand.

Our view is that if we give way when we have so strong and reasonable a claim we are prejudicing our position in many other important matters. The political problem is there. It was stated clearly in the memorandum which was left with Mr. Sumner Welles on February 10th¹⁴ especially in the next to last paragraph. The problem must be faced, not evaded. It cannot be solved by a series of expedients. The durability of the post-war settlement depends on its solution. The Soviet Government must be brought to see this and it is greatly in the interest of the other United Nations that this should be done soon. No better opportunity seems likely to arise than this of impressing on the larger powers the importance of sharing control of international organizations with the smaller countries.

I think that you should proceed on the assumption that, unless there is some great change in conditions, the Canadian Government will refuse to participate in the Relief Administration if its constitution is not altered to meet their views. I have noted the remarks made to Mr. Pearson by Mr. Acheson which were reported in your message WA-1017 of March 4th. We cannot accept his argument that this is an isolated problem. If he reverts to his suggestion that he should visit Ottawa, you should reply that we would be glad to see him. I doubt that any arguments that he could use would affect the situation, but it might be as well for him to receive at first-hand the views of the Canadian Government. It now looks as though either there must be a change of heart on the part of the Soviet and United States Governments or we shall have to find our own means of assisting in the relief of the devastated countries.

This despatch is intended for background information. If the draft scheme is formally submitted to the Canadian Government for observations, it will come again before the War Committee for consideration and formal reply.

I have etc.

Pearson tells me¹⁵ that he has had some discussions with members of Mr. Eden's staff and especially Jebb of the Foreign Office about the Relief Administration. He reports that the British are very worried over the present position. Jebb has suggested that a solution might be for Canada to take the place of the United Kingdom on the Central Committee. This possible solution was mentioned in a telegram which Malcolm MacDonald showed us some weeks ago. I gather that Lord Halifax has hinted at it also in a conversation with Mr. McCarthy.

Pearson is under the impression, however, that the British feel that if Canada were to replace them on the Central Committee we would act as the representative of the whole Commonwealth and would, on occasion, speak for the United Kingdom in particular. I think that you should know of this suggestion before Mr. McCarthy comes to Ottawa next week as he may advance it on the authority of Mr. Eden or Lord Halifax.

The idea has some attractions. It would break "the four-power front" and place Canada on an important post-war body with the United States, China and Russia. It would advertise our importance as a provider of relief and not least to the United States. It would be acceptable to public opinion in Canada.

On the other hand there are some serious disadvantages. The idea that Canada might represent the whole Commonwealth (even though this need not be formalized in any way) savors of outworn constitutional doctrine. Doubtless in the United States and elsewhere the argument would be made in some quarters that we were merely a spokesman for the United Kingdom. The absence of direct United Kingdom representation on the Central Committee would certainly not assist in the operation of relief administration. They have laid much of the groundwork and in collaboration with the European Governments have developed the relief plans through the Committee headed by Sir Frederick Leith-Ross.

I should favour having both Canada and the United Kingdom on the Central Committee and not either Canada or the United Kingdom. It is a generous proposal for the United Kingdom to sponsor, but I am inclined to think that we ought not to accept it. If we did it would not be of much value as a precedent in determining the composition of other post-war bodies.

RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION

3. MR. EDEN expressed appreciation of the position taken by the Canadian government with regard to membership on the Central Committee.

The U.K. government had strongly supported the Canadian case but had encountered resolute opposition from the other great powers and, as a consequence, now found themselves in a difficult position. This was the first occasion upon which specific agreement was being sought on an important phase of international organization, and it was essential that efforts be successful.

The proposal that the Canadian representative be chairman of the Committee of Suppliers, with the right of participation in the Central Committee should go a long way toward meeting the Canadian position. Further, the Committee of Suppliers might, in the event, prove more important than the Central Committee itself, since control of supply would be the paramount factor in determining policy.

As to the future, it would be wrong to assume that the organization adopted for the Relief Administration would be a pattern for other post-war organizations and, if the Canadian government decided to accept the plan under consideration, a specific reservation in that respect could be made.

4. MR. KING suggested that the decision of the four great powers to constitute themselves an executive committee of the proposed organization would have an unfortunate effect upon the other United Nations. The Relief Administration would provide a model which would make it difficult, now or later, to achieve the co-operation and support of the smaller countries in a more broadly based United Nations organization.

5. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE expressed the view that the smaller powers, including the British Dominions, could not be expected to give their support to a world organization based solely upon the decisions of the four great powers and controlled by them alone. No doubt the lot of the small nations in a world controlled by the four great powers would be governed more beneficently than one governed by the Axis, but it would not differ in principle.

6. MR. EDEN agreed that authority should derive from all of the United Nations, though, necessarily, the great powers must play the major role. The problem was awkward but not insoluble. Discussions, so far, seemed to be working toward something similar to the Council of the League of Nations, possibly on a more representative basis.

7. THE U.K. HIGH COMMISSIONER TO CANADA expressed general agreement with Mr. Eden's views. While, inevitably, the four great powers must provide leadership in international organization, the smaller powers should be associated with them through some satisfactory form of representation.

8. MR. KING pointed out that Canada, in 1919, had been compelled to deal with the problem of status and international recognition. The government could not now retreat from the position taken at that time, or since, and therefore would have to oppose any great power conception of international organization.

*Mémoire du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures.
au Premier ministre*

*Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
to Prime Minister*

[Ottawa,] April 2, 1943

I am attaching a note[†] which Pearson prepared yesterday, reviewing the developments in the negotiations for the establishment of the Relief Administration and summarizing the arguments for and against Canadian acceptance of the so-called "compromise" arrangement, of which Mr. Eden spoke at War Committee on Wednesday.

Mr. Heenev and I saw Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Eden for a few minutes late last night. In the conversation, Mr. Eden developed the idea that there might be an exchange of letters between Canada and the United States (the latter speaking on behalf of the Big Four), confirming our understanding that any arrangements arrived at with regard to the position of the Central and Supplies Committees of the Relief Organization would not be a precedent fixing the Canadian relationship to other post-war agencies which might be established. I was rather skeptical of the value of this sort of assurance, arguing that the actual outcome of some months of pretty stubborn and contentious negotiations would be a de facto precedent which would be invoked, regardless of any formal reservation of the position which we and other countries concerned might agree to. Eden, however, argued quite vigorously in support of the suggested exchange of letters and thought that it would be of considerable value in preparing the way for the kind of Central Political Council which he had outlined in War Committee.

I suggested that the arrangements under consideration might be more acceptable to our Government and perhaps to a number of other Governments if the draft Relief Agreement, providing for a Central Committee of four and a Supplies Committee of seven, were to leave the names of the countries blank, to be filled in by the Conference. Eden felt that it would be very difficult to go back to the Russians with such an amendment. They had been talked into withdrawing their last sheaf of modifications of the draft and he thought they would be suspicious and opposed to a suggestion of this sort.

Eden mentioned a cable he had recently received from Evatt, insisting on Australia's right to the same position as Canada in the councils of the Relief Organization. He did not propose to take any action on this Australian request, but cited it as a further argument for clinching the arrangements under consideration as quickly as possible. If they were left open until after Evatt arrived in Washington, there was no telling what the upshot might be. Our talk did not last very long for the hour was very late and Eden was obviously pretty tired. I did not, therefore, cover the general ground as thoroughly as I would have liked to. I did stress the overall political necessity of our people feeling they were full partners in all plans for post-war organization. I told him I thought the root of the present difficulties lay in the way the Combined Boards had been shaped as agencies of the United Kingdom and United States rather than of the United Nations. Our relationship with the Combined Boards had not been very satisfactory and we wanted to see the post-war organizations get off to a good start. I thought this could only be done if the Canadian people felt that their Government was sharing as a full partner in the preparation and direction of plans to which the Canadian people themselves would be expected to make a pretty big contribution.

Washington, April 5, 1943

IMMEDIATE. Following for Robertson and Wrong from Pearson, Begins: Your EX-1195, April 5th¹. Relief. At their request, I had a talk this afternoon with Acheson, Atherton, and Dunn at the State Department and explained to them the present position of the consideration being given in Ottawa to U.N.R.R.O.; that it was hoped that the War Committee would discuss the compromise proposal on Wednesday, when some decision might be reached. I also explained why we had hoped that it might have been possible for Acheson to visit Ottawa over the week-end, but I made no effort to press further the desirability of such a visit. I gathered from a few words with Acheson after our meeting that not Berle, but the Secretary of State and Dunn had been a little worried about the visit and had wished to have a talk with me before deciding whether Acheson should go. It was felt this afternoon that there would now be no point in Acheson making the visit if the matter is up for decision on Wednesday and that, in any event, the arrival of Evatt on Friday night might make it a little difficult.

The State Department people felt that Evatt might be somewhat disturbed if he discovered on arrival that Acheson was in Ottawa discussing with the Canadian government the terms of Canada's association with the relief organization, especially as in any event he may not be too happy about Canada's chairmanship of the Supplies Committee (if the Canadian Government decide to accept the compromise). I therefore do not propose to bring up again the question of a visit to Ottawa by Acheson on the relief question unless you tell me to. At the same time, I still feel that at an appropriate time it would be a good thing to have him go to Ottawa and discuss other questions with the Canadian Government, more particularly that of the forthcoming Food Conference, about which I am telegraphing you separately. From my talk with him this afternoon, I am quite sure that Acheson would be glad to go.

2. I was told this afternoon that Litvinov conveyed this morning to the State Department a definite acceptance of the draft convention as amended. This has pleased them very much, as they thought that Moscow might have some last-minute hesitations or make some last-minute changes; especially as Litvinov seemed to be somewhat uneasy at the enlarged Supplies Committee, with its increased powers.

3. I pointed out to the State Department officials this afternoon that we were worried in Ottawa about the importance which might be attached to this relief convention as a precedent for subsequent United Nations organizations. They took the view that it might be a precedent very advantageous to us, in view of the probability of the Supplies Committee becoming the dominating body. My reply to this was that if every technical United Nations council was to have, alongside the "dominating body", an inner council of the big Four, the result would be confusing and unsatisfactory. They argued that this would not in fact follow, because there would probably be United Nations organizations which would have no committee of four at all. Acheson, to prove this, cited the proposed currency stabilization organization. There might also be commodity agreements in which China would play a very small part. They felt, however, that there was a good deal to be said for the inclusion of the Four Powers on their merits in the Central Committee of any relief organization, quite apart from their general political importance. Certainly Russia and China would consider relief and rehabilitation as a matter of the first and greatest importance to them. Ends.

au Comité de guerre du Cabinet*

*Memorandum from Department of External Affairs
to Cabinet War Committee*

Ottawa, April 6, 1943

THE UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION

1. The draft agreement to establish this Organization, prepared by the United Kingdom and United States Governments and agreed to by Russia and China, will be circulated to the other United Nations for their comments, if and when Canada's objections to certain of its provisions are cleared up. After circulation, a United Nations Conference will be called to consider the draft and establish the Relief Administration as an agency of the United Nations.

2. It looked for a time as if Russian opposition to some of the clauses (including amendments designed to meet Canada's position) might result in indefinite delay or even abandonment of the whole plan. This Russian difficulty has, however, now been removed by the Russians, making what they feel to be concessions to meet the British-Canadian position. The Canadian objection remains, therefore, the only outstanding problem. Its solution should make possible an early United Nations Relief Conference; failure to find a solution may prevent such a conference. We should, therefore, be certain that this failure cannot fairly be attributed to Canada.

3. The present difficulty is over the constitution of the proposed Administration. All United Nations are to be represented on its Council, as a concession to theoretical equality. In practice, however, control will be exercised through smaller committees.

4. One of these is the so-called Central Committee, which was to consist of the United Kingdom, the United States, China and Russia. As we felt that our importance in the matter of Relief was such as to warrant our inclusion, we suggested its enlargement. The United Kingdom endorsed our view and proposed its extension from 4 to 7 by the addition of Canada, possibly Brazil, and a European ally.

5. The United States have not opposed this change, but Russia has refused to accept any additions to the Central Committee. She is inspired first by the fear that a scramble for the place reserved to a European power might result in Polish membership, and secondly, by the feeling that in a Committee of 7, constituted as above, she would be in a minority of one on many questions. Russia considers the whole question to be as much political as economic. Her fears seem genuine to her, unreasonable though they may seem to us, and there seems little or no prospect of a change in the Russian attitude.

6. To solve this problem the United Kingdom and the United States have made a compromise proposal. The Central Committee should remain at 4. The Committee on Supplies of the Administration should, however, have its numbers and powers increased. Canada would become chairman of that Committee and as such would "participate in" the deliberations of the Central Committee when supply questions were under consideration.

7. The Russians have accepted this compromise on condition that the 4 members of the Central Committee be also members of the Committee on Supplies. This latter Committee would, therefore, probably consist of the following States:

Canada – (Chairman)
United States of America
United Kingdom
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

China

Brazil

Australia

France (when there is a single French Government)

New Zealand and the Netherlands may also request representation on this Committee.

8. This is the compromise which Canada is asked to accept. We are told that its rejection may wreck the whole scheme as the Russians will not agree to a Central Committee of 7 and other solutions — such as the substitution of Canada for the United Kingdom on a Central Committee of 4 — do not appear to be feasible.

9. The chief arguments against acceptance of this compromise are:

(1) If we are to ensure the “functional approach” to the organization of the United Nations, we should now insist on its recognition. The admission of Canada to the Central Committee would mean its recognition in an unmistakable way.

(2) What is now done will be a precedent for other United Nations bodies. Therefore, if we do not get full recognition of our position now, we may expect similar treatment in other matters later.

(3) The compromise might not satisfy the Canadian people that their government was properly recognized in the direction of International relief and rehabilitation. Without such satisfaction Canadians cannot be expected to accept the sacrifices that relief contributions will entail.

(4) Qualified participation in the Central Committee accompanied by the Canadian chairmanship of the Committee on Supplies might not provide the Canadian people with the assurances required. Absolute equality on the Central Committee with the other four powers might alone suffice. If this Committee is regarded as the controlling and planning body, the Canadian people will not understand our omission from it.

(5) A Central Committee composed of the “Big Four” only might confirm the unfortunate impression that every United Nations body may be dominated by those four Powers, even though there may be other countries more interested in and important to the solution of a particular problem than China or the U.S.S.R.

10. The chief arguments for the acceptance of the compromise are:

(1) It in fact provides adequate recognition of the importance of Canada’s position in relief matters by Chairmanship of the Committee on Supplies and partial membership of the Central Committee.

(2) We have tended to pay too much attention to the Central Committee and not enough to the Committee on Supplies. The latter — now that all members of the Central Committee are on it — may well become the dominating body and a Canadian will be its chairman.

(3) If this is so, this precedent will be a most satisfactory one and become the pattern for other organizations. It will represent a valid recognition of the functional principle.

(4) Even if the Central Committee should retain its importance, we will have full membership on it in all but name. "Participation in" and "membership of" are not actually very different, and attendance at meetings "when supply questions are under consideration" will in fact mean attendance at practically every meeting.

(5) The Canadian people, far from being dissatisfied at this recognition of Canada's position, will welcome an arrangement that makes Canada in relief matters at the least the fifth country in the world and at best the second or third.

(6) Australia and other countries which might claim equality of treatment with Canada (Australia has already done so) could not complain about this compromise as being unfair to them. We know that this is an important point, and one to which President Roosevelt attaches weight.

(7) If we reject this compromise, it may be alleged that we are responsible for the failure of the whole United Nations Relief Plan. People will not understand what will be called our "obstinacy", because to them Canada will have been offered a really important place and will have turned it down on grounds that will seem far less impressive to others than they do to us. Our position in connection with representation on other international bodies may well become weaker if we try unsuccessfully to impose our own views.

(8) The present offer is in fact in full accord with position which we sought in our representations to the State Department of February 10th. What we have insisted on is "the full participation of Canada" in the direction of the Administration, to ensure that our part was commensurate with our expected importance as a supplier.

11. It should be noted that it is intended that the membership of the Central Committee should be spelled out in the draft agreement by naming the four larger powers. The membership of the Committee on Supplies, however, would apparently not be specified in the draft agreement but it is contemplated that an assurance would be given to us in the name of the four larger powers that they would support the selection of a Canadian chairman. (There is some suggestion in the last message received from Washington that the Central Committee would itself determine the membership of the Committee on Supplies and not the full Council on which all the United Nations would be represented). An assurance of support from the four larger powers ought to be enough to guarantee the Canadian chairmanship.

12. Mr. Eden when in Ottawa laid some emphasis on the importance of our securing a formal statement that the composition of the Central Committee would not be regarded as a precedent in the establishment of other United Nations agencies. While such formal assurances often have little value, Mr. Eden felt that in this case they might be very useful in later negotiations, not only to us but also to the British Government. If, for instance, Russia, were to press for the four-power pattern in other connections the fact that we had secured such an assurance to which Russia was a party would be a valuable means of resisting pressure.

UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION

40. THE PRIME MINISTER pointed out that the proposal that a Canadian representative be chairman of the "Committee on Supplies" and participate in meetings of the Central Committee when matters affecting the provision of supplies were under discussion, was still before the government. The U.K. and U.S. governments were awaiting our views before communicating the draft plan to the other United Nations.

When in Ottawa, the U.K. Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had emphasized the importance of succeeding in this first attempt to set up an important United Nations organization. Mr. Eden had not felt that the pattern adopted in the Relief Administration need become a precedent for further international organizations. He had laid some emphasis on obtaining an exchange of notes to this effect.

The present proposal did not remove the basis of the Canadian objection, namely, control of an important United Nations agency by the four great powers, though it went some distance in meeting the Canadian claim to major participation. Nevertheless, the Canadian government would be subject to severe criticism both inside and outside Canada if it could be alleged that we were responsible for the failure of the whole United Nations relief plan.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(External Affairs memorandum, April 6, 1943 — C.W.C. document 470).

41. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE felt that the Canadian people would be satisfied to have the Canadian representative as chairman of the Committee on Supplies in the manner suggested. The solution proposed should be accepted but it should, at the same time, be made clear that Canada did not accept the principle of four-power control of international organizations.

42. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY agreed with Mr. Ralston. In the circumstances the solution proposed was the best we could hope for and would give Canada substantially what had been asked.

43. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE felt that no undertaking as to the establishment of a precedent would have any effect. If Canada withdrew from the position taken by the government in this instance, where the Canadian case was strong, her claims upon other international organizations would be hopelessly prejudiced. It might be preferable to stay out of the Administration altogether and confine the Canadian role to independent co-operation in the provision of supplies.

44. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR was inclined to agree with the Minister of Finance.

45. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed, in the circumstances, to accept the compromise proposed for Canadian association with the Relief Administration, it being understood that an undertaking would be requested that the form of the Administration would not constitute a precedent for other United Nations organizations and that acceptance did not affect the Canadian government's views on the principle of control of United Nations organizations by the four great powers.

Your WA-1617 of April 5th.

War Committee today agreed to accept main constitutional provisions of Relief Administration draft as now revised, without prejudice to a number of observations on drafting points which will be sent forward when draft is communicated to us officially. The Government's agreement has in large part been determined by their desire that international organization in this field should get under way as soon as possible.

In informing State Department and representatives of other prospective members of the Central Committee of this decision, you should make it clear that Canadian concurrence is on understanding that they will use their best endeavours to secure the selection of a Canadian as Chairman of Committee on Supplies of which members of the Central Committee will themselves be members. At the same time it should be understood that our acceptance of these arrangements in the particular case of the Relief Administration does not indicate any withdrawal from position we have taken that the four-power pattern is not in principle an acceptable form of international organization, that representation on international bodies should whenever possible be determined on a functional basis, and that the proposed form of the Central Committee will not be regarded as a precedent in other connections.

Please discuss with Acheson and British Embassy the manner in which these understandings can best be recorded.

Washington, April 9, 1943

IMMEDIATE. Your EX-1248, April 7th, relief. I saw Acheson and Noel Hall yesterday afternoon and gave them letters¹ based on the above teletype. I thought I had better do this at once, pending a discussion of a more formal way in which the understandings of your teletype could best be recorded. Both Acheson and Hall were very pleased with the information I gave them, and the former said that Mr. Hull also, whom he saw immediately after my earlier telephone call yesterday morning, had also expressed his great satisfaction at the position we had now adopted.

2. There is one possible difficulty in respect of the recording of these understandings, namely, that all our previous correspondence and discussions concerning this matter in Washington have necessarily been informal, in view of the fact that the Draft Convention has not yet been circulated officially. As you know, our most important communication to the State Department on the subject took the form of a memorandum¹⁶. Any formal and official communications to the State Department and to the other three Governments registering our position and requiring formal answers would therefore put on record the fact that we had been consulted and worked out an arrangement about this matter before Australia or other countries concerned had had the same opportunity. At our discussion yesterday afternoon the following procedure was therefore suggested: The State Department will call a meeting as soon as possible of the Ambassadors of the United Kingdom, U.S.S.R. and China and read to them the letter¹ I left with Acheson. The minutes of this meeting will record the agreement of the representatives of the four Governments on the points we have made as conditions to our acceptance of the Convention as now drafted. Later, when the draft is officially circulated, we can, as part of the official observations which we will make thereon to the State Department, include the points made in your teletype. The State Department could then, in their reply to our official observations, accept those points.

3. It was also suggested that the recording of these understandings by the United Kingdom Government might better be done through the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Ottawa and the Government in London than through the British Embassy here; if, indeed, any additional recording is required by the United Kingdom Government apart from that outlined above.

CONFIDENTIAL

London, April 10, 1943

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have informed the United Kingdom government of the information conveyed in your telegram No. 554 of April 7th[†] and have sent a personal letter to Mr. Eden[†] on this subject as you requested.

Perhaps I might be permitted to say how disappointed I was when I learned that the War Committee of the Cabinet had felt obliged to withdraw their claim to full membership of the post-war relief administration and had accepted the compromise proposal. One could hardly imagine a case offering us sounder grounds for making a claim for full membership of an international body. It was clear, of course, that the American and Russian objections were too strong to be overcome, but I cannot help feeling that we would have been in a better position to secure our rightful place in international bodies in the future if we had carried out our intention of quietly withdrawing altogether from the relief administration if our claim could not be met.

I feel very doubtful whether we can place much reliance on any undertakings which the American Government might give us that this particular decision will not be regarded as a precedent in the future. One of the arguments advanced by the Russians against our full membership of the policy committee of the post-war relief administration was precisely that it might be a precedent for the future. They will presumably attach a similar significance to our non-membership and will use it as an argument on future occasions.

I am not impressed by the value to us of presence on the supplies committee of the four great powers. The membership that will matter is that of the policy committee. In the next few months we shall no doubt move rapidly towards some form of post-war international organization. So far as Canada is concerned, there seem to be two lions in the path. One of these is the "big power complex" which has appeared in this particular issue, and the other is the old objection, so powerful in Washington in 1919-20, to the presence on any body of two or more member states of the British Commonwealth. This latter apprehension, to judge from the correspondence, was not absent from the minds of American officials on this occasion. Unless we can deal effectively with both these obstacles our way will be a difficult one. The key of the problem is of course representation on a "functional basis" and I feel we should stress this in and out of season. It is a time for toughness.

Yours sincerely,

VINCENT MASSEY

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Minister in United States

CONFIDENTIAL. Your WA-1684 of April 9th, Relief Administration. Our impression was that the United States Government would assure us in the name of the four powers that at any rate two of the four points set out in our message EX-1248 of April 7th were accepted by them all. These two points would be (1) the understanding that they would use their best endeavours to secure the selection of a Canadian as chairman of the Committee on Supplies and (2) that they did not regard the proposed form of the Central Committee as a precedent in other connections. We presumably cannot ask the four powers to do more than note our views on the other two points: (3) that the four-power pattern is not in principle an acceptable form of international organization and (4) that representation on international bodies should whenever possible be determined on a functional basis.

2. We see some difficulties over applying the procedure whereby the necessary assurances would be conveyed to us by the State Department as part of their formal reply to our formal observations on the draft agreement. Could not these assurances be better conveyed following the next four-power meeting in a memorandum in reply to our memorandum of February 10th which would convey to us the stipulations as recorded in the minutes? This would close the matter promptly without requiring the presentation of a formal note at this stage.

3. Another possibility might be that when the draft is formally circulated by the Department of State to the United Nations the covering note to Canada might set forth the understandings.

4. It is far from unlikely that a good many other complications will arise before the draft is generally accepted. Naturally we wish to have the present position, which has only been reached after long and difficult negotiations, clearly defined before new problems come to the front.

5. If it is correct that the United States Government will record the understandings in the name of all four Governments, it seems unnecessary to seek any separate undertaking by the United Kingdom Government as suggested in your paragraph 3.

Assistant Under-Secretary of State of United States

Dear Mr. Acheson,

May I refer to our discussion on April 8th concerning the association of Canada with the proposed United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration and my letter to you of that date on the same subject? You will recall that this letter informed you of the acceptance by the Canadian Government of the main constitutional provisions of the Draft Convention, on the understanding that their position in respect of certain matters arising out of the Convention could be accepted and suitably recorded by the Governments to be represented on the Central Committee of the proposed Administration.

In communicating to the Canadian Government the results of our conversation, I pointed out that you had mentioned a possible difficulty in formally recording these understandings now, arising out of the fact that all our previous correspondence and discussions concerning this matter in Washington had necessarily been informal, in view of the fact that the Draft Convention had not been circulated officially. Therefore, as you pointed out, any official Canadian communications to the State Department and to the other three Governments registering Canada's position and requiring formal replies would put on record the fact that we had been consulted and had worked out an arrangement about this matter before certain other countries concerned had had the same opportunity. I therefore suggested to Ottawa a procedure which you felt might be satisfactory, namely, that the State Department would call a meeting as soon as possible of the Ambassadors of the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R., and China and read to them my letter to you of April 8th. The minutes of this meeting would then record the agreement of the representatives of the four Governments on the points made by the Canadian Government as conditions to their acceptance of the Convention as now drafted. Later, when the Convention was officially circulated, the Canadian Government could, as part of the official observations which they will make thereon to the State Department, include the points which they have already made through the less formal procedure outlined above.

I have now heard from the Canadian authorities on this matter. They feel that they cannot ask the representatives of the four Powers on the Central Committee of U.N.R.R.A. to do more than note the views of the Canadian Government on the following two points: (a) that the Four-Power pattern is not in principle an acceptable form of international organization, and (b) that representation on international bodies should, whenever possible, be determined on a functional basis. They hope, however, that in respect of the other two points, the agreement of the four Powers will not merely be recorded in the minutes of a meeting held to discuss this matter, but that this agreement might be conveyed in the name of those representatives by the State Department to the Canadian Government. These other two points are: (a) the Governments of the United States, United Kingdom, U.S.S.R. and China will use their best endeavours to secure the selection of a Canadian as Chairman of the proposed Committee on Supplies, and (b) they do not regard the proposed form of the Central Committee as a precedent in other connections.

It is hoped that, following the next Four-Power meeting called to discuss this matter, these assurances could be conveyed in a memorandum from the State Department in reply to our memorandum of February 10th. This would close the matter promptly, without requiring the presentation of a formal note by the Canadian Government at this stage, and would avoid precedural difficulties which might arise if the necessary assurances were conveyed to the Canadian Government as part of a formal reply to Canadian official observations on the Draft Convention.

Another possible procedure would be that, when the draft is formally circulated by the Department of State to the United Nations, a covering letter sent therewith to Canada might note the Canadian views on the first two points referred to above and record the agreement of the four Governments on the other two.

Yours sincerely,

L. B. PEARSON

Your EX-1297, April 12th, relief. Procedure recommended has been taken up with Acheson, who told me that there was a meeting of the Four Powers on Monday, at which the Canadian position as outlined in my letter to him of April 8th¹⁷ was discussed. The British, Chinese, and Soviet representatives have cabled their Governments for permission to give us assurances in respect of election to Chairmanship of the Supplies Committee. Acheson is somewhat more worried about the other assurance required, namely, that the proposed form of the Central Committee is not to be regarded as a precedent in other connections. He states that it is obvious that if the United Nations do not wish it to be a precedent, it will not in fact become one, but that there may be some difficulty in securing a statement to this effect on behalf of the Four Powers. However, these were merely his preliminary observations, and I expect to have another talk with him about the matter after he has had an opportunity of considering the points raised in your EX-1297.

relating to Canada's position vis-à-vis the Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. It seems to me that Acheson's expressed worries over the possibility of getting Russia, China and United Kingdom to give us the assurance that the proposed form of the Central Committee is not to be regarded as a precedent in other connections, is a complete confirmation of the fundamental worry we had from the beginning. It appears to show that fundamental issues must be faced and that appeasement policies will not work.

Your telegram No. 6 of April 8th[†], Relief Administration. I had an opportunity yesterday of discussing with Lozovsky¹⁸ Canadian participation in relief organization. I told him of our disapproval of Four-Power pattern, giving reasons. He appeared to be familiar with the general proposal but not with arguments supporting previous [sic] representation on Central Committee. I mentioned that Canada and United Kingdom did not by any means always act together. He asked me if we did not, as part of the British Empire, subscribe to the British policy, and this made it necessary for me to explain Canada's constitutional position, adding that we stood for establishment of international order preventing another world war, which required cooperation of all nations. Lozovsky took in what I said and told me he would advise Molotov.

Your telegram No. 6 of April 8th[†], and my telegram No. 31 of April 17th, touching on possible Soviet apprehension that Canada and United Kingdom always act together.

In my opinion there is also apprehension that we will support the United States whom Soviet Government do not want to see taking too active a part in Europe. Soviet Government, basing its policy on Anglo-Soviet alliance, appear to be thinking in regional terms; United Kingdom as leader of Western and Soviet Union Eastern Europe, with neither interfering too much with the other. China is welcomed to Four-Power Council as representative of another region, as offset to influence of United States, and tending to divert that influence to other regions where United States sea and air power will be predominant.

This purely personal view suggests, as Soviet Government is thinking of regional groups rather than collective security, they would not regard Canada as entitled to voice at Four-Power Council; they would hold that we were not leader of any group and that anyway we would be represented as British country by United Kingdom and as American country by the United States. I shall lose no opportunity to contest this view of our position.

Ottawa, June 10, 1943

Sir,

Acting on the instructions of my Government, I have the honor to transmit to you herewith for the consideration of your Government a draft agreement for the establishment of a United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, together with an explanatory memorandum relating thereto[†].

I know that your Government has been giving attention to the problems of relief and rehabilitation which will exist after the war and in war-torn areas as they are liberated from control of the enemy even before the termination of hostilities. My Government will be happy to collaborate with the Government of Canada in developing plans for joint action by the United Nations and the other nations associated with them in this war in meeting these vast and challenging problems.

In order to secure a basis for general discussion of the subject, my Government has been engaged in informal discussions with the British Government, the Soviet Government and the Chinese Government; the enclosed draft meets with the approval of those governments.

This draft is being brought to the attention of all of the United Nations and of the nations associated with them in this war. It is also being placed before the appropriate French authorities.

The representative of your Government in Washington is being informed regarding the substance of this note and he is being told that the Secretary of State and the other officers of the Department of State dealing with this subject will hold themselves in readiness to discuss with him any questions or suggestions which your Government may wish to present. In order to forestall speculation as to the terms of the proposal, arising out of the wide public interest in the matter in many countries, the text of the draft agreement will be released to the press for publication after nine o'clock p.m. Washington time on the day on which it is being placed before the Governments; the explanatory memorandum will be given to the press for background purposes at the same time. In making this release to the press the Government will make it clear that the draft agreement is tentative and that no action will be proposed until all of the governments concerned have had an opportunity for full consideration and discussion of the proposal. The Government of Canada will feel free, of course, to release the text or to discuss the actual terms of the draft agreement with the press at any time after the time set for the release in Washington.

In view of the tremendous scope of the problems of relief and rehabilitation which will face our nations and of the possibility that large scale assistance will be required for civilians who may be freed from Axis domination in the near future, action by the United Nations and the nations associated with them is of the utmost importance. It is the hope of the Government of the United States, therefore, that your Government will be in position shortly to join with the United States and the other nations in definitive action on this matter.

Projet d'accord établissant l'Administration des Nations Unies pour le secours et la reconstruction

Draft Agreement for Establishment of United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration

The Governments or authorities whose duly-authorized representatives have subscribed hereto,

Being United Nations or being associated with the United Nations in this war,

Being determined that immediately upon the liberation of any area by the armed forces of the United Nations the population thereof shall receive aid and relief from their sufferings, food, clothing and shelter, aid in the prevention of pestilence and in the recovery of the health of the people, and that preparation and arrangements shall be made for the return of prisoners and exiles to their homes, for the resumption of agricultural and industrial production and the restoration of essential services, to the end that peoples once freed may be preserved and restored to health and strength for the tasks and opportunities of building anew,

Have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I

There is hereby established the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration.

1. The Administration shall have power to acquire, hold and convey property, to enter into contracts and undertake obligations, to designate or create agencies and to review the activities of agencies so created, to manage undertakings and in general to perform any legal act appropriate to its objects and purposes.

2. Subject to the provisions of Article VII, the purposes and functions of the Administration shall be as follows:

(a) To plan, coordinate, administer or arrange for the administration of measures for the relief of victims of war in any area under the control of any of the United Nations through the provision of food, fuel, clothing and other basic necessities, housing facilities, medical and other essential services; and to facilitate in areas receiving relief the production and transportation of these articles and the furnishing of these services so far as necessary to the adequate provision of relief. The form of activities of the Administration within the territory of a member government wherein that government exercises administrative authority and the responsibility to be assumed by the member government for carrying out measures planned by the Administration therein shall be determined after consultation with and with the consent of the member government.

(b) To formulate and recommend measures for individual or joint action by any or all of the member governments for the coordination of purchasing, the use of ships and other procurement activities in the period following the cessation of hostilities, with a view to integrating the plans and activities of the Administration with the total movement of supplies, and for the purpose of achieving an equitable distribution of available supplies. The Administration may administer such coordination measures as the member governments authorize.

(c) To formulate and recommend for individual or joint action by any or all of the member governments measures with respect to such related matters, arising out of its experience in planning and performing the work of relief and rehabilitation, as may be proposed by any of the member governments and approved by unanimous vote of the Central Committee.

ARTICLE II

MEMBERSHIP

The members of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration shall be the governments or authorities signatory hereto and such other governments or authorities as may upon application for membership be admitted thereto by action by the Council or between sessions of the Council, by the Central Committee. Wherever the term "member government" is used in this Agreement it shall be construed to embrace such authorities as shall have signed the Agreement or shall subsequently become members of the Administration.

ARTICLE III

THE COUNCIL

1. Each member government shall name one representative, and such alternates as may be necessary, upon the Council of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, which shall be the policy-making body of the Administration. The Council shall, for each of its sessions, select one of its members to preside at the session.

2. The Council shall be convened in normal session not less than twice a year by the Central Committee. It may be convened in special session whenever the Central Committee shall deem necessary, and shall be convened within thirty days after request therefor by a majority of the members of the Council.

3. The Central Committee of the Council shall consist of the representatives of China, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, and the United States of America, with the Director General presiding. Between sessions of the Council it shall exercise all the powers and functions thereof. It shall invite the participation of the representatives of any member government at those of its meetings at which action of special interest to such government is discussed. It shall invite the participation of the representative serving as Chairman of the Committee on Supplies of the Council at those of its meetings at which policies affecting the provision of supplies are discussed.

4. The Committee on Supplies of the Council shall consist of the members of the Council, or their alternates, representing those member governments likely to be principal suppliers of materials for relief and rehabilitation. The members shall be appointed by the Central Committee, with the approval of the Council if it be in session and otherwise subject to its ratification. The Committee on Supplies shall consider, formulate and recommend to the Central Committee and the Council policies designed to assure the provision of required supplies. The Central Committee shall from time to time meet with the Committee on Supplies to review policy matters affecting supplies.

5. The Committee of the Council for Europe shall consist of all the members of the Council, or their alternates, representing member governments of territories within the European area, and such other members of the Council, representing other governments directly concerned with the problems of relief and rehabilitation in the European area, as shall be appointed by the Central Committee, with the approval of the Council if it be in session and otherwise subject to its ratification. The Committee of the Council for the Far East shall consist of all the members of the Council, or their alternates, representing member governments of territories within the Far Eastern area, and such other members of the Council representing other governments directly concerned with the problems of relief and rehabilitation in the Far Eastern area as shall be appointed by the Central Committee, with the approval of the Council if it be in session and otherwise subject to the Council's ratification. The regional committees shall normally meet within their respective areas. They shall consider and recommend to the Council and the Central Committee policies with respect to relief and rehabilitation within their respective areas. The Committee of the Council for Europe shall replace the Inter-Allied Committee on European Post-war Relief established in London on September 24, 1941 and the records of the latter shall be made available to the Committee for Europe.

6. The Council shall establish such other standing regional committees as it shall consider desirable, the functions of such committees and the method of appointing their members being identical to that provided in paragraph 5 of this Article with respect to the Committees of the Council for Europe and for the Far East. The Council shall also establish such other standing committees as it considers desirable to advise it, and, in intervals between sessions of the Council, to advise the Central Committee. For such technical standing committees as may be established, in respect of particular problems such as nutrition, health, agriculture, transport, repatriation, and finance, the members may be members of the Council or alternates nominated by them because of special competence in their respective fields of work. The members shall be appointed by the Central Committee, with the approval of the Council if it be in session and otherwise subject to its ratification. Should a regional committee so desire, subcommittees of the technical standing committees shall be established by the technical committees in consultation with the regional committees, to advise the regional committees.

7. The travel and other expenses of members of the Council and of members of its committees shall be borne by the governments which they represent.

8. All reports and recommendations of committees of the Council shall be transmitted to the Director General for distribution to the Council and the Central Committee by the secretariat of the Council established under the provisions of Article IV, paragraph 4.

ARTICLE IV

THE DIRECTOR GENERAL

1. The executive authority of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration shall be in the Director General, who shall be appointed by the Council on the nomination by unanimous vote of the Central Committee. The Director General may be removed by unanimous vote of the Central Committee.

2. The Director General shall have full power and authority for carrying out relief operations contemplated by Article I, paragraph 2 (a), within the limits of available resources and the broad policies determined by the Council or its Central Committee. Immediately upon taking office he shall in conjunction with the military and other appropriate authorities of the United Nations prepare plans for the emergency relief of the civilian population in any area occupied by the armed forces of any of the United Nations, arrange for the procurement and assembly of the necessary supplies and create or select the emergency organization required for this purpose. In arranging for the procurement, transportation, and distribution of supplies and services, he and his representatives shall consult and collaborate with the appropriate authorities of the United Nations and shall, wherever practicable, use the facilities made available by such authorities. Foreign voluntary relief agencies may not engage in activity in any area receiving relief from the Administration without the consent and unless subject to the regulation of the Director General. The powers and duties of the Director General are subject to the limitations of Article VII.

3. The Director General shall also be responsible for the organization and direction of the functions contemplated by Article I, paragraphs 2(b) and 2(c).

4. The Director General shall appoint such Deputy Directors General, officers, expert personnel, and staff at his headquarters and elsewhere, including field missions, as he shall find necessary, and he may delegate to them such of his powers as he may deem appropriate. The Director General, or upon his authorization the Deputy Directors General, shall supply such secretariat and other staff and facilities as shall be required by the Council and its committees, including the regional committees and subcommittees. Such Deputy Directors General as shall be assigned special functions within a region shall attend meetings of the regional standing committee whenever possible and shall keep it advised on the progress of the relief and rehabilitation program within the region.

5. The Director General shall make periodic reports to the Central Committee and to the Council covering the progress of the Administration's activities. The reports shall be made public except for such portions as the Central Committee may consider it necessary, in the interest of the United Nations, to keep confidential. The Director General shall also arrange to have prepared periodic reports covering the activities of the Administration within such region and he shall transmit such reports with his comments thereon to the Council, the Central Committee and the respective regional committees.

ARTICLE V

SUPPLIES AND RESOURCES

1. Each member government pledges its full support to the Administration, within the limits of its available resources and subject to the requirements of its constitutional procedure, through contributions of funds, materials, equipment, supplies and services, for use in its own, adjacent or other areas in need, in order to accomplish the purposes of Article I, paragraph 2(a). All such contributions received by the Administration shall be accounted for.

2. The supplies and resources made available by the member government shall be kept in review in relation to prospective requirements by the Director General, who shall initiate action with the member governments with a view to assuring such additional supplies and resources as may be required.

3. All purchases by any of the member governments, made outside their own territories during the war for relief or rehabilitation purposes, shall be made only after consultation with the Director General, and shall, so far as practicable, be carried out through the appropriate United Nations agency.

ARTICLE VI

ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES

The Director General shall submit to the Council an annual budget, and from time to time such supplementary budgets as may be required, covering the necessary administrative expenses of the Administration. Upon approval of a budget by the Council the total amount approved shall be allocated to the member governments in proportions to be determined by the Council. Each member government pledges itself, subject to the requirements of its constitutional procedure, to contribute to the Administration promptly its share of the administrative expenses so determined.

ARTICLE VII

Notwithstanding any other provision herein contained, while hostilities or other military necessities exist in any area, the Administration and its Director General shall not undertake activities therein without the consent of the military command of that area, and unless subject to such control as the command may find necessary. The determination that such hostilities or military necessities exist in any area shall be made by its military commander.

ARTICLE VIII

AMENDMENT

The provisions of this agreement may be amended by unanimous vote of the Central Committee and two-thirds vote of the Council.

ARTICLE IX

ENTRY INTO FORCE

This Agreement shall enter into force with respect to each signatory on the date when the Agreement is signed by that signatory, unless otherwise specified by such signatory.

“At a meeting of the representatives of the British Government, the Soviet Government, the Chinese Government and this Government on April 12th, 1943, I read for the information of those present the text of your letter of April 8th²⁰. All of those present expressed their gratification at the willingness of the Canadian Government to cooperate with the plan set forth in the draft agreement. At the same time they took cognizance of the statement that Canadian acceptance of the proposed plan is based on the following points of understanding:

(a) That the prospective members of the Central Committee will use their best endeavours to secure the selection of a Canadian as Chairman of the Committee on Supplies.

(b) That in the view of the Canadian Government the Four-Power pattern is not in principle an acceptable form of international organization.

(c) That in its view representation on international bodies should whenever possible be determined on a functional basis; and

(d) That the Canadian Government does not regard the proposed form of the Central Committee as a precedent in other connections.

“As you point out in your letter of April 13th, there seems to be no need for comment on points (b) and (c) as listed above. With regard to point (d) I believe I can say that there has been nothing in the discussions of the representatives of the Four Powers to indicate that any of these Powers take the position that the form of organisation proposed in the draft agreement for a Relief and Rehabilitation Administration would in any sense set a precedent for the form of any other international organisation. With respect to point (a) I can say that the representatives of the other three Governments have been empowered to join with me in stating that the Four Powers will use their best endeavours to secure the selection of a Canadian as Chairman of the Committee on Supplies of the Council.

“In view of the statements made above I suppose that this communication can be considered as a satisfactory conclusion of the discussion of these matters that has taken place between your Government and my Government, and that no further response is required on the part of the Department of State to the Canadian Legation memorandum of February 9th, 1943, which you placed before the Under-Secretary of State, Mr. Welles, on February 10th. Sgd. Dean Acheson.”

You will no doubt wish to discuss this matter with Mr. Pearson while he is in Ottawa. Meanwhile, pending Mr. Pearson's return, no reply will be made to Mr. Acheson's letter unless instructions to that effect are received. Ends.

We asked for an understanding that the Four Powers would not regard the proposed form of the Central Committee as a precedent in other connections but this has been altered in Acheson's letter by the substitution of the Canadian Government for the Four Powers. You will remember that Mr. Eden, when in Ottawa, urged strongly that an assurance of this nature would be useful in other connections. The Prime Minister thinks that Acheson's attention should be drawn to this change and that it should be made clear to the State Department that we hold to what we said and meant. In view, however, of the explanation of this point given in Acheson's letter it is not necessary to seek an alteration in writing to the assurances given us, so long as our position is made clear at the Department of State.

We shall send the Legation very shortly a number of comments on the Draft Agreement for presentation to the Secretary of State. These embody most of the points made in your letter of June 19th[†].

Washington, July 5, 1943

Sir,

With his Note No. 907 of June 10th, 1943, the United States Chargé d'Affaires in Ottawa transmitted to the Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada a Draft Agreement for the establishment of a United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration and invited the Canadian Government to submit to you its observations thereon. I have the honour to inform you that the Canadian Government agrees with the view of the Government of the United States that action by the United Nations and the nations associated with them for the relief and rehabilitation of territories ravaged by the war is of the utmost importance. The Canadian Government is prepared to collaborate fully with the Governments of the United States and of the other United Nations in developing plans for joint action.

With regard to the terms of the Draft Agreement, the Canadian Government does not desire to propose any substantial changes in the general scheme put forward. There are, however, several points of detail which might, in the view of the Canadian Government, be clarified with advantage. In the attached memorandum a number of suggestions, mainly of a drafting character, are put forward for consideration.

A more general comment relates to the possibilities of collaboration of neutral governments in the work of the Administration. It is considered that the Agreement should be framed both so as to encourage full participation by neutral countries as members of the Administration in some cases and so as to permit neutral countries in other cases to contribute supplies and resources to the work of relief without becoming signatories of the Agreement. Article II of the draft should be expanded, in the view of the Canadian Government, to make it clear that the collaboration of acceptable neutral countries will be both expected and welcomed.

MEMORANDUM ON DRAFT CONVENTION FOR UNITED NATIONS
 RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION

The Canadian Government desire to make the following observations on the Draft Convention referred to above.

Article III, paragraphs 1 and 2.

No mention is made in the Draft Agreement of the normal method of reaching decisions in the Council and its Committees. In Article III (2) it is provided that special meetings of the Council may be convened on the request of the majority of its members. In Article VIII it is provided that the Agreement may be amended by a unanimous vote of the Central Committee and two-thirds of the Council. Presumably the Council and its Committees (except the Central Committee) will normally take decisions by majority vote. Later difficulties might be avoided if this were to be stated explicitly in the Agreement.

Article III, paragraph 3.

(a) If it is the intention that unanimity is to be required in the Central Committee on all occasions, it might be desirable that this should be stated explicitly in this paragraph. Reference to the requirement of unanimity in certain circumstances is made in Article IV (1) and in Article VIII.

(b) The relationship of the Director General to the Central Committee is not altogether clear. It is provided that he is to be its presiding officer. It is also provided in Article IV (1) that he is to be appointed on the nomination by unanimous vote of the Central Committee and that he can only be removed by a similar unanimous vote. It is assumed that it is intended that the Director General should not be a voting member of the Central Committee, but it is considered that this should be stated in the Agreement.

(c) This paragraph authorizes the Central Committee to exercise all powers and functions of the Council between sessions of the Council. So that the prerogatives of the Council as the "policy-making body of the Administration" (Article III, paragraph 1) may be protected when it is not in session, it appears desirable to provide that decisions of the Central Committee on matters of policy should be submitted for approval by the Council at its next session.

(d) In the last sentence of this paragraph it is provided that the Chairman of the Committee on Supplies shall be invited to participate in the Central Committee at those of its meetings at which policies affecting the provision of supplies are discussed. It is assumed that it is intended that participation carries with it the full rights and duties of membership of the Central Committee at those of its meetings which he attends.

Article III, paragraph 4.

This paragraph provides that the members of the Committee on Supplies shall be appointed by the Central Committee with the approval or ratification of the Council. It might be preferable to have the appointments to this Committee made by the Council on the nomination of the Central Committee. It is also suggested that in the next to last sentence of this paragraph reference should be made to "the Council and the Central Committee" rather than in the reverse order.

Article III, paragraph 5.

It is suggested that the Regional Committees should also be appointed by the Council on the nomination of the Central Committee.

Article IV, paragraph 3.

It is considered that the Director General's authority under this paragraph should be qualified by adding at its end; "Within the limits of the broad policies determined by the Council or its Central Committee".

Article IV, paragraph 4.

By this paragraph the Director General is given authority to appoint the staff of the Administration without any limit except that imposed by the annual budget required under Article VI. It is considered that some provision should be inserted requiring the approval of the Central Committee for the executive establishment desired by the Director General.

Article V, paragraph 2.

This paragraph authorizes the Director General to initiate action with member governments in order to secure additional supplies and resources. Without some requirement that, in initiating such action, the Director General should act within the limits of the policies already approved by the Committee on Supplies, it would appear that the responsibilities of that Committee as defined in Article III (4) could in practice be ignored by the Director General.

Article V, paragraph 3.

It is understood that the purpose of this paragraph is to avoid competitive foreign buying of relief supplies, especially by governments which will have large relief requirements to meet in their own territories. The language of the paragraph, however, could be construed as restricting supplying governments from making on their own account incidental foreign purchases which might be necessary to complete the relief supplies that they have promised to furnish. For example, the paragraph would seem to cover the purchase in other countries of textile fibres or textiles needed for the manufacture of clothing for relief, and also of sundry medicines and medical equipment needed to furnish complete medical outfits for relief purposes.

Article VI.

This article would leave to the Council the responsibility of determining the allocation to member governments of the administrative expenses of Administration. As this is likely to be a matter of considerable difficulty, it is suggested that concrete proposals should be formulated for consideration by governments before the first meeting of the Council, if it is not considered feasible to specify the principle of allocation in the Agreement itself.

Article VIII.

It may be considered that the phrase "other military necessities" used in this article is too vague. Its meaning might be extended to cover areas in friendly countries along the lines of communication of armies of occupation long after hostilities have ceased. It is felt that in such circumstances the decision should not be left wholly to the Military Commander of the area. Consideration might therefore be given to narrowing the scope of the article by a more exact definition of the circumstances in which it would apply, once hostilities have ended in an area of relief.

Article IX.

It is open to question whether the final phrase is necessary, as it appears to invite delay. Reservations are likely to be appended by certain signatories, in any event.

Le chargé d'affaires des États-Unis au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
Chargé d'Affaires of United States to Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, September 23, 1943

Sir,

I have the honor to refer to the note of July 5, 1943, to the Secretary of State from the Canadian Minister in Washington concerning the draft agreement for a United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration presented to you on June 10, 1943, and to inform you that the Government of the United States was gratified to learn that the Canadian Government was prepared to collaborate fully with the Governments of the United States and of the other United Nations in developing plans for joint action for the relief and rehabilitation of territories ravaged by the war. The Secretary of State made no effort at that time to reply in detail to the suggestions offered by your government, for it was believed that the most effective response to those suggestions would be modification of the draft agreement in line with your government's wishes so far as that might prove to be possible. Your government's suggestions were given special consideration, therefore, in connection with re-study of the provisions of the draft agreement. Acting on the instructions of my government, I am pleased to present herewith a revised text of that agreement²¹.

Since the draft agreement was first presented my government has received a number of suggestions from the governments concerned with respect to modification of the draft, and all of these suggestions have been studied with care. As a result the draft agreement has been modified to a considerable degree in an effort to improve the plan and to clarify the language. It is the hope of my government that your government will share the opinion that the text submitted herewith is now in the form in which it will be most acceptable to all of the governments which have been giving consideration to this matter. Many governments have stressed the urgent need of prompt action on the lines proposed. The Government of the United States fully shares this sense of urgency and is taking the initiative therefore in placing before each of the governments concerned the following specific proposals:

1. That each government inform the government of the United States at the earliest possible moment whether it is prepared to sign the draft agreement in the form in which it is now presented.

²¹ Pour le texte de ce projet d'accord voir États-Unis, Department of State Bulletin, volume 9, septembre 25, 1943, pp. 211-6.

²¹ For text of draft agreement see United States, Department of State Bulletin, Volume 9, September 25, 1943, pp. 211-6.

2. That each government also inform the Government of the United States as to whether it is prepared to sign the Agreement without any reservation under Article IX. It is hoped that all governments can take this action so that the Agreement may enter into force immediately after signature with respect to all signing governments.

3. That each government appoint a representative with full power and authority to join with the representatives of the other governments in signing the Agreement at the White House in Washington on or about November 9.

4. That each government select in advance its representative on the Council of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration which will be brought into existence by signature of the Agreement, and such alternates, advisers and assistants to this representative as it shall wish to have present at the first session of the Council.

5. That the Council of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration be convened in its first session at a place within the United States but outside of Washington a day or two after signature of the Agreement.

It will be appreciated if your government will transmit its views with respect to these proposals to my government as promptly as possible. The Government of the United States is prepared to make specific arrangements for signature of the Agreement and for the first session of the Council and it will transmit information regarding such arrangements to each government planning to sign the Agreement. If it would be helpful to other governments in reaching a decision as to the size and character of the delegations to be chosen to attend the first session of the Council, my government also will transmit to such governments information regarding the general character of the delegation which will represent the Government of the United States. In order to expedite action by the Council, my government will be prepared also, as the host government, to lay before the Council for its consideration drafts covering its temporary organization and rules of procedure, and the agenda for its first session. It is the hope of the Government of the United States that the Government of Canada and the governments of all of the other United Nations and of the nations associated with them in this war will be prepared to take the action suggested above so that an effective organization may be established promptly to act for all of these governments in providing the greatest possible assistance to the victims of the war.

Washington, September 25, 1943

Sir,

I am enclosing herewith a memorandum[†] which indicates the changes that have been made in the first draft of the agreement for the establishing of a

United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. You will note that the general effect of these changes is to strengthen the power of the Council and weaken that of the Central Committee. As such, the second draft carries out a good many of the ideas suggested in our amendments to the first draft. In some cases those amendments have been specifically adopted.

Ottawa, October 8, 1943

Sir,

I have the honor to refer to my note No. 29 of September 23, 1943, transmitting a revised draft agreement for the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration.

I am instructed by my Government to inform you that arrangements have been made for the use of the Claridge Hotel in Atlantic City for the first session of the Council of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration if that organization is brought into existence by signature of the proposed agreement by the United Nations and the nations associated with them in this war. If this plan is agreeable to other governments my Government would propose signature of the agreement in the East Room of the White House in Washington Tuesday evening November 9, and the assembly of the Council for its first session at the Claridge Hotel on Wednesday afternoon, November 10.

Arrangements have been made to reserve the Claridge Hotel for the exclusive use of the Council for approximately four weeks on the assumption that such a period will be ample to enable the Council to transact the business of its first session.

The Government of the United States expects to lay before the Council for its consideration a draft of agenda, a draft of temporary rules and regulations and proposals for temporary ad hoc committees for the first session of the Council somewhat along the following lines. There might be four general committees on which all governments would be represented covering (1) organization and administration; (2) general policy matters; (3) problems of finance and supplies; and (4) policies of relief and rehabilitation. Such committees if established might expedite their work by appointing smaller sub-committees. For instance, the Committee on Organization and Administration might have smaller groups working on the organization of the Council and its standing committees, on permanent rules and regulations of the Council, on the personnel policies of the Administration, and on the administrative, budget, auditing and other financial procedures. The Committee on General Policy might have smaller groups reporting to it on the scope of United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration's activities on relations with member governments, on relations with non-member governments, and on relations with other inter-governmental agencies. Under the Committee of Finance and Supplies there might be separate groups on means of financing supplies, services and administration, and on procedure for ascertaining and meeting deficits in supplies requiring importation. The Committee on Relief and Rehabilitation Policies might have sub-groups in such specialized fields as the policies governing relief distribution, policies with respect to health and medical care, policies with respect to welfare services, including relations with foreign voluntary relief agencies, policies with respect to assistance to displaced persons, policies relating to agricultural rehabilitation essential to relief, and policies relating to the rehabilitation of such industries, transport and other services as are essential to relief.

Whatever specific plan the Council may adopt to govern its work during the first session, it seems probable that opportunity will be found for discussion during the course of the session of the subjects listed above, and perhaps other subjects of special interest to member governments. It is assumed that at some time during the session, after study of the permanent organization of the Council by the appropriate temporary committee, the Council will establish the standing committees contemplated in the Agreement, including the Supplies Committee and the regional committees.

In view of the difficulty of transportation at this time it is assumed that each member government will wish to restrict the size of its delegation so far as practicable. If the Council establishes four general ad hoc committees along the lines suggested above, the sessions of these committees might be so arranged to enable each member government to be represented on each of these committees. Since the reports and recommendations of any sub-committees established would be cleared through these general committees before presentation to the Council, presumably each member government would be represented only on those sub-committees in which it would have a special interest and for which it could provide specially qualified members.

The Government of the United States probably will designate a Counsellor for each of the four main subjects of discussion enumerated above to assist the United States member of the Council, as well as a few advisers or technical experts as shall seem necessary. More specific information regarding the United States delegation will be communicated to your Government in the near future.

It will be of assistance in arranging for necessary accommodations if your Government will supply as soon as possible detailed information regarding the delegation which it plans to send to the proposed first session of the Council.

Accept etc.

Ottawa, October 14, 1943

The following for Mr. Pearson, [Begins:] UNRRA. There has not been an opportunity for full consideration by the Government of the proposed agreement for the establishment of UNRRA and hence we are not yet in the position to send a reply to the United States Note as to whether Canada is prepared to sign the draft agreement in the form in which it is now presented. However, the terms of the agreement were discussed on October 12th at an interdepartmental meeting. It was agreed that we should seek to obtain clarification of the following points:

1. Article II. Our suggestion that the wording of this clause be expanded to make it clear that the collaboration of acceptable neutral countries will be both expected and welcomed has not been adopted. We should like to know what is intended regarding the participation of neutrals.

2. Article III para. 3. The question as to whether or not the chairman of the Committee on Supplies will have a vote when sitting with the Central Committee is left in the air. The implication is that he will not have a vote. We should like to have this matter cleared up. The Legal Adviser is of the opinion that the word "participation" from a legal standpoint would include the power to vote.

3. Article IV para. 3 and 4, Article V para. 2. The Canadian suggestions for changes in wording which would require that the Director General should exercise his powers under these provisions within the limits of the broad policies laid down by the Council, the Central Committee or the Committees on Supplies as the case may be, have not been adopted. As it stands it would be possible for the Director General to act independently of, and perhaps overrule, the Committee on Supplies. These matters might best be dealt with in the by-laws and procedures laid down by the Council. However we would like to have some clarification of what is intended particularly, with respect to the relations between the Director General and the Committee on Supplies.

It was agreed at the interdepartmental meeting that our queries on these points should not hold up Canadian signature since it would be very awkward to get changes made at this stage. The most we can do is to state our views and to ask for clarification and an expression of intention. I should be grateful, therefore, if you would take up these matters informally with the State Department. It would be appropriate to do so since we have never received a reply to our suggestions on the earlier draft. Clarification of the points mentioned would be helpful in connection with the consideration of the agreement by the Government.

It would be helpful, also, if you could obtain some information on intentions or views regarding methods of financing relief through UNRRA. Will the financial arrangements be made directly between the supplying and receiving countries or will the payments from receiving countries be pooled? How are supplies from neutral countries to be financed? etc.

Following for Wrong from Legation, Begins: Reference your EX-4012 of October 14th, UNRRA.

Questions raised in your message have been discussed with Mr. Roy Veatch, Chief of Division of International Relations in OFRRO²², State Department having informed us that Mr. Veatch should be regarded as the officer of the State Department who would be responsible for answering questions of that character.

1. With regard to participation of neutrals, Mr. Veatch said the U.S. would probably be opposed to inviting the participation of neutrals as members in the preliminary stages. It had not therefore been thought advisable to go as far as the Canadian suggestions. He made it clear that the U.S. would welcome the cooperation of neutrals and their acceptance as members after UNRRA is set up and after the Council decided what policies should be adopted in this connection.

2. Article III, paragraph 3. Mr. Veatch made it clear that the Chairman of the Committee on Supplies would not have a vote when sitting with the Central Committee. He stated also that in similar circumstances the representatives of interested Governments would not have a vote.

3. Article IV, paragraph 3. Mr. Veatch pointed out that paragraphs 2 (B) and 2(C) of Article I related to recommendatory functions and did not add any administrative functions. It did not appear necessary to qualify these functions by adding "within the limits of the broad policies determined by the Council or its Central Committee".

4. Article IV, paragraph 4. We obtained the impression that the U.S. Government would be opposed to any move to make appointments to the administration's staff subject to approval of Committee. Mr. Veatch expressed the opinion that such a condition would be undesirable "from the political angle" and might hamper the Director General in work of urgency.

5. Article V, paragraph 2. Mr. Veatch pointed out that the Committee on Supplies' functions were recommendatory and it was not intended to have policies approved by that Committee. If it were considered desirable to insert provision that the Director should act within the limits of the policies approved by the Central Committee or Council, Mr. Veatch thought this question should be taken up with the Council.

With regard to the methods of financing relief, Mr. Veatch said that their own ideas were not set and that they did not wish to recommend any plan. This must be a matter for the Council to decide. He did not consider that UNRRA would become "a super economic organization or colossus in its field". There would be plenty of room for commercial operations. His own view was that there would be no chance of U.S. Government moving towards a centralization through UNRRA of all commercial dealings that might affect relief or rehabilitation. A wide field of opportunity should be provided to use the quickest method of obtaining allocations without pooling. He hoped the final result would be complete control of allocations by UNRRA as quickly as possible to meet urgent requirements. One of the first duties of the Council should be to study relations with neutral Governments and International Committees (such as Food Commission) which are interested in relief.

UNRRA seems now to be seen more as a medium of control sufficient to ensure best use of supplies and shipping and fair proportioning of procurements among the supplying nations in accordance with their resources and abilities. Mr. Veatch said that some Governments "might be unwilling to turn the whole job over to UNRRA" and that the U.S. did not wish to appear as trying "to run things in our own way".

Mr. Veatch did not wish to be quoted and asked us to treat his replies as confidential. Ends.

COMBINED FOOD BOARD; UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION; CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

34. THE PRIME MINISTER raised the question of Canadian representation on these two bodies. The Minister of Agriculture had been consulted.

35. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed:

(a) that, subject to concurrence of the Minister of Finance (in consultation with the Wartime Prices and Trade Board) and the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Gardiner be named Canadian member of the Combined Food Board, with Dr. Barton as deputy; and

(b) that, if available, George W. McIvor, Chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board, would be suitable for appointment as Canadian representative on the Council of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, and as Chairman of the Administration's Committee on Supplies, provided that Mr. G.R. Paterson, of the Department of Trade and Commerce, could be made available as an executive officer in Washington in connection with the work of the Administration and that of the Combined Food Board.

UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND REHABILITATION
ADMINISTRATION; DRAFT AGREEMENT

36. THE ASSISTANT UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS submitted a revised draft agreement for the establishment of the Administration.

This document had been included in a note from the U.S. Minister²³, which requested concurrence of the Canadian government. Copies of the document and of the note had been circulated.

(External Affairs memoranda, Oct. 12th[†] and 16th, 1943[†] and attached documents).

37. MR. WRONG pointed out that the revised draft had been the result of lengthy international negotiations. Its terms had been examined carefully by Canadian departments concerned. In the circumstances, it was recommended that it be accepted by the government, and authorization given to a Canadian representative to sign on behalf of Canada.

It was contemplated that the first meeting of the Council of the Administration would be held at Atlantic City on November the 10th.

38. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed to accept the document submitted, and to authorize the Canadian Minister to the United States to sign it, without reservation, on behalf of Canada.

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your note No. 29 of September 23rd enclosing a revised text of the draft agreement for the establishment of a United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration.

The position of the Government of Canada with regard to the proposals contained in your note is as follows:

1. The Government of Canada is prepared to sign the draft agreement in the form in which it is now presented.

²³ Document 704.

2. The Government of Canada is prepared to sign the agreement without any reservation under Article IX.

3. The Government of Canada will authorize the Canadian Minister in Washington to join with the representatives of the other Governments in signing the agreement at the White House in Washington on November 9th next²⁴.

4. The Government of Canada will be glad to appoint its representative on the Council of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration and such alternates, advisers and assistants to this representative as may be necessary.

5. The Government of Canada agrees that the first session of the Council should be convened in the United States shortly after the signature of the agreement. I expect shortly to be able to communicate to you in reply to the request made in your note of October 8th full information regarding the Canadian delegation to the proposed first session of the Council opening on November 10th at Atlantic City.

The Government of Canada would be glad to receive from the Government of the United States information concerning the delegation which will represent the Government of the United States at the meeting of the Council. It would also welcome the receipt from the Government of the United States of information supplementary to that contained in your notes of September 23rd and October 8th concerning the proposals which will be laid before the Council for its consideration by the Government of the United States covering the temporary organization, rules of procedure and agenda of the Council for its first session.

NOTES ON SOME QUESTIONS OF INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION WHICH MAY ARISE DURING THE MEETING OF THE RELIEF COUNCIL AT ATLANTIC CITY

1. The signature on November 9th of the agreement establishing UNRRA will bring into existence the first formal organization of the United Nations. Strong objection has been taken in several countries to the methods of control incorporated in the agreement, and some countries, including particularly Canada and the Netherlands, only gave their assent on the understanding that the pattern therein followed was in no way to be regarded as a precedent which might be applied in other international organizations. One of the tasks of the Relief Council at its first meeting will be to fill out by the approval of regulations and procedures the outline contained in the agreement. It is altogether likely that this will give rise to considerable discussion about the most satisfactory types of constitution for future international organizations.

2. As originally drafted the agreement appeared to place virtually complete control of UNRRA in the hands of a committee made up of representatives of the four largest powers. When the Canadian Government was informally consulted strong objection was taken to this. In the course of the negotiations which ensued the Canadian Government enunciated the principle that the composition of new international bodies should be determined on a functional basis "which will admit to full membership those countries large or small which have the greatest contribution to make to the particular object in question" (statement by Prime Minister in House of Commons, July 9th, 1943)²⁷. Both the United Kingdom and the United States Governments intimated that they were impressed by the force of the Canadian arguments and an attempt was made to secure consent to the enlargement of the Central Committee from four to seven members so as to admit Canada, a European ally and perhaps a Latin-American country to full membership. This solution appears to have been strongly supported by the United Kingdom. We do not know how strong was the support given to it by the United States. We do know, however, that it was resolutely opposed by the Soviet Government.

3. When it became apparent that Soviet opposition could not be overcome Mr. Eden took up the matter in Ottawa during his visit last April and expressed the conviction that no international relief administration could be established if Canada were to maintain her demand for representation on the Central Committee. Similar views were expressed by the State Department to the Canadian Legation in Washington. The Canadian Government, therefore, reluctantly agreed to a compromise whereby the four large powers pledged themselves to support the choice of a Canadian as chairman of the Committee on Supplies who would by a change in the agreement be entitled to sit with the Central Committee when supply matters were under discussion. This compromise may work out so as to provide Canada with an adequate voice in the direction of UNRRA although this is not certain. It did not bring about a departure in form from the Four-Power pattern to which objection had been taken.

4. The draft agreement was circulated to all members of the United Nations by the United States Government in June²⁸ and observations were asked for. In the light of the criticisms so made the draft has been modified in many respects, the general tendency being to emphasize the authority of the Council on which all members are equally represented at the expense of the Central Committee made up of the four large powers. It is apparent that the view originally taken by the Canadian Government is shared by the Governments of a number of other countries, especially those of intermediate rank like the Netherlands and Belgium. These Governments had no opportunity of expressing their views until the draft agreement was made public last June.

5. We are confronted at present almost daily with problems which arise from the concentration of international authority in the hands of the largest powers. In military matters we have left the high direction of the war to the United Kingdom and United States authorities acting together through the Combined Chiefs of Staff and concerting strategy with the Soviet Government by such methods as they may be able to employ. Although it is probable that in the war against Germany, Canada is the fourth military power among the United Nations, the volume of our military contribution is so much smaller than that of the three Great Powers that we have only been concerned to ensure that we were consulted fully about the tasks assigned to Canadian forces. This is a sound application of the functional idea of organization.

6. The position of China in the group of the four large powers presents some anomalies and it is reasonable that China has been excluded from strategic discussions except where she was directly involved. The weakness of China as a Great Power seems in itself to be an argument for the extension of the functional principle wherever it can be applied.

7. Two meanings can be given to functional international organization. The meaning of the term as used hitherto by us has been that effective international authority in a given matter ought to be concentrated in bodies in which the countries mainly concerned are represented. In certain connections this is obvious: a body composed of the Great Powers which sought to deal with the international trade in wheat would be an absurdity. The principle can only be easily applied when quantitative criteria can be used, and it is, therefore, of chief value in relation to international trade and finance. There is another meaning given to the term, used especially by Professor Mitrany in a study recently issued by Chatham House²⁹. He argues that the world should be bound together by a large number of different international institutions organized to deal separately with the many functions requiring international cooperation. The two meanings overlap and are not essentially inconsistent but the variation in use of the term should be borne in mind.

8. It is undoubtedly sound that influence should be proportionate to contribution, actual or expected. The clarity of this conception has often been obscured in the past by emphasis on status. For example, Brazil resigned from the League of Nations in 1926 because she was refused a permanent seat on the Council as a Great Power. The possible contribution of Brazil, however, to the maintenance of world peace was far smaller than that of many countries which advanced no such claim. This emphasis on status has often led to a completely unreal division of the world between Great and Small Powers. It is to be hoped that the absurdity of labelling indiscriminately as Small Powers diminutive states like Afghanistan or Paraguay, satellite states such as Panama or Slovakia, and intermediate states like the Netherlands or Brazil will gradually disappear.

9. It is well, therefore, to avoid emphasis on status as such in discussing the forms of international organization. A practical argument in favour of the effective recognition of function rather than of status in determining the composition of international bodies is that no democratic country can be expected to play its due part in international affairs if its influence in their direction is less than its expected contribution. This may seem so obvious that it is hardly worth stating, but experience shows that this elementary political fact is frequently in danger of being forgotten by the large powers. This argument was the basis of the Canadian Government's objection to the constitution of UNRRA as originally proposed: unless Canada was given her fair share of control in the direction of UNRRA, the Parliament and people of Canada might not be willing to provide the supplies which Canada might be expected to contribute.

10. There is one suggested solution for these problems as they affect Canada. Canada is a leading secondary power among the United Nations and is also the ranking member of the British Commonwealth after the United Kingdom. It appears to be widely held in London that the drawing together of the British Commonwealth in a joint policy would of itself solve the problems of securing proper international influence for Canada, Australia and the rest. In Australia there is considerable sentiment in favour of the development of a joint Commonwealth policy and apparently even in favour of the substitution of the British Commonwealth of Nations for the United Kingdom as a single great power.³⁰ These questions will not arise at the Relief Council and one need not elaborate on them here. There may be some tendency to seek behind the scenes the formation of a joint Commonwealth view on questions to be decided by the Council. On the one hand it is in our interest to maintain a close entente cordiale with the representatives of the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries, especially since the United Kingdom representatives usually are far readier than those of the United States and other countries to discuss questions frankly and to disclose information to Canadian representatives. On the other hand it is also in our interest carefully to avoid any public appearance of concerted support for the United Kingdom point of view.

11. It is possible, however, although perhaps unlikely, that one aspect of intra-Commonwealth relations may become the subject of international discussion at Atlantic City. The suggestion may be made that a panel system of representing Member States should be adopted in deciding the composition of some of the committees of the Relief Council. In that event, proposals would almost certainly be made that the United Kingdom should be chosen in her own right as a Great Power and that one of the Dominions or India should be chosen to represent the rest of the British Commonwealth. This was the method applied in determining the choice of non-permanent members of the League Council and it was far from satisfactory. Its adoption in connection with UNRRA would be a departure from the functional idea and should be resisted. Support for panel representation of the Commonwealth might come from the United Kingdom Government which at one time during the debate over the composition of the Central Committee offered to stand down themselves in favour of Canada as the representative of the Commonwealth.³¹

Approved. W. L. M[ACKENZIE] K[ING]

The following have been appointed as the Canadian delegation to the first session of the Council:

Member of the Council, L.B. Pearson, Minister-Counsellor of the Canadian Legation in Washington,

Alternate Member of the Council, Brooke Claxton, K.C., M.P., Parliamentary Assistant to the President of the Privy Council,

Advisers, J.G. Bouchard, Assistant Deputy Minister of Agriculture; J.J. Deutsch, Special Assistant to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs; G.R. Paterson, Canadian Government Trade Commissioner, Department of Trade and Commerce; A.F.W. Plumptre, Financial Attaché, Canadian Legation, Washington, and representative in Washington of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board; Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt, Legislative Councillor of the Province of Quebec.

It is probable that Mr. A.D. Dunton, Assistant General Manager, War[time] Information Board, will be attached to the Canadian delegation during the opening days of the meeting of the Council but it is not desired that he should be listed as a member of the Canadian delegation. It would be appreciated if arrangements could be made to reserve accommodation for Mr. Dunton with the Canadian delegation and to grant him the necessary facilities.

Instructions pour la délégation à la première session du Conseil d'UNRRA
Instructions for Delegation to First Session of Council of UNRRA

[n.d.]

Headings of points to be considered.

I. The role of UNRRA and the extent of its responsibility.

The British Government has suggested that the "... Administration should work all down the line in close collaboration with representatives of the Combined Boards and the British and United States Supply Departments ...". With reference to relief distribution they have suggested also that "... it might be desirable to establish local screening bodies representative of the local Government, the Administration and the British and United States Supply Agencies".

Obviously UNRRA will have to work in close relationship with the Combined Boards and Supply Agencies with respect to the allocation of relief supplies and the co-ordination of the relief programme with war needs. However, there is a question as to how far the Combined Boards and National Supply Agencies should exercise responsibility in the administration and distributive aspects of relief as seems to be suggested in some quarters. The Combined Boards are not United Nations agencies and efforts on their part to "control" relief will lead to difficulties. This would bring resentment from the smaller countries. Basically, the problem is how far is UNRRA to be the instrument for a genuine United Nations effort or simply a cloak for the dominance of the two or three "big" powers through an extension of the functions of existing machinery.

2. The Scope of Relief under UNRRA.

The British Government have stated that the supplies to be made available through UNRRA should consist mainly of "... consumption goods for the local population, with such additions as are needed to enable local production to provide for consumption needs otherwise calling for imports." They feel also that UNRRA "... should not be concerned with either production for war purposes on the one hand or long-range reconstruction on the other". The occupied countries are likely to press for a pretty liberal interpretation of the functions of UNRRA so that they would receive not only consumption goods but also materials and machinery for the rapid rehabilitation and reconstruction of their economies. Failing in this they will ask for assurances that the longer-run needs will be met in other ways. Considerable stress was laid on this aspect of the problem in the report of the Leith-Ross Committee where it was stated that the restoration of employment in industrial areas would be an urgent and essential part of any relief action in order to avoid the "grave risk of social disorder and civil disturbance". There will be great difficulty in meeting the wishes of the occupied countries in this respect but it may be necessary to tell them something of how it is proposed to deal with the more basic problems of rehabilitation and reconstruction.

3. The relationship of relief requirements to consumption levels in supplying countries.

It is most likely that in the early stages relief supplies will be very hard to come by. This raises the difficult question regarding the degree of sacrifice to be borne by the consumers of supplying countries so as to support a minimum level of consumption in liberated territory. In this connection the report of the Leith-Ross Committee states "The Committee recognise that, in so far as supplies prove inadequate to meet full requirements, the estimates which they have submitted will have to be reduced; but in that event, similar reductions ought to be applied also to the import requirements and to the current consumption of other countries". How far can the viewpoint implied in this statement be adopted as a principle? How far should the supplying countries be prepared to go in further restrictions on their own consumption to enable consumption in liberated territory to approach adequate or comparable levels?

4. Financing of Relief.

Various suggestions have been made.

a) The U.S. Treasury has suggested a plan whereby each benefactor country would contribute 1% of its national income for one year, 90% to be spent internally and 10% externally.

- b) Contributions in kind according to the availability of supplies in each country.
- c) Payments from receiving countries to be pooled and distributed among supplying countries on some equitable basis.
- d) Payments to be arranged directly between supplying and receiving countries. The British memorandum[†] states "Our own view is that restored local governments which can pay for their requirements should be encouraged to enter into direct relations with the supply authorities".

5. Organization of the Council and Powers of the Director General.

Procedures and by-laws will have to be adopted to provide for, among other things, a) specific powers and responsibility of the Director General; b) the relationships between the Director General and the Committees of the Council.

It would seem desirable to define more closely the powers of the Director General under Article IV paragraph 3. It is suggested that the procedures to be established by the Council should provide that the Director General should carry out his functions under this paragraph within the limits of the broad policies laid down by the Council or its Central Committee.

The powers of the Director General to appoint staff and field missions under Article IV para. 4 would appear to need some qualification. This would seem to call for the adoption of a by-law requiring the approval of Council or the Central Committee of the general executive establishment (but not for individual appointments) of the Administration.

The relationships between the Director General and the Committees of the Council are left very vague in the draft agreement. These relationships will need to be set out more specifically in the by-laws and procedures. With reference to the Committee on Supplies we are informed by Mr. Veatch of OFRRO that it is not intended to have supply policies approved by that Committee and that its functions are recommendatory. This important matter will need to be clarified. If the Committee on Supplies is to be a significant body it should have the duty of formulating general supply policy and the Director General should be required to act in accordance with that policy.

In addition to the Committee on Supplies the draft agreement provides for the establishment of committees of the Council for Europe and the Far East. The Council would be given authority to appoint other standing committees. Committees on finance, transport and repatriation have been suggested. It will be necessary to decide on which of these committees Canada should seek to be represented.

6. Participation of neutral countries.

The Canadian authorities have suggested that the Agreement should be so framed both so as to encourage full participation by neutral countries as members of the Administration in some cases and so as to permit neutral countries in other cases to contribute supplies and resources to the work of relief without becoming signatories of the Agreement. We have been told informally that the U.S. would probably be opposed to inviting the participation of neutrals as members in the preliminary stages. It was stated, however, that the U.S. would welcome the co-operation of neutrals and their acceptance as members after UNRRA is set up and after the Council decided what policies should be adopted in this connection.

7. Relations with other International bodies.

It is probable that the ILO and the Permanent Organization on Food and Agriculture will need to be associated in some way with the work of UNRRA. The British Government have informed the U.S. Government that they are much interested in ensuring the participation of the ILO in an appropriate manner in the work of UNRRA and they have suggested that at the first meeting of the Council the delegates should be given the opportunity of considering the whole subject of the participation of other international bodies in the work of the relief administration. It will have to be decided what the nature of that participation is to be.

8. Commencement of operations.

Article VII of the draft agreement provides that "while hostilities or other military necessities exist in any area, the Administration and its Director General shall not undertake activities therein without the consent of the military command of that area, and unless subject to such control as the command may find necessary. The determination that such hostilities or military necessities exist in any area shall be made by its military commander". Some clarification of the circumstances under which UNRRA would assume responsibility would seem to be required, particularly with reference to the meaning of "military necessities".

9. Repatriation of prisoners, distressed nationals and displaced populations.

The draft agreement provides for, [sic] and the United [States] Government has proposed that the repatriation of all United Nations citizens should be effected through UNRRA. Previously Canada had agreed to take part in a scheme according to which the responsibility for repatriating all Empire prisoners-of-war was divided among the British nations. Under this plan, the United Kingdom was to arrange for repatriating Canadian and other British prisoners from the European area, while Canada was to be responsible for the repatriation of all British prisoners in the Chinese area. A suggestion to extend this scheme to include distressed nationals has been under consideration.

This British Empire scheme is being held in abeyance until the plans developed by UNRRA are known. However, it should be considered whether it would not be better to handle the repatriation of British prisoners-of-war and distressed nationals as a separate project instead of being combined with the much larger, more complicated and less immediate job of repatriating the displaced populations of Europe for which UNRRA might more appropriately be responsible.

Memorandum from Department of External Affairs to Cabinet War Committee

Ottawa, December 4, 1943

FIRST SESSION OF THE COUNCIL OF THE UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION. ATLANTIC CITY,
NOVEMBER 10TH-DECEMBER 1ST, 1943

The Council of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration consisting of the representatives of forty-four United and Associated Nations was established by the Agreement signed in Washington on November 9, 1943³². In this Agreement the signatories expressed their determination to bring relief to the victims of war immediately upon the liberation of any area by the armed forces of the United Nations and agreed to establish a United Nations administration for the accomplishment of this purpose. The first session of the Council in Atlantic City had before it the task of determining the organization of this administration and of formulating the broad policies which are to govern its work.

In particular, it was the duty of the Council, 1) to outline the nature and scope of the relief activities to be undertaken, 2) to define the relationships of the Administration with the existing intergovernmental supply and shipping agencies so that the effective prosecution of the war would not be impeded, 3) to decide the policies to be followed in the distribution of relief supplies in the liberated areas, 4) to provide for an equitable apportionment of available supplies among the liberated countries, 5) to establish the procedures for determining the needs of the liberated peoples, 6) to prescribe the procedures for obtaining the supplies required to meet these essential needs, 7) to recommend a method for the equitable sharing of the burden among the contributing nations, and finally, 8) to frame the rules which are to govern the conduct of the Administration itself, so as to secure effective representation of the interested nations in the development of policies and to facilitate the work of the Director General in carrying these policies into effect.

These questions, all of which contained matters of considerable difficulty, were approached in an encouraging spirit of co-operation and with a minimum of emphasis on prestige. There was no attempt at domination by the large powers nor obstruction on the part of the small. Consequently, in all cases it was possible to find satisfactory and workable solutions.

The Conference did not attempt to reach ambitious objectives either with regard to detail in its recommendations or the functions of the Administration. The scope of relief and rehabilitation is to be narrow. The purpose is to meet an emergency and to provide the food and supplies which are essential to prevent starvation and disease. The assistance of the Administration in providing repairs, equipment and supplies for the rehabilitation of industry and services is to be confined to what is necessary for relief and for an early recovery of the liberated areas from dependence upon outside help. The resources of the Administration are not to be used for long-term reconstruction.

Since the successful prosecution of the war is the first objective of the United Nations it was agreed that the activities of the Administration in obtaining supplies for relief must be co-ordinated with the existing wartime arrangements for the allocation of supplies and shipping. Consequently, all requirements for relief and rehabilitation which have been drawn up or approved by the Administration, are to be brought before the Combined Boards where they will be considered as an additional claim on the available supplies alongside the needs for war and the civilian populations of the supplying countries. In cases of scarce commodities in respect of which the Combined Boards wish to exercise control the Boards, in consultation with the Director General and the Chairman of the Supplies Committee of the Administration, will determine the amounts which may be devoted to relief. This will ensure that the flow of supplies necessary for the war effort will not be hampered.

The representatives of a number of the occupied countries, namely the French Committee, the Netherlands and Belgium, have indicated that they intend to pay for the whole or part of their relief needs. In order to achieve an equitable apportionment of available supplies among the countries in a position to pay and those not in a position to pay it was provided that all member governments shall keep the Administration fully informed of their intentions regarding the importation of relief and rehabilitation supplies regardless of how these are to be financed. On the basis of this information the Director General may present to the Combined Boards such recommendations or objections as he may deem necessary to obtain a fair distribution of supplies among all the liberated areas.

It was agreed that the responsibility for the distribution of relief within a receiving country shall be borne by the recognized government which exercises administrative authority in the area. The Administration may not operate in a territory without the consent of the recognized government, or if such a government does not exist, the military command. In the cases of countries which are not in a position to pay for the relief supplies furnished to them it was provided that they should make available to the Administration in whole or in part the proceeds in local currency from the sale of such supplies to their peoples. The Administration will use this local currency for all its expenses arising out of any relief work which it undertakes within the countries concerned.

The problem of devising a formula whereby the burden, resulting from the provision of relief to liberated countries not in a position to pay, may be shared equitably among the contributing countries gave rise to considerable discussion.

The Council finally agreed to recommend that each member government whose home territory has not been occupied by the enemy shall make a contribution approximately equivalent to one per cent of its national income for the year ending June 30, 1943 as determined by the member government and, that as much as possible but not less than 10% of the contribution shall be in such form of currency as can be expended outside of the contributing country. The balance of the contribution is to be in the form of a credit in local currency which shall be available for the purchase of the contributing country's goods. It was not possible to agree on a 'watertight' formula and each country is left free to decide for itself whether there are special circumstances which would make the one per cent contribution excessively burdensome. On the assumption that the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada and one or two of the other Dominions would make their full contributions, the United States would give between $1,300 and $1,500 millions, the United Kingdom between $300 and $400 millions and Canada between $80 and $90 millions. Altogether a fund of between $2,000 and $2,500 millions would be provided. Should this fund not be sufficient the question of further contributions would have to be considered at a later meeting of the Council.

In addition to the general policy decisions outlined above the Council had the task of setting up the organization to carry these policies into effect. The executive and administrative functions are assigned by the Agreement to the Director General whose position is analogous to that of the general manager of a corporation. The Council appointed Governor Herbert Lehman to this office. Governor Lehman's attitude and contribution to the work of the Council created a high degree of confidence among all the representatives.

A considerable part of the time of the session was devoted to the establishment of the relationships and the demarcation of responsibility between the Council, the Director General and the standing committees of the Council. The draft proposals presented by the United States secretariat gave a large measure of authority to the Director General in the field of policy as against the representative organs of the Administration. This was not in accord with either the British system of representative government nor with the conditions necessary for the successful operation of the Administration. The Canadian delegation took an active part, along with the British, the other Dominions, a number of the smaller powers and finally the official United States delegates themselves in working out a more satisfactory system of organization. The functional principle of international representation was found to be a highly appropriate criterion and received widespread support. Consequently, in the final decisions of the Council the role of the representative bodies of the Administration in the formation of policy was firmly established.

Aside from the Council itself the policy-making organs of the Administration consist of the Central Committee, the Standing Regional Committees for Europe and the Far East, the Standing Committee on Supplies, the Standing Committee on Financial Control and the Standing Technical Committees on agriculture, displaced persons, health, industrial rehabilitation, and welfare. The Central Committee of which the Director General is chairman and which is composed of the representatives of the four great powers is to deal with general policy matters between sessions of the Council. The importance of the Central Committee has been considerably reduced since the presentation of the initial proposals. All its decisions must be reported promptly to each of the member governments and must be ratified later by the Council. The Regional Committees for Europe and the Far East are to prepare recommendations to the Council regarding the bases for the determination of relief requirements in their areas, to advise the Director General with respect to the equitable apportionment of relief supplies and generally to formulate recommendations regarding relief policies within their respective regions. The Committee for the Far East is under the chairmanship of the representative of China and consists of the representatives of all the member governments in that region. The representative of the United Kingdom is chairman of the Committee for Europe which is composed of the representatives of all the member governments in Europe together with the representatives of Brazil, the United States and Canada. The Committee on Financial Control under the chairmanship of the representative of the United States is to deal with questions concerning the administrative budget, and the auditing and accounting control of the Administration's operations. The Standing Technical Committees are intended to be expert bodies to advise the Council, the Regional Committees and the Director General on technical matters in their field.

The Committee on Supplies, which was given important functions, will play a large part in the affairs of the Administration. The countries represented on the Committee whose chairman is to be appointed by Canada, are: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, the French Committee, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom and the United States. The Committee is to advise the Council, the Central Committee and the Director General on general policies regarding the provision, financing and transport of supplies. The Committee is to advise also on all financial matters related to the provision of supplies. The chairman is to appoint the special sub-committee which is charged with the determination of whether a recipient country is in a position to pay. The chairman, together with the Director General, will be consulted by the Combined Boards when matters affecting the Administration are under discussion. He will participate in the meetings of the Central Committee when matters concerning supplies are being considered.

The Director General has indicated that he is anxious to obtain assistance and advice from the Committee on Supplies as soon as possible. He has already received specific requests regarding arrangements for the future provision of relief goods. Important matters remain to be worked out with the military authorities who will be responsible for relief during the immediate period following the liberation of any territory. The circumstances and the time at which the Administration will take over are matters of considerable interest to the supplying countries and in respect of which the Supplies Committee will be expected to give advice and assistance. With the rapid progress of events these questions will need to be clarified as soon as possible and therefore it is felt that the Supplies Committee and its chairman should be ready to function at an early date.

UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION

7. THE SECRETARY submitted and read a report from Canadian representatives at the first session of the Council of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration held at Atlantic City from November 10th to December 1st.

(External Affairs memorandum, December 4, 1943 – C.W.C. Document 668).

8. THE MINISTER-COUNSELLOR, CANADIAN LEGATION, WASHINGTON, and the PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL commented on and explained certain features of the report submitted, and described the present position in respect of UNRRA, as it affected Canada.

A difficulty had developed and doubt still existed as to the division between civil and military responsibility for relief and rehabilitation. The U.S. Army had received a directive from the President which indicated a substantial extension of military responsibility beyond the six months' period contemplated in the organization of UNRRA. This was a matter of considerable concern to the Director General which would have to be cleared up satisfactorily before UNRRA could get under way.

9. THE MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES and the MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES expressed the view that the sooner relief and rehabilitation were transferred from the Army to the civil authority, the better. The Army were not equipped, nor were they competent for anything beyond immediate relief on the spot.

10. MR. CLAXTON AND MR. PEARSON pointed out that Canada would have to provide a Chairman for the Supplies Committee, and also a member³³; the latter would be responsible for looking after Canadian interests. It was expected that the Supplies Committee would have substantial importance in the work of UNRRA.

It was not possible to make any accurate estimate of the total amount of relief supplies which would be required. Supplies to be included in the Canadian contribution (tentatively at from $80 to $90 million) would be wheat, flour, agricultural machinery, clothing and other supplies.

It would be helpful if something could be provided at once upon the Canadian cash contribution to the work of the Administration. Governor Lehman had expressed the desire to have a number of Canadians in key administrative posts under his direction.

³³ L.B. Pearson was named Chairman and J.J. Deutsch was named alternate member.

11. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed as follows:

- (a) that submission of the report of the Canadian representatives to the Atlantic City meeting be noted with approval;
- (b) that, as soon as possible, responsibility for relief and rehabilitation should be transferred from military to civil administration (UNRRA), and that the U.S. government be informed of the Canadian government's view on this point; and,
- (c) that a sum of $50,000 be provided forthwith from the War Appropriation on account of Canada's contribution to UNRRA.

Sir,

Under instructions from the President of the United States I have the honor to transmit the following invitation to the Canadian Government:

"The Government of the United States of America is of the opinion that it is desirable now for the United Nations and those nations which are associated with them in this war to begin joint consideration of the basic economic problems with which they and the world will be confronted after complete military victory shall have been attained. Accordingly and as a first step in this direction the Government of the United States proposes to convene on April 27 at some suitable place in the United States a conference on food and other essential agricultural products and hereby invites the Government of Canada to send to that conference a small number of appropriate technical and expert representatives.

The purpose of the conference is to provide an opportunity for an exchange of views and information with respect to the following topics and for exploring and seeking agreement in principle as to the most desirable and practicable means and methods of dealing with the following problems:

Plans and prospects of various countries for the post-war period regarding production, import requirements or exportable surpluses of foodstuffs and other essential agricultural products with a view to improving progressively in each country the levels of consumption within the framework of the opportunities and possibilities of an expansion of its general economic activity. Such consideration will be entirely divorced from the question of the provision of relief.

Possibilities of coordinating and stimulating by international action national policies looking to the improvement of nutrition and the enhancement of consumption in general.

Possibilities of setting up international agreements, arrangements and institutions designed to promote efficient production of foodstuffs and other essential agricultural products and to ensure for the world adequate supplies of such products with due consideration to the attainment of equitable prices from the viewpoint of both producers and consumers.

Commercial, financial and other arrangements which will be necessary in order to enable the countries of the world to obtain the foodstuffs and other essential agricultural products which they will need and to maintain adequate markets for their own surplus production.”

Sir,

I have the honor to refer to my note No. 861 of March 25, 1943, and the Department of External Affairs' note No. 39 of April 3 in reply thereto, regarding the conference on food and agriculture which is scheduled to convene in the United States on April 27 next. Particular reference is made to the last paragraph of the note from the Department of External Affairs expressing a desire to obtain further information on the contemplated scope and procedure of the conference.

In that regard the Legation has just received a communication from the Department of State which states that while no public announcement has been made regarding the nature of the United States delegation or the nature of the delegations of other countries, the following information might be helpful to the Canadian Government:

The United States delegation will, so far as can now be foreseen, consist of approximately five delegates and several technical advisers. None of the delegates will be of Cabinet rank but one or more of the delegates will be of sub-Cabinet rank. In general the delegates will have personal and expert knowledge of problems of food, nutrition and agriculture and will typify agricultural and economic statesmanship in the broadest sense.

Other governments participating in the conference may wish to designate similar types of delegates. Each country will obviously also desire (within the necessary limitations which in certain countries transportation facilities may impose upon the size of the delegations) to have expert advisers upon the particular agricultural problems in which that country is especially interested, as well as experts upon general economic matters.

Sir,

I have the honor to refer to my note No. 861 of March 25, 1943, transmitting an invitation to the Canadian Government to send representatives to a conference on food and agricultural products, to convene at some suitable place in the United States on April 27, and, under instructions from my Government, to transmit the following supplementary information:

The United Nations conference on food and agriculture has been postponed and will convene on May 18, 1943, at Hot Springs, Virginia.

The President has approved the following delegates from the United States:

The Honorable Marvin Jones, Judge of the United States Court of Claims, Chairman; the Honorable Paul H. Appleby, Undersecretary of Agriculture; the Honorable W. L. Clayton, Assistant Secretary of Commerce; Surgeon General Thomas Parr of the United States Public Health Service; Mr. Murray D. Lincoln, Executive Secretary of the Ohio Farm Bureau Federation.

It is the hope of the United States Government that the discussions may be as informal as possible and that most of the detailed work will be done in technical sections or committees. There will be the usual opening and closing public plenary sessions, but it would seem that the sections and committees might more effectively consider the various topics in executive session. Although the duration of the conference will be determined by the delegations in the light of the progress of the discussions it would seem at this juncture that the conference might be in session for a period of approximately two weeks.

In view of the fact that this will be a technical war-time meeting it is felt that there should be an absolute minimum of social entertainment. It is not contemplated that wives or other family members will accompany the delegates. Business suit will be adequate.

Hot Springs is approximately 290 miles from Washington. The Homestead Hotel has been reserved for the exclusive use of the conference and has facilities for both residential and conference requirements. Special rates have been arranged for the delegations.

The Department of State in Washington has requested the Legation to inform it by telegram of the names, titles, dates and ports of arrival of all members of the Canadian delegation so that necessary reservations may be made at the hotel.

“This agenda is organized around the following conception of the problem with which the conference should deal:

“The agenda begins with an effort to ascertain the facts as to what are the needs of the various peoples of the world for food and other essential agricultural products, with due regard to differing conditions and possibilities among countries. It recognizes that in the past excessive accumulations of certain agricultural products were in fact not surpluses at all when measured by the world’s minimum needs of food and clothing; that these so-called surpluses were usually the result of maldistribution and under-consumption. It then seeks to ascertain the prospects for so organizing world agricultural production as to enable the satisfaction of these needs and to explore the measures, both domestic and international, by which production can be enhanced and better directed in terms of consumption. Finally it examines the measures and conditions which are necessary to assure that what can be produced moves into consumption.

“1. Consumption levels and requirements

(a) Food

1. Character and extent of consumption deficiencies in each country.
2. Causes and consequences of malnutrition.
3. Measures for improving standards of consumption (education et cetera)
4. Reasonable national and international goals for improved food consumption.

(b) Other essential agricultural products.

1. Pre-war consumption levels in various countries as influenced by prosperity or depression and by buying power of population.
2. Reasonable national and international goals for improved consumption with sustained employment and expanded industrial activity.

“2. Expansion of production and adaptation to consumption needs.

- a. Measures for re-direction of production toward more essential commodities.
- b. Measures for shifting production out of commodities in chronic surplus.
- c. Measures for improving agricultural productivity and efficiency.
- d. Measures for development and conservation of agricultural resources.
- e. Opportunities for occupational adjustments in agricultural populations.

“3. Facilitation and improvement of distribution.

(a) Relation of national and international economic policies to agricultural problems with special reference to the facilitation of the movement of agricultural products in commerce.

1. Expansion of international trade.
 2. Broad policies for assuring increased production and consumption in general.
 - (b) Improvement of agricultural marketing, processing and distribution.
 - (c) Special measures for wider food distribution.
 1. Improvement of consumption of low income groups.
 2. International disposition of commodities in over-supply.
 - (d) Buffer stocks and commodities arrangements to assure equitable prices and adequate supplies.
- “4. Recommendations for continuing and carrying forward the work of the conference.”

The following addendum is proposed as a basis for understanding but not for incorporation in the agenda: “As will be seen from the form of the agenda it is not contemplated that the conference would discuss the problems of individual commodities as such but would rather be organized around the broader aspects of production and distribution in relation to more adequate consumption levels. In any limited discussion of individual commodities that may take place within the broader framework it would not be contemplated in any event that the discussion would include rubber, drug plants or forest products.

“My Government entertains the hope that Government of Canada will be in a position to concur in the projected agenda and addendum and hopes to receive its response on the proposal by April 24 in order that a definitive agenda may be promptly prepared and distributed.”

Accept etc.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, April 21, 1943

Dear Mr. Pearson,

We have been going over the agenda for the United Nations Food Conference and giving some consideration to the composition of the Canadian delegation. The agenda is clear enough and a good deal has been said in advance as to the purely advisory character of the Conference. What still remains in doubt is how far the participating countries will be ready to go at this time in really frank discussion of the basic question of national policy raised by the agenda of the Conference.

For instance it is quite possible that the United Kingdom might be prepared to import, as in the past, a large quantity of its food provided that it has reasonably assured markets for goods and services by which payment could be made. It is far from clear that similar considerations would apply to countries which in the past have protected their agriculture as a matter of social policy. There also will be countries which are dependent on agriculture because they are overpopulated and have no alternative occupations. These countries may receive adequate food only if there is an element of gift about the transaction. For instance in a recent Nuffield House study it was suggested that some of the Danubian countries might be dependent on strictly bilateral trade, designed to enable them to market the goods they could sell on far more favourable terms than would be the case if they had to face the competition of the great food producing countries. The special conditions of countries where nutritional standards have always been low, including parts of India, China, and Russia, again raise very special issues.

Then, too, there is the case of a country like Japan which could import food-stuffs and pay for them provided that adequate markets were available. It is assumed that the position of the enemy nations will have to be given consideration in any comprehensive plans for dealing with post-war trade.

It would be useful if it could be ascertained, confidentially and in advance of the meetings, whether the United States delegates contemplate a frank discussion of such issues.

Some awkward issues exist. Some of the United States declarations seem to have suggested that it is almost a moral duty of food-importing countries to place no obstacles in the way of the importation of foodstuffs. These precepts have been combined in practice both in the United States and in Canada as in Great Britain with very expensive protection for beet sugar as against cane sugar. It is also probable that it could be contended that United States and Canadian exports of food are directly or indirectly subsidised by the exporting countries. It is very difficult to contend that protection designed to offset direct or indirect subsidies is discriminatory, and it is possible to contend that direct or indirect subsidies for export either of goods or services are themselves discriminatory.

It would help us in selecting our delegation and working out their instructions to know how frankly the Conference is expected to discuss the sort of thing that has been mentioned in this letter. Will the United States itself take the lead in bringing these difficult cases before the Conference? On the other hand will the United States attempt to discourage other countries from raising them or attempt to evade them if they are raised? These are awkward questions to put and probably impossible questions to answer. Any information you can gather in Washington as to other countries' attitudes toward them would, however, be of interest to us.

Yours sincerely,

N. A. ROBERTSON

Ottawa, April 22, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your note No. 869 of April 14, concerning the detailed agenda for the Conference on food and agricultural products which is to convene on May 18 at Hot Springs, Virginia. Careful consideration has been given to the proposed agenda by the departments of the Canadian Government most intimately concerned with the work of the Conference. The general view is that the agenda will provide a sound basis for arranging the work of the Conference.

The proposed agenda is arranged under four main headings. It is anticipated that the first two will be concerned mainly with the assembling of information and with its reduction to a form which permits of ready comparison between conditions for the various countries concerned. It seems probable that it is only after some progress has been made with the work which falls under these two headings that it will be possible to turn to the third heading, which seems to contemplate an assembly of statements of national policy and national attitude with a view to formulating general resolutions. In the view of the Canadian Government it is extremely important that the Conference should be a success, and it is felt that its success will be judged largely by the general resolutions upon which agreement can be reached.

While the Canadian Government is not proposing any changes in the structure of the agenda, a few notes on points of detail may be of assistance when its revision is undertaken.

1. It is noted that there is no reference to fish as a foodstuff. This omission is unfortunate because some of the problems raised in the second section of the agenda arise quite as much in the case of fish as they do in the case of agricultural products, while measures of conservation are more likely to have an international aspect in the case of fisheries than in the case of agricultural produce. In the case of fish it is also possible that there may be some reference to the declarations as to the right of all nations to access to sources of raw material.

2. The reference to the consumption of low income groups in paragraph 3 c. 1 of the agenda appears to be somewhat unfortunate in a Conference in which so many countries are represented that the low income groups in the richer countries may actually be better off than the average income groups in the poorer countries. Countries where general nutrition is low may feel that their problem should have precedence over those of low income groups in the richer countries.

3. It is assumed that paragraph 1 a. 1 refers to consumption in a typical pre-war year and not to the consumption deficiencies which have arisen in the course of the war or which may be anticipated during the immediate post-war period. If this assumption is correct it is suggested that the agenda might be expressed so as to make the point clear.

The Canadian Government is giving consideration to the personnel of the Canadian delegation and to the numbers that will be required. It is impossible to reach a final decision on this point until the agenda of the Conference has been reduced to its final form, as it is the wish of the Canadian Government to have experts available who can deal with any of the topics which may be brought up in discussion.

Accept etc.

IMMEDIATE. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: Your letter of April 21st, points arising out of Food Conference agenda³⁵. As stated in my letter of April 28th[†], I took this matter up with Mr. Dean Acheson in the State Department, and have just received the following reply:

“I quite agree that you have posed some very important and searching questions to which there is no very easy answer and that these questions are very likely to arise at the Food Conference. Indeed, they are at the heart of some parts of the agenda. At the same time the question of an adequate world organization with respect to international trade is one which, as we understand it and as we hope we have clearly expressed to the other Governments, goes beyond the competence of this Conference. Furthermore, as you know, the Conference is at a technical and advisory level in which the delegations will not be able to make any commitments which are binding on their Governments.

“Accordingly, while it would not be our thought to attempt to head off any discussion which was pertinent to revealing the relationship between the national and international aspects of agricultural problems, we would expect that in the Conference’s discussions of item III A of the agenda it would be recognized that the improvement in the organization of production with a view to reaching reasonable consumption goals would be dependent in a very considerable degree upon adequate action by the various nations in the expansion of international trade and in pursuing broad policies for assuring increased production and consumption in general. The Conference would then, presumably, recommend to the various Governments that this broader problem be further examined by the nations represented, perhaps at another United Nations Conference.

“If you should care to discuss this further with any of us here in the Department, we should be only too glad to be at your disposal.” Ends.

Jones as Chairman of the Conference, were also present. Questions of organization were discussed. There was submitted to us a tentative list of the personnel who might be suitable for Chairman, Vice-Chairman, and Rapporteur of the four main sections, as follows:

Section 1: Chairman from the Chinese Delegation, Vice-Chairman from Mexico, Rapporteur, Dr. Ackroyd (India).

Section 2: Chairman, U.S.S.R; Vice-Chairman, India; Rapporteur, Lincoln (U.S.A.).

Section 3: Chairman, Brazil; Vice-Chairman, Yugoslavia; Rapporteur, Hart (Netherlands).

Section 4: Chairman, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman, Cuba; Rapporteur, McDougall (Australia).

I was the only person who ventured to query these suggestions. I stated bluntly that if the Steering Committee of the Conference were to consist of the Conference Chairman, the Section Chairman and Vice-Chairman, Canada would not favour this list, as she would feel that at a Food Conference her importance would justify membership on the Steering Committee.

I pointed out that the Section Chairmen and Vice-Chairmen included three Latin Americans. Apparently the Americans feel that the Steering Committee might possibly be chosen on a different basis, and apart from the Section officers. It was suggested in this regard that the Steering Committee should consist of representatives of the Big Four, two European countries, two Latin American countries, one Near Eastern country, and one British Dominion. I emphasized that however chosen, Canada would expect to be on the Steering Committee. Please tell me how far I should go in emphasizing this.

2. There was considerable discussion as to whether the choice of the officers of the Section Committees should be left to the sections or whether slates should be prepared in advance. If the latter is not done, there will obviously be much time wasted at a conference where time is at a premium. Therefore the Americans had made a tentative selection from the various delegations which conferred on every country some post on every Committee, whether Chairman, Vice-Chairman, or second Vice-Chairman. They have suggested Dr. Barton as Chairman of Committee 1. of Section 2. Other Committee Chairmen suggested were:

Section I, Committee 1. Dr. Evang (Norway)

Committee 2. Arvaessos (Greece)

Committee 3. Dantos (Brazil)

Section II, Committee 2. Castro (El Salvador)

Committee 3. Elizalde (Philippines)

IMPRESSIONS OF THE UNITED NATIONS FOOD CONFERENCE AT HOT SPRINGS, VIRGINIA

1. The Conference was a complete success in the sense that it achieved all that it could possibly have been expected to accomplish. The technical discussions proceeded smoothly and general issues of policy were settled in complete unanimity.
2. This success may be of value in two ways:
 - a. It may serve as a basis for propaganda within the United Nations, among neutral countries and even in enemy countries;
 - b. It may establish the basis for genuine collaboration at a later date by committing the countries concerned in some degree to such a policy and by accustoming their peoples to considering such a development as reasonable.
3. The unanimity on matters of policy was reached by the simple process of pushing aside any questions on which disagreement seemed likely to arise. These questions were numerous, particularly in Section 3 which was concerned with matters of government policy and ultimately with matters in which strong political roots in each country will be affected. A few illustrations will make my meaning clear:

a. The unanimous opinion that trade barriers should be reduced was qualified in debate by the delegates from several countries who pointed out that the trade barriers which they imposed and also those barriers which they intended to impose were of so eminently reasonable a character as not to fall within the scope of the resolutions. It was clear that Australia intended to practise protection in order to secure the establishment there of a diversified industry. The delegates objected to the words "suitable industry" as limiting their freedom of action. Tariffs were said to be needed to protect Australian industry against the competition of established industries in more mature industrial countries. They were also said to be needed for the purpose of social diversification, which presumably means that some industries may be permanently protected in order that people with special aptitudes who seek employment in those industries may not be compelled to leave Australia. No mention was made of defence as a reason for protection, and it would have been ungracious to mention defence in view of the fact that the Conference itself had postulated freedom from fear as something which must be established by international collaboration. However, should international collaboration not reach this point of perfection it is almost certain that the Australians will add to their reasons for protection Adam Smith's preference for defence rather than opulence;

b. India was quite as emphatic as Australia in stressing the need for using trade barriers in order to establish industries in the face of foreign competition, and Sir Girja Bajpai³⁸ said expressly that he would be considered as having given away the Indian cause if he were to agree that protection should be confined to suitable industries;

c. Delegates from Mexico explained that they considered that trade barriers would be necessary in that country to exclude the competition of Japanese labour because of its low living standards;

d. My suggestion that a constructive method of approach to the problem would be to find out if the objects served by protective tariffs could be as well, or even better, achieved by concerted international action was not badly received, but I do not think that anyone considered it practicable and it would certainly have gone somewhat beyond the scope of the Conference. There was a tendency to use the words "excessive tariffs" but as there was no test as to what was excessive the term appears to have meant nothing more than tariffs imposed by nations other than that of the person using the term. I do not think that anyone would have been prepared to accept the idea of an international authority entrusted with the duty of determining when trade barriers became excessive;

e. It was impossible to secure an exception for so-called revenue tariffs, that is to say tariffs on commodities not produced in the taxing country, or tariffs counterbalanced by equivalent excise taxes on home production. It does, of course, seem grotesque to suggest that a country may legitimately tax tea, salt or beer as long as it is itself the producer of the whole amount required for its annual consumption, but that it may not tax any of these commodities if it imports all or part of its supply. The reason for not pursuing the discussion of this topic was that some of the countries which exported coffee were aggrieved by the very high tariffs imposed on coffee by France and Italy although these countries were in a position to say that their tariffs were not protective in character;

f. Although the British proposals concerning buffer stocks made it clear that purchases by an international authority and sales by that authority were to be limited to two purposes, namely,

- a. the moderation of short-term price fluctuations, and
- b. the arresting of incipient depressions by maintaining the purchasing power of certain agriculture producers, it was quite clear that some countries wish to use this device for a totally different purpose, namely, the maintenance of a fair price, or of some sort of parity between the price of the commodity concerned and the price of industrial products. The Cuban delegation went so far as to define a fair price as a price which would enable the producer to maintain an adequate standard of living (presumably the standard which the Japanese were reproached for not maintaining). It was obvious that if buffer stocks were used for this purpose they could not at the same time follow the long-term price trend in such a way as to eliminate the less efficient producers by making it impossible for them to earn an adequate income in the occupation of their choice. Indeed, this idea of eliminating inefficient producers was not really acceptable to all the countries concerned. The Australians, for instance, succeeded in having a reservation made to the effect that the stocks should be so managed that any occupational change should be gradual and orderly;

g. While there is complete agreement that if buffer stocks could not be sold without producing a disastrous fall in prices they should be used to feed undernourished people and should not be destroyed, there was a great temptation to make this enlightened declaration the only commitment for meeting the needs of chronically undernourished peoples. Hesitation on this point was curious in view of the avowed wish of the Conference to abolish hunger throughout the world;

h. Yet, this paradox is capable of explanation. The British delegation made it clear that it expected the improvement in nutrition in backward countries to be a gradual and possibly a slow process. It obviously wished to avoid the financial burden of providing adequate diets throughout the dependent Empire. The United States delegates were clearly desirous of avoiding the reproach, which might be fatal politically, that they were casting the United States for the role of Santa Claus. The result was that no emphasis was placed on the need for adequate agricultural programmes to meet the requirements of undernourished countries. While some attention was given to the desirability of enabling these countries to put an end to the conditions of poverty, that had prevented them from securing sufficient food, the only practical suggestions were that technical assistance might be provided, supplies of per capita goods might be forthcoming and financial assistance might be organized. There was, however, reticence on the balance of international payments, the problem of these countries, and little was said about the problem of finding markets for the produce of backward countries if some special assistance were required.

4. The President of the Conference in his final speech made a great showing of the fact that nations great and small had met on the footing of perfect equality and that there had been no sacrifice of national sovereignty. This declaration may make it difficult for any permanent body to recommend joint action in the field of policy with any prospect of its recommendation being accepted.

5. The upshot of the matter seems to be, therefore, that the basic questions of policy have still to be faced, although perhaps in a better atmosphere than existed before the Conference met.

6. With this review in mind, it is possible to approach the question of whether or not it was wise to call the Conference at all. As has been shown, the Conference has probably improved morale at the present time and may be a stepping-stone to something more constructive. It has, however, excited expectations which are quite possibly doomed to complete disappointment. It is hardly necessary to emphasize how disastrous an effect disappointment and disillusion may have in the years after the war.

7. My own view is that, as the end of the war approaches, it will be necessary for statesmen in all countries to impress on their people that the task of "winning the peace" and of establishing the better world promised to the men who died is quite as difficult as the task of winning the war, and that it will require substantial sacrifices of immediate interests by many nations and by substantial groups within each nation. I fully realize that it is much harder to bring this point home than it is to make a "sweat, blood and tears" speech in a moment of obvious military crisis.³⁹

Chairman, Food Requirements Committee, to Clerk of the Privy Council

Dear Mr. Heeney,

At its meeting yesterday evening the Food Requirements Committee recommended that the Government of Canada should approve of the Final Act of the United Nations Conference on Food and Agriculture. Although no formal request for advice on this subject had been received, I had been asked by Mr. Robertson to treat the reference as having been made.

The Final Act comprises a long series of resolutions and may require some study before the members of the Government are in a position to form a clear picture of the principles to which they have been invited to give their approval. My personal view is that some emphasis should be placed on the following points:

(1) Approval of the Final Act will commit the Government to membership in a permanent body which it is proposed to set up for the purpose of securing international co-operation in raising the levels of nutrition and improving the efficiency of agricultural production.

(2) The Government will also be assenting to the establishment of an Interim Commission on which each Government would have one member which would formulate a specific plan for the permanent organization and which, in the meantime, would in some ways carry on the work of the Food Conference.

(3) The Government would undertake to pursue certain lines of policy directed to increasing the food resources of Canada and improving the diet of the Canadian people. Without analysing these policies in detail, it may be said that they include measures for increasing the efficiency of agriculture in almost every possible way and measures for the attainment of social security and the abolition of poverty, at least in so far as poverty is a handicap to adequate nutrition.

(4) The Government would also be affirming the principle of mutual responsibility with other Governments and the importance of co-ordinated action for three main purposes:

(a) maintaining the general food supply during the period of shortages which is expected to precede and to follow the termination of hostilities;

(b) the maintenance of international security;

(c) the pursuit, after the period of shortages, of an expansionist economic policy designed to secure full employment within each nation on a basis consistent with the expansion of international trade so that advantage can be taken of international specialization.

In suggesting that these points should be emphasized I do not wish to suggest that they are the only important points covered in the lengthy resolutions which constitute the Final Act. These resolutions have been carefully framed to cover the whole ground and also to include numerous reservations designed to protect the particular interests of a number of countries. These reservations are naturally more important in relation to that part of the work of the Conference which was concerned with national economic policies than in that part of the work which had to do with the more technical aspects of nutrition and production.⁴¹

Dear Mr. Robertson,

There are some matters concerning the organization and activities of the United Nations Interim Commission on Food and Agriculture about which I think I should write you in the hope that you will take them up with those concerned in Ottawa.

We have begun to receive documents and papers of the Commission and are sending two sets of these to Ottawa. If additional sets are required, will you let me know so that I can ensure that in the future you receive the right number.

I have been giving some consideration to Canadian representation and participation in the work of the Commission. My duties of Chairman (which are pretty heavy at the moment) will prevent my giving as much time as otherwise would be the case to following the work of the committees and reporting on phases of that work of particular interest to Canada. It is, I think, therefore essential that an alternate Canadian delegate or a Canadian adviser be appointed who can attend committee meetings when I am not able to do so. There are two possibilities in this regard: Drummond, of Mr. Plumptre's office, and Bull, of Mr. Scott's office. So far as Drummond is concerned, I think he would probably be of greater value as a member of the Commission's Secretariat and we are hoping to use him in that capacity. However, if it later seemed advisable, he could be made alternate Canadian delegate and represent us on the necessary committees. The other possibility is that Bull could attend committee sessions when necessary. I have talked to Scott about this and to Bull, and they are agreeable. It should not take up too much of Bull's time as he would only have to follow the work of the committees in a general way and to assist me generally. I would be grateful, therefore, if the question as to how Drummond and Bull could most effectively be used could be left to my discretion. Could a telegram be sent to me on this point?

This is an extraordinarily difficult Commission to get going. We represent forty-four governments but we have no secretaries, experts, or staff, and no funds of any kind. So far as staff is concerned, I have been spending a great deal of time this week going over lists of possible people with the Department of Agriculture and the State Department. We hope to establish a position of Secretary General which will not be filled for some time until we see how the work of the Commission develops and how the other secretaries pan out. We are, however, hoping to fill at once — and indeed we must do so in order to begin the work — the position of Executive Secretary and also appoint four or five associate secretaries who can take charge of the three committees we have already established. The Executive Secretary will be a key appointment and we are having a hard time getting the right person. We are agreed that he should be an American because we need so much help from here, but the Americans who would be suitable without question are usually not available, and of those available we are having some difficulty in choosing the best.

I have also been having discussions with the State Department and with Loveday as to how the League Economic and Financial Section can be used — if, indeed, it can be used at all. The Americans are extraordinarily sticky on this point.⁴³

There remains the all-important question of finance. As I said above, we haven't a penny and are not likely to be able to work out a scale of contributions from governments which can be put into effect for some months. Such a scale will, of course, depend largely upon the scale adopted for the proposed permanent body. Meanwhile, we must have money. Both the British and the American delegates (Twentyman and Appleby) are approaching their governments for advances which may be credited against subsequent contributions. In view of the prominent position which Canada has been given in this work, would it not be possible for us also to make a gesture by advancing twenty or thirty thousand dollars? Here again, such an amount would be credited against subsequent contributions which we may make. In the meantime, however, it would be a great help to the Commission and would certainly increase our prestige on that body. With such an inadequate and inexperienced Canadian as Chairman, the question of increasing our prestige is an important one!

I would be glad if those concerned in Ottawa would look into these questions. I am anxious to have word as soon as possible as to whether I can use Drummond full time and Bull part time as suggested above; the exact manner of their use to be left to my discretion.

Yours sincerely,

L. B. PEARSON

IMMEDIATE. Following for Pearson from Robertson, Begins: Reference your letter of July 23rd re organization of the United Nations Interim Commission on Food and Agriculture.

An immediate advance of 10,000 dollars (U.S. funds) by the Canadian Government toward the expenses of the Commission has been arranged. This advance is to be credited against subsequent contributions. Please let me know when, how and to whom these funds should be transferred.

The question of using Drummond and Bull to assist you with the work of the Commission has been discussed with the appropriate authorities here. The Department of Trade and Commerce is quite agreeable to your using Bull part time in the manner you have suggested. They assume that you have made mutually satisfactory arrangements with Harry Scott. With reference to Drummond, the Food Administrator, Ken Taylor, states that about half of Drummond's time is taken up with work for his administration and that if Drummond is taken away someone would have to be found to replace him. In any case before Drummond could be taken the matter would have to be cleared with Plumptre. Furthermore, there is some doubt here about Drummond's suitability as a Canadian representative on committees. W.P.T.B. say his work has been very satisfactory but that he has had virtually no experience with committee work. If he were to be used in the latter connection they would have some reservations and would wish to consider the matter further. In these circumstances it might be advisable to leave Drummond where he is, since he would have to be replaced anyway, and try to find someone else for the work you have in mind. We shall explore the possibilities here. Any further details of the nature of the position, responsibilities, qualifications, remuneration, etc., would be helpful.

CONFÉRENCE DES MINISTRES DE L'ÉDUCATION ALLIÉS CONFERENCE OF ALLIED MINISTERS OF EDUCATION

W.L.M.K./Vol. 346

Le haut commissaire en Grande-Bretagne au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

High Commissioner in Great Britain to Secretary of State for External Affairs

DESPATCH A. 255

London, August 10, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to the Conference of Allied Ministers of Education which has been sitting in London under the chairmanship of the Rt. Hon. R.A. Butler, M.P., President of the Board of Education. It was first convened in November 1942, on the joint initiative of the Board of Education and the British Council; and it has met once every two months since then. The Ministers of Education of all the Governments-in-Exile are members of the Conference on which the Board of Education, the British Council, the Foreign Office and the Scottish Education Department are also represented. In May of this year I was invited to appoint a Canadian observer. I nominated Mr. D.V. LePan. The U.S.A., the Soviet Union, China, and the other Dominions are also represented by observers.

2. The problems which the Conference is considering are primarily those connected with the task of re-establishing the systems of education in the occupied countries of Europe as soon as an Armistice is signed. The provision of books and periodicals to devastated national and university libraries such as those of Rotterdam, Louvain, and Warsaw; the recovery from Germany of the scientific equipment which has been stolen; the possibility of training teachers in this country for service in Europe; the publication of new school text-books to replace the partisan tracts prescribed by the Nazis; these are some of the questions which the Allied Ministers have had under review. Already much has been accomplished. Information has been pooled about the present state of education and educational facilities in the various occupied countries, and rough estimates have been made of the damage which has been done and of the replenishments which will be needed, so that the point is now being approached when practical decisions can be taken. The Ministers have agreed that the problem of the re-education of Germany does not fall within their province but is properly the concern of the authorities which will direct the Allied Armies of Occupation. By this decision, they have rid themselves of a number of embarrassing complications, which are political rather than pedagogical. At other points, however, they are examining projects which have political implications. Suggestions which are being considered for a short factual history of the War to be published as soon as hostilities cease in order to dispel the smoke left by German propaganda, and for a common European history to be used by boys and girls between the ages of 16 and 18, might present political difficulties.

3. The Conference has also paid some attention to a number of long-term questions. For example, one of its Commissions has examined the various bilateral cultural conventions, which were entered into by European countries before the War to facilitate the exchange of university professors and students and to further intellectual co-operation in other ways, and has submitted a number of recommendations about the use of such conventions in the future. These recommendations have been approved by the Conference, and have been published as an official paper by H.M. Stationery Office. I am enclosing a copy[†] for your information.

4. Canadian participation in the work of the Conference is warmly sought. It is hoped that Canada will be able to provide some of the educational supplies which will be urgently needed. Specifically, I have been asked to inquire whether Canada would be prepared to help restock the national and university libraries in Europe which have either been censored and pillaged by the Nazis or have been gutted by military action. The books and periodicals required would fall i. to four classes:

- (a) standard works to replace those which have been destroyed,
- (b) books published during the War (These of course, have not been available to European libraries).
- (c) Government publications and the periodicals of scientific and learned societies (Copies of these should be reserved now, as they appear, for dispatch to Europe after the war. Previous issues of important periodicals, if they are now unavailable, might be microfilmed).
- (d) books about Canada or by Canadians. (This category of books stands on a somewhat different footing from the other three, since in the case of most European libraries it would represent an addition rather than a replacement. The Allied Ministers, however, have especially asked that attention be paid to this possibility).

It has also been suggested that, because of the shortage of paper, both here and in the occupied countries, and because of the dislocation of the publishing trade, arrangements might be made in Canada to publish the textbooks which will be necessary. The French publishing houses in Montreal and Quebec might be especially valuable in this connection.

5. The Conference now stands at a watershed. Up till the present, membership has been limited to representatives of the European Allies. The Conference has met every two months, but it is not a standing body, and has no secretariat of its own, using simply the staff of the British Council. It now wishes to transform itself into a United Nations organization, on which all the United Nations would be represented by members, and which would have its own secretariat. I should like to have the views of the Canadian Government on these proposals. Would it be willing to sit on such a United Nations body to consider the questions I have outlined in paras. 2, 3, and 4 above? Although there is some difference of opinion between the present members of the Conference on the details of the proposed organization and on the expediency of setting up at present a separate secretariat (which would be necessarily small), there is complete agreement that all the United Nations should participate as members. I assume that the Canadian Government would wish to participate on these terms. I should, for my own part, most strongly recommend participation. If you sanction this step in principle, I shall later, no doubt, be asked to ascertain your views as to how the new body should be organized and staffed.

6. The fact that education is a Provincial rather than a Dominion matter might seem to present some difficulties. I suggest, however, that this is one place where the newly formed Canada Foundation might prove useful. The Dominion Government might ask it to undertake the responsibility of securing books and periodicals in Canada for the European libraries, and to explore the possibility both of printing textbooks in Canada for the use of European schools and of providing scientific apparatus. The National Research Council might also be useful in the latter inquiry.

7. It will be seen that the proposed reconstitution of the Conference of Allied Ministers of Education would create a United Nations bureau which, although of lesser importance, would stand beside the Interim Commission on Food and Agriculture and the projected United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. Obviously the decision of the Government on the subject of this dispatch must be taken in the light of its general policy towards all these organizations which embody the concept of the United Nations.

A Conference of Allied Ministers of Education has been meeting in London every two months since November 1942. In general it has been considering problems connected with the task of re-establishing the systems of education in the occupied countries of Europe as soon as an Armistice is signed. Such questions as the provision of books, training of teachers, and the publication of textbooks have been discussed. A representative from the High Commissioner's Office has been attending the meetings.

It is now proposed to transform the conference into a formally organized United Nations Commission or Bureau with a small secretariat of its own. The High Commissioner strongly recommends that Canada participate in this organization. He has asked whether or not the Canadian Government would be willing to sit on such a United Nations body.

The history and functions of this body were outlined in Mr. Massey's despatch A. 255 of August 10 last, of which you received a copy. One suggestion is that Canada should help to restock devastated libraries and to provide facilities for publishing textbooks, of which there will be a great dearth in Europe. I think we should agree to participate⁴⁴.

London, November 19, 1943

Sir,

With reference to your despatch No. 1163 of November 9th,[†] which dealt with the Conference of Allied Ministers of Education in London, since my

⁴⁴ La note suivante était écrite sur ce mémorandum:

⁴⁴ The following note was written on the memorandum:

This will need to be considered in Council and thought through as to what will be involved, what books, firms, taxes? K[ING] despatch of August 10th there have been certain developments in the direction of the establishment of a permanent United Nations organisation to deal with questions of education.

2. The Select Committee of Ministers of Education which was set up by the Conference to study the question of future organisation has made its report, and I am enclosing a copy of this report herewith, Paper AME/A/20a.[†] You will see that the Committee recommended that a Bureau should be set up along the lines indicated in paragraph 5 of my despatch of the 10th August, and that the Bureau, in turn, should be empowered to organise a Secretariat. The Report was considered at the 6th Meeting of the Conference of the Ministers of Education of the Allied Governments on the 5th October. The American representative who was present on this occasion was Mr. Ralph Turner, of the Cultural Division of the State Department. Mr. Turner said that he would recommend to his Government that they should ultimately appoint a representative to the Bureau and that in the meantime they would be represented by an observer at the main Conference of the Ministers of Education.

3. It was pointed out during the course of the meeting that one of the recommendations of the Select Committee's report was that countries at present represented by observers should now be invited to become full members of the Conference of Ministers of Education, and that the new Bureau would be an executive bureau of the Conference and was of a purely temporary nature. It would be within the terms of reference of the bureau to consider the more long-term project of the creation of a United Nations Bureau of Education. I should point out that so far no official invitation has been received by me — or, indeed by any of the other Dominion High Commissioners — for Canada to become a member of the Conference.

4. Meanwhile the Bureau held its first meeting on the 27th October at the Board of Education. It had been proposed in the Report of the Select Committee that as it was necessary to restrict the size of the Bureau it would not be possible for all countries to be represented directly. Accordingly a scheme of representation was drawn up based on the allocation of one or two representatives to each of several groups of countries. It was proposed that the Dominions and India should have one representative between them, and that representation should rotate among them. In actual fact none of the Dominions found it possible to be represented at the first meeting of the Bureau, of which I enclose the draft report herewith.

5. Subsequent to the first Meeting of the Bureau representatives of the High Commissioner's Offices of the four Dominions, with the Official Secretary to the Office of the High Commissioner for Australia in the Chair, met at Australia House to talk over informally their relation to the Conference and the newly-created Bureau. Mr. Ritchie represented this Office at this meeting. It appeared that none of the Governments had as yet decided to become members of the Conference, and there was a general tendency to feel that as no instruction had been received from the respective Governments it would be as well to hasten slowly in relation to the Bureau. There was some tendency to feel that the Bureau had taken rather a lot for granted at their first meeting by suggesting that the Dominion Governments should each provide £750 as a contribution to the first year's administrative expenses. Nor were the Dominion representatives altogether happy about the arrangements by which it was proposed that all Dominions would be represented by one of their number at the meetings of the Bureau. It was eventually decided unanimously that instructions from the respective Governments should be awaited before participation in the work of the Bureau.

6. With general reference to the subject of this despatch I am enclosing copies in English and French of the Report of the Commission appointed by the Conference of the Ministers of Education of the Allied Governments to consider Conventions for the Adjustment of Intellectual Co-operation between the British and Allied Governments.[†]

London, December 7, 1943

Sir,

With regard to my despatch No. A. 380 of the 19th November and previous correspondence concerning the Conference of Allied Ministers of Education in London, I am now enclosing a copy of a letter from the Secretary of State for the Dominions[†] inviting the Canadian Government to appoint a full representative to the Conference. No doubt, in principle, as I represented to you in my despatch No. A. 255 of the 10th August, it is desirable that Canada should support this Conference which it is hoped will develop into a clearing house for educational questions on an international scale.

2. The only question that occurs to me is whether it is desirable that we should join as a full member now, and on this point I should be very grateful for your views. On the one hand, it is clear that the United Kingdom Government intend to join and to make a very substantial financial contribution, and that any encouragement which could be given to the emerging organisation would be doubly valuable if it could be given now rather than later. On the other hand, the United States attitude seems to be that they prefer to consider further before accepting full membership of the Conference.

3. As I mentioned in my despatch No. 380 of the 19th November, Mr. Turner of the Cultural Division of the State Department, who has been in London to attend the Sixth Meeting of the Conference, has now returned to Washington where he is discussing with the State Department the question of American membership. I rather gather from the American Embassy that the United States would like to see the Conference expanded to include some of the Latin-American Nations and that they feel that in its present form it is perhaps too exclusively European.

4. There are two other points in connection with Canada's membership of this Body which I may mention: one is that of finances. You will notice that the Secretary of State's letter of the 26th November[†] refers to financial support. I think that the sum mentioned in the fifth paragraph of my despatch No. A.380 of the 19th November, i.e., £750 for the first year as administrative expenses is the contribution which would be expected of the Dominion Governments as a contribution to a total budget of £15,000 for the first year of the new organisation's existence. This budget does not seem excessive provided the Conference develops the more extended functions which it intends to assume.

5. The other question is one of representation. To do a useful job in connection with an international educational Body we really need a specialist in educational matters in London, and at present I have no one on my staff who can spare the time to follow up the work of the Conference and the Bureau as fully as might be desirable.

Dear Mr. Massey,

With reference to your despatches Nos. A. 380 of November 19th and A. 400 of December 7th on the Conference of Allied Ministers of Education, I think that it is likely that there will be a further delay before we return a reply to the invitation for the appointment of a full Canadian member. This is not an easy matter to decide. We are making enquiries in Washington to see whether the Department of State has yet reached a definite decision on participation.

One reason for hesitation is the lack of Federal responsibility for educational matters and the consequent difficulties in the way of the Canadian Government adopting a definite attitude in educational questions of international concern. Another difficulty arises from the European origin and scope of the Conference. I think it quite likely that the Government will agree to make some contribution towards educational reconstruction in Allied European countries but I am not sure at all that this should take the form of membership in the Conference and I think it most unlikely that we would be prepared to be represented on the Bureau in the manner suggested in one of the documents enclosed with your despatch A. 380.

We have been in touch with Mr. Walter Herbert of the Canadian Committee who expresses very considerable interest and considers that it would be possible to arrange for private contributions to educational reconstruction so as to finance the purchase of books and other equipment.

We have not yet submitted a definite recommendation for ministerial consideration. If you have any further comments to offer I should be glad to receive them.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. McCarthy,

In your personal letter of February 18th[†] you referred to the discussion at the meeting of the Pacific Council on February 17th about the wisdom of having a meeting of all the United Nations. Since then the President has made public at his Press Conference⁴⁶ his suggestion that such a meeting might be held in order to discuss problems of food and nutrition in the post-war world. This will not, I imagine, meet the views of Mr. Nash and others who have been pressing for a meeting as they would not be inclined to accept as adequate a conference with so limited a field.

There is a great deal to be said for giving more reality to the conception embodied in the phrase "United Nations". Actions are constantly taking place in the name of the United Nations about which a good many of the partner nations have never been consulted. I think, however, that a general conference of the United Nations on war aims should not take place without a good deal of preliminary settlement behind the scenes.

There are a number of obvious difficulties, one of the chief of which is that the Soviet Government is not at war with Japan and might well be unwilling to participate in any meeting at which questions affecting the war against Japan would come up. On the other hand there is growing public questioning in Canada over the influence exercised by Canada in the conduct of the war and there are some signs that this may become a matter of considerable political importance. My own view is that it is desirable to embody the idea of the United Nations in some institutional form but that a great deal of preliminary discussion and negotiation among the chief countries is necessary before this can be done with advantage.

As you know, we are not satisfied with the place that has been accorded to Canada in some of the bodies set up for the direction of the war. You also are familiar with the position that we have adopted over our proper place in the Relief Administration. We cannot accept the idea that our destinies can be entrusted to the four larger Powers and we have advanced the principle that representation on international bodies should depend on the extent of the contribution which each country would be expected to make to their work. We intend to continue to press for the acceptance of this principle and for Canadian representation on bodies in which we have a special interest. To ensure that these bodies exercise in some sense a mandate for the United Nations in whose name they often speak, it may be desirable that there should be a general meeting before long. I think, therefore, that you should certainly not oppose such a scheme although you should also not strongly urge it at present.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

When I was talking to Berle on Monday, we got on the subject of what seems to be the increasing demand for a United Nations meeting. I think you know my own view on this matter; that such a meeting should be held, and that, if the preparatory work is carefully done, its advantages would be great and its dangers (which seem to loom pretty large in many minds) minimized. Certainly something should be done to give the United Nations idea institutional form; something which it lacks almost 100% at present. May I mention in this regard paragraphs 9, 10, and 11 of the minutes of the informal discussion on Anglo-American relations held in Ottawa on February 6th and 7th last,[†] where this point of view is expressed so well? Also, such a meeting would emphasize the unity of purpose of the United Nations in a way which no statement from any single United Nations leader could hope to do. As such, it would be most valuable for political warfare purposes.

There is another point, however, and this is what I particularly talked to Berle about. It would appear that there are four or five subjects ripe, or soon to be ripe, for general discussion by United Nations representatives. The President himself mentioned one when he talked about a United Nations conference on "food" though I am not sure what was in his mind in this regard. Sumner Welles carried the idea further when he talked in Toronto about United Nations economic discussions.⁴⁷ There are also the questions of relief and rehabilitation; financial stabilization, refugees, and possibly civil aviation. If a United Nations meeting were held, it could refer all these matters or such of them as were considered appropriate, to committees which would be set up by it. This would accomplish two things: It would give the meeting in question something concrete to do and make its assembly of practical as well as of political importance; secondly, it would ensure that the committees in question would derive their authority from the United Nations and not from any one man or any one pronouncement, or even any bilateral decision.

Mr. Berle said that this idea had occurred to them in the State Department and that there was a good deal to be said for it. On the other hand, he felt there might be political difficulties in tying up these technical discussions directly to a United Nations conference. The political difficulties he was thinking of were no doubt "congressional". He thought, therefore, that it might be better if the various United Nations committees were set up independently as the need for them arose; without any particular connection with each other or any parent body. Personally, I think this a much less desirable course of procedure than the alternative mentioned above, and I hope it can be avoided.

I understand that Mr. Eden, during his visit to Washington, is to discuss with the President and the Government here ways and means of implementing the United Nations idea. I think it would be most useful if we could secure from him, before the discussions begin, some indication of the lines along which he intends to proceed. If you agree, I shall try to do so, possibly through the Embassy. I would also be glad to give to him, or to the Embassy for him, any ideas which we might have on the subject. I cannot, however, do that until I know what those ideas are.

Yours sincerely,

Washington, March 15, 1943

Dear Norman [Robertson],

I spent two or three hours with William Strang and Ronnie Campbell on Saturday night and the same length of time with Noel Hall and Gladwyn Jebb last night. It is strange that neither Strang nor Jebb had ever been in the Western Hemisphere before. Both were pretty excited about their trip and both are looking forward to their visit to Ottawa.

I was not able to get very much from Strang about the hopes or purposes of the Eden mission, and it was, of course, too soon to find out how things were going, as they had only arrived the night before. Strang said that they came with no agenda of any kind, but were entirely in the hands of the President and the State Department. They were quite prepared to discuss anything the Americans brought up, but were not committed in advance to the discussion of any particular subject. As you know from the press announcement, they expect to examine the United Nations idea; and apparently to prepare the ground for the certain United Nations meetings. I see from the press (we have had no word about it officially) the first of such meetings is to be held on April 27th.⁴⁸

I expounded at some length, but purely personally, to Strang, and to Jebb also, my thesis that it is a mistake to set up a series of unrelated and separate committees to discuss specific technical questions; that it would be much better to have one full-dress United Nations meeting, which could itself set up the committees to discuss the subjects mentioned in the memorandum of March 9th that you prepared for the War Committee.[†] Both Strang and Jebb agreed that this was, from their point of view, the best procedure, but they were both aware of U.S. political difficulties which were supposed to stand in its way. Personally – and I pointed this out to them – I do not think those difficulties are as great as they may appear to be. After all, if it is the President's intention to have these United Nations matters discussed with a minimum of publicity, that will not, I fear, be achieved by setting up separate committees to discuss separate subjects, each one of which will provide a news story. On the other hand, while one general meeting would receive a great deal of publicity and might cause some suspicion in Congress, nevertheless the committees set up by that meeting to discuss special subjects, could work, as committees, with practically no publicity at all.

Jebb wanted to talk to me particularly about the relief question. Like the rest of the British, he is, of course, very worried about the present position. He wondered whether a way out of the difficulty might not be found by Canada taking the place of the U.K. on the central committee. I feel, however, that he was thinking that, if this were done, Canada might represent the whole of the Commonwealth on that committee. Jebb is possibly somewhat old-fashioned in these Imperial constitutional matters and did not fully appreciate the difficulties in the way of this widening of our responsibilities. I gather from the Minister that at the meeting on Saturday, when Mr. Eden met the heads of the Dominions missions, Lord Halifax, in an aside afterwards, hinted at some such solution to Mr. McCarthy.

Certainly the Prime Minister's despatch⁴⁹, which arrived on Saturday, makes it quite clear to us that no compromise of the kind put forward by Dean Acheson will satisfy the Canadian Government. I would be glad, therefore, to get your views as to whether the substitution of Canada for the U.K. on the central committee would be satisfactory; and, if so, whether we could accept an understanding, which need only be tacit, that we would also act as spokesman for the U.K. on suitable occasions before that committee.

Jebb also mentioned the financial stabilization discussions and indicated that he would be glad to have a chance to talk about this matter with you and others interested in Ottawa.

On both nights we had a good deal of general discussion on U.K.-U.S. relations. Apparently the misunderstandings which seem to develop are causing a good deal of distress in the Foreign Office, where they feel that the Americans are unduly suspicious of British motives and British methods; are too sensitive about criticism of their own methods, and probably a little too assertive in taking the lead in United Nations affairs. On this latter point, I argued with Strang that they should not worry unduly about the apparent U.S. desire to take the initiative; that Washington should be allowed, and in fact should even be encouraged, to take the lead and make the running. After all, one of the main anxieties of the British is that the United States will withdraw unto itself after the war. Therefore, they should not discourage tendencies in the other direction now, even if it meant an immediate loss of some prestige for them; furthermore, the fact that the Americans took the initiative in these matters did not mean that the British would not have lots of opportunities to influence developments later.

We had some talk about North Africa, and I was encouraged to hear from Strang that things are going much better there on the political side and that Anglo-American co-operation was closer than it had been.

I shall keep closely in touch with the members of the Eden mission and, if anything develops of particular interest, I shall telegraph you.

Yours sincerely,

MIKE [PEARSON]

Ottawa, March 16, 1943

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for Pearson from Robertson, Begins: Your letter of March 11th concerning organization of United Nations. You have doubtless seen the Prime Minister's recent letter to Mr. McCarthy⁵⁰ on this subject in reply to Mr. McCarthy's report of the discussion in the Pacific Council on February 18th[†]. This letter, together with the statements of our position on the constitution of the Relief Administration⁵¹, should give you a general indication of the Canadian attitude.

We gave some thought last year to a procedure whereby the Combined Boards, or at any rate the Combined Food Board and perhaps the other Boards not directly concerned with strategy, might be given some sort of mandate from the United Nations. This idea was not pursued when a temporary settlement of the Combined Board problem was reached last September. The War Committee, however, has decided that our request for full membership on the Food Board should be renewed and we may have a chance to discuss this with Mr. R.H. Brand here today.

In general we are not very happy about the current arrangements for organizing the war effort and planning the peace and would welcome their improvement, but do not feel able to advocate as yet any general plan for the better organization of the United Nations and realize the importance of careful preparatory work before a United Nations Conference is called.

I do not like Berle's idea that the various United Nations Committees on technical questions which are needed or will be needed should be set up independently without any connection with each other. I feel that such a method would precipitate argument in each case over the constitution of the committees and would prevent them from getting down to business. This in fact is what has happened over the Relief Administration.

It may be desirable to develop our views on the organization of the United Nations before Mr. Eden comes to Ottawa. This is one of the major questions which he is discussing in Washington, with reference more to the planning of the peace than to the direction of the war. You will have noted from Dominions Office telegrams D. 149[†], 150[†], 151[†] and 152[†] that there have been considerable developments as between the United Kingdom and the United States.

Hitherto our main concern has been to endeavour to secure a proper influence for Canada in certain of the bodies set up for war direction and also in the Relief Administration which was the only subject on which post-war planning had reached an advanced stage of international negotiation. We have approached the questions singly and have improvised as successful methods as we could manage, such as our liaison with the Combined Chiefs of Staff through the Canadian Joint Staff in Washington, our membership of the Production and Resources Board and of the Pacific Council, and our contacts with the Food Board which have not gone as far as we wish.

The United States Government has not indicated its readiness to participate in a series of post-war discussions on a broad economic front — relief, food consumption and distribution apart from relief, international monetary arrangements, and other economic questions. Their largest proposal is for the convocation on April 27th in the United States of a conference of the United Nations on food consumption and production. In the monetary field there is both a British and an American plan which without careful handling may become rival plans; the British plan was the main topic during last autumn's meetings in London, and it is proposed to submit one or both of the plans to further examination by United Nations experts. As for relief, before the Relief Administration can be set up the draft agreement will have to be approved by the United Nations, all of which will be represented on the Relief Council.

The British are anxious that these subjects of international discussion should be brought together in some orderly fashion so as to provide against overlapping and to ensure that the discussions are conducted to some sort of timetable and on a fairly uniform basis. They point out, for example, in telegram D. 152 that one cannot make international plans for the consumption and production of food after the war without taking into account the organization of food supplies for relief, which is a problem of immediate urgency. The Americans seem rather inclined to arrange for a series of ad hoc meetings and conferences, partly because they are afraid of congressional reactions and wish to avoid publicity as much as possible. Before the British were invited to attend the Food Conference they took the view (see telegram D. 149) that the aim should be to hold a United Nations Economic Conference after preliminary agreement with the United States and consultation with China and Russia. Such a conference, they suggested, might establish a Steering Committee, which might remain in being "as a permanent nucleus for economic cooperation between the United Nations".

Both Governments seem to be contemplating discussions between experts, and there is undoubtedly a great deal of work to be done before Governments can be asked to commit themselves to specific plans at a full-dress conference on the political level. The United Kingdom Government suggests that discussions on political security problems should begin with talks in London between the four larger powers.

We are, of course, deeply concerned with both the form and the substance of international post-war planning. As to the substance, a good deal of preliminary study has been given here to some of the economic questions, notably in the monetary field, and the committee under Mackintosh is developing a general plan for further study. As to the form, we have hitherto advanced, in our approaches over the Relief Administration and to some extent in connection with the Combined Boards, the principle that representation on international bodies should be determined on a functional basis so as to permit the participation of those countries which have the greatest stake in the particular subject under examination. We have used this principle both to combat the argument that the four largest powers should have a special responsibility in all the fields of planning and organization and to avoid the other extreme which would allow each member of the United Nations to be represented on a basis of nominal equality. I think that we should stick to this functional principle. If we can secure its general acceptance, it would permit the representation of Canada on most of the bodies in which we are deeply interested.

On this matter of representation there is one aspect which deserves emphasis. The suggestion has been made informally by British representatives in Washington that Canada should take the seat allotted to the United Kingdom on the Central Committee of the Relief Administration, and should act there, perhaps by tacit agreement, as the representative of the whole British Commonwealth. Mr. Pearson has reported that Mr. Eden on March 17th in an off-the-record press conference described the United Nations as resting in the first instance on a four-legged stool, and indicated his hope that the fourth leg of the stool might be not so much the United Kingdom as the British Commonwealth and might on occasion be from the Dominions. This amounts to a revival of the old concept of the diplomatic unity of the Commonwealth and is an unexpected consequence of our attempts to secure a proper place for Canada in the Relief Administration. Our acceptance of this idea either in this connection or in other connections might well have some dangerous results. It would almost certainly bring about a revival of the old arguments after the last war that the British Commonwealth was being given six votes in the League, and might even be used to reopen the issue of joint or separate Commonwealth delegations at conferences. If in one context we were to agree to speak for the whole Commonwealth, undoubtedly in other contexts the assumption would be made that the United Kingdom would speak for us when we were not present. If this view is allowed to prevail, I foresee plenty of trouble.

I think that the tidiest way of dealing with the present situation would be to hold as soon as possible a full-dress conference of the United Nations with an agenda mainly restricted to the establishment of methods of post-war planning. There should first be a measure of preliminary agreement between the chief participants on what ought to result. The conference might set up a series of bodies of experts to prepare draft plans in particular fields, applying the functional principle to their composition. The occasion might also be used for the formal adoption of some general declarations of purpose, perhaps embodying the economic principles in Article 7 of the Lend-Lease Agreement which were repeated in our own exchange of notes with the United States last November. In this way a mandate could be given by the United Nations for a programme of international collaboration of a flexible character, and we should avoid what I feel would otherwise be the case — a series of disputes like that over the Relief Administration about what countries are to be represented on each body.

It seems to me that the best position for us to assume is as follows:

1. It is desirable that the concept of the United Nations should be embodied in some institutional form.
2. In setting up agencies to act for the United Nations representation should not be limited to the largest powers but should be extended to include those countries which have the chief contribution to make in each field.
3. When some member states of the British Commonwealth are represented on United Nations agencies they should accept responsibility for keeping other member states who are not represented informed of matters of concern to them but they should not directly represent them.
4. An early agreement is desirable so as to avoid disputes about the form of international cooperation and to permit progress towards agreement on the substance of international problems.
5. This might best be attained by holding a United Nations conference charged with the duty of setting up expert bodies to study particular problems. If this method, however, is not acceptable to the large powers, it would not be in our interest to press for its adoption.

6. While we must accept the procedure of preliminary four-power consultations on matters of interest to us, we should do our best to ensure that the United Kingdom Government (and as far as possible also the United States Government) keeps us informed of the substance of these consultations while making it clear that the Canadian Government alone can make commitments on behalf of Canada.

I enclose a note¹ which Mr. Escott Reid has given me, reporting a conversation with Berle that took place at a meeting of the Joint Economic Committees in Montreal. This gives some indication of Berle's views of the Eden conversations in Washington. You will notice that Mr. Berle offered advice on the need for our making clear our position on the organization of the United Nations. It is rather disturbing that he considers that we have not made our position clear in Washington, especially as I gather from a short talk this morning with Mr. McCarthy that Mr. McCarthy shares this view.

In fact, we enunciated the general principles which we thought ought to be followed in the memorandum on the Relief Administration, which was given to Mr. Welles on February 9th⁵⁴ after consideration by the War Committee. The text of the memorandum was also communicated to the United Kingdom and Soviet Governments. It contained the two following paragraphs:

"There is already a good deal of public questioning over the place accorded to Canada in the various inter-Allied bodies which have been set up for the direction of the war. During wartime, problems of this nature are to some extent disguised, because of public concentration on the attainment of victory and because of the secrecy which must surround many aspects of war direction. After the fighting ends, the issues will be seen nakedly. The full activities of the Relief Administration will not begin until the war is over; and it will be very difficult, or even impossible, to persuade the Parliament and people of Canada to accept the financial burdens and other sacrifices, such perhaps as the continuation of rationing and other restrictions on the domestic supply of consumers' goods, which will be necessary for the provision of relief through the Administration on the expected scale, unless they are satisfied that their representatives exercise their due part in its direction.

⁵⁴ See Document 670.

It is appreciated that there are great practical difficulties in creating effective international agencies that are properly representative of the United Nations. These difficulties are a challenge to statesmanship; they must be faced and on their solution depends in large measure the possibility of an enduring peace. No lasting international system can be based on the concentration of influence and authority in bodies composed of a few large powers to the exclusion of the rest. Such a system would be a denial of the democratic principle. It would also be unreal, for it is not always the largest Powers that have the greatest contribution to make to the work of these bodies, or the greatest stake in their success. In the opinion of the Canadian Government representation of countries on international bodies should be determined on a functional basis whenever functional criteria can be applied; this principle can be given wide application, particularly in the case of international economic and technical organizations such as the Relief Administration.”

If Mr. Berle is really speaking with knowledge, it looks as though we ought to take up the question again in Washington, at a high level. It is not possible to meet his suggestion that we should specify the committees of the United Nations on which we want representation as no such committees have been established and we do not know what is contemplated. The Combined Boards are not committees of the United Nations in form, though they act as such in function to a considerable degree.

SECRET AND CONFIDENTIAL

London, April 10, 1943

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have read with much interest Mr. Wrong's letter of March 30th, and his attached memorandum on the form of organisation which should be given to the United Nations, and particularly with regard to the question of Canada's representation on International bodies.⁵⁵ One point appears to be of special relevance to relations between Canada and the United Kingdom. On this I venture to make some comments.

In his memorandum, Mr. Wrong refers to “a revival of the old concept of diplomatic unity of the Commonwealth” at Washington as “an unexpected consequence of our attempts to secure a proper place for Canada in the Relief Administration”. I am in entire agreement with the statement that “our acceptance of this idea, either in this connection or in other connections, might well have some dangerous results”. Judged from the standpoint of Canadian interests the revival of this principle would be very unfortunate, as most Canadians would now agree. Moreover, from the point of view of intra-Commonwealth relations generally, the idea of "diplomatic unity" would provide a fruitful and dangerous source of misunderstanding between member states of the Commonwealth. On the other hand, it would surely be equally undesirable from our standpoint to drift towards the view which lies at the other extreme and to find ourselves regarding our relations with Great Britain as being no different from those with any other friendly country. In this direction lies a gradual weakening of those remaining ties which still bind our two nations, to the mutual benefit of both.

It would seem more than ever urgent, therefore, that we should clearly define our attitude to the problems of post-war international relations to the Government of this country. Failure to do so may lead to an unconscious movement in one of two opposite directions, in each of which lies danger.

There is a growing realisation here that after this war Great Britain will find herself standing in greater need than ever of the British Commonwealth. It is felt increasingly that this country may be able to retain her position as a first-class Power only by stressing her membership of the Commonwealth, which as a group would represent a factor in international affairs as important as each of the other two great Powers — the United States and Russia. Far-sighted people here are becoming conscious of this changing orientation.

The tendency on the part of Great Britain to set greater store by her Commonwealth ties is by no means, in my opinion, to our disadvantage. For the position of Canada too, is surely likewise enhanced by our association with the other nations of the Commonwealth in a great world-wide alliance.

This development, however, need not lead us, in my opinion, to a renewal of the idea of the "Empire" diplomatically "speaking with one voice". It would seem to me, therefore, well to make it clear to Great Britain that while we cannot accept the notion of "diplomatic unity", which would not be in accordance with the existing relations between the nations of the Commonwealth, we are prepared to co-operate on the analogy of an alliance between them, each giving the other the closest mutual diplomatic support on a basis of equality and in a manner consistent with their respective interests.

By the same token we cannot accept the view that any nation of the Commonwealth, except possibly by prior agreement in minor matters, can speak for any other nation, on the international bodies which are to be set up when the United Nations are given some definite form of organisation.

In this connection I am in entire agreement that the "functional" principle should be the criterion as to membership in these post-war international bodies and that those countries should have a place who have the greatest practical stake in the principal subject under reference and the greatest contribution to make.

Although our relations with the United States lie outside the scope of these comments they cannot be neglected in any consideration of Canadian external policy. It is obvious that our relations with the American Government will be the most important field where the policy of mutual and independent support referred to in this memorandum is likely to be put to the test. For this reason it is of the greatest importance that the nature of the British Commonwealth and of Canada's relation to it, should be understood in Washington.

Yours sincerely,

VINCENT MASSEY

POST-WAR INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION⁵⁷

This may be among the most important subjects of discussion. The Canadian Government has received very little information on the views of the United Kingdom and United States Governments on the organization of international security. It must be assumed, however, that much thought has been given to this subject in London and Washington. It is generally agreed that an effective security system is a necessary foundation for all post-war planning, and that international plans for civil aviation, monetary stabilization, commercial policy and so on can only be effective in an atmosphere of international security. We have now reached a stage in the war at which it is most desirable that there should be an exchange of views on these vital questions.

Mr. Churchill publicly referred some months ago to the possibility of establishing a Council of Europe and perhaps a Council of Asia, implying his preference for a regional organization of security without necessarily discarding the conception of a world organization.⁵⁸ From the Canadian point of view there is much to be said against great emphasis being laid on regional methods, especially if the regions are taken to be the continental land masses. In such a system Canada would be in the American region but would also be intimately concerned with security in the European and Asiatic regions. Emphasis on regionalism would tend to lead the forces in the United States that are opposed to international commitments to concentrate on security in the American region as the particular sphere of the U.S., and to argue for the assumption of no responsibility for European stability. We have in the last four years had a striking demonstration of the truth of the doctrine that peace is indivisible in the modern world, and, therefore, that security everywhere is the concern of all countries. Furthermore, "regions" from the security point of view can no longer be identified with continents. It is more realistic to regard the North Atlantic area as a security region than the continents of North and South America. While regional bodies may play a valuable part, it seems desirable that we should support a world system on which any regional bodies would depend.

The Covenant of the League of Nations is still in force between a substantial majority of the states of the world. There has been no exchange of views on the future of the League and a time has come when the existing obligations of the Covenant should be considered in relation to the organization of security by the United Nations. If the League is to be scrapped a method must be devised for its scrapping which will be acceptable to Member States. Any world security system would necessarily include many provisions of the Covenant, but it may well be that the United States would not be ready to participate in a revision of the Covenant and would prefer that a fresh start be made. It is by no means clear that the President will favour either a new formal security system or a revised League. He may prefer an ad hoc "Concert of great Powers" operating without any international instrument. In this way he might avoid difficulties with the U.S. Senate, but the responsibilities of the United States would be undefined and would be varied with each change in the Presidency.

The work of the International Labour Office and many of the technical activities of the League Secretariat are continuing but there has been no agreement on their relationship to any new international bodies that may be set up, such as the contemplated permanent institution dealing with food and agriculture. It is important that the work done and under way by the League organizations should be employed and that their skilled personnel should be made use of in framing certain aspects of the settlement. In Washington they appear to contemplate the creation of a number of independent international bodies, separately constituted and certain frequently to overlap in their functions, and also likely to cover ground already occupied by the League and I.L.O.

In general discussions on international organization opportunities are likely to arise for advocating the adoption of a functional method of representation, at any rate on international bodies of a technical character, in preference either to participation of all states large and small or to concentration of representation in the hands of the largest powers. Canada has already made known its views, both in the prolonged negotiations on the constitution of the Relief Administration and in the Prime Minister's speech of July 9th in the House of Commons⁵⁹. The "four-power concept" is known to commend itself to Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill. This is as good an occasion as is likely to arise to put the Canadian point of view forward once more.

In general it is becoming increasingly important that we should know more of the ideas of other Governments, and especially of the United States and the United Kingdom, on these vital problems of world organization. As matters stand Canadian planning in this field must be undertaken in the most hypothetical way. There is danger that we may be confronted with a prior understanding, especially between the United States and the United Kingdom, which would be difficult to change and which might not accord to Canada a place that we would be ready to accept.

POST-WAR INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION

16. THE UNITED KINGDOM PRIME MINISTER said that discussions of post-war organization with President Roosevelt had been of a tentative, exploratory character.

The U.S. government were thinking along the lines of a central agency consisting of the four Great Powers — the United Kingdom, United States, China and the U.S.S.R., and a broader committee on which all nations would be represented, but in which voting would be limited to regional or other groupings of the smaller countries with, for example, one vote for Europe and one for the Dominions.

These proposals were being given to the United Kingdom, unofficially, for study and comment, in the form of a memorandum. The Dominions would be given full opportunity to comment on this U.S. paper and on any other proposals for post-war organization which might be put forward.

17. MR. CHURCHILL observed that these tentative proposals did not accord with his own approach to the problem of post-war machinery. He would prefer a system of regional councils, a Council of Europe, a Council of Asia, and a Council in the Western Hemisphere upon which Canada would represent the Commonwealth.

The restoration of a strong France was essential to the security of Europe and adequate provision would have to be made for French representation.

The only firm basis for the post-war world lay in the continued close co-operation and association of the British Commonwealth and Empire, with the United States, and the establishment of a strong and satisfactory understanding between both and Soviet Russia.

18. THE PRIME MINISTER observed that, in the Canadian view, the establishment of machinery which created even the impression of domination by the Great Powers would inevitably have grave results. After the war each nation would be looking to its own place in international organization. Clearly, each could not be given an equal voice in the councils of the nations, but some method should be sought which would enable an equitable apportionment of rights, functions and responsibilities to be made. It had been possible to leave the supreme direction of the war largely in the hands of the U.K. and U.S. governments, but the same conditions would not obtain in time of peace.

19. THE WAR COMMITTEE noted the statements of Mr. Churchill and Mr. King.

Dominions Office telegram D. 1102 of December 14th¹ reports the initiation of discussions between London and Washington on the course to be followed to give effect to paragraph 4 of the Four-Power Declaration on security issued at Moscow.⁶⁰ The United States have proposed (and the Soviet Government have agreed) that the parties to the Declaration should invite the adhesion of other United Nations to this paragraph, which reads as follows:

“That they recognize the necessity of establishing at the earliest practicable date a general international organization, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states, and open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the maintenance of international peace and security.”

The United Kingdom without rejecting this suggestion has proposed that there should first be a preliminary exchange of views between the U.S., U.K. and U.S.S.R. In London they favour pressing on with the establishment of the organization, possibly even before the defeat of Germany.

It is open to question whether we should make any comment at this stage. I do not myself like the United States suggestion that all the other United Nations should merely be asked to adhere to the paragraph quoted above. This would repeat the sort of procedure adopted in the Declaration by United Nations of January 1st, 1942⁶¹, when the Atlantic Charter was generally accepted, but to take this line now would emphasize the gulf between the Great Powers and the rest in a more direct fashion since the Declaration of January 1, 1942, constituted the acceptance of the Atlantic Charter by the U.S.S.R. and China as well as by the other United Nations. In short the U.S. proposal would be an invitation from the big boys to the little fellows to sign on the dotted line.

It is important that some further development should soon take place of the plans for international security and at a very early stage countries other than the Great Powers should be brought into the picture. I should prefer this to be done initially by an expansion of the Moscow statement rather than its mere repetition. Probably this would have to be agreed on in the first place between the U.S., U.K. and U.S.S.R. and we might, therefore, indicate to London that we support their proposal for further talks before approaching other Governments.

Incidentally, we have not received from London any indication of their views on the methods whereby the obligations of the League Covenant are to be dealt with. The Moscow Declaration is an accurate description of the general character of the League of Nations. Plans will have to be made either for winding up the League and replacing it with a new security system or for amending the Covenant so that those United Nations which are not League members will be ready to adhere. The first alternative seems more likely than the second. Should we ask London for a statement of their views on this point which is certain to give rise to some intricate problems? As a basis for further discussion I attach a draft telegram to the Dominions Office.⁶²

MOST SECRET. Your telegram D. 1102 of December 14.[†] Moscow Declaration on security. Following from the Prime Minister, Begins:

1. We feel that it would be a mistake for the parties to the Moscow Declaration to invite other United Nations to adhere to paragraph 4.

2. We think it may be assumed that none of the other United Nations is in disagreement with the principle expressed in paragraph 4 and there would be no real gain in having a formal adherence to it. Such adherence might, in fact, have an entirely negative effect in giving rise to the suggestion that the United Nations could not, at this date, go beyond the general formulation of principle in paragraph 4. Accordingly, we favour your proposal for a preliminary exchange of views between the parties to the Moscow Declaration. It is certainly desirable that other United Nations should soon be brought into the picture. Perhaps the best course would be to attempt the expansion of paragraph 4 of the Declaration into a somewhat longer statement of purpose and method with a view to submitting it for consideration to other Governments in the near future. This would be a stage towards the elaboration of the general international instrument defining the scope and authority of the security organization. Concurrence in such an instrument would constitute a development of real value.

3. We also feel that it would be unfortunate to emphasize unnecessarily a distinction in status between the signatories of the Moscow Declaration and the other United Nations by having them merely concur in a principle agreed on by the largest powers. Difficult questions as to the relationship of the largest powers to the rest will have to be faced but they should not be raised over an issue so devoid of substantial advantage as adherence to the present declaration of purpose.

4. The majority of the United Nations are still members of the League of Nations and will, therefore, have to relate their position under any new scheme to the League Covenant. We assume that you have been giving consideration to this problem and we feel that the time has come for some exchange of views between Commonwealth Governments on what should be done. Ends.

W.L.M.K./Vol. 301

Le Premier ministre d'Australie au Premier ministre
Prime Minister of Australia to Prime Minister

Canberra, May 26, 1943

Addressed Secdomin No. 127, Prime Minister Canada No. 11, Prime Minister South Africa No. 74, Prime Minister New Zealand No. 93, Secretary Government of India No. 94.

Commonwealth Government is disturbed at what is still considered excessive League of Nations budget which is £825,000 as compared with £700,000 for 1942. Further, with the retirement of France and Roumania and the nominal contribution of the Netherlands, practically the whole amount now falls on members of the British Commonwealth.

For our part we note that our assessed contribution is £43,850 as compared with £34,000 for last year.

Whilst fully appreciating the necessity for maintaining the nucleus of the League as an international organisation at the present time we feel grave doubts as to whether the value of the work now being done warrants the contribution levied, and this aspect has been and will continue to be seriously criticised by Parliament and the general public.

2. We propose therefore to inform the Secretary General of the League that the Commonwealth Government is prepared to pay the same amount only as last year, namely £34,000 plus the contribution levied for the reconstruction work of the League £2,900 for 1943. We also propose that the Supervisory Commission should further reduce the ordinary budget, particularly in regard to payments to the pension fund.

3. Before submitting these proposals, however, we would be glad to receive your comments and an expression of the attitude your Government has in mind to adopt.

Addressed to Prime Minister of Australia No. 4 repeated to Dominions Office No. 95.

Your telegram No. 11 of May 26th. League of Nations budget. We propose to pay the full Canadian contribution assessed in the budget for 1943. Provided that as you suggest "the necessity for maintaining the nucleus of the League as an international organization" is admitted, we consider that there is little room for reduction in League expenditures. The main reason for the current increase has been the inclusion in the budget of the special reconstruction credit for the International Labour Office which was unanimously approved by the International Labour Conference of 1941. We feel it to be most desirable that this work should continue and that the economic studies of the Secretariat's Economic Financial and Transit Department at Princeton should not be interrupted.

It is of course true that nearly all the League's receipts, apart from token contributions from Allied European Governments, currently come from British Commonwealth countries, but it should be remembered that the United States, Brazil and some other states not members of the League are contributing substantially to the International Labour Office.

The budget figures give an inflated idea of actual League expenditures since the Supervisory Commission has laid down the principle that the League organizations should limit their expenditures to accord with anticipated receipts which of late have amounted to about two-thirds of the total. In any case the current budget has now been in effect for five months and it is too late to reduce the commitments for 1943. If receipts fall short of expectations a deficit will almost certainly be incurred which would have to be met from future contributions. With regard to the Pension Fund we doubt the feasibility of any reduction in the sums allotted in view of the heavy burden placed on the Fund by the premature retirement since 1938 of a large number of officials through staff reductions.

Addressed to Secretary of State for Dominions Affairs, No. 161, repeated to External, Ottawa, No. 13, Prime Minister of New Zealand No. 112, Prime Minister of South Africa, No. 84. Your telegram June 6th, No. 148. In view of the action and opinion of other Governments of the Empire, the Commonwealth Government proposes to continue to meet its obligations as a member of the League and to pay assessed contribution of approximately £43,850 in Australian currency. We still feel that the present expenditure budget of the League is out of all proportion to the amount necessary to maintain the nucleus of the League as an international organisation at the present time. It would be very much appreciated if you could see your way clear to instruct the British members of the Supervisory Commission to press for an immediate meeting of that body to reconsider the expenditure of the League with a view to effecting an appreciable reduction in the present rate of expenditure, both for the balance of the current year and while present conditions exist¹. IMMEDIATE. My telegram No. of [sic]³ Emergency Committee of International Labour Office.

1. Budget. Preliminary report seems to indicate that the draft budget is obscure in many items. Do not hesitate to ask for explanations.
2. Assessed supplementary contribution for reconstruction. Canadian Government are not putting their assessed contributions into the estimates under the general League budget, but it will probably appear as a special item under reconstruction. This is being done to avoid prejudicing the position of the Canadian member of the Supervisory Commission, as we still adhere to the view that all League contributions should be handled through the League Treasury.
3. It is not desired that the Conference Resolution on reconstruction should be too widely interpreted by the International Labour Office. We consider they should devote themselves to the exchange of information between governments.
4. In general discussion on the work of the Office please give your support to the view that the International Labour Organization should regard itself as fully belligerent and its prime function at present to serve the needs of the democratic countries in every way possible, in the present war effort.

Understand Acting Director and his party delayed and meeting postponed several days. Please cable probable date of meeting.

Suggest an informal meeting be arranged with Sir Frederick Leggett⁴ and report any particular points which he thinks might be of special interest to us. It might also be useful to get into touch with Rossetti who is the other United Kingdom member of government group.

IMMEDIATE. I attended the opening meeting of the Conference. The proceedings began with speech by Mr. Ernest Bevin in which he stressed importance of work of reconstruction and contribution which could be made by International Labour Office. The meeting then discussed Acting Director's report, during the course of which I carried out instructions contained in your telegram No. 776⁵. The meeting next discussed report of Financial Committee in so far as it concerned financial year 1941 and financial position at the beginning of 1942.

(2) In the afternoon there was a general discussion of topics raised in general note¹ prepared by the Office on best method of giving effect to reconstruction resolution. The Acting Director and United States Government member strongly recommended appointment of Committee referred to on pages 4 and 5 of general notes. The type of Committee which the Acting Director and United States have in mind is a small Committee of say 5 very eminent persons not necessarily economists. The intention is that the International Labour Office would not itself make intensive studies of economic measures necessary to realize social objective of Atlantic Charter⁶. These studies and proposals would be made by the League and by such persons or organizations as may be charged with such duties by States. The Committee would be expected to scrutinise economic proposals of other bodies from point of view of their social consequence. It is intended that the Committee should point out if need be the harmful social consequences of economic proposals, and also to suggest modifications in any proposals which might give a better opportunity for a fuller realization of the social objectives of the Atlantic Charter. The Committee would, of course, act in an advisory capacity only and report to Governing Body.

(3) Two members of workers' group and Dutch Government members approved creation of a Committee of this kind. One member of employees' group and United Kingdom member reserved judgment. I now gather that United Kingdom Government, in view of strong stand being taken by the United States, are more disposed to accept a Committee of this kind.

(4) Meeting adjourned last night until 3:00 P.M. Wednesday, April 22nd, when United Kingdom will make known its decision with regard to Committee.

QUESTION OF INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

Mr. Goodrich, Chairman of the Governing Body of the I.L.O., and Mr. Phelan, the Acting Director, discussed on November 13th with Mr. Robertson, Mr. Rive and Mr. Wrong the holding early next year of an International Labour Conference. Mr. Vincent MacDonald¹⁰ was also present during the latter part of the discussion. It was made clear that the Canadian officials concerned were speaking on their own responsibility and were not presenting a statement of considered Government policy.

The visitors stated that there was strong support in Washington and London for a meeting of the Conference to take place at the earliest in the late winter and at the latest in the early summer. Messrs. Roosevelt and Churchill had endorsed this view during their conversations in Washington last September. Agreement has not yet been reached on the agenda of the conference or on the place of meeting and they wished to discuss informally these two questions.

On the agenda they both agreed that the main objectives should be to influence and mould social policy in liberated European countries with special emphasis on the attainment of full employment. Generalities such as those expressed by the New York Conference of 1941 would not now be sufficient. What was needed was concrete recommendations to Governments on the course they should pursue which would carry great weight if they had the endorsement of a tripartite conference. The time was not ripe for using the elaborate legislative procedure of the I.L.O. for the preparation of draft conventions to be ratified later by individual states. Mr. Goodrich felt more strongly than Mr. Phelan that a simplification of the normal conference technique was needed but both agreed that the conference ought to result in recommendations containing programmes which European Governments could translate into legislative action, especially on the subjects of employment policies and social security.

¹⁰ Assistant Deputy Minister of Labour.

Messrs. Robertson and Wrong expressed the view that a Labour Conference, if it were to be useful, had to be inspired by a missionary spirit aimed at appealing to and guiding the ferment of opinion which there would be in liberated Europe. They were both doubtful whether at such a time as this a great deal could be done by a conference to prepare specific plans for application inside Europe on liberation. They agreed, however, that a conference would perform valuable work if it could influence opinion inside Europe, especially in labour circles, to concentrate on social legislation of a generally similar type not in conflict with the international economic aims of the United Nations expressed in the Atlantic Charter. All agreed that the main function of a conference would be to seek to give more detailed meaning to the general programme laid down in the Atlantic Charter. Messrs. Goodrich and Phelan were more confident than the Canadian officials that a labour conference would achieve a lot in this direction.

From the point of view of the future of the I.L.O. itself there was general agreement that unless it were able to stimulate enthusiasm and demand support by doing useful work during the period of settlement, it was doubtful whether it could survive as an agency of international social reform.

With regard to the place of the conference, Mr. Goodrich and Mr. Phelan both expressed the view that it should be held in Montreal. The main arguments which they employed were:

1. It would be easier to get full representation, especially from the American countries and notably from U.S. labour organizations if the conference were on this side of the ocean.
2. A large U.S. labour group at the conference with both the A.F.L. and C.I.O. represented would tend to give the I.L.O. new strength since hitherto a chief weakness of the I.L.O. on the labour side had been the lack of interest of U.S. Labour.
3. Technically it was much easier to hold a conference in Montreal than in London since the requisite staff of the Office was already there with the necessary records.

Mr. Goodrich indicated that the U.S. Government desired the conference to be in Montreal especially for the second reason. It was felt to be inappropriate that two conferences running should take place in the United States and there was a great deal to be said for holding it at the temporary seat of the Office. Hitherto also U.S. Labour had been represented by an A.F.L. delegate and the C.I.O. as such had not participated in U.S. delegations. They thought that they could persuade Mr. Green¹¹ and Mr. Murray¹² to attend the conference in Montreal as joint Labour delegates but they would not in all probability be able to get them to go to London or to send representatives to London in a similar relationship. Mr. Goodrich indicated, however, that the preliminary views

¹¹ Président, American Federation of Labour

¹¹ President, American Federation of Labour.

¹² Président, Congress of Industrial Organizations.

¹² President, Congress of Industrial Organizations.

which they had received from London showed that the United Kingdom Government would prefer the conference to take place there and were prepared to issue an invitation.

The Canadian officials expressed the view that the primary purpose of the conference could best be attained by a meeting in London.¹³ Its object was to assist in the rehabilitation of Europe which might well then be in process of liberation. The closer the contact with the Allied Governments and with European Labour the the greater the chance of useful results. Mr. Goodrich without altering his view that Montreal was the best place indicated that he had been impressed by these arguments and would discuss them in Washington.

Mr. Wrong also found an opportunity to indicate privately to Mr. Goodrich and Mr. Phelan that he was not sure whether the Canadian Government would look with favour on a great international conference taking place in Montreal between March and June 1944.¹⁴ Although the Government would not be responsible for the organization or direction of the conference it would, nevertheless, have to pay considerable attention to it. The timetable indicated that the conference would meet in the middle of a Parliamentary session and in a period when urgent problems, both international and domestic would inevitably require the attention of the Cabinet and senior officials. It was likely, therefore, that on these practical grounds the Canadian Government would prefer the conference to be held elsewhere than in Canada.

CONFIDENTIAL. With reference to Wrong's personal telegram No. 2160 of November 30th[†] and your reply No. 3034 of December 1st[†] you are appointed to represent the Government of Canada at the meeting of the Governing Body of the I.L.O. which opens in London on December 16th with Mr. Ritchie as your deputy. The Acting Director of the I.L.O. is being so informed. Instructions on the items on the agenda will be sent to you as soon as possible. We are awaiting further information on some points. Your letter of November 24th[†] has not yet been received.

For your immediate guidance. Concerning proposed meeting of Labour Conference, our view is that if it is held it could best be held in London in the hope that its recommendations would help to influence social legislation in liberated countries on progressive and orderly lines. The United States authorities and Acting Director have informally approached us over holding conference in Montreal. This is definitely not acceptable to the Government and if Governing Body favours holding of conference on this continent we feel it should take place in United States. Chief reasons advanced by Chairman of Governing Body for holding conference in Montreal are: (a) that Green and Murray would be likely to attend as joint United States Labour delegates and (b) that technical arrangements are much easier to make for conference at temporary headquarters of I.L.O.

My telegram 2176 of December 2nd. Governing Body of International Labour Office.

1. The following instructions are for your general guidance. I assume you can secure agenda and supporting documents from London Office of I.L.O.

2. We favour admission of representative of French Committee of [National] Liberation. While formally he cannot sit as representative of French Government, a suitable formula should be discoverable. You can support any arrangement acceptable to United Kingdom. French notice of withdrawal from League in 1941 included statement to effect that position respecting membership in I.L.O. might later be reconsidered, and in view of this France can still be regarded as member of I.L.O. No difficulty arises over admission of representatives of French employers and workers.

3. Chief item is agenda, date and place of 26th Session of International Labour Conference. As to date, at least four months notice of convocation of conference should be given and we are inclined to think that longer notice is desirable so that the conference would take place in May or June, 1944.

4. As to place, United States Ambassador has been informed that Canadian Government does not wish Conference in Canada at any time in 1944. This should end pressure for Montreal meeting. Chief benefits of Conference would be its influence on social reconstruction in Europe, and therefore participation of large number of representatives of occupied countries is desirable. We are inclined to favour London but if United States representatives press for conference in United States (or perhaps Bermuda) this would be acceptable as second-best.

5. As to Conference agenda, the questions proposed by the Office for a resolution or declaration on post-war social policies and the future policy of the

I.L.O. are acceptable, and also their suggestions for topics to be included looking to the adoption of recommendations on the organization of employment in the transition from war to peace, social security and social policy in dependent territories. Chief aim of the Conference should be production of orderly programme of social legislation and practice for use in liberated territory (and possibly also in enemy countries after the war) as a general guide to governments, in the hope of encouraging parallel and progressive action on labour standards in the various countries of the continent and curbing revolutionary movements. On most of these subjects time is not ripe for using the detailed Conference procedure of draft conventions and recommendations based on elaborate preliminary studies. More specific results, however, are needed than those of the last Conference in New York.

6. The Office suggests that question of Model Code of factory safety provisions might be included in Conference agenda. We doubt that this is timely; perhaps a preparatory technical conference might be held during the next year.

7. Item 3 of Governing Body agenda concerns relations of I.L.O. with new international bodies. Our general view is that we desire to see the position of the I.L.O. preserved but do not favour an aggressive policy claiming too much territory for I.L.O. Its tripartite nature often makes close association with purely governmental bodies difficult. Its experience should be employed through consultation and at times collaboration in international discussions on social policy. Provision should be made for early consideration of amendments needed in I.L.O. constitution and procedures.

8. We are consulting departments concerned on Items 4 and 5 of the Governing Body agenda and will telegraph later if instructions are required.

9. With regard to Item 6, we are doubtful whether the time has arrived for establishing joint industrial committees on various industries although we think that this ought to receive consideration. We have not yet seen the British Government's proposals. We may later telegraph our view on the future of the Permanent Agricultural Committee.

10. No special instructions seem to be required on financial questions. It is remembered, however, that financial support for the I.L.O. comes from a small group of governments, mainly those of the English-speaking countries. Doubtless if the conference is held, the Governing Body will request supplementary credit to cover its cost.

11. The Office proposals on Item 8 regarding collective agreements are acceptable and also those concerning future meetings of the Governing Body.

12. Please telegraph if you require instructions on any other matters.

London, December 21, 1943

The meeting of the Governing Body of the I.L.O. terminated yesterday. The most important points dealt with were the place, date and agenda for the I.L.O. Conference in 1944.

(a) Place. The invitation of the United States Government to hold the Conference in the United States, probably at Philadelphia, was accepted by the Governing Body. The United Kingdom attitude in the matter has changed and now appears to be that there will be too many important developments in this country about the time of the holding of the Conference for it to be convenient to hold it here. European representatives made no opposition to acceptance of American invitation, which was put forward very tactfully by Carter Goodrich. The possibility of holding the Conference in Montreal did not come up.

(b) Time. April 20th was agreed on as date for the Conference. The United States Government wanted it earlier and suggested March, but after discussion agreed to the later date, principally on practical grounds that sufficient time must be allowed to prepare for the Conference if it was to be effective. Ritchie made short statement in course of debate urging that adequate time should be given for preparation of material in order that the Conference should be in a position to consider concrete proposals. The chief argument for early Conference was that delay would disappoint hopes of oppressed peoples.

(c) Agenda. The following agenda was agreed upon:

(1) Future policy, program and status of the International Labour Organization.

(2) Recommendations to the United Nations for present and post-war social policy.

(3) The organization of employment in the transition from war to peace.

(4) Social security principles, and problems arising out of the war.

(5) Minimum standards of social policy in dependent territories.

(6) Reports on the application of conventions. (Article 22 of the Constitution).

(7) Director's report.

The letter communicating the agenda to Governments will make it plain that the first five items on the agenda are general headings, the full scope of each item being illustrated in explanatory paragraphs dealing with each of the matters set out as sub-clauses in the office draft agenda of which you already have a copy.

2. It was thought that the published agenda should be kept as simple as possible as being more effective for publicity purposes. Ritchie made a statement on the Canadian attitude re the agenda in accordance with the general guidance supplied in paragraphs 5 and 6 of your telegram No. 2232 of 11th December.

3. The Acting Director asked for a supplementary credit of from 870,000 to 1,913,999 Swiss francs to cover expenses of I.L.O. and this was unanimously agreed to by the Governing Body.

4. French Committee of [National] Liberation was represented at Governing Body by Tixier.

5. The question of Soviet participation was raised and it was agreed that discreet approaches should be made by the Chairman and Acting Director to the Soviet Ambassador in London with the object of obtaining Soviet attendance at the Conference.

6. The Conference was opened by Mr. Bevin at the initial session which I attended and Mr. Eden delivered a friendly and encouraging speech at the final session.

7. Despatch[†] dealing more fully with these and other points follows.

THIRD MEETING OF THE FOREIGN MINISTERS OF THE AMERICAN REPUBLICS

I. On the suggestion of Chile, Secretary of State Cordell Hull has proposed to the Governing Board of the Pan-American Union that a meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the American nations should be held in Rio de Janeiro in the first week of January. The purpose of the meeting is to consult on defence measures for the western hemisphere.

II. In view of the general world situation, of the relationship of Canada to the other nations involved, and of the purpose for which the meeting has been called, it would seem to be desirable that Canada should be represented at the proposed conference.

III. The major arguments in favour of such representation may be summarized thus:

A — The meeting is for the purpose of coordinating policies for hemisphere defence. Canada, as an American nation, is vitally interested and Canadian cooperation would be desirable from the national as well as from the international angle.

B — Canada has a natural interest in the defence plans of any nations that are still unconquered, especially when those nations propose to cooperate with Canada and Canada's allies in the common struggle to remain free and destroy the aggressor.

C — Participation in discussions for hemisphere defence would be a natural development from the Ogdensburg Agreement which covered only the northern half of the Americas.¹⁵ It would be inefficient for Canada to be in the position of having to use Washington as the sole channel for coordination. Canadian experience on the Permanent Joint Board on Defence might be of real value.

D — The meeting at Rio de Janeiro will probably lay plans for mobilizing the resources of the hemisphere. Canadian participation would be a natural development from Hyde Park¹⁶ and would be essential for the construction of an adequate programme.

¹⁵ Voir le volume 8, document 93.

¹⁶ Voir le volume 8, document 191.

¹⁶ See Volume 8, Document 191.

E — Canada can assist the United States and the other Allied powers in bringing influence to bear on those Governments that are still hesitating on the verge of war. We need every ally we can get; to forego an opportunity of this kind would be inexcusable.

F — Rio de Janeiro will offer one of the few remaining examples of cooperation in a collapsing world. As such it deserves Canadian support.

G — Finally it would seem rather absurd for Canada, the only power in the hemisphere that has been fighting for two years against what is now the common foe, to be absent from a meeting specifically called to consider means of defeating that enemy.

IV. The only rational arguments against Canadian participation are the difficulty of forming a suitable delegation for a Conference which will probably include the Foreign Ministers of all Latin American States, and the fact that the meeting may result in involving Canada in commitments relating to the defence of South America. The first can be overcome if one of the Defence Ministers and one senior official from this Department can attend the Conference. Désy who is in Rio already might also be appointed; and the second is answered by the obvious argument — which has been used so effectively by the Prime Ministers of Canada and the United Kingdom and the President of the United States — that assaults on liberty anywhere are assaults on liberty everywhere. If South America is conquered Canada will not long survive.

V. It is pretty certain that an immediate invitation would be forthcoming once the other countries knew Canada would accept it. Chile, which took the initiative in first proposing the coming Conference, would probably be willing to sound out the others informally. So doubtless would Brazil, which will be host to the meeting. There is something to be said for having a Latin American country, rather than the United States, take the first step in suggesting an invitation to Canada.

VI. A meeting of the Governing Board of the Pan-American Union is to be held in Washington on December 17th. The formal steps to permit Canadian participation at Rio de Janeiro could be taken at that meeting if you thought it advisable.¹⁷

“Please see appropriate officials of Brazilian Government at once and indicate in confidence that Canada would be glad to accept an invitation to the Conference of Foreign Ministers that is to be held in Rio de Janeiro during the first week in January. Several other Latin American states have offered to take matter up at the meeting of the Governing Board of the Pan-American Union which is to convene in Washington tomorrow morning at eleven, December 17, but we would prefer to have the suggestion come from Brazil, the first Latin American nation with whom we have exchanged diplomatic representatives and the country in which the Conference is to be held.

If the Brazilian Government agree it will be necessary for them to communicate at once with their Ambassador in Washington in order that he may raise the matter at tomorrow’s meeting.

If you think it advisable you may also tell the Brazilian authorities for their confidential information that Canada would be prepared to accept an invitation to join the Pan-American Union.

Please report as soon as possible.”

Please give this information immediately in confidence to United Kingdom Government. Reason for our decision is desire to cooperate with other states in the Western Hemisphere in drawing up plans for resisting aggression by enemy. Government feels that Conference at Rio provides Canada with an opportunity to advance our common cause.

Mr. Wrong has telephoned to report a conversation he had this morning with Mr. Sumner Welles about the question of possible Canadian participation in the Conference of Foreign Ministers of American countries to be held in Rio de Janeiro early next month.

Mr. Welles had discussed the question with the President, who was of the opinion that, in view of the terms of the Statute of Havana under which the Conference of Foreign Ministers of American Republics was to be convened, it would not be possible to arrange for an invitation to be extended to Canada for the next meeting.¹⁸ He felt that a number of Latin American countries would be certain to raise at today’s meeting the technical question of international law involved in inviting a country which was not, strictly speaking an American republic and that, in view of the terms of the Statutes, the United States would be compelled to support their position.¹⁹

I told Mr. Wrong I would convey this information to you at once, and that I thought you would not wish the question of Canadian participation raised if there was any difference of view as to the feasibility of Canadian participation²⁰. I also told him that I thought you would be surprised at the rather legalistic position the President appeared to take, having in mind the importance he had attached, in talking to you, to securing a greater measure of Canadian cooperation in Latin American relations.²¹

Wrong is reporting Welles' message by telegram, but he thought that as matters stood the only way in which the present United States position might be modified would be by a direct message to the President from yourself.²²

Dear Mr. Robertson,

With reference to our Telegram No. 587 of December 17th[†] and subsequent telephone conversations on the question of Canadian representation at the Conference at Rio de Janeiro, I am enclosing two memoranda, dated December 17th and 18th, on this matter. These memoranda are records of various conversations which we have had on the question. That of December 18th is almost wholly devoted to my talk with Mr. Welles this morning.

It occurs to me that you may wish to send copies of the enclosures to Mr. Turgeon and Mr. Désy, and I am therefore forwarding them in quadruplicate. I hope that you will find this acceptable in place of a more formal report.

Yours sincerely,

Mémorandum du ministre-conseiller, la légation aux États-Unis

Memorandum by Minister-Counsellor, Legation in United States

Washington, December 17, 1941

Telegram No. 587 to Ottawa contains the message transmitted to me by Mr. Welles on the telephone concerning Canadian representation at the Rio de Janeiro Conference. I passed this to Mr. Robertson by telephone as soon as it was received and suggested to him that it was desirable to send immediate telegrams to Mr. Désy and Mr. Turgeon informing them of the position adopted by the U.S. Government. He thought it would be desirable for the Legation to seek to prevent any discussion of the matter at the meeting of the Governing Board of the Pan-American Union this afternoon on the initiative of either the Brazilian Ambassador or the Dominican Minister. I told him that I felt unable as yet to give him any background to the bald answer to our enquiry which Mr. Welles had transmitted.

I later called on the Dominican Minister and explained the position to him, saying that in response to the enquiry of his Government which he had transmitted yesterday to me I had to inform him that it would be embarrassing to us if the matter were raised by him at the Governing Board meeting today. I gave him briefly the reasons leading to this conclusion and thanked him for the interest which he and his Government had shown in the matter.

Mr. McCarthy called also on the Brazilian Ambassador and found that, following Mr. Désy's approach to the Brazilian Government, he had received instructions to bring the matter up today. He had, however, already checked with Mr. Welles on the position of the State Department and had received a reply in terms similar to that given to us. He was not therefore proposing to raise the question at the Board meeting.

Mr. Robertson telephoned at about 2:30 to convey the Prime Minister's observations on the President's reply to our enquiry.²⁴ Mr. King thinks that the President's message has settled the question as far as Canada is concerned. He would not be surprised if the President had other things in mind apart from the legalistic attitude expressed in the message. He wished a message to be conveyed to the President along the following lines: He would like the President to know that he fully understands that he has the best of reasons for his point of view. Mr. King welcomes the frankness shown by the President in his reply to our enquiry. He wishes the President to know that his only desire in following up the initiative taken by certain Latin American Governments in this connection was to be helpful in furthering the good relations between the United States and Latin American countries.

I called on Mr. Welles late this morning and gave him verbally, for transmission to the President, the message from the Prime Minister set forth in my minute of December 17th. He said he would take the first opportunity of passing this on to the President.

Mr. Welles said that the position from the legal or constitutional point of view might not be fully understood in Canada. The meeting next January grew out of Agreements adopted at the Conferences of American States at Buenos Aires and at Lima and the subsequent consultative meetings of the Foreign Ministers of the American Republics which were held at Panama and Havana. The Agreement providing for the January meeting permitted only the attendance of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the twenty-one American Republics and no one else. At several previous inter-American gatherings the question of the admission of Spain as an observer had been raised, with considerable Latin American support, but in each case it had been rejected on the initiative of the United States, Brazil, and some other Governments. He felt that our Latin American friends in the urgent circumstances of the moment might be rather inclined to push the idea of Canadian representation without weighing the difficulties which were in fact too serious to overcome.

I told him that while I was waiting to see him press correspondents had come to me with the question whether Canada would be represented by an observer at the meeting. I had answered that "observer" was an indefinite term in international practice. We had in Rio an active and able Minister in Mr. Désy, who would certainly observe the proceedings of the Conference in the literal sense and would transmit full reports to the Canadian Government. As for full Canadian representation, I had said that there were serious constitutional impediments in the way, since the controlling Inter-American Agreements limited participation to the Foreign Ministers of the American Republics. I had assured the correspondents that the Canadian Government were greatly interested in the proceedings and in their outcome. Mr. Welles said that he thought that this was the best position to adopt in dealing with enquiries and that if questions were addressed to the State Department he would see that they were answered in the same way.

He informed me that there had been no discussion at the meeting of the Governing Board of the Pan-American Union the previous day of Canadian representation at the Conference beyond a statement of the difficulties from Mr. Hull and a request to all present that no publicity should be given to the matter.

I then said to Mr. Welles that I was going to ask him a hypothetical question which he might not feel free to answer. If he could answer it, I thought that a frank reply would be helpful. My question was: If the constitutional difficulties which he had mentioned did not exist, would the Government of the United States welcome Canadian representation at the forthcoming Conference? He answered in cordial terms to the effect that he could speak for the Government on this matter and could ask me to assure the Prime Minister that the United States would be glad to have full Canadian collaboration in all aspects of inter-American affairs. The United States delegation would unofficially discuss the best means to adopt to attain this end with the representatives at Rio of the other American Republics. I then thought it wise to say to him that I could give him a fairly definite assurance that the Canadian Government was ready to accept an invitation to become a full member of the Pan-American Union. He said that he welcomed this statement and would bring it to the attention of the President.

I have given the substance of this memorandum to Mr. Robertson on the telephone and am sending a copy to him by mail. He tells me that the Brazilian and Argentine Ministers have both called at the Department this morning to express the wishes of their Governments that Canada should be represented at Rio. The Argentine Minister had made several suggestions on the means whereby the legal obstacles might be circumvented.

Mr. King told me yesterday that Mr. Hull and he had discussed the representation of Canada at the Rio Conference on the evening of December 27th²⁵. Mr. Hull had apparently not emphasized the legalistic arguments which were used by Mr. Welles in rejecting the proposal. He had said, however, that he felt that a debate about Canadian representation might well upset their plans for using the Conference as a means of combatting Axis influence and propaganda in Latin America. Mr. King derived the impression that the main reason for taking this view was because of Canadian membership in the British Commonwealth. Mr. Hull seemed to feel that Canadian representation would be regarded in some quarters in Latin America as equivalent to British representation at the Conference.

Incidentally, Mr. Noel Hall told me the other day that it had been suggested that he might take a holiday in January and spend part of it as the guest of the British Ambassador to Brazil while the Conference was in session.

2. This means definitely that United States delegation will not support referendum that Conference should invite Canada to join Pan-American Union. Reasons are partly formal since the State Department's lawyers consider invitation can only be extended by next regular Conference of American States. Their immediate concern, however, seems to be delicate balance of Latin American relations.

CANADA, THE PAN-AMERICAN UNION AND THE UNITED STATES

The proposal that Canada should join the Pan-American Union has been made and debated on and off for many years. It came up again as a practical proposition late in 1941 in connection with the preparations for a meeting, under the general auspices of the Union, of the Foreign Ministers of member states at Rio de Janeiro. Prior to the Conference, Santo Domingo, Brazil, Argentina and Chile all indicated that they would like to have Canada take part in the Conference and, by inference at least, that they would like to have the Dominion join the Union.

There is little doubt that by the end of 1941 the people of Canada were, with few exceptions, ready to approve any action that would lead to closer relations between this country and the Latin-American States. In view of this fact and of the probable advantages that would incur [sic] from participation in the Rio Conference, the Canadian Government decided to move towards membership in the Union. Before taking any concrete step in this direction, however, it was deemed advisable to obtain assurances of the unqualified support of the Government of the United States. For this reason inquiries were addressed to the United States Minister in Ottawa and the matter was also discussed with the State Department in Washington. It was immediately ascertained that the Government of the United States, or at any rate that branch of the Government with which Canada was forced to deal, had completely reversed the attitude that had previously been adopted by the United States in relation to the proposal that Canada should seek membership in the Pan-American Union. This reversal was as complete as it was unexpected, and it was not accompanied by any explanation that could be seriously accepted. Mr. Sumner Welles contented himself with saying that in view of the terms of the Statute of Havana under which the Conference of Foreign Ministers was to be convened, it would not be possible to arrange for an invitation to be extended to Canada for the meeting at Rio de Janeiro. He felt that a number of Latin-American countries would be certain to raise the technical question of international law involved in inviting a country which was not an American Republic and that, in view of the terms of the Statutes, the United States would be compelled to support their position. He did, however, agree to look into the general situation in regard to Canadian participation in the Union while he was at the Rio Conference. He expressed his personal sympathy with the idea and promised to report Canada's views to the President.

Although the Conference of Foreign Ministers ended in the middle of January no report was received, even indirectly, from Mr. Sumner Welles until March 12th, when, in the course of a discussion of other matters, the United States Minister in Ottawa informed Mr. Keenleyside that he had heard that Mr. Welles had found a division of opinion among the Latin Americans at Rio de Janeiro in regard to the propriety of Canadian participation in both the Conference and the Union. Mr. Welles apparently had reported that if the matter had come to a vote Canada would probably have been excluded from the Conference.

There is no evidence from any other source to support the alleged views of Mr. Welles. On the contrary, Canada has received information which would seem to support the belief that the following Latin-American countries would definitely favour Canadian participation in the Pan-American Union: Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Bolivia, Ecuador, Peru, Honduras, Santo Domingo, Nicaragua, Panama, Venezuela, Haiti, Paraguay, Uruguay, Guatemala and Mexico.

The latest development in connection with this matter is a report from Mr. Désy, dated March 17th,¹ in which the Secretary of State for External Affairs was informed that the Brazilian Foreign Minister had quoted Mr. Sumner Welles as saying to him (Dr. Aranha) at the Rio Conference that the United States had objected to an invitation being extended to Canada for two reasons:

- (a) Because Canada formed part of the British Commonwealth of Nations, and as such could not be considered an independent country;

(b) Because the United States did not want Canada to claim the same concessions as those the United States was prepared to make to South American countries.

Dr. Aranha told Mr. Désy very definitely that he had gathered the vivid impression that the United States was afraid of Canadian competition in the markets of South America.

It is possible that Dr. Aranha may have been exaggerating in his description of the views of Mr. Sumner Welles, but there seems to be no doubt that in explaining his position to us the Acting Secretary of State has been using specious arguments to justify his action in blocking Canadian participation in the Rio Conference and Canadian membership in the Pan-American Union. It is quite clear at the present time that the only serious obstacle to Canadian membership in the Union is the attitude of Mr. Welles, which we must assume to be that of the United States Government. In view of this fact it is of interest to look back over the record of Canadian discussions with the United States in regard to this matter. These discussions can be summarized as follows:

1. In December, 1925, Dr. James Brown Scott²⁸ wrote Sir Charles Fitzpatrick²⁹ a letter on the subject of Canadian entry into the Pan-American Union which Dr. Skelton³⁰ in a memorandum to the Prime Minister said was, in view of Dr. Scott's former connection with the State Department, "undoubtedly an unofficial sounding as to whether Canada desires to enter the Pan-American Union".

2. In January, 1928, Mr. Kellogg, Secretary of State, in conversation with the Canadian Minister in Washington, referred to a newspaper despatch in which he was quoted as opposing a reported movement at the Pan-American Conference in Havana to invite Canada to join the Union. He denied that the report represented his view and went on to say that he would be very glad to see Canada a member of the Union. He thought, however, that there might be some difficulty in our joining because of our membership in the Empire. The Canadian Minister replied that we would be quite free to join if we wished to do so.

3. In 1936, before the Buenos Aires Conference the United States informed the Canadian Government that they did not wish to make any suggestion on what Canadian policy should be respecting entry into the Union. They wished to let Canada know, however, that if Canada desired to become a member of the Union, the United States would have much pleasure in fully supporting the proposal. (This is referred to in memoranda from Dr. Skelton of November 19, 1936,³¹ and November 29th[†] and 30, 1938³² to the Prime Minister.)

4. On November 29, 1938, before the Lima Conference, Dr. Skelton, at the Prime Minister's request, asked the Chargé of the United States Legation to find out the procedure for providing for a Canadian observer at Lima. The next day, the Chargé replied that the inquiry had been transmitted by the State Department to the President who had stated that the attitude of the United States Government to Canadian participation was the same as it had been two years before.

5. On December 18, 1941, Mr. Wrong asked Mr. Welles the following question: If the constitutional difficulties which he had mentioned as standing in the way of Canadian participation in the Rio Conference did not exist, would the Government of the United States welcome Canadian representation at the Conference? Mr. Welles replied in cordial terms that he could speak for his Government on this matter and could ask Mr. Wrong to assure the Prime Minister that the United States would be glad to have full Canadian collaboration in all aspects of inter-American affairs. The United States delegation would unofficially discuss the best means to adopt to attain this end with the representatives at Rio of the other American Republics. Mr. Wrong then gave Mr. Welles a fairly definite assurance that the Canadian Government was ready to accept an invitation to become a full member of the Pan-American Union. Mr. Welles said that he welcomed this statement and would bring it to the attention of the President.

It may also be useful to put on the record a summary of the approaches that have been made by the Latin-American states to Canada on this subject.

1. Chile – 1923

Señor Edwards, the Chilean Minister in London, who expected to preside at the Santiago Conference, asked the British Minister at Santiago for guidance as the question of inviting Canada to become a member of the Pan-American Union will not improbably be raised.

2. Brazil – 1925

Senhor de Mello Franco, the Brazilian representative on the Council of the League of Nations, told Dr. Riddell that if Canada would accept an invitation to join the Union he could assure Dr. Riddell that one would be forthcoming from the Havana Conference in 1926. Dr. Riddell said that he believed Senhor de Mello Franco expressed the general attitude of the South Americans to Canada's participation in the Pan-American Union.

3. Mexico – 1928 and 1931

In January, 1928, the British Minister in Mexico was told by a high official in the Mexican Foreign Office that Mexico intended to move at the Havana Conference that Canada be invited to join the Union. In November, 1931, the Mexican Foreign Minister told the British Minister to Mexico that Mexico was proposing that Canada be invited to attend the Montevideo Conference.

4. Argentina – 1929

Dr. Molenari suggested to the British Ambassador in a private conversation, but which according to the British Ambassador he would hardly have made without the President's knowledge, that Canada and the British Colonial possessions in the West Indies and Central America be urged to become members of the Pan-American Union.

5. Dominican Republic – 1941

On December 16, 1941, the Dominican Minister in Washington, on instructions from his Government, asked the Legation in Washington whether the Canadian Government would welcome an invitation to participate fully in the Rio Conference; if so, he would raise the question at the meeting of the Governing Board on December 17th.

6. Brazil – 1941

On December 18, 1941, the Brazilian Minister called on the Under-Secretary to say that his Government had asked him to let us know how warmly they welcomed the possibility of more direct Canadian participation in the shaping of hemispheric policies.

7. Argentine – 1941

On December 18, 1941, the Argentine Minister called on the Under-Secretary to say that his Government had been very glad to learn that Canada might be prepared to participate in hemispheric defence discussions, and, as he put it, become a member of "the American Commonwealth of Nations" as well as of the British Commonwealth.

8. Chile – 1941

On January 3, 1942, the Canadian Minister to Chile paid his first call on Señor Rossetti, the Foreign Minister of Chile. During the conversation Señor Rossetti raised only one question of importance, the question of Canada's entry into the Pan-American Union. He said that he was very enthusiastically in favour of Canada becoming a member of the organization.

9. General

The Argentine Minister to Canada stated on December 18th that his private opinion was that, if a telegram were sent to the members of the Pan-American Union asking if they were prepared to associate themselves with an invitation to Canada to attend the Rio Conference, every Latin-American state would immediately endorse the proposal.

The Canadian Minister to Brazil reported[†] as follows after the Rio Conference:

"One of my informants has had an opportunity to ask unofficially the delegates of the following fifteen countries if they would favour Canadian participation: Peru, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Bolivia, Honduras, Nicaragua, the Dominican Republic, Panama, Venezuela, Haiti, Paraguay, Uruguay, Guatemala and Mexico. All replied in the affirmative. I have already mentioned . . . the reference to Canada made by the Mexican Chancellor at the opening of the Conference, and I am now quite convinced that there would be absolute unanimity among the South American nations with regard to Canadian participation in the Union and future Pan-American conferences."

While Canada may with justice feel some resentment at the way in which the United States has blocked the desire of this country to join the Pan-American Union, the wider significance of the actions of Mr. Welles in regard to this matter are of much greater importance.

During recent years Canada and the United States have been working together in matters of mutual interest with a frankness and mutual confidence that has few parallels in the history of international relations. We have had our differences of opinion and have bargained when bargaining was necessary. From the Canadian side, however, and we have every reason to believe that this is duplicated in Washington, there has been no effort to indulge in the old tactics of secret and dishonest diplomacy. We have agreed or disagreed openly and without equivocation.

Now, for the first time in many years, we find the man who is responsible for the direction of the foreign affairs of the United States Government justifying a policy which seriously affects Canadian interests by the use of arguments which are known to be unsound and which he himself does not use when describing the situation to third parties. When this fact is combined with the other evidences that have been accumulating lately of a growing American tendency to take action affecting Canadian interests, and even in some cases involving the use of Canadian soil without prior notification to the Canadian Government, we are justified in feeling that our relations with the United States have entered an unsatisfactory phase, and one which should be ended just as quickly as possible.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

Mr. Berle mentioned to me today the question of Canadian participation in inter-American organizations and meetings. He said very frankly that the reason why our approach last December had not been accepted was the extreme delicacy of the international position in Latin America. They felt that the question of the admission of Canada to the Conference might well become a complicating factor which might embarrass the efforts of the United States representatives to create a united front of the American republics.³³

He told me that he was considering methods whereby the Canadian Government could be more fully associated in inter-American affairs and that he and his Government were entirely sympathetic to this idea. He thought it likely that there would develop (presumably in Washington) some sort of body representing the American countries which had declared war on the Axis, a group which he hoped would soon include Brazil and perhaps some other South American States. Canada, of course, belonged naturally in such a body. If such a body is created, it would be an easy way of beginning Canadian participation in inter-American meetings, and if we so desired would lead before long to Canadian entry into the Pan-American Union. I remarked to him that I had told Mr. Welles in December that Canada would be glad to join the Pan-American Union and that, so far as I knew, this decision still stood.

You may think it desirable to develop these ideas with Mr. Berle further when he visits Ottawa on June 8th and 9th for a discussion of the future of the Joint Economic Committees.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Prime Minister,

At the Pacific Council meeting yesterday, during the discussion with reference to the wisdom or otherwise of calling a meeting at an early date of all the United Nations, the President was suggesting that it might be something like the Pan-American Union. He turned to me and in an aside said, "You are not a member of the Pan-American Union, but Vargas told me he would like to have you in. I have discussed it with Mackenzie and you will be in as an observer or something like that". I merely replied, "Of course, you understand that since the Pan-American Union was formed our status has under the Statute of Westminster entirely changed". He nodded as if he understood.

It was just a fleeting aside which I do not think any other member, if they heard it, took notice of or grasped. It has occurred to me, however, that I should report it to you, as it seemed to me to have two important elements: first, that Vargas has told him that he would like to have Canada in the Pan-American Union, and the President evidently feels that the result of his last discussion with you was to the effect that we might come in only as an observer or something like that.³⁴

Very sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. McCarthy,

I am glad that you reported to me your brief exchange of remarks with Mr. Roosevelt concerning the possibility of Canada participating in the Pan-American Union. It did not come as a surprise to me to learn that the President of Brazil had told Mr. Roosevelt that Brazil wants Canada in the Union. The Brazilian Government has for more than a year made this clear to Mr. Désy.

There are certain obvious difficulties in the way of Canada becoming associated with the Pan-American Union either as a full member or in any less definite capacity. While we would be willing to consider any suggestions along these lines we would not, of course, wish to have Canadian membership or association with the Union become a subject of debate either within the Union or among the member governments.

Until the attitude of all members of the Union becomes more clearly determined and until steps are taken to work out a method by which Canadian adherence can be facilitated, I think that we shall probably find it wise to concentrate our efforts to improve relations between Canada and the Latin American states on the expansion of direct diplomatic contacts. Certainly I do not believe that it would be advisable for Canada to take any initiative in relation to membership in the Union at this time.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I am enclosing herewith five copies of the draft documents relating to the Washington Wheat Agreement[†] which are being circulated for final consideration by the five participating Governments.

The present drafts represent a wide departure from the provisional draft of the International Wheat Agreement circulated last August.³⁵ In the first place, for the purpose of avoiding offense to non-represented countries, the principal document embodying the present agreement is an informally worded "Memorandum of Agreement" which recognizes that an international wheat agreement requires a conference of all the nations having a substantial interest in wheat, and which provides for the calling of such a conference as soon as the time becomes suitable.

Since the conference may not be called and conclude its deliberations until some time after a general armistice, interim measures are regarded as necessary to prevent competitive disorganization of the international wheat trade in the period between the end of the war and the conclusion of a new agreement. These measures are provided for in the "Memorandum of Agreement" and include:

(a) provisions for relief wheat distribution and for the machinery connected therewith to be set up now.

(b) an undertaking to regulate production during the war so as to prevent the accumulation of excessive stocks.

(c) at the end of the war, or at such earlier agreed date to bring into operation the production control, reserve stocks and export quota provisions as set out in the "Draft Convention".

(d) to maintain during the interim period wheat prices properly related to the price paid by the United Kingdom for the last bulk purchase from the principal country of supply prior to the end of hostilities. Provision is made for alteration in the light of substantial changes in freight and exchange rates. If any interested country is dissatisfied with these prices, resort will be had to the price arrangements in the "Draft Convention" which provide for a price range to be negotiated, subject to the concurrence of the United Kingdom.

(e) The "Memorandum of Agreement" is to be superseded by the agreement arising from the larger conference. Failing such new agreement, the "Memorandum of Agreement" is to terminate in any event within two years.

The "Draft Convention" is a considerably revised version of the provisional draft circulated last August, which was intended as a five-year wheat agreement. Its present purpose is two-fold. It is related to the "Memorandum of Agreement" through the "Minutes of the Final Session of the Washington Meeting" which places in operation the necessary portions of the "Draft Convention" in order to carry out the provisions of the "Memorandum of Agreement". Its other purpose is to place before the new wheat conference a draft agreement as a basis for negotiations within that conference.

Within the Draft Convention, the percentage export quotas remain within one per cent of final agreement with Australia asking 19, Argentina 25, Canada 40, and the United States 17 per cent of the total exports for the four countries, and the quota negotiations are still continuing. Approval is sought from the Canadian Government for the new maximum stock figure of 275 million bushels for Canada in relation to the revised stocks article.

³⁵ See Volume 7, Document 1271.

As indicated in the attached letter from Mr. Carlill,[†] the British Delegation has proposed that the three documents be initialled by the delegates for each country at the final meeting. The United States State Department would then send certified copies of the document to the diplomatic representatives of the other four countries and would invite each government to signify their willingness to adopt and give effect to the "Memorandum of Agreement" and its interpretation in the Final Minutes. When the State Department receives the assent of each government the interim arrangements regarding relief and production control during the war would be deemed to have come into effect. If this procedure is agreed to by the other Governments and by our own, Paragraph 1 of the "Minutes of the Final Session" should be revised by substituting "acceptance" or "approval" in the place of "signature" in the third line thereof.

I would appreciate your forwarding the enclosed documents together with a copy of this explanatory letter to the Departments of Trade and Commerce, Agriculture, Finance, and Mines and Resources.

Faithfully yours,

C. F. WILSON

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT DISCUSSIONS AT WASHINGTON

Mr. George McIvor, Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board, has telephoned from Washington giving a preliminary report on the International Wheat Discussions which have been taking place in that city.

He advises he has been successful in maintaining Canada's share of exports from the four principal countries at 40 per cent. Nothing further has been heard of the proposal of Mr. McCarthy, the Australian delegate, that the four exporting countries should sign a declaration as to their understanding of the prices which should be approved by the Wheat Council, after it is formed.

A great deal of the time during the past three days has been occupied in discussions regarding paragraph six of the proposed "Memorandum of Agreement". You will recall that this paragraph concerns the arrangements for maintaining the price of wheat until the Draft Convention comes into operation. This paragraph has now been redrafted to read as follows:

"The five countries will, as from the cessation of hostilities or from such earlier date as they may agree, determine the prices of wheat in accordance with the arrangements described in the attached Draft Convention, except that the determination will be by unanimous agreement. Pending such determination, the five countries will, for a period not exceeding six months, maintain as the export price of wheat the last price negotiated by the United Kingdom for the bulk purchase of wheat from the principal country of supply; equivalent f.o.b. prices will be calculated for wheats of the other exporting countries and will be adjusted from time to time to meet substantial changes in freight and exchange rates."

Mr. McIvor strongly recommends that Canada should agree to the above revised proposal. You will note that the most significant change is that the price of the last bulk sale to the United Kingdom will be maintained for a period not exceeding six months.

Mr. McIvor points out that this safeguards our position, in that during the six months the wheat which will be imported into the United Kingdom will be the wheat negotiated under the last bulk purchase, which is certain to cover requirements for a fairly long period. The limitation to the six months' period also removes the political objection raised by Mr. Gardiner, in that as the price will only be in force for a period of six months there would not be any great inducement for the United Kingdom to depress the price for the last bulk purchase.

Mr. McIvor reports that the United States very much wanted the period to be a year instead of six months, but they finally agreed to the six months' period as a means of meeting Canada. The United States attach the greatest importance to having this provision in about prices during the interim period and our refusal to agree to the revised formula will be certain to create difficulties with the United States.

Finally, Mr. McIvor points out that in another part of the memorandum Canada is defined as the principal country of supply for wheat imported into the United Kingdom. This is clearly of value as bringing about an official recognition of our position in relation to the supply of wheat to the United Kingdom and obviates any arguments being put forward by the United States in favour of the supply of wheat to the United Kingdom under lend-lease.

Dr. C.F. Wilson will be returning to Ottawa at the end of the week, when he will be in a position to report fully. The revised draft of paragraph six is being referred to the other Governments and it is expected that the International Wheat Discussions will have to be resumed in about ten days to two weeks, when it is hoped to reach finality and to initial the various documents. In the meantime, Mr. McIvor thought that you would like to have this preliminary report of what has transpired in Washington in case you may have the opportunity of discussing the whole question with the Hon. Mr. Gardiner and the other members of the Wheat Committee of Council. Mr. McIvor most strongly urges our acceptance of the revised draft of paragraph six, in view of the considerations referred to above.

Dear Mr. McIvor,

I duly received your letter of April 4,[†] confirming our telephone conversation and advising on the subject of the proposed change in the price clause of the draft Memorandum of Agreement, as agreed upon at the recent meeting in Washington.

In accordance with your request, I brought the revised draft of the paragraph on prices to the attention of Mr. Ilsley and his Secretary has to-day telephoned to Mr. Adams³⁶ advising that Mr. Ilsley is agreeable to the paragraph as it now stands. Accordingly, I am acting upon the request in the last paragraph of your letter of April 4 and am asking Dr. C.F. Wilson to communicate with Mr. Cairns³⁷, reporting that Canada is agreeable to the revised draft of paragraph VI of the Memorandum of Agreement.³⁸

Yours faithfully,

MEETING OF THE INTERNATIONAL WHEAT COUNCIL, WASHINGTON,
UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, AUGUST 3-5, 1942⁴⁰

- a) Summary of business transacted.
- b) Notes on the proceedings. These are my own notes and are not the official minutes of the meetings. The latter will not be available for some weeks.

SUMMARY OF BUSINESS TRANSACTED

1. Election of Officers:

- a) Chairman — Mr. Paul Appleby, United States Under-Secretary of Agriculture was elected Chairman for a period of one year.
- b) Secretary — Mr. Andrew Cairns was appointed full-time secretary for the period of hostilities plus two years or until after the meeting of the full International Conference to take place after the war, whichever is the shorter. The Secretary is to be wholly responsible to the Council.

2. Budget:

It was agreed to provide the Council with a budget of $12,500 for the year August 1942-July 1943. According to the provisions of the agreement this sum is to be raised by equal contributions from each of the five contracting governments.

3. Appointment of Executive Committee:

It was agreed to appoint an Executive Committee consisting of one representative from each delegation to be named by the respective governments. The United States member (L.H. Wheeler) of the Executive Committee was appointed chairman of the Committee.

4. Reports by Contracting Governments to the Council:

- a) It was agreed that each country should submit to the secretariat documentation, viz. statutes, regulations, announcements, etc. concerning wheat control measures undertaken by its government. The secretariat would then prepare a convenient summary for distribution to each contracting government.

b) In connection with the preparation of statistical reports by the secretariat it was agreed that any request for confidential statistics from governments should first be approved by the Executive Committee.

5. Price Stability after cessation of hostilities beyond the initial six-months period:

It was agreed that the Executive Committee should prepare a factual and analytical report on ways of securing price stability after the cessation of hostilities beyond the initial six-months period. This report is to be made available to the contracting governments prior to the January meeting and is not to contain any recommendations or conclusions.

6. Consideration of Canadian relief shipments to Greece as Part of Canadian Contribution to Relief Pool:

Council was not prepared to agree to Canadian request at this stage. It was agreed however that a question of principle was involved and the Canadian delegation gave notice that the matter would [be] raised again at the January meeting.

On the question of the appointment of Mr. Cairns the Canadian delegation felt that the appointment should be a part-time one, mainly out of apprehension of what he might do, since it was clear there was not enough work of a necessary character to keep him busy. All of the other delegations, however, wanted him full time. Mr. Wilson discussed the matter over the phone with Mr. Wilgress who thought that we ought to fall in with the wishes of the others since it was obvious that we would be outvoted. The first offer of salary to Mr. Cairns was $7,000 per annum which he said he could not accept. It was finally agreed to meet his figure of $8,000. In the appointment of Mr. Cairns it was made clear that he was wholly responsible to the Council, that he was given no specific powers and was not to start anything without the approval of either the Council or the Executive Committee. In fact, this was one of the reasons why it was thought wise to appoint an Executive Committee at this stage.

The item on the agenda concerning the question of assuring price stability after cessation of hostilities beyond the initial six-months period came as a surprise. In private conversation Mr. Wheeler said that the Americans were not happy about the present arrangement; they wanted longer continuity for the price arrangements and because they recognized the embarrassment to us in tying the post-war price to our sale price to the United Kingdom, they felt that the substitution of a price formula should be re-explored. Our delegation was unfavourable to a reopening of the question but in view of our interest in the possibility of getting away from the connection between our sales prices to the United Kingdom and the post-war price we agreed to the United States proposals for a study of the matter and inclusion in the agenda for the January meeting.

The disposal of the question regarding wheat for Greece in the manner indicated was partly due to lack of time for consideration by the other delegations. At the earliest opportunity we told Messrs. Hall and Wheeler that the Canadian delegation would bring up the matter but they were unable to discuss it adequately with their colleagues. The issue had to be raised suddenly when it was clear that there was an effort to conclude the meeting as rapidly as possible. The Chairman was caught unprepared and hence tried to turn the question aside. At the January meeting there will have been an opportunity for full consideration.

IMMEDIATE. CONFIDENTIAL.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have been informed that at the first meeting of the Executive Committee of the International Wheat Council in Washington the U.S. chairman urged that the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments should undertake to inform the Council confidentially of the price of the next contract for the bulk purchase of wheat by the United Kingdom from Canada on the ground that this would facilitate the negotiation at the earliest possible moment of the basic minimum and maximum prices applicable during the interim period following the end of hostilities in place of the present arrangement applying to latest Canada/United Kingdom price in the first six months of that period.

As you are of course aware, the Canadian and United Kingdom Governments have been asked on a number of occasions in the past to disclose the prices at which wheat purchases have been arranged between the two countries, and the views of the United Kingdom Government on this subject were set out in a letter of the 24th June last from the Dominions Office to Canada House.[†] I enclose a copy of this letter for convenience of reference. The United Kingdom Government themselves considered the arguments against the disclosure of prices to be convincing but they regarded these arguments as based on the joint interests of the United Kingdom and Canada and they were content to leave it to the Canadian Government to decide whether to disclose the price or not, in answer to the requests which have been addressed to them in the past.

As regards the present request by the chairman of the Executive Committee of the International Wheat Council, the position is that the United Kingdom Government, while appreciating their obligations under paragraph 6 of the memorandum of agreement concluded on the 24th April last still consider that discussion of specific post-war prices would be premature and see serious disadvantage in any actual disclosure of the next contract price with Canada or any undertaking to disclose that price. They realise that the United States Government could call for this information through the Combined Food Board if they attached sufficient importance to it, but it is considered that in the latter event the U.S. Government would be able to make only limited use of the information, whereas any disclosure to the Executive Committee of the Wheat Council would, in the opinion of the United Kingdom Government, be tantamount to publication.

The United Kingdom Government feel that they themselves are confronted with a serious risk that publication of the price would result in their being forced to pay higher prices for imported wheat and flour. There would undoubtedly be pressure for higher prices from the Argentine and Australia. They fear moreover that there might be pressure on the Canadian Government also from Western Canadian farmers for a raising of the price at the next contract negotiations.

Further it may indeed be found that, although the present request was made by the U.S. chairman of the Executive Committee of the Wheat Council, the United States Government have not realised the dangers of forcing the issue of the post-war wheat price at a time when the farm bloc in the U.S. are renewing their agitation to drive up parity prices.

The United Kingdom Government feel that the subject should be examined jointly with the Canadian Government with a view to reaching an agreed policy before discussion is resumed in Washington. I understand that the next meeting of the Wheat Council will take place in January, and in the circumstances I should be very grateful if the Canadian Government could consider this matter at their earliest convenience and afford an opportunity of discussing it with this Office.

Yours sincerely,

⁴¹ A similar letter was sent to the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Council confidentially of the price of the next contract for the bulk purchase of wheat by the United Kingdom from Canada. It appears from this letter that the United Kingdom Government would be even more reluctant to disclose the contract price now than it was at the time of the earlier letter of June the 24th, a copy of which is enclosed for reference. It also appears that the United Kingdom would like to act in this matter jointly with the Canadian Government, although the letter of December the 28th does not, like the letter of June the 24th,[†] go so far as to leave the ultimate decision in the hands of the Canadian Government.

The letter ends with a request that an opportunity should be given for discussing this matter and before arranging a meeting between the United Kingdom representatives and a member of the Department of External Affairs, I hope that I may have an expression of your views on the advisability of acting jointly with the United Kingdom in resisting the pressure from the United States Chairman of the International Wheat Council for disclosure of a contract price for the bulk purchase of wheat.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have your letter of December 29th, regarding a request from the United States Chairman of the International Wheat Council that the Canadian and United Kingdom Governments should undertake to inform the Council confidentially of the price of the next contract for the bulk purchase of wheat by the United Kingdom from Canada.

I gather that this request is made on the ground that knowledge of the price would facilitate the negotiation of the basic minimum and maximum prices applicable during the interim period following the end of hostilities in place of the present arrangement applying to latest Canada/United Kingdom prices in the first six months of that period. This does not seem to me to be a valid reason for revealing the price, as I understood that the reference to the latest Canada/United Kingdom contract in the Memorandum of Agreement was intended as a temporary device to prevent a collapse of price in the immediate post-war period if it had not been possible to reach finality under Article V of the Draft Agreement before close of hostilities.

Far from facilitating negotiations, I am inclined to think that knowledge of current Canada/United Kingdom prices, which reflect wartime considerations and the existing commercial and financial relations between the two countries, might actually prove to be a distorting influence in the negotiation of post-war basic maximum and minimum prices under Article V of the Draft Agreement.

I have always felt that the reference in the Agreement to the Canada/United Kingdom contract was most unfortunate and indeed positively dangerous, and this latest development confirms my fears. If the price can be kept secret until the end of the war, it may be possible to maintain our negotiations with the British Government on a strictly commercial basis, but if the price under the next contract is revealed even in confidence to the members of the International Wheat Council, I am by no means confident that we will be able to resist the pressures that are certain to arise.

I would, therefore, strongly advise that Canada join with the United Kingdom in resisting the United States Chairman's request.

Yours very truly,

W. C. CLARK

IMMEDIATE. SECRET.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

The Executive Committee of the International Wheat Council has prepared for discussion by the Council at a meeting in Washington on the 28th January a report on the question of assuring price stability after the cessation of hostilities for the balance of a two-year interim period after the initial six months. The report points out that under the terms of the present Agreement the Council may —

(a) rely for the first six months of the interim period on the "last price negotiated by the United Kingdom for a bulk purchase of wheat from the principal country of supply", and negotiate under Article V of the Draft Convention during that six months prices for the remaining part of the interim period; or

(b) negotiate under Article V some time prior to the cessation of hostilities prices which would rule during the entire interim period. But the report points out further that if neither alternative were acceptable a third course would be open viz., the Council may;

(c) recommend that paragraph 6(7) of the Memorandum of Agreement be amended to provide in the absence of unanimously agreed prices under Article V, for ad hoc arrangements assuring price stability for the two years following the cessation of hostilities.

2. The report suggests that if the Council decided to adopt alternative (a), the Executive Committee should be instructed to consider the possibility of preparatory work being undertaken with a view to mitigating the objections to this alternative, viz., that the six-months' time limit is a much shorter period than experience in normal times has shown to be necessary to get unanimous agreement upon matters not more difficult, and that in the absence of completed price arrangements it will be difficult to get the required unanimous agreement within six months after the cessation of hostilities for the date upon which the control of production, stocks and exports provided for in Articles II, III, and IV of Draft Convention is to come into force. The report also suggests that if the Council decided to adopt alternative (b), it might instruct the Committee to prepare comprehensive data, including alternative draft schemes for submission to the Council at its August meeting.

3. The United Kingdom Government have under urgent consideration the instructions to be sent to their representatives on the Council as to the line which they should take on this question. Certain informal discussions have already taken place in Ottawa between United Kingdom and Canadian officials, and the United Kingdom Government would greatly value a further expression of the views of the Canadian authorities in the light of the Executive Committee's report which they are no doubt studying and of the résumé given in the following paragraphs of this letter of the reasons which lead the United Kingdom Government to maintain their view that discussion of specific post-war prices is premature at the present time.

4. In the view of the United Kingdom Government, the present Ministry of Food contract price (on a basis of 90 Canadian cents per bushel for No. 1 Manitoba in store Fort William plus storage costs) is, and for the interim period would be reasonable. It must no doubt be subject to review in the event of radical changes in the general level of prices and costs, but the United Kingdom Government hope that such will not occur, and they expect that in accordance with what they understand to be their present policy the Canadian controls will prevent it.

5. In last year's wheat discussions at Washington proposals put forward on behalf of the exporting countries took the form of formulae providing for the price of wheat to move in accordance with variations in the general level of prices in such a way as to involve a price being fixed materially in excess of the present Ministry of Food contract price. The United Kingdom Government see no reason to suppose that the situation would be different if the question of prices were reopened at the forthcoming Wheat Council and they adhere to the line they took last year that in these circumstances they should avoid discussions about specific prices at the Council since these would almost certainly become difficult and embarrassing.

6. They also think that any attempt to fix prices by means of a formula is undesirable. Anyhow it would seem premature to attempt to devise a formula to apply to post-war conditions which are unforeseeable.

7. One factor prominently in their minds when the United Kingdom Government opposed the inclusion of a definite price formula in the Wheat Agreement was the effect such a provision would have upon the Governments and peoples of enemy-occupied territories. Any understanding as to price reached between the wheat exporting countries and the United Kingdom (as the sole importing country that is a party to the Agreement) would have to bear the critical scrutiny of the Allies whom the United Kingdom would in effect be committing to pay that price after the war. Already the Agreement has been used by Axis propagandists to suggest that the United Kingdom has committed Europe in this way. The higher the price agreed the greater would be the criticism that would be levelled against the United Kingdom. It might therefore be necessary for the United Kingdom Government to take unofficial soundings of the Allies before committing themselves to any concrete price proposal.

8. The United Kingdom Government therefore find it difficult to see any alternative to standing on the interim price provisions of paragraph 6 of the Memorandum of Agreement. They have considered instructing their representatives to agree to an extension of the period from six months to two years, which, in view of paragraph 4 above they would think satisfactory if there were general agreement. They recognise however that this might involve disclosure of the present Ministry of Food price. Moreover they could not make such an offer in good faith unless bulk purchase contracts with Canada continued to be freely negotiated and pending a decision regarding the future financial relationship between the United Kingdom and Canada it is clearly not possible to say on what basis future contracts for the supply of Canadian wheat would be made. Their uncertainty on this subject disposes the United Kingdom Government to prefer that, if possible, the whole question of the post-war price of wheat should be postponed until the next meeting of the International Wheat Council.

9. Relying therefore upon —

(I) The views expressed in paragraph 4 above about the present Ministry of Food price;

(II) Their conviction that any proposals based upon formulae would not yield reasonable results;

(III) Their anxiety to avoid contentious discussions about specific prices;

(IV) Their assessment of the propaganda aspects of the matter;

(V) Their uncertainty regarding the arrangements which will govern in future the supply to the United Kingdom of wheat from Canada, the United Kingdom Government are inclined to think that their representatives on the Council should resist any proposal to reopen the provisions of the Draft Convention or Memorandum of Agreement about prices whether at the Council or by way of instructions to the Executive Committee to undertake further studies, and that they should seek the agreement of the Council to postpone consideration of the question of price until the following meeting. The United Kingdom Government fear however that unless they have the support of the Canadian Government such a proposal might be represented as procrastination. For this among other reasons I have been instructed to place before the Canadian Government the foregoing statement of the views of the United Kingdom Government and to say that the United Kingdom Government would be most grateful if they could be favoured with an expression of the views of the Canadian Government on the whole question before instructions are sent to the United Kingdom representatives in Washington.

10. Since the International Wheat Council is to meet on the 28th January, you will appreciate that the matter is one of considerable urgency and I shall be very grateful for an early reply to this letter. If you feel that a talk would be useful with yourself or with others concerned I am at your service at any time.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. MacDonald,

I am referring to your letter of January 19th, concerning the question of reopening the price provisions of the Draft Convention or Memorandum of Agreement (Wheat) at the meeting of the International Wheat Council to be held in Washington, January 28th.

When the report of the Executive Committee on this matter is discussed by the Council, the representatives of the United Kingdom will no doubt express the views of your Government as outlined in your letter. Under the instructions given by the Canadian Government the Canadian representatives would not press the United Kingdom to alter its position.

I wish to refer also to the question concerning the disclosure to the Council of the price of the next contract for the bulk purchase of wheat by the United Kingdom from Canada. If the discussion regarding the post-war price of wheat is postponed the Canadian Government feel that the disclosure of the next contract price would, aside from other considerations, serve no desirable purpose. Whenever the discussion of post-war price is resumed this question would have to be considered by the two Government in the light of the situation then existing.

Following for Pearson from Robertson, Begins: Reference your WA-3217 re discussion pending with Appleby. Wilson has consulted McIvor and Biddulph and they advise as follows for your guidance:

1. Immediate uncertainties about trend of wheat prices in North American markets resulting from rapid correction of surplus position make present time a very difficult one for effective progress to be made toward price determination contemplated under price clause of draft convention.

2. At same time Canadian delegation have grave doubts about practicability of present basis, as provided in Memorandum of Agreement, for price determination during first six months after war.

3. Present basis, very reluctantly agreed to by Canadian delegation and only because it facilitated conclusion of agreement, was intended in theory to fix price for first six months at level ruling immediately prior to cessation of hostilities.

4. Method of basing price on last bulk sale very imperfect for accomplishing purpose of paragraph 3. For example, market prices might change substantially between date of last bulk sale and date of armistice.

5. This of utmost importance to Canada because if armistice came within next year or so Canada would be only substantial exporter and the only one of the big four substantially concerned with price. From this standpoint we would welcome removal of present reference to price in Memorandum of Agreement.

6. Canadian delegation are anxious to know attitude of new Argentine government toward Wheat Agreement in general and whether they are willing to respect the terms of an agreement entered into by former government.

7. Canadian delegation are also anxious to know policy of United States Government respecting winter wheat acreage to be sown in 1943.

8. All of the foregoing for your guidance, and whatever you pass on to Appleby should be done on an informal basis, since there has been no opportunity to clear these points with Wheat Committee of Cabinet.

Washington, July 6, 1943

Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: Your EX-2567, July 5th. Appleby, as I expected, brought up at our talk today the question of price discussions at the next meeting of the Wheat Council. He has not yet approached any of the other members on this matter as he wishes to get the Canadian reaction first. He is anxious to know whether we would approve of such discussions at this time; not merely discussions for the establishment of a price mechanism in the existing draft convention which might replace that already in the convention, which, as your telegram indicates, we do not find very satisfactory, but also discussions with a view to agreeing on price figures. Appleby thinks that figures could be agreed on which would be, in the long run, advantageous to Canada, though they might represent immediate disadvantages. I told Appleby that the Cabinet had not yet, of course, had an opportunity to consider this matter, but I gave him informally the information in your telegram as an indication of the views of officials concerned. He is most anxious to hear from us officially as soon as possible. Possibly it might be desirable to have Wilson come to Washington to have a talk with him. Appleby made it clear to me that if we found ourselves unable to discuss price questions at the next meeting, he would not proceed further with the matter. Ends.

Washington, July 10, 1943

Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: Following is letter just received from Appleby referred to in my WA-3411 of today's date[†], on wheat matters. The press release mentioned in the last sentence of his letter was forwarded to you by teletype[†] earlier today, Begins: "Many thanks for your letter of July 6th[†] with its discussion of the tentative views of certain Canadian officials about wheat prices.

"My own view is that our thinking of a year or two ago still is valid. That is to say, that when we were thinking a few years ago that the Wheat Agreement should so operate as to get regularly a somewhat higher price for wheat in the world market than otherwise would be obtained, but on the whole a price fair to both producers and consumers, and one which did not take advantage of special shortages of supply or special gluts of supply, I believe we were thinking along the right lines. Consequently, I believe it should be our effort in coming discussions with regard to the Wheat Agreement to provide for substantially the same kind of price we would have had in mind a year or two ago for the period following the end of hostilities and carrying over beyond the period of shipping shortage as a base from which to adjust prices thereafter. This would mean for exporter countries accepting a lower price during that period than otherwise they would get, in return for getting a higher price in less favorable years.

“I realize that for each country there are political considerations which will prevent its Government from doing simply what appears to be the best thing to do in terms of long-time policy, but I should like to express to you the hope that the Canadian Government will find it possible to go along on lines earlier indicated.

“If Canada should find it possible to do this, I should think it entirely in order and on the constructive side to raise the whole question of price for the whole period I have described above. But if it is the position of the Canadian Government that present market situations are so favorable as to make it impossible now to agree to the kind of price we should have found a year or so ago, then I suppose we shall have to forego discussion of price at the coming meeting of the Wheat Council. I shall appreciate having advice from you as soon as you are in position to give it.

“With respect to the two questions you raised in your letter: I have no reason to think other than that the Argentine Government will go along with its previous commitment in the Wheat Agreement. It may be that within the next few days I may have an opportunity to explore this matter in a way which would not be offensive. As to the policy of the United States Government respecting the winter wheat acreage to be sown in 1943, I enclose for your confidential information copy of a press release[†] which will be issued here within a few days.

“Sincerely yours, Signed Paul H. Appleby” Ends.

Mémorandum

Memorandum

[n.d.]

MEETING BETWEEN MR. PAUL APPLEBY, CHAIRMAN OF THE INTERNATIONAL WHEAT COUNCIL, AND MR. GEORGE MCIVOR AND
DR. C. F. WILSON, ON JULY 20, 1943, AT 3:00 P.M.

RE PRICE PROVISIONS IN THE INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Prior to the above meeting, Mr. L. B. Pearson ascertained through Mr. Twentyman of the United Kingdom delegation that Mr. Noel Hall, the head of the British delegation, had advised Mr. Dean Acheson, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State, that the United Kingdom Government hoped there would be no reference to price on the agenda for the August meeting of the International Wheat Council.

At the meeting with Mr. Appleby, the latter confirmed that the above request had been made. Mr. Appleby expressed some surprise that Mr. Hall had referred the request to the U.S. State Department since the Wheat Council had agreed in January that he as chairman should keep in touch with each of the delegations with a view to determining an appropriate time when negotiations might take place for a price agreement covering the full two-year period after the cessation of hostilities.

MR. APPLEBY explained that prior to receipt of this information he had deduced that the Canadian delegation might be interested in having the existing price provisions altered. Accordingly he had discussed the matter with Mr. Pearson which had led to arrangements for the present meeting.

MR. McIVOR prefaced his remarks by stating they must be informal since there had been no opportunity as yet for presenting the problem to the Wheat Committee of the Cabinet. In confidence he indicated to Mr. Appleby that there were a number of factors developing within the Canadian situation which raised the question whether it would be practicable to continue with an open market. If the market for other reasons should be closed, then the existing price provisions in the agreement would be practicable from a Canadian point of view. On the other hand, if the market remains open, the Canadian Wheat Board may at some time find itself in a position where it would no longer be possible to make bulk sales of futures to the United Kingdom. In the meantime the market might depart materially from the price of the last bulk sale. If the departure were on the up-side, it would be politically impossible for the Canadian Government to make a sharp downward adjustment in prices at the armistice to the level of the last bulk sale which might easily have been made one or two years previously.

MR. APPLEBY admitted the necessity for some change in the price provisions on the assumption that the market remains open. He hoped that by August 26, the date set for the August meeting of the International Wheat Council, there might be some clarification of the latter issue. He went on to deplore the United Kingdom attitude of forestalling any reconsideration of prices now as representing their basic unwillingness to pay a shilling more than must be paid to obtain their wheat supplies. He considered that the United Kingdom had something to gain through the agreement by way of protection against high prices, just as the producing countries hoped to gain protection against low prices. He thought that if an item were placed upon the August agenda which would permit modification — or elimination — of the existing price arrangements in the agreement, the United Kingdom would pay some heed to the possibility of loss of protection against high prices, and therefore might consider it in their best interest to take a more constructive attitude toward negotiation of a range of prices which would last for the full two years. He added that he was now of the opinion that tying prices to a formula would be impracticable and that an actual price range would need to be determined.

MR. WILSON pointed out that it might be impracticable to fix prices for the whole of the two-year period. In plans that had been discussed elsewhere for commodity agreements in the post-war period, the principle of an annual review of prices had been freely admitted.

MR. APPLEBY agreed that whatever range of prices might be negotiated for the two-year period, should be made subject to review at the end of the first year.

MR. MCLIVOR said that providing the United Kingdom an opportunity to discuss the elimination of any reference to price from the agreement would be satisfactory from Canada's viewpoint as a producing country. If the United Kingdom attached any value to having price protection as a consuming country, such an item would serve to bring out their views. On the other hand, if the United Kingdom were interested, as they appeared to be, in avoiding any agreement on prices, the producing countries in reality had nothing to lose by permitting the United Kingdom to escape from a price provision to which they had no desire to give any effect.

Ottawa, August 23, 1943

IMMEDIATE. Following for Pearson from Deutsch, Begins: Re meeting of Wheat Council. The following communication was received today from the Office of the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom. Begins:

1. The United Kingdom authorities have had under consideration the attitude which the United Kingdom representatives on the International Wheat Council should be instructed to adopt in regard to the discussions about the future price of wheat, which are to be reopened at the meeting of the Council on the 26th August next.

2. I have been asked to communicate to you confidentially the substance of the instructions which have now been sent to them as follows: —

“We have hitherto deprecated the reopening of the price question because of the difficulties we have apprehended in reaching agreement on price to apply for an indefinite period ahead in view of the many uncertain factors which are relevant and because we have been anxious to avoid a failure to agree. However, if others wish to make an attempt, while we must defend the interests of the United Kingdom and of other consumers, we are willing to try to reach agreement on prices to producers as well as consumers.

We cannot however hope to formulate definite proposals in time to submit them to the Council meeting this month, particularly in view of the desirability of prior consultation with Canada and Australia. You should therefore at the forthcoming meeting of the Council make a statement on the lines of paragraph (1) above and should propose (or support proposal) that the price question should be referred to the Executive Committee for consideration and for report to a Council meeting to be convened in January or earlier at the Chairman's discretion.

If opportunity occurs you should make it clear that we do not consider that agreement on a price formula would be realisable and that what we contemplate is an attempt to apply Article V of the draft convention or a more similar arrangement under which a basic minimum and maximum price would be fixed as soon as possible by unanimous agreement to hold good until August 1944. The Council would then, and in each subsequent August, fix prices for the year following the meeting and the Executive Committee should, if possible, be given precise terms of reference in this sense.

We feel that the United Kingdom must cover itself against any criticism that it has agreed to prices without consulting those allies whose post-war needs for wheat will be abnormal and that you should at the meeting on 26th August therefore urge that the Soviet and other allied governments be consulted before prices are fixed. We suggest that the Wheat Council itself here should make this approach at such time and through such channels as it thinks appropriate.

We hope that you can arrange that the Executive Committee should not meet before the first week in October so as to give us adequate time for consideration of our position."

3. It is hoped that the Canadian Government will share the view of the United Kingdom Government that having regard to the importance of this question, the whole matter should be referred to the Executive Committee for consideration, and that a reasonable time should be allowed to elapse before the meeting of the Executive Committee so as to give adequate time for consultation and consideration. Ends.

Messrs. Wilson and Biddulph saw the Honourable Mr. Crerar⁴² this morning. Mr. Crerar instructed the Canadian delegates that they should press for the deletion of the following sentence from the Memorandum of Agreement:

"If no determination of prices has been made on the cessation of hostilities, the five countries will, pending such determination but for a period not exceeding six months, maintain as the export price of wheat the last price negotiated by the United Kingdom for a bulk purchase of wheat from the principal country of supply; equivalent f.o.b. prices will be calculated for wheats of the other exporting countries and will be adjusted from time to time to meet substantial changes in freight and exchange rates."

Mr. Crerar also said that if the Canadian delegates are urged to discuss a substitute they should do so but only in a preliminary way. Any substitute proposal would have to be referred back to the Canadian Government. These instructions were given prior to the receipt of the above communication from the British. The Canadian authorities are now considering the implications of the British position.

Reference your WA-4200[†]. Messrs. Biddulph and Wilson agree that the meeting of the Council on Thursday should be gone ahead with and should not be postponed.

Washington, August 28, 1943

Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: Wheat Council concluded its sessions this morning. There was a long and at times somewhat difficult discussion over our proposal to delete the last sentence of paragraph 6 of the memorandum of agreement. We succeeded, however, in having the following resolution accepted by the Council which, I think, should be quite satisfactory:

“The Council took notice of the strong representations of the Canadian Government that the concluding sentence of paragraph 6 of the memorandum of agreement be deleted.

“The Council was of the opinion that that sentence, as interpreted by Minute 5 of the final session of the Washington Wheat Meeting,⁴³ may no longer be effective for the purpose for which it was designed.

“The Council recommends that Governments give earnest consideration to the representations of the Canadian Government with a view to securing either the deletion of the sentence or such substitution or interpretation as may be satisfactory to the Canadian Government at the additional meeting of the Council to be held in October next.”

In price discussions the United Kingdom and United States positions were completely reversed from previous discussions on this subject. The United Kingdom indicated that some price arrangement will probably have to be worked out, while the United States stated that they were not pressing for this now. The reason for this reversal of position is, of course, quite obvious, but underlines the difficulties in including price arrangements in commodity agreements. The Council also passed the following innocuous resolution regarding relief:

“The attention of the Council was called to the obligation of Member Governments to make available wheat or its equivalent for relief in war-stricken and necessitous areas, and to intention expressed in paragraph 4 of the memorandum of agreement that there shall be no delay in the provision of wheat for such purposes. The Council was impressed by difficulties that may arise under certain circumstances, both in delivering expeditiously relief wheat or flour to appropriate ports, and lifting it from these ports. The Council calls the attention of Member Governments to these difficulties and urges that consideration be given to them by Governments concerned.”

Wilson will be returning to Ottawa Monday and will make a full report of the meetings, but I thought you might like to have the above information at once. Ends.

WHEAT

1. Prior to the August meeting of the International Wheat Council, Canada informed the U.K. that at that meeting they intended to propose that the last sentence of paragraph 6 of the Memorandum of Agreement should be deleted. They stated that the underlying reason for this proposal was that they felt that in the present changed conditions a price based on "bulk purchase of wheat" (meaning purchase, off the market, as between the Canadian Wheat Board and the Ministry of Food) will in all probability shortly lose its present meaning. Canada accordingly feels that some new machinery for purchase by the U.K. may be necessary and that thought must be given to this. They said that they had no preconceived views themselves as yet on this subject.

2. At the August meeting it was decided to hold a further meeting in October at which the Canadian proposal will be dealt with and the question of prices will be discussed.

3. In view of the probability that the proceedings at the October meeting will develop into a discussion of the whole price question, the U.K. would like, if possible, to agree with the Canadian Government, before the meeting takes place, on some common policy in regard to price fixing.

4. The U.K. are accordingly wondering whether the Canadians have as yet had opportunity to give further consideration to this problem.

5. The U.K. feels that there would be every advantage in initiating discussion on the subject as soon as possible and, if agreeable, the U.K. Government would wish to be able to arrive at some broad informal understanding with the Canadian Government, covering both the question of the procedure which might be adopted at the October meeting and to know whether the Canadians would agree with the U.K. suggestion, namely that they consider the most fruitful method of procedure under Article V of the convention would be to determine minimum and maximum prices by unanimous agreement to become effective as soon as adopted. The U.K. Government are similarly taking steps to pave the way for a similar exchange of views on this subject with the Australian Government.

Ottawa, September 24, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to the Aide-Mémoire left by Mr. Munro on September 17th⁴⁴ containing certain proposals regarding a discussion of wheat prices between the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments.

The Canadian Government have considered the proposal that direct discussion take place between the Canadian and United Kingdom authorities on a maximum and minimum range of prices to take effect now under Article V of the Draft Convention. The Canadian Government feel that the United Kingdom proposal to make Article V of the Draft Convention operative during the war was not what was generally contemplated under the Agreement which envisaged a price agreement to be operative in the post-war period. Further, the Canadian Government have concluded that it would be impossible to set minimum and maximum prices which would look reasonable to anyone under the existing circumstances. Accordingly, the Canadian Government do not consider that direct discussions, with a view to reaching agreement on maximum and minimum prices to take effect now under Article V of Draft Convention, can profitably be undertaken at the present time.

My dear Mr. Robertson,

May I refer to my letter to you of the 3rd November[†] and to subsequent conversations which we have had on the subject of the International Wheat Agreement and the meeting of the Wheat Council in January?

⁴⁴ Voir le document précédent.

⁴⁴ See preceding document.

About two weeks ago I saw Mr. McIvor at his invitation when he was in Ottawa and he confirmed what you had previously told me, that he could not make a visit to the United Kingdom in any case before the middle of January. I reported this to the United Kingdom authorities and have now had a telegram from them in which they again welcome the prospect of an early visit from Mr. McIvor. They recognize, however, the preoccupations which make it difficult for him to leave Canada; and they feel indeed that, in view of the high importance attached to rapid progress on the part of the Cereal Committee of the Combined Food Board, of which it is understood Mr. McIvor may be nominated Chairman,⁴⁵ the need for him to carry out the essential preliminary work of that Committee may make it necessary to defer till early February any visit to the United Kingdom.

At the same time they attach none the less importance to having early discussions regarding questions arising out of the Wheat Agreement and they are hoping that Mr. McIvor or anyone accompanying him may have the necessary authority to discuss these questions whenever he comes.

The United Kingdom authorities do not want to press the Canadian Government for decisions before they can be ready, but the questions on which they would be particularly glad to learn the Canadian Government's views include the operation of Part V of the Wheat Agreement and the suggested modification, interpretation, or deletion of the concluding sentence of paragraph 6 of the Memorandum of Agreement. It is felt that you may find it useful to have the provisional views of the United Kingdom authorities on these points and I may therefore say that, in view of the general situation, they would regard it as unfortunate if no progress were made on price questions under the Agreement before the meeting of the Council in August. The further course of prices, particularly in the United States, may make satisfactory agreement more difficult the longer it is delayed. These considerations would suggest the desirability of an early attempt to operate Part V of the Agreement or alternatively to fix minimum and maximum prices to come into operation only on the cessation of hostilities, but subject to review each August subsequent to fixing. As regards the concluding sentence of paragraph 6 of the Memorandum of Agreement, the provisional view of the United Kingdom authorities is that they agree to its deletion, but that they cannot suggest any alternative procedure other than that which I have mentioned above.

The question of what can be done at the meeting of the Wheat Council in January still remains. The postponement of Mr. McIvor's visit to the United Kingdom would preclude the discussions with him which the United Kingdom authorities were hoping so much to have had before the Council meets, although it is realized that in any case the Canadian authorities may not be ready by the time that the Council meets to discuss these questions. I should be very grateful if you could let me have any views on this point.

Yours sincerely,

PATRICK DUFF

PARTIE 5/PART 5
CONFÉRENCE INTERNATIONALE SUR LA PÊCHE INTERNATIONAL FISHERIES CONFERENCE

793.

DEA/5134-A-40

Le secrétaire aux Dominions au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
Dominions Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs

London, June 25, 1943

Sir,

His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom have had under review the existing international arrangements for the policing of fisheries and the protection of immature fish.

2. At an international conference held in London in 1937, a Convention was signed on behalf of the Governments of ten European countries for the regulation of meshes of fishing nets and the size limits of fish. (See Mr. MacDonald's Circular despatch No. A 10 of 20th July 1937)[†]. This Convention, which applies to fisheries in the North Atlantic and dependent seas, excluding the Mediterranean and Baltic Seas, though prevented from coming formally into operation was in fact enforced by a number of the signatory Governments up to the outbreak of the war.

3. The policing of fisheries in certain areas of the waters to which the above-mentioned Convention was intended to apply is at present regulated by a number of international treaties including, in chronological order —

(1) A convention (usually known as the English Channel Convention) concluded between the United Kingdom and France in 1839, with the Regulations of 1843, amended by the Agreement of the 20th December 1928 relating to the fishery in the neighbourhood of the Channel Islands.

(2) The North Sea Fisheries Convention of 1882 between the United Kingdom, Germany, Belgium, Denmark, France and the Netherlands, dealing with the policing of fisheries in the North Sea area, and

(3) The Faroe Islands and Iceland Convention of 1901 between the United Kingdom and Denmark for the policing of fisheries in the neighbourhood of those islands.

4. The two last named Conventions contain certain provisions in common, notably, those (a) limiting exclusive fishery rights in coastal waters to 3 nautical miles from the coast, calculated in the case of bays by a straight line drawn across the entrance at the first point nearest to the entrance where the width does not exceed 10 miles, (b) regulating the marking of fishing boats and gear, their movements when on the fishing grounds and the use of lights and signals (c) empowering naval vessels of the contracting Powers to police the fisheries and to establish contraventions of the conventions.

5. Some of these provisions, on the other hand, are now out of date, and movements had already been instituted before the war, not only to bring the conventions up to date, but also to extend their scope both as regards the areas covered by the conventions and the number of countries participating in them.

6. That such an extension is desirable is the view of the United Kingdom Government as the result of their experience at the end of the war of 1914-1918. During that period many of the most prolific fishing grounds had been closed to fishing, and, after a period during which the fishing grounds were grossly over-fished, the tendency of the fishing fleets to seek new and profitable grounds further and further afield, outside the limits of the existing measures of police led to a series of disputes which did much to impair the good relations between the Powers concerned. The United Kingdom Government consider that it is of the utmost importance that a repetition of the experience of the last post-war period in the fishing industry should be prevented, and that a foundation should be laid in advance for co-operation between the interested Governments in the settlement of more difficult problems of international fishery, by renovating and extending to the utmost the co-operation in this sphere which has already produced encouraging results.

7. With these ends in view, it is proposed that a Conference of representatives of Governments interested in the international instruments referred to in paragraph 3 above should be opened in London at the earliest convenient date, to consider measures for the policing of fisheries in the North Atlantic (outside the limits of exclusive national fisheries) and for the protection of immature fish by the regulation of sizes of meshes of fishing-nets and the size limits of fish, and the Canadian Government are now invited to be represented at the proposed Conference.

8. In order to facilitate the consideration of the subject, the United Kingdom Government have caused to be prepared, in purely tentative form, a draft Convention[†] embodying the principles of the conventions mentioned above, and in transmitting the enclosed copies of the draft Convention, I have the honour to request that the attention of the Canadian Government may be drawn to the following aspects of some of its salient provisions: —

- (1) The draft Convention does not in any way prejudice the views of any of the Contracting Parties concerning the limits of territorial waters;
- (2) The waters to which the Convention is intended to apply are those of the Atlantic and Arctic Oceans north of the Tropic of Cancer lying between 60 west and 80 east longitude but excluding the Mediterranean and Baltic Seas;
- (3) Without prejudice to rights acquired under bilateral agreements between Parties to the Convention relating to fishing within national waters, the standard limit of exclusive national fishery proposed by the draft Convention is one of 3 nautical miles subject to the 10-mile rule, mentioned in paragraph 4 above, in the case of bays.

It is hoped that the Contracting Parties will be prepared to accept these limits in so far as they are unable to obtain recognition of more favourable limits under bilateral agreements with individual Contracting Parties.

- (4) In so far as the draft Convention is intended to apply to territories (as distinct from waters) of the Contracting Parties, it is thought that it should apply to the metropolitan territories of all the Contracting Parties and to such other territories as may be notified in accordance with Article 59. The vessels to which the draft Convention applies will as stated in Article 55, be vessels registered in those territories of the Contracting Parties to which the Convention applies.

(5) Infractions of the Convention may be established by fishery patrol vessels of any of the Contracting Parties but are to be dealt with under the laws of each Contracting Party by the authorities of the latter.

(6) The settlement of claims arising as the result of damage to gear by trawlers is tentatively regulated under Article 18 of the draft Convention, by normal diplomatic procedure or by bilateral arrangements concluded between the interested Parties. The United Kingdom Government realise however that the effect of this provision, in the initial stages of the operation of the Convention would, in the absence of bilateral arrangements, be to limit the legal remedies of fishermen to action in the courts or through the diplomatic channel, and they will welcome any alternative proposals for dealing with claims which may recommend themselves to the Conference.

9. I shall be glad to be informed whether, after having studied the proposals contained in the draft Convention, the Canadian Government are willing to send a Delegation to the proposed Conference.

10. Invitations have also been sent to the Governments of Eire, Newfoundland, Belgium, Iceland, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, the Soviet Union and the United States, and it is hoped that acceptances will reach the United Kingdom Government in time to enable the Conference to be held in London in the coming summer.

I have etc.

Copy of Dominions Office despatch of June 25, 1943, No. 57, on subject of Fisheries Conference has been received with your despatch of the same date, No. 683[†]. We have also received Dominions Office despatch of July 1st, No. 58[†], direct.

Our initial inclination is to accept the invitation to attend the proposed conference. We would, however, like to have additional information on the following points before making a final decision.

(1) Is there reasonable assurance that the U.S.S.R., the U.S.A. and Newfoundland will participate?

(2) Will time be given for adequate preparation, that is until after say the 10th of September?

(3) What kind of national representation is contemplated? Will Ministers participate?

Any information you can obtain on these points will be welcome.

Your telegram No. 1302 of July 24th and my telegram No. 1794 of July 30th[†]. United States will participate in Fisheries Conference. No information available at present regarding U.S.S.R.

It is unlikely that Conference will be able to commence before September 15th, and the general idea is that it might meet for 3 or 4 days when the Conference opens and perhaps adjourn subsequently for some weeks whilst the countries participating are considering the draft of the Convention in the light of what will have transpired at the preliminary meeting.

As regards representation it is not yet possible to say what the status of foreign representatives will be, but so far as United Kingdom representation is concerned it is likely that somebody of Ministerial rank will preside at the Conference or at least over the opening stages.

I will telegraph again when further information is available.

Your telegram of August 13, 1943, No. 1919. Fisheries Conference.

Washington informs us that the British Embassy and the State Department have both been informed that the Conference will not meet until October.

We find some difficulty in understanding the reason for the arrangements for the meetings of the Conference which are outlined in your telegram. The interested countries have now had the draft Convention before them for some weeks. It could hardly seem reasonable to send officials from Ottawa and Washington to meet in London for a brief discussion of the Convention to be followed by an adjournment of "some weeks". Surely it would be possible, if the Conference does not meet until October, to continue discussions until some reasonably definite conclusions are reached. We shall have to reconsider the whole question of our representation if the programme described in your telegram is adopted. We have reason to believe that the United States government shares our concern.

London, September 3, 1943

Your telegrams Nos. 1444, August 14th, and 1554, September 2nd[†].

Dominions Office have now replied to your enquiries which they referred to Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries. The following is the substance of the latter's reply, Begins:

"We cannot help feeling that there has been some misunderstanding about the object and effect of these proposals. We, in the United Kingdom, have no means of judging at the present time whether Canada will, in the end, be a party to the Convention, for, while it is true that the area to which the Convention is proposed to apply extends a considerable way across the Atlantic, it is by no means certain that this area will not be altered and confined more to European waters as the discussions proceed. In any event the proposals, which are based on existing Conventions, will be essentially European, and for that reason the Ministry cannot foresee that countries which are at present either ruled by quisling Governments or are directly under the heel of Germany can be expected to sign a new Convention until after the war is over.

In these circumstances it does not seem possible that the matters to be discussed at the Conference can be settled at it, as there must of necessity be some considerable adjournment to enable the Convention, in draft, to be thoroughly discussed by the European countries who are likely to be most affected, and until we are able to form some conclusion as to what amendments to the draft are likely to be necessary.

There is another point. As you know the Norwegians are not parties to the existing fishing Conventions for the reason that they have never been willing to recognise the 3-mile limit for fishing purposes. The Norwegian authorities here have made it pretty clear that they will want to work out their own particular form of agreement on the lines of the talks between the United Kingdom and Norwegian Governments just before the war and it is probable that these preliminary talks will be held in advance of the main Convention discussions.

Again, we have heard nothing yet from Russia, in response to our inquiries whether they wish to take part, but they also are a country which claims exceptional limits for fishery purposes.

In all these circumstances you will appreciate that it is difficult for us to give at this precise moment adequate guidance on the point whether the Canadian Government should send officials from Ottawa and the Americans from Washington, for the Convention, and it would seem to have been more natural that some Canadian (or American) representative at present in London, e.g., of the High Commissioner's Office, might attend the preliminary Conference to hold a watching brief on behalf of his Government, and that the question of sending any definite delegation might well be postponed until we are ready after the war to sign the Convention. By this time it will be much clearer to everybody whether Canada and America are sufficiently interested to wish to be in the Convention or not." Ends.

It is not yet possible to give exact date for opening of the preliminary discussions but it is likely to be some time in October. As soon as the actual date is known to me I will telegraph again.

Ottawa, September 16, 1943

With reference to your telegrams of September 3 and September 13, 1943, Nos. 2117 and 2200[†]. Fisheries Conference.

1. We have been giving a good deal of thought to the proposed Conference and set out below a summary of our views with regard to the general problems involved. These you may communicate to the interested authorities in London.

2. First, with regard to the suggestion of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries that there appears to be a misunderstanding in Ottawa about the purpose and scope of the Conference. If we have misinterpreted the British invitation we are not alone in so doing as Washington shared our understanding of what was involved. The original proposal as described in the Dominions Office despatch of June 25, 1943, No. 57 and as summarized in your telegram of June 25, 1943, No. 1421[†], was for a conference "to bring up to date and also to extend the scope" of certain named fisheries conventions. The extension referred to brought into the scope of the conventions all the major fisheries on the North Atlantic coast and included even a considerable part of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The draft convention which accompanied the Dominions Office invitation made it clear that the proposed regulations would apply to the most important of our Atlantic fisheries and would place wide powers in the hands of a body upon which neither the United States nor Canada is represented. It is not, I think, surprising that the Americans and ourselves felt it advisable to accept the British invitation to be represented at a Conference of this nature and scope.

3. After considering the communication from the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries which was quoted in your telegram No. 2117 we were in some doubt as to the course to pursue. There are some parts of the British draft convention which would require amendment to make them acceptable to the Americans and ourselves (and I assume to Newfoundland also) and with this end in view we have been doing some tentative redrafting which would provide for the establishment of a special regime for the Northwest Atlantic fisheries within the framework of the general scheme as envisaged in London. We have now talked informally with the Americans about this and are about to send them a copy of our suggestions. We are also hoping to have an early discussion with Newfoundland and will then send our proposals to London as far in advance of the Conference as possible.

4. We are not altogether happy about the proposal that the Conference should meet for about one week and then adjourn for several weeks while the governments concerned examine the results of the initial exchange of views. As all the countries involved have now had the text of the Convention before them for some time and as each will presumably be represented at London by competent officials and experts it would seem to be feasible to envisage a programme which would keep the Conference in session until at least informal agreement has been reached between the participating countries. This would be particularly useful from the standpoint of Canada, Newfoundland and the United States as the distances and time involved in sending representatives to two conferences would be a matter of some importance.

5. Our present tentative plan is to send Keenleyside and Finn with probably two technical experts from Ottawa, and to ask you to supply a Secretary for the delegation from Canada House. The United States is thinking in terms of about four delegates and six or seven technical advisers.

6. We hope to be able to send you a detailed statement of our proposed amendments and additions to the draft Convention some time in the next fortnight. In the meanwhile we shall be glad to receive any further information that you may be able to obtain in regard to the Conference.

CONFIDENTIAL. Reference to my telegram of September 16th, 1943, No. 1636. Fisheries Conference.

1. We are informed that the United States State Department has received from the United States Embassy in London a report of a conversation with the principal assistant secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries in which it had been indicated that it would not make very much difference whether Canada and the United States were or were not represented at the Conference. It was suggested that the Western boundary of the area to be covered by the proposed Convention might be shifted eastward thus making the deliberations of the Conference of less importance to North American countries. The opinion was also expressed that certain of the European countries may not be in any position to sign a Convention until after the war.

2. I should be grateful if you could find out from the United Kingdom authorities just what their views are as to the scope and agenda of the Conference so that the Canadian Government can decide whether it should be represented at it.

London, September 26, 1943

IMMEDIATE. CONFIDENTIAL. Your telegram No. 1657 of September 20th. The following memorandum has been furnished by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, Begins: It is clear that there has been some misunderstanding with regard to the purport of the proposed Fisheries Convention and this is probably due to the fact that the original letter of invitation as issued to the United States, Canadian and Newfoundland Governments did not contain sufficient information, having regard to the fact that they were not parties to any of the existing Conventions which the present Convention is intended to replace and were not, therefore, familiar with their purpose or their provisions. There are three points upon which further information appears to be desirable.

First. As regards the necessity for a preliminary Conference and an adjournment before any Convention can be signed, it is still felt that it would be impossible to ask any foreign Government which is not exercising jurisdiction in its own territory to sign any Convention, even though it would be subject to subsequent ratification by its Parliament, until the end of the war, or at least until there is clear indication that Germany is likely shortly to be eliminated. Furthermore, the United Kingdom Government is certainly not in a position to sign any Convention until, at all events, it has had an opportunity of consulting, in greater detail than has been up to the present possible, its own industry on the subject, and it was not proposing to carry this consultation any further until it was in a position to know the general reaction to the present draft as the result of the meetings of the opening Conference. Detailed consultation with the industry might have led to the premature disclosure of information which would have proved embarrassing to the foreign Governments now in this country. In these circumstances, therefore, there is no necessity for any country to send representatives with plenipotentiary powers as there will be nothing for them to sign at the conclusion of the meetings of the coming exploratory Conference. Secondly. As regards the area to which the Convention is to apply the existing three Conventions dealing with policing are essentially European in character and they apply substantially to European waters. It would have been sufficient, so far as this aspect of the Convention is concerned, to adopt a more or less similar limitation of area. It was proposed, however, to include in the new Convention the provisions of the 1937 International Agreement affecting the size of fish and the size of the mesh of nets. This Agreement never came into force because its operation was contingent upon its ratification by all the signatory countries, and upon the outbreak of war three countries had not ratified. The western limit to which this latter Agreement applied was 80 degrees west longitude and the southern limit was the equator. These wide limits were originally fixed in order to be quite sure of embracing all the waters which might be visited by British fishing vessels or those of the other High Contracting Parties. It was, however, considered that these limits, if adopted in the present Convention, would lead to difficulties, as it might then be necessary to invite the participation of countries like Brazil, who have no possible interest in the matter. It was, therefore, decided to adopt tentatively the limits shown in the draft Convention as circulated, viz., 60 degrees west longitude on the west and the Tropic of Cancer on the south, as there is little likelihood of European fishing vessels extending their range beyond these limits. It was the adoption of those limits, which embrace waters off Canada and Newfoundland, which made it necessary to bring the proposals to the notice of those countries, in order that they might be aware of what was proposed and might have an opportunity to participate, if they so desired. It should, however, have been made more clear to them that the primary object of the Convention was to cover the operations of European fishing vessels and that, while it was thought that Canada and Newfoundland, who fished in some of the waters, would be interested in the proposals and might wish to participate in the Agreement, it was not an essential part of the proposals to try to bring them in. This is the position even with the limits of the area shown in the present draft Convention. It is quite possible, however, that in the course of the meetings of the Conference it might be suggested that the western limit should be moved eastwards, say, to 40 degrees west longitude, in which case neither Canada nor Newfoundland (nor the United States of America) would have any direct interest in the Convention. In these circumstances, therefore, there would not seem to be any necessity for Canada or Newfoundland to send a number of delegates to the Conference, but rather only an observer, unless Canada is anxious to see the western limit left at 60 degrees West longitude because they wish to participate in the Convention.

Thirdly. Perhaps the most difficult feature emerging from the coming Conference arises from the fact that certain countries are known to claim exclusive fishery limits in excess of the usual three marine miles. In order to bring them into the Convention it will be necessary for them to have separate Agreements with those countries who fish in their waters, the basis of which will be a recognition of their particular claims. This arose before the war, more particularly in the case of Norway, and, while the Conference is going on and thereafter, conversations will have to proceed, possibly lasting a considerable time, with those foreign countries who claim special limits. That is likely to create a difficult problem and for this reason alone it will be quite impossible for the Convention to be signed at the conclusion of the proposed inaugural Conference. Norway is certainly unlikely at any time to sign the main Convention unless upon the same day they are able to sign a separate Agreement with all the countries concerned (mainly Great Britain) accepting their special claims. The conversations to be carried out with these particular countries will be quite independent of the main Conference. In the case of Norway they will represent a resumption of conversations started in 1938 and broken off at the outbreak of war. Ends.

I am verbally informed [it is] proposed commence Conference about October 12th.

THE LONDON FISHERIES CONFERENCE

1. You will recall that Canada has been invited by the United Kingdom Government to attend a Fisheries Conference in London which is to meet about October 12. The United Kingdom has also submitted a draft Convention which will be considered by the Conference. Other countries invited and which have intimated their intention to attend are Belgium, Denmark, Iceland, the Netherlands, Newfoundland, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Sweden and the United States.

2. The purposes of the Conference are:

(a) to bring up to date various fisheries agreements relating to policing of fishing grounds, rules of navigation for fishing vessels, and the prevention of disputes between fishermen of different countries; and

(b) with a view to conservation of fisheries, to endeavour to reach agreement on the minimum size of mesh in nets used in trawler fishing and minimum size of fish which may be legally caught and marketed.

3. Canada's interests are involved for the following reasons:

(a) the proposed western boundary for the convention is 60° west longitude, which cuts across the western Atlantic fishing grounds on a north-south line running roughly through Sable Island and the eastern tip of Cape Breton and the Gulf of St. Lawrence; and

(b) it is proposed that the legal minimum size of mesh and of fish caught may be changed by resolution of the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea, a European body on which Canada and other American fishing countries are not represented.

4. Preliminary discussions have been held with United States and Newfoundland officials concerned with the administration of fisheries, and they generally agree that although the proposed convention is by no means completely satisfactory, a general fisheries convention applying to the whole northern Atlantic region is desirable especially in view of the probable increased fishing in waters near North America by European fishing interests after the war.

5. As a result of discussions between the interested Departments here the Minister of Fisheries is proposing to recommend to Council that Canada should be represented at the Conference and that Keenleyside, Dr. Finn, Deputy Minister of Fisheries, and Dr. A.W.H. Needler, Director Biological Station, St. Andrews, New Brunswick, should constitute the Canadian delegation.

6. If this proposal is approved it is suggested that the policy to be followed at the Conference should be along the following lines:

(a) to endeavour to have the western boundary extended westward to include all North Atlantic high seas fisheries in order to prevent European interests from depleting fisheries near the Canadian coasts by unsound practices;

(b) to endeavour to have adopted in the Convention a higher legal minimum size of mesh for trawling on the fishing grounds off the North American coast than that proposed in the United Kingdom draft.

(c) to endeavour to have recognized by the Convention that the fishing grounds of the western Atlantic constitute a special fisheries area in which North American fishing countries have a paramount interest and in which special arrangements may be made for administering the Convention and strengthening the measures of conservation;

(d) in the event of the European members of the Convention refusing to recognize the special interests of North American countries in the conservation of the fisheries off their coasts, it may be desirable to insist that these areas be excluded from the convention and to intimate that North American countries favour special arrangements between countries immediately concerned for the conservation of fisheries in these areas.

7. As the Conference is to commence on or about October 12, it will be necessary to make immediate arrangements if Canada is to be represented. We should also give an early indication of our intentions to the United States and Newfoundland, with whom we have been discussing the whole problem.

Please pass following to Sturgeon from Keenleyside, Begins: Referring to the London Fisheries Conference. Our latest advice from London is similar to that contained in your telegram shown to us in Montreal⁴⁶, although somewhat less discouraging.⁴⁷

We feel that it is desirable to obtain a convention in which European states will recognize restrictions on the methods of fishing in the western Atlantic and that the possibility of securing this through the proposed convention, even if remote, should not be passed over. After careful consideration we have recommended to the Government that Canada be represented at London. We have also recommended the following as the appropriate line of policy to be followed by our representatives:

(a) To endeavour to have the western boundary extended westward to include all North Atlantic high seas fisheries in order to prevent European interests from depleting fisheries near the North American coasts by unsound practices;

(b) to endeavour to have adopted in the Convention a higher legal minimum size of mesh for trawling on the fishing grounds off the North American coast than that proposed in the United Kingdom draft;

(c) to endeavour to have recognized by the Convention that the fishing grounds of the western Atlantic constitute a special fisheries area in which North American fishing countries have a paramount interest and in which special arrangements may be made for administering the Convention and strengthening measures of conservation;

(d) in the event of the European members of the Convention refusing to recognize the special interests of North American countries in the conservation of the fisheries off their coasts it may be desirable to insist that these areas be excluded from the Convention and to intimate that North American countries favour special arrangements between countries immediately concerned for the conservation of fisheries in these areas.

It is probable that Finn, Needler and I will be the Canadian representatives.

We think it would be extremely useful for securing favourable action in London if your government were to be represented and to follow in general a similar course of policy. Ends.

Following for Keenleyside from Sturgeon, Begins: Reference to your message of September 29th. It is regretted that in the absence of indication that the British Fishery authorities have materially modified their intentions with regard to the purpose and scope of the London Conference, we would not feel justified in taking an extensive part. As we informed you at Montreal, the British have indicated to us that the Conference is to be limited to matters of primarily European interest, that it appeared undesirable to introduce new matters into the proposed Draft Convention, and that probably ratification would not take place before the end of the war.

In view of the British position, we do not feel warranted in pressing for inclusion of the problems of the Western Atlantic within the scope of the Conference. Even if the British objection to extension of the scope of the Conference should be withdrawn there is a serious question, in the light of information we now have, that the Conference affords the best occasion to deal with the regulatory problems of the Western Atlantic Fisheries. We feel that insistence upon inclusion of American waters in a European Convention might prove an undesirable precedent, and that it might have the effect of tying our hands with respect to possible necessary interim action.

We believe it would be preferable to exclude the Western Atlantic Fisheries from the Convention, as the British appear to desire, and that their regulation and conservation might best be effected by the countries immediately concerned. We are hopeful that a common position can be maintained with regard to these matters and that your proposals⁴⁸, which we considered at the Montreal meeting, might ultimately be adapted to this purpose. However, we have not had sufficient time here to give these proposals the thorough consideration they should receive, especially in relation to possible future policy. We should therefore like opportunity for further study of the proposals and shall expect to send you the Department's views as soon thereafter as possible.

We plan to be represented at the Conference by one or more observers from the Embassy, although we appreciate that on the part of Canada the situation may warrant a somewhat different representation. We are informing the British of our decision, and are also suggesting that for the purposes of their Draft Convention forty degrees west longitude appears to us an appropriate western limit.

I am sorry I shall not be in London with you. Ends.

LONDON FISHERIES CONFERENCE

1. This afternoon I had another long discussion on the telephone with Hickerson and Sturgeon in Washington. As a result of our conversation yesterday the State Department is now designating two "observers" to attend the Conference. They are Commander Richmond of the United States Coast Guard, a fisheries specialist, and Mr. John Allison, Second Secretary and Consul, United States Embassy London, who has also considerable experience in this field. (Mr. Allison is an old friend of mine). These two representatives are being instructed to participate in the Conference discussions and to keep "in intimate contact" with the Canadian delegation. They will apparently be full members of the Conference except that they will not sign any agreement and will be called "observers".

2. The United States has not, however, changed its new attitude of preferring a separate agreement for the Northwest Atlantic. I pointed out that this might leave Washington in an awkward spot if the Conference should decide to agree to our proposal that the Convention cover western waters but allow the establishment of a special and additional regime therein. This was recognized but Hickerson and Sturgeon felt that there was little likelihood of the European countries accepting such a proposal. With this I agree. Our real difference is that Canada thinks the effort at wider agreement should be made; the U.S.A. is now not willing to make an official effort to this end. The Department of Fisheries is in agreement with External Affairs in feeling

- (a) that the wider the boundaries of agreement can be set the better, and
- (b) that we will be in a much stronger position to act on our own if first we have offered general cooperation.

3. The Americans expressed themselves as being upset over our divergence in tactics and policy. They expressed the hope that this divergence would not interfere with close and friendly cooperation in fisheries matters in the future. I assured them that so far as we were concerned, and in spite of our regret at their changed views in regard to the North Atlantic, we would expect to cooperate with them in solving problems of mutual interest.

4. Sturgeon informed me that the United States would shortly be making proposals to us relating to the machinery of cooperation in the field of fisheries. I imagine that this will have to do with the organization and composition of the Fisheries Advisory Committee.

3. The objectives assigned to the Canadian representatives were:

A – to obtain agreement on a western boundary for the Convention waters which would include all the major fisheries on the high seas off the eastern coasts of Canada and Newfoundland;

B – to obtain agreement to the principle that countries with special interests in special fishing areas have particular responsibilities in those areas and may, by mutual agreement, add to the regulations provided by the London Convention additional regulations applicable to such areas;

C – to obtain agreement in principle to the setting up of a special regime for the control of fisheries in that area of the North Atlantic Ocean which is bounded by 40 North Latitude, 40 West Longitude and 75 West Longitude;

D – to obtain agreement on the enlargement of the mesh of nets used for taking cod and haddock in the North-Western Atlantic Ocean from 70mm. to 105 mm.;

E – to obtain such amendments in detail as would serve to make the draft Convention more acceptable from the Canadian point of view.

A list of the amendments to the Draft Convention which were proposed by the Canadian representatives is attached to this Report (Annex "A")[†]. Attached also (Annex B)[†] is a copy of the Final Act of the Conference which includes the text of the Convention as amended.⁵⁰

4. In introducing the major Canadian proposals Mr. Keenleyside made the following statement:

"When it was first proposed that we should attend the Conference, we were in some doubt whether we could contribute anything useful to it or not, particularly when it was indicated that it might be agreed at the Conference that the boundary would be moved from 60 degrees west longitude back to about 40 degrees. However, having had a good deal of experience of co-operation in the field of fisheries on the high seas, particularly in relations with the United States and with Newfoundland, we felt rather strongly that it was desirable to go as far as possible in extending the principle of co-operation over as much of the area of the high seas as possible. We felt, therefore, that if, by coming to the Conference, we could succeed in bringing it about that there would be co-operation over a larger area than there would be if we did not come to the Conference, it would be advisable for us to attend.

⁵⁰ See Great Britain, Final Act of the International Fisheries Conference, London, 22nd October, 1943. Cmd. 6496, 1943.

We are proposing, in substance in the changes that I have outlined . . . that the draft Convention be extended in so far as its western boundary is concerned to 75 degrees west longitude. We make that suggestion, however, with the understanding that in the area bounded by 40 degrees west longitude and 75 degrees west longitude and north of 40 degrees north latitude, it may be possible to set up a special regime in addition to what is provided in the Convention. In other words, we agree with you that the principles of this Convention are desirable. We want to see them extended as far as possible, but in addition we would like to have it understood that those countries that have special interests in the North-Western Atlantic fisheries should not be bound to comply only with the principles of the Convention; that we might put in additional restrictions on fisheries in that area if we can get agreement among all the countries that participate actively in those fisheries; and in this outline . . . we have set out what we consider to be reasonable proposals for a special regime in that special area. We also indicate that if other special areas exist where particular countries have special interests, they, in those areas, should be allowed to set up special regimes also”

In continuing the argument on the following day the Canadian representative said further:

“I think the substance of what we have in mind becomes very clear from the reading of the text itself. Basically our idea is this: we want to see the principle of co-operation extended as widely as possible over the fisheries on the high seas. For that reason we are anxious to have the Convention that we are now considering extended into the waters of the North-Western Atlantic. We are, however, disturbed by the prospect of excessive fishing in those waters at the conclusion of the war, and we are not satisfied that the terms of the present Convention would be adequate to prevent over-fishing in those areas. In consequence we hope that it will be found possible to agree that whereas the Convention does extend over those waters, it will be possible for the countries which have special interests there, if they agree, to draw up additional rules, not weakening the present rules but strengthening them, to govern the fisheries in that area. What we have tried to do . . . is to provide that, within the general framework of the Convention, groups of countries can get together and add additional rules for the governance of fisheries in areas in which they have special interests. I do not know what other areas are likely to be formed but it is possible that countries in the North-Eastern Atlantic might, for example, wish to form a special area at some point in that general region. If that should be done, as far as Canada is concerned we would not expect to take part in the settling of rules for that area; we would not be fishing there and we would have no direct interest in it. On the other hand, we have a very special interest in the area that is mentioned in Article 54A . . . I think that is the basis of our submission, Mr. Chairman, and I do not know that it is necessary to go any further in the discussion of the general principle now. Perhaps if you would be good enough to take it up point by point, if there is no fundamental objection to the proposal itself, we could then discuss the details as they are set out in this proposal.”

5. From an examination of the documents noted in paragraph 3 above it will be observed

A – that the western boundary of the Convention waters was extended to 75 west longitude (see 3-A above);

B – that the Conference recommended to the “immediate and sympathetic consideration of all governments interested” the Canadian proposals referred to in 3-B and 3-C above;

C – that the Conference accepted the Canadian proposal regarding the size of mesh to be used in taking cod and haddock in the North-Western Atlantic (see 3-D above);

D – that on various points of detail Canadian amendments were accepted and that no Canadian proposal was wholly refused.

6. The one unsatisfactory feature of the Conference from the Canadian standpoint was the attitude of the United States. Although it was understood from preliminary conferences with United States representatives that the United States and Canada were united in desiring the westward extension of the boundary of Convention waters so long as this did not preclude the setting up of additional controls in the area of special interest to those countries and to Newfoundland, the United States observers made the following representations to the Conference on October 21st;

“The United States Government has from the outset been interested in the purpose of the conference to develop international measures for the safeguarding of basic food resources represented by the fisheries of the North Atlantic Ocean. The problem of fishery regulation in this general area has therefore been carefully considered on the basis of the British draft convention and explanatory statements supplied by the British authorities in regard to objectives of the convention.

Two specific questions were immediately considered by the United States authorities:

(1) Whether the western boundary of a convention designed primarily to deal with fisheries in the eastern Atlantic should extend as far as 60 degrees west longitude into the western Atlantic, and

(2) Whether in case of such extension westward adequate provision had been made in the convention as to the regulatory requirements of the western Atlantic fisheries.

A further and more fundamental question also arose namely whether it might constitute a sounder and more practical approach to the general problem of regulating North Atlantic fisheries if the fishing areas of the Eastern and Western Atlantic were treated as separate fields.

A proposal has now come before the conference to extend the western boundary of the convention to 75 degrees west longitude thus joining for the purposes of regulation the “eastern and western areas of the North Atlantic”. This is of course a development beyond the original purpose and scope of the conference and the United States Government therefore desires to express the following views:

The United States Government has strong preference for the idea of separate regulatory treatment of the fisheries of the eastern and western Atlantic and believes 40 degrees west longitude would constitute a logical dividing line between the fisheries of the two areas. The following basic reasons for this position are suggested to the conference:

‘The problems of the fisheries vary from sea to sea and from latitude to latitude. The fish population of one sea and of one latitude is different from that of another and even a given species of fish may be found to require protection in one area which it does not require in another. It follows then that fishery problems are so localized as to be of interest only to those nations whose fishermen have access to the localities and fisheries concerned and if and when the necessity for regulation of any of the local fisheries arises it will be a matter for treatment by agreement between the nations interested and between them alone.’

In taking the position outlined above the United States Government does not intend that the established rights of any nation would be disturbed but is simply suggesting that the eastern and western Atlantic should be made the subjects of separate arrangements among the nations whose proximity to or well established or historical interest in the fisheries entitles them to a voice in their regulation”

7. This placed the Canadian delegation in a difficult position and after consultation it was agreed that Mr. Keenleyside would make a statement to the Conference in the following terms:

“There are a number of points made in the United States representations which under other circumstances, I should be glad to examine in detail.

For example, the reference to ‘affected United States fishing interests’ indicates what seems to me to be a misapprehension as to the character of the Convention. No United States fishing interests are affected except that the participating countries agree to place limitations, which do not now exist, on their vessels operating in Convention waters and the western Atlantic.

However, it is not, I think, necessary to discuss the United States paper in detail.

While I greatly regret that the American Authorities have felt it desirable to place on record their objection to the western boundary of the Convention, I trust that the members of the Conference will persist in their adherence to the line 75 West Longitude.

It is, I believe, important that the area of co-operation in fishing, as in every other aspect of international relations, should be extended as widely as may be practicable.

I hope, therefore, that the Conference will leave the western line where it now is and rely on Canada, Newfoundland and the other countries particularly interested in the North-Western Atlantic to see if they cannot convince the authorities of the United States that this boundary is in the American as well as the general interest”.

This statement was strongly supported by Newfoundland and met with the general concurrence of the members of the Conference.

8. The full proceedings of the Conference are on file in the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Fisheries. From these it will be observed that the Canadian representatives took a reasonable degree of participation in the work of the Conference. Dr. Finn represented Canada on the drafting Committee which produced the final text of the Convention. Dr. Finn and Dr. Needler, moreover, took advantage of the fact that the Conference was held in London to discuss technical, administrative and biological questions with the appropriate officials of the Government of the United Kingdom.

9. The members of the Canadian delegation recommend that immediate steps be taken to obtain the concurrence of the United States in the programme outlined in the Canadian proposals referred to in this report, and that arrangements then be made, in consultation with the United States and Newfoundland, for the convening of a special conference in Canada for the purpose of obtaining agreement on the establishment of a North-Western Atlantic Fisheries Organization.

Respectfully submitted,

DESPATCH 1323

Ottawa, November 19, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to enclose two copies of the report of the Canadian delegation to the International Fisheries Conference which was held in London, England, from October 12, 1943 to October 22, 1943.

2. You will observe that whereas the Canadian delegation succeeded in obtaining from the Conference general agreement on the policies which Canada desires to have made effective, an unfortunate division has arisen between Canadian and United States policy. Prior to the London Conference a number of meetings were held by the members of the Canada-United States Fisheries Advisory Committee and it was the unanimous opinion of the Canadian participants in the last meeting which was held in Montreal on September 24th and 25th that the United States officials were in favour of the policy which was subsequently advocated by the Canadian representatives at London. A copy of the minutes of the Montreal meeting[†] is enclosed for your files.

3. As you will see from the last paragraph of the report of the Canadian delegation, it has now been recommended that steps be taken to bring about a reconciliation of Canadian and United States views and that this be followed by the calling of a conference to organize a special fishery regime for the North-western Atlantic in the very near future. As an initial step towards bridging the difference between Canadian and United States policy, Mr. Keenleyside had a conversation with Mr. Hickerson on November 9 at which the latter promised to have the situation reviewed by the State Department as soon as this could be arranged.

4. I shall be very much obliged if you will institute informal enquiries at the State Department with a view to ascertaining what progress is being made as a consequence of Mr. Hickerson's undertaking.

I have etc.

PERSONAL

Ottawa, November 19, 1943

Dear Mike [Pearson],

By concurrent mail we are sending you a despatch on the fisheries situation that has arisen as a result of a sudden and unexpected reversal of policy by the United States in relation to the programme which we thought we had agreed upon for the North Atlantic. At the last meeting of the Fisheries Advisory Committee in Montreal, John Read, Finn (Deputy Minister of Fisheries), MacKay, Feaver and I all thought the Americans were still agreeable to the basic understanding which we had been working on from the time when the London Fisheries Conference was first announced, namely that it would be desirable to have the terms of the London Convention extended as widely as possible, so long as it was agreed that nothing in the Convention would interfere with the right of Canada, the United States, Newfoundland and the other interested countries to establish a special régime superimposed upon the Convention for the additional governance of fisheries in the Northwestern Atlantic.

The United States was represented at the Montreal meeting by Sturgeon and Bevans of the State Department and Dr. Deeson, a technical expert. Either Sturgeon and Bevans were inexact in expression and muddled in their own thinking or else Read, Finn and the rest of us were suddenly bereft of our understanding of the English language. The policy which the United States subsequently pursued was embarrassing to us and was stupid from their own point of view. We got for them in London everything that they could possibly desire, and far more than they or we had originally expected.

However, it is no use concentrating on the past. We must now try to get the Americans worked into the new programme. We want to call a conference in Ottawa to include representatives of all the countries participating in the fisheries of the Northwestern Atlantic to be held early in the new year. The object of the Conference would be to set up a regional organization with the powers described in the draft which we presented to the London Conference. We would like to get this organization working in 1944. We can then fit this scheme into the general Convention when that Convention comes up for final signature at or about the end of the war.

The arguments in favour of having the terms of the general Convention cover waters of the Northwestern Atlantic are briefly as follows:

(a) Any extension of the area of international cooperation in the field of fisheries is desirable.

(b) Without such extension European or other fishermen could enter this area and fish without restrictions of any kind (they could come within three miles of Boston, for example, take fish without paying any attention to even such meagre regulations as are provided by the London Convention).

(c) We can probably get the "signing" Conference in London to agree that fishermen of any signing country who enter the Northwestern Atlantic will agree to abide by the terms of the special regime set up in that area. It would probably be impossible to get any such agreement except through the general convention.

If the United States will not cooperate in this policy, it will mean that they will be playing a lone hand in the Northwestern Atlantic. Newfoundland and Canada will certainly adhere to their present advocacy of the extension of the London Convention waters and the other members of the London Conference will almost certainly agree to the retention of the western boundary as now fixed in the draft Convention. In other words, the result of United States policy will be to destroy the possibility of obtaining exactly the kind of agreement for the governance of the Northwestern Atlantic that they, themselves, have always said they wanted. This should be too big a price for the gratification of pique.

We will be very much obliged if you will take an early opportunity to discuss the situation with Hickerson and urge him as strongly as possible to get the United States to play ball. We have had too long and too much experience in joint cooperation in the field of fisheries to see it destroyed or limited by a stupid development of this kind.

The situation in brief is simply this. We have come to a position which we in Canada like, which some people in Washington apparently dislike. The position, however, is not going to be changed by either sentiment. What we now have to do is to start from that position and work out the best solution we can in our own and in the general interest. That means in this case that the Americans have got to back down or, more properly, that they have to retreat from the position which they suddenly and incomprehensibly adopted post-Montreal.

Yours sincerely,

H. L. KEENLEYSIDE

Ottawa, December 11, 1943

MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATION BETWEEN
MR. NORMAN ROBERTSON AND MR. ATHERTON

I told Mr. Robertson that my Government has from the outset of discussions regarding North Atlantic fisheries wished to proceed in full agreement with the Canadian Government and to this end it had proposed the establishment of and has constantly supported the Fisheries Advisory Committee. I added that certain misunderstandings had arisen prior to the London Conference this autumn and Washington had taken special pains to remove, if possible, the basis of the misunderstanding. I said that additionally it had been made clear to the Canadian Government some days before the departure of the Canadian delegation to London that there had developed a divergence of a fundamental character between the positions of our two governments. I said that it would appear that the Canadian delegation, notwithstanding this knowledge, had taken a course of action in London such that the divergence of opinion between the Canadian Government and the United States Government became public knowledge at the Conference. I told Mr. Robertson that this divergence was, moreover, according to information available, underscored by the action of the Canadian delegation in advising the Conference not to pay too much attention to my Government's position as made by our observer at the Conference.

I then informed Mr. Robertson that, putting aside the previous, if the Canadian Government now has any disposition to achieve an agreement, the American Government for its part remains convinced that such agreement is in the interests of both countries and is therefore at any time prepared to participate in efforts to that end.

I told Mr. Robertson that I had been directed to say that in so far as the North Atlantic fisheries are concerned my Government had given abundant indication that it considered the eastern and western fisheries to be separate with generally unrelated problems of exploitation and regulation. I added that, quite apart, however, from my Government's view in this regard, there was a fundamental reason why it was not prepared to sign an Atlantic fisheries convention at this time. I continued that, as the Canadian authorities were in some measures aware, serious consideration was being given to the establishment of fisheries conservation zones beyond the three-mile limit. If such zones were established it followed that the administration thereof, and most especially the enforcement of regulatory measures, would develop along different lines than would be the case under a general convention. I added that it was, however, of course recognized that in view of the Canadian and Newfoundland interests in the northwest Atlantic fisheries, most careful consideration would necessarily have to be given to all aspects of this possible new development.

I suggested that it would be obvious to the Canadian authorities that if the United States should sign a western Atlantic fisheries convention such action would be incompatible with its interests in the proposed fisheries zones⁵¹. It was therefore, I said, wholly out of the question for my Government to consider participation in such a convention or to consider integrating a Western Atlantic regime with a general Atlantic Convention until studies of the proposed zones had been completed.

I told Mr. Robertson that in taking this position the American authorities did not believe that final settlement of the question need be delayed thereby or that progress in that direction would be impeded. I added that it did not, for instance, appear that technical studies in conjunction with local authorities and fisheries interests had been completed by any of the parties at interest. Nor did it appear that such studies would make it more, rather than less, difficult to reconcile the divergent view of Canada and the United States, assuming that such remains an objective which both Governments hold in common.

I then told Mr. Robertson that it was therefore in this spirit that the American Government had set forth in the memorandum⁵² which I handed him the proposal that a conference of experts be held in the immediate future. We felt that such a conference could do useful preliminary work and throw much light upon implications of the proposed fisheries zones. I added that until an agreed position had been reached between Canada, Newfoundland and the United States as to the conditions under which they proposed to fish in the Western Atlantic it did not appear to my Government that there was any urgent need to call into consultation the five European nations having a minor interest in these fisheries.⁵³ It followed, furthermore, that it was only after an agreed position had been developed with Canadian-Newfoundland-American cooperation as the cornerstone that any broader regime could have meaning or effect. We felt that then and then only would it be necessary to consider integration as between the Western Atlantic regime and the proposed European Convention.

In conclusion, I remarked to Mr. Robertson that the United States fishing interests in the Northwest Atlantic exceeded those of any other country. In our opinion, I added, a satisfactory regulation of Northwestern Atlantic fisheries was desirable but could be achieved only on terms satisfactory to the United States, Canada and Newfoundland as a point of departure before bringing in the interested European countries. I said that my Government was prepared to work toward that objective on a basis of mutual cooperation with the Canadian Government but that my Government was equally prepared to take whatever steps might be necessary to safeguard its interests and those of its nationals in the Northwestern Atlantic if Canada preferred to press a unilateral program for that area.

Mémorandum de la légation des États-Unis
Memorandum by Legation of United States

MEMORANDUM: THE NORTH ATLANTIC FISHERY SITUATION

The United States Government believes that a statement of its position with regard to the proposals made by the Canadian delegation at the International Fishery Conference held in London in October, and with regard to the ensuing situation, may best begin with a repetition of the pertinent part of the statement its observer was instructed to make before the conference in the following language.

“ . . . The United States Government has strong preference for the idea of separate regulatory treatment of the fisheries of the Eastern and Western Atlantic and believes 40 degrees west longitude would constitute a logical dividing line between the fisheries of the two areas. The following basic reasons for this position are suggested to the conference:

“(1) The establishment of 40 degrees west longitude as a dividing line between the two areas would result in all important fishing areas being within either the eastern (European) or western (North American) areas, with the exception of the fisheries of Greenland.

“(2) The fishermen of the countries of the Western Atlantic have not generally fished in waters east of 40 degrees west longitude. Conversely, the fishermen of the countries of the Eastern Atlantic have, with the exception of a few areas, confined their fishing activity to waters east of 40 degrees west longitude.

“(3) The United States authorities regard fishery regulation in the Eastern and Western Atlantic as distinct and in the main unrelated problems.

“(4) Separate regulatory systems would present fewer difficulties both as to formulation and administration than an overall system.

“(5) Should the trend of fishing activity or the development of fishing techniques create an interrelationship between the Eastern and Western Atlantic, this problem might be met by integration of separate regulatory systems.

“With reference to the proposal before the conference to extend convention waters into areas immediately adjacent to the United States coast, the United States Government is obliged to bear in mind the possibility of an adverse attitude on the part of affected United States fishing interests and the authorities of the American state governments of the Atlantic coast states. In view of the confidential nature and the originally limited scope of the conference, there has been no opportunity to consult with these affected interests.

“Finally, the general position taken by the United States Government relative to the conclusion of an overall North Atlantic convention is influenced by the view that regulatory arrangements for a particular fishing area or region can best be made among the nations whose proximity to the affected resource gives them the intimate knowledge and interest necessary to wise and effective control. The principle here involved has been endorsed by competent fishing authorities, notably the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea, which stated in part in a report to the Economic Committee of the League of Nations that:

“The problems of the fisheries vary from sea to sea and from latitude to latitude. The fish population of one latitude is different from that of another and even a given species of fish may be found to require protection in one area which it does not require in another. It follows then that fishery problems are so localized as to be of interest only to those nations whose fishermen have access to the localities and fisheries concerned and, if and when the necessity for regulation of any of the local fisheries arises it will be a matter for treatment by agreement between the nations interested and between them alone.’

“In taking the position outlined above, the United States Government does not intend that the established rights of any nation would be disturbed but is simply suggesting that the Eastern and Western Atlantic should be made the subjects of separate arrangements among the nations whose proximity to or well established or historical interest in the fisheries entitles them to a voice in their regulation.”

Points 1 and 2 in the statement are factual and supported by data prepared by the concerned agencies of the United States Government, and the further points had the approval of those agencies.

The paragraph following the points enumerated and relating to the “possibility of an adverse attitude on the part of affected United States fishing interests and the authorities of the American state governments of the Atlantic coast states” represents the views of experts on this phase of the situation. Moreover, this point represents a most important factor with regard to any proposal to bring international convention waters into areas immediately off United States shores and hitherto fished almost exclusively by American nationals.

It is also noteworthy in this connection that for several years the trend of thinking in interested fishing circles, and also among an increasing number of students of the international legal situation relative to fisheries, has been toward limiting foreign fishing activities in areas immediately off the coast rather than toward making further commitments which might lead to an extension of foreign activities. The United States Government believes that the Canadian Government will have observed this trend and will probably have noticed that it is in the direction of regional treatment of the problem of regulation and protection of coastal fisheries.

Considering that the New England fisheries are affected to an important degree by Canada’s proposal that a general convention should include all North Atlantic high seas fisheries, the United States Government wishes to point out that the fishery operations in this area are of such predominant interest to United States fishermen that the Government is obviously obliged, not only in deference to states rights but also in recognition of established United States commercial interests, to weigh carefully the advantages of such regional treatment against any advantage that might accrue from general international treatment. This should be apparent to the Canadian authorities from the fact that at the present moment action on proposals before them in regard to an agreement on the Great Lakes fisheries is held in abeyance for similar reasons. It is not intended here to suggest an exact parallel but rather to indicate a very real difficulty with respect to the North Atlantic fishery situation which cannot reasonably be ignored.

The United States Government believes that proper regulatory measures should be possible with respect to the Western Atlantic fisheries, and its competent authorities are in general agreement that the United States Government's statement to the fishery conference in London may represent a sounder and more practical approach to the problem than the Canadian proposal to join for the purpose of regulation both the eastern and western areas of the North Atlantic. The United States Government authorities concerned are of the opinion that definitive action is inadvisable prior to the making and correlating of necessary technical studies for the purpose of determining both the regulatory measures that may be needed and the type of organization through which they might best be undertaken.

As matters stand it is apparent that the Canadian authorities have taken one position with regard to method of treatment of the North Atlantic fisheries while the United States Government has taken another which is fundamentally different. The United States authorities are nevertheless desirous that cooperative efforts between the United States and Canada shall continue to be made with respect to the formulation of any necessary regulatory arrangements for the Western Atlantic. It is therefore hoped that the positions of the United States and Canada can remain sufficiently flexible to permit any constructive action which may ultimately appear advantageous. In fact, the United States Government believes that until United States, Canadian and Newfoundland views are generally in accord, as the parties chiefly interested in the Western Atlantic fisheries, it would not be wise for these countries to proceed to any formal conference restricted even to these fisheries.

In this latter connection and with a view to providing opportunity for an adjustment of the United States and Canadian positions, the United States Government desires to suggest that, prior to the calling of any formal conference, and without undue emphasis on developments related to the London conference, plans be made for an early meeting in Washington, say late in January, of United States, Canadian and Newfoundland fishery experts for the particular purpose of correlating data which might be assembled in the meantime and of exchanging views relative to alternative approaches to the problem of regulation of the Western Atlantic fisheries.

The United States Government believes that if this were done, it should be possible to lay the technical groundwork which is a necessary preliminary to any course of action which may have far-reaching effects upon the fisheries in question. The meeting could of course consider both the limited regional aspects of the problem and the overall international aspects, and on the part of the United States authorities it would be agreeable that the particular Canadian proposals relative to a regulatory organization for the Western Atlantic fisheries be carefully and sympathetically studied. The meeting suggested might, depending upon the wishes of the Canadian authorities, be held under the informal Fisheries Advisory Committee or separately as a special technical conference. It may be preferable to use the latter procedure, owing to the very considerable importance of the situation.

NORTH ATLANTIC FISHERIES

Dr. D.B. Finn, Deputy Minister of Fisheries, Mr. John Read and I met for an hour this morning to consider the "Memorandum of conversation between Mr. Norman Robertson and Mr. Atherton" which the United States Ambassador handed to you on Saturday last.

It is our united opinion that this Memorandum is an inaccurate and insulting (discourteous?) document. It would be easy to compile a list of corrections and to answer in kind. None of us, however, think that any useful result would come from such a procedure.

We are agreed in suggesting:

A — that you should ask Atherton to come to see you again, personally and informally;

B — that you should say to him that it is clear that there has been a fundamental misunderstanding; that from your study of the papers and discussion with the senior Canadian officials who have been handling this matter you are satisfied that the misunderstanding is not attributable to them; that you assume that the United States authorities are equally satisfied that the mistake was not on their side; that in any event it is your view that no useful purpose would be served by continuing to add fuel to the argument;

C — that you should proceed by pointing out that we cannot accept certain of the statements in his Memorandum as accurate and that if we were to reply, we would have to take exception to many points; that we naturally do not wish to have a document of this kind permanently on our files and that we would regret to think that it would be on the files of the Embassy or the State Department; that under the circumstances it would be helpful all around if Atherton would take back this memo and allow us to go ahead with the search for a solution of the problem (which we both want to solve) on the basis of the formal Memorandum on the North Atlantic Fisheries situation, which accompanied the paper which is the subject of this note;

⁵⁴H.L. Keenleyside.

D—that we would feel happier about the formal memorandum if he would authorize us to delete the final sentence.

Mémoire du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
Memorandum by Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

I had a word with the United States Ambassador this morning about the “Memorandum of Conversation” which he left with me on Saturday. I had not been sufficiently familiar with the fisheries files to comment usefully on the various points he had been instructed to make. I had now been over the papers myself, and could not agree that the narrative of past fisheries discussions with which he had been furnished was really fair or objective. At the same time, I did not want to traverse the ground he had covered, because our Government, like his Government, was much more concerned about getting ahead with effective cooperation in fisheries questions than with sterile efforts to straighten out the record. There had obviously been a pretty serious misunderstanding of each other’s position, which was all the more surprising as we had had a number of senior officers taking part in the preparatory discussions with the United States experts. However, the most important thing now was to see that recriminations about past misunderstandings did not prejudice our future efforts to reach agreement on fisheries questions. We had not time enough to put the question by and take it up at leisure. Now was probably the best time to get on with the job, and our problem was to find the best method of making a fresh start. In some respects our Governments had managed to work more closely together on fisheries questions than in other fields of joint economic interest, and it would be very unfortunate if this cooperation were in any way prejudiced. We had to think of fisheries questions not only in terms of conservation of resources but also of general trade and tariff policy. We might have occasion in the near future to talk trade questions with the United States, and in any trade negotiations fisheries questions always assumed an importance greatly in excess of the financial value of the trade affected. It was important that, when the time came, we could face these questions in the light of our joint interests and not with a jaundiced eye.

Atherton said he had not been very happy about the message he had delivered. He had been asked to convey the observations it contained, but thought it might perhaps have been better if he had tried to make them orally, so that I could have selected from them, for purposes of record, those points which might have a bearing on future discussions. He did not send a copy of this “Memorandum of Conversation” to the State Department or to any other Department of the United States Government, and would be glad to destroy his copy. If I felt like doing the same, he saw no objection. The main question was that of finding the best basis for future discussions. He thought they might perhaps be begun through the diplomatic channel and then broaden out to the expert level. Alternatively, there might be merit in letting the technical fisheries people get together themselves and see whether they could agree on some findings of fact which might be a basis for policy discussions between Governments. I said we were examining the memorandum on the North Atlantic fisheries situation which he had left with me, and would be glad to have a talk about it with him in a few days, when we also perhaps would have some suggestions to make about procedure.

I saw the United States Ambassador yesterday about North Atlantic fisheries questions, and told him we were very glad to take up the suggestion put forward in his memorandum⁵⁵ that representatives of the United States, Newfoundland and Canada should meet together in the near future to try and work out a mutually satisfactory solution of this question. I thought a round-table discussion in Ottawa, in which he and I could take part, might be helpful. I suggested January 19th as a suitable date, but agreed to January 24th to meet his convenience. The topics for discussion would be those mentioned in his memorandum.

Our Governments were in agreement on objectives, but had different views as to the method of achieving them.

As he knew, we felt we had very good reasons for believing the course we had taken was a wise one and in the best interests of our countries. His Government's advisers took a different view. We did not think the narrative of past discussions contained in his memorandum was the last word on the subject, nor were we ready to accept the cogency of all the reasons adduced in that memorandum in support of the United States position. At the same time I did not think that the prospects of our reaching agreement at the forthcoming meeting would be improved by my giving him a Canadian counterpart of the memorandum he had left with me. We knew the American point of view and we thought that they knew ours. I could give him a letter restating and explaining the position if he thought this would further our common interest in finding an agreed solution. We concluded that it would not.

As matters stand, therefore, I have explained our position to him orally and informally, and agreed to the suggestion of round-table discussions in Ottawa next month.

NORTH ATLANTIC FISHERIES QUESTIONS

The United States Ambassador confirmed his Government's agreement to fisheries talks in Ottawa on January 24th. The United States participants, beside himself, would be Messrs. Sturgeon, Dooman, Gabrielson and a representative of the Tariff Commission and of the Legal Division of the State Department still to be named. It was understood that we were inviting Newfoundland to be represented.

Mr. Atherton said his Government was very anxious that the talks in Ottawa should be followed, as quickly as possible, by rather more strictly "technical" talks in Washington, at which various American fisheries experts (he mentioned 15), would have an opportunity of saying their pieces. I said I was sure that our people would be very glad to work to this programme, and plan to continue the conversations in Washington on the plane he suggested.

We have been thinking over machinery for consultation between ourselves and other members of the British Commonwealth on matters of urgency connected with the war in the light of the new position resulting from United States entry into the war and recent developments in the Pacific. We have also received requests from the Australian Government for some change in the existing system, more particularly expressing desire that "accredited representative of Commonwealth Government will have the right to be heard in the War Cabinet in formulation and direction of policy".

2. We are now informing the Commonwealth Government that we are prepared to agree to this request, and Sir Earle Page, who is at present in London as special representative of the Australian Cabinet, will attend meetings of the War Cabinet for purposes indicated.

3. We feel that Canada should know this in case they felt disposed to avail themselves of the new arrangements on a similar footing to Australia. We recognize that each Dominion may have its own views about this, though I need not say they would be warmly welcomed.

PERSONAL AND PRIVATE. Following for the Prime Minister, Begins: Informal conversation took place this afternoon at Dominions Office regarding Churchill's reference to subject of proposed representation from the Dominions at meetings of the War Cabinet here. Question was raised by High Commissioner for South Africa as to whether a Dominion High Commissioner himself could appropriately perform duties related to such representation. Cranborne's personal opinion was that a High Commissioner would be acceptable from the United Kingdom point of view, but he offered to make enquiries. I do not know, of course, whether you propose to take any action on Churchill's proposal. As I see the problem, the presence at meetings of the War Cabinet of a Dominion representative would not substantially alter the existing situation. Such a representative would, of course, be in direct touch with the War Cabinet discussions but could do little more than a High Commissioner is able to do with his present facilities. Naturally, neither could speak for his Government except under specific instructions. On the other hand, a special representative from a Dominion, sitting with the War Cabinet would duplicate some important functions at present performed by High Commissioners and the division between their duties would be most difficult to define.

It is widely felt here that it would have been better if matters had been left as they were and some controversy has an air of unreality, but I felt sure that since question of High Commissionership in relation to the War Cabinet has been raised, you would wish to be kept informed of any important discussions on this subject. I know you will not misunderstand my motives in dealing with this question which I do of course impersonally and objectively.

My immediately preceding telegram.

Following is text of statement made by the Prime Minister in House of Commons January 28, Begins: From the foregoing, it will be seen that Mr. Churchill has made a clear distinction between an imperial War Cabinet, which, in addition to the Prime Minister of Great Britain, would contain the Prime Ministers of the four Dominions, and an arrangement under which an accredited representative of any of the four Dominions will have the right to be heard in the War Cabinet of Great Britain in the formulation and direction of policy.

Mr. Churchill's statement makes clear that an Imperial War Cabinet containing the Prime Ministers of the four Dominions would involve having them all together in London at one and the same time, either periodically or continuously. This, as Mr. Churchill points out, has not thus far, at any time, been possible. It requires no comment to make clear how impossible it would be to form, at the present time, with its seat in London, an Imperial War Cabinet containing the Prime Ministers of the four Dominions.

The statement also makes clear that since the outbreak of war, whenever any of the Prime Ministers of the Dominions have been in London, they have, as a matter of course, taken their seats at the Cabinet table in the War Cabinet. On other occasions Mr. Churchill has made it equally plain that this privilege will continue to be accorded to the Prime Ministers of the Dominions.

Mr. Churchill's statement next discloses that in the last three months Sir Earle Page, representing the Commonwealth Government of Australia, has been accorded the privilege of being present at the Cabinet table in London when war matters and Australian matters were under discussion and also, in similar circumstances, in the defence committee. It is clear from the statement that this privilege, while broadly interpreted, has, however, been extended only as a matter of courtesy. What recently has been asked specifically by the Australian Government, and agreed to by the Government of Great Britain, is that an accredited representative of the Commonwealth Government of Australia shall have the right to be heard in the War Cabinet in the formulation and direction of policies. Similar facilities, Mr. Churchill states, will, of course, be available to New Zealand, Canada and South Africa.

Mr. Churchill's statement leaves no room for doubt that the power to make decisions and the responsibility for decisions made in the War Cabinet of Great Britain will continue to rest with the War Cabinet of Great Britain. The right being accorded to accredited representatives of the Dominions is that of "being heard" in the formulation and direction of policies.

It is clear from the word sent by the British Government to the Governments of the several Dominions to which I made reference yesterday, that this right to be heard relates to the machinery for consultation between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Governments of the other members of the British Commonwealth on matters of urgency connected with the war; further, that it has resulted from the United States entry into the war, and recent developments in the Pacific, and also from the request of the Australian Government.

Speaking for the Canadian Government, I may say that the existing machinery for consultation between not only the Governments of Great Britain and Canada but also between Canada and the Governments of the other Dominions has, in our opinion, worked exceedingly well. If at any time in the future we should find the means of consultation inadequate to meet the new developments which have arisen or which may arise, our Government will not only be prepared but glad to avail itself of the supplementary arrangement to have our views presented to the War Cabinet of Great Britain by an accredited representative, in accordance with the procedure which was announced yesterday by the Prime Minister of Great Britain.

I attach an interesting memorandum prepared by Mr. Holmes commenting on the Australian suggestion for an Empire Council and dealing with our current problems of intra-Commonwealth relations. I think that this memorandum has a good deal of material that will be of use in preparing for the London talks. I doubt, however, that it should go to the Prime Minister in its present form. I have sent a copy to Mr. Heeny and I have two more copies which I am holding.²

MEMORANDUM ON MR. CURTIN'S PROPOSALS FOR AN EMPIRE COUNCIL

NATURE OF THE PROPOSALS

In a speech at Adelaide on August 14th Prime Minister Curtin suggested the establishment of a British Commonwealth Council. Because of what he called the "gratifying and encouraging interest" shown the proposals, especially in Britain, Mr. Curtin enlarged upon his suggestion on September 6th at the request of The Times' correspondent.⁴ The principal features of the proposal are as follows:

1. Although Mr. Curtin first referred to the proposed body as "some Imperial authority", he stressed that it should (or at any rate could) be a "standing consultative body" rather than an executive body.
2. The body should provide facilities for "quick and frequent consultation on any urgent matter".
3. It should resemble the Pacific Council, providing machinery whereby "representatives of the Dominions could consult regularly with British Government representatives".
4. The Dominion representatives could be the High Commissioners in London but could be replaced "at appropriate intervals" by special representatives, who could be Ministers.
5. The Council should be a permanent body with regular meetings.
6. Regular meetings would presumably take place in London, but occasional meetings would be held in Ottawa, Canberra, Pretoria, and Wellington. The personnel for the meetings outside England is not defined.
7. The Council should have a permanent secretariat of "experts".

AUSTRALIAN MOTIVES

There is little in these proposals that has not been advocated before, frequently with considerable support in Australia. The Labour Party has not usually identified itself with schemes for imperial solidarity, but its attitude has been modified by the war. When Australia was directly threatened in 1942, she looked to the United States for help because United Kingdom forces were tied up in the European theatre. The dependence of the British territories in the Pacific on American support had, of course, been implicit since the Washington naval agreement. Now that the honeymoon between Australia and the United States is over, Australians are realizing their dependence on the imperial connection as well. Although they remain vitally interested in the continuation of commitments from the United States for their future security, they are worried about two possibilities: The United States might revert to an isolationist policy, or might, on the other hand, seek to dominate the southwest Pacific in a way which would offend Australian susceptibilities or overlook their interests. Mr. Curtin was probably thinking of the demands in the United States for air bases and economic concessions in return for lend-lease when he spoke of the need for concerted Empire policy in view of the fierce economic war in the post-war years. Australia is also, like Canada, giving some thought to the role of a small power in a world dominated by the four great powers, and Mr. Curtin is anxious to strengthen Australian influence with the one great power which is the most apt to be influenced. The Labour Government has accepted the Statute of Westminster and is now seeking to establish a principle which goes farther. The proposal of an Empire Council is not a gesture of old-fashioned 'imperialism' but a protestation of equality and an assertion that simple statutory equality is not good enough. In the last war the situation was quite different. The basis of equality had not yet been recognized. Japan was an ally, and the real nature of Australia's defence problems in the Pacific area had not been realized. The Australian Government has been much impressed by its success in securing the establishment of the Pacific Council, and it is this Council which Mr. Curtin has seen as a model for Commonwealth relations. Although the Pacific Council in its present state hardly warrants enthusiasm, Mr. Curtin seems to be satisfied with the consultative machinery which it provides.

⁴ Voir l'édition du 7 septembre.

⁴ See edition of September 7.

A COMMON FOREIGN POLICY

Canada's position is not dissimilar from that of Australia. She has less need to fear American isolationism, because even the most diehard isolationist admits the necessity of keeping enemies out of Canada. She has even greater need to fear American domination, but she has had much more experience in frustrating it. Canada has recognized the importance of the United Kingdom in her own defensive strategy. This recognition, her economic interests, and the sentiment of her people together indicate that Canada will probably be involved in any war in which the United Kingdom is involved. She has, therefore, a strong interest in influencing United Kingdom policy. Canada has also the same reasons as Australia for seeking a channel through which to make her influence felt in the councils of the great powers.

The question arises, therefore, as to whether Canada, as well as Australia and the other British nations, should strive for a common Empire foreign policy or "a concerted Empire policy", as Mr. Curtin has described it. There is much which could be said for a single policy, formulated by representatives of all British countries, which would make the British Empire a powerful unit in a world council. Such a system would, however, necessitate the creation of an imperial executive body and possibly the merging of diplomatic services, if it were to be effective. A development in this direction would run counter to the principle on which the Commonwealth has flourished and the deepest instincts of the self-governing nations. It must be ruled out as politically impossible, even if it were otherwise considered desirable.

With or without a common foreign policy, the position of any part of the British Commonwealth is strengthened by the expectation on the part of other countries that if one part of the Commonwealth is attacked it will be supported by the other parts. The fact that Canada, South Africa and Australia (in 1941) have decided against the principle of automatic commitment in declarations of war by the United Kingdom has created less impression abroad than the fact that these countries did go to war. The franker acknowledgement on their part that they went to war not because of sentiment but because of their own national interests will serve to emphasize the reality of a relationship which is an implicit alliance. It has seemed to many persons that this implicit alliance was an unwarranted limitation of national sovereignty. But alliances between foreign countries, such as that between Great Britain and the Soviet Union, limit the freedom of the contracting parties to participate in wars. All countries must accommodate their policies to the interest of their allies or potential allies. In doing so, however, they have not found it necessary or possible to merge their foreign policies.

A strong argument for a common Empire foreign policy has been made by Mr. Lionel Curtis on the ground that Great Britain cannot enter a major war without being assured of the use of Canadian flying fields and Canadian space for training a mechanized army, not to mention the resources in men and material of the whole Empire. But Great Britain could not fight a major war without the resources of the United States and the armies of the Soviet Union. Although Great Britain's policy has been to avoid commitments, her strength has depended on her ability to secure allies, and her foreign policy must continue to be influenced by the interests of those on whom she must count for help in war. Her most dependable allies have proved to be the other self-governing British nations, and the past few years have revealed that they are much more powerful allies than had previously been realized. Great Britain is making it clear, therefore, that she is prepared to pay more attention than in the past to the advice of the other British countries. The time is therefore ripe for the other British countries to see that their views are expressed through adequate channels. But Britain must also think of her other allies, and a foreign policy based on a compromise between demands of all parts of the Empire would be too slow and indecisive for the company Great Britain keeps.

Because of this interdependence of nations, the only common policy which it might be possible to achieve is a policy on which all the United Nations agree, expressed in an association of nations. The fundamental interests of the British nations are similar, but they are not exclusive to the British nations. These interests cannot be defended by the British nations alone, and anything in the nature of an exclusive foreign policy based upon the illusion that the Empire can defend itself with its own resources must be avoided. Yet the lesson of 1940 is that the cohesion of the British nations is not contrary to the best interests of other nations. It proved to be the most dependable alliance of all, and it saved the cause of the United Nations. This fact has been obscured in clouds of rhetoric, but it remains a fact of fundamental importance for Canada, because, if Canada had not formed part of that alliance, it is doubtful if the United Kingdom could have held out, and the war might now be taking place on Canadian soil. If the importance of the British association has been proved, there are good arguments for keeping it harmonious through constant consultation and strengthening it by making certain that it has a world viewpoint. But insistence on a common foreign policy would almost certainly create tensions which would wreck the association, and the suggestion of a British front against the world would alienate allies on whom the Commonwealth depends.

INTRA-COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATION

The arguments in favour of intra-Commonwealth consultation might be briefly summarized as follows:

1. Even though Canada does not accept unreservedly the doctrine of four-power domination, it is her supreme interest to do nothing to frustrate the closest collaboration of the great powers. Through her close association with the United Kingdom, Canada is able to introduce her views into councils which are closed to most smaller powers. Recent events suggest that Canada's voice is not without influence (e.g. United Kingdom support of Canada's claim to an important role in U.N.R.R.A. and acceptance of Canadian suggestions concerning the Four-Power declaration). The strengthening of the machinery of consultation would enable Canada to present her views not only to the United Kingdom Government but also to the other British nations, whose opinions must be weighed by that government.

2. It is of interest to Canada to strengthen the British voice in world councils, because the existence of the United Kingdom is important to her defence and her economy, and because the United Kingdom can serve as her mouth-piece. Even without a common foreign policy, the voice of the United Kingdom will be strengthened by consultation with associated countries, each of which will probably be playing an important role in its own region. While Great Britain is preparing for an important role in European affairs, Canada is thinking of taking part in Inter-American activities, Australia and New Zealand speak of organizing the South-West Pacific, and South Africa is proclaiming her leadership in Pan Africa. (If India should remain within the Commonwealth, her important role in Asia should be considered.) It would not only strengthen the United Kingdom's voice in Big-Four councils to have the advice of countries with such diverse experience, but it would also be of considerable value to Canada and the other countries, all of which are recent entries in the field of diplomacy.

There are, on the other hand, certain factors to be kept in mind which might limit the value of consultation:

1. Steps toward Commonwealth solidarity might compromise Canada's claim to international recognition of her autonomy. Even if the Narkomindel and the State Department are thoroughly aware of the constitutional niceties of the Canadian position, they may seek arguments to dispose of the troublesome claims of Canada or Australia — claims which upset the four-power principle and inspire pretensions on the part of even more troublesome countries like Poland and France.

2. Canada's intimate contacts with the Foreign Office might inspire charges that she was a British tool in the Pan American Union. In the same way the representatives of foreign countries might hesitate to entrust confidences to Canadian diplomatic officers out of fear that these would be reported to the other British countries.

Suspensions of this kind could, of course, be counteracted by the nature of Canadian policy, if this policy were seen to be that of a loyal but independent ally of other British countries. The original arguments against the membership of the Dominions in the League did not recur after it became obvious that they were not puppets controlled from the United Kingdom. It is possible that some at least of the Pan American nations would welcome Canada's dual association as a link between two associations with mutual interests. Some opinion in the United States has also welcomed the strengthening of the association between Commonwealth countries on two grounds. First, they believe it strengthens the voice of their primary ally; and secondly, they believe that the advice tendered the United Kingdom by Canada or Australia is apt to be along lines which they would approve.

If it should be decided that improved facilities for consultation are desirable, the question arises as to whether Mr. Curtin's proposals describe the best machinery for the purpose. Mr. Curtin (who has had no experience at Imperial Conferences) does not make it clear whether he wants a common foreign policy or not. At any rate he insists that his council could be consultative rather than executive. The difference between a consultative and an executive body would be that the former would not be obliged to reach unanimous decisions on policy. Efforts would undoubtedly be made to influence the views of other participants, but there would be no obligation on the part of any country to accept majority opinions. All countries, including of course the United Kingdom, would remain free to reject or accept the advice of any or all of the other countries. If the example of the Pacific Council were followed, as suggested, the Council would serve rather as a clearing-house of information rather than as a body for discussing policies to be pursued.

PRESENT METHODS OF CONSULTATION

There are at present four principal channels of intra-Commonwealth communication:

(a) The Imperial Conference has not met since 1936. The concern of recent Imperial Conferences has been almost exclusively with the constitution and machinery of the Commonwealth. Since 1926, there has been little of great importance for the Conference to do, and it might be expected that the constitutional nature of the Commonwealth will, before long, become if not frozen at least stabilized. Mr. Curtin is interested in a body which meets much more frequently and which devotes its attention to the function rather than the nature of the Commonwealth. The Imperial Conference, meeting every four years, might consider the long-range aspects of Commonwealth policies and interests, but it could not be a very effective body in [a] world of constant emergencies. Before 1914 there was an effort to make the Imperial Conference something like a permanent and executive body with a secretariat, but this effort never had Canadian support, and the Conference is now strictly consultative.

(b) The High Commissioners do already hold daily meetings in London with the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, at which they are given the latest military and political intelligence, which they then discuss. The appointment, since the War began, of High Commissioners in other British capitals besides London has greatly improved the machinery of Commonwealth relations, particularly as between the overseas countries themselves.

(c) The Dominions Office has developed a useful and effective system of circulating information to the various Departments of External Affairs. The policy of asking the opinion of the Dominions on major matters of foreign policy has enabled them to exercise a real influence on United Kingdom policy. The circulation of despatches from United Kingdom agents in countries where other Commonwealth countries are not represented is of particular value.

(d) Personal contacts between leading Commonwealth statesmen and officials are important, even if they do not take place according to any system. The custom of admitting visiting Commonwealth statesmen into British War Cabinet and the Canadian War Committee provides opportunities for consultation unlike those between foreign countries.

The methods of consultation described in (b), (c) and (d) above are improving, and it may be that the best course is simply to perfect this machinery and develop the practice of consultation by experience without inaugurating new bodies. Consultation initiated by the Dominions Office is not a method which emphasizes equality of status, although it does no violence to the principle. Equality of function will be imperfect so long as one nation only has a decisive word in allied councils and a world-wide diplomatic service with long experience. Consultation by telegram is an unostentatious system, the importance of which is perhaps recognized only by those who practise it. Lack of publicity does have the advantage of not unduly irritating those who are suspicious of Commonwealth ties. On the other hand, it leads those who favour such ties to assume that no real ties exist and to advocate imperial parliaments or executive bodies. If these impractical and embarrassing proposals are to be discouraged, it might be advisable to seek opportunities to acquaint the Canadian public with the extent and the value of intra-Commonwealth consultation. Such a revelation should appeal not only to those who approve of close Commonwealth associations for their own sake, but also to those who are particularly anxious to know that Canadian views are being expressed somewhere where they will be heard.

A FORMAL COUNCIL

There might be certain advantages in a system which provided for regular personal consultation within a Commonwealth Council. Canadian views could be expressed more forcefully and interpreted more accurately by a representative at a meeting than by a telegram or despatch. Such meetings would allow the Commonwealth nations to exchange opinions and discuss matters of common interest. By this method differing views would be understood, if not always reconciled.

The loosest form of such a council could be simply a meeting of the High Commissioners in London, called informally at the suggestion of any one of the governments, to talk over an emerging issue. Each High Commissioner would be briefed by his government and would, of course, be unable to make any commitments or go beyond his instructions. Mr. Curtin envisages something more than this. He suggests regular meetings and the establishment of a permanent council. Regular meetings would facilitate the preparation of agenda and the briefing of High Commissioners. Meetings must always have chairmen, but it is perhaps not advisable to have these meetings always summoned and chaired by the Secretary of State for the Dominions or by another United Kingdom representative. A chairman and secretary could be informally appointed at each meeting. The setting-up of a council as such would simplify the organization of meetings and the rotation of officers, but it would, of course, represent a step toward a formal establishment.

Undoubtedly the centre of action would have to be London, not only because it is the capital with the strongest voice in world affairs but also because it is the only capital on which all the other countries would agree. That there should also be meetings in the other capitals would be highly desirable. Such meetings could, of course, prove to be mere window-dressing, as continuity of membership is important for an effective council. On the other hand, if the consultative features of the meetings is to be emphasized, there is much to be said for meetings in Ottawa and other capitals attended by the local High Commissioners assisted possibly by secondary officers who regularly attend the London meetings. The further possibility of having regular meetings of the High Commissioners in all Dominion capitals might seem almost a reductio ad absurdum, but such a system would effectively prevent the assumption of any executive powers on the part of the London body and would emphasize the informal nature of the consultation.

Mr. Curtin suggests that a High Commissioner "could be replaced at appropriate intervals by a special representative who would be a Minister". Pacific Council meetings are customarily attended by diplomatic officers, but visiting Prime Ministers and other officials frequently attend when they are in Washington. There would probably be no objection to having visiting Cabinet Ministers sit in on such meetings, particularly if matters of concern to them were up for discussion. Meetings of Ministers, however, or a revival of the suggestion for the appointment of Resident Ministers in London would probably lead to the assumption of quasi-executive functions on the part of the Council and spoil its purely consultative nature. A High Commissioner would represent in such a body the policy of his government. When the 1911 Imperial Conference discussed Sir Joseph Ward's proposals for a Standing Committee,⁵ objection was taken to the appointment of High Commissioners to the Committee on the ground that it would mean extending their functions in order to give them a consultative authority. This situation, it was thought, might be unsatisfactory from the point of view of a Government which had to receive advice from an officer who was under its direction. For similar reasons it was considered undesirable to appoint Ministers and High Commissioners to the same Committee. But there should be no objection to the offering of advice by a High Commissioner to his Government based on his experience in Council, provided that he accepts the decision of the Government. Nor should it be impossible for him to take part in consultations so long as it is understood that although his views generally correspond to the policy of his Government, his Government is not committed by his remarks in Council.

PERMANENT SECRETARIAT

Mr. Curtin also recommends a permanent Secretariat of "experts". Meetings require a staff of some kind to prepare agenda and minutes. If no other arrangements were made, this work would probably be done by the Dominions Office or by the office of the representative serving as chairman or secretary. The Dominions Office has provided something in the nature of a Commonwealth secretariat, but objection has been taken to the fact that this secretariat was purely a United Kingdom body. The Dominions might wish to set up a secretariat with a staff drawn from all parts of the Commonwealth. Such a secretariat would occupy itself not only in preparing agenda and carrying out instructions of the Commonwealth Council but also in circulating information to the British government. This change would imply an obligation on the part of the Dominions to pool information received from their officers abroad on a scale similar to that now provided by the Dominions Office.

When proposals for a permanent Imperial Conference secretariat were made by a previous Australian Prime Minister in 1907, Sir Wilfrid Laurier objected on three grounds: (1) that there was no one to whom the Secretariat could be directly responsible between Imperial Conferences; (2) that it might grow in numbers and involve increased expenditure; (3) that it might grow in power and interfere with the powers of the Governments and the basic principle of responsibility of Ministers to Parliament. All these fears have to some extent been answered by the experience of the League of Nations, where an efficient and not too expensive international secretariat found it possible to be responsible to a Council without sovereign or executive powers. The chief advantage of such a secretariat would be that it could facilitate the machinery of intra-Commonwealth consultation and remove the anomalies of the Dominions Office. On the other hand, even though there seems little chance of its assuming executive functions, it might prove to be a centralizing force. One practical difficulty is that the smaller countries, in particular, are hard pressed to find personnel for their diplomatic services and might be reluctant to spare valuable men for this Commonwealth secretariat.

INTERNAL COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

One question which should be given serious consideration in connection with proposals for a Commonwealth Council is whether the Council would consider internal as well as external affairs. Should such a question as the relation of Ireland to the Commonwealth be considered by all the Dominions? Ireland, of course, is in a special position because her status is (or was) based on a treaty with the United Kingdom. But the present Irish Government has not recognized this treaty as a valid basis of relationship. The relation of Ireland to the Commonwealth may be again an issue after the war, with a possible demand for her expulsion. It is questionable whether the status of a Dominion is a matter which can properly be decided by the United Kingdom alone. (The question of the Six Counties is on the other hand a boundary matter between Ireland and the United Kingdom in which other Dominions could do no more than offer to mediate.) In the same way, it may be asked whether the United Kingdom has the right to admit India, or Ceylon, Southern Rhodesia, or Jamaica as Dominions.

ions without consulting the other Dominions. The status of Newfoundland is a matter in which Canada would be particularly interested. There will, no doubt, be no great anxiety on the part of Canada or other Dominions to become involved directly in relations with India or colonies before they become Dominions. Yet there is a good deal to be said for a strictly consultative body like the proposed Council discussing colonial issues and offering advice. (The Dominions cannot close their eyes pharisaically to the most crucial problem of our time, the assistance of dependent areas to self-government, for they will be involved in the catastrophe which will inevitably ensue from the failure to solve this problem.) One other subject which might be dealt with by such a Council is the monarchy. If another crisis like that of 1936 should arise, there may be differences of opinion as between the countries owing allegiance to the King which could best be threshed out in a meeting.

The right of the Dominions to a voice on the position of Ireland or India or of the monarchy is not of course necessarily connected with the establishment of a Commonwealth council, but it would add important items to a council's agenda. As for colonial questions, for which Canada is anxious to avoid any specific responsibility, it is perhaps only in the informal atmosphere of a consultative council that it would be safe to offer advice.

CANADIAN POLICY

It is important for the Canadian Government to clarify its views with regard to Mr. Curtin's proposals, for there is evidence of increasing interest in cooperation between the British Nations. Mr. Fraser has expressed himself as being in favour of any scheme which means closer consultation and cooperation. Although South Africa has, like Canada, never been enthusiastic about such schemes, General Smuts has, by his suggestion for the sharing out of colonial responsibilities among the self-governing British countries, indicated that he too may be thinking of new developments in Commonwealth relationships (if he isn't just thinking of how to secure Union control of some of the African colonies). In Canada the chief spokesman for this trend has been Premier Drew, whose speeches have been quoted by such advocates of solidarity in the United Kingdom as Lionel Curtis and Sir Edward Grigg.

The recent telegrams concerning the Four-Power Declaration raised the issue of Commonwealth foreign policy very clearly. The Australian Government proposed that the United Kingdom representative should sign the Declaration on behalf of the "British Commonwealth". The Australian Government indicated through Sir William Glasgow that they were hoping for Canadian support in their proposal. Before the Canadian comments on the Australian proposal had been sent to London, the Dominions Office had rejected this proposal on the grounds that it was contrary to the decision made by the Dominions themselves in 1926.⁶

In spite of this view, however, there is evidence of confusion, uncertainty, or difference of opinion in London on the subject. The notes for guidance of the Foreign Secretary in Moscow refer to the "British Commonwealth and Empire" as one of the three great powers, and Mr. Churchill frequently speaks in the name of the British Commonwealth and/or Empire. The United Kingdom is particularly anxious to strengthen its position alongside the immense and populous land powers of the United States and the Soviet Union. For this reason it may welcome proposals for closer collaboration coming from the Dominions, even though experience has taught the Dominions Office to be careful.

It is to be expected that proposals like that of Mr. Curtin would be on the agenda of the projected meeting of Prime Ministers. Such a discussion might find the Prime Ministers sharply divided. Canadian opinion will be at least reticent about any extreme interpretation of the Curtin plan. If the Australians are insistent, and are backed by New Zealand, Canada might propose as a compromise solution certain changes in the present daily meetings of High Commissioners in London intended to make them more in the nature of informal discussions of policy. Such a proposal would not rouse antagonism as would the setting up of a new Empire Council. It could be interpreted simply as a modification of machinery now in existence. It would be a pragmatic and experimental solution in the best British tradition. It would commit the Commonwealth to no new scheme, the failure of which could have dangerous effects on the Commonwealth association. On the other hand, the meeting might prove itself an instrument of such value to all participants that there would be a unanimous wish to strengthen it.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, November 19, 1943

Dear Mr. Riddell,

I have read with great interest your despatch No. 269 of October 20th[†] outlining opinion in New Zealand concerning Mr. Curtin's proposals for an Empire Council. The editorials which you quote are not unlike those which have appeared in the Canadian press. Those Canadian papers which continue to comment on the proposal for the most part express scepticism about the value of anything like an executive body. Most of them, however, are favourable to consultation among the countries of the Commonwealth. There is some difference of opinion as to whether new machinery is necessary.

You may be interested to know that a Gallup Poll was recently held in Canada in which the question asked was: "It has been suggested that a British Empire Council be formed, with a representative from each of the Dominions to decide affairs of the Commonwealth. Would you like to see such a Council formed, or should we continue as at present?" The results of the poll were as follows:

Want Council 54%

No Council 26%

Undecided 20%

The figures were also broken down as follows:

	Que.	Ont.	National except Que.
For Council	41%	54%	57%
Against Council	32%	29%	25%
Undecided	27%	17%	18%

It should be noted that the wording of this question was not very specific and the poll was not preceded by any general discussion of the proposal in the press.

Your own comments in paragraph 4 of your despatch are interesting. It is undoubtedly in the light of the recent trend towards concentration of power in the hands of the four large countries that thought in Australia and in other parts of the Commonwealth has turned towards such ideas Mr. Curtin's.

Canada, like the other Dominions, is on occasions able to place her views before the Great powers through the United Kingdom. This advantage, which is not possessed by other small powers, may prove to be of considerable importance in a world largely controlled by big countries. If, however, the Commonwealth should try to speak with one voice as a single great power, the Dominions might forfeit the right to take their places also as independent entities in world councils.

An important question in connection with Mr. Curtin's proposals is whether a purely consultative council would serve any useful purpose. Your experiences at Geneva with Commonwealth consultation is [sic] very much relevant to this discussion. The fact that, as you point out, agreement at Commonwealth meetings was frequently neither possible nor desirable, indicates that anything in the nature of an executive council for the Commonwealth would provoke discord rather than harmony. On the other hand, informative and consultative meetings at which representatives of Commonwealth countries explain their policies to each other might serve a useful purpose.

I should be interested in having your assessment, in retrospect, of the value of the Commonwealth consultation which took place at Geneva. Did it prove useful? Did it arouse suspicion on the part of other countries? Did it develop any techniques which might usefully be applied or developed in the future?

Yours sincerely,

No. 428

Wellington, December 24, 1943

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

With reference to my despatch No. 269 of October 20th[†] and to the Under-Secretary's letter of November 19th, the joint Four-Power Declaration at Moscow⁷ announcing the proposed setting up of a general international organization for peace and security should help to clarify the situation to a considerable extent regarding Commonwealth consultation. The importance and value of an "Empire Council" as proposed by Mr. Curtin naturally depends to a considerable extent upon the world situation. From now until the general international organization is set up British Commonwealth consultation either as at present carried on or as contemplated by Mr. Curtin would seem to be of greater importance than when the peace settlement has been concluded. For once the general international organization is established and takes over the powers regarding peace and security now being exercised by the Big Four, Commonwealth consultation of the close and intimate character required under present conditions would not seem to be as important and would require to be of a somewhat different character. The ad hoc consultation which was carried on at Geneva by the members of the British Commonwealth delegations in connection with the activities of the League of Nations, while it might have been improved upon, would appear to have been better calculated to meet the requirements of carrying on foreign policy at international levels. In fact the seat of the peace and security organization is bound to become the most important meeting place of the representatives of the British Commonwealth, much more than any of the capitals of its respective members, even London. It will be evident that once a world organization is set up for maintaining peace and security, if it is taken seriously foreign policy should be determined by it and settled through it. Unless this is done the new organization will go the way of the old.

2. Probably the most satisfactory way to answer your questions ("Did Commonwealth consultation prove satisfactory? Did it arouse suspicion? Did it develop any techniques which might usefully be applied or developed in the future?") would be to describe the situation at Geneva as regards group consultation in general and Commonwealth consultation in particular.

3. In considering British Commonwealth consultation at Geneva it is necessary to understand that the British Commonwealth was only one of several groups of states which cooperated among themselves, held meetings of the members of their respective groups, and to a considerable extent may be said to have reached a common policy. Two of the more important of these were purely European, the Scandinavian group and the Little Entente. Other groups were the Latin Americans, the Arab and Moslem states, and, of course, the British Commonwealth. These groupings played a very important part in the election of the non-permanent members of the Council of the League and in advancing their special ideas and interests; and it is a well known fact that most if not all of these groups met from time to time and discussed the policies which they would pursue both in the Assembly and the Council of the League and in the international conferences which were held from time to time. I have intimate knowledge only of the British Commonwealth group meetings which were held in connection with these international gatherings. As Canadian Advisory Officer for over thirteen years I had a much longer contact with these meetings than any other person. The British Commonwealth group, although from a constitutional standpoint the most closely related, was no more successful in correlating its policy than some of the other groups which I have mentioned.

4. The British Commonwealth representatives who came to Geneva differed very materially in experience and outlook. More than half of them came from the United Kingdom, the most internationally minded of the major Powers. Their delegations almost always included one or more members of the Cabinet and at the Assembly invariably included the Foreign Secretary. These delegates were supported by a large and efficient staff of technical advisers and secretaries, who fully appreciated the importance of matters to be discussed and had come well prepared for such discussions. The Dominion delegations, as was to be expected, were much smaller and usually numbered not more than eight or ten each, including technical advisers and secretaries. The United Kingdom delegation frequently numbered from thirty to forty. Occasionally a Dominion delegation to the Assembly was headed by a Prime Minister, probably one coming on an average every second year. Frequently, however, their representatives were of Cabinet rank or had formerly enjoyed Cabinet rank. Their delegations, however, for the most part were manned by the official representatives of the Dominions in Europe. In view of the expense in time and in money it was very rarely that they were supported by technical advisers from their own countries. The delegates from the United Kingdom were usually men with a world outlook, whereas frequently the delegates from the Dominions were men with little experience outside their own countries, who were largely strangers to international politics. They came with their political horizons limited very largely by their own boundaries and they came with different problems and sympathies. Certain of them, such as those from Canada and South Africa, were alive to minority problems because they had two races within their own countries. Others such as those from New Zealand and Australia were jealous of maintaining unimpaired the security which they had with the United Kingdom, while the Irish Free State sought primarily to maintain and demonstrate its independence, sometimes by holding aloof from the British Commonwealth and sometimes by being cooperative. Most of them came to the League of Nations realizing that their new status as nations was contemporaneous with the establishment of the League, and that the assertion and development of this status had been closely associated with it. All of them were impressed with their position in the League; certain of them looked upon the League as the touchstone of their freedom from subordination and of their equality with the United Kingdom in their relations with other States. The League gave them an opportunity for international contacts and international action. It became for them a testing ground for the application of the fundamental principles of the British Commonwealth.

5. It soon became known to the other Members of the League that the Dominions exercised the same freedom in voting as other Members and cast their votes with the same independence. Frequently it happened that the Commonwealth delegations voted against one another and sometimes they did so on questions of political importance. At the First Assembly Canada voted for the admission of Armenia to the League although the United Kingdom was opposed to it. At the Third Assembly Canada and the other Dominions supported the Norwegian motion for the intervention of the League in the Greco-Turkish war, although the United Kingdom voted against it. At another Assembly the Canadian and New Zealand delegates introduced an amendment to a report of a sub-committee on the slavery convention, headed by a British delegate, and with the votes of the other Dominions defeated the report and had their amendment inserted in the Convention. At one session of the International Labour Conference, following our instructions the two Australian Government delegates and myself and a colleague representing the Government of Canada voted against a convention on emigration which had the strong support of the United Kingdom and thereby failed to receive the requisite two-thirds majority.

6. While there never was to my knowledge any official arrangement for Commonwealth consultation at Geneva I do not think I am overstating in saying that there was a deliberate and systematic effort on the part of some delegations at least to bring about the correlation of policy. When I became the permanent representative of the Canadian Government at Geneva in 1925 the practice of holding consultations among the Commonwealth delegations was already established. These consultations took the form of informal contacts between the members of the Commonwealth delegations, of meetings of the heads of delegations and more commonly of fairly regular meetings of the whole delegations or at least of their more important members as well as of meetings of delegates or their advisers who were interested in particular questions. With the exception of the International Labour Conference group consultations were held in connection with most of the gatherings held under the auspices of the League Assemblies, Conferences and the more important Commissions. An attempt was made to include the International Labour Organization, but after a meeting in London and one in Geneva it was seen that the questions dealt with and the questionnaire method used by the International Labour Organization did not lend themselves to profitable Commonwealth consultation. Group meetings were usually called by the United Kingdom delegation, though not invariably so, as occasionally other delegations called meetings. The presiding officer was almost invariably from among the members of the delegation convening the meeting. I recall having called a meeting at the request of the South African and Irish Free State delegations to the Red Cross and Prisoners of War Conferences. The United Kingdom delegate who at that time was the Ambassador to Berlin was quite unaccustomed to Commonwealth procedure and he had on one or two occasions in the Conference spoken on behalf of the British Commonwealth of Nations, without even consulting us. This was considered such a breach of Commonwealth procedure that we could not permit it to pass unchallenged. The meeting in my office, at which I presided, was called for the purpose of informing the United Kingdom delegate and did so inform him that he was unfamiliar with the established procedure under which he could speak only in the name of his own delegation. Minutes of the proceedings of these meetings were taken only rarely as it was felt that delegates should be free to express their own views without any record being kept.

7. These meetings were of different kinds and for different purposes. Sometimes they were solely for the giving of information as to the difficulties which certain questions before the Assembly or Conference presented to a particular delegation, or as to the progress being made in delegates' negotiations with foreign Governments. Frequently they were for consultation as to what was the best attitude to take under these circumstances, or even for the drafting of proposals which would give the largest measure of satisfaction to all the delegates and which might be put forward in the name of one of the delegations. Then again they might deal largely with important questions of the procedure which it would be most advisable for Commonwealth members in the Bureau of the Assembly or Conference to advocate or support. The permanent representatives accredited to the League played an important role in helping to maintain cooperation in their respective groups. More than two-thirds of the Members of the League had such representatives in Geneva. They were accredited to the League of Nations and many of them to the International Labour Organization as well. The Scandinavian countries had very able representatives, as also had the Little Entente. The Latin American countries were also very well represented. These representatives not only worked within their group but also kept in touch both informally and formally with the other permanent representatives. As you know until my transfer to Washington in 1937 I had the honour of being the Dean of the Diplomatic Corps and presided regularly over their official deliberations.

8. It may be of interest therefore for me to describe in more detail the part that the permanent representatives of the Dominions played in the correlation of Commonwealth policy. Three Dominions, viz. the Irish Free State, the Union of South Africa, and Canada, had duly accredited representatives to the League of Nations and the International Labour Office. The Irish Free State appointed its permanent representative in 1923, Canada in December 1924 and South Africa in 1929. The functions of these permanent representatives on the whole differed little from those of diplomatic representatives accredited to the heads of states, except that more of their time was taken up with representation at Assemblies, international conferences, commissions and so forth. Because of their permanency in Geneva these officials played a very considerable part in bringing about cooperation between the Commonwealth delegations. The fact that we had attended scores of group meetings was of great assistance in explaining to delegates coming to Geneva for the first time the possibilities and the desirability of cooperation. Through the British Foreign Office officials who came regularly to Geneva, as well as the more or less permanent officials of the other two Dominions who resided in London, we were able to keep in close touch with one another's foreign policy, to explain these respective policies and to keep our Governments informed of the position taken by the other Dominions and the United Kingdom in matters coming before the League. In addition, the commentary which I, as Canadian Advisory Officer, prepared on the items of the agenda of the Assembly each year was intended to give to the Canadian Government not only assistance in drafting its instructions but also a discussion of the questions in such a way that if pre-Assembly consultation with the other Members of the Commonwealth seemed necessary it might have afforded a basis for such discussion.

9. From the above it will be evident that in my opinion Commonwealth consultation did prove useful. It brought more or less like-minded delegates together, and by furnishing them with necessary information frequently provided a factual background of the general setting of the Assembly or conference which was invaluable for effective participation in the work of the session. When a new situation developed it afforded delegates an opportunity to take decisions with more of the relevant facts before them, thus making reasonable and necessary compromises possible. I have already pointed out that on occasion the members of the Commonwealth have opposed one another with regard to certain proposals and have voted against one another, but on the whole they were able to reach a large measure of unanimity. This was no doubt the result to a considerable extent of the desire for cooperation which characterised the work of the Commonwealth delegations at Geneva.

10. It aroused little suspicion, no more than consultation among the members of the other groups, and certainly not enough to have any adverse effect on the work of the League. Commonwealth cooperation at Geneva might have been improved. Negative and blocking tactics often received more enthusiastic support than constructive and creative activities. Permanent representation and ad hoc representation could have been more effective. As regards the permanent representation, while there was no organized operation among the three permanent representatives of Commonwealth countries they were in such close personal touch that organization was unnecessary. Cooperation would have been furthered if all the Dominions had had permanent representatives. Both Australia and India had considered the question of appointing representatives and the reports were favourable, but financial and political difficulties stood in the way of accomplishment. Another weakness was that the methods of procedure at the group meetings were apt to change from year to year depending somewhat upon the political complexion of the Governments in office and the attitude of the head delegates of the various delegations. The ideal would have been full participation by all the delegations on all important matters. For various reasons this was not always obtainable. It was sometimes suggested, and with some reason, that the various meetings were too much devoted to the giving of information and the seeking of approval of proposals put forward by the senior member rather than to proposals arrived at jointly after consultation which might then have been put forward by any Member of the Commonwealth with at least the tacit approval of the other Members. Commonwealth cooperation nevertheless was on the whole successful and useful.

11. It did develop certain techniques. Meetings could be called at the instance of any delegation desiring them. The first delegate of the "calling" delegation usually presided. Minutes of the discussions, except for the first meeting or two I attended, were never taken. It is quite possible that certain delegates may have kept a record of the proceedings of some of these meetings dictated from memory. These meetings were convened for various purposes, the commonest being for the exchange of information with regard to instructions and to learn of contemplated proposals, particularly at the opening of a session; to assist one another to obtain a clearer idea of the attitude of foreign Governments; and to exchange information on how we were likely to vote on proposals coming before the Assembly, Conference or Commission. In fact Commonwealth consultation at Geneva was able on the one hand to convince the delegates who came to Geneva that the seven Commonwealth votes were not controlled by any one member and on the other hand it was able to achieve a surprising amount of unanimity on most matters of vital importance.

12. The memberships of the general international organization according to the Moscow Declaration is to be based upon the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states. The recognition of "sovereign equality" would seem to render unnecessary the Commonwealth trying to "speak with one voice as a single great power". It will not lessen, however, the need for group consultation. If an international peace and security organization is to operate on the basis of sovereign equality, unanimity or near unanimity will be necessary for action. Experience at Geneva I believe has shown, contrary to some ill-informed critics, that the achievement of this result was appreciably advanced by Commonwealth and group consultation.

London, March 4, 1942

IMMEDIATE. MOST SECRET. My immediately preceding telegram. Following is text of statement, Begins: His Majesty's Government having considered anxieties expressed in this country and in India as to fulfilment of promises made in regard to the future of India, have decided to lay down in precise and clear terms the steps which they propose shall be taken for earliest possible realization of self-government in India. The object is the creation of new Indian Union which shall constitute a Dominion associated with the United Kingdom and other Dominions by a common allegiance to the Crown, but equal to them in every respect, in no way subordinate in any aspect of its domestic or external affairs and free to remain in or to separate itself from equal partnership of British Commonwealth of Nations.

His Majesty's Government therefore make the following declaration:

(a) Immediately upon cessation of hostilities, steps shall be taken to set up in India, in manner described hereafter, an elected body charged with the task of framing a new Constitution for India.

(b) Provision shall be made as set out below for participation of Indian States in Constitution-making body.

(c) His Majesty's Government undertake to accept and implement forthwith Constitution so framed, subject only to:

(1) The right of any province of British India that is not prepared to accept new Constitution to retain for the time being its present Constitutional position, provision being made for its subsequent accession if it so decides.

With such non-acceding provinces, should they so desire, His Majesty's Government will be prepared to agree upon a new Constitution on lines analogous to those here laid down.

(2) The signing of a treaty which shall be negotiated between His Majesty's Government and Constitution-making body covering all necessary matters relating to complete transfer of responsibility from British to Indian hands.

Whether or not an Indian State elects to adhere to Constitution it will be necessary to negotiate a revision of its treaty arrangements so far as this may be required in the new situation.

(d) The Constitution-making body shall be composed as follows, unless the leaders of Indian opinion in principal communities agree upon some other form before the end of hostilities:

Immediately upon the result being known of Provincial elections, which will be necessary at the end of hostilities, the entire membership of the Lower Houses of the Provincial Legislatures shall as a single Electoral College proceed to election of Constitution-making body by system of proportional representation. This new body shall be in number about one-tenth of the number of Electoral College.

Indian States shall be invited to appoint representatives in the same proportion to their total population as in the case of the representatives of British India as a whole and with the same powers as British Indian members.

(e) While during critical period which now faces India and until the new Constitution can be framed, His Majesty's Government must inevitably bear the full responsibility for India's defence, they desire and invite immediate and effective participation of leaders of the principal sections of the Indian people in the counsels of their country to give their active and constructive help in discharge of a task so vital and essential for the future freedom of India.

MOST IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Your circular telegrams No. 120 and 121. Following from Prime Minister for your Prime Minister, Begins: The Canadian Government heartily welcomes the statement of policy laying down the steps it is proposed to take for the earliest possible realization of complete self-government in India⁸. We attach the highest importance to its early issue and believe it is in the interest of all the United Nations that the utmost expedition should be exercised in promulgating the new programme. We believe that a fully self-governing India has a great part to play in free and equal association with the other nations of the British Commonwealth and that a free India, fighting alongside the other free peoples of the world, will strengthen immeasurably the common cause. We have had under consideration, from time to time, advisability of exchanging representatives with the Government of India and would be glad to make an early appointment of a High Commissioner for Canada in India if it was thought that such action on our part would help to signalize India's emergence as an equal member of the Commonwealth. His Excellency Dr. T. V. Soong, Chinese Foreign Minister, at present residing at Washington, visited Canada within the last few days. One of his sisters, as you doubtless know, is the wife of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. Soong told me that in a communication which he had received direct from Chiang Kai-shek since his interviews in India, Chiang Kai-shek had stated that he doubted if Britain could count on the necessary support in India to save situation there unless immediate action were taken to insure to India full Dominion status. He said Chiang Kai-shek himself felt that the alleged difficulties which might arise between Mohammedans and Hindus had been greatly exaggerated. Chiang had done all he could to convince leaders that their interests like those of himself and the people of China lay in giving British all possible support but was convinced that unless self-government problems could be met immediately, this would not be forthcoming to the extent necessary to save existing situation which he regards as extremely precarious. You no doubt have this information which Soong has communicated to United States Government and possibly also to British Ambassador. I have felt, however, that you might like to know that I felt much impressed by what Soong said to me and that all my colleagues in the government are very strongly of view that no time should be lost in accepting and making known the proposals set forth in your telegram. Following for your Prime Minister, Begins: Since issue of my telegram of March 4th, Circular D. 120, regarding proposed Declaration of Policy as to India we have considered matter further. Having regard to the military situation, the complications of Indian problem, and possible repercussions of an announcement of a constitutional plan for India at the present time, we have decided it would be unwise to publish Declaration of Policy without having taken soundings as to the kind of responses which it will evoke. We have therefore decided to send Sir Stafford Cripps to India as a Special Emissary of the War Cabinet to seek agreement of Indian leaders on basis of Declaration which remains agreed policy of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom.

In the circumstances, the Prime Minister will on Thursday announce our decision to send out Sir Stafford Cripps for the purpose indicated.

It is in the circumstances of special importance that strict secrecy should be preserved as regards terms of Declaration of Policy which we had proposed to make, and I am sure I can rely upon you to help in this. PRIVATE AND PERSONAL. Strictly private and personal. Following for Mr. Churchill from Mr. Mackenzie King, Begins: I have been giving much thought to the situation in India. It occurs to me that it might be of assistance to the Government of the United Kingdom and to the success of Cripps' mission were Cripps to be fortified by an expression from each of the self-governing Dominions of their readiness to co-operate at the time of peace negotiations in insuring immediate recognition of India's status as one of equality with the other self-governing parts of the British Commonwealth of Nations. This I should think could be arranged by communication with the Dominion Premiers in a manner which would avoid necessity of any public discussion or debate. As evidence of readiness of Dominions to accord recognition of Dominion status to India in so far as that may be possible while war is in progress, an exchange of High Commissioners between the Dominions and India might be immediately arranged. Having regard to the evolution of self-government in Canada and the position taken by Canada in peace negotiations after the last war, and at subsequent Imperial Conferences with respect to equality of status of all self-governing parts of the British Commonwealth, it might well be that strong assurances to India on the part of Canada as to helpful role we would be prepared to take on her behalf, might not be without some real effect at this time. Without ascertaining, in the first instance, the views and wishes of yourself and Amery, I naturally hesitate to make an official move of any kind. If, however, the War Committee of the Cabinet of the United Kingdom felt that an association of the self-governing Dominions with the Government of Great Britain in Cripps' present mission to India would be at all helpful, I should like you to know that my colleagues and I would be ready to lend any good offices that may be within our power. I feel quite sure that Smuts, Curtin and Fraser would be equally ready to give assurances on parallel lines.

I have thought it best to communicate direct with you in this personal and confidential manner before discussing the suggestion with anyone, even Amery. I should be obliged, however, if you would let Amery know of the contents of this communication which I would like to have regarded as intended equally for him.

I should perhaps add that when Dr. Soong was in Ottawa, I told him that he could feel wholly assured that the Dominions and, in particular, Canada were wholly sympathetic with India's desire for self-government, and that their influence to that end might be relied upon in conferences immediately succeeding the termination of the war. I have no doubt that this word has been passed on by Soong to Chiang Kai-shek. Ends.

Le Premier ministre au ministre des Affaires étrangères de Chine
Prime Minister to Minister for Foreign Affairs of China

PERSONAL

Ottawa, March 16, 1942

As mentioned to you over the long distance phone yesterday, I was more than pleased to receive your exceedingly kind letter of the 3rd instant^f. It was a very great pleasure to me to make the acquaintance of Mrs. Soong and yourself, and particularly to have the opportunity of the confidential talk with you which we had together at the time of your visit. I am glad, indeed, to know that the visit itself has left to the members of your party and yourself, the happy memories of which you speak in your letter.

As I said to you in conversation and repeated again yesterday over the phone, I am most anxious that Canada's influence should be exerted to the full — as indeed is the wish of the Canadian people — in helping to meet some of the appalling situations with which the united nations are faced at the present time. As Canada was the first of the Dominions within the British Empire to win complete self-government, it has seemed to me that an assurance by Canada of her readiness to assist in obtaining for India, equality of status with other of the self-governing dominions of the British Commonwealth might be of real assistance in the situation at present existing in India.

I recall with [sic] interest with which you looked at the proclamation which placed a reward on the head of my grandfather William Lyon Mackenzie, at the time he was the leader, in Canada, in the struggle for responsible government. Being a grandson of Mackenzie, and occupying the position which I have for some years past, it has seemed to me that the leaders in India might have reason to feel that Canada's interest in their cause would be a very real one, and that any assurance given in the name of Canada would be honoured to the letter.

You may recall my saying to you that I thought the appointment of Mr. [sic] Cripps as leader of the House of Commons in Britain was because of his known democratic sympathies, and that I believed it was immediately related to the situation in India. The decision of Mr. Cripps himself to go to India had not, so far as I am aware, been made at that time. It has seemed to me that if Mr. Nehru and Mr. Gandhi had reason to know that any representations Mr. Cripps might make on behalf of the British Government would be backed up to the letter by Canada, it might be helpful all around. Personally, I have no doubt that it would be possible to have like assurances from the Prime Ministers of the other self-governing dominions: Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa.

While the matter of self-government within the British Commonwealth of Nations is a matter primarily for the several governments of the Commonwealth, I have no doubt that our friend Mr. Roosevelt would also be prepared to lend the good offices of the United States toward helping to assure the implementation of any undertakings which might be given by the Government of Great Britain to India at the present time.

I see, of course, great difficulties in the way of arranging any conferences, representative of all the nations of the British Commonwealth, or of the united nations while the war itself is in progress. I see, however, no reason why undertakings might not be given immediately which, with assurances on the part of the self-governing dominions and the United States, would then be as certain of fulfilment immediately upon the termination of the war as if they were put into effect today. Moreover, I doubt if, in the long run, it would further the interests of self-government in India to attempt to bring a new Constitution into being at a time of actual war.

By chance, a night or two ago, I happened to come across a little pamphlet in reference to myself which was issued in the course of the last general elections in March, 1940. Since that time, it has occurred to me that some of the biographical material it contains might be of interest to you and, indeed, of possible interest to His Excellency Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek and possibly also to Nehru. It helps to throw light on the extent to which I might be expected to take a special interest in the movement for self-government on the part of India, and also on the authority which might attach to any promise which might be made to India, in my name, on behalf of Canada. Perhaps, in the circumstances, you will excuse me if I venture to enclose one or two copies to be retained or to be used by yourself in any way you may think might be of service.

This letter is, of course, entirely personal and wholly unofficial. It has seemed to me that before attempting anything of an official nature, it would be preferable to write you in this personal way. You will know better than I what value to attach to any of the suggestions or ideas the letter contains. I need scarcely add that this letter, like my message to you over the phone, is being written wholly at my own instance, and without suggestion from any source. Should you wish to acquaint Mr. Lauchlin Currie with its contents, I, of course, would be only too pleased to have you do so.

Dear Mr. Currie,

I thank you most warmly for your kind letter of the 6th instant.[†] I am indeed pleased to know that the recent visit to Ottawa of our Chinese friends, and Mrs. Currie and yourself, has left the many happy memories it has.

I very much enjoyed the talk we had together, and only wish that it might have been of longer duration.

General McNaughton was delighted with the interview which he had with the President. His talks with members of the different staffs were also of the greatest value to him, and indeed I think, I may well say, to all of us. I am deeply obliged to you for your thoughtful initiation of this exceptional and helpful step.

I have tonight been writing a letter to Dr. Soong which he may show to you. It contains the suggestion that assurances to be given by Canada, and other of the self-governing dominions, of their readiness to see that any undertakings for complete self-government by India given by Cripps on behalf of the British government, are fully implemented, might be of assistance in the present difficult situation. I have no doubt too that President Roosevelt will be equally prepared to have the United States lend its good offices toward having the leaders in India believe that its influence, as well as that of other of the United Nations, would be exerted to see that whatever the undertakings might be given, will be fulfilled to the utmost and without delay. I can see wherein it is going to be almost impossible for any final settlement to be made while the war is in progress. There is no reason, however, why a comprehensive undertaking should not be immediately given, together with sufficient in the way of assurances on the part of the self-governing dominions in the Commonwealth, and of other nations, to place its immediate implementation, once the war is ended, beyond all shadow of doubt.

With kindest remembrances and regards to Mrs. Currie and yourself,

Yours very sincerely,

[W. L. MACKENZIE KING]

Le secrétaire d'État pour l'Inde et la Birmanie au Premier ministre

Secretary of State for India and Burma to Prime Minister

London, March 17, 1942

My dear Mackenzie King,

The Prime Minister has just shown me your most generous and helpful telegram about India, as well as his reply.⁹ It is of course perfectly true, as he points out, that the problem is one of immense difficulty, that Congress has committed itself to extreme policies, and that we cannot afford any immediate settlement which would shake the loyalty of the Army or interfere with recruiting. For all these reasons it would no doubt be as well that you should stay your hand, so far as any public declaration goes, until we know how far the Cripps Mission has succeeded or failed.

Personally, I fear that the latter is the more probable alternative, and that the bulk at any rate of Congress will reject our policy because it does not give Indian political leaders the immediate control of the conduct of the war. The practical objections to that are obvious, but there is the equally serious political objection that by this the Congress leaders mean control for themselves and the opportunity to shape the future of India to their liking, regardless of the wishes of the minorities or of the Princes. That is why even a moderately extensive degree of co-operation in the present Government of India is only possible if Cripps can bring about some measure of agreement on the future.

By "failure" I mean, of course, immediate failure to bring about an agreement between Indians and the immediate co-operation of the political parties. That need not be altogether failure from the long-term point of view. For two years I have been trying to tell Indians that if they want a free and united India they must shape it themselves by agreement, just as every Dominion has framed its own constitution; that the suggestion that they cannot agree and must therefore have a constitution imposed by us which they can then all criticise, is evidence of a real unreadiness to shoulder the responsibility of freedom. Now Cripps is going to bring this home to them in even more direct fashion and make it clear, I hope for good and all, that if they cannot agree they are not going to secure what they want by belabouring the British Government. From that point of view Cripps' Mission, even if it fails in its immediate object, may help to pave the way for Indian agreement a little later on.

Meanwhile, I do feel that, agreement or no agreement, the interest that would be shown in India and the recognition of India's status implied in an exchange of High Commissioners between India and Canada, would be of the very greatest help with a sensitive people like that of India, and I hope to take up that suggestion of yours with the Viceroy without delay.

Similarly, no doubt, when the peace negotiations come in sight, a lead from the senior Dominion in welcoming the Indian delegates to the Peace Conference as in the fullest sense equals, would be immensely helpful. By then, whatever happens to Cripps' Mission, the political situation may have ripened further and it may become possible for India to be represented at the Peace Conference by men representative, not merely of the official Government of India, but of the main elements in her political life.

Once again, let me express my warm appreciation of your generous initiative, which I am sure will bear useful fruit.

Yours ever,

L. S. AMERY

SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following from Mr. Churchill for Mr. Mackenzie King, Begins: Personal and Secret also Private. Your telegram No. 79.¹⁰ Question which has to be solved is not one between British Government and India, but between different sects or nations in India itself. We have resigned ourselves to fighting our utmost to defend India in order if successful to be turned out. Congress have hitherto definitely refused Dominion status. Moslems, a hundred millions, declare they will insist upon Pakistan, i.e. a sort of Ulster in the north. We have our treaties which must be respected with Princes in India, over ninety million. There are forty million Hindu Untouchables to whom we have obligations. These are the grim issues which Cripps is valiantly trying to settle. There can be no question of our handing over control during the war. This would break up the Indian Army, eighty-five per cent of which cares nothing for Congress and is loyal only to the King-Emperor. It would render the defence of India impossible. I should strongly recommend your awaiting developments till we see how the Cripps' mission goes. I have shown your telegram to Amery. Ends.

Minister for Foreign Affairs of China to Prime Minister

PERSONAL

Washington, March 24, 1942

Dear Prime Minister,

Thank you so much for your letter of the 16th, which reminds me once again of the friendly intimacy with which you have honored me since meeting you in Ottawa. It is indeed China's good fortune that we have in you an ally who is so far-seeing, and is even now giving thought to the difficult problems of peace, which in their way are perhaps even more difficult of solution than the immediate military situation.

As I told you over the telephone last night, General Chiang Kai-shek is greatly encouraged by your warm interest in the prompt and satisfactory solution of the Indian problem, and he has passed on your message to his Indian friends, who are all most appreciative. Now that Cripps has arrived in India, it is the Generalissimo's belief that, after having shown the Indians where your sympathies lie, the next move would be to await the outcome of Cripps' conversations.

Should these conversations unfortunately break down, he hopes that you will then take the initiative and call for an immediate conference of the various members of the Empire to settle the Indian problem. While recognizing that it is primarily a question for the various members of the British Empire, he would be glad to be associated with you and to lend his assistance in any way that is required of him. I have no doubt that our mutual friend, President Roosevelt, would also be more than glad to lend a helping hand, so that in the titanic struggle in which we are engaged, the issue between us and the Axis powers would be clearly defined, our side representing the hope and future of all mankind.

I am delighted to receive the copies of the little pamphlet issued during the General Elections of March, 1940. While much of what it relates is already known to me, I am sending it on to the Generalissimo and to Nehru, who would be interested to know the background of the friend who is destined to play a common role with them.

I am having the Australian Minister for External Affairs, Mr. Evatt, and his wife to dinner tonight, together with Mr. and Mrs. Felix Frankfurter. I shall certainly pass on to Mr. Evatt your warm message of greetings and your hope that he can visit Canada very soon.

With kindest regards, in which my wife joins me,

Yours sincerely,

TELEGRAM CIRCULAR D. 538

London, December 11, 1942

MOST SECRET. Following for Prime Minister from Prime Minister, Begins: We have for some time past had under consideration the question how to deal with the considerable volume of criticism which is heard from time to time regarding British Colonial policy. Recent events in America — for example Mr. Luce's article in Life and Mr. Wendell Willkie's recent speeches, have raised the question in an acute form. It is clear that there is a widespread and rooted feeling in the United States which regards the British Colonial Empire as equivalent to the private estate of a landlord preserved for his own benefit. Clearly this view is unreasonable but it is no use ignoring its existence. Moreover, we must, if we can, endeavour to get the United States to express their willingness to enter some general defence scheme which would include the defence of Colonial areas. Their assistance however will not be forthcoming unless we can secure their general goodwill. With this in view it is essential that we should act now to convince United States opinion that our Colonial policy is not a danger and an anachronism as certain quarters in that country are inclined to regard it.

Some time ago His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington had a discussion with the United States Secretary of State on this matter. Mr. Hull referred to the question how the statements of the Atlantic Charter¹¹ could best be utilised to guide opinion wisely in relation to backward peoples of differing grades and capacities, and said that his idea was to get some general statement in which we might all assert broad purposes, making plain that attainment of freedom involved mutual responsibility of what he called "Parent States" and of those who aspired to it. He was prepared to include a very clear expression against officious intervention from outside with affairs which were responsibility of Parent State and said that wide variety of the problem could be appropriately stressed.

It appears to us that Mr. Hull's suggestion affords a valuable basis for further action and we have been considering, in consultation with General Smuts, during his visit to London, what would be most convenient course.

It seems to us that as a first step it would be desirable that we should endeavour to remove the misconceptions about British Colonial policy which are prevalent in the United States and elsewhere. We should explain that principles on which our Colonial policy has been founded, how within our resources we have consistently applied liberal ideas in social, economic and political sphere for the benefit of the peoples concerned, and how our administration of backward territories has never meant that others have been deprived of free access to their resources. Lord Cranborne's recent speech in the House of Lords¹² was therefore designed with this object in view.

¹¹ Voir le volume 7, document 327.

It is clearly important that we should encourage the United States to look outwards rather than inwards and to be a World Power rather than a Hemispheric Power. For this purpose we should do well not to resent but rather to welcome American interest in the British Colonial Empire and there would be advantages in so arranging our affairs that the United States joins in public acceptance of a line of policy towards Colonial peoples and their development.

As a next step, therefore, we should propose to follow up suggestion thrown out by Mr. Hull and propose a joint declaration (to which other Colonial Powers might possibly subscribe) on the general Colonial question. Such a document, if participated in by the United States Government, should do much to damp down the restless irresponsible and ignorant criticism which has been prevalent in America and help dispel the illusion that this is an Anglo-American question, whereas it is of course of equal concern to all Powers with overseas possessions. It would not of course constitute informal commitment on the part of the United States to join in a general defence scheme for Colonial areas, but it would certainly be a step towards to [sic] acceptance of obligations for defence.

We are greatly attracted by Mr. Hull's conception of "Parent States" and something on the lines of his remarks on that point would be an essential basis of the declaration. With this in mind as a basis, the line which we should like to see such a declaration take would be as follows:

(1) First aim of United Nations is to defeat present aggression and render future aggression impossible.

(2) This aim requires for its successful achievement the establishment of conditions under which security and prosperity can be assured to all nations. Since it is evident that there are certain peoples whose social equipment and resources are not yet such as to enable them to achieve these ends by themselves, it will be a clear responsibility of all Parent States to enter into general defence schemes designed to ensure freedom from fear for all peoples.

(3) The Parent States must aim to promote the social, economic and political well-being of peoples who are unable without danger to themselves and to others to assume full responsibility for their affairs. Defence having been assured, the Parent States with their special qualifications for the task must accept the duty of guiding and developing the social and political institutions of the territories with which they are concerned, that their peoples may in due course be able to discharge the other responsibilities of Government.

(4) By this combination of defence and orderly development the Parent States will fulfil their responsibilities to those peoples and enable them to enjoy rising standards of life and to continue their advance along the path of progress. In pursuance of this policy the natural resources of Colonial territories will be organized and marketed not for the promotion merely of commercial ends, but in the best interests of the peoples concerned and of the world as a whole.

We should propose that His Majesty's Ambassador should, in the first place, sound Mr. Hull on the above list of points as the basis for a declaration. If Mr. Hull agrees that a declaration on these lines would be in accordance with his views, His Majesty's Ambassador would then explain to him that we think that practical application of these principles would need to be discussed and agreed as soon as the declaration had been published and inform him that our present line of thought is:

(a) That necessary practical measures would take the form of machinery for consultation and collaboration between Parent States with the aim of ensuring a common policy in those regions of the world in which they have interests as Parent States. For this purpose Regional Commissions composed of representatives of such States should be constituted. Provision should also be made for the representation of nations which have a major defence or economic interest in the regions concerned. Such regions might be, first the Far East, secondly Africa, and thirdly the West Atlantic, and any others which at a later stage may seem appropriate.

(b) That within this framework and subject to the principles laid down in paragraphs (2) and (3) of the joint declaration responsibility for administration of its own territories would rest with the individual Parent State concerned.

Should be glad to learn as soon as possible whether you have any comments or suggestions to make regarding the above proposals. You will appreciate that we are very anxious to proceed with the matter with the least possible delay.
Ends.

London, December 12, 1942

MOST SECRET. Following for the Prime Minister, Begins: Dominions Office telegram Circular D. 538 of December 11th. Informal discussion on proposed declaration referred to in this wire took place yesterday at Dominions Office and certain observations were made which would seem worthy of consideration. It was suggested that in the outline of proposed declaration the emphasis on defence aspect and the language employed in referring to it might lead to misunderstanding in Washington. Secondly it was thought that it would be wiser to make clear to the American Government that it is the intention of the British Government in any event to pursue course with regard to its own Colonies outlined in paragraph 3, and that this is in no way conditional. It was also suggested that status, functions, and membership of Regional Commissions referred to in (a) should be more clearly defined.

The document was drawn up by a Committee composed of Attlee, Cranborne and Eden but it has full concurrence and approval of Oliver Stanley who has just succeeded Cranborne. Stanley has emphasised the importance of speedy action in connection with proposals which are to be submitted to the United States Government. The matter has now been under consideration for a good many months and he is most anxious to have the proposal placed before the Secretary of State as soon as possible lest something might happen to change atmosphere in Washington which, when the subject was last raised by Mr. Hull, was very favourable to something along lines of draft declaration which is now proposed. Government here would therefore much appreciate the views of Canadian Government as soon as it is possible for you to give the matter consideration. Ends.

I submit some hasty and perhaps immature observations on Dominions Office Circular D. 538 of December 11th concerning projected discussions with the United States on future Colonial policy. This telegram asks rather urgently for an early reply and the anxiety of the United Kingdom Government to proceed without delay is emphasized also in Mr. Massey's telegram on the same subject, No. 3074 of December 12th.

1. I agree that it is a matter of considerable importance to deal with the criticism rampant in the United States of British Colonial policy. I agree, also, that much of this criticism is due to ignorance and that a fuller understanding of the purpose and methods of administration, in parts of the Colonial Empire at any rate, should in itself remove many misconceptions in the United States. I agree emphatically with the statement at the top of page 3 of the telegram that it is important that the United States should be encouraged to look outwards rather than inwards and to be a world power rather than a hemispheric power. This should be a dominant concern of all of us and should not merely be confined to consideration of Colonial questions. The suggestion made by Mr. Hull for a joint declaration is too interesting and valuable not to be followed up but I suspect that there will be many difficulties and delays in arriving at an agreed text and I doubt very much whether the United States will agree to a text on the lines indicated on pages 4 and 5 of the telegram.

2. I share the doubts expressed by Mr. Massey over the wisdom of putting defence in the forefront of the proposal submitted to the United States. Not only do I think that this idea will be rejected in Washington but I also believe that it is the wrong way to approach the post-war security problem. It is certainly unreasonable to expect a public commitment by the United States to enter into a general defence scheme for the protection of colonies before there has been any discussion of the post-war security system as a whole. It cannot fairly be represented that the dominant purpose of any general scheme in a world constituted like ours will be to allow the peoples incapable of developing in independence to grow up in safety.

3. I have no other objections to make to the four points set out in the telegram as a possible basis for a joint declaration but I think that they should in all probability be supplemented. I understand that you intend to prepare a note on the possibility of including a proposal for the abolition of Colonial preferences as a concrete evidence of British intentions. The Colonial preferences in general tend to be an irritant in the United States and particularly to Mr. Hull, whereas their real value is now open to serious questioning. I am not sure whether something ought not to be said about the operations of the big Colonial trading companies like the United Africa Company and Lever Brothers to which there is a considerable opposition in England itself.

4. It is open to question whether a joint declaration on Colonial policy, even if it won general commendation in the United States, would meet the criticism of British Imperialism unless it is accompanied by some further and satisfactory statement of policy towards India.

5. On page 5 of the telegram a suggestion is made for a regional organization of "parent states" in regional commissions, actual administrative responsibility in each territory being left to the Colonial power. It would seem to be contemplated that the regional commissions would operate along the lines intended for the League Mandates Commission but would be composed only of representatives of the "parent states" interested in the particular regions. There may be a good deal to be said for this idea but it is very difficult to judge its value except in relation to the sort of general international political organization to be set up after the war. A region most ripe for treatment on these principles would be the Caribbean area.

While I was in London I was present at several discussions of Colonial policy. The main purpose often seemed to me to be rather to placate and educate opinion in the United States than to consider Colonial problems on their merits. On one occasion Lord Cranborne, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, was seeking some word to substitute for "colony" on the true ground that this was taken in the United States to imply autocratic government in the interests of the mother country. On another occasion Mr. Harold Macmillan, Parliamentary Under-Secretary for the Colonies, who is one of the ablest young ministers, developed a scheme for devolving Colonial responsibility in certain cases from the United Kingdom to Dominion Governments. I told him that I thought Canada was not interested, that we had our own Colonial problems inside our national boundaries, that I doubted whether the inhabitants of the British West Indies would welcome government from Ottawa instead of from London, but that we might be interested in participating in some form of international regulation in the Caribbean area with which the United States was associated. I think that he threw out this idea mainly to provoke discussion. He, like Lord Cranborne, was anxious to find some linguistic method of breaking down the sharp distinction between the self-governing and nonself-governing parts of the British Commonwealth. Mr. Richard Law, Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who was also present, criticized Mr. Macmillan's proposals and expressed rather strong views on the desirability of curbing the activities of the big companies operating in the Colonies.

RE: STATEMENT ON BRITISH COLONIAL POLICY

Apparently the main purpose in issuing the statement is to clear up misunderstanding regarding future British policy. A statement along the lines proposed, however, would appear to be largely a justification of British policy in the past, and would indicate no major change in that policy. This would not help matters, since the existing criticism is largely based on past British policy.

Emphasis on the necessity of defence guarantees might be used in the United States by critics of British policy as evidence of a British trick to draw the United States into a guarantee of the British Colonial Empire, unless there is indication, at the same time, of a drastic change in the nature of all Colonial government.

Apparently the regional commissions suggested would have purely advisory functions. Moreover, there is no indication that the commissions would be responsible to a central body. Both of these conditions would make for weakness. What is even more important is the apparent trend toward Great Power supervision. There is no indication that the colonies themselves would be represented on the commissions. Nor is there any indication that nations which at present do not possess colonies would be allowed representation; yet such nations, as neutral third parties, should have valuable contributions to make.

The policy indicated is very disappointing. It appears to be a step backward from the mandate system. As a disinterested third party, Canada is in a good position to make strong representations to the United Kingdom on this matter, pointing out the unsatisfactory nature of the proposals and possibly making counter-suggestions. (In this connection Rasminsky's draft¹³ prepared at Mont Tremblant¹³ might be interesting.)

I think if the matter goes to the War Committee that it might be advisable to do more than report on the telegram from Great Britain. Suggestions regarding a reply could be offered.

PERSONAL

Ottawa, December 16, 1942

Dear Hume [Wrong],

I am returning herewith the material on colonial policy you sent me yesterday and I enclose a memorandum of my own comments on this material and also the synthesis of views on colonial policy[†] which was reached at the I.P.R. conference at Mont Tremblant.¹⁴

I would like to stress the following points more than I have done in my memorandum:

American suspicions regarding British colonial policy are so widespread that nothing short of a major step will allay them. If the British put up a proposition which is unimaginative and unprogressive, not only will no good be accomplished, but positive harm. For the critics, including the friendly critics, of ¹⁴ Conférence de l'Institut des relations du Pacifique du 4 au 14 décembre.

¹⁴ Conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations, December 4-14.

British policy will find in such a proposition confirmation of their suspicions and fears.

I feel quite certain in my own mind that the present British proposal is a backward step. It goes no further than the old Mandates Commission; in fact it does not go so far for the Mandates Commission was representative of genuine third-party interest while the British proposal is not. But more important, the emphasis on security would be very broadly interpreted in the United States as an attempt on the part of the British to edge the Americans into underwriting the British Empire without the British even giving real commitments regarding their future colonial policy.

I think that you will find the Mont Tremblant declaration on colonial policy¹⁵ worth reading. Lord Hailey started with a proposal identical with that contained in the British telegram¹⁵ and after being subjected to several days' criticism from most of the rest of the conference he and Captain Gammans, a Conservative M.P. who has lived in Malaya and knows a good deal about colonial policy and administration, finally agreed to the declaration. You will see that it goes very much further than the original proposal and in view of the British acceptance of this at Mont Tremblant it would seem to me worth while putting up to the British Government something along these general lines.

I have in my mind one or two other points which I shall not bother you with now as they would arise only if our Government decided to reply constructively to the British telegram.

Yours sincerely,

L. RASMINSKY

Mémoire du président suppléant, la Commission de contrôle du change étranger, au sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Alternate Chairman, Foreign Exchange Control Board, to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

The following points have occurred to me on examining Mr. Churchill's telegram to Mr. King and Mr. Massey's telegram and your own memorandum:

1. I entirely agree that to place security questions in the forefront at the present time will not meet the purpose which the joint declaration is designed to serve, namely allaying American suspicions of British colonial policy. It is perfectly clear that the American Administration is in no position to give any commitments in this matter. This was so repeatedly stressed by the official group of Americans at Mont Tremblant that there seems little doubt of what the Administration view regarding American public opinion in this matter is. To come forward now with a statement on colonial policy which starts by stressing the need for American commitments regarding security would be generally interpreted in the United States as a mark of insincerity regarding the future of British colonial policy itself, and as an attempt to get the USA to underwrite the Empire.

2. I entirely agree with your point regarding India but I do not think that it would be possible to work into a joint declaration of the sort envisaged any direct references to India. Could it not, however, be done by opening with a general reference to the aims of the Atlantic Charter which would make it clear beyond doubt that the Atlantic Charter is intended to apply to all parts of the world. The reservations Mr. Churchill made regarding its application to India have left considerable suspicion in American (and also Canadian) minds. It is important that this suspicion should be dispelled and this would be a convenient way of doing it.

3. If a joint declaration is to be made, there are certain general points which seem to me should be stressed more than the British proposal. One is their desire to hasten the attainment of self-government in the colonial areas. Another is their desire (again referring to the Atlantic Charter) to secure social and economic progress, a rise in the standard of living in these areas. The concept of trusteeship should be stressed and in this connection the lack of desire for any special economic privilege and the freedom of access to raw materials are relevant. Most important of all, as it seems to me, would be a clear statement that the colonial powers recognize that they have a moral responsibility to the rest of the world for the manner in which they discharge their obligations of "parent-hood" in the colonial areas.

4. The heart of the problem, which to my mind is not met by the proposed British declaration, is the willingness on the part of the colonial powers to introduce third-party judgment on their colonial administration. It is only through third-party judgment that their moral responsibility to the rest of the world can in fact be discharged. The proposal of the British telegram goes some way towards meeting this but not as far as it will be necessary to go if the objections to British colonial policy are to be effectively met. The British proposal was put up to the I.P.R. Conference at Mont Tremblant by Lord Hailey and aroused no enthusiasm among the non-British participants. It is in fact a proposal for a sort of syndicated imperialism with the admission of the United States and other countries to purely advisory functions on condition that they are willing to assume some responsibility for security in the areas concerned. It seems to me that if the purpose of the proposed declaration is to be achieved it will be necessary to do more than this. It will be necessary to (a) provide for genuine third-party interest, that is representation of non-colonial powers, and (b) to provide for representation of the indigenous peoples themselves. Lord Hailey and the other British representatives finally agreed to this at Mont Tremblant and the Annex to the Report of the group on South-Eastern Asia, to which they subscribed, provides for genuine third-party representation. The British also agreed that if outside powers were willing to assume some responsibility for security in the Pacific the proposed Council could be endowed with more than purely advisory and consultative functions. In particular they agreed that it should have (a) the right of investigation on the spot, (b) the right to call for reports from the colonial power on the progress made and planned towards the achievement of self-government and the progress made in improving economic and social conditions, and (c) the right to suggest lines of policy directed towards the two major objectives just named.

5. Even if no assurances regarding security arrangements can be obtained at the present time, the consultative body proposed should still be representative of genuine third-party interest, i.e. it should include representatives of the indigenous peoples and non-colonial powers, and the British at Mont Tremblant agreed that even in this case there was no reason to withhold from such a body, which would have its own technical staff, the right of investigation on the spot.

6. Some concrete action would go much further to allay American and Canadian suspicions than a general statement of policy. The concrete action which could be taken at once would be the establishment of an international body with advisory functions representing the colonial powers, the indigenous peoples and outside interests. Even if this body did not have much to do at the present time (and it obviously could not in the Pacific area) it would create the impression that the British were progressive and forward-looking in this matter and genuinely determined to carry out the aims of the Atlantic Charter.

PROPOSED DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND UNITED KINGDOM ON COLONIAL POLICY

Dominions Office Circular telegram D. 538 of December 11th brings to the attention of the Canadian Government for comment and suggestions the steps contemplated to meet with the criticism prevalent in the United States of British Colonial policy. It is requested that any comments should be telegraphed to London immediately.

They propose to follow up a suggestion made by Mr. Hull (I think sometime before the November elections) that a joint statement setting forth the broad purposes of the United Kingdom and the United States Governments on Colonial policy should be issued in amplification of the relevant passages in the Atlantic Charter. The chief points which they think in London should be proposed for this joint statement are set forth in the telegram. They relate to the ending of present and future aggression, the development of a general defence scheme by "parent states" (a phrase borrowed from Mr. Hull to replace "Colonial powers”) and the responsibility of parent states for the social, economic and political well-being of peoples not yet capable of independence. If Mr. Hull were to agree to these points the British Ambassador would propose as a practical measure the creation of Regional Commissions composed of representatives of parent states which have major defence or economic interests in the regions; three regions are suggested,— the Far East, Africa and the West Atlantic.

There is no doubt whatever of the great importance of British Colonial policy as a present and future element in the relations between the United States and the United Kingdom. (In the United States Colonial policy is associated with Indian policy which is not referred to in the telegram). I feel, however, that the suggested approach to the United States would have most unfortunate effects and that it might aggravate the present controversies by implanting new suspicions in the minds of senior United States officials. I think, therefore, that it would be desirable for us to comment promptly, as invited, on the proposed plan.

The outstanding weakness in it is the emphasis on defence which would be construed by many in Washington as an attempt to commit the United States indirectly to full participation in a world security system. I think that in discussions dealing with future Colonial policy it should at this stage merely be assumed that an international security system will be framed by the United Nations after their victory. An approach on the proposed lines would tend to look like hypocrisy to many in Washington.

Secondly, the suggestions for Colonial policy proper do not imply any progressive step. The proposed Regional Commissions made up solely of the parent states interested in each region and without third-party representation are in theory at least a backward step from the Mandate system established after the last war in which disinterested third parties played an important part. There is also nothing new in the statement of social, economic and political purposes towards Colonial territories. What is needed to meet criticism in the United States is both education on the realities of British Colonial administration (which is often ignorantly attacked) and some new evidence of genuinely progressive intentions.

I would suggest that an immediate reply should be sent to the telegram saying that we have serious doubts over the form of the suggested approach and that we shall telegraph our views at length after full consideration. I understand that at the Conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations at Mont Tremblant, which has just concluded, the British Delegation tried out on the American representatives the scheme outlined in this telegram and that they had a very chilly reception. The scheme certainly seems to ignore some important realities of present American opinion.

MOST SECRET. Your Circular telegram D. 538 and our interim reply No. 271.[†]

1. We are hesitant to comment on the substance of your proposals for the development of Colonial policy since we feel that this must remain the primary responsibility of the Government of the United Kingdom and of the other parts of the British Commonwealth which control Colonial territories. We are, however, deeply interested in the effect on Anglo-American relations of problems of Colonial policy. The comments which follow contain our estimate of the effect on United States opinion, both official and general, of the proposals outlined in your telegram. We do not wish to express any definite views on how Colonial policy should be developed; our particular concern is whether these proposals are in fact likely to achieve their purpose.

2. We are in general agreement with your estimate of the importance of taking steps to deal with criticisms in the United States of British Colonial and Indian policy and also with the desirability of following up Mr. Hull's suggestion for a joint declaration on this subject to which other Colonial powers might subscribe.

3. We have no special comments to offer on the first six paragraphs of your telegram except to say that the criticisms of British Colonial policy found in the United States are also present to some degree in Canada.

4. Concerning the proposed joint declaration we consider that the emphasis placed on defence in paragraph 2 is likely to be misinterpreted in the United States and to be regarded in some quarters as an effort to secure indirectly a prior commitment for participation in the defence of the British Colonial Empire in advance of a general settlement. We believe that at this stage it is wisest to assume that the victory of the United Nations will result in an effective system of international security, and to refer only incidentally to defence in this approach. While security is a prerequisite of progressive Colonial development, it is, of course, equally important to states which are not Colonial powers.

5. It seems to us that informed opinion in the United States would consider that points three and four of the proposed declaration ought to be expanded to include some recognition that colonial development has become a legitimate subject of international concern. It would meet this if the reference to the responsibility of "parent States" were extended in the declaration so as to make it clear that this responsibility is not only towards the indigenous peoples, but also towards enlightened world opinion. While there is much in the present criticisms in the United States that is ignorant and captious, the main concern would appear to be not merely to explain and defend the record but to encourage a greater sense of responsibility for orderly progress throughout the world.

6. This might be accomplished if the proposed declaration were expanded so as to make the approach less negative and conditional. For example greater emphasis might be placed on the rights of native peoples to participate as much as possible in the conduct of their own affairs, and the opportunity might be taken to remove misgivings about the universality of the Atlantic Charter, and to underline that the various declarations on the necessity of raising living standards after the war apply to colonies as well as self-governing areas.

7. Regarding the practical application of the principles of the declaration the proposal to establish international Regional Commissions would, we think, in general be welcomed in the United States, but it appears to us that opinion there would expect more than the admission of the United States and other directly interested countries for the purpose of "consultation and collaboration" on condition that they assume some responsibility for security. Your suggestion would limit participation to "parent states" and nations with major defence and economic interests in the regions concerned. Critics might argue that "parent states" ought clearly to recognize their position of trusteeship not only towards the people of colonies but also towards the rest of the world, and that this requires the introduction of genuine third-party opinion, involving participation in Regional Commissions by representatives of countries without great interests in the regions. Furthermore, unless some provision is made for representation on the Commissions of the indigenous peoples themselves, the scheme might not be regarded as constructive and progressive. Some importance might also be attached to the right of the proposed international bodies to maintain their own technical staffs and to make their own investigations in colonial territories.

8. We do not profess to judge whether it is feasible at this time for proposals of greater weight and content along the lines suggested above to be presented to the Government of the United States. We fear, however, that the approach will not achieve the desired results unless it is more comprehensive and explicit.

Supplementing our telegram to Dominions Office, we have told the United Kingdom High Commissioner that public attention in Canada and the United States is concentrated more on India than on the Colonial Empire and that if the approach to the United States makes no reference even indirectly to India we doubt that the atmosphere will be thoroughly cleared. We have also told him that we are somewhat concerned over the possible effects in the United States of the continuance of a form of Colonial rule in Newfoundland although we do not wish to raise the question of any immediate change in its status. Mr. MacDonald is telegraphing to the Dominions Office on these points.

You may think it wise to discuss with Attlee the contents of this telegram.

Your telegram No. 2395 of December 24th. I saw Attlee yesterday and conveyed to him your views on the subject of questions of India and Newfoundland in relation to proposed declaration. I also emphasised the points made in paragraph 6 of your telegram No. 274 of December 23rd. I think he appreciates importance of these suggestions. Halifax has sent a wire from Washington in which he expresses views similar to those in paragraph 4 of your telegram No. 274 and which resembles your telegram in other respects.

IMPORTANT. MOST SECRET. Your telegram of December 23rd, No. 274. Following for the Prime Minister, Begins: We are very grateful for your helpful comments and criticisms on the subject of Colonial policy.

After full consideration of the whole question and with the views of other Dominion Governments also before them, the Cabinet are now disposed to authorise Lord Halifax to approach Mr. Hull on the basis of the revised draft statement, the text of which is set out in my immediately following telegram Circular D. 14.

As you will see this statement has been redrafted in a manner which we hope substantially meets your suggestions with one exception, namely, that relating to the inclusion of representation of third-party opinion on the proposed Regional Commissions. It seemed to us that any attempt to follow too closely the analogy of the Permanent Mandates Commission would lead to weakness by introducing an element of irresponsibility and that it would be better to rely for protection of general world interests on the collaboration of the various authorities with direct and important interests in the areas concerned. Provided that as we have assumed this would in each region include the United States, we think that sufficient provision would be made for safeguarding the general world interest.

Should be very grateful if you would telegraph any further comments at earliest possible moment. Matter is now becoming extremely urgent and we should like to send instructions to Washington early next week, Lord Halifax having promised Mr. Hull a further conversation at an early date. Ends.

IMPORTANT. MOST SECRET. Following for the Prime Minister, Begins: My immediately preceding telegram. Following is revised text, Begins: The immediate object of the United Nations is to defeat the present aggression and to render future aggression impossible. This requires for its successful achievement the establishment of conditions under which security, prosperity and equal opportunity can be assured to all peoples.

2. This then is the aim of those nations which have, owing to past events, become charged with responsibilities for the future of Colonial peoples. But it is evident that while some peoples are far advanced along this road, the development and resources of others are not yet such as to enable them to achieve security and prosperity by themselves. It is therefore the duty of "parent or trustee" States to guide and develop the social, economic and political institutions of the Colonial peoples until they are able without danger to themselves and others to discharge the responsibilities of Government.

3. Freedom from fear and want should be the assured possession not of some, but of all peoples. It is the clear responsibility of the "parent or trustee" States to enter into general defence schemes designed to secure the safety of all peoples. The duty of guidance must be discharged in the general interest of all nations as well as in the particular interest of the peoples of the territories concerned. In pursuance of this policy, the natural resources of Colonial territories should be organised and marketed not for the promotion merely of commercial ends but rather for the service of the people concerned and of the world as a whole.

4. The "parent or trustee" States will remain responsible for the administration of their territories. But the policy embodied in this declaration cannot successfully be pursued without a large measure of co-operation between nations. We accordingly propose the establishment for certain regions as soon as circumstances permit, of Commissions comprising both the "parent or trustee" States concerned in the region and other States which have a major strategic or economic interest there. The machinery of each Commission should be designed to give the people of the territories an opportunity to be associated with its work. These Commissions will provide effective machinery for consultation and collaboration so that the States concerned may work together to promote the advancement of the Colonial peoples and the general welfare of mankind. [Ottawa,] January 12, 1943

I had a talk with Malcolm MacDonald this morning about the latest draft of the statement on colonial policy which the United Kingdom propose to communicate to the United States Government. I told him that your reaction to it was wholly favourable and that you felt it marked a great improvement on the original text. I thought there were one or two drafting points which had struck us in comparing the different texts and which he might, if he thought the suggestions useful, pass on to London.

In particular, we thought the second sentence of paragraph 3 of Dominions Office telegram D.14 which reads "It is the clear responsibility of the 'parent or trustee' states to enter into general defence schemes designed to secure the safety of all peoples" might still be regarded as an attempt to secure a prior commitment from the United States for participation in defence of the British Colonial Empire and that as now phrased it mixes up statements applicable to all peoples with statements applicable only to colonial peoples.

I thought the general purpose they had in mind might be a bit more clearly put along the following lines:

"In accordance with the Sixth Article of the Atlantic Charter it is the clear responsibility of all the United Nations to enter into general arrangements designed to secure the safety and prosperity of all peoples. It is the special responsibility of 'parent or trustee' States to ensure that the safety and prosperity of Colonial peoples are safeguarded."

Mr. MacDonald thought this would be a clarification and improvement of the text received.

MOST SECRET. My telegrams Nos. 4 and Circular D. 14. Colonial policy.

We are grateful for Canadian Government's suggestions conveyed to us through our High Commissioner on January 12th.

As regards amendment to paragraph 3, we agree with substance of this proposal but we are not sure whether the exact form of words suggested would be quite satisfactory. We have tried to meet the point by splitting the paragraph into two paragraphs and slightly re-wording them, including a reference to the Atlantic Charter. We have not included suggestion that the Regional Commissions should have the right to maintain their own technical staffs and to make their own investigations, as we feel that it would involve too much detail at the present stage. We are anxious to avoid being committed to any particular form of machinery at present.

In the light of your observations and those of the other Dominion Governments we have now instructed Lord Halifax to make personal approach to Mr. Hull on the basis of the revised draft statement contained in my immediately following telegram Circular D. 54. Lord Halifax is being asked to leave the draft with Mr. Hull after his talk but only as a basis of discussion.

MOST SECRET AND PERSONAL. Your telegram No. 61 of April 6th[†]. Following from Prime Minister for Prime Minister, Begins: Subjoined I send you privately an advance copy of the telegram which we propose to send to all the Dominions. The matter is urgent on account of the difficulty of finding a period when all can meet together. I think it essential, however, to have a conference of this kind even if some of the Prime Ministers have to send representatives, although this would be a great misfortune. Ends.

Following is telegram referred to, Begins:

The time has now come when we must devote serious thought to the planning of the future world organisation, both in the period immediately following the cessation of hostilities and also for the long-term settlement. The lessons of 1918, when we were caught unprepared by the end of the war, show how necessary proper planning is. This time let us make sure that we are ready both with our armistice terms when the enemy sues for peace and with our long-term plans.

In this planning it is essential that the British Commonwealth and Empire should take its full share. Each of us has his own contribution to make, but only by working together in full co-operation and agreement can we ensure that our proper influence and collective strength are exerted.

Already, as you know, some progress has been made with the detailed working out of plans for dealing with specific post-war problems, more especially on the economic side. But all these plans presuppose some general political organisation and we have recently found our planning hampered by the absence of any clear formulation of our combined policy in the post-war world.

I suggest, therefore, that at this stage it would be most valuable if the five Prime Ministers could meet together to discuss these problems and agree upon the part which the British Commonwealth and Empire can and should take in organising world affairs. Apart from the intrinsic value of such private discussions on the major issues which we shall soon have to face, I attach great importance to demonstrating to the world our solidarity and strength.

I hope that you will find it possible to attend such a meeting here. I can well understand that it is not easy for you to leave your country for any prolonged absence, but I very much hope that, by careful timing, we may be able to arrange a date convenient to all and not involving prolonged delay for any. Please let me have your views as soon as possible. I should myself like a meeting in June or July, but if that is impracticable then I hope that August or early September could be arranged. Ends.

I shall do my utmost to arrange matters here so as to be present at a time most convenient for all to meet together. A meeting in late June or in July would I think be preferable to August or early September.

In reply to your earlier telegram No. 70, I had prepared a somewhat lengthy statement¹ setting forth what seemed to me strong reasons against attempting to hold at a time of war an Imperial Conference of the conventional type. From the reference in your telegram to the suggested designation "British Commonwealth and Empire" I gathered the Imperial Conference to be called might be concerned largely with questions of intra-Imperial relations, and that almost certainly would raise questions respecting status of India and other constitutional issues. I was suggesting instead a meeting of Prime Ministers for purposes of conference on lines you now propose. I was about to send this communication when your present message was received but am not now forwarding it. I am much relieved to find that we are apparently of same mind as to a meeting of Prime Ministers being preferable to an Imperial Conference. Ends.

If the meeting is to serve the purposes indicated, it is, I think, important that it should be one of Prime Ministers only. Great care must, moreover, be taken to see that no ground for misunderstanding as to the underlying purpose of any conference should be given to any of the Allied Nations.

Now that the Australian and South African elections are over, and that the New Zealand election has been fixed for September, Mr. Churchill greatly hopes that it will now be found possible definitely to arrange a meeting of the five Prime Ministers in London in November. There are strong reasons for holding such a meeting as explained in that telegram, and recent events have indeed emphasized the desirability of early consultation between the Prime Ministers, especially on post-war problems. It is not, of course, a formal Imperial Conference of the pre-war type that is in mind, but a meeting of the five Prime Ministers, the number of official advisers being kept to the minimum.

The importance of adequate preparation was stressed in replies to the Prime Minister's earlier message. We are fully alive to the importance of this, and if the date proposed is generally acceptable we would send as soon as possible, for your consideration, suggestions as to the agenda for the meetings and as to the best method of arrangement for the necessary preparatory work. As time is short for this the Prime Minister would be grateful for the earliest possible reply. Ends.

 IMMIGRATION

858.

DEA/5418-40

Le secrétaire aux Dominions au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
Dominions Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs

DESPATCH CIRCULAR D. 24

London, April 2, 1943

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom feel it desirable to invite the attention of His Majesty's Governments in the Dominions to the question of migration. This aspect of the problems of post-war reconstruction is one which is of vital interest to all members of the British Commonwealth, and moreover is one which in a particular degree requires mutual co-operation and joint planning.

2. The question of migration was the subject of a comprehensive study from the point of view of the United Kingdom, before the outbreak of the war, in the Report of the Oversea Settlement Board of which a copy was enclosed in the late Lord Stanley's despatch C. No. 136 of the 30th June, 1938^t. A single copy of the Report^t is enclosed in this despatch for easy reference.

3. The Report opened with an analysis of the general principles affecting migration from the United Kingdom. After briefly referring to international considerations (paragraphs 9-12) and the importance of British stock as a source of increased population in the Dominions (paragraphs 13-15) it went on to deal with population trends in the United Kingdom (paragraphs 16-24, 38). It pointed out (paragraph 39) that hitherto nearly all Governments, in considering migration within the Empire had made, either overtly or tacitly, two assumptions, the second being that there was a surplus population in the United Kingdom which it was desirable to transfer to the Dominions in order to provide an increase in the population there. It stated (paragraphs 40-47) that it could no longer be assumed that large scale migration from the United Kingdom could still take place, and suggested that, if an increase in the population of British stock of any particular Dominion was desired, it was for the Dominion concerned to encourage migration from the United Kingdom.

4. To the considerations mentioned in the Report should now, of course, be added the experience of the war. It will, I think, be generally agreed that the war has emphasized the Dominions' need for larger populations from the Defence aspect. It has also brought about important alterations in the internal economy of many parts of the Empire by the increase in secondary industries. This development may well offer wider scope for the absorption in the Dominions of industrial workers from this country than has been offered in the past when land settlement has had a prominent place in migration schemes. The war has moreover produced in the United Kingdom a general and widespread interest in migration and an expectation that when the war ends the Governments concerned will be ready with plans to promote it.

5. The Report of the Oversea Settlement Board also dealt at considerable length with methods of migration (paragraphs 49-58, 82-85). It laid down the principle that migration was essentially a question of partnership between participating countries and this implied that, if assistance was given, such assistance should be afforded not merely by the Government of the United Kingdom in encouraging the departure of individuals from this country, but as a joint enterprise in which the "receiving" country should take at least as active a part in the matter as the "giving" country (paragraph 51). So far as methods of migration are concerned, the Board, in paragraph 82 of their Report, expressed themselves in favour of placing reliance "primarily upon what is described as 'infiltration', namely, the settlement on the land, or otherwise, of single individuals or families in existing communities as and where they may find room for themselves, or room may be found for them The most fruitful means by which infiltration can be assisted, is, in our view, the system of nomination, whereby individuals or groups of persons resident overseas may nominate persons resident in this country for the grant of an assisted passage, the nominator accepting responsibility for the person nominated in the initial stages of settlement".

6. In the widest sense, the method of "infiltration" is always operative and can be operative without any Government intervention in the country of departure. Under this method, no impression can be given that the primary responsibility for successful settlement rests anywhere else than on the individual migrant, and it will thus help to preserve his personal initiative which is so essential a quality in the achievement of success as a settler. In this connection, one factor which in future will probably loom larger than it has done in the past is the extent to which an emigrant from the United Kingdom will be able to carry with him, on entry into the Dominions, the benefit of any rights for which he may have qualified under Social Insurance Schemes in the United Kingdom as an equivalent in corresponding local schemes. The importance of this point cannot be over-estimated and from the United Kingdom point of view it is under consideration in connection with Sir William Beveridge's Report on Social Security. I shall hope to address you further as to this as soon as possible but in the meantime I assume that Dominion Governments will also wish to consider the problem from their point of view.

7. Even under "infiltration" schemes, however, it would not be possible under present-day conditions for the United Kingdom Government to divest itself of interest in the migrant after his departure. It is not in the interests of the United Kingdom that a migrant should depart from this country on reaching the age of maturity to find that conditions in the country of arrival are unfavourable to his earning a livelihood, with the result that he may fall into destitution and even be returned to this country to make a fresh start in life. With rising standards of life in this country, public opinion will be more exacting in future as regards the steps to be taken to ensure the well-being of a migrant after he has arrived in the country of destination. The further care of a migrant after entry is thus also a matter which requires the full co-operation of the 'giving' and 'receiving' Governments. The essential element, from the point of view of the United Kingdom Government, is that under modern conditions, and particularly in view of the hazards of industrial life, some continuing machinery should be set up in the country of settlement to watch over the interests of the migrant who is genuinely seeking employment, but through no fault of his own is unable to secure it, and that this machinery should be not merely local in character, but should extend over the whole area of a Dominion in order that information of possible openings, both in the place where the migrant happens to be and elsewhere where conditions may be more suitable, may be made available to him.

8. Paragraphs 79 to 97 of the Board's Report also develop the suggestion for a greater measure of planned co-operation than has existed in the past. The Board suggest, in paragraph 79, that there should exist in the Dominions, in so far as it does not exist already, machinery through which the current needs of the Dominions for specific types of workers may be ascertained as precisely as possible, and through which these needs may be correlated with the supply available in the United Kingdom. In paragraph 97, the Board go on to suggest that machinery should be provided, as in former years, for making available full and reliable information regarding the Dominions, and for giving advice to the intending migrant as to the best means of achieving his objective. As regards the last suggestion, the establishment in the United Kingdom of machinery for making available full and reliable information regarding the Dominions and for giving advice to the intending migrant is of course a matter for action by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom. Such machinery cannot act efficiently unless it is able to secure full, up-to-date, and reliable information of current conditions (particularly as to industrial occupations) from each Dominion to which migration is taking place and that such information can only be obtained on an adequate scale if suitable machinery has been established in the Dominion with adequate resources in staff to enable the information to be collected. The question of establishing such machinery would seem to be one of the requisite steps to be considered by a Dominion Government which is anxious to promote migration in future to its territories. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom would, for their part, be ready to take the measures recommended in the above paragraphs of the Report, so far as lies with them.

9. A further point in the Report of the Oversea Settlement Board merits special consideration. In paragraph 94 the Board recommend the establishment of reduced passage rates for migrants "which, while bringing the cost of the passage within the reach of the average person desiring to proceed overseas yet leave the settler on arrival overseas within the category of an unassisted migrant". This recommendation embodies one of the most important practical steps which can usefully be taken to assist migration and, if adopted, would be likely to produce a considerable increase in the numbers proceeding from the United Kingdom to the destinations to which such reduced rates would apply.

10. The Report of the Oversea Settlement Board also referred briefly to international considerations (paragraphs 9-12, 48). The war is likely to bring this matter into even greater prominence than in the past and, just as there may be a stronger desire in the United Kingdom for the resumption of migration from this country to other parts of the Empire, so foreign countries are likely to press for facilities for the admission of members of their own communities into the Dominions. The population trends analysed in the Board's Report go to show that the Dominions could not rely on this country alone to provide an influx of population to meet fully a demand for a rapid influx of population. If a policy of admitting foreign immigration on a selective basis is regarded as a legitimate ideal in a Dominion, the question would presumably arise of giving special consideration to the admission of nationals of countries Allied with us in the war, but is not intended to suggest that a decision on this question would be practicable here and now. It seems, however, desirable to mention the matter here as it will no doubt be a live issue in the post-war situation and may, indeed, arise with considerable force before the termination of the war.

11. The foregoing paragraphs of this despatch deal with the general considerations relevant to a policy of assisted migration after the war. There are however certain more immediate problems which will arise as soon as hostilities end. These will result from the demobilisation of the Armed Forces of all the Governments concerned, and of the resettlement of ex-service personnel in civil life. There is no doubt that the prospects of migration to the Dominions as one of the possible methods of seeking a livelihood in the future are already exercising the minds of many members of the Forces of the United Kingdom. This question is likely to call for some public statement of policy, probably before the end of the war. One aspect relates to the demobilisation of ex-service personnel who may already be in a Dominion at the time of the termination of hostilities and desire to settle there. Accordingly His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom have recently appointed a Committee to consider the immediate problems as to oversea settlement resulting from the general demobilisation of the Armed Forces of the United Kingdom. A copy of the Committee's Report is enclosed; their recommendations are summarised in paragraph 20.

12. It will be seen that the Committee have recommended that the United Kingdom Government should adopt a free-passage scheme, somewhat on the lines of the scheme which was in operation from 1919 to 1922, for such ex-service men and women and their dependents as may be approved for admission to the Dominions. Under the proposal in the Committee's Report, the United Kingdom Government would provide free transportation to the port of disembarkation overseas, and the Dominion Government would be asked to bear the cost of the rail journey to the final destination in the country of settlement. Dominion Governments would be asked to set up, at their own expense, the machinery necessary for the examination of applicants in the United Kingdom and for the reception and after-care of approved settlers after their arrival overseas. It is suggested that permission should be given, on certain conditions, for the demobilisation of United Kingdom Service personnel in a Dominion, if such action is approved by the Government of the Dominion, and that such personnel should retain the right to repatriation to the United Kingdom for two years from the time of their discharge. The free passage scheme would, in general, extend to the dependents in the United Kingdom of a married man demobilised overseas, but his right to repatriation in such cases would cease as soon as the grant of free passages to his dependents had been approved. Alternatively, his right to demobilisation in a Dominion would not be granted if the category of dependent was not, in general, acceptable to a Dominion Government.

13. The United Kingdom Government are prepared for their part to accept the recommendations of the Committee and would be glad to learn the views of Dominion Governments on them.

14. A subsidiary point considered by the Committee relates to the classes of dependents to be recognised as eligible under the free-passage scheme. The same question also arises for an entirely different purpose (set out in paragraph 1 of their Report) in connection with the repatriation of members of the Armed Forces who have come from overseas to join the Armed Forces of the United Kingdom and become entitled to repatriation at the expense of the United Kingdom Government and His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom would be glad to have the views of Dominion Governments on this point as discussed in paragraph 16 of the Report.

15. I have thought it well to set out in the preceding paragraphs the main issues in relation to migration from the United Kingdom to the Dominions to which the Oversea Settlement Board Report of 1938 calls attention. In view of the importance of the question to the future of the British Commonwealth of Nations, it would, I suggest, be desirable that there should now be an interchange of views between the several Governments on the policy to be adopted after the war so far as this can at present be determined. It would, I think, be useful if the principles formulated in that Report as set out above could be taken as a basis of discussion. I should accordingly be glad to receive the views of Dominion Governments on these lines. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom fully realize the difficulty of reaching any final conclusions on the policy while the future of the post-war world is still so uncertain and indefinite. Nevertheless they are confident that a preliminary examination of the problem ought if possible to be undertaken.

16. A copy of this despatch is also being sent to the Government of Southern Rhodesia.

[Ottawa,] May 17, 1943

I attach a copy of a lengthy despatch from the Dominions Office (Circular D. 24 of April 2nd) which proposes an interchange of views between Commonwealth Governments on the question of migration after the war. The bulk of the despatch is devoted to a summary of the 1938 Report of the Oversea Settlement Board (paragraphs 2-10). Paragraphs 11-13 deal with a Report of an Interdepartmental Committee on Oversea Settlement on Demobilization dated February 1, 1943, the recommendations in which have been accepted by the United Kingdom Government. I attach a copy of this Report.¹ Paragraph 15 proposes a general interchange of views on the whole question.

I have received a letter from Sir Patrick Duff dated May 8th¹ urging that early and sympathetic consideration should be given to the whole question and especially to the immediate problems that will arise of special facilities for migration on demobilization:

“The United Kingdom authorities are very much hoping that early and sympathetic consideration can be given to the issues raised and to hear an expression of the views of the Canadian Government on the general problem. It is recognised that the study of this matter may inevitably take some time: but included among the wider considerations is the more immediate and concrete problem which will arise as soon as hostilities end, of special facilities on demobilisation. This particular aspect is dealt with in paragraphs 11 and following of the Secretary of State's despatch. Mr. Attlee hopes very much that a reply on this more restricted issue may not have to wait until comprehensive views on the broader problem are forthcoming".

I am sending the enclosures under a covering letter to the Departments of Mines and Resources, Labour, Pensions and National Health and Finance.

DESPATCH A. 248

London, August 9, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to my previous despatches concerning the Committees under the Chairmanship of Lord Hankey which are considering the further education and training of members of the Armed Forces and the posts which will be open to them on demobilisation.

2. At one of these meetings Mr. Johnson was asked if he could provide an estimate of the numbers of persons belonging to the United Kingdom who might be employed in Canada after the war, excluding persons in the employ of the United Kingdom firms operating in Canada. Mr. Johnson pointed out the magnitude of the problem facing the Canadian authorities in providing employment for the members of the Canadian Armed Forces and persons engaged in war work, and thought that the prospects of United Kingdom residents obtaining employment in Canada for the first three years after the war at any rate, were practically negligible. He did, however, undertake to refer the request to the Canadian Government to see if they would be able to give an estimate.

3. You will understand that these Committees are concerned with posts which are normally filled by persons with training above Secondary School standard. The appendix of F.T. (43)3 contains a list of most of the callings concerned with the corresponding qualifications. The Note F.T. (43)3¹ containing this appendix has already been sent to you, but for your convenience I am enclosing a copy of the appendix[†] herewith.

Ottawa, September 13, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. A.248 concerning the possible employment in Canada after the war of members of the United Kingdom Armed Forces. While it is not practicable for the Canadian Government to give an estimate of the character contemplated by the members of Lord Hankey's Committee, it is perhaps possible to add a little to what Mr. Johnson told the Committee.

2. It is a matter of common knowledge that it will be the concern of all governments, after the conclusion of hostilities, to maintain conditions which will ensure, as far as practicable, what is generally termed full employment. It is equally obvious that the training and employment of members of the Armed Forces will be a primary objective.

3. It is only if these two objectives can be achieved in Canada that there is likely to be any scope for an immigration policy. On the other hand, the achievement of full employment and of a reasonably high national income would be very likely to make Canada attractive to prospective immigrants and at the same time capable of absorbing them with advantage to the country.

4. It is impossible to say with any confidence whether or not full employment can be reached and maintained in Canada; nor is it possible to say how long a period must elapse before the civil establishment of members of the Armed Forces will be completed. There would, therefore, appear to be a very considerable hazard in educating, or training, members of the United Kingdom Armed Forces specifically for careers in Canada.

5. As the immigration law stands at present British subjects from the United Kingdom who are in good health and who have sufficient funds to maintain themselves until employment is secured may enter Canada. If they come they do so at their own risk, and it would not be fair to them that we should hold out any expectation as to what employment conditions are likely to be at the end of the war.

6. Mr. W.S. Woods, Associate Deputy Minister of Pensions and National Health, informs us that he expects to be in England shortly and hopes to discuss the matter with Mr. Johnson with reference to the activities of his Department in providing for the re-establishment of members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

Dear Sir Patrick [Duff],

I am referring to your conversation with Mr. Wrong and myself on September 22, on the subject of the possibility of migration from the United Kingdom to Canada when the war is over. This conversation concerned a request which was originally advanced in Circular despatch D. No. 24 of April 2, 1943, and special attention has more recently been drawn to the particular question of permitting the demobilization of United Kingdom service personnel in Canada.

While it may be some time before the Canadian authorities are able to make any commitment in respect of these questions, it may be useful to set out a few general considerations.

In the course of the war very great changes have taken place in the Canadian economy and it is not at all an easy matter to predict the lines on which that economy will develop in the post-war period. The most immediate concern of the Canadian Government, when the war ends, will be the demobilization and re-establishment in civilian life of the personnel in the Canadian armed services. As you know, careful preparations have been made to deal with this problem.

It is becoming increasingly clear that the policy of most countries after the war will be directed to attaining and preserving what is rather loosely called "full employment". In so far as full employment is achieved in Canada, conditions will presumably be established which are very favourable to the economic absorption of suitable immigrants, but, until full employment is achieved, immigration is likely to be popularly regarded as an economic danger which may increase the magnitude of the problem. If immigrants receive employment at a time when large numbers of Canadians are unable to secure employment, or at a time when large numbers of Canadians are migrating to the United States, the popular movement for restricting immigration might easily become irresistible.

In advancing these considerations I am not losing sight of the fact that from the point of view of the United Kingdom it will be very difficult to postpone the emigration of demobilized personnel until it can be seen how the post-war economy of Canada is developing. However, as the time of demobilization approaches, it may be possible to look into the future with more confidence than at present. For one thing the ability of Canada to maintain full employment and a high standard of living will depend in large part on the arrangements which can be made with respect to international trade in the post-war world. I understand that at the present time substantial progress is being made in the course of discussions on this subject between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of the United States, and it is to the outcome of such discussions, perhaps on an even broader scale, that we must look for guidance when we attempt to make economic forecasts.

Turning to the specific question of the demobilization of the United Kingdom personnel in Canada, who elect to remain in this country, I am inclined to think that the problem is somewhat simpler. The numbers affected cannot be very large and it may be possible for the United Kingdom authorities to give us a fairly accurate estimate of these numbers. If we may assume that the numbers will not be large enough to make a serious difference to the general problem of re-establishing service men in Canada, the ideal solution would appear to be for the United Kingdom Government to provide for its personnel in Canada conditions of demobilization and civil re-establishment comparable to, if not identical with, those provided by the Canadian Government for its own personnel. It may not be practicable for the United Kingdom Government to do as much as this, but it would be a rather unfortunate development to have two classes of ex-service men seeking a place in civilian life who are on very different terms with respect to educational opportunities, assurance against the hazards of unemployment and against the hazards of disabilities resulting from injuries received in the course of the war. I cannot help thinking that ex-service men from the United Kingdom will be seriously handicapped in their effort to establish themselves in Canada if they have to compete with Canadian ex-service men who know the country and have, in many cases, an established position to which to return, unless the United Kingdom service men have at least comparable treatment from their Government on demobilization.

I hope that the considerations which I have set out in this letter may help to provide a basis for constructive discussion. It might be possible for the United Kingdom authorities to examine the preparations which have been made in Canada for the re-establishment of returned soldiers and to see how far they are prepared to go along similar lines in the case of United Kingdom personnel discharged in Canada. You will probably come across a book by Mr. Robert England entitled Discharged which gives a good account of these preparations.

Yours sincerely,

*Mémoire du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

*Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
to Prime Minister*

[Ottawa,] November 20, 1943

As you know, the United Kingdom Government have been anxious, for some months, to receive an indication of the Canadian Government's general attitude towards questions of post-war immigration. We have explained that it is almost impossible for the Government to consider questions of immigration policy until the general post-war international economic framework takes firmer shape. Moreover, in the year or two immediately following the close of hostilities, our major task will be the reabsorption into civilian occupations of the million, four or five hundred thousand persons who are now in the Armed Services or in war industries. Until this job is in a fair way to accomplishment, it would be almost impossible to give much consideration to the question of an organized immigration policy.

There is one specific question of limited scope, however, to which early consideration will have to be given in connection with plans for demobilization. On the assumption (which may be modified in the light of prospective changes in the air training programme) that there would be a substantial number of United Kingdom air personnel in Canada at the time the war ended, the United Kingdom wishes to find out whether the Canadian Government would see objection to the demobilization here of those who wish to make their homes in Canada. We have had some preliminary discussion of this question with representatives of the Departments of Labour, Pensions and National Health and Immigration. We all feel that the numbers involved are likely to be so small, in relation to the general problem of demobilization, that we could safely give the United Kingdom an affirmative answer to this enquiry.

I understand Mr. Crerar may bring the question up in Cabinet War Committee within the next few weeks.²²

Dear Mr. Robertson,

Thank you for your letter of the 4th November in which you set out a number of general considerations concerning the possibility of emigration from the United Kingdom to Canada when the war is over. I am arranging for a copy of your letter to be forwarded to London for the consideration of the authorities there together with the volume Discharged to which you make reference. I shall not fail to let you know as soon as I receive their reply.

In the meantime the Dominions Office have forwarded to us various comments based on the views which had been expressed in previous discussions on this matter and it may be useful to you to have these comments at once.

²² La note suivante était écrite sur ce mémorandum:

Please have Heeney bring this before me for Council (not war committee). K[ING]

²² The following note was written on the memorandum:

The United Kingdom authorities agree that the question of the settlement of demobilised ex-service men has a very considerable bearing on the general problem of migration. But they feel that there are two considerations which are worth bearing in mind. First there is a time-limit over the question of the demobilised personnel. They are obtainable at the time of demobilisation in a way in which they are not obtainable later when they have settled down into other employment. Secondly, the handling and the success of the settlement of demobilised personnel will be of great value as an indication of what is required and what is possible in the long-term policy.

The United Kingdom authorities recognise the difficulties due to the uncertainty of post-war economic developments, but, as set out above, it seems to them that there is much to be said for the settlement of demobilised personnel being given a trial as a pointer to future migration schemes rather than being held up because of its possible bearing upon future migration.

The United Kingdom authorities entirely agree with the importance of giving the ex-service man and woman sent from Great Britain assistance substantially equivalent to that given to the demobilised Canadian. It seems to them that this is an essential requirement for the success of this, or, indeed, any migration scheme.

It is extremely difficult to offer any suggestion as to the numbers likely to be involved but the Departments concerned are being asked whether they are yet in a position to give any idea of the sort of numbers in the following categories:

- (1) ex-Service men who will actually be in Canada at the time of demobilisation
- (2) ex-Service men who have spent a considerable time in Canada but have left by the time of their demobilisation
- (3) ex-Service men who have not been in Canada at all.

The only useful figure at the moment is that of the 1919 scheme. The sailings for Canada under that scheme from 1919 to the end of 1922 were:

11,539 men
7,522 women
7,499 children
26,560 Total

So far as the United Kingdom authorities are concerned, they would regard it as an essential feature of the scheme that the Canadian Government should do what it thinks reasonable to satisfy itself as to the suitability of the persons concerned for settlement. War disabilities of a nervous character would certainly seem to them to accord reasonable grounds for disqualification, at any rate if they were in any way serious.

I should be very glad to discuss this matter further with you at any time that you feel would be convenient.

Yours sincerely,

MALCOLM MACDONALD

TELEGRAM 5

Canberra, January 10, 1942

MOST SECRET. Following for the Prime Minister from Odlum, Begins:

1. I reached Canberra January 8th and saw Prime Minister Curtin. I told him that I had come direct from England and had had no opportunity to talk with you. For that reason anything said was my own, except in so far as I knew your general attitude. I added that Canada and Australia faced on the Pacific same threat and viewed it from the same point of view. Australia being nearer the immediate danger has a better understanding of its nature and of steps that should be taken to meet it. Subject to her existing heavy commitments, Canada I knew was anxious to do what she could to co-operate with Australia. I was present myself as tangible evidence of Canada's desire to stand by side of her sister Dominion in this time of peril.

2. Prime Minister thanked me and said he heartily reciprocated warm greetings which I had conveyed from you to the Australian people. To the people of Canada he sent on behalf of the Australian people a cheering word that Australians will never halt in the march along the road of service and that, comrades in arms, the two peoples will win victory. He suggested that Australia needed help to meet a very real emergency and asked me to attend the meeting of Advisory War Council and confer with Chiefs of Staff early next week. In a later unofficial talk with Permanent Secretary of External Affairs it was suggested that immediate danger points are New Caledonia, New Guinea and Timor which Australia has not sufficient force to garrison. I am informed confidentially that two Australian divisions are to be brought back from the Middle East to Malaya where situation is critical. I am further informed that threat in Borneo is real. If New Caledonia is not held air ferry route from America to Australia will cease to be practical.

3. I am not yet prepared to make a recommendation, but for reasons of high Imperial policy already suggested to you in a previous message¹ consideration should be given to probable desirability of establishing very urgently a base in Australia on which some Canadian force could be built up and from which it could operate. Loss of Penang has already in effect closed northern approach to Singapore and occupation of western Borneo by enemy would as effectively close southern approach. Elements of American naval and military forces are in Australia after being driven out of Cavite. Their presence is causing some inconvenience as preparations had not been made. Though the war as a whole cannot be lost here, I sincerely believe, with an eye to a long-term peace objective, Canada should now hold out practical help to her sister Dominion. Eventual despatch of a brigade group or a division to act as part of an Australian force may appear desirable.

4. Yesterday I was received by the Governor General and discussed with him these problems and others disclosed in my visit to the Middle East, which I wish to bring to your attention but which I withhold until I am satisfied of security of our cypher system.

5. My trip took 18 days in actual flight, balance being spent with Australian field force. I find mail badly disarranged and am at a loss how to communicate. It appears to me that for all important matters we must rely on cable. Ends.

Canberra, January 24, 1942

MOST SECRET. My telegram No. 16, January 17th[†]. Following for the Prime Minister from the High Commissioner, Begins:

1. In view of grave situation including actual threat of physical invasion which now confronts Australia, Commonwealth Government, through Minister for External Affairs, has asked me to submit to your Government the following three suggestions of help which it hopes the Government of Canada might extend to it in this emergency. Suggestions are made in order of priority in which they would best meet Australia's needs, and will be supported by an appreciation of the situation now being prepared by the Chiefs of Staff which will be submitted to you early next week through the Australian High Commissioner in Canada.

2. Suggestions are:

(a) Supply where possible of equipment in which Australian deficiencies are serious, such as aircraft, anti-aircraft equipment, R.D.F. equipment, armoured fighting vehicles, anti-tank equipment and torpedoes;

(b) Establishment in Australia of a Canadian Army force to be a G.H.Q. mobile reserve in Australia. Knowledge that such a force would be made available would justify the Australian Government in adopting a bolder policy than it otherwise could in sending out detachments of its own Air Force to defend advanced positions;

(c) Transfer to Australian naval stations of a number of fully manned and equipped naval units suitable for local defence.

3. Suggestions were submitted to me yesterday as an aide-mémoire for a discussion which Dr. Evatt proposed should be held in Canberra next week, but in view of the urgency of the situation I am now asked to transmit them to you without discussion.

4. In studying the situation you should consider the entire Malay Peninsula, including Singapore, Borneo, Celebes, New Guinea and Northern Solomon Islands likely to be in enemy hands before any assistance agreed upon could be implemented.

5. Australian Government is fully aware that final action must be subject to the approval of Allied coordinating authority but approaches you direct to ascertain what assistance could be made available if that approval were forthcoming. Ends.

Ottawa, January 29, 1942

MOST SECRET. Reference your telegram No. 20 of January 24th. War Committee of Cabinet and Chiefs of Staff have been examining suggestions transmitted in your telegram as to form which Canadian assistance to Australia might take.

They feel that Australian proposals for assistance could not properly be dealt with by Canada, but should be submitted to the Combined British-American Chiefs of Staff Committee and Munitions Assignments Board, which have been set up to direct and coordinate the war effort of the United Nations. Disposition of military forces and allocation of equipment in the light of the world situation viewed as a whole are functions of the Combined Chiefs of Staff and Munitions Assignments Board, and their advice should be sought before any decisions were taken by Canada.

Examination of the naval features of the Australian request indicates that torpedoes could not be spared from Canadian supplies, nor would it be possible for Canada to man vessels for Australian local defence. The only ships in Canada which could possibly be spared would be six mine-sweepers now under construction for Admiralty account on the Pacific Coast. Their transfer would require the consent of the United Kingdom Government.

Because of deficiencies in estimated minimum requirements for defence of Canada, Government cannot now spare aircraft for Australia. Same is true of R.D.F. and other equipment. It would, however, be possible to provide trained air crew if these are needed.

SECRET. You may wish to let the Commonwealth Government know that the Canadian Government have agreed to the diversion to Australia of nine Catalina flying boats which had been ordered for Canadian coast defence requirements and made available to the United Kingdom for use in the western approaches under an arrangement by which they could be returned to Canadian operations if the situation in the opinion of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff warranted. At the time when the United Kingdom Government approached our Government for their concurrence in the proposed diversion of these Catalinas, we were ourselves seriously concerned about our defence dispositions on both Atlantic and Pacific coasts, where the supply of serviceable Catalinas available for coastal patrol and defence is inadequate for present needs. In view, however, of the immediate urgency of the Australian need for additional flying boats, the Canadian Government was glad to concur in the proposed diversion.

URGENT

Sir William Glasgow called this morning to let you know that Mr. H.V. Evatt, the Australian Secretary of State for External Affairs, expected to come to Ottawa probably in about a fortnight. Sir William is leaving for Washington tomorrow morning to have a conference with Evatt there.

I gathered from Glasgow that Evatt had been rather violent over the telephone, complaining that Canada was not rallying to Australia's aid in the present crisis in the way that Australia had a right to expect. Sir William said he had remonstrated with Evatt and told him that in all his contacts with the Canadian Government, he had found them anxious to do everything they could to help Australia, as part of the total war effort. He gathered that what Evatt particularly had in mind had been requests for military assistance transmitted through General Odlum — requests about which the Australian High Commissioner's Office here have never been informed by their own Government.

When Evatt comes to Ottawa he wants to see you and the Defence Ministers, and probably the Minister of Finance. Sir William wondered if the Ministers would wish to see him separately or be willing to receive him in the War Committee. He did not wish to ask for a meeting for Evatt with the War Committee unless this would be acceptable to the Canadian Government.²³ I promised I would have a word with you and let him know your wishes before he goes to Washington tomorrow morning.

The Canadian Club are anxious to invite Evatt to speak to them when he comes to Canada. There is little doubt that he will be glad to accept, and some risk that under the present circumstances he may make a mischievous speech. I do not think we can try to head him off from making a speech when he is here. The best we can do is to arrange that he has his conferences with Ministers before his public engagements, so we can be sure that he at least understands the Canadian position before he goes on the air.

CANADIAN ASSISTANCE TO AUSTRALIA — MUNITIONS

5. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY reported that, upon instructions from the Australian Minister for External Affairs, from Washington, the Australian High Commissioner had presented an urgent appeal for the shipment of Canadian produced equipment to Australia.

In reply, it had been necessary to tell Sir William Glasgow that, beyond filling orders already placed, it was not possible for Canada to do anything, without affecting munitions for which commitments to the United Kingdom or the United States had been made.

If Australia wished to obtain a larger share of Canadian production, representations should be made to the Munitions Assignments Board. The Department of Munitions and Supply, without the United Kingdom's concurrence, could not divert equipment to meet the Australian request.

²⁴ After a press conference in Canberra, apparently on January 14, it was reported that the High Commissioner had stated that Canada's immediate concern was the defence of the Pacific area, especially Australia, and the supply of assistance to that country. See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1942, Volume 2, pp. 1644-5. Melbourne is erroneously identified as the site of the press conference. The High Commissioner's explanation was that he had been misquoted.

Canadian aid to Australia owing to the probability of any statements being misinterpreted. In our talks yesterday and today with Dr. Evatt, which are of course strictly confidential, it was made clear to him, and he appreciated the point, that the commitments undertaken by Canada overseas in respect of men and munitions, which occupy Canadian capacity to the full at the sacrifice of home defence needs, cannot be altered by Canada alone, or by Canada in consultation with Australia, but only as a result of decisions of the Combined Staffs on highest strategic grounds. Indeed Dr. Evatt argued this thesis himself and stated that the Canadian position in this regard was fully appreciated by the Australian Government.

Dr. Evatt also stated that his Government were not satisfied that the existing machinery for the conduct of the war was entirely satisfactory; he disliked present parallelism between London and Washington, and felt that some sort of supreme war council in one place would have to be set up. He emphasized that munitions should be allocated not to governments but to theatres of war on the basis solely of strategic needs determined by supreme strategic authority.

Dr. Evatt also reviewed the present strategic position in the South-Western Pacific, reading an appreciation furnished by the Australian Chiefs of Staff and concurred in by General McArthur. He stated that the position in respect of equipment, aircraft and naval strength was causing grave concern, and that their immediate and urgent requirements in this regard have been brought to the attention of the President and the United States authorities.

Dr. Evatt is making a very good impression in Ottawa and has been most friendly and understanding.

I feel Dr. Evatt has complete understanding of Canada's position vis-à-vis Australia, just as we have gained from him a very full appreciation of Australia's present very pressing needs. Ottawa, April 13, 1942

My dear Prime Minister,

On Saturday evening, the Minister of External Affairs, Dr. H. V. Evatt with his Assistant, Mr. W. S. Robinson, dined with me in Montreal. The subject of our conversation was of course the urgent need by Australia of munitions.

I pointed out that, while Canada is manufacturing large quantities of munitions of the type required, our entire output is committed to certain allied countries, and that diversion could only be made with the consent of our allies; in fact, consent of United Kingdom is required in practically every instance.

Following is a list of equipment represented as urgently required, and the numbers asked for:

Bren machine guns, 6,600
 Browning machine guns, aeroplane type, 1,000
 Bofors anti-aircraft guns, unlimited numbers
 25-pdr field artillery, 200
 6-pdr anti-tank equipments, 500
 RDF equipments, 600
 GLM – K2 equipments, 100
 GLM – K3 equipments 125
 SL3 equipments 200
 A – 271 equipments 20
 2" field mortars 1,000
 Anti-aircraft searchlights, 1,000

While the above represents a very large order, Canada is capable of filling all orders within a month or two by diversion of orders from United Kingdom and United States. Allocations, however, must be made by the Allocations Board in Washington or in London before any shipment can be made. I have definitely determined that we have no free capacity that can be offered at this time.

I will be glad if you will explain the situation to Dr. Evatt. Personally, I have the greatest sympathy with the position of Australia, and would like to help. No doubt your support at the Pacific conference table²⁵ will assist toward larger allocations for Australia.

Yours faithfully,

C. D. HOWE

RE: MUNITIONS ASSIGNMENTS BOARD

The question of decisions re theatres of war and functions of a Munitions Assignments Board came up for pretty full discussion. It arose out of some reference by the President to previous discussions, and was enlarged upon by Dr. Evatt. I told the Council of the consideration we had given the matter in the War Committee in Ottawa at the time of Evatt's visit, and subsequently pointed out that we were most anxious to assist wherever we could, but made perfectly clear our present position with respect to commitments. I said we were, since Japan's entry, in much the same position with respect to planning for a world war as we had been in planning for what many thought would be mainly a European war, some four and a half months after the war itself began. At that time all plans were made largely in consultation and co-operation with London; and Britain was viewed as the centre of the Empire and the British Isles as the most important of the possible theatres of war; that Canada, Australia, New Zealand had given only secondary thought to their own defence, and had sent their forces overseas. Similarly the United States Lease-Lend policy had aimed at strengthening the position of the Allied forces in Europe, while giving some assistance to China. Today, however, in the light of Japanese occupation of different free countries in the Orient, with the threat there was to Australia and New Zealand, the situation what it is in India, and particularly in the Indian Ocean, it was necessary from the point of view alike of strategy and allocation of supplies to have everything viewed in the light of probable and actual theatres of war.

I stressed the necessity from broad political considerations as well as strategic, of not letting situations develop which would cause alienation of feeling between different parts of the British Commonwealth and any of the free countries. I pointed out how Australia's problem had created a problem in Canada such as had scarcely been dreamt of before. Just as the feeling had grown up suddenly in Australia which was causing Australians to look more to the United States than to Britain, so to the amazement of some of us, a few British Columbians were beginning to adopt a similar attitude toward the Government of Canada, urging that we were not conscious of the dangers on the Pacific; some of them were saying they would have to look to the United States rather than to Ottawa for an understanding of their problems. The necessity of providing for Pacific coast defence had made it increasingly difficult for us to comply with requests from Australia. The only real solution was recognition that we were all equally concerned in the progress and outcome of the war, and seek so to arrange matters of allocation of supplies as to retain confidence in the purpose of each part to help the other as much as possible.

IMMEDIATE. Please convey following personal message from Prime Minister to Dr. Evatt before his departure. Message begins:

I am very sorry that it has not yet been possible to work out some form of direct and immediate assistance from Canada to Australia. As you know, I have been most anxious, particularly since our talks in Ottawa, that we should if at all possible make some definite and specific contribution to the defence of Australia over and above the flow of men and munitions of war which is being poured into the common pool for the joint use of the United Nations. Since my return from Washington the Defence Ministers and their advisers have again examined very thoroughly the possibility of diverting some supplies from our own defence requirements. Our own shortages of initial equipment quite apart from any provision for wastage make such diversions impossible.

In principle our effort to effect a diversion of supplies on a bilateral basis does not represent the right way of tackling the problem but I was prepared to attempt it as a short cut in an emergency. Now I am more hopeful that the assignment of munitions and supplies will soon become closely integrated with the strategic needs of the different theatres of war. Arrangements are nearly completed for the full participation of Canada in the Munitions Assignments Board, and I feel certain that Canadian representative on that Board will appreciate to the full the importance of doing everything that can be done to strengthen the defences against aggression of your country and New Zealand.

NOTES ON A SPEECH BY DR. EVATT, OCTOBER 14TH/43

Dr. Evatt's statement on international affairs in the House of Representatives at Canberra on October 14th is of particular interest. It suggests, among other things, cooperation for mutual advantage between Canada and Australia because of their common interests as members of the British Commonwealth and as small nations. This gesture, combined with Mr. Davis's recent report of a friendlier attitude towards himself by Dr. Evatt, suggests that Dr. Evatt may be giving serious consideration to the advantages of a Canberra-Ottawa axis. Although the recent Australian attitude on the Four-Power Declaration was not one which the Canadian Government wished to support, it is worth considering whether there might not be advantages for Canada in working closely with Australia both in Commonwealth and international councils.

It is worth noting that Dr. Evatt has outlined in his statement the principles of an Australian foreign policy which might very well form the basis of a Canadian policy. The main points might be summarized as follows:

1. Collaboration with other peace-loving nations, world cooperation, the four freedoms, etc.
2. Inability 'to contract out of Europe' and the consequent necessity of taking an active part in planning peace in Europe.

²⁸ Voir les documents 350, 352 et 975.

²⁸ See Documents 350, 352 and 975.

3. Belief in the Atlantic Charter.²⁹
4. Determination that the Mussolini and Hitler regimes will not be followed by fascist regimes under another guise.
5. Recognition (with emphasis) of the French National Committee of Liberation.
6. Friendly attitude towards the League of Nations.
7. Limited approval of the Three-(or Four-) Power System and desire to combine the two concepts of the equality of nations and the necessity of great power leadership "which do not seem to be in necessary conflict". (Dr. Evatt should be a ready convert to the functional principle).
8. Predominant interest in the Pacific, with a firm realization that peace and prosperity of continents is not divisible.
9. Need to make defence arrangements with neighbouring territories.
10. Close collaboration with New Zealand.
11. Close collaboration with the United States.
12. Promotion of closer relations with South America.
13. Friendly relations with China and the Soviet Union.
14. Conduct of relations with other countries either by consultation within the British Commonwealth with a view to joint action or, when appropriate, by exercise of "Australia's distinct international status".
15. Desire for a wider international agreement on civil aviation as well as an understanding between members of the Commonwealth.

The only essential alterations necessary in a Canadian statement would be due to regional differences. Canada is vitally but not "predominantly" interested in the Pacific, but Canada is interested, like Australia, in cooperation for defence purposes with countries in her own region. Nevertheless, Canada could agree that a "regional approach should not be an isolationist approach". For geographical reasons, Canada has not the same urgent necessity for cooperation with New Zealand, but she is interested in cooperating with all British nations. It is particularly Dr. Evatt's views on the role of a small power that correspond with this Government's. As for the role of Canada or Australia in the Commonwealth, Dr. Evatt's view of alternative policies is the same as ours. If we agree in principle, however, we probably disagree on balance. Canada, like Australia, seeks to make her influence felt through Commonwealth channels, but she is not committed, like the Australian Prime Minister, to the policy of seeking joint Commonwealth action. The Australian Government would undoubtedly like Canadian support for their thesis, but it is on this matter that there is perhaps the widest divergence of views.

Other points of interest in the statement are:

1. Dr. Evatt's reference to "Britain or the British Commonwealth" as one of the great powers may reflect the Dominions Office response to the Australian ²⁹ Voir le volume 7, document 327.

²⁹ See Volume 7, Document 327.

telegram regarding the Four-Power Declaration.³⁰

2. The extensive references to the French Committee, the role of Free French forces, the warning against substitute fascist regimes, and the statement that "special arrangements made as a result of the military exigencies do not, and cannot, prejudice a final settlement" suggest a sympathy with the views of "liberal" circles and may be intended as a protest against the Italian arrangements. It would be interesting to know whether Canberra has commented to London on the D.O. telegrams dealing with these negotiations³¹. (When Dr. Evatt was in Ottawa he made in private some caustic comments about Giraud, not necessarily attributable to any pique at the attention being shown the latter in Ottawa).

3. The prominence given to relations with New Zealand may augur a more sensible recognition of mutual interests in the future.

4. The reference to South America may be an interesting result of the descent of American culture upon Australia. It might also reflect some "global" thinking about airways.

5. Of all the countries specifically mentioned as those with whom Australia must cooperate, the United States gets the least attention, a fact which may be purely accidental.

6. The tone of the statement is calculated, like other recent Australian Government statements, to correct the impression that Australia intends henceforth to interest herself solely in the Pacific and to depend primarily on the United States for help.

DESPATCH 227

Ottawa, November 10, 1943

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 385 of October 16th[†] with which was enclosed a statement on foreign policy by Dr. Evatt[†]. In this statement Dr. Evatt refers to his intention to discuss with the accredited representatives in Australia of the various governments interested in the South-West Pacific the handling of the problems of security, post-war development, and native welfare. In view of the fact that you are already associated with the political warfare organization to which Dr. Evatt makes reference in this connection, you have asked whether you should be prepared to engage in the proposed discussions on the South-West Pacific region.

³¹ Voir le document 521.

It is true, as you say, that Canada is a Pacific country with a vital interest in the security of the whole Pacific region. Canada is interested in fighting Japan on the best vantage ground, wherever it may be. This is a world war, and because future wars are apt to be world wars Canada must remain interested in the security and prosperity of the whole world. However, Dr. Evatt's principle of regional organization within the framework of a world organization is based on a recognition of direct and indirect interests. Just as Australia's direct interest, according to this thesis, is in the South-West Pacific, so Canada's direct interest is in the North Atlantic and North Pacific regions. The welfare and security of the South-West Pacific is of importance to Canada, but no more so than the welfare and security of the Middle East or the continent of Africa. If Canada should insist on taking part in a regional organization for the South-West Pacific, Australia would be entitled to take part in a North Atlantic organization, and the regional principle would be frustrated. Dr. Evatt's thesis would allow Canada's interest in worldwide prosperity and security to be expressed at the higher level of an international organization. Our special interest in Australia because of our association in the British Commonwealth can also be expressed through the Commonwealth machinery of consultation.

In this connection Dr. Evatt's analogy with the political warfare organization is somewhat misleading. This latter is primarily an organization for cooperation on the part of those countries engaged in fighting Japan. It is because Canada is fighting Japan rather than because Canada is a country with direct interests in the South-West Pacific that she is represented on a committee of this kind which happens to be situated in the country which is the base of operations for the South-West Pacific.

As you point out, "Canada has the same interest in the Pacific as the United States of America although naturally our degree of interest must be influenced by our relative strength as a nation, in comparison with the United States". Unless Canada wishes to become involved in responsibilities which she could not properly fulfil because of her small population, we must recognize that the great powers have extensive interests and primary responsibilities for security which entitle them to be associated with virtually all regional associations.

You will, I think, realize that we must be guided in our attitude towards regional organization by principles consistent with the functional thesis of representation which we have enunciated. For your guidance, I shall be sending shortly a despatch discussing the functional thesis in the light of recent developments.

I have etc.

My telegram No. 714 of March 14th¹, bauxite mines at Mackenzie. United Kingdom authorities confirm that recommendation that a white company should be posted temporarily to protect the works has been taken up in Washington and that Joint Staff Mission have been asked to keep in touch with Canadian service representatives on the matter.

(2) On related question of security of bauxite ships on Demerara river, I have been asked to place following proposal before the Canadian Government. Local coloured guards are already provided on the ships, but United Kingdom authorities recognize that there would be an advantage if these guards could be strengthened by a small number of white N.C.O.'s. What is wanted are carefully selected older men not necessarily highly trained in the military sense but steady and reliable. It is considered that some 18 N.C.O.'s would be required and a suitable officer. If they can be obtained, it is contemplated that these with the coloured personnel of local militia at present providing guards on bauxite ships should be organized into a separate unit of the forces of the Colony. The unit would be under its own officer, thus freeing Commandant of local forces from day to day direction of it, though he would retain general responsibility.

(3) United Kingdom authorities state that it would be very difficult to spare suitable men from United Kingdom and would greatly appreciate it if the Canadian Government could assist by facilitating loan or recruitment of these men in Canada. If the Canadian Government agree to do so, United Kingdom hopes that Canadian security authorities might be prepared, possibly in consultation with Aluminium Company, to select suitable candidates.

(4) It is hardly practicable in London to define further their duties and conditions of service, but Sir Connop Guthrie of Security Coordination, New York, who is familiar with local security problem in all its aspects, hopes to visit Ottawa shortly where he could discuss details and, if desired, help in selection of candidates.

(5) United Kingdom authorities, in view of urgency of matter, would appreciate early reply so that if the Canadian Government agree to personnel required being drawn from Canada, suitable instructions as to details may be sent to Sir Connop Guthrie.

- (ii) Dependents Allowance
- (iii) Pension claims
- (iv) Clothing and personal equipment
- (v) Rifles, Revolvers and side-arms
- (vi) Transportation to and from British Guiana for original members and reliefs;

(2) that British Guiana Government pay to Canadian Government yearly a sum computed at the rate of £408 for each Canadian Officer, £300 for each Canadian Warrant Officer and Sergeant to cover the above items; and (3) British Guiana Government also to provide free of any charge to all ranks

- (i) Quarters, including accommodation, blankets, bedding, etc.,
- (ii) Rations on a scale comparable to Canadian army in Canada,
- (iii) Medical and dental treatment.

It is also proposed that Canadian detachment be placed under command of the senior officer of British Guiana militia for all purposes except pay and allowances as set out above; that members of Canadian detachment be given commissions and rank in local British Guiana militia equal to rank that they hold in Canadian army.

(2) As regards paragraph three of your telegram concerning accommodation, rations and medical and dental treatment, United Kingdom authorities explain that items in question will be provided by Colonial Government and suggests that details should be settled direct between Officer Commanding troops British Guiana and Department of National Defence. As regards quarters, Government of British Guiana have recently been authorized to construct additional quarters for militia. (3) United Kingdom agree that Canadian personnel should be placed under command of Senior Officer of British Guiana militia for all purposes except pay and allowances, and that they should be given commissions and rank in militia equal to rank that they hold in Canadian Army.

(4) Since United Kingdom made its original proposal, as contained in my telegram No. 800 of March 23rd³³, Colonel Stratton, the Security Officer who recently visited Colony, has strongly recommended that number of white sergeants should be increased to thirty and this recommendation has been endorsed by the Governor. CANADIAN TROOPS FOR SERVICE IN BRITISH GUIANA

1. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE reported a request of the U.K. government for a number of Canadian officers and N.C.O.'s to undertake training of native coloured troops engaged in guard and security duties on ships carrying bauxite on the Demerara River.

It was recommended that, in order to comply with this request, the mobilization of No. 34 Company of the Veterans' Guard, on a limited establishment of 2 officers and 32 N.C.O.'s, be authorized with authority to complete the establishment as required.

The cost to the Canadian government would be $15,600. Approval was recommended. An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Departmental memorandum May 19, 1942 – C.W.C. document 169)†.

2. The War Committee approved the Minister's recommendation.

TELEGRAM 1399

London, May 27, 1942

MOST SECRET. Your despatches No. 324† and No. 326† of May 18th, Bauxite Mines.

Dominions Secretary has handed me memorandum on the subject of the local defence of Mackenzie which may be summarised as follows:

(a) When originally considered it was thought that local defence forces should prove adequate for this purpose and that there was no need to provide troops from outside the colony;

(b) Subsequently view was taken in London that as the local forces were being reorganized it was desirable to provide a company of white troops to guard the works for a temporary period. The process of reorganization is taking longer than was expected and it is unlikely that local force will reach satisfactory state of training until 1943. For the time being protection is being afforded by Colonial police except for one platoon of Militia;

(c) When the above decision was communicated to the G.O.C., he consulted the local Joint Military Defence Sub-Committee in British Guiana, a body similar to those established in other Colonies where there are United States leased bases. Sub-Committee recommended to United States Commanding General at Trinidad that a company of United States troops should be provided. The Commanding General at Trinidad referred recommendation to Washington;

(d) The view of both United States and United Kingdom staffs is that a company of troops should be sent to Mackenzie. The United States have not yet offered any troops but the United Kingdom Military Staff report that although the United States might be prepared to provide a company of coloured troops it is most unlikely that they would send white troops;

(e) The Governor of British Guiana has advised strongly against the use of coloured troops for two reasons, (1) they would not have steadying effect of white troops and (2) their usefulness would in the opinion of Governor, which is shared in London, be offset by complications which may be expected to ensue from the existence of a large East Indian community in the Colony;

(f) The alternative of sending United Kingdom troops has been carefully considered but it is felt that the many calls on United Kingdom resources make it very difficult to spare any;

(g) The last paragraph of memorandum reads as follows, Begins: In these circumstances having regard to the high importance of the works and to the interest which both the Canadian Government and the Aluminium Company of Canada have taken in the question, it is desired to enquire whether Canadian Government would be so good as to provide a company of Canadian troops for Mackenzie, at any rate as a temporary measure until the local militia can take over. The provision of Canadian or United Kingdom troops was among the suggestions made by the Aluminium Company in their correspondence with the Canadian authorities forwarded from Canada House on January 30 and February 18, and an earlier approach would have been made to the Canadian Government had the matter not been referred direct from the Colony to United States authorities. The provision of the requisite troops is clearly a matter of urgency and a very early expression of the views of the Canadian Government would be welcomed.

SECRET AND IMMEDIATE

Ottawa, May 6, 1942

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have been asked by the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs to inform the Canadian Government that the Anglo-United States Caribbean Commission recently reported that the present acute shipping difficulties had resulted in a serious threat of a shortage of essential foodstuffs and other commodities in the Caribbean area, with the possibility of exhaustion of supplies in the not very distant future. The Commission have therefore given urgent consideration to the problem of "organizing essential supplies to the Caribbean on a permanent and long-term basis".

It would be impossible, in their view, for supplies to be maintained adequately by the operation of ordinary commercial procedure, and the situation calls for the establishment of improved co-ordination within the Caribbean area for the control of shipments of essentials, including foodstuffs and non-foodstuffs, on a programmed basis. With a view to determining the most suitable method of co-ordination they recommended that there should be called, under the auspices of the Commission and at the earliest possible date, a conference to be attended by representatives of supply organisations in all British and American Caribbean territories, of the joint Shipping Administrations, of the British Colonial Supply Liaison at Washington, and of any other agency in Washington which might be involved.

This recommendation has been approved by the United States and United Kingdom Governments and arrangements are now in hand for a conference to be held in Jamaica, with the opening date 15th May. The United States and United Kingdom Governments feel that it would be of great assistance if the Canadian Government were willing to appoint a representative to the conference, and in informing the Canadian Government of the arrangements for the holding of the conference I have been asked to extend to them a cordial invitation to be represented at it. The short notice is greatly regretted, but in view of the strong recommendations of the Commission it has been felt necessary to summon the conference with a minimum delay. It is understood that the State Department at Washington will be very willing to assist with transportation arrangements.

The agenda for the conference would include the following:

(1) Ascertainment of minimum supplies essential to maintain wartime economy.

(2) Co-ordination of steamship services from North America, (3) Establishment of emergency stores of concentrated foods, (4) Scheme of control of local steamers, schooners etc., for inter-island distribution, (5) Feasibility of land and sea supply routes through the Greater Antilles, (6) Promotion of further production of foodstuffs locally, (7) Obtaining of priorities for equipment needed for local production, processing and preservation of foodstuffs, (8) Recommendations to the Home Governments regarding increase of inter-Caribbean trade.

I understand that further details if needed can be obtained from the British Colonial Supply Liaison, Washington.

Yours sincerely,

PATRICK DUFF

IMPORTANT

I believe Mr. MacKinnon is bringing up in Council today the question of Canadian representation at the Conference to be held in Jamaica on May 15th to consider what measures should be taken to deal with the threatened shortage of essential foodstuffs and other commodities in the Caribbean area as a result of acute shipping difficulties due to enemy action. In view of Canada's close shipping and trade connection with the British West Indies and their dependence on this country for most of their staple foodstuffs it is, I think, important that Canada should be adequately represented in the discussions in Jamaica, which are likely to determine not only the immediate emergency arrangements for provisioning the Islands but also affect their post war relations with the United States and Canada. I would suggest that Mr. Wilgress and Mr. J.S. Macdonald of this Department, who are both very familiar with West Indian trade and shipping questions, should represent Canada. They would have to leave tomorrow to join the American Delegation at Miami and thence proceed to Jamaica by plane, which the United States State Department is reserving.

The Agenda for the Conference includes:

- (1) Ascertainment of minimum supplies essential to maintain wartime economy.
- (2) Co-ordination of steamship services from North America.
- (3) Establishment of emergency stores of concentrated foods.
- (4) Scheme of control of local steamers, schooners etc., for inter-island distribution.
- (5) Feasibility of land and sea supply routes through the Greater Antilles.
- (6) Promotion of further production of foodstuffs locally.
- (7) Obtaining of priorities for equipment needed for local production, processing and preservation of foodstuffs.
- (8) Recommendations to the Home Governments regarding increase of inter-Caribbean trade.³⁴

Ottawa, May 26, 1942

Sir,

The undersigned, designated to represent the Canadian Government at the international Conference for the co-ordination of the shipment of foodstuffs and other essential supplies to Islands in the Caribbean area, have the honour to report that the Conference was held in the Legislative Council Chamber, Kingston, Jamaica, from May 15th to May 18th. It was attended by representatives of the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission; of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands; of the various British West Indian Colonies, including British Guiana and British Honduras; as well as by representatives of the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada.

³⁴ La note suivante était écrite sur ce mémorandum:

³⁴ The following note was written on the memorandum:

Approved by P[rime] M[inister] 11-5-42. R[OBERTSON]

The purpose of the Conference was to examine means of maintaining supplies for these areas, nearly all of which are facing severe shortages of foodstuffs and other materials essential to the maintenance of their economic life. In recent months enemy submarines have inflicted very heavy losses on Allied and neutral shipping in Caribbean and American waters and have made it impracticable if not impossible to continue shipments of supplies at the normal volume and by the usual routes. From January 12th, when the campaign in these waters was inaugurated, to May 18th, when the Conference closed, the enemy had succeeded in sinking 113 tankers and 169 cargo steamers — in all 282 ships of an aggregate tonnage of 1,574,870 gross tons, as compared with 197,761 gross tons of shipping sunk in the Western Atlantic during the whole of 1918. Many other ships have been damaged so severely as to be unable to continue their schedules without substantial repairs.

While the amount of shipping available for the carriage of goods has thus been greatly reduced in recent months, a number of circumstances have combined to make the problem more acute on the side of supply. The establishment by the United States of naval and air bases in Jamaica, St. Lucia, Antigua, British Guiana and Trinidad (thirty thousand workers are engaged on the naval and air base in Trinidad alone) is giving rise to the influx of large numbers of troops and artisans and to the withdrawal of native workers from agriculture and fishing to work on non-productive defence projects thus necessitating the importation of increased quantities of building materials and foodstuffs. The economic structure of these Islands is based, not on subsistence cultivation, but on the production of commercial or cash crops, such as sugar, coffee or bananas, and the importation of foodstuffs, clothing and manufactured articles from abroad. The local production of foodstuffs, indeed, would be insufficient even if all available land were taken for this purpose, for all of the Islands are confronted with the problem of over-population (1160 inhabitants to the square mile in Barbados), with a high birth-rate and a rapidly increasing number of mouths to feed. Moreover, the British West Indian and other Caribbean Islands, due largely to the hot, humid climate and lack of refrigeration, maintain small stocks and, consequently, have practically no reserves to meet the emergency.

Recently, indeed, some of the Colonies have found themselves without such staples as fish or meat, with only a few days' supply of flour and, in one case, with only thirty-six hours' supply of fuel oil to maintain essential pumps in operation. It has even been necessary to resort to airplanes to meet the demand for certain commodities such as yeast. These conditions, and the fear of even more serious developments, should sinkings continue, led the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States to approve the proposal of the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission for an immediate examination of the whole situation.

The discussions at the Conference centred around two main phases of the problem —

(1) The minimum supplies, after full development of local production, essential to the maintenance of their economic life; and

(2) The co-ordination of shipping services with a view to the full and most efficient use of all tonnage available — whether oil, steam or sail.

In its larger aspects the Conference was not an unqualified success. On the one hand the Puerto Rican authorities flatly declined to consider the question of ascertaining the minimum supplies essential to the maintenance of the economic life of the Island though this was one of the subjects the United States Government agreed in advance to place on the Agenda. On the other, the United States authorities were not prepared to put any of their ships into a pool for the supply of the Islands generally — American and British. Though they took an active part in indicating directions in which the British West Indian Colonies could cut down imports, their general idea seems to have been that the United States would assume responsibility for feeding Puerto Rico and the American Virgin Islands and that Canada would assume responsibility for feeding the British West Indian Colonies. Such, indeed, was the project they originally put forward. It was, however, withdrawn after brief discussion and eventually the United States delegates agreed to recognize that part of the problem confronting the British West Indies was caused by the increased demands on food and labour supply resulting from the establishment of United States bases in the Colonies and that, under certain conditions, imports of essential goods would be carried in boats set aside for the carriage of bauxite. It was agreed, also, that United Fruit Company vessels would call at British Honduras and occasionally at Jamaica.

The Conference did, however, accomplish a good deal in other directions. The Supply Officers of the British West Indian Colonies met together and, after careful enquiry and comparison of their respective positions and prospects, set forth their minimum requirements which amount to 52,000 short tons per month — one-half of which would be foodstuffs and one-half non-foodstuffs. These figures made allowance for the fullest development of local production through subsistence production on available lands and did not include oil, coal or cement or the importation of tools and machinery that would be necessary for the general introduction of subsistence farming if the present basic system of agriculture, i.e., the production of specialized crops for export, were to be substantially modified. While it was not found practicable to compile comparable figures for recent or pre-war imports, there was no doubt that the figure agreed upon constitutes a drastic reduction of imports over previous periods and represents the bare minimum necessary to enable the people of these areas to continue to live and produce the commodities — oil, bauxite, sugar, coffee, cocoa, etc., that they are peculiarly adapted to contribute to the war effort of the united nations.

While the Conference was concerned mainly with supply, which was not a direct responsibility of Canada, Canadian representation was warmly welcomed and was of considerable advantage from the strictly Canadian point of view. It provided evidence of Canada's interest in the welfare of the Islands and of Canada's desire to maintain close reciprocal trade relations in spite of the present difficult situation. It provided an opportunity to explain Canada's inability, in face of the submarine menace, to maintain the shipping services provided for in the Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement. It provided an opportunity to put forward, as Canada's contribution to the solution of the difficulties in which the Colonies find themselves, a project which had, in fact, already been tentatively arranged in agreement with the War Shipping Administration in Washington and which would be of direct interest to Canada in providing a market for Canadian goods, chiefly flour and salt fish, and in supplying a substantial proportion of Canadian requirements of sugar, coffee and cocoa. It provided, also, an excellent opportunity to consult competent local authorities on such practical questions as port facilities (now of great importance in view of the hazards involved where lighterage is necessary), cargoes available under war conditions and present possibilities of organizing connecting services by small local vessels between the Islands.

Under the Trade Agreement signed at Ottawa in 1925, and which is still in force, Canada is committed to provide five combined passenger and freight boats and six freight vessels with an aggregate carrying capacity of 62,840 tons and the British West Indies to pay annually a subsidy of 47,000 pounds sterling. The Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, the operating Company, endeavoured to maintain this service in spite of war conditions. Three of the combined passenger and freight ships — the "Lady Boats" — have been sunk by enemy action and a fourth has been severely damaged, leaving only one vessel of this type — the Lady Rodney — still available for service and she is adjudged too valuable a ship to risk further in this hazardous service. Some of the freighters have had to be diverted to other routes where the need was greater. A month ago the Canadian Shipping Board, in consultation with the Wartime Shipping Administration at Washington and the Naval authorities, came to the conclusion that it was no longer practicable to maintain the direct shipping service from Canadian or United States Atlantic ports to the West Indies and that all traffic should be routed via the Gulf of Mexico where the shorter route would economize in ships and where greater protection could be accorded them against submarine attack. It had been ascertained that the Jamaican authorities were willing to allocate four small vessels of Jamaican registry, owned by the Webster Line, for operation by the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships and investigations were undertaken by the Board and the Sugar Controller to ascertain whether suitable port and railway facilities were, or could be made, available at rates that would be acceptable.

This project was put before the Conference and met with the approval of the British West Indian Colonies who realized that, by reason of "force majeure", the steamship service provided for in the Trade Agreement could no longer be carried out and by the United States authorities who placed great emphasis on the economy in shipping that would thus be effected. The proposal as explained to the Conference was divided into two main services:—

1. A service from a Gulf port to Jamaica by three ships — the CANATCO (C.N.S.), the DALWARNIC (C.N.S.) and the ALLISTER (Webster Line) — with an aggregate carrying capacity of 6650 tons. It was calculated that they would be able to carry approximately 7,200 tons of freight per month. The minimum requirements to maintain the economic life of Jamaica were estimated to be about 12,000 tons per month. The balance of the requirements, therefore, will have to be provided by occasional calls at Kingston of United Fruit Company vessels.

2. A service from a Gulf port to Trinidad and Barbados by five ships — the CAVALIER (C.N.S.), the CATHCART (C.N.S.), the HUSVIK (Webster), the MAGISTER (Webster) and the ARMINDA (Webster) — with an aggregate carrying capacity of 13,250 tons. It was calculated that these ships could carry approximately 8,820 tons per month. Trinidad would also be supplied by occasional cargoes on the boats carrying bauxite. The balance of Barbados requirements and the requirements of the Windward and Leeward Islands would be met by a service between Trinidad and St. Thomas calling at the various Islands. It would be maintained by two smaller ships — the SOUTHERN LADY and the SMAALAND of the Webster Line — with an aggregate carrying capacity of 2500 tons, enabling 7,400 tons of North American freight to be delivered to these Colonies each month.

Both of these services would be operated by the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships.

It was also thought the above vessels might be supplemented by two vessels, of which one or both would be operated by Messrs. Pickford and Black, who have had long experience in the operation of ships in this area, in such a manner as to increase the capacity of the two services to 9,000 tons of outward cargo per month for Jamaica and 11,000 tons per month for the Colonies in the Eastern group of the British West Indies.

The Conference felt it was the best arrangement that could be made in the circumstances and recommended its immediate establishment. It was clearly understood, however, that its establishment would depend on our ability to make satisfactory port and freight arrangements, and its maintenance would depend on our ability to secure other ships if any of those mentioned should be sunk or diverted to services of even greater necessity.

The Bahamas, served by small local ships, and British Guiana, more self-contained as to foodstuffs than the other Colonies and which can secure some supplies on the bauxite boats, expressed their ability to face the emergency without special attention thus lightening the load on the shipping available.

The continued payment of subsidies by these Colonies for a service they no longer receive or do not receive in full, while outside the scope of the Conference, will, of course, require to be taken up with their Governments.

From the strictly Canadian point of view the inauguration of this new service would have the advantage of maintaining our established trade contacts and generally preferred position in the British West Indies; would enable us to continue the sale of Canadian flour for which export markets are badly needed; and enable Canada to secure its sugar, coffee, cocoa and some less important commodities from an area accepting payment in sterling.

The Conference also examined the question of utilizing fishing schooners with auxiliary engines in the carriage of salt fish to these markets. It was felt that a number of such vessels at present idle or engaged in less important work might be available and prepared to enter the trade if the position were explained to their owners. The Conference, accordingly, decided that a survey be undertaken without delay in the United States, Canada and the various Colonies. In view of the importance to Canada of regaining this long-established market for salt fish, which trade has, since the early days of the war, been almost eliminated by reason of the lack of shipping, steps are being taken by the Shipping Board to have an official familiar with the situation visit Nova Scotia and report as soon as possible on any suitable schooners that may be available. Should it be found, as a result of this survey, that sufficient schooners are available in Canada and in the other countries cooperating, it may be practicable to organize a service of great benefit both to Puerto Rican and British West Indian consumers and to the Canadian salt fish trade.

We have etc.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, October 28, 1942

Dear Mr. Robertson,

You will recall that under date of May 24, 1941, we were advised by the Office of the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom at Ottawa regarding the proposed establishment of the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission. It was explained, confidentially, that, while it was not intended to exclude the possibility of Canadian participation, the United Kingdom Government preferred that this possibility should not be raised at that particular stage.

Later on steps were taken to set up the Commission, consisting of three members nominated by the United Kingdom and three members nominated by the United States. The terms of reference indicated that the chief objective of the Commission was to promote the social welfare and standard of living of the inhabitants of British and United States possessions in the Caribbean area. In view of this long-run objective of the Commission and the fact that we had no possessions of our own in the Caribbean area, we could not raise any valid objection to the exclusion of Canada from representation on the Commission, in spite of our very substantial interests in the trade with the British West Indies.

It became evident as soon as the Commission commenced to operate that they were concerning themselves more with short-term objectives, such as the food supply of the different colonies. An indication of this was the Conference which was convened under the auspices of the Commission and which was held in Jamaica last May. In view of the large share of the food requirements of the British West Indies supplied by Canada, arrangements were made for us to be represented at the Conference and our representatives who attended were myself, Mr. J. S. Macdonald, of your Department, and Mr. G. B. Smith, of this Department.

Apart from discussions regarding steamship services, the two points which were brought out at the Conference were the desire of the United States members of the Commission to see a curtailment in sugar production in the British West Indies, in order that the colonies might become more self-sufficient in the production of foodstuffs, and a proposal for the establishment of a stockpile at Santiago de Cuba, from which Jamaica and other islands in the Caribbean area could draw emergency supplies of foodstuffs.

The proposal for a stockpile was advanced by Mr. Charles W. Taussig, United States Co-Chairman of the Commission, but found little support among those present at the Conference, most of whom considered the proposal impracticable. It was felt, for instance, that it would be just as difficult to organize transport from Santiago de Cuba to the other islands; and there were definite limitations on the application of the stockpile idea to food products, which deteriorate rapidly in quality in a tropical climate. This is notably the case with flour and we never thought that any serious effort would be made to use the stockpile for distributing flour to the British colonies.

The United States section of the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission went ahead with arranging for the stockpile and, as a result, a fairly large quantity of food products has been assembled at Santiago de Cuba. The Food Controller of Jamaica some weeks ago obtained a small quantity of flour from this stockpile, in order to tide over a temporary shortage of supplies, but he found the quality of the flour very unsatisfactory and decided not to repeat the experiment.

The Canadian Shipping Board have been doing their best, under very difficult circumstances, to provide sufficient shipping space for the requirements of Jamaica — it having been agreed at the Jamaica Conference that we would provide shipping space for the bulk of the Jamaican requirements, leaving the Eastern Group to be supplied largely by vessels of the Alcoa Steamship Company, which have to proceed to Trinidad for bauxite, supplemented by such vessels as the Canadian Shipping Board can still arrange to be allotted to the service of the Canadian National Steamships.

At the beginning of this month Mr. F. E. V. Smith, Food Controller of Jamaica, was in Ottawa and discussed with the Canadian Shipping Board the provision of vessels for the future requirements of Jamaica. A tentative plan was worked out, which would provide sufficient space, but since that time one vessel has been lost and another has had to go in for overhaul of her engines. This leaves Jamaica, for the time being, short on shipping space; but we hope that after the close of navigation on the St. Lawrence the deficiency may be made good and sufficient space provided to enable Jamaica to obtain through the port of New York Canadian flour and the other food products which the colony requires.

After leaving Ottawa Mr. Smith went to Washington, where he met Sir

George Gater, Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies; Mr. John Huggins, recently appointed United Kingdom member of the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission; and Mr. Sydney Caine, Economic Adviser to the Colonial Office. From what we have been able to learn, Sir George Gater indicated to Mr. Smith that he was under strong pressure from the United States members of the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission to have Jamaica make use of the stockpile. Accordingly, he agreed to take 750 tons of flour per month, along with other food products — in which we are not interested — from the stockpile, although he was told he would have to make his own arrangements for the transport of these supplies from Santiago de Cuba to Jamaica.

The quantity of flour amounts to only one-fifth of Jamaican requirements and cannot be regarded as any serious inroad on our flour trade, but the chief significance of the incident is that a joint commission, on which we are not represented, is taking steps to divert trade away from Canada.

The Canadian National Millers' Association have received inquiries from the United States Flour Millers' Export Association as to whether they would be willing to supply flour to the Santiago stockpile, but the Canadian millers are opposed to having their flour distributed through what they consider to be an agency of the United States Government.

The reason I am writing to you on this subject to-day is, chiefly, that since the end of last week Mr. H. A. Scott, the Commercial Attaché to the Canadian Legation at Washington, has been approached a number of times by the British Colonial Representatives in Washington wanting to know if I could not come to Washington to see Sir George Gater before he leaves for London on Sunday, November 1. I suspected that the reason why Sir George Gater wished to see me was to explain what had happened in regard to the supply of flour to Jamaica out of the Santiago stockpile, but I did not consider that this warranted a visit to Washington — nor did I think the circumstances would justify our making any complaint. Yesterday Mr. Scott advised me that on learning that it would be impossible for me to go to Washington Sir George Gater had wished to know if there were any Canadian representative in Washington with whom he could discuss the subject. Mr. Scott talked the matter over with Mr. Pearson, who expressed a willingness to see Sir George Gater if he could be briefed beforehand on the facts.

This morning I have received from Mr. Scott teletype message WA-3143, dated October 27,[†] in which Mr. John Huggins and Mr. Sydney Caine give a satisfactory explanation as to the supply of flour from the Santiago stockpile for the requirements of Jamaica. Mr. Caine advised Mr. Scott that the scheme is definitely to be operated on a limited scale and only to be resorted to in an emergency. The quantities involved would only be sufficient to represent an insurance of adequate supplies in case other facilities break down.

We can readily accept this explanation as satisfactory and would hardly be warranted in making an issue of the pressure brought to bear upon Jamaica to obtain flour from the Santiago stockpile. However, since Sir George Gater will probably be discussing the whole question with Mr. Pearson, I felt it desirable to outline to you the circumstances of this particular case.

It is obvious that the recent developments in connection with the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission give rise to the broader question of whether or not Canada should be represented on the Commission. Mr. Scott has told me, over the telephone, that the Washington Post this morning carried a report indicating that Sir George Gater and Mr. Charles Taussig had an interview yesterday with President Roosevelt, after which the President told the Press that he was convinced of the need of unifying steps to improve the welfare of the inhabitants of the Caribbean area. According to the Press report, the President specifically excluded from the scope of his remarks Cuba, Haiti and — significantly enough — Puerto Rico.

I think we are now very definitely faced with the issue as to whether or not we wish to divorce ourselves entirely from the political and economic future of the British West Indies, or to associate ourselves with the United Kingdom and the United States in order to protect the trade interests we have developed with the British colonies in the Caribbean area. I am more or less convinced that we shall not be able to hold on to the tariff preferences which we enjoy in the British West Indies in the post-war period, but I do feel that the relinquishment of these trade advantages should be used as a bargaining lever for compensation in other directions and not allowed to go by default, through possible lack of interest in the welfare of the British West Indies during the period of the present emergency.

I am sending this letter in duplicate, in case you may wish to forward a copy to Mr. L. B. Pearson, Minister-Counsellor at Washington, in time for his interview with Sir George Gater, which must take place this week as Sir George is leaving on Sunday to return to the United Kingdom.

Yours faithfully,

L. D. WILGRESS •

MOVEMENT OF WEST INDIAN LABOUR TO CANADA

This question arose from a letter, dated September 25th, from the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Ottawa,[†] asking:

- (1) Whether the Canadian authorities would cooperate in a joint plan as regards the enlistment of West Indians in the Canadian Forces, and
- (2) Whether they would similarly cooperate in the employment of West Indians as civilian labourers.

The letter stated that the Colonial Office was anxious to ascertain whether the Canadian Government would be prepared to cooperate, since there was, in the West Indies, a surplus of civilian labour which was increasing as a result of the termination of employment on the construction of some of the United States bases. Furthermore, the shipping situation as between the United Kingdom and the West Indies precluded other schemes for utilizing West Indian manpower which had been considered in London.

The first question was taken up with the military authorities and is still under advisement; a number of West Indians, however, have already joined the Canadian forces, coming to Canada either in groups of volunteers or as individuals. The second point was referred to the Immigration Branch and to National Selective Service, which were chiefly concerned.

On October 26th, the Director of Immigration reported that his Department would not encourage any movement of West Indians for civilian labour. This decision was duly communicated to the Department of Labour. The Department of Labour, in an interim reply on October 31st[†] suggested that the final decision should be left to the Immigration authorities. Further particulars were requested about the number of labourers involved, the kind of work to which they were accustomed, etc. The answers were obtained from the United Kingdom authorities who pointed out, in supplying the additional information, that there were at the time between 1,000 and 1,500 motor transport drivers available in Jamaica and that the Governor of the Leeward Islands had recently reported that between 400 and 500 unemployed stevedores might if required be available for work in Canadian ports. These particulars were passed on to the Department of Labour with the advice that they request reconsideration by the Immigration Branch if they were prepared to take action.

On December 8th, 1942, the Department of Labour answered as follows:

“We have examined this matter further and find that there is a possibility of being able to use a considerable number for work in agriculture in Southern Ontario, particularly in the sugar-beet fields. If you think it advisable, we could discuss the Immigration problems directly with the Immigration Branch. We should like also to explore the question with the Province of Ontario and consider with them, the desirability of sending someone down to the West Indies to report on the kind of labour that would be available and the specific arrangements that would have to be made.”

On the following day, this Department approved of these suggestions, requesting to be kept informed of further developments.

The matter was subsequently discussed between the Department of Labour and the Immigration Branch direct. The decision was reached that, provided a plan could be shown to the Immigration authorities, indicating the number of persons that would be coming to Canada, what they would be doing in this country, and giving satisfactory guarantees in regard to their repatriation after the war, there would be no objection on their part. The next step then was for the Labour authorities to investigate conditions in the West Indies and ascertain whether such a plan would be feasible and under what conditions. Hence the recommendation submitted to Council by the Minister of Labour.

Unless Council, for social considerations or reasons of general policy, is opposed to the employment of coloured persons in Canada, even temporarily for emergency purposes, further enquiries into the possibility of using West Indian agricultural labour are desirable. Another aspect is the concern of the British authorities over economic conditions in the West Indies and their desire to find new outlets for employment. It does not appear from our records, however, whether the West Indians now unemployed are suitable for work in the sugar-beet industry in sufficient number to warrant the institution of a special scheme. It might be best, therefore, to secure the opinion of the British Colonial Office on this point before proceeding further. If an affirmative answer is received, the delegation recommended by the Minister of Labour might be despatched to the West Indies for an investigation on the spot and to complete the practical arrangements.

MOVEMENT OF WEST INDIAN LABOUR TO CANADA

33. THE SECRETARY reported that the Minister of Labour had submitted a recommendation to Council for authority to send a delegation to the West Indies to investigate the possibility of importing labourers to assist Ontario sugar-beet producers. This had been referred to External Affairs for report.

An explanatory document had been circulated.

(Secretary's memorandum, February 3, 1943 — C.W.C. document 401[†]; also submission to Council, P.C. 659[†]).

34. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS said that, unless on grounds of policy the government were not prepared to consider the introduction of coloured labour, it was suggested that the British Colonial Office be consulted before any steps were taken as proposed by the Labour Department.

35. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that, inasmuch as the government were not prepared, on grounds of general policy, to permit the entry into Canada of coloured labour, the proposal of the Minister of Labour for sending a delegation to the West Indies should not be approved.

At the Cabinet War Committee yesterday, it was decided not to proceed with the Minister of Labour's recommendation that a delegation should be sent to the B.W.I. to explore the feasibility of importing coloured labour to work in Ontario sugar-beet fields. Mr. Heeney is advising the Minister of Labour of this decision, and we should, I think, let the United Kingdom High Commissioner know that the Canadian Government is not in a position to take up the suggestion put forward in September last that idle West Indian labour might be utilized in Canadian industry.

The decision of War Committee, determined largely by social and demographic considerations, was undoubtedly strengthened by the fact that there is at the moment a good deal of seasonal and local unemployment in Canada. The Prime Minister was inclined to think that we might make a more serious effort to use the Japanese population, which is only partially employed at present, instead of adding a new complication in the shape of imported coloured labour.

Dear Sir Patrick [Duff],

I have not been able to give you an earlier answer to the last part of your letter of September 25th last[†] (your File 510B/16) which referred to the prospects of employing civilian labour from the West Indies in Canada. The reason for the delay has been the necessity of examining the suggestions of the Colonial Office with care in relation to the nature and extent of our own labour shortages and the social and economic implications of a temporary movement of coloured labour to Canada.

The question has been studied by the Department of Labour and the Immigration Branch and has been considered by the Cabinet. It has now been decided that it is not desirable to permit the utilization in Canada of idle West Indian labour since the economic benefits are not likely to counter-balance the difficulties inherent in such a movement.

RE CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN DISCUSSIONS
CONCERNING THE CARIBBEAN

1. The importance of this question lies in its being the first test of Canada's willingness to take part in dealing with the world problem of backward areas and colonial economies.

2. Canada has already been a party to broad declarations on this subject by approving the Atlantic Charter³⁶ and may become a party to more if the recommendations of the United Nations Conference on Food and Agriculture are accepted.

3. In respect of colonial areas two principles are important: (a) The dominant consideration in all cases should be the long-term interests of the peoples of those areas and (b) until they can make all decisions for themselves those who make them should not seek advantages for themselves at the expense of the inhabitants of the area or of third parties.

4. Canada's major interest lies in promoting not only the verbal acceptance of these principles but the honouring of them in practice. It is not dominantly a direct interest in the sense of there being a danger of Canada's exclusion from trade with these areas. It is a broad interest in assuring a world economic structure favourable to the peace and prosperity of all peoples.

5. In the Caribbean the presence of Canadian representatives in discussion should make it easier to keep the interested motives of other countries in the background. Canada, for instance, can do more than Great Britain to make it difficult for the United States to fight for United States immediate interests; and easier for United States representatives to resist political pressures. In this and in other ways it may be easier for Great Britain and the United States to cooperate if Canada is present too.

6. To put it somewhat differently Canada's presence would be useful because Canadian interests are broad enough to coincide with world interests as set out in paragraph 3 above.

³⁶ Voir le volume 7, document 327.

³⁶ See Volume 7, Document 327.

7. In other areas other countries with no vital interests at stake may play the rôle which Canada can fill in the Caribbean. Canada's presence there will make it easier to include such countries elsewhere. For this reason I think it unfortunate if we make our decision appear to turn solely on evidence that Canada has direct interests in the West Indies.

[Ottawa,] June 22, 1943

About two years ago the United States and the United Kingdom set up a Joint Caribbean Commission to advise them on questions of social and economic policy relating to British and American colonies in the West Indies. Its duties were to "initiate research and to exchange information for the purpose of strengthening the economic life of the dependencies in the Bahamas and the Caribbean area". At the time that this Commission was set up, some consideration was given to the question of whether Canada should participate in it. The United Kingdom took the view that the Commission should consist of representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom, but "did not desire to exclude the possibility of Canadian participation, though the United Kingdom would prefer that this possibility should not be raised at this stage". The Caribbean Commission is now proposing that a regular system of West Indian Conferences should be inaugurated to deal with questions of common concern to the West Indian colonies and has suggested that the first of such Conferences could profitably be held at an early date to consider the general question of obtaining supplies from the United States for development purposes and to discuss the stabilization of food prices in the West Indies and the means by which food production can be maintained after the war.

We are asked whether Canada would wish to be represented at such a Conference. The Department of Trade and Commerce and the Wartime Prices and Trade Board, who have been consulted, favour Canadian participation in any such Conferences dealing with questions in which we are directly interested, such as shipping communications, West Indian import policy or agricultural production programmes which would affect Canadian sources of supply. Against our participation it has to be remembered that the Caribbean Commission is a body set up to advise the parent states and the Colonial Governments primarily on questions of administration, with which we have no connection or interest. Our long established connection with the West Indies has been concerned solely with matters of trade and, since the war, of defence. At an inter-departmental meeting held on June 21st, at which representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Canadian Shipping Board were present, it was suggested that we inform the British Government that Canada is definitely interested in the plans for a Conference but would prefer to receive further information about the type of problem to be discussed and the nature of the representations at the deliberations before giving a definite reply to the invitation. If the topics to be discussed involve such matters as trade, tariff policy, and communications of direct interest to Canada, the Government will then give the question of representation further careful consideration.

My dear Sir Patrick [Duff],

I have noted with interest the information given in your letter of May 22nd[†] regarding the proposed inauguration of a system of technical conferences in the West Indian area to be held under the auspices of the Caribbean Commission. The question of Canadian participation in these conferences has been given preliminary consideration by the Departments chiefly concerned.

All that I can say on this aspect at the moment is that we are interested in the project and anxious that we should be kept informed of its development. We should like to keep open for later determination the question of direct Canadian representation at the conferences when we have received further information on the organization of the conferences, the territories to be covered during the discussions, the nature of representation and related matters. On receipt of this information prompt consideration will be given to the question of representation.

nial areas involves a major question of Canadian post-war policy. These suggestions have appeared before from sources less authoritative. General Smuts, during the exchange of views on the proposed British-United States declaration on colonial policy, suggested that South Africa might assume obligations towards the African colonies, that Australia and New Zealand might do the same for the Oceanic and South-East Asian colonies, and that Canada might help with the West Indies. (It will be recalled that the question of political union of Canada and the West Indies has been raised at intervals in the past and that at the Paris Peace Conference, while other Dominions were assuming mandatory obligations towards former German colonies, Lloyd George suggested to Sir Robert Borden that Canada might "take over" the West Indies.)

Although there has been some loose talk recently about Canada's "taking over" the British West Indies, it is doubtful if Canadian (or West Indian) opinion would approve of political suzerainty on the part of Canada. Our strategic interests are undoubtedly guaranteed by the presence of both British and United States bases on the Islands. Our trading interests should not require any closer political tie than at present exists. Furthermore, we could not hope to provide enough persons trained in colonial administration. Union could not be on a basis of equality; and the future of a white country and of a black country might far better be worked out independently. It is important also that Canada should take no step which would provoke hostile elements in the United States into accusing her of seeking territorial aggrandizement out of the war.

If the entry of the West Indies into the Canadian confederation is not advisable, and if Canadians would be unwilling to assume and West Indians indisposed to accept the substitution of rule from the East Block for rule from Downing Street, it need not be assumed that Canada ought not to take some special interest in this area. It will no doubt be argued that Canada is under no obligation to take over British imperial responsibilities and that Canada has colonial problems in her own vast territories. But the question of our responsibility towards backward peoples will not be put to us in this way. Other countries will note that Canada has subscribed to the Atlantic Charter, that the Prime Minister has said that prosperity is indivisible, and that other Canadians have proclaimed benevolent intentions to their less fortunate brethren. They will note that Canada is one of the wealthiest countries in the world and therefore in a most favourable position to assist in bringing about freedom from want and self-government in all parts of the world. Canada will have to decide, therefore, whether the protestations of her good intentions are more than parrot cries and wartime cajoleries. If Canada refuses invitations to help in the work of improving the conditions of backward peoples and helping them along towards that self-government she herself has already achieved, it may be assumed that Canada is no more interested in carrying out the terms of the Atlantic Charter than is Senator Wheeler. It may be assumed, furthermore, that Canada is not really interested in assuming world interests as a world power but prefers to remain herself in a colonial position.

It might be argued that Canada should wait until she is doled out certain specific jobs at a peace conference. There would be an advantage, however, in our making certain definite commitments now. Widespread cynicism undoubtedly exists concerning the willingness of the more favoured nations to carry out their promises to colonial peoples. A Canadian example at this time might have useful repercussions. This example might take the form of specific commitments for the assistance of the West Indies, both in their efforts to achieve self-government and to improve their economic position.

Canada's particular contribution might be in the provision of technical assistance. We could provide particularly doctors, nurses, public health officers, and we could do a great deal more to educate West Indians for work of this kind. Dr. Frigon's³⁸ recent mission to Jamaica to advise on the establishment of a broadcasting system is indicative of the services Canada might offer. The new Jamaican government will probably need financial advice of a kind Canadians would be well equipped to give. By interchanges of visits and in other ways Canadian parliamentarians might help to advise and encourage the Jamaicans in their significant new experiment. If the project of a West Indian University materializes, Canadian advice and assistance would be helpful. Agricultural specialists and engineers will also be needed.

There are many reasons why Canadians are especially equipped to give assistance in the West Indies. Canadians may not be able to take on full responsibility for this area. But it should be realized that the United Kingdom will be unable to provide all the personnel needed if extensive schemes for raising the standards of living of backward peoples are put into practice. The United States can play a large part and is already committed by the Anglo-[American] Caribbean Commission to an interest in the West Indies. But the United States will have vast obligations throughout the world, especially in Asia and Africa. United States assistance will be limited to some extent by the existence of a colour problem in that country. West Indians would suffer less social exclusion in Canadian universities; and Canadians who might go to the West Indies to render advice would be less handicapped by racial prejudices. Furthermore, the parliamentary system of government which is being evolved in Jamaica and other colonies more closely approximates the Canadian system, and Canadian precedents will be more useful. Canadian parliamentary government can be not only a model but an inspiration to the West Indians. Mr. Morrison and other British spokesmen are continually describing the Colonies as regions in a process of development towards Dominion status. If at least one non-white colony can achieve and maintain self-government, a significant milestone will have been passed not just in the development of the British Empire but in the solution of a major problem which faces all the world.

There is no reason why our philanthropic endeavours need be directed exclusively to the British West Indies, but on the other hand there is something to be said for concentration of effort. Canadians could thereby take pride in their contribution to the development of one colonial region. A useful outlet would be provided for Canadians seeking careers, and a fund of goodwill might be built up which would result in commercial advantages. (This latter argument is inserted for those who do not believe there is any inherent advantage in goodwill).

³⁸ Directeur général par intérim, Radio-Canada.

³⁸ Acting General Manager, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Such assistance could be offered without the assumption of any political obligations. Most proposals for post-war colonial development have made provision for the establishment of supervisory bodies in various regions, on which would be represented at least those countries with special interests in the area. The nucleus of such a body for the West Indies already exists in the Anglo-[American] Caribbean Commission. It is on this level that Canadian interest should be expressed. The rehabilitation of the West Indies is dependent upon fundamental decisions concerning the economy of the region. Canada has a vital interest in such decisions, as they affect our economy. But Canada cannot demand a voice on any body established to supervise West Indian interests simply to protect her own interests. She must be prepared to make contributions.

If prosperity is indeed indivisible, Canada cannot disclaim responsibility for dependent areas simply on the ground that she has never been a colonial power and desires no "territorial aggrandizement." The problem of backward peoples is not the result of the selfish exploitation by "imperialist" powers; it is inherent in the nature of things. (Whether "imperialist" powers have contributed on the whole to the solving or to the complication of the problem is a properly debatable point.) Doing something about this problem may prove to be the most healthy preoccupation of the post-war world, and one in which all countries which aspire to a role on world affairs must take part.

If it should be decided that a policy similar to that suggested could be pursued the following specific steps might be considered:

1. Mr. Malcolm MacDonald or Mr. Attlee might be informed that, in view of Mr. Eden's suggestions, Canada would be interested in discussing with the Colonial Office the contribution which could be made to the development of the West Indies. Conversations with the Colonial Office to discover what sort of help is needed might well be supplemented by on-the-spot investigations and discussions with West Indians. It would, of course, be essential not to act independently of the Colonial Office, but at the same time to preserve the right to make suggestions and not simply to carry out assigned jobs.
2. Canada should indicate to the United Kingdom and United States governments that she is willing and anxious to take a part in the activities of the Anglo-[American] Caribbean Commission. (This matter is under consideration.)
3. The Prime Minister should seek an opportunity for a declaration of Canada's intentions to make some concrete contribution to the colonial problem. Such a declaration should, of course, wait until the ground has been explored.
4. The Prime Minister should seek an opportunity to refer in the House of Commons to the new Jamaican constitution and to make to the Jamaicans some gesture of encouragement and an offer of assistance. Several leading Jamaican political leaders might be invited to Ottawa to discuss constitutional problems with Canadian leaders.

5. Consideration might be given to the appointment of a Canadian High Commissioner to the West Indies. It is recognized that this problem is difficult in view of the fact that the West Indies are not a political entity, but the possibilities might be studied.

6. An appropriation might be made to provide funds with which to bring West Indians to Canada to study medicine, public health, engineering, public administration, agriculture, etc. Facilities might also be provided for apprenticing West Indians in Canada just as Great Britain is training East Indian apprentices. Such possibilities are of course limited by the dissimilarity between Canadian and West Indian industries, but they might be developed more in the field of commerce, banking, agriculture, and public administration.³⁹

[Ottawa,] September 1, 1943

A discussion on the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission took place in my office yesterday between Sir Arthur Richards, who has been Governor of Jamaica for the last five years and who is about to become Governor of Nigeria, Mr. Smith of Jamaica and Messrs. Master, Angus and Croft⁴⁰ and myself. Sir Arthur said that he would express his personal views on the understanding that these were to be treated in strict confidence. Officially he was bound to defend the work of the Commission but personally he had grave doubts about its ability and present activities.

The dominating personality on the Commission is Mr. Taussig and the criticisms made by Sir Arthur related mainly to Mr. Taussig's activities. Behind them, however, was the belief that the American attitude towards the British colonies, Haiti and the Dominican Republic, was shaped by the desire to establish the economic supremacy of the United States in the Caribbean area.

Sir Arthur said that the Commission had done very little to fulfil its ostensible purpose and he doubted that it could do much unless it had the direction of the ³⁹ La note suivante était annexée à ce mémorandum:

Mr. Wrong.

This seems to me an excellent memo, but not an entirely convincing one. For Canada to be a sort of elder brother to a colony in transition does involve very delicate political problems. These are not avoided by assuming no formal commitments and there may be room for a new concept: shall we call it "satellite dominions" for New[foundland], B[ritish] W[est] I[ndies], and eventually many other communities.

³⁹ The following note was attached to this memorandum:

expenditure of substantial sums for development and social welfare. The commission had turned into an agency for considering supply problems during the war but it had not been effective in this. Mr. Smith remarked that American undertakings had not been fulfilled and without the cooperation of Canada, Jamaica would have gone short of absolutely essential supplies. Sir Arthur said that Mr. Taussig was devoting his energy to matters foreign to the purpose of the commission and was taking a great interest in the politics of Jamaica. He had a "spy" there attached to the United States Consulate who maintained contact with local politicians.

He commented that the United States had received a negligible return for the expenditure of some $120,000,000 in Puerto Rico where he regards their colonial administration as ineffective and wasteful. He said that there were American efforts to get control of the communications systems (railways, telegraphs, telephones, etc.) in the British Colonies, and that Pan-American Airways, who certainly provided efficient service, was very strongly entrenched. He spoke well of Mr. Yerex⁴¹ and hoped that he would be given encouragement from Canada.

With regard to Canadian association with the Caribbean Commission, I think that Sir Arthur would personally welcome our active participation but he said frankly, with support from Mr. Smith, that from the Canadian point of view he felt we had little to gain so long as the Commission was composed as at present. The suggestion was made that we should seek to improve our contacts with the Commission by arranging to secure regular information of its proceedings. Sir Arthur thought that we could do this via the Colonial Office or preferably make an arrangement whereby the Washington Office maintained by the United Kingdom side of the Commission would pass on information through the Legation there. He thought that we might be well advised to participate in the technical conferences planned by the Commission but he said that our participation would be likely to result in our having to give financial assistance for the development of plans of social welfare, technical education, etc.

In general he was very anxious that the Canadian interest in the Caribbean area should be maintained and developed. He felt that otherwise the influence of the United States would in time become dominant and he was clearly alarmed lest this influence should be exercised in the interests of large American firms. He did not place stock in any suggestions for the establishment of a political connection between Canada and the Caribbean colonies.

Sir Arthur is sceptical about proposals for international commissions in Colonial areas. This is a natural attitude in a professional Colonial Administrator. I gathered that his feeling was that such commissions would possess power without responsibility and would complicate the work of Colonial government without any compensation in the way of financial assistance.

In the light of this discussion I think that our best course in respect to the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission is for us to keep alive the possibility of Canadian membership without seeking to play a direct part in its work for the present. We should probably follow up the suggestion of establishing closer contact with the work of the Commission through Washington and we should also be ready to send well qualified people to participate in technical conferences.⁴²

RE CONVERSATIONS ON ANGLO-AMERICAN CARIBBEAN COMMISSION

I share your opinion that our division should have had representation at this meeting held on August 31st.⁴⁴ The information given seems to substantiate the argument that we should be cautious on our approach towards membership in the Commission. However, before I fully accept British criticisms of the American delegation, I should like to hear the American version of the case, which, under the circumstances, is not likely. I suspect that the sensitivity of the West Indian officials concerned and the obvious deficiency in administration there make them unduly suspicious of United States observations and actions. I am not quite clear what Sir Arthur means by international commissions in Colonial areas. If he means administration by international commissions, I quite agree. If he objects to supervision and investigation by an international commission, I cannot share his opinions. The suggestions contained in Mr. Wrong's closing paragraph seem to meet the situation and I feel that our Legation in Washington, which has already expressed interest in this matter, should be approached to see what can be done in creating closer contact with the work of the commission.

ANGLO-AMERICAN CARIBBEAN COMMISSION

With reference to the attached correspondence[†], the following points may be of some assistance in any views you wish to express on the matter to Ottawa:

(1) Since our joint meeting with Sir George Gater⁴⁵ last November, the Legation has, as far as I am aware, had no subsequent contacts with the Commission, except for the periodical meetings of the informal Caribbean Shipping Review Committee, which I have attended along with Leslie Lawes at the invitation of Sir John Huggins who presided usually, with Taussig and De la Rue of OLLA⁴⁶ present. The discussions at such meetings were invariably confined to potential shipping space and in particular the relationship of such space to the movement of sugar from the Caribbean areas, notably Puerto Rico; and I might add that usually a representative of the Department of Interior, one Mr. Thoron, was present to give advice on the Puerto Rican situation.

(2) Although you and I have both apparently discussed Canadian representation at different times when in Ottawa, I am unaware of any expression of Canadian Government policy which would encourage the Legation to take the initiative suggested in Mr. Wrong's letter to you⁴⁷. Certainly Ottawa has not so far seen fit to commit itself either with respect to representation or even attendance at the projected conference, which I believe was originally planned for some time in October in the West Indies. In other words, if we attempted to foster closer relations, what would be our terms of reference and what specific problems have we to take up now that shipping is easier and no longer presents an acute problem in that area?

(3) In considering Smith's views, Ottawa should keep in mind that while reputedly an able administrator well experienced in the affairs of Jamaica, he is nevertheless at odds with practically the whole personnel of the British Colonies Supply Mission in Washington, by reason of his consistent refusal to place orders for North American account through the Mission, and in general, he maintains a hostile attitude toward the Mission as such. He has advanced, from his standpoint, some sound views for this attitude.

⁴⁶ Office of Lend-Lease Administration.

⁴⁵ Permanent Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies of Great Britain.

⁴⁷ A copy of Document 900 was forwarded with this letter. The initiative referred to was for Canadian liaison with the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission through the British office in Washington.

(4) It must be remembered that Sir John Huggins, who has been heading the Mission, is now to become Smith's superior, and somewhat to my surprise, when talking to Smith himself in the past two weeks when he was en route to Canada, in the face of these circumstances he still seems very anti-Huggins.

Smith is known to have the ear of Sir Arthur Richards, who has the greatest confidence in him and they can therefore be expected to speak with one voice. It happens that Sir John Huggins, through us, has undertaken to pay a call on the Minister of Trade and Commerce on September 17 in Ottawa. He will be accompanied by Thomson, one of the supply officers of the Mission here, and it is expected that some informal discussions will take place with individual officials of Trade and Commerce in regard to specific trade problems.

(5) I have long since warned Croft in the course of making these preparations to see that External was kept informed in case it is desired to discuss with Huggins any matters affecting Canadian Government policy, and I know that Croft has this in hand. The point is that Huggins himself is visiting Canada primarily in an unofficial capacity on vacation, and specifically requested that his visit be treated as strictly informal. In spite of this, I have felt, right from the outset, that Huggins should call on someone in External and perhaps you would like to refer to this in your reply to Hume. I have been asked to stand in readiness on September 17 in my own department for these discussions, and if you would like to leave it to me, I will raise the issue with External early in the week, in order to ensure that he meets whomever you think he should see, presumably Hume himself.

(6) As Huggins has just returned from England, perhaps the most important point to clear with him, while he is in Ottawa, is precisely what his own attitude is toward Canadian representation on the Commission, in view of his changed status from the Head of the B.C.S.M. to that of Governor of one of the territories concerned.

(7) It would also be interesting to ascertain his views as to what Jamaica's relationship is going to be under his direction with the B.C.S.M., as compared with Sir Arthur Richards', who apparently encouraged Smith to ignore it.

(8) Finally, I might just mention that there is no feeling of personal hostility between myself and Smith. We have enjoyed the most cordial relations ever since he started coming to Washington, and knowing something of the background from his point of view, I have always recognized that there were two sides to this dispute and all I have ever tried to do was to meet Smith's wishes when I could, and avoid getting into the dispute between the rival factions. The most amazing part of the whole thing is how the Colonial Office has allowed such conditions to carry on over the past two years, as I have good reason to believe that they are fully aware of the situation.

to Prime Minister*

[Ottawa,] September 15, 1943

I am attaching copy of a telegram which Lord Halifax sent to the United Kingdom Foreign Secretary on August 9th[†] about the exploitation of certain bauxite (the raw material from which aluminum is made) deposits in Jamaica. You might wish to note particularly paragraphs 4, 6 and 8, from which the impression could be drawn that the Canadian Government was pressing for a "common raw materials development and exploitation policy", by which the international bargaining power of the "Commonwealth and Empire" could be increased. We have all subscribed to the objective of freedom of access to raw materials laid down in the Atlantic Charter, and we are also committed to the goal of eliminating discriminatory practices in international commerce.

We have a definite interest in maintaining adequate post-war sources of supply for the enormous Canadian aluminum capacity. I do not think, however, that such special interests should be generalized into an exclusive policy, which would put us at odds with the United States.

In the circumstances, I think, if you approve, that we might send instructions along the lines of the attached despatch to our High Commissioner in London, dissociating the Canadian Government from support of the attitudes attributed to it in Lord Halifax's telegram.

Ottawa, October 26, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to draw your attention to the enclosed copy of telegram No. 3817 of August 9, 1943[†] from Viscount Halifax to the Foreign Office on the subject of Jamaican bauxite. This telegram has been referred to the Department of External Affairs by the Metals Controller who received it from the United Kingdom representatives in Washington. I also enclose a copy of a letter from the Metals Controller to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, dated September 11,[†] which summarizes the discussions on the subject of Jamaican bauxite which preceded the drafting of this telegram at the British Embassy.

2. The Department of Munitions and Supply has taken the position that as bauxite from Jamaica is not to be treated as a war material of importance in the present war the Department is no longer concerned with the matter.

3. As the question of Jamaican bauxite has now become entirely a matter of post-war policy, it is important that there should be no possible misunderstanding in the minds of the United Kingdom authorities as to the position of Canada in relation to the general questions of post-war policy raised in the telegram of August 9. This telegram has been brought officially to the attention of the Department of External Affairs and it follows that unless some steps are taken at once to explain that the Canadian views have been misunderstood by Lord Halifax we should be tacitly accepting as correct his interpretation of Canada's position.

4. The references to Canadian policy appear in paragraphs 6 and 8 of the telegram. If these are read together with paragraph 4 there may even be a suggestion that Canada would welcome the development by the Empire of "a common raw materials development and exploitation policy" by which the bargaining power of the Commonwealth would be increased.

5. It is not entirely clear to what the "Canadian argument" mentioned in the first line of paragraph 8 refers, and this very vagueness is itself a possible source of misunderstanding.

6. It would, therefore, be appreciated if you would take whatever steps are appropriate to counteract at the Foreign Office what may perhaps be called the overtones in the telegram of Lord Halifax.

7. For your confidential information, it is the view of the Minister of Munitions and Supply that if Canada takes no steps whatever the interests of Canada would be sufficiently protected provided Britain does not yield to pressure from the United States State Department for nationalization of the deposits and for a concession from government to government. It appears that the Aluminum Company is acquiring holdings of bauxite deposits by private purchases and that, therefore, the Department of Munitions and Supply would no longer favour the policy of nationalization of these deposits, which was suggested by the Metals Controller to Lord Halifax in the earlier discussions.

ANGLO-[AMERICAN] CARIBBEAN COMMISSION

In accordance with your suggestion I have discussed with Mr. Wrong and Mr. Macdonald, the letter from Mr. Malcolm MacDonald of December 30¹ offering us an opportunity of attending the first of a proposed new series of West Indies Conferences under the auspices of the Anglo-[American] Caribbean Commission.

Mr. Wrong is of the opinion that it might be well for us to attend this conference, although he points out that it may be difficult to get senior expert officers at the time proposed because of the pressure of parliamentary business. This will be especially true of an individual such as Mr. Bryce. He informs me that the Mutual Aid Board, with the approval of the United Kingdom, has recently agreed to mutual aid to the British West Indies in the form of flour granted directly to them and not through the United Kingdom as in the past. The basis of the award is flour to the value of one dollar per head of the population or approximately three million dollars.

Mr. Macdonald is opposed to attending the conference on the ground that it would be the first step in involving us in West Indies problems for which we are not directly responsible. He points out that the suggestion in Mr. MacDonald's letter varies from that discussed with us by Sir Frank Stockdale⁴⁹, in that it contemplates a conference under Anglo-Caribbean auspices, including United States representation, whereas Sir Frank had discussed with us a purely British West Indies Conference which we might attend. He feels that the two great empires that are responsible for colonies in that area may launch ambitious projects in the economic and social field for the well-being of these peoples in which we might become involved once we undertook representation at such conferences.

I also discussed this question with Mr. Angus. He made the interesting point that, when the problem of providing supplies for the West Indies colonies first came up, Canada argued there was a special Canadian interest in the West Indies, and that therefore Canada was prepared to find food for these islands without any reference to the Combined Food Board in Washington. If this contention of special interest was brought up for that purpose, Mr. Angus feels that it equally applies to this conference where some of the topics [to be] discussed include food problems.

I would suggest that before further action be taken this letter also be circulated to Messrs. Bryce and Master, and the Chairmen of the Canadian Shipping Board and Wartime Prices and Trade Board.⁵⁰

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRIME MINISTER CONCERNING
THE EAST INDIANS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA⁵²

1. There is a very strong feeling in India that the East Indians in all parts of the Empire should have full political rights. The situation in British Columbia is therefore considered a political grievance and the importance of this grievance has become grossly exaggerated in the course of political controversy.
2. This view of the matter is sentimental rather than rational. As the East Indian community in British Columbia has not been assimilated there and, as there is no adult Canadian-born group of East Indian race, no strong case can be made on practical grounds for enfranchisement.
3. On the other hand, as the East Indians in British Columbia are very few in number and as there is never likely to be an East Indian minority of any significant size, their enfranchisement would occasion no appreciable change in the electoral fortunes of any political party. It would be a graceful gesture on our part, which while it would not really benefit anyone could not conceivably cause direct injury to anyone.

⁵¹ H.F. Angus.

⁵² See Document 47.

4. There is even some sentiment in British Columbia itself in favour of the enfranchisement of East Indians. The difficulty lies in the fact that it would be extremely hard to rationalize their enfranchisement without at the same time admitting the claims of Canadian-born Chinese and Japanese. These groups, particularly the latter, are numerically significant and are likely to increase in numbers. Like the Indians they can rank as "Natural-born British subjects". They are also much more assimilated in culture than are the East Indians.

5. Perhaps at the present time the war with Japan might make it possible to justify an extension of the franchise to the East Indians alone. However, it must be recognized that if this [is] done it will become increasingly difficult to deny a similar concession to Canadians of Japanese and Chinese race. In the long view this does not matter in the least because the denial of the franchise on grounds of race is contrary to the policy of the whole of North America and is bound in any event to become increasingly difficult. In practice some people would see that the enfranchisement of East Indians made the continued disfranchisement of Chinese and Japanese Canadians difficult and would not see that the difficulty would be almost equally great in any case.

6. Mr. Polak's proposal that the Federal franchise should be given to East Indians in British Columbia without waiting for action by the Provincial Legislature is open to the objection already mentioned in the case of the Provincial franchise namely that it is almost impossible to justify a distinction between East Indians and Canadian-born Japanese and Chinese. To adopt Mr. Polak's proposal would have the further disadvantage of creating a conflict between Federal and Provincial politics.

7. On balance, as it is understood that Mr. Polak has already approached Mr. Hart⁵³ and Mr. Maitland⁵⁴, it is recommended that the Government of British Columbia should be asked whether it can see its way to making this gesture⁵⁵, which would unquestionably be of great value during and after the war in promoting cordial relations between India and Canada and indeed between India and other nations in the British Commonwealth.

8. The question of franchise is not connected with that of sending a High Commissioner to India which is discussed in an accompanying memorandum except that such an official would obviously find his path smoother if he did not have to defend racial discrimination in Canada.

Dear Mr. Polak,

Thanks for your letter from Seattle^f.

I am sorry to say that the Prime Minister has decided not to send the proposed personal communication to Mr. Hart. Recent developments in the general Oriental position on the Pacific Coast have brought Mr. King to the conclusion that it would be inadvisable at this time to intervene in regard to the position of the East Indians there. Under the circumstances I am afraid there is nothing very much that we can do except to endeavour to obtain a favourable decision in regard to the proposed appointment of a Canadian High Commissioner to India.

DESPATCH 42

London, April 13, 1942

Sir,

I have the honour to state that the Government of India have enquired whether His Majesty's Government in Canada would be prepared to take action with a view to the conferment of the Dominion, Provincial and Municipal franchise on Indians domiciled in British Columbia.

2. It will be recalled that, after the statement made by the Prime Minister of Canada at the Imperial Conference in 1923,⁵⁶ the Government of India enquired in 1925 what was the position with regard to the suggested revision of the Dominion Franchise Law,⁵⁷ but that when the Dominion of Canada Elections Act came under revision by Parliament in the same year, the Committee on Privileges at Elections after careful consideration, came to the conclusion that no changes in the existing law could be made, and that the position of Indians in British Columbia could not therefore be modified.

3. The Government of India now point out that about 1,300 out of the 1,500 Indians resident in Canada are domiciled in British Columbia and that they do not enjoy franchise rights while in other Provinces of Canada Indian residents are not subjected to any legal or political disability. Indians in British Columbia are, by virtue of section 5 of the British Columbia Provincial Elections Act, disqualified from voting at elections and debarred from having their names inserted in any list of voters. The Government of India further state that by the operation of section 30 (1) (g) of the Dominion Elections Act, which lays down that "persons who by the laws of any Province in Canada are disqualified from voting for a member of the Legislative Assembly of such Province in respect of race, shall not be qualified to vote", they are also denied the federal franchise. They consider that the lack of franchise rights constitutes a grievance among Indians in British Columbia and is regarded as a humiliation in India.

4. The Government of India observe that, since the outbreak of the present war, public feeling in India against the discrimination to which Indians in other parts of the British Commonwealth are exposed has been increasingly evident. They are also of the view that, bearing in mind the paramount need for Commonwealth solidarity and the general recognition of the valuable contribution made by India towards the common war effort, another effort should now be made to obtain the enfranchisement of Indians living in British Columbia. The Indian population of the Province is in itself very small and it appears that there is no danger of any appreciable increase in the future, as the immigration of Indians into Canada for permanent settlement has now virtually ceased. The Indians in British Columbia are, moreover, practically all engaged as farmers, stock-raisers, gardeners and farm labourers and as unskilled workers, and should not, in the opinion of the Government of India, present any serious economic menace to the white population. Nor in their view could the grant of franchise to the Indians give rise to any complications with similar Japanese and Chinese claims, as Indians can, by reason of their common allegiance to the Crown, claim preference over persons of alien origin. Moreover, the Government of India Act, 1935, has now enfranchised persons of lower economic status in India so that it can no longer be said that Indians of similar status do not enjoy the privilege to vote in their own country.

5. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom would be grateful if the question could be considered in the light of the above representations and they would be glad to receive an expression of the views of His Majesty's Government in Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS REPORTS: RE: FRANCHISE
FOR EAST INDIANS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

1. A formal enquiry from the Government of India has been transmitted by the Dominions Office asking if the Canadian government "would be prepared to take action with a view to the conferment of the Dominion, Provincial and Municipal franchise on Indians domiciled in British Columbia". A copy of this despatch is attached.

2. There are very strong reasons for doing whatever may be possible to meet this request.

(a) The political status of East Indians in various parts of the British Dominions has been bitterly resented by Indian opinion and is one of the serious barriers to whole-hearted cooperation within the British Empire.

(b) Canada has recently decided that a High Commissioner may be sent to India. The position of such a commissioner would be greatly strengthened if he could bring with him the assurance that a long-standing Indian grievance had been removed.

(c) It is important to conciliate Asiatic opinion during the war by making it impossible for Japan to represent the English-speaking countries as insisting on racial discrimination against Asiatics in general.

(d) In any peace settlement racial discriminations in democratic countries against the citizens of friendly democratic countries will be most undesirable.

3. The Provincial and Municipal franchises in British Columbia are governed by provincial legislation. They do not extend to aliens and they exclude British subjects of Chinese, Japanese, East Indian and other Asiatic races and also North American Indians. An exception is made for British subjects of Japanese race who served in the last war. The Dominion Elections Act excluded from the Federal franchise in any province persons excluded on racial grounds from the Provincial franchise in that province.

4. Any change which British Columbia might make in its franchise policy would, therefore, automatically affect the Federal franchise in British Columbia. On the other hand, while it would be possible for the Parliament of Canada to amend the Dominion Elections Act so as to confer the Dominion franchise on East Indians in British Columbia, such an action would be regarded in that province as an interference with its recognized rights and it might prejudice rather than improve the position of East Indians in British Columbia.

5. The East Indian population of British Columbia is very small and the request of the Government of India could be met by adding less than one thousand to the number of qualified voters. Immigration has been effectively stopped and numbers are decreasing.

6. Although the East Indians as a group are probably less Canadianized than the two other Asiatic groups and would therefore have the weakest case for enfranchisement on grounds of internal policy, there would probably be no great opposition to their enfranchisement at the present time if this could be done without affecting the position of Canadians of Chinese and Japanese racial origin.

7. The war with Japan makes it easy to exclude Canadians of Japanese racial origin from consideration. There are, therefore, two alternative courses open to the Government of British Columbia if it is willing to meet the request made by the Government of India.

(a) To remove East Indians from the list of Asiatic races excluded from the franchise. This policy would be explained as a recognition of imperial solidarity and as a friendly gesture to a nation recognized as about to become a sister dominion.

(b) To make an exception to the exclusion of Asiatics from the franchise for natural-born British subjects of other than Japanese race. This exception would include all East Indians and Canadian-born Chinese who are not numerous. It would not include naturalized Chinese. It would be explained as a gesture of comradeship with nations associated with Canada in the battle for civilization against aggressors.

8. It is recommended that the request of the Government of India should be transmitted to the Government of British Columbia with the endorsement of the War Committee of the Cabinet. The Government of British Columbia would be asked to give an assurance that it would introduce legislation to extend the Provincial and Municipal franchise to persons of East Indian race. This assurance would be transmitted to the Government of India and in order to produce the hoped for effect on Indian opinion and on political developments in India it would have to be made public.

9. It is also recommended that the Dominions Office, which has asked for an expression of the views of His Majesty's Government in Canada, should be informed both of the difficulties of the situation and of the action taken by the Canadian Government.

FRANCHISE OF EAST INDIANS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

9. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS reported that a formal enquiry had been received from the government of India, asking if Canada would be prepared to take action with a view to the conferment of the Dominion, Provincial and Municipal franchise on Indians domiciled in British Columbia.

The question was a complicated one and involved important considerations. An explanatory note had been circulated.

(External Affairs report, May 26, 1942 — C.W.C. document 173).

10. The War Committee, after discussion, agreed that the request of the Government of India be referred to the Government of British Columbia for consideration.

DESPATCH 69

Ottawa, August 15, 1942

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your note No. 42 of April 13, 1942, transmitting an inquiry from the Government of India as to whether His Majesty's Government in Canada would be prepared to take action with a view to the conferment of the Dominion, Provincial and Municipal franchise on Indians domiciled in British Columbia. This inquiry has received careful consideration and has been transmitted to the Government of the Province of British Columbia which is primarily concerned, since the conferment of the Provincial franchise by that Government would automatically confer the Dominion franchise for elections within the Province and the Municipal franchise within the Province. The Government of British Columbia has now replied that, after a very thorough review of the subject, it is of the opinion that the present is not an opportune time to discuss the conferment of the franchise on East Indians domiciled in British Columbia.

2. In the final paragraph of your note you asked for an expression of the views of His Majesty's Government in Canada. His Majesty's Government in Canada regret that any sense of humiliation should be felt in India concerning the policy followed in British Columbia with regard to the franchise. It may help in an understanding of the complexities of the situation to point out that it is a misapprehension on the part of the Government of India that the grant of the franchise to East Indians in British Columbia could not give rise to any complications with similar Japanese and Chinese claims, since Indians can, by reason of their common allegiance to the Crown, claim preference over persons of alien origin. Neither the Government of Canada nor the Government of British Columbia could be expected to take the view that persons of Japanese or Chinese race, born in Canada, do not owe the same allegiance to the Crown as East Indians, and it would be extremely difficult to take this view with regard to persons of Chinese or Japanese race who have been naturalised in Canada. In view of these circumstances, the grant of the franchise to East Indians would inevitably be the occasion for a demand for the franchise by Canadians of Chinese race and would be considered as a tacit promise of the franchise to Canadians of Japanese race after the conclusion of hostilities with Japan. In these circumstances His Majesty's Government in Canada hopes that the difficulties of the situation will be appreciated by the Government of India and that a full understanding of the position in British Columbia at a time when Canada is at war with Japan will help to mitigate the sense of humiliation which is not unnaturally felt by East Indians.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

From a telegram which we have received from the Dominions Office we understand that the Air Ministry consulted the Minister of National Defence (Air) during the latter's recent visit to the United Kingdom about the proposal made as a result of a request from the Government of India to train in R.A.F. schools in Canada 50 Indian pupils as pilots every three months. Subject to I.T.W. Training being undertaken in India prior to embarkation these Indians would be counted against the United Kingdom quota of pupils under the B.C.A.T.P.⁵⁸ agreement of June, 1942 and on graduation would be employed in R.A.F. Fighter Squadrons in the United Kingdom.

I should be very grateful if you would let me know as soon as possible whether it will be in order for the United Kingdom Air Liaison Mission now to approach the Department of National Defence for Air with a view to making the necessary arrangements for the training of these Indian pupils in Canada.

In this connection I might, perhaps, invite attention to a letter (a copy of which is, no doubt, available to you) of the 8th January last[†] from Canada House to the Dominions Office in which it is stated that the Department of National Defence for Air had reacted favourably to an earlier unofficial suggestion that certain Indian air crews might be trained in Canada. Unfortunately it was not, in the situation existing, possible for the Government of India to pursue the matter at that time.

The letter from Canada House to which I have referred raised the question of whether any dietetic difficulties or special treatment would be involved in the training of Indians in Canada. I might mention here that the India Office have been asked to confirm that no special arrangements would in fact be required in regard to diet or accommodation of Indian pupils here.

Yours sincerely,

London, October 20, 1942

One of the two representatives of India at War Cabinet here, His Highness the Jam Sahib of Nawanager, is leaving shortly for a visit to North America and wishes to spend three or four weeks in Canada before going to the United States. His Highness represents that part of India governed by the Princes. He was educated in England and speaks English perfectly. Mr. Amery tells me that he has good judgment and common sense and would make useful speeches while in Canada. His Highness was for over twelve years a professional soldier before succeeding and is very anxious to see what he can of military activity in Canada. I should be grateful for a telegram to the effect that his visit would be welcome and that suitable arrangements would be made for him to see something of Canada's war effort.

My dear Prime Minister,

I have just had a telegram from the Secretary of State for the Dominions in which I am asked to transmit to you the following personal message from the Secretary of State for India on the subject of His Highness the Jam Sahib of Nawanagar.

“I understand that your Government feel somewhat doubtful about the advisability of the Jam Sahib making any speeches while in Canada. I cannot help feeling that this must be due to some misapprehension as to the kind of subject he would talk about or the kind of speech he would make. He has been a serving soldier and would naturally talk primarily about India's war effort in the field and in raising and equipping forces while as a capable administrator of his own state and Chancellor of the Chamber of Princes he can also speak interestingly about the administration of Indian states and dispel some ideas as to their backwardness and administrative inefficiency. He would certainly not raise uncomfortable controversial issues about British India. He has great personal charm, speaks in a breezy attractive fashion and answers questions frankly and readily. He has made the very best impression here in all quarters and on all political parties and it seems to me it would be a great pity if the Canadian public did not have some opportunity of coming into contact with the personality of the best kind of Indian soldier statesman. Kindest regards. Amery.”

Dear Sir Patrick [Duff],

I received last night your letter of yesterday transmitting a personal message to me from the Secretary of State for India. I shall be obliged if you will kindly forward to Mr. Amery the following personal message in reply:

“I have received your personal message on the subject of the proposed visit to Canada of His Highness the Jam Sahib of Nawanagar.

The doubts which my colleagues and I entertain about the advisability of his visit do not arise so much from fears of what the Jam Sahib may say in the course of his speeches — as for that, we realize that you would not think of having him visit Canada unless you were fully satisfied as to his judgment and discretion in matters of the kind. Our concern is with the wisdom of the visit at all, as certain to give rise to public controversy on the Indian question.

Thus far, there has been little public discussion in Canada on matters relating to India. Our people are prepared to accept the view that the question of the future status of India will be settled immediately after the war in accordance with undertakings already given, and that the matter should be left over until that time. The presence in Canada of an Indian prince, seeking to explain the Indian situation, would almost certainly be regarded in some quarters as propaganda at the instance of the British government, and discussion of the right of India to immediate self-government might well set the heather on fire. Moreover, every time a representative of India has travelled through Canada the visit has provoked anew an agitation in the province of British Columbia to give the franchise to natives of India resident there. In the province the problem would almost certainly be bound up at the present time with a similar claim for the Chinese who have been lifelong residents of the province. It would be most embarrassing to the government of British Columbia and our own government to have this issue reopened at this time.

It is not, of course, for me to say anything about the wisdom of a visit of an Indian prince and ruler to the United States. You no doubt already have Lord Halifax's views as to the wisdom of a visit there by the Jam Sahib of Nawanganar, and no doubt Lord Halifax has given you the President's reaction to the possible effects of such a visit. Granting all you say of the personality of the Jam Sahib, and what he stands for as an Indian soldier statesman, I am sure, in the position which he holds in India, his visiting the United States would in itself be misunderstood, and might make the situation there more difficult than it already is. This is, of course, only a personal view. I should feel, however, that I had not been true to Britain's interest vis-à-vis the feeling in America on the Indian question, or to the interests of our own war effort if I did not express to you unreservedly my own strong conviction in this matter.

MEMORANDUM OF A CONVERSATION BETWEEN THE PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA AND THE HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR GREAT BRITAIN,
 AT LAURIER HOUSE, NOVEMBER 6, 1942, 5 P.M.

RE: VISIT OF THE JAM SAHIB OF NAWANAGAR

Malcolm MacDonald returned from England yesterday. In conversation with him at Laurier House, he told me that the Indian Prince, Jam Sahib of Nawana-gar, was coming out to see something of the war effort of Canada and the United States and that it was embarrassing to the British Government not to have him come.

MacDonald said that when Amery received my letter he called him in and told him quite frankly what the difficulties were that we foresaw in the letter. The Prince had said that he would not attempt much in the way of speaking but would make broadcast which would deal mostly with the war effort of India. If I wished it, he would be glad to submit the plans to me in advance. I said to MacDonald that I would not wish to take any responsibility with respect to the broadcast. That he himself would be quite as good a judge as I would be as to what should or should not be said. The difficulty that I saw was in the visit at all and the controversy to which the presence of a native Indian ruler on this continent would be certain to give rise with respect to self-government in India. That if some poor Hindu had been sent out to tell the story of how the British were helping to improve the conditions of the Indians, someone of that type might have a story to which the people on this continent would be inclined to listen sympathetically.

The presence of an Indian Prince would only cause them to view the whole business in a satirical way. The Prince would find himself the subject of ridicule in some of the American papers.

MacDonald said that what he was most afraid of was the interviews — the questions that might be asked, and the possible slips that might be made in reply. I told him it was inevitable that embarrassing questions would be asked and that of course that was at the foundation of my view that the visit should not be made at all.

MacDonald spoke of the two Indians who were coming out to the Canadian Pacific Conference⁵⁹ and said that he thought there was a danger in their presence though they were highly intelligent men. I said my whole point of view was that of allowing sleeping dogs lie.

I then spoke to him of what Willkie had said in his speech reflecting on the English rule in India and read to him the letter[†] which Coldwell had sent me on the day following, the essence of which I had sent on to Amery. He would see there how ready the C.C.F. would be to make an issue of the Indian situation. Clearly, both the C.C.F. and Willkie were ready to further their own political popularity at the expense of others, in this case the British Empire at a time of war.

I said I thought the whole business was full of dangerous possibilities and that I would not agree to alter in any particular the views I had expressed as to the unwisdom of having Prince Jam Sahib of Nawanagar at this time.

MacDonald told me that Lord Halifax had been a little uncertain at the start but had agreed to his coming. I said Lord Halifax, having been Viceroy of India, was in a very embarrassing position, but I did not think it was fair to place any responsibility on him. I hoped that he had sought the President's view.

I spoke to MacDonald of the fact that the British could not see the folly of sending to democratic self-governing countries like Canada a ruling Prince to discuss the Indian situation, and said that that was in itself evidence that they could not understand the feeling of the native races and the masses of the people in the Orient in their desire for complete self-government. It was ludicrous to think that you could begin to educate the masses of this continent to the intricacies of the Indian situation by any number of visitors.

[Ottawa,] October 14, 1943

We have been following up the suggestion you made some weeks ago that Canada might appropriately do something to help relieve the Indian famine. Angus had a preliminary talk on the subject with Sir Girja Bajpai, the Indian High Commissioner⁶⁰ in the United States, during Food Commission discussions in Princeton last week, and Pearson had a further word with him in Washington yesterday.

Bajpai thinks that the political effect of a gift of wheat from Canada would be very great. He was obviously himself much impressed by this aspect of the gift, quite apart from its immediate value in overcoming famine conditions. He was strongly of the opinion that any gift should be made to the Government of India and not to the Governments of the Provinces. There were three or four Provinces concerned, and Bengal, where the need was greatest, had so messed up existing arrangements for relief that he thought it would be better not to send the gift directly to them.

Bajpai felt that if the Canadian Government wished to help relieve the Indian famine, a gift of wheat would be the most appropriate and effective assistance they could give. He recognized that shipping difficulties would be serious and might delay deliveries pretty materially.

Bajpai, whom you will remember meeting, is a very fair-minded and level-headed Indian, and his view that a gift of wheat from Canada at this juncture would have a real political effect, can, I think, be taken seriously. If you approve, I would be inclined to take up with the Mutual Aid Board the question of offering India up to 100,000 tons of wheat, provided shipping can be made available. India has been paying cash for all of her requirements from Canada, and is not a recipient of Mutual Aid assistance. India could pay for the wheat, but in sterling, of which we have no present need. Apparently the Mayor of Calcutta has appealed by cable to President Roosevelt for wheat supplies, but the United States had to reply that their wheat commitments were so numerous that they were not in a position at that time to meet the Calcutta request. We would have difficulty shipping wheat from eastern Canadian ports because of transportation difficulties, but I think we should look into the possibility of shipping wheat from West Coast ports in vessels which have to be sent out to India to pick up essential supplies for Canada.

The round figure of 100,000 tons, which would be the equivalent of about 3,000,000 bushels and would represent a market value of about $4,000,000, would seem to be a fair one, having in mind the scale of our Mutual Aid assistance to China.⁶¹

can to help to alleviate the Indian famine and to this end are prepared to give to the Government of India up to 100,000 tons of wheat, provided that it may be found practicable to arrange for the shipment of this wheat to India from western Canadian ports. Under the procedure of the Canadian Mutual Aid Act, by which such a gift could be effected, an application for assistance should be received from the Government to which the goods are to be transferred. A formal application for assistance in this sense will, I may assure you, receive the immediate and most sympathetic consideration of the Canadian Government.

London, November 4, 1943

IMMEDIATE. MOST SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following Most Secret and Personal from the Prime Minister for Mr. Mackenzie King, Begins:

1. I have seen the telegrams exchanged by you and the Viceroy offering 100,000 tons of wheat to India and I gratefully acknowledge the spirit which prompts Canada to make this generous gesture.

2. Your offer is contingent, however, on shipment from the Pacific coast which I regret is impracticable. The only ships available to us on the Pacific coast are the Canadian new buildings which you place at our disposal. These are already proving inadequate to fulfil our existing high priority commitments from that area which include important timber requirements for aeroplane manufacture in the United Kingdom and quantities of nitrate from Chile to the Middle East which we are under obligation to supply to the Egyptian Government in return for foodstuffs for our forces and for export to neighboring territories including Ceylon.

3. Even if you could make the wheat available in eastern Canada I should still be faced with a serious shipping question. If our strategic plans are not to suffer undue interference, we must continue to scrutinise all demands for shipping with the utmost rigour. India's need for imported wheat must be met from the nearest source i.e. from Australia. Wheat from Canada would take at least two months to reach India whereas it could be carried from Australia in 3 to 4 weeks. Thus, apart from the delay in arrival, the cost in shipping is more than doubled by shipment from Canada instead of from Australia. In existing circumstances this uneconomical use of shipping would be indefensible.

4. Publication of your offer would, in these circumstances, create a difficult position. We should have to say that no shipping was available. This would cause disappointment in India and such an announcement might be bad on general grounds. Much therefore as I should like Canada's gesture of sympathy to be made known to the world, I would earnestly beg you to let the matter rest, at any rate for the present, and defer any publication of Canada's most generous offer. Ends.

1. I see from your telegram No. 49 to the Government of India[†] that you propose to load a Canadian ship on November 12th with wheat for India. I understand this ship has been withdrawn from the Canada/Australia service with no prospect of early replacement. I gathered from the last sentence of your No. 176 that it was not intended to make any immediate shipping arrangements, at any rate without further consultation.

2. The War Cabinet has again considered the question of further shipments of Australian wheat and has decided to ship up to another 100,000 tons, part of which will arrive earlier than the proposed cargo from Canada.

3. I feel, therefore, that I must press you to cancel the proposed shipment from Canada, partly because of the alternative arrangements we have been able to make for India, and partly because the withdrawal of the ship from the Canada/Australia trade would create a serious gap in a service of vital importance to the war effort and one which we are being strongly pressed by Evatt to increase. IMPORTANT. SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following from Prime Minister for Prime Minister, Begins: Your telegram No. 171. The offer of Canadian wheat was addressed to the Viceroy of India on October 24th and was promptly accepted by him. Amery was simultaneously informed through Massey. I was ready reluctantly to comply with request to defer publicity made in your telegram No. 164 of November 4th but publication of announcement in India made it necessary to issue statement here.

2. The situation thus is that the Canadian Government has offered and the Indian Government has accepted a substantial gift to relieve urgent famine conditions. The United Kingdom Government has been kept fully informed. In making the gift we had in mind, in addition to the humanitarian aspects, that it would have valuable results from the standpoint of intra-imperial relations. These might well outbalance a slight delay in the movement of Canadian supplies to Australia. If our action is to be more than an empty gesture, it is essential that at least some wheat from Canada should reach India as soon as possible.

3. I am glad to note that you have reached a decision greatly to increase wheat shipments from Australia to India and I hope that these will arrive in time to save lives and alleviate distress. In view of this action on your part I am issuing instructions that the ship due to load today should be restored to the Australian run. We feel, however, that tangible evidence of the Canadian desire to help India in her present tribulations should be furnished by an early actual shipment of wheat from Canada. We shall soon be putting additional ships into the Australian run and hope you will agree that at least one of these ships should be used for at least a single voyage to India. Ends.

In response to press enquiries we have confined ourselves to saying that our announcement of the gift on November 5th included statement that the question of finding shipping presented considerable difficulties and that wheat would move as soon as shipping could be found. Yesterday New York PM published long feature article under heading "No Ships for Starving India, but We Bring In Unneeded Bauxite". This was mainly an attack on War Production Board and Aluminum Company for using bauxite from Guiana while reducing production in Arkansas. It ended with paragraph quoted in my immediately succeeding telegram.[†]

Please inform United Kingdom authorities that we hope to ship consignment of war supplies for China to India during first half of January and are prepared to load them on two Canadian ships with part cargoes of wheat for India. Mémorandum du troisième secrétaire⁶² au conseiller juridique
Memorandum from Third Secretary⁶² to Legal Adviser

RE: APPLICATION OF RECRUITS REGULATIONS TO NATIONALS OF EIRE

I think that the Department of External Affairs should now decide what steps, if any, ought to be taken to settle the position of nationals of Eire under the new Recruits Regulations⁶³. Before suggesting what courses are open to us I should like to summarize the relevant correspondence.

Oct. 3, 1941

We wrote National War Services, on file 715-40, that in our opinion any person born in what is now called Eire is a natural-born British subject under Canadian law.

1942

March 12 (715-F-2-40)

We sent the following telegram to the Canadian High Commissioner in Dublin:

“Existing Canadian law relating to compulsory calling up of men for military training and service applies only to every male British subject who is or has been at any time subsequent to September 1, 1939, ‘ordinarily resident in Canada.’

2. The phrase “ordinarily resident” is lacking in precision. Many British subjects “belonging to” other parts of the British Commonwealth but who have been in Canada for a substantial time, have not been touched by the existing law.

⁶² Max Wershof.

⁶³ See Document 262.

3. Canadian Government therefore proposes to amend the law to make it apply to all persons born or naturalized in any other part of the British Commonwealth who have been in Canada for one year.

4. Please ascertain as soon as possible and telegraph whether Government of Ireland has any objection to this proposal. Canadian Government is of course willing that Canadian nationals should be subject to similar laws in other parts of the Commonwealth.”

Similar telegrams were sent to our other High Commissioners.

March 31 (715-F-2-40)

Our High Commissioner in Dublin cabled that he had received a letter from the Irish Department of External Affairs which read in part as follows:

“Irish citizens are not British subjects. That position is made finally clear in Article No. 33, Irish Nationality and Citizenship Act, 1935. It would therefore, not be right for the Canadian Government to include Irish citizens in general category of British subjects.

The Irish Government could not and would not dispute justice of a proposal to make all male citizens whatsoever, including Irish citizens, who have entered Canada for the purpose of permanent residence there amenable to Compulsory Service Law. But they would find it very difficult to understand why certain national groups only — of whom Irish citizens would be one — should be brought within the law.”

March 31 (688-34)

A United Kingdom court decided that a person born in what is now Eire was a British subject under United Kingdom law and was therefore liable to conscription in the United Kingdom as he was residing in the United Kingdom.

April 1 (715-F-2-40)

Mr. de Valera issued a statement to the press regarding the judgment of the United Kingdom court, in which he said:

“A law which purports still to provide that every man who is born in Ireland becomes automatically, and precisely by reason of that fact, a citizen of another State, is contrary to all reason and common sense.”

April 3 (715-F-40)

We sent a despatch[†] to our High Commissioner in Ireland and to all our other High Commissioners giving them, for their own confidential information, a full statement of our plans regarding conscription of various classes of aliens in Canada.

June 2 (715-F-40)

Our High Commissioner in Ireland cabled that the Irish Department of External Affairs was considering the documents which we had sent him on April 3.

June 10 (715-F-40)

We cabled the High Commissioner that the documents we sent on April 3 were not intended for anyone except himself.

June 12 (715-F-40)

Our High Commissioner cabled expressing regret for having, in error, given the Irish Government the documents we sent him on April 3. He added that the Department of External Affairs had told him orally that "if the Canadian Government ultimately decides to adopt course outlined, Irish Government would place no obstacles in the way."

June 23 (501-33C)

We sent to the Irish High Commissioner in Ottawa, for the information of his Government, a copy of a draft Order in Council[†] to change the naturalization law. Similar communications were sent to our High Commissioners in other parts of the Commonwealth. A copy of our note[†] to the Irish High Commissioner in Ottawa was referred to our High Commissioner in Dublin. Our note to the Irish High Commissioner in Ottawa said that two of the proposed changes in the naturalization law were part of a proposed programme concerning Canada's compulsory military service laws. The note said in part:

"At present Canada's compulsory military service laws apply only to British subjects. It is intended to change the laws to apply to neutral aliens. They will have the right, as citizens of another country, to claim exemption, but those who do so will be barred from naturalization and will be deportable. The Order in Council makes provision for Declarations of Intention or "first paper procedure" similar to that in force in the United States. First paper aliens will then be drafted as if they were British subjects."

Our High Commissioner in Ireland sent us a copy of a letter[†] from the Irish Department of External Affairs setting forth their attitude towards the proposed changes in Canada's conscription laws. This reply completely ignored the only question we had ever authorized our High Commissioner to put to the Irish Government, namely, whether they would object to our draft law being amended to cover all persons born or naturalized in any other part of the British Commonwealth who have been in Canada for one year. The letter concludes with this paragraph:

"If, however, your Government's plan will be capable of being applied to Irish citizens as citizens of a neutral country that should render it less difficult for our Government to explain it both at home and to our nationals in Canada. Clearly, it would ease the position if, (as is apparently being done in the United States) the classification of Irish citizens as citizens of a neutral State were to proceed from an official source, rather than have to be acknowledged by the Canadian authorities ad hoc in each individual case, after an individual claim had been made. But that may, of course, be the Canadian Government's intention. The difficulty, if any, in deciding who are Irish citizens (as distinct from persons of Irish origin claiming either Irish or some other nationality) could always be resolved by reference to our High Commissioner at Ottawa whom we would suitably instruct."

July 16

The Irish High Commissioner in Ottawa answered our note of June 23. He said in part:

“I beg to add that I understand that the High Commissioner for Canada in Ireland has had informal conversations with the Department of External Affairs, Dublin, as a result of which it has been assumed that, for the purposes of the Order in Council, etc., Irish citizens will be regarded as neutral aliens.”

Looking back on this comedy of errors, it seems clear that it would have been better if we had never said anything to the Irish Government regarding the proposed changes in our draft law and regarding the proposed changes in our naturalization law. There was no chance of the Irish Government concurring in our treating their people as British subjects, and it is equally clear under our law that any person born in what is now Eire is a British subject.

The question is now whether we should give any advice to the authorities administering the Recruits Regulations as to how they should treat persons born in Eire claiming to be citizens of Eire, and whether we should say anything further to our High Commissioner in Dublin or the Irish High Commissioner in Ottawa.

Our High Commissioner in Dublin, without any authority from us, has apparently let the Irish Government get the idea that we would treat citizens of Eire as neutral aliens. Should we now tell the Irish Government that we will treat their people as British subjects or should we wait until a particular case arises?⁶⁴

[Ottawa,] August 13, 1943

The position of Irish nationals under N.R.M.A. regulations presents a number of difficulties, which have been the subject of consideration by the Departments concerned for some months past. Aliens, resident in Canada, who are nationals of neutral countries, are allowed to claim exemption from military service on the ground of their nationality. If they do so they become liable to deportation and are permanently disqualified from naturalization in Canada. Irish nationals are in an anomalous position. Under the laws of Canada they are regarded as British subjects as well as citizens of Eire, and do not legally come within the scope of the regulation excepting nationals of neutral countries from military service.

⁶⁴ The following notes were written on the memorandum:

Note: I think that Nat[ional] War Services should be directed to instruct all registrars to refer all cases in which a conscript claimed Irish nationality to External Affairs. (There won't be any.) We can then tell the Irish that we will treat any person whom we regard as entitled to claim Irish Nationality as if he was a friendly neutral alien. We should not use the language underlined.⁶⁵ We should beg the question as to who is to decide.

J. E. R[ead]

I agree with Mr. Read's recommendation. N. A. R[OBERTSON]

⁶⁵ Les mots sont en italiques ici.

⁶⁵ The words are in italics here.

After consultation with the Departments of Justice, Immigration and National War Services, we prepared a Recommendation to Council[†] amending the Mobilization Regulations so that Irish nationals resident in Canada, who are not also nationals of some other part of the British Commonwealth, would be entitled to claim exemption under substantially the same conditions as neutral aliens, i.e., by becoming liable to summary deportation. This concession to the Irish position would only apply to Irishmen who had come to Canada within the last five years. If they have been here longer than that they automatically become Canadian nationals under the provisions of our law and are, therefore, ineligible for separate treatment.

An amendment of our regulations in this sense would not dispose of a majority of the 'Irish cases' now pending under the Mobilization Regulations. It would not go very far to meet the Irish request for recognition of their fully neutral status and it would almost certainly provoke a very sharp and unpleasant debate in the House and in the press about the Irish position in the war and status in the Commonwealth.

All things considered, I think the least objectionable course is to apply the law as it now stands, without amendment. This would mean that Irish nationals, ordinarily resident in Canada, would be liable to call up for military service in the same way as other British subjects. Their position in Canada would be substantially the same as it is in the United Kingdom. We would undoubtedly receive representations from the Irish Government, which we would have to resist. I think it would be very foolish for the Irish Government to try to make an issue out of the question at this time, and I should hope that Mr. Kearney would be able to convince Mr. de Valera that no good purpose would be served by Irish insistence on the ultimate implications of recognition of their neutral status.

If you agree, I shall advise the Departments in Ottawa accordingly. They are pressing us for a decision on this matter.⁶⁶ als would be called up as British subjects, and that there would be no recognition of Ireland's neutral status.

Mr. Hearne pointed out that the correspondence between our High Commissioner in Ireland and the Irish Government had led the Irish to believe that we would treat Irish nationals as neutral aliens, and no subsequent correspondence between Mr. Hearne and External Affairs had led him to believe otherwise. Mr. Hearne felt that if the present policy were carried out, it would fundamentally raise the issue of Ireland's position as a neutral state.

Mr. Hearne suggested that it might be possible to revise the wording of Section 3(2)(j), changing the words "a non-declarant alien who is a national of any country not specified", to "citizens of neutral countries who are not also nationals of belligerent countries."

Without promising a change in policy, the Deputy agreed to review this suggestion, and to submit it to the Ministers concerned.

RE: POSITION OF IRISH CITIZENS WITH RESPECT
TO MOBILIZATION REGULATIONS

In our letter dated August 24, 1943[†], we communicated the decision taken after discussion of this question by the Ministers with regard to the Irish position under the Mobilization Regulations.

The High Commissioner for Ireland, after being informed, discussed this question with the Department and pointed out that the Irish Government was very much disturbed about this situation. He expressed the hope that the matter might be reconsidered by the Government. In view of the position taken by Mr. Hearne, I told him that I would discuss the matter again with the Prime Minister and see whether there would be any possibility of the adoption of a course of action which would to some extent at any rate meet the Irish position. He suggested that it might be possible to make a revision in the regulations which would overcome some at any rate of the objections which have been taken.

It is thought that the special position of Irish citizens might be met by the addition of a new paragraph (k) as a part of Regulation No. 3, Subsection (2). The paragraph might read as follows:

(k) A citizen of a neutral country, other than one who comes within the provisions of paragraph (j) of this subsection, provided that he does not belong to or is not a national of a belligerent country, if he has completed a statutory declaration in the form set out in Schedule (C), and has filed the same with the Registrar.

Before submitting a suggestion along these lines to the Prime Minister, I should be grateful if you would let me have your views. Possibly Mr. Henry might be able to discuss the matter with the Legal Division of the Department upon his return.

Ottawa, September 22, 1943

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

I have the honour to bring to your attention some requests which have been received from the High Commissioner for Ireland concerning proposed exports from Canada to Ireland. The basic facts governing an export trade of this character are peculiar and are not generally appreciated. It may, therefore, be useful for you to have them clearly before you.

2. At the present time Canada's foreign exchange position is of such a character that additional exports which result in payment in funds other than Canadian dollars are of negligible importance. For instance, if exports to Ireland were paid for in sterling the result would be to increase Canadian balances of sterling which are already adequate if not excessive. They would also decrease Irish balances of sterling which are at present very large. If, as is probable, the relations between Canada and the United Kingdom resulted in transactions of one sort or another designed to reduce Canada's sterling balances, the net result of an export to Ireland would be to benefit the tax-payer in the United Kingdom by reducing his liabilities to Ireland and to impose the cost of the transaction on the tax-payer in Canada who would be acquiring a sterling credit and then renouncing it. The gift which the Canadian tax-payer would make would arouse no gratitude in Ireland because the Irish would pay for the goods which they had imported, and it would arouse no gratitude in the United Kingdom because it would not be known there.

3. Insofar as questions of supply are concerned, exports to Ireland are competitive with home consumption and with exports to other destinations. If supply is short, essential home consumption must take first place; next in priority will come the essential requirements of countries which are actively carrying on the war with the Axis; after these will come areas which are recognized as, more or less, an obligation for Canada. These include Empire countries in the Western Hemisphere. In this sequence of priorities, Ireland will obviously occupy a very low position unless a case could be made out for supplying Ireland on one or other of the following grounds:

a. An indirect contribution to the war potential of the United Kingdom by enabling the Irish to supply goods which but for the proposed export from Canada they could not supply. This argument may have had some weight in the case of agricultural machinery;

b. On humanitarian grounds to prevent extreme hardship in a friendly country.

4. It may at times appear unreasonable to apply these broad considerations of policy to proposed transactions which are concerned with very small quantities of goods. For instance, a request for the release of 101/2 tons of boots and shoes for Ireland concerns a quantity of the order of magnitude of 1% of Canada's annual exports to the other British Empire countries in the Western Hemisphere. In cases in which real hardship in Ireland may be obviated by small exports of this character, there may well be a reason for departing from the order of priorities dictated by general policy.

5. It is, however, highly desirable that the real facts of the situation should be thoroughly understood in Ireland before requests are made, and that the requests should be made in a way which takes account of the realities of the situation. It will, therefore, be appreciated if you can avail yourself of some opportunity of discussing these issues with the Irish authorities so that they will understand that any refusal to release commodities in short supply in Canada is based on obvious consideration of policy, and does not show any callous disregard of Irish needs. It should, of course, be equally clear that Ireland in remaining neutral in the present war has completely disentitled itself from advancing any claim on the basis of common effort in the present emergency.

6. It would also be appreciated if you could keep the Canadian Government informed as to the actual conditions in Ireland insofar as shortages of consumers' goods are concerned. It is very difficult for us to decide how far a request for the release of 101/2 tons of boots and shoes is based on shortages of such a character that we should be lacking in humanity if we did not respond to the request. You can readily appreciate our difficulty in asking for information on such a point from the High Commissioner for Ireland in this country, and also his difficulty in answering such a question if we were to ask it. His instructions would be to make the best possible case for Ireland and this might very well conflict with his wish to give us a completely frank statement of the supply position in that country, and of the sufferings, if any, which its citizens are undergoing as a result of being improperly shod. The case of the boots and shoes is advanced merely by way of an illustration, and while I should appreciate a reply on this point, I hope it will also be possible for you to keep the Canadian authorities informed, from time to time, as to the Irish supply position in general and as to the hardships, if any, which are being suffered in Ireland as a result of shortages.

CONFIDENTIAL. Your despatch of September 22nd concerning Irish request for Canadian commodities.

Preliminary investigation does not reveal an acute shortage of boots and shoes, further enquiries are being made.

Irish ships make regular trips to Canada and/or the United States for purpose of bringing back commodities. It seems to me, under the circumstances, that you will have frequent (word omitted) in some form or other for supplies. Have you considered advisability of requiring repatriation of Canadian securities held by citizens of Eire instead of accepting sterling as at present? Am I correct in assuming that Canada would not have serious objection if Irish ships took Canadian wheat? Please name a few other commodities, if any, which fall within same category.

I am leaving for London immediately and on my return will discuss contents of your despatch with appropriate authorities.

RE: POSITION OF IRISH CITIZENS WITH RESPECT
TO MOBILIZATION REGULATIONS

I have your letter of September 8th on the above matter in which you suggest the incorporation of a new paragraph (k) as part of Regulation No. 3, Subsection (2) of the Mobilization Regulations, and ask whether the suggested clause is acceptable.

I am advised that the clause in the form put forward would give immunity not only to citizens of Eire but also to declarant neutral aliens such as Swiss, Swedish, Spanish, Portuguese, etc. I believe that you will agree that this is not desirable. In our judgment, if the Government, as a matter of policy, want to provide exemption for citizens of Eire from the operation of the Regulations, the amendment should so provide and should be so limited.

I would appreciate it if you would obtain an early decision on this point as there are a number of cases of Irish citizens now before the Boards.

Dear Mr. Angus,

I have today received your letter of October 13th in which you were good enough to enclose copy of Confidential Despatch No. 76 of September 22nd to the High Commissioner for Canada in Ireland. The Board has also received copy of the High Commissioner's reply, confidential telegram No. 53 of October 8th.

We are quite disturbed by the instructions given to the High Commissioner to explain to the Irish Government that a main reason for Canada's unwillingness to export to Ireland is that payment in sterling is unacceptable to us.

The Irish Free State is a part of the sterling area and since the outbreak of war the policy of the Board has been to regard sterling and Canadian dollars derived from authorized sterling area sources as good payment for exports to the sterling area. It is quite true that under present conditions any export to any part of the sterling area increases the sterling area's deficit of Canadian dollars which is being largely financed by the Canadian Government. It is our view, however, that if it is the desire of the Government to reduce our exports of any particular class of goods to any part of the sterling area, this should be done on grounds of shortage of supply and by refusing to grant export permits and that the decision should not be based on the statement that payment in sterling is unacceptable.

The latter statement cannot fail to create the impression that the Canadian Government regards sterling as a bad currency which is not worth having. We have been very careful to avoid creating such an impression and have given the United Kingdom exchange control authorities an undertaking to purchase any sterling transfer of which to Canada is authorized by any sterling area control, and to claim from the British reimbursement in United States dollars for any sterling transferred to Canada for purpose not falling within an agreed list of types of payment which we are prepared to have enter the sterling area's deficit of Canadian dollars. This agreed list comprises normal current account transactions, including exports to the sterling area.

It would, we feel, be particularly unfortunate if the Irish Government were given any reason for believing that we regard sterling as an unacceptable currency. They have, as is pointed out in the Department's despatch, large sterling balances and no doubt there are elements in Ireland who would welcome an opportunity to cause the British some embarrassment. Our information is that the Irish authorities have cooperated very well with the British in exchange control matters and it would be a pity if this cooperation were in any way jeopardized as a result of any action of ours.

You will note that I am not questioning the validity of your analysis of the financial implications of exporting to Ireland for sterling, but merely raising the question of the political wisdom of basing our explanation on the unacceptability of sterling payment. This argument applies equally to exports to any part of the sterling area; if Ireland is singled out for special treatment it can only be by reason of her neutrality and I suggest it would be more expedient to base an explanation on that fact combined with the shortage of goods, as you have done in the later paragraphs of your despatch.

The same considerations apply, I believe, to the High Commissioner's suggestion that we might try to arrange for a vesting of Irish-held Canadian securities. We have no information regarding the amounts of such securities owned by Irish residents. In any case, the amounts of our exports to Ireland are so small under present conditions that it would not be worth-while, in our view, to suggest a major financial operation of this sort. So far as the Irish are concerned, they are covering their requirements of Canadian dollars in the same way as they have always done, namely, through London. This has some disadvantages for us at the moment, but the amounts involved are so small that it does not appear to us worth taking any step which could be interpreted as interfering with the internal cohesion of the sterling area. I think it quite likely that if the matter were put up to them, the British would prefer to reimburse us in United States dollars for sterling we accepted for our exports to Ireland. At the moment this suits us no better than sterling payment and I would not recommend that this suggestion be made unless the Government wishes to have Ireland treated in a different manner, with regard to exchange transactions, than the rest of the sterling area.

Yours sincerely,

IMMEDIATE. Your telegram No. 53 of October 8, Irish requests for Canadian Commodities.

On reconsideration it has been decided that it is not expedient to discuss the question of currency of payment with the Irish authorities as this might seem to throw some doubt on the value of sterling. For the same reason we are not considering raising the question of the repatriation of Canadian securities held in Ireland. In discussion with the Irish authorities our explanation should be based entirely on shortages and on the necessity of rationing these in a suitable order of priority among Allied and friendly countries.

It is hoped that this telegram will be in time to forestall any discussion of the currency with the Irish authorities.

RE: POSITION OF IRISH CITIZENS WITH RESPECT TO THE MOBILIZATION REGULATIONS

I should like to refer to your letter of October 14 in which you commented on the suggestion I made in my letter of September 8 as to the desirability of incorporating a new paragraph (k) as part of Regulation No. 3, Subsection (2) of the Mobilization Regulations in order to provide exemption from military service under certain circumstances for Irish citizens.

I do not think that it would be desirable for the Government to provide exemption in specific terms for Irish citizens. What is desired as a matter of principle is to make exemption possible for the citizens of, or persons belonging to, any part of the British Commonwealth which may be neutral. It was with this consideration in mind that the amendment I suggested was drafted.

On further examination of the amendment as put forward in my letter of September 8, I have noted the validity of your criticism. As drafted, the amendment would, it is true, give an undesirable exemption to declarant neutral aliens who are at present liable for compulsory service. This difficulty could, however, be circumvented quite simply by inserting the words "non-declarant" before the word "citizen" in the proposed amendment. It would then read "a non-declarant citizen of a neutral country, other than one who comes within the provisions of paragraph (j) . . ."

While the above amendment would, I think, achieve the object desired, I think it would be very much preferable if you could see your way clear to have the problem presented by the position of Irish citizens treated now and in future as it was early in 1942 by means of administrative arrangement. It seems to me that this should be as feasible and workable as the administrative arrangement that is made without specific legal basis in order to provide exemption from military call for Canadian nationals of Chinese and Japanese race and for Bulgarian nationals who are treated in the same manner as enemy aliens although, in fact, there has been no declaration of war between Canada and Bulgaria.

I should appreciate it if you would inform me as to the action you think should be taken after you have had an opportunity to examine the points I have raised in the present letter.

DESPATCH 102

Ottawa, December 15, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your conversations with Mr. Angus of this Department⁶⁸ concerning Canadian exports to Ireland. In view of your opinion that it would be desirable to have a very frank talk with the Irish authorities concerning the reasons which may lead to some limitations on the exports which they might wish to obtain from Canada, the whole question has been discussed very thoroughly with the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Finance and the Foreign Exchange Control Board. The upshot of these discussions is that we consider that a frank and useful explanation, such as you have in mind, can be given without saying anything to disparage the position of sterling as a currency of payment.

2. Your discussion with the Irish authorities might well be along the following lines:

In considering its export policy at the present time Canada is faced with three major difficulties:

a. Supplies of many things are short. Labour in general is scarce and must be applied where it is most needed. It follows that it is not desirable to push the exports of commodities indiscriminately even when there is no scarcity of basic materials;

b. There are difficulties in providing transportation. Indeed, even if the Irish are in a position to supply their own shipping, the Canadian authorities might find it difficult to make exports available at eastern ports during the winter. This is particularly true at the present time in the case of wheat;

c. Canada is faced with the problem of financing its surplus of exports over imports, and this burden of financing is added to that of financing the war itself. The Canadian authorities are naturally anxious not to increase this burden unnecessarily and are, therefore, reluctant for this reason also to push exports unless there is good reason for doing so. By way of illustration but without confining the observation to Ireland, you might go on to point out that an increase in Canada's exports to the Sterling Area would eventually result in a greater call for mutual aid from the United Kingdom. This consideration may be of importance even when supplies are adequate and shipping is available, i.e. when difficulties (a) and (b) do not exist.

3. None of the explanations mentioned in the preceding paragraph applies to Ireland more than to any other country and these explanations, therefore, merely form a background for consideration of Ireland's special position. This position is that of a friendly country, an Empire country, a neutral country and, in some cases, that of an old-established customer. Canada is at war and, therefore, places its own domestic requirements for civilian goods behind immediate military requirements. Inevitably, in establishing priorities for exports, Canada ranks military requirements first and the civilian requirements of our Allies ahead of those of friendly, neutral countries. We do, however, make a special effort to furnish supplies that are necessary on humanitarian grounds or for the maintenance of the economy of friendly countries. In addition we are anxious to do what is in our power to safeguard the interests of old customers who naturally look to us as their principal source of supply. As opportunity offers and if it can be done without prejudice to ourselves or our Allies, we are anxious to build up post-war markets that are likely to have a long-term value and we are likely to place the demands of these potential markets higher in the scheme of priorities than the demands of markets which are admittedly of a temporary character.

4. The demands of neutrals, of whom Ireland is one, have to be scrutinized with particular care because neutrals have not the same incentive as belligerents to eliminate imports which are not strictly essential. The tenor of recent despatches from Dublin appears, however, to indicate that the economic situation in Ireland and the scarcity of shipping are resulting in care being taken there to avoid calling for imports that are not strictly essential. We hope that you will continue to keep us advised on this point.

5. It will be of great assistance to the Canadian authorities in meeting Irish requirements if they may have a list or program of these requirements in advance of the time at which tentative allocations must be made for the coming year. The importance of this has already been mentioned in our correspondence.

6. Finally it might be worth-while to remind the Irish authorities that, if they can push their exports to Canada, the surplus of Canadian exports over Canadian imports which Canada has to finance will be correspondingly reduced and the position correspondingly eased. This argument, however, should not be carried to the point of suggesting specific barter trade.

Wellington, August 6, 1942

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Associated Chambers of Commerce of New Zealand have requested me to bring to your attention the matter of securing an arrangement between the New Zealand and Canadian Governments concerning double taxation. A similar arrangement was concluded recently between the Governments of New Zealand and the United Kingdom, copies[†] of which are enclosed, together with copies of the Income Tax (United Kingdom Traders) Exemption Order 1942[†].

2. The Associated Chambers of Commerce have already made representations to the Acting Minister of Finance on behalf of certain Canadian nationals carrying on business in New Zealand and a copy of this communication,[†] together with the Minister's reply,[†] is also enclosed. From these communications you will observe that the Acting Minister of Finance has stated that the Government of New Zealand is prepared to give consideration to the negotiation of an agreement with Canada under Section 11 of the New Zealand Land and Income Tax Amendment Act, 1935 (a copy[†] of which was sent with my despatch No. 179 of June 12th, 1942[†]). Section 11 reads as follows:

“The Governor General may by Order in Council exempt in whole or in part from their liability to pay income tax in New Zealand as non-resident traders any persons being residents or nationals of a country specified in the Order (whether a country within His Majesty's dominions or elsewhere) if he is satisfied that residents of New Zealand who are carrying on business as non-resident traders in that country are exempt therein (whether by agreement with the Government of that country or otherwise) from income tax on profits derived from their business as non-resident traders.”

3. “Non-resident trader” is defined in Section 2 of the Land and Income Tax Act, 1923, as “any person (or company) who, being in New Zealand, carries on business there without having any fixed and permanent place of business or abode there.”

4. The Associated Chambers of Commerce point out that they consider the time opportune for some move to be made in the direction of bringing about a reciprocal taxation arrangement between Canada and New Zealand. Similar representations have been made, they point out, to the United States Minister in New Zealand.

5. I have discussed the matter with the Deputy Commissioner of Taxes who has informed me that the New Zealand Government would welcome any initiative in this matter which the Canadian Government might care to take.

DESPATCH 7

Ottawa, January 22, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your Despatch No. 221 of August 6th concerning the possibility of negotiating an agreement between the New Zealand and Canadian Governments concerning double taxation. It has taken some time to discuss this matter thoroughly with the Canadian Income Tax authorities but I am now in a position to request you to take the initiative in approaching the New Zealand Government with a proposal for a tax convention with Canada along the lines of the enclosed draft.[†]

Of necessity Article 1 of this draft has been very roughly constructed because it contains the undertaking to be made by the Government of New Zealand, and it is, of course, not known here how far that Government is prepared to go. It will remain for you, after consultation with the New Zealand authorities, to complete this Article by reciting the various acts and sections thereof under which exemptions will be allowed.

The date as from which the convention should take effect is probably not of great importance under existing conditions, but it is suggested that the agreement should have effect for the 1942 taxation year and subsequently.

The draft which I am enclosing follows very closely the lines of the agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom, which was signed at Ottawa on October 3rd, 1935,⁶⁹ and which has been in force retroactively from April 6th, 1930.

Wellington, August 19, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 7 of January 22nd, 1943, concerning the possibility of negotiating an agreement between the New Zealand and Canadian Governments concerning double taxation. Immediately on receipt of your despatch I initiated negotiations with the New Zealand authorities, and after repeated delays have now received an official reply from the New Zealand Government.

2. I have now been informed that the New Zealand Government is prepared to enter into an arrangement with the Canadian Government for the granting of reciprocal exemption from income tax along the lines of the draft Agreement submitted, subject to certain modifications which are underlined in red⁷⁰ in the amended draft Agreement which I am forwarding herewith in duplicate, together with an explanatory memorandum[†] in duplicate.

3. I am further informed that the New Zealand Government prefers that the commencing date of the Agreement shall be April 1st, 1943.

4. The New Zealand Government would be glad to receive any comments of the Canadian Government with regard to the amended draft Agreement.

5. I also enclose for your information two copies of a memorandum[†] indicating the liability of non-resident traders to income tax in New Zealand, with a request that a similar memorandum be furnished by the Canadian Government indicating the nature and extent of the liability of non-resident traders to income tax in Canada. The Government of New Zealand further desires to confirm that profits which are exempted under the Agreement from New Zealand income tax will also be exempt from all New Zealand taxes on income, that is to say, from income tax, social security charge, national security tax and excess profits tax, and would appreciate confirmation by the Canadian Government that profits which are exempted under the Agreement from Canadian Income Tax will similarly be exempt from all Canadian taxes.

⁷⁰ These amendments are in italics here.

His Majesty's Government in Canada and His Majesty's Government in New Zealand, being desirous of concluding an agreement for reciprocal exemption from income tax in certain cases of profits or gains arising through an agency, have agreed as follows:

His Majesty's Government in New Zealand undertake that the profits or gains to which this Article relates shall, so long as the exemption specified in Article 2 hereof remains effective, be exempted from income tax chargeable in New Zealand for the year of assessment commencing on the first day of April, nineteen hundred and forty-three, and for every subsequent year of assessment, and will take the necessary action under Section eleven of the Act of Parliament of New Zealand known as the Land and Income Tax Amendment Act, 1935, with a view to giving the force of law to the exemption aforesaid.

The profits or gains to which this Article relates are any profits or gains from the sale of goods, other than things in action and money, arising, whether directly or indirectly, through an agency in New Zealand to a person who is resident in Canada and is not resident in New Zealand, unless the profits or gains either —

- (1) arise from the sale of goods from a stock in New Zealand, or
- (2) accrue directly or indirectly through any branch or management in New Zealand where the agent has and habitually exercises a general authority to negotiate and conclude contracts.

ARTICLE 2

His Majesty's Government in Canada undertake that the profits or gains to which this Article relates shall, so long as the exemption specified in Article 1 hereof remains effective, be exempted from income tax chargeable in the Dominion of Canada in respect of the 1944 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein, and thereafter, and will take the necessary action under subsection 3 of section 27A of the Income War Tax Act as enacted by Section 14 of Chapter 55 of the Statutes of 1934 with a view to giving the force of law to the exemption aforesaid.

The profits or gains to which this Article relates are any profits or gains from the sale of goods, other than things in action and money, arising, whether directly or indirectly, through an agency in Canada to a person who is resident in New Zealand and is not resident in Canada, unless the profits or gains either

- (1) arise from the sale of goods from a stock in Canada, or
- (2) accrue directly or indirectly through any branch or management in Canada, or through an agency in Canada where the agent has and habitually exercises a general authority to negotiate and conclude contracts.

ARTICLE 3

His Majesty's Government in New Zealand further undertake that for the year of assessment commencing on the first day of April nineteen hundred and forty-three, and for every subsequent year of assessment, so long as the exemption specified in Article 4 hereof remains effective, profits or gains accruing to a person resident in Canada and not resident in New Zealand from sales under contracts entered into in Canada (that is to say, where the acceptance of the offer of purchase is effected in Canada) of goods stocked in a warehouse in New Zealand for convenience of delivery and not for the purposes of display, shall be exempted from income tax in New Zealand, even though the offers of purchase have been obtained by an agent in New Zealand of the principal in Canada and transmitted by him to the principal for acceptance, and His Majesty's Government in New Zealand will take the necessary action under Section eleven aforementioned with a view to giving the force of law to the exemption aforesaid.

ARTICLE 4

His Majesty's Government in Canada further undertake that in respect of the 1944 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein, and thereafter, so long as the exemption specified in Article 3 hereof remains effective, profits or gains accruing to a person resident in New Zealand and not resident in Canada from sales under contracts entered into in New Zealand (that is to say, where the acceptance of the offer of purchase is effected in New Zealand) of goods stocked in a warehouse in Canada for convenience of delivery and not for the purposes of display, shall be exempted from income tax chargeable in the Dominion of Canada, even though the offers of purchase have been obtained by an agent in Canada of the principal in New Zealand and transmitted by him to the principal for acceptance, and His Majesty's Government in Canada will take the necessary action under subsection 3 of section 27A aforementioned with a view to giving the force of law to the exemption aforesaid.

ARTICLE 5

For the purposes of this Agreement the word "person" includes any body of persons, corporate or not corporate, and a body corporate shall be regarded as resident in New Zealand and not resident in Canada if its business is managed and controlled in New Zealand, and shall be regarded as resident in Canada and not resident in New Zealand if its business is managed and controlled in Canada.

ARTICLE 6

The Agreement may be denounced at any time upon six months' notice being given by one Government to the other.

*Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

*Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
to Prime Minister*

[Ottawa,] December 20, 1941

The South African Government is examining the possibility of negotiating a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States. From preliminary discussions, it is clear that the Canadian-South African Trade Agreement of 1932⁷¹ would have to be modified before a mutually satisfactory trade agreement could be concluded between the Union and the United States. Dr. Viljoen, who has been in Washington conducting the preliminary negotiations for the Union Government, was in Ottawa some weeks ago, and discussed with Mr. Wilgress certain modifications in preferences now granted Canada to which the Union Government would like us to consent in order to facilitate their agreement with the United States.

During the 1938 trade negotiations between Canada and the United States, South Africa was quite forthcoming in consenting to modifications of its preferences in Canada to facilitate our reaching an agreement with the United States. We are, therefore, under a certain obligation to help them to reach a similar agreement themselves.

As you will have seen from Mr. Moffat's memorandum of November 15th,[†] he is hopeful that Canada will help to facilitate projected trade agreements between the United States and other parts of the Commonwealth by consenting to certain modifications in preferences guaranteed to us under earlier Empire trade agreements.

In the circumstances, I think we should indicate to the South African Government that the Canadian Government would be prepared to release South Africa from her obligations to maintain preferences in favour of Canada to the extent indicated in Mr. Wilgress' attached memorandum.[†] It may be that we should go a little further than this memorandum suggests with regard to the margin of preference on fresh apples, particularly if there are any reasons for believing that a concession on this commodity in the South African market might help us to retain a preference on apples in the vastly more important United Kingdom market.

As you will see from the attached letter[†] from the South African Accredited Representative, his Government would be grateful for an early indication of the Canadian attitude toward the United States request for tariff modifications in the Union.⁷²

Dear Mr. Wilgress,

With reference to my letter of January 5th[†] regarding the South African request for Canadian concurrence in certain modifications of guaranteed margins of preference which stand in the way of the conclusion of a trade agreement between the Union of South Africa and the United States, I am enclosing copy of a further letter of March 11th[†], from the Accredited Representative of the Union Government, enquiring on instructions from his Government, when they can expect a definite Canadian reply to their requests.

My own feeling is that, in welcoming the Lease-Lend Consideration Agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States which fixed the progressive removal of discriminatory tariffs as one of the objectives of post-war international economic policy⁷³, we cannot with a very good grace turn down the first request we have received for Canadian cooperation in moving toward this objective.

You will recall that the Prime Minister was prepared to approve our meeting the South African request if your Minister and the Minister of Finance concurred. He thought the question could be initiated in Council by them.

I am sending a similar letter to Dr. Clark.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have your letter of March 12th asking for immediate consideration of the request of the Union of South Africa for concurrence in certain modifications of guaranteed margins of preference which stand in the way of the conclusion of a Trade Agreement between the Union of South Africa and the United States.

⁷³ Voir le document 561.

⁷³ See Document 561.

I have discussed the question with my Minister and am now able to set out his views as follows:

(1) He would concur in a policy of going as far as possible in contributing to the conclusion of this trade agreement even though it means giving up valuable trade preferences.

(2) The precise extent to which we can afford to go on individual items and the extent to which concessions are necessary in order to make the agreement possible, are matters on which he would be prepared to follow the advice of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

(3) He thinks that it should be pointed out to the governments negotiating this trade agreement that, in the view of the Canadian Government, the progressive removal of discriminatory tariffs should proceed by way of tariff reductions and not of tariff increases. Of the four items on which Canada is asked to release the bound margins, the proposals would increase the duties against Canadian goods in three cases and reduce them in one. On two items, the United States would obtain a reduction in duty and on the other two is satisfied with ensuring that the duty against Canada is raised. Our willingness to cooperate in facilitating trade agreements and in the progressive removal of discriminatory tariffs should not be capable of being interpreted as concurrence in arrangements which will restrict rather than facilitate trade.

Yours very truly,

W. C. CLARK

Ottawa, March 25, 1942

Dear Mr. Wilgress,

With reference to our telephone conversation the other day about the South African request for Canadian concurrence in the modification of certain margins of preference which appear to stand in the way of the conclusion of a trade agreement between the Union of South Africa and the United States, I am enclosing copy of a letter of March 18th from the Deputy Minister of Finance giving his Minister's views on the matter. I know you see some difficulty in pressing his third point on the South Africans at this juncture, but I am inclined to think that it is such an important question of policy in the realization of the general trade programme which our Governments have agreed to pursue, that we should assert it in our reply to South Africa. It is true that the South African duties on the particular products on which we are asked to consent to modification of our margins of preference are low and that their incidence is not protective. There is also force in your argument that if we agree to the South African requests, subject to the conditions outlined in Dr. Clark's letter, we would, in effect, be asking for conventionalized tariff treatment in return for the relinquishment of preferential margins and that the pattern of the present Canadian-South African Trade Agreement does not give us any conventionalized rates. I do not think, however, that we are necessarily tied to the form of trade agreement negotiated with South Africa in 1932. If we had ever got around to negotiating a new trade agreement with them we would almost certainly have endeavoured to work out an agreement paralleling our 1937 Agreement with the United Kingdom, in which both countries agreed to modifications of margins of preference in return for conventionalizing of substantive tariff rates. There is no present prospect or occasion for negotiating a new agreement between Canada and South Africa, but I do not see why we should not effect an instalment of revision of the present Agreement by substituting conventionalized tariff rates in favour of Canada on those items in which we are relinquishing bound margins of preference to facilitate a trade agreement between the Union and the United States.

With reference to your enquiry as to whether or not an Order-in-Council is needed at this stage to authorize our concurrence in the modification of margins of preference guaranteed under the Canada-South Africa Trade Agreement, I wish to confirm my view which is that all that is now needed is Cabinet approval in principle of the matters of policy involved. I am not sure that a formal Order-in-Council is needed at any stage — certainly not until definite agreement has been worked out between the United States and the Union, in which case formal approval might be sought for the necessary Exchange of Notes with South Africa modifying the Canada-South Africa Trade Agreement.

Yours sincerely,

Ottawa, March 26, 1942

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have received your letter of March 25 and thank you for enclosing copy of the letter, dated March 18, which you received from Dr. W. C. Clark, Deputy Minister of Finance, giving the views of his Minister on the subject of the South African request for Canadian concurrence in the modification of certain margins of preference which appear to stand in the way of the conclusion of a trade agreement between the Union of South Africa and the United States.

Since my telephone conversation with you, I have had the opportunity of discussing with Dr. W. A. Mackintosh, Special Assistant to the Deputy Minister of Finance, the third point in Dr. Clark's letter. He told me that it was not their view that we should make a condition of our concurrence in the modification of preferences that the South African Government should not increase the rates of duty against Canada, but rather that we should point out to the Government of the Union of South Africa our view that the progressive removal of discriminatory tariffs should proceed by way of tariff reductions and not of tariff increases.

I might state that when Dr. P. R. Viljoen, Head of the South African Trade Delegation in Washington, discussed this question with me on his visit to Ottawa last November, I pointed out to him the reluctance of the Canadian Government to agree to modifications of preferences which involved increases in the rates of duty on the Canadian products concerned. Dr. Viljoen said that he appreciated our position, but that it would be quite impossible for the South African Government to forego the revenue which would be involved in decreasing the duties on United States goods, in order to apply to them the same rates as are now applicable to Canadian goods. He pointed out that, while it was possible for the South African Treasury to forego the revenue involved in according Canadian goods rates of duty below those of the Minimum Tariff, it would be quite another thing to extend these reductions below the Minimum Tariff to a country such as the United States and perhaps later on to other friendly countries with which South Africa might negotiate similar trade agreements. I fear, therefore, that if we make it a condition that South Africa should not increase the rates against Canada they will come back to us and say that this makes it impossible for them to grant the modifications in preferences necessary to conclude the trade agreement with the United States. I feel that we would make our point if we could content ourselves to pointing out the views of the Canadian Government as set forth under the third of the three points mentioned in Dr. Clark's letter, as representing the views of the Minister of Finance.

Yours faithfully,

L. D. WILGRESS

No. 8

Ottawa, April 15, 1942

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of March 11th^t respecting the verbal representations made by Mr. Viljoen, Head of the South African Trade Delegation to the United States, on certain requests which it is expected the United States may put forward to share in preferences that are now granted by the Union of South Africa to Canada under the provisions of the Trade Agreement of 1932.

In reply I may say that the Canadian Government, in accordance with its general policy of favouring the progressive reduction of tariff barriers and its desire to facilitate in every practicable way South Africa's trade negotiations with the United States, has given careful and sympathetic consideration to these representations. As they cover a good many commodities and involve a number of Canadian interests it has not been practicable to write you earlier with respect to them. In view, however, of the desire you have expressed for an early reply I have asked the Departments concerned to expedite their enquiries and desire to set forth, for your information, the conclusions they have reached.

On tinned salmon, the first of the commodities mentioned by Mr. Viljoen, the United States negotiators are asking for the abolition of the preference of 11/2d. per pound granted to Canada under the Trade Agreement and that tinned salmon from Canada and the United States be made dutiable at a rate of 2d. per pound as compared with a rate under the Maximum Tariff of 4d. per pound which would be applicable to competing countries. The Canadian Government would be prepared to accede to this request if your trade delegation, in completing their negotiations with the United States, find it necessary to the conclusion of a satisfactory Trade Agreement.

On fresh apples, on which Canada is guaranteed under the Trade Agreement a margin of preference of 5% ad valorem during the period October 1st to December 31st, it is understood the United States negotiators are asking for the abolition of the preference and that your Government would propose to accede to their request by introducing a flat rate of 5% throughout the year. It is further understood that the United States attach considerable importance to a modification of the preference on apples. In these circumstances the Canadian Government would be prepared to accede to the request.

The Canadian Government would also be prepared to concur in the proposals put forward with respect to the tariff reclassification of plywood and unmanufactured wood.

Concessions on the remaining two items — tinned fish other than salmon (including sardines, herrings and pilchards) and hosiery — would be extremely difficult to grant. It is understood, however, that neither of them is of particular importance to the United States and that their negotiators would probably not press for the rates now accorded to Canada.

We trust that the surrender by Canada of its guaranteed margins of preference on the items cited will facilitate your negotiations with the United States and that a mutually satisfactory Agreement will shortly be concluded. While we would not desire to make it a condition of concurrence in the abolition of the preferences on the commodities mentioned, we feel it would be desirable that the abrogation of fixed margins of preference on agreed commodities should proceed on the principle of tariff reductions and not of tariff increases. Of the four items on which Canada is asked to release the bound margins, the United States proposals would increase the duties against Canadian goods in three cases and reduce them in one. On two items the United States would obtain a reduction in duty and on the other two would be satisfied with ensuring that the duty against Canada be raised. In our trade negotiations in recent years the practice has been followed as far as practicable of conventionalizing preferential rates rather than the opposite process of eliminating margins of preference by increasing duties and we trust that this principle will be given the widest practicable application in negotiations for the progressive removal of restrictive tariff barriers during the war and in the post-war period.

Attached is a rather discursive personal note on some aspects of our representation in the United States, which may be useful as part of the background in considering the question of where Canada should stand in relation to projected plans for establishing a supreme political and strategic direction of the war effort in Washington.

In this memorandum I have taken the liberty of making some rather radical suggestions regarding our general representation in Washington, which you may not think timely or sound.

[Ottawa,] December 22, 1941

1. In recent years Canadians have tended to take it for granted that the United States will continue to follow a friendly, cooperative and unassuming policy toward Canada. Our general relations with the United States are all based on this assumption which is, I think, a fundamentally correct one. There have been a number of warning developments in the last year or so, however, which suggest that we should not be too cavalier in our confidence that the United States will always regard Canadian interests as a close second to their own and appreciably ahead of those of any third country.

2. It is probably an inevitable consequence of the increasing involvement of the United States in the war and of its acceptance of leadership of the democratic cause that the President should tend more and more to deal directly with the Great Powers and find less time to spend on the specifically Canadian aspects of American international relations. Canada naturally loomed much larger in the American scheme of things when the President and both political parties in the United States were thinking primarily in terms of continental and hemispheric defence. Now that the world war is joined on both oceans, the United States is, not unnaturally, inclined to take Canadian concurrence and support entirely for granted. In terms of the evolution of United States policy over the last five or six years, the President's cultivation of Canada has probably served one of its purposes. As an American nation in the British Commonwealth, this country was, in the first years of the war, visible and important evidence of the war's nearness to America. Now that the United States is itself at war with Germany, Italy and Japan, and allied with the British Commonwealth and the U.S.S.R., this phase of Canada's historical role is completed, and Americans are once more viewing Canadian questions in a more modest and more nearly domestic perspective.

3. The consequential changes in Canadian-American relations have been proceeding pretty quickly in recent months. The transition has been rather abrupt and not too tactfully handled. Its brusqueness has been accentuated by two or three secondary causes among which may be mentioned, the scattering of responsibility for United States foreign policy among a host of new agencies and the growing pressure of service and supply considerations in favour of the unification of Allied representation in the United States.

4. In the first years of the war, the Department of State found itself sharing the conduct of United States foreign relations with other agencies of Government, improvised or expanded to meet the present emergency. Each new defence organization has tended to handle its own international contacts and, in effect, to work out its own foreign policies. In pre-war days, policies or activities of the Department of Agriculture, the Treasury and the Service Departments which were likely to affect, even indirectly, United States relations with Canada were cleared through the Department of State, where they were weighed and appraised in terms of their possible effects on general Canadian-American relations. Latterly, these agencies of the United States Government, and such additions as OPM¹, Donovan's² organization and the Office of Emergency Management, have tended to by-pass the Department of State and handle their foreign contacts direct. This process, which has its modest Canadian counterpart, was particularly easy between Canada and the United States because none of the limitations of language, distance and protocol, etc., which normally give the State Department or the Foreign Office at least a quasi monopoly of intergovernmental communications, were really operative. The advantages of direct contacts between each of the American Government agencies and their opposite numbers in Canada were obvious and important. They were, however, in part at least, offset by the loss they entailed of the preferred position Canada had gradually consolidated through long years of close and friendly collaboration with the President and the Department of State.

² General W.J. Donovan, Co-ordinator of Information of United States.

5. Another development which has tended to weaken our relative position in Washington has been a consequence of the difficulty of harmonizing the requirements of the United States' own rearmament with the competing needs of the belligerent countries. Just as the United States has been compelled to centralize control of its own defence policies and to institute a single priority classification into which the competing domestic needs of the United States Army, Navy and Air Force could be met from limited supplies of equipment and material, so it has felt compelled to insist on some unification of the programmes of the countries whose war efforts the United States was helping. United States pressure was exerted to bring Canada within the scope of operations of the British Supply Council. The United States probably would have preferred to have Canada come under Lend-Lease arrangements so that the assistance given us could be fitted more neatly into the general pattern of assistance short of war which she was giving the other allied countries.

6. This pressure on Canada to come into a unified Allied and Empire supply programme was reinforced when the United States Government began to make plans for eventual military and naval collaboration with the Allies. Inevitably, plans for such collaboration, contemplating offensive air and land operations in other continents, and combined naval operations in both oceans had to be made primarily with the United Kingdom. The United States Service Departments have always been slow and reluctant to recognize the independent status of the countries of the Commonwealth. You will recall the difficulties encountered in pre-war efforts at naval disarmament when the Americans insisted on regarding the naval strength of the countries of the Commonwealth as one, despite all our efforts to establish our separate status. These difficulties, which were more or less academic in those days are, of course, vastly more important when you are planning the actual operational use of naval forces. Undoubtedly the development of staff conversations looking to the combined use of British and American naval forces has tended to make it more difficult for us to assert, or the United States to recognize, our position as an independent principal.

7. Linked with these considerations and reinforcing them has been the effect on Canadian-American relationships of the United States' new awareness of the implications of its position as a great world power. It has always been sure of its strength and confident that it could control the conditions and degree of its participation in world affairs. For a good many years the President hoped and believed that the United States could save the world by its example, by minding its own business, pursuing a fair and friendly policy towards its neighbours, encouraging and supporting other countries disposed to follow in the same path and frowning on countries who wandered from it.

8. Now that this era is over, we can see the United States turning everywhere to more direct and forceful methods of exerting its influence. The men charged with the conduct of America's foreign policies took over from the other democratic countries the handling of all negotiations with Japan. They are now assuming a parallel responsibility for our collective relations with Vichy, and they seem clearly prepared to speak to and for the Latin American countries in their major relationships with the rest of the world, witness the United States attitude towards the suggestion that Canada might be directly represented at the Rio Conference and the pressure they put on the United Kingdom to drop Argentina as protecting power in the Orient in order to prepare the way for compelling Argentina to come into the war as a belligerent. In fact, the only major diplomatic relationship which the United States is not yet managing is contact with Russia, and here it is clear that the United Kingdom cannot make further progress in the negotiations with Stalin without bringing in the United States to decide how far they should go to meet his terms.

9. These facts are bringing home to Americans a new appreciation of the enormous strategic importance and strength of the United States. They are showing a new sense of their "manifest destiny" and a corresponding disposition to take decisions and accept responsibilities. This change of attitude is very encouraging from the standpoint of the world in general, but it does imply quite an important modification of the special relationship in which Canada has hitherto stood with regard to the United States.

10. During this period when the powerful forces outlined in the preceding paragraphs were at work to modify the essential character of Canadian-American relations, and when those relations themselves were assuming an enormous variety of forms, our actual diplomatic representation in Washington has not been very strong — probably weaker than in the immediately preceding period when Parliament and the press were assailing the alleged inadequacy of our representation. Canadian press and political appreciation of our relations with the United States is, in the short run, apt to be pretty largely determined by press clippings. When, for one reason or another, Canadian news and activities get reasonably full and favourable publicity in American newspapers, all is well with the world. When the volume of applause for our efforts falls away, if there is a suggestion of criticism in United States comment, our press is inclined to conclude that Canadian-American relations are in a bad way.

11. During the past year there has been a disposition to measure the ups and downs of our relationships with the United States too largely in these terms. Meanwhile, there have been other more significant indications of a change in our relations with the United States which have been overlooked or misunderstood by Canadian opinion. I might mention:

(a) the gradual assumption by the United States of hegemony in Newfoundland, a development dating back to the Atlantic Bases Conference in London, at which Canada was only represented by observers;

(b) the negotiation of the A.B.C. plans in Washington between the United Kingdom and the United States, in which the direct Canadian and American defence plans were, for all practical purposes subordinated, and probably quite properly subordinated, to the main strategic alignments which the United Kingdom and the United States General Staffs thought best calculated to win the war;

(c) the negotiation of the Atlantic Charter direct between the United Kingdom and the United States Governments;

(d) the discussions on post-war commercial relationships between the United States and the British Empire which have, up to now, been handled directly between London and Washington. We have been kept informed and consulted by the United Kingdom, but the field of these negotiations is one in which, up until this year, Canada had taken a much greater initiative than any other part of the British Commonwealth;

(e) the diplomatic negotiations with Japan prior to the outbreak of the war. Here, it was agreed, that the United States should conduct the negotiations single-handed, but we had to rely on information relayed from London on the course of these negotiations although we had our own separate diplomatic representation in Washington. The Netherlands, Australia and China were kept directly informed of the negotiations by the United States. The failure of the United States to keep us informed was not calculated or deliberate. It was an oversight partly due to their growing tendency to regard their special relationship with Canada as an internal domestic relationship rather than an international one. It was also partly due to lack of local initiative by our representation in Washington;

(f) the question of policy towards French Colonial possessions in this hemisphere. Here the United States have been laying down the law as to what we should and should not do with regard to St. Pierre, but told us very little about the policy they proposed to pursue in relation to Martinique, and less about the bases that policy had in United States understandings with the Vichy Government;

(g) the American attitude toward Canadian participation in the Conference of American Foreign Ministers at Rio de Janeiro.

12. The task of representing Canada in Washington has been enormously complicated in the last eighteen months by the multiplication of direct contacts between American and Canadian Governmental agencies. These contacts are not canalized at the top or policy level, but occur wherever these agencies find themselves tackling mutual or similar problems. Some of these new contacts are now stabilized and continuous, e.g., the Department of Munitions and Supply has a large and well organized office in Washington in direct touch with the appropriate divisions of OPM, and with the British Supply Council. The Shipping Board has now a man permanently stationed in Washington, in touch with the United States Maritime Commission. The coordination of Canadian and American export control policy also requires continuous liaison in Washington. Domestic price control policies in Canada and the United States impinge on each other all the time, and to minimize friction and secure an understanding of what the other country is doing, the Wartime Prices and Trade Board are going to keep a representative in Washington and the United States Office of Price Administration has already a representative in Ottawa. In addition to these fixed contacts, a good deal of progress has been made in the last year in working out new techniques for Canadian-American collaboration. The device of the Joint Committee, developed in the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, has been used in the Materials Coordination Committee, the Canadian-American Joint Economic Committees and in the Joint War Production Committees. The question of the best machinery for the direct coordination of Canadian-American military activities policies is still under consideration with no steps yet taken to set up the proposed Military Mission.

13. The role of the Legation in relation to all these new developments is pretty hard to define. The Minister, as the general representative of Canada in the United States, should have the supervising responsibility for all Canadian activities in the United States, though the delegation of a good deal of this responsibility is an administrative necessity. He is the person who should be taking an over-all view of Canadian-American relations. The Minister's staff has been enlarged from time to time, but he has only a fraction of the staff given the British Ambassador to assist him in keeping up similar responsibilities. Since the war we have added three Service Attachés, Press, Financial and Commercial Attachés and a General Assistant to the Minister to the Legation Staff. We also have in Washington in Wrong the most competent executive officer in the External Affairs Service.

14. The present establishment, however, does not seem to meet the requirements of the new situation either with regard to

(a) supervision and coordination of Canadian activities in the United States; or

(b) the representation of Canadian national interests at the top policy level.

At a time when the gravest decisions, which may determine the whole future of this country, are being taken in Washington, the post of Canadian representative there has become as important as any post in the public service of Canada. Developments in the next weeks are likely to accentuate the concentration of the political and strategic direction of the war in Washington. If we are going to participate in any significant way in shaping decisions which may be of great moment to this country, we should have the strongest possible representation in Washington and do everything we can to help make it effective.

15. To this end, it may be worth considering whether the time has not arrived to raise our Legation to the status of an Embassy, giving our senior representative in Washington the rank of Ambassador. The United Kingdom has taken the position that it will not change the status of any of its diplomatic missions during war-time, but this policy has no real bearing on our problem, and their decision need not be a controlling precedent for Canadian action.

16. The Canadian Ambassador in Washington could be made a member of the War Committee of the Cabinet. The British Ambassador was a senior member of the War Cabinet and kept his appointment on his designation to Washington. The Australian Minister was a senior member of the Australian Cabinet. The New Zealand Minister Designate, Mr. Nash, is Minister of Finance and Deputy Prime Minister of the New Zealand Government. We cannot afford to forego any "prestige importance" which membership in the War Cabinet might give our representative in Washington, and, at the same time, geography would make it possible for him to be, in a much more real sense, a member of the Canadian War Committee than say Lord Halifax is of the British War Cabinet.

17. The Canadian representative, given this dual status, of Ambassador and member of the War Committee could be expected to exercise a much more direct and active supervision over Canadian activities in the United States than his predecessors have been able to do. He would be able to participate on a more nearly equal footing with the United Kingdom and United States representatives in the formulation of high policy and should keep Canada a little nearer to the centre of things than it has been in recent months.

18. To make this strengthening of the top representation really effective, it would be necessary to enlarge the immediate Washington establishment, particularly on the staff side. The Minister has asked for authority to take over the premises immediately adjoining the Legation, which could house the Service Attachés, now quartered in an annex a mile away, and give some room for the accommodation of the enlarged establishment the work requires.³

19. At the same time, we should try to speed up communications with Washington. We are still carrying on with the three diplomatic bags a week which were adequate before the war. The volume and tempo of business is increasing all the time, and delays in handling mail at both ends, with inadequate staffs, are becoming increasingly serious. This situation could be improved by establishing a direct teletype connection between the Legation and the Department and by sending more frequent bags by airmail.³ In this connection, consideration might be given to the establishment of a direct, daily air connection between Ottawa and Washington, available for the carrying of official mail and for the frequent, first-hand contacts with our representative in Washington, which circumstances require.

RECENT TRENDS IN UNITED STATES-CANADA RELATIONS

I. The recent unexpected and discouraging developments in connection with the proposal that Canada should be represented at the forthcoming meeting of American Foreign Ministers have brought the general problem of our relations with the United States into momentary focus. It might be advantageous to record certain trends that have lately become apparent in that field.

³ Note marginale:

³ Marginal note:

O.K.

⁴ H.L. Keenleyside.

Fortune Poll

II. A Fortune poll which was published in December disclosed that, of those expressing opinions, 71% of Americans “in all groups, all classes, all districts” today display an “unblushingly imperialist attitude” in regard to the objectives of United States foreign policy. There seems in our own experience to be some reason to believe that members of the Administration and the State Department have been affected by the influences that the Fortune poll records. The following incidents, unimportant in isolation and subject to modification when considered in the light of contrary experiences, do nevertheless form a pattern that could not have been discerned a year ago. In the light of this fact they deserve contemplation.

Mr. Stone’s Report

III. When Mr. Stone visited Washington a month ago he was charged with the duty of consulting with the United States officials who were designing and beginning to operate regulations relating to all aspects of economic warfare. He was prepared to consult with these officials with a view to coordinating Canadian and United States policies in this field. Mr. Stone reported that his American colleagues had impressed him as being quite prepared to handle the whole problem by themselves — not only for the United States and Canada but for the remainder of the hemisphere as well. They were ready for Canadian “cooperation” so long as that meant that Canada would follow the American lead and subordinate the policies of Ottawa to those of Washington. He returned to Canada disturbed by the spirit he had found in certain administrative circles.

The U.S. Maritime Commission

IV. Additional colour was added to Mr. Stone’s report by certain experiences of the Canadian Shipping Board and the Royal Canadian Navy in their dealings with the United States Maritime Commission. Without going into detail it may be said that the Maritime Commission at one stage arrogated to itself the right to decide what commodities Canada might or might not import — even in neutral or Canadian ships. It was this situation that led to the recommendation on shipping which was adopted by the Joint Economic Committees and which resulted in the establishment of the Shipping Import Priorities Committee. On another occasion the Maritime Commission held up the transfer of registry of two United States tugs which had been purchased for the Royal Canadian Navy after consultation with the United States Naval authorities. It was only by bringing State Department and Defence Board influences to bear that the Commission was forced to acquiesce in this transfer.

Canadian Military Mission

V. The United States authorities, both civil and military, have displayed a complete absence of enthusiasm in relation to the proposed establishment of a Canadian Military Mission in Washington. The arguments advanced against the use of the name have been not unreasonable, but the coldness with which the practical advantages of the establishment have been viewed is less easily explained.

Unified Command

VI. From the very first days of cooperation in military, naval and air planning the Canadian members of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence and the Canadian Chiefs of Staff have had to resist American attempts to gain unified, which means in practice United States, command. Pressure to this end has been brought to bear from many sources, and in one case the senior United States Army Officer engaged in a bitter and insulting personal attack on the Chairman of the Canadian Section of the Defence Board, because the latter would not accept the principle of United States supremacy in command. This attitude has been carried so far that on December 9th, two days after the Japanese attack in Hawaii, and when the residents of the West Coast of Canada and the United States were understandably in a state of considerable nervous tension, an "inspired" story was sent out from Washington which began:

"Japan's surprise attack on the United States Navy and the consequent weakening of the strategic position of the whole Pacific Coast . . . found arrangements for joint hemispheric defence between the United States and Canada incomplete . . .

Although the Joint Defence Board conferred regarding a joint command no single command was designated."

Apart from being completely untrue the statement that the joint defence arrangements were incomplete was obviously designed (and the authorship of the report is clear from internal evidence) to take advantage of the popular apprehension for the purpose of forcing Canada to agree to the extension of American command over Canadian forces.

Radio Detectors

VII. On December 8th the United States members of the Defence Board, against the wishes of the Chairman of the Canadian Section, cancelled a meeting which had been called for the 9th and 10th. Early on the morning of the 9th the United States Minister called on the Canadian Government with a request for approval "in principle" and permission to take immediate action, on a proposal that, if accepted, would be a contradiction of the basic assumptions on which the joint defence plans had been drawn up. It was a matter, moreover, (the installation of United States radio detectors on the British Columbia Coast) which should have been handled through the Defence Board and not through political channels in a hurried midnight decision. The whole incident may have been perfectly innocent but the sequence of events certainly created a presumption to the contrary.

St. Pierre and Miquelon

VIII. We have had more than a little reason in recent weeks to gain the impression that the United States is opposing Free French action at St. Pierre because they hope to eliminate French sovereignty there entirely. Mr. Moffat's statement that long-run considerations were more important than current convenience in leading Washington to oppose the solution of the matter through the Free French, was hardly susceptible to any other interpretation.

Final evidence of the American attitude in regard to the Islands, and the most glaring example yet of the way in which the United States has endeavoured to use the power of the press to browbeat Canada into acquiescence in American policies, came on December the 24th and 25th. On the former date Admiral Muselier, with three corvettes and the Surcouf, appeared off St. Pierre and "rallied" the Islands. He was apparently received with enthusiasm by the local population, and immediately set up a new administration. Washington at once came out in print with a statement to the effect that the Free French action was "arbitrary" and "unjustified" and announced that the United States Government was asking the Canadian Government what it proposed to do to restore the status quo ante in the Islands. The United States Minister to Canada, during the whole of the 25th, kept in constant touch with different members and officials of the Canadian Government, using language that can only be adequately described as "threatening" in his endeavour to force the Canadian Government to take immediate action by way of despatching a naval expedition to the Islands to restore the Vichy administration. The whole attitude of the State Department and the American Minister in Ottawa was typical of that displayed by people who are not only surprised but angered by having their will thwarted. For the surprise, there is some justification; the anger might perhaps be forgiven because of a misapprehension as to the background (particularly in regard to Admiral Muselier's visit to Ottawa), but for the technique of employing the public press as a means of bringing pressure to bear upon a friendly, allied and cooperative Government there can be no excuse.

Canada & the Conference at Rio de Janeiro

IX. After Canada had taken the preliminary steps to secure an invitation to the meeting of American Foreign Ministers which is to be held in Rio de Janeiro in January, the United States administration, when we brought the matter to their attention, adopted an attitude which in effect vetoed our plans. The reason given was not impressive, namely, that legal difficulties made our representation at the Conference impossible. These difficulties could have been overcome if the desire to do so had existed. It was also suggested at Washington that our presence at the Conference would be objected to by certain Latin American states and that the U.S.A. would have to support them. We have no reason to suppose there would have been any such objection. On the contrary, it is likely that Canada's presence would have been entirely welcome to these states.

The real reason for United States opposition to our presence in Rio is obscure, but possibly arises out of our connection with Europe through Great Britain which may seem, in the eyes of certain Americans, to disqualify us from talking about hemisphere defence in present circumstances. The United States administration may feel that South American states will think that Great Britain is talking through Canada and that this would prove embarrassing.

Mr. Moffat in discussing this matter with Mr. Robertson on Friday, December 19th, supported this interpretation of the United States attitude when he referred to the fact that Canada had an East-West as well as a North-South connection.

This American argument, however, can hardly be admitted as valid, if we, in fact, wish ever to take a place in the councils of American nations.

At all events, it is clear that, in spite of United States assurances in the past that Canada would be welcome in Pan-American Councils, the United States was definitely perturbed when they heard that we were actually preparing to carry out such plans. Something must have happened recently to affect United States policy in this matter. Whatever it was, the United States attitude has put Canada in an embarrassing position. South American states will know of our initial steps to be present at Rio and our later retreat. They will also know that the reason for this retreat was advice from Washington. They may well argue, therefore, that if we are under such strong United States influence, our membership in the Pan-American Union has little value for them.

There is one concrete respect, at least, in which our absence from Rio may be unfortunate. Among other things, there will be discussed there measures for economic warfare against the Axis; supplies and control of raw materials; inter-American wartime trading and shipping arrangements, etc. There is no reason to believe that in our absence our very considerable interest in these matters will be given the same consideration as if we were present. We are having difficulty in securing adequate consultation with the United States when we are on the spot; those difficulties will increase at a Conference where we are not represented.

Washington's Failures in Consultation

X. This brings up another trend in Canadian-American relations which must cause uneasiness: the omission of Washington to consult us or even inform us in advance on matters of mutual concern.

A B C D Conference

It will be recalled that during the Far East discussions in Washington prior to the Japanese attack, Canada was not included in the A B C D group⁵ that was in such close touch with the Secretary of State.

Martinique

Further, in recent discussions over Martinique between the United States and Vichy, Canada was not informed of the United States plans, though they undoubtedly affected our policy towards St. Pierre and Miquelon.

Effects of this policy

XI. This tendency to ignore us — which is in startling contrast to our punctilious care to keep the United States informed and to secure United States approval before we take any action which might affect United States policy — may have very great and damaging results for us if it is extended into those new fields of political and strategic cooperation and consultation which are now to be developed following the entry of the United States into the war. For instance, if an inter-Allied Supreme Council is set up in Washington will Canada be invited to become a member along with other belligerent powers or are we to be asked to join in “British Empire” representation? If we wish to participate as a separate state with full rights and powers, we should make known our desires at once. Otherwise we may be passed over.

Likewise, in respect of inter-Allied Committees on economic and financial, political warfare and supply questions, we should also take steps now to see that we are not overlooked by those in Washington who are likely to call the tune in such matters.

The fact that Washington is likely to become the centre of all these fundamental and far-reaching activities gives us a great opportunity, but also involves elements of danger to our position as a separate nation fighting in this war as such. We may find that the Americans are not as conscious of our position and our problems in this regard as the British have become through a long period of education. So far we have not received from Washington — in matters relating to the conduct of the war — that degree of consideration which should be accorded an ally.

Conclusion

XII. Of course, the first essential is to win the war; and no consideration of prestige or constitutional sensitiveness should be allowed to interfere with that end. It is, however, not going to help, but will rather hinder our effort, which is so important to the common cause, if the authorities in Washington feel they can consider us as almost a colonial dependency.

It would hardly be a satisfactory phase of Canada's national development if, having acquired our rightful place as a free and separate nation in the British Commonwealth, we accepted something less than the equivalent of that position in our relationship with Washington.

AMERICAN IMPERIALISM AND CANADA

1. Affected by a not unnatural wartime psychosis and impatient with any restrictions or conventions that would limit even momentarily the carrying out of American plans for the prosecution of the war, the United States Government and its various more or less independent agencies have recently shown a tendency in dealing with foreign countries to act first and seek approval afterwards — if at all.

2. In the case of Canada this neo-Imperialism has been greatly modified by the existence of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence and the other joint agencies which can often foresee prospective developments and arrange for appropriate clearances and the observance of conventional forms. Even here, however, there has been a whole series of unsatisfactory episodes, for some of which informal apologies have been received but which have generally gone unrebuked and unexplained. So far no very serious damage has been done but this may not always be true. The cases which have already occurred are summarized in the following paragraphs.

3. St. Pierre and Miquelon — Canada was asked to keep Washington informed of all developments affecting these Islands. This was done without exception. In spite of a reciprocal undertaking by Washington the United States negotiated an agreement with Admiral Robert which the French interpreted as applying to St. Pierre and which, under any interpretation, did indirectly at least affect the situation in the Islands. There then occurred the episode of the Free French occupation and the peremptory demands by the United States Minister and the State Department that Canada announce at once what it proposed to do about restoring the position in the Islands.

4. R.D.F. Installations on the Pacific Coast — Without any advance warning through the agreed and available service channels the United States Minister announced to a member of the staff of External Affairs, on a Sunday afternoon, that his Government wanted immediate permission to install certain radio equipment on the Coast of Vancouver Island. He, and presumably his superiors in Washington, were very annoyed when it was insisted that the proposal be made in accordance with the accepted procedure. This would involve no delay but would require an explanation of what was proposed and why.

5. Northwestern Airlines — At the request of the United States Army Canada agreed that Northwestern Airlines should be employed to carry military supplies and equipment across Canadian territory to Alaska. While the discussion of this was taking place (it was all settled in two days) a Northwestern Airlines plane arrived in Canada, without warning and loaded with personnel, to make a "survey" of the route. The United States Army subsequently apologized for this invasion but the incident caused trouble for weeks in the United States press.

6. United States Installations at Sault Ste. Marie — At the March meeting of the Defence Board it was recommended, and this Recommendation was approved by the Governments, that additions be made to the defensive equipment at Sault Ste. Marie. Canada agreed to station one A.A. battery on the northern side of the Locks, and the United States promised to supply the guns if Canada could not obtain them immediately from her own services. A few days after the Recommendation was approved Ottawa received word from the Sault that the United States Army officer commanding in the district was asking for accommodation on the Canadian side for 600 men and was moving in anti-aircraft guns, barrage balloons, R.D.F. equipment (he had already set up a station eight miles North of the Canadian Sault) and other military supplies. This was wholly out of line with the terms of the Recommendation, and informal apologies, or rather explanations were subsequently given. But that was long after the United States units were firmly established on Canadian soil.

7. Railway to Alaska — Without any previous warning whatever a United States Army Officer (Engineers Corps) telephoned to the General Manager of the Canadian National Railways at Winnipeg, and asked for 60 Canadian engineers to help him “locate and construct” a 1400-mile railway from Prince George, B.C., to Fairbanks, Alaska. It was only after this matter had been taken up through Defence Board channels that it was ascertained that the United States authorities were, in fact, contemplating a request to Canada to allow a survey to be made. This request will presently come forward through diplomatic channels.

8. Canada and the Pan-American Union — The way in which the United States has blocked Canadian admission to the Pan-American Union against the wishes of the other members of the Union is described in another memo of this date.⁷

CERTAIN DEVELOPMENTS IN CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

Certain current developments in the diplomatic relations of Canada and the United States must cause some anxiety. These arise out of (1), a tendency of the United States to overlook our position, not only in matters of general interest, but even in those of direct and immediate concern between the two countries; and (2), our efforts, and the attitude of the United States thereto, to secure a proper position for Canada in Combined Boards which have been set up and in United Nations organizations which have been or which may be proposed.

As to (1), the very intimacy, informality, and friendliness of our relations with the United States, though it has great advantages in many ways, notably in the field of defence and war supplies, does in another sense constitute a difficulty. The American authorities often tend to consider us not as a foreign nation at all, but as one of themselves. This is flattering, but leads occasionally to misunderstandings. Because they take us for granted, they are perplexed when we show an impatience at being ignored and an irritation at being treated as something less than an independent State. They make sudden demands on us, for some concession or co-operation which they consider to be required by the war emergency, and they do not understand why we should not respond, as the Governor of a State would.

In their occasionally careless, but seldom conscious, disregard of our recently acquired independent position, about which we are rightly sensitive, they may make demands on Canada with a casualness that they would not dream of showing towards Brazil or any other Latin American State, basking in the Pan-American sun of policy and politeness. Take the application of the U.S. Selective Service laws. These are being enforced very strictly against Canadians in this country. No real effort is made, however, to conscript Latin Americans who may be living here.

There are other and more important instances of a certain disregard by the United States of our susceptibilities, which have had, too often, the result of forcing us to complain to the State Department about such disregard. This tends, in turn, to make us somewhat suspicious of every request the American authorities make of us, and provokes a feeling of resistance which we probably would not possess if these suspicions had not been aroused. The recent demand by the United States for exclusive jurisdiction over their armed forces in Canada is a case in point.

Other illustrations of this unsatisfactory position are to be found in the recent mix-up over the proposed refugee conference in Ottawa; in the sudden decision, without consulting us, to put into effect at once the decentralized plan for controlling exports to South America; in the difficulties that we have had in securing a proper recognition of our position on Combined Boards; in our current controversy over the relationship of Canada to the proposed United Nations Relief Organizations; and in the sudden change of United States policy toward supplies for Martinique without consultation with us.

I do not wish to exaggerate the seriousness of this situation, but it is regrettable, at least, that we should be so often forced into a position where we have to complain to the State Department about slights or injuries or omissions. It weakens the complete confidence and vitiates the atmosphere of frank co-operation which is essential between two countries whose relationship is so close. It makes us over-suspicious of the Americans and the Americans impatient at what they think is over-sensitiveness on our part.

There is another danger arising out of this situation. On instructions from Ottawa, we take a firm stand in Washington in opposition to certain United States demands. But as soon as pressure is exerted by the U.S. Government, either here or in Ottawa, we give in. The jurisdiction conference is a case in point. There are others. If the value of representations made by the Legation in Washington is not to be seriously diminished, we should not be asked to take a strong line when that line is abandoned shortly afterward with scarcely a struggle. This kind of diplomacy, the strong glove over the velvet hand, has nothing to commend it. We should, I think, be particularly careful in forcing the issue with the United States on any matter unless we are willing to pursue the matter through to the end; and unless we have a good chance of emerging successful. In estimating our chances in this regard, we should never lose sight of the relative position of the two countries. It will therefore be necessary for us to have an unanswerable case, or one in which some really vital Canadian interest is at stake, if we are "to go to the mat" with Washington. Otherwise, the United States will ignore our arguments, bring up their heavy guns, and we will make a virtue of necessity by giving in. In the end, we will be in a much worse position than if we had not taken the “firm stand” originally.

The second cloud on the U.S.-Canadian diplomatic horizon arises out of our efforts to secure a proper position for Canada in the United Nations war and post-war set-up.

These efforts are concerned with: (1) Canada’s relationship to existing Combined United Kingdom and United States Boards; and (2), her relationship to United Nations organizations which may be established.

As to (1), the situation is known, even if it is not clear. The present relationship is not satisfactory and we are ourselves partly to blame. We do not always seem to know what we want. More than a year ago we asked for full representation on the C.M.A.B.⁹ and rejected the suggestion made here that it might be better if we gave this up in favour of répresentation on the C.P.R.B.¹⁰ Later we reversed this decision; secured representation on the latter body, and have never replied to the proposal by the United States Government giving us restricted representation on the C.M.A.B. We may not have replied to this because it has not yet been possible in Ottawa to reconcile three views on this matter: (a) that the compromise offer of the United States goes too far; (b) that it is satisfactory, and (c) that it does not go far enough. There is evidence to show that the State Department is quite well aware of the reasons for our failure to reply to their C.M.A.B. offer and that this awareness causes them to be less impressed by arguments we advance on other occasions for Canadian representation on other boards and organizations.

The Combined Food Board provides another illustration of the disadvantage of a ragged solution. We are not satisfied with the existing position of representation on Committees only. We have, however, accepted it long enough to make alteration difficult.

The other question — which promises to be even more difficult — is Canada’s position in relation to proposed United Nations conferences and organizations. The disposition of this matter will, in turn, probably affect our position in the whole post-war set-up.

The matter has come to a head in the U.N.R.R.A. discussions. We have demanded — as the price of our adhesion to the Organization and a recognition of our importance thereto — full membership on its Central Committee. We have rejected the compromise which would have given us the chairmanship of the Supplies Committee and restricted membership on the Central Committee. It is a case of membership, full membership, and nothing but full membership. Our claim is based on valid reasons. Our arguments are strong. But these arguments may not prevail against the opposition of Russia, inspired primarily by political considerations remote from Canada. The U.S.A. are not going to support our claim against this opposition, especially as certain Americans are, I believe, worried about the effect on Congress of the old, but apparently not dead, “two votes for the British” argument. I understand also that while certain American officials appreciate our position in this matter, others do not and are becoming impatient at what they consider to be our obstinacy; comparing us unfavourably on this score with Australia, Brazil, and other countries whose interest in Relief and Rehabilitation is also important.

⁹ Combined Munitions Assignments Board.

¹⁰ Combined Production and Resources Board.

The United Kingdom, originally cool to our representation on the Central Committee, have recently strongly supported it, but are not likely to continue this policy, now that we have rejected the compromise and in the face of Russian opposition.

Further efforts, however, are undoubtedly being made to solve “the Canadian difficulty”. It has, for instance, been suggested that the United Kingdom might give up its place on the Central Committee to Canada. This would overcome the Russian objection, as the size of the Committee would not be increased thereby. There has been some indication, however, that if the British stand down for Canada, they would expect us to represent the whole of the Empire on the Committee. This, of course, introduces a very far-reaching and fundamental problem of intra-Commonwealth relationship, the effect of which would not be confined to this proposed Organization.

I do not myself see how we could divide ourselves up in this way; at times acting for ourselves alone, at other times “going Imperial”. Furthermore, if we act for the United Kingdom on the Relief Organization, she may expect to act for us on the United Nations Council if and when one is created. In short, unless we are to reverse the course of history, and move towards a centralized British Commonwealth, we should not formally represent anyone but ourselves on the Relief Central Committee; especially as that body is to be a post-war, even more than a war, organization.

This brings up the question of the attitude likely to be adopted by the U.S. Government towards our aspirations to play an important but independent role in the post-war set-up. There are indications that we may have as much difficulty asserting our position in Washington as we ever had in London during and after the last war. United States understanding of Canada’s status and stature in the world in general, and the British Empire in particular, is certainly confused, but I am not sure that this confusion will be cleared up in a way satisfactory to us.

There are four schools of opinion on this matter:

(1) those who encourage every centripetal tendency in the Commonwealth. This is done for various reasons, one being that it will mean the increasing dependence of countries like Canada and Australia on the U.S.A.

(2) Those, possibly the President is one, who would, for convenience sake, like the British Empire to speak with one voice. Often the reason is deeper than that of convenience. It is a desire to maintain a strong British Empire in a post-war world in which Russia and China may play such a big part that a strong British Empire could be a comfort rather than a challenge to the U.S.A.

(3) Those who think that Canada is still a colony of Great Britain and who will suspect that any efforts of ours to assert an independent position are merely those dictated by Downing Street.

(4) Those who think that Canada's interests should be looked after by the U.S.A. and that Canadians shouldn't object to this.

Suspended, then, somewhat uneasily in the minds of so many Americans between the position of British Colony and American dependency, we are going to have a difficult time in the months ahead in maintaining our own position and in standing on our own feet.

This difficulty in merely "standing" should make us particularly careful in choosing our direction each time we start to "move". If we don't exercise such care, our role of "interpreter" will result in bringing the United States and United Kingdom together, but in such a way that we may find ourselves uncomfortably squeezed in between. In a post-war world, where power is going to count for so much and where the little nation may possibly receive less consideration than formerly, we should certainly try to avoid a squeeze play of this kind.

The Chiefs of Staff Committee desire to recommend that the Canadian Government should authorise the Chiefs of Staff to place in effect Joint Canadian-United States Basic Defence Plan No. 2 (Short Title ABC-22)¹¹ against Japan in accordance with Section II, Paragraph 17, which states:

"This Plan will be placed in effect by the Chiefs of Staff of Canada and the United States when so directed by the Canadian and United States Governments."

2. By a signal addressed to all U.S. men-of-war from the Secretary of the U.S. Navy, U.S. War Plan WPL-46 was put into execution against Japan at 1930 on the 7th December. 2. There was an informal discussion of the adequacy of the measures taken in pursuance of the plan (ABC 22) which was immediately placed in operation in the two countries when the Japanese attack took place. The question of the cooperation between the armed forces of the two countries in local areas was also discussed.

3. The senior United States naval member advised the Board that a report had been received from Admiral Freeman, the Commander Pacific Northern Naval Coastal Frontier, with headquarters at Seattle, to the effect that his relations with the Canadian Army, Navy and Air Force left nothing to be desired.

4. The Board discussed the measures of cooperation now in effect between the forces of the various Services present in Newfoundland. The degree of cooperation now existing was noted with gratification, but the Board considers it necessary to stress the need for decentralization of command sufficiently to permit local operational control and full cooperation between all forces assigned to the local defence of Newfoundland, and also to permit immediate local action on requests from Task Force Commanders of the United States Atlantic Fleet for support of naval operations by the forces present.

5. The Board considered the possibility that in the prosecution of the war, situations can arise suddenly, requiring immediately the further integration for joint defence of the military forces of the United States and Canada, advance preparation therefor, or the movement of military forces or equipment of one country into or through the territory of the other. The Board, therefore, approved the following as its TWENTY-SECOND RECOMMENDATION:

That the United States and Canadian Governments now authorize the Commanders named in paragraph 12 of ABC-22, or their duly authorized representatives, to effect by mutual agreement any arrangements they deem necessary for the perfection of preparation for the common defence, including but not limited to, the installations of accessory equipment in the territory of either, the transit of armed forces, equipment or defence materials into or through the territory of either, and the utilization by either nation of the base and military facilities of the other.

NOTE ON MEETING OF PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE
HELD AT NEW YORK, 19TH-20TH DEC. 41

1. As previously arranged, a meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence was duly held in New York on 19th-20th December. The first day was devoted to the exchange of information and preliminary discussion of items of new business between United States Army Members and Canadian Army and Air Members. The meeting of the full Board was held on 20th December.

2. It was, I think, a very useful meeting. The atmosphere was most cordial.

3. On Friday, 20th December, accompanied by Air Commodore Heakes and Lieut.-Col. Jenkins, I met with General Embick and Lieut.-Col. Bissell, U.S.A., and gave them both verbally, and in documentary form, a complete statement of our position on the West Coast and drew their attention to the several actions the Canadian Army had taken subsequent to the 7th December. On his part, Lieut.-Col. Bissell made a comprehensive statement of the strength and dispositions of U.S. Army forces in continental United States, including Alaska. He handed me a note giving in some detail United States Army forces in the Puget Sound Area of which the essential items are that over and above the actual coast defences, they have disposed some four regiments of Anti-Aircraft Artillery (4 x (12-3 inch, 56-37 mm. and 24-5 inch M.G.)) and two divisions, these latter consisting of approximately 35,000 officers and men. He did not have information prepared as regards Alaska but he undertook to let me have a précis of this without delay.

4. From our general discussions, I formed the impression that the United States War Department had steadied down after the shock of the events of the 7th December. While they had by no means stopped being concerned as to the requirements of continental defence, quite definitely they showed us that their minds were already ranging farther afield. General Embick did not give me to understand that he feared invasion. He did, however, say that he was of opinion that the Japanese might well undertake a carrier-borne air attack against their very important naval base at Bremerton. I think this is sound. Bremerton undoubtedly constitutes the most important military objective north of San Francisco.

5. On the conclusion of our exchange of information, General Embick suggested to me that the time had now come for both countries to decentralize authority to local commanders to the end that defence measures involving the forces of both countries might be put in hand without delay by the commanders concerned. To this general proposition, I concurred, for the reason that the Department of National Defence in Ottawa, no more than the War Department in Washington, is an operational headquarters. Our function, to use United States Service language, is to assign missions and to provide the means necessary thereto. It is for the local commanders, e.g., G.O.C.-in-C. Atlantic and Pacific Commands, to execute the missions they receive. The Department of National Defence can only exercise its true function by means of directives. Any action on its part to take charge of operations as such, would simply hamper the responsible commander in the field. As a consequence we drafted the following which on the next day was assented to by the full Board.

“The Board considered the possibility that in the prosecution of the war, situations can arise suddenly, requiring immediately the further integration for joint defense of the military forces of the United States and Canada, advance preparation therefor, or the movement of military forces or equipment of one country into or through the territory of the other. The Board, therefore, approved the following as its TWENTY-SECOND Recommendation:

“That the United States and Canadian governments now authorize the Commanders named in paragraph 12 of ABC-22, or their duly authorized representatives, to effect by mutual agreement any arrangements they deem necessary for the perfection of preparations for the common defense, including but not limited to, the installations of accessory equipment in the territory of either, the transit of armed forces, equipment or defense materials into or through the territory of either, and the utilization by either nation of the base and military facilities of the other.”

6. In conversation, General Embick asked me if in view of the changed circumstances in the Pacific we proposed dispatching the 4th Division to the United Kingdom. I replied that so far you had not contemplated any amendment of your plans, i.e., Army Programme, 1942. The reason for this, I added, was that the Army Programme had not yet been approved by the Government and that so far as the 4th Division was concerned, there was a very considerable interval of time yet in hand. It would take not less than four months for the 4th Division to convert itself from an ordinary division into an armoured division and that in these circumstances it did not seem to us at all likely that it could leave Canada before the month of June, that is, six months. As a consequence, it would be readily available for operations at home during all this period.

7. I also mentioned that in his recent appreciation of the situation, General Crerar had carefully stated that any serious change in the position might later require him to recommend the provision of an additional division for home defence. While I took pains to say that we did not think that such a situation had yet arisen, I pointed out to General Embick that there seemed to be plenty of time in which to avail ourselves of the qualification contained in Gen. Crerar's appreciation, should further developments cause us to believe that such a cause was indicated.

8. On 20th December the Board met in full session and carried out a good amount of useful business. Apart from the 22nd Recommendation referred to above, the main item for the Record was the question of United States nationals serving in the Canadian armed forces. This item is appended hereunder and to my mind the proposition can be stated in the following words, namely, that it is fitting and proper that the nationals of any country should serve in the armed forces of that country.

“The Board discussed the question of those citizens of the United States now serving in the Canadian military forces. It was pointed out that since the entry of the United States into the war, there have been a large number of applications from such persons for transfer to the United States forces. It was recognized that undoubtedly the most effective contribution to the war effort of the United States that those United States citizens now in training in the Canadian Air Service could make would be to complete their training in Canada. The Board was informed that steps are now under consideration to issue an agreed public statement in this sense.

“At the same time, the Board agreed that ordinarily it would be desirable from the standpoint of the morale of the individual for a person to perform his military service in the forces of his own country. The Board, therefore, suggested that it would be desirable for the appropriate authorities of the two Governments to work out, as soon as practicable, arrangements for the orderly transfer of those Americans in the Canadian forces who desire such transfers and can be released without impairing Canadian war effort, to the military forces of their own country. Meanwhile, the Board agreed that it would be desirable for the Canadian Government to decline in general to accept applications of United States citizens for enlistment in its armed forces.

“The Board also urges that the above principles be given due consideration in the administration of the draft laws of the two countries.”

9. A statement of the other business of the day will appear in the Record which will be circulated shortly.

10. As the meeting was breaking up, I had a very interesting talk with Commander Sherman of the United States Navy. We were sitting together (the Board having broken up into a number of small groups) when he suddenly asked me if, in respect of Newfoundland, I thought that a unified command was necessary and if so did I think it possible of achievement. I at once replied that I did not think it was necessary and that I was convinced it was impossible of achievement. To this Sherman replied in a friendly way, “well, then, we had better leave it at that”.

11. I then said that so far as the Navies were concerned, the action of the R.C.N. in allocating an important proportion of its strength for convoy escort duty under the direct command of the United States Admiral was giving entire satisfaction to both sides. To this view Sherman agreed.

12. As respects the Air Force, I said that speaking purely for myself I thought that a similar arrangement would have been preferable but that apparently the R.C.A.F. had taken a contrary view and insisted on a method of co-operation. The effect of the 22nd Recommendation, to which the R.C.A.F. had agreed, was that the Air Force Commander in Newfoundland would now be empowered to work directly with the U.S. Naval Commander at Argentia which was a considerable step forward and should make this co-operation more effective. Again, Sherman expressed himself as being in accord with my view.

13. Turning to the Army, I said that the idea of a unified command, possibly by a United States Admiral over a Canadian infantry garrison at Botwood and Airport, fighting off a raid did not, to my mind, make good sense. He would be unable to influence the course of the action in any way. Support could not quickly be given. These were little self-contained garrisons designed to carry out their duties independently. As regards the situation of the two Armies in St. John's, I said that the position seemed all askew. We had two Army garrisons there and a mixed up, or ill defined, division of duties. Referring to his conversation of some three months ago, I said that his words on that occasion had cheered me immensely. (On this occasion Sherman said that he was of opinion the United States Army should pick itself up from St. John's and move to Argentia, handing over their accommodation at Quidi Vidi to the Canadians). He would recall, I said, that in respect of the report that we had received that the War Department were considering the idea of handing over their coast defence guns to us, I had definitely stated in one of my progress reports and should the War Department come to a decision in this sense, Canada was prepared to assume the commitment involved. We Canadians had not the slightest illusion that we could, and certainly we did not desire to, crowd the United States in these matters and I felt, as I had always felt, that our proper course was to let them clearly understand that St. John's being a Canadian Naval Base, we were desirous and competent of ensuring its defence. The next step was up to the War Department and this we would await without impatience. I was sure that he would not resent my remark, that sometimes it seemed to me that the situation was more or less that a year ago the United States Navy desired to establish a base at St. John's; that reconnaissance however had showed that this would be quite inadequate to their needs and therefore they had gone across the Avalon Peninsula to Argentia but had omitted to inform the Army of this fact. As a consequence the Navy was at Argentia and the bulk of the Army at St. John's. Sherman good naturedly agreed and said that in his mind the Army ought to be at Argentia and he could not understand their idea of looking around for other tasks to assume in the vicinity of St. John's, namely, a certain interest they had evinced in the Torbay Airdrome. This he thought would soon solve itself as the United States were now in the war and thus would have plenty of activity in many parts of the world and they were no longer in the position of seeking outlets for their energies. I told Sherman that were it possible to get the necessary equipment from the United Kingdom, I would move at Ottawa for authority to put in a coast defence battery on the north side of St. John's Harbour and inquire of the United States War Department if such a step would be agreeable to them. Sherman said he thought this would be a good plan and he agreed with me that until we were in a position to do something more definite we were wise to leave the matter alone. It would work itself out in time.

14. In his general view, he continued, the work of the Board and more than that the work of the fighting Services of the two countries, should be based on mutual self respect and confidence. To this I heartily agreed and took advantage of the opportunity to say that while in several instances the United States with our consent had established certain stations in Canada, I felt that these feelings of mutual self respect and confidence would be enhanced if Canada made special efforts to take over these stations from the United States at the earliest possible moment, making full provision of course to ensure that all information (meteorological and R.D.F.) was made immediately available to the United States. Sherman agreed saying that it was but natural and expedient for each country to provide and operate any installation located within its own jurisdiction. I stress this point because at times it has seemed to me that the R.C.A.F. have not attached much importance to it.

15. Concluding, Sherman said that the U.S. Army should of course settle down at Argentia and jokingly remarked that before long the U.S. Navy might observe to them that they now proposed to send marines to guard the Argentia base as the Army was not providing them with adequate ground protection. This he thought would bring the War Department to with a jolt.

16. As a result of this talk, I feel confirmed in the view I have always held that our best course in respect of St. John's is to leave things alone in the expectation that the U.S. will sooner or later come to the conclusion that their base there has become meaningless and that Canada should assume at least primary responsibility for its defence. It is obvious that we cannot successfully press them and as we have already intimated that "Barkis is willing", there does not seem to be anything else that we can usefully do.

New York, January [2], 1942

My dear Colonel Biggar,

My Government has requested me, in the interests of greater security of the Pacific Coast, to bring to the attention of the Canadian authorities the advisability of taking immediate action to effect a greater degree of integration of ground and air forces defending the Pacific Coast.¹⁴

In consequence of the current situation in the Pacific, the United States has constituted a Western Theater which comprises Western United States and Alaska, and embraces under one command all United States Army ground and air forces located therein.¹⁵ Lieut.-General John L. DeWitt has been designated as Commander of this Theater.

The Province of British Columbia is geographically an enclave within the Western Theater, is in a strategic sense an integral part thereof, and its most vital section — the area embracing Southern British Columbia and Puget Sound — cannot be most effectively defended under the control of several commanders.

We feel that the present divided responsibility constitutes a hazard not only to British Columbia but to the Northwestern United States and Alaska.¹⁶

In view of the foregoing, I have been instructed, in the interests of most effective common defense, to ask that you present to the Canadian Government the advisability of agreeing to the inclusion of British Columbia within the Western Theater to the extent of placing under the Supreme Command of General DeWitt for local defense, all Canadian Army and Air Forces assigned to the defense of British Columbia, except Air units assigned to over-water operations.

The agreement proposed would limit the authority of the Supreme Commander over the Canadian forces mentioned to such strategical and tactical directives as may be found necessary to insure coordination of effort in defense of the British Columbia-Northwestern United States-Southeastern Alaska area.

The proposed agreement would impose specific limitations upon the authority of the Supreme Commander over the Canadian forces concerned, such as denying him authority to, inter alia: transfer Canadian forces from Canadian Territory without the consent of the Canadian Commander or the Canadian Government; alter the tactical organization of Canadian units; or interfere in their administration or discipline.

As you are aware, Plan 2 of the Joint Defense Board provides that a unified command may, if circumstances so require, be set up in any area or areas, *when agreed upon by the Chiefs of Staff concerned*¹⁷.

In this case the problem presented is one of setting up, as a wise precautionary measure, in advance of the occurrence of an actual attack, that form of basic organization that will afford the greatest measure of protection against enemy operations. It is felt, therefore, that in this instance the two Governments should reach an agreement in principle upon this question of basic organization. Thereafter the agreement can be developed in detail by the Chiefs of Staff concerned and submitted for final approval by the two Governments.

Sincerely yours,

F. H. LA GUARDIA

Dear Mr. Mayor,

We had our meeting this afternoon and discussed at some length the subject raised by your letter. The unanimous view of the Service Members was that it would be inadvisable for this Section to make any recommendation, particularly in the absence at Washington of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff and in view of the fact that decisions on the question of unified command in any area had been expressly confided to the Chiefs of Staff concerned by the relevant plan which was concurred in by all the Service Members of both Sections.

In the circumstances, we decided that the only course open to us was to send copies of your letter to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff for consideration as soon as they return to Ottawa, no doubt with fuller information as to the situation generally than any of us have at the moment. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff will, no doubt, notify to their opposite members the conclusion to which they arrive after obtaining, if necessary, a direction from the War Cabinet.

¹⁷Marginal note:

Yes but circumstances do not require.

I hope that the views of the Canadian and United States Chiefs of Staff will be found to coincide, but if they do not the subject will, of course, be open for discussion at the next full meeting of the Board, either on the 20th instant or earlier if an earlier meeting is called for.

My dear Prime Minister,

You are likely to receive a request by letter or telephone from the President of the United States that the command of the Canadian land forces (army and air) in British Columbia should be entrusted to the United States army commander at San Francisco.

The way in which such a request has been put forward and so far dealt with is outlined in the enclosed memorandum. I hope I have not incorrectly represented the way in which you would deal with it if it were made directly to you (paragraph 7) and that you will not disapprove of the course the Canadian Section of the Permanent Joint Board decided to adopt at its meeting today (paragraph 8).

Yours sincerely,

Mémoire du président, la section canadienne, CPCAD,

Memorandum from Chairman, Canadian Section, PJBD, to Prime Minister

1. A request from Mayor La Guardia that the command of the Canadian land forces (army and air) on the West Coast should be entrusted to Major-General DeWitt, who commands the United States army in the coastal and some interior states and in Alaska was conveyed to me in a letter sent by special army plane and received on Saturday, January 3, at 11:45 a.m. The only reason given for the request was the desirability of "integrating" the arrangements for the land defence of the whole coast.

2. The Canadian Section of the Joint Board met to consider the proposal the same afternoon, when the Service Members pointed out that the question of a unified command in any area had been expressly left to the Chiefs of Staff concerned in the two countries by the terms of the plan (Plan 2) concerted by all the Service Members of the Board and approved by the President of the United States and by the War Cabinet on the recommendation of the Ministers of Defence. It was accordingly decided to refer the proposal to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee, and I advised Mayor La Guardia by letter despatched on the same day that this had been done.

3. On the following Thursday, January 9, Mayor La Guardia telephoned me to say that the proposal was one made at the instance of the President, and was regarded as being of the utmost urgency. Consideration, he said, had been given to the question whether the President should take it up directly with you, but that the President's view was that, if the Joint Board was to be of any use, a question of this kind should be dealt with by it. The Mayor wanted me to discuss the question with you directly, but I said that on the information I had, I could not very well do this because I was myself unable to appreciate what were the practical reasons for putting forward the proposal or the practical consequences of its acceptance, and that I had already drafted but not despatched a personal letter to him expressing my difficulties in this respect. This he asked me to send forward in order that he might obtain the information necessary to deal with my difficulties.

4. I did so and the consequence was that, immediately upon receipt of my letter[†], he telephoned on Friday, January 10, asking me to come to Washington on the following Monday as the relevant considerations were too delicate to be made the subject of a written communication.

5. The Canadian Section met on Saturday, the 11th, and approved of my going to Washington as requested by the Mayor. This decision was arrived at after considering a communication from the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee[†] in which that Committee expressed the view that there was no need to make any new arrangements with regard to command on the West Coast. The communication stated that at the end of the previous week the Chiefs of Staff had met their United States opposite members [numbers] in Washington and had received the impression that the latter were perfectly satisfied with the arrangements now in force. They preferred, therefore, not to deal with the subject at all until it was raised by their United States opposite numbers and indicated their view that the matter was one rather for the Chiefs of Staff on both sides of the line than for the Joint Board.

6. I went to Washington accordingly, and spent some two hours yesterday afternoon discussing the subject partly with the Mayor but chiefly with Lieutenant-General Embick, whom the Mayor had asked to join him. The practical points I had raised were not satisfactorily dealt with in this conversation, but it appeared that the reason for the proposal was that a new view of possible scales of attack had been recently taken in the United States War Department. I pointed out that this was exclusively a military problem and suggested that the Board might arrange for the preparation of a third plan based upon the assumption upon which this new view was founded, and that in that third plan, which would be brought into force by agreement between the governments upon the happening of the contemplated event, there might be included such provisions with regard to the vesting of command over the forces of both countries in a single officer as the event contemplated seemed to require.

7. This suggestion was reluctantly agreed to by the Mayor and General Embick, the former particularly expressing his dissatisfaction with it, and saying that he would discuss it with the President, who would, of course, remain free to take the point up directly with you. I told the Mayor that I thought the question was not one that you would be prepared to deal with without consultation with the Ministers of Defence and that they in turn would be unlikely to overrule their respective military advisers, so that nothing was likely to be gained by the course he proposed. The Mayor said that he would communicate my expression of opinion on this point to the President when he spoke to him on the subject generally.

8. I today reported yesterday's conversations to the Canadian Section of the Board and it was then decided that I should telephone the Mayor that in the opinion of the Section the preparation of a new plan based on a new view should not be undertaken until an appreciation of the situation had been submitted by the United States Army Members of the Board for consideration by the Canadian officers concerned in order that they might be in a position to discuss the subject at the next meeting of the whole Board. Such a meeting is to be held in Montreal on the 20th instant.

My dear General Pope,

My Government is deeply concerned by the prospects that the situation in the Pacific is likely to assume more and more critical phases for some time to come. Our Pacific Fleet — which heretofore has been a protective screen for our West Coast — may have to be removed at any moment to a distant theater, relinquishing to the enemy for an indefinite period the control of the Northern Pacific. Such action would increase greatly the exposure of the West Coast.

In consequence of these prospects, my Government feels that all practicable measures should be taken immediately to increase the effectiveness of our defensive organization on the West Coast. It regards the unification of control of the local ground forces and associated air units, as one of the most important of such measures, and to that end a letter on the subject was addressed to Col. Biggar by Mayor La Guardia on January 2nd[†], a copy of which I enclose. Subsequently, the subject was discussed at a conference with Col. Biggar in this city on January 12, 1942.

The most important region with which we are mutually concerned is that embracing Southern British Columbia and Puget Sound — an indivisible military entity. Surely a formula can be found for a unified command that will safeguard Canadian interests and yet provide for a more effective organization of the common defense.

The fundamental purpose of unified control is to secure the most effective employment of our combined forces. In view of the great preponderance of U.S. forces in the region in question, I am sure you will agree that the practical effect on Canada of the adoption of the proposal will be that of ensuring the prompt and effective reinforcement of British Columbia by U.S. forces in the event of an enemy attack. Failure to provide for the most effective control of forces subjects both British Columbia and the North West United States to an unnecessary hazard.

Looking forward to seeing you on the 20th and with kindest personal wishes,
Sincerely yours,

S. D. EMBICK

CANADA-U.S. PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE
TWENTY-SECOND RECOMMENDATION — AGREEMENT BY LOCAL COMMANDERS RE DEFENCE ARRANGEMENTS;
TWENTY-THIRD RECOMMENDATION — CONFERENCE ON AIR TRAINING PROGRAMMES

21. THE SECRETARY submitted the Journal of Discussions and Decisions, covering the Board's twenty-fourth meeting held in New York, December 20, 1941, and containing the Board's Twenty-second and Twenty-third Recommendations.

This report had been submitted to the Prime Minister, December 31, 1941, and copies thereof at once referred to Ministers concerned so that the Recommendations might be examined without delay.

The Twenty-second Recommendation contemplated authorization to local U.S. and Canadian commanding officers to effect, by mutual agreement, arrangements deemed necessary in the common defence. The Twenty-third Recommendation proposed that the two governments consider the advisability of arranging a meeting between British, Canadian and American representatives, with a view to the co-ordination of air training programmes in Canada and the United States.¹⁸

¹⁸ Voir le document 263.

¹⁸ See Document 263.

Both recommendations had been approved by the President of the United States, and the Board hoped that early action might be taken by the Canadian government.

(P.J.B.D. Journal, December 20, 1941; letter, Secretary, Canadian Section, to Secretary, December 30, 1941).[†]

22. MR. HEENEY reported that both of these Recommendations had now been considered by the three Services and that, at a meeting held that morning (January 14th) the Chiefs of Staff Committee had agreed to recommend their approval by the government.

With regard to the Twenty-second Recommendation, it was suggested that an amendment to provide that agreements between local commanders be "subject to confirmation by the respective Chiefs of Staff" might be thought desirable. However, if the government were prepared to direct that local commanders be instructed to refer to their respective Chiefs before concluding agreements involving questions of major importance, the Chiefs of Staff would be satisfied to recommend approval of this Recommendation as it stood.

23. The War Committee, thereupon, approved, on behalf of the government of Canada, the Twenty-second and Twenty-third Recommendations of the Canada-U.S. Permanent Joint Board on Defence; the Secretary being directed to advise the Board accordingly.

With regard to the Twenty-second Recommendation, it was agreed that appropriate directions be given by the Chiefs of Staff to local commanders affected, with a view to prior reference to the respective Chiefs of Staff of agreements of major importance.

Ottawa, January 16, 1942

SOUTHERN BRITISH COLUMBIA-PUGET SOUND
U.S. REQUEST FOR INSTITUTION OF UNITY OF COMMAND

1. In a letter addressed to myself and dated 14 Jan. 42, several folios down, General Embick, U.S. Army, advises me that his Government is deeply concerned by the prospect that the situation in the Pacific is likely to assume more and more critical phases for some time to come and that, in consequence, it regards the unification of control of the local ground forces and associated air units stationed in the Southern British Columbia-Puget Sound region as one of the most important practicable measures that can immediately be taken to increase the effectiveness of the defensive organization of our two countries on the West Coast.

2. The propriety of an officer of the War Department writing in the name of his Government to an officer of the Department of National Defence on a matter of this kind may be open to question. In any event, the appropriateness of the form of this approach I am quite unable to see.

3. The Fighting Services of both Canada and the United States are operating under the provisions of Joint Canadian-United States Basic Defense Plan No. 2 (ABC-22) which was drawn up last year by the Service Members, P.J.B.D., and subsequently approved by the Canadian and United States Governments.

4. As provided for, ABC-22 was duly placed in effect last month by the Chiefs of Staff as directed by their respective Governments.

5. ABC-22 expressly states that the coordination of the Military effort of the United States and Canada shall be effected by mutual cooperation. Provision is also made for the institution of unity of command, when circumstances so require, by agreement between the Chiefs of Staff concerned, or in emergency by local commanders. The pertinent paragraphs of ABC-22 are appended hereunder:

“6. Coordination of the military effort of the United States and Canada shall be effected by mutual cooperation, and by assigning to the forces of each nation tasks for whose execution such forces shall be primarily responsible. These tasks may be assigned in Joint Canadian-United States Basic Defense Plans, or by agreement between the Chiefs of Staff concerned, the United States Chief of Naval Operations being considered as such.

7. In effecting mutual cooperation, as provided in paragraph 6, the forces of one nation will, to their utmost capacity, support the appropriate forces of the other nation.

8. Each nation shall retain the strategic direction and command of its own forces, except as hereinafter provided.

9. A unified command may, if circumstances so require, be established over United States and Canadian forces operating in any area or areas, or for particular United States and Canadian forces operating for a common purpose:

(a) when agreed upon by the Chiefs of Staff concerned; or

(b) when the commanders of the Canadian and United States forces concerned agree that the situation requires the exercise of unity of command, and further agree as to the Service that shall exercise such command. All such mutual agreements shall be subject to confirmation by the Chiefs of Staff concerned, but this provision shall not prevent the immediate establishment of unity of command in cases of emergency.

10. Unity of command, when established, vests in one commander the responsibility and authority to coordinate the operations of the participating forces of both nations by the setting up of task forces, the assignment of tasks, the designation of objectives, and the exercise of such coordinating control as the commander deems necessary to ensure the success of the operations. Unity of command does not authorize a commander exercising it to control the administration and discipline of the forces of the nation of which he is not an officer, nor to issue any instructions to such forces beyond those necessary for effective coordination. In no case shall a commander of a unified force move naval forces of the other nation from the North Atlantic or the North Pacific Oceans, nor move land or air forces under his command from the adjacent land areas, without authorization by the Chief of Staff concerned."

6. As I have suggested above, the method of approach adopted by General Embick would appear to be very much open to question. It clearly ignores the channel laid down in ABC-22, namely, "when agreed upon by the Chiefs of Staff concerned." Indeed, I am of opinion that the Service Members of the P.J.B.D. having drawn up a defence plan, and that plan having been placed in effect by the Chiefs of Staff as laid down, its execution is a matter not for the P.J.B.D. but for the Chiefs of Staff. Consequently, should the United States feel that the principle of mutual cooperation leaves something to be desired, any change in our command relations should be a matter for discussion between the Chief of Staff, United States Army on the one hand, and C.A.S. and yourself on the other and not by discussion in the Board. Without a shadow of doubt, Canadian Service Members would be justified in declining to discuss this question at the P.J.B.D. meeting to be held in Montreal on 20 Jan next and I recommend that we be instructed accordingly.

7. Should, however, the Chiefs of Staff decide that the question be discussed in the Board, the Service Members will require definite instructions.

8. As you will have observed, General Embick's letter is not specific. He expresses a feeling of deep concern because a probable move of the United States fleet to a distant theatre will relinquish to the enemy control of the Northern Pacific. He refrains from stating either the form or the scale of attack he considers probable. Briefly put, his case is that all practicable measures should immediately be taken to increase the effectiveness of our defensive organization on the West Coast, of these one of the most important is the unification of control of the local ground forces and associated air units stationed in Southern British Columbia and Puget Sound which he affirms is an indivisible military entity; and that failure to provide for the most effective control of forces, subjects both British Columbia and the Northwest United States to an unnecessary hazard.

9. I suggest that although General Embick is quite clear and specific in stating what he would like us to agree to, he is extremely vague in stating the premise on which his demand is based. The position as I see it is as follows:

(a) The position in which we now find ourselves is, with one exception, the situation contemplated when ABC-22 was drawn up in the second quarter of 1941.

(b) This exception is that by reason of the losses sustained by the United States Navy at Pearl Harbour on 7 Dec 41, naval superiority in the Northern Pacific has been transferred to the Japanese.

(c) This change in the general strategic situation however, does not imply that the West Coast is liable to major land attack.

(d) Japanese aims are in the South China Sea and the East Indies and to date she has conducted her operations in accordance with these aims.

- (e) These operations are straining her resources to the utmost degree.
- (f) It is doubtful if Japan is in a position to conduct large-scale operations against our West Coast.
- (g) Even if she were, it would be irrational for her to do so.
- (i) [sic] Such an operation would require her to risk important fleet units and many transports to attack by shore-based aircraft.
- (j) It would also mean that Japan seriously contemplated sending an expedition across the Pacific Ocean to attack a continent against vastly superior forces.
- (k) Such a plan would be fantastic, no more so than, in similar circumstances, would be a joint Canadian-United States plan to launch an expeditionary force against the coasts of Japan, or so far as the Southern British Columbia-Puget Sound area is concerned, against some point in the Inland Sea.
- (l) In any event on 10 Dec 41 and again as recently as 15 Jan 42 the Canadian Chiefs of Staff stated that in their view major land operations (against the West Coast) were not to be considered as practicable operations of war.
- (m) Both the Commander-in-Chief and the Chief of Naval Operations, U.S.N., are of opinion that any operations on our coasts must necessarily be of the hit-and-run variety.
- (n) The British Chiefs of Staff are of a similar opinion.
- (o) Air attacks by carrier-borne aircraft against West Coast objectives are distinctly possible.
- (p) Canadian Army defences are such as to be able to deal with landing raids at vital points.
- (q) Such sporadic attacks are not such as even remotely to require the institution of unity of command.
- (r) Should the United States Army believe that our defences are in any way inadequate, they are perfectly free to bring any point of which they are in doubt to our attention and, within reasonable limits, Canada should be glad to provide such additional forces as might be found to be necessary.
- (s) The request for unified control of local ground forces and associated air units, but not of naval and other air units, is not logical.
- (t) If the forwards can work by cooperation, then assuredly unity of command of the goalers is not required.
- (u) The contention put forward by the United States Army Member cannot be admitted by the Canadian Service Members.

Ottawa, January 19, 1942

Dear General Embick,

Further to my brief acknowledgment[†] of your letter addressed to myself and dated 14th January, 1942, in which you advise me that your Government regards the establishment of a unification of control of the local ground forces and associated air units in the Southern British Columbia-Puget Sound region as being one of the most important of the practicable measures that can immediately be taken to increase the effectiveness of our defensive organization on the West Coast, I beg to inform you that this question has received the careful consideration of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff.

I am to say that the Canadian Chiefs of Staff are of opinion that a proposal of the nature made in your letter now under reply would only be appropriate should the method of co-operation now laid down in ABC-22 break down.

I am therefore to inquire if, from the point of view of the United States Army, the co-operation between our respective Forces on the West Coast has been in any way unsatisfactory and to advise you that in the event of this being the case, the Canadian Chiefs of Staff concerned would be anxious to take immediate corrective action.

The Canadian Army and Air Members of the Board will be prepared further to discuss this question, should you so desire, at the meeting of the Board to be held in Montreal, on the 20th of January.

Yours sincerely,

MAURICE POPE

P.J.B.D. MEETING, MONTREAL, 20 JAN 42

1. When the Service members of the P.J.B.D. met amongst themselves yesterday in Montreal prior to the meeting of the full Board, I handed General Em-

¹⁹ La note suivante était écrite sur ce mémorandum:

¹⁹ The following note was written on the memorandum:

As revised by VCGS but not signed.

bick my reply (copy of which appears hereunder) to his letter of the 14 Jan in which he had proposed a unification of control of the local ground forces and associated air units of the two countries serving in the southern British Columbia-Puget Sound region.

2. Gen. Embick read this letter calmly and then, supported by Col. Bissel, restated his case verbally. This he did by reiterating that the changed strategical conditions in the northern Pacific exposed the West Coast of North America to serious attack. He did not specify the weight of attack that he apprehended, but clearly stated that "we in the United States are very frightened".

3. On their part, the Canadian Service members went over the arguments they have always upheld, namely, that they did not consider that operations other than those of a hit-and-run nature were to be anticipated, that in this view they were supported by the British Chiefs of Staff who had been consulted slightly more than a fortnight previously, that it was understood the same view was shared by certain Service authorities in Washington, and that the co-ordination of effort that the circumstances required would as well be obtained by the principle of mutual co-operation as by the unification of control. We clearly pointed out that ABC-22 having been put into effect by the Chiefs of Staff and as that Plan specifically provided machinery for the institution of unity of command, we felt that should the U.S. Army consider such a step desirable, it seemed to us appropriate, and in fact the only course, that the Chief of Staff, U.S. Army should make representations in this sense to his Canadian opposite numbers.

4. This course the Americans expressed their reluctance to take for the following reasons:

- (a) They had no desire to risk a refusal.
- (b) The U.S. Chief of Staff would be too much preoccupied by the conduct of the war even to invite C.A.S. and C.G.S. to come down and talk the matter over with him.

5. I think (a) is a valid objection, but as respects (b) if the U.S. Chief of Staff could not spare the time to talk the matter over with you, then I suggest it has not the importance Gen. Embick attaches to it.

6. The U.S. members then appeared to accept the situation but said that they would like to have inserted in the Record of the Discussions of the Board a note as to their position. To this proposal we readily assented but added that we would desire to have our position also recorded.

7. Just before adjournment, Mayor La Guardia made a statement on the same lines as that made by Gen. Embick earlier in the day, and the well-worn arguments on both sides were brought out again. The U.S. members handed to us a copy of the item they desired to have included in the Record and later we drafted one of our own. Copies of both of these items are appended hereunder.

(a) "The Board discussed possible developments in the strategic situation in the Pacific, and their bearing upon the exposure of the West Coast to enemy attack. The members of the U.S. Section expressed the opinion that in view of these possible developments it is advisable that unity of command be established over the ground forces on the West Coast, and over the air forces assigned to support them, in order to ensure that available means are so coordinated and employed as to afford the most effective defense. They are of the opinion that failure to provide such unified control subjects both British Columbia and Northwestern United States to an unnecessary hazard.”

(b) “The members of the Canadian Section expressed their willingness to consider the possible developments referred to by the U.S. members with a view to determining the circumstances which would require unity of command and its appropriate scope, but were of opinion that although Japan may quite possibly attempt to harass the West Coast of North America, major land operations or invasion would not be practicable operations of war and therefore felt that the continued co-ordination of the military effort by mutual co-operation is adequate to meet the situation as now appreciated.”

8. After we had adjourned, Gen. Embick sat down beside me and said with evident sincerity that he trusted that the views put forward by the American Service members had not in any way embarrassed the Canadian Section. To this I replied most definitely that they had not — that the discussion had been carried out most amicably and rather than any member experiencing embarrassment, we should all retain the pleasantest of recollection of the way in which this subject had been dealt with.

9. At this stage I had meant to suggest to Gen. Embick three possible ways of getting his proposal to the Chiefs of Staff, each of which would be more appropriate than those he had adopted:

(a) To send us a copy of their appreciation of the situation.

(b) To ask us to let them have our Chiefs of Staff appreciation which would give them an opportunity of representing a contrary view.

(c) For the Chief of Staff, U.S. army, to invite C.A.S. and C.G.S. to come down to Washington and talk the matter over.

10. Gen. Embick, however, having given me the impression that the matter should be allowed to remain in abeyance, I kept these suggestions to myself.

11. On our return to Ottawa, I talked the matter over with Col. Biggar and Mr. Keenleyside, the former of whom was of opinion that the secret history of this present approach was somewhat as follows:

12. Gen. Embick, who was brought out of retirement to serve on boards of the nature of the P.J.B.D. had long felt the U.S. policy vis-à-vis Japan to be wrong, that the course of operations in the Southwest Pacific was in accordance with his worst fears; that in addition he had long been a fervent disciple of the principle of unity of command; that he was sincerely apprehensive as to the possibility of attack on our West Coast and that he had converted Mayor La Guardia to this view. With the zeal of a convert La Guardia had obtained the ear of the President who had authorized the Mayor to write to Biggar in the sense that he did. It did not necessarily follow, however, that Gen. Embick's views were held by Gen. Marshall, and that the U.S. desire to have a note inserted in the Record stating their side of the question was really for the purpose of justifying the action taken by Mayor La Guardia and Gen. Embick.

13. I think there is a strong possibility that Biggar has correctly appreciated the situation and I agree with Keenleyside who said he would not be surprised if this would not be the last we should hear of the matter for some little time.

14. There were no other items of outstanding importance discussed at the Board meeting. A draft copy of the Record should be available within a very few days.

UNITED STATES AEROPLANE DETECTORS FOR PACIFIC COAST

1. At 1 a.m. on December 9th the United States Minister reported that he had received a "Triple Priority" message from the United States War Department in which he was instructed to ask for permission to install aeroplane detector equipment on the British Columbia Coast. Mr. Moffat stated that he was informed that the War Department had not decided on the exact locations to be selected, but it has subsequently been ascertained that two sites will probably be chosen, one at the northern tip of Vancouver Island (Cape Scott) and one near Arrowsmith on the Nanaimo-Alberni road.

2. The United States request was considered by the Canadian Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence at 11 a.m. on December 9th. The Canadian Section recommend as follows:

That the request of the United States War Department to be allowed to install aeroplane detectors on the British Columbia Coast be approved, subject to the following conditions:

A — That the United States detachments (approximately 50 of all ranks for each detector) are to be under the command of the Air Officer Commanding, Western Air Command.

B — That Canadian technical personnel may be attached for the purpose of instruction to each United States detachment in numbers and at times to be decided by the Air Officer Commanding, Western Air Command.

C — That the Royal Canadian Air Force will take over the handling of the detectors as soon as the Air Officer Commanding, Western Air Command, is prepared to assume the responsibility.

D — That the Royal Canadian Army Service Corps will provide subsistence for the United States personnel on the usual accounting basis, and

E — That Canada shall provide the accommodation required in accordance with arrangements made between the Air Officer Commanding, Western Air Command and the General Commanding, Second Air Force, United States Army; such accommodation to be provided from Canadian or United States sources, in whichever way will produce the quickest results, but with ownership remaining in Canada.

3. Provision of facilities of this character is on the programme of the R.C.A.F. Acquiescence in the United States request will mean hastening the execution of this element in the said programme. The cost is estimated at approximately $125,000.00 for each detector station.

UNITED STATES AEROPLANE DETECTORS ON THE PACIFIC COAST

Mr. Moffat called on me this morning to say that Washington, through Mr. Hickerson, had been disappointed by our reply to their request for approval "in principle" of the proposal that the United States should be allowed to install aeroplane detector equipment on the British Columbia coast. Mr. Hickerson had said that the United States had asked informally for approval in principle on this matter which might require immediate action and had been met by an official reply "Government to Government" establishing conditions and limitations which would result in long negotiations and delay.

I told Mr. Moffat that Mr. Hickerson had obviously misinterpreted what had been done. The situation as I saw it was as follows:

A — We had suddenly been asked by the United States Minister acting on instructions from his Government, as a matter of great urgency, to accept "in principle" an arrangement which, if accepted without qualification, would be contrary to the basic principle that has guided the Americans and ourselves in our cooperative activities during the last year and a half.

B — In less than twenty-four hours we had agreed to the American proposal with this modification that it had been brought into line with the basic principle mentioned above.

C — In addition we had obtained the approval of the Canadian Government for a method of procedure which would enable the Americans in fact to act with the maximum speed and convenience. In doing this we had departed from the usual methods of governmental action by giving the Air Officer Commanding, Western Air Command, power to enter into agreements which would ordinarily involve action by Treasury Board and (probably) Munitions and Supply or Transport.

²⁰ H.L. Keenleyside.

I suggested to Mr. Moffat that he should tell Mr. Hickerson that, if the American authorities were worried by the arrangement suggested by Canada, they should instruct the General Commanding the Second Air Corps to get in touch with the Officer Commanding, Western Air Command, with a view to finding out whether, in practice, there would be any delay or other difficulty caused by the conditions outlined in the Canadian reply to the American request. If the two Officers found that matters could not be arranged between them to their complete satisfaction, then they could report back and we would see what other steps might be taken. In my opinion the Americans can get anything they need out of the present arrangement and get it more speedily than in any other way. In any event the decision as to whether or not the programme would be workable should be left to the Officers who would have to work it out and not be decided by Washington.

With regard to the point that the Americans had merely asked “informally” for an immediate approval “in principle”, and did not expect an official reply with conditions attached, I pointed out that an approach by the American Minister, acting on the instructions of his Government, for approval of a principle that was contrary to the established basis of cooperation between the armed forces of the two countries, could hardly be called or treated as an informal matter.

Mr. Moffat left with the intention of telephoning Mr. Hickerson and advising him to have the General Commanding the Second Air Corps get in touch with Air Commodore Godfrey at once and find out whether or not the Canadian suggestions would allow these two men to achieve the mutually desired results.

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for Robertson from Wrong, Begins: Most Secret. At first meeting of Pacific Council this morning the President gave a review of the strategic position and possibilities in the Pacific area. The proceedings were informal and no records of the meeting were kept. I shall forward a report by tomorrow's bag.

2. He said, with reference to Canada, that he believed that Canada could do more than she was doing on the Pacific Coast, particularly with respect to assistance in the defence of Alaska and the Aleutian Islands. He made it clear that he would not suggest any reduction in the despatch of Canadian forces to the United Kingdom, where he hoped they would be employed on a second European front before the end of 1942. He appeared to consider that in addition to executing our military plans in this respect, we might station troops in Alaskan territory for use both against a Japanese attack and towards establishing military contact with Russia in Siberia in the event of Russian involvement in war with Japan.

3. Apart from this, the only other direct reference to Canada was an expression from Dr. Soong of hope that the delivery of munitions to China from Canada would be carried out in accordance with the tentative arrangements made by him in Ottawa.

4. The next meeting of the Council will be on Tuesday, April 7th, at 11 a.m. Instructions on one or two points may be needed, and I shall communicate with you again on this. Ends.

[Ottawa,] April 6, 1942

You will have received, in today's bag, Wrong's report^t on the first meeting of the Pacific Council. His enclosed secret and personal note^t about arrangements for Canadian representation at subsequent meetings of the Council is a useful pendant to it. This is, of course, an important aspect of the general question of Canadian representation in Washington, which you are going to discuss with Mr. McCarthy next week.

As the Defence Ministers have all been out of town, it has not been found possible to prepare, for Wrong's guidance at tomorrow's meeting of the Pacific Council, any comments on the specific suggestions the President made as to what more Canada might do in strengthening the defences of the Northeast Pacific. Wrong's comments on the background of these suggestions on pages 3 and 4 of the enclosed letter^t are very interesting. As he points out, the suggestion that Canadian forces should assist in the defence of Alaska is a new one which has never been mentioned in the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. Local arrangements have already been made between our Air Officer Commanding on the Pacific Coast and his American opposite number to have a Canadian fighter squadron based near Ketchikan at the southern end of the Alaskan Panhandle. The squadron will consist, in the first instance, of Kittyhawks, these to be replaced as 'planes become available by a squadron of dive bombers. It will be stationed at Ketchikan, chiefly because this is one of the few available bases for the land 'planes intended for the defence of the Prince Rupert area and the Queen Charlotte Islands. We might usefully link up these local operational arrangements, under which Canadian forces are being stationed in United States territory, with the President's general suggestion that Canada might take a direct share in the defence of Alaska. Psychologically and politically there is, I think, a great deal to be said for having some Canadian troops somewhere assuming a direct and public responsibility for the defence of some portion of United States territory. It is probably true, as General Pope reports, that the United States War Department would not be very happy about the despatch of Canadian troops to Alaska, but with United States troops now stationed at the Canadian Soo, northern British Columbia and the Yukon, it would help to balance things a little if we were taking a direct and visible share in the defence of some portion of United States territory. The southern tip of the Panhandle is probably the point at which we could most effectively do so.

TWENTY-SEVENTH MEETING OF THE BOARD,
 MONTREAL, APRIL 7 AND 8, 1942

5. The Secretary of the Canadian Section, at the direction of the Canadian government, brought to the attention of the Board certain observations reported by the representative of Canada at the first meeting of the Pacific Council in Washington to have been made at that meeting by the President of the United States concerning Canadian participation in the general defence of Alaska.

The American Service Members brought to the attention of the Board the report of a conference between the Commanding General, Western Defence Command (United States); the Commander Northwestern Sea Frontier (United States); the General Officer, Commanding in Chief, Pacific (Canada); the Air Officer Commanding Western Air Command (Royal Canadian Air Force); and the Commanding Officer Pacific Coast (Royal Canadian Navy), which concerned itself with the defence of the Queen Charlotte Islands, the northern area of the Canadian Pacific Sector and the relationship of this problem to the defence of Alaska and made specific recommendations understood by the Board to be:

(a) That this correspondence be submitted to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence for consideration.

(b) That the Royal Canadian Air Force station one squadron of fighter aircraft at Annette Island, Alaska, pending the availability of a similar squadron by the United States.

(c) That the airfield at Smithers, British Columbia, be garrisoned by the Royal Canadian Air Force with one squadron of fighters and one squadron of medium bombers.

The Canadian Service Members reported the following recent decisions to increase the strength of the Canadian forces in the area:

(a) ARMY

By midsummer Army strengths will have been increased to the equivalent of two infantry divisions with supporting Coast and Anti-aircraft artillery.

(b) AIR FORCE

The number of Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons, Western Air Command, will be increased from 10 to 24.

The American Naval Members brought to the attention of the Board the recent agreement between the Governments of Australia, New Zealand, the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, and the United States establishing the Pacific Theatre as an area of United States strategic responsibility; and also the constitution of the Pacific Ocean Area and the assignment of the present Commander-in-Chief, Pacific Fleet, as the Commander-in-Chief, Pacific Ocean Area.

It was agreed that the Service Members concerned should ascertain the views of their respective departments and advise the Board as to any further action required for the defence of Alaska.

RE: ALASKA

The position of Alaska was another subject of discussion. At the end of the room a map, showing the U.S. and Canadian Pacific coasts, Alaska, the Aleutian Islands, etc., was prominently portrayed [sic]. The President drew attention to the fact that Alaska itself was very open, more so than any other area affected by the war. There was practically no defence. The Japanese could get to the coast quickly via the Aleutian Islands, and he pointed to the need of keeping this possibility much to the fore. I stated that what the President had just said was the best possible illustration that could be given of what I had earlier been saying of the need to view the war as a world war, and what, as a consequence, had to be watched in every quarter of the globe, and no longer as a war mainly concerned with Europe and the need arising out of strategic considerations, allocation of munitions, disposition of armed forces, etc., in the light of all possible developments.

I said the reason there had been inadequate defences on our Pacific coasts was that at the beginning of the war we had stripped both the Pacific and the Atlantic of whatever we had in the way of naval, air or armed forces that could be sent overseas, permitting only a minimum of defence, and regarding the theatre of war as entirely on the other side beyond the Atlantic; that we had continued viewing matters in that light practically up to the moment that Japan came in. I then added that, since Japan had come in, we had decided to raise two new divisions which would be mobile in character, and one at least which would be available for defence along the Pacific Coast. That we had recently established an air squadron near Alaska. That we had been strengthening the defences and bases at Prince Rupert and elsewhere. That I understood the United States were sending some of their forces to Prince Rupert. If that were so I thought our Government might be prepared later on to have some of the Canadian forces moved into Alaska.

In speaking of the matter, I pointed out that, as was known, we had been proceeding in accordance with recommendations of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, and that there had been little or nothing in the way of recommendations by the Board which the Government could have acted upon at an earlier date.

The President's remarks were not expressed in a way which indicated any reflection upon Canada, but rather as pointing out the great need of this particular area receiving immediate consideration.

TWENTY-NINTH MEETING OF THE BOARD, NEW YORK, APRIL 27, 1942

9. The Canadian Section referred to the discussion which took place at the last meeting of the Board in regard to possible further participation by Canada in the defence of Alaska. General Embick stated that this question had been considered in the United States War Department and that it was felt that the Royal Canadian Air Force should make plans to send such air reinforcements to Alaska as possible in the event of an enemy attack on any point in Alaska. Captain Thomas said that the United States Navy had sent an officer to Alaska to review local defence arrangements and that he would prefer not to comment on this until the report of that officer had been received. Air Commodore Heakes said that the Annette Island Pursuit Squadron of the Royal Canadian Air Force was being formed. Captain Sherman suggested that the Royal Canadian Air Force might usefully send planes on a visit to Sitka and Air Commodore Heakes said that orders in this sense had gone out last week. After a considerable discussion of this whole question, it was the sense of the Board that the appropriate Service members should ascertain whether the local commanders have made plans to redistribute air strength on the west coast so as to permit the reinforcement of Alaska promptly and to the maximum extent possible in the circumstances; and that, if such plans have not been made, see that arrangements are made at once, ear-marking, if practicable, specific units in connection with plans for the redistribution of air strength.

CANADA-U.S. PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE — REPORT OF MEETING

5. THE SECRETARY reported that the Journal of the Board's Discussions and Decisions, covering their twenty-ninth meeting, held in New York on April the 27th, had, on May the 9th, been submitted to the Prime Minister. In accordance with the usual practice, copies had simultaneously been sent to the Ministers of National Defence and the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

The Journal contained no specific recommendations upon which action by the government was required.

6. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR said that the Air Staff had examined the proceedings of the Board's meeting of April the 27th. Their principal comment had reference to paragraph 9 in which an American Army representative had appeared to place upon Canada the onus of providing air reinforcement in the event of enemy attack upon Alaska.

The Air Staff felt that at present the defences of Alaska were dangerously low, and that further Canadian air strength available for West Coast defence would be adequate only if U.S. forces in Alaska were strong. No Canadian reserve was available to assume major commitments in Alaska. Canada should, therefore, accept no such obligations, which would involve major redistribution of Canadian air strength on the West Coast. The defence of Alaska must remain a primary concern of the United States, Canadian air reinforcements being limited to local support in the Panhandle.

Incidentally, the R.C.A.F. now had a squadron of fighters at Annette Island for the protection of Prince Rupert.

7. THE PRIME MINISTER felt that the President's observations, at a recent meeting of the Pacific Council in Washington, regarding the defence of Alaska, were not intended to be critical of Canada, in this respect, but rather to draw attention to the importance of the problem. It should certainly be made clear that Canada could not undertake the responsibility for defending U.S. territory, though our Forces would do what was possible by way of co-operation.

8. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE remarked upon reference in the Board's Journal to a suggested additional airfield, or fields, in Canadian territory, between Goose Inlet and Greenland. It had apparently been intimated that Canada would be prepared to construct a field at Fort Chimo, and possibly other fields, as links in an air route to Iceland. The Army were concerned as to the location of such fields from the point of view of ground defence.

9. MR. HEENEY pointed out that the Canadian government were not committed to the construction of an airfield at Chimo. Presumably the statement in the Board's Journal had reference to the general policy agreed upon by the War Committee to cover Canadian expenditures upon joint Canada-U.S. defence projects.

10. The War Committee noted the submission of the Board's Journal covering the meeting of April 27th, 1942, the Secretary being directed to draw the Board's attention to the comments of the Air Staff regarding air defence of Alaska and also to the fact that the Canadian government had acknowledged no commitment in respect of an airfield at Fort Chimo.

CANADIAN ARMY — PARTICIPATION IN ALASKAN OPERATIONS

22. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE reported that an enquiry had been received from the U.S. Army regarding employment of Canadian Army personnel for operations in the Aleutian area. In this connection certain detailed suggestions had been made to the Canadian G.O.C. Pacific Coast by the U.S. Commanding Officer in Alaska.

23. THE CHIEF OF THE GENERAL STAFF expressed the opinion that participation by Canadian Army formations would be of great value in strengthening morale and providing battle experience. Personnel obtained under the National Resources Mobilization Act could be employed in these operations. The U.S. proposals were now being examined.

(National Defence telegram, P.C.O. 2020, G.O.C. Pacific Coast to C.G.S., May 26, 1943)†.

24. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed to consider the proposals further at a special meeting to be held the following day, by which time the Army Staff would have completed their preliminary examination of the matter.

In considering the advisability of Canadian participation in Aleutian operations, you may wish to have in mind, in addition to the points mentioned in yesterday's discussion, the effect of such action —

1. in the United States
2. in Australia.

The presence of a Canadian force, even if only of token proportions, in Attu and in subsequent Aleutian operations would I think make a thoroughly useful impression on United States public opinion and confirm the good impression noted after the despatch of Canadian fighter squadrons to the Alaskan Panhandle last year. The active participation of our troops in plans for recovering Alaska would emphasize our partnership in the defence of Northwest America and to a certain extent balance the impression created here and in the United States by the predominant part played by the Americans in defence activities in Northwest Canada.

I think too that the presence of Canadian troops in the Aleutians would have a very good effect on Canadian-Australian relations, and would, to some extent, deflect the reviving of the Australian demand for more direct and visible assistance in her own theatre of war. The fact that Canadians would be participating in operations in the Pacific against Japan would, I feel, have a good moral and psychological influence in Australia and remind them that the United States is not the only American country helping in the Pacific war.

CANADIAN ARMY — PARTICIPATION IN ALASKAN OPERATIONS

1. THE PRIME MINISTER referred to the discussion at the previous meeting. The War Committee would hear the report of the Chief of the General Staff following his preliminary examination of the proposals made. Before doing so, it would be well to have clearly in mind the chief considerations involved:

On the one hand, from the military point of view, participation by Canadian troops in the manner suggested, would no doubt, raise morale and afford valuable battle experience. From the civil, or political point of view, the despatch of a Canadian force for active operations against the Japanese would be valuable in demonstrating to the United States, Australia and New Zealand as well, Canadian interest in the Pacific theatre. It would emphasize our partnership with the United States in the defence of Northwest America and, perhaps, to some extent balance the predominant part played by the Americans in our own Northwest.

On the other hand, the Canadian contribution would inevitably be small in comparison with that of the United States and it should not be expected that any credit would accrue to Canada from the success of these operations, while failure would most certainly involve the Canadian government in a disproportionate degree.

Another consideration was the relation of Canadian participation to the general strategic plans of the Combined Chiefs of Staff. It was important that the decision taken should be in accord with these overall plans. In any event no final decision should be taken by the Canadian Government until an official approach had been made by U.S. authorities.

It was important that proposals of this nature involving participation of Canadian forces in new operations should be made known, at once, to the responsible Ministers, before discussions between officials advanced beyond the purely exploratory stage.

2. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE submitted a report by the Chief of the General Staff upon the proposals laid before the War Committee at the previous meeting.

A first proposal involved early provision of one infantry battalion and one light anti-aircraft battery for reinforcement in the Aleutian area, in case of counter-offensive; a second involved a brigade group for offensive operations later in the season. Special supplies, rations, transport, accommodation and other maintenance would be supplied by the United States.

It was considered by Lieutenant-General Stuart that participation in the proposed operations would afford much needed battle experience, increase Army prestige and morale, help to break down the barrier between Home Defence and General Service personnel, and serve to improve relations with the United States and exemplify Canada's active interest in the Pacific in accord with our joint responsibility for North American defence.

It was recommended, therefore, that the General Officer Commanding in Chief, Pacific Command, be authorized to make the necessary preparation for participation in accordance with the two proposals submitted.

(Memorandum, Chief of the General Staff, to the Minister of National Defence,[†] also attached telegram for G.O.C.-in-C. Pacific Coast, May 26, 1943[†]).

3. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR was sceptical of the value of Canadian participation in the first proposal. At best this might involve mere garrison duty; at worst, the position of the troops concerned might be similar to that of the Canadian force sent to Hong Kong.

On the other hand, the second proposal involving participation by a more substantial Canadian force in offensive operations would have valuable results.

4. THE CHIEF OF THE GENERAL STAFF elaborated the analysis and conclusions contained in his report.

Withdrawal of the troops required from the Pacific Command for participation in the proposed operations would not impair the security of Canadian West Coast defences or affect personnel or equipment available for reinforcements for the Army overseas. The disposition and resources of U.S. forces available in the Aleutian area were known and were regarded as satisfactory.

The discussions which had taken place with U.S. forces, leading to the present proposals from the U.S. Commander in the Northwest Pacific, had taken place on Lieutenant-General Stuart's own responsibility, had been purely exploratory, and no commitments whatever had been made.

5. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion and consideration of the report of the Chief of the General Staff, agreed:

(a) that the government would be prepared to receive and consider a proposal from the U.S. government for Canadian participation in operations against the Japanese in the Aleutian area;

(b) that the Chief of the General Staff be authorized to have the appropriate U.S. authorities informed through the appropriate channels to the above effect; and,

(c) that, while decision regarding the form and extent of such participation as might be agreed upon could not be made unless and until such a proposal from official sources were forthcoming, it appeared that the provision of a Canadian force for participation with the U.S. forces in offensive operations would be preferable to the first proposal laid before the War Committee.

A meeting of the War Committee of the Cabinet was held in Room 401, House of Commons, on Monday, May 31, 1943, at 6.00 p.m.

Present

The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), in the Chair.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston),

The Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power),

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Michaud),

The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe),

The Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald),

The Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent).

The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

(Mr. Robertson), (Acting Secretary),

Mr. J.R. Baldwin, Privy Council Office.

CANADIAN ARMY — PARTICIPATION IN ALASKAN OPERATIONS

1. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE referred to the decision of War Committee on this subject at the previous meeting. A letter had now been received from the U.S. Secretary of War, stating that the participation of the Canadian Army in operations in the Aleutians would be gratifying to the U.S. War Department, and suggesting that arrangements with regard to form, time and place of participation be made between the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff and the corresponding Canadian military officials.

(Letter, U.S. Secretary of War, to Minister of National Defence, May 29, 1943).[†]

2. MR. RALSTON stated that the Chief of the General Staff recommended that the Canadian Army participation be limited to one brigade group, which should be ready to move by midsummer, that the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief, Pacific Command, be authorized to undertake the organization and training of the troops involved, that authority to despatch the force be requested only after details regarding its employment had been obtained from the United States, and that the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief, Pacific Command, be instructed to obtain information regarding the provision of supplies and transport for which the U.S. War Department was to assume responsibility.

(Memorandum, Chief of the General Staff, to the Minister of National Defence, May 31st, 1943).[†]

The Prime Minister had been consulted with regard to the communication received from the U.S. Secretary for War, and had stated that he would concur in a proposal for the despatch of a Canadian brigade group to the Alaskan theatre.

3. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that participation by Canadian forces in the Alaskan operations was desirable, and approved the recommendations of the Chief of the General Staff covering this participation.

The meeting adjourned at 6.30 p.m.

24. THE SECRETARY reported that it had been learned informally that a request would shortly be made by the U.S. government for permission to have U.S. Army engineers begin a survey, with a view to early construction of an overland highway to Alaska via Peace River to Whitehorse. An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Secretary's note, February 10, 1942 — C.W.C. document 84).[†]

25. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS said that, while the formal request had not yet been made, the U.S. Minister had informed him that the President and Secretaries of War and Navy had recently reviewed the Alaskan defence position and had come to the conclusion that a highway was needed for effective continental defence. The easterly route linking the airfields already in operation was favoured for military and engineering reasons.

26. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES observed that the Chiefs of Staff had recently concluded that the Alaska Highway should not be proceeded with.

27. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY favoured agreeing to the U.S. request and expressed the view that the route via the airports was a good one. To permit the survey would not commit Canada to actual construction.

28. The War Committee, after further discussion, agreed that there would be no objection to U.S. Army engineers coming to Canada to make a survey.

Mémorandum du ministre des États-Unis
Memorandum by Minister of United States

SECRET

Ottawa, February 13, 1942

MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATIONS WITH MR. NORMAN ROBERTSON, UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS, AND MR.
JOHN D. HICKERSON, OF THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON

I called on Mr. Robertson this morning and told him as follows:

The War and Navy Departments, given the military situation in the Pacific, have reconsidered the whole question of communication with Alaska and have reached the conclusion that it is imperative for a land route to be provided at as early a date as practicable to Alaska from continental United States. The preferred route would follow in general the Canadian airports, Fort St. John, Fort Nelson, Watson Lake, Whitehorse. This route will not only connect the airports but will permit an uninterrupted all-year movement of supplies and reinforcements from the United States. Moreover, it is not beyond the bounds of possibility that such a route might eventually serve for the passage of troops, equipment and supplies, via Alaska, for an offensive against Japan.

The recommendations of the War and Navy Departments were submitted for review by Secretaries Stimson, Knox and Ickes. All three approved them. They were then submitted to the President who not only gave his approval on February 11th, but directed that all necessary steps to hurry the construction be undertaken as soon as possible.

In the circumstances, the United States War Department wants to send two detachments of United States Army engineers to Canada to make surveys in connection with the proposed road and to construct a pioneer road if the surveys are satisfactory. Of course all expenses connected with this work will be defrayed by the American Government. The officer in command of the engineer troops conducting this work will be Colonel William M. Hoge, U.S.A., who, if the idea commends itself to the Canadian Government, will visit Ottawa to confer with engineers of the Canadian Government who know this country and the problems connected therewith.

The idea would be to send two regiments of United States engineers to Whitehorse and two to Fort St. John. It is accordingly hoped that the Canadian Government will be prepared to grant permission for their despatch. Detailed arrangements for their movement can be worked out, in accordance with Recommendation 22 of the Permanent Joint Defense Board²¹, between the military commanders direct.

Should it be desired that Canadian Army engineers participate in the survey, the United States engineers would be glad to have them if the matter is brought up at the forthcoming meeting of the Permanent Joint Defense Board on February 25th.

²¹ Voir le document 955.

²¹ See Document 955.

The President hopes that the necessary arrangements to construct the road can be made through the Permanent Joint Board on Defense.

Mr. Robertson said that he could reply to some of the points right away; to others he could not answer until he had some further information.

1. The Canadian Government was glad to give its permission for the survey in question to be undertaken.

2. Colonel Hoge would be welcomed if he came to Ottawa. The appropriate officials would be ready to discuss matters with him at any time in the near future.

3. Mr. Robertson suggested that the question of whether a Canadian Army engineer should participate in the survey be left in abeyance pending Colonel Hoge's talks in Ottawa. One difficulty was that much of the work done by United States Army engineers is done in Canada by civilian engineers in the Department of Mines and Resources.

4. The Canadians approved the idea of proceeding via the Permanent Joint Defense Board. It took the matter entirely out of the political sphere, emphasized its exclusively military character, and would probably enable matters to be hurried through with the maximum speed. He thought, however, that there were a number of problems that would later have to be tied up in an exchange of notes; this exchange, however, could be so phrased that it would implement the Board's recommendation.

5. The Canadian members of the Board would be brought up to date on the problem for the meeting on February 25th.

Mr. Robertson, however, said that he was confused by the word "pioneer" road. Did I know what it meant? For instance, in the British Army a pioneer corps is a road-building corps. Did the word pioneer road mean in effect the road itself? In approving the construction of the pioneer road, was the Canadian Government automatically committing itself to approving the building of the entire road? If so, this would have to be cleared through Council, as all he had done was to clear the question of the survey. The next question in his mind was as to the size of the engineering units we were planning to send. Would these units themselves make the road? How were they going to be housed? He thought that there would be slight accommodation in Whitehorse and almost none at Fort St. John. Would the commanding officers be able to deal with this directly? Was it planned to send the engineer regiments in immediately, or wait until the thaw? Were there collateral roads joining the proposed Fort St. John-Whitehorse section? Was there, for instance, a passable road from Edmonton to Fort St. John?

I told him that my answers to most of his questions if made at once would be largely guess-work. I would, therefore, telephone Mr. Hickerson, obtain the information he desired and call him back later in the day.

I telephoned Mr. Hickerson who said that he was lunching with General Embick and would give me the necessary information by telephone this afternoon.

Later.

Mr. Hickerson called me back this afternoon and requested me to inform Mr. Robertson as follows: We greatly appreciate the cooperation of the Canadian authorities in meeting our request. This request was limited to the survey and was not a request at this point for a commitment to the entire road. That commitment will be sought later on the basis of the survey, and still more on the basis of the studies and recommendations of the Permanent Joint Defense Board.

As a matter of fact, a "pioneer road" might be described as a rough working road. It is considered part of the survey and would be in part the site of an eventual road. Obviously, the engineers could not go to either Whitehorse or Fort St. John before April or even early May. It was merely requested that permission be granted for them to be sent to Canada to carry out the survey just as soon as feasible.

There have been two small changes since this morning. Colonel Hoge will not come to Ottawa. The trip to Ottawa will be made by his boss, Brigadier-General C.W. Sturdevant, who is in charge of both the Washington end and the field end of the survey project. He will arrive in Ottawa Monday next, February 16, by the "Washingtonian", and will hope to be able to call on various officials.

The other change is that Colonel Hoge and two officers will, if agreeable to the Canadians, proceed to Edmonton next Wednesday, February 18, for a preliminary look-see. They want to make some inquiries about weather conditions, availability of supplies, housing, etc.

I telephoned Mr. Robertson who did not demur at either of these two changes and who seemed pleased that we had reached a meeting of minds on what Canada had committed herself to and what she had not committed herself to in agreeing to our original request.

One other point came up in my conversation with Mr. Hickerson. I asked him what attitude any of us should take in the event of publicity breaking from the visit of Colonel Hoge to Edmonton. I did not think that General Sturdevant's visit would give rise to any talk. Mr. Hickerson replied that he would like to think that over and we could discuss it in some later telephone conversation.

A — Agree to join in a recommendation that the road be built if the United States members believe that the construction is necessary for, or would contribute materially towards, the defence of Alaska;

B — Agree that the road may be constructed by, and at the expense of the United States Government; and that for the duration of the present war against Japan it shall be maintained as a military highway by the United States Government; on the understanding that the road should, as constructed, but subject to military necessities, be made available for Canadian use in the same way as other highways in Canada and should, at the end of the said war acquire at once the same status in all respects as such other highways.

C — Point out that Canada has already contributed to the establishment of this defence channel to Alaska by the construction of the existing ground communications between the United States Boundary and the present rail-end road-head; by the expenditure that has been made on the construction of the airports that lie along the route of the highway; and by the installation of air communication facilities such as range-finders, etc; and agree to recommend that this be supplemented by the Canadian Government acquiring and making available to the United States the lands and easements necessary for the construction of the new highway and its maintenance during the war.

D — Offer the cooperation of such Dominion Government engineers with northern experience as may be stationed in the area to assist the United States representatives by advice or in other ways.

E — Suggest that in the event of civilian construction companies and labour being employed on the building of the road, the United States authorities should agree to give consideration to the employment of suitable Canadian organizations of which there are many with northern experience; and that similar consideration will be given to reliance upon Canadian supplies and purveyors.

F — Ask that the United States supply to Canada copies of all field notes and survey material obtained in the course of the location and construction of the road.

G — Agree to recommend

(1) that Canada make available to the United States authorities all survey and other records which may be of value to those in charge of the construction of the road.

(2) that all machinery and supplies which it is decided to bring into Canada for the purpose of carrying out the project should, subject to appropriate protective customs regulations, be admitted to Canada free of duty or sales taxes.

New York, February 26, 1942

TWENTY-SIXTH MEETING OF THE BOARD,
NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 25 AND 26, 1942

8. The Board considered the increasing gravity of the military situation in the Pacific and possible developments therein affecting Alaska. The Board was informed that the United States Government believes that the construction of a land route to Alaska as an alternative to the sea route is imperative for the defence of North America and that the United States Government, for military reasons, favours the route that follows the general line of the Canadian airports, Fort St. John-Fort Nelson-Watson Lake-Whitehorse-Boundary-Big Delta, the respective termini connecting with existing roads in Canada and Alaska. The Board shares this belief for the following reasons:

(1) That the effective defence of Alaska is of paramount importance to the defence of the continent against attack from the the West, since Alaska is the area most exposed to an attempt by the enemy to establish a foothold in North America;

(2) That sea communications with Alaska in the future may be subject to serious interruption by enemy sea and air action;

(3) That construction of the highway will provide a secure inland route not exposed to attack from the sea, will alleviate the shipping situation, and will provide an alternate route for use in case sea communications are interrupted;

(4) That the air route to Alaska and the defence facilities in Alaska cannot be fully utilized without adequate means of supply for the air route. This can best be provided by a highway along this route.

(5) That the additional line of communications via the inland route will be of great value in the event of an offensive against Japan projected from Alaska;

(6) That there is already on this continent a sufficient supply of land transport vehicles to enable the road to be used to its full capacity for the rapid reinforcement and supply of the forces in Alaska, without adding to the burden on industry, and that the machinery for the construction of the road is already in existence;

(7) Air transport service does not offer a practicable substitute for the proposed road because of the shortage of aircraft and of aircraft constructional facilities.

(8) That the use of Skagway as a sea terminal with a road only from Whitehorse to Fairbanks would not be a satisfactory solution of the problem. (It is understood that the Whitehorse-Fairbanks section of the highway would probably be given first construction priority.)

The proposed highway would have its southern terminus on the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbian Railway, which has available carrying capacity substantially in excess of the possible carrying capacity of the road. Its northern terminus would be at a point about 60 miles south of Fairbanks on the Richardson Highway, which connects Fairbanks with Valdes. From Fairbanks there is also a railway connection with Seward. According to information furnished by General Sturdevant of the United States Army Engineers, the estimated approximate length of the road is 1,600 miles of which about 1,200 miles would be in Canada and 400 miles in Alaska; that the cost of a 24-foot gravel road capable of carrying heavy traffic during both summer and winter is likely to average in the neighbourhood of $50,000 to $60,000 a mile; and that the total cost might conceivably exceed one hundred million and probably would not be less than seventy-five million. The information of the Canadian members in respect to costs was to the same effect.

As its TWENTY-FOURTH RECOMMENDATION, the Board accordingly, as a matter pertaining to the joint defence of Canada and the United States, recommends the construction of a highway along the route that follows the general line of airports, Fort St. John-Fort Nelson-Watson Lake-Whitehorse-Boundary-Big Delta, the respective termini connecting with existing roads in Canada and Alaska.

The Board was informed by the United States members that the United States Government appreciating the burden of the war expenditure already incurred by Canada since her entry into the war in September 1939, and in particular on the construction of the air route to Alaska, and being convinced of the necessity of the road and the urgency of its construction, would be prepared to meet the whole of the cost of its construction and of its maintenance during the war, without asking Canada to do more than provide certain facilities as indicated below. If this offer on the part of the United States Government were accepted, that Government would:

(A) Carry out the necessary surveys for which preliminary arrangements have already been made and construct a Pioneer Road by the use of United States Engineer troops for surveys and initial construction (It would expect to complete this work during the current year and is advised that the Pioneer Road should be sufficiently advanced to be capable next winter of carrying a small amount of emergency traffic);

(B) Arrange for the highway's completion under contracts made by the United States Public Roads Administration and awarded with a view to insuring the execution of all contracts in the shortest possible time without regard to whether the contractors were Canadian or American (It expects that the road should be able to carry traffic to its full capacity not later than the end of 1943);

(C) Maintain the highway until the termination of the present war unless the government of Canada prefers to assume responsibility at an earlier date for the maintenance of so much of it as lies in Canada;

(D) Agree that at the conclusion of the war that that [sic] part of the highway in Canada shall become in all respects an integral part of the Canadian highway system subject to the understanding that there shall at no time be imposed any discriminatory conditions in relation to the use of the road by Canadian or United States civilian traffic.

In the event of this proposal being accepted, the United States Government would ask the Canadian Government to agree:

(A) To acquire rights-of-way for the road in Canada, the title to remain in the Crown; in the right of Canada or of the Province of British Columbia as appears most convenient;

(B) To waive import duties, transit or similar charges on shipments originating in the United States and transported over the highway to Alaska, or originating in Alaska and transported over the highway to the United States;

(C) To waive import duties, sales taxes, license fees or other similar charges on all equipment and supplies to be used in the construction or maintenance of the road and on personal effects of the construction personnel;

(D) To take the necessary steps to facilitate the admission into Canada of such United States citizens as may be employed in the construction or maintenance of the highway, it being understood that the United States will assume the expense of repatriating any such persons if the contractors fail to do so.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

1. As you know, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence has submitted a Recommendation endorsing the proposed construction of a 24-ft. gravel-surfaced highway along the route of the airports from Fort St. John to the Richardson Highway in Alaska. It is estimated that this road will cost about $80,000,000.00, and that it will be completed about the 1st of January, 1944. The United States Government is prepared to pay the whole cost of construction and maintenance during the war and to release the road to Canada "without strings" at the conclusion of peace.

2. Without presuming to speak for anyone else on either Section of the Board, I should like to have you know that I agreed to this Recommendation (No. 24) on political rather than strategic grounds.²⁴ In my opinion the strategic

²⁴ Note marginale:

²⁴ Marginal note:

Col. Biggar subsequently agreed. H. L. K[EENLEYSIDE]

justifications that are being used to support the arguments for the road are of questionable or conditional validity. On the other hand the United States Government is now so insistent that the road is required that the Canadian Government cannot possibly allow itself to be put in the position of barring the United States from land access to Alaska. In my opinion it is extremely unlikely that Japan will be able, in 1944, to deny the United States access by sea to Alaska. But if this should happen and if Canada had prevented the construction of land communications the Canadian Government would be in a completely untenable position. Therefore, because of United States insistence, Canada should in my opinion agree to the construction of the road.²⁵

3. I do not like the idea of Canada allowing the United States to construct a highway on Canadian territory (thereby acquiring a moral if not a legal right to its continued use, at will, in peace or war). The alternative, however, is for Canada to expend some $80,000,000.00 on the construction, and about $1,000,000.00 per annum on the maintenance of a road that would be a monument to our friendship for the United States but would otherwise be pretty much of a "white elephant".

4. My reasons for discounting the strategic value of the road can perhaps best be clarified by a brief commentary on each of the arguments used by the Board to justify its construction.

A

"That the effective defence of Alaska is of paramount importance to the defence of the continent against attack from the West, since Alaska is the area most exposed to an attempt by the enemy to establish a foothold in North America."

This is true.

"That sea communications with Alaska in the future may be subject to serious interruption by enemy sea and air action."

*This is true at present, but if the United States programme of plane and ship construction is even approximately achieved it will not be true in 1944. If the road could be built in two weeks instead of two years the argument would be valid.*²⁶

C

"That construction of the highway will provide a secure inland route not exposed to attack from the sea, will alleviate the shipping situation, and will provide an alternate route for use in case sea communications are interrupted."

²⁵ Les notes suivantes étaient écrites sur ce mémorandum:

This is a pretty devastating analysis of the strategic arguments for the highway but I agree that on political grounds we cannot be put in the position of blocking its construction. N. A. R[OBERTSON]

I think we might send a copy to Wrong for his confidential information. R[OBERTSON]

²⁶ Note marginale (Cette note et les deux qui suivent semblent avoir été ajoutées en 1944):

Finished nominally November 1943. Actually Summer 1944. June 1944. H. L. K[EEBLEYSIDE]

²⁵ The following notes were written on the memorandum:

²⁶ Marginal note (This note and the two following notes were apparently added in 1944):

The same comments apply as in the case of "B" above. This argument should be considered, however, in the light of the following facts:

1. There is already a secure sea route along the Inside Passage to Skagway. From Skagway there is a railway to Whitehorse and a 400-mile road could be built from Whitehorse to Fairbanks thus giving safe access to Alaska at a very much lower cost than that required by the construction of the highway from Fort St. John.

2. The real object of the highway is to provide an alternative to the Skagway-Whitehorse-Fairbanks route, and to the open sea route from Cross Sound to Seward. The latter is about 350 miles in length and is the only section of the Seattle-Vancouver-Prince Rupert-Seward route which is exposed to sea attack.

3. In other words, and reduced to its lowest terms, the United States Government wants the Alaska highway constructed because they fear that in 1944 they may not be able to hold a sea route open along 350 miles of the Alaska Coast and because they do not want to be put to the trouble of shipping equipment and supplies along the Skagway-Whitehorse route on which there would be two extra handlings required. Because of this apprehension, or of the desire to avoid this inconvenience, the United States Government is prepared to spend $80,000,000.00 on a highway.

"That the air route to Alaska and the defence facilities in Alaska cannot be fully utilized without adequate means of supply for the air route. This can best be provided by a highway along this route."

It is, of course, true that the air route will be more efficient when serviced by a connecting road. This, in my opinion, is probably the strongest argument in favour of the construction of the highway, but the advantage to be gained by such a connection between the airports would certainly not be of the order to justify an expenditure of $80,000,000.00 by Canada.

"That the additional line of communications via the inland route will be of great value in the event of an offensive against Japan projected from Alaska."

This is a doubtful argument. The best advice that I can obtain suggests that if there are plenty of ships available — as there will be in 1944 if the present plans materialize — very little in the way of supplies or equipment will be sent over the highway to Alaska. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that not a ton of freight will be sent by land when shipping is available to handle it.²⁷

F

"That there is already on this continent a sufficient supply of land transport vehicles to enable that road to be used to its full capacity for the rapid reinforcement and supply of the forces in Alaska, without adding to the burden on industry, and that the machinery for the construction of the road is already in existence."

²⁷ Note marginale:

²⁷ Marginal note:

True so far. June 1940 [1944?]. K[EEENLEYSIDE]

There is a good deal of doubt about the validity of this statement. I imagine that before many months have passed we will be receiving requests for priorities for equipment to be used on this construction project.

G

“Air transport service does not offer a practicable substitute for the proposed road because of the shortage of aircraft and of aircraft constructional facilities.”

This is true now, but it will probably not be true in 1944. And the road will not be ready until 1944.

H

“That the use of Skagway as a sea terminal with a road only from Whitehorse to Fairbanks would not be a satisfactory solution of the problem. (It is understood that the Whitehorse-Fairbanks section of the highway would probably be given first construction priority.)”

This is referred to under “C” above.

5. If the Canadian Government agrees to allow the United States Government to construct the proposed highway, every possible precaution should be taken in the exchange of notes, by which the agreement is effected, to preserve eventual Canadian control over the road. The Americans will endeavour, as they endeavoured in the meeting of the Defence Board, to obtain the permanent right of access to Alaska by the highway. This should be resisted and the Americans will, I think, agree to our demands.

6. There will, of course, be complaints from British Columbia when the route of the highway becomes known. This may complicate the post-war position because the maintenance charges will be high and British Columbia will probably refuse to pay them. That, however, is a problem for the future.²⁸

7. In the meantime, and in my opinion, the Canadian Government should agree to allow the United States to construct the road but this agreement should be recognized, in our own minds at least, as being based on political and not on strategic grounds. The political argument, given the attitude of Washington, is inescapable; the strategic argument, in my opinion, is a most dubious egg.

 TWENTY-FOURTH RECOMMENDATION — ALASKA HIGHWAY

4. THE SECRETARY reported that the Board had submitted, in advance of the preparation of their Journal of Discussions and Decisions covering their last meeting, a recommendation for the construction, by the United States, on conditions therein described, of a highway to Alaska along the route, Fort St. John-Fort Nelson-Watson Lake-Whitehorse-Boundary-Big Delta.

The U.S. government were pressing through diplomatic, as well as Service channels, for early action upon this proposal, and copies of the Board's recommendation had been circulated to Ministers concerned.

(P.J.B.D. memorandum – “Military Highway to Alaska”, undated – C.W.C. document 101).²⁹

5. MR. HEENEY said that the Chiefs of Staff had considered the Board's recommendation on the subject. While they had previously reported that “the construction of this road by Canada was not warranted”, they fully concurred in the present proposal that it be built by the United States, on the terms proposed by the Board, and “agreed generally with the reasons outlined by the Board justifying this project”. The Chiefs of Staff report had been circulated.

(Chiefs of Staff memorandum to the Ministers, March 3, 1942 – C.W.C. document 104).[†]

6. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY felt that the government should approve the recommendation. There was no doubt that a freighting route was required; if the United States were willing to pay for it, they should be allowed to do so.

7. THE MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES pointed out that the report of the British Columbia, Yukon, Alaska Highway Commission had favoured other routes. Further consideration should be given to the highway's location before the final decision were made. It was doubtful that the route proposed was a practical one.

8. THE PRIME MINISTER observed that the government would be criticized for permitting the United States to make, in Canada, the large expenditure involved. On the other hand, in the circumstances, this should not prevent the project going forward.

9. The War Committee, after further discussion, approved, on behalf of the government of Canada, the Board's Twenty-fourth Recommendation, on the conditions proposed by the U.S. government and stated in the Board's report. These conditions included the provision that the U.S. government meet the whole cost of construction and maintenance during the war, without asking Canada to do more than provide certain facilities, as indicated below; further, the U.S. government would

“(a) carry out the necessary surveys for which preliminary arrangements have already been made and construct a Pioneer Road by the use of United States Engineer Troops for surveys and initial construction; (It would expect to complete this work during the current year and is advised that the Pioneer Road should be sufficiently advanced to be capable next winter of carrying a small amount of emergency traffic.)

²⁹ See Document 981.

(b) arrange for the highway's completion under contracts made by the United States Public Roads Administration and awarded with a view to ensuring the execution of all contracts in the shortest possible time without regard to whether the contractors were Canadian or American. (It expects that the road should be able to carry traffic to its full capacity not later than the end of 1943).

(c) maintain the highway until the termination of the present war unless the Government of Canada prefers to assume responsibility at an earlier date for the maintenance of so much of it as lies in Canada.

(d) agree that at the conclusion of the war that that part of the highway in Canada shall become in all respects an integral part of the Canadian highway system subject to the understanding that there shall at no time be imposed any discriminatory conditions in relation to the use of the road by Canadian or United States civilian traffic."

On their part, the Canadian government were to agree:

"(a) to acquire rights-of-way for the road in Canada, the title to remain in the Crown in the right of Canada or of the Province of British Columbia as appears most convenient;

(b) to waive import duties, transit or similar charges on shipments originating in the United States and transported over the highway to Alaska, or originating in Alaska and transported over the highway to the United States;

(c) to waive import duties, sales taxes, license fees or other similar charges on all equipment and supplies to be used in the construction or maintenance of the road and on personal effects of the construction personnel.

(d) to take the necessary steps to facilitate the admission into Canada of such United States citizens as may be employed in the construction or maintenance of the highway, it being understood that the United States will assume the expense of repatriating any such persons if the contractors fail to do so."

Ottawa, March , 1942

Sir,

1. As you are aware, on February 26, 1942, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence approved a recommendation as a result of which the two Sections proposed to their respective Governments:

“the construction of a highway along the route that follows the general line of airports, Fort St. John-Fort Nelson-Watson Lake-Whitehorse-Boundary-Big Delta, the respective termini connecting with existing roads in Canada and Alaska.”

This recommendation based as it was on military considerations and military considerations only, and having the endorsement of the Service Departments of the two countries, has been approved by both Governments.

2. My Government, being convinced of the urgent necessity for the construction of this highway and appreciating the burden of war expenditure already incurred by Canada, in particular on the construction of the air route to Alaska, is prepared to undertake the building and wartime maintenance of the highway. Subject to the provision by Canada of the facilities set forth in paragraph 3 of this Note, the Government of the United States is prepared to:

(a) Carry out the necessary surveys for which preliminary arrangements have already been made, and construct a Pioneer Road by the use of United States Engineer troops for surveys and initial construction.

(b) Arrange for the highway's completion under contracts made by the United States Public Roads Administration and awarded with a view to insuring the execution of all contracts in the shortest possible time without regard to whether the contractors are Canadian or American.

(c) Maintain the highway until the termination of the present war unless the Government of Canada prefers to assume responsibility at an earlier date for the maintenance of so much of it as lies in Canada.

(d) Agree that at the conclusion of the war that part of the highway which lies in Canada shall become in all respects an integral part of the Canadian highway system, subject to the understanding that there shall at no time be imposed any discriminatory conditions in relation to the use of the road by Canadian or United States civilian traffic.

3. For its part, my Government will ask the Canadian Government to agree:

(a) To acquire right-of-way for the road in Canada (including the settlement of all local claims in this connection), the title to remain in the Crown; in the right of Canada or of the Province of British Columbia as appears most convenient;

(b) To waive import duties, transit or similar charges on shipments originating in the United States and transported over the highway to Alaska, or originating in Alaska and transported over the highway to the United States;

(c) To waive import duties, sales taxes, license fees or other similar charges on all equipment and supplies to be used in the construction or maintenance of the road and on personal effects of the construction personnel;

(d) To take the necessary steps to facilitate the admission into Canada of such United States citizens as may be employed in the construction or maintenance of the highway, it being understood that the United States will assume the expense of repatriating any such persons if the contractors fail to do so.

(e) To permit those in charge of the construction of the road to obtain timber, gravel and rock where such occurs on Crown lands in the neighbourhood of the right of way.

4. If the Government of Canada agrees to this proposal it is suggested that the practical details involved in its execution be arranged directly between the appropriate governmental agencies and, when desirable, be confirmed by subsequent exchange of notes.

Accept etc.

Ottawa, March , 1942

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your Note of March 1942, in which you referred to the recommendation approved by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, as a result of which the two Sections of the Board proposed to their respective Governments:

“the construction of a highway along the route that follows the general line of airports, Fort St. John-Fort Nelson-Watson Lake-Whitehorse-Boundary-Big Delta, the respective termini connecting with existing roads in Canada and Alaska”.

2. As announced on March 6, 1942, the Canadian Government has approved this recommendation and has accepted the offer of the United States Government to undertake the building and wartime maintenance of the highway which will connect the airports already constructed by Canada.

3. It is understood that the United States Government will

(a) Carry out the necessary surveys for which preliminary arrangements have already been made, and construct a Pioneer Road by the use of United States Engineer troops for surveys and initial construction;

(b) Arrange for the highway's completion under contracts made by the United States Public Roads Administration and awarded with a view to insuring the execution of all contracts in the shortest possible time without regard to whether the contractors were Canadian or American;

(c) Maintain the highway until the termination of the present war unless the Government of Canada prefers to assume responsibility at an earlier date for the maintenance of so much of it as lies in Canada;

*Le sous-ministre des Mines et des Ressources au
sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
Deputy Minister of Mines and Resources to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs*

Ottawa, March 16, 1942

Dear Sir,

Consideration has been given to the copies of the draft exchange of notes, forwarded with your letter of the 12th instant, and in regard to the suggested letter to the United States Minister to Canada at Ottawa, I would make the following comments and suggestions:

1. It is assumed that the route of the proposed highway from Whitehorse to Boundary and Big Delta is the route that goes via Kluane Lake.

3.(b) Canadian contractors will demand they be given equal consideration in the awarding of contracts by the United States Bureau of Roads for the construction of the highway and will expect the Canadian Government to arrange for such consideration. Canadian labour will also expect its interests to be protected. It is consequently suggested that this particular section be amended to read as follows:

“in the shortest possible time without regard to whether the contractors are residents of Canada or of the United States provided that Canadian contractors where available and competent will be given equal consideration in the award of contracts and that Canadian labour will also be employed to the extent it is available and competent.”

3.(c) When the war with Japan is concluded it is possible that there will be a great exodus of men, war equipment and supplies from Alaska to the United States over the highway, and under the present wording of this clause Canada would be responsible for maintaining the highway under this heavy traffic. It is consequently suggested that it be amended to read as follows:

“Maintain the highway during the present war with Japan and for a period of six months after its termination unless the Government of Canada prefers to assume responsibility, etc., etc.”

3.(d) The inclusion in the present wording of this clause of the reference to no “discriminatory conditions in relation to the use of the road by Canadian or United States civilian traffic” seems to place the highway in a different category to other Canadian highways where no such condition applies. Consequently it is suggested that this section be amended by deleting all words after “Canadian highway system”.

4.(b)and (c). The wording of these two clauses is far-reaching in so far as their effect on Canadian contractors is concerned. The wording permits United States contractors to bring in new construction equipment direct from the factory without payment of duty or licenses and use it on the work. Canadian contractors, under present Customs Regulations, would first have to get an A-1 Priority to purchase additional equipment in the United States, then pay duty, then, in the case of trucks, pay out license fees and have the drivers take out chauffeur's licenses, etc. Canadian contractors would thus be at a great disadvantage in overhead investment and costs. In the case of trucks and other equipment they already possess, Canadian contractors would have to make arrangements with the Province of British Columbia and the Dominion Government for their use in those particular areas.

Under the circumstances it is suggested that Canadian firms, who may be awarded contracts on this project, be given the same privilege in regard to licenses, duty, etc., for equipment they actually bring in or use on this work. After the work is over they can either return the equipment under some arrangement they might make or, if they propose to use it on other work in Canada, they would pay duty.

4.(d). It is the opinion that there will be considerable difficulty in actually repatriating all of the citizens of the United States who are brought in for the construction or maintenance of the highway. It is accordingly suggested that the latter part of this clause be amended to read as follows:

“it being understood that the United States will guarantee the repatriation of its citizens employed on the highway within a reasonable time and not later than six months after the end of the war and will assume the expense of repatriation of any such persons, if contractors fail to do so.

4.(e) It would not be fair to the Province of British Columbia, or to the Yukon Territory, to give the contractors or United States Engineers in Charge uncontrolled authority to obtain timber on Crown lands in the neighbourhood of the right-of-way, since selected stands thirty or forty miles away might be denuded of the best timber in the whole area and left in a dangerous condition from the fire hazard standpoint. It is consequently suggested that this clause be amended to read as follows:

“To permit those in charge of the construction of the road to obtain timber, gravel, and rock where such occurs on Crown Lands in the neighbourhood of the right-of-way, providing that timber required shall be cut under the direction of the appropriate Department of the province in which it is located and in the case of Dominion Lands under the direction of the appropriate Department of the Dominion Government.”

A point arises here as to whether the Province of British Columbia and the Dominion would be expected to supply timber free of charge to the United States authorities, in view of the fact that the latter were paying for the highway. Perhaps it would be fairer if the Dominion permitted the use of timber without charge and reimbursed the Province for Provincial timber. This is a matter for consideration.

There are other points that will have to be agreed upon since they will undoubtedly arise in the location and construction of the highway. These include the administration of justice in Canadian territory, particularly as affecting United States troops, Workmen's Compensation with provision that Canada will be protected from claims after the road passes to her jurisdiction, protection of the Dominion from property damage, etc., and the enforcement of Dominion and Provincial Health Act Regulations.

The question of wage schedules that will be paid after the work is contracted will require careful consideration. Wages paid will have to be high enough to attract labour to the project but if these are excessive the wage schedule structure of other projects in the West will be upset.

It is further the opinion that with each United States Engineering Corps, or at least at each end of construction, there should be a liaison engineer representing the Dominion and who should keep the Dominion authorities advised on the progress of the work. If preferred this engineer need not have any administrative authority, but might be merely an observer in the interests of the Dominion.³⁰

Yours very truly,

C. W. JACKSON

Secretary to Governor General to Prime Minister

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, February 2, 1943

My dear Prime Minister,

The Governor General has asked me to go into the question of his tours in 1943. His Excellency and Her Royal Highness consider that, in this connection, they should be guided by the following considerations:

(i) At this time more than ever, it is important that such tours should cost the public as little as possible. Train movements should, therefore, be confined to the main lines so as to avoid "specials", and only a skeleton staff should be taken so that additional equipment will not be required.³¹

(ii) Visits should be made preferably to areas which have not been visited before and where there is a concentration of "service" activity or munitions work.³²

In the light of the above, I have under consideration the following proposals:

(a) A Spring visit to Vancouver, where there have been a number of developments since His Excellency and Her Royal Highness were last there. A short stop could be made en route at Sault Ste. Marie and Sudbury.³²

³⁰ The exchange of notes with the United States took place on March 17 and 18, 1942. See Canada, Treaty Series, 1942, No. 13. The final text incorporates the changes suggested for paragraphs 3(c) and 4(e) of the draft Canadian note.

³¹ Note marginale:

O.K.

(b) A visit to the Alaska Highway from Edmonton. A round trip might be arranged, ending up at Prince Rupert, which His Excellency and Her Royal Highness have not yet visited. I think a visit by The Governor General to the Alaska Highway area might tend to offset the notion that the United States have a sole proprietary interest in this project. I would arrange for this trip at a time when the weather is likely to be settled — possibly in July.³³

(c) A small tour through the Eastern Townships in the Autumn on the way to or from Quebec.³²

The above is a very rough general outline of what I have in mind, and with which His Excellency and Her Royal Highness agree in principle, but I should greatly value any comments or suggestions which might occur to you.

There is one point in particular on which His Excellency would like to have the benefit of your advice. On the occasion of a former visit to Vancouver and Victoria, an invitation was received from the United States authorities to visit Seattle. It was not then possible to accept it, but His Excellency was wondering if it would be desirable to accept such an invitation if it were renewed. I feel sure that if it were mentioned to the United States Legation here or by Mr. Leighton McCarthy in Washington, the authorities in Seattle would have no hesitation in inviting His Excellency and Her Royal Highness to visit the city.

Yours very sincerely,

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, February 9, 1943

My dear Sir Shuldham [Redfern],

I duly received your letter of February 2nd, regarding tours by The Governor General and Princess Alice during 1943. What you have outlined seems to me wholly appropriate and satisfactory.

I am sure my colleagues will appreciate no less than I do the thoughtfulness of His Excellency and Her Royal Highness in wishing to avoid specials and limiting as much as possible any unnecessary expenses in connection with the tours.

There would, I think, be general approval of a spring visit to Vancouver, with stops en route at Sault Ste Marie and Sudbury.

I am wholly in accord with the proposal, at an appropriate season, of a visit to the Alaska Highway from Edmonton. As a matter of fact, in one of our conversations recently, I had a word with His Excellency about the advisability of such a visit.³⁴

Very advisable.

³⁴ The Governor General and Princess Alice visited the Alaska Highway in September 1943.

Small tours of the Eastern Townships in the autumn would be, of course, much appreciated.

As to a visit to Seattle from Vancouver or Victoria, I would be much in favour of The Governor General and Princess Alice accepting an invitation if it were renewed, as I feel sure it would be if the matter were raised in the quarters which you mention. I do not know how His Excellency would feel about a possible extension of a visit from Seattle to include the new large shipbuilding establishments at Vancouver (Washington) and Portland (Oregon). It occurs to me that such a visit would in some degree be an added incentive to workers in Canadian shipyards on the Pacific coast. If The Governor General and Princess Alice feel that they would like to undertake such an additional visit, I feel sure the arrangements could readily be made.³⁵

ALASKA HIGHWAY — USE OF CONNECTING ROADS

1. In the Exchange of Notes on the Alaska Highway dated March 17 and March 18, 1942³⁶, it was provided

“ . . . that at the conclusion of the war that part of the highway which lies in Canada shall become in all respects an integral part of the Canadian highway system, subject to the understanding that there shall at no time be imposed any discriminatory conditions in relation to the use of the road as between Canadian and United States civilian traffic.”

It will be noted that the last clause of this paragraph refers specifically to civilian traffic.

2. At the time the agreement on the Alaska Highway was made it was understood that the materials to be transported over the road would be carried to Dawson Creek by railway. Subsequently it was found desirable to send some United States vehicles and some freight by road. This raised a question as to the right of the United States to use the intervening highways in Canada, (that is, those between the United States boundary and Dawson Creek). This question was referred to the Legal Officers of the Department of Transport and the Legal Adviser of the Department of External Affairs who agreed that the terms of the ³⁶ See Canada, Treaty Series, 1942, No. 13.

Exchange of Notes covered “by implication roads leading to the highway, principally because the commitments undertaken by the Canadian Government would otherwise be without practical meaning.”

3. Subsequently the United States Legation endeavoured to extend the meaning to cover the post-war use of the connecting roads and of the Highway itself, by United States military vehicles. It was pointed out in reply that there had never at any time been any suggestion that the United States should have any post-war military use of the road. After some discussion it was suggested that agreement might be reached on the basis of an understanding that the United States might send military vehicles over the road under conditions to be prescribed by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. In consequence the United States Chargé d’Affaires wrote a letter to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs embodying this suggestion.[†] A copy of this letter is attached.

4. It is proposed that we should reply in the terms set forth in the letter from the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs dated February 18, 1943,[†] of which a copy is attached. The pertinent paragraph of this letter reads as follows: “While no provision was made in the exchange of notes under reference for the post-war use of the Alaska Highway or the connecting roads by United States military vehicles, the Canadian Government confirms your understanding that such use will be permitted under conditions to be recommended by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.”

ALASKA HIGHWAY; POST-WAR MILITARY USE; CONNECTING ROADS

30. THE SECRETARY submitted a memorandum from the Department of External Affairs proposing an exchange of notes with the United States; copies had been circulated.

As to the present use of connecting roads, it was pointed out that the inadequacy of rail transportation had made it necessary to send U.S. vehicles and freight by road from the United States to the eastern terminus of the highway. It was felt that the exchange of notes regarding the Alaska highway itself covered by implication use of roads leading to the highway.

As to post-war military use of the highway and connecting roads, the United States now sought to extend the interpretation of the agreement to include this. The original exchange of notes, however, had made no provision in this respect.

It was suggested, therefore, that the matters be the subject of an exchange of notes under which the United States would be permitted post-war use of the highway and connecting roads upon conditions to be recommended by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

(External Affairs memorandum, Feb. 20, 1943 — C.W.C. document 431).

31. THE PRIME MINISTER expressed the view that the use of roads in Canada by U.S. forces after the war was a serious question of policy. Further commitments of this kind would have to be the subject of Parliamentary discussion.

The first step should be to obtain the views of the government's advisers on the military aspects of the proposals.

32. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE drew attention to the serious legal implications for Canada of entering into an agreement such as that suggested in the proposed exchange of notes.

33. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the question be referred to the Chiefs of Staff for examination with the Canadian Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, and subsequent report.

SECRET

Ottawa, March 16, 1943

With reference to the attached letter from Mr. Heeney[†] which will be discussed at a special meeting of Chiefs of Staff and Canadian Section, P.J.B.D.

1. When permission was granted for the U.S. to construct the Alcan Highway through Canada it was agreed that after the war there would be no discrimination against full use being made of the highway by U.S. civilian traffic. I am advised that in the resultant agreement the word 'civilian' was specifically inserted by Canada.

2. The U.S. are now requesting that this agreement should be extended to cover

(a) Canadian Highways connecting the U.S. border with the Eastern terminus of the Alcan Highway, and

(b) the unrestricted post-war use of the Highway by U.S. Military Forces.

3. There would appear to be no objection to the extension of the present agreement to cover the connecting Canadian Highways. The main point of issue is to be the question of giving the U.S. the right to move military personnel and equipment through Canada in time of peace.

4. It is improbable that future events might occur which would see the U.S. at war and Canada strictly neutral. Yet were such situation to develop, the maintenance of this neutrality might be compromised by the U.S. having been given the right to move war material through Canada.

5. A more satisfactory solution would appear to be for Canada not to guarantee the U.S. the right of unrestricted post-war military use of the Highway but instead to offer to give sympathetic consideration to requests for such use as the need arises. Such requests would be dealt with as a matter of routine but it is felt that Canada should retain some control over the peace-time movement through her territory of military forces of another nation (no matter how friendly).

ALASKA HIGHWAY; — POST-WAR MILITARY USE; CONNECTING ROADS

17. THE SECRETARY submitted the report of a meeting of the Chiefs of Staff with the Canadian Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, to whom the U.S. request on this subject had been referred by the War Committee on March 11th.

The Chiefs of Staff had agreed that, from the military point of view, as it was impossible to foresee the circumstances which might exist on the cessation of hostilities and from time to time thereafter, no commitment should be made regarding post-war military use of the highway and connecting roads. Draft paragraphs for inclusion in a communication to the United States to this effect were attached to the report, copies of which had been circulated.

18. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, approved the report and agreed that a communication in the sense recommended, including (with certain amendments) the paragraphs submitted be forwarded to the U.S. government.³⁷

While it may well be that this is the most satisfactory name that can be chosen and although it is certainly a great improvement on "The Alcan Highway", I think it would be unfortunate if Congress were to undertake by itself to name a road, the larger part of which lies in Canada.

I think it might be desirable for you to speak to Hickerson about this matter and to suggest that if any official title is to be given to the highway, it should be selected jointly after consultation between Ottawa and Washington.

2. We spoke to Hickerson of the State Department along the lines of your EX-1084. He agreed that, if any official name is to be given to the Highway, it should be given by agreement between the two Governments and not by action of Congress. He said that the State Department would, at the appropriate time, communicate this view to the House Committee to which Dimond's resolution has been referred.

3. Hickerson added that, when this view is explained to the House Committee, the latter may ask the State Department to take the initiative in reaching an agreement between the two Governments. Hickerson therefore suggested informally that the Canadian Government might now give some thought to the question of the official name to be given to the Highway.

My WA-1481, March 29, naming of Alaska Highway. We have received from the State Department the following note dated April 13, Begins:

"The Secretary of State presents his compliments to The Honourable the Minister of Canada and has the honour to enclose a copy of H.J. RES. 105[†] to name the highway to Alaska the "Alaska Highway".

The chairman of the House of Representatives' Committee on Roads has asked this Department for an expression of its views in regard to the name proposed. In as much as the new highway lies for the greater part of its length within Canada, Mr. Hull replied that in his opinion no action should be taken

Ottawa, April 29, 1943

Reference your teletype of April 14, 1943, No. WA-1775, naming of Alaska Highway.

The Prime Minister states that he is agreeable to the use of the name "Alaska Highway" and you may so inform the State Department.

If it is desired that a name should now be officially adopted, it is our view that agreement should be reached between the two Governments and an announcement issued simultaneously in Ottawa and Washington. Please impress upon the State Department the importance of avoiding any precipitate announcement in Washington.

TELETYPE WA-2887

Washington, June 15, 1943

My WA-2304, May 13,[†] naming of Alaska highway. Parsons of the State Department informed the Legation today that the State Department has worked out what they hope will be an acceptable solution to the difficult question of procedure. Berle had a talk recently with Mr. Dimond, who introduced H.J. Res. 105 in the House of Representatives. Berle explained to him the desirability of having an exchange of notes between the two Governments for the purpose of giving a name to the highway. Berle told him that the State Department had in mind to propose to the Canadian Government an exchange of notes in which Mr. Dimond's name would be mentioned. Dimond fell in with this plan and, if this plan is carried out, State Department does not anticipate any difficulty with the House Committee on Roads.

³⁸ Les notes suivantes étaient écrites sur cette copie du télégramme:

³⁸ The following notes were written on this copy of the telegram:

Ask Robertson if reply prepared I agree to "Alaska Highway". K[ING]
Noted reply in sense approved is now going forward. R[OBERTSON]

2. Following is draft note from Secretary of State to the Canadian Minister which State Department has prepared, Begins:

“I have the honor to inform you that the Honorable Anthony J. Dimond, delegate of Alaska, United States House of Representatives, has proposed that the highway from Dawson Creek, British Columbia, to Fairbanks, Alaska, be given the official name “Alaska Highway”.

The Government of the United States believes that the name suggested by Mr. Dimond is suitable and in harmony with popular usage. It is of the further opinion that the highway should be jointly named by the Governments of the United States and Canada in view of the location of the greater part of the highway within Canada and in view of the friendly cooperation which has made possible its construction.

In accordance with the foregoing, I have the honor to propose that the highway from Dawson Creek, British Columbia to Fairbanks, Alaska be designated the “Alaska Highway”. If the Canadian Government is agreeable to this proposal, it is suggested that this note and your reply in that sense shall be considered as placing on record the agreement of the two Governments in this matter.

Accept, Sir, the renewed assurance of my highest consideration.” End of draft note.

3. State Department had not prepared a draft reply from the Canadian Minister. The Legation asked whether a reply in the following form would be acceptable and Parsons said that it would be, Begins:

“I have the honour to inform you that the Government of Canada concurs in the proposal, contained in your note of . . . , that the highway from Dawson Creek, British Columbia to Fairbanks, Alaska be given the official name ‘Alaska Highway’.” End of draft reply.

4. Once the terms of the notes are settled, State Department suggests that the date of exchange be fixed and that the date of the publication of the notes also be fixed, the date of publication to be three days after the dates of exchange. During this interval, State Department intends to give Dimond confidentially a copy of the notes and to tell him when they will be made public.

5. State Department does not know whether Dimond’s Bill will be proceeded with in the House of Representatives following the announcement of the exchange of notes. They do not think that it matters much whether the Bill is proceeded with or not.

6. State Department has gone to a good deal of trouble to work out a draft solution which will avoid offending Mr. Dimond and the House Committee on Roads unnecessarily. They hope that you will have this in mind when considering whether to approve the draft note from the Secretary of State to the Canadian Minister.

7. If terms of notes are acceptable, have you any special preference as to the date of exchange? Ends.

Ottawa, June 19, 1943

I am enclosing copy of teletype WA-2887 from our Legation in Washington, containing the United States proposals for an exchange of notes between Canada and the United States which would definitely name the Alaska Highway. I think we should agree to the procedure suggested by the Americans, on the understanding that when this exchange of notes is completed the Bill pending in Congress for the naming of the Highway should be withdrawn. It does not seem entirely appropriate to have an act of Congress officially giving a name to a Canadian road, even if the Canadian and the United States Governments have already agreed on that name.

OIL SUPPLIES ON THE ALASKA AIRWAY AND THE ALASKA HIGHWAY

1. On May 4th the United States Minister wrote to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, quoting the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army as follows:

“1. The Chief of Engineers has been directed by the Commanding General, Services of Supply to take steps at once for extending fuel supply for the Air Corps, United States Army, in Canada and Alaska as follows:

(A) Arrange with the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey for the drilling of nine additional wells in the vicinity of Norman, Northwestern Territories, Canada.

(B) Make surveys for, and arrange for construction of a pipeline from Norman to Whitehorse, Yukon, Canada.

(C) Arrange for establishment at Whitehorse, Yukon, Canada, of facilities for refining crude oil with a capacity of three thousand barrels per day.

(D) Build or otherwise acquire and operate necessary water transportation facilities between McMurray; Waterways, Alberta, Canada and Norman, Northwestern Territories, Canada.

(E) Arrange with the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey to store, for future use of the Air Corps, United States Army, all of the gasoline which may be produced by its refinery at Norman during the operating season of 1942 and to operate the pipeline to Whitehorse and the refinery at that place after their construction.

“2. It is requested that permission be obtained from the Government of the Dominion of Canada to carry out the operations outlined above. Immediate action on this matter is necessary in order that full advantage may be taken of the present working season.”

2. Following receipt of this communication officers of the appropriate Departments in Ottawa have examined the proposals made by the Chief of Engineers and have discussed these with the experts in the industry. As a result it appears

(a) that nine additional wells would certainly not supply the increased output required; that thirty wells would probably be required;

(b) that there is no certainty that the output could be obtained regardless of the number of wells;

(c) that the probable length of the pipeline required would be 460 miles, and that the total cost of drilling and equipping the wells and of constructing the pipeline with the necessary pumping stations would be in the neighbourhood of $30,000,000.00;

(d) that very extensive diversions of labour, materials, and equipment would be necessary to meet the United States request;

(e) that it might turn out that only a part of the required oil can be obtained, in which case the expenditure of money, labour and materials might prove to be unjustified.

These considerations have been placed before the United States Minister, informally, and Mr. Moffat is taking steps to ascertain whether they will in any way modify the views of the Chief of Engineers and his advisers.

3. If the United States persist in their proposals it will be for Canada to decide to what extent and in what terms they should be accepted.

OIL SUPPLIES ON ALASKA AIRWAY AND ALASKA HIGHWAY

8. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS reported that the U.S. Minister had recently submitted a request that the government permit the extension of fuel supply for the U.S. Army Air Corps in Canada and Alaska through the further development of the Norman oil fields in the Northwest Territories, and the construction of a pipeline from Norman to Whitehorse.

It was proposed also to establish facilities for refining crude oil at Whitehorse and to provide necessary water transportation facilities. The Standard Oil Company of New Jersey would undertake this development for the United States.

These proposals had been examined by the appropriate departments of the government, who had expressed some doubts as to the project. The pipeline required would cost in the neighbourhood of 30 million dollars. These considerations had been placed informally before the U.S. Minister.

(External Affairs memorandum to the War Committee, May 15, 1942).

9. MR. ROBERTSON pointed out that the Minister of Munitions and Supply, in a statement made in the House of Commons the previous day, had reported that arrangements had been made for the development referred to, that additional wells were being drilled, refinery capacity increased, and a pipeline being installed to carry the oil to the site of the Alaska Highway.

In the circumstances it was suggested that approval be given to the request submitted by the U.S. Minister.

(Unrevised Hansard, May 15, 1942, page 2696).⁴¹

10. The War Committee approved permission being given to the United States, as requested by Mr. Moffat.

Dear Dr. Camsell,

With regard to our recent conversations concerning the proposed increased production of oil at Ft. Norman and the construction of a pipeline to Whitehorse, I wish to confirm that in conversation with the United States Minister yesterday I told him of the difficulties and doubts that have arisen in the minds of the officers of this Department and those members of the industry who have been consulted.

Mr. Moffat immediately communicated the information that I gave him to Washington and this morning he received a reply which seemed to indicate that the United States Army engineers are anxious to go ahead in spite of the possibility of their being disappointed in their expectations as to the output of oil in the Ft. Norman area.

The attitude of the United States authorities was conveyed to the Cabinet War Committee in its special meeting at one today and the Committee decided that if the United States wishes to go ahead with the project the Canadian Government would be prepared to agree and cooperate. This information has now been transmitted to the United States Minister.

Yours sincerely,

No.

Ottawa, June , 1942

Sir,

1. I have the honour to refer to recent conversations which have taken place with officials of the Department of External Affairs regarding the desire of the United States Government to take steps for extending the fuel supply for the United States Army Air Corps in Canada and Alaska.

2. My Government, faced with the necessity of obtaining an increased fuel supply without delay, desires to propose the following project, to wit: that it

(a) Make surveys and construct a pipeline, either by United States Army Engineers or by contract, of a size sufficient to deliver three thousand barrels of oil daily from Norman Wells, Northwest Territories, Canada, to Whitehorse, Yukon Territory, Canada;

(b) Sign a contract with a Canadian company to drill additional wells, upon its leases obtained under the Petroleum and Natural Gas Regulations applicable to Dominion Lands or upon permits obtained by it under the Oil and Gas Regulations covering land in the vicinity of Norman Wells. Under this contract the United States War Department would provide the necessary equipment and would purchase the total flow of the additional wells during the war at an agreed price. The wells would remain part of the leasehold or permit property of the Canadian company and would be regarded as having been drilled under the provisions of the Dominion Regulations noted in this clause;

(c) Arrange for the establishment at Whitehorse of facilities for refining crude oil with a capacity of three thousand barrels per day under a contract awarded with a view to insuring the execution of the work in the shortest possible time without regard to whether the contractors are Canadian or American;

(d) Contract with a Canadian company or companies to store for the future use of the Air Corps, United States Army, all of the gasoline which may be produced by the refinery at Norman Wells during the operating season of 1942 in excess of what is required for the maintenance of services and enterprises in the Mackenzie District, to operate the pipeline to Whitehorse and to operate the refinery there unless it is operated by the United States Government.

3. My Government further proposes that the pipeline and the refinery shall remain its property, and shall be operated under contracts with it or by its agent or representatives during the war. It further proposes that at the termination of hostilities the pipeline and refinery shall be valued by two valuers of whom one shall be named by the United States and one by Canada, with power, if they disagree, to appoint an umpire. The valuation shall be based upon their then commercial value and the Canadian Government shall be given the first option to purchase at the amount of the valuation. If the option is not exercised within three months they shall be sold by public tender, or the United States Government may dismantle and remove them. It is understood that if they are sold by public tender their subsequent operations will be subject to such regulations and conditions as the Canadian Government may consider it necessary to impose in order to safeguard the public interest.

4. For its part, my Government asks the Canadian Government to agree:

(a) to acquire any essential land and necessary rights-of-way that may be involved in the project (including the settlement of all local claims in this connection), title to remain in the Crown in the right of Canada;

(b) to waive during the war import duties, sales taxes, territorial taxes, license fees or other similar charges on all equipment and supplies to be used in the execution or maintenance of the project by the United States and all personal effects of the construction personnel;

(c) to remit during the war royalties on oil production, and income tax on the income of persons (including corporations) resident in the United States who are employed on the construction or maintenance of the project;

(d) to take the necessary steps to facilitate the admission into Canada of such United States citizens as may be employed on the construction or maintenance of the project during the war, it being understood that the United States will undertake to repatriate at its expense any such persons if the contractors fail to do so.

5. If the Government of Canada agrees to the foregoing proposal for this project, it is suggested that any supplementary details involved in its execution be arranged directly between the appropriate governmental agencies subject, when desirable, to confirmation by subsequent exchange of notes.

Accept etc.

Ottawa, June 13, 1942

Dear Sir,

I enclose a copy of a draft letter which was prepared in this Department after discussions with the United States Minister and representatives of the interested departments of the Canadian Government. This letter is designed as the first communication in an exchange of notes on the proposed construction of a pipeline from Norman Wells to Whitehorse.

The United States Minister sent a copy of this draft to his Government and has now received a reply in which two changes are proposed. These are as follows:

Para. 2 (d)

United States authorities would like to omit the word "Canadian" in the first line; the word "future" in the second line; and the words "air corps", in the third line. The reason for these changes is that, while the United States authorities propose to enter into a contract with a Canadian company for the storage of oil at Norman Wells, they propose to make contracts with the Standard Oil Company of California for the purpose of operating the pipeline and the refinery. I imagine that no exception can properly be taken to this proposal.

The second proposed change is more important. The United States authorities do not like that part of Para. 3 in which it is indicated that if suitable arrangements for sale to the Canadian Government or a Canadian company cannot be made, the United States authorities will have to dismantle and remove the pipeline and refinery. They say that both the line and the refinery will have a continuing and permanent value and should not, under any circumstances, be dismantled, although it is perhaps reasonable to assume that they will be allowed to stand idle.

The effect of the American criticism on this point would be to make it altogether probable that the Canadian Government would have to buy the pipeline and refinery, as a Canadian company would be unlikely to make the purchase as the commercial value of the line and refinery would probably be small. The only other alternative would be to allow the line to be operated by the United States Government or to stand idle with title remaining in the United States Government. Neither of these alternatives would seem to offer a satisfactory solution.

⁴² Similar letters were sent to the Chairman, Canadian Section, PJBD, to the Deputy Minister of Transport and to the Deputy Commissioner for the Northwest Territories.

I shall be very much obliged if you will let me have an expression of your views in regard to the suggestions made by the United States authorities. I shall also be glad to have any further comments which you may wish to make in regard to other aspects of the draft.

Yours sincerely,

Ottawa, June 15, 1942

Dear Mr. Robertson,

PROPOSED PIPELINE — NORMAN WELLS TO WHITEHORSE, AND REFINERY AT WHITEHORSE

I have your letter of the 13th instant, and note the suggestions which have been made by the United States Minister with respect to the draft letter prepared by your Department. In reply I would say —

1. We were under the impression in drafting the letter about the pipeline and refinery that it was desired to follow as closely as possible the pattern laid down in the exchange of notes about the Alaska Highway.⁴³ If we adopt the suggestions now made by the United States Minister there will be a distinct difference between the two agreements for while in both cases the Dominion undertakes to secure and hold the right-of-way, the United States in one instance not only builds a pioneer road but a highway as well, and at the end of the war will turn these roads over to Canada without compensation, on the other hand, in the case of the pipeline it is evident that the United States Government wishes to secure an undertaking that Canada shall arrange to reimburse the United States for the commercial value of the pipeline and refinery at the expiration of the war or, as an alternative, allow the line to be operated by the United States Government, or to stand idle with title remaining in the United States Government.

Commenting on this I would say we have endeavoured to make it clear from the beginning of the discussion of this pipeline proposal that we are quite convinced once the war is over and it is possible to ship oil again by tankers up the coast it would not be commercially feasible to pump oil from the Norman field if there was any substantial capital investment charged against the enterprise. One important factor that must still be determined is the supply of oil that will be available from the Norman field.

There is the possibility that if the McMurray tar sands are developed actively a pipeline might be constructed from there to Edmonton but such a pipeline would likely be larger than the 4-in. line which the Americans are building from Norman Wells to Whitehorse.

⁴³ Voir Canada, Recueil des traités, 1942, N° 13.

⁴³ See Canada, Treaty Series, 1942, No. 13.

There is also the probability that even at the end of the war the United States would prefer to have the line from Norman Wells to Whitehorse left where it is constructed so that it might be put in use quickly later on should need arise. A lot depends on the supply of oil that will be indicated at Norman Wells when the drilling programme now under way has progressed sufficiently and especially should the North West Company drill certain exploratory wells off their present property, a plan that they have been discussing.

No one knows how long the war will last, nor what conditions will prevail after the war, and it may be that the oil deposits in Canada will take on much greater importance. My personal view is that it should be possible to fix a fair price for the pipeline after the war, based on its then commercial or salvage value and that even if this enterprise has been conceived wholly by the United States Army, any outlay that Canada might make in this connection either for original outlay or subsequent care would be a contribution to the war effort of the United Nations as we should not allow the United States to own a pipeline in Canada after the war. However, I do not think that the United States Government should be asked to undertake to dismantle and remove the pipeline after the war.

2. Referring particularly to Clause D of Para. No. 2 of the draft letter, I may say it seems to me that if the changes proposed by the United States Minister are to be adopted it would be well to reword the clause, for the first part of it undoubtedly relates to activities of the North West Company Limited, a subsidiary of Imperial Oil Limited, which under our regulations must conduct the operations on the Company's leasehold and permit at Norman Wells.

Evidently the American Minister's observations relate particularly to the second part of the clause which refers to the operation of the pipeline and to the refinery at Whitehorse. If the United States Government enters into some arrangement with an American Company to operate the pipeline and the Whitehorse refinery during the war, then it should be distinctly understood that such Company would be subject to all Canadian laws and that it is not allowed to get into any preferred position after the war with respect to operation by reason of its present association with the United States Government.

I understand that you referred the correspondence to the Department of Transport and also to the Oil Controller.

Yours very truly,

CHARLES CAMSELL

Dear Dr. Camsell,

With reference to the exchange of notes regarding the Canol project, the one point that seems to be still at issue between the United States and ourselves is the reference to the disposition of the pipeline and refinery after the war. The United States Minister has presented a draft, a copy of which, marked "A", is attached.

This draft does not seem to me to be satisfactory; in consequence, I have prepared a substitute, a copy of which, marked "B", is also attached. In this substitute, as you will see, I have proposed that the disposition of the pipeline and refinery be referred, in default of a sale, to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. This really provides a postponing of a decision, but it seems to me a satisfactory present solution for our problem. I shall be obliged if I may have an indication of your views in regard to this subject at your very early convenience as both the Americans and ourselves would like to get this matter settled.

Yours sincerely,

The valuation shall be based upon their then commercial value and the Canadian Government shall be given the first option to purchase at the amount of the valuation, it being understood that the Canadian Government would dismantle neither the pipeline nor the refinery without prior agreement with the Government of the United States. If the option is not exercised within three months they may be offered for sale by public tender, with the amount of the valuation as a reserve price, subject to the provision that for years there shall be no dismantlement of pipeline or refinery without the permission in writing of the Canadian Government, which in turn, given the importance of the pipeline and the refinery to the joint defence of Canada and the United States, would not accord this permission without prior agreement with the Government of the United States. It is understood that if they are sold by public tender their subsequent operations will be subject to such regulations and conditions as the Canadian Government may consider it necessary to impose in order to safeguard the public interest. Only in the event that neither the Canadian Government nor a private company desires to purchase them, at the value agreed upon, shall the Government of the United States retain title, having the option of dismantling or removing them, or allowing them to stand idle.

RE — CANOL PROJECT — PIPELINE FROM NORMAN WELLS,
N.W.T., TO WHITEHORSE, Y.T., AND REFINERY AT WHITEHORSE

I return herewith the letter dated the 23rd instant, addressed to you by the Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, who desires an opinion on the wording of the clause which relates to the disposition of the pipeline and refinery after the war.

In comment I would say that I gather from the discussion which I have had over the telephone with Dr. Keenleyside that his clause which is marked "B" is intended to follow the word "price" at the end of the eighteenth line of Draft "A", where a period would occur under the proposed revision. On this understanding, I would suggest that after the word "price" on the 18th line of Draft "A", and before Draft "B" begins, there should be inserted a sentence reading about as follows:

"It is understood that if either the pipeline or the refinery, or both of them, should be operated by Government or private interests for commercial purposes, such operations will be subject to such regulations and conditions as the Canadian Government may consider it necessary to impose to safeguard the public interest."

For convenience of reference the consolidated clause as amended has been rewritten and is appended to this memorandum.

Dr. Keenleyside assures me that the Permanent Joint Board on Defence is an organization that will continue after the war.

We take it that Dr. Keenleyside will obtain whatever legal advice is necessary to ensure that the wording of the notes bears out the intention.⁴⁴

⁴⁴ Notes were exchanged in Ottawa on June 27 and 29, 1942. See Canada, Treaty Series, 1942, No. 23.

It was proposed to transport gasoline in tank cars to Prince Rupert, where suitable storage and loading facilities would be constructed by the U.S. government. The gasoline would then be carried by barges to Skagway, and a 4' pipeline built from there to Whitehorse. It was estimated that the project could be carried out with a small expenditure, and in a short time. An explanatory note had been circulated.

Dear Mr. Cottrelle,

The United States Minister called on me this afternoon to show me a draft note which he would like to address to the Canadian Government with regard to the proposed extension of the plans for oil exploration in Northwestern Canada. This draft has been prepared by Mr. Moffat and has not been endorsed by his Government but he thinks that it is along these lines that his Government would like to have agreement reached. I am sending a copy of this draft also to Dr. Camsell.

I shall be very much obliged if I may have your advice as to the attitude which we should take in regard to the agreement which is proposed in Mr. Moffat's draft note.

Yours sincerely,

*Draft Note from Minister of United States to

Ottawa, November , 1942

Sir,

I have the honor to refer to our exchange of notes of June 27 and June 29, 1942⁴⁶, regarding the desire of the United States Government to take steps for extending the fuel supply for the U.S. Army in Canada and Alaska. At that time the United States Government proposed, and the Canadian Government approved, the so-called Canol Project which included, inter alia, the drilling of wells in the vicinity of Norman Wells, and the laying of a pipeline from Norman Wells to Whitehorse, capable of delivering 3,000 barrels of oil daily.

The developments of our joint war effort have in the opinion of my Government made it vitally necessary to discover additional sources of petroleum in northwestern Canada and Alaska, capable of producing from 15,000 to 20,000 barrels per day, to supplement the supply which will be obtained from Norman Wells. This will require the drilling of exploratory, or in oil parlance "wildcat" wells in this northern region. As such operations should be conducted in a number of widely separated locations in the Northwest Territories, where oil is believed to exist, it is suggested that the area in Canada within which such operations are authorized be bounded on the north by the Arctic Ocean, on the east by the 112th meridian, on the south by the 60th parallel, on the west by the Continental Divide and the Alaska-Canadian Border.

The operations under immediate contemplation, — as a result of which, however, it may prove desirable to enlarge or expand the Canol Project — are for the sole purpose of discovering oilfields capable of producing the required 20,000 barrels per day. No plans have as yet been worked out covering refineries, storage or distribution systems beyond those already authorized and approved by the Canadian Government.

In view of all the circumstances involved, and the increasingly urgent need of additional fuel for military purposes in the far north, the Government of the United States of America hopes that the Canadian Government will approve these exploratory operations, with the understanding that the U.S. Army authorities be allowed during the war to develop and make use of any petroleum sources that may be discovered, subject in general to the applicable provisions of our exchange of notes of June 27-June 29, 1942, above referred to. My Government will of course keep the Canadian Government fully informed of any future plans for carrying out these operations.

Accept etc.

Dear Mr. Keenleyside,

I acknowledge receipt of your letter of November 27th enclosing a draft note of the United States Minister to Canada, in regard to further development work in Canada. I have delayed my reply, hoping to have a complete range of proposed activities in Canada which have been reported direct to me.

For the first time, United States officials realize that their supply of petroleum products is a subject of grave concern and that this continent is likely to be faced with a severe shortage next year, in fact they are now making inquiries about the tar sands of Northern Alberta — the development of these sands they were not favourable to a few months ago.

The dwindling production of Turner Valley in Alberta, together with the mounting army requirements for the Northwest Command is now the subject of discussion as between this Office and the Office of the Petroleum Coordinator in Washington. This country, as you know, is now in the domestic category. In other words, we are strictly under the Hyde Park Agreement,⁴⁷ and the oil industry in Canada is, therefore, considered on a parity with that of the United States. Supplies, therefore, for Western Canada and the Northwest Command are in a manner likely to be pooled. There is no doubt that we in this country will find, as each day goes on, a growing interest in what can be done in Canada, and a request on the part of Washington authorities to develop our resources.

I have carefully read the draft as submitted to you by the United States Minister and, as I read it, this would be giving them blanket authority over all of the Yukon Territory and about one-half of the Northwest Territories. However, I note that you have sent a copy to Dr. Camsell, and he will be able to advise you as to how this is likely to conflict with an arrangement that he has made with Imperial Oil Limited for development in the Territories. It occurs to me that they could easily cross each other's path and cause confusion.

Blanket arrangements, such as this reflects, (as I see it) have been one of your problems and I can easily understand that you may wish to have the situation clarified to a point where they will state specifically the structures and/or areas on which they wish to operate.

Yours very truly,

Ottawa, December 11, 1942

Replying to your letter of the 27th ultimo, enclosing a copy of Mr. Moffat's note with regard to the desirability of enlarging or extending the Canol Project for the sole purpose of discovering new oil fields, I agree that all support possible should be given to such a plan. I might say that during my recent visit to Edmonton I had an interview with Mr. Sidney Paige, chief oil geologist for the Canol Project, and discussed the matter further with him yesterday.

The proposed request contemplates exploratory work in both the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. At present the oil regulations of both Territories permit prospecting and development and consequently are now open for general staking. The existing regulations, however, do not allow applications from foreign companies, which would, of course, include foreign governments.

The draft note does not indicate whether the United States Government will itself carry on the exploratory work or whether it proposes to adopt the procedure that was followed in the Canol Project, namely to contract to have the work done by a Canadian company or at least under the name of a Canadian company. If the former, it is presumed the necessary authority under the War Measures Act can be obtained permitting the United States Government to carry on this exploratory work. If the latter, I see no difficulty in the way of extending the scheme of the Canol Project and making similar arrangements for each new field that may be developed.

It should be kept in mind, however, that in the new areas to be explored, no permits or leases will have been granted. In the permits being granted to the Imperial Oil Company in the Norman field, covering areas outside those the company already has, provision is being made that upon the termination of the war the company will only have the right to obtain leases for one-half of the areas developed. The other one-half and all the plant equipment and structures, without reimbursement to the company, will belong to the Crown. This condition has been accepted by the company and will be one of the provisions of the new regulations which will shortly be submitted to Council for approval. It is assumed that the Canadian Government would have no objection to this arrangement, which seems to be fair, applying to any other field that may be discovered. Or again, if the field should be developed by the United States Government, would there then be any objection to it owning one-half of the area? This is a matter to which you will no doubt wish to give further consideration.

⁴⁸ H.L. Keenleyside.

As the general terms of the Canol Project are to apply to the new proposal, it is suggested it should be made clear that any operations carried on will not be under the present Dominion Oil Regulations but under the new regulations to be passed in connection with the areas being developed outside the existing leases in the Norman field, and that these new regulations will apply to any areas to be developed under the new proposal.

I can see no objection to the other conditions of the Canol Project set out in the exchange of notes applying; that is, those relating to the freedom from royalties and to the ownership and disposal of any refineries and pipelines that may be constructed.

Deputy Minister of Mines and Resources to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs⁴⁹

Ottawa, January 6, 1943

With your letter of the 22nd ultimo[†] you have referred here for consideration a revision[†] of the draft note which the United States Minister proposes to address to the Secretary of State for External Affairs about the desire of the United States Army to extend further the search for oil supplies in the Northwest Territories and to include the Yukon Territory in the tract under exploration.

This draft clarifies some points. Particularly it is noted that while the United States asks that it be permitted to engage United States drillers as well as Canadians for the drilling operations, it restricts to Canadian companies the actual operation of the wells for production. This is a desirable feature from our standpoint. Whatever formal permits are issued covering these operations under our regulations should be in the name of the Canadian companies which will actually carry on operations, leaving it to these Canadian companies to make arrangements for drilling as they may be able, subject, of course, to the usual safeguards imposed by the conservation features of our regulations.

However, there is a difficulty which may develop, i.e., the possibility that someone whose interest is not identical with that of the United States Government or of the Canadian Government might intervene by making application for oil and gas rights under our existing regulations before we can make effective the proposed new regulations for oil and gas permits which I mentioned to you in my note of December 11th.

Under the Dominion Lands Act the new regulations, to become effective, must be published for four weeks in the Canada Gazette, although there is the possibility that this period might be shortened by action under the War Mea-

tures Act. In any event, unless it is specifically provided otherwise, there is the possibility that others might apply under the regulations which are now being drafted. One way to meet this situation would be to reserve the whole area which the United States now desires to have prospected and to make it clear in the Order in Council creating the reservation that permits will only be granted to the nominees of the United States Government under conditions which could be summarized in the Order in Council that makes the reservation. However, this would mean the reservation of an extremely large area, approximately 535,000 square miles, and it would doubtless cause criticism which could be avoided if the United States authorities would indicate more definitely the particular districts which seem to be the most promising. It would then be possible to create a number of reservations of reasonable size.

From the discussions which have taken place we take it that Imperial Oil Limited will be the Canadian Company operating any wells that may be brought in and the terms of the regulations proposed for the issue of permits have been discussed with the executives of that Company.

No question arises about any revenue to the Dominion Government from production during the war. Once the war is over it will be our duty to see that an appropriate share of the enterprise is conveyed promptly to the Canadian Government. It is these terms that constitute the main new feature of the regulations which we are now drafting for the issue of permits.

I see no reason why you should not make an affirmative reply to the proposals.⁵⁰

Dear Dr. Camsell,

A reply has been received from the United States Legation on the matter referred to in your letter of January 6, regarding a more strict delimitation of the districts in which wildcatting would be done in the Northwest Territories in order that such districts might be reserved for exploration by nominees of the United States Government.

The United States Government take the view that while they are wholly in accord with your suggestion, it would nevertheless be desirable that in the regulations that are adopted there be nothing which would forbid operations anywhere within the broad general area mentioned in their note of December 28, 1942.⁵¹ This was the area bounded on the north by the Arctic Ocean, on the east by the 112th meridian, on the south by the 60th parallel, and on the west by the Continental Divide and the Alaska-Canadian Border.

I quote below from a letter to the United States Secretary of State from the Secretary of War on this subject:

“This office is wholly in accord with the suggestion contained in Dr. Keenleyside’s letter of January 18, 1943[†] that certain areas should be reserved for exploration by nominees of the United States in order to prevent the possible intervention of anyone whose interest is not identical with that of the Canadian Government or of the United States Government.

At the present time it is expected that the greater part of the wildcatting will be carried on in the district contiguous to the Mackenzie River, approximately 25 miles each side thereof, and extending from Fort Wrigley on the south to Good Hope on the north. It is hoped that sufficient sources of oil to fulfil our requirements will be discovered within this area. However, there are under consideration and surveys are being made of two major districts which, on the basis of presently available geological data, are considered to be the most promising for oil exploration. These areas are defined as follows:

- a. District of Mackenzie – An area contiguous to the Mackenzie River, approximately 75 miles each side thereof, and extending from Great Slave Lake on the south to the Arctic Ocean on the north.
- b. Yukon Territory – All that portion of the Yukon Territory lying north of the 66th parallel.

It is believed that, in accordance with the suggestion of the Canadian authorities, it would be advantageous to both governments to have the two major areas as described above reserved for oil exploration by the United States in connection with the Canol Project, to the exclusion of other interests.

Although it is expected that our activities will be confined within these two areas it would be considered inadvisable to have them strictly limited thereto. It is therefore the desire of this department that any regulations which may be adopted be of such a nature as to permit operations anywhere within the broad general area described in our letter of November 18, 1942[†].”

Yours sincerely,

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, February 23, 1943

In the absence of the Deputy Minister I have received your letter of the 19th instant conveying the request of the United States Government for an additional reservation of petroleum and natural gas rights in the Yukon and in the Mackenzie District of the Northwest Territories in order to prevent possible intervention of anyone whose interest is not identical with that of the Canadian Government or of the United States Government.

In reply I am enclosing for your information a copy of a map[†] upon which you will find outlined the reservations which have been made already and also the additional reservation suggested. It will be unnecessary for me to repeat what has been said already about the difficulty of reserving the oil and gas rights in upwards of a half million square miles of territory, which was the suggestion of the United States Government under discussion last month.

As you know, Mr. Sidney Paige, Consulting Geologist attached to the office of Colonel Wyman who is in charge of the Canol Project, discussed this situation fully with Dr. Camsell and with our administrative and technical officers and as a result an Order-in-Council, P.C. 1138 dated 12th February, 1943, was passed. This Order-in-Council authorizes the withdrawal from the Petroleum and Natural Gas Regulations and the Oil and Gas Regulations of certain tracts in the Yukon and in the Northwest Territories and places these tracts under the provisions of the special regulations established by Order-in-Council P.C. 742, dated 28th January, 1943, which apply to the reserved territory within a fifty-mile radius of Norman Wells. A copy of these regulations is appended.[†] The regulations appear in the February 20th issue of the Canada Gazette. Your attention is directed especially to Clause 1 which provides that no person shall enter a reserved area for the purpose of prospecting for oil and staking a location without first obtaining from the Minister of Mines and Resources a preliminary authority so to do, and to Clause 14 which provides that the Minister shall have the right to refuse to issue a permit to any applicant when, in his opinion, the issue thereof might retard the search for and the development of the oil resources in the area covered by the regulations or interfere with the production of petroleum therefrom for the use of His Majesty or of any country associated or allied with His Majesty in the conduct of the present war.

We gathered from our discussions with Mr. Sidney Paige that the geological and wildcatting parties arranged by the United States Government would find plenty of scope for their activities this year in the area within a radius of fifty miles of Norman Wells, but the two additional reservations were created so that there would be plenty of territory available for exploration.

If additional reservations are to be created it should be on the understanding that the United States is planning for a substantial enlargement of the arrangements for exploration so that it can be said that the territory will be examined within a reasonable time. As you know, representatives of oil companies have been visiting Ottawa to ascertain what territories are available for exploration. It would create a difficult situation if those competent to undertake extensive exploration are prevented from doing so by extensive reservations unless we can show that the United States Government has organized adequate exploration of the territory in question.

While we have not had time to compute the area which the United States now asks to have reserved, it looks as though it would exceed 100,000 square miles. We do not see that there should be any objection to the reservation of the oil and gas rights in this territory in view of the provisions of the special regulations above mentioned for it means that the Minister will still have the right to allow entry to any bona fide company which has the resources to conduct worthwhile exploration and development and which is willing to concede to the allied governments whatever control of products may be necessary for the effective prosecution of the war, but the reservation should only be made on the distinct assurance that the United States will conduct active exploration to the satisfaction of the Canadian Government.⁵²

Yours very truly,

TELETYPE EX-4650

Ottawa, November 26, 1943

Your WA-5885 of November 25, 1943,[†] Canol Project.

The United States Ambassador called on Keenleyside on November 22nd and left a letter reading as follows:

“In an exchange of notes between the American Legation at Ottawa and the Department of External Affairs on December 28, 1942 and January 13, 1943 arrangements were made for a program of drilling exploratory oil wells in the Northwest Territories. In the note of the American Legation of December 28, 1942 it was stated that no plans had been worked out regarding facilities in connection with these wells beyond those already authorized by the Canadian Government and that the American Government would, of course, keep the Canadian Government fully informed of any future plans for carrying out these operations.

⁵² L'entente sur cette question fut incarnée par les notes du 18 janvier, du 17 février et du 13 mars. Voir Canada, Recueil des traités, 1943, N^o 19.

⁵² The agreement on this matter was embodied in Notes dated January 18, February 17 and March 13. See Canada, Treaty Series, 1943, No. 19.

It is believed that a point has now been reached when it would be useful for officials of the two Governments to have an exchange of views on this whole subject. Proposals are, therefore, being formulated dealing with the entire oil development in the Northwest which will be placed before the Canadian authorities informally at an early date as a suggested basis for such a discussion.”

Atherton then added that Hickerson and two officers from the War Department would like to come to Ottawa next week to discuss the matter.

We have agreed to meet them here on the afternoon of Thursday, December 2nd. We are to have a preliminary meeting of the interested Canadian officials on Tuesday, November 30th. A set of the papers being prepared for this meeting will be forwarded to you.

Minutes of a Meeting

Ottawa, November 30, 1943

MINUTES OF A MEETING HELD NOVEMBER 30, 1943,
TO DISCUSS THE CANOL DEVELOPMENT

1. A meeting was held in Room 123, East Block, on Tuesday, November 30, to discuss the Northwestern oil development, preparatory to a meeting with United States officials on Thursday, December 2nd. The following participated:

Mr. N.A. Robertson, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Mr. A.D.P. Heeney, Secretary, Cabinet War Committee

Commander C.P. Edwards, Deputy Minister of Transport

Dr. W.C. Clark, Deputy Minister of Finance

Mr. R.A. Gibson, Director, Lands, Parks and Forests Branch, Dept. of Mines and Resources

Major-General W.W. Foster, Special Commissioner for Defence Projects in the Northwest

Mr. C.W. Jackson, Executive Assistant to the Deputy Minister of Mines and Resources

Mr. J.E. Read, Legal Adviser, Dept. of External Affairs

Group Captain W.F. Hanna, Director of Plans, Dept. of National Defence for Air

Dr. J.S. Stewart, Dept. of Mines and Resources

Wing Commander P.A. Cumyn, Secretary, Interdepartmental Panel on Joint Defence Projects

Mr. H.L. Keenleyside, Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs – Chairman

Miss B.M. Bridge, Dept. of External Affairs – Secretary

2. Mr. Keenleyside opened the discussion with a brief reference to the recent hearings on the Canol Project conducted by the Truman Committee.⁵³ He said that the Canadian policy has been to hold completely aloof from what we consider a purely domestic quarrel between departments of the United States Government. Canada had been requested to provide certain facilities for the Canol construction as a matter of urgent war necessity. We were not asked for an opinion, nor did we express one officially, though in informal discussions it had been suggested that the emergency which the Canol Project was designed to meet would have passed before the facilities would be completed. Although members of the Truman Committee have hinted that Canada had "out-smarted" the United States War Department on the Canol deal, Mr. Fulton, Counsel of the Committee, admitted in private conversation with a member of the Canadian Legation that the Committee had no grievance against Canada. The worst feature from the standpoint of our relations with the United States arises from the attitude of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, who has argued that the War Department was inveigled into the project by the Arctic explorer, Stefansson, acting in the interests of Canadian Pacific Airlines. Another hearing is to be held in January by his Bureau on the financial side of the project.

Mr. Keenleyside then said that the question before the meeting was the attitude which the Canadian representatives should adopt towards the proposals which would undoubtedly be made by the Americans at the meeting with United States officials on Thursday, December 2. He pointed out that this case is probably only the first of a number of United States efforts to renegotiate war-time agreements with Canada, using as an excuse the development of public opinion in the United States. The manner in which we handle this question may have an important bearing on future proposals of the same kind.

3. Mr. Jackson stated that the wells in the Norman area are now producing an average of 8500 barrels per day. Canadian estimates of the extent of the oil field range from 35 to 50 million barrels, while United States estimates range from 50 to 100 million barrels.

4. Consideration was given to the possible proposals and arguments which might be advanced by the United States representatives for post-war use of the oil resources in the Northwest.

(a) Interest on Investment — The Financial Argument

Mr. Heeney reported that in a brief discussion with him Mr. Hickerson had taken the line that the United States had made a huge investment in the North-western oil development and that the time had come when they must of necessity give some thought to obtaining a return on their investment. It was unanimously agreed that we should refuse to admit the validity of any such argument. Our answer should be that the Canol Project was conceived as a defence project and that it should not be considered as a commercial investment. Mr. Robertson felt that a little reflection would probably convince the United States War Department that the use of the financial argument would be most ill-advised, even for home consumption. As a commercial venture, the Canol Project is indefensible.

(b) Installation of a 10" pipeline

General Foster informed the meeting that the suggestion had been made to him that the United States might propose the installation of a 10" pipeline, with a capacity of 20,000 barrels daily, to carry crude oil to Skagway whence it would be taken to the United States by tanker for refining. It was agreed that this suggestion should not be entertained. We should point out (a) that local needs, in an area whose economy is based on the internal combustion engine, could not be neglected; and (b) that the interests of overall continental defence require the maintenance of oil reserves in this region, whereas such a scheme would exhaust them in a very short time. Reference might also be made to the North Pacific Planning Project which is designed to consider the post-war development of the whole region in which the Canol Project is located.

(c) Dwindling United States Oil Reserves

The argument might be advanced that the United States had supplied large quantities of oil to Canada, thus depleting her own resources, and that they were therefore entitled to a portion of the product of this Canadian field. Such an argument would be contrary to the principle of joint use of resources embodied in the Hyde Park agreement, and, in any event, can be applied both ways (e.g. depletion of Canadian nickel and timber resources).

(d) The Defence Aspect

The Americans may suggest that we should have some kind of agreement whereby in the post-war period the United States defence forces in Alaska should not be denied access to the gasoline produced in the Northwest, but should obtain it on conditions not less favourable than those extended to Canadian defence forces in the same general area. After discussion, it was agreed that, subject to the result of an examination of the application of this argument to other defence facilities, there would be no objection to this or to our undertaking to maintain a strategic reserve for defence purposes in the Northwest.

It was suggested that it would be undesirable for political and other reasons to continue into the post-war period the exclusive rights now enjoyed by Imperial Oil as nominee of the United States Government. We will supply gasoline for defence purposes, but under a new agreement.

There was some discussion on the method of reaching such an agreement. Mr. Read thought it might best be handled as a recommendation of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. Mr. Robertson felt that it might be arranged as part of a general reciprocal agreement for defence, continuing into the post-war period the principles laid down in the Ogdensburg and Hyde Park agreements. He thought that consideration might profitably be given now to the conclusion of a comprehensive Canadian-American defence agreement (along the lines of the Anglo-Soviet Treaty).

5. It was agreed that Group Captain Hanna and Wing Commander Cumyn would prepare a memorandum as suggested in 4(d) above for circulation on Wednesday, December 1, and that Miss Bridge would place minutes of the present meeting in the afternoon mail today.

The meeting adjourned at 1 p.m.

DEFENCE ASPECTS OF THE CANOL PROJECT

Recent press comment suggests that certain sections of the United States public are becoming concerned about the very large sums of money which have been spent on United States war projects in foreign countries. The Canol project is but one of many such projects to which attention has been directed. In this instance, it has been charged that the War Department, on its own initiative and without seeking the advice of competent civil authorities, embarked on a grandiose scheme of oil development in Northwestern Canada; that expenditure of public funds there has been reckless and entirely unwarranted on the basis of the benefits which might have been expected to accrue to the United States; and that Canada will benefit greatly at the expense of the United States tax-payers. In the face of these charges, it may be assumed that the United States War Department will wish to take steps to reassure the United States public that their interests have been safeguarded.

One obvious solution, from the point of view of the United States War Department, would be to induce the Canadian Government to reimburse the United States Government for a part or all of the cost of the Canol project on the grounds that it will be of enormous post-war value to Canada. However, since the post-war disposition of the project has already been agreed upon, some other less direct approach will have to be made. An alternative would be that the Canol agreement should be revised so as to guarantee to the United States ample and readily available oil reserves needed in the post-war period for their defence forces stationed in the Alaskan theatre. If the Canol project could be represented in this light to the United States public, the criticism which has been levelled at the United States War Department would lose much of its force. There is reason to believe that the United States representative may make such a proposal in the course of the forthcoming conversations.

If the Canadian Government were to agree that on grounds of Hemisphere defence a part of the output from the Fort Norman oil field should be made available in the post-war period as a strategic reserve for the use of the United States defence forces in Alaska, the way might be left open for presentation by the United States of similar representations for other concessions on the grounds of joint defence needs. It therefore becomes necessary to make some appreciation of the position in which Canada would be placed if an initial concession regarding the Canol project were granted.

Since the United States Government has spent very large sums of money on the construction of defence facilities in Alaska and the Aleutians and, since these facilities may properly be regarded as vital to the defence of Northwestern Canada, as well as to that of the United States, it may be anticipated that Canada will be asked to permit the regular movement of United States land and air forces from continental United States through Canada to Alaska. The movement of land forces and equipment would involve the post-war military use of the Alaska Highway and, incidental thereto, the right to station repair and servicing detachments at intervals along the highway between the United States border and the Alaskan boundary. Similarly, the movement of air forces might necessitate the use of the Northwest airway to Alaska, including the right to set up servicing facilities, ground detachments, meteorological services, and separate communications along the airway.

In Eastern Canada a parallel situation prevails with respect to United States bases in Newfoundland. In this area, the United States might request permission to operate military aircraft from the Eastern States across Canada to leased bases in Newfoundland, such as Argentia and Stephenville. Such a request might include the right to establish maintenance and servicing detachments in Canada. The use of Goose Bay might also be required for military aircraft flying to and from Greenland.

If the defence agreement entered into with the United States included reciprocal provisions, Canada might secure permission from the United States to operate military aircraft over the State of Maine and across portions of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. Certain bases on the Pacific coast, such as Annette Island, might also be used by Canadian defence forces. Canada's position with respect to the post-war military use of bases and ancillary facilities in Newfoundland has not yet been defined, but sooner or later this question must be taken into consideration, and any proposals which are put forward should take into account United States defence interests in Newfoundland. In this connection, existing arrangements providing for the joint use of certain Newfoundland bases by United States and Canadian forces might be continued in the post-war period.

During the present war, Canada and the United States have been intimately associated in measures undertaken for the common defence of North America. Economic resources have been pooled, United States defence bases have been constructed in Canada, and United States forces have been given freedom of transit across Canadian territory. At some time in the near future, a decision will have to be reached as to whether these measures for common defence are to be terminated or continued into the post-war period. It may be suggested that Canada's interests can best be served by a continuance of the present close military association with the United States, but it should not be overlooked that, by the acceptance of this point of view, Canada will in a sense be committed to the consequences of future United States policy.

It may be suggested that the reservation, for the defence needs of another country, of an important natural resource such as oil, is purely an economic transaction and, as such, is not comparable to a concession which would grant to a foreign country the right of transit for armed forces and military equipment. If this point of view is accepted, it might be argued that the granting of special concessions by Canada with respect to the reservation of the Fort Norman oil resources for defence purposes in Alaska would not necessarily imply closer military collaboration with the United States. On the other hand, it must be recognized that the Canol Project was conceived, not as a commercial venture, but as a joint defence undertaking; that on this basis it was agreed to by the Canadian Government; and that the Project has been developed throughout as an integral part of the network of joint military installations in Northwestern Canada and Alaska. In view of these considerations, therefore, Canada might properly take the position that any modification or extension of the Canol agreement should be decided upon primarily in the light of joint United States-Canada defence requirements, with due regard being given to the interests of Canadian economy in the area affected. Accordingly, it is suggested that this matter should be referred to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence for review and recommendation.

MINUTES OF A MEETING HELD IN OTTAWA ON DECEMBER 2, 1943,
TO DISCUSS THE CANOL DEVELOPMENT

1. A meeting of United States and Canadian representatives was held in Room 123, East Block, at 2.30 p.m. on Thursday, December 2, 1943, for the purpose of discussing certain aspects of the oil development programme now being conducted in Northwestern Canada by the United States Army or by Imperial Oil as agent for the United States Army. The following participated:

UNITED STATES

Hon. Ray Atherton, United States Ambassador to Canada
 Col. Francis J. Graling, Military Attaché, United States Embassy
 Mr. Edward P. Lawton, First Secretary, United States Embassy
 Mr. John D. Hickerson, U.S. State Department
 Major-General T.M. Robins, Assistant Chief of Engineers, U.S. Army
 Brigadier-General H.L. Peckham, Office Quartermaster General, U.S. Army
 Brigadier-General Boykin Wright, Director of International Aid Division, Army Service Forces
 Lieutenant Loftus E. Becker, U.S. Army

CANADA

Mr. N.A. Robertson, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
 Mr. J.E. Read, Legal Adviser, Department of External Affairs
 Mr. H.L. Keenleyside, Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
 Miss B.M. Bridge, Department of External Affairs
 Mr. A.D.P. Heeney, Secretary, Cabinet War Committee
 Major-General W.W. Foster, Special Commissioner for Defence Projects in the Northwest
 Wing Commander P.A. Cumyn, Secretary, Interdepartmental Panel on Joint Defence Projects
 Dr. W.C. Clark, Deputy Minister of Finance
 Commander C.P. Edwards, Deputy Minister of Transport
 Mr. C.W. Jackson, Executive Assistant to the Deputy Minister of Mines and Resources
 Group Captain W.F. Hanna, Director of Plans, Department of National Defence for Air

2. Mr. Hickerson opened the discussion by explaining the considerations which had prompted the United States representatives to seek an exchange of views on this subject with Canadian officials. He described the grave strategic situation in the Pacific in the spring of 1942 which had led the War Department to embark upon the Canol Project as a strictly military venture. Subsequently the inauguration of the ferry service to Russia, and later the prospect of mounting a Northern air attack against Japan, made expansion of the original exploratory programme appear desirable. Now, however, with the change in the military and strategic picture in the North Pacific, American critics of the Project were tending to look at it from a commercial rather than a military standpoint. There were, moreover, possibilities of a further alteration in the situation due to the unexpectedly encouraging oil prospects revealed by the wildcatting activities. Although drilling operations had not been completed, geological structures at Loon Creek and Raider Island in the wildcat area were reported to be most promising. If sufficient oil should be discovered to make development of the field a commercial proposition, the present arrangement giving Imperial Oil a major interest in the wells would be embarrassing for both governments. Since the United States had done the pioneering and laid out large sums of money, they felt that, if a really large oil development resulted, it would be reasonable to propose that an equitable arrangement should be worked out (wholly consistent, of course, with Canadian sovereignty) whereby they could recover as much of their investment as the traffic would bear. Although the United States representatives were not yet in a position to make definite proposals, they desired to place the facts before the Canadian officials for their comments and advice. At the same time, they wished to inform the Canadian Government of their intention to renegotiate the contract with Imperial Oil.

Turning to the existing intergovernmental agreements covering the North-western oil development programme, Mr. Hickerson said that the first exchange of notes on the original Canol Project (June 27-29, 1942)⁵⁴ was drawn up at a time when it was thought that the whole undertaking would probably be abandoned at the end of the war. If, however, there should be a big find of oil, the United States situation would not be met by this arrangement for the disposition of the pipeline and refinery. The second exchange of notes (August 14-15, 1942)⁵⁵ on the Skagway or Supplementary Canol Project, did not settle the post-war disposition of the pipeline from Whitehorse to Skagway. Wildcatting operations conducted under the third exchange of notes (December 28, 1942-January 13, 1943)⁵⁶ gave promise of uncovering a much larger field than there had been any reason to expect at the time the agreement was made. Finally, the United States authorities felt that the distribution pipelines along the Alaska Highway should be considered as part of the Canol development, since they obviously could not be operated by highway maintenance personnel⁵⁷, and some provision should therefore be made for their post-war disposition.

In conclusion, Mr. Hickerson summed up briefly what the United States representatives wished to accomplish at this meeting, namely, (a) to discuss with the Canadian officials the extent of the field; (b) to acquaint them with the intention of the United States to renegotiate the contract with Imperial Oil and to ascertain whether the Canadian Government shared, in general, the United States approach to the problem; and (c) to canvass the possibility of reaching some arrangement which would modify the existing intergovernmental agreements in certain respects and which would (d) provide for the contingencies which would flow from the discovery of a very large oil field in the area. He added that neither government could afford to lose sight of the fact that the Mackenzie Valley field is so located as to be of enormous strategic value under certain circumstances. Some consideration should therefore be given by both Canada and the United States to the future military value of the oil resources, the pipelines and the refinery.

3. The following is a brief summary of the discussions on these four points:

(a) General Foster stated that all information on the field has already been furnished to him with the exception of certain geological data which General

⁵⁶ See Canada, Treaty Series, 1942, No. 18.

⁵⁷ The following note was in the original:

Worsham⁵⁸ felt he should not turn over without specific authorization from the War Department. General Robins said that the necessary authorization would be sent to General Worsham immediately and that the Canadian Government was welcome to and would be given every scrap of information that the United States officials received. In this connection General Peckham requested that the Canadian Government would not make available either to the press or to private concerns the results of the wildcatting operations — e.g. definite locations of the wildcat holes, indications resulting from geological and geophysical structures, flow of wildcat wells. Mr. Jackson assured him that such information would be treated by the Canadian Government as strictly confidential.

(b) The representatives of the United States War Department pointed out that the original contract with Imperial Oil was made on the basis of a 7-8 million barrel field, not on the 50 to 150 million barrel field which in their opinion was now in prospect. As the present contract stands, moreover, no distinction is made in price between oil from wells developed at the Company's expense and wells developed exclusively at United States expense. It is thus possible for critics of the project in the United States to argue that the United States Government has developed an oil field for Imperial Oil without receiving any return. Mr. Keenleyside said that, subject to further consideration, there would, in his opinion, be no disposition on the part of the Canadian Government to object to the United States renegotiating the contract with Imperial Oil. The Canadian Government would, of course, be interested in the terms. The United States representatives gave assurance that the Canadian Government would be kept fully informed on the progress of these negotiations.

(c) Enlarging upon his previous statement, Mr. Hickerson stated that even if no large field is discovered, the original intergovernmental agreements require modification in certain respects. For instance, to answer current criticism in the United States it should be made clear that the United States will have the right to purchase gasoline for military purposes from the Norman field in the post-war period; the clause with respect to title to the right-of-way should be re-phrased in such a way as to remove misunderstanding of its meaning in the United States; some provision should be made for post-war maintenance of the pipelines which otherwise would be allowed to deteriorate since they could not be operated commercially at a profit. In this connection Mr. Keenleyside stated that he felt that the defence aspects and the use of the pipelines have been reasonably taken care of in the existing agreements which forbid dismantlement except on recommendation of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. Unless there is some new overall agreement to modify them, the Canadian Government would be inclined to leave them as they are, although there would probably be no serious objection to minor revisions. Mr. Read asked whether the United States representatives were committed to the idea of revision of the existing agreements or whether a supplementary agreement, taking into account the post-war situation would be more satisfactory. The United States representatives said that their principal concern was to reach an agreement; they had no particular predilection about the form it should take.

Mr. Robertson referred to the Congressional criticism of the Canol Project and said that such difficulties were not peculiar to the United States. There had been a number of indications in recent months that Canadian public opinion was worried about possible implications of the extent of United States participation in joint defence projects in Canada — and a feeling that the United States had been allowed to construct a good many defence facilities in Canada that this country could have built, if its war effort had not been fully extended in other directions. This is the background against which we have to consider revision of any of the defence arrangements.

(d) The United States War Department representatives stated that the question of United States post-war financial participation would only arise if the field should turn out to be an enormous one, in which event they felt that it would be desirable and equitable to work out some new arrangement, both from the standpoint of a post-war military resource of oil, and of some return on the United States investment of $134,000,000. Mr. Keenleyside felt that Canol should not be considered as a commercial investment. It was, he said, an investment in defence and should continue to be regarded as such. With regard to the contingency of a bonanza being discovered in the Northwest, he suggested that it would be of interest to consider what the United States Government or the Canadian Government had done in comparable circumstances involving their own nationals. General Wright referred to the fact that in somewhat parallel circumstances the United States after the war would be discussing with the recipients of Lease-Lend assistance the return that the American Government might expect to receive. In reply it was pointed out that Canada's contributions through the Mutual Aid procedure were being given without any intention of asking for post-war recompense.

Mr. Keenleyside also suggested that the increased commercial value of the Canol installations, if the field turned out to be very extensive, would be met, in part at least, by the existing arrangements for their disposition. If there was assurance that the refinery could be kept operating at full capacity as an adjunct to a major movement of oil from the Mackenzie valley to the coast, its assessed value — and consequently its selling price — would be greatly enhanced. Mr. Hickerson, however, felt that the operating cost of a 3,000 barrel refinery, coupled with the expense of transporting the refined product to its logical markets, would be prohibitive from a commercial standpoint. In reply to a question by Mr. Keenleyside the United States representatives stated that no estimates have been made of the size of pipeline which would be necessary to make the delivery of crude at Skagway for refining in British Columbia or a Pacific State a commercial proposition.

In conclusion, Mr. Keenleyside summarized what he considered to be the tentative attitude of the Canadian participants in the discussion in relation to the United States proposals. In his opinion

A — there would be no disposition to object to the renegotiation of the United States contract with Imperial Oil, although Canada would, of course, have an interest in the terms;

B – sympathetic consideration would be given to proposals for minor modifications, of the kind mentioned as illustrations by Mr. Hickerson, in the present agreements;

C – arrangements for the utilization of the Mackenzie Valley oil and of the Canol installations for joint defence purposes could probably be worked out, if and insofar as they are not adequately covered by the existing agreements, without great difficulty;

D – the Canadian representatives would be inclined to advise their Government against the acceptance of modifications in the present agreements based on the assumption that a major oil development might be discovered in the Northwest.

He added, however, that this summary, of course, was not to be considered an official reply. The Canadian participants in the discussions would be interested to receive additional information and suggestions from the United States and would, in any case, give further thought to the views advanced in the present meeting.

4. At the close of the meeting the United States representatives furnished the following rough breakdown of the cost of the project:

Drilling operations in the Norman field – $5,000,000
 Wildcatting operations – $2-3,000,000
 Small pipelines – $34,000,000
 4" pipeline (Norman to Whitehorse) – $31,000,000
 Refinery – $24,000,000
 Transportation costs (including development of Mackenzie waterway) – $26,000,000

5. The meeting adjourned at 5 p.m.

NORTHWEST AIRWAY – PAYMENT FOR ADDITIONAL COSTS

When, on the recommendation of the Joint Defence Commission, the Canadian Government decided to construct this airway, the policy was adopted that the whole cost should be borne by Canada.

It is evident, from our discussions with the officers of the United States Army Air Service Ferry Command, that very large additional facilities will now be required. They stated that the U.S. Ferry Command had received a large allocation for this purpose and that they were quite willing to bear the cost of any further work required.

It is recommended that the Canadian Government continue to accept responsibility for the cost of completion of the programme of work already authorized and in hand according to plans and specifications already approved.

The United States Government should be asked to accept financial responsibility for all other work, including supply of additional ranges, and emergency landing strips adjacent to them, 2-way radio, extension of runway systems, taxi strips, hangars, additional housing facilities, gas storage and refuelling facilities, and transportation costs in creating such facilities, the provision or purchase of any lands required excepted.

The Air Services Branch having the necessary engineering staffs, construction equipment and contractors on the ground who are familiar with conditions, should complete the work at the present airport sites and also any extra work required by the extension of existing contracts.

In regard to construction work at new sites on the route, the Air Services Branch has already made preliminary surveys for intermediate landing strips, and the location of additional ranges. It is suggested that advantage be taken of this knowledge and that construction of any additional airport facilities be undertaken on behalf of the U.S. authorities by the Air Services Branch. If, however, the U.S. authorities would prefer to construct such additional facilities by their own forces at the same time that they are building the highway, this Department would have no objection.⁵⁹

Submitted for approval.

ADDITIONAL FACILITIES ON THE NORTHWEST AIRWAY

1. It is my understanding that Canada has spent, or is spending, some ten million dollars in providing airfields and their essential equipment along the air route from Edmonton to Fairbanks. The facilities thus being created or supplied are sufficient to handle fighter planes and medium bombers. They will also be adequate for the servicing of ordinary commercial planes. They are not adequate however, for the large Consolidated bombers that the United States may wish to send to Alaska, nor would these facilities be capable of handling the type of plane that is likely to be used on the commercial service which will inevitably be established along the Great Circle route after the war.

2. The United States Army Air Service Ferry Command have received a large allocation of funds from which they propose to spend sufficient money to expand the fields and to provide such additional equipment and facilities as may be necessary to make the route available for any type of plane now in service. It is estimated that the cost of this expansion will be somewhere in the neighbourhood of four to five million dollars.

3. The desirability of the Canadian Government avoiding any unnecessary expenditure is so obvious that it does not need to be emphasized. It is almost equally desirable that United States funds should be spent in Canada whenever this can be arranged without putting Canada under any detrimental obligation.

4. There is only one real reason for objecting to the proposal that the United States should be allowed to expend money for the purposes indicated above. The objection is that, if the United States does spend five million dollars on the Northwest air route the Americans will have a proprietary and perpetual interest in the fields which they have extended and whose equipment they have supplemented. This may not be a matter of any particular significance during the war; American interest, however, will not terminate with the end of the conflict. Americans will continue to look upon the fields as their own. The United States will undoubtedly establish commercial services to the Far East and will certainly expect special concessions and privileges in "their" fields. Canada will be under an everlasting obligation, and Washington will not hesitate to remind Ottawa of that fact when commercial competition develops and controversies result.

5. Under the circumstances, and unfortunate as it is that additional expenditure is necessary, it is submitted that it would be desirable to follow in this case the established policy by which the Canadian Government itself pays for all permanent facilities established in Canada for the use of United States forces, or for joint use by the forces of Canada and the United States. Five million dollars is a great deal of money but the expenditure of that sum in Canada, even under present conditions, would probably be preferable to the acceptance of a perpetual obligation which would be detrimental to Canadian prestige now and to Canadian national and commercial interests when peace returns.

Dear Commander Edwards,

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 17,¹ and of the memorandum regarding additional construction on the Northwest airway⁶¹ which accompanied it.

When speaking to you on the telephone yesterday, I referred to the fact that the policy suggested in the memorandum under reference, namely, that the United States should be allowed to spend money in Canada for facilities to be used by United States forces based in or passing through this country, is contrary to the principle that has heretofore been maintained by the Canadian Government. You will recall that this matter has been before Council in connection with air base facilities and other establishments in the Maritime Provinces, British Columbia and Newfoundland. The only variation from this rule is found in the agreement covering the construction of the Alaska highway.⁶²

As I promised in our conversation, I am sending you two copies of a brief memorandum⁶³ prepared in this Department in which reference is made to the possibility of difficulties being experienced in the post-war period if the Canadian Government should abandon its present policy in the case of the Northwest airway. Recalling the unscrupulous methods which have been employed to bring pressure on the Canadian Government in connection with the campaign of United States interests to obtain a commercial franchise over this route, it seems to me that the dangers mentioned in the Departmental memorandum are not at all unlikely to materialize.

I think that it might be helpful if you would consider the views expressed in this memorandum, and let Mr. Robertson have the benefit of your advice in the premises. Whatever your views in regard to the question of policy I assume that you will also wish to discuss with your Minister the most appropriate method of placing the matter before the Cabinet War Committee. We will be glad to learn what steps the Honourable Mr. Howe may wish to have taken for this purpose.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Dr. Keenleyside,

I have your favour of the 25th inst., enclosing memo regarding the provision of additional airway facilities on the northwest route to Alaska, and have discussed the matter in some detail with my Minister.

In reply I am directed to say that we fully appreciate the points you raise, but after careful review of the whole situation, we are of the opinion that it would not jeopardize our future position to permit the United States to contribute to the extension of these facilities.

Our attitude is that our present programme, when completed, will provide an airway completely adequate for the services we now contemplate, and if, at some future date, we find we require additional facilities for commercial services, we will then provide them.

If, however, in the meantime the United States, for military purposes, desire certain extensions immediately in order to handle their heavy military planes, then in permitting them to contribute the cost of such extensions, we do not regard ourselves as committed in any way to according them any commercial rights at some future date.

Yours faithfully,

My dear Prime Minister,

I enclose a memorandum on the subject of certain proposals by the United States for the expenditure of money in Canada which will almost certainly be made at the next meeting of the Joint Board. The purpose of submitting it is that the members of the Canadian Section should, if possible, obtain an indication of the Government's view as to the principle which should guide them in dealing with proposals of this kind.

Yours faithfully,

*Mémorandum du président, la section canadienne, CPCAD,

Memorandum from Chairman, Canadian Section, PJBD, to Prime Minister

Ottawa, April 17, 1942

1. The meeting by the United States of the cost of defence facilities in Canada will be proposed at the next meeting of the Board on the 27th of this month with respect to several works. It would be of great assistance if an indication could be given of the Government's view as to the principle which should guide the Canadian Section in dealing with proposals of the kind.
2. The anticipated proposals relate to (a) the improvement of the airway between Edmonton and Fairbanks, Alaska, (b) the construction of an aerodrome near Chimo, Ungava, in Northern Quebec as part of an airway leading through the Canadian aerodrome at Goose Inlet, Labrador, to Greenland, Iceland and Europe, and (c) barrack accommodation for United States troops and dock facilities at Prince Rupert. The United States members of the Board will probably assume that the United States should meet the expense to be incurred at Prince Rupert. They will offer also to meet the cost of the improvement of the northwestern airway and the provision of the Chimo aerodrome.
3. The Canadian departments concerned have as yet reached no conclusion as to the necessity or feasibility of the Chimo project. The programme for the works at Prince Rupert has been approved by the General Officer Commanding West Coast Defences, the estimated cost of these works being some $61/2 millions. The improvements to the northwestern airway have been the subject of discussion at meetings attended by representatives of the Canadian and United States authorities concerned. The cost of what has been agreed upon as desirable is estimated roughly at $51/2 millions, an amount approximately equal to that of the airway as originally projected and substantially completed.
4. Of this additional expenditure of $51/2 millions about $2,000,000 is for the construction of emergency landing grounds intermediate between the existing aerodromes and the provision of range apparatus thereon. A further $500,000 is for buildings on the existing aerodromes, and the balance of $3,000,000 is for increasing the size of these and lengthening the landing strips, etc. thereon. The work of increasing the size of the aerodromes is being proceeded with by the Department of Transport, the necessary machinery having remained in place since last season, but responsibility for the cost remains in suspense.
5. From a financial point of view there are obvious advantages in accepting United States offers to meet expenditures on defence projects. The disadvantage of doing so is that in some cases acceptance might after the war afford foundation for claims by United States organizations to some sort of semi-proprietary rights in Canadian undertakings.

6. My own view, if I may be permitted to express it, would be that Canada should, as part of its own war expenditure, meet the cost of installations forming part of anything to be regarded as a Canadian undertaking, especially if this is likely to be of use after the war, but that there is no reason why the United States should not be permitted to meet the cost of any other installation in Canada which it regards as necessary for defence.

7. Approval of this principle would lead to the assumption by Canada of responsibility for the improvement of the northwestern airway and the construction of the aerodrome at Chimo if this is undertaken. It would, on the other hand, leave the United States to bear the cost of any facilities which it is agreed should be provided for United States use at Prince Rupert.

U.S. EXPENDITURES IN CANADA FOR DEFENCE PROJECTS — ALASKA AIR ROUTE; AERODROME AT CHIMO;
 PRINCE RUPERT FACILITIES

11. THE SECRETARY submitted a memorandum from the Chairman of the Canadian Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, requesting direction on the principle which should govern in respect of the cost of certain defence facilities undertaken in Canada at the instance of the United States.

It was expected that the American members of the Board would, at the next meeting, suggest that the United States pay for the improvement of the airway between Edmonton and Fairbanks, the construction of an aerodrome near Chimo, Ungava, and barrack accommodation and dock facilities at Prince Rupert in connection with movements of U.S. troops and supplies to Alaska. Additional expenditure on the airway to Alaska was estimated at — $2,000,000 for construction of emergency landing grounds, $500,000 for buildings on existing aerodromes, and $3,000,000 for increasing the size of aerodromes and lengthening landing strips. This work was proceeding. The Chimo project had not yet been examined or approved by the Canadian departments concerned. The programme for works at Prince Rupert had received approval of the G.O.C. West Coast Defences.

Colonel Biggar's memorandum expressed the view that the disadvantage of accepting U.S. offers to meet expenditures on defence projects was that acceptance, in certain cases, might afford foundation for post-war claims. It recommended, therefore, that Canada meet the cost of installations forming part of anything to be regarded as a Canadian undertaking, and that, in respect of these three specific proposals, Canada should accept responsibility for improvement of the northwestern airway, and the construction of the aerodrome at Chimo if this were undertaken. An explanatory note had been circulated.

Letter, Chairman, Canadian Section P.J.B.D. to the Prime Minister, and attached memorandum, April 17, 1942; also Secretary's note, April 21, 1942 — C.W.C. document 140.[†])

12. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY said that the original arrangement regarding the air route to Alaska had involved Canadian agreement to build and pay for aerodromes, up to Canadian standards on the understanding that any additions requested by the United States would be for U.S. account, Canada retaining full title and control. There was no reason why the United States should not finance the improvements which they required in existing aerodromes. Emergency landing fields, however, should be for Canadian account as should also the aerodrome at Chimo, if that were decided upon.

The possibility of the United States attempting to press any claims to post-war rights in these installations had been specifically provided against. It had been clearly understood that no such claims would be made as a result of money spent in Canada during the war.

13. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR agreed that the United States should be permitted to pay for what they wanted beyond Canadian requirements, on condition that Canada retained title and control.

14. The War Committee, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that the United States be permitted to pay for such approved extensions and improvements to existing defence installations in Canada as are required by U.S. forces beyond Canadian standards and requirements, on condition that Canada retain full title and control; thus the cost of additional work upon existing aerodromes of the northwestern airway, but not the cost of constructing emergency landing grounds, should be for U.S. account.

(b) that the cost of defence installations in Canada used by Canadian forces, up to Canadian standards and requirements, should be paid for by Canada; thus the construction of emergency fields for the northwestern airway and the construction of the proposed aerodrome at Chimo, or elsewhere, as part of an air route to Europe (should that be decided upon by Canadian defence authorities) should be for Canadian account;

(c) that there was no objection to the United States providing, at their own cost, barrack accommodation and dock facilities, for use by American forces, at Prince Rupert;

(d) that the proposal to construct an aerodrome at or near Chimo be examined by the Chiefs of Staff.

TWENTY-NINTH MEETING OF THE BOARD,
NEW YORK, APRIL 27, 1942

11. The United States Army Air Member referred to recent conversations between officers of the United States Army Air Corps and officials of the Canadian Government in regard to improvements which the United States Army Air Corps Officials desired made in Canada in order to facilitate the operation of the military air route via Canadian points to Alaska. He stated that it is the view of the United States War Department that it would be an appropriate matter for the Board to discuss and to arrive at some fair division of the cost of these improvements as between the Canadian Government and the United States Government. The Chairman of the Canadian Section stated that the Canadian Government felt that Canada should properly pay for the construction of new fields or other permanent works of continuing value to the airway and that the United States should pay for such approved extensions and improvements to existing facilities as are required by the United States forces beyond Canadian standards and requirements. It was the view of the Board that this is an equitable arrangement in respect to the cost of these improvements.

*Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
to Prime Minister*

[Ottawa,] May 28, 1942

General George, Colonel Maclachlan and three other senior officers of the United States Army Air Corps were in Ottawa today to discuss with the Acting Chief of the Air Staff the United States plans for developing the northern air route to the United Kingdom. This question was before the Permanent Joint Board on Defence at its meeting in Quebec on Monday and Tuesday, and will be the subject of a special meeting of the Board to be held in Ottawa on Monday. Today's meeting was intended to give senior Canadian Air officers a full understanding of the United States plans, so that our Service Departments could give rapid consideration to the recommendation which may be expected from the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

To bring the full weight of American plane production to bear in air offensives against Germany, facilities have to be provided for delivering a thousand planes a month, both bombers and fighters, to the United Kingdom. The existing route by way of Gander or Goose River cannot be enlarged to handle this contemplated expansion of traffic, for three reasons:

- (1) Available ground facilities are strictly limited.
- (2) Fog and precipitation block the use of the route between Labrador and Newfoundland for long and uncertain periods.
- (3) The over-water lap to the United Kingdom is too long for anything but the bigger bombers to navigate safely.

To fulfil the commitment which the President gave Mr. Churchill about United States air assistance to the United Kingdom, and to carry out the directives of the Chiefs of Staff, the United States has had to envisage an enormous development of additional and alternative air routes to Europe. They contemplate using three primary routes:

- (1) A projection of the direct air line from Southern California, where the bombers are built, along the western side of Hudson's Bay, across Southampton Island, Baffinland, Greenland and Iceland, to the United Kingdom.
- (2) From Detroit to Moosonee, across Ungava to Fort Chimo in Ungava Bay and thence to Greenland and so on to the United Kingdom.
- (3) The present route via Newfoundland and Labrador, either direct to the United Kingdom or by way of Greenland and Iceland to the United Kingdom.

The more northerly routes are being designed to ferry aircraft to the United Kingdom, but they would also be capable of extension to Archangel if reinforcement of the Russian front were more needed.

The President and the United States Army Air Corps give absolute priority to this project, which they believe to be of the highest strategical importance. They are prepared to spend any sums necessary to construct the main and intermediate airfields required for these ferry services, and will commandeer all the equipment and supplies in the United States that may be needed for their construction. They are prepared to assume the whole cost of the project, which cannot be closely estimated, but may easily be nearer two hundred million dollars than one hundred million dollars. They claim that they appreciate the magnitude of the undertaking, the difficulties which the construction of the airfields and the maintenance of ferry services through high latitudes will entail, and they are anxious to make an immediate and more or less simultaneous start on the construction of all the necessary facilities so that the routes will be in operation for next winter and the spring of 1943, and capable of handling the output of American plane production which by then would be in full swing.

The questions for consideration by the War Committee are:

- (1) Whether Canada will permit the construction of the necessary airports and related facilities in Canadian territory.

This decision, I think, will be influenced by the extent to which the offensive possibilities of the new air routes are limited by the defence liability which the construction of these air bases will create. This is a point on which you will presumably wish to have the advice of the Chiefs of Staff.

(2) Whether Canada will permit the United States to bear the full cost of construction, or whether we should attempt to maintain the policy heretofore pursued of providing ourselves any basic airfields needed in Canadian territory.

I think myself that the magnitude of the operation envisaged by the President is so great as to require a reconsideration of this policy. When it was a question of the construction of one additional airfield at Chimo to match the field we had built at Goose River, I thought there was everything to be said for our assuming responsibility for its construction and control. Now that we are faced with a demand for construction of seven or eight big fields, intermediate fields, radio direction-finding stations, etc., I think we have to regard our Far North as a "theatre of military operations" in which we should be grateful for all the aid our ally can give the common cause. At this stage of the war it would be impossible for us to block the carrying out of a project which may well have a decisive effect on the outcome and duration of the war, and equally impossible for us to assume the cost ourselves of installing and maintaining the facilities in Canadian territory which the project requires.

Mr. Power, with whom I was speaking this afternoon, would be very glad to have a direction from you on the higher political aspects of the plan. He proposes to ask the Chiefs of Staff to report at once on the defence aspects of the American proposal. He is worried about its political implications. He will try to have a word with Colonel Ralston on the telephone today, and will let me know what the latter's views are.⁶⁴

NORTHERN AIR FERRY ROUTES TO EUROPE

28. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR raised, as a question of urgency, proposals of the U.S. Army Air Forces Ferry Command for the early development of aerodromes in Northern Canada and Labrador, for the purpose of ferrying operational aircraft to the United Kingdom.

Preliminary discussions with high U.S. officers had taken place in advance of the formulation of a complete scheme to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

The proposals envisaged three routes, the first from San Francisco via Regina and Churchill, the second, from Detroit via Chimo and York Sound, the third, a modification of the existing route from Presque Isle, or Montreal, via Goose Bay.

⁶⁴ The following note was written on the memorandum:

The capacity contemplated was 1,000 aircraft per month, 100 per day, 30 per hour. The United States were prepared to pay for the whole or any part of the development, undertake surveys and construction and furnish necessary defences. They would, however, appreciate Canadian assistance and advice. The cost would run up to 200 million dollars.

(D.C.A.S. memorandum to the Minister, May 28, 1942).[†]

29. MR. POWER said that two principal questions emerged, the first concerned defence aspects of the scheme; the second, the high political implications. It was suggested that the Chiefs of Staff should be asked to look immediately into the former, while the latter should be reviewed by the Prime Minister from the point of view of American expenditure in Canada, and possible American garrisons in aerodromes within the Canadian boundaries.

While both the R.C.A.F. and the R.A.F. staffs had reservations as to the practicability of these routes, and felt that losses in passage would inevitably be great, the U.S. Government accorded the project the highest priority and wished to have an immediate decision. The object was to bring the full weight of American plane production to bear in air offensives against Germany.

The Permanent Joint Board on Defence were holding a special meeting on the subject on June 1st, and their early recommendation could be anticipated.

30. The War Committee, after some discussion, expressed general agreement that Canada should give her consent to the scheme. It was decided, however, to refer defence aspects of the project to the Chiefs of Staff for immediate report, and higher political aspects of the plan for the views of the Prime Minister.

NORTHEAST AIR FERRY ROUTES — CANADA-U.S.
PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE

16. THE SECRETARY submitted the Journal for the Board's recent meetings, at Quebec and Montreal, on May 26th and June 9th. Copies of the Journal had been received the previous day and communicated immediately to the Prime Minister, the Ministers of National Defence and the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

The Journal for these meetings, included the Board's twenty-sixth Recommendation, reading as follows:

"In order to facilitate the greatly increased ferrying projects of the United States Government in transporting fighter, light, medium, and long-range bombardment aircraft across the North Atlantic, the Board recommends:

(a) That the airfields in Canadian territory on the ferry routes outlined in the Army Air Force appreciation dated June 6th be constructed with such variations as the detailed survey, now under way, may determine to be advisable.

(b) That the Canadian Government construct or authorize the United States Government to construct these fields and inform the United States Government as promptly as possible what fields, if any, Canada will construct.

(c) That the existing ferry airdrome facilities in Canada and Newfoundland, including Labrador, form a part of the proposed ferrying project and be increased, wherever necessary, to appropriate capacity.

(d) That such additional radio weather-reporting facilities for these routes be provided and maintained as may be agreed upon by the United States and the Canadian Governments.

(e) That all costs of constructing airfields and other installations in connection with this project be borne by the Government which agrees to undertake that part of the project.

(f) That suitable arrangements be made in Washington and Ottawa to insure the proper centralization of responsibility for an control over the work of construction, and to provide the maximum facilities for instant and effective contact and co-operation between the appropriate authorities of the two countries.

(g) That the proposals relating to defence, to the maintenance of Canadian sovereignty and the post-war disposition of the new installations as outlined in the memoranda[†] under reference be accepted by the two Governments.

(h) That these airfields and facilities be made available for the use of the Royal Air Force Ferry Command.”

(P.J.B.D. Journal, May 26 and June 9, 1942).

17. MR. HEENEY pointed out that, on May 28th, the American proposals had received consideration, the War Committee expressing general agreement and referring defence aspects of the project to the Chiefs of Staff, and higher political aspects for the views of the Prime Minister.

The Chiefs of Staff had since examined the Service questions involved, and Mr. King had had an opportunity of considering the proposals from the national point of view. Copies of the Chiefs of Staff report had been circulated.

(Chiefs of Staff's report to the Ministers, May 30, 1942 — C.W.C. document 180).[†]

18. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE observed that the Chiefs of Staff recommended that Canada undertake control and air defence of the Canadian portion of each route, as far north as Churchill, Kapuskasing and Goose Bay, and, for the present, Army responsibility for defence of a limited number of aerodromes. Control and defence of remaining aerodromes by U.S. forces should be subject to Canada's right to assume responsibility when able to do so, and compliance, meantime, with the standards of defence regarded as adequate by Canadian authorities.

The Deputy Chief of the Air Staff had estimated, roughly, that $10,000,000 would be involved in the construction of aerodromes recommended to be under Canadian control.

19. THE PRIME MINISTER expressed the view that, since the United States attached such high value to these routes, Canadian approval to their establishment should be given.

Possibly the question as to the actual projects to be undertaken by Canada should be referred to a committee of interested Ministers.

20. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY again expressed his scepticism as to the practicability of the most northerly routes. That via Goose Bay was proving satisfactory and was under Canadian control. The United States should be permitted to build other routes at their own expense.

21. THE MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES referred to possible wage difficulties in the event of American construction of aerodromes in Northern Canada.

As to the political aspect of the scheme, so long as the question of ultimate control by Canada was settled, there should be no political objection.

22. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE suggested that Canada could not altogether avoid responsibility for defending any point in Canadian territory which required defence, irrespective of any arrangements made with the United States.

23. The War Committee, after further discussion, approved, on behalf of the government of Canada, the Twenty-sixth Recommendation of the Canada U.S. Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

The question of the extent to which construction in Canada, along the new routes, should be undertaken by the Canadian government, and to what extent by the United States, was referred, for-examination and report, to a sub-committee consisting of the Ministers of National Defence, Finance, and Munitions and Supply.

NORTH ATLANTIC FERRY ROUTE

7. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE reported that modified proposals had now passed the Combined Planning Committee. As submitted for approval by the Combined Chiefs of Staff, the scheme now involved the conversion of the original fighter route via Regina, The Pas, Churchill, etc. to a bomber route, the abandonment of the proposed route via Kapuskasing, Moosonee, Chimo, etc., and the further development of the existing route via Presque Isle and Goose Bay.

The question of Canadian participation in the construction of new aerodromes and their defence had been considered further with the Chiefs of Staff who had now prepared a further report, copies of which had been circulated.

The Chiefs of Staff recommended that, subject to the provisions of the Twenty-sixth Recommendation of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, Canada undertake and pay for completion of facilities at Goose Bay (as arranged) and construction at Regina, The Pas and Churchill, and that the United States develop Southampton Island and the winter fields at Chimo, Frobisher Bay or Cape Dyer. As to defence, they recommended that Canada accept responsibility for aerodromes at Regina, The Pas and Churchill. In fact, this involved defence at Churchill only, defence of the other two points being regarded as unnecessary.

(Chiefs of Staff memorandum, undated, to the Ministers — C.W.C. document 208).[†]

8. MR. RALSTON expressed the view that the Canadian government need not undertake financial responsibility for the construction of any of the new aerodromes involved. Further, the United States should be asked to provide, for these stations, defences adequate to Canadian requirements. Construction, maintenance and administration by the United States should be carried on in collaboration with Canadian authorities so as to take into account all considerations of defence, labour and material supply, and other conditions affecting Canadian war activities.

9. THE CHIEF OF THE AIR STAFF expressed the opinion that the recommendation of the Chiefs of Staff was in line with government policy regarding construction of U.S.-Canada joint defence projects. They provided for concurrent financial and defence responsibilities.

10. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE said that the project was an American one and there was nothing whatever to prevent the United States paying for the whole of it. Canadian financial commitments connected with the war were already enormous and the task of raising the money required for all war needs was already critical. To permit the United States to bear the whole cost of this development might later prove embarrassing, but it must be done nevertheless if other obligations of the Canadian war effort were to be performed.

In the circumstances, Mr. Ralston's suggestions should be accepted.

11. THE MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES was inclined to the view that Canada should undertake defence of Churchill and Canadian points. There was no objection to the United States paying the costs involved in construction. There might, however, be difficulties in accepting American administration.

12. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR agreed with Mr. Ralston's proposals. As for Regina, it was already constructed and would be under Canadian control. It was important that the Canadian staff should have recognized authority to decide upon the standards of defences to be provided.

13. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the U.S. government be informed that Canada would co-operate fully in granting permission for the construction, maintenance and administration during the war, of additional aerodromes and facilities included in the modified North Atlantic ferry routes project, provided —

(a) that all costs of new aerodromes and facilities involved were borne by the United States;

(b) that construction, maintenance and administration were carried on in collaboration with Canadian authorities so as to take into account considerations of defence, labour and material supply, and other conditions affecting Canadian war activities; and

(c) that defences for all aerodromes and facilities were provided by the United States to the extent regarded as adequate by the Canadian authorities.

Ottawa, July 4, 1942

Dear Mr. Heeney,

I have just now received your letter[†] of yesterday on the subject of the construction and defence of aerodromes on the projected North Atlantic ferry routes.

I venture to suggest that the decision as to the defence of the two aerodromes at Le Pas and Churchill might usefully be reconsidered. These aerodromes stand in a special position in that both are situated far from the Canada-United States border and on Canadian railway lines. These circumstances are no doubt relevant to the question of which Government should undertake their construction, but still more relevant to the question of their defence.

The handing of them altogether over to the United States forces might constitute a somewhat awkward precedent. Moreover I understand that their defence is a matter involving only negligibly small, if indeed any, forces, and that whatever forces are necessary for the aerodrome at Regina, which may be used as part of the route, are already available there.

Had the subcommittee before it the Department of Transport's preliminary estimate of the cost of preparing the two fields apart from the buildings, for which, according to the Northwest Airway precedent, the United States might assume responsibility? This estimate is, as I understand, that the cost would be of the order of $3,000,000.

Yours very truly,

O. M. BIGGAR

RE: NORTH ATLANTIC FERRY ROUTES —
DEFENCE OF AERODROMES IN CANADA

You will remember that at last week's meeting of the Cabinet War Committee, it was decided that the construction of all new aerodromes on the proposed ferry routes should be paid for by the United States, whose forces should undertake their defence, subject to compliance with Canadian requirements.

On being informed of this decision, Colonel Biggar has written me the attached letter, urging that any defence necessary at The Pas and Churchill be undertaken by Canadian forces.

It seems to me that there is a good deal in Colonel Biggar's contentions. The defence problems at these two points are almost negligible and would cost little, if anything, in men and money. On the other hand, the presence of American troops at these two points for defence purposes might, at the least, prove to be embarrassing. Our Chiefs of Staff have said that, in present circumstances, no defence facilities are necessary at The Pas or Churchill.

I am sending copies of Colonel Biggar's letter to Mr. Ralston and Mr. Power, also to Mr. Robertson, and propose to put the subject on the agenda for this week's regular meeting of the War Committee.

NORTH ATLANTIC FERRY ROUTES

37. THE SECRETARY reported that he had received a communication from the Chairman of the Canadian Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, expressing concern as to the effect of the War Committee's decision of July the 1st with regard to the defence of the two aerodromes to be built at The Pas and Churchill. In view of the fact that both of these points were far from the international boundary, and as the defence problem involved was not serious, Colonel Biggar suggested that the question of responsibility for defence be reconsidered. Otherwise, he felt a somewhat awkward precedent would be established. An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Secretary's note, July 7, 1942 — C.W.C. document 220).†

38. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY expressed the view that reconsideration should also be given to responsibility for constructing these two aerodromes. The effect of introducing U.S. labour at higher wages for construction at The Pas would inevitably interfere with the labour supply of important base metal producers. In the circumstances, it would be better for Canada to undertake construction at The Pas and permit the United States to build the aerodrome at Churchill. The cost at The Pas would be about $1,000,000.

39. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed to amend the decision taken on July the 1st, in the following sense —

(a) that Canada accept responsibility for the construction and defence of the aerodrome to be built at The Pas; and,

(b) that construction of the aerodrome at Churchill be undertaken by the United States who should be asked to accept responsibility for the provision of such defences as Canada was not in a position to provide and the Canadian Staff might deem necessary.

NORTH ATLANTIC FERRY ROUTES —
CANADIAN DEFENCE RESPONSIBILITIES

3. THE SECRETARY submitted a report of the Chiefs of Staff regarding the defence of aerodromes at Regina, The Pas and Churchill, copies of which had been circulated.

Provision of defences at Regina and The Pas had been considered unnecessary. After reviewing the situation at Churchill, the Chiefs of Staff had concluded that there was, at present, no need for defence at this aerodrome (other than the personal weapons of the U.S. Air Corps ground crew stationed there), and that provision of the small Canadian garrison and anti-aircraft troop, previously contemplated, could, therefore, be left in abeyance.

It was, accordingly, recommended that the U.S. War Department be advised that, under present conditions, Canadian requirements for U.S. participation in the defences of Churchill were limited to preparation for demolitions, but that it was noted that U.S. Air Force ground personnel would be armed and available for local protection, also that provision of Canadian Army defences at Churchill would be left in abeyance.

(Chiefs of Staff's report to the Ministers, August 13, 1942 — C.W.C. document 251).[†]

4. The War Committee approved the Chiefs of Staff recommendation.

2. The Board adopted the following as its TWENTY-EIGHTH RECOMMENDATION:

The Board considered the question of the post-war disposition of the defence projects and installations which the Government of the United States has built or may build in Canada. The Board noted that the two Governments have already reached specific agreements for the post-war disposition of most of the projects and installations thus far undertaken. It considers that such agreements are desirable and should be made whenever possible.

The Board recommends the approval of the following formula as a generally fair and equitable basis to be used by reference whenever appropriate in the making of agreements in the future and to cover such defence projects, if any, the post-war disposition of which has not previously been specifically provided for:

“A — All immovable defence installations built or provided in Canada by the Government of the United States shall within one year after the cessation of hostilities, unless otherwise agreed by the two Governments, be relinquished to the Crown either in the right of Canada or in the right of the province in which the same or any part thereof lies, as may be appropriate under Canadian law.”

“B — All movable facilities built or provided in Canada by the Government of the United States shall within one year after the cessation of hostilities, unless otherwise agreed by the two Governments, at the option of the United States Government:

(1) be removed from Canada; or

(2) be offered for sale to the Government of Canada, or with the approval of the Government of Canada, to the Government of the appropriate Province at a price to be fixed by a Board of two appraisers, one to be chosen by each country and with power to select a third in the case of disagreement.”

“C — In the event that the United States government has foregone its option as described in B(1), and the Canadian Government or the Provincial Government decides to forego its option as described in B(2), the facility under consideration shall be offered for sale in the open market, any sale to be subject to the approval of both Governments.”

“D — In the event of no sale being concluded the disposition of such facility shall be referred for recommendation to the Permanent Joint Board on Defence or to such other agency as the two Governments may designate.”

The principles outlined above shall reciprocally apply to any defence projects and installations which may be built in the United States by the Government of Canada.

All of the foregoing provisions relate to the physical disposition and ownership of projects, installations, and facilities and are without prejudice to any agreement or agreements which may be reached between the Governments of the United States and Canada in regard to the post-war use of any of these projects, installations, and facilities.⁶⁵

CONTROL OF AERODROMES IN CANADA

3. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR raised the question of control of aerodromes on the Northwest and Northeast Staging routes.

Original plans for development of these routes had not included definition of responsibility for operational control. On the Northwest Staging [route], where all bases were jointly used by Canadian and U.S. aircraft, the R.C.A.F. had assumed control. On the other hand airfields developed in connection with the Canol project were apparently under U.S. control. On the Northeast Staging route, some bases were used jointly, others intended only for U.S. use; the R.C.A.F. had assumed control only at Goose Bay.

Similar problems of control existed with regard to the U.S. base at Mingan, P.Q., and other bases such as Dorval, used by the British Ferry Command, and Edmonton, used by T.C.A.

The Chiefs of the Air Staff recommended that aerodromes, used jointly by U.S. and Canadian forces, be controlled by the R.C.A.F., and that airports, used exclusively by the United States, be considered as Canadian airports with an R.C.A.F. liaison officer attached in each case. These proposals might be taken up by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence now meeting in Montreal.

(Memorandum C.A.S. to Minister, Feb. 24, 1943).[†]

4. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that arrangements for control of aerodromes in Canada be concluded in accordance with the following principles:

(a) the right to exercise operational control over all aerodromes in Canada is vested in the Canadian government;

⁶⁵ L'entente entre le Canada et les États-Unis sur les principes fut signalée par un échange de notes le 27 janvier. Voir Canada, Recueil des traités, 1943, N° 2.

⁶⁵ The agreement between Canada and the United States on the principles was embodied in an exchange of Notes on January 27. See Canada, Treaty Series, 1943, No. 2.

(b) operational control at all bases used jointly by Canadian and U.S. forces shall be exercised by the R.C.A.F.;

(c) subject to (a) above the United States may exercise operational control at aerodromes used solely by the U.S. forces (with the exception of Mingan, P.Q.), a Canadian liaison officer to be appointed to each of such aerodromes;

(d) for the duration of the war U.S. forces have the right to make full use of all air facilities which the United States has established.

5. THE WAR COMMITTEE also agreed:

(1) that the Canadian representatives on the Canada-U.S. Permanent Joint Board on Defence be directed to inform the Board of the decisions set out in paragraph 4 above;

(2) that the U.S. government be approached with a view to the conclusion of an agreement in accordance with the above principles;

(3) that the Minister of National Defence for Air examine further the position of the U.S. base at Mingan and report, at a later meeting, as to what special arrangements for control should be made in that case;

(4) that the Ministers of National Defence for Air and Munitions and Supply confer upon operational questions at aerodromes used jointly by Service and civilian aircraft.

MEETING OF THE BOARD, MONTREAL, FEBRUARY 24 AND 25, 1943

5. The Board considered the report[†] of a meeting between representatives of the directly interested departments of the two Governments which had been held in Ottawa on February 18-20, 1943, to discuss certain proposals regarding the expansion of facilities on the Northwest Airway.

It was explained by the senior United States Army Member that work had been greatly delayed on much of the already approved programme of construction along the Airway, that this had interfered with the delivery of aircraft to the U.S.S.R., that it had delayed the reinforcement of the United States Forces operating from Alaska, and that the prospective utilization of this route in connection with plans for the defeat of Japan make it necessary to supplement the original construction programme by extensive and immediate additions.

After careful consideration of the proposals emanating from the meeting mentioned above, the Board agreed to adopt the following as its TWENTY-NINTH RECOMMENDATION:

The Governments of Canada and the United States having a mutual interest in the expeditious completion of the airway from the United States to Alaska, including the necessary installations thereon such as airports, housing, air navigation and other facilities, and in the expansion of this route with a view to its utilization in facilitating offensive operations against Japan, it is recommended:

1. that the Department of Transport (Canada) be responsible for the completion of all facilities on this route presently in process of actual construction by contractors under contract to the Department of Transport, but that wherever possible and in order to expedite construction, United States Engineer troops be used to assist in such construction;

2. that the construction of the following facilities be approved by the Canadian Government, subject to the submission to the Department of Transport of a detailed plan showing the location of such facilities at the respective airports.

7. that in the construction of any such additional facilities, including airports, at any point north of Edmonton, United States Engineer troops, or Canadian or United States contractors employing United States labour may be employed, except that Canadian and United States contractors be not engaged in the same specific project. (At Edmonton work is to be performed by United States Engineer troops or Canadian contractors within the limit of the ability of such contractors to perform the services required.);

8. that in all cases where civilian labour is employed, if Canadian contractors are available, their services shall be utilized, within the limit of their abilities, in the construction of these projects;

9. that in any case where Canadian contractors are employed by the United States Forces in the construction of any projects, the United States Forces be responsible for the administration and supervision of the contract;

10. that the Department of Transport (Canada) designate a responsible official to be stationed on this route with authority to make decisions with respect to location of buildings and any other matters which properly may be brought to his attention.

CANADA-U.S. PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE,
REPORT OF MEETING, FEBRUARY 24TH AND 25TH, 1943

(a) TWENTY-NINTH RECOMMENDATION

17. THE SECRETARY reported that the Journal of the Board's Discussions and Decisions, covering a meeting held in Montreal on February 24th and 25th, had, on March 1st, been submitted to the Prime Minister. In accordance with the usual practice, copies had been sent to the Ministers of National Defence and the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

(P.J.B.D. Journal, Feb. 24 and 25, 1943).

18. MR. HEENEY pointed out that the Journal contained the Board's Twenty-ninth Recommendation dealing with the completion and expansion of construction on the Northwest Staging route.

19. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR said that the United States were evidently planning construction on a very wide scale. These plans would require substantial quantities of Canadian lumber and other materials at a time when Canadian projects, some possibly of greater importance, were already being delayed by shortages of the same building supplies. These U.S. projects should be examined carefully by the Services with a view to determining relative priorities. It was requested, therefore, that action on this recommendation be deferred.

20. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed to defer action on the Board's Twenty-ninth Recommendation.

A PROPOSAL THAT CANADA SHOULD TAKE OVER THE UNITED STATES OUTLAY ON AIRFIELD CONSTRUCTION IN CANADA

1. Canada, through the Department of Transport, has undertaken the construction of air facilities in Canada for the United States Government. This construction has included the building of airfields and the cost of extending runways on already existing airfields. It has also included the construction of barracks and other ancillary equipment at airports. In addition the United States has itself constructed extensive air facilities in Canada, using its own troops for the construction work.

2. On the basis of present and probable future commitments the total cost of the air facilities which the Department of Transport is constructing in Canada for the United States will be about $25,000,000. The commitments to date amount to $18,000,000. It is probable that an additional commitment of $7,000,000 on United States account will shortly be incurred. Of the estimated total expenditure of $25,000,000 about two-thirds will be spent in the Canadian North-West. (The Department of Transport supplies the United States with quarterly statements of the estimated cost of the work done by them on behalf of the United States but the United States has not yet been billed for payment.)

3. The total cost of the air facilities which the United States is constructing or has constructed in Canada might be as much as $25,000,000 but we have no information on which to base a reliable estimate. The direct United States construction is chiefly at Mingan (P.Q.), Churchill (Manitoba), Coral Harbour (Southampton Island) and on the alternative Northwest Staging Route down the Mackenzie River.

4. The post-war disposition of these air facilities is governed by the exchange of notes of January 27, 1943, under which "all immovable defence installations" revert to Canada or a Canadian province and "movable facilities" are either removed from Canada or offered for sale to the Government of Canada or of a Canadian province.⁶⁶

5. This agreement thus makes it clear that the United States has acquired as a result of its expenditures no continuing rights over Canadian air bases and other air facilities. Regardless, however, of this formal intergovernmental assurance, it is clear that many people in the United States, some of them occupying important positions in the United States Government, feel now and will continue to feel that the United States should get some permanent advantage out of these expenditures. Mayor La Guardia, for example, at the meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence on January 13, 1943, said, "Of course, American planes would be able after the war to use the bases in Canada which are being built with American money." Representative Vorys of Ohio said on February 15 that the United States should have the right to civilian use of air bases built by the United States in foreign countries. Mr. A.A. Berle, the Assistant Secretary of State who is particularly charged with relations with Canada, said on February 15, 1943, before the House of Representatives Committee on Foreign Affairs that he believed that the United States expenditures made during the war on airfields in foreign countries "to the extent that they have permanent utility represent an item of equity which can and should be urged in the ensuing negotiation" on the post-war use of airfields in foreign countries. When a member of the committee asked whether Mr. Berle did not grant that "it (the expenditure) is a chip in the game which we should not simply throw out of a jackpot and forget about", Mr. Berle said "certainly".

6. It should also be recalled that the United States members of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence insisted on the inclusion of the following paragraph in the Twenty-eighth Recommendation of the Board concerning the post-war disposition of war facilities constructed or installed in Canada by the United States:

"All of the foregoing provisions relate to the physical disposition and ownership of projects, installations, and facilities and are without prejudice to any agreement or agreements which may be reached between the Governments of the United States and Canada in regard to the post-war use of any of these projects, installations, and facilities."

7. There is thus danger that the United States may try to obtain special air concessions in Canada after the war and that they will argue that their expenditures on air facilities in Canada entitle them to special concessions. So far as the rights and wrongs of the argument are concerned, a sufficient Canadian reply would be that the fifty million dollars or so which the United States has spent on air facilities in Canada should be considered as a United States contribution to the common Canadian-United States defence of North America. It may, however, be difficult to persuade certain sections of the American public that this Canadian reply is in fact a sufficient answer to United States claims of a moral right to use these facilities after the war.

8. In order to preserve our freedom of action after the war, serious consideration might be given to Canada now meeting all the expenses which have been incurred in the construction by or on behalf of the United States of immovable air facilities in Canada. If this course were decided on Canada would be expected to assume financial responsibility for all further immovable air facilities to be constructed in Canada whether they were built by Canadian or United States contractors.

9. The adoption of this recommendation would in effect mean that Canada would pay for the construction and extension of all airfields in Canada (i.e. runways, pavements etc.) but would not pay for the cost of constructing such temporary movable equipment as buildings. (We do not have to worry about movable facilities since, under the agreement of January 27, 1943, movable facilities will either be removed from Canada after the war or offered for sale to the Government of Canada or of a Canadian province.)

10. On the basis that there have been or will shortly be constructed in Canada by or on behalf of the United States air facilities costing about $50,000,000 it is possible that the cost of the immovable facilities, which would under this arrangement be paid for by Canada, would be $35,000,000.

11. Since the primary purpose of the proposed new agreement with the United States is to convince the United States public that the United States is not entitled to any special air concessions in Canada after the war because of expenditures made in Canada during the war, the new agreement should be made public though certain annexes to the agreement setting forth how some of the amounts of money involved had been arrived at would have to be confidential.

12. The United States has constructed or is constructing in Canada the following facilities in addition to air facilities:

(1) The Alaska Highway and works incidental to the construction of the Highway, i.e. the development of the White Pass and Yukon Railway and the construction of a feeder highway from Haines to Champagne;

(2) The Canol pipeline and works incidental to its construction, i.e. the development of the land and water transportation routes from Edmonton down the Mackenzie River to Norman Wells and thence to the Yukon River, by the construction of winter roads down the Mackenzie and to connect the Mackenzie and Yukon Rivers and by the improvement of shipping facilities along the Mackenzie River waterway;

(3) About thirty meteorological stations in the north;

(4) Extensive storage facilities at Prince Rupert. (The extensive storage facilities elsewhere are considered part of the other projects.)

In addition the United States spent about $2,500,000 surveying a route for a possible railway to Alaska. The question whether there is any cause for concern lest the United States assert a claim in equity because of its wartime expenditures on these facilities will be considered in a subsequent memorandum to the War Committee.⁶⁷

PAYMENT TO THE UNITED STATES FOR AERODROME CONSTRUCTION IN CANADA

25. THE SECRETARY submitted a proposal for the assumption by Canada of the cost of U.S. expenditures on airfield construction in Canada. An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

It was estimated that the total cost of air facilities which Canada was constructing for U.S. account would amount to about $25,000,000; in addition, the total cost of facilities which the United States was itself undertaking would probably reach a similar total.

Under existing agreements immovable defence installations would revert to Canada after the war, while movable facilities paid for by the United States would be removed by the United States, or offered for sale. It was feared that despite these agreements the United States, after the war, might seek to base an equitable claim to special concessions upon these large expenditures in Canada. It was suggested, therefore, that the government might take advantage of the present favourable U.S. dollar position by undertaking now to pay the United States for immovable facilities undertaken in Canada, particularly for the cost of construction and extension of all airfields and thus ensure our post-war freedom of action. The cost involved might be in the neighbourhood of $35,000,000.

(External Affairs memorandum, Apr. 5, 1943 — C.W.C. document 474).

26. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE suggested that it would be difficult to explain to the Canadian public why this money was being given to the United States instead of being used for projects more important from our own viewpoint. Why, it would be asked, should the Canadian government pay these large sums to the United States, at this time, for undertakings in the location and planning of which we had had no voice.

⁶⁷ Non trouvé.

⁶⁷ Not located.

27. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE pointed out that the funds that would be employed from this purpose could not be used for other purposes. They represented the excess over the favourable U.S. balance which we could retain. There might be unfavourable political reactions in Canada in the short run, but the proposal advanced would be sound, both politically and economically, in the long run.

28. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY and the MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR expressed themselves as generally favourable to the proposal, if it were financially feasible.

29. THE PRIME MINISTER expressed general approval of the principle of establishing as strongly as possible the Canadian post-war position in regard to developments on Canadian soil.

30. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the matter be deferred for further consideration.

RE: STATEMENT ON CONTROL OF AIRFIELDS IN CANADA

The right of control over all airfields in Canadian territory is vested in Canada. In the interests of the joint defence of North America and the effective prosecution of the war it is, however, desirable that special arrangements be made between the government of Canada and the government of the United States in regard to control, use, maintenance and defence of airfields in which the two nations have a common operational or defence interest.

It is, therefore, agreed that the following principles shall apply in regard to airfields in Canada used by U.S. aircraft.

1. At airfields used principally by U.S. forces, control shall be exercised by the United States; at all other airfields control shall be exercised by Canada.

2. U.S. forces shall have full use, for the duration of the war, of all air facilities established in Canada by the United States with the approval of the Canadian government.

3. Canada shall be responsible for the maintenance and defence of airfields where control is exercised by Canada. The United States shall be responsible for maintenance and defence of airfields at which control is exercised by the United States. Standards of defence shall in no instance fall below the minimum requirements set by the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee.

4. No airfield under the control of the United States shall be abandoned without reasonable notice to the Canadian government, and until completion of either arrangements for transfer of control to Canada or arrangements for demolition acceptable to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee.

5. The U.S. government may station a liaison officer at any airfield in Canada used by U.S. forces; the Canadian government may, likewise, station a liaison officer at any airfield, the control of which is exercised by the United States.

It is understood that the Canadian government may, at any time, review arrangements made in respect of any airfield, in accordance with the above conditions.

CONTROL OF AERODROMES IN CANADA

1. THE SECRETARY submitted a revised draft statement with regard to control, use, maintenance and defence of aerodromes in Canada. This had been prepared in consultation with officials of departments concerned, following the meeting of April 21st. Copies had been circulated.

The Air Staff had recommended certain modifications in the draft submitted.

(Minutes of meeting of April 21st, paras. 12-13; Secretary's memorandum, April 27 — C.W.C. document 497^t; memorandum, A.V.M. Cowley to the Minister, April 28, 1943^t).

2. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, approved, with certain amendments, the revised draft statement submitted, as suitable for inclusion in an exchange of notes with the United States.

MEETING OF THE BOARD, MONTREAL, MAY 6 AND 7, 1943

9. The Board gave renewed consideration to the problems arising from the fact that, although the right of control over all airfields in Canadian territory is an inalienable attribute of Canadian sovereignty, it has been found desirable, for the effective prosecution of the war, to make special arrangements for the assumption by the United States of responsibility for the administration, defence, traffic control and maintenance of certain airfields on Canadian territory.

The Board therefore decided to propose the acceptance of the following general principles defining the respective responsibilities of the two countries as its THIRTY-FIRST RECOMMENDATION:

1. In cases in which the airfield is used principally or exclusively by U.S. forces the United States shall normally be responsible for defence, maintenance and control.
2. In all other cases, unless some special arrangement has been made, Canada shall be responsible for defence, maintenance and control.
3. Provision for the defence of airfields shall, in all cases, be of a standard acceptable to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff.
4. The assignment of responsibilities in respect of any airfield shall remain unchanged during the war except by mutual agreement; provided that should Canada inform the United States that it is prepared to assume such responsibilities in respect of any airfield previously controlled by the United States, the necessary arrangements shall be concerted between the two Governments.
5. The United States Government may station a liaison officer at any airfield in Canada used by United States forces; and the Canadian Government may station a liaison officer at any airfield in Canada the control of which is exercised by the United States.

It was agreed that upon acceptance of this Recommendation the Air Members of the Board should prepare a schedule showing the application of these principles to each airfield affected for submission to the Board as a basis for a further recommendation.

CANADA-U.S. PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE —
 REPORT OF MEETING, MAY 6TH AND 7TH, 1943

1. THE SECRETARY reported that the Journal of the Board's discussions and decisions, covering a meeting held in Montreal on May 6th and 7th, had been submitted to the Prime Minister. In accordance with the usual practice, copies had been sent to the Ministers of National Defence and the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

(P.J.B.D. Journal, meeting May 6 and 7, 1943).

A number of items contained in the Journal were drawn to the particular attention of the meeting, read and dealt with as follows.

...

(F) THIRTY-FIRST RECOMMENDATION — CONTROL OF AERODROMES

12. The Board's Thirty-first Recommendation proposed a statement of general principles defining the rights and responsibilities of the United States and Canada in respect of certain airfields in Canadian territory.

(P.J.B.D. Journal, para. 9).

13. MR. HEENEY said that the draft statement, approved by the War Committee on April 28th, had been communicated to the Canadian Section of the Board as an indication of the government's views on the subject. The Thirty-first Recommendation, subsequently agreed upon by the Board, differed in certain respects from the document approved by the War Committee. (War Committee Minutes, para. 2, April 28, 1943).

14. THE CHIEF OF THE AIR STAFF drew attention to certain features in the Recommendation which were unsatisfactory to the Air Staff.

No statement of Canada's right of control over all airfields in Canadian territory was included in the Recommendation, though included in an introductory paragraph in the Journal. The Recommendation gave control to the United States of airfields used "principally" by U.S. forces. Such control should be conceded only in relation to airfields constructed by or for the United States, not to airfields of the R.C.A.F. or the Department of Transport. The Recommendation did not make it sufficiently clear that it would apply only for the duration of the war.

(Memorandum, Chief of the Air Staff to the Minister, May 12, 1943).

15. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, referred the Thirty-first Recommendation to the Secretary for consultation with External Affairs and the Air Staff, and report.

ADDITIONAL AERODROME CONSTRUCTION FOR UNITED STATES IN CANADA

3. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY reported that the U.S. Corps of Engineers had indicated their desire to let, directly, all contracts for construction and expansion of aerodromes in Canada to meet U.S. requirements.

Such procedure would be contrary to government policy. The U.S. Corps of Engineers had, accordingly, been informed that while there was no objection to the United States letting, directly, contracts for movable and temporary construction, construction of a permanent nature would continue to be done by Canadian authorities, through Canadian contractors.

4. THE WAR COMMITTEE noted with approval the Minister's report.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES;
PAYMENT FOR U.S. DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION IN CANADA, LABRADOR AND NEWFOUNDLAND

5. THE DEPUTY MINISTER OF FINANCE described the agreement made recently with the U.S. Treasury with regard to Canadian holdings of United States exchange.⁶⁸

The U.S. Treasury were prepared to ensure to us the maintenance of a minimum balance of U.S. $300 million, provided that, in return, we did not allow the balance to accumulate beyond a maximum of U.S. $350 million. This was the essence of the present arrangement.

As at April 30th, however, Canadian holdings of U.S. dollars (including gold) amounted to $506 million and since that date an additional amount of some $15 to $16 million had been accumulated.

It had been agreed that an amount equivalent to U.S. funds accumulating from the sale of Canadian securities to U.S. holders could be used by the government to redeem Dominion government obligations in the United States. Some $70 million was at present available for this purpose and this amount was likely to increase, so that Canada would be able to pay off, in full, two issues in the United States, this year, to a total amount of $106 million. After redemption of these securities, however, our balance of U.S. exchange would still be substantially in excess of the $350 million maximum.

The United States had been informed that, upon passage of the Mutual Aid Bill Canada would be prepared to assume (and charge to Mutual Aid) liability for Canadian-produced munitions ordered by the United States for lease-lend to Britain. This would have the effect of substantially reducing our U.S. dollar balances, though the extent to which this would result was as yet undetermined because of the lack of precise knowledge of the extent and timing of the curtailment planned in the production concerned.

6. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE expressed concern as to capital movements from the United States through U.S. purchases of Canadian securities. At the same time Canadians were liquidating their holdings of U.S. securities. The net result was to increase Canada's foreign debt.

If this movement continued and more than U.S. $106 million were built up in this way, consideration would have to be given to a ban on American purchases of Canadian securities.

7. THE SECRETARY submitted a memorandum on defence construction in Canada by or for the account of the United States. Copies of the memorandum had been circulated.

⁶⁸ See Document 1158.

The memorandum suggested that surplus U.S. exchange might be used to reimburse the United States for expenditure on "movables" which, under the terms of the existing agreement were to be returned to the United States or offered for sale to the Canadian government after the war. The total expenditure involved might be $10 million.

Further defence construction, totalling close to $25 million had been undertaken by Canada on U.S. account. A decision was required as to whether now or at any future date a bill was to be submitted to the United States for this expenditure.

(Secretary's note, May 18, 1943 — C.W.C. document 515).[†]

8. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR expressed the view that, after the war, it would be advantageous for Canada to have constructed and paid for all air bases in Canadian territory. If this were financially possible, it should be done.

9. THE DEPUTY MINISTER OF FINANCE felt that the use of surplus U.S. funds for the purposes indicated would strengthen Canada's post-war position and prevent the possibility of the United States seeking to base claims to special advantage upon the argument of investment on Canadian territory.

10. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE questioned whether payment now to the United States would be likely to improve the Canadian post-war position in the circumstances contemplated.

11. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed:

(a) that no accounts for payment be now presented to the U.S. government in respect of defence construction carried out by Canada for U.S. account; that the U.S. government be informed that the question of settlement of such expenditures would be left until after the war; that the U.S. government should, if they so desired, be informed from time to time as to the amounts involved in such construction;

(b) that the question of reimbursement of the United States in respect of construction undertaken in Canada by the U.S. government be deferred.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

It will be recalled that in conversations during February between officers of the United States Army and officers of the Canadian Government, as well as during the recent conversations on the subject of United States projects in Canada, there was mention of a so-called Plan "B" program of construction, Alaskan Wing in Canada.

I have now been instructed to say that in accordance with a directive from the Commanding General, United States Army Service Forces, the Corps of Engineers desires to erect certain facilities as indicated in the enclosed Plan "B" Program of construction† at the following locations:

Edmonton, Alberta
Grande Prairie, Alberta
Fort St. John, British Columbia
Fort Nelson, British Columbia
Watson Lake, Yukon Territory
Whitehorse, Yukon Territory.

I have been directed to endeavor to obtain the approval of the Canadian authorities for the six projects described in Plan "B", and to express the hope that the matter will be given consideration as expeditiously as may be feasible.

I have been further instructed to say that the determination of the ultimate requirements may indicate the necessity of considerable expansion of these facilities, and that if this determination does indicate such a necessity, an additional clearance will be sought from the Canadian Government prior to proceeding with the work.

Sincerely yours,

Ottawa, May 27, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Government has recently been giving consideration to certain questions arising out of the expenditure of Canadian funds for the construction in Canada of defence facilities desired by the United States and, in most cases, recommended by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. Under present arrangements the money thus expended is recoverable from the United States Government.

The most extensive expenditures of the kind under reference are those involved in the construction by the Department of Transport of airfield facilities, barracks, hangars, and other related buildings at Canadian airports, particularly those between and including Edmonton and Whitehorse.

At a meeting of the Cabinet War Committee held on May 19th, 1943, it was decided the United States Government should be informed that the Canadian Government believes that the settlement of all accounts arising from Canadian expenditure on behalf of the United States for the acquisition or construction of defence facilities in Canada should be left for discussion and disposition at the end of the war. You are therefore authorized to communicate officially with the United States Government in this sense, indicating that the Canadian Government is not disposed at present to submit to the United States claims for payment for defence facilities of the kind under reference, and proposes instead that the whole matter of the settlement of these accounts be postponed for consideration at the end of the war.

A detailed statement of the accounts concerned can be supplied to the United States Government at any time on request.

I have etc.

Ottawa, May 28, 1943

Dear Colonel Biggar,

The Cabinet War Committee, at meetings held on May 13th and 26th, gave careful consideration to the Thirty-first Recommendation contained in the Board's Journal for May 6th and 7th.

The War Committee felt unable to approve the Thirty-first Recommendation, in the form submitted, for the following reasons:

1. The inclusion of the word "principally" in paragraph 1 of the Recommendation would have the effect of giving to the United States control of certain aerodromes at which it is intended that control be exercised by the Department of National Defence for Air; the qualifying word "normally" is not regarded as a satisfactory safeguard.

2. In the same paragraph, control, maintenance and defence are linked. There may be cases where control will be turned over to the United States but where Canada will wish to retain responsibility for defence. Provision should be made for such circumstances.

3. The War Committee were of the opinion that there should be specific reference to the fact that the Recommendation shall have effect only for the duration of the war.

4. Approval of the Recommendation by the governments of Canada and the United States would not extend formally beyond the text of the Recommendation. For this reason, War Committee were of the opinion that there should be included a brief preamble along the lines of the explanatory paragraphs immediately preceding the Recommendation in the Board's Journal. Accordingly, with these considerations in mind, the War Committee, at their meeting of May 26th, approved in principle a modified draft recommendation to which they would be prepared to give approval on behalf of the Canadian government. I am enclosing a copy of this draft.⁶⁹

Yours sincerely,

A. D. P. HEENEY

Dear Mr. Heeney,

I have your letter of the 28th dealing with the Thirty-First Recommendation of the Board, and am writing the Prime Minister suggesting that I should see him on the subject.

There is, I think, no difference of substance between the recommendation as made and a recommendation in the terms of the draft enclosed in your letter, and it seems to me both practically unnecessary and very inadvisable that approval of the recommendation should be delayed, since steps should be taken immediately to prepare the contemplated schedule for submission to the Board at its next meeting in the early days of July.

⁶⁹ Voir le document 1045.

⁶⁹ See Document 1045.

The position with regard to the four points which you specify seems to be as follows:

(1) This comment seems to overlook the fact that the principles laid down are only to operate as a guide to the preparation of a schedule to be submitted as a subsequent recommendation. There are in fact no aerodromes in respect of which any question can presently arise, and no prospect that there could hereafter be any.

(2) The same remarks apply to this point.

(3) This point is covered by the preamble and the expressions used in the first clause of the paragraph of the recommendation numbered 4, but if there were any doubt about this the approval of the recommendation might be expressly confined to the duration.

(4) This point does not seem to be well taken, as the second unnumbered paragraph of the paragraph of the Journal numbered 9⁷⁰ is meaningless without the introductory paragraph. (The only difference in this respect between the draft attached to your letter and paragraph 9 of the Journal is that the former has a descriptive heading followed by the word "Recommendation").

The whole situation would, I think, be adequately dealt with from every point of view if the Minute of Council with regard to the recommendation was in some such terms as the following: —

"The general principles to be applied to responsibility for administration, defence, traffic control and maintenance of airfields on Canadian territory during the war as set out in the Thirty-first Recommendation of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence are approved as the basis for the preparation and submission of a recommendation scheduling the respective obligations of Canada and the United States in respect of the aerodromes presently in use, and subject to the consideration of the proposed further recommendation."

My dear Prime Minister,

Mr. Heeney has written me indicating some difficulties the Cabinet War Committee felt about the Thirty-first Recommendation of the Board, and in my reply I have pointed out that these appear to relate only to questions of form, not of substance.

I am afraid that if recommendations made by the Board are refused approval on formal grounds there is grave danger that the Board's usefulness will be impaired.

The difficulties in this case would, I feel sure, disappear if I were given an opportunity to explain the facts of the situation either to you or to the War Cabinet, and I should very much appreciate an opportunity of speaking to you on the subject at any time that would be convenient to you.

Yours faithfully,

NORTHWEST STAGING ROUTE — ADDITIONAL CONSTRUCTION

1. THE SECRETARY reported that, on May 24th, a request had been received, through the U.S. Legation, for permission to undertake certain additional construction on the Northwest Staging Route ("Plan B").

The additional facilities desired by the United States included extension and improvement of airfields and the construction of hangars, warehouses, barracks and other buildings. Departments concerned had been consulted and raised no objections, although Transport stipulated that location plans be subject to approval by Canadian authorities.

Hitherto, as a matter of policy, the Canadian government had carried out most of the construction on the Northwest Staging Route, including all construction of a permanent nature. If the U.S. Plan B were approved, it would be necessary to decide whether this policy would be maintained.

An explanatory note has been circulated.

(Secretary's memorandum, June 1, 1943 — C.W.C. document 529).

2. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY, referring to his statement on this subject at the meeting of May 19th, 1943, expressed the opinion that the policy then approved of having additional construction of a permanent nature done exclusively by Canadian authorities, through Canadian contractors, should be continued with regard to the present U.S. request (Plan B).

However, a much larger scheme of construction ("Plan C") was now under consideration and it was possible that the United States might, in the near future, submit a request for its approval. This Plan C, if proceeded with, would be so extensive that it would then be impossible for Canada to hold to the present policy and assume responsibility for the work involved.

3. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the U.S. request (Plan B) be approved, on the understanding:

(a) that no work be undertaken until competent Canadian authorities had approved location plans;

(b) that construction of a permanent character, specifically extension and improvement of airfields, be undertaken by the Canadian government, employing Canadian contractors and Canadian labour; and

(c) that other construction be undertaken by the U.S. government, employing U.S. contractors and U.S. labour.

CANADA-U.S. PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE —
THIRTY-FIRST RECOMMENDATION (CONTROL OF AERODROMES)

15. THE SECRETARY reported that, following the meeting of May 26th, the War Committee's decision had been communicated to the Canadian Section of the Board, together with a revised draft of the Thirty-first Recommendation.

The Chairman of the Canadian Section, in reply, had suggested that the views of the War Committee might be met by appropriate qualifications in the terms of approval of the Thirty-first Recommendation.

(Letter, Secretary to Chairman, Canadian Section, P.J.B.D., and enclosure, May 28, 1943; also reply, May 31, 1943).

16. THE CHAIRMAN, CANADIAN SECTION, CANADA-U.S. PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE pointed out that, while the War Committee might find certain difficulties in the phraseology of the Thirty-first Recommendation, there would, in fact, be no such difficulties in its application, since the Recommendation provided that a schedule covering all aerodromes was to be drawn up and made the subject of a subsequent recommendation.

It would be preferable, as a matter of procedure if, in dealing with Recommendations of the Board, the War Committee would stipulate such reservations as might be desired, rather than return them to the Board for revision.

17. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed, in this instance, to proceed in the manner recommended by Colonel Biggar and, in respect of the Board's Thirty-first Recommendation, agreed that the general principles to be applied to responsibility for administration, defence, traffic control and maintenance of airfields on Canadian territory during the war, as set out in the Thirty-first Recommendation, be approved by the Canadian government as the basis for the preparation and submission of a recommendation scheduling the respective obligations of Canada and the United States in respect of the aerodromes presently in use, and subject to the consideration of the proposed further recommendation.

Dear Mr. Clark,

It gives me pleasure to inform you that the Canadian Government has agreed to the construction of certain additional facilities on the Northwest Staging Route as set forth in "Plan B" which was submitted under cover of your letter to me of May 2, 1943.⁷¹

This agreement is based on the understanding that:

- (a) no work be undertaken until competent Canadian authorities have approved location plans;
- (b) construction of a permanent character, specifically extension and improvement of airfields, be undertaken by the Canadian Government, employing Canadian contractors and Canadian labour; and
- (c) other construction be undertaken by the United States Government, employing United States contractors and United States labour.

I trust that this arrangement will be acceptable to the Government of the United States.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, June 11, 1943

Dear Mr. Robertson,

In my letter to you of May 24, 1943, I requested Canadian approval for six projects described in Plan "B" of the Program of Construction, United States Alaskan Wing in Canada, and in Mr. Keenleyside's reply of June 3 he communicated to me Canadian approval of this project. You will recall that in my note of May 24th I pointed out that the determination of the ultimate requirements might indicate the necessity of considerable expansion of these facilities.

⁷¹ Document 1044.

Under instructions of my Government, I am now enclosing a copy of a letter, dated June 8, 1943, from Major-General Guy V. Henry, Senior United States Member of the Permanent Joint Board on Defense[†], together with a copy of the enclosures thereto, being Plan "C" of the Program of Construction[†] which is an addition to Plan "B".

I have been directed to endeavor to obtain the approval of the Canadian authorities for the projects described in Plan "C" and to express the hope that the matter may be given consideration as expeditiously as may be feasible. May I draw your particular attention to the statement contained in General Henry's letter to the effect that "it is desired that all work be undertaken by United States Engineers Department, with direct liaison with the proper representatives of the Department of Transport."

Yours sincerely,

ADDITIONAL CONSTRUCTION ON NORTHWEST STAGING ROUTE

9. THE SECRETARY submitted a formal request from the U.S. government for permission to construct further additional facilities on the Northwest Staging Route.

The new programme (Plan C), details of which had been made available to departments concerned for their examination, involved large extensions of the programme (Plan B), approved by the War Committee on June 2nd, 1943.

In requesting permission, the U.S. government asked that the U.S. Engineers be permitted to undertake all construction involved, maintaining direct liaison with representatives of the Department of Transport.

The United States had also asked permission to use U.S. contractors and labour in constructing facilities required at Edmonton, approved by the War Committee on June 2nd, 1943.

The Departments of Transport and National Defence for Air had recommended that the request be approved, on the understanding that the work would not be begun until detailed plans had been approved by Canadian authorities. The Special Commissioner for Defence Projects in Northwest Canada had reported that the available Canadian labour and Canadian equipment would not be adequate to carry out the new and greatly enlarged programme.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Secretary's memorandum, 1943 — C.W.C. document 539[†]; also memorandum Deputy Minister of National Defence for Air, to Secretary, June 17, 1943[†].)

10. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY said that the extent of the new programme was such that it would be impossible, in present circumstances, to have Canadian contractors and Canadian labour carry it out in the time available. The United States should, therefore, undertake all the work involved and Canadian contractors and labour should be withdrawn, except at Edmonton, where the employment of American labour would cause serious wage difficulties.

The U.S. request should be approved, subject to the condition that all construction required in Edmonton would be carried out by Canadian contractors and Canadian labour.

11. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR concurred in the view expressed by Mr. Howe.

12. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussions, agreed that the U.S. request (Plan C) be approved, subject to the following conditions:

(a) that all construction involved, except in the Edmonton area (including such as remained unfinished under the earlier Plans A and B), be carried out by U.S. labour, and that Canadian contractors and labour now engaged in airfield construction north of Edmonton, be withdrawn;

(b) that all construction in the Edmonton area be carried out solely by Canadian contractors and Canadian labour.

It was also agreed that the U.S. government be informed that the Canadian government attached great importance to the condition that only Canadian contractors and Canadian labour be employed in the Edmonton area and also to the taking of adequate steps to prevent the employment of Canadian labour or contractors in other construction on the Northwest Staging Route.

U.S. TENURE OF LAND IN CANADA

38. THE SECRETARY stated that while the government had, in most cases, taken the view that the U.S. government should not hold title to property in Canada, and that land and premises required should be taken over by the government and then leased or otherwise made available to the United States, there had been no general statement of policy to that effect. Officials concerned agreed that it would be helpful to have such a statement on record. An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Secretary's memorandum, June 10, 1943 — C.W.C. document 535).[†]

39. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that the government should purchase, lease or otherwise acquire property required in Canada by the U.S. government to which such property should then be made available, upon appropriate conditions, as from the Crown.

Dear Mr. Clark,

On June 11, 1943, you wrote to me with regard to a new programme of construction described as Plan C which the United States authorities wish to inaugurate along the line of the Northwest Staging Route. This proposal was considered at the meeting of the Cabinet War Committee held on June 18 and the United States request was approved subject to the following conditions:

(a) that all construction involved, except in the Edmonton area, (including such as remains unfinished under the earlier plans A and B), be carried out by U.S. labour, and that Canadian contractors and labour now engaged in airfield construction north of Edmonton be withdrawn;

(b) that all construction in the Edmonton area be carried out solely by Canadian contractors and Canadian labour.

It was also agreed that the United States government be informed that the Canadian government attach great importance to the condition that only Canadian contractors and Canadian labour be employed in the Edmonton area, and also, in view of the new conditions which will exist as a result of the above decision, to the taking of adequate steps to prevent the employment of Canadian labour or contractors in other construction on the Northwest Staging Route.

Ottawa, June 26, 1943

Dear Mr. Clark,

With reference to my letter of June 22nd with regard to "Plan C", it has been brought to my attention that the Department of Transport is constructing, as purely Canadian projects, certain intermediate airfields and radio ranges at Beaton River, Smith River, Teslin, Aishihik and Snag, and that it had been understood in discussions with United States officials on May 18, 1943, that the construction proposed under Plan C would not affect completion of these works under Canadian contracts. To avoid possible misunderstanding, I should therefore like to add to the conditions set forth in my letter under reference a further paragraph reading as follows:

“(c) that the Department of Transport will carry on to completion the Canadian contracts now in progress at the Canadian projects at Beaton River, Smith River, Teslin, Aishihik and Snag.”

Canadian contractors and labour will, of course, be used under present contracts to complete this work.

CONSTRUCTION ON NORTHWEST STAGING ROUTE — SUPERVISION; FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS

3. THE SECRETARY reported that decisions were required on the following additional questions which had arisen in connection with construction under Plan C:

- (a) whether Canadian contractors and labour employed in the Edmonton area should be under the supervision of the Department of Transport or that of the U.S. Engineers;
- (b) whether the Canadian government should pay for any part of the construction involved; and,
- (c) what special steps, if any, should be taken to ensure maintenance of the Canadian wage ceiling in connection with employment of Canadian contractors and labour by the United States.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Secretary's memorandum, June 29, 1943 — C.W.C. document 551).[†]

4. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed:

- (a) that all contracts under the new programme of construction, including those in the Edmonton area, be let directly by U.S. authorities;
- (b) that the funds required for construction under the new programme be provided by the U.S. government who should, however, be informed that the Canadian government might, at a later date, wish to consider repayments for certain permanent parts of the construction involved; and,

(c) that the Special Commissioner for Defence Projects in Northwest Canada be directed to take any necessary steps to provide for the observance of the wage ceiling in construction in the Edmonton area.

TITLE TO PROPERTY IN CANADA REQUIRED FOR UNITED STATES PURPOSES

12. THE SECRETARY submitted a report[†] from officials of departments concerned on implementation of the decisions of War Committee of June 18th, 1943, regarding the acquisition of title to properties required in Canada by the United States for defence projects. Copies of this report had been circulated.

It was recommended:

- (a) that the Department of Mines and Resources assume responsibility for acquiring properties located in the Northwest Territories, the Yukon Territory, the Dawson Creek area, B.C., including Fort St. John, the Fitzgerald area, Alberta, and in any case connected with rights-of-way for the Alaska highway;
- (b) that the Department of Transport take action in all other cases.

The Department of External Affairs was preparing a draft Exchange of Notes with the United States to establish the general principles on which properties would be made available to the U.S. government.

(Secretary's note, July 6, 1943 — C.W.C. document 557).[†]

13. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, approved in principle the report submitted and agreed on the following specific points:

- (a) that the government take action to acquire properties only when they were intended for the direct use of the U.S. government; U.S. contractors to make their own arrangements on the understanding that they would not acquire property in the name of the U.S. government;
- (b) that government action be limited to cases where the United States wished to acquire land for building or a complete building together with the land on which it stood;
- (c) that all leases to property already acquired by the U.S. government be taken over by the government;
- (d) that the government assume the cost of all properties acquired for the U.S. government making them available to the U.S. government without cost;
- (e) that the Department of Transport be authorized to purchase the Jesuit College in Edmonton (at present being used as headquarters for the U.S. Army Engineers) at an approximate cost of $115,000.

The Secretary of State presents his compliments to the Honorable the Minister of Canada and has the honor to refer to the Minister's note No. 288, May 31, 1943,⁷² in regard to the question of payment for defence facilities in Canada desired by the Government of the United States and constructed by the Canadian Government.

The Canadian Government's statement that it is not disposed at present to submit to this Government claims for payment for defence facilities of the kind under reference and its proposal that the matter of settlement of those accounts be postponed for consideration at the end of the war were referred to the Secretary of War. Mr. Stimson has now informed Mr. Hull that the Canadian Government's proposal is entirely satisfactory to the War Department. He adds, however, that it would be appreciated if the Canadian Government would furnish the United States Army Chief of Engineers a statement of the status of these accounts at approximately quarterly intervals.

Memorandum from Senior United States Army Member, PJBD, to PJBD

Washington, July 29, 1943

SUBJECT: MODIFICATION OF CRIMSON PROJECT

1. At the meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defense, Canada-United States, May 6-7, 1943, the Senior U.S. Army Member presented a memorandum which set forth proposals of the U.S. War Department with respect to the modification of the program envisaged in the twenty-sixth recommendation⁷³ which had to do with the Northeast Ferry Route to Europe (Crimson Project). The contents of this memorandum are set forth in paragraph 10 of the Journal of the Board's meeting for these dates.[†]

2. Shortly after this meeting, the Senior U.S. Army Member notified the proper Canadian authorities that the War Department had given further consideration to the Crimson Project. In light of this further consideration, the Department requested that no action be taken on the memorandum set forth in paragraph 10 of the Journal and above referred to.

3. At the meeting of the Board, 5 July 1943, the Senior U.S. Army Member notified the Board that the War Department had reconsidered the modification of the Crimson Project as was set forth in paragraph 10 of the Journal covering the meeting of the Board on May 6-7, 1943, in order that the Crimson Route may be made available for sending planes to Europe if, at a later date, strategic conditions render such a movement over that route advisable, and he further stated that he would present the details of this new proposal in a memorandum to various members of the Board.

The following is the War Department's present proposal:

The Pas, Churchill, Southampton Island:

- a. All construction at The Pas, Churchill and Southampton Island fifty per cent or more completed will be finished in accordance with the original plan.
- b. All construction at the above-named points less than fifty percent completed and not essential to health or sanitation will be discontinued.
- c. United States Army Air Forces servicing detachments, including provision for first and second echelon maintenance, will be stationed at the three above-named points. (Approximately 100 men per station.)
- d. A runway 5,000' X 150' capable of withstanding a gross load of 62,000 pounds will be completed at Southampton Island and provision made during construction for demolition.

Fort Chimo, P.Q.:

Facilities will be completed for station complement of 36 officers, 200 enlisted men and for 203 transients. One Northeast/Southwest 5,000' X 150' paved runway. One East/West 5,000' X 150' hard-surfaced water bound macadam runway. Necessary hard-surfaced parking areas and service aprons. Runways, parking areas and service aprons to support a gross load of 74,000 pounds. One standard steel hangar, 120' X 200'. One nose hangar, 120' X 77'.

Frobisher Bay, Baffin Island:

Installations approximately as indicated at Fort Chimo, P.Q.

The following, although not distinctly a portion of the Crimson Project, is nevertheless closely allied thereto and the information is given in order to complete the picture.

Mingan, P.Q.:

Necessary facilities for station complement of 12 officers and 155 enlisted men and 20 transient officers. A runway 5,000' X 150' paved. One runway 5,000' X 150' hard-surfaced water bound macadam. One taxiway 50' wide, hard-surfaced from Lake Paterson to runway. Necessary parking areas and service aprons. Runways, parking areas, service aprons, and taxiways to support a gross load of 74,000 pounds. One nose hangar.

Padloping Island

Facilities for station complement of two officers and 28 enlisted men. The installation of a radio range.

The United States accepts the responsibility for the control, maintenance and defense of all of the above-named installations. The War Department believes that the station complements in each locality, with proper Arms, will be sufficient for the local security of the station concerned.

4. Copies of a letter addressed to Mr. Keenleyside, 23 July 1943[†] have already been submitted to the interested members of the Board, giving the War Department's revised weather installations and weather reporting service for this area.

MODIFICATION OF NORTHEAST AIR STAGING ROUTE

12. THE SECRETARY submitted a report of the Chiefs of Staff on new proposal of the U.S. War Department, the purpose of which was to make the Northeast Route available for sending planes to Europe if, at a later date, strategic conditions rendered such a movement advisable.

After setting out the U.S. proposals as described in a memorandum of July 29 from the senior U.S. Army member of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, the Chiefs of Staff recommended that:

(a) the Northeast Staging Route programme of development as modified by the said memorandum, be approved;

(b) responsibility for the defence of Northeast Staging Route aerodromes remain as at present designated, until the recommendations of the Permanent Joint Board were received in consequence of the Board's Thirty-first Recommendation;⁷⁴ and

(c) decision on control and maintenance of these aerodromes be left until the recommendations of the Permanent Joint Board were received in consequence of the Board's Thirty-first Recommendation.

Copies of the Chiefs of Staff report were circulated.

MEETING OF THE BOARD, NEW YORK, AUGUST 24 AND 25, 1943

...

4. The Board discussed the matter of the application of the principles of its Thirty-first Recommendation, approved at the meeting of the Board in Montreal on May 6th and 7th, 1943, for the control, maintenance and defence of certain airfields in Canadian territory used jointly by the armed forces of both countries. It will be recalled that upon the approval by the Board of the Thirty-first Recommendation the air members of the Board were requested to prepare a schedule setting forth the application of these principles for submission to the Board as a basis for further recommendation. The Board had before it a detailed report on this subject^f which was prepared at a meeting in Ottawa on August 19, 1943, by representatives of the interested agencies of the two countries.

After detailed discussion of this report, the Board approved the following as its THIRTY-SECOND RECOMMENDATION:

APPLICATION OF PRINCIPLES SET FORTH IN THE BOARD'S THIRTY-FIRST RECOMMENDATION

PART I

DEFINITIONS

That for the purposes of this Recommendation, the following definitions apply:

1. CONTROL:

Control of airport and airways traffic, and airport administration, provided that regulations applicable to airway and airport traffic control shall be prepared jointly by the using services, and shall be limited to those matters essential to the orderly control of traffic movement, and shall not include ceiling and visibility limitations for take-off and landing.

Note: Airport administration, in the military sense, consisting of those functions pertaining to command.

2. MAINTENANCE

a. Airfields

Maintenance of airfield surfaces including runways, taxiways, parking areas, hardstandings, and snow removal according to the standard of the principal user. The priority of such snow removal shall be as prescribed by the principal user.

Maintenance of access roads used solely, or nearly so, for the servicing of the airport and of roads and drainage ditches within and adjacent to the airport area, including snow clearance.

b. Other Facilities

Maintenance of local airport landline communication systems, power, heating, lighting, water, fire-fighting and sewage systems, with the exception of that part of these systems installed in buildings.

c. Responsibility of Using Service

Proper maintenance of all buildings and facilities installed therein is the responsibility of the using Service. When facilities are provided by the Government of one country for the occupation of forces of the other, the principles set forth in the Twenty-first Recommendation⁷⁵ of the Board apply to the maintenance, upkeep and servicing of such facilities.

d. Responsibility of Officers Commanding

In the discharge of the above responsibilities, Officers Commanding will be authorized to make such definitions or modifications as local circumstances may require.

3. Defence

Defence of the airport area in conformance with standards acceptable to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff.

Note: Local security of aircraft, technical installations and building areas is the responsibility of the using Service.

PART II

SCHEDULE OF RESPONSIBILITY

1. NORTHWEST STAGING ROUTE:

a. That Canada be responsible for the control, maintenance and defence of the following airports:

Feeder: Prince George, Kamloops, B.C.; Lethbridge and Calgary, Alta.; Regina, Sask.

Main: Edmonton, Alta.; Grande Prairie, Alta.; Fort St. John and Fort Nelson, B.C.; Watson Lake and Whitehorse, Y.T.

Intermediate: Beaton River and Smith River, B.C.; Teslin, Aishihik and Snag, Y.T.; (Whitecourt, Alta., when constructed).

b. That the United States be responsible for the maintenance, local airport control and defence of the following airports:

Main: Edmonton Satellite.

Note: Edmonton Satellite will be subject only to airways traffic control by Canada under mutually acceptable regulations.

2. That the United States be responsible for the control, maintenance and defence of the following flight strips:

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au ministre des États-Unis

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Minister of United States

No. 106

Ottawa, September 7, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to earlier correspondence in connection with the construction and development of various defence projects in the Canadian Northwest.

2. As you are aware, the construction of defence projects and the administration connected with them has necessitated in the past, and will necessitate in the future, the use of land in various places by the United States authorities and the acquisition of office space, quarters for personnel, and other types of housing and general buildings. Consideration has recently been given by the authorities of the Canadian Government to the question of the most expeditious and suitable procedure to be adopted in connection with land which is so needed. Depending on the area in which the property is located, the use of which is desired for the United States authorities, it may be one of three types:

(a) It may be Crown land held in the right of Canada. This is normally the case in connection with defence projects in the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories;

(b) It may be Crown land held in the right of one or the other of the provinces. This will frequently be the case where defence projects are located in northern British Columbia or Alberta;

(c) It may be property held by a private individual.

From the above you will observe that it is only in a restricted number of cases that the property involved will be property already held by the Dominion Government. Such property can, of course, without any difficulty and very readily be made available for the United States authorities. However, in the other two cases more difficulty arises, and the Canadian authorities have come to the conclusion that it would be most satisfactory, not only from the point of view of convenience and efficiency in acquisition of the desired land, but also from the point of view of the settlement after the war in respect of property that is used during the war by the United States authorities if, in all cases, land to be used for defence projects were acquired by the Canadian Government and then made available for the use of the United States authorities.

3. In accordance with the above view, the Canadian Government suggests that the procedure set forth hereafter should prevail in connection with the acquisition of land, although the arrangements would not, of course, interfere with or limit in any way the procedures adopted for the handling of recommendations made by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. It is suggested that, in all cases where land is needed by the United States for a major defence project, a request concerning it should be forwarded through the State Department to the Department of External Affairs. In the case of minor projects involving the use of land, the United States authorities should communicate their requirements to Major-General W.W. Foster, D.S.O., Special Commissioner for Defence Projects in Northwest Canada, Edmonton, Alberta. In both cases, assuming the request to be approved, the appropriate authorities of the Canadian Government will take the necessary steps to have the land placed at the disposal of the United States authorities. In cases in which the land needed is Crown land in the right of a province or private property, the Canadian Government will take immediate steps to secure title to or a lease of the land, and will then make it available to the United States authorities in precisely the same way as land originally held by the Canadian Government. It is suggested that this procedure should apply in all cases where land is required, but not in cases where all that is needed is office space or housing quarters comprising part of a building or an entire building but not involving the lease or other acquisition of the land on which the building is constructed.

4. In the absence of any clear-cut understanding on matters of this type until now, the United States authorities have in certain instances taken out leases of property or have bought property for defence projects. In order to have all land involved in such projects held on the same basis, the Canadian Government suggests that it should take over the lease or title at present held in the name of the United States or, if there are such instances, in the name of any contractor or other person for the use of the United States authorities. If a list of all such property could be provided, either to Major-General Foster or to this Department, setting forth the terms on which it is held and by whom, I have no doubt that it would be a simple matter to arrange a transfer of title or lease, as the case may be, to the Canadian Government.

5. In connection with the construction of the projects there will be a number of cases, I presume, in which the United States contractors engaged in operations for the United States Government will have acquired either leases or title to property utilized by them in connection with their construction work. The view of the Canadian Government is that no difficulty is presented by the holding of such property or leases by United States contractors, providing that this is for the purposes of the contractor involved and not merely a utilization of his name as a method of holding property for the use of the United States authorities. It is assumed that it is not the policy of the United States Government to take over property or leases which have been acquired by United States contractors for their own use in connection with wartime work for the United States Government, and that the United States Government will only make requests for land, or for the use of land, in pursuance of paragraph 3 hereof, when the land is actually to be used by the United States authorities.

6. In all cases in which property is made available by the Canadian Government for the use of the United States authorities, it is suggested that the right of user should be deemed to continue in the United States authorities for the duration of the war subject to termination of such user [sic] at a prior date on six months' notice by either the United States Government or the Canadian Government. In all cases, the land would be made available by the Canadian Government without charge to the United States Government. With regard to installations, buildings, or other structures erected on any property so made available to the United States Government, such installations or structures shall be disposed of in accordance with the principles laid down in the exchange of notes dated January 27, 1943⁷⁶, between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States. Insofar as it is practicable to do so, the United States Government shall remove from land which has been made available for their use all debris which constitutes a fire hazard or otherwise detracts from the original condition of the land, and shall, as a general principle, endeavour to restore the sites involved to their original state.

7. If the United States Government agrees to the proposals here put forward, I would suggest that this Note, together with your Note of acceptance, should be deemed to constitute an agreement between the United States and Canada for the general treatment of land and property required for defence projects in the Northwest, to the extent that it is not inconsistent with any agreement previously entered into or which may hereafter be entered into providing for the development of defence projects. It is the belief of the Canadian Government that an agreement along these lines would do much to expedite the acquisition of the necessary property for defence works and also to avoid misunderstanding and embarrassment in connection with it at the conclusion of the war.

Dear General Henry,

I am happy to inform you that the Canadian Government has approved the War Department's latest proposal, embodied in your memorandum of July 29th, for the modification of the Crimson Project. Responsibility for the defence, control and maintenance of the aerodromes on this route will remain as at present until a decision has been reached on the Board's Thirty-second Recommendation, which should be forthcoming in the very near future.

Yours sincerely,

CANADA-U.S. PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE —
REPORT OF MEETING, AUGUST 24TH AND 25TH, 1943

4. THE SECRETARY reported that the Journal of the Board's discussions and decisions, covering a meeting held in New York on August 24th and 25th had been submitted to the Prime Minister. In accordance with the usual practice, copies had been sent to the Ministers of National Defence and the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

(P.J.B.D. Journal, meeting Aug. 24 and 25, 1943).

5. MR. HEENEY pointed out that this section of the Journal contained the Board's Thirty-second Recommendation, setting forth a schedule for control, maintenance and defence of airfields in Canadian territory used jointly by the armed forces of both countries. This schedule had been prepared in accordance with the Thirty-first Recommendation of the Board, approved by the War Committee on June 2nd, 1943.

6. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE submitted a report from the Chief of the General Staff, suggesting that the Recommendation be studied by the Chiefs of Staff, prior to its final disposition by the War Committee.

(Memorandum, Chief of General Staff to the Minister, Sept. 7, 1943).†

7. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, referred the Board's Recommendation to the Chiefs of Staff for consideration and report.

CANADA-U.S. JOINT DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS IN NORTHWEST; PUBLICITY

11. THE SECRETARY reported that it had been agreed by senior officials of the departments concerned that, at an early date, suitable official publicity should be made available by the government upon the various defence projects in Northwest Canada, particularly the Canol project. This was felt to be advisable in order to correct public misconceptions, both in Canada and the United States, not only as to the nature of certain of these projects but as to the extent of Canadian participation and agreements between the two countries as to post-war use.

With regard to Canol there was some urgency as public hearings on the subject were to begin, the following week, before a Congressional Committee. Accordingly, it was proposed to make arrangements with the State Department for joint release of the exchanges of notes, if possible, within the next few days.

A detailed résumé of all joint defence works had been prepared by the various departments concerned and it was proposed that this be issued by the Wartime Information Board as an official release by the government for the use of the press.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Secretary's memorandum, Nov. 16, 1943 — C.W.C. document 656).[†]

12. MR. HEENEY said that direction was required as to whether the omnibus release should contain reference to financial arrangements with the United States. It would be recalled that no final decision had been made by the government regarding payment for American undertakings at airfields and elsewhere. Accounts for payment were not being presented to the U.S. government, for the present, but no announcement of this had ever been made.

13. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, approved the arrangements described by the Secretary for release of information on defence projects in Northwest Canada, it being understood, however, that, for the present, no reference should be made to financial arrangements with the United States with respect to essential payment for American undertakings.⁷⁷

RE: REIMBURSEMENT TO THE UNITED STATES
FOR DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION IN CANADA

This matter came up again in the War Committee the other day in relation to the extension of airports on the Northwest Staging Route. The result was a pretty unsatisfactory discussion of the advantages and disadvantages to Canada's offering to reimburse the United States for expenditures on this and other defence projects in Canada.

In favour of such a course, the old (to my mind none the less valid) arguments were again put forward — protection against anticipated pressure from Congress and American public opinion that the Stars and Stripes should follow the U.S. dollar. Against the proposal it was argued that, after four years of war, the Canadian public would be exceedingly critical of large expenditures for the purpose of reimbursing a wealthy nation for extravagant undertakings in this country, for which we had felt no need; we had made agreements with the United States and should assume that they would be honoured.

You will have seen that the development which was anticipated has already begun in connection with Canol. Next week, at the request of the U.S. War Department, we are to have conversations with them regarding post-war use of the product of the new wells discovered in the Mackenzie valley. My own feeling is that requests will follow in respect of other developments in which the United States have invested large sums.

I suggest that we should prepare to put before the government, against an analysis of the present U.S.-Canadian dollar position, a statement of American projects payment of which might be made before the situation further deteriorates. Such a statement might be arranged in order of priority of usefulness to Canada. Of these the very first should be the Northwest Staging Route airports in so far as they have been objects of U.S. expenditure. Clearly these will rapidly increase in importance — first, when the German war is over and a concentration through the North against Japan may be expected, and second, in the post-war period of major development in civil air transport.

In any event it is time that the War Committee were brought up to date on the financial picture and I suggest that it would be exceedingly useful if some such document as I have suggested were prepared and made available to the War Committee at an early date. My own feeling is that, while it remains financially possible, we should begin to make payments to the United States, starting with the items which will serve us best.

If you agree, would you have someone bring the financial elements together in a suitable paper.

RE: REIMBURSEMENT TO THE UNITED STATES
FOR DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION IN CANADA

I have read with interest your note on the above subject. I find that my own mind is very much in the same state as that which you report in respect of the War Committee.

I think the argument based upon protection against anticipated pressure from Congress and American public opinion is a very strong one and the argument based on our U.S. dollar position also favours making the payments. On the other hand, it goes against my grain to pay the excessive costs incurred by the United States for the facilities which we would be taking over, particularly those that are likely to have relatively little post-war value.

On the whole, I agree with you that it would be a good thing to prepare a new memorandum outlining the elements of the problem and I am asking Bob Bryce to take responsibility for this, although he will obviously have to have co-operation from Transport and also probably from Mr. Baldwin.

It seems to me possible that our views may be clearer after we have had the discussions next week with U.S. officials in regard to the Canol project. On the other hand, I was planning to go to Washington at the end of next week with a view to discussing with the U.S. Treasury our whole exchange position, and if we were going to do anything in regard to payment for these projects, I would like to be able to tell the Treasury of our decisions during the course of my visit. This might help me in accomplishing the objective I have in mind of discontinuing the maximum-minimum balance arrangement as from the first of the new year.

Thank you for your note of the 27th. Baldwin will be glad to co-operate with Bryce and help him with Transport.

In the circumstances I think we should try and have something to put before War Committee on Wednesday, so that you may have some fresh guidance before you leave for Washington.

SECRET

Ottawa, December 1, 1943

MEMORANDUM ON POSSIBLE REIMBURSEMENT OF UNITED STATES FOR COST OF AIRFIELDS CONSTRUCTED IN CANADA

Public outcry as a result of the recent trip made abroad by the five United States Senators, and more recently the serious difficulties that have arisen over the Canol project, indicate that, regardless of the friendly spirit of the administration in Washington, serious and troublesome difficulties may arise as a result of the pressure brought by interested groups over U.S. defence expenditures in Canada.

Airfields and related facilities constructed or paid for in Canada by the U.S. are likely to be the most controversial issue in view of the extensive public interest in the development of air transport and air power after the war; and it may well be that the protection afforded Canada by existing legal agreements between Washington and Ottawa may not be sufficient. For example, the U.S. has, regardless of previous exchange of notes, as a result of public pressure, requested reopening of negotiations regarding the Canol project.

The present agreement regarding post-war ownership of these facilities is that permanent construction built or paid for by the U.S. in Canada will become the property of the Canadian Government after the war; and that temporary facilities will either be dismantled and taken back to the U.S. or offered for sale to Canada.

The following construction is involved:

1. Complete air bases at Mingan and Chimo, P.Q., Churchill, Manitoba, Southampton Island and Frobisher Bay. No figures are available from the U.S. on the cost of construction of these bases, but in view of their location and the extensive and costly method of transportation involved, cost would be high. Their immediate value to Canada is doubtful, although they may in a few years become important as possible bases on a short route across northern Canada from Asia to Europe. Costs might be in the neighbourhood of $15,000,000, and possibly even half as much more.

2. Landing fields down the Mackenzie River Route. Landing fields have been constructed by the U.S. at:

Camp Canol
Norman Wells
Wrigley
Simpson
Providence

⁷⁸ R.B. Bryce.

Hay River
Resolution
Fort Smith
Embarrass Waterways

These are adequate to handle present traffic to serve the Canol project and could be expanded into extensive air bases. Construction of buildings and associated facilities has not been extensive. Total cost might be in the neighbourhood of $7,000,000, although here again no figures have been made available from the U.S.

3. Landing strips on the Alaska Highway.

Eight gravel-surfaced landing strips have been completed or partially completed on the Alaska Highway and a ninth is contemplated. Cost of these might be in the neighbourhood of $1,000,000 to $2,000,000, but no estimates are available from the U.S.

4. Northwest Staging.

The first expansion (Plan "B") of the Northwest Staging has been carried out by the Department of Transport on U.S. account. The War Committee has, however, decided that no bill should be presented to the U.S. for the time being, and strong reasons can be advanced against presentation of a bill at any time if this can be avoided. Total commitments of the Department of Transport at September 30, 1943, were $17,230,000, of which $11,500,000 had already been spent.

A further expansion, however, of the staging route (Plan "C") was proposed by the U.S. and the Canadian Government requested the U.S. to carry out this expansion itself at its own expense. No estimates of cost are available. The major part of the program of existing airfields involves the construction of hangar aprons and taxi strips together with certain buildings, although at Edmonton a completely new satellite airport is being constructed at Namao.

The airfields on the Mackenzie River route and on the Northwest Staging will be of great value to Canada since the Northwest Staging is already a major traffic artery on the route to Asia, while the Mackenzie River route possesses great potentialities in this respect both from the point of view of distance and flying conditions.

Inasmuch as Canada has now a large supply of U.S. dollars resulting in part from the beneficial effects of the Hyde Park Agreement, and as means are being sought to adjust our financial arrangements with the United States in order that it will not appear that the United States Government assisted Canada in building up its dollar balances to an unwarranted size, it is suggested that Canada might now offer to meet all, or at least a large part of, the costs of airfield construction in Canada. This would include both the amounts already spent by the Department of Transport on U.S. account, and an agreed estimated amount for the costs of fields constructed by the U.S. authorities themselves. The total sum involved would likely be between $30,000,000 and $50,000,000, of which we have already advanced $11,500,000 on work done. Alternatively, Canada might offer (a) to pay for all permanent construction involved (which by agreement is to revert to Canadian ownership); or (b) for such part of the permanent construction as is judged to be of post-war value to Canada; or (c) for the temporary facilities constructed and installed (which by agreement are to be offered for sale to Canada if not removed). It is estimated that paying the cost of the temporary facilities might involve as much as $20,000,000.

In view of the great importance of the Northwest Staging to Canada and the danger that it would become the area which would cause the controversy in the U.S., it would seem desirable at least to clear the Canadian position with regard to that route by taking over as much of the cost of construction as possible.

No satisfactory estimates of the amount spent by the U.S. on the various facilities mentioned above are available, and in view of the difficulties of accounting, particularly in connection with Army construction projects, it has been suggested that it would not be easy to obtain adequate estimates from Washington even if inquiries were made. Moreover, such inquiries might give rise to suspicion or political difficulties. Perhaps a fairer basis for judgment of the Canadian position might be to request the Department of Transport to provide rough estimates, for each of the air bases or landing facilities listed above, of the amount which would have been spent by the Department of Transport had it undertaken similar construction. These estimates would be broken down into permanent and temporary facilities.

It might be argued that reimbursement to the United States Government for the work it has undertaken should be made not on the basis of actual costs incurred, which would be difficult to ascertain, particularly as much of the work was done by Service personnel, but instead on the basis of an agreed valuation based upon war-time costs of such construction in Canada. This would have the additional advantage of avoiding charges that Canada was paying for any wasteful or extravagant action in the construction of these bases.

On the other hand, it seems likely that the United States authorities, for the same reason that prompts Canada to get unquestionably clear title to these bases, will be reluctant to agree to Canada paying for them, and if an attempt were made to do so on the basis of agreed valuations, opportunity would arise for obstruction and delay. Consequently it would seem desirable not to qualify our proposal in this way, but to offer to meet all costs except the actual pay, allowances, rations, etc., for Army personnel employed on the work. Against any alleged waste or extravagance, Canada would be able then to offset the value of the work done by the U.S. Army personnel.

It is necessary to consider the possibility that for Canada to offer to pay for this permanent construction which the United States has agreed to transfer to Canada after the war, would be to imply that the United States might not live up to its obligation, and might also prejudice the position of other items (e.g., defence works or St. Lawrence waterway works) which the United States has constructed or will construct in Canada and which it has agreed to transfer to Canada without payment. To meet this argument it would seem desirable to make clear that the original agreement for return to Canada of the permanent installations did not provide for payment because at the time it was not evident that Canada's supply of U.S. dollars would be adequate to enable her to make payment. As it now appears that Canada can provide the United States dollars that are necessary to reimburse the United States Government for these costs, the Canadian Government is now undertaking, it might be said, to meet these costs of all airfield construction in Canada as part of Canada's share in the war and in the joint defence of the Western Hemisphere.

PAYMENT FOR U.S. DEFENCE EXPENDITURES IN CANADA —
 CANADA-UNITED STATES FINANCIAL POSITION

26. THE SECRETARY submitted a memorandum respecting possible reimbursement to the United States of the cost of airfield construction in Canada.

Serious difficulties might arise as a result of pressures by interested groups in the United States with respect to post-war use and ownership of U.S. defence projects in Canada. The evident potential value after the war of airfields and related facilities might well lead to a request from the United States for the re-opening of the questions of eventual disposition and post-war use.

Five air bases in the north and northeast, ten landing fields on the Mackenzie River, several landing strips on the Alaska highway and the expansion of the Northwest Staging Route had been objects of large expenditures by and on behalf of the United States. No estimate of the cost was available from U.S. sources but the total sum involved might be from $40 to $60 millions.

Since Canada now held U.S. dollars considerably in excess of the maximum allowed under the present agreement with the U.S. Treasury, consideration might be given to Canada's offering to pay for the permanent construction involved in these works, even though under existing agreements they were to revert to Canadian ownership after the war. Alternatively, an offer might be made to reimburse the United States the costs of temporary facilities which, by agreement, were to be offered for sale to Canada, if not removed, after the war.

(Memorandum — Privy Council Office, Department of Finance, Dec. 1, 1943).

27. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY felt that it would be unwise to purchase now temporary facilities which, in the main, would be of little use to Canada after the war. There would be less objection to Canada's paying for permanent construction. On the other hand, any proposal by the Canadian government to do so, at this stage, would probably be resisted by the United States and might give rise to serious embarrassment.

Consideration should be given to modification of the existing agreement limiting Canadian holdings of U.S. dollars. U.S. orders were not now being placed in Canada to assist the Canadian financial position, but with the sole object of obtaining necessary war supplies which could best be obtained by the United States in this country.

28. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS expressed the view that the present reserve of U.S. dollars did not appear too large for future Canadian requirements. Any payment for U.S. construction in Canada, which, by formal agreement, was to become Canadian property after the war, might be interpreted in the United States as a criticism of their good faith. Moreover, if such payment were taken in respect of air bases, difficulties might be created with respect to much more costly projects such as the Alaska Highway and the Canol programme.

29. THE DEPUTY MINISTER OF FINANCE said that Canada now held some $706 millions in U.S. exchange, of which $85 millions would be set aside for conversion of Canadian securities in the United States. The balance would still be in excess of the agreed limitation to Canada's holdings.

It had been understood that, in the event of a surplus developing beyond the agreed maximum, we would reduce our holdings by cancellation of American contracts placed in Canada under the Hyde Park Agreement. The procedure had been followed, but it had not brought about the necessary reduction because of the changed situation described by the Minister of Munitions and Supply. The United States were now placing an increasing number of orders in Canada for supplies to meet their actual war needs.

In these circumstances, it would be necessary to propose some readjustment or the complete cancellation of the existing agreement with the United States.

30. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, deferred consideration of these problems to an early meeting.

PAYMENT FOR U.S. DEFENCE EXPENDITURES IN CANADA; CANADA-U.S. FINANCIAL POSITION

8. THE SECRETARY referred to the discussion at the last meeting (December 1st) and reported that, at the request of the U.S. government, a meeting had taken place in Ottawa, the previous day, between U.S. and Canadian officials, regarding possible modification of the existing agreements between the two countries in respect of the Canol project.⁷⁹

⁷⁹ Voir le document 1017.

⁷⁹ See Document 1017.

In urging that the Canadian government consent to revision of these agreements American representatives had indicated that conditions had altered since the agreements had been negotiated in 1942; the strategic situation in the Pacific had undergone a radical change for the better; there were indications that the oilfields in the Mackenzie area might be much larger than originally anticipated. The U.S. War Department were being violently criticized in the United States for undertaking the large expenditures involved — some $134 million in all, without economic justification and under arrangements which gave no return to the United States.

No specific proposal had been made but it had been urged that the Canadian government should agree to some new and “equitable” adjustment which would allow some return, after the war, upon the large U.S. capital investment.

9. THE DEPUTY MINISTER OF FINANCE suggested that the course pursued by the United States with regard to the Canol agreement strengthened the case for payment by the Canadian government for all U.S. expenditures upon airfield construction in Canada.

Although these airfields, by agreement, would be ours after the war, our position would be stronger in every way if Canada had paid for the facilities involved.

10. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY felt that any payment offered by Canada upon American expenditures on airfield construction should be limited to permanent improvements or immovables, in the Northwest, and should not include temporary construction or movables which Canada would, in any case, have an opportunity to purchase after the war.

11. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR agreed that it would be well for Canada to pay the full cost of all permanent facilities in the Northwest area.

Consideration might also be given to payment for the fields constructed by the United States in Northeast Canada. These would be of importance if Arctic Circle routes were developed.

These payments should be interpreted to the Canadian public, not as unnecessary or extravagant expenditures but as moves in a wise policy of safeguarding Canadian sovereignty and protecting Canadian interests in important air routes within our own borders.

12. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS pointed out that the original policy of the government in relation to airfield construction with the United States had been that Canada would build to Canadian standards and requirements, leaving the United States to assume responsibility beyond those limits.

It would be consistent with this policy to inform the U.S. government that the position had been reviewed and that Canadian standards and requirements had been substantially raised for these air routes in the light of subsequent developments. It would follow, logically, that the Canadian government should undertake, now, payment for the expansions and improvements initiated by the United States.

13. THE MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES agreed that we should take the opportunity of paying in full for the aerodromes which were likely to be of importance in the post-war period. In this connection, consideration should be given to the probable future value, as well, of the developments in the Northeast.

14. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the U.S. government be informed:

(a) that it was not the intention of the Canadian government to request or accept payment from the United States for construction of any permanent facilities or improvements made by Canada, on U.S. account, upon airfields in Northwest Canada; and,

(b) that the Canadian government wished to make payment to the U.S. government for all construction of a permanent nature carried out by the U.S. government upon air routes in Northwest Canada.

It was understood that the Deputy Minister of Finance would make reference to the views of the government in the course of discussions, the following week, with the U.S. Treasury, prior to a proposal being made to the U.S. government through the usual channels.

EVIDENCE RELATING TO UNITED STATES EFFORTS TO OBTAIN
POST-WAR ADVANTAGES FROM WARTIME EXPENDITURES IN CANADA

1. The United States has been spending money on the acquisition or construction of defence facilities in Canada since long before Pearl Harbour. The list of such facilities now covers hundreds of items and the total of expenditure is in the hundreds of millions of dollars.

2. Until comparatively recently the United States authorities have been careful in every case to indicate that they were interested in these facilities only from the point of view of their wartime value. They made no claims to any post-war title in or usufruct from the construction for which they were paying except that, as in the case of Canol, they hoped to recover the then commercial value when the facility was disposed of after the war. There was no indication of any desire to obtain any continuing right or any special favour or concession.

3. Gradually, however, as the military situation of the United Nations has improved and as the defeat of the Axis becomes a more evident prospect the legislators and people of the United States have begun to think in terms of post-war advantage. As a result, moreover, of individual or organized Congressional investigation there is more knowledge in the United States of the extent to which American money and effort have been put into construction in other lands. These facts, combined with the common interpretation or misinterpretation of the principles underlying Lease-Lend, have led to a popular feeling in the United States that the Administration will be failing in its duty if it does not provide now for the acquisition of post-war profit from wartime expenditure in foreign countries. So strong has this feeling become that efforts are now being initiated to arrange for the renegotiation of certain international agreements relating to the post-war disposition of such defence projects. In Canada this has taken the initial form of a proposal to re-open the Canol agreements.

4. In all the negotiations between Canada and the United States, either through the Defence Board or the Department of External Affairs, the greatest care was taken to protect the Canadian post-war position. Detailed arrangements for the ultimate disposition of United States projects were written into the text of some of the agreements, and other cases were covered by a general formula embodied in the 28th Recommendation of the Board.⁸¹ Thus, if existing agreements are maintained and executed all Canadian interests will be adequately protected.

5. Even apart from the Canol approach, however, there is accumulating evidence that the United States will endeavour to arrange for modifications in the present agreements with Canada. The weight of this evidence is cumulative when the following items are noted in their chronological sequence:

A. At a meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence on January 13, 1943, in the course of the discussion on the Twenty-eighth Recommendation, Mayor LaGuardia, Chairman of the United States Section, said that "Of course, American planes would be able to use the bases in Canada which are now being built with American money." Now the Mayor knew as well as the rest of the Board that United States expenditure on bases in Canada was part of the United States contribution to the united war effort and that it had been agreed and emphasized again and again that this contribution would not give the United States the right to claim a privileged position in post-war aviation. Apparently, however, he had been influenced by the feeling, prevalent even among people occupying important positions in the Government, that the United States should get some permanent advantage out of wartime expenditures of this kind, and was taking advantage of the opportunity offered by the discussion in the Board to try to reopen the whole question.

B. On the 13th of January in drafting the Twenty-eighth Recommendation, which outlined general rules for the post-war disposition of United States defence projects in Canada, the United States members of the Board insisted on the inclusion of the following paragraph:

"All of the foregoing provisions relate to the physical disposition and ownership of projects, installations, and facilities and are without prejudice to any agreement or agreements which may be reached between the Governments of the United States and Canada in regard to the post-war use of any of these projects, installations and facilities."

C. By letter dated January 27[†] and on February 16, 1943, the United States Government raised through the Legation in Ottawa the question of post-war use of Canadian highways giving access to the Alaska Highway, and of post-war use of these roads and of the Highway itself by United States military vehicles, indicating that it considered these two points to be covered by implication in the exchange of notes authorizing construction of the Highway.⁸² While the Canadian Government was prepared to concede the first point — that it was a natural inference from the language of the notes that United States vehicles should be allowed to use the roads leading from the boundary to the Alaska Highway under conditions and for purposes similar to those governing the use of the Highway itself — it refused to agree to the claim that the notes conferred the right to post-war military use. (This issue had in fact been discussed and decided in the negative when the problem was first before the Board).

D. On February 15, 1943, before the House of Representatives Committee on Foreign Affairs, Assistant Secretary of State A.A. Berle, who is particularly charged with relations with Canada, said that he believed that United States wartime expenditures on airfields in foreign countries “to the extent that they have permanent utility represent an item of equity which can and should be urged in the ensuing negotiation” on the post-war use of airfields in foreign countries. When a member of the Committee asked whether he did not grant that “it (the expenditure) is a chip in the game which we should not simply throw out of a jackpot and forget about”, Mr. Berle replied “Certainly”.

E. In a report to the Senate on October 28, 1943, Senator Richard B. Russell, speaking for himself and his four colleagues on the now famous tour of world’s battlefronts, stated that “All of us are concerned about American rights in air bases and air facilities which have been constructed at our expense all over the world. There should be no delay in having some definite understanding and agreement as to the post-war rights of commercial aviation. We cannot expect to have sovereignty over all bases that we have constructed for military purposes but we should assure to American enterprise an equal chance with others in these bases we have paid for, and the right to operate in all parts of the world.”

F. On November 14, 1943, the Washington Post said that the Sub-Committee of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads had reported that “The United States has made a large investment in the facilities of airfields along the route of the Highway. Improvements made are of permanent value for defense of Alaska, and should remain available to us after the war” and recommended that “The War Department should request the State Department to initiate negotiations at once with the Canadian Government looking to free use of the airfields after the war.”

G. [With] Reference to the Canol negotiations it is unnecessary here to recapitulate the arguments advanced by the United States representatives at the meeting on December 2, but it may be of interest to record the attitude of the Hon. H.L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, as expressed before the Truman Committee on November 22. “. . . I would suggest . . . that these contracts should be re-examined in the light of present conditions and future possibilities in order that the expenditures of this Government with respect to this project may be repaid. In return for the enormous investments and risks which we alone have assumed from the very beginning, the United States ought to be accorded a permanent peacetime share of the oil and products to be produced upon terms commensurate with the magnitude of the contribution which this Government has made.”

6. The purpose of this compilation is to indicate the necessity of giving early and detailed consideration to the position that Canada is to adopt as these approaches become more substantive and more pressing. It emphasizes also the desirability of doing everything possible to reduce the number and the relative importance of the defence facilities in Canada for which the United States taxpayer has to foot the bill. The most pressing case, as has already been indicated to Council, is the matter of United States expenditure on the Northwest Air Route.

RE: CANADIAN PAYMENT FOR U.S. AIRFIELD
CONSTRUCTION IN NORTHWEST CANADA

On December 3rd, the War Committee agreed that the U.S. government be informed that the Canadian government wished to make payment to the U.S. government for all construction of a permanent nature carried out by the United States upon air routes in Northwest Canada, it being understood that the Deputy Minister of Finance would mention this in discussions with the U.S. Treasury prior to a proposal being made through the usual channels. This was in addition to the decision not to request or accept payment for any permanent works done by Canada for U.S. account. (C.W.C. Minutes of December 3rd, page 4, paragraph 14).

I saw Clark yesterday, and he told me of his conversations with Harry White, during which he had mentioned the attitude of our government in this connection. White gave no indication one way or another as to what the U.S. attitude might be. In any event, of course, White would be interested only in the financial aspects. Clark saw no one in the State Department.

Clark feels that we should follow up at once by addressing a note to the U.S. government in the sense of the War Committee's decision. In his view, it is particularly important that the suggestions should go forward and be of record with the State Department, before the Canol negotiations advance any further. His fear is that if, as is likely, we have to take a stiff attitude toward American proposals for recovery of their investment in Canol, that fact would affect the U.S. government's response to a suggestion that we pay for all the Northwest airfields. From this point of view, it would be much better to have our bid in on the airfields before having to take a strong negative line on any formal U.S. proposals regarding Canol.

I am inclined to agree and since we have the instructions of the War Committee from the meeting of December 3rd, I think it would be well to have Pearson instructed to deliver a note to the State Department along the lines of the War Committee's decision.

SECRET. Please present to the Secretary of State, personally if possible, a note in the following terms, Begins: With reference to previous correspondence and discussions concerning the construction of airfields and ancillary facilities in Northwestern Canada I have the honour to inform you that the Canadian Government has decided

(a) not to request or accept payment from the Government of the United States for construction of any permanent facilities or improvements made by the Government of Canada, on United States account, upon airfields in Northwest Canada; and,

(b) to make payment to the Government of the United States for all construction of a permanent nature carried out by the Government of the United States upon air routes in Northwest Canada.

2. When United States proposals for the considerable extension of certain defence facilities in Canada were under discussion in the early months of 1942 it was decided by the Canadian Government

(a) that the Government of the United States should be permitted to pay for such approved extensions and improvements to existing defence installations in Canada as are required by United State forces beyond Canadian standards and requirements, on condition that Canada retain full title and control; and

(b) that the cost of defence installations in Canada used by Canadian forces, up to Canadian standards and requirements, should be paid for by Canada.

This decision was conveyed to the United States authorities by the Chairman of the Canadian Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence at the meeting held in New York City on April 27, 1942. The pertinent section of paragraph 11 of the Journal of the Board reads as follows:

“The Chairman of the Canadian Section stated that the Canadian Government felt that Canada should properly pay for the construction of new fields or other permanent works of continuing value to the airway and that the United States should pay for such approved extensions and improvements to existing facilities as are required by the United States forces beyond Canadian standards and requirements.”

3. When this decision was taken the airfields of Northwestern Canada had been or were being developed by Canada to a stage commensurate with the view the Canadian Government then took of their importance in the general field of Canadian aviation. The Canadian Government has been reviewing the probable future requirements of aviation in this area and as a result has come to the conclusion that the standards to which these air routes should be developed are substantially above those previously considered necessary.

4. In these circumstances I am instructed to inform you that the Canadian Government has reviewed the whole position of air transport routes in Northwest Canada, that its estimate of the appropriate standard of development has risen materially since 1942 and that it has therefore come to the conclusion that Canada should pay for all construction of permanent facilities or improvements on the air routes in question. In pursuance of this decision the Canadian Government will not accept payment from the United States Government for the construction of any permanent facilities or improvements made by the Canadian Government on United States Government account on airfields in Northwest Canada, and will make payment to the United States Government for all construction of a permanent nature carried out by the United States Government on air routes in this area.

5. This decision applies to all airfields on the Northwest Staging Route, to the fields and landing strips on the Mackenzie River route, the landing strips along the Canol pipeline and all other airfields, landing strips and permanent air route facilities constructed by or for the United States Government in Northwest Canada in accordance with arrangements made from time to time between the two Governments for the joint defence of this continent.

6. The Canadian Government will be glad to enter into discussions with the United States Government at an early date with a view to effecting detailed arrangements for carrying out these conclusions of policy. Ends.

JURIDICTION SUR LES FORCES DES ÉTATS-UNIS AU CANADA

JURISDICTION OVER UNITED STATES FORCES IN CANADA

1078.

DEA/2818-40

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au ministre aux États-UnisSecretary of State for External Affairs to Minister in United States

DESPATCH 785

Ottawa, July 1, 1942

IMPORTANT

Sir,

I have the honour to direct attention to certain jurisdictional questions in relation to Canadian forces on duty in the United States and United States forces on duty in Canada. Some preliminary consideration has been given to the subject by this Department and by the Service Departments. It has also been raised before the Permanent Joint Board on Defence without, however, any recommendation having been made.

2. In relation to Canadian forces in the United States these questions are not of any special urgency since the strength of any formations on duty in the United States is small. There are, however, in Canada considerable bodies of United States troops on duty at Sault Ste. Marie, along the Alaska road and probably already at Prince Rupert. Some problems have already arisen as to the respective jurisdictions of the civil authorities and the officers in command of these forces, particularly that engaged on the construction of the Alaska road. These have been dealt with locally without friction, but similar problems may emerge at points where the Canadian civil authorities might prove less inclined to cooperate than those in sparsely settled northern areas. Such authorities are, as you know, free from any control by this Government except to the extent authorized by legislation enacted either by Parliament itself or by the Governor-in-Council under the provisions of the War Measures Act.

3. It is assumed that under the domestic law of the United States both strictly military offences and offences affecting civilians committed by members of the United States forces can be dealt with by United States service courts and authorities wherever the forces may be serving. This no doubt presents no difficulty when the area is one in which active operations of war against a present enemy are being carried on; whatever may be the local civil law it is silenced by the clash of arms. The problem is however not so simple when, as happily just now in Canada, direct enemy action is absent or extremely slight. In these circumstances the activities of the civilian authorities continue in a normal manner and the legal status of service courts and authorities is of much greater importance.

4. The powers of Canadian service courts and authorities are very clearly defined by Canadian legislation, and owing to the presence in Canada of foreign forces, steps were taken in April, 1941, to regularize their position in relation to Canadian law. There are enclosed thirty copies of a pamphlet[†] containing both the Foreign Forces Order, 1941 (P.C. 2546 of April 15, 1941), and a confidential memorandum in explanation of its provisions.

5. The Canadian Government has, by Order in Council P.C. 5484 of June 26, 1942 (ten copies of which are enclosed), applied the Foreign Forces Order 1941 to the United States of America as an interim measure, in order that civil authorities may have appropriate guidance in their relations with United States service courts and authorities. In the absence of such legislation the latter could not under Canadian law lawfully impose any corporal restraint or punishment on a member of the United States forces and any member detained or punished would almost certainly be entitled to succeed in obtaining an order for his release on an application for habeas corpus or in recovering judgment for damages either for false imprisonment or assault. Indeed, if a sentence of death were carried out in Canada under a judgment of a United States service court, it is difficult to see what defence, if any, to a charge of murder could be advanced by those concerned in its being so.

6. In brief, the main effect of the order is (a) to confer power on the service courts and authorities of a country to which the Order is applied to exercise within Canada in relation to members of that country's forces very wide powers to deal with offences of all kinds except murder, manslaughter or rape; (b) to require that Canadian military and civil authorities should cooperate with the service courts and authorities of foreign forces, and (c) to preserve intact the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of Canada to try members of foreign forces for acts constituting offences under Canadian law.

7. In practice the concurrent jurisdiction of the Canadian courts has not created any difficulty. The general policy followed in Canada has been to let the allied service courts and authorities deal with offences apart from the three specified offences.

8. The question for immediate discussion with the United States Government is whether the regime provided by the Foreign Forces Order would be satisfactory for the duration of the war or whether steps should be at once taken to modify or to substitute some other and quite different legislative provisions. Whatever course is taken the Canadian Government would expect that the position of Canadian service courts and authorities acting in respect of members of Canadian forces in the United States would correspond to those agreed upon with respect to United States forces in Canada.

9. If the United States Government thinks it desirable to discuss arrangements other than those for which provision is made by the Foreign Forces Order, I suggest the desirability of an early meeting of representatives of the two governments to discuss the important questions involved. The Canadian delegation to such a meeting would include representatives of the American and Legal Divisions of the Department of External Affairs, of the Department of Justice and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, of the Director of Naval Personnel, the Adjutant General (Army) and the Air Member for Personnel (Air), and of the Judge Advocate General. The meeting might take place in either Ottawa or Washington as the United States Government prefers.

10. In view of the importance of this subject, it is desirable that it should be discussed with the appropriate members of the State Department and that the information contained in paragraphs 1 to 9 of this despatch should be brought to their attention.

11. For your confidential information I enclose copies of letters of June 18 and 19 from the Deputy Minister of Justice[†] and a copy of our reply[†].

12. Also for your confidential information, I should like to summarize the information obtained from the Government of the United Kingdom in relation to the analogous jurisdictional situation in Great Britain. The United Kingdom has a statute called the Allied Forces Act which is to the same general effect as our Foreign Forces Order. This Act has recently been applied to the United States forces, but the United States Government has indicated its unwillingness to accept the restrictions imposed by that Act and in particular to agree that the ordinary courts of the United Kingdom should retain a concurrent jurisdiction over members of the United States forces.

13. The Government of the United Kingdom has decided to concede this point to the Government of the United States and a Bill will shortly be introduced into Parliament conferring exclusive jurisdiction on United States service courts in respect of offences by members of the United States forces. No assurance of reciprocity with respect to British forces in the United States has apparently been given, but the Government of the United Kingdom has expressed the hope that reciprocity will be forthcoming in the somewhat unlikely event of United Kingdom organized forces being sent from the United Kingdom to the United States.

14. No information has been received to indicate how it is proposed that the United Kingdom legislation should deal with the problem of the procedure to be adopted for compelling the attendance of civilian witnesses before United States service courts, and on that point it is not possible presently to make any constructive suggestion. It would require considerable exploration. The working out of reciprocal provisions on the point would perhaps increase the difficulty of reaching a satisfactory solution.

TELETYPE WA-3014

Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: Reference WA-2822 of October 2nd[†] and previous correspondence concerning the legal position of United States forces in Canada, State Department have now given us a memorandum dated October 16th in which they ask for exclusive jurisdiction in criminal matters over their forces in Canada and would be prepared to reciprocate. Text of the memorandum follows:

“The Legation’s memorandum of July 6, 1942[†] raised certain jurisdictional questions concerning United States forces in Canada and Canadian forces in the United States.

“It was pointed out that the Canadian Government had by Order-in-Council P.C. 5484 of June 26, 1942,[†] applied the Foreign Forces Order P.C. 2546 of April 15, 1941,[†] to the United States of America as an interim measure, and it was added that the effect of the Order was to confer on the Service authorities of the United States power to deal with offences of all kinds except murder, manslaughter and rape, and to require Canadian Military and Civil authorities to cooperate with the Service authorities of the United States, while preserving intact the jurisdiction of the civil courts of Canada to try members of the armed forces of the United States for offences under Canadian law.

“The question was raised whether the measures referred to would be satisfactory to the United States for the duration of the war or whether steps should be taken to substitute other legislative provisions. In the latter event, it was suggested that any discussion of arrangements other than those for which provision had already been made should be taken up in a meeting of representatives of the United States and Canada to be held either in Ottawa or Washington.

“The Service authorities of the United States feel that the present arrangements concerning jurisdiction over members of the armed forces of the United States in Canada are not satisfactory for the duration of the war and have indicated their desire for exclusive jurisdiction in criminal matters over such forces. In that connection, attention is called to the United States of America (Visiting Forces) Act 1942, 3 and 4 GEO. 6, C.51, enacted by the British Parliament, which gives the Service authorities of the United States such jurisdiction in the United Kingdom. Appended to the Legislation as a schedule were the notes exchanged by the United States and Great Britain on July 27, 1942, constituting an agreement recognizing the exclusive jurisdiction in criminal matters of the United States over the members of its armed forces in the United Kingdom. It is suggested that a similar arrangement might be entered into between the United States and Canada. Whatever course is taken would, agreeable to the suggestion of the Canadian Government, be on a reciprocal basis.

“If it is felt that the arrangements referred to can best be worked out by a meeting of representatives of the two Governments, this Government would be agreeable to participate in such a meeting either at Ottawa or in Washington.”
Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, December 23, 1942

Dear Mr. Robertson,

RE: LEGAL POSITION OF U.S. FORCES IN CANADA

This subject was, as you know, considered by the War Committee on December the 16th, on the basis of your memorandum to the Prime Minister, of December the 10th,[†] and the attached memorandum of December the 7th from your Departmental Legal Adviser.[†]

The War Committee had serious reservations in principle as to the wisdom of agreeing to the American request, the view being expressed that, if it were decided to do so, the appropriate action should be taken by Act of Parliament rather than by Order in Council under the War Measures Act. Because of the general importance of the subject, decision was deferred pending consideration by the full Cabinet.

Council reviewed the matter, yesterday, and came to the conclusion that, despite the considerations pointed out in Mr. Read's memorandum, the government could not agree to the ouster of Canadian criminal jurisdiction involved in acceding to the U.S. request. It was noted that the United Kingdom and Australia had felt constrained to accept similar demands for exclusive criminal jurisdiction for U.S. Service courts but, in the view of the government, the situation in Britain and Australia is clearly distinguishable from that of Canada. For one thing, Canada is in a position of close proximity to the United States; this is not true in the other cases. Further, American units in Canada are comparatively small and are scattered throughout the country, whereas those in Britain and Australia are larger in numbers, and, for the most part, comparatively concentrated. In the circumstances, to deny to Canadians their normal right of recourse in respect of local offences against the criminal law because the wrongdoer is a member of the American forces would not, in the opinion of the government, be in the interests of justice nor would it be justified by the necessities of the case.

For these reasons the government are not prepared to have negotiations opened with the United States in the sense suggested in Mr. Read's memorandum, and the U.S. Minister may be so informed. For your personal information I may say that the Prime Minister indicated that he would, if necessary, be quite willing to take this matter up, himself, with the President.

I am sending copies of this letter to the three Ministers of National Defence, and the Minister of Justice.

Yours sincerely,

Secretary of State for External Affairs to Minister in United States

DESPATCH 6

Ottawa, January 4, 1943

Sir,

In your teletype message of October 17, 1942, you dealt with the question of the legal position of United States forces in Canada.

In your memorandum to the State Department dated July 6[†], after discussing the jurisdictional problems arising out of the presence of Canadian forces in the United States of America and of United States forces in Canada, you brought to the attention of the United States Government the provisions of P.C. 5484 of June 26, 1942.[†]

That Order in Council applied the Foreign Forces Order, 1941, to the United States of America and brought into being the regime in which it became possible for the United States forces in Canada to maintain and administer their own discipline on the same basis as forces of others of the United Nations including forces of other parts of the British Commonwealth.

It was suggested in the memorandum that if the United States Government thought it desirable to discuss arrangements other than those for which provision was made by the Foreign Forces Order, a meeting might be held either in Ottawa or in Washington, attended by representatives of the interested departments of the two governments.

In your telegram of October 17 quoting the answering memorandum from the State Department, it was pointed out that the service authorities of the United States felt that the present arrangements were not satisfactory. The memorandum indicated their desire for exclusive jurisdiction in criminal matters and called attention to the United Kingdom legislation. It was suggested that a similar arrangement might be entered into between the United States and Canada on a reciprocal basis.

The suggestion by the United States authorities that we should adopt the same regime as that which has been followed in the United Kingdom has been studied with the utmost care by the interested departments of the Government and by the Cabinet.

Careful consideration was given to the position taken both in the United Kingdom and in Australia, but it is thought that the situation in those countries is clearly distinguishable from that in Canada. Canada is in a position of close proximity to the United States and it is unlikely that Canadian forces in the United States or United States forces in Canada will be far removed from their home bases. Further, the units in Canada are comparatively small and are scattered throughout the country, whereas those in the United Kingdom and in Australia are larger in numbers and are comparatively concentrated. It is thought that a similar position exists with regard to the Canadian forces in the United States.

It is thought that to deny to citizens of the United States of America their normal right of recourse in respect of legal offences against the criminal law because the wrongdoer happened to be a member of the Canadian forces would not be in the interests of justice nor would it be justified by the interests of the case. Similarly, it was thought that it would be difficult to justify to the Canadian people the removal of their right to institute prosecutions in the courts of this country against persons who had committed offences against the criminal code.

The Canadian Government has now had an extensive experience of operations under the Foreign Forces Order. In the practical working out of these arrangements a position, satisfactory both to the local authorities and to the foreign forces themselves, has been reached without difficulty. A similar situation exists with regard to United Kingdom formations in this country and the position of Canadian armed forces abroad is substantially identical. By practical arrangements and understandings, the forces are left to deal with practically all cases of offences committed by soldiers. It is only where the members of the armed forces are concerned in crimes directed primarily against the civilians that it becomes necessary for the civil authorities to intervene. These cases are so few that they do not, in practice, involve any embarrassment to the forces concerned.

IMMEDIATE. Your EX-297, January 27th,[†] legal position of United States forces in Canada. Hickerson phoned me on Saturday afternoon to say that he had received the results of the enquiries made of other United States Departments on this matter and referred to in my WA-321 of January 22nd.[†] Hickerson stated that he had found the Departments concerned most anxious to have an agreement with Canada on this matter. The War Department especially are anxious to have this agreement concluded with the least possible delay. When they were informed that the Canadian Government now considered that no such agreement seemed necessary, they were both surprised and perplexed. They pointed out that they had agreements of this kind with practically all other countries where American troops were serving and that, as there would always be during the war considerable numbers of United States troops in Canada, an agreement with our country was, in their opinion, also essential. They mentioned in this connection agreements with Great Britain, the British Colonies, Australia, India, Iran and Iraq (the latter one I think is now being negotiated). Hickerson hoped that before presenting formally our note, the Canadian Government might reconsider the matter, in view of the position taken here by the authorities concerned. I told him that I would pass on to you this request for reconsideration. He also added, incidentally, that there was a school of legal thought here which took the view that once Canada had permitted United States troops to serve in Canadian territory, under international law Canada also permitted United States exclusive jurisdiction over those troops. Hickerson admitted that there was a division of opinion among legal authorities in the Government here on this point, and he may have mentioned it merely to indicate the great importance attached by the Americans to their request for exclusive jurisdiction and the firm attitude they will be inclined to take if we reject their proposals. Hickerson also emphasized that we were the only country who had been offered reciprocity in this matter, which made it all the more surprising that we should be the only one to object to an arrangement covering exclusive jurisdiction.

2. If the Canadian Government reconsiders, but adheres to decision to refuse exclusive jurisdiction, or if you think that the Canadian Government cannot be asked even to reconsider this issue, I hope that consideration can nevertheless be given to a secondary issue before we present our note refusing exclusive jurisdiction. The secondary issue is whether to remove the prohibition, contained in the Foreign Forces Order, on United States service courts dealing with cases of murder, manslaughter, and rape. An offer on our part to remove this ban might possibly dull the edge of our refusal to grant exclusive jurisdiction.

3. I appreciate how desirable it is in present circumstances to maintain a firm and self-respecting attitude in discussions with the United States when differences of opinion arise. I feel, however, that serious consideration should be given to the suggestion that in this particular instance we are not on as strong ground as we might be, especially in the light of the previous approaches made to the United States on this subject, which certainly indicated that if we were granted reciprocity we would have no objection to an agreement between the two countries covering this matter.

LEGAL POSITION OF U.S. FORCES IN CANADA

13. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS referred to the decision of Council on December 22nd, that the government could not agree to the U.S. request regarding criminal jurisdiction in respect of American forces in Canada.

The Legation in Washington had taken the matter up, informally, with the U.S. government and reported that the United States had similar agreements with practically all other countries where American troops were serving; Canada was the only nation which had been offered reciprocity. The State Department had expressed the hope that the Canadian government would reconsider the position.

(Teletype WA-457, Canadian Minister, Washington, to External Affairs, February 1, 1943).

14. THE SECRETARY reported that the External Affairs Legal Adviser had suggested that, if the government did not wish to reconsider the decision taken, the position might be discussed by the Canadian Minister, or the Prime Minister, with the U.S. Secretary of State, or the President, before formal presentation of a note on the subject.

As an alternative to acceptance or refusal of the American request it was suggested that it might be possible to withdraw the limitation involved in the Foreign Forces Order on disposition of certain types of cases. Copies of the report from the Legal Adviser had been circulated to Ministers concerned.

15. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion and reconsideration of the factors involved, agreed:

(a) that the decision of Council on December 22nd, 1942, remain unchanged; and

(b) that, prior to the communication to the U.S. government of a formal note on the subject, the Canadian Minister in Washington be instructed to explain the views of the Canadian government, informally, to the U.S. Secretary of State and the President, with a view to obtaining, if possible, the withdrawal of the formal request submitted.

TELETYPE EX-538

Ottawa, February 13, 1943

The Minister of Justice was informed by the Attorney General of British Columbia this morning that the latter would not object to United States Army Commander proceeding with court martial at Dawson Creek of soldier accused of attempted rape. He wished however to have a representative present at the proceedings who could make a report to him of the action taken. I have advised the United States Chargé d'Affaires of the Attorney General's position. He sees no objection to the presence of a representative of the Attorney General at the court martial and is arranging to have the United States Army Commander notify the Attorney General so that he can make suitable arrangements for representation. It thus appears that the difficulties of the immediate Dawson Creek incident have been overcome.

In the circumstances I think it is desirable to attempt to secure a settlement of the general jurisdictional question as quickly as possible. Clark having referred to the anxiety of United States War Department to have the position cleared up by discussion to take place in Washington or Ottawa, I told him we would be glad to examine whole position with representatives whom United States Government might wish to send to Ottawa for this purpose.

LEGAL POSITION OF U.S. FORCES IN CANADA

41. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE reported upon discussions in Ottawa, between U.S. and Canadian officials.

Agreement had been reached as to the nature of the jurisdiction to be granted U.S. Service Courts, on the understanding that the U.S. government would make certain reciprocal concessions in respect of Canadian forces in the United States. On this basis, a draft United States Foreign Forces order had been prepared.

Subsequently, information had been received from Washington to the effect that the U.S. government, for constitutional and other reasons, were unable to grant to Canadian forces the measure of reciprocal treatment upon which agreement had been reached in Ottawa. Copies of a memorandum on the subject had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Minister of Justice from Committee on Drafting, Mar. 10, 1943 — C.W.C. document 438).[†]

42. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed to defer further consideration of the subject, pending its further examination by the Minister of Justice with officials of departments concerned.

TELETYPE EX-951

Ottawa, March 18, 1943

My teletype EX-771 of March 4[†] concerning negotiations with the United States as to the legal position of their forces in Canada and Canadian forces in the United States.

For your confidential information, a memorandum forwarded by the United States authorities[†] indicating the position of Canadian Forces in the United States makes it clear that the present law there would not provide true reciprocity for the position sought in Canada. It is also made clear that no legislation is desired or intended to alter the position. The United States memorandum suggests that it would be possible to provide true reciprocity if the arrangements with respect to jurisdiction were made by means of an agreement rather than by unilateral provision. In consequence, it seems desirable to have recourse to this procedure and attempt to reach an agreement under an exchange of notes which would be subject to ratification by the United States Senate. A draft exchange of notes is at present being made which would provide for the position in sufficient detail that ratification by the Senate would give satisfactory legal position for Canadian forces in the United States.

It is expected that the draft will be ready for consideration by the Canadian authorities within a day or two and, following agreement on the preliminary draft, a communication embodying our new suggestion will be sent to the United States Chargé d'Affaires in Ottawa.

It is intended in the draft exchange of notes to allow jurisdiction over all members of United States forces in Canada or Canadian forces in the United States whether on duty or visiting but to provide that, only in the case of members on duty, will there be any obligation to notify the visiting force of arrest or to turn such person over.

Memorandum from Department of External Affairs to Minister of Justice

Ottawa, March 24, 1943

MEMORANDUM FOR THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE CONCERNING MR.
LEWIS CLARK'S CONVERSATION ABOUT THE LEGAL POSITION OF UNITED STATES FORCES IN CANADA AND CANADIAN FORCES
IN THE UNITED STATES

I. SUBSTANCE OF MR. CLARK'S MEMORANDUM

(1) Mr. Clark states that he understands that, because the United States cannot at present provide compulsory attendance of witnesses at Canadian courts martial there, Canada wishes to use the "treaty method" for an agreement on the legal position of forces.

(2) The United States is willing to have an exchange of notes similar to that in the case of the United Kingdom. (There was no ratification by the Senate in that case.)

(3) While Canadian courts in the United States cannot compel attendance of witnesses, nor can United States courts do so here at present. To parallel the proposed Canadian order in council which provides for witnesses, consideration is being given to the question of having legislative provision made by Congress. However, it is felt that provision to give exclusive jurisdiction to United States courts in Canada should not be delayed pending such legislation. Canadian forces in the United States enjoy such exclusive jurisdiction. (There is no legal basis for this statement so far as concerns men in the United States other than on duty. With respect to men on duty it seems to be true, but it is to be noted that there have been cases of British naval personnel being tried by United States courts in this war.)

(4) The United States is willing to have Canada not provide for compulsory attendance of witnesses until it is provided in the United States.

(5) Until United States forces in Canada are given the same exclusive jurisdiction Canadian forces have in the United States, questions of procedure "appear to be premature."

(6) The "treaty method" of agreement is undesirable "because of the delay involved and because such a formal method would not appear to be necessary for the purpose indicated."

II. POSITION OF THE DRAFT EXCHANGE OF NOTES IN THE LIGHT OF MR. CLARK'S MEMORANDUM

(1) There appears to be little likelihood that our proposal for an exchange of notes to be ratified by the United States Senate will be accepted.

(2) However, Mr. Clark's stated reason for dismissing the treaty method (as too formal for a minor matter like securing compulsory attendance of witnesses) is not entirely valid, in view of the fact that the exchange would establish Canadian jurisdiction over personnel on leave in the United States, which is not provided for by any of the authorities the United States representatives have cited thus far. Moreover, such an exchange with ratification would put the general jurisdiction of Canadian service courts in the United States beyond any doubt. Recent British representations make it clear that they are by no means satisfied with their position in the United States despite the exchange of notes they had. It seems clear that they are seeking definite legal commitment. By making these points clear, it might be feasible to press for the "treaty method". However, the prospect does not seem good.

(3) On the occasion of the meeting in your office on March 17th, you were of the opinion that, if the United States would not agree to the "treaty method" or to making legislative provision, the extent of Canadian action should be to remove the bar to jurisdiction over cases of murder, manslaughter, and rape. (Foreign Forces Order, s.3.) This would probably not meet the United States demand for exclusive jurisdiction, since it would provide only for general concurrent jurisdiction parallel to the paramount jurisdiction of Canadian civil courts.

(4) Some possible courses of action at present appear to be the following:

(a) To press for the "treaty method" as providing for certainty in the substantive law, as well as for necessary adjective law. (There seems little hope of this being accepted.)

(b) To enter into an exchange of notes without ratification, providing for exclusive jurisdiction in the case of all personnel except men visiting the country on leave. (The United States might object to the latter exception. Such an agreement would do nothing to make legal provision for such matters as notification of service authorities of arrests, assistance in making arrests, etc.)

(c) To amend the Foreign Forces Order as suggested so as to give jurisdiction over murder, manslaughter, and rape. (This would not meet the demand for exclusive jurisdiction.)

(d) To amend the Foreign Forces Order as above, and also amend it to make the jurisdiction exclusive. (This would go beyond the limits previously decided upon.)

(e) To pass the order in council drafted at the time of meeting the United States representatives, with or without provision to cover men on leave or to make the jurisdiction exclusive. (An exchange of notes, even without ratification, might be preferable to unilateral action of this type, since the exchange would at least set forth the United States view of the state of the law in the United States, and would specify their opinion as to the position of our forces.)

(5) It seems clear that there are drawbacks in respect of any of the courses of action likely of acceptance. If it is deemed politically feasible, having regard to the position of the provincial authorities with respect to the administration of justice as well as to other factors, possibly the most desirable course would be to amend the Foreign Forces Order as it applies to the United States so as to give jurisdiction over murder, manslaughter, and rape, and also so as to make the jurisdiction exclusive. This would not give jurisdiction over personnel in Canada on leave.

(6) Your instructions in this matter would be appreciated.

LEGAL POSITION OF U.S. FORCES IN CANADA

32. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE reported that the U.S. government were pressing for action upon their request for jurisdiction over American Service personnel in Canada. They were prepared to embody in a note a statement of the doctrine of the U.S. Supreme Court under which the Service Courts of a friendly power would exercise exclusive jurisdiction over members of its armed forces in the United States.

On our part, as a result of interdepartmental consultation it was now proposed:

(a) that the Foreign Forces order be extended in respect of U.S. forces, by Order in Council, so as to include the major crimes. (This action would not accord U.S. Service courts in Canada exclusive jurisdiction over American personnel nor would it affect the authority of the Attorneys-General of the provinces);

(b) to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada the question whether, under international law, U.S. Service Courts possessed exclusive jurisdiction over American personnel in Canada and, if not, whether, in war conditions, the Federal government had power to confer such exclusive jurisdiction upon them.

In the circumstances, though not free from objection, it was recommended that these proposals be approved for communication to the U.S. government.

33. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, approved the recommendation of the Minister of Justice.

P.C. 2813

Ottawa, April 6, 1943

WHEREAS with the consent of the Canadian Government the Government of the United States of America has stationed and will station units of its Armed Forces in Canada;

AND WHEREAS by section 2(c) of the Foreign Forces Order, 1941, being P.C. 2546 dated the 15th April, 1941, a foreign power is defined as any power which may be designated by order of the Governor in Council as a foreign power, to which the said order may apply;

NOW, THEREFORE, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence and pursuant to the power conferred by the War Measures Act, is pleased to order as follows:

1. The United States of America is hereby designated as a foreign power to which the Foreign Forces Order, 1941, shall apply except the following proviso contained in section 3 of the said Order, which proviso shall not apply in the case of the Forces of the United States of America aforesaid:

“Provided that such service courts or authorities shall not have jurisdiction in respect of any acts or omissions which would constitute the offences of murder, manslaughter or rape under the Criminal Code; and provided further that such service courts or authorities acting under or pursuant to the provisions of this section shall not have jurisdiction to sentence any person to death for any offence, except for an offence which, under the law of the foreign Power to which the force belongs, is an offence for which a member of that force may be so sentenced and which is an offence of the same nature as one for which a member of a like home force would, under the law applicable to such home force, be liable to be sentenced to death.”

2. The application of the Foreign Forces Order, 1941, as aforesaid, to the forces of the United States of America shall not be construed as prejudicing or curtailing in any respect whatsoever any claim to immunity from the operation of the municipal laws of Canada or from the processes of Canadian courts exercising either criminal or civil jurisdiction by members of the forces of the United States of America founded on the consent granted by His Majesty's Government in Canada to such forces to be present in Canada;

Décret en ConseilOrder in Council

P.C. 2931

Ottawa, April 9, 1943

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 8th April, 1943,[†] from the Minister of Justice, representing:

That, with the consent of the Government of Canada, the Government of the United States of America has stationed and will station units of its military and naval forces in Canada;

That a question has arisen as to the relationship of the authorities and courts of Canada to the aforesaid forces and more particularly as to whether criminal proceedings may be prosecuted in Canada before any Canadian court against a member of the military or naval forces of the United States of America;

That United States authorities contend that the members of their military and naval forces aforesaid present in Canada with the consent of the Government of Canada are exempt from prosecution as aforesaid;

That cases have already occurred in which members of the military forces of the United States of America present in Canada have been charged with having committed criminal offences in Canada and questions have arisen as to whether such members are subject to be prosecuted in the criminal courts of Canada or whether service courts established for the purpose by the United States military authorities have exclusive jurisdiction in that behalf;

That certain regulations enacted under the War Measures Act entitled the Foreign Forces Order, 1941, provide that, when a foreign force to which the Order is made applicable is present in Canada, the service courts of the foreign power may exercise within Canada, in relation to members of that force, in matters concerning discipline and internal administration, all such powers as are conferred upon them by the law of that power, subject to certain exceptions set out in a proviso to section three of the said Regulations, which exceptions, however, are not applicable in the case of the forces of the United States of America; and

That these Regulations have, subject to the qualification mentioned in the next preceding paragraph, been extended to the forces of the United States of America, which extension was made for the purpose of placing service courts of the forces of the United States of America in no less advantageous position than those of our other allies and it was expressly provided in the Order that the application of the Foreign Forces Order, 1941, to the forces of the United States of America shall not be construed as prejudicing or curtailing in any respect whatsoever any claim to immunity from the operation of the municipal laws of Canada or from the processes of Canadian courts exercising either criminal or civil jurisdiction by members of the forces of the United States of America (P.C. 2813 dated 6th April, 1943).

The Minister is of opinion that important questions of law are raised, and recommends that, pursuant to the powers vested in the Governor in Council by section fifty-five of the Supreme Court Act, the following questions be referred to the Supreme Court for hearing and consideration:

1. Are members of the military or naval forces of the United States of America who are present in Canada with the consent of the Government of Canada for purposes of military operations in connection with or related to the state of war now existing exempt from criminal proceedings prosecuted in Canadian criminal courts and, if so, to what extent and in what circumstances?

2. If the answer to the first question is to the effect that the members of the forces of the United States of America are not exempt from criminal proceedings or are only in certain circumstances or to a certain extent exempt, has Parliament or the Governor General in Council acting under the War Measures Act, jurisdiction to enact legislation similar to the statute of the United Kingdom entitled the United States of America (Visiting Forces) Act, 1942?

The Committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

*Mémoire du troisième secrétaire*⁸³
*Memorandum by Third Secretary*⁸³

Ottawa, August 5, 1943

SUPREME COURT DECISION IN REFERENCE AS TO JURISDICTION
OVER MEMBERS OF THE UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES

1. The Chief Justice and Hudson, J. concurred in the following answer to question 1:

1. Land forces

(a) The civil courts (i.e. non-military) have jurisdiction.

(b) As a matter of practice, criminal courts do not exercise jurisdiction in the case of offences within the camp or between members of the force if the act involved does not affect the person or property of a Canadian subject.

2. Naval forces

(a) Criminal courts have no jurisdiction over the crew of an armed ship of the United States in the case of offences aboard ship involving only members of United States forces.

(b) Courts have jurisdiction in the case of offences committed on shore. As a matter of practice, jurisdiction is not exercised if only members of the crew are involved.

⁸³R.G. Robertson.

In his reasons, the Chief Justice stated that it is a settled principle of British law that the members of armed forces are subject to the civil law. This principle applies to all armed British or foreign forces, except as it may have been modified by statute. In the United Kingdom, legislation has modified this (and only legislation could remove the jurisdiction of the courts) but no immunity has been recognized as a matter of international law. The Chief Justice is of the opinion that there is no principle of international law giving immunity. In respect of the Cheung Case the decision had to do only with offences by one member of the crew against another and has no bearing on offences by other than naval forces, or against other people than members of the crew or offences committed on land.

2. Taschereau and Kerwin, J.,J. agreed in independent decisions on the following answers to question 1:

1. Members of United States forces stationed in Canada, whether they are on leave or otherwise, are exempt from jurisdiction of the criminal courts.
2. The exemption does not extend to tourists or members of the United States forces casually visiting in Canada.

Taschereau, J. stated that there is a strong preponderance of authority in favour of the view that international law grants “immunity to organized forces visiting a country with the consent of the receiving government”. He was of the opinion that the essence of the Cheung Case applies to all armed forces. The principle involved is that, in inviting armed forces onto his territory, the sovereign waives or cedes a portion of his sovereignty. The rules of international law apply in Canada unless inconsistent with the laws of the land and there is no inconsistency which negatives the application of the international law principle. Members of the United States forces in Canada on a casual visit are not here by invitation and, consequently, there is no immunity for them.

Kerwin, J. stated that, in general, the consent of the Canadian Government to the presence of United States forces is found in the declaration by the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States regarding the establishment of a Permanent Joint Board on Defence on August 18, 1940⁸⁴. The Chief Justice had argued that, in granting immunity to the United States forces in the United Kingdom, the statements by the United Kingdom authorities as to the exceptional nature of this departure indicated that, in their view, there clearly was no principle of international law which granted such immunity. Kerwin, J. was of the opinion that all references to the exceptional nature of the step had reference to the fact that “foreign troops had not been on the soil of Great Britain for many years with the exception of the last war”. Kerwin, J. was of the opinion that the rule of international law involved is clearly dealt with in The Exchange Case stating that there is immunity for troops invited to pass through a foreign territory. The Cheung Case did not question the principle involved but only the theory upon which the principle was based. In his view, the principle applied to United States forces since they were here on the invitation of the Government of Canada and “the invitation must be taken to have been extended and accepted on the basis that complete immunity of prosecution in Canadian criminal courts would be extended to members of the United States forces". Thus, immunity results from the invitation given.

⁸⁴ Voir le volume 8, document 90.

⁸⁴ See Volume 8. Document 90.

3. Rand, J. answered question 1 as follows:

1. Members of the United States forces are exempt from criminal proceedings in the case of offences occurring —

(a) In camps or on ships except where they involve persons or property not subject to United States service law;

(b) under local law in any location provided that they involve only members of the United States forces.

2. While such exemption exists, it applies only to the extent that the United States forces exercise jurisdiction over the offences involved.

Rand, J. was of the opinion that Canada has invited here an army with its laws, courts, and discipline. It cannot be thought that the army would take the invitation to mean that "once the international border was crossed, its disciplinary powers would be suspended . . .". He also referred to the existence of a principle of British law that civil law is supreme over all military organizations. If this conflicts with the principle of international law giving immunity in the cases cited, clearly the international law principle is subordinate. However, the rule of British law does not stand in the way of a rule "limited to the relations of members of a foreign group admitted into Canada for temporary national purposes with persons other than members of the Canadian public."

4. The justices were unanimous in the view that the Parliament of Canada and the Governor General in Council acting under the War Measures Act may provide immunity from jurisdiction for members of the United States armed forces.

COMMENT

1. In view of the division of opinion among the justices, it seems that, for practical purposes, action must be based on the assumption that there is not any immunity for members of the United States armed forces unless it is provided by legislation either by act of Parliament or by Order in Council. The Foreign Forces Order gives authority for the exercise of jurisdiction by the military courts of the United States but it does not provide any immunity from process of the Canadian courts.

2. If the above conclusion is correct, it would seem that there are two possibilities available in order to meet the United States contentions as to the position of members of their forces:

(a) Have provision made by Order in Council, presumably amending the Foreign Forces Order in its application to the United States forces, so as to provide immunity for them from Canadian criminal jurisdiction. This probably could be done without any difficulty arising vis-à-vis other foreign forces in Canada since, so far as I am aware, there has been no protest on their part against the special position already accorded United States troops in removing any limitation on the extent of jurisdiction of their military courts.

(b) It might be possible to enter into an administrative arrangement with the Attorneys General of the provinces under which, without changing the law, as a matter of practice jurisdiction would not be exercised over members of the United States forces. This would clearly depend on the cooperation of the provincial authorities and might perhaps lead to difficulty if bad cases arise in which there is considerable popular resentment against members of the United States forces involved.

On the whole, the decision appears to throw the entire question back on the Government for decision as a matter of policy.

3. One point on which there seems to be no doubt as a result of the opinion given is that members of the United States forces in Canada as tourists or as casual visitors enjoy no exemption whatever from Canadian jurisdiction. The United States has contended for such immunity but the view of the Canadian authorities working with the question has been that such persons should not be accorded any immunity. The argument in favour of refusing such immunity is strengthened by the clear agreement that international law does not recognize it.

4. I understand that the Minister of Justice is discussing today, or will discuss shortly, the entire question with the officers of his department in order to determine what action would seem to be advisable in the light of the Supreme Court decision.

*Chargé d'Affaires of United States to

No. 59

Ottawa, October 28, 1943

Sir,

I have the honor to refer to my note No. 901 of May 27, 1943[†] and to subsequent correspondence[†] with officers of the Department of External Affairs with regard to the right under international law of members of the armed forces of the United States on Canadian territory, with the consent of the Canadian Government, to immunity from the local jurisdiction in criminal matters.

My Government has taken due note of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in this matter rendered on August 3, 1943. While the Supreme Court was divided in its views concerning the right of the United States Government to exclusive jurisdiction in the premises under Canadian law, it did not deny that the United States had such right under international law and it was unanimously of the opinion that any infirmities in the law of Canada could be cured by governmental action. Also, while the Canadian Minister of Justice has been able in certain cases which have been brought to his attention to obtain, as he had undertaken to endeavor to do, acquiescence of local prosecuting authorities in the exercise of jurisdiction by United States service courts over offences committed by members of United States armed forces in Canada, in several other cases which have come to the attention of my Government jurisdiction was exercised by the local authority. In still another case, which is now pending in Edmonton, Alberta, my Government is informed that, although jurisdiction is being exercised by our service authorities, the action taken by them is being influenced by the requests of the local authorities.

Even though the Canadian Government may be able to obtain the acquiescence of the local authority to the exercise of jurisdiction by our service authorities in all cases which may arise, my Government does not consider that it should be necessary in every case in which a member of the armed forces of the United States in Canada is charged with an offence to make the matter the subject of diplomatic procedure.

My Government attaches considerable importance to obtaining a clarification of this situation, and I have been directed to state that it feels that its rights to exclusive jurisdiction over offences with which members of its armed forces in Canada may be charged should be formally recognized by the Canadian Government. Accordingly, I have been directed to express the hope that the Canadian Government may find it possible to take action toward that end.

Accept etc.

Décret en Conseil

Order in Council

P.C. 9694

Ottawa, December 20, 1943

WHEREAS the Minister of Justice reports that as the result of a request made on behalf of the United States Government discussions have recently taken place at Ottawa by means of a joint committee of United States and Canadian officials for the purpose of clarifying the legal position of members of the armed forces of the United States of America charged with having committed offences while in Canada and of members of the armed forces of Canada charged with having committed offences while in the United States, and that the joint committee aforesaid drafted regulations which if enacted as law in Canada will establish a regime acceptable for the said purposes.

THEREFORE, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, for the security, defence, peace, order, and welfare of Canada, is pleased, on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice and under the authority of the War Measures Act, to make the following regulations and they are hereby made and established accordingly:

REGULATIONS

1. The United States of America is hereby designated as a foreign power to which the Foreign Forces Order, 1941, shall, subject as hereinafter provided, apply.

2. (1) "Member" shall, except as hereinafter provided, include all persons who are by the law of the United States of America for the time being subject to the military or naval law of that country, provided that no person employed in connection with the said forces not being a citizen or National of the United States of America shall be deemed to be a member of those forces unless he entered into that employment outside of Canada and further provided that in paragraphs five and six hereof the word "member" means a member of the military or naval forces of the United States of America stationed in Canada or in Canada on military or naval duty who, when detained as mentioned therein, is wearing a uniform of such forces.

(2) For the purpose of any proceeding in any court of Canada, a certificate issued for or on behalf of such authority as may be appointed for the purpose by the Government of the United States of America stating that a person of the name and description specified in the certificate is or was at the time so specified subject to the military or naval law of the United States of America shall be conclusive evidence of that fact.

(3) For the purpose of any proceeding in any court of Canada in which the question is raised, whether a party to the proceeding is or was at any time a member of the military or naval forces of the United States of America, any such certificate as aforesaid relating to a person bearing the name in which that party is charged or appears in the proceeding shall, unless the contrary be proved, be deemed to relate to that party.

(4) Any document purporting to be a certificate issued for the purpose of this section and to be signed by or on behalf of an authority described as appointed by the Government of the United States of America for the purpose of this section shall be received in evidence and shall, unless the contrary is proved, be deemed to be a certificate issued by or on behalf of an authority so appointed.

3. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 3 of the Foreign Forces Order, 1941, a service court of the United States of America shall have jurisdiction to try all members of its forces in Canada in respect of every offence committed by any of its members in Canada.

4. Every member of the forces of the United States of America charged with an offence committed in Canada and detained by a United States service authority in respect thereof shall be deemed to be in lawful custody.

5. Whenever a member of the forces of the United States of America is detained by any authority of Canada in respect of an offence, such authority shall forthwith notify the commanding officer of the member detained, or the commanding officer of the nearest United States force, or the military or naval attaché of the United States Legation at Ottawa, or such other officer of the forces of the United States of America as the said military or naval attaché may designate.

6. (1) Whenever a member of the forces of the United States of America is detained by any authority of Canada, the officer commanding the unit to which the said member belongs, or the officer commanding the nearest United States force, or the military or naval attaché of the United States Legation at Ottawa, or any commissioned officer authorized to act on their behalf may, by request in writing made no later than thirty days after a notice given pursuant to the next preceding section, require the authority so detaining to release the said member to such person or persons as he may designate, and the authority so detaining shall thereupon release the member accordingly: Provided that if such member has been admitted to bail in respect of any offence such request in writing may be made to the judge or justice who has admitted the said member to bail and such bail shall thereupon be released.

(2) After a request in writing has been made as aforesaid, no criminal proceedings shall be prosecuted in Canada before any court of Canada against the said member based on the offence in respect of which the said member was detained.

7. The said request in writing shall be substantially in form "A"[†] attached hereto, and shall certify that the member so detained is required for trial before a United States service court on a charge in respect of the offence for which he is detained by the authority of Canada, and shall state on its face the authority of the officer signing same.

8. No proceedings by way of injunction, prohibition or otherwise shall be entertained by any court in Canada for the purpose of enjoining, prohibiting, restraining or in any way reviewing the proceedings of a United States service court in connection with the detention, trial, conviction or punishment of a member of the forces of the United States of America.

9. (1) Any United States service court, or any commissioned officer of the forces of the United States of America authorized to do so under the laws of the United States, shall have power to require the attendance before such court in Canada of any person whose evidence is required for the purpose of the trial before it of any member of the forces of the United States of America.

(2) If the person whose attendance is so required is a member of the home forces, such attendance shall be obtained by a request in writing made to any appropriate officer of the home forces indicating the place and time at which the attendance of such person is required, and the proper officer of the home forces, subject to the military exigencies of the moment, of which he shall be the sole judge, shall make the appropriate Order for the attendance of such person accordingly.

(3) If the person whose attendance as a witness is required as aforesaid is not a member of the home forces, the officer of the forces of the United States of America authorized to require his attendance may issue a subpoena, in form "B"[†] attached hereto, which may be served by a peace officer or by a Canadian service authority; and any person served with such a subpoena shall attend and give evidence as thereby required upon payment to him of an amount sufficient to cover his necessary travelling expenses going to, staying at and returning from the place at which his attendance is required and an additional amount of $3.00 a day during his necessary absence from his place of residence for the purpose of such attendance.

10. Any person who, not being a member of the home forces, fails to comply with the provisions of the last preceding section shall be liable to be dealt with by any civil court in the same way as if such failure had followed the service of a subpoena out of such court or such refusal had occurred on a trial therein.

11. Every person other than a member of the forces of the United States of America who attends as a witness before a United States service court shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities as a witness to which he would be entitled if his evidence were being given in proceedings in a Canadian civil court.

12. Save as herein otherwise provided, the Foreign Forces Order, 1941, except Part II thereof, shall be of force and effect in respect of members and forces of the United States of America, and these Regulations shall be read and construed as one with the said Foreign Forces Order, 1941.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures à l'ambassadeur des États-Unis
Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador of United States

No. 160

Ottawa, December 27, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to invite your attention to the correspondence and discussions with regard to the legal position of members of the Armed Forces of the United States of America charged with having committed offences within Canada.

2. I am enclosing copies of an Order-in-Council, P.C. 9694 dated 20th December, 1943, which defines the legal position of members of the United States Forces in respect to offences committed in this country.

3. You will observe that this Order-in-Council conforms closely to the provisions which were discussed with representatives of your Government, and I have no doubt that they will be satisfactory.

4. Without commenting upon all of the provisions of this Order, I should like to mention several points.

5. You will observe that by virtue of the provisions of Regulations 2, 3, 5 and 6, United States Service Tribunals are enabled to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over members of the United States Forces within this country. The only cases in which Canadian civil authorities will be able to exercise any jurisdiction over members of the United States Forces are those in which your own Service authorities have refrained from action.

6. The second point is that when a request has been made under the provisions of the Regulations to Canadian civil authorities, normal proceedings cannot be continued in civil courts. The effective working of these arrangements is, therefore, dependent upon the United States Service authorities taking the accused and submitting him to trial before a United States military tribunal. The Canadian Government feels justified in assuming that your authorities will, in all cases, submit any person, who may be surrendered under the provisions of Regulation 6, to trial before a United States military court.

7. The third point to which I should like to invite your attention is that the Regulations enable United States military courts to exercise jurisdiction over certain classes of civilians who are subject to the military and naval law of the United States. The provisions of Regulations 5 and 6 do not apply to such persons and jurisdiction over them is, in fact, concurrent with that of the civilian courts in Canada. Under our constitutional system, the jurisdiction of the civilian court in such circumstances is necessarily paramount, and in the event that it is invoked in any case, either by the Attorney-General of Canada or by the Attorney-General of a province, it would be necessary for your military authorities to deliver the accused, notwithstanding that proceedings have been commenced in accordance with the provisions of Regulations 2 and 3. It is assumed that you will give directions to your military commanders to this effect.

8. You will observe that the Regulations, read in conjunction with the Foreign Forces Order, 1941, provide a comprehensive procedural code whereby Canadian authorities are under a legal obligation to do all things which are necessary in fact to enable the jurisdiction conferred by the Regulations to be exercised in an effective manner.

9. An arrangement of this sort presents insurmountable difficulty unless it is based upon effective reciprocity. The legal advisers of the Government, and especially the Judge Advocate General's office, are of the opinion that it would be impracticable for Canadian Service Court to exercise similar jurisdiction in respect of Canadian Forces in the United States of America in the present state of the law in the United States of America. They are convinced that, until some measures similar to those embodied in the legislation now before Congress are enacted, it will be impossible to cope with the complex problems presented in unusual cases in which crimes have been committed by Canadian sailors, soldiers or airmen. It is hoped, therefore, that your Government will endeavour to obtain the necessary legislation.

10. There is a point of practice with regard to Form B which I venture to bring to your attention. Form B¹ is intended to be a basis for a document to be issued by the United States military and naval authorities. It is intended for service within Canada, and I assume that your authorities would want the finished document to be in a form which would insure its effectiveness. In order to make the scheme work, it is essential that the person summoned should fully understand the consequences of failure to comply with its provisions. It is thought that the documents should be prepared with a foot-note along the following lines:

This summons is issued in accordance with the provisions of a Canadian Order-in-Council, P.C. 9694, December 20, 1943, which makes regulations including the following: (Here might be printed Regulations 9, 10, 11.)

9. (1) Any United States service court, or any commissioned officer of the forces of the United States of America authorized to do so under the laws of the United States, shall have power to require the attendance before such court in Canada of any person whose evidence is required for the purpose of the trial before it of any member of the forces of the United States of America.

(2) If the person whose attendance is so required is a member of the home forces, such attendance shall be obtained by a request in writing made to any appropriate officer of the home forces indicating the place and time at which the attendance of such person is required, and the proper officer of the home forces, subject to the military exigencies of the moment, of which he shall be the sole judge, shall make the appropriate Order for the attendance of such person accordingly.

(3) If the person whose attendance as a witness is required as aforesaid is not a member of the home forces, the officer of the forces of the United States of America authorized to require his attendance may issue a subpoena, in form "B" attached hereto, which may be served by a peace officer or by a Canadian service authority; and any person served with such a subpoena shall attend and give evidence as thereby required upon payment to him of an amount sufficient to cover his necessary travelling expenses going to, staying at and returning from the place at which his attendance is required and an additional amount of $3.00 a day during his necessary absence from his place of residence for the purpose of such attendance.

10. Any person who, not being a member of the home forces, fails to comply with the provisions of the last preceding section shall be liable to be dealt with by any civil court in the same way as if such failure had followed the service of a subpoena out of such court or such refusal had occurred on a trial therein.

11. Every person other than a member of the forces of the United States of America who attends as a witness before a United States service court shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities as a witness to which he would be entitled if his evidence were being given in proceedings in a Canadian civil court.

REVISION OF THE RUSH-BAGOT AGREEMENT

1. I am enclosing, for your information, the following:

(a) Copy of Treaty Series 1940, No. 12, including the revisions of the Rush-Bagot Agreement which were carried out in 1939 and 1940.

(b) Copy of Note No. 611 from the United States Legation at Ottawa suggesting a further revision of the Agreement.⁸⁵

(c) Copy of a draft reply.⁸⁶

2. This new revision will enable war vessels built in the Great Lakes to be completely armed and tested before leaving the Lakes. They will thus be able to meet German submarines between the estuary of the St. Lawrence and the nearest United States naval bases.

3. This proposal is for the duration of the war. It seems to be a sensible arrangement. It probably could be accomplished under the existing notes but it removes a possibility of doubt. When the earlier notes were exchanged in 1940 neither country had in mind the likelihood of there being German U-boat activities between the St. Lawrence and the United States Atlantic ports.

4. Consideration might be given to the following:

(a) Authority to accept United States suggestion.

(b) Immediate preparation of a print for tabling and distribution in the House.

5. A short statement will be prepared to be made on the occasion of the tabling of the documents⁸⁷ if the foregoing course is approved.⁸⁸

STATEMENT OF WAR PRODUCTION POLICY FOR CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

Having regard to the fact that Canada and the United States are engaged in a war with common enemies, the Joint War Production Committee of Canada and the United States recommends to the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada the following statement of policy for the war production of the two countries:

I approve. W. L. M[ACKENZIE] K[ING]

1. Victory will require the maximum war production in both countries in the shortest possible time; speed and volume of war output, rather than monetary cost, are the primary considerations.
2. An all-out war production effort in both countries requires the maximum use of the labor, raw materials and facilities in each country.
3. Achievement of maximum volume and speed of war output requires that the production and resources of both countries should be effectively integrated, and directed towards a common program of requirements for the total war effort.
4. Each country should produce those articles in an integrated program of requirements which will result in maximum joint output of war goods in the minimum time.
5. Scarce raw materials and goods which one country requires from the other in order to carry out the joint program of war production should be so allocated between the two countries that such materials and goods will make the maximum contribution toward the output of the most necessary articles in the shortest period of time.
6. Legislative and administrative barriers, including tariffs, import duties, customs and other regulations or restrictions of any character which prohibit, prevent, delay or otherwise impede the free flow of necessary munitions and war supplies between the two countries should be suspended or otherwise eliminated for the duration of the war.
7. The two Governments should take all measures necessary for the fullest implementation of the foregoing principles.

The Joint War Production Committee of Canada and the United States accordingly recommends to the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States that:

- (a) The foregoing statement of policy should be formally approved and forwarded as directives for action to the supply and procurement agencies of the two Governments, to the agencies responsible for production, and to the armed services of the two countries.
- (b) The legislative and administrative bodies of the two countries should take action at once to fulfill the objectives set forth in Section 6 above.

Washington, December 16, 1941

Dear Mr. Robertson,

Yesterday afternoon the first meeting took place here of the Joint Committee on Defense Production.⁸⁹ All the 12 members of the Committee were present except for Mr. Forrestal, the Under-Secretary of the Navy, who had to send a representative. There were in addition over a dozen other people at the meeting, about evenly divided between the two countries. I have not time to dictate a long report on the proceedings. You will, I expect, in any case receive a copy of the minutes either from Mr. Sheils or from Mr. Lesslie Thomson, the Secretary of the Canadian Section.

The discussion was rather rambling and diffuse, as was perhaps to be expected at an inaugural meeting without an agenda prepared in advance. The chief conclusion was that a statement of policy (not in the form of a formal resolution) should be prepared by the two Chairmen and the Secretaries which would include the following points:

- (a) the integration of the war production of the two countries;
- (b) the removal by both countries of obstacles arising from legislation or regulations to the free movement from one to the other of war materials, such as tariff restrictions and laws of type of the "Buy American" Act;
- (c) the establishment of a substantial number of small technical committees to examine problems of war production in their own field along the lines of the successful Explosives and Chemicals Committee, which is already in existence; and
- (d) the creation of a sub-committee of production experts to consider specific problems in any field in which difficulties and controversies may arise.

These are, I think, the main points, but I am not quite sure how much will go into the statement of policy, the text of which I have not yet seen. There was a good deal of talk about an agreement not to interfere with existing orders, which from our point of view meant mainly that the United States would undertake to supply us without question with the necessary components and raw materials for the completion of existing orders. There was also a good deal of talk about some specific programs, especially merchant shipbuilding and aircraft.

The general feeling on both sides seemed to be that the main Committee should only meet when some really serious problem arose. In fact, Mr. Milo Perkins, the American Chairman, said that ideally the main Committee ought not to have to meet again after adopting its declaration of policy. They plan, however, to hold a second meeting in Ottawa in about a month's time. I doubt whether in fact many of the American members will think it worth their while to go to Ottawa unless an agenda has been circulated in advance containing a number of items of considerable importance.

⁸⁹ Voir le volume 8, document 210.

⁸⁹ See Volume 8, Document 210.

Although this was not mentioned at the meeting except incidentally, I think it quite likely that there will be much closer collaboration in the production field between Great Britain and the United States and that we may have to consider some of the production problems on an inter-Allied rather than on a continental basis. The discussion yesterday centred almost altogether around the continental organization of war production.

It was agreed that Mr. Carswell should attend future meetings of the Committee in order to ensure liaison with his office. I think that it will not be necessary for the Legation to be represented, and I also feel that it is desirable that the number of those present at the meetings, in addition to the members, should be kept to the minimum. The main uses of the Committee should be, first, a high-level channel of approach for the solution of problems which have not been solved at a lower level, and secondly, the means of spreading throughout the whole vast supply organization here the doctrines agreed upon in the Hyde Park Agreement.⁹⁰

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I am enclosing a copy of a Directive issued by the Under-Secretary of War on December 27th⁹¹ in order to give effect to the declaration of policy proposed by the Joint War Production Committees of Canada and the United States and approved by the President and the Prime Minister.⁹² This goes as far as we could ask towards removing any obstacles which may exist that impede the placing of orders in Canada by the War Department. Legislation will be required on certain points, notably with respect to tariff restrictions.

⁹⁰ Voir le volume 8, document 191.

⁹¹ Aucune copie complète ne fut trouvée.

⁹⁰ See Volume 8, Document 191.

⁹¹ No complete copy was located.

⁹² This document was approved by the Cabinet War Committee on December 18, 1941. President Roosevelt announced his approval on December 23.

There has as yet, however, been no solution of the problem referred to in my Telegram No. 544 of December 4th¹ arising from a ruling of the Lease-Lend Administration that they would not purchase in Canada "completed articles" to be transferred to the United Kingdom under the Lease-Lend Act. Mr. Carswell informs me that he received yesterday a letter from Mr. Stettinius, stating that he was not able to revise this ruling, which he described as tentative, unless there was a serious change for the worse in the U.S. dollar position of Canada. Mr. Carswell has been told that a letter in the same sense is going forward from Mr. Morgenthau to Dr. Clark. He did succeed, however, by seeing Mr. Stettinius yesterday afternoon, in having this ruling waived in the case of a very large order of scout cars for the United Kingdom. The order in question had been well advanced when the ruling of the Lease-Lend Administration was given, and to ensure its completion the Ford Company had been instructed to proceed with their manufacture. In view of the special circumstances, Mr. Stettinius indicated that he would authorize payment for these cars out of Lease-Lend funds.

The sole reason given for this ruling is that they feel it necessary to avoid political criticism that they are using Lease-Lend funds in order to provide one part of the British Commonwealth with completely manufactured articles of war produced in another part of the British Commonwealth. One would hope that the U.S. entry into the war would lead to a change of view. They seem still to consider, however, that all such purchases should be directly arranged between Canada and the United Kingdom — a position which wrecks most of the business of War Supplies, Limited, in so far as future orders are concerned. In the present frame of mind, this position will not be modified unless we get close to scraping the bottom of our barrel for U.S. dollars.

The question is primarily one for the Finance Department. Mr. Carswell is keeping Mr. Sheils fully informed, and doubtless Mr. Sheils is in contact with Dr. Clark.

Yours sincerely,

H. H. WRONG

*Memorandum by Secretary, Canadian Section,

[Ottawa,] January 16, 1942

MEMORANDUM OF A MEETING WITH MR. NORMAN ROBERTSON, UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS, IN HIS OFFICE, ON THURSDAY, JANUARY 15TH, AT 5.30 P.M.

1. In opening, I referred to the Statement of Policy approved by the Joint War Production Committee. The Canadian Section of that Committee was now anxious to explore all steps necessary for Canada to take to implement the said Statement having regard to the fact that it had been approved by the Government. (See letter from the Privy Council, signed by Mr. Heeney, dated December 23rd, 1941, to all Ministers concerned.[†])

2. I pointed out to Mr. Robertson that Canada had already gone a great deal of the way toward carrying the policy into effect. To illustrate this I gave him a copy of the memorandum dated January 13th[†], of a meeting held between Mr. Hugh Scully, Mr. David Sim⁹⁴, and myself, in the beginning of which there is a list of the more recent orders-in-council under which authorities material is now brought free into Canada.

3. Mr. Robertson mentioned a conversation which he had had with Mr. Howe when going down on the train recently to Washington.

4. After some further discussion it developed that the following appears to be a summary of what Mr. Robertson believes are the appropriate steps to take:

(i) Broadly speaking, it would seem that the two countries should move in step in bringing about the results of the policy. One country should not be far in advance of the other. Although it was clearly stated that such actions were to be taken for the duration, nevertheless, when the war was over, it would be difficult if not impossible to revert completely to the status ante bellum. Therefore, careful thought should be taken by Canada as to the effects of what she was to do, and especially is this true in that Canada has already gone much farther along the road, relatively, than the United States, in reaching the ends specified in the Statement of Policy.

(ii) The Canadian Section should find out from their United States colleagues to what lengths the United States authorities are prepared to go to implement the policy. The President has certain discretionary powers, it is true, in regard to tariff, but the changes which he, independently of Congress, can make in any U.S. tariff are limited to a 50% reduction in tariff as it existed in 1930. Tariff changes which go beyond this range must be approved by Congress. Again, would the complete abrogation of the present United States 'Buy-American' limitations require an Act of Congress? or are there some discretionary powers in the Executive? Is the American Section of the Joint War Production Committee prepared to push these matters into Congress in order to bring about the whole results? If so, see sub-para. (v).

(iii) Correspondingly, the Canadian Section should be armed completely with information as to the present legal restrictions in Canada as to buying outside of Canada. The present purchasing policy of Government Departments ought to be looked into. For example, about 15 years ago there was, Mr. Robertson thought, an Order-in-Council limiting Canadian Government departmental purchasing. This whole situation should be explored so that the Canadian Section may have full information.

(iv) In the event that it be decided to admit a whole range of articles duty free and thus to alter greatly the effect of the present trade agreements, it is obvious that the United Kingdom authorities would have to be consulted and in addition some consultation should be had with the overseas Dominions, because the latter are materially interested also in our existing trade treaties in relation to preferences.

⁹⁴ Commissaire de l'accise, ministère du Revenu national.

⁹⁴ Commissioner of Excise, Department of National Revenue.

(v) Again, in the event of a Government policy being to admit a whole range of articles free to Canada, it would probably be better, having regard to all the factors in the problem, that a formal agreement be negotiated between the two countries⁹⁵. This would have several advantages over unilateral actions to be taken independently by the United States and by Canada.

Mémorandum du ministre des États-Unis
Memorandum by Minister of United States

Ottawa, February 19, 1942

MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATION WITH MR. NORMAN ROBERTSON,
 UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Robertson asked me if I knew the terms of the bill which would shortly be brought down to implement the tariff recommendations of the Joint Defense Productions Board. He said that he was inclined to think that the Board had builded better than they knew and that the reception in both countries to the recommendation had been so favorable that he hoped we would take the occasion to draft the enabling part of the bill sufficiently broadly to serve as an entering wedge for further mutual concessions in line with the more liberal trade policies laid down in the Atlantic Charter⁹⁶ and the draft Lease-Lend Agreement. For instance, take base metals which can be produced at a lower cost in Canada than the United States. Would not both the war situation and the post-war situation be benefited by Canada expanding its marginal production of base metals at least up to the point where costs between Canada and the United States equalized, rather than to subsidize the development of sub-marginal base metal mines in the United States, which would create a new vested interest?

A short while ago he had received a message from John Stirling and Wiseman to the effect that Harry Hawkins' mind was running along these lines but he had not sent any message in reply, partly because the status of the Lease-Lend Agreement was not clear, partly because he had not had time to talk

⁹⁵ La note suivante était dans l'original:

Query by L.R. T[homson] – How long would it take to negotiate and conclude an agreement of this sort? An estimate of the time would be helpful. Reply: Required time probably hinges on U.S. Mr. Robertson believes that Canada, for various reasons, could do her part in such negotiations within three or four months. Could the U.S. State Department act as quickly? It might, but the chances are it would take a good deal longer.

⁹⁶ Voir le volume 7, document 327.

⁹⁶ See Volume 7, Document 327.

through the problem with a number of his colleagues. However, he could not help wondering whether there was not a psychological situation in both countries from which we should profit. Although the bill was related to war supplies only and limited to the duration of the war, he wondered if authorization could not be included to extend its provisions by trade agreement or otherwise. He thought there had been some thinking along those lines in Washington.

As to the lease-lend bill, Canada had agreed to its being signed by Britain without an accompanying exchange of letters [notes] which, as he said, would not so much have protected the Ottawa system as “surrounded it with a dense fog”. A telegram confirming Canada’s position was being despatched this afternoon.⁹⁷

The main point to remember and it is one which he has iterated and reiterated to me was that there must be some new ground for manoeuvre in reducing yet further the barriers between Canada and the United States.

RE: CANADIAN WOODS LABOUR IN NEW ENGLAND

The following letter has been received by the Secretary from the Minister of Labour:

“I wish to acknowledge your letter of September 17^t concerning employment of Canadian labourers in woods operations in the Northeastern United States.

I believe that there is some misunderstanding with regard to the agreement reached on this question. This spring, in consultation with officials of the United States War Manpower Committee, it was agreed that a new quota of 3,500 men would be allowed for these woods operations, of whom 800 were to be available for Canadian cutting in the United States. This revised agreement was for the period of June 15 to October 31, 1943.

For years and years it has been the practice for seasonal labour to move from Canada to the States. Prior to the war Canada benefited very greatly because of this movement. The numbers varied, but would average a movement of 15,000 woodcutters into the State of Maine.

Through the co-operation of the United States Manpower authorities the numbers have been drastically curtailed. Each year lesser numbers have been allowed to go.

The present agreement is for not more than 3,500 men, of whom, as above stated, 800 ought to be made available for Canadian contractors operating in the State of Maine.

⁹⁷ Voir le document 561.

⁹⁷ See Document 561.

No men are allowed to go at all if they are acceptable to the army and no men are allowed to go if the agronomes [sic] of the district do not agree that the movement will not affect agricultural production.

The Manpower Commission of the United States is sending a representative group of officials to Ottawa on September 28 next to interview the Director and Timber Controller in respect to a new arrangement for the forthcoming winter.

Our policy will be to endeavour to effect a further reduction to possibly a maximum of 3,000 men, but it is not the opinion of the Department nor of those who have been consulted that there would be any advantage in absolutely prohibiting the movement of any men.

We are not overlooking the fact that as a post-war outlet for men who need work the practice of allowing men to go into the United States will be of great benefit."

MANPOWER; CANADIAN WOODS LABOUR IN NEW ENGLAND

45. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS presented a report from the Minister of Labour, in accordance with the decision of the War Committee on September 15th with regard to the employment of Canadian woods labour in New England. Copies of this report had been circulated.

An agreement covering the period June 15th to October 31st, 1943, between the United States and Canada, had provided that 3,500 Canadians be allowed to enter the United States for woods operations. Of these, 800 were to cut wood for Canadian use.

No men acceptable to the Army, or whose movement would affect agricultural production were allowed to go. This seasonal movement was a long-established practice which might provide a post-war outlet for Canadian labour.

(Letter, Minister of Labour to the Secretary, Sept. 21, 1943 — C.W.C. document 621).

46. THE DEPUTY MINISTER OF LABOUR stated that representatives of the U.S. Manpower Commission were expected in Ottawa in the near future to discuss the extension of this agreement.

47. MR. ROBERTSON stated that Canadians seeking employment were allowed to move to the United States only through the exercise of certain U.S. discretionary powers, which might not be used after the war. Accordingly, it would not be advisable to rely upon the post-war benefits of such a scheme.

48. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that National Selective Service and the Department of External Affairs consider and report upon the possibility of returning, for use in Canada, Canadian labour now employed in the New England woods.

[Ottawa,] September 28, 1943

At your request, I attended a meeting in Mr. MacNamara's⁹⁸ office this afternoon, at which there were present from the United States Mr. Parsons of the State Department, Mr. Lawton of the United States Legation, Mr. Roseman of the War Manpower Commission in Washington, and from Canadian departments concerned Mr. Fogo⁹⁹, Mr. Hall¹⁰⁰ and myself.

Mr. Roseman presented the attached letter to the Minister of Labour,[†] from which you will note that the United States now asks for sufficient exit permits to allow United States timber operators to employ a stable labour force of 7,500 Canadian citizens and that additional permits be granted for Canadian operators in the United States.

As a result of the discussions, Mr. Roseman will present us with a report listing the end products which result from the work of the present 2,800 now in the United States, and estimating the end products if we were to let them have 8,500 Canadians. He will also try to find out how many Canadians are in the New England woods without the proper exit permit or clearance from their draft board. Mr. MacNamara, I understand, will in turn prepare a report showing what would be likely to happen to the present 2,800 men if they were recalled to Canada and what would be the effect on Canadian war production if the United States were permitted to recruit up to 8,500 men in Canada.

Everyone, of course, said that they believed in the principle that the manpower involved should be used where it would most effectively serve the common war effort of North America. Mr. Roseman, however, indicated that the opinion in the United States was that if these men did not work in the United States they would sit around in Canada doing nothing, and that in any event the Canadian manpower pool could provide men from non-essential activities in Canada and thus not interfere with the normal movement to the United States of these workers. Mr. Roseman made it pretty clear that he thought we were not using our manpower most efficiently in Canada and said, for example, that we had more railway porters at our stations in Canada than they had in the United States.

No information was available on the question whether Canadians had been permitted to work in the Maine woods during the period from about 1930 to 1938, but the general impression was that they were not, though a number may well have slipped across the border illegally.

Mr. MacNamara made it clear that there was no chance of their securing permission for exit permits sufficient to maintaining a labour force of 8,500 Canadians in the Maine woods.

Mr. MacNamara is now of the opinion that from the point of view of National Selective Service, and disregarding domestic and international political considerations, the Canadian border should be closed to the movement of these workers, and the present 2,800 should be recalled. He is convinced that he would be able, directly or indirectly, to increase, as a result of this, the number of men engaged in the woods or in the base metal industries in Canada. He says that if the border is closed that then a considerable number of men will be ready to take work in essential industries in Canada who otherwise would be immobilized because they were sitting around waiting for a chance to get into the United States and draw high wages there. The closing of the border would be pleasing to Canadian companies in Canada but would, of course, displease Canadian companies in the United States.

It is probable that the United States Minister will request an interview with you tomorrow to submit informally the request from the United States, which is contained in the attached letter.

I return to you the memorandum of September 22[†] on the decision of War Committee and the Cabinet War Committee document, No. 621 of September 21, which apparently belongs to Mr. Baldwin.

NOTES ON A MEETING HELD SEPTEMBER 29TH, 1943 CONCERNING EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIANS IN MAINE WOODS.

Present

UNITED STATES

Honourable Ray Atherton, United States Minister;
Mr. J. Graham Parsons, State Department;

Mr. E.P. Lawton, United States Legation;
Mr. Alvin Roseman, War Manpower Commission.

CANADA

Mr. H.L. Keenleyside, Department of External Affairs;
Mr. A. MacNamara, Deputy Minister of Labour;
Mr. Escott Reid, Department of External Affairs;
Mr. J.J. Deutsch, Department of External Affairs.

MR. ATHERTON referred to the technical discussions which have been taking place between officials of the U.S. War Manpower Commission and Mr. MacNamara concerning the employment of Canadians in the Maine woods. He said the basis of these discussions had been entirely altered by a letter from Mr. MacNamara to the War Manpower Commission, which introduces two new arguments into the situation, namely, political factors and the circumstances surrounding this movement prior to the war. He said he wanted to raise, as a matter of principle, the question arising out of the deviation from the spirit of the Hyde Park Agreement which is involved in Mr. MacNamara's letter. The United States regarded labour in the same way as other resources needed for the war effort which under Hyde Park the two countries had agreed to share and share alike. He hoped that the Canadian Government would put the discussions back to the technical level and on the basis of the principle of the Hyde Park Agreement, where they belonged.

MR. KEENLEYSIDE said that as far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned its recommendation would be based on the principle that the labour should be used wherever it would contribute most to the war effort. The matter to be determined is where in fact would this labour produce most for the war effort?

MR. ROSEMAN stated that in 1940-41 as many as 9,000 Canadians were employed in the Maine woods. In 1942 the figure was cut, as a result of an agreement between the industries on the two sides of the border, to 3700. More recently the quota has ranged between 3500 and 4200. We are anxious now to have the quota raised to 7500. This number would virtually all be employed in highly essential production. The 2700 Canadian workers at present in Maine are employed approximately as follows: — 33% in logging for lumber; (ship timbers, boxes, aircraft spruce) 54% in logging for wood pulp; (nitrate pulps, wrapping papers, insulating papers, industrial papers and some fine papers) 13% in logging for newsprint. The requirements of wood for newsprint are not considered an important part of the argument for more Canadian labour. Every effort will be made to see to it that the labour is used for essential purposes. Representatives of the War Manpower Commission are visiting every employer to check on the utilization of workers and to assure essential and efficient use of labour. They will see to it also that all available labour in the local area is used. The greatest manpower shortage in northern New England is woods labour. A part of this labour has gone into the shipyards and steps are being taken to bring some of it back. No labour is being exported from northern New England to other states. While the need for workers in northern New England is great we are told that if the border is closed the Canadian labour would be under-employed. Because of the geographical isolation of the Canadian group adjacent to the border it would not be as readily available for essential use in Canada. The movement to Maine is a natural one owing to close proximity and habit.

MR. MACNAMARA replied that the question of under-employment of the Canadian workers has not been proven. If any under-employment exists it is due to the possibility of going into Maine where higher wages are paid with the result that the men are inclined to stay on their farms and wait for an opportunity to get across. If the border were definitely closed these men could be moved to essential work in Canada. There is a shortage of 50,000 workers in Canada for the highest priority work and all available labour could be used, directly or indirectly, for these essential purposes. MR. MACNAMARA agreed that the criterion should be: where can the men contribute most to the war effort? He said that Mr. Roseman should submit a statement showing how the men would be used in the United States. He should also provide information on how many are now in the United States illegally and without exit permits. These points should be cleared up before a decision is reached. Mr. MacNamara felt that reports concerning illegal entries were exaggerated.

MR. ROSEMAN said that he had been in touch with the U.S. immigration service who have informed him that they are checking all the camps monthly for illegal entry. To date only about 30 or 40 have been found. He was convinced that there were relatively few illegal entries. MR. ROSEMAN said he would be glad to provide a statement showing how the 7500 Canadian woodsmen requested would be allocated.

MR. MACNAMARA felt that there would have to be a strong argument to justify allowing Canadian workers to go to Maine when there may not be enough fuel-wood this winter in the neighboring Quebec cities.

MR. ATHERTON replied that when many United States cities were threatened with a coal shortage the United States at no time discriminated against Canada on that account. Share and share alike has been the considered policy of the United States with regard to coal.

MR. MACNAMARA said that normally from 8,000 to 10,000 workers from the areas concerned go into woods operations during the logging season. Last year 3700-4200 of this number went to the United States and the remainder to Canadian operations on the Canadian side. If the number permitted to go to the United States were raised to 7500 a considerable number would be drained away from Canadian areas. He said that he told Mr. Roseman previously that a figure as large as 7500 was out of the question. MR. MACNAMARA thought that an argument, in addition to war essentiality, could be made for allowing some workers to go across the border because it would establish the movement as a normal one from the post-war point of view. During the depression the border was closed by the United States.

MR. ROSEMAN thought that this exclusion was due to lack of employment in the area during this period. The largest employer, the Brown Corp., had gone bankrupt.

MR. KEENLEYSIDE said that before a recommendation can be made it would be necessary to obtain a statement from Mr. Roseman showing how the labour would be used in the United States; also, definite information on the effectiveness of the border controls and on the extent of illegal entries. Mr. Keenleyside asked Mr. MacNamara to prepare a statement showing how the labour would be used in Canada if it were not permitted to go to the New England woods. This information regarding utilization of the workers on the two sides of the border would enable a recommendation to be framed on the basis of essentiality to the war effort.

MESSRS. ROSEMAN AND MACNAMARA agreed to provide the statements requested as soon as possible.

MR. ATHERTON said that Mr. Keenleyside's proposal was entirely satisfactory. He said the question should not be dealt with on a political or pre-war basis but in the spirit of the Hyde Park Agreement.

Mémorandum du ministre des États-Unis
Memorandum by Minister of United States

Ottawa, September 29, 1943

Mr. Atherton, accompanied by Mr. Alvin Roseman of the War Manpower Commission and Mr. J. Graham Parsons of the State Department, called on Dr. Keenleyside to discuss the importation of Canadian woods labor into the northeastern States. He stated that he had been instructed to say that the American Government considered this matter of importance to the joint war effort and that it was considered that the basic principle of the Hyde Park Agreement between the Prime Minister and the President was applicable.

Mr. Roseman and Mr. Parsons pointed out that under this agreement the United States had shared with Canada resources in short supply and had made them available for essential Canadian needs on a basis of equality as between Canadian and American users. In this case the situation was reversed. The resource in short supply was labor and the labor necessary to ensure the full wartime productivity of a vital American industry was located just across the border from the scene of operations. This labor, moreover, had habitually crossed into the United States for employment in American woods operations and the history of the matter appeared to indicate that at such times as the border had been closed the labor involved was lost to the war effort. If Canadian labor were not permitted to cross the border in quantity adequate to maintain operations, now threatened by dwindling inventories and a drastically reduced labor force, it would inevitably give rise to the impression that Canada was not reciprocating the treatment which the United States had accorded Canada in conformity with the Hyde Park principle. Mr. Atherton added, however, that he knew that the Canadian Government, as well as his own Government, subscribed to the principle that inadequacy of supply was not a sufficient reason for stopping all export of a critical resource to the United States. For this reason he felt confident that the War Committee of the Cabinet would wish to reconsider its reported decision mentioned in a letter[†] from the Director of National Selective Service to Brigadier-General Rose of the War Manpower Commission that it desired the border closed to the movement of Canadian woods labor to the northeastern States.

Supplementing the foregoing, Mr. Roseman presented evidence to indicate that the American authorities had taken adequate action to prevent the illegal entry of Canadian labor, to police the border, to exhaust all available American sources of labor suitable for this operation, and to ensure that Canadian labor would be allocated only to companies producing essential goods of high priority. He and Mr. Parsons particularly assured Dr. Keenleyside that the Canadian labor involved would be engaged in direct war production of importance not only to the American Government but to the British and Canadian Governments.

During the conversation Mr. Parsons gave to Dr. Keenleyside a copy of a letter which the Secretary of State had received from an important American company in the northeastern area. Regardless of the truth or untruth of the allegations contained in this letter it was, he said, indicative of the growing criticism in the United States of Canadian regulations in the field of woods products. The whole subject was a matter of very real concern to the American Government and the woods labor aspect of it provided one concrete instance in which the Canadian position appeared to be in conflict with the Hyde Park principle. Other instances, relating for the most part to the woods products field, were also under review in the State Department but at this time it was desired to confine the discussion to the pressing matter of woods labor. Accordingly, Mr. Atherton and his colleagues concluded by stating that in the interest of the joint war effort they hoped that the Canadian Government would be willing to meet the request made by the Chairman of the War Manpower Commission to the Minister of Labor for the importation of Canadian woods labor into the United States.

MANPOWER; CANADIAN WOODS LABOUR IN NEW ENGLAND

23. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS reported that, following the meeting of September 22nd, officials of External Affairs and Labour had conferred as to the solution of this problem. Labour (National Selective Service) had subsequently recommended that exit permits continue to be granted to Canadian woods workers up to the present authorized limit of 3,500.

In this connection, it had been unfortunate that National Selective Service had, in a direct communication to a U.S. Selective Service official, represented that the government's refusal or reluctance to permit the movement of Canadian workers to the New England woods had been determined by past differences on the subject, and misgivings as to the future. This communication, the contents of which had come to the attention of a good many persons in the United States, had created a wrong impression of the government's attitude and policy, and provided grounds for serious misunderstanding. The U.S. government considered, rightly, that the problem should be dealt with on the basis of the Hyde Park Agreement and the most effective use of the resources of the two nations in relation to the war effort.

U.S. authorities were also aware that our National Selective Service officials had recommended continuance of exit permits up to the existing limit. It was, therefore, difficult to see how, in the circumstances, we could recede from this position, particularly in view of the impression created by the letter referred to.

It had been requested that, in future, all communications on the subject to U.S. authorities be made through the Department of External Affairs.

24. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR felt that it would be difficult to agree to 3,500 Canadians being employed in the American woods when we could not get enough men to produce wood for our own urgent needs. In this connection, the pulp and papers industries were making strong representations to the government to obtain manpower priorities. It should be remembered that our forest products were largely for the benefit of the United States.

25. THE MINISTER OF TRANSPORT agreed with Mr. Power. National Selective Service did not understand the gravity of the situation in Canada. They had gone so far as to instruct their local office at Edmundston, N.B. to issue permits to men to work in the United States, in the face of the most serious local shortage.

26. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE observed that an additional ground for criticism would be the fact that wages earned in the United States were not subject to normal Canadian deductions.

On the other hand, failure to meet the American contentions would give opportunity for serious mischief in Canadian-American relations.

27. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the matter be referred to the full Cabinet for consideration when the Prime Minister was present.

DECISION REGARDING EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIANS IN THE MAINE WOODS

Mr. MacNamara told me he was informed by his Minister that Cabinet decided that National Selective Service should try to place the men in Canada but if that is not possible a total of 3500 may be permitted to go to Maine. Mr. MacNamara felt that the most practical way of carrying out this decision would be to give the United States a definite quota of 3500, for both Canadian and United States operators, and then to close the border completely. He thought that an attempt to place the men in Canada while the border is being kept open to allow those that cannot be placed to enter the United States, would produce the worst of both worlds. As long as there is uncertainty the men tend to sit tight and wait for a chance to cross the line where the wages are so much higher. Under these conditions they would not be working either in Canada or the United States.

Mr. MacNamara and his officials have, in the last day or two, seen representatives of the U.S. War Manpower Commission who have been told that the 2400 now in Maine will be allowed to remain and that the U.S. operators will be permitted to recruit an additional 1100 during a period of one month. At the end of the month the border would be closed. Thereafter the border would be kept closed but the situation would be reviewed from time to time with respect to the provision of replacements.

Mr. MacNamara thought that the U.S. War Manpower officials were reasonably satisfied but he said he would not be surprised if they came back with a proposition that the 3500 should be entirely available to U.S. operations and the needs of Canadian operators should be met from an additional allotment.

SECTION B
 CONTRÔLES SUR LES EXPORTATIONS
 EXPORT CONTROLS

1108.

DEA/836-P-39

Mémoire du ministère des Affaires extérieures
Memorandum by Department of External Affairs

[n.d.]

MEMORANDUM ON THE CO-ORDINATION OF EXPORT CONTROL
 POLICIES BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES¹⁰¹

The problem of export control is distinct in principle from the problem of allocating supplies within the area from which exports are made, but the two problems are so closely related that they cannot in practice be considered separately. The situation is further complicated by the fact that the area within which supplies are allocated for war purposes is much larger than the area from which exports originate for export control purposes since supplies are allocated to the United Kingdom and other united nations. An additional complication is that exports, besides contributing to the united war effort, affect the future trading position of the country which supplies them. In order to have a clear picture of the machinery by means of which essential materials will be made available for export from the United States and Canada it is necessary to examine briefly the organizations which are now being created jointly by the United Kingdom and the United States or by the United States alone to deal with the large problems of supply.

It is the present plan that the distribution of materials for all purposes (including exports) will be made by two organizations:¹⁰²

1. The Combined Raw Materials Board (United Kingdom-United States); and
2. The Requirements Committee (United States under Mr. Batt).

It is contemplated that the Combined Raw Materials Board will compile information on the total available supplies of raw materials and will determine the distribution of these supplies (including Canadian supplies) among the United Nations. The part that we might be able to take in these decisions is not clear.

The Requirements Committee under Mr. Batt will, it is anticipated, assemble information on total supplies available to the United States and will determine the distribution of these supplies among various United States defense procurement agencies (army, navy, etc.), civilian uses and export. Just where Canada will fit into the operations of this Committee either as a user of the materials with which it will deal or as a supplier of certain of them is also not clear.

The nature of the relations which will exist between these two Committees is not yet known. Mr. Batt, however, will probably be chairman of both.

It seems likely that the Foreign Requirements Committee (a United States interdepartmental Committee) of the Board of Economic Warfare will continue to compile estimates of the minimum essential requirements of countries other than the United Nations whose economies it is a matter of policy that we should support. Presumably the estimates will be used as the basis of allocations for export to these countries made by either or both of the two principal agencies mentioned above — the Combined Raw Materials Board and/or the United States Requirements Committee.

Canada and the United States have a joint responsibility to supply the minimum needs of the essential materials required to maintain the basic economies of certain friendly countries. Both Canada and the United States have a legitimate interest in maintaining their markets in these countries. In order that Canada may fulfil her share of this responsibility it is necessary to establish the principles and methods of Canadian participation by agreement with the United States officials at the top level.

1. The major problem to be worked out is that of determining specifically the extent and basis of Canadian participation in meeting the essential needs of friendly countries. At the present time the minimum requirements of these countries, the basis on which allocations are made, are being determined by the United States Interdepartmental Requirements Committee without reference to Canada. On what basis should Canadian participation be determined?¹⁰³ On the basis of the past proportion of exports supplied by Canada? On the basis of available Canadian supplies? On the basis of some criteria of the most efficient division of continental production between the two countries?¹⁰⁴

2. Secondly it must be determined how Canada would get the necessary materials and component parts from the United States in order to enable her to produce her share of the exports to friendly countries worked out in accordance with the agreed principle of Canadian participation. In so far as the United States is concerned the policy which seems now to be taking shape there is to fit the question of the procurement of necessary exports to friendly countries into the general system of the allocation of raw materials among countries by the Combined Raw Materials Board and among the various purposes in the United States by the Requirements Committee (Batt). It would seem essential that Canada be represented on or actually work with these agencies in some specific manner and at various levels in order that Canada may be assured of the necessary materials and component parts from the United States.

Allocation by areas? Preferential areas?

3. Finally it is necessary to determine the precise machinery by which the details of Canadian participation in exports to friendly countries in terms of quantities, specific commodities, countries of destination, consignees, etc. would be worked out. Should a Canadian representative, with adequate authority, be placed on the United States Interdepartmental Foreign Requirements Committee?¹⁰⁵

Minister of Munitions and Supply to Under-Secretary of State

Ottawa, February 20, 1942

Dear Mr. Robertson,

Under date of February 10th[†] your Mr. Keenleyside wrote my Deputy Minister enclosing "Memorandum on the Coordination of Export Control Policies between Canada and the United States".

In my opinion, this memorandum is wholly inconsistent with the war situation as it exists to-day; furthermore, it will not be helpful in working out the position of Canada in its relation to the Combined Raw Materials Board and the Allocations Board. I feel very strongly that all reference to Canada's trading position after the war should be avoided at this time.

I have represented on a number of occasions the desirability of Canada acting jointly with the United States on matters of export control, with close liaison between the controls of both countries. I think that, if any communication is sent, it should follow this line. The matter of exports has reduced itself to the problem of supplying essential war requirements of friendly countries, in cases where requirements of those countries are more urgent than our own requirements. Trade for dollars, either for private interests or for the public treasury, is out of the question, except in the case of the United States, where machinery has been set up to enable us to meet our dollar requirements.

I humbly suggest that considerations of post-war position must remain in abeyance until the outcome of the war is less obscure.

Yours truly,

C. D. HOWE

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, February 20, 1942

My dear Norman [Robertson],

I have wanted to speak to you for some time about the need for clarification of the situation pertaining to export control, but we have both been so busy that I have not had the opportunity of talking with you and, therefore, I am taking the liberty of sending you this private and confidential letter.

I fear that the impasse which has developed over the proposed Export Control Conference¹⁰⁶ in Washington and obtaining steel for export requirements is apt to affect your Department unfavourably, both in regard to its relation to the Department of Munitions and Supply and, what is still more important, in regard to Canada's relations with the United States.

We are all agreed that the war effort must come first and the responsibility of obtaining supplies of steel and other materials, not only for our war effort but also for other essential requirements, rests with the Department of Munitions and Supply. The situation pertaining to the supply of steel and no doubt other materials from the United States is most unsatisfactory and has been giving Mr. Howe a great deal of concern. With the formation of the Baillieu-Batt committee or board Canada no longer has a direct say in the allocation of materials and, naturally, Mr. Howe is very much worried about the whole situation. I, therefore, think it is most unfortunate if at the present time we inject into what is a very unsatisfactory situation the very minor problem of our export trade. By doing so we are only antagonizing the Department on whom we must rely for the supply of steel and other materials upon which our export trade is dependent, and I can see that no good purpose is served by other Departments endeavouring to embarrass the Department of the Government most concerned with the economic side of our war effort and, therefore, burdened with very heavy responsibilities.

Our relations with the United States must be giving you a great deal of concern because they have certainly deteriorated within recent weeks. I for one would hate to see this situation made worse by anyone in official circles in Washington deriving the impression that in the present state of the war we are attaching such importance to export trade as would be implied in the proposal for an Export Control Conference.

¹⁰⁶ Cette conférence, qui n'a pas eu lieu, devait examiner les méthodes de contrôles des exportations dans les deux pays et permettre autant que possible une plus grande coordination.

¹⁰⁶ This conference, which was not held, was meant to survey existing methods of export control in the two countries and to provide as much co-ordination as possible.

The pooling of resources and the treatment of Canada and the United States as one economic unit is a very fine conception in theory, but I fear it breaks down very badly in practice. The memorandum on the Coordination of Export Control Policies between Canada and the United States, which was prepared in your Department recently for submission to the United States, contains this sentence¹⁰⁷:

“Canada, for her part, has at no time attempted to control the export of Canadian raw materials to the United States or to allocate these exports within that country.”

I shuddered when I read this sentence and I thought of our restrictions on steel scrap, Douglas fir saw-logs, pulpwood, waste paper, etc. Every week we are receiving from the Wartime Prices and Trade Board and the Department of Agriculture requests to add new products to the list of those subject to export control, with a view to restricting exports to the United States. This goes to show that these two Branches of the Government do not regard Canada and the United States as one economic unit.

The United States, on her part, is endeavouring to transform her economy from a peacetime to a wartime basis within a much shorter space of time than has been the case in Canada. This has involved the dislocation of industries and the temporary unemployment of large numbers of working people before they can be absorbed in the war industries. It is natural that under these conditions the United States should be preoccupied with her own problems and have little time or opportunity to consider our special problems – particularly those not strictly connected with the war effort.

The steel situation is such that we have not sufficient supplies for our war requirements and many essential civilian requirements are now going short of steel. Under these circumstances the Department of Munitions and Supply are adopting the perfectly correct attitude in declining to agree to the export of iron and steel products from Canada. Instead, therefore, of beating about the bush we should recognize the situation clearly and tell the Belgians frankly that we are unable to supply the requirements of the Congo and that they should look to the United States. We should also tell Newfoundland that we cannot supply their requirements for rails. We should certainly refrain from any approaches to the United States for steel for our export trade, at least until such time as there is sufficient steel for our war requirements. We should also recognize clearly that the Department of Munitions and Supply is the responsible body set up to obtain supplies of steel and other materials from the United States and we should not endeavour to do anything to hamper their responsibilities in this connection by too energetically pressing the claims of our export trade. If we adopt a more cooperative attitude we are more likely to get sympathetic attention for our export trade from the Department of Munitions and Supply when in the course of time Mr. Howe has succeeded in solving the very difficult problem with which he is now confronted in relation to essential steel supplies from the United States.

¹⁰⁷ This sentence was in the first draft of the memorandum.

It is very difficult for me to write like this because this Department is responsible for the promotion of Canadian trade and should be in the forefront of pressing the claims of our export trade, but I have been shocked to see how matters have got out of hand in recent weeks and I am most anxious to bring about a clarification. I have no illusions about our export trade and realize that under total war we must sacrifice all of our export trade which in any way conflicts with the war effort. I cannot get very excited about export trade in steel products, about which there has been most of the fuss in recent weeks. These are not the types of steel products in which we do any extensive trade in normal times and I certainly think the Belgian Congo has been made an issue out of all proportion to its importance. This territory will certainly revert to Belgium when the war is over as the source of its supplies for steel and, while I have every sympathy for the Belgians in their desire to secure essential steel, I feel that they have no right to expect us, when we are short, to supply their deficiencies, and the situation could have been much better handled from the outset by telling them they would have to obtain their requirements from the United States.

I am also anxious to put an end to these constant references to Washington on almost every problem that arises and I do not favour the proposal that we should have a representative on the Foreign Requirements Committee of the United States. This is a purely domestic Committee deciding how far the United States can go in supplying the requirements of other countries and we should content ourselves with our existing liaison, which is satisfactory for our main purposes. I shall do what I can to restrict the pilgrimages to Washington on export control matters on the part of Evans and Mallory and I hope that Mackintosh can do likewise as regards Deutsch and Baldwin.

I think that the best manner in which we can bring about a clarification of the situation is to hold a meeting in the near future of the Advisory Committee on Export Control and, therefore, I propose to call a meeting some evening next week. I hope that this will present the opportunity for Mr. Kilbourn¹⁰⁸ to review the steel situation and for Mr. Bateman¹⁰⁹ and Mr. Berkinshaw¹¹⁰ to outline the difficulties in respect of allocations to Canada by the United States. When they have done this I hope that the whole Committee will realize that there are really no export control problems, but merely problems of supply, and that these are the concern primarily of the Department of Munitions and Supply and not of the other Departments represented on the Committee. I cannot help but feel that it would be in the interests of your Department, for the reasons I have stated, to assist in arriving at this conclusion and to curb the tempestuous spirits of those members of the Committee who have been largely responsible for

1. Two replies have been received from Munitions and Supply. The first dated February 19th[†] is in reply to the original memorandum from External Affairs.[†] It asks for postponement until there have been discussions between the two Departments and gives as the reason that the relation of Canada and the new United States bodies allocating supplies is under consideration by the Department of Munitions and Supply.

2. As this reply had not come quickly a second version of the memorandum had been prepared on your instructions.¹¹² It may have crossed with the reply just considered. It differed from the first memorandum in throwing the emphasis against elements in export control (the allocation of markets) with which the Department of Munitions and Supply is not concerned.

3. This second version of the memorandum though not mentioned expressly may have produced the reply from Mr. Howe condemning considering dollar trade, or anything other than the essential war requirements of friendly countries, at the present time, and asking that if the memorandum is sent all reference to postwar trading positions should be omitted from it.

4. The correspondence thus raises two clear issues:

(a) Is the Department of Munitions and Supply or the Department of External Affairs the proper Department to conduct negotiations?

(b) Should negotiations be confined to the allocation of materials for essential war requirements in order of importance?¹¹³

Washington, March 30, 1942

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I think that I ought to draw your attention to a lack of reciprocity in one aspect of the export control systems of Canada and the United States which may get us into some difficulty later on. Mr. Scott and Mr. Plumptre tell me that it has already been the subject of some comment on the part of officials here with whom they are in touch.

We have been successful in developing arrangements with the U.S. authorities whereby the requirement of individual export licenses has not been imposed in respect of goods going to Canada. We have secured treatment accorded to no other country. There are only about half a dozen articles for which individual licenses are needed when they are exported to Canada, and these are regarded as special cases. Our requirements are dealt with by the same procedure of allocations and priorities that is applied to domestic requirements, and control is exercised by the various branches of the War Production Board. This involves in practice the removal of decisions concerning supplies for Canada from the Board of Economic Warfare and their transfer to the War Production Board. When the Board of Economic Warfare passes on the needs of foreign countries they should, under the present system, subtract from the total available supply of each product the essential requirements of Canada and the United States as placed before them by the War Production Board and allocate to other countries whatever may remain. This is a simplification of what is actually done, but it indicates the general trend.

In developing this system of treating Canada and the United States as a single continental area, it has, of course, been necessary to satisfy the authorities that the restrictions and controls in Canada governing the distribution of materials and articles in short supply are at least as rigorous and effective as those in force in the United States. Although there will inevitably be difficulties from time to time in connection with individual products, in general the United States authorities are satisfied with our methods of control in comparison with their own.

This position has not been arrived at without difficulty and it cannot be regarded as having been finally settled for the duration of the war. Its continuance appears to be very much in our interest, since under it we secure in respect of our essential needs from the United States treatment as generous as that accorded to domestic industries and consumers.

When we look at our export controls, however, we find that individual export permits are required for a long list of products exported from Canada to the United States, and there is a tendency to lengthen this list. There are also embar-goes on the export from Canada of a number of commodities which are in short supply in this country. There is a prima facie case that we do not grant as generous treatment to U.S. needs in Canada as the U.S. grants to Canadian needs in the United States. In practice, however, probably there is only ground for complaint here with respect to a short list of commodities.

This disparity of treatment appears to originate almost entirely in the field of price control. The Canadian price ceiling makes it necessary that we should regulate or prohibit certain exports to the United States if we are to avoid the loss of badly needed supplies which, without control, would go to the United States to secure higher prices there. In such cases, an export embargo or a strict control of exports is the only alternative to the establishment of a rationing system covering both domestic consumers and foreign requirements. Certain agricultural and forest products, such as feed and wood-pulp, are those mainly involved, and any system of rationing them to the domestic consumer would seem to present great difficulties. It is inevitable that the country with the lower price level should, to conserve essential supplies, impose some effective method of restriction on exports, at any rate when the exports are of commodities which are not controlled by other means such as those applied to metals and minerals.

The purpose of this letter is only to direct your attention to this problem, as I think that we should constantly bear in mind when we have to consider new export restrictions their possible effect on the treatment accorded to us by the United States.

Yours sincerely,

H. H. WRONG

TELETYPE WA-647

Washington, April 14, 1942

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for Donald Gordon from Plumtre, Begins: Proposed Revision by the Office of Price Administration of Regulations Affecting Export Prices.

1. Dr. Seymour E. Harris of the Office of Price Administration told me over the telephone yesterday evening that he and others in the Office of Price Administration were engaged in drafting new general regulations covering export prices. He hoped that the draft would be completed to-day (April 14th).

2. At present the Office of Price Administration has substantially more than 100 price orders in effect, but only 32 of these make specific reference to the prices of exports, and only 10 of these specify a particular premium which sellers for export may charge over and above the price chargeable by sellers to domestic purchasers. Where special premiums are allowed on export sales, they are mostly about 5 or 10 per cent, although in one special case the premium runs as high as 40 per cent. The payment of a special premium is permitted by O.P.A.

on the general grounds that special cost and special risks are incidental to doing business for export. (For the most part the special costs and special risks apply to overseas export and not, of course, to exports to Canada).

3. Mr. Harris made one suggestion last night for dealing with the special case of Canada and a rather different one this morning. These are as follows:

4. According to the original suggestion which Mr. Harris made to me last night, the Office of Price Administration would extend their price regulations to cover all goods affected by ceilings in the United States. This would be done by permitting sales for export at prices appreciably higher, say 5 or 10 per cent higher, than sales to domestic consumers. However, it was proposed specifically to exclude Canada from these regulations. Accordingly Canada would be placed "on the same basis as Chicago", i.e. would be treated as part of the United States of America.

5. When this proposal was disclosed to me, I expressed some apprehension. I pointed out, as I had done in previous conversations with Mr. Harris, that an American buying in New York from Chicago and a Canadian buying in New York from a similar distance were not really on an exactly equal footing. It was not only the matter of extra costs incidental to sending goods across an International border, but a matter of the average size of purchases, the ability to exercise pressure when and where necessary, and so forth. However, I said that I would get in touch with him in the morning if I had anything further to offer.

6. First thing this morning I called on Mr. Harris and had a discussion of the whole matter. He said that, after thinking the matter over, he was inclined to put Canada on the same basis as other foreign countries (rather than "Chicago"), and to reword the proposed general provisions regarding export prices to allow the inclusion of "normal export margins to the particular country involved" in the prices payable in U.S.A. Extra costs incidental to export (such as special packaging required for transport across an International frontier) would also be included. His plan was to try to make exporters keep track of extra costs, etc., in order to justify such increases of prices over domestic ceilings as they found to be necessary in relation to export business.

7. I agreed that this latter proposal was preferable, from the Canadian point of view, to that originally put forward. However, I was still worried on two accounts. In the first place, one could not be sure that Canadians would obtain a fair share of supplies even by permitting them to pay "normal premiums" and extra costs incidental to International business. In so far as these premiums existed they were probably established in a period (i.e. the nineteen-thirties) of ample supplies, when exporters were glad to serve any market they could find. It would be helpful if "normal premiums" were defined (as proposed) to be those existing in January 1942; but the shortage of supplies was only beginning to be acute at that time.

8. In the second place, I was not anxious for Canada to be ranked along with foreign countries, because of the possible threat to the Canadian General Export License. I foresaw the possibility that, if Canada obtained the advantage of securing supplies by paying appreciably higher prices than American buyers, this would very soon lead to demands on the part of would-be United States buyers either to revoke the price-advantage (the recent case of cocoa) or to impose the same export regulations as those to which other countries were subjected viz. specific export licences issued by the Board of Economic Warfare. The reintroduction of specific licences on the whole range of exports to Canada was extremely undesirable.

9. Accordingly I urged that Canada should be treated neither exactly "like Chicago" nor exactly "like all other foreign countries". Special treatment was justifiable on the ground that the Canadian war programme and war restrictions were much farther advanced than those of almost any other country (at any rate farther advanced than any country not receiving direct lend-lease assistance). Special treatment for Canada was also justifiable on the ground that the highest political sanction had been given to "integrating" the war effort of the two countries.

10. While arguing for special treatment, I admitted that I could see no clear formula which would give Canada "a square deal" under all circumstances. I suggested that, since no one could foretell how a given formula would work, the new export-price regulations might in general follow the second line of approach suggested in paragraph 6 above, and that they should in addition contain some clause which (A) related specifically to Canada and which (B) left considerable administrative freedom in dealing with prices of goods going to Canada.

11. I emphasized that, whatever provisions were made initially in respect of prices on goods going to Canada, experience would probably show points at which amendments were necessary. This was a further reason in favour of a special clause relating to Canada. It would permit easy alterations of the regulations affecting Canada alone, without alterations of the regulations affecting "Chicago" or "all other countries".

12. I reiterated a point I had made in previous conversations with Mr. Harris viz., that when a commodity is in short supply and a price-ceiling is imposed by O.P.A. which applies to Canadian and American purchases alike, then it is desirable that some form of allocation should be instituted to ensure a fair distribution of supplies between the two countries. I pointed out that, while it is within the power of O.P.A. to impose a price-ceiling, it is not within its power to introduce any such form of allocation. In the case of war supplies, Canadian purchasers were protected by the existing priority system. This put Canadian purchasers on an equal footing with American purchasers buying supplies for similar purposes and on a better footing than American (or Canadian) purchasers buying for less urgent purposes. This system, however, while giving protection in the case of Canadian purchases of war supplies, gave no similar protection in Canadian purchases of civilian supplies in general.

Incidentally, Dr. Harris mentioned that he had been exercising his influence towards giving foreign buyers greater freedom to pay prices higher than American buyers. He said that some members of O.P.A. seemed anxious to make all foreigners conform rigidly to domestic ceilings which would, in effect, practically eliminate exports. He took the view, however, that the trade of most foreign countries had been severely damaged by wartime events, particularly by the shipping shortage, and that since there were already export controls exercised by the Board of Economic Warfare in regard to exports to most countries, it was permissible to allow foreigners to pay what amounted to a slight premium over prices in American markets.

He mentioned that some of the American possessions had been objecting to the prospect of having to pay prices higher than domestic American buyers because of the effects on price-ceilings in those possessions. He had warned them, however, that they should be worrying about their supply situation rather than their price situation. If they paid no more than American domestic ceilings they might get no supplies at all. Ends.

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for Donald Gordon from Plumtre, Begins: I have just been advised by Mr. Harris over the telephone that the drafting of the regulations regarding export prices was completed this morning.

According to present proposals exporters will generally be allowed to charge their customary margins above domestic prices. It is made clear, however, that the margins may differ from country to country, and Canada is specifically mentioned apart from other foreign countries.

I gather that the regulations are likely to be issued as an order in the very near future, and if you wish to hold up the proceedings pending a more thorough review of the situation from Canada's point of view, you should communicate directly either with me or with Mr. Kenneth Galbraith¹¹⁴, in whose hands the affair now rests. 1. Meeting held last evening was attended by Gordon, Towers, Wilgress, Clark, Mackintosh, MacKinnon, Noble¹¹⁵, Skelton, Coyne¹¹⁶, Taylor¹¹⁷, Rasminsky and myself. We discussed Wrong's letters of March 30th and April 11th, Plumpre's telegram to Gordon dated April 14th, No. WA-649, and earlier communications in the same series.

2. After full discussion it was generally agreed that there is little evidence to support the suggestion that United States authorities resent the failure of Canada to grant general licences for exports to that country. It was emphasized that many of the Canadian license requirements were imposed to bring the Canadian list into concurrence with that of the United States and thus prevent Canada being used as a base for re-exports to third countries. It was also stressed that additions had been made to the Canadian list in order to prevent the export to the United States of commodities that had not heretofore been sold in that country but which were now being attracted to the United States by the price differential. There has been no complaint from the United States in connection with the imposition of license requirements for commodities in this category and none is expected. These cases constitute the only Canadian deviations from the United States list of license requirements.

3. It was acknowledged that in some cases Canadian controllers have probably been rather too ready to refuse export permits for the United States in order to maintain normal conditions in Canada, and it was agreed that an effort should be made to follow a consistent, reasonable and just policy. The difficulty of defining and maintaining such a policy in all cases was, of course, recognized.

4. In general it was agreed that Canada, while maintaining the present system, should

(a) make a special effort to ensure that the Canadian practice and the reasons for its adoption are made perfectly clear to the United States, and

(b) take steps to eliminate the few cases in which the United States can with some justice claim that Canadian officials are using the export control system to maintain unnecessary supplies in Canada.

5. The prospective United States price control policy described in Plumpre's telegram of April 14th No. WA-649, was accepted as being generally satisfactory, although it was agreed that individual problems would be likely to require adjustment in its execution. The hope was expressed that the enforcement of the new United States policy would not lead to the cancellation of the present general licenses for exports to Canada.

6. The newsprint situation was canvassed at considerable length. It was generally felt that it might have been advisable for Canada to have avoided being directly engaged in arguments on individual issues of this kind and to have stuck to the general thesis that the effect of the Canadian price and wage ceiling is of great benefit to the United States. It was recognized, however, that this line could not now be adopted in the newsprint situation because we have gone too far in assisting the United States to study the arguments of the Canadian companies.

7. It was finally decided that no further step should be taken in regard to the newsprint controversy at least until the promised additional information in regard to Canadian costs has been supplied by the companies involved. Further action can be decided upon in the light of this information.

DESPATCH 138

Ottawa, February 9, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the question of the maintenance of the Canadian export permit regulations, in so far as exports to the United States are concerned, was raised in conversation with Mr. Robertson by Mr. Laughlin Currie on February 8. On the same day, Mr. Coe and a colleague from B.E.W.¹¹⁸ discussed the matter with Mr. Angus and Mr. Deutsch.

Mr. Coe explained that there was a growing movement in the United States in favour of a more rigid control of exports from that country, and that there had been a long discussion on this subject between Mr. Milo Perkins and Senator Wheeler. He added that when the general question of controlling exports was raised the particular issue of controlling exports to Canada might very well arise. Mr. Coe then pointed out that the Joint War Production Committee as early as December 1941 had recommended that all obstacles to the free movement of supplies between Canada and the United States should be removed.¹¹⁹ He pointed out that the United States did not require licenses for the export of goods to Canada, but that it would be difficult to defend this generous policy in the course of political debates while Canada was requiring export permits for the exportation to the United States, as well as to other countries, of an extremely long list of goods.

¹¹⁹ Voir le document 1096.

¹¹⁹ See Document 1096.

Mr. Angus replied that critics of Canadian policy were attaching too much importance to appearances and were neglecting realities. The recommendation of December 1941 contemplated war material rather than consumer goods generally. It was since that time that the most irksome shortages of consumer goods had developed. The tendency was for their goods to move from the country with lower prices to the country with higher prices. Prices were higher today in the United States than in Canada, and generally speaking the United States control of wages had been less effective in limiting consumers' purchasing power than the Canadian control had been. The result was that if the requirement of export permits were to be removed by Canada goods would flow in large quantities to the United States and great hardship would be occasioned to Canadian consumers. To avoid this hardship, the Canadian Government would no doubt be compelled to resort to the type of control to which no objection has been taken by the United States, that is to say to control by allocation. While a change from control by export permits to a control by allocation might make Canadian policy less vulnerable to congressional criticism, it would have a great many disadvantages. It would involve a great deal of otherwise unnecessary effort at a time when there was a shortage of manpower, and it would in practice be likely to be much more irksome to United States importers than the Canadian export permit system is at present.

Mr. Coe pointed out that when export licenses were required for the export of war material from the United States to Canada the Canadian Department of Munitions and Supply had to maintain a fairly large staff in Washington in order to get United States exports out of the country and into Canada. Mr. Angus replied that this example was a good illustration of the difference between the two types of control and that the Canadian export permit system was really very simple in its administration, and had never given rise to the sort of difficulty mentioned by Mr. Coe.

In the course of the discussion, reference was made to a few specific instances. The Canadian control of the export of logs from British Columbia has been often described in the United States as an embargo, and interested parties have demanded retaliation. Mr. Coe suggested that Canada could have obtained the same results by a system of allocation without presenting its critics with the word "embargo" which had a powerful propaganda value. The obvious reply was that if the policy had been essentially the same a skilful propagandist would have found a means of attacking it. Mr. Deutsch pointed out that it would be practically impossible to deal with such things as forage crops by a system of allocation. Mr. Angus mentioned the commodities which received subsidies in order to keep them below the Canadian price ceiling. Some of these are imported from the United States, and if re-export were allowed it would presumably be profitable. It would be very irksome if every one of these commodities had to be subject to severe control, and possibly to rationing. Mr. Angus pointed out that presumably the United States rationing of shoes, which had just been announced, would involve the prohibition of export by mail order to Canada. Mr. Coe agreed and added that for commercial purposes there would no doubt be an allocation to Canada. Mr. Angus pointed out that the difference between a small allocation and an embargo might be in practice negligible.

In summary, the export control system made it possible to keep goods in Canada without the detailed control necessary if they were to be allocated and allowed much greater freedom of movement in Canada. It therefore appeared to be the type of device best suited to the needs of the country with the lower price ceiling.

Mr. Coe and his colleague agreed that the present system was not, in fact, unsatisfactory but repeated that it lent itself to attacks in Congress on the Canadian controls, and that these attacks might lead to a stricter United States policy with regard to exports to Canada if the general export policy of the United States were to come up for review in the immediate future.

Mr. Angus replied that Canadians fully understood the importance of not merely acting reasonably but also of appearing to act reasonably. The Canadian system could easily be explained and defended, and there was probably not much that Canadians could do to influence the course of political discussion in the United States.

I have given this very full account of the recent conversations because the issue which might arise in Washington is one of very great importance to Canada, and it may be necessary for the Canadian authorities to decide at short notice on the best line to take as regards publicity in the United States. Your advice on this point would be appreciated.

If appearances are neglected and realities are considered, the main issue appears to be how far the policy of each country has been deflected from that of a total war effort by the need for giving consideration to particular economic interests within the country. These interests may be those of industry, of labour, of agriculture or of other groups. A war effort which disregarded them completely would run the risk of impairing, or even destroying, the will to victory on which the war effort depends. On this broad issue Canada has nothing to fear from comparison with the United States, but it is extremely difficult for any governmental agency, or any "inspired" commentator to bring this broad issue before the public.

The narrower issue can be dealt with by explaining that the Canadian export permit system is an efficient and necessary type of control suited to Canadian conditions, that the special cases in which United States interests are affected can readily be dealt with on their merits by being made the subject of discussion between the appropriate agencies of the two Governments, and that this is exactly what would take place under any other system of control.

Sir,

With reference to your despatch number 328 of March 26, 1943 on the subject of the maintenance of Canadian export permit regulations, I have the honour to transmit to you herewith copies of the memorandum containing the changes suggested in your despatch under reference and to inform you that copies were handed to Mr. Hickerson in the Department of State on April 6th, at which time he was fully informed of the background of the case including the discussions which took place in your Department, as dealt with in your despatch number 138 of February 9, 1943.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Mémoire de la légation aux États-Unis
Memorandum by Legation in United States

Washington, April 2, 1943

MAINTENANCE OF CANADIAN EXPORT CONTROL REGULATIONS

The successful operation of an export control system to be justified must (1) fulfil a function essential to the maximum war effort; and (2) operate without detriment to that effort.

(1) Export controls by the United States over the movement of materials to Canada were abolished for the reason that they were not justified by the above-mentioned standards, because in the first place, such controls were an unnecessary duplication of other controls enforced by the United States i.e., priorities and allocations applicable to all critical commodities exported to Canada.

¹²⁰ War Production Board.

In order to comply with these United States priority and allocation controls the Canadian authorities must obtain from the United States authorities specific authority and clearance on each and every shipment to Canada of critical materials. To obtain such clearance the Canadian authorities furnish not only evidence of necessity, but, in addition evidence that Canadian internal controls parallel those established in the United States. For the purpose of co-operating in this direction the United States War Production Board maintains an office at Ottawa which examines the necessity in the individual case and comparability of controls in general. United States commodities which are not subject to United States internal control are not of critical or strategic materials and presumably for this reason when shipped to Canada they are free from United States export control.

Any danger arising from the unrestricted movement of goods across the border in both directions would be far more prejudicial to Canada's economic life than to that of the United States because of Canada's smaller population. The danger, in the case of Canada, is augmented by the fact that the level of prices in Canada is lower than in the United States, a factor which encouraged exports from Canada across the border, thus adversely affecting the supply situation in Canada and adding to Canada's difficulties in the sphere of price control.

(2) In the second place, United States border restrictions were unjustified because they operated to the serious detriment of the joint war effort. When in operation it took weeks to obtain the second clearance of even the smallest repair part already cleared by the War Production Board Division in control of that item. Traffic facilities were very heavily taxed by cars held at all border points, demurrage accumulated everywhere, United States shipping floors were cluttered with machinery already cleared by priority but waiting the second border clearance. As a result invaluable time and millions of dollars were wasted to the detriment of the united war effort.

It may be emphasized that, with very few exceptions, export restrictions in Canada are only applied to commodities in short supply and that export permits are issued without limitation in respect to other goods. Canada's export permit system is intended to facilitate the maintenance of a close watch on the trend of exports of these other goods with a view to enabling exports of specific commodities in this group to be checked before the supply situation becomes critical. The determination of allocations for exports of Canadian products to the United States would call for the setting up of a much more complicated system of control than is at present in force, and it is not felt that anything would be gained by the substitution of allocations for the present system.

The Canadian authorities are of the opinion that Canadian export controls are justified by the standards hereinbefore mentioned, since controls serve as a counterpart of United States priority clearances. For example, in the case of lumber, the Canadian authorities submit the export permit application to the Lumber Branch of the United States War Production Board for recommendation on permits that should be granted. In effect such procedure provides a more rapid and simpler method of clearance than would result from a system of Canadian priorities. Moreover, the Canadian procedure obviates the necessity of Canadian authorities keeping under continuous review the United States system of internal controls.

The Canadian export control system which is really very simple in its administration has never given rise to difficulties in the way of delay in the movement of war materials, not only because it is possible to issue export permits rapidly owing to the comparatively small volume, but amongst other reasons because of the difference of the nature of essential war materials interchanged between the two countries. For example, United States requirements from Canada are predominantly for raw materials, involving large quantities, the supply of which is ascertained in advance and which are not generally speaking as urgently required as is the machinery, equipment, finished stores, and so-called end-products which comprise the larger portion of Canadian requirements from the United States.

In summary, the Canadian export control system is considered an efficient and necessary type of control suited to Canadian conditions. It makes possible keeping goods in Canada without the detailed control necessary if they were to be allocated, and allows much greater freedom of movement in Canada. It therefore appears to be the type of device best suited to the need of the country with the lower price ceiling.

In the event that special cases should arise in which United States interests are affected they can readily be dealt with on their merits by being made the subject of discussion between the appropriate agencies of the two Governments; which is exactly what would take place under any other system of control.

During the discussions between the agencies of the two Governments which preceded the waiver of export control system on shipments of war materials to Canada, the Canadian authorities offered no objections to the principle of such control measures. On the other hand, there was convincing evidence that the controls should be removed on grounds that they were unnecessary and harmful to the common effort.

My dear Colleague,

May I bring to your attention a problem that arises, to some extent, out of dissatisfaction in Government circles at Washington with what is looked upon as the lack of reciprocity between Canada and the United States in the matter of export restrictions. Criticism of Canadian export control policy springs from the ¹²¹ Une lettre semblable fut envoyée au ministre des Finances.

¹²¹ A similar letter was sent to the Minister of Finance.

fact that goods move from the United States to Canada with no need for export permits, whereas nearly all products moving from Canada to the United States require export permits and such permits are often refused.

You will recall that export control in Canada was centralized in the Export Permit Branch of this Department in April, 1941. In the exercise of this control, where questions of supply only are involved, the Export Permit Branch has acted mainly as an administrative agency — that is, in approving or refusing applications for permits, it has been guided by the advice of the Controllers of the Wartime Industries Control Board, of the Administrators of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board, or by the advice of the Agricultural Supplies Board, the Dairy Products Board or such other authorities as have been made responsible for conserving supplies. Nearly all requests to have products added to the list of items subject to export control originate, quite properly, with these authorities. On receipt of such requests, my Department secures the authority to apply the export permit requirement — often on short notice, and, in some cases, to meet conditions which, though urgent, are only temporary.

This system of export control has worked out well on the whole. Nevertheless, it has almost inevitably resulted in the rapid growth of what is now a very extensive system of restrictions. There is not the same degree of alertness to remove controls, as soon as they can be dispensed with, as there is to impose them. I strongly urge that the supply authorities, through whom my Department is requested to secure and to enforce export restrictions, should keep these restrictions under constant review, in order that they may initiate the removal of restrictions when it becomes clear that they have served their purposes, just as promptly as they recommend their adoption.

It will be appreciated if, insofar as your Department is concerned with export restrictions that are intended to conserve supplies, you will be good enough to have steps taken to ensure that these restrictions are kept under frequent review, in order that there may be the least room for criticism of their effect upon Canada's trade relations with the United States.

What I have in mind is that restrictions on exports to the United States should be eliminated if it is practicable to do so. In cases where they must be retained they should be administered with the utmost consideration of the need to avoid interfering unduly with trade between the two countries.

Yours sincerely,

JAS. A. MACKINNON

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, July 5, 1943

My dear Colleague,

On June 17 you wrote me a confidential letter relating to the removal of export controls wherever possible. With your consent, given on June 23, I showed your letter to Mr. Gordon, Chairman of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board, and I now have a reply from him, which is as follows and which I cite for your confidential information:

“Miss Wickwire¹²² forwarded to me a copy of the letter you received from the Hon. James A. MacKinnon dated June 17, dealing with the subject of export controls as they apply to the United States.

“I delayed replying to this letter because Mr. M.W. Mackenzie¹²³ was at the time in Washington discussing this very point with officials of the Board of Economic Warfare.

“As a result of these discussions in Washington we are planning to have made a review of all existing export controls covering commodities where a control has been instituted at the request of our Administrators. We are hopeful that a similar review will be undertaken by the Wartime Industries Control Board, and in this way it should be possible to eliminate a number of border restrictions which certainly appear on the face of them to represent unnecessary formality and duplication. It is quite apparent, therefore, that our thinking is completely in line with the suggestion made by the Hon. Mr. MacKinnon.

“For your information I may add that in my opinion the problem is really of comparatively small importance. The principle of share-and-share-alike between the United States and Canada is and has been followed by our Administrators, and I am satisfied that the great bulk of the export controls in existence are necessary because of the fundamental difference in the price level in the two countries which, without control, would completely drain Canada of supplies. The agitation in Washington for a removal of export controls by Canada is, I am convinced, inspired very largely by an interdepartmental difference of opinion as to which authority should be in control of exports to Canada.

“At the present time Canada, through the Canadian Division of the War Production Board, files its claims on United States supply directly through the Combined Production and Resources Board. Other countries are taken care of through the Board of Economic Warfare. There can be little doubt that the Board of Economic Warfare is anxious to secure control over all exports from the United States. It appears that the Board of Economic Warfare sees an opportunity to reinstitute export control to Canada on the grounds that we have not done our part in implementing the Hyde Park Agreement relative to the removal of border restrictions.

“The officials of the Board of Economic Warfare are unable to deny the logic of our position in maintaining export controls on a large number of commodities, particularly those items such as agricultural products where it does not appear possible to design any other system to protect Canadian supply. Neither can the officials show any valid reason why exports from the United States to Canada should be brought under what is known as the programme licensing system. At the same time, however, they maintain a rigid view that for the sake of tidying up, Canada should be under the programme licensing system, and we can only draw the one conclusion, that it is a desire on the part of the Board of Economic Warfare to assume the driver's seat displacing the War Production Board.

“We are not unduly concerned about this situation because we feel confident that our position would be upheld in any discussions at a higher level. None the less we are proceeding to tidy up our own position by the review that I have mentioned of existing export controls, with the expectation that some of them can now be removed because of the development of internal distribution controls, for example, the rationing of farm machinery by certificate may upon investigation show that export control is a simple duplication.”

You will note from the foregoing that the matter is receiving close attention.

Yours very truly,

J. L. ILSLEY

BULLETIN No. 163

Ottawa, July 20, 1943

RE: HYDE PARK AGREEMENT AND EXPORT CONTROLS

It has been recognized by the Governments of the United States and Canada that the joint war effort can best be furthered by the pooling of resources and production. This principle has been laid down on the highest level by the Hyde Park Agreement between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister,¹²⁵ and reiterated on many occasions by joint U.S.-Canadian bodies.

The President in his statement of December 23rd, 1941, approved of the removal of any barrier standing in the way of the combined effort and asked departments and agencies in the United States Government to abide by the letter and spirit of the policy. Following the Presidential direction, the U.S. Departments and Agencies, chiefly the State Department and Board of Economic Warfare, promptly completed their work already in hand of removing export controls on the movement of commodities and materials to Canada with the result that there is today no export license restriction on any commodity or material whatsoever to Canada. This complete freedom from export license restrictions has not been granted to any other country. Within the Controlled Materials Plan and the priorities system of the United States, Canada has been granted complete equality — a Canadian firm has exactly the same status as an American firm and a Canadian requirement receives exactly the same priority rating as an American requirement. In those fields where quotas are established, Canada, through the Canadian Division of the WPB, voices her requirements as a claimant agency in common with the claimant agencies of the U.S. Government. Our experience in the granting of quotas has been, on the whole, that Canada has received treatment comparable to that given the U.S. Services and Agencies.

On our side in Canada, we have given general effect to the policy of pooling of resources and production and to the removal of barriers hindering the implementation of that policy. However, it is not possible to use the same means to obtain the same results. Export controls cannot be removed because of special considerations obtaining in Canada which are not present in the U.S. The most important of these is the higher level of United States prices backed by a volume of purchasing power capable in most instances of draining the Canadian market completely. The spirit of the agreement is that each country should continue to draw on the other for its normal share of available goods, obtaining neither more nor less. To achieve this end in respect of Canadian production, export controls are necessary, particularly in the case of goods produced by a large number of small producers. In other words, we are following the same policy of distribution between the two countries, but rely on a different method of exercising it.

Our method, applied with understanding, is no more likely to be onerous on United States interests than their method is likely to be onerous on ours. However, since some of our export controls were instituted suddenly in a moment of crisis, it might be found on examination that some of them are no longer needed or that they require modification in order to give effect to the accepted policy to which the two countries have subscribed. I would appreciate it if you would take steps to review existing export controls on commodities with which you are immediately concerned, and in doing so, ask that you exercise the greatest care in seeing that full consideration is given to legitimate United States interests in the application of those controls. Please let me have a report after you have made the review.

Should you, at any time in the future, feel it necessary to recommend new restrictions likely to affect Canadian exports to the United States, you should first make full enquiry as to the United States interests involved, and in submitting your recommendation to the Board indicate the quota of Canadian production that should be allocated to the United States. Appropriate advices will then be sent by the Supply Division of the Board to the interested United States officials through our representatives in Washington, explaining the need for action, and should it be found necessary providing an opportunity for further discussion (in Canada and the United States) on the amount of the quota.

It should be understood that inadequacy of supply is not in itself a sufficient reason for stopping all export to the United States. Obviously, if Canada or the U.S. took this stand, there would be no interchange of really critical commo-ties whatsoever. In drawing this matter to your attention I do so because we are anxious to make sure that we are implementing in every way possible a policy which is today as mutually advantageous as it was at the time the Hyde Park Agreement was reached between the President and the Prime Minister.

[Ottawa,] November 16, 1943

Mr. Lewis Clark called by appointment this morning to discuss a report to the effect that the Canadian Government had issued a ruling forbidding herring fishermen on the east coast from exporting to Maine canneries any herring that had not been offered to and refused by Canadian canners. In advance of Mr. Clark's visit I had taken this matter up with the Department of Fisheries and they had informed me that they knew of no such ruling. Mr. Sutherland of the Fisheries Department was present during my conversation with Mr. Clark.

In the course of the discussion, it was suggested that possibly the problem might have arisen through some regulation of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board or of the Export Permit Branch. I phoned the latter and was unable to obtain an immediate answer to my enquiries, although Mr. Barkley, with whom I spoke, said that he thought it was probable that such a ruling had been issued. He is to let me know as soon as possible.

Mr. Clark then went on to generalize his complaint. He said that in a considerable number of cases, including two instances in the field of fisheries, the Canadian authorities had issued regulations banning exports to the United States unless and until all Canadian and "Empire" requirements had been met. He said that similar action had been taken on two or three occasions by the Oils and Fats Administration. Mr. Clark argued that actions of this kind were directly contrary to the spirit and letter of the Hyde Park Agreement and that the United States had been very careful to see that Canada received a proper proportionate share of any essential commodities which were in short supply in the United States.

I told Mr. Clark that we would let him know as soon as possible what the situation was in regard to the exports of herring and that I would bring to the attention of the appropriate officials his comments on our general export permit policy. If his criticism in regard to the latter is justified, it is obviously a matter that should be reviewed at the highest level.

Dear Mr. Clark,

1. I have been giving further consideration to the questions which were discussed in our meeting on November 16, and I think it may help to remove misunderstandings if I set out the background against which the Canadian authorities are inclined to consider the objections advanced to regulations banning exports to the United States unless and until Canadian and Empire requirements have been met.

2. As you are aware the Canadian authorities have from time to time made extensive contracts with the United Kingdom for the supply of large quantities of certain commodities. It is obviously necessary to avoid any administrative regulations which would interfere with the filling of these contracts and at the same time to protect Canadian supplies from being diverted to markets which from the standpoint of the individual purchaser, may be more lucrative. I have never understood that the United States object either to the contracts or to the measures corresponding to allocation which are necessary to give effect to them.

3. In the case of some other British Empire countries, of which the British West Indies may be taken as the best example, Canada has assumed a de facto responsibility for ensuring an adequate minimum of supplies. Here again it is necessary to conserve our resources if we are to fulfil our undertakings.

4. In a general way, therefore, it may be said that exports from Canada to the United Kingdom and other parts of the British Empire are not really comparable with exports on a commercial basis to the United States. There is a further important distinction to be made. The exports to the United States are paid for in United States dollars and are more lucrative both to the individual exporters and to Canada as a whole than exports to the sterling area. If, therefore, Canadian authorities are insisting on protecting exports to the sterling area they are doing so to their own financial disadvantage, and this circumstance ought in itself to be a protection against any suspicion that undue discrimination is being practised.

5. Insofar as the safeguarding of purely Canadian requirements is concerned, the situation is such that it is frequently necessary to preclude exports to the United States which might deplete either the Canadian market, or certain sections of that market, of their supplies of essential commodities. In a general way, United States prices are higher than Canadian prices and in some instances Canadian export restrictions have been designed in part to assist the United States authorities in their efforts to check the development of black market activities. When the restrictions are designed to protect the supplies available for Canadian consumers under the Canadian price ceiling in spite of the lure of the United States market, it must be borne in mind that the difference in population between the countries is so great that a very small increment in United States per capita supplies would correspond to a very large decrease in Canadian per capita supplies.

6. It seems to me that these general considerations explain why there is sometimes an appearance of discrimination when, on a fully informed view of the situation, there is no real discrimination. In emphasizing this general picture, as a safeguard against misunderstandings, I do not wish to use it in any way as an answer to particular complaints which may be made in respect of definite commodities which are in short supply in both countries and of which the need is great in the United States. The Canadian authorities are far from denying that isolated instances of this character may occur, and will always be grateful if they are brought to their attention. We do, however, feel that we are completely innocent of the charge that we are acting directly contrary to the spirit and letter of the Hyde Park Agreement.

Yours sincerely,

Ottawa, December 20, 1943

Dear Mr. Keenleyside,

A copy of your letter of November 23, 1943, prompted by my informal remarks of November 16 to you regarding Canadian export policy, was forwarded to Mr. Hickerson in Washington for his comment. Mr. Hickerson has discussed this matter in Washington and thought you might like to have informally the reaction which your letter produced in the Department.

He believes that it may be fairly said that the United States Government has all along been mindful of the effect which the differences in price levels and the differences in volume and purchasing power of the two markets — American and Canadian — might have on the Canadian supply situation in the absence of any control. It is our purpose, of course, always to take a reasonable attitude in the light of these important factors.

Several other important points made in your letter have, however, provoked comment. In paragraph 2 of your letter you refer to Canadian contracts for supplies to the United Kingdom and state that you have "never understood that the United States object either to the contracts or to the measures corresponding to allocation which are necessary to give effect to them." Mr. Hickerson comments that you are quite correct in assuming that no objection is taken to the contracts. As you are aware, however, the United States also has, through somewhat similar contracts and through Lend-Lease, obligated itself to furnish supplies not only to the United Kingdom, but also to other destinations. These commitments have contributed to a short supply situation in a wide range of commodities, some of which Canada too requires from the United States.

Mr. Hickerson says that he is not aware that our commitments to third countries have ever been advanced as a reason for an embargo on the export to Canada of any commodity. It is, in his opinion, in just such situations that the Hyde Park principles come into play. Obviously in so far as commitments to third countries create short supply situations the need for such principles is further emphasized. Your letter, however, has created the impression that "measures corresponding to allocation" are considered on a different basis in the two countries. Mr. Hickerson feels that, if this is true, it should be pointed out that the view generally held in Washington is that any situation whereby Canada exported to the United States out of surplus only at a time when the United States was exporting to Canada materials in short supply could not in the long run be other than harmful to the best interests of both countries. Personally Mr. Hickerson is convinced that you did not intend to convey any such impression, but he would be glad to be assured on this point.

In paragraph 3 of your letter it is stated that Canada has assumed de facto responsibility for insuring an adequate minimum of supplies to certain other British Empire countries, notably the British West Indies. Although he is not fully informed, Mr. Hickerson feels that this assertion of responsibility appears to reveal a divergence in methods of allocation of supplies. It has been his impression that allocation of American supplies has, in the main, taken place in accordance with policy decisions and plans headed up under the Combined Boards. He wonders, therefore, whether your assertion of Canadian responsibility for supplying Empire markets implies allocation outside the general planning undertaken by such agencies.

Mr. Hickerson has noted, with gratification, the willingness of the Canadian authorities to investigate any complaints that Canada has embargoed export to the United States of a commodity in short supply, and we shall take advantage of this offer should cases be brought to our attention.

Sincerely yours,

LEWIS CLARK

Ottawa, December 29, 1943

Dear Mr. Clark,

I am much obliged for your letter of December 20, in which you inform me of the reaction that my letter of November 23, in which I attempted to remove certain misunderstandings concerning Canadian export regulations, had produced in the State Department. I am sorry to see that my letter has itself given rise to two misunderstandings, but now that these have been brought to my attention I think that I can easily remove them.

When I explained that Canada, like the United States, had undertaken export commitments which contributed to a short supply situation and that these commitments could be met and the short supply made to cover essential Canadian requirements only by measures of export control, I did not for a moment mean to suggest that Canada should export "to the United States out of surplus only, at a time when the United States was exporting to Canada materials in short supply". If this was the impression which my letter gave, I can well imagine that it might arouse a certain consternation as it could be interpreted as threatening important supplies which the United States receives from Canada.

It is, of course, true that in the case of certain commodities Canada has, with, I understand, the full approbation of the Combined Food Board, undertaken to export to the United Kingdom its entire exportable surplus. In these cases what is left in Canada is not merely what we ordinarily term "short supply" but is by definition a supply which allows no margin for export. These cases, however, are not numerous.

I do not think that the de facto responsibility that Canada has assumed for supplying the British West Indies implies any departure from the general policy, decisions and plans of the Combined Boards. It has, I believe, been a matter of convenience to these Boards that some details of supply for smaller areas should have been settled directly between Canada and the areas concerned. To go outside the Empire, a similar instance could be found in the case of St. Pierre and Miquelon.

Yours sincerely,

DESPATCH 333

Washington, February 18, 1943

SECRET

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to my despatch No. 2959 of December 12th[†], with which I submitted copies of the agreement covering the United States Decentralization Plan of Export Control[†], insofar as it concerned Brazil.

2. As anticipated at that time, further clarification of the mechanics of the procedure involved has taken place, and such changes are embodied in the attached copies of what is now known as "Plan A"⁷. Further changes may be expected as a result of the current visit to Latin American countries of a number of two-men flying missions, composed of representatives of the State Department and the Board of Economic Warfare, who are studying the possibilities of extending the scheme to other countries in Latin America, the French West Indies, and the Caribbean area. A re-examination of the plan as it is to be applied to Brazil is also being made.

3. Considerable difference of opinion exists in Washington regarding the timing of the operation of the decentralized plan in the various countries concerned, but definite information on this point may be available shortly. Meanwhile, in informal discussions which the Commercial Attaché has had with the State Department and the Board of Economic Warfare on this subject, he has stressed the fact that our own Missions and Trade Commissioners in the countries concerned should be kept fully informed of developments.

4. You will note that the form to be used in the country of destination is now referred to as an "Import Recommendation Form". This replaces the previous term "Preference Request". It has been pointed out to the United States agencies concerned that the procedure, insofar as it relates to Canadian products, should avoid the despatch of such forms by the Board of Economic Warfare direct to Canadian exporters, and that it would be desirable for these to reach Canadian firms via a Canadian agency concerned with export trade.

5. As to the attitude of Latin American countries regarding the need for this form of control, there are some indications that they regard this decentralization of exports as both unnecessary and as unwarranted intervention with their own controls over imports. This attitude in part may be explained by their lack of confidence in a complicated scheme which will not permit much latitude in providing shipping space to meet a critical supply situation. Moreover, it is felt that United States missions abroad, who will have the last word in what and when exports are to be allowed, may become a lobbying centre for importers, and that inexperienced United States personnel will not be able to render detached decisions which Washington representatives of those countries are accustomed to make under the present system.

6. On the other hand, the United States exporting community is very dissatisfied with existing arrangements and, in view of the extreme shortage of shipping for ordinary commercial trade, it is evident that the State Department considers it necessary to exercise stricter control both over the supply and shipment of all commercial orders in relation to their use in the country of destination.

DESPATCH 174

Ottawa, February 22, 1943

SECRET

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 333 of February 18th in which you enclosed three copies of "Plan A"[†]. I am sending copies of the despatch and of the plan to the Canadian Legations in South America, as you suggest. As one copy of the plan will be required for the files of the Department of External Affairs, I should appreciate it if you can procure an additional copy for the new Canadian Legation in Chile.

2. Although Plan A is advanced as a modification of the earlier plan discussed in your despatch No. 2959 of December 12[†], it is in itself a measure of unusual scope and of great potential importance. I therefore find it difficult to understand why Plan A should have been explained to the Commercial Attaché with the help of mimeographed interdepartmental memoranda of the most informal character instead of being made the subject of a formal request for Canadian cooperation in framing its terms as well as putting them into execution. I am inclined to think that the Legation might with propriety have asked for a formal statement of what the State Department wished Canada to do.

3. While the proposed plan applies in terms to all articles of raw materials imported from or by way of the United States, it is apparently contemplated that it should extend eventually to all countries in the Western hemisphere. These countries include Canada, Newfoundland and the British West Indies as well as the countries mentioned in paragraph 2 of your note. Plan A, however, is formulated at times in a way which suggests that the United States is the only country concerned with the problem of supply. Yet it is obvious that Plan A can hardly accomplish its purpose unless account is taken of the direct exchanges between countries in the Western hemisphere and of the trade which those countries carry on with countries in the Eastern hemisphere. I am unable to discover either from your despatch or from the memoranda enclosed in it how this problem is to be solved.

4. In so far as the immediate problem of controlling exports to Latin American countries is concerned it would be possible for Canada to cooperate very closely with the United States. The same Import Recommendation forms could perhaps be used for both countries provided that, as is suggested in paragraph 4 of your despatch, these forms reach Canadian firms through a Canadian agency and not direct from B.E.W.¹²⁷. If Canada were to decide to cooperate in this way it would be necessary for Canadian interests in each importing country to be closely safeguarded. In those countries in which Canada has commercial representatives this task would be far easier than in those where there are no Canadian Trade Representatives at the present time.

5. It may well be that the control which the United States is able to exercise over shipping facilities will be used to compel Canada to cooperate in the manner suggested in the preceding paragraph and it is possible that the prospect of this compulsion may make Canada decide to cooperate with good grace. I gather from your despatch that Canada was not consulted when Plan A was in the course of preparation and on looking at your despatch No. 2959 of December 12th I find that the Canadian Legation was not consulted when the earlier plan, of which Plan A is a modification, was instituted. I do not know whether it is anticipated that a formal request for cooperation will be received.

6. An alternative form which Canadian cooperation might take would become possible if Canada were to receive an allocation of shipping space and were then to make her own allocations in consultation, on an equal footing, with the United States. While it is true that the shipping concerned is not on Canadian registry, Canada's contribution both to ship construction and to convoy work has been of an order which should entitle Canada to consideration in the use to which shipping is to be put.

7. If an alternative of this sort were to be found practicable it would lessen in some degree the danger incidental to the concentration of enormous power in the hands of the United States authorities. Without suspecting that any sinister intentions exist at the present time as to the use to which this power may be put, it is impossible not to feel some apprehension as to what might happen if political pressure within the United States were to demand that it should be used for the selfish promotion of United States business interests.

8. It is therefore of some importance that we should keep the record clear. Paragraph 3 of your despatch suggests that it was blandly taken for granted by the State Department and the Bureau of Economic Warfare that Canada would cooperate in the plan in whatever way the United States might consider best. It also appears from paragraph 4 as if this position had been accepted by the Legation subject to a suggested modification with respect to the use of Import Recommendation forms when Canadian products are concerned. The assumption that Canada will cooperate in the plan seems rather strange in view of the fact that the plan itself makes no mention of Canada and that the proposed control of Canadian exports is entirely incidental to their shipment by way of the United States.

9. While Canada is not mentioned as a supplying country, the text of the communications under consideration, if taken literally, would imply that Canada as an importing country would be subject to the provisions of Plan A. There is, however, no reference in your despatch to this possibility and I am therefore led to infer that a tacit exception is to be made for Canada, at any rate, for the present. While this difference of treatment is satisfactory, as far as Canada is concerned, it seems quite possible that it may increase the resentment that may be felt in Latin America over this novel proposal for the control of trade.

10. In view of these observations, I should appreciate some further explanation of and comment on Plan A.

TELETYPE EX-689

Ottawa, February 26, 1943

IMMEDIATE. The Department of Trade and Commerce has reported on the telephone conversations with Scott on the subject of the cancellation as from Monday, March the 1st, of G.I.T.¹²⁸ licences, covering the movement of Canadian goods through the United States to Brazil, and of similar licences for Argentina as from April 1st. It would have been preferable if a proposal of this far-reaching character could have been discussed with Canadian authorities before being put into effect, particularly as the Canadian Government has at all times been thoroughly willing to cooperate with the United States authorities as regards the export policy to South America. The Canadian Government is naturally concerned with safeguarding the appropriate Canadian share of the export trade to South America during the war, and the Canadian position in South American markets afterwards. Hitherto Canadian exports have been controlled by Canadian authorities working in close agreement with the United States authorities. Under the proposed arrangement these procedures will no longer be possible and it appears to us that the only reasonable arrangement would be to set up some joint United States-Canadian authority to control the exports of both countries to South America and in the first instance to Brazil and to the Argentine. It is felt that any proposal for Canadian representation on some United States departmental committee, or committees, would be entirely unsuitable for this purpose. It would, therefore, be appreciated if you could bring this view to the attention of the United States authorities and emphasize that it is the logical outcome of the new policy involving cancellation of G.I.T. licences.

TELETYPE WA-934

Washington, February 27, 1943

IMMEDIATE. I have just received your despatch No. 174 of February 22, regarding "Plan A", (decentralization of export control) and as there are several points which warrant clarification in the light of our current discussions regarding Brazil, the following general comments are offered:

(1) Shipments in transit to Latin American countries from all sources, including European, South Pacific, etc., as well as from Canada, are included in Plan A. The scheme is, therefore, much broader in its scope than was ever previously indicated to us. Even admitting Canadian export control is already closely integrated with that of the United States, the number of countries affected would partially account for the specific lack of interest shown hitherto in the effect on Canadian export trade of a plan of this type, and for the absence of an official request for cooperation. So far we have no information regarding the attitude of British and other interests which will be similarly affected.

(2) United States authorities still have to settle questions of detail insofar as they apply to specific countries of import, and as some of their missions have not completed their reports, further changes in procedure may be expected. For example, at today's discussions with the State Department, it was apparent that the plan for Brazil differs in respect to procedure from that proposed for other Latin American countries.

(3) There has never been any doubt here regarding the desire of the United States authorities for our cooperation from the point of view of supply, and this has been illustrated by the interim instructions to their missions regarding the enlisting of the cooperation of Canadian field representatives. In this connection it should be emphasized that the plan is essentially "decentralized", and that Washington is dependent upon the country agencies, (working in cooperation with their missions), for recommendations regarding cargoes to be accommodated on United States vessels, and the respective sources of supply.

(4) Taking all the above into account, the scheme has only now crystallized (in the case of Brazil) to a sufficient extent that the State Department feels they are in a position to discuss the subject with us in detail, even though admittedly these discussions were precipitated by the promulgation by B.E.W. [of] regulations designed to bring exports to Brazil and Argentina under the plan. Incidentally, only four or five days ago we were advised that the plan would not be operative for Brazil until May 1, and even now we have no definite information regarding Argentina where the plan is operative April 1.

(5) As a result of discussions this week, in which B.C. Butler, Associate Director of the Shipping Priorities Committee, Department of Trade and Commerce, participated, the suggestion made in paragraph 6 of your despatch has been accepted by the State Department and B.E.W. as a means of dealing with the interim shipping problem for individual countries where the plan is not yet operative. It is quite clear, however, that as and when the scheme is in operation in those countries, Canadian exporters will only obtain shipping space to the extent that import recommendations for Canadian goods are issued by the country agency concerned. The same consideration applies to all countries of origin affected. It may be possible, however, for us to arrange with the State Department for the import recommendations for specific products to be issued on a proportional basis where Canadian and United States interests conflict. In this way, Canada's share of the trade will be safeguarded. It has been intimated to us that instructions to the United States missions abroad along these lines could be issued.

Please pass a copy of this teletype to the Acting Deputy Minister, Department of Trade and Commerce.

TELETYPE WA-949

Washington, March 1, 1943

IMMEDIATE. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: Following is draft despatch [note] on export control matters referred to in my immediately preceding teletype[†], Begins: Sir,

I have the honour to refer to measures which have recently been taken or proposed by the United States Government in the control of exports to Latin American countries. As you know, there has existed for some time close co-operation between United States and Canadian agencies in this field. The Canadian Government has heartily welcomed such co-operation, while the United States Government has on more than one occasion given evidence of a similar attitude; notably in the circular despatch of the Department of State of December 22nd, 1942, to United States diplomatic officers in the other American republics on "relations with Canadian officials abroad"[†]. This circular despatch referred to the exchange of notes between our two Governments of November 30th, 1942¹²⁹, on post-war economic policy and quoted that sentence from those notes which expressed our desire "to furnish the world with a concrete example of how two friendly, economically interdependent countries may promote by agreed action their mutual interest to the benefit of themselves and other countries".

While sensible of the goodwill and close co-operation which it has enjoyed in its relations with United States authorities in this export-control field, the Canadian Government views with concern a recent development therein. I refer to the cancellation by the United States authorities, without prior notice, of general in-transit license privileges previously accorded Canadian goods moving through the United States. This cancellation is, I believe, incident to the putting into effect of a decentralized plan for export control, drawn up by the United States authorities.

Considering the close day-to-day relationship which exists between United States and Canadian officials in all phases of export control, it is felt that it would have been neither inappropriate nor difficult for the latter to have been consulted before this step was taken; especially as the cancellation in question is bound to cause unnecessary hardship and dislocation to Canadian trading interests.

¹²⁹ Voir Canada, Recueil des traités, 1942, No 17.

¹²⁹ See Canada, Treaty Series, 1942, No. 17.

It is hoped that, if further restrictions of this character affecting Canadian export interests are contemplated, the opportunity for a prior exchange of view may be provided, with a view to facilitating joint action and close and friendly co-operation.

In the circular despatch referred to above the Secretary of State wrote:

“In all economic work it should constantly be borne in mind that an underlying policy of both Governments (United States and Canadian) is to keep war-time exports in equitable proportion to peace-time trade and to ensure so far as possible that no advantage is taken by nationals of either country at the expense of the other”. In this connection, the Canadian Government would welcome discussions with a view to ensuring that the decentralized plan of export control now put into effect will not prejudice the realization of the objective embodied in the above statement. TELETYPE EX-732

Ottawa, March 3, 1943

IMMEDIATE. Following for Mr. H.A. Scott from Mr. G.D. Mallory,¹³⁰ Begins: If the Canadian Government agrees to collaborate in Plan A the following recommendation is made by the Export Control Committee as a basis for discussions with B.E.W. and State Department officials:

1. Acceptance of Plan A must be predicated on the assumption that Canada will be considered as a regular supplier of certain goods to Latin America. Our share of this regular trade, commodity by commodity, should be represented as percentages based on past trade over a representative period, say five years, Canada's share of the available shipping space to be on the same basis.

2. Canada's export control measures so far as Latin America is concerned, have paralleled those of the United States, thus demonstrating our ability and willingness to co-ordinate our controls with those of the United States. There is every intention that this policy will continue and there is, therefore, no valid reason why Canadian goods should not continue to move through the United States on G.I.T. licenses.

3. It is recognized that only those commodities, the import of which is essential to the war aims of the United Nations, the maintenance of essential industries and services, and the economic life of Latin American countries can move in terms of present shipping space limitations. Therefore, Canadian Export Control authorities have already tightened their control to embrace virtually all commodities moving to Latin America, and those remaining outside this category can be effectually controlled by Ministerial order in a matter of hours.

¹³⁰ Président, Comité de contrôle des exportations, ministère du Commerce.

¹³⁰ Chairman, Export Control Committee, Department of Trade and Commerce.

4. For the effective operation of Plan A, arrangements should be made for joint and full discussion between Canadian and United States officials in Washington, for example, a joint committee to deal with matters of policy and procedure. Furthermore, (insofar as Canadian goods are concerned,) the details of the administration of Plan A should be worked out by collaboration between Canadian and American Export Control authorities, and a method developed whereby the Canadian Government will receive import recommendations direct from the country of import.

5. In establishing the import requirements of a country as a basis for import recommendations in the field, the Canadian Commercial Attaché or other authorized representative should be a member of the Committee making such decisions.

6. In countries where there is no Canadian representation, arrangements will be made for a qualified representative to attend meetings in the country concerned as and when required, for the purpose of discussions with the American Mission. Failing attendance of a Canadian representative, the Canadian Export Control Authorities will rely on the U.S. Mission to give consideration to Canadian interests in accordance with the principles set out in their note of November 30.

IMMEDIATE. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: further to our WA-949, March 1st, export control. I handed the communication to Mr. Acheson this afternoon as we had previously telegraphed it to you, with the exception that the last sentence was changed to read:

“In this connection, the Canadian Government would welcome discussions with a view to embodying in an exchange of notes, not only arrangements for the association of Canada with the decentralization plan of export control now being put into effect, but also measures to ensure that this plan will not prejudice the realization of the objective embodied in your statement above.”

Scott, who accompanied me, and I explained to Acheson the situation which seemed to the Canadian Government to necessitate a note of this kind. Acheson agreed that it was desirable that discussions should be negotiated with a view to working out an exchange of notes which would embody arrangements to avoid future difficulties of this kind. As these discussions will probably begin shortly, we should receive without delay explicit instructions as to the line we are to take. In this connection, reference is made to EX-732 of March 3rd from Mallory to Scott, which lays down certain conditions which should be accepted before Canada associates itself with plan A.

2. I would like also to point out that the restoration of our G.I.T. privileges is dependent on our acceptance of plan A. On the assumption that arrangements can be made here which will permit us to associate ourselves with plan A, it is therefore important that the resulting exchange of notes should be concluded as soon as possible. TELETYPE EX-786

Your Teletype WA-1005 of March 4th. Export control.

The association of Canada with Plan A will depend to some extent on a satisfactory settlement of the points raised in Mallory's teletype EX-732 of March 3rd to Scott. The latest reports seem to indicate that there will be no great difficulty in reaching substantial agreement.

2. The second issue raised in your teletype concerns the line to be taken in negotiations looking to an exchange of notes embodying arrangements designed to avoid future difficulties of the sort which have arisen in connection with Plan A, and the cancellation of G.I.T. licenses. The essence of the matter is that preliminary discussions of details should precede any final settlement which is to be accepted by the governments concerned. The procedure to be avoided is the settlement of a policy in advance, subject to negotiation as to the details. In the course of conversation you might explain that Canadian officials are placed in a position of great embarrassment when they are asked to discuss the details of the plan, taking it for granted in advance that their Government will accept the plan. If details are discussed it should be on the clear understanding that both the general principles of the plan and the details will be explained to the Canadian Government before anything is done to commit that Government to a course of action. It is equally embarrassing to Canadian officials if important modifications are made in a plan while discussion is in progress and are announced to the Canadian officials as hard and fast decisions, not themselves open to discussion.

3. These principles are so elementary that it would be out of place in an exchange of notes to set them out in detail, but it may be possible to find a way of indicating a suitable procedure in future cases.

TELETYPE EX-837

Ottawa, March 10, 1943

Following for H.A. Scott from G.D. Mallory, Begins: The Export Control Committee at yesterday's meeting recommended that the following points be considered in any discussion of Plan "A". You will note that some changes have been made in the draft report telephoned to Washington by Mr. Bull yesterday morning:

1. Acceptance of Plan "A" must be predicated on the assumption that Canada will be considered as a regular supplier of certain goods to Latin America. Our share of this regular trade, commodity by commodity, (essentially being equal), should be represented as percentages based on past trade over a representative period, say five years, Canada's share of the available shipping space to be on the same basis.

2. (a) Canada's export control measures so far as Latin America is concerned have paralleled those of the United States thus demonstrating our ability and willingness to coordinate our controls with those of the United States. There is every intention that this policy will continue and there is therefore no valid reason why Canadian goods should not continue to move through the United States on G.I.T. licenses.

(b) With respect to procedure under Plan "A" Canadian export control authorities are prepared to restrict the issuance of export permits to those applications supported by import recommendations.

3. In common with B.E.W. Canadian export control authorities will endeavour to issue export permits for which the country agency has issued import recommendations. Canadian export control authorities reserve the right to reject an application for an export permit even though accompanied by an import recommendation and to grant an export permit without an import recommendation when it deems such action necessary to the best interests of the war effort.

4. Arrangements should be made for full discussions from time to time between Canadian and United States officials in Washington of any proposed changes in Plan "A" or other controls affecting the movement of Canadian goods through the United States.

5. The Canadian Commercial Attaché or other authorized representative should be given an opportunity to participate in any advice offered to the country agency by the supplying countries in the establishment of import requirements.

6. Assuming that copies of import recommendations will be sent direct to Canadian exporters by the Latin American importers it is suggested that a copy or list of such recommendations should be made available to the Canadian field representative for transmission to the Canadian export control authorities in Ottawa to facilitate administration.

7. In countries where there is no resident Canadian representation arrangements will be made for a representative to attend meetings in the country concerned as and when required for the purpose of discussions with the American mission. Failing attendance of a Canadian representative the Canadian export control authorities will rely on the United States mission to give consideration to Canadian interests in accordance with the principles set out in their note of November 30th, 1942.

8. In order to offset the possibility of misunderstanding the country agencies should be asked to make clear to their importing communities the fact that imports from Canada are included under Plan "A".

9. It is suggested that announcements released in the United States with respect to Plan "A" should include references to Canada's association with the plan in order to correct any misunderstanding especially in the minds of United States firms dealing in Canadian exports.

10. It is understood that when the Latin American governments are advised of the allocation of commodities in short supply such advices will include the portion to be supplied from Canada.

11. As part of the collaboration between United States and Canadian field officers, the question of "projects" which are supplied entirely or in part from Canada should be given consideration. It may be assumed that Canadian export control authorities would be prepared to establish the machinery that might be necessary to administer the granting of export permits of a special nature to cover supplies for such projects.

12. It is understood that newsprint will be excluded from the operation of Plan "A" in view of the satisfactory arrangements already in effect for control of shipments of this commodity.

13. It is suggested that joint instructions embodying the above points be sent the United States and Canadian field officers in Latin American countries. Ends.

DESPATCH 393

Ottawa, April 7, 1943

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your teletype WA-1441 of March 26[†] and to previous correspondence concerning the plan for the decentralization of export control, known as Plan "A". During the visit of Mr. Scott the negotiations which have taken place concerning the details of the proposed Plan and their application to Canada were carefully reviewed, and it was decided that it was highly desirable to avoid any further delays in reaching an agreement in principle which could be communicated to Canadian officials in South America.

2. It will therefore be appreciated if you will inform the State Department that Canada is prepared to accept Plan "A" in principle on the understanding that negotiations will continue in order that details of procedure may be arranged. It is hoped that notes can be exchanged on this basis at an early date.

3. There are one or two points on which it would be desirable to record an agreement if it could be reached at the present time. The most important of these concerns the in-transit privileges granted to Canada on shipments to Latin America. At the present time there is a list of exemptions to general in-transit licenses which appears on pages 77 and 78 of the Comprehensive Export Schedule^f. The effect of these exemptions, supposing Plan "A" to be in operation, would be that Canadian shipments of the specified commodities might be stopped in transit through the United States if a United States authority were to decide that the commodities were urgently needed in the United States for war purposes and that the United States need should take precedence over the necessity of the South American country, which had been established before the Canadian export permit had been granted. The maintenance of this right exposes Canadian trade to a serious danger and does not appear to be justified from the military point of view if consideration is given to the care which will be exercised before permission to export is granted by Canada. The maintenance of the exemption would be particularly objectionable because it would deprive the decentralization plan of its reciprocal character as between Canada and the United States. It would have this effect because exports destined for South America could be pre-empted by the United States if they originated in Canada but could not be pre-empted in Canada if they originated in the United States.

4. A second point which should be dealt with, as soon as an exchange of notes is arranged, concerns the publicity to be given in Latin America to the fact that Canada will participate in Plan "A". From the standpoint of Canadian trade relations, it is important to correct at once the existing impression that materials urgently required in South America cannot be obtained from Canada under Plan "A". Indeed cases have occurred in which importers in South America have feared that by obtaining supplies from Canada they might destroy the basis for future allocations from the United States which might be made to depend on their previous importations from that country.

5. As the interim plan for Argentina came into effect on April 1st, it would be appreciated if arrangements could be made on an interim basis under which B.E.W. would make available immediately to the Canadian Legation any Certificates of Necessity which may have been received from Argentina which indicated Canada as a source of supply. It would be also helpful if the Legation could be furnished with rejected Certificates of Necessity indicating Canada as a source of supply.

6. During his visit Mr. Scott repeated the suggestion made by Mr. Ravndal that someone from the State Department should visit Ottawa to explain the State Department's point of view as to the best procedure to adopt in putting Plan "A" into execution. The proposed visit would be welcomed in Ottawa, but it is hoped that it will not be necessary to postpone the proposed exchange of notes until it has taken place. If the notes are confined to the general question of principle, the discussions in Ottawa could be concerned with the details which must be settled in order to put it into effective operation. It is of the utmost importance to have a formal agreement on the general principles as early as possible in order that publicity may be given in the Latin American countries to the fact that the operation of the decentralization plan will not interrupt their trade relations with Canada, nor replace them by trade relations with the United States.

Washington, April 16, 1943

Sir,

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note no. 124 of March 4, 1943¹³¹, concerning certain measures taken recently by this Government in connection with the control of exports to Latin American countries.

In keeping with the close cooperation to which you refer, the various special missions representing this Department and the Board of Economic Warfare that were sent to the Caribbean area and to Central and South America to discuss Decentralization Plan A with the interested governments held themselves at the disposal of the Canadian representatives, and it is my impression that every effort was made either to include the Canadian representatives in the numerous discussions that took place or to report the nature of the discussions to them. I might mention in this connection that copies of the itineraries of the various special missions that went to the field in January were made available in advance to the Canadian Legation in Washington so that the Canadian representatives could join these special missions en route. With this background, therefore, the untoward cancellation of the General In-Transit License was the source of embarrassment and immediate steps were taken to insure its reinstatement.

May I take this opportunity to express the hope that the Canadian Government will see its way clear to participate in Decentralization Plan A. The objective of the Plan is to achieve a more scientific determination and implementation of the essential requirements of the other American republics and to make the most effective use possible of the limited amount of shipping space available to us. The Plan, as you perhaps know, is designed to integrate Canadian exports into the flow of materials from United States ports.

I feel certain that the various procedures contemplated by the Plan as well as supply problems can be worked out between the Legation and officers of this Department within the spirit of the circular instruction to which you made reference, and you will find that not only this Department but also the other interested agencies of this Government will welcome a full discussion of any phase of the Plan in question. While Plan A provides a procedural framework, it is to be anticipated that changes may be required according to circumstances peculiar to certain of the Latin American countries; and I should like to suggest, accordingly, that the formalization of procedure be postponed until such time as the Plan is functioning smoothly.

TELETYPE EX-1472

Ottawa, April 20, 1943

IMMEDIATE. Following for Scott, Begins: Your WA-1818 of April 16.¹

As a result of the conversations which took place in Ottawa on April 19 and 20, the details concerning Canadian participation in Decentralization Plan "A" have been worked out sufficiently to enable the Legation to reply favourably to the note on this subject from the State Department replying to your note 124 dated March 4.

It is understood that the United States authorities wish for a specific request from the Canadian Government that United States missions should deal with import recommendations naming Canada as a source of supply which are received in countries in which Canada has no trade representatives available at the present time. It appears to be essential to the success of the Plan that this request should be made, but it would appear desirable to soften it as much as possible by describing it as a temporary measure pending the appointment of some Canadian representative and by indicating that the nearest Canadian Trade Commissioner will endeavour to keep in touch with the work of the United States missions within his sphere of activity.

The State Department should be informed that as soon as the agreement has been settled in Washington the Canadian Government will take steps to bring it to the attention of the governments of the Latin American countries concerned either through the Canadian Minister or through the British Minister in countries where there is no Canadian Minister. It will be explained to the British Minister in each instance that the Plan is purely a wartime arrangement and that its purpose is to help in the effective prosecution of the war by limiting the strain on scarce materials and on shipping space to essentials.

It is the view of the Department of Trade and Commerce and of this Department that when Plan "A" is put into operation it would be timely to formalize the Joint Supply Committee in Washington¹³² so that if any difficulties arise in the execution of Plan "A" the authority for dealing with them will be clearly settled. If you see no objection you might mention this matter when presenting your reply to the State Department's note, and ascertain the views of the State Department on the subject.

A draft press announcement[†] for use by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with Canadian participation in Plan "A" was handed to you in Ottawa. It is intended to release this announcement as soon as telegrams have been despatched to the Canadian and British Legations in Latin America. It will, therefore, be appreciated if you will discuss the proposed announcement with the United States authorities. Ends.

Sir,

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of April 16th concerning certain measures taken recently by the United States government in connection with the control of exports to Latin American countries, and the invitation to the Canadian government to participate in Decentralization Plan A in order to achieve a more scientific determination and implementation of the essential requirements of the other American republics, and to make the most effective use of the limited amount of shipping space available.

As a result of the conversations which have taken place in Ottawa, since the receipt of your note, between the appropriate United States and Canadian authorities, the details concerning Canada's participation in Decentralization Plan A have been worked out sufficiently to enable me to inform you that the Canadian government is now in a position to accept your invitation to cooperate in the operation of Plan A.

In respect to Canada's participation in the plan in those Latin American countries where Canada has no trade representative available at the present time, it is requested that, as a temporary measure pending the appointment of some Canadian representative, the United States missions should deal with import recommendations which name Canada as a source of supply. It is understood, of course, that the nearest Canadian Trade Commissioner will endeavour to keep in close touch with this aspect of the functions of the United States missions within his sphere of activity.

Now that agreement has been reached as to Canada's participation in Plan A, the Canadian government will immediately take steps to bring this to the attention of the governments of the Latin American countries concerned, through either the Canadian Minister or the British Minister in countries where there is no Canadian Minister.

I have also been asked to point out that, in the view of the appropriate Canadian authorities, when Plan A is put into operation it would be timely to formalize the Joint Supply Committee in Washington so that, if any difficulties arise in the execution of Plan A, the authority for dealing with them will be clearly settled. I would be glad to have the benefit of your views on this subject.

Washington, June 8, 1943

Following for H.F. Angus, External, C.M. Croft, Department of Trade and Commerce, and G.R. Heasman, Export Permit Branch, 220 Queen Street, from Bull, Begins: Ravndal of State Department telephoned this afternoon to report that B.E.W. had made certain important changes in Decentralization Plan in Current Export Bulletin No. 99, dated June 7. These changes affecting Canada were made without consultation, as provided by our exchange of notes. Ravndal was disturbed at this further evidence of B.E.W.'s failure to consult with State Department and this Legation before issuing Export Control Bulletins. Aside from the fact that we were not consulted in connection with this change in Decentralization Plan, the new policy should assist Canadian exporters to move non-essential commodities made up for shipment to Latin America.

Current Export Bulletin No. 99 reads in part as follows:

"1. Appeals on 'non-essential' exports under Decentralization.

1. B.E.W. policy outlined — the Office of Exports announces that application from exporters for licenses to export commodities on so-called 'non-essential lists' (Bulletins 90 and 94) will be received and considered by the Office of Exports in all cases where exporters can show either essentiality of the product in question, or undue hardship in case of rejection of license application. This policy announcement follows substantially recommendations made by exporters and is in line with B.E.W.'s policy of flexibility in its export control regulations.

2. Certain conditions must be met — exporters whose products are listed on the so-called 'non-essential lists' as issued by various countries in Latin America (Bulletins 90 and 94) may nevertheless apply for export licenses and receive consideration from B.E.W., whether accompanied by import recommendation or not, provided the exporter accompanies his application with a letter either:

- (a) Establishing the essentiality of the product in the country of destination; or
- (b) Proving that denial of such export license would work undue hardship upon the exporter. Since there can be no hard and fast rule as to what 'undue hardship' means, each case must be judged on its own merits.

Likewise, where foreign importers have been denied import recommendations, whether or not the item is on the non-essential list, but can show that the product is essential, such proof should be forwarded by the exporter to the Office of Exports, and each case will be examined on its own merits.

3. Changes in 'non-essential' lists — similarly, exporters, whether applicants for export licenses or not, may at all times indicate to the Board of Economic Warfare recommendations with respect to any item appearing on any of the 'non-essential' lists as published in Bulletins 90 and 94, which are defined in terms of Schedule 'B' numbers and therefore cover at times broad classification. Where inclusion in such lists cover 'essential' products, exporters are invited to submit proof and recommendation to the Board of Economic Warfare for appropriate action.

4. 'Non-essential' lists are not definite prohibition lists — the lists of so-called 'non-essential products' as published in both Bulletin 90 and Bulletin 94 are intended as aids to exporters, and indicate only products which, under conditions of short shipping space and wartime needs, will ordinarily receive no import recommendation from foreign country agencies, or receive no supply assistance or export license from the Board of Economic Warfare in the United States. They do not, however, preclude the granting of such import recommendations, nor the issuance of export license by the Board of Economic Warfare, if the conditions outlined in paragraph 2 above are met. Subject 1, Bulletin 90, is amended accordingly." Ends.

Your WA-2770 of June 8, changes in Decentralization Plan.

While we do not wish to make any formal protest to the State Department because of the failure to consult the Canadian Government, as provided in our exchange of notes, before making the changes in Decentralization Plan "A", contained in Export Bulletin No. 99 of June 7, it will make it easier for us to give the necessary explanations to the Canadian officers in the field if we may have a statement from the State Department notifying us formally of the changes which have been made and explaining the reasons for the changes. It will be appreciated if you could bring to Ravndal's attention the desirability of such a communication.

Following for H.F. Angus, External Affairs from Scott, Begins: Your EX-2203 of June 11th — changes in decentralization plan.

When I conveyed your message to Ravndal on Saturday morning he was considerably upset, as he felt that we were putting the State Department most decidedly on the spot, which is apparently what you intended.

Ravndal freely admits the guilt over our not having been consulted beforehand regarding the changes announced in export bulletin No. 99 but as he pointed out when reporting to Bull earlier in the week, neither was the State Department consulted by B.E.W. Furthermore, he told me on Saturday that the State Department would never have agreed to these changes had they known the intention of B.E.W. Accordingly strenuous efforts are being made by the State Department to have bulletin No. 99 rescinded, in view of the undertakings which they have entered into with the Latin American Governments concerned. Ravndal also agreed that Bulletin No. 99 is completely ambiguous. In the circumstances, Ravndal would prefer that the State Department be given a little time to straighten out this domestic mess with B.E.W. rather than have to formally advise us of the reasons for the changes made, since, as you will see from the above, State does not agree with these changes.

The line I took with Ravndal was that on personal grounds I could sympathize with their position, but that from the Canadian standpoint you were beginning to wonder whether as partners to Plan A we were expected automatically to accept any changes without being consulted beforehand, and that these recurring incidents were creating a very embarrassing situation for our Government.

I would be grateful if you would show this teletype to Pearson, since before your EX-2203 had reached me I had previously asked him to discuss this problem with you in Ottawa from the standpoint of just what tactics we should employ in our further negotiations with State Department and B.E.W. on the subject of non-consultation on export control matters.

Considering all of the angles of this latest development, and particularly having in mind that we are not expected to fully adhere to Plan A until August 1st, it does not seem to us in Washington that our trade is being very much affected, indeed except for the confusion which has been caused the prospects are now good for cleaning up the backlog on commodities already licensed, but for which no freight space has been available heretofore. [It] occurs to us that to press the State Department too actively at the present juncture might possibly impair to some extent their goodwill, particularly now that we have registered an informal complaint. TELETYPE WA-4923

Washington, October 5, 1943

IMMEDIATE. Referring to Angus' teletype EX-3786 of September 29th[†] re terms of reference of proposed United States-Canadian Joint Exports Committee, the suggestions made therein have been accepted by the State Department, and a note has now been received under date of October 5th which reads as follows:

"I have the honor to refer to the concluding paragraph of the Legation's note of April 24th, 1943, regarding the desirability of establishing a formal Joint Committee in Washington to handle the numerous mutual problems arising out of the United States plan for decentralized control of exports to the other American republics.

"This matter has been fully discussed by representatives of the Department of State and the Canadian Legation during recent months, and the further conclusion has been reached that the scope of such a committee should include all wartime export matters of mutual concern to the two Governments, without restriction as to areas or commodities.

"I am accordingly enclosing for your consideration a draft of the suggested terms of reference for a United States-Canada Joint Exports Committee, which may be established immediately upon the receipt of the concurrence of the Canadian Government.

"Accept, Sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

"For the Secretary of State,

DEAN ACHESON"

The suggested terms of reference read as follows:

"1. The United States-Canada Joint Exports Committee has been established by agreement between the United States and Canadian Governments as a wartime measure to ensure the maximum coordination of exports from the two countries of non-military goods needed by third countries. In its deliberations this Committee shall be guided by the underlying policy of both Governments, that no advantage should be taken by the Government or by nationals of either country at the expense of the Government or nationals of the other, either in wartime trade or with respect to post-war trading opportunities. In this connection the post-war trading position of other countries shall be given due consideration. Furthermore the Committee will seek to preserve and protect the normal functioning of private traders to the fullest possible extent consistent with the most effective prosecution of the war.

"2. The principles underlying this coordination are as follows:

(a) That when considering the minimum essential requirements of third countries of commodities in short supply they should be met from the most economical source in the interest of the United Nations' war effort, but where the overriding interests of the war effort do not otherwise dictate neither country shall re-export goods of the other country in short supply;

(b) That there shall be no overlapping in shipments resulting in excess supply to any particular area;

(c) That all relevant factors of foreign and commercial policy are taken into account in the formation of joint export programs;

(d) That where the overriding interests of the war effort do not otherwise dictate, all exports of the two countries shall be maintained in equitable proportion to peacetime exports in cases where both have previously been sources of supply;

(e) That the technical licensing and shipping control procedures of the two countries shall be kept in harmony so far as is practicable or necessary.

“3. The Committee meets under the chairmanship of the Department of State and includes on the part of the United States permanent representatives from the Department of State and the Office of Economic Warfare; on the part of Canada it includes permanent representatives from the Canadian Legation in Washington. Representatives of other agencies of the two Governments having special knowledge of the problems in hand, or representatives of other supplying countries, may be invited to attend whenever the Committee deems necessary.

“4. The Committee is concerned with exports of either raw materials or manufactured goods, whether or not in scarce supply, which both countries are in a position to supply to third markets.

“5. Where it is necessary to establish an agreed joint export program for any commodity or area the Committee assembles from all available and mutually acceptable sources full data on the minimum essential requirements of third countries or areas dependent upon imports from the United States and Canada, with a view to determining the net global demand on each of the two economies for each given commodity, due regard being paid to any alternative source of supply.

“6. Agreed export programs will normally be formulated on a calendar year basis and will remain in effect until revoked, amended, or superseded by mutual agreement. Each program shall become effective as of the date of transmission of the program to the respective licensing or shipping authorities of the two Governments.

“7. In addition to such export programs, the Committee may at the instance of any permanent member place on the agenda special problems relating to the supply of particular areas or to particular export licensing or shipping controls of either Government.

“8. The Committee will establish and maintain close relationship with the Combined Boards and other combined organizations concerned with foreign civilian requirements. The precise nature of these relationships is left for future determination.”

The terms of reference as submitted above appear to fully cover all amendments suggested by you, and the Commercial Counsellor has been informed today by the Division of Exports and Requirements (which was responsible for drawing up the terms of reference) that a note of acceptance would be appreciated as early as possible, in order to commence the functioning of this Committee without further delay.

Your early instructions would therefore be appreciated.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au ministre aux États-Unis
Secretary of State for External Affairs to Minister in United States

TELETYPE EX-4700

Ottawa, December 2, 1943

Following for H.A. Scott from C.M. Croft, Begins: Pursuant to telephone conversations which you and Bull have had with various officers here concerning the operation of Decentralization, at the last meeting of the Executive Subcommittee of the Advisory Committee on Export and a later meeting of the Departmental Coordination Committee, it was agreed that you should be asked to open discussions in the Canada-United States Joint Exports Committee as to the desirability of reviewing the Plan, its purpose, objects and mechanics, with a view to making further drastic modifications or even completely abandoning or suspending the Plan. Our reasons for suggesting this are:

(1) That the Plan was originally predicated upon the shortage of shipping space and that this factor has now become of relatively minor importance in the case of shipments to Latin America.

(2) That the Plan demands the full and efficient co-operation of the Latin American countries and that such co-operation has not materialized in several countries, Mexico being the outstanding example.

(3) That there are exceptions to the requirements of import recommendations for certain exports from the United States and that such cases upset our administration of the Plan to dissatisfaction of Canadian exporters.

Examples of the effects of one or other of the above are as follows:

(a) The extensive Special Project Licencing system in force in the United States which accords their exporters preferential treatment by waiver of I.R.'s¹³⁴. We have tried to follow the United States practice for shipments to mines, oil companies, etc., known to be on the S.P.¹³⁵ or mines serial list but it is obviously impossible for us to accord Canadian exporters equal treatment for shipments to all consignees enjoying United States S.P. procedure.

(b) The difficulty of determining the interpretation of distressed stocks and permitting exports of such stocks without I.R.'s. We feel that the United States authorities have possibly been more liberal in this than we have, to the consequent disadvantage of Canadian exporters.

(c) The case of the National Steel Company of Brazil referred to you by Export Permit Branch. This consignee does not appear to be under S.P. procedure but shipments are nevertheless made from the United States without preference requests.

(d) Delays in the arrival of original (approved or denied) copies of I.R.'s, thus retarding the issuance of export permits and occasioning correspondence with F.E.A.¹³⁶ Frequently such cases involve commodities which are in relatively long supply and it is extremely difficult to give good reasons to our exporters as to why export permits may not be issued when they have provided fourth copies of the I.R.'s and know that lack of shipping is not the impeding factor.

(e) I.R.'s are not being granted in some countries in favour of Canadian exporters for commodities for which estimates of supply have been announced, let alone commodities included in the ratio list or otherwise indicated as available from Canada. It seems to be impossible to ascertain the reasons for the non-issuance of I.R.'s in favour of Canada but a number of exporters have complained of this and doubtless there are many cases of which we are not aware.

(f) The confusion in interpreting instructions concerning the issuance of I.R.'s on Canada. This is a further development of (e). Usually the confusion is due to lack of understanding of our statements of supply. This problem might be solved by explaining our positive estimates sent to the United States Missions but as you know the work involved is out of proportion to the volume or value of the trade.

(g) Shippers of small-bulk high-value commodities such as vitamin concentrates, cannot see the object of the procedure when their shipments do not present a space problem.

¹³⁴ Import Recommendations.

¹³⁵ Special Project.

¹³⁶ Foreign Economic Administration.

In our opinion it will never be possible to bring our procedure in the handling of exemptions to the Plan into line with that followed in the United States because the decisions are based upon the merits of individual cases which leaves room for varying interpretations and moreover we have not developed and do not wish to develop the complete systems of allocations, S.P. Licences, etc., that would bring us into complete uniformity with F.E.A. controls.

In essence we suggest that the problem is one of supply rather than shipping. In other words if an export permit were granted on the basis of supply, there would appear to be no reason for otherwise controlling the shipment although we admit that the mechanics involving freight space applications, etc. should be kept in operation in case shipping again becomes tight.

It is not suggested that you should mention anything that follows when you propose discussions on this subject. However, you should have the information in mind in the event that your conversations lead the United States officials to the point where they themselves question whether Decentralization should continue.

Our experience leads us to question the value or purpose of continuing the Decentralization procedure at the present time. Possibly your discussions will bring out reasons why shipping is still or may again become a serious factor, thus necessitating the continuance of the Decentralization machinery to meet such an eventuality. It is admitted that in our considerations we have had in mind the fact that the volume of Canadian shipments is small in comparison with those from the United States and does not justify the elaborate mechanics required by Decentralization, particularly when our main bulk items are exempted from the Plan, viz., newsprint, flour and calcium carbide for mines. There may be strong reasons, however, why the United States would want to continue the Plan for their own purpose but we would enquire whether it would not be possible for Canada to abandon the Plan without injury to United States interests and also without prejudicing our own exporters' chances of obtaining shipping space. We are, of course, not unmindful of the possibility that, for diplomatic reasons, it might be desirable for Canada to continue to participate, even nominally, in the Decentralization Plan.

In conclusion we admit the advisability of keeping Latin American countries informed of the quantities of materials in short supply which they may reasonably expect to receive from Canada so that they may plan accordingly and if necessary set up their own domestic controls to take care of distribution. Thus whether the Plan continues or is abandoned we feel that estimates of such materials should continue to be supplied. Furthermore, it is expected that we would continue to require export permits for all exports, except newsprint, to Latin America, unless the Administrators and Controllers change their present views. Thus we contemplate maintaining effective control over all exports including newsprint from the standpoint of supply.

As the difficulties reported by our exporters and partially listed herein are retarding or completely preventing certain Canadian shippers [shipments?] to Latin America, it is hoped that you will be able to initiate the proposed discussions without undue delay. You should, of course, feel at liberty to request further clarification of any points which are doubtful or to suggest modifications of our proposals where in the light of your own knowledge of the situation they are ill-advised.

TELETYPE WA-6037

Washington, December 3, 1943

Following for C.M. Croft, Department of Trade and Commerce, from Scott, Begins: Reference your EX-4700 of December 2nd and further to our telephone conversation, we will explore the possibility of winding up the Decentralization Plan on the strength of your paragraphs Nos. (1) and (2). We would hesitate to raise No. (3) in a discussion, as it would be difficult to back up this statement with examples. For instance, your (a) and (c) page 2. As reported to Ottawa in earlier correspondence, all S.P. licenses are not exempted from I.R.'s. F.E.A. estimates that less than half the S.P. licenses are exempt. The following S.P.'s do not require I.R.'s:

- (1) Oil companies,
- (2) Mining companies on the mines serial list,
- (3) United States Government sponsored projects, that is, projects directly connected with the war effort in the procurement of strategic commodities, such as rubber, sisal, peanuts, sunflower seeds, mahogany, etc. The National Steel Company, Brazil, is not under S.P. procedure, however, Brazilian Government requested that this undertaking be exempted from preference requests.

Your (b) on page 2 "distressed stocks". This regulation has only been in effect for six weeks and we would appreciate any definite evidence you have to the effect that during this short period the United States authorities have been more liberal than Canadian authorities in interpreting this information.

Your paragraph (e) page 2. We have hopes that this operational problem will be corrected by the new procedure reported in our WA-6028 of December 2nd, under which we would discontinue the practice of breaking down our estimates into "Projects and Programmes" and "General". It is also anticipated that Mexican position will be cleared up by January 1st, as an airgram has gone forward to Mexico, suggesting the re-institution of a modified type of Certificate of Necessity procedure to replace the present export recommendation procedure which everyone admits has completely broken down. If Mexico will accept this drastic modification of decentralization, there should be no further difficulty as, at the most, certificates would only be required on three or four items of interest to Canada. The remainder of our trade would be subject to Canadian controls only.

We are not sure what is meant in your paragraph (f) by "explaining our positive estimates".

The question of vitamin concentrates, your paragraph (g), will also be solved by January 1st, if the Latin American countries accept the new proposed roll-back, details of which will go forward to you by mail to-day. Briefly, it is proposed that the following groups of commodities be removed from requirements of I.R.'s. These items will remain under license in the United States, but licenses will be issued without I.R.'s: farm implements and machinery; drugs and medicinals; chemicals (with some exceptions); communication requirements; foods; fats and oils.

Subject to any fresh instructions which you may wish to let us have on the strength of my telephone conversation with you this morning and the foregoing remarks in this teletype, we have arranged for exploratory discussions early next week. Our approach will be that surely the same operational difficulties must be affecting American exporters and that we would accordingly be interested in knowing what the prospects are of winding up the Decentralization Plan.

You will note that this approach will not be made in a spirit of complaint on the way Canada has been treated, but that in our joint interests we are beginning to think that the time has come when the Plan is no longer serving a useful purpose to either the United States or Canada under present conditions.

This approach will be predicated, however, on our continued co-operation with the United States in all export control problems and provision will also be made for the possibility of having to revert to the plan itself, if and when shipping considerations warrant the tightening up of exports.

In view of the rather important implications, some of which are referred to in your EX-4700, I would like to have the opportunity of reporting the results of my exploratory discussions to you and other Departmental officers concerned, during my visit to Ottawa commencing December 20th, before any decisions are made which would commit us to a drastic change in policy. Ends.

Washington, December 6, 1943

Following for C.M. Croft, Department of Trade and Commerce, from Scott, Begins: Further to our WA-6037 of December 3rd concerning the operation of decentralization, Bull and I had a satisfactory informal discussion today with Farriss, the State Department official who is currently acting as Chairman of the United States-Canadian Joint Exports Committee, in that we found him entirely sympathetic to our point of view. He volunteered that in his view the Decentralization Plan had outlived its usefulness, and that this opinion was held by certain other officers in the State Department.

Farriss's first reaction was that perhaps the best approach might be to have a note from the Canadian Government to the State Department proposing that the scheme be wound up. We do not like the idea, however, of Canada being used by State Department as a lever against another agency, and stressed to Farriss the desirability of having the problem approached from the standpoint of asking whether or not the plan had not, as mentioned above, outlived its usefulness, instead of signifying that Canada is the sole victim of the impracticability of the plan. In other words, while we were content to put up with the paper work and restrictions imposed by the plan because of the need to conserve shipping space, the argument we put forward this morning was that we could no longer see any reason for the continuation of this cumbersome procedure.

It was agreed that Farriss would try to arrange a meeting of the United States-Canada Joint Exports Committee towards the end of this week, with F.E.A. and W.P.B.¹³⁷ officials in attendance, with the objective of further developing the above-mentioned point of view, and he gave us his assurance that State Department's support would be forthcoming at this meeting.

Meanwhile, considering that the operational difficulties referred to in your EX-4700 are, in the main, likely to be removed, as forecast in our WA-6037 of December 3rd, within a very short time, we are somewhat apprehensive regarding our position at this forthcoming meeting, from the standpoint of trying to illustrate defects in the plan by pointing to operational difficulties.

This would seem to suggest that our only recourse is to fall back on the stand that, from the Canadian point of view, the Decentralization Plan is an unnecessary hindrance to Canadian export trade with Latin America under present conditions.

In the light of the foregoing, we would appreciate having from you at your earliest convenience any fresh point of view you may wish to express on this matter, in order that we may be governed accordingly in our discussions later this week. Ends.

IMMEDIATE. Reference your WA-6037 December 3rd, regulation regarding "distressed stocks" has, as you say, not been in effect long enough to provide us with any actual evidence that Canadian export interests have suffered. However, the interpretation of the term is capable of such wide variations that we foresee difficulties in the future and we are sure the United States officials will agree.

Paragraph (f) EX-4700 should read "expanding" not "explaining". We fully approve your proposed approach as outlined in the last four paragraphs of your WA-6037 and in the penultimate paragraph of your WA-6070 of December 6th.

¹³⁷ War Production Board.

When we first agreed to participate in Decentralization it was with the understanding that the scheme was necessary because of shipping. Moreover, it was to embrace all commodities, except newsprint, which made for ease of administration.

As the shipping situation has improved it has been possible to make more and more exceptions to the scheme but this has made administration progressively more complicated, not so much for ourselves as for the Latin American countries and the possibility of delays, mistakes or outright non-cooperation has been thereby increased. Furthermore, as the scheme becomes more cumbersome and requires more careful administration in order that I.R.'s will not be insisted upon where none is required, the list of exceptions is apparently to be extended in accordance with copies of airgrams¹ attached to your letter to Croft of December 4th[†]. Extensions to the list of exceptions seem to be a tacit admission that the scheme is not needed for an ever increasing number of items, but additions to the list of exemptions will add to the possibilities of misinterpretation by the Agencies issuing I.R.'s. It seems to us that we are overtaxing the competence and integrity of the officials of the countries with which we are dealing and that we are imposing too heavy a burden upon them, especially when the shipping situation would appear to make it possible for us to consider abandoning or at least suspending the scheme.

For most effective administration in Latin America there would appear to be only two ways of ensuring satisfaction, (a) one hundred per cent Decentralization including all commodities or (b) one hundred per cent control in Washington and Ottawa. With shipping as it is (a) does not seem to be necessary which leaves (b) as the alternative. Under (b) supply would be the controlling factor and commodities in generous supply would move freely. As stated in EX-4700 we suggest that estimates of supply for short items should still be given to the Latin American countries so that they could introduce any internal administration they desire to ensure equitable distribution. In cases where our supplies are so limited that we require information as to end-use before export permits can be granted, such cases could be referred individually to the Field Officers.

We, therefore, do not feel that the removal of the operational difficulties exemplified in EX-4700 will solve the problem either for us or the United States. The trouble seems to lie in the fundamental fact that difficulties of administration in Latin America are disproportionate to the benefits to be gained in the face of the existing shipping situation. We agree, however, that provision might be made for the immediate revival of the scheme should shipping or some other factor make such course necessary. Ends.

TELETYPE WA-6168

Washington, December 10, 1943

Following for C.M. Croft, Dept. of Trade and Commerce, from Scott, Begins: On the strength of the verbal concurrence given by you and Butler to the approach suggested in our WA-6070 of December 6th, we had an exploratory discussion today at a meeting of the United States-Canada Joint Exports Committee to discuss the prospects of the Decentralization Plan being wound up in the near future. The Americans readily conceded our arguments from the Canadian point of view, but it was pointed out to us that it was one thing to start such a scheme and another to pull out from under it too suddenly.

Their contention is that they are, in fact, trying gradually to wind up the plan, and in support of this contention illustrated the new Mexican scheme and the proposed rollback of four main commodity groups for the other Latin American countries, as reported in my letter of December 4th[†].

When the Decentralization scheme could be finally dispensed with, no one could predict; but at this point a rather disturbing explanation was given as to the need for proceeding gradually with the abolishment of the plan. It was suggested that the alternative to Decentralization would be a more stringent application of exchange control by the importing countries, by reason of the fact that most of the Latin American markets are over-bought in the United States, and that there is a danger that continued unrestricted purchases in this country might jeopardize their credit position. The ultimate result would be detrimental to United States export interests in Latin America.

We find it difficult to see how Decentralization can be justified on such grounds as, if it is necessary to withhold merchandise from such customers, surely the control can be adequately taken care of from the supplying end, through licensing procedure. It almost appears as though the Americans are trying to develop this control on a paternalistic basis, which doubtless will be resented by some importing countries. Certainly, it is a long way from the original conception of Decentralization. For the reasons already explained and agreed to by you, we refrained from giving any impression that Canada wishes to withdraw from the plan, and, although it was not specifically stated, it was clear from the remarks by the Americans present that they would not like to see us withdraw, as it would obviously make their position very difficult.

One of the imponderables discussed was the future shipping situation, and it was frankly admitted that it was impossible to give any long-range guide, because the War Shipping Administration was unable to gauge military demands ahead for any length of time. It was, however, pointed out that just at present there is a rather tight position on the west coast of South America.

From the standpoint of procedure, as you will have gathered from our several recent teletypes, there now seems to be some hope of our being relieved of the worst features of Decentralization within the next two to three months. In these circumstances, having in mind the obvious implications of our withdrawal from the plan, it is suggested that our further negotiations with the Americans be deferred, pending my being able to discuss the matter with you and others concerned during my forthcoming visit to Ottawa.

Following for H.A. Scott, Begins: In the final paragraph of Knox's¹³⁸ letter to you of December 16th[†] respecting maintenance of Decentralization Plan, he refers to "problem of foreign exchange availabilities in other American republics" and alludes to danger of causing "exchange or financial difficulties by increasing the flow of exportations in a precipitate or erratic manner". It can be readily understood that, as Mr. Knox suggests, a large increase in exports to Latin America might lead to a depreciation of Latin American currencies in terms of United States dollars if the importing countries do not at the same time increase their exports to the United States, or acquire United States dollars through other channels, as, for instance, by the export of capital from the United States. What comes as a surprise is Mr. Knox's anticipation that the increase in imports in Latin American countries, which would be likely under existing conditions if the restrictions involved in the Decentralization Plan were removed, would itself suffice to produce a collapse of these currencies. While this might be the case in respect of some Latin American countries, it seems unlikely that it would be true of them all at the same time.

Mr. Knox's statements are unfortunately too obscure to be at all useful. It is very important, if foreign exchange considerations are causing the United States Government to delay modification of the Decentralization Plan, that we have a clear understanding of just what these difficulties are and the magnitude of them. It would be appreciated, therefore, if you could secure a more detailed explanation of the financial difficulties which Mr. Knox had in mind and a statement of the financial policy which the United States authorities are following, or propose to follow, in relation to Latin American countries, together with any special considerations affecting particular countries.

Washington, December 28, 1942

Dear Dr. Clark,

At Dr. White's request I called on him today and he formally raised the question, "What should be the accepted level around which the Canadian reserves of gold and United States dollars ought to fluctuate?"

On December 14 I wrote to you transmitting a copy of the minutes of the American Section of the Joint War Production Board,[†] in which it was indicated that a new procedure would be adopted in relation to Canadian gold and dollar balances. Under the new procedure it was suggested that when Canadian balances sunk unduly low, the Treasury and other agencies would take steps to see that additional orders were placed through War Supplies Ltd. On the other hand, if Canadian balances grew unduly large, steps would be taken to divert some War Supplies Ltd. orders into other channels. Obviously the working of such a system implies that between the Canadian and U.S. Treasury there has been some broad agreement regarding what constitutes an unduly low or an unduly high reserve. In other words, it postulates an agreement between the treasuries on a normal Canadian working balance. Dr. White expressed the hope that this matter might be settled before the end of January 1943. He said he felt sure that it would be possible to reach an amicable settlement of this point. He seemed willing to discuss with the Canadians (either directly with yourself or through me or through any other person you might suggest) any figure which you cared to put forward as a basis for discussion. I do not think that he has any firm idea of his own regarding the proper figure, although he casually mentioned that he thought it might possibly be in the vicinity of the existing reserve of gold and dollar balances.

For what they are worth, I would like to offer the following comments: (1) I do not feel that the existing level of Canadian-U.S. dollar balances is adequate, particularly in view of the burdens to which such balances might be subjected in the immediate post-war period. (2) I think it would be well worth while to have prepared in Ottawa a memorandum as brief as possible indicating the size of the balance which you would consider reasonable and particularly emphasizing (if you agree with me) that the current balance is inadequate. (3) Amongst the points which I would bring forward in such a memorandum if I were preparing it would be the fact that the Canadian balances were on the low side at the outbreak of war in 1939. (I put forward my own views on this subject in my "Central Banking in the British Dominions" almost at the end of the next to last chapter.)

I will be in Ottawa during the week of January 11 and will discuss this matter with you.

Yours sincerely,

SUGGESTIONS AS TO A REASONABLE RESERVE OF U.S.
DOLLAR EXCHANGE TO BE MAINTAINED BY CANADA

1. It is believed that it would be desirable for the United States and Canada to reach an agreement as to what should be the magnitude of the reserve of gold and U.S. dollar balances which Canada should seek to maintain, having regard to the interests of both countries.

It is suggested that minimum and maximum figures might well be agreed upon. In that case it would be the understanding that if Canada's reserves tended to fall below the agreed minimum, the United States would be willing to increase her purchases of war supplies in Canada, in accordance with the principles of the Hyde Park Declaration. Conversely, if Canada's reserves tended to rise above the agreed maximum, Canada would be willing not only to accept reductions in U.S. orders for war supplies being placed in Canada but also to contribute free to the United States (either for her own use or for assignment to other United Nations through the Munitions Assignments Board) finished war supplies manufactured in Canada as a result of orders placed by the United States through War Supplies Limited.

2. In considering the appropriate magnitude of a U.S. dollar reserve to be maintained by Canada, the following general considerations are believed to be important:

(a) The high degree of vulnerability of Canada's international trading position. (Her foreign trade is very large in relation to her size and national income. Her economy is geared to export markets to an extent that is matched by few other countries. To a very large extent also her exports consist of agricultural products and basic raw materials and, at the first blast of depression, are apt to fall off rapidly because of declines in volume and more drastic declines in prices. In previous major depressions, drastic decreases in export receipts have immediately emerged, while the cost of imports based to a considerable extent on machinery and capital equipment has tended to keep up for a time, with a consequent serious strain on Canada's balance of payments).

(b) Canada's heavy external indebtedness, now owing largely to the United States. (In recent years Canada has had to find from $200 to $250 millions U.S. to meet interest and dividend payments payable to U.S. investors. In addition, it must be remembered that the investment markets of the countries are so closely interrelated that securities move back and forth across the boundary line with great freedom and in enormous volume — in 1937 the total of this trade was over $1000 millions. If confidence in Canada's currency or financial position is impaired, capital may flow out quickly in very large volume not only in the form of marketable securities but also in the form of withdrawal by U.S. parent companies of surplus funds held by their Canadian subsidiaries or branches).

(c) Canada's probable post-war reconstruction needs. (We hope to have post-war a much higher rate of general economic activity as compared with pre-war conditions. Even if the U.S. follows a policy of expansion, the character of the trade between the two countries is such that the balance of payments could be heavily against us in the early post-war years).

(d) The desirability of being able to restore parity of exchange, eliminate various restrictions and maintain a liberal commercial policy. (In addition to the normal problems of post-war reconstruction, Canada will desire, and it will be in the interest of the U.S. that she should be in a position, to return to the pre-war parity between the Canadian and U.S. dollars; to remove exchange control, the 10% War Exchange Tax, heavy excise taxes on certain commodities and other restrictions on imports from the U.S., and the prohibition on pleasure travel in the U.S., all of which Canada has had to impose during the war in order to conserve her scanty reserves of U.S. dollar exchange; and generally to resist successfully any internal, sectional pressures attempting to force the solution of an exchange problem by reactionary trade policy or by exchange control or depreciation).

3. In the light of these general considerations, we may approach the concrete problem of what should be a reasonable magnitude for Canada's exchange reserve by reviewing a number of historical situations:

(a) At September 15, 1939, Canada's official and available private reserves of gold and U.S. dollars were $390 millions, made up as follows: Official Spot Position Millions of U.S. dollars Foreign Exchange Control Board and Bank of Canada gold 205 Foreign Exchange Control Board, Bank of Canada and Dominion Government U.S. balances 56 Total official spot position 261 *Private Spot Position*¹⁴¹ Corporation balances (excluding minimum working balances)¹⁴² 85 Individuals' balances¹⁴³ 23 Chartered banks'

(b) The size of the exchange reserve possessed by Canada just before the war, as shown above, was much smaller than that maintained by Canada in the years preceding the great depression. In this connection the following extract from Professor A.F.W. Plumptre's "Central Banking in the British Dominions" (published in 1939 [1940]) is pertinent:

"Although Canada's long-term foreign indebtedness has been greatly reduced in the years 1933-8, the short-term international position of the financial system has by no means been restored to that of ten or twelve years ago. The change is shown in an accompanying table. At the end of 1938 the net short-term international assets of the system were less than half the amount eleven years earlier. In the event of a new severe depression, entailing falling income from exports and difficulty in meeting foreign debts, it seems desirable to have at least as large a reserve of international assets as was available before the last one." (page 421).

To Professor Plumptre's comment there might be added the further comment that in spite of what now seems like a large exchange reserve held in 1927 and just prior to the end of the last major business boom), a falling trade position and an outflow of funds to the New York market brought weakness and some depreciation in the Canadian dollar during 1929, followed by acute weakness and substantial depreciation in 1931 and 1932 when the United Kingdom went off gold and Canada's balance of payments showed serious worsening.

(c) By the middle of 1941, Canada's reserve had dropped from $390 millions at the outbreak of war to $255 millions.

The following table shows the position at June 30, 1941:

June 30, 1941.
(millions of U.S. dollars)
Foreign Exchange Control Board gold	137
Foreign Exchange Control Board — U.S. balances	72
Dominion Government — U.S. balances	46
Total official spot position	255

(d) As a result primarily of the working of the Hyde Park agreement and of capital movements, the drain on Canada's reserve which had amounted to $142 millions (U.S.) in 1941 was checked and then reversed in 1942. Preliminary figures for the past year show a gain of approximately 133 millions, bringing the official reserve up to 318 millions as at December 31, 1942, made up as follows:

December 31, 1942.
(millions of U.S. dollars)
Gold held by Foreign Exchange Control Board and Dominion Government	154.9
U.S. balances held by Foreign Exchange Control Board and Dominion Government	163.6
Total official spot position	318.5

(e) The following table shows the net impairment of Canada's U.S. position, the liquidation of U.S. assets and the increased purchases by U.S. investors of Canadian assets, by various periods since the outbreak of war up to December 31, 1942. (The table was prepared about the middle of December last and consequently the figures used for the year 1942 are estimates which may vary slightly from the figures as finally determined):¹⁴⁹

It is important to note from the preceding table that in addition to losing $72 millions of her liquid U.S. dollar reserves since the outbreak of war, Canada has also lost approximately $115 millions of other U.S. dollar assets and in addition has increased her indebtedness to the U.S. by approximately $109 millions net during the same period. In other words, there has been a total net impairment in her position and indebtedness vis-à-vis the U.S. of approximately $296 millions.

¹⁴⁹ Voir Appendice A de ce volume.

¹⁴⁹ See Appendix A of this volume.

4. With the above historical and statistical background, we are now in a position to make concrete suggestions as to the magnitude of an appropriate U.S. dollar reserve for Canada, having in mind the best interest of the two countries.

One alternative might be that Canada should be allowed to return to the position at September 15, 1939, when she had gold and U.S. dollar balances of $390 millions, or about $72 millions more than at December 31, 1942. It should be noted, however, that the present cash position has been attained only at the expense of our capital resources to a net extent of about $224 millions. On the other hand it would be unrealistic to suggest that we should be allowed to recoup ourselves for this loss by building up our liquid resources to a corresponding extent; we must be prepared to accept some increase in our net debt to the U.S. as a result of the war.

A second alternative might be based on the argument that, as it was during the spring of 1941 that the Hyde Park discussions took place, Canada might be asked to accept a net impairment of position up to, say, mid-1941 on the ground that after that date it was the general intention that the Hyde Park arrangements should obviate any further substantial impairments of Canada's U.S. capital resources. On this basis, we would have to make up a net impairment in position and indebtedness of $119 millions which, added to our actual liquid reserve of $318 millions at December 31, 1942, would mean total liquid resources of $437 millions.

The average of the two alternative approaches outlined above works out at $414 millions. It is therefore respectfully suggested that consideration be given to agreeing upon a range of $400 to $430 millions. Bearing in mind that under certain circumstances an annual exchange loss of $150 millions is by no means improbable and that one of $200 millions or even more is quite conceivable, liquid reserves of the magnitude here suggested are no more than sufficient to give Canada a breathing spell of 1 1/2 or 2 years if things do not go well in the post-war years. The reference to such a period assumes that desperate measures have to be taken before exchange reserves reach the vanishing point.

It is also suggested that consideration should be given in agreeing upon a suitable exchange reserve, to the desirability of leaving out of the calculations for operating purposes any cash which may later be accumulated through net sales of securities in the U.S. — either Canadian or U.S. securities. (By net sales is meant gross sales of securities minus redemptions or purchases, leaving other capital transactions out of account for the sake of simplicity). Behind this suggestion is a question as to the wisdom of Canada borrowing in order to maintain her liquid position. There is also behind it the conviction that a minimum cash reserve of $400 millions does not fully take into account the vulnerability of Canada's international position and her probable post-war reconstruction needs. There is also the further fact that we will have to deal with a number of maturing Dominion bond issues in the near future, such for instance as the $30 million issue due January 15, 1944, and callable on or after January 15, 1943, and the $76 million issue due August 15, 1945, and callable on or after August 15, 1943. These issues might be retired in part with funds accumulated by the ordinary market sales of U.S. or Canadian securities to the U.S.

[Ottawa,] January 11, 1943

DISCUSSIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES TREASURY RELATING TO OUR PROPOSED PROGRAM OF FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS WITH THE UNITED KINGDOM AND OTHER UNITED NATIONS, TO THE POSSIBILITY OF AGREEING WITH THE UNITED STATES TREASURY UPON THE UNITED STATES DOLLAR RESERVE WHICH CANADA SHOULD BE ALLOWED TO KEEP, AND TO THE DESIRABILITY OR UNDESIRABILITY OF PAYING OFF OUR 5% ISSUE MATURING IN 1952 RATHER THAN REFUNDING IT.

By appointment I saw Dr. Harry White on Friday, January 8, and had a very pleasant and helpful discussion with him on the above points, the discussion lasting for about two and a half hours. The purport of the discussion may be briefly summarized as follows:

(1) I explained to him in some detail the fact that our billion dollar gift appropriation had been exhausted in the closing days of 1942, that our Parliament would not meet until January 27, and that it was impossible, or at least highly undesirable, that we should embark upon any new program for financing the United Kingdom and other United Nations until we had an opportunity of explaining our proposals to Parliament and, if possible, having any necessary legislation passed. In the meanwhile, therefore, it was necessary for the United Kingdom to pay cash, and she was proposing to turn over to us $150 million in gold and U.S. balances which was expected to be sufficient to take care of the situation until after Parliament met. Dr. White was very interested in this fact and asked a good many questions about it. I then went on to say that apart from two or three special steps which we could take to increase the supply of dollars available to the United Kingdom, it now appeared that our general program of financing the United Kingdom and other United Nations would take the form of something closely approaching the United States Lend-Lease program. In other words, our idea would be to pool our surplus war production and make contributions out of it directly to each of the United Nations in accordance with the strategic requirements of the war. In answer to a question from him, I intimated that it might mean making certain free contributions to the United States itself, which appeared to please him. I pointed out that the proposal was still in an exploratory stage, being considered by a sub-committee of the War Committee and would later have to be discussed by the War Committee and then by the Cabinet itself before any official statement could be made. Dr. White was very much interested and asked a great many questions. I did not discuss specifically with him the question of the machinery of allocating our surplus output, but I did ask him whether he thought there was any value in getting some kind of reciprocal undertaking from the Nations to whom aid was given, even though such undertaking was very largely in the form of platitudinous expressions in regard to the United Nations' attitude to the war and the post-war world. Dr. White discussed the background of their own legislation and expressed the view that it was desirable to have some undertaking on the part of the receiving countries.

(2) I then raised with him the question of an appropriate U.S. dollar exchange reserve to be maintained by Canada, pointing out that the program we had in mind could hardly be adopted unless we had some assurance of being able to meet our U.S. exchange problem. I then presented the attached memorandum to him and called attention to the main points in it. He had various questions as we went through the memorandum, and disclosed some confusion of mind in regard to our present official balances and their comparison with official and private balances at the outbreak of war. At the end he stated that it was an able and comprehensive memorandum and set forth the case very clearly and forcefully. He seemed to be impressed by the arguments, and it was the view of both Mr. Plumptre and myself that the proposal would be generally acceptable to him. However, he said that he would like to discuss it with his Committee and then take it up with Secretary Morgenthau. He would then be in a position to give me the answer and would do so either by calling me back or by telling it to Mr. Plumptre. I told him that unless he was anxious to have a further discussion, it would be preferable from my point of view to have the answer given to Mr. Plumptre who could pass it on to me. He also said something about the desirability of Mr. Morgenthau mentioning the matter to, and securing the approval of, the President, which would then make it a binding arrangement and enable directions to be given to officials all down the line.

(3) I told him about negotiations going on with New York underwriters in regard to the refunding of our 5s of '52, and asked him whether from their point of view they would object to us paying off the loan instead of refunding it. He immediately expressed the opinion that it would be a mistake for us to pay off the loan and would create political embarrassment for them. Furthermore, he said that if we did pay off the loan, they would have to take the use of these funds in this way into account in any arrangement they agreed to in connection with my proposal under No. 2 above. He was so confident of his own opinion on this point that I immediately dropped the matter without pressing it further.

I should add that Mr. Morgenthau was ill and away from the office. It would have been impossible for me to see him unless I had stayed over until some time during the present week.

Le ministre aux États-Unis au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Minister in United States to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TELETYPE WA-295

Washington, January 20, 1943

IMMEDIATE. Following for Dr. W.C. Clark, Deputy Minister of Finance, Ottawa, Canada, from A.F.W. Plumptre, Washington Office, Begins: I visited Dr. White this afternoon and discussed with him the question of a maximum and minimum Canadian reserve of gold and United States dollars. Miss Kistler was present and I also had a little further discussion with her after I left Dr. White.

2. Your proposal as set forth in your memorandum of January 7th, that the Canadian reserve should range from $400 to $430 millions has been given consideration, not only by Dr. White and Treasury officials, but also by an interdepartmental group of officials of similar rank to White. It appears that this group is concerning itself with the reserves of gold and United States dollars which are to be held by such countries as Canada, the United Kingdom and others of the United Nations.

3. Dr. White said that this group had regretfully reached the conclusion that the range which you suggested was rather higher than they could support in the face of adverse criticism, wherever it might arise. Accordingly, he wished to suggest as an alternative a range from $300 to $350 millions.

4. Dr. White emphasized that he was rather apologetic in suggesting any reduction from the range which you mentioned. He said he hoped that we would understand that this in no way implied any unwillingness on the part of the Treasurer to support our current wartime needs for exchange. Under the Hyde Park Agreement¹⁵⁰ they had undertaken to supply us with whatever exchange we needed under wartime conditions and they fully intended to carry this out whatever it might cost, running to many hundreds of millions or even into billions. He also said that the difference between the amounts which you had suggested and the amounts which he was suggesting was, as an absolute sum, very small.

5. On the other hand, he hoped we would appreciate that the Canadian reserve balance which was guaranteed by the Treasury had to be something which could be defended, not only in relation to the pre-war Canadian position, but also in relation to the treatment which was accorded to other countries, including the United Kingdom. Even the range of $300 to $350 millions was pretty large in relationship to what was being allowed to the United Kingdom, (the amount of which he did not state). Moreover, it was felt by the interdepartmental group that it would be difficult for them to justify an aggregate reserve larger than that which was held at the outbreak of war (i.e., $390 millions). Therefore, the top of the range which they were suggesting was somewhat below this figure.

6. He made it clear that the matter was still definitely open for discussion. On the other hand, it is very clear that we shall have to put forward a very strong case if we wish to press for a higher figure.

7. It appears to me in retrospect that the chief difference between his approach and your own lies in the fact that you are very strongly concerned with the post-war position. On the other hand he and the interdepartmental group are concerned with what can be defended in public; and the comparisons which will be made are almost certain to be with the treatment accorded to other countries and the position of the Canadian reserve balances at the outbreak of the war. He emphasized that while the Treasury could supply practically unlimited exchange for current wartime purposes, they could not very well supply funds for putting Canada in a more comfortable exchange position than it had had at the outbreak of war. Dr. White said that under wartime conditions he doubted whether it was possible to justify a reserve as high as you had proposed. Indeed it might be difficult to justify one as high as they were proposing. (Actually I suppose under conditions where they are more or less guaranteeing a minimum it is extremely difficult to justify any particular minimum above zero.

¹⁵⁰ Voir le volume 8, document 191.

¹⁵⁰ See Volume 8, Document 191.

Granted that guarantee, our basic needs for exchange reserve relate almost entirely to the post-war position and that, as I have said, is something to which the interdepartmental group does not appear to be giving much consideration.)

8. In the final paragraph of your memorandum you suggested the possibility that such additions to Canadian reserves as were accumulated by net sales of securities should be left out of account when computing the official maximum and minimum. This suggestion, Dr. White said, had met with "some raised eyebrows" in the interdepartmental group. It seems clear that such a proposal is not likely to be acceptable. It would establish a principle which might cause very serious difficulties, particularly if any proposal were made to make it retroactive. (Of course, there was no suggestion that you had made this proposal). He pointed out that in regard to the United Kingdom, this proposal might involve the Treasury in supplying several billions of balances which was of course quite impossible.

9. While Dr. White did not feel it was impossible to establish this principle as you had put it forward in your memorandum, he suggested that, if in the future we wanted to raise the question of adding to our balances on account of specific net capital movements, he would always be willing to discuss the matter. Indeed, he emphasized that whatever maximum and minimum were determined in the near future, these need not be considered as absolutely final. It would always be possible to reconsider the figures. Moreover, he said that he saw no reason to expect under any circumstances that the figures would be revised downwards.

10. You will recall that you and I were both worried after our discussion with Dr. White because he was inclined to compare the current official Canadian reserves with pre-war official reserves; i.e., without allowance for the private reserves which had been taken over by the Foreign Exchange Control Board. I raised this matter with Miss Kistler. She recognized the point immediately and said that Dr. White had in the past been making the comparison which we considered to be incorrect. On the other hand, she assured me that he was not making this comparison now and that in the discussion of the interdepartmental group our present position had been compared with our pre-war aggregate position and not merely with our pre-war official position.

11. Dr. White is obviously anxious to get this matter settled amicably as soon as possible. I told him that there was some hope of my being able to give him further information regarding the trend of our opinion later this week. There is apparently some possibility of early and definite action on this matter down here and White expressed the hope that agreement would be reached before this action was necessary. Ends.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au ministre aux États-UnisSecretary of State for External Affairs to Minister in United States

TELETYPE EX-234

Ottawa, January 22, 1943

IMMEDIATE. Following for A.F.W. Plumptre, Canadian Legation, Washington, from W.C. Clark, Deputy Minister of Finance, Ottawa, Begins:

1. Please thank Dr. Harry White for the consideration which he had given to the proposal set forth in my memorandum of January 7th.

2. I am disappointed, of course, but I can see the reasons which have led Dr. White and his committee to take the position they have. As you point out, the chief difference between his approach and our own lies in the fact that we are concerned with the post-war position and the post-war relations between the two countries, while he and his group seem to be worried over the possibility of public criticism based primarily on possible comparisons between the exchange reserve which I had suggested for Canada and that which may be agreed upon in the case of certain other countries. Of course I think such criticism would be more tenable if our exchange reserves were being built up as a result of lend-lease assistance by the United States to Canada as in the case of the other countries with which comparisons would be made. Actually, however, we think that we are giving the United States dollar for dollar value in the delivery of war supplies which can be secured here quickly and economically. Furthermore, in making comparisons between countries, regard should be had to Canada's debtor position vis-à-vis the United States, the peculiar vulnerability of her trade position and the other considerations outlined in my memorandum.

3. I still believe that the principles and considerations developed in my memorandum of January 7th were sound and appropriate and that the size of the reserve which I suggested therein was likely to be in the best interests of both countries. I am not in a position to make any alternative suggestion which would be sound on the basis of the principles that seem relevant to us and of course I would not consider this a matter for bargaining. You may therefore tell Dr. White that we are prepared to leave ourselves in his hands if the Treasury believes that they must settle the question primarily on the basis of considerations relating to possible comparisons with settlements reached for other countries. You might point out, however, that while, as he says, the differences between the two suggestions for the minimum figure is not as an absolute sum very large, it represents nevertheless a substantial percentage and would probably bring forward by eight or ten months the time when drastic action would have to be taken to protect our reserves if a drain upon them began in the immediate post-war period.

4. If the Treasury feel they must adhere to the minimum figure suggested by Dr. White, I would make only this one suggestion. Under those circumstances would he agree that the United States authorities would have no objection if we should wish to pay off in the next year or two maturing or callable securities payable in U.S. funds, up to the amount, say, of the net proceeds of sales of securities after the date of the new arrangement. This would avoid a further impairment in our capital position vis-à-vis the United States.

5. You should point out to Dr. White that of course there was no suggestion in my original memorandum or in our discussion that the provision in regard to security sales should be made retroactive.

6. I have expressed our position frankly but have no objection to your showing this despatch to Dr. White. As we are prepared to leave the question in his hands, I do not think any further discussions are necessary but in view of our Parliament meeting next week, we would appreciate anything he can do to expedite a decision.

*Assistant to Secretary of the Treasury of United States

Washington, January 26, 1943

Dear Dr. Clark,

Mr. Plumptre has been kind enough to send me a copy of your dispatch to him dated January 22, 1943, concerning the tentative decision on Canada's U.S. dollar exchange reserve.

It appears, from your reply, that there is a misunderstanding concerning the basis of our tentative views. It is true that one of the factors taken into account is the relationship between Canada's reserve and that of other countries. However, this was of only minor importance. The major considerations were Canada's total international financial situation since the outbreak of war and the overall policy of this Government in extending financial assistance to our Allies.

The prime purpose of the policy of this Government in extending financial assistance to the United Nations is the prosecution of the war. In view of Congressional directives and public commitments made by the Administration, it would be most difficult to defend extension of financial aid to the Allied Governments for the purpose of providing for their post-war needs.

So far as concerns the second major consideration, we were dubious about the feasibility of evaluating Canada's U.S. dollar position without reference to changes in her overall international financial situation. Other factors influencing our decision were (1) the fact that your suggested minimum figure is higher than the U.S. dollar reserve held by Canada at the outbreak of war in September 1939, and (2) the lack of any justifiable basis for special treatment of Canada's post-war needs.

There is to be another meeting tomorrow morning at which time your views will be submitted. We shall, at that time, also examine very carefully your suggestion for handling the net proceeds of security sales.

Very truly yours,

H. D. WHITE

Following for W.C. Clark, Deputy Minister of Finance, from Plumptre, Begins: Your EX-234 of January 22 regarding maximum-minimum Canadian holdings of United States dollars was transmitted immediately to Dr. White according to the permission given in paragraph 6.

He has just telephoned me to say that an answer¹⁵¹ was air mailed to you two days ago with a copy to myself which I have not as yet received.

He asked me to raise one further matter with you connected with paragraph 4 of your teletype. He said that the interdepartmental group had shown sympathetic interest in your suggestion that securities might be paid off in U.S.A. up to the next proceeds of sales of securities after the date of the new arrangement.

Dr. White asked us to supply him with more information on this matter indicating (1) the possible programme of repayment of maturing or callable securities (2) whether these are solely Dominion Government issues or whether other issues are involved and (3) whether the net proceeds of sales of securities which are to be counterbalanced are sales of all types of securities including stocks and bonds or only certain types. Following for Dr. W.C. Clark, Department of Finance, from A.F.W. Plumptre, Begins: Maximum-minimum Canadian Balances of U.S. Dollars.

I obtained some information on the above subject when Miss Kistler telephoned to me about something else today.

She tells me that arrangements are going steadily forward for the establishment of the maximum-minimum balances along the lines indicated by Dr. White.

I specifically asked her whether your suggestion that certain security issues might be repaid at maturity had proved acceptable. She said that it had and that provisions to incorporate its principle were included in the arrangements which were being drafted along with certain arrangements to give "protection" to the U.S.A.

I asked her whether there had been any objection or annoyance to your suggestion and she said that to the best of her knowledge there had been none. Ends.

Washington, March 6, 1943

Following for Dr. W.C. Clark, Department of Finance, from Plumptre, Begins: Maximum-Minimum Balances, Treasury Decisions.

Late yesterday afternoon I had a brief telephone conversation with Miss Kistler, who told me that our maximum-minimum balance arrangements had been completed and finally approved down here. This morning I have had rather a longer and more informative telephone conversation with Dr. White and I am now in a position to give you fairly full information.

Mr. J.B. Carswell called me yesterday evening and explained that after an unsuccessful attempt to reach me by telephone he had telephoned to you and given you the information that the arrangements had been completed although he did not know exactly what form they took. He had also told you that certain sales of ships to the U.S.A. were to be delayed pending clarification of the whole situation.

Dr. White tells me that he is writing to you today to explain what has been done in regard to the maximum-minimum balance. However, the following information may be useful.

1. The range is, as he had previously indicated, from $300,000,000 to $350,000,000.
2. Canex arrangements are to be discontinued.¹⁵²
3. During 1943 receipts from net sales of securities in the United States may be used for the reduction of bonds in United States.

Dr. White emphasizes that in order to make the maximum-minimum balance arrangements workable, it is absolutely essential that the Treasury should be informed promptly immediately after the end of each month what changes have occurred in balances during the month and what net sales of securities have occurred. He pointed out that, while we had sometimes been able to fulfil our promise to give him monthly information, we had not always done so. (I assured him that our intentions at least were pure). Ends.

*Mémoire du ministère des Affaires extérieures¹⁵³ au
sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures*

Memorandum from Department of External Affairs¹⁵³ to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa,] August 26, 1943

It has become apparent from the observations of the Department of Finance with respect to the Brazilian desire to buy ships in Canada and the Shipping Board's memorandum[†] on the employment of Canadian ships that the Department of Finance has entered into an exchange agreement or understanding with the United States, of which this Department has no knowledge — at least the Records Branch is unable to find the text of any agreement or even a reference to the fact that one exists. Quite apart from this unusual method of making an international agreement, ignorance of its terms makes it difficult for this Division to formulate an opinion or participate in discussions on questions of trade and economic matters generally or even to follow such discussions intelligently.

A few examples, in addition to the Brazilian and shipping questions referred to above, will make the difficulty clear:

(a) Some time ago the Government of Ireland was authorized to buy agricultural machinery in Canada which would require 450 tons of steel. The question has now arisen as to whether or not Canada has any financial interests in the completion of such a transaction. The Export Permit Branch, after consulting the Foreign Exchange Control Board, reports that Ireland has no Canadian dollars at its disposal and expresses the opinion that "sterling and American dollars are of no use to Canada". The conclusion suggested, however, is not that the transaction should be cancelled but that it becomes, in essence, a gift to Ireland. As Ireland is a neutral country, the gift cannot be made by means of Mutual Aid and it is, therefore, suggested that the United Kingdom's Department of Agriculture should act as intermediary and place the order on behalf of Ireland eventually making payment from United Kingdom sources, either in cash or under Mutual Aid. This is a peculiarly involved way of considering the transaction and one which it will be very difficult to explain in public.

(b) The Food Requirements Committee had occasion to consider a proposal for apportioning Canada's exportations of apples between Britain, the United States and Latin America. It is not easy to consider this question in total ignorance of the importance of receipts from these countries nor is it easy to balance the importance of maintaining stocks for home consumption against the advantage of exporting them.

(c) In considering Canada's trade relations with Latin America under the United States Decentralization Plan, to which Canada has adhered, or under the arrangements which may be substituted for it, it is important to know whether Canadian exports to Latin America should be considered merely as a drain on Canada's resources which is accepted with equanimity at the present time because it contributes to maintaining Canada's foothold in markets which may be important after the war; or if the receipts from this trade, at the present time, are also of importance to Canada.

(d) Similar questions arose when concessions to the United States in the matter of taxation were under discussion. If American dollar receipts are not important, there is no reason why we should not be financially generous whenever any minor questions arise.

I have drafted the attached letter[†] with a view to securing the information we need.

You may prefer to ask for the information verbally but in any case I wish to stress that the information is essential if we are to participate effectively in many of the questions of an international economic character that come before us.

[Ottawa,] August 28, 1943

The copies of a number of teletype messages which have passed between Dr. Clark and Mr. Plumptre in the period January-April 1943, which Mr. Cullen showed me this morning, do not materially change the situation respecting our lack of knowledge of the financial relations between Canada and the United States.

It is clear from these teletypes that an exchange agreement or arrangement was made between the Department of Finance and the United States Treasury last winter. The terms of the arrangement, however, have not been communicated to this Department nor is there sufficient information in the teletypes (which were supplemented by telephone calls and at least two conferences in Washington) to permit us to form a clear understanding of the purpose of the arrangement and how it works in practice.
