Europe's Latest Republic And Its Initial Attempts to Rule.

Portugal as a republic gives me the impression of a boy wearing his first pair of long pants. It is very self-conscious, very touchy and very raw in spots. It is the raw spots, however, that are attracting a good deal of attention in Europe at the present moment. A clever English lady, the Duchess of Bedford came here to Lisbon a few months ago and started using her eyes and ears to some advantage.

English Noblewoman Makes Discoveries.

She moved about in legation circles and heard a good many of these stories, which are labelled "private and confidential," when transmitted to home governments. Some one on an unguarded moment suggested that she take a look at the prisons where people suspected of monarchical leanings are being convicted of the error of their ways. The night does not seem to have impressed her favorably for immediately after returning to England a series of articles under her name appeared in a leading London paper. These articles did not contain the usual bald statements about cruelty and tyranny. There were enough of facts and statistics to make the Portuguese president and prime minister very uncomfortable.

Vain Denials—Unlooked For Results.

They cabled indignant denials and displayed to great lack of courtesy and good manners in connection with these denials that the English press took up the cudgels in her defence. Like a true woman her ladyship has had the last word and it is not very pleasing to Portuguese mildness if we are to judge from the amount of abuse which is being heaped upon her in official organs.

Not A Popular Government.

Now the sum and substance of the ladies arrangement is that the new republic of Portugal is not a government of the people, by the people and for the people. The Portuguese people have not been consulted as to the kind of government they want or do not want. A secret political society, closely resembling the Sicilian Mafia or the Italian Camorra, saves them from worrying about governmental affairs. The official title of this society is "Os Carbonari," and in round numbers embrace about 5,000 interested parties. In order to keep them in good humor the offices are parcelled out amongst them and those who do not hold office are paid regular salaries for spying upon the Portuguese rank and file.

A National Tragedy.

Drawn from the lower straits of society their control of the governmental machinery has been nothing more or less than one long drawn out national tragedy. Like their forefathers, in Sicily they have established in Lisbon and elsewhere throughout the country a veritable reign of terror. A member of the Carbonari can walk up behind anyone on the street, follow him to the nearest policeman and by showing his card can order his arrest. Being brought to trial afterwards is largely a matter of accident. Dozens of people have remained in prison for months without knowing anything of the crimes charged up against them. And such prisons! Filth, vermin, semi-starvation and such horrors. Americans have read of in connection with Andersonville and the other terrible prison camps of civil war days.

Her ladyship brings all these things out in the series of letters referred to above. These have been gathered together and issued in pamphlet form, but they are not being distributed in Portugal. The Carbonari sees to it that they are treated as contraband matter and are not permitted to pass through the mails. Surveillance of The Mails. In fact mail matter in general is subjected to official scrutiny. Nobody thinks of writing anything in a private letter calculated to hurt the feelings of those in authority. No newspaperman would think of committing to the mails any articles of the powers that be. Even this innocent letter will be sent across the Spanish border and mailed from some point in Don Alfonso's dominions.

Have Helped Somewhat.

I wish to state here and now that I have come to Portugal without any particular prejudices for or against the new republic. Like the average citizen of the United States I am not greatly enamored of monarchical institutions. I have known something of the record made by the Braganza or Bourbon dynasty in Portugal and have felt that the Republic would have to be pretty bad, not to be an improvement upon that institution. I came prepared to praise rather than blame, but the venal reign of terror, with which I have come in close touch during the past week, leaves me no other choice but to set forth the truth as I see it, in other words to confirm every statement made by this English lady and to add a few that are not found in her indictment. And let me state too in passing, that the letters of this courageous gentleman have already done a certain amount of good.

Mafia Practically Cowed.

The Mafia, on the admission of all, is not nearly as daring, as brutal and as indifferent to foreign public opinion as it was a couple of months ago. It is beginning to realize that there are possibilities of foreign intervention and that England has an unpleasant way of stepping in and asking care of people who show an inability to take care of themselves. There are not nearly so many indiscriminate arrests and some of the political prisoners have been vouchsafed the privilege of a public trial. There are fewer assassinations and sudden disappearances. The government has even gone so far as late as to permit post mortem examinations being held over people who die suddenly. This is a great relief to nervous individuals, who object to a Mafia ingredient being added to their coffee or soup. Three or four men can now stand and talk on the street.

Real Cause of Revolution.

In the United States there is a pretty general impression that the revolution of three years ago was the culmination of popular discontent and disgust with monarchical institutions. It may come as a surprise to be told that it was the direct result of a monarchical attempt to purify official life. There was a republican movement smouldering for twenty or thirty years but it was neither widespread or universal even at the moment when Teixeira De Sousa, Don Manuel's premier, sold out his king and treacherously turned over the government to the revolutionaries.

King Carlos signed his own death warrant when he made Franco his premier and gave him a free hand to institute these real reforms, which could have alone saved Portugal from the dangers, which now threaten it from every side. Franco's program was eminently sound and patriotic, his party was genuinely respected and his ministers to a man were upright, honest and able. Corruption was too deep seated however to give up without a struggle. The plot against King Carlos' life was instigated by the monarchists, whom Franco's reforms had thrown out of office. It was these men who forced the young king, immediately after his accession, to dismiss Franco and to appoint in his place the weak and vacillating Ferreira De Amaral. It was their quarrels, plots and counter-plots that reduced the authority of the government to a shadow and made the country ripe for any change.

Manuel Was Overruled And Betrayed.

Foreigners, who have lived in Lisbon for many years, are unanimous in declaring that the young king was honestly desirous of serving his country and of promoting its happiness and prosperity but that his personal policy was over-ruled by the Queen-mother and by the men who later betrayed him. He was young and inexperienced and after Franco's dismissal did not have a single patriotic and high minded statesman to whom he could turn for guidance in the difficulties and perplexities confronting him. A very well known and highly respected foreign diplomat assures me that these stories, reflecting upon his private character, which have appeared from time to time in the American press, had no foundation in fact. He was a Bourbon with the usual Bourbon ineptitude but he was neither a degenerate nor a weakling. Under fairer auspices he might have made a first class king, as kings go, and he will probably get a chance before many moons to show what manner of kingly stuff there is in him.

The present republic on the confession of its supporters is surely doomed. The leaders of the Carbonari have already begun to quarrel among themselves. But there are other reasons. Yesterday in one of the public squares I saw a group of children who were being led around by their teachers. Each child bore a little bannerette on which was inscribed, "No king, no God." These are some of the things that have made the republic a horror and a nightmare, perhaps the most hideous thing of its kind in the history of modern governments.—New World.

Priest Murdered By Chinese Fanatics

Father Francis Barnat of San Francisco, a missionary, met death at the hands of Chinese fanatics in a remote region of the North Szechuan on June 13 last, according to mail advices which reached here recently. The message stated that Father Barnat and a servant were travelling in Szechuan, when they were attacked by members of the Chinese Society of the Elder Brothers, a dreaded confederation of Chinese, that had opposed the march of Christianity in the Orient by murder and mutilation.

Both the missionary and the servant were killed. The tragedy occurred on the day of the Feast of St. Anthony, and on the same date, just a year ago, another priest of the Order, Father Peter Lang, gave up his life in the same manner at the hands of members of the Chinese organization. Father Barnat was a native of Barcelona, Spain. He entered upon his missionary work in China five years ago.

Child Labor.

In the course of an address, delivered at Offenbach, Germany, in 1893, Bishop Ketteler said of child labor:

"My own observations are in full accord with the statements of Ketteler on the bad effect of factory labor on children. I know right well what arguments are brought forward to excuse it, and I am also aware that even some that are well disposed toward the working classes wish to see child labor tolerated to a certain extent. Children are in duty bound to help their parents in the labors of the house and the field—why debar them from the factory?"

These people forget that there is a vast difference between work at home and work in the factory. Factory work quenches, as it were, the family spirit of the child, and this, as we shall see presently, the greatest danger that threatens the working class in our day. Moreover, it robs the child of the time it should devote to innocent, joyous recreation so necessary at this period of life. Lastly, the factory undermines the bodily and spiritual health of the child. I regard child labor in factories as a monstrous cruelty of our time, a cruelty committed against the child by the spirit of the age and selfishness of parents. I look on it as a slow poisoning of the body and the soul of the child. With the sacrifice of the joys of childhood, with the sacrifice of health, with the sacrifice of innocence, the child is condemned to increase the profits of the entrepreneur and oftentimes to earn bread for parents whose dissolute life has made them incapable of doing so themselves. Hence I rejoice at every word spoken in favor of the workingman's child. Religion in its great love for children can not support the demand for the prohibition of child labor in factories. You my dear workmen, on second the demand most efficaciously by never permitting your children under fourteen years of age to work in a factory.

Convert Benedictines.

The tenderness with which Rome treats the exiles who find her and offer her their all, is well demonstrated by the good news which has reached the communities of Caldey and Milford Haven, who so recently made the repairs with the Church. It is that by special permission of the Holy See, Caldey is to be raised to the ranks of a Benedictine Abbey with a novitiate. It has been placed for ten years under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Mansueti, in whose diocese it stands. For the present, Dom John Chapman and Dom Bobo Jamn will act as superior and novice master respectively, but at the end of a year the Superior Pontiff is going to send back to the community their old founder as the first Abbot of the new Abbey. Dom Alfred Carlyle is studying at Marsden, in Belgium, at present. At the close of twelve months he is to be permitted not only to profess himself a son of St. Benedict, but to be ordained priest and canonically blessed as Abbot of Caldey. Similar good news has reached the Sisters of Milford Haven. For a year they are placed under the guidance of the Princess of Sianbrook Abbey, after which they will be re-entrusted to the spiritual care of Sister Schoenheit, who will then become their Abbess. This generous trust completes the happiness of the new communities.

Government Victory.

The by-election for the House of Commons held in Chateaugay County, Quebec, on Saturday last resulted in the return of Morris, the Conservative candidate, by a majority of 144. Under all the circumstances this is a most signal victory for the Borden Government. This Quebec constituency has elected Liberal members ever since Confederation and the electors are almost seventy per cent French Canadians. On their very face these conditions would strongly argue in favor of the return of the Laurier candidate. The Liberal candidate was Mr. Sydney Fisher, who had been Minister of Agriculture in the Laurier Cabinet, during the whole existence of the Liberal administration. In addition to all these circumstances, Laurier made the fight his own and took an active part in the election campaign, as did all his ablest lieutenants. But all their efforts and devices proved vain; and the Conservative triumphantly carried the election as above stated.

Our Liberal friends entertained very strong hopes of winning the election, and their press left nothing undone in their line to bring about such a result. The leading Liberal newspapers, the Toronto Globe, the Montreal Telegraph, the Halifax Chronicle, as well as our own Patriot declared the election was "fought out on a straight issue between the Liberals and Conservatives." Very well, on this straight issue the Conservatives won a signal victory and the Liberal policy received a humiliating rebuff.

As above stated, Chateaugay has been Liberal since 1867. The majorities have varied considerably in the different elections, being highest in 1896 and lowest in 1911, as the following table shows:

1867 Luther Halton (Lib.)	427
1872 Luther Halton (Lib.)	238
1874 Luther Halton (Lib.)	892
1878 Luther Halton (Lib.)	179
1882 Edward Halton (Lib.)	61
1887 Edward Halton (Lib.)	358
1891 J. P. Brown (Lib.)	98
1896 J. P. Brown (Lib.)	700
1900 J. P. Brown (Lib.)	420
1904 J. P. Brown (Lib.)	464
1908 J. P. Brown (Lib.)	305
1911 J. P. Brown (Lib.)	42

Reports indicate that the vote polled on Saturday was the largest cast by the constituency in any Dominion election. In the riding, as a whole, 80 per cent of the total registered vote was polled; many individual polls cast 95 per cent of their total votes, and in one poll with a list of 127 all voted but 2. This goes to show how much interest was taken in the contest and gives a very full expression of the opinion of the electorate. The verdict of the electors of Chateaugay is a most important pronouncement of public sentiment, as this was the first by-election since Premier Borden's presentation of the Government's naval aid proposition. The election of Mr. Morris brings the Government majority in the House of Commons up to 49.

Hon. Martin Burrell, Minister of Agriculture, who took a prominent part in the campaign and whose exposition of the Government's policy, did much to put the issues clearly before the electorate, said: "The result of the Chateaugay contest is a matter of unusual importance and significance. Two great questions have divided political parties and engrossed public attention during the past three years, viz: National trade and imperial defence. Mr. Fisher in common with his leader re-affirmed the Liberal party's views on reciprocity and justified the senate action in defeating the naval bill. The verdict of Chateaugay is a crushing reply to Sir Wilfrid's arguments. Coming from a Quebec constituency historically Liberal, the reply is of double importance and will be rightly regarded throughout Canada and the Empire as a timely expression of the national feeling on matters of great national importance. On these two questions and on the agricultural and highways policies of the Government both of extreme interest in a rural constituency, the electors were well informed through public discussion and by means of the press. Mr. Morris whose majority represents the united voices of French and English speaking Canadians, has the high privilege of showing to the country that the races are one in their common devotion to the Empire and in their desire to work out the economic salvation of Canada along the lines laid down by the people two years ago."

An English Opinion.

The financial News, of London, according to a cable through the Central News Cable Service, to Canadian newspapers, deals with the new United States tariff in an interesting article. The Financial News says: "The most interesting feature of President Woodrow Wilson's work is that this gives Canada for practically nothing all that ex-President Taft promised in return for considerable sacrifices which were demanded under the so called reciprocity agreement. Hence those sturdy Canadians were amply justified who argued in 1911 that it was superfluous to make far-reaching concessions which might have an incalculable effect upon those precious ties that bind the Dominion and the Motherland."

Concerning the effect upon current Canadian trade, the News declares that as Canada is not likely to admit American wheat flour free, it is probable that the act will remain a dead letter respecting those items. The market for Canadian lumber in the United States will no doubt be enlarged, but the Canadian prohibition against export of pulpwood will check the expansion of American saw and pulp mills at the expense of the Canadian raw materials. On the other hand Canadian fisheries receive healthy stimulation.

It has been proposed in the U. S. Congress that the first Sunday in June each year shall be established as "Father's Day," and that a rose shall be the sentimental emblem of the festival. The selection of the day may meet the approval of the "old man." A Sunday celebration will not interfere with his work for keeping the other members of the family fed and comfortable. —Montreal Gazette.

The old grandiloquent and flamboyant style has given place to a trenchant, concise form of commercial truth-telling, which is not only far more appropriate but far more convincing. Advertisers, too, have come to recognize the value of white space and margins. Their matter is no longer verbose and crowded. They have reduced the number of words, and now allow illustrations to tell the tale. —Cincinnati Star.

The Sun has proven that the World and the Times do not understand the (currency) measure. The Times has proved that the World and the Sun do not understand it. Let the campaign of education go on.—New York World.

There has not been a Canadian newspaper, whatever its party affiliations, that has failed to approve of Mr. Doherty's action in the Thaw case. The Minister of justice is a politician of the quiet type, but anybody who takes this as indicating any lack of force of character makes a serious mistake. —Edmonton Journal.

The governor of Woodstock jail has been suspended because two of the prisoners to whom keys of the prison were loaned failed to return. Incidents like these shake one's faith in human nature, but it is to be sincerely hoped that the guests will not add to their abuse of hospitality by failing to return the keys. —Vancouver Province.

Swiss dairymen assert that cows will yield a larger quantity of milk if they listen to music during the milking process. A gramophone that could render "The Old Oaken Bucket," "Shall We Gather at the River," "Where the River Shannon Flows," and other aquatic selections ought to be installed in every well equipped dairy. —Vancouver Province.

Taking courage from a preacher college president, who spanked his father, an Illinois minister has undertaken to chastise a newspaper editor. If we had to be thrashed, we suppose a minister might as well do it as anybody, but we don't mind saying it would suit our purpose just as well, and save our feelings, if the case could be submitted to arbitration. —Mail and Empire.

It is significant that the three places in Chateaugay —Ormstown, Chateaugay Basin and St. Martins—in which Sir Wilfrid Laurier spoke, all gave Conservative majorities. The enthusiasm said to have been shown at the Laurier meetings, was largely manufactured, and the thousands carried in by special trains from Montreal and other adjacent points, failed in their object of impressing the electors of Chateaugay with the Liberal Chief's greatness. Sir Wilfrid would have been wise had he retired in 1911, as he said he would if defeated. —Moncton Times.

Reset By Fire And Big Gale Many Die.

London, Oct. 13.—The latest accounts of the disaster to the steamship Voltorno, burned and abandoned in mid-ocean on Friday morning, confirm that the loss of life will be limited to about one hundred and thirty-six. The Carmania, first of the rescuing ships to reach the burning steamer, arrived off Queenstown this morning, but owing to the gale proceeded direct to Fishguard, where she is due to arrive at 11 a.m.

A graphic story by the solitary survivor aboard the Carmania was received by wireless and presents a terrible picture of the horror, the panic and confusion aboard the burning liner. Walter Trintepohl, a German who tells the story, however, is clearly suffering from the stress of illness and awful experiences, and his story is too incoherent to be accepted in every detail. Most important, if true, is that two boats got away from the Voltorno. According to other accounts, Captain Inch was the last to leave his vessel, which was still burning last Friday night, and was a danger to navigation.

Forty of the one hundred and thirty-six persons lost from the steamship Voltorno in mid-Atlantic were in the two boats which succeeded in getting away from the burning vessel and which without doubt were swamped. The majority of the other victims lost their lives when four other boats were smashed against the steamer's sides in an attempt to launch them.

All this occurred before the arrival of the Carmania, and the other liners summoned by wireless calls for help. The Carmania, with one lone survivor of the Voltorno aboard, found it too rough to stop at Queenstown and is proceeding direct to Fishguard. From the survivor however comes a thrilling story of the burning of the steamer, of the terror of the struggle for the boats the death of those who went over the sides and his own desperate struggle for life.

Arthur Spurgeon, a passenger on the Carmania, in a wireless message, supplemented his own description of the race of the Carmania to the burning vessel and the rescue of the passengers of the Voltorno by the story told him by the survivor, Walter Trintepohl, a German who swam to the Carmania and was rescued in an exhausted condition. Since being taken aboard the Carmania, Trintepohl has been in the ship's hospital, threatened with pneumonia. He told his story to Mr. Spurgeon before he became seriously ill, but owing to his exhausted state and his broken English, his account of the disaster was somewhat incoherent.

Trintepohl had been employed at Barcelona and took third class passage on the Voltorno, to secure a position offered to him in New York.

"All went well," said Trintepohl, "until six o'clock Thursday morning, when the fire alarm sounded. We were aroused and told to go on deck, as fire had broken out in the hold. As we assembled life belts were handed around, and much time was occupied in fastening them. We were told that the fire might soon be quenched, but the captain thought it wise to have belts as a precaution.

"The fire frightened the children, who cried bitterly. There were many babies in arms.

"The fire grew worse. We saw things blazing down below. At about ten o'clock there was a cry to lower the boats.

"The captain behaved splendidly. So did the officers, who were English, I am sorry to say that the crew who were Germans and Belgians, behaved very badly. The people rushed about wildly and the crew seemed to think they ought to get first place, and instead of quieting the passengers they made the panic worse.

Massachusetts Politics Badly Mixed At Present.

Boston, Oct. 6.—Massachusetts politics continue in a mixed state, but not quite as much so as in New York, where the Republicans, Wilson, Bryan and Silk Stooking Democrats, Silver Democrats, Hearst men, Bull Mooses, Socialists and Fusionists are out to do up Tammany Hall in November. The impeachment of Sulzer, ex Tammanyite, is expected to hurt Murphy's candidature for mayor seriously and with the Croker influence at least neutral, if not with Sulzer, Tammany's enemies expect to throw that corrupt organization.

In this state the Republicans are hopelessly split, and the Democrats are by no means united, as the Washington administration is opposed to the Boston ring, headed by Mayor Fitzgerald and Martin M. Lomasney, the West end boss. Gov. Foss formerly a Republican, nominally a Democrat, but really an Independent, he of Canadian reciprocity fame, is expected to go to the polls next month for reelection on an anti-trades union, anti New Haven railroad platform, and lock horns with Congressman Gardner, regular and radical Republican and Progressive League (Roosevelt) candidate.

Many unbiased and many biased folks suggest that Foss may win again but the situation is so complicated that the politicians themselves are not only at sea but are lost in a fog.

Although Boston's Tammany objects to Edmond Billings, a native of St. George, Nfld, for the post of collector of customs here, it seems to be a certainty that President Wilson will nominate him within a few days.

PSALM XXVI.

DOMINUS ILLUMINATIO.

DAVID'S FAITH AND HOPE IN G. D.

(Written for the Catholic Bulletin by Helen Hughes Hielcher)

The Lord gave light unto my path. Why should I fear the slender's wrath?

And when the master lends me aid, Of whom, thou shouldst I be afraid!

Thou wicket rash my flesh to eat, But stumbling fall before my feet, Though battled hosts should threaten me,

Unshaken were my trust in Thee.

Oas thing I pray for earnestly— That I may ever dwell with Thee Within Thy house and all my days Thy temple seek with prayer and praise.

For Thou dost hide me in Thy tent When raging foes would round me pent.

And placed me on a rocky brow— I see the foe beneath me now.

A song unto Thee I will bring, Thy praises in the temple sing.

Hear, Lord, the voice that calls on Thee, And show Thy mercy unto me;

My heart hath bid me seek Thy face, I plead to Thee, O Lord for grace.

Be Thou my help, forsake me not, Though nearest kin have me forgot.

Set Thou my feet within Thy way, Nor to my enemies betray.

For false accusers blight my name; And shame itself hath led to shame.

But I will hope in Thine own place To see Thy glory face to face.

The Last Redoubt.

He lived at San Pedro opposite the Laguna de la Madre beyond which lay Padre Island and the Gulf of Mexico. All around stretched wild, uncultivated and sparsely settled country. Often for weeks they saw no one from their own world. One long ago when he was about seven years old, a priest had come all the way on horseback from San Antonio, and had baptized him and his twin brother and two other sisters. After that perhaps a half dozen times the devoted priest had found his way to this wilder spot, had said Mass and had catechized the children. Those were happy days for his mother. Even now, after the lapse of years, he remembered how the Father had complimented her because she had so carefully taught her children the faith.

But this was long ago. He was a man now, surely—almost thirty—and with a man's interest in the stirring affairs of his country. For there were rumors of war, and he felt who once a week rode on his stout little burro to the nearest post office, miles away to get the weekly news paper. It was a New York paper, the Sun, and the news was old by the time it reached them, but how eagerly they spread out the sheets on the kitchen table in the evening and how intently they pored over it. Usually it was father who read aloud to them, while mother sat with the basket of sewing and mending that never seemed to end.

Then in March came the exciting news that General Taylor had advanced into the disputed country between Mexico and the Rio Grande. It was a barefooted boy who brought the information. He had come on his burro all the way from Corpus Christi riding as hard as he could, stopping only at the scattered cabins and farms to eat and sleep. Later they heard that Taylor had reached the Rio Grande, and was accompanied with his valiant little army opposite Matamoros. On the 13th of May, 1846, war was formally declared between the United States and Mexico and this was followed by a call for 50,000 volunteers.

After that events moved rapidly. Two men on horseback, authorized by the commanding general, appeared at San Pedro looking for recruits. The father was the first one to be enrolled. Of New Hampshire stock and of Irish descent, he had drifted south in early manhood, had married a young Scotch wife and had lived at San Pedro ever since. But he had brought with him the traditions of his emigre grandfather, a sturdy Irishman of giant stature who had fought through the Revolution for his adopted country. For proof he had the very soldier's suit worn and the drum that had been carried by his gallant forebear the first American Peargus Cullen, for whom he had been named. Proudly he showed the recruiting sergeants his revolutionary relics, and then he called his sons.

"Michael will go with me," he said, "and Cormac must stay here to take care of his mother." But the boy started forward. "Let me go too," he pleaded "O father!" The sergeant scolded his appeal. "We want all the men we can get," he said. "The other few, recruit in this reason as strong and as able to fight as your sons."

But Peargus Cullen had made up his mind.

"No," he said, "the boy must stay. If Cormac goes too his mother will be alone. My two daughters are married and are gone to other homes far from here. One son goes with me to the service of our country, the other stays here to till the farm and take care of his mother. This is just."

Cormac listened and acquiesced. His father was right, but perhaps his turn would come.

But before he went away Peargus Cullen called the boy to him, and there, spread out on the broad kitchen table, was the coat and cap, the drum and knapsack built worn by his grandfather, the first Peargus, whose name signified man strength or strong man.

"I am leaving these behind," his father said. "They are for you, Cormac. If you have the chance to wear them remember that your grandfather sowed his adopted country to the death. Here is the bullet hole just over his heart that killed him, and here (opening the coat where there was a dark brown stain) is the blood he shed for the stars and stripes."

"I'll remember," said Cormac.

After that there were hurried preparations. Cormac stood with his mother by the gate, watching his father and brother marching proudly down the road until they were lost to sight in a cloud of dust.

There followed long lonely days and weeks when the boy did his best to cheer and comfort his mother who visibly drooped after the departure of her husband. Often he wished his sisters were at home, but they were too far away to be summoned, especially in the present unsettled state of southern Texas.

At night when his mother had retired early Cormac took his boat and rowed out on the Laguna. Sometimes gazing up at the blue dome studded with stars, overhead, he felt as if he were canopied by a great blue flag pierced by the stars of hope and courage and endeavor. For the boy yearned passionately to do some great and noble deed for his country. Meanwhile he was daily being provided in courage, endurance and love through the little things that strengthened and rounded out his character.

They heard of the battle of Monterrey in September, 1846, and then stray news reached them from time to time until in February, 1847, came the battle of Buena Vista. In December, 1846, a volunteer from a farm some six miles away was invalided home, and brought Mary Cullen word that her husband and son were well. There had been no time to write letters, but the news, scanty as it was, cheered and reassured them. Surely the war would soon be over!

It was toward the middle of March that Cormac crossing a field to the house for the midday meal, saw a figure on a burro coming down the road. With a joyful exclamation he recognized the priest, Father Martin, who had baptized him ten years ago, and who once in every two years found his way to the scattered Catholics of that lonely region. He ran to the house to tell his mother. Her worn face lit up with joy as, accompanied by Cormac, she hastened to the road to bid her guest welcome. Then followed a happy day and evening for the priest had the latest news to relate about the war which he thought could not last much longer. "Scott has begun to land his forces near Vera Cruz, and is going to advance on Mexico," he said, "and Perry is sailing south with a strong sea force."

Mary Cullen listened, the while Cormac, mounted on his stout little burro, was scouring the country for miles around to notify the Catholics, about fifteen or twenty in all, that there would be Mass early the next morning at their house. On his way home he stopped at the post office and received a letter for his mother from one of his sisters and the weekly paper from New York. On opening the paper he found it contained the first accounts of the battle of Buena Vista, and from habit he ran his eye down the column of killed and wounded. And then the boy stopped, with a cry he could not suppress. There were the words that meant so much to him and his mother. Peargus Cullen, private, Company C—Infantry, killed in action.

"God help my mother," said Cormac. Then remembering that he was fatherless the boy wept.

There was no mention of his brother, though he searched for the name Michael Scott Cullen. He, therefore, was presumably still alive and well.

It was at sunset that he resighed home. The Father was walking up and down the field at the west side of the house, while Mary Cullen prepared the evening meal. Afterwards Cormac remembered the golden glory of the sunset and the light over the Laguna; almost it seemed to him that the gates of Paradise were wide open that night to show some of the celestial radiance to flood the storm-tossed world without.

He beckoned the Father to him and briefly told him the news. "You'll tell her, Father?" he said.

And he priest that lived only to bless and comfort and heal, assented. "Later, my son," he said. "She is busy now and tired. After her evening work is done leave her with me, and I will break the news."

Cormac stole little and talked less. His mother on seeing his preoccupation thought he was thinking of his confession and Communion on the morrow, so she devoted herself to talking to the priest. Very gently he led her out of doors about seven o'clock when her work was done, and pointed out to her the dying rays of the sunset splendor in the West.

Then very slowly and gently he broke the news to her. She made no outcry, but with a moan she pressed her hand to her heart. Agonizing physical pain had come to deaden the pain of love bereft. It was only a moment after that the priest called Cormac, and together they worked to restore her. But for her the call had come and her work was done. The Gate of Paradise was wide open to receive her. Was it not good to die thus, in that lonely wilderness, with the "Absolve te" sounding in her ears?

And so it was a Requiem Mass the next morning, and afterwards they laid her away in sight and sound of the sea that had so often recalled the far off South-west coast of her youth. And then Cormac was alone.

He came out of his room the next morning, a quiet figure clad in his grandfather's blue army suit and a blue drum slung over one shoulder, the cap held in his hand.

"I am going to fight for my country, Father," he said.

"I knew you would, my son. God bless you."

And then a thought struck the priest. "It will be a long, long journey by land," he said. "Why not first take your boat and row out into the Gulf? Perry and his fleet are to pass here some time tomorrow, beyond Vera Cruz. It is possible he would pick you up."

To this Cormac assented. He would try, and if not successful, he would come back and go over land to Vera Cruz.

The kindhearted priest stayed with him while he put things away and made up a bundle for his knapsack, and when all was done they retired for the night. They were up at half past three, and by four they had eaten their simple meal. Then the boy looked the front door and gave the key to the older man, who was to leave it at the nearest farmhouse where friends lived.

The priest wrung Cormac's hand again and again. "Courage," he said. "Remember, my son, that your name is Cullen, or young warrior; it is the ancient Irish of Cullin."

The boy's eyes kindled. "I am glad," he said simply that I can be a warrior now."

"A brave warrior, Cormac, and true—true to God, true to your country—true now good, and may Heaven bless you!"

They were on the shore and with a final blessing and handclasp Cormac stepped into his boat, and bent to oars and presently he was far on on the Laguna. And the good priest turned away, and his eyes were moist. His work here was done—the seed planted by a good Catholic mother, and watered by himself, had borne fruit. What would the final result be?

He rowed north of Padre Island out into the Gulf, and then, familiar with the sea from boyhood, he held his oars and hoisted a sail and the little boat flew before the wind and the soft breeze and early morning sun brought him a measure of comfort. He was young he was going to the fulfillment of his heart's desire. And his dear father and mother—were they not in that "place of refreshment, light and peace" where pain and parting are no more?

Perhaps it was about five o'clock, or later that his keen dark eyes spied far off the outline of a ship. Distantly he began to look in that direction. What the priest had thought probably came to pass. He was seen, suspected of being a Mexican spy, and promptly taken on board the first ship of the line. Brought before Commodore Perry, he speedily won his way to that hero's good graces and permission to remain on the ship and continue the voyage on to Vera Cruz was readily given. On the 23rd of March he participated

Face To Face WITH A Serious Problem.

BAD WATER WAS THE CAUSE.

Mrs. EDWARD KINGSTON, Mirror, Alta., writes:—"Coming to the Northwest from B. C., in the summer of 1910, we were face to face with the serious problem of being able to secure good drinking water; this we could not get, so were obliged to drink water containing a great deal of alkali, with the result that we were all troubled with Diarrhea. Fortunately, we had a bottle of Dr. Fowler's EXTRACT OF WILD STRAWBERRY in the house which soon relieved our sufferings. I have always kept a bottle in the house since obtaining such beneficial results from its use when my boy as a baby was similarly troubled. It has always proved a friend in need."

There are many imitations of "Dr. Fowler's". When you ask for the well-known article, insist on being given it. It has been on the market for over sixty years, and has always given the greatest satisfaction. It cures when all others fail.

with Perry and Scott in the bombardment of Vera Cruz and on the 29th with the victorious Americans, he entered the city.

One of his first acts on being granted a few hours' liberty to roam where he would, was to visit the Cathedral. Often as he had heard choruses and Cathedrals described by his mother, this was the first time he had ever been into a place of worship. The nearest church to his home was St. Antonio, whether he had never been. For some time he knelt in the dim Cathedral, absorbed in prayer for his father and mother. Then curiously but reverently he made the circuit of the altar, recognizing the different shrines and altars, all just as his mother had described them.
